PERIL AND PRIVATION.

BY JAMES PAYN.

THE WRECK OF THE "JUNO."

OF all the sufferers from shipwrecks, women are the most to be pitied; for children do not know the full extent of their danger until death relieves them, while women usually overestimate it. Their mental agonies are therefore greater than those endured by men, while their physical privations are as great, without the same strength to bear them.

Mrs. Bremner, wife of the Captain of the Juno, bound from Rangoon to Madras, had perhaps as terrible an experience of shipwreck as ever fell to the lot of any of her sex. The ship's crew consisted chiefly of Lascars, with a few Europeans, among whom was John Mackay, the second mate, who tells this story.

Soon after the Juno set sail she sprang a leak, which increased more and more on account of the sand ballast choking the pumps, until on the twelfth evening she settled down. From the sudden jerk all imagined they were going to the bottom, but she only sank low enough to bring the upper deck just under water.

All hands scrambled up the rigging to escape instant destruction, "moving gradually upward as each succeeding wave buried the ship still deeper. The Captain and his wife, Mr. Wade and myself, with a few others, got into the mizzen-top. The rest clung about the mizzen-rigging.

"ALL HANDS SCRAMBLED UP THE RIGGING."

Mrs. Bremner complained much of cold, having no covering but a couple of thin under-garments, and as I happened to be better clothed than her husband, I pulled off my jacket and gave it her."

On the first occurrence of these calamities such selfishness is not uncommon: it is the continuous privation which tries poor human nature. But it must be said to John Mackay's credit that he behaved most unselfishly throughout, and stood by this poor woman like a man.

The ship rocked so violently that the people could hardly hold on, and though excessive fatigue brought slumber to some eyes, Mr. Mackay did not snatch a wink. "I could not," he says, "sufficiently compose myself, but listened all night long for a gun, several times imagining I heard one; and whenever I mentioned this to my companions, each one fancied he heard it too." It is noteworthy that the same thing happened throughout the calamity as to seeing land. When one would imagine that he saw it, the others were persuaded that they saw it too.

The prospect at dawn was frightful; a tremendous gale; the sea running mountains high; the upper parts of the hull going to pieces, and the rigging giving way that supported the masts to which seventy-two wretched creatures were clinging.

After three days, during which their numbers were much diminished, the pangs of hunger became intolerable. "I tried to doze away the hours and to induce insensibility. The useless complaining of my fellow-sufferers provoked me, and, instead of sympathizing, I was angry at being disturbed by them." He had read of similar scenes, and his dread of what might be was at first more painful than his actual sufferings. Presently, however, he learned by bitter experience that imagination falls short of reality.

For the first three days the weather was cold and cloudy, but on the fourth the wind lowered, and they found themselves exposed to the racking heat of a powerful sun. Mackay's agonies, especially his sufferings from thirst, then became terrible. The only relief from them was afforded by dipping a flannel waistcoat which he wore next his skin from time to time in the sea. He writes, however, that he always "found a secret satisfaction in every effort I made for the preservation of my life." On the fifth day the first two persons died of actual starvation, their end being attended by sufferings which had a most sorrowful effect on the survivors.

As the sea was now smooth, an attempt was made to fit out a raft (the boats having been rendered useless), but this being insufficient to contain the whole crew, the stronger beat off the weaker. Though Mackay succeeded in getting on board, Mrs. Bremner did not, and he asked to be put back again, which was readily done. He resumed his place by her in the mizzen-top. Her husband had by this time lost his wits, and would not even answer when addressed. "At first the sight of his wife's distress seemed to give him pain as having been the cause of her sufferings, and he avoided her; but now he would barely permit her to quit his arms, so that they were sometimes even obliged to use force to rescue her from his embraces." His frenzy (as often happens in such cases) took the form of seeing an imaginary feast, and wildly demanding to be helped to this or that dish. On the twelfth day he died, and it was with the utmost difficulty that they threw the body into the sea, after stripping off a portion of his clothing for his wife's use.

There were two boys on board the Junio, who were among the earliest victims. Their fathers were both in the foretop, and heard of their sons' illness from those below. One of them—it was the thirteenth day of their misery—answered with indifference that he "could do nothing" for his son. The other hurried down as well as he could, and, "watching a favorable moment, scrambled on all fours along the weather gunwale to his child, who was in the mizzen-rigging. By that time only three or four planks of the quarter-deck remained, and to them he led the boy, making him fast to the rail to prevent his being washed away. Whenever the lad was seized with a fit of sickness, the father lifted him up and wiped away the foam from his lips, and if a shower came, he made him open his mouth and receive the drops, or gently squeezed them into it from a rag. In this terrible situation both remained five days, until the boy expired. The unfortunate parent, as if unwilling to believe the fact, raised the body, looked wistfully at it, and when he could no longer entertain any doubt, watched it in silence until it was carried off by the sea. Then, wrapping himself in a piece of canvas, he sank down and rose no more, though he must have lived—as we judged from the quivering of his limbs when a wave broke over him—a few days longer." In all the annals of shipwreck I know no more pathetic picture than this.

But for showers of rain all would have been dead long since. They had no means of catching the drops save by spreading out their clothes, which were so wet with salt-water that at first it tainted the fresh. Mackay, however, before these timely supplies arrived, had had a very unusual experience. Maddened by the fever which consumed him, and in spite of the ill consequences he expected to happen, he had gone down and drank two quarts of sea-water. "To my great astonishment, though this relaxed me violently, it revived both my strength and spirits. I got a sound sleep, and my animal heat abated." Another expedient for getting some moisture into their mouths was to chew canvas or even lead. Shoes they had none, as leather dressed in India is rendered useless by water, and Lascars never use any shoes. There were, indeed, some bits of leather about the rigging, but the smell and taste of it were found "too disagreeable to be endured." The rains and their fatigue made them very cold at night. In the morning, as the heat increased, "we exposed first one side and then the other to it, until our limbs became pliant; and as our spirits revived, we indulged in conversation, which sometimes even became cheerful. But as mid-day approached, the scorching rays renewed our torments, and we wondered how we could have wished the rain to cease."

It must be understood that the ship, though its hull was under water, was moving on all this time. On July the 10th, being the twentieth day from its partial sinking, one of the people, as had often before happened, cried out, "Land!" His cry was now heard without emotion, though, "on raising my head a few minutes afterward," says Mackay, "I saw many eyes turned in the direction indicated." Mrs. Bremner inquired of him whether he thought it might be the coast of Coromandel, which seemed to him so ridiculous that he answered that if it was, "they ought to be exhibited as enriosisies in the Long Room at Madras under the pictures of Cornwallis and Meadows."

It was, however, really the land, though they had small chance of reaching it. Indeed, before evening, the ship, under water as it already was, struck on a rock. The tide having fallen, the remaining beams of the upper deck were left bare, and Mackay and the gunner tried to get Mrs. Bremner down to them, "but she was too weak to help herself, and we had not strength to carry her." The Lascars—for the raft had come back with them, as it could make no headway—offered to help if she gave them money. She happened to have thirty rupees about her, which was afterward of great use, and she did not stint it in helping her preservers. They brought her down for eight rupees, and insisted on being paid on the spot. With that exception, it is pleasant to read that their conduct was excellent throughout, and their behavior to Mrs. Bremner singularly kind and delicate.

In the gun-room, which they could now reach through a hole in the deck, were found some cocoa-nuts, which one would have expected the finders to retain. On the contrary, they shared them, and insisted only upon keeping the milk in the nuts. This consisted of only a few drops of rancid oil; nor had the solid part of the cocoa-nuts—a fact to be remembered by those who buy them out of barrows—the least nourishment in it. They found themselves rather worse than better for eating them.

They were past the worst pains of hunger by this time, but the frenzied desire for water still continued. "Water, fresh-water," says Mackay, "was what perpetually haunted my imagination; not a short draught which I could gulp down in a moment—of that I could not endure the thought—but a large bowlful, such as I could hardly hold in my arms. When I thought of victuals, I only longed for such as I could swallow at once without the trouble of chewing."

Hope now began to animate them, and though it was the twenty-first day of their sufferings, it is noteworthy that no one died after they first saw land. Toward evening six of the stoutest Lascars, though indeed they were all shadows, tied themselves to spars, and reached the shore. They found a stream of fresh-water, of which those on board could "see them drinking their fill." In the morning they beheld these men surrounded by natives, and were all attention to see what sort of treatment they met with. The natives "immediately kindled a fire, which we rightly concluded was for dressing rice, and then came down to the water's edge, waving handkerchiefs to us as a signal that we should come ashore. To describe our emotions at that moment is impossible."

But these poor folks could not get on shore, and least of all the poor woman. Boats there were none, and if there had been, there was such a surf between the ship and the land that no boat could live in it. But to remain was certain death. "I felt myself called upon," says Mackay, "to make the attempt." With great difficulty he got out a spar and tied it to him with a rope. He then took leave of Mrs. Bremner, who was of course utterly helpless. "She dismissed me with a thousand good wishes for my safety." While they were speaking, the spar broke loose, and floated away. He paused one moment, then plunged into the sea. Though he could "hardly move a joint" before, his limbs immediately became lumber in the water, and the spar helped to sustain him; but "being a perfect square, it turned round with every motion of the water, and rolled me under it." Eventually, however, a tremendous wave carried him to land.

Some natives, speaking in the Moorish tongue—"at which I was overjoyed, for I feared we were beyond the Company's territories, and in those of the King of Ava"—observing his ineffectual efforts to rise, laid hold of him and bore him along. As they passed a little stream he made signs to be set down. "I immediately fell on my face in the water and began to gulp it down." His bearers finally dragged him away lest he should drink too much. They took him to a fire, round which the Lascars were sitting, and gave him some boiled rice, "but after chewing it a little I found I could not swallow it." One of the natives, seeing his distress, dashed some water in his face, which, washing the rice down, almost choked him, but "caused such an exertion of the muscles that I recovered the power of swallowing. For some time, however, I was obliged to take a mouthful of water with every one of rice. My lips and the inside of my mouth were so cracked with the heat that every motion of my jaws set them a-bleeding and gave me great pain."

As soon as he was a little recovered, his first care was for Mrs. Bremner, and on pointing out that she had some money about her, the natives were persuaded to take her off the ship. This was accomplished only a few hours before it parted in two. She was totally unable to walk, but her remaining rupees, joined to liberal promises, to be performed on her reaching her journey's end, procured her a litter, in which she was conveyed to Chittagong.

No woman probably ever went through such an experience and survived it as this unhappy lady. Mackay, having no money—for Mrs. Bremner had no more to give him—had to walk, and speedily broke down. The natives left him behind without a scruple. He fell in, however, with a party of Mugs, the chief of whom was full of human kindness. He washed Mackay's wounds, which were filled with sand and dirt, supplied him with rice, and endeavored to teach him how to make fire by rubbing two pieces of bamboo together. Mackay finally arrived at Chittagong, though in a pitiable condition.

In a postscript to this miserable story he says, "With respect to the fate of my companions in misfortune, Mrs. Bremner, having recovered her health and spirits, was afterward well married." So it seems that with time and courage one really does get over almost everything.

BUSY BIRDS.

BY MARCIA BRADBURY JORDAN.

A BROAD green marsh, with sullen pools
Of brackish water here and there,
With mounds of hay on wooden piles,
And squares of yellow flowers like tiles,
And swamp-rosemary everywhere.

The straight road stretches, gray with dust,
From distant pine-trees to the hill;
The warm breath of an autumn day
Prevails, and with its languid sway
Keeps every little song-bird still.

But all along the wire line
That telegrams unnumbered brings,
Small chirping birds are perched secure,
With down-bent head and mien demure,
And gray-brown tightly folded wings.

And do you ask, dear girls and boys,
What calls these flutterers from home,
Why restlessly they care to roam
Far from the foliage-guarded nest?
A new idea has come to me;
I wonder if you will agree
To what I'm going to suggest.

When in some quite mysterious way
A trifling fault strikes mamma's ears,
I'm confident you must have heard
Of that communicative bird
Who's always telling all he hears.

A little bird told me, she says,
Of what I never should suspect.
Suppose these listening songsters light
Upon the wires there in sight
To get the latest news direct!

If they're the gossips of bird-land,
Reporters for the "Night-hawk Press,"
Then very likely they indulge
In other meddling, and divulge
The tiny secrets so few guess.

They hover near the open door
In summer; past the eaves they dart,
And very likely understand
When any hidden mischief's planned,
And straightway hasten to impart,

To those they think it may concern,
Their interesting items. Why,
I seem to see their bright eyes shine,
Their cunning heads sidwavs incline
Inquisitively, full of joy.

The only way I know is this—
To always try to do so well
That when the busy birds appear
To carry secrets through the air,
They won't have anything to tell
Except those messages that bless
Obedience and truthfulness.

A LITTLE PHILOSOPHER.

BY MRS. JOHN LILLIE,

AUTHOR OF "MILDRED'S BARGAIN," "AUNT RUTH'S TEMPTATION," ETC.

CHAPTER III.

NAN'S visitor, Miss Rolf, left the little shop, and walked away in the winter's dusk up the main street, and down one of the more secluded streets, where the "upper ten" of Bromfield lived. Bromfield was a large dull town, full of factories and smoke, and had a general air of business and money-making. The houses on the pretty street to which Miss Rolf directed her steps seemed to be shut away from all the dust and noise of the town, and Mrs. Grange's gateway was the finest and most aristocratic-looking one in the row. Miss Rolf went in at the gate, past a pretty lawn dotted with cedars, to the side entrance of a long low stone house, within the windows of which lights were already twinkling. She had a curious, amused smile on her face as she went down the hall, and it had not faded when she entered the parlor fronting the garden and the lawn.

Three people were seated in the fire-light—an elderly lady with a pale sweet face, a tall boy of fifteen, and a gentleman whose face was like Miss Rolf's in regularity of feature, but much softer in expression.

In the luxurious room Miss Rolf looked much more in her place than in Mr. Rupert's butter shop, and if Nan could have seen her "second cousin Phyllis" there, she would have been more than ever certain that she belonged to those who had the money.

Miss Rolf was greeted by all three occupants of the room at once.

"Well, Phyllis?"—from the gentleman.

"Did you see her?"—this from the boy.

"Well, what happened?"—this from the lady.

Miss Rolf sank into one of the many easy-chairs, and, leaning back, began to draw off her long gloves.

"Yes, I saw her," she answered, smiling.

"It was really very interesting. Quite like something in a story. There was the horrible little store, and Mrs. Rupert, a vulgar sort of woman; and then the little girl came in—dreadfully untidy and dowdy-looking, but really not at all so common as I feared. She has the hazel eyes every one admired so in her father."

"And did you tell her that her aunt Letitia wants her to go to Beverley?" said the boy, eagerly.

"No, I didn't," rejoined Miss Rolf. "I thought I'd do that when I went to-morrow. There was no time to discuss the matter. Besides, I wanted to see the child alone first."

"Why not send for her to come here?" Mrs. Grange said, gently.

"Not a bad idea," said Miss Rolf, sitting upright. "She might come to-morrow, instead of my going there."

"I can't help thinking Letitia will regret it," said the gentleman, who was Miss Rolf's father.

"Why should she, papa?" said the boy, quickly. "Surely it is only fair. Her father was left out of Cousin Harris's will just for a mere caprice, and why should Cousin Letty have everything, and this child nothing? I don't see the justice of that."

"But to remove her from a low condition; to place her among people she never knew—I am afraid it is unwise," said Mr. Rolf, shaking his head. "You don't understand it, Lance; I don't expect you to. Just wait, and see my words come true."

Lance, or Lancelot Rolf, laughed brightly. He seemed quite prepared to take the risks on Miss Letitia Rolf's venture. While Miss Rolf wrote her letter to little Nan, the boy watched her earnestly. He was intensely interested in this new-found cousin, and, had he known where to go, would certainly have paid a visit to the cheese-monger's family himself.

He would have found an excited little party had he done so, for by eight o'clock Mrs. Rupert had indulged in every possible speculation about Nan's future. Mr. Rupert, a tall, thin, weather-beaten man, had come in for tea, and was told of the visitor, and obliged to hear all Mrs. Rupert's ideas and hopes on the subject, while Nan herself was the only quiet member of the party. She sat at the tea-table, for once in her life very quiet and repressed. Just what she hoped or thought she could not have told you; but it seemed to her as if something like her old life with her parents might be coming back. Could it be she was to go away, and leave Bromfield, the cheeses and butter and eggs, her aunt's loud voice, Marian's little airs of superiority, and Phil's rough kindness, forever behind her?

"Come, Nan, you may as well help with the tea-things, if you are going to see your rich relations," said her aunt's voice, sharply recalling her to her duties, and Marian laughed scornfully.

"I don't suppose we'll know Nan, or she us, by to-morrow night," she said, with a shrug of the shoulders.

Early the next morning a man-servant from Mrs. Grange's brought a note for Nan, which she read in the little untidy parlor, surrounded by all the family. It was from Miss Rolf, requesting Nan to come as soon as possible to Mrs. Grange's house, and it produced a new flutter in the household. Nan was dressed by Mrs. Rupert and Marian in everything that either of the girls' scanty wardrobe possessed worth putting on for such a visit. Had she but known it, a much simpler toilet would have been far more appropriate and becoming, for her purple merino dress and Marian's red silk neck-tie, her "best" hat with its green feathers, and Mrs. Rupert's soiled lavender kid gloves, were a very dreadful combination. Nan, as she walked up Main Street, did not feel entirely satisfied with the costume herself. If her head had not been so dazed by what the Ruperts already called her "good fortune," she would have felt it all more keenly. As it was, she went into Mrs. Grange's gateway feeling herself in a dream, and wondering how and where she would wake up.

CHAPTER IV.

NAN was admitted by a very grave-looking man-servant, who, on hearing her name, led her down the softly carpeted hall, and upstairs to the door of a cozy little sitting-room, where Miss Rolf was waiting for her. The many luxuries of the room, its brightness and air of refinement, made Nan half afraid to go farther, and suddenly she seemed to feel the vulgarity of her own dress; but her "second cousin," Miss Rolf, smiled very pleasantly upon her from the window, and coming up to the little girl, kissed her affectionately.

Miss Rolf in the morning light, and in a long dress of pale gray woollen material, looked to Nan like nothing less than a princess. She was apparently about twenty one or two, with a fair face, soft waves of blonde hair, and eyes that looked to Nan like stars, they were so bright, and yet soft with all their sparkle. Nan scarcely noticed the imperious curve of her new cousin's pretty mouth or the disdainful pose of the head. She thought of nothing then but her beauty and grace and charming manners.

"Well, my dear," this dazzling princess said, "take off your hat and cloak, and sit down by the fire. I want to have a talk with you." Nan, very much subdued by everything she saw about her, obeyed, while Miss Rolf seated herself in a low chair, and looked at her little cousin critically.

"Now, Nan," she said, gravely, "do you know that your father would have been a very rich man but for an absurd quarrel with his elder brother?"

"I knew there was something," said Nan, who was afraid of her own voice.

"Well, then," continued Miss Rolf, "when your grandfather died, he left everything to his elder son and daughter. The son, your uncle Harris, is a confirmed invalid—indeed, he is not altogether right in his mind—but your aunt Letitia, your father's older sister, is strong and well, and they live together at Beverley. Miss Letitia has suddenly taken it into her head to hunt you up, and as my father and I were coming here on a visit, she asked me to try and find you."

Miss Rolf paused, and Nan, who sat very still, her hazel eyes fixed on the young lady's face, nodded, and said, in a sort of whisper, "Thank you."

"Your aunt," continued Phyllis, smiling pleasantly, "told me that I was to invite you, in her name, to come on a visit to Beverley. Mind, Nan, don't get it into your head that it is more than a visit—unless you prove so nice and pleasant a little visitor that she will want you to stay always."

Nan's face broke into a smile that made her really pretty.

"I'll try and be pleasant," she said, brightly.

"So you would like to go?" said Miss Phyllis, looking at her earnestly. "Wouldn't you miss—the Ruperts?"

"NAN WAS DRESSED BY MRS. RUPERT AND MARIAN."

Nan's face flushed.

"Yes," she said, looking down, "I shall miss aunt—and Philip."

Miss Phyllis said nothing for a moment. She had more to tell, but she thought it as well not to say it now. She had taken a sudden fancy to Nan; she wanted the child to come to Beverley, and perhaps, if she told her all, Nan would refuse: at least, looking at the child's honest, fearless eyes, she felt it more prudent to say no more. So Nan was told that she was to go, if she liked, in a week, to her grandfather's and her father's old home.

"Your aunt thought," said Miss Phyllis, "that you might need some new clothes. You see, you will have to dress more at her house than here in Bromfield, and so we will take a week to get you ready. Perhaps it would be as well for you to stay here to-day, and go out with me."

Nan's eyes danced. Never but once since she lived in Bromfield had she owned an entirely new dress. Everything she wore had been "made over" from Mrs. Rupert's or Marian's, and she faintly understood that new clothes of Miss Phyllis's buying would be something unthought of in the Rupert mind.

"I'll leave you here a little while, Nan," said the young lady, "and you can amuse yourself with the books and papers."

But Nan needed nothing of the kind. When the door was closed, she uttered a little half-scream of delight, and jumped up, walking over to the window, where she looked out at the dull town lying snooky and hazy in the distance, and which she felt sure she was about to leave forever. She hardly heard Miss Phyllis returning, and felt startled by the sound of her voice, saying, "Nan, are you ready?" And there was the beautiful young lady in her furs and broad-brimmed hat, with a purse and a little notebook in her hand, ready to lead Nan into the first scene of her enchantment.

VENOMOUS SNAKES.

BY W. L. ALDEN.

VENOMOUS snakes are those which have two hollow teeth in the upper jaw through which they inject poison into the wound made by their bite. The great majority of snakes are not venomous, but nevertheless there are more venomous snakes in the world than most men really require.

There are two classes of venomous snakes—those whose bite is certain death, and those whose bite can be cured. The only venomous snake inhabiting Europe is the viper, but its bite is seldom fatal. In the United States, with the possible exception of New Mexico and Arizona, there are only three venomous snakes—the rattlesnake, the copperhead, and the moccasin. All our other snakes are harmless. In some places the copperhead is known as the flat-headed adder, but the other species of snakes, to which the name "adder" is often given by country people, are as harmless as the pretty little garter-snake.

Central and South America have many venomous snakes whose bite is always fatal. Among these the best-known are the coral-snake, the tuboba, and the dama blanca. A British naval vessel, on its way up a South American river a few years ago, anchored for the night, and a number of the officers thought they would go ashore, and sleep in a deserted shanty that stood on the bank, where they fancied that the air would be cooler than it was on board the vessel. When they reached the shanty, one of them said he thought he would go back to the ship, and all the others, with one exception, said that they would follow him. The officer who determined to stay swung his hammock from the beams of the roof, and was soon asleep. He woke early in the morning, and, to his horror, found that three snakes were sleeping on his body, and that others were hanging from the rafters or gliding over the floor. He recognized among them snakes whose bite meant death within an hour or two, and he did not dare to move a finger. He lay in his hammock until the sun grew warm and the snakes glided back to their holes. His companions had noticed that the place looked as if it was infested with snakes, but had cruelly refrained from warning him. The officer was one of the bravest men that ever lived, but he could never speak of his night among the snakes without a shudder.

In one of the West India Islands—Martinique—there is a snake called the lance-headed viper, which is almost as deadly as the coral-snake. The East Indies are full of venomous snakes, and in British India nearly twenty thousand persons are killed every year by snake bites. Of the East Indian snakes whose bite is incurable the cobra is the most numerous, but the diamond snake, the tubora, and the ophiophagus are also the cause of a great many deaths. The British government has offered a large reward for the discovery of an antidote to the poison of the cobra, but no one has yet been able to claim it.

Africa, like all tropical countries, has many species of venomous snakes. The horned cerastes is the snake from whose bite Cleopatra is said to have died, and from its small size, and its habit of burying itself all but its head in the sand, it is peculiarly dreaded by the natives. The ugliest of these snakes is the great puff-adder, which often grows to the length of five or six feet, and whose poison is used by the natives in making poisoned arrows.

It is a very curious fact that the poison of venomous snakes can not be distinguished by the chemist from the white of an egg. And yet one kind of snake poison will produce an effect entirely unlike that produced by another kind. The blood of an animal bitten by a cobra is decomposed and turned into a thin, watery, straw-colored fluid, while the blood of an animal bitten by a coral-snake is solidified, and looks very much like currant jelly. Nevertheless, the poison of the cobra and that of the coral-snake seem to be precisely alike when analyzed by the chemist, and are apparently composed of the same substances in the same proportion as is the white of an egg.

THE TRAIN-BOY'S FORTUNE.

BY ELIOT McCORMICK.

I.

"PAPERS! Harper's Weekly! Bazar! All the monthly magazines!"

Jim Richards wished that he might have a dollar for every time he had repeated that cry. He was sure he had said it, during the three years he had been train-boy on the road between Philadelphia and New York, as many as fifty thousand times. Even ten cents each time would give him five thousand dollars. What could he not do with as much money as that? His mother should have a new dress, for one thing. He would give little Pete for his birthday the box of tin soldiers in the toy-shop window; and Lizzie, for hers, the doll on which her heart was set. Then they would all move into a new house somewhere in the country, instead of their wretched tenement in New York. Jim himself would give up his place as train-boy and go into the company's machine-shop, which he could not do now, because his earnings from the sale of the papers were pretty good, while the machine-shop wages would be for some time small. But these were dreams; the train was approaching Trenton, where Jim would find the New York evening papers, and he had still to go through the last car. It was Saturday evening, and he must make enough to buy his mother's Sunday dinner.

"Papers!" he cried, slamming the door after him, and beginning to lay them one by one in the laps of the passengers. The first passenger was an old gentleman, and in his lap Jim laid a copy of a weekly paper.

"Take it away!" exclaimed the old man. "I don't want it."

Jim, in his hurry, had passed on without hearing.

"What! You won't, eh?" the old man went on, provoked by Jim's seeming inattention. "Then I'll get rid of it myself."

Crumpling it up into a ball, he turned around and threw it violently down the aisle, narrowly missing Jim's head, and landing it in the lap of an old lady on the opposite side.

"You won't lay any more papers in my lap, I guess," he added, shaking his head threateningly as Jim came back.

Jim was angry. He picked up the paper and smoothed it out as well as he could, but it was hopelessly damaged, and no one would think of buying it.

"You'll have to pay me ten cents for that," he exclaimed.

The train was now slackening, and the old gentleman, who was evidently bound for Trenton, had risen from his seat.

"Not a cent," he declared; "not a single cent! You hadn't any business to put it in my lap. I told you not to, but you persisted in leaving it there. Your train-boys are a nuisance. It'll be a lesson to you."

"But I'll have to pay for it myself," cried Jim.

"Serve you right. You'll have ten cents less to spend for cigarettes."

By this time the train had stopped, and the passengers were crowding out. The old man was already on the platform, and Jim was standing by the seat, angrily uncertain whether to follow him out or stay and pick up the few papers he had distributed before returning to the baggage-car. In his moment of uncertainty he happened to look down upon the floor. There in the shadow of the seat lay a long leather pocket-book. No one but the old gentleman could have dropped it. Jim stooped and picked it up. Here was a chance to pay off his venerable friend.

In another instant, though, a better impulse came to him.

"What would mother say?" he thought. He threw down his papers, rushed to the door, jumped from the steps, and ran along the platform through the crowd in pursuit of the old man. In the confusion and darkness it was not easy to find anybody. Jim thought he saw him a little way ahead, but at the same moment the bell rang for the train to start. Should he follow the man or not? There must be time, he thought. In a moment more he had caught up with the person, but it was not his man at all. It was too bad, but he had done his best. He did not know that where he had failed, two other persons—dark-looking men, whom he had noticed getting off the car—had succeeded, and were now following the old gentleman along the passageway that leads up to the street.

Still uncertain what to do, Jim turned around, only to see the train moving off. It was but a few steps back to the track, and Jim ran with all his speed. But when he got there, the rear platform of the last car was a hundred yards away, and all that he could see was the red lantern winking at him, as it seemed, through the darkness.

The train had gone off with all his papers, including those which he had expected to sell between Trenton and New York. There would be no Sunday dinner to-morrow; indeed, Jim would be lucky if he were not discharged from his place.

For a moment Jim was bewildered. Then he bethought himself of the pocket-book. He would, at any rate, find out what was in that, only no one must see him do it.

So he walked down the track until he was quite out of sight, and by the light of a match carefully opened the leather flap. On the inside, in gilt letters, was the owner's name—John G. Vanderpoel, 14 Sycamore Street, Trenton. Jim had no excuse now for not returning it at once.

The sight of the name, though, brought back his anger. "Old screw!" he said, half aloud. "I guess if he'd only known what was going to happen, he'd have paid me my ten cents. Let's see what's in it, anyhow."

The match had gone out, but Jim had another. Striking it, he looked into the pockets, one of which seemed to contain something green. Jim pulled it out with a beating heart. Yes, it was money—a package of greenbacks—and the label on the outside, though Jim's hands shook so that he could hardly make it out, read "$5000."

II.

Not only was Jim ignorant that the old gentleman was being followed, but Mr. Vanderpoel did not know it himself. He walked out of the station with a firm, brisk step, his overcoat tightly buttoned over the place where he supposed his money to be, and congratulating himself that he had at length collected the debt which it represented.

It was not far to his house, which was in a side street, and occupied several lots of ground. A long path led up from the front gate, lined with shrubbery, and lighted only by the pale rays that gleamed from the front door. Alongside of the path stretched a little duck pond. It was a quiet, retired street, and when Mr. Vanderpoel turned into it, he left the crowd behind. He did not leave, however, the two men who had kept him in sight all the way from the station, and who now quickened their steps so that when he stopped at his gate they were not more than a few feet in the rear. Mr. Vanderpoel opened the gate and went in. The gate swung back on its hinges, and was held open by one of the men, while the other entered. Not hearing the latch click, Mr. Vanderpoel turned around, and was met face to face by the intruder.

"Well, what do you want?" he demanded, angrily.

For an answer the old gentleman's arms were promptly seized and pinioned behind his back, and he himself was laid at full length along the garden path.

"Keep still now," hissed a rough voice. "We ain't no idea o' hurtin' ye, but what we want is them five thousand dollars."

It was not the slightest use to struggle. One man held him fast while the other went through his pockets. Presently the first inquired of his partner,

"Where do you s'pose he's hid it?"

If it was the money they were speaking of, Mr. Vanderpoel knew perfectly well where he had hid it. It was, or ought to be, in the very pocket which the man was now searching—the breast pocket of his overcoat—and he waited breathlessly for the man's answer.

"Don't know," growled the thief, after a moment. "Tain't here."

Mr. Vanderpoel almost jumped. If it were not there, where could it be? He had certainly put it in that pocket. He was glad, of course, that the thieves could not find it, but that did not relieve his mind as to its safety. However, if it had already been stolen, or if he had lost it, he could afford to lie still and enjoy what promised to be a humorous situation. Indeed, he felt almost inclined to laugh; and the robbers themselves, it seemed, began to realize that they were the victims of a sell.

"Tain't on him nowhere," gruffly remarked the one who had been making the search.

"Feel in his breeches pocket," suggested the other.

The man transferred his hand from the coat to the trousers without success. "Tain't there neither," he growled. "I don't believe he fetched it to-night."

"There's his shoes," observed the first man, who was evidently the more persevering of the two. "See if it ain't in them."

The other tore open the gaiters and dragged them off. The cold air struck Mr. Vanderpoel's stocking feet very unpleasantly, and filled him with dismal visions of rheumatism and gout; but he bore it bravely, and by a tremendous effort stopped a threatening sneeze.

"I tell yer he ain't got it," declared the first man. "We're left; that's what it is. What 'll we do with the old chap?"

His partner scowled. "Chuck him into the pond."

He chucked into a pond at his time of life, and with his rheumatism! It would be the death of him. The prospect of a ducking loosened his tongue.

"Help! murder! thieves!"

At this moment the gate clicked. Both men heard the sound, and started for the shrubbery at the side of the path. Almost before the old gentleman was aware that they had gone, their retreating footsteps were echoing down the street.

Mr. Vanderpoel felt that he was saved. He would have risen to his feet but for the fact that his shoes were off. The person who had come in the gate, and who was now standing before him, was a lad dressed, as it seemed to Mr. Vanderpoel's confused sight, in the District Telegraph uniform.

"Well, young man," he exclaimed, "I guess you've saved my life. Just help me on with my shoes, will you, and we'll go into the house."

It was some time before Jim could take in the situation, and he stood gazing at the old man without saying a word.

"What are you staring at?" cried Mr. Vanderpoel, hotly. "Do you suppose I'm sitting here in my stocking feet for amusement? I've been knocked down and robbed—or I would have been robbed if some one else hadn't done it already. If anything could reconcile one to the thought of being robbed by one set of thieves, it would be that they left nothing for the next set. But I certainly believe they would have killed me if you hadn't come up. Easy, now?"

"$5000"

now gone up the steps, and while Mr. Vanderpoel drew out his latch-key, were standing in the light that gleamed through the door. As Mr. Vanderpoel turned around, he recognized, as he had not done before, the boy's features.

"Hello!" he cried, "you're that train-boy. Yes, it was a good deal. Do you know anything about it?"

Jim's face took on a non-committal look.

"Well," he said, "I found something in the car. Perhaps you'd better identify it. Prove property, you know."

"Come in," said Mr. Vanderpoel, drawing Jim inside and closing the door. "Was it a pocket book you found?"

Jim nodded.

"With money in it?" eagerly.

Jim nodded again.

"Five thousand dollars?" Mr. Vanderpoel whispered.

"I didn't count it," said Jim, briefly. "There it is."

He handed over the book, which Mr. Vanderpoel seized and breathlessly opened. The money was in fifty-dollar bills, and did not take long to count. When counted it proved to be all right.

"Yes," said Mr. Vanderpoel, delightedly. "It's all there. It must have dropped out of my pocket when I threw that paper at you in the car. Served me right for making such a lunatic of myself! But what a sell!" rubbing his hands gleefully. "What a tremendous sell on those villains that they didn't get a penny of it! Now come in to dinner"—leading the way through the hall—"and tell me all about yourself. You saved my life, and I'm going to do the correct thing."

And so the train-boy came into his fortune. In the end it amounted to a good deal more than $5000, for Mr. Vanderpoel's ideas of correctness turned out to be on a liberal scale. The family was brought to Trenton and put in a neat little cottage; Pete had all the tin soldiers that he could use, and Lizzie more dolls than she could possibly take care of; the mother got her dress, and Jim

"HE HANDED OVER THE BOOK, WHICH MR. VANDERPOEL SEIZED."

—as the boy drew the gaiter over the old man's knobby foot—"look out for that corn. Now the other one. There! never mind the buttons. Lend me your arm, will you? I'm lame and bruised where I fell. It was lucky I didn't hit my head. Well, I'm sorry I lost the money, but I'm mighty glad those fellows didn't get it."

"Was it much?" asked the boy, briefly. They had had his heart's desire, by being put, not in the company's machine-shop, but in a great deal better one, in which Mr. Vanderpoel was interested, and where Jim himself will no doubt one day be an owner. But better than all is the sense which Jim has of having fought against and overcome a great temptation. And this sense, I think, is the train-boy's fortune.

THE SINGING LESSON.

BY M. E. SANGSTER.

WHAT an interesting picture they make, the old music-master and his young pupil! By his cowed head we see that the teacher is a monk, and we remember to have read in our histories about the convents, where, during the fierce conflicts of the Middle Ages, holy men lived peaceful lives, wrote books, painted pictures, and set beautiful Latin hymns to lovely music. Those times were wild and dark enough. The brave young men who put on the armor of knighthood and rode forth to defend the weak and right the oppressed found plenty to do. Ladies sat in their castles, working endless pieces of tapestry in stitches which have lately been revived. Boys found pleasure in learning all sorts of manly sports. Here and there one would be found who was quiet and gentle, and he would perhaps be taught to read and write, and would be regarded as a wonderful scholar.

From the sweet rapt look on the face of this little chorister we see that he is one of the pure and noble natures which would not care for fighting, or pitching quoits, or rushing along with hawk and hounds. He loves art, and puts his whole soul into its study.

The gray-bearded master has trained many boys, and while kind and tender, is severe in requiring his pupils to do their best. The score on which the boy's eyes are resting is familiar to him through long years of use, and he feels that it is sacred. He shivers with horror when a note is flatted, as it sometimes is by a giddy singer whose ear is not accurate or whose voice is not disciplined.

The little fellow to whom the master is listening so critically while the sweet full tone chords so perfectly with the long-drawn note on the violin will be only one among a multitude of others in the great cathedral. But when the choir uplifts the Te Deum or the *Inflammatu*s with its waves of melody floods every nook and corner of the grand church, one voice untrained and out of tune might mar the harmony.

THE NOVICE.—FROM A PAINTING BY M. ALEXANDRE ROBERT.

THE MULATTO OF MURILLO.

A TRUE STORY.

ONE beautiful summer morning, about the year 1630, several youths of Seville approached the dwelling of the celebrated painter Murillo, where they arrived nearly at the same time. After the usual salutation they entered the studio. Murillo was not yet there, and each of the pupils walked up quickly to his easel to examine if the paint had dried, or perhaps to admire his work of the previous evening.

"Pray, gentlemen," exclaimed Isturitz, angrily, "which of you remained behind in the studio last night?"

"What an absurd question! Don't you recollect that we all came away together?"

With these words Mendez, with a careless air, approached his easel, when an exclamation of astonishment escaped him, and he gazed in mute surprise on his canvas, on which was roughly sketched a most beautiful head of the Virgin.

At this moment some one was heard entering the room. The pupils turned at the sound, and all made a respectful obeisance to the great master.

"Look, Señor Murillo, look!" exclaimed the youths, as they pointed to the easel of Mendez.

"Who has painted this—who has painted this head, gentlemen?" asked Murillo, eagerly. "Speak; tell me. He who has sketched this head will one day be the master of us all. Murillo wishes he had done it. What skill! Mendez, my dear pupil, was it you?"

"No, señor," replied Mendez, in a sorrowful tone.

"Was it you, then, Isturitz, or Ferdinand, or Carlos?"

But they all gave the same reply as Mendez.

"I think, sir," said Cordova, the youngest of the pupils, "that these strange pictures are very alarming. To tell the truth, such wonderful things have happened in your studio that one scarcely knows what to believe."

"What are they?" asked Murillo, still lost in admiration of the beautiful head by the unknown artist.

"According to your orders, señor," answered Ferdinand, "we never leave the studio without putting everything in order; but when we return in the morning, not only is everything in confusion, our brushes filled with paint, our palettes dirtied, but here and there are sketches, sometimes of the head of an angel, sometimes of a demon, then again a young girl, or the figure of an old man, but all admirable, as you have seen yourself, señor."

"This is certainly a curious affair, gentlemen," observed Murillo, "but we shall soon learn who is this nightly visitant. Sebastian," he continued, addressing a little mulatto boy about fourteen years old, who appeared at his call, "did I not desire you to sleep here every night?"

"Yes, master," said the boy, with timidity.

"And have you done so?"

"Yes, master."

"Speak, then: who was here last night and this morning before these gentlemen came?"

"No one but me, I swear to you, master," cried the mulatto, throwing himself on his knees in the middle of the studio, and holding out his little hands in supplication before his master.

"Listen to me," pursued Murillo. "I wish to know who has sketched this head of the Virgin and all the figures which my pupils find every morning here on coming to the studio. This night, in place of going to bed, you shall keep watch, and if by to-morrow you do not discover who the culprit is, you shall have twenty-five strokes from the lash. You hear! I have said it. Now go and grind the colors; and you, gentlemen, to work."

From the commencement until the termination of the hour of instruction Murillo was too much absorbed with his pencil to allow a word to be spoken but what related to their occupation; but the moment he disappeared conversation began, and naturally turned to the subject in which they were all interested.

"Beware, Sebastian, of the lash," said Mendez, "and watch well for the culprit; but give me the Naples yellow."

"You do not need it, Señor Mendez; you have made it yellow enough already; and as to the culprit, I have already told you that it is the Zombi."

"Are these negroes fools with their Zombi?" said Gonzalo, laughing. "Pray what is a Zombi?"

"Oh, an imaginary being, of course. But take care, Señor Gonzalo," continued Sebastian, with a mischievous glance at his easel, "for it must be the Zombi who has stretched the left arm of your St. John to such a length that if the right resembles it he will be able to untie his shoe-strings without stooping."

"Do you know, gentlemen," said Isturitz, as he glanced at the painting, "that the remarks of Sebastian are extremely just, and much to the point? Who knows but that from grinding the colors he may one day astonish us by showing he knows one from another?"

It was night, and the studio of Murillo, the most celebrated painter in Seville, was now as silent as the grave. A single lamp burned upon a marble table, and a young mulatto boy, whose eyes sparkled like diamonds, leaned against an easel. Immovable and still, he was so deeply absorbed in his meditations that the door of the studio was opened by one who several times called him by name, and who, on receiving no answer, approached and touched him. Sebastian raised his eyes, which rested on a tall and handsome negro.

"Why do you come here, father?" he asked, in a melancholy tone.

"To keep you company, Sebastian."

"There is no need, father; I can watch alone."

"But what if the Zombi should come?"

"I do not fear him," replied the boy, with a sad smile.

"He may carry you away, and then the poor negro Gomez will have no one to console him in his slavery."

"Oh, how sad! how dreadful it is to be a slave!" exclaimed the boy, weeping bitterly.

"It is the will of God," replied the negro, with an air of resignation.

"God!" ejaculated Sebastian, as he raised his eyes to the dome of the studio, through which the stars glittered—"God! I pray constantly to Him, my father (and He will one day listen to me), that we may no longer be slaves. But go to bed, father; go, go, and I shall go to mine there in that corner, and I shall soon fall asleep. Good-night, father, good-night."

"Good-night, my son;" and having kissed the boy, the negro retired.

The moment Sebastian found himself alone he uttered an exclamation of joy. Then suddenly checking himself, he said: "Twenty-five lashes to-morrow if I do not tell who sketched these figures, and perhaps more if I do. Oh, my God, come to my aid!" and the little mulatto threw himself upon the mat which served him for a bed, where he soon fell fast asleep.

Sebastian awoke at daybreak; it was only three o'clock. "Courage, courage, Sebastian," he exclaimed, as he shook himself awake; "three hours are thine—only three hours; then profit by them; the rest belong to thy master. Slave! Let me at least be my own master for three short hours. To begin, these figures must be effaced," and seizing a brush, he approached the Virgin, which, viewed by the soft light of morning, appeared more beautiful than ever.

"Efface this!" he exclaimed—"efface this! No; I will die first. Efface this—they dare not—neither dare I. No—that head—breathes—speaks; it seems as if her blood would flow if I should offer to efface it, and that I should be her murderer. No, no, no; rather let me finish it."

Scarcely had he uttered these words, when, seizing a palette, he seated himself at the easel, and was soon totally absorbed in his occupation. Hour after hour passed unheeded by Sebastian, who was too much engrossed by the beautiful creation of his pencil, which seemed bursting into life, to mark the flight of time.

But who can describe the horror and consternation of the unhappy slave, when, on suddenly turning round, he beheld all the pupils, with his master at their head, standing beside him!

Sebastian never once dreamed of justifying himself, and, with his palette in one hand and his brushes in the other, he hung down his head, awaiting in silence the punishment he believed that he justly merited.

Murillo having, with a gesture of the hand, imposed silence on his pupils, and concealing his emotion, said in a cold and severe tone, while he looked alternately from the beautiful picture to the terrified slave,

"Who is your master, Sebastian?"

"You," replied the boy, in a voice scarcely audible.

"I mean your drawing-master," said Murillo.

"You, señor," again replied the trembling slave.

"It can not be; I never gave you lessons," said the astounded painter.

"But you gave them to others, and I listened to them," rejoined the boy, emboldened by the kindness of his master.

"And you have done better than listen; you have profited by them," exclaimed Murillo, unable longer to conceal his admiration. "Gentlemen, does this boy merit punishment or reward?"

At the word punishment Sebastian's heart beat quick; the word reward gave him a little courage; but fearing that his ears deceived him, he looked with timid and imploring eyes toward his master.

"A reward, señor," cried the pupils, in a breath.

"That is well; but what shall it be?"

Sebastian began to breathe.

"Speak, Sebastian," said Murillo, looking at his slave. "Tell me what you wish for; I am so much pleased with your beautiful composition that I will grant any request you may make. Speak, then; do not be afraid."

"Oh, master, if I dared—" And Sebastian, clasping his hands, fell at the feet of his master.

With the view of encouraging him, each of the pupils suggested some favor for him to demand.

"Ask gold, Sebastian."

"Ask rich dresses, Sebastian."

"Ask to be received as a pupil, Sebastian."

A faint smile passed over the countenance of the slave at the last words, but he hung down his head and remained silent.

"Come, take courage," said Murillo, gayly.

"The master is so kind," said Ferdinand, half aloud, "I would risk something; ask your freedom, Sebastian."

At these words Sebastian uttered a cry of anguish, and raising his eyes to his master, he exclaimed, in a voice choked with sobs, "The freedom of my father! the freedom of my father!"

"And thine also," said Murillo, who, no longer able to conceal his emotion, threw his arms round Sebastian, and pressed him to his breast. "Your pencil," he continued, "shows that you have talent; your request proves that you have a heart; the artist is complete. From this day consider yourself not only as my pupil, but as my son. Happy Murillo! I have done more than paint—I have made a painter."

Murillo kept his word, and Sebastian Gomez, better known under the name of the Mulatto of Murillo, became one of the most celebrated painters in Spain. There may yet be seen in the churches of Seville the celebrated picture which he had been found painting by his master, and others of the highest merit.

THE DUCK HAT.

BY IRVING L. BEMAN.

DICK SMITH'S home was in the West, and as the incident I am about to relate happened a good many years ago, he must have been then only thirteen or fourteen years old. He was a brave, hearty lad, full of enthusiasm and love of adventure, but especially abounding with ingenuity, and always doing something new and curious. Thus he has been known all his life as an "inventor," and still shows the same quality.

He lived on the bank of a river, and being fond of the water, became an expert swimmer and oarsman. Although he had no gun, yet with cunning traps and many original devices he caught considerable game, some for its fur, and some for its meat. It is about one of his boyish inventions that I am going to tell you.

At certain seasons of the year great flocks of ducks came into the river, and staid many days eating the Indian rice (Zizania aquatica) that grew in the shallow water. But as Dick's father had no shot-gun or any convenient way of capturing them, the ducks came and went unmolested.

At length ingenious Dick set to work to contrive some method of catching them. He obtained a section of thin bark from some tree, and arranged so that it would just slip over his head and rest on his shoulders, like the crown of a large old-fashioned hat, the top of it reaching several inches above his scalp.

In this he cut holes for his eyes and mouth, so that he could see and breathe. He also fastened leaves and vines on the top and around it to partly conceal it.

When this was done, he put it on and started for the ducks. Reaching a thicket on the river's brink near the game, he laid aside his clothes and took to the water. He had often been in the river where the rice grew, and knew just what difficulties he would have to overcome in swimming and wading. Out he went, and as he came near the ducks he moved very slowly and cautiously so as not to alarm them.

Pretty soon he was in the midst of an immense flock, and although they were extremely wary and quite suspicious of the vine-covered bark, yet within a short time he succeeded in grasping quite a number by the legs, and jerking them under the water. When he had secured all he could fairly manage, he quietly made his way home. His catch proved most delicious eating, and was very acceptable to the family, as it came at a time in the year when no other meat was generally available. Frequently while the wild rice lasted did he repeat the operation, bringing home the fattest specimens that came to the river.

But one day as he sat beneath the bushes on the edge of the water about a quarter of a mile from home, examining some ducks just caught, his little dog by his side, suddenly a huge panther pounced down from the high bank above, and rushed for the dog. Away went the dog for dear life, and the panther after him. But Dick knew well enough that the dog, which was very fleet, would escape, and that the great cat would soon give up the race and come back for himself. But the lad had no notion of affording the panther a boy for dinner; and so, perfectly cool and brave, set to thinking how to escape. If he should run away, the animal would follow his track and soon overtake him, for he could not equal the dog in speed; if he should climb a tree, the creature could excel him in climbing; if he should wade or swim into the river and the panther should see him, she might follow and get him there. But Dick was not to be caught so easily; what worked so well in deceiving ducks might do even better with the panther. And so, instantly slipping on his "duck hat," as he called it, he waded rapidly into the water a few rods, and settled down so that he could just breathe and see, and turning around, watched the shore. Hardly had he reached this position when the panther pounced down as before from the high bank and began smelling and looking for the boy. Failing to detect his whereabouts, she pawed over the ducks Dick had left; and since she could not have dog or boy for dinner, she decided to take duck.

Dick felt quite certain that when his dog reached home in fright and excitement the attention of the family would be attracted, and his father would shoulder his rifle and start out to investigate the matter. And Dick was not mistaken. In a very few minutes he saw his father in the canoe swiftly paddling along the shore, peering sharply for his boy. But the spot occupied by the panther was around a little curve in the bank, where she would not see the man until he was close upon her.

Before Mr. Smith reached this place he saw the lad's "duck hat," and Dick contrived to lift one hand carefully above the water and point where the creature was dining.

The father understood the signal, and giving the canoe a strong pull, seized the gun, and prepared to fire the instant he saw anything to fire at. A moment more the rifle's sharp crack rang out, the panther sprang into the air, and fell back among the ducks, dead as they were.

Even yet, Dick, now elderly "Mr. Richard Smith," delights in telling how he escaped in a "duck hat" from a panther.

ART.

BY JIMMY BROWN.

OUR town has been very lively this winter. First we had two circuses, and then we had the small pox, and now we've got a course of lectures. A course of lectures is six men, and you can go to sleep while they're talking, if you want to, and you'd better do it unless they are missionaries with real idols or a magic lantern. I always go to sleep before the lectures are through, but I heard a good deal of one of them that was all about art.

Art is almost as useful as history or arithmetic, and we ought all to learn it, so that we can make beautiful things and elevate our minds. Art is done with mud in the first place. The art man takes a large chunk of mud and squeezes it until it is like a beautiful man or woman, or wild bull, and then he takes a marble grave-stone and cuts it with a chisel until it is exactly like the piece of mud. If you want a solid photograph of yourself made out of marble, the art man covers your face with mud, and when it gets hard he takes it off, and the inside of it is just like a mould, so that he can fill it full of melted marble which will be an exact photograph of you as soon as it gets cool.

This is what one of the men who belong to the course of lectures told us. He said he would have shown us ex-

As I said, I believed everything the man said, and when the lecture was over, and father said, "I do hope Jimmy you've got some benefit from the lecture this time"; and Sue said, "A great deal of benefit that boy will ever get unless he gets it with a good big switch don't I wish I was his father! I'd let him know," I made up my mind that I would do some art the very next day, and show people that I could get lots of benefit if I wanted to.

I have spoken about our baby a good many times. It's no good to anybody, and I call it a failure. It's a year and three months old now, and it can't talk or walk, and as for reading or writing, you might as well expect it to play base-ball. I always knew how to read and write, and there must be something the matter with this baby, or it would know more.

Last Monday mother and Sue went out to make calls, and left me to take care of the baby. They had done that before, and the baby had got me into a scrape, so I didn't want to be exposed to its temptations; but the more I begged them not to leave me, the more they would do it, and mother said, "I know you'll stay and be a good boy while we go and make those horrid calls," and Sue said, "I'd better or I'd get what I wouldn't like."

After they'd gone I tried to think what I could do to please them, and make everybody around me better and happier. After a while I thought that it would be just the thing to do some art and make a marble photograph of the baby, for that would show everybody that I had got some benefit from the lectures, and the photograph of the baby would delight mother and Sue.

I took mother's fruit basket and filled it with mud out of the back yard. It was nice thick mud, and it would stay in any shape that you squeezed it into, so that it was just the thing to do art with. I laid the baby on its back on the bed, and covered its face all over with the mud about two inches thick. A fellow who didn't know anything about art might have killed the baby, for if you cover a baby's mouth and nose with mud it can't breathe, which is very unhealthy, but I left its nose so it could breathe, and intended to put an extra piece of mud over that part of the mould after it was dry. Of course the baby howled all it could, and it would have kicked dreadfully, only I fastened its arms and legs with a shawl strap so that it couldn't do itself any harm.

The mud wasn't half dry when mother and Sue and father came in, for he met them at the front gate,

They all came upstairs, and the moment they saw the baby they said the most dreadful things to me without waiting for me to explain. I did manage to explain a little through the closet door while father was looking for his raitan cane, but it didn't do the least good.

I don't want to hear any more about art or to see any more lectures. There is nothing so ungrateful as people, and if I did do what wasn't just what people wanted, they might have remembered that I meant well, and only wanted to please them and elevate their minds.

"THE MOMENT THEY SAW THE BABY THEY SAID THE MOST DREADFUL THINGS."

actly how to do art, and would have made a beautiful portrait of a friend of his, named Vee Nuss, right on the stage before our eyes, only he couldn't get the right kind of mud. I believed him then, but I don't believe him now. A man who will contrive to get an innocent boy into a terrible scrape isn't above telling what isn't true. He could have got mud if he'd wanted it, for there was mornamillion tons of it in the street, and it's my belief that he couldn't have made anything beautiful if he'd had mud a foot deep on the stage.

we have very pleasant times playing with dolls and books and sleds. To-night we had a circus in the parlor. Budge and Ruth were the lions, and I was the keeper; but soon they became unmanageable and were sent to bed. It's drawing near my bed-time, and I will ask you to please print this, for I enjoy reading the letters, and would like to see my own name in the Post-office box. Good night.

CINDY B.

SAVANNA LA MAR, JAMAICA, WEST INDIES.
This is my first letter. We live in Jamaica, West Indies, and I like to read the letters from other boys and girls.

I am twelve years old, and have five brothers and two sisters. One brother is in England, at the Blue-Cot School; the others learn lessons here at home. We have black people to do our work.

HARRY M.

BUTTERNUT LAKE, WISCONSIN.
My sister Kate and I send you some yellow violets which we picked this afternoon while we were out walking. Is that not good for so far north? We are about fifty-three miles from Superior. I love YOUNG PEOPLE very much, and I like the Post-office box best.

KATE B. and FANNIE T. M.

Brave little violets, and bright eyes that found them! Thank you, Kate and Fannie, for sending the pretty flower to me.

NEW YORK CITY.

I have taken YOUNG PEOPLE from the first number and enjoy it very much. I do not want your water-proof and overshoes to school. If it is doubtful, and papa says the wind is in the east, the safest way will be to wear them in New York.

LULU L.

I suppose you will ask your sea-wind to tell you in the morning whether or not to wear your water-proof and overshoes to school. If it is doubtful, and papa says the wind is in the east, the safest way will be to wear them in New York.

THONASVILLE, GEORGIA.

Last Christmas my papa presented me with HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, and it has afforded me a great deal of pleasure, and I intend to continue reading it allways. I am aged ten years, and I go to school. I am now in the Fifth Reader, and work sums in fractions; but somehow I still love to play, and ride my velocipede, while my sister Sadie, who is five years, and Edna, nineteen months, amuse themselves with dolls. We live in a town quite famous as a winter resort, and many come here to escape the cold North and West, and to enjoy our pine regions.

HERBERT J. H.

BELDEN, TEXAS.
I am a little boy nine years old. I have been taking YOUNG PEOPLE since last November. I have several pets. I have a dog, a pony, a pig, and three chickens; but the sweetest pet of all is my little baby brother; his name is Charley, but we call him Carly. I want to tell about my pig, he is so smart he thinks he is a dog. Every-where the dogs go, the pig goes too. He helped me drive the horses to water yesterday. I live on a farm. I do not go to school; mamma teaches me at home.

WALTER J. M.

A very remarkable pig. It must be funny to see him trotting off after the dogs and their little master.

NEW YORK CITY.

I am a little girl thirteen years old. I have a little dog, but he is very homey. I have three cats, and two mice, and they are pretty. And I have found them in the garden. The cats and the dog do not fight. I have a papa and a mamma, and an auntie, and two big brothers. My auntie reads all the little letters to me. I have taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE since the first number.

NETTIE B. M.

MONTICELLO, NEW YORK.

Have you, dear Postmistress, ever been to Monticello? It is a lovely place. I have three cats, and two mice, and they are pretty. And I have found them in the garden. The cats and the dog do not fight. I have a papa and a mamma, and an auntie, and two big brothers. My auntie reads all the little letters to me. I have taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE since the first number.

I want to tell you about the County Fair. The grounds are two miles and a half from here. We rode up, and staid all day. First we went into the poultry house, which was full. What do you suppose we saw? Two little tiny hens, each with five little chickens no bigger than a medium-sized egg. After that we entered the domestic building. Dear! how full it was! Cakes, jelly, pies, preserves, and fruit occupied an entire side of it. The other side was filled with art, fancy-work, and such things. The vegetable tent was next, and some one said the display of vegetables was larger than that at the State Fair, and I was glad to tell how many cattle, pigs, and sheep there were. We ate our lunch in the wagon, and it tasted very good. I was very tired when we got home, but we had a pleasant day and lovely weather.

A few weeks ago we drove to Katrina Falls. We went down into the basin, and saw the water cascading down about fifty feet from above, with high rocks and woods all around, and it made as wild a scene as I ever saw. I picked a fern and leaf to bring home and press.

EFFIE E. H.

THE CHILDREN AND THE SHEEP.

Diddie, Dumps, and Tot were three little girls who lived on a plantation in Mississippi many years ago. Their real names were Madeleine, Edith, and Josephine, but they never came to know by anything except their funny pet names. The three little girls had three little colored maids, who waited on them, shared their plays, and went with them everywhere. It was not until they were them so much trouble on the afternoon of this story was a sheep, who had belonged to Diddie since he was a lamb. Then he had been very gentle, and never crossed his will with any of them, though Diddie kept on loving him dearly.

You may all look at his picture on the cover of this number of YOUNG PEOPLE. They were playing about the house, and that is the first time he was made in his honor. But, alas! this lamb, objected to being carried to the entertainment.

"You, Dumps, an' Tot, an' Dilsely, an' all of yer, I've got er letter from Lord Burgooze, an' he'll be here to-morrow, an' I want you all to go right into the kitchen an' make pies an' cakes." And so the whole party adjourned to a little ditch where they were used to get their water, and on that account had been selected as the kitchen, and began at once to prepare an elegant dinner.

"Bea! me! how busy the little housekeepers were! and such beautiful pies they made, and lovely cakes all iced with white sand, and bits of grass laid around the edges for trimming; and all the time hanging and chattering as gaily as could be."

"An' we havin' fun?" said Dumps, who, regardless of her nice clothes, was down on her knees, and had just finished her own cake. "I want her fat little arms muddly to the elbows; 'an' an't you glad we slipped off, Diddie? I tol' yer there wa'n't nothin' zoin' to hurt us."

"And an't you glad we got away, too?" said Diddie. "We wouldn't er had nobody to be Lord Burgooze."

"Yes," replied Dumps; "er he an't behaved bad at all; he ain't no body, and he ain't runned after nobody to-day."

"'Ook at de cake," interrupted Tot, holding up a mud-ball that she had moulded with her own little hands, and which she regarded with great pride.

And now, the plank being as fast as it would hold, they all returned to the hotel to arrange the table. But after the table was set, the excitement was all over, for there was nobody to be the guest.

"Et Ole Billy wa'n't so mean," said Chris. "we could totch 'im hyeah in de omnibus. I wish de name of 'Chum an' Sappum come; dey'd er been Lord Buzo!"

"I b'lieve Billy would tell us had 'im," said Diddie, who was always ready to take up for her pet; "he's er gentle now, an' he's quit hurtin' the only thing in his, he's so good we couldn't get 'im in the wheelbarrow."

"Me 'in Chris kin put 'im in," said Dilsely. "We kin hit 'em, an' all;" and accordingly the omnibus was dispatched for Lord Burgooze, who was quietly nibbling grass on the ditch bank at some little distance from the hotel.

He did not hear, and as he slowly approached, and regarded them attentively. "Billy! Billy! po' Ole Billy!" soothingly murmured Diddie, who had accompanied Dilsely and Chris with the omnibus, and she had not had time to get away from anybody else. He came now at once to her side, and rubbed his head gently against her, and while she caressed him, Dilsely on one side and Chris on the other, rubbed him up to put him on the wheelbarrow.

And now the scene changed. Lord Burgooze, an unmindful of love or gratitude, and with an eye sick of her, and not at all moved by her just as she reached the gin-house, placed his head in the middle of her back, and sent her sprawling on her face. Diddie and Chris had in this time regained their feet, and had now got up near the omnibus, and Chris with her face all scratched from the roots

OUR POST-OFFICE BOX.

"I HATE to apologize; I do not like to admit that I was in the wrong."

I do not know who the speaker was. I did not even see his face as he passed the window where I was sitting, resting in the shadow of the curtain, and thinking clear children about you. I am sure that he was a boy, however, for such a fresh, decided voice, and such a quick step, could belong to nobody in the world but a boy.

Somewhat I felt very sorry indeed when I thought about what he had said: "I hate to apologize! Not like to confess one's self to have been in the wrong!" Why, that is not noble.

Every one of us—you, Elsie, at your pretty embroidery, you, Dora, at your map drawing, you, Horace, over your chemistry, you, Towahid, deep in Virgil, I, the Postmistress, with my heaps of letters—every one of us, my dears, is little something to be in the wrong. We say something hastily, and hurt somebody's feelings, and then we are sorry. We do something which is foolish, and which we regret. The only brave course—the only course of an honorable people—is to apologize, to ask pardon, if necessary, of the person whom we have vexed or annoyed. It is always manly in a boy to own up and bear the blame if he has made a mistake. Many of the troubles and heart-aches that people have to bear would be done away with if everybody who did wrong was willing to admit it, and if those who were wronged would be forgiving.

And now for the good things with which this number of the Post-office Box is fairly overflowing.

SAN FRANCISCO, CALIFORNIA.

I live in San Francisco. I often drive out to the bench with papa and mamma. A little way from the shore there is a large pile of rocks, and upon them you can see hundreds of sea-lions climbing about, and one plainly hear them barking or roaring. I often drive through the Golden Gate Park too. It is beautifully laid out with flowers, and at the large conservatory the beautiful Victoria Regia is in bloom now—a big whose blossoms open three times, the first day a pure white, with a large white crown in the center, then closes to open the next day a pale pink, then closes to open the last time almost purple. The leaves are saucer-shaped, about one yard across, and will bear the weight of a child two, or four years old standing on them. But I must stop now, so good-by. I am nine years old, and study at home.

BIDDIE.

Thank you, dear, for your description of the superb Victoria Regia.

MOUNT VERNON, OHIO.

I am a little girl nearly nine years old. I go to school every day. We have but one pet; it is a kitty, and its name is Annetta. I am working a motto. It is my first, and my friends think it very nicely done. Mount Vernon is the county-seat of Knox County, Ohio. I have two sisters, Anna and Ruth, and one brother, Budge. On many days

WHO'S YOUR BARBER?

THE OBJECT GAME.

THIS game may be played by any number of people. The party first divides itself into two equal parts. One person from each side is chosen to go out of the room, and, after consulting together, they fix upon any object they like for the rest to guess.

The company then seat themselves in two distinct circles, sufficiently apart to prevent the remarks made in one circle from being overheard by those in the other.

The two representatives are now summoned, and requested to take their places, one in each group, when a race begins as to which group shall first find out what object of thought has been fixed upon. This is done by asking questions as to the shape, size, qualities, and attributes of the object. The rule is that the number of questions asked should be limited to twenty, though in many cases it is impossible to adhere to this restriction; while, on the other hand, the object is frequently guessed before the whole twenty questions have been asked.

No restriction is placed upon the objects to be thought of—a drop of water, a ray of light, a crab's claw, a nail in the boot of some great man, or anything else may be chosen. The object of the game is, of course, to make the guessing as difficult as possible, so that the struggle as to who shall be the winners may be a hard one.

DARKIE'S SEARCH.

A BLACK retriever named Darkie, the property of a friend, lately went with his master to a country railway station. His master went to a neighboring station down the line, leaving Darkie to await his return, which he dutifully did, guarding the pony trap with faithfulness and sagacity.

On their arrival at home again after a two-mile drive, the master missed one of his gloves. He showed it to Darkie, saying only, "He, lost!" Darkie started off and was gone for three hours, when he returned with the missing glove, breathless but happy. The next day the porter at the station told the owner:

"We had a pretty job with your dog yesterday, sir. He came here, went down the line as fast as his legs would carry him, went to the station you got out at, came back here, rummaged the place all over, and nearly upset the book-stall, under which your glove was, and carried it off in his month."

KING CAULIFLOWER.—By PALMER COX.

OLD CAULIFLOWER was a king who ruled o'er land and sea;
He took a penny from the till of his great treasury,
And with the money in his hand he ran about the town
To make a purchase of a pint of pea-nuts roasted brown.
And when he brought them to his room it was the king's intent
To eat the pea-nuts in the bed before to sleep he went.

To this the queen objection made, and very well she might,
For he was well along in years, and late it was at night;
Then said the crabbed Cauliflower: "Am I not a king?
And may I not do what I please, or swallow anything?"

Oh! have a care, my queenly dame; my word is law, you know,
And if I do but say the word, your saucy head may go."

Then quick the fearless queen replied: "Go, frighten slave or fool,

But I would have you understand that here 'tis I who rule;
So take your pea-nuts somewhere else, and may they cost you dear.

For were you fifty times a king you'll not be munching here!"
Then out upon the steps of stone in silence sat his grace,
And ate the pint of roasted nuts before he left the place.

WAITING :

J.M.D.

WAITING.

BY MARGARET JOHNSON.

I SAID, "When will the summer come?
Mamma, is it not late?"
She smiled, and answered, "By-and-by;
Be patient, child, and wait."
I asked papa if he would buy
A new wax doll for me,
He pinched my cheek, and said, "Not now;
Be patient, and I'll see."
"Nurse, tell me when my dear rose-bush
A blossom red will bear."
"Oh, by-and-by, my dear. Don't fret.
Come, let me brush your hair."
"When shall I grow so tall, papa,
That I can reach your head?"
"Quite soon enough, my little one;
Wait patiently," he said.
"Dear me!" I thought; "they all say 'Wait.'
I'll put my dolls away,
And go and sit upon the stairs
As long as I can stay."
Now I have waited patiently
For hours and hours and hours,
And yet the dear doll has not come,
The summer, nor the flowers.
I have not grown a single bit,
And now I know it's late,
I'm going up to tell mamma
It does no good to wait.

AN ADVENTURE IN THE SUEZ CANAL.

BY DAVID KER.

SO it seems a fellow called Arabi Bey, or some such name, is making a row in Cairo; but of course it won't come to anything—these things never do."

So spoke, after exchanging a few words with a pilot who had just come down the Suez Canal from Port Said, the Captain of our homeward-bound steamer from India, little dreaming how world-famous the "row" of which he spoke so lightly was to become not many weeks later.

"If these Arab fellows should ever want to destroy the canal," says a young English Lieutenant of Engineers going home from India on leave, "they wouldn't have much trouble with it. You see there's a regular hollow on each side here and there, and they need only dig through or blow up the embankment to run the channel bone-dry in no time."

His words are confirmed a few minutes later when a group of native goat-herds, as black and shaggy and wild-looking as the goats which they tend, wade out to within a few yards of the steamer, clamorously offering to dive for piastres (five-cent copper pieces). In fact, the Suez Canal, throughout its whole length of eighty-six miles, is as shallow as any ditch except in the very centre of the channel, and even there it has a depth of only twenty six and a quarter feet, with a mean breadth of seventy, widening to one hundred in the "sidings."

Every now and then we pass a neat little landing-place, surmounted by a painted station house overlooking a tiny patch of stunted shrubs and straggling flowers, doing their best to grow upon a thin smear of soil brought from a distance, and plastered upon the barren, scorching sand. A little farther on we see, perched on a steep sand ridge just at the point where the canal enters the wide smooth expanse of the Timsah Lake, a primitive sentry-box, consisting merely of a screen of dried grass, supported by four tall canes, beneath which a drowsy Arab is supposed to look out for passing steamers when he has nothing better to do.

But just as we are two-thirds of the way across the Timsah Lake itself, one of the many shallow lagoons through which the canal runs for a full third of its length, we see the French steamer ahead of us halt suddenly, and the next moment comes a signal that a boat has run aground in the canal beyond the lake, and that we must wait until she gets off again.

There is no help for it, and we are just making up our minds to a halt of several hours, with nothing to do but stare at the trim bonbon-like houses and dark green plantations of Ismailia* along the farther shore, with the big white front of the Khedive's palace standing up in the midst like an overgrown hotel, when an unexpected interruption occurs.

"Look here, mates," shouts a sailor perched on the jib-boom; "here's one o' them darkies out for a swim.
He'll be coming to challenge old Jack here to swim a match for the championship of the canal."

"Let him try it," retorts a tall, raw-boned, North Country man behind him. "If that 'ere nigger thinks he can beat me, he'll know better afore long, or my name ain't Jaek Hawley."

So saying, Jack strips and plunges in, heading straight for the round black head which is bobbing about like a cork in the smooth water. But just as he reaches the Arab the latter vanishes, and a sharp pinch on his right calf warns Jack that his enemy has taken him in the rear, amid a shout of laughter from the steamer.

Jack darts at his assailant, who dives again, and coming up beyond him, splashes a perfect cataract of water in his face, and instantly the two are at it with might and main, filling the whole air with showers of glittering spray.

"Will you swim me to that buoy yonder, Johnny?"
challenges Jack.

"You go, me go," grins the native, and off they start.

At first the Egyptian's short, snapping, hand-over-hand stroke carries him bravely on; but little by little the long, steady, powerful strokes of the Englishman begin to tell, and at length he forges slightly ahead. The crew cheer lustily, and fancy that Jack has certainly won the race;
but the young Lieutenant, who knows Arab ways, shakes his head and tells them to "wait a bit."

Poor Jack! he has forgotten in his eagerness that his head is unprotected, and that he has not one of those cast-iron Eastern skulls that can defy a tropical sun. All at once his head is seen to sway dizzily back, he throws up his arms convulsively, and down he goes.

"Stand by to lower the boat!" roars the Captain. "Be alive now!"

As if moved by a single impulse, the men spring at once to the davits; but, luckily for poor Jaek, other and nearer help is at hand. The Arab, when he sees his rival's strength fail so suddenly, guesses in a moment what is the matter, and makes for him at once. Three powerful strokes bring him alongside of the sinking man, and twining his sinewy fingers in Jack's bushy hair, he holds the latter's head above water, paddling gently meanwhile to keep himself afloat.

"Stand by your tackle! let go!"

The tackles rattle sharply through the blocks, the boat splashes into the water, and the passengers spring upon the bulwarks to give her a shove as she darts away toward the two imperilled men, as fast as eight sturdy rowers can propel her.

But in this race betwixen life and death the chances are terribly in favor of the latter. True, the water of the lake, saltier by far than the sea itself, is buoyant as India rubber; but it is no easy matter for the Arab, already spent with his long swim, to support the huge bulk of the helpless sailor, and the boat seems still a fearfully long way off.

* Named after its founder, Ismail Pasha, the late Khedive of Egypt.
It is connected with Suez by a fresh-water canal, through which the little Egyptian steam-launches run in about twelve hours.

Once, twice, the Englishman's head dips below the surface, and the oarsmen almost leap from their seats as they see it. Pull, boys, pull! And now they are but three lengths off, and now but one, and now, with a deafening hurrah, the fainting man and his exhausted rescuer are dragged into the boat.

"Come, boys," cried Lieutenant H—, "that's a plucky fellow, Arab or no Arab. What do you say to sending round the hat for him; here's a rupee" (fifty cents) "to begin with."

And half an hour later the Arab was on his way back to the shore, with more money tied up in the white cotton sash round his waist than he had ever had before in his life.

UNCLE ZED'S WOLF.

A TRUE STORY.

BY MRS. KATE UPSON CLARK.

"BAA! baa! baa!" sounded in noisy, frightened chorus underneath Parson Darius Miller's windows one cold April morning about fifty years ago.

So loud and so persistent was the chorus that Parson Miller's three sturdy boys were awake and on their feet before it had grown light enough to distinguish anything in the gray outside.

"Father! father!" shouted James, the second boy, clattering down the stairs in his heavy boots. "what ails the sheep? They're all huddled up close to the house, right under your window. Don't you hear them? Say, father, wake up!"

In response to all this ontery, good Parson Miller, who was a hard-working farmer as well as a parson, and slept the sleep of the just, gave forth a feeble and only half-intelligent "yes." Presently, however, he joined the boys, and then discovered that not all the sheep were huddled together underneath the windows, but that two of them were missing, and that large dangerous-looking tracks were all over the light snow—a regular "sugar-snow"—which covered the ground outside.

"I'll bet it's a wolf," ventured Daniel, the eldest boy.

"Guess it's nothing but a wild-cat," said the parson.

"Too big for a wild-cat," said Tom. "A great deal bigger than the one Squire Taylor caught in his trap."

Tom was the quiet boy, but somehow, when Tom spoke, even the older ones paid attention. Tom's eyes were always on the alert, and though they were of a gray and by no means beautiful color, and were set in a sallow and "peaked" little face, Tom was considered a vastly good-looking boy by all of the family and his intimate friends, on the principle of "Handsome is that handsome does."

Just then Squire Taylor, their next neighbor, came tramping hastily across his field, his two boys, of about the same age as James and Tom Miller, following after him.

"Wolf tracks all around my barn," said the good Squire, excitedly, before he had come near enough to see the sheep lying on the snow.

"There!" cried Daniel, nodding significantly to Tom.

"Where's the fellow gone?" queried little Tom, who was only fourteen, and who didn't look so old as that by reason of his small stature.

"That's it! that's it!" cried the Squire, slapping Tom approvingly on the shoulder. "Where's the varmint gone? Let's track him, to be sure. Hullo! there's Uncle Zed."

Sure enough, old Zadok Cummings, familiarly known as "Uncle Zed," was hurrying along through the fields toward them, and carrying his old shot-gun in his hands. The news had evidently travelled fast.

"Seen him?" shouted the old man, all on fire with excitement, while drops of sweat ran down his russet face, in spite of the chilly weather. "Jest tell me what d'rection he's took, 'n' I'll ketch him! The eritter! I'll ketch him; oh, I'll ketch him!" And Uncle Zed looked so fierce and funny that all of them began to laugh. But they finally succeeded in convincing the old man that he couldn't possibly "ketch him," for a few moments at least, and that the case was too serious for them to decide at once on the best course to pursue.

"He'll be around to-night too, and bring some more with him, if we don't ketch him," put in Uncle Zed, whenever a good chance occurred.

Two or three had started out to follow the trail of the wolf, and they came back to report that the tracks ended in Squire Taylor's woods.

"We must make a ring right around the woods, and hem him in—that's the way," said the Squire, quickly.

Tom, standing back behind his brothers, was seen to nod approvingly, whereupon the other boys did the same. Indeed, the proposition seemed to commend itself to the entire company, and they started toward the woods, those who had not brought guns hurrying off to get some.

"I could do it just as well alone," muttered Uncle Zed. "They hain't ben no wolves around here for several years now, but I hain't forgot how to ketch 'em. I guess I hain't."

The men were disposed, and then everything was profoundly quiet, excepting for the sound of the beating of the bushes, or of a stray shot, when some overconfident hunter was "sure he had him."

At last Uncle Zed heard a low growl in a thicket, and he had hardly time to raise his gun when out sprang an enormous wolf, and came directly toward him. The old man, almost paralyzed with fright, pulled the trigger, but his hand trembled so that his shot went a yard above the wolf's head, and the animal bounded past him unhurt. Uncle Zed shrieked, "Wolf! wolf!" and a half-dozen men were soon in hot pursuit of the discovered game.

Tom Miller, feeling very disconsolate because he hadn't any gun, had not accompanied the rest; but his mother, who felt no fear for Tom, and sympathized deeply with the courageous little fellow, had advised him to go to a certain neighbor's and see if he couldn't borrow one. It was necessary to go quite a distance, but Tom had made it on old Sorrel, the mare. He had come back in a wonderfully short time, bringing a trusty little shot-gun with him, and was making his way up the hill just as the wolf dashed out of the woods, heading in his direction.

Tom's heart came up in his throat, but he ran for a clump of bushes close by that he thought would afford a good position for a shot, stationed himself among them, and waited.

The cries of the men in pursuit came nearer. Then the gallop into which the wolf had broken from its quick trot when it left the woods seemed to shake the very ground under him. Spring—spring—spring, came the terrified brute. He was in sight. Tom steadied his gun and fired. The wolf uttered a cry, half bark, half screech, and giving a few lame and wounded leaps, lay bleeding on the ground. Then shot after shot from the men behind was poured in upon the poor creature, until he lay thoroughly dead. Tom Miller was quite the hero of the day, and it was voted unanimously that the wolf-skin belonged to him.

"Well, Uncle Zed, why didn't you 'ketch him,' as you said you were going to?" inquired Squire Taylor, jokingly, as the men were separating to go to a late dinner.

"Don't know what in thunder ailed my gun," complained Uncle Zed, rapping that unfortunate weapon crossly; "but, after all"—straightening up proudly—"you'd never have ketched that wolf if it hadn't 'a ben for me."

"How's that?" asked the Squire.

"Why, goodness gracious! didn't you hear me holler? I hollered an' started you all up. My!" continued the old man, reflectively, as he turned away amid a general laugh, which did not appear to damp his spirits in the least, "how I did holler!"

CORAL REEFS.

BY SARAH COOPER.

THE attention of seamen and navigators has long been attracted by the number of circular islands in the warm parts of the Pacific and Indian oceans. Generally each one of these circular islands contains a lake of quiet water extending almost to its outer shores, so that the island looks like a fairy ring of land floating in the ocean, and adorned with tropical trees and plants.

Happily for the boys and girls of the present day, this subject, with other equally fascinating branches of science, has now been studied by naturalists, who give us the rich results of their labors. It seems scarcely possible that the dainty beautiful corals which we examined not long ago in YOUNG PEOPLE can have anything to do with the making of islands, but so it is. Coral reefs are vast masses of coral which have grown in warm oceans. Their formation must have been slow, yet they sometimes extend hundreds of miles. Florida and many other parts of our solid continents are known to have been formed from coral reefs.

Let us now try to picture to ourselves the beginning of one of these reefs, and by following its growth step by step we may at least understand how it has been formed. There are hills and valleys on the bottom of the ocean as well as on the land. We will fancy that some young coral polyps which have been swimming about in the sea settle on the sides of one of these hills, and begin to grow and spread all around it. They will increase also by the deposit of eggs until they form a circular wall.

As the coral wall grows, the lower polyps and the inner ones die, their skeletons forming a solid foundation for all that grow above them. There may be only about an inch of living coral on the outside of the reef.

These walls rise nearly straight, and you will see that in doing so they inclose a circular basin of quiet water, and now you can understand why it is that a coral island mostly has a lake in the centre, as is shown in Fig. 1. The lakes are called lagoons.

The bottom of the wall is formed of brain-coral and other solid kinds which live only in deep water, and they die when a certain height is reached. The formation of the new island does not stop with their death, however. The wall having now reached the proper height to suit branching corals, which require shallower water, their young polyps will settle upon it, and finish the structure. We might suppose a reef formed of branching corals would be open and unsubstantial, but in their growth the branches are thickly interlaced. The spaces between them become filled with substances floating in the ocean, and with pieces of coral which are broken from the reef by the force dashing of the waves. The whole forms a solid mass, stronger, perhaps, than any stone masonry. The fragments of coral suffer no serious injury by breaking, but if lodged in some favorable spot they continue to grow.

The outer edge of the wall is steep and abrupt. Soundings taken just outside show very deep water. In this portion of the wall the corals live and thrive, always supplied with clear water. The breakers dash against it with such fury that apparently the hardest rock must in time yield to the tremendous force of the waves. But, strange as it may appear, the soft jelly-like bodies of the polyps give to the reef the power of resisting the billows.

The inner surface of the wall slopes gently to the land, and being washed by quiet waters often containing sand and mud, it is not favorable to the growth of polyps. Still, there are certain kinds of coral which thrive within the lagoons; some of them are exceedingly brilliant and beautiful.

The coral polyps die before they reach the surface of the ocean, as no corals can live out of water. The remainder of the island is built up by shells, pieces of broken coral, sea-weed, and other floating materials which are washed upon it, raising the wall higher and higher. The never-ceasing action of the waves grinds up these shells and broken coral, until at last they form a soil of sand and mud which is now ready to receive any seeds that may float on the water or be brought by the winds and the birds. The seeds take root in the new soil, and young plants begin to appear on the glistening white surface. Floating coconuts often lodge on the shores, and cocoa-nut-trees are among the first to grow upon them. As the plants drop their leaves and decay, the soil is enriched little by little, and fitted for the home of various animals and birds, which in some mysterious manner find their way to these lonely spots far out at sea. In time our coral reef may become a beautiful tropical island fringed with waving trees and plants, and inhabited by man.

Circular islands seldom form complete rings. There is generally an opening into the lake on the side most sheltered from the wind. A safe harbor in mid-ocean is thus made, in which vessels may take shelter, but it requires an expert navigator to pass the perils at its entrance. To anchor on the outer shore would be impossible. In Fig. 2 is a pretty little coral island with ships in its lagoon. If a lake is entirely inclosed by the coral wall, it may in time be changed to fresh water by the rains that fall into it.

Coral reefs often extend to a depth of three hundred feet below the surface of the ocean, and formerly persons were puzzled to know how they could have grown in such deep water, as no coral polyps can live at a greater depth than twenty or thirty fathoms. This puzzling question was settled by the late Charles Darwin, who first showed that coral islands occur where there has been a gradual sinking of the bottom of the ocean. As the reef rises in height, the sinking of the foundation partly counteracts the upward growth of the coral; consequently the proper depth of water is secured, and the reef appears to be stationary, whereas it is really growing upward.

Whenever a coral reef rises above the surface of the ocean, we may know that the coral, which grew under water, has been lifted above the level of the sea by a rising of the ocean-bed.

These circular reefs are called "atolls." They are quite different from the "fringing reefs," which extend along the shores of continents and islands. There are usually openings or breaks in fringing reefs directly opposite the mouths of rivers and fresh-water streams, as the corals can not endure currents which carry mud or sediment. Perhaps the grandest reef to be found in any part of the world is the one extending along the northeast coast of Australia. It is nearly one thousand miles in length, and proves to us that the helpless coral polyps have played no trifling part in the formation of our earth. All they have accomplished has been done merely by their living and growing.

THE BOYS' STORE-KEEPING.

BY C. M. ST. DENYS.

I.

A CROSS the way from the Stanley boys' home a new house was being built. A pile of lumber lay just outside of the sidewalk in front of the new building, and it was piled so irregularly that the upper boards extended out considerably beyond the lower ones, thus forming a sheltered spot below. The ends of some of the lower boards, too, projected in such a way as to make little shelves at different heights, and even a rude seat and table. The boys had often gathered under this shelter for a chat, and when John and Bob Stanley announced that they saw in it the making of a fine store, all the other boys groaned inwardly, and said to themselves, "Why did not I think of that?"

Of course Bob and John did not plunge into the risks of business without first counting the cost. The plan was well digested. They had talked it over fully three days before it was publicly announced.

The chief difficulty was about the amount of capital to be invested. John had been saving up his money for a long time toward buying a bicycle, and Bob—well, Bob was not so thrifty; there was not much "save" about him, though when it came to needing the money to set him up in business, he saw clearly that he must mend his ways.

"I declare, John," he said, gloomily, "I don't believe I can rake up twenty-five cents toward starting the store. I wish I'd thought of it before. It was only last week I bought ten cents' worth of marbles."

"Put them in stock, and sell out at an advance," suggested John.

Bob shook his head. "The boys aren't going to pay me more for marbles than they can get them for at Thompson's. Besides, I was dince enough to show them off at recess, so the boys would call them second-hand, and want a reduction."

"That's true. But you had better lose on them for the sake of getting some cash in hand that you could lay out in something you could make money on."

"But I don't see how we are to make money, anyhow. The other boys can buy as cheap as we can."

"No; Thompson would come down in his prices if we told him we were buying to sell again. Buying at wholesale, you know, they always do."

"So they do;" and Bob's face brightened. "You have a lot of money to put into the business," he said, admiringly.

"I shan't put all my money in," said the prudent John. "It's too much risk. I'd rather begin small; and then I could get my bicycle even if we failed in business."

For it must be admitted that, like reasonable beings, they looked forward to failure as the most probable ending to their enterprise. Nine men out of every ten who start in business for themselves fail; and why should not they close in this exciting and approved manner? As far back as the time of Macbeth such things were not unknown; and the boys said bravely to themselves, "If we fail, we fail"; and so much the more interesting.

"But how much capital are you going to put in?" persisted Bob.

"Well, now, really, Bob, if we are to be even partners, I can't put any more money in than you do. It would make the thing too complicated, and not be fair to me, you know."

Bob sighed. "Only half a dollar to start the business! It will look mean. I wish I had not got so many glasses of soda-water this season. It's worse than marble3 for running away with money."

"We might take in some more partners," said John, after a thoughtful pause.

"But Dick says he don't care about it, and every cent of Sam's money goes for his bantams and pigeons."

"What do you say to asking Tom Fleming?"

"No," said Bob, decisively. "When a gold mine opens before you, keep it all in the family, I say."

But the difficulty of the small capital still remained. Their anxiety lost the boys at least an hour's sleep that night, and when they woke in the morning, the same burden at once took possession of them.

"Let's tell Aunt Sue about it," said Bob.

Aunt Sue was much pleased with the plan. She thought the effort to conduct the little business would give them business habits and tact. She made suggestions that helped them greatly.

"You won't need much money to start with," she said. "Look over your closets and boxes, and see what you have already that you would like to dispose of. You have a good many toys and other things that you will never use again, and you might sell them for something. Call your shop a new and second-hand store, and that will make it all fair. What kind of a stock were you thinking of keeping?"

"Oh, almost anything. Like a country store, you know. Marbles, and tops, and slate-pencils, and—"

"And chewing-gum," suggested Bob. "The boys and girls buy more of that than of anything else lately."

"I wouldn't keep it if I were you," said Aunt Sue. "It's a bad habit to use it, and you want to establish your business on good principles. I hope you'll keep bird-seed, though. You could count on me as a customer."

"Well, we will, and we'll give up the chewing-gum. But, Aunt Sue," and Bob assumed his most persuasive tones, "I'll tell you one thing we could sell like wild-fire, and it would not cost us anything, either."

"What?" asked Aunt Sue, smiling, but mentally bracing herself for opposition.

"Cookies."

"Not of my baking, Bob. You ought to know too much of the trouble and expense of cake-making to think of it. I can't undertake to supply the town with cookies."

Bob sobered at this reference to his prowess at cake-baking; but Sister Bess, regardless of his feelings, mischievously suggested,

"You might make molasses candy for sale."

"It's out of season," returned Bob, with dignity. "I guess we'll lay in a stock of sour-balls."

"I'll tell you what I'll do for you," said Bess, relenting. "I'll make you some button-hole bouquets."

"Well, but I don't know who'll buy them."

"They'll help to fill up the shelves and make the place look pretty, at any rate."

Bob and John began to feel that the store was going to be a success, and proceeded to overhaul the attic for salable articles.

The sign-board was a very important matter. Dick undertook to paint them one. But as it would take some days for the paint to dry, it was decided that they could begin with a sign chalked on an old slate.

There was not much to be done toward fitting up the store. A piece of canvas was hung on one side, and a loose board was laid across the entrance for protection against the rabble, for as the store was only large enough to hold the proprietors and their goods, the customers were expected to make their purchases over the counter from the outside.

Saturday was to be "Opening Day," and the very earliest people on their way to market saw the two boys working like beavers to get the place to rights in good season. By the time the village boys and girls had breakfasted the new store shone out in all its glory, with the sign "STANLEY BROTHERS" the most conspicuous thing about it.

The marbles and other small articles were arranged as neatly as possible in boxes on the irregular little shelves. Some old story-books with the boys' dictionary were piled modestly in the background, while the jar of sour-balls and the row of tasty little bouquets were paraded on the counter.

This plan, however, did not work well, for the boys found themselves obliged to keep a sharp eye on these attractive goods to prevent their being snatched by evil-disposed visitors, and it was very harassing. The business had been so well advertised beforehand, at recesses and on other occasions, that the whole juvenile population made a point of repairing thither in the course of the day. Most of them came only to look, but that was to be expected on Opening Day.

The boys had not thought of putting up a notice to the effect that it was no trouble to show goods; but if they had, that day's experience would have decided them against it. Some of the boys, and girls too, for that matter, were very provoking, and insisted on seeing everything that was in the store, when they had not the least intention of buying anything.

Some of them, too, were very frank in expressing their opinion about the stock. They would not open a store at all if they could do no better than that.

But the very worst of it all was that all the boys that did want to buy always wanted to trade off something else for the goods; and the girls were more unreasonable still, for they thought that Bob and John ought to be willing to sell everything for pins.

By noon the boys were beginning to feel quite dejected. To be sure, they had taken in a few cents for sour-balls; but then they had reason to believe that several had been feloniously abstracted while the throng was greatest—for part of the time the little counter had been lined three or four deep—so that, on the whole, they would probably lose on this most popular article. Bob and John each ate a sour-ball to restore their spirits.

"They'll melt in this bright sun," said Bob, "and the flowers are wilting. We had better put them back in the shade. What shall we put front instead?"

"Slate-pencils," suggested John.

"Pooh! Catch a boy buying a slate-pencil on Saturday."

The question was still unsettled when the welcome sound of the dinner bell was heard. Obeying the first impulse, both boys started for home. Then Bob stopped,

"I don't believe it's safe to leave the store alone," he said.

"No, of course not. You stay till I come back. I'm awfully hungry."

"I guess I'm as hungry as you are," returned Bob, but John was half-way across the street; so Bob, calling to him to hurry back, sat down, hungrier than ever, to nurse his provocation over that selfish John. There was no help for it; he must try if another sour-ball would stop the gnawings of hunger and sweeten his temper for the next customer.

It seemed as if the whole town must dine at the same hour, for Bob was left quite lonely for a while.

Then John came back, devouring a biscuit as he came, and making some remarks beginning, "Aunt Sue says," which Bob did not stop to hear, for the boys passed each other in the middle of the street like two oppositely bound locomotives.

II.

Bob staid a long time. Neither did he move as swiftly on his return trip as he had when he started out.

"I'll tell you what it is, John," he said, at the first opportunity, "we'll have to take in some outside partners, after all. A couple of the Flemings could help us first-rate. They always have their meals later than we do."

"Well," said John, "I don't know but it would be a good thing to have somebody to share the responsibility."

"But I don't see how we can make room for any more boys inside here. It's crowded enough now."

"We don't all need to be inside at once. One could be floor-walker, and one a detective, or something in the crowd. I'd like it. It's tiresome sitting in this little place all day. I got awfully cramped this morning."

So overtures were made to Tom and Fred Fleming, who felt quite flattered, and accepted the honor at once. After some discussion they were installed as silent partners, and contributed their quota of fish-hooks and decaleomanie pictures, etc., to the now flourishing business.

The shop being so near, Aunt Sue and Bessie visited it in the afternoon to see how the boys were getting on.

They were shocked to see some of their own possessions airing in the new store. An old set of false curls hung dangling on a nail, like a scalp adorning an Indian wig-wam as an honorable trophy.

"You outrageous boys!" exclaimed Aunt Sue, as she seized and confiscated it. "Where did you get this?"

"Out of the attic," said Bob, meekly. "I thought you were done with it."

"But it's not for sale if I am done with it. I'm surprised at you."

Aunt Sue seemed really hurt, and was scarcely mollified by Bob's saying, coaxingly, "Oh, now, Aunt Sue, don't be vexed. I always liked to see them hanging down your neck. They looked so pretty, I thought somebody else might be glad to get them."

By this time Bessie had discovered a tin-type of herself among a lot of cheap pictures, and her wrath burst forth on John, who was just congratulating himself on having escaped his aunt's wrath.

"I'd like to know what right you have to offer my picture for sale," she said, indignantly.

"It's not yours. It's mine. You gave it to me on my birthday."

"And that's all you care for it! I'll be careful how I ever give my picture to another boy. Give it to me this minute."

"Why, no, Bess. It shows how much we admire it. Other folks do too. I had an offer for it this morning, but I couldn't make the change."

Bessie's eyes flashed; and Aunt Sue, coming to the rescue, quietly laid the picture in her bag with the curls.

"I think you had better show us your whole stock, boys," she said, calmly. "What are your skates doing here?"

"I'm going to sell them. I'd rather have a bicycle than skates any day."

"Very well; only if you part with them don't expect to have a new pair given to you when winter comes. What books have you? Why, boys, you are not going to sell your dictionary?"

"Oh, I'm tired of looking through it. The old bother!"

"It must be taken home," said Aunt Sue, with decision. "It won't do to have your father's dictionaries thumbed and dog-eared in this way. You must keep your own."

The boys were beginning to think that the custom of their immediate relatives was not going to be profitable. But the seizures were over now, and Aunt Sue actually bought in John's old copy of Original Poems. Bessie, too, concluded to be forgiving, and she and Aunt Sue made several other purchases, so that they left the boys in good spirits in spite of the bad beginning.

In the trying morning hours the boys had decided to close early every Saturday afternoon "for the sake of their clerks." But they felt better after the Flenings came to their assistance, and did not close until six o'clock, when everything had to be packed in boxes and carried home until Monday. Before doing this, however, they took an account of stock and balanced their accounts, which was a comparatively simple matter, as they sold nothing on credit. Aunt Sue had bought half their supply of bird-seed, and Molly Fleming had taken all the bouquets at half price to distribute in the infant school the next morning. The boys spent the evening in talking over the events of the day.

"If we did so well on the first day, what may we not expect on the second?" was the feeling with which the young merchants began business on Monday. But Monday brought new trials. The goods had all to be packed away, and the store closed by school-time, which seemed rather humiliating. Of course the boys intended to resume punctually at twelve o'clock. But how unlucky! They all unaccountably missed their lessons, and were kept in to correct them, so that they lost the whole of their noon trade.

Perhaps this only gave greater zest to the afternoon spell, for they kept open quite late that evening. Still, with all their devotion, business flagged. Infant schools could not absorb a stock of bouquets every day, and Aunt Sue had enough bird-seed to last her a week. The sour-ball business proved to be quite a losing one, for the luscious things melted away mysteriously even when kept in the shade, although each partner kept a strict watch on himself, and seldom, oh, very seldom, refreshed himself with one.

Things got so serious that the four partners held a business meeting that evening after the store closed.

"We've got to do something, boys, or we'll break before the week's out, sure as fate," said Fred Fleming.

By Tuesday the boys had that care-worn look that men acquire when they can't make both ends meet. The other boys really pitied them, and some of them actually bought slate-pencils on their way to school in the afternoon, though they did not need them.

That very afternoon an occurrence took place which threatened to end the boys' store-keeping quite tragically.

An organ-grinder, with his red-coated monkey, planted himself just beside the pile of lumber and began to play. This pleased Tom and Bob, who happened to be in sole charge at the time. They enjoyed a monkey's antics as well as any one.

Perhaps it was the flag waving over the sign of the "Stally Brothers" that suggested to the man to play "Ranly round the Flag, Boys." He played it with a will, and the boys, and girls too, rallied with a vengeance. The young merchants found their store again a grand centre of attraction.

The monkey seemed particularly delighted with it, for, after dancing and bowing on the organ-top a short time, he leaped upon the counter, and before the proprietors knew what he was about he had thrust his paw into the box of rubber balls, and was throwing a ball into the crowd.

A shout of delight greeted this feat. Tom and Bob each made a dive after the monkey, but he dexterously eluded them, and threw another ball.

Of course the balls were thrown back at him, and in a moment the air seemed full of them, flying in every direction. The boys could not turn their heads but bounce would come a ball into their eyes, and if they tried to say, "You rascal," the words would be cut short by a ball flying into their mouths. The uproar was tremendous, and the crowd grew larger every minute. The monkey seemed to be in his element, dancing and jumping from shelf to shelf, grinning and chattering with all his might, and when there was no ball convenient he did not hesitate to throw something else.

The boys grew desperate when they saw their slate-pencils and Jew's-harps flying through the air.

"See here!" they shouted to the organ-grinder, who was now peacefully playing the "Marseillaise Hymn," "this thing is getting dangerous. Take your old monkey away, will you? You'll have to pay for all the damage. Do you hear?"

It would have been surprising if he had heard in all that uproar, but he gave no sign.

Tom made another lunge at the monkey, and fell sprawling over the counter. Then Bob dived at him, but the monkey, reaching down from a high perch, deftly lifted Bob's hat, and threw it into the crowd.

"You rascal. I'll pay you for this," screamed Bob.

But the next thing the monkey did was to plant himself on Bob's head. Bob, with his face as red as the monkey's coat, clutched wildly at him, but the monkey clutched the tighter.

Bob could do nothing but scream and beat at the mischievous animal, first with one hand, then with the other, then with both at once, while the crowd shouted with laughter, until the organ-grinder, seeing that his monkey was really in danger, stopped his music, called off his pet, and began to move away. Then the crowd of children dispersed.

John and Fred, who had been taking their turn "off" when these proceedings began, now made their way to their crest-fallen comrades. Bob was too angry to make any attempt to collect his property. He picked up his battered hat and walked home, saying, "I don't care what becomes of the old things. I've done with them."

A few of their friends were kind enough to assist them in the search, but it was a sorry-looking set of goods that were collected.

"They're half of them gone," said Tom. "I do believe that monkey went off with his cheeks and pockets full of our things."

"I'll have that man prosecuted," said John, fiercely. "Which way did he go?"

"Oh, he's more likely to prosecute us. He says Bob half killed his monkey."

Sadly the boys packed up their damaged goods and carried them home, protesting that they had had enough of store-keeping. The monkey had scratched Bob's head so hard that he was really suffering, and Bess had to run for the arnica bottle, and bandage his head.

Aunt Sue was particularly liberal with the cake and preserves that evening at tea, and if anything could have comforted the boys, it was such thoughtfulness.

A FLIRTATION.

SQUIRRELS, AND HOW TO KEEP THEM.

BY JAMES OTIS.

IT seems almost cruel to catch and cage such a bright, winsome little fellow as a squirrel. In his natural state he seems to be thoroughly happy. His home is a snug little hole in the fork of a tree, and all the nut-bearing giants of the forest pay tribute to him. Bright, happy, "cunning" little fellow, if you must keep him as a pet, lavish upon him such kindness and attention as shall reconcile him to the prison bars, and make him forget his forest home.

The name squirrel comes from the Greek word sciurus, which is made up of two words, signifying shade and tail, indicative of the little creature's habit of shading its entire body when at rest with its tail.

Of the species known to our woods, the most common is the striped squirrel, an industrious little body, fond of his home and family, and seldom given to roving, but one which the confinement of a cage kills in a very short time.

Then there is a little animal known by the boys as a chipmunk, which some naturalists declare is a member of the squirrel family, while others give it the name of dormouse. It makes a good pet, but must be kept in a warm place, and besides the usual food for squirrels it requires milk.

The black squirrel is the largest of its species, and while it will live in a cage, is rarely a tractable animal, requiring a vast amount of patience to induce it even to take its food when any one is looking at it.

Then there is the flying-squirrel, which resembles the striped species. It does not really fly, but has the power of flattening its legs and feet in such a way that they do not look unlike wings. In leaping, the legs and feet sustain it in the air until it almost seems as if it was flying.

It is the gray squirrel that is the most contented in captivity, and the most easily tamed; therefore, if one really thinks it necessary to his happiness to make a prisoner of such a liberty-loving little creature, he should procure one of the gray species.

If the reader is a would-be squirrel owner, and proposes to catch one in the woods, he will be obliged to take just the kind of one that is foolish enough to enter his trap; but if he proposes to buy one, he should select it carefully, for much depends upon the condition of the prisoner in taming or keeping him.

See that the fur is sleek and glossy, for dry, ruffled-looking fur is a sure sign the animal is sick, or pining so for the woods that he will not live very long in a cage. Observe well if the feet are clean, for if they are dirty, he has lost all pride in his appearance, which is another sign of homesickness or some equally serious ailment. The eyes should be bright, and the teeth perfectly white. Yellow teeth are a sign of age, and it is as difficult to tame a very old squirrel as it is to keep him alive in captivity.

Beware of squirrels brought around by men who say they have caught and tamed them. If they look stupid and inactive, the chances are that they have been drugged to make them seem tame, and if they live, they will surely be wild and intractable.

Having made the selection of just such a one as you want for a pet, give him all the comfort possible in the way of a cage. It is better to have a large rough one than a small neat-looking one; and if it is not possible to buy a large cage, make one yourself, and the squirrel will be pleased at the absence of style because of the increased facilities for moving about.

A board thirty-six inches long and sixteen wide is quite as small a base for the house and run-around as should be given. Twenty-two inches of this length should be devoted to the dwelling portion, which should be built something after the style of a one-story cottage, with a second floor just at the slope of the roof, so that the attic may serve as sleeping-room and a place to which the squirrel can retire when he is anxious to be hidden from view.

The lower front of the house may be of wire, so that a portion of his domestic life may be seen. The second floor should have in it an opening about three inches square, which is connected with the first floor by a small strip of board or thin stuff of any kind, placed at an angle, so that he can get "upstairs" without difficulty.

The floors should be of some hard wood, so that they may not absorb water, and the whole place should be cleaned thoroughly once in every three or four weeks. In order to do this readily, it is well to have one side of the house fastened with hinges, so it may be swung open, and then the little fellow can be shut into the wheel during house-cleaning. The lower compartment should have a wire door, through which food can be given.

The wheel in which he takes his tread-mill exercise any tin or wire worker can make, and the hole which connects it with the house should be large enough to prevent any possibility of his getting squeezed if he attempts to go into his house while the wheel is turning rapidly.

Give the little prisoner plenty of nuts of any kind, although those containing the least oil are the best—acorns, wheat, stale bread, a little boiled potato, and once in a very great while a bit of cooked meat. Keep a small dish of water in the cage, and see to it carefully that it is changed each day.

In all dealings with the squirrel it is necessary to be gentle and patient with him, if it is desired to make of him a real pet. Do not force him out of his nest when he goes into it, nor keep him in the wheel when he desires to go into his house.

Each time that he is fed, whistle or make some peculiar sound, and he will soon learn to come when he is called. This is the first step toward teaching him to come into his owner's hands. After he has learned to come at call, hold some particular dainty in the fingers, and do not let him have it until he takes it himself.

When once he has learned to have perfect confidence in his master, he will not scruple to take food from his hands, and in a very short time will be bold enough to explore his pockets, going into them bodily, for something to eat that is a trifle better than his regular fare.

CHAPTER V.

NAN thought that the delight of this day never could be equalled by anything life would bring, even at Beverly. To begin with, she and Miss Phyllis started out in a luxurious carriage, which rolled them through the town, past the butter shop, where Mrs. Rupert was standing in the doorway, and deposited them at Mr. Lennon's large store, into which Nan had never gone half so proudly before.

"You needn't appear to recognize any one, Nan," Miss Phyllis said, just as they went in; and this dashed Nan's spirits just a little, for Mary Seymour, one of the girls in the millinery-room, was a particular friend of her aunt's; but then Miss Phyllis must know best, thought Nan, and she would trust to luck's keeping Mary out of their way.

Everybody was most polite to Miss Rolf; and when she said quietly, "I want to see your handsomest dresses, ready made, for this little girl," Nan could hardly move to follow them upstairs. Out of a long case, dress after dress was taken, held up, tried on, examined, and criticised by Miss Phyllis, who sat languidly with her purse and her note-book, evidently quite regardless of prices. It was well Nan's opinion was not asked, for she would never have dared to choose what Miss Phyllis did for her, a soft seal brown wool costume, handsomely trimmed with silk, and with a jacket to match. Miss Phyllis quietly desired Nan to put these garments on; and when the saleswoman brought her back from the dressing-room, her cousin could not repress a smile of satisfaction; and really little Nan did credit to the quiet, lady-like costume. Miss Phyllis saw a great many possibilities in the child's bright face and pretty, slender figure.

The hat question came next, and here Nan's joy was somewhat dampened by her fear that Mary Seymour would appear and claim acquaintance, and thereby annoy Miss Phyllis; and sure enough, while she was trying on a beautiful brown felt hat with a scarlet wing in it, Mary Seymour's voice was heard cheerily from across the room.

"Why, Nan Rolf," she was saying, "is that you?"

And then Nan saw that her princess could look very different on different occasions. She turned a cold little stare upon poor Mary, and then said, in a tone that the shop-girl could hear perfectly, "Who is that, Annie?"

Now it was the first time Nan had been called by her full name since her father died, and between the start it gave her, and her little worry about Mary Seymour, she hardly knew what to say, and stood looking guiltily at her aunt's friend, with a rush of color in her face.

"It is Mary Seymour," she said, in a low voice.

Miss Phyllis waited a moment, the cold look still on her face; then she took Nan by the hand, and went across the room to where Mary was busy putting bonnet frames into a drawer.

"My little cousin is going away from Bromfield," she said, smiling, but speaking in the very chilliest tone. "Perhaps you had better say 'good-by' to her now. She is going to live with her aunt at Beverley."

Poor Mary stared at the beautiful young lady, and said nothing for a moment; then she stooped down and kissed Nan's little red cheek lightly.

"Well, good-luck go with you, Nannie dear," she said; and half understanding the impression Miss Rolf wished to make, she added, looking up with a sad smile, "I suppose it won't do to expect you to remember us any more, but Tommy 'll miss you dreadfully."

"I'll write him a letter, Mary," Nan exclaimed, and seeing Miss Rolf's look of surprise turn to something like disgust, she added, "Tommy is Mary's lame little brother."

Miss Phyllis said nothing, but led the way back to the hat, and Nan, unable to restrain herself further, whispered, "Miss Rolf, Cousin Phyllis, why did you say I was going to live at Beverley, when it is only a visit?"

Miss Phyllis bit her lip angrily. "Never mind," was all she answered; and then the brown felt hat was chosen, and the purchases went on—gloves, and boots, and some dainty under-linen, and various small belongings, until finally all that remained on Miss Phyllis's list was a dressing-case and a trunk. Nan hardly knew which of the beautiful cases to choose when her cousin left it to her; but finally a black leather one with silver fastenings was selected, and Miss Phyllis directed the shopman to have Nan's initials, A. B. R., put on it in little silver letters.

By this time Nan, in her new brown suit, with her hands in three-button kid gloves, had begun to think she never, never could do justice to the day, to Philip and Marian, and yet a something had stolen over her of half dread to going back to the shop. Already she dreaded her aunt's voice; the noisy, greasy tea table, where only Philip made things endurable for her; so that when, as they left the last store, loading the carriage with parcels, and Miss Phyllis said, "I'm going to keep you for the night, Nan," my little heroine felt more than ever grateful and happy.

CHAPTER VI.

MRS. GRANGE received Nan very cordially when she made her appearance with Miss Rolf. The gentle little lady was quite a revelation to Nan, whose ideas of elderly people were formed entirely on the noisy, overworked matrons she had seen at Mrs. Rupert's. Nan was only allowed a few words with her hostess, and then Miss Rolf carried her off to the little sitting-room upstairs, where, when she had laid aside her hat and jacket, Miss Rolf told her she had better write Mrs. Rupert a note to explain her absence.

"And I want you to word it very carefully, Nan," said Phyllis, coming up to the little girl with a very serious expression. "You know things are changed with you now, and you must begin at once to let your aunt and her family understand that you are not—they can not expect you—to treat them quite as equals."

Nan was still full of the excitement and delight of her good fortune; yet as Phyllis spoke, looking down gravely upon her, there came a blush of mortification into the child's honest face. A tinge of the same color deepened in Phyllis's soft cheeks for just half a moment, but she said, very decidedly:

"Now, Nan, you are not going to be a foolish, obstinate child, I hope? Surely you must know that I and your aunt Letitia understand these things better than a little girl brought up among vulgar people could. Now there must be no nonsense, my dear."

Phyllis's tone was kind, but something in it made Nan see that she expected obedience; and was she not in every way the most wonderful and beautiful creature Nan had ever seen? Nan's doubts vanished while Phyllis laid out note-paper and pen and ink on a dainty little table drawn up to one of the windows; and when Nan placed herself there to write, her cousin sat down by the fire, with her slipped-toes on the fender, and her pretty hands, sparkling with rings, folded gracefully in her lap.

"Now, Nan," she said, "begin your letter. Date it 'The Willows'—that is the name of this place. 'March 8. Dear Mrs. Rupert.'"

Nan smiled quickly.

"Why, Miss—Cousin Phyllis," she said, looking up from the paper, "she would think me crazy: she is Aunt Rebecca, you know."

Miss Rolf's delicate eyebrows drew together in a little frown. She waited a moment, and then, with an impatient sigh, said,

"Very well, let it go—'Dear Aunt Rebecca.'"

Nan's pen scratched on, with many splutterings, for penmanship was her weak point, and had not been considered a very necessary accomplishment in the Rupert household. She looked up presently for further instructions.

"My cousin, Miss Rolf," dictated that young lady, "has decided that I had better remain with her until I go to Beverley." ("Oh!" ejaculated Nan.) "My aunt, Miss Rolf, has invited me to make her a long visit, and as, previous to my going, there are many things to be attended to in my wardrobe, etc., my cousin Phyllis thinks it best to keep me with her. I shall, of course, see you all before I leave."

Nan's pen finally came to a stop.

"That is all," said Phyllis, placidly.

"Then I'll just send my love, I suppose," said Nan.

After a little pause Phyllis said, "Yes," and Nan went to work again. When she brought the letter to her cousin for inspection, this is how it was concluded:

"I hope you are all well, and that you'll tell Mary Seymour, when you see her, that I'll go there before I leave, and I'll write to Tommy; and tell Marian, please, I'll give her and Philip all the pea-nuts that are in my drawer, and I'll write them everything that happens at Beverley. I hope uncle's jaw is better. Your loving niece, Nan."

Phyllis Rolf read the letter with so quiet an air that for a moment Nan felt much relieved, feeling sure it was all right; but the first words startled her.

"That would not do, my dear, at all," Phyllis said, coldly. "You can not go to see this Tommy Seymour, and you had better understand at once that your aunt will not like you to write everything to your cousins here. Now, Nan, do you see what I mean?"

Nan began to see a little more clearly, yet her mind was not yet made up; still, enough of Phyllis's meaning reached her to bring two large tears to her eyes. They rolled down her cheeks, while she looked silently at Phyllis and her letter.

"Yes," was Nan's timid answer.

"Well," said the boy, cheerfully, "we are cousins. My name is Lancelot Rolf. I hope we'll be very well acquainted. So you are going to Beverley."

"Yes," was all Nan could contrive to say again. She longed to ask a dozen questions of the bright, cheerful-looking boy, who, although no older than Philip, looked so very much like a little gentleman.

"Shall you like to go?" Lance said, presently.

Nan really felt she couldn't go on saying "yes" to everything, and so with a great effort she said:

"I want to go very much. Is it—is it nice there?"

"It's a jolly old house where you are going," said Lance, "but I don't know whether you'll enjoy it much, it's so slow, so stupid. Still, perhaps you're not accustomed to much fun." Lance could hardly imagine the cheese-monger's family as very entertaining.

"Oh yes, we have a great deal of fun sometimes," said Nan, gaining confidence. "In winter we coast and skate, and in summer there are always picnics, and sometimes a circus."

"But at home—wasn't there ever any fun at home?"

Nan could not remember anything which impressed her as particularly enjoyable in-doors.

"No," she said, slowly, "I don't think there was. Marian always liked to tend the shop, but I never cared so much for that. I didn't like the smell of the cheeses, don't you know?"

"It was a cheese shop?" Lance looked very much interested.

"Cheese and butter, and eggs and hams." Nan recited the list glibly.

"Well," said Lancelot, very gravely, "there won't be anything like that at Beverley; and see here, Nan, I'll just give you a friendly hint. I don't think I'd talk much about the shop before Cousin Letitia. You see, she might not like it—don't be ashamed of it," added the boy, flushing a little; "I don't mean you to be mean about it, only you won't need to talk of it."

Nan felt that she had begun to put her old life behind her when she was arrayed in the brown cashmere, and now little by little she was learning to feel as the people around her felt; that, after all, she would be expected to act and appear and think very differently about everything

NAN PRESENTED TO MISS PHYLLIS FOR APPROVAL.

"Don't be silly, my dear," said the young lady, standing up and smiling good-naturedly. "There, finish your letter with just your love; that will be the best way."

And so Nan went back to the little table, brushing away those first tears, and quietly obeyed her cousin. Miss Rolf took the letter from her as soon as it was finished, and went out of the room, while Nan sat still, wondering if Beverley would be quite all she hoped for.

Enough excitement remained to make it easy for Phyllis to control her as she wished, and that young lady trusted to time and absence working wonders. While Nan was sitting absorbed in her thoughts, the door opened, and Lance Rolf came suddenly into the room. He was a tall boy, with a spare, handsome face, delicate as Phyllis's in feature, but olive-tinted, and with more sweetness in the brown eyes and the lines of the mouth. He came up to Nan, holding out his hand with a pleasant smile.

"And are you Nan?" he said, looking at her earnestly.

as soon as she was in Beverley.

"What do you do?" said Nan, looking brightly at her new acquaintance. "Do you live at Beverley?"

Lance nodded.

"When I'm home," he said. "I come to school near here, at Barnabas Academy. When I'm home I live quite near to where you're going to be. Oh, I do lots of things! Boys are so different from girls. I'm captain of our baseball club, for one thing, and we are jolly good cricketers too, I tell you. At home I do all sorts of things. Phyllis and I are great chums; Phyllis is a regular brick." He might have said more, but at this moment Phyllis reappeared. Nan looked at her a little anxiously. She wondered if she was going to feel offended with her about the note; but the young lady was perfectly cheerful, and even kissed Nan when she said, "Now, dear, we will go down to supper. Mrs. Grange is waiting."

LITTLE MASTER QUIG.

BY MARY A. BARR.

THIS tale's of little Master Quig,
 Who, being little, wasn't big,
 And many said, who understood,
 That, being bad, he wasn't good.
 When from his school he ran away,
 Most people thought he didn't stay;
 And I have heard, from those who know,
 When he ran fast, it wasn't slow.
 He always studied when compelled,
 And always staid when he was held,
 And always slept when not awake,
 And left the thing he could not take.
 To go to sea one day he planned,
 And being there, was not on land,
 And so stuck on a bar—alas!
 For, being stuck, he could not pass.
 The dark night found him in a fright,
 For, being dark, it was not light.
 The big waves rose and filled the boat,
 And being full, it could not float.
 And so, as I have heard it said,
 They found him in the morning dead.
 And men of sense do still maintain
 He never more was seen again.

The cow jumped over the moon.

The little dog laughed to see such sport;

Hey, diddle, diddle,

And the dish ran away with the spoon.

The cat and the fiddle;

OUR POST-OFFICE BOX.

WYTHEVILLE, VIRGINIA.

We are three little girls who have often read and enjoyed HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE very much. We meet successively at each other's home every Friday evening, and read the stories in it. We live in a beautiful town in the mountains of Southwest Virginia. We attend to the same school, and like our teachers very much. Our parents take all your papers—the MONTHLY, BAZAR, and WEEKLY—and we take YOUNG PEOPLE. We look forward to Wednesday with a great deal of pleasure, for we know it is the day our paper comes. We are so glad to see Mrs. John Lillie is going to write a new story, and we are sure it will be very interesting, as all her others are. Please print this, as we would like to surprise our mamma.

ELLIE C., HELEN S. S., and ESTIE W.

Well, Ellie, Susie, and Helen, though I do not know which of you has brown eyes and which blue, who is the tall slender girl, which the merry-faced one with the dancing dimples, and which the plump little maiden who always thinks before she speaks, I send my love to each of you, and am glad to hear of your pleasant Friday evenings. You and the thousands of other girls for whom Mrs. Lillie has written her charming story have a real treat before you in reading it. I sometimes wish myself a girl again just to feel for an hour the delight I used to when beginning a beautiful new story. The girls who form Mrs. Lillie's audience have better times in the story way than girls did when your mamma and myself were at your age. But I, for one, still dearly love a bright sketch or a beautiful serial; and if I were near you, I might sometimes glide in and take an easy-chair in the corner on your reading evenings—that is, if you would let me in on your promising to be very good indeed.

Some of you who have empty cologne or scent bottles may make very pretty presents for your friends by covering them with silk or plush, and finishing off with a dainty lace ruffle and a narrow ribbon around the neck. A beautiful tidy which I saw the other day was crocheted in heavy cord, and looped over crimson silk. Very lovely plaques are made of the birch-bark plates on which butter is sent home by the grocer. They must be covered very neatly with silk or satin, on which a design is worked or painted. The pretty little Japanese umbrellas, which cost but a few cents, may be inverted, opened, and caught at each point with a ribbon. Suspended from a nail, they make dainty little scrap-books.

The letter which follows contains a suggestion which the Postmistress thinks excellent. She will keep a corner in the Post-office Box for all such letters as our correspondent invites:

BOSTON, MASSACHUSETTS.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS—I remember, when I was eight or ten years younger than I am now, how hard it used to be for me to find anything new to make for Christmas for all the aunts and cousins, and now, as Christmas is drawing near, my younger sister comes to me and says, "Can you think of something for Christmas?" I want something for Aunt Mary and Aunt Lizzie, something I have not made for them before. I have no doubt that many other little people say the same thing. Now, I have a plan to propose to you, and if you think it a good one, will you mention it in the Post-office Box? Let each little girl—and boy too, if he wishes—write and describe something that he or she makes for Christmas, and then if you will be so good as to publish the letters I think before Christmas we may have quite a variety of ideas. Of course each article mentioned would not be new to all, but it would be new to some, and I think many little girls would be greatly aided. Now what do you think?

ONE OF YOUR OLDER READERS.

BABY'S DAY.

Awake at five in the morning,
Bright as a little bird,
Cooling and laughing and crowing
Before a person has stirred.

Carried on papa's shoulder,
Lying on mamma's arm.
Never a king was leader,
Or safer from slightest harm.

Going to ride with sister,
Taking a cozy nap,
Resting before his dinner
On grandmamma's silken lap.

Creeping over the carpet,
Playing with pretty toys;
Baby's the dearest darling,
The prettiest, best of boys.

SUSIE PATTON.

OLFAK, NEW YORK.

I think that Frankie would be a pretty name for Marion W.'s baby brother. I have nine dolls. Their names are Mollie, Lottie, Edith, Eva, Lena, Christina, Carrie, Johnnie, and Bertie. I like your stories all very much, especially "Toby Tyler," "Mr. Stubbs's Brother," and "The Girl." I send my love to the Postmistress.

LENA MATTHEWS.

MADISON, NEW JERSEY.

I am a little boy six years old. My brother Lonnie takes YOUNG PEOPLE, and has every number it. Baby Roe and I have had colds, so I could not get to school, but Lonnie could. I wanted to print in school. This is my first letter. I hope you will print it.

HOWARD B. G.

Your little note was printed so nicely that it was as plain as though the letters had been formed by the type-writing machine. After all, there is no machine of which I ever heard so wonderful as the four little fingers and thumb of a boy's hand. Ask papa and mamma if they don't agree with me.

SALEM, NORTH CAROLINA.

I have taken YOUNG PEOPLE from the first number, and I like it very much. I have written one letter to the Post-office Box, but I thought I would write again. My friend Howard R. has written too. We two have formed a printing firm under the name of P. & R. We made four dollars clear profit, with which we bought each a pair of roller skates. We have over three dollars in our bank now. Some of my playmates and I have formed a club under the name of Holiday Club, and some of my boy friends and I have formed a military company by the name of Home Guards. We parade in the academy play-grounds. The other day we fought almost all the battles of the Revolution.

A. H. P.

All the battles of the Revolution in one day! I wish you slept a wink the night after such tremendous exertion. But boys are made of steel springs and India rubber, and can stand a good deal of pounding. Please send me word about the various doings of your holiday club, and don't let the fun interfere with your studies, or else the preceptors and professors may veto your good times. I am glad you are so successful as amateur printers.

NEW YORK CITY.

I am a little boy nine years old. I have a cat and a kitten. The cat's name is GIPSY, but I have not named the kitten yet. I take HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, and I like it very much. The other day my dog fell from a chair and hurt its leg, but it is well now.

CRIS S.

Dear little Robin D., who often sends answers to puzzles, was not well, and so mamma became her amanuensis, sent her answers and her new puzzles, which will see the light before long, and this pleasant little message to the Postmistress and to Marion W.

I hope Robin is quite well by this time.

Robin says: "Mamma, let the Postmistress say my little pet bird Jimmie died, and wasn't it too bad, but the next day I had a beautiful white dove and a dear little bird whose name is Monie, but I still mourn for Jimmie, whose cage was draped in mourning for a whole week. We buried him in our yard."

Robin thinks that Edgar is a very pretty name for a boy, or Irving. See, I don't really know who I like best, and Marion W.'s dear baby brother. She says, "If our little girl may put in more than one name for Marion to choose from, put both Irving and Edgar in from Robin D."

I am very sorry little Jimmie died. When Marion chooses a name, she must not forget to send us all word what it is, as we feel quite an interest, don't we, children?

BOSTON, MASSACHUSETTS.

I want to ask you to tell me a pretty name for a little kitty, because I don't know any nice ones. Now I want to tell you about where I went last summer. I went to Edgemoor, which is very near the sea-side, and is a very pleasant place. I went in bathing only twice while I was there, but went in wading nearly every day. I went in a sail boat once, and had a very nice sail, and then I went down the beach a little way, and caught minnows, but couldn't. Good-by. ALICE S.

Muff is a nice name for a kitty.

Let me tell you about a kitty which a little boy friend of mine had for his pet. It was a black kitty, I believe, though I am not sure. He carried it everywhere with him, and when he was practicing one afternoon, he set it on the piano that it might hear him play. It nestled its head cunningly on its tiny paws, and listened with all its might.

Somebody called the little boy away for a moment. When he came back the kitty was gone.

High and low they hunted for it. Mamma, nurse, two little sisters, and even the baby, called Kitty! Kitty! but no kitty answered. After a long time there came a faint little meow on the air; and where do you suppose they found that small cat? Why, in the piano, where she had taken a cozy nap.

NASHVILLE, TENNESSEE.

Most boys and girls tell about their pets. I have none, except my little brother, two years and a half old. I have two sisters and this sweet baby. I was born in Edgemoor, near Louisville, Kentucky, to Nashville about a month ago, and am very homesick to go back again. We spent the summer at Bon Aqua Springs, not far from here, and because I have no mamma, and her name is Eva Wallace; she will be four years old on Christmas. My little brother tries to call us girls "girle," and he says "dirle." He calls me "Blue-eye dirle," my sister Grace "Blue-eye dirle," and sister Florence "Brown-eye dirle." His name is Theodore. We have taken YOUNG PEOPLE from the beginning, and think it is the best of papers. Mamma takes the BAZAR and MAGAZINE. My papa is away most of the time, and we are always glad when he comes home. I go to school, and am in the Fifth Grade. I study reading, spelling, arithmetic, geography, and drawing. I am eleven years old.

BESSIE W.

SOUTH BEND, INDIANA.

I like YOUNG PEOPLE very much. I am a little girl eight years old, and live on a farm five miles from the city. I go to school now, but mamma will teach me at home this winter. I have two pets, a white lamb called chicken named Polly, and a white kitty named Snow. I had a canary bird, but he was sick and died; his name was Billy. I have three dolls; I do not play with them very much, but because I have no one to play with me, I play with them. I had a dog, but his name is Paul. I will write again as soon as I can write better.

GEORGIANA D.

DREITON, PENNSYLVANIA.

I have lately returned from Europe, and I enjoyed the pile of Magazines I found. I brought home a gondola from Venice, and I also brought a curious swan which I saw them make at the glass-works. I had a splendid time in dear old London. We saw the Queen and the Princess of Wales. We saw the wine-vaults. We crossed the Alps in four horse carriages, and I made snow balls in June. YOUNG PEOPLE is the best paper out.

OCCLEY B. C.

You have many delightful things to remember about your trip abroad. I hope you kept a journal.

NORWALK, CONNECTICUT.

I am eleven years old, and live in Norwalk in the summer, and in New York City in the winter. I have no brothers or sisters, but I have two who are grown up, and I have a brother at college. We are going to New York on the first of next month. I enjoy HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE very much, and look forward to its coming with great pleasure. As you wanted to hear from my dog or boy who had a garden, I thought I would tell you about mine. I planted in my garden this summer potatoes, onions, tomatoes, strawberries, and celery, besides flowers. I had enough potatoes for the whole family for dinner, so I had them on the table that day, and I hope to have my celery-to-morrow. The cook made me some crayons from the receipt you put in YOUR YOUNG PEOPLE, but it wouldn't harden, so she made a chocolate cake, and I had it on the table to-night. As I have no more to tell about I think I will close. HARRY C. M.

You were a famous little gardener, and deserve great praise.

ALLEGHENY, PENNSYLVANIA.
I am a little girl nearly eleven years old. I will tell you about my summer trip. I can not tell all the places we went, but our place was the White Mountains of New Hampshire. There are very fine views, especially from the top of Mount Washington. You would laugh to see the funny little car that runs up and down the steep, and as you go up you see nothing but rocks. Mamma thought it was frightful, but I did not. Well, good-by. ANNIE E. S.

I might have laughed when I was eleven years old, dear, but I never got up a steep mountain nowadays without feeling like your mamma, that there is danger as well as pleasure about the ascent. I am glad you have been to the top of Mount Washington, and have looked from there over the great mountains and deep valleys of New England.

MILTON, ONTARIO, CANADA.
I am a little girl twelve years old, and live in a small town thirty miles from Toronto. We are always very glad when your paper comes. I love to read the letters in the Post-office Box. I like to get a card from my father and mother, and four of my uncles are in Montana, and my aunt and her children are going out there next week. My uncle and his youngest brother belong to the prospecting party, and will go to the top of the Rocky Mountains and Yellowstone Park, and snamer, and write home delightful interesting descriptions of the wonders to be seen there—the great geysers, the glaciers, the high mountains, and canyons. One of the canyons is the deepest of all; it is several thousand feet deep, and at the bottom is a rushing, roaring river. One of my uncles has landed there. It is so deep that if you go down into it and look up you can see the stars at three o'clock in the afternoon. The geysers spout up water to a tremendous height. One of them I think it is called the Excelsior—throws water up to a height of three hundred feet. Often the eruptions are preceded by rumblings and shakings like an earthquake. Once when the geysers were in the way the earth began to quake, and the water in the basin spouted ever so high, and the sky was filled with water and pieces of rock, and they had to run to get out the way. My father says that if we go to Montana if father stays there; and if we do, mother says that we may take an occasional trip to the Park, and then I will write and tell you of some of the things we see there.

BECCA R.

The cunning little letter which follows was sent by a little girl five and one-half years old to her young lady sisters away from home. This little girl lives near a railroad, and every day she and her brothers wait for their conductors, as they call them, and wave to them as the cars rush past the door. By the "tassels with the board on" little Amy meant a lambequin which belonged on the mantel. Jumbo is a huge toy elephant greatly admired by the little folks in Amy's nursery:

TENAFLY, NEW JERSEY.

DEAR LOUISE AND MAGGIE.—It will soon be Roy's birthday. If you don't come home quick, you won't be here before it comes. Roy says he can walk with our talking hold of him. He can stand up by the bath-tub. May S. don't know some of the words of her uncles—Louise. I say my lessons every day at home, and then I say them in school. I did not get a bad mark to-day; sometimes I do. I get apples in B. S. yard—they don't care—and take them to school over recess, and then I take them home. Mamma has sent me, so hard, and we loathe her, and she sends us outdoors. When it rains she don't; then we stay in the house, and play with our toys. Sarah's back, and then I take them to school every Tuesday. We take walks with her sometimes. Mary's here too, and sometimes she goes out with her husband. I like him, and it gives me peonies. I would like to see these and see your big dog, Fran. Some Sunday afternoons papa's tired, and he don't want to go riding. We did go last Sunday. Last Sunday we took Roy. Marian plays with me every day, and mamma says I love her when she hurts him. Clifford has to get his teeth fixed, and we can't go to P. until next month. Every day papa goes out to see the men fixing his horse, and he gives me five cents every day. I have a little party; no one is coming, only us. Mamma has to send out when she wants papa—away out to the freestle-work. Mamma writes this letter, and I do the words. I have a few lots of things in the corner by the bookcase again. Clifford's got lots of cars now, and he plays with them 'most every day. He's got a new tin train of cars from the Fair. We're getting our stoves fixed. There's fire in the sitting-room. Your tassels with the board on is up in the front parlor. We've got a Jumbo from the Fair. We take Jumbo out to see our doctors. Mine is away, and ain't home yet. Roy goes around picking up everything, and gets things out of mamma's basket, and dumped it over twice. It's near winter, and we've got the sleds down. A kiss for Maggie, and a kiss for Louise. Love for Maggie, and love for Louise. AMY D.

FREMONT, NEBRASKA.

DEAR "HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE."—My brother Paul takes HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, and I think it is a very nice paper. I was eight years old the 7th of September. I have a sister who is four years old. And we have a horse named Dick; he is gentle and a very nice horse, and he eats apples as well as any boy can. He will shake hands with either leg. I go to school, and I am already in the Third Reader. My teacher's name is Miss S. And we have got a calf called Roy, and she is a very gentle and nice calf, and we have a pretty wild cow. BERNIE C.

SAN FRANCISCO, CALIFORNIA.

I am a little boy nine years old. This is my first letter. I like the story of "The Cruise of the Casco (Ship)" and "Mr. Stubbs's Brood." I commenced going to school in March, 1881, and am now in the Seventh Grade. I was honorably promoted last June. I am trying very hard to be the same this term. I am nearly a year old. On Saturday with my papa I take a sail with my boat. I can swim a little. I live in the city, and can not leave as much time as the little boys in the country; but I shall go to the country next vacation. ALLEN G. W.

A boy who tries hard is sure to succeed. When next you are promoted write again, as I like to keep an account of my boys when they do well. I am glad you can swim.

FRANK AND JOE.—The twenty numbers of HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE containing the story of "Toby Tyler" will cost you eighty cents. By sending $1 to Messrs. HARPER & BROTHERS you may obtain Toby Tyler in a beautiful bound volume, handsomely illustrated.

SALT.—Yes, Daisy, you are right in your supposition that people in very old times were alarmed if any one spilled salt on the table at a meal. It was fancied that the unlucky accident was the sign of a quarrel between two of the company. However, I attach no importance to such signs, even when they are ancient, and if you came to dine with me, and the salt-cellar happened to be upset, I should not trouble for our friendship.

Among the Arabs salt is regarded as sacred, and you who happen to be the guest of a Bedonin, who unseeing you in the desert would not be, and be glad of the chance, you are perfectly right if you share his bread and salt; he will protect you against all enemies. You see, that salt among these wild people is the emblem of hospitality. The Romans thought it unfortunate to sit down at a feast where the salt had been forgotten. The Greeks had the same feeling. It was also considered very thoughtless to leave salt unlocked overnight.

I hope, Daisy dear, that while reading and studying about these curious superstitions you will take care not to believe in them yourself.

For the information of some of our new subscribers who write to ask we repeat that there is no charge for the publication of exchanges. They should be brief. State first what you desire to offer, and then what you wish to receive. Please write with black ink as plainly as you can, and sign your full name and post-office address. Birds' eggs and fire-arms are prohibited as articles of exchange. The Editor reserves the right to exclude any exchange in whole or in part if for any reason it is considered unfit for YOUNG PEOPLE.

Having sent your letter, you should wait very patiently for your turn, as the department is always crowded, and no exchange can ever be printed in the paper next issued after its reception.

To avoid misunderstanding, exchangers should always write fully to each other and receive replies before sending away their articles. Each should arrange in this way about the necessary expense of the mail or express. Articles should not be sent to the office of YOUNG PEOPLE, but directly to the persons with whom they are to be exchanged.

SUCCESSFUL WIGGLENS.—We should be glad if Hattie M. Pearly, B. F. M., and A. W., who have been successful in reproducing our artist's idea of Wiggle No. 29, would each send us his or her full name and address.

THE FLY CATCHER.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

FLY-CATCHERS, BLUE-GUM-TREES, AND SPIDERS' WEBS.

BY ARTHUR LINDSLEY.

"FOUR hundred feet high! I don't believe a word of it. Nobody ever saw a tree four hundred feet high; you nor any one else, Tom."

"I did not say I ever did, Jack, so don't quite bowl me over like a ten-pin. But I say this: I have seen and I have measured those that were fully three hundred feet in height—one was twelve feet over it. And persons on whose truthfulness I could depend have told me that away 'in the bush' they had seen blue-gum-trees which were certainly a hundred feet higher than any of those which were about us, and which I measured. I am like Unele Remus: 'That's what makes I say what I does.'"

"But, Tom, do have a little sense about you. Four hundred feet! Whew! We are here in Maeao, and there is nothing to measure by; but you have just come from New York. Now imagine yourself standing in Broadway at the head of Wall Street, and one of your beautiful blue-gum-trees growing on the opposite side of the street, and running up alongside of Trinity Church, and when it gets to the top of the spire very coolly going on a hundred and twenty feet higher. Why, Tom, I am ashamed of you."

"All right, Jack, only I wish you would just step over to Australia and mention to a few of the people that it is quite absurd to let their trees grow to such a ridiculous height. I landed there late in December, and a few days afterward I spoke of some of their strange productions to a man who had come out in the same ship with me, a thorough Londoner. 'Ya-as, you know, quite so—aw—but out yer, where—aw—they have Christmas in the—aw—middle of summer, you can't—aw—you can't quite tell, as you would at 'ome,' and I thought so."

This was one day when Jack and I were examining the nests made by the swallows, the sight which brought to my mind a nest which I had seen in Australia, which, though made of totally different materials, had yet a somewhat similar look.

I mentioned it to Jack, and as the nest is always built on a eucalyptus, or at least of eucalyptus bark, it led me to refer to the eucalyptus-trees themselves. They are in Australia always called gum-trees, the Eucalyptus globulus being the blue-gum, and the wonderful height to which that species grows, and which I mentioned incidentally and without any thought of raising a storm, induced Jack to "pitch into" me, as he termed it, so fiercely.

"But come now, old fellow, do you mean it? Really, honestly?"

"Certainly I mean it, Jack. I am not joking. The three hundred is the simple truth, and I am inclined to believe that the larger story may be also true."

"Well, then, I will take it all back. But what was that you were saying about a nest? Nothing in the style of this sort of thing, I suppose?"

"Oh no; mine was quite different; but the way its fibres were woven and bound together gave it a somewhat similar look. Very fortunately I have here a drawing of the nest and of the bird."

This, of course, took Jack's attention on the instant; his love of natural history caught at the idea of something new, and he began to examine the drawing with great interest and care. "Queer little beggar, is he not? By-the-way, is that one of your wonderful gum plants—eucalyptus you called it?"

"That is meant for eucalyptus foliage, Jack, but it is not accurate. It may, however, give you some idea of the tree, and also of the fruit, which is a hard, almost stony, cup-like nut. The general look of the bark and stem is given tolerably."

"But how about that nest, my boy? What is there so astonishing as to the nest? You recollect Mr. Twain's comment on the Jumping Frog at Angel's Camp, 'I don't see no p'int about that frog that's any better than any other frog.' Well, that is the way the present attraction strikes me. I have nothing to say against the nest; may be a very good nest; dare say it is. But then there was a phoebe-bird in New Haven that used to build a very good nest, and a bluebird too, to say nothing of the orioles!—and Jack looked as if he thought he had rather caught me, and had said a pretty good thing.

"It is clear that you don't appreciate my little gobe-mouche, Jack. We will make a comparison. When your swallow wanted to mend his nest if it was broken, what did he use, cotton or linen?"

"Cotton or linen! Go 'way! what are you talking about? He just wove the fibres together."

"Just so. My gobe-mouche did not do that way; he was in a higher circle of life. When he needed to mend he used silk, and in fact he used silk from the beginning."

"Tom, have you got any sense left in you? What is a gobe-mouche? And what are you talking about?"

"For the benefit of those who do not understand foreign languages I will translate. A gobe-mouche is a fly-catcher."

"There I have got you, my boy; there I have got you. Do you mean to tell me that the bird sitting on that nest is a fly-catcher? But I forgot. Maybe, down there where Christmas comes in the summer, they have different fly-catchers fit on those of other parts of the world."

"You know I am not much of a naturalist, Jack, and I should hesitate to attempt enlightening you on any such matter, but in this case I am backed up by good authority. Though I have spoken of Australia, and though I saw many of them there, yet my first acquaintance with the species was made in Van Dieman's Land instead. When I returned to Hobart Town I met Professor Murray, who happened to be there, and submitted my collections to his examination. He labelled the bird for me Rhipidura albiscapa, and I found that Rhipidura is a species in the family of the fly-catchers, so that I am sure I must be right."

"Very correctly and scientifically quoted. I bow to the Professor. A fly-catcher the little fellow is and always shall be. Now go on with the nest."

"Well, that nest is a wonderfully neat affair, Jack. What do you suppose it is made of? The drawing can scarcely give you an idea. It is built of eucalyptus bark and spiders' webs. The bark has the tendency to split up into long, slender, fibrous strips, and you can pull them out as fine as threads, almost as fine as hair. These the little gobe-mouche works off for herself, or for himself (for both male and female assist in the nest-building), and uses as the main material—the warp, so to speak, in the weaving; but then the woof is very different. All through the forests in Australia and in Van Dieman's Land spiders abound, some of them of large size. Their webs are to be seen in every direction, and they are so strong that I have seen small birds even stopped by them. The Rhipidura gathers these webs, at first singly, and then in patches and in bunches, and works them craftily in with the eucalyptus fibres; and if she had spun threads of silk for the purpose she could not have produced a finer effect. The webs are very bright and shining, and coming twisted in through the gray fibres and threads of the bark, they make a mass—for you see the nest is built up quite solidly from the bottom—that has a neat and silvery look particularly attractive."

"Very satisfactorily told, Tom, for one who professes not to be a naturalist. But what sort of looking person is the little gobe-mouche himself? Rather plain, I should fancy."

"Very plain, Jack; decidedly plain. As nearly as I recollect them, they are of a deep sooty brown on the back and breast, all other parts below being yellowish; then you have the throat white, as well as the space above the eye and a spot behind it, together with the edges of some of the wing feathers and those of the tail, the bill and feet being black. That is about the way I remember him. At all events, I know there were no bright colors about him."

"Not a very ornamental member of society certainly; sorry for him. But maybe he made it up vocally. Some of the fly-catchers are very sweet singers."

"I can not think that he excelled even in that. They seemed to be very gentle and easy-going little souls. They came about the houses as familiarly as could be, and I have often seen them come hopping up on the bushes within live or six feet of me. But they seemed to have no musical ambition whatever. All that I ever heard was a feeble note now and then—nothing that you could call singing. But they had one curious habit which I never saw displayed by any other bird. It was this:

"In the bright days of spring, which you know come there in October, I used often to watch them. One would start from a bush and go almost straight upward, perhaps several hundred feet. He acted always as though he was driven by a sort of frenzy. I used to fancy to myself that it was a kind of poetical and musical inspiration. His tail would be spread as widely as he could stretch it, his wings fluttering and quivering, his feathers ruffled, and everything about him indicating intense excitement, while every few seconds he would burst out into a series of joyful cries, really sweet, though you could not fairly call it a song.

"He would go on that way till he reached his highest point, I thought till he tired himself out, when all at once he would stop, come very humbly and quietly down, sit awhile, and off he would go again. A curious habit, but I have seen them do it hundreds of times. That is all there is about him; but what a queer thing it is for me to be giving you a lecture about birds!"

"All right, Tom; you will do yourself credit as a naturalist some of these days."

A WILD-GOOSE CHASE

A Thanksgiving Poem.

BY JOSEPHINE POLLARD.

THANKSGIVING! When Effie heard it she knew very well what it meant,

For always at Grandma Spicer's Thanksgiving-day had been spent, With aunts and uncles and cousins, dogs, cats, and pumpkin pies, And nuts and apples, frolicsome games, and many a glad surprise.

Is "Fanksgivin'-day to-morrer?" over and over again Effie would ask her parents, begging them to explain How many days and weeks must pass, and endeavor to make it clear

Why Thanksgiving-day at grandma's came only once in a year.

The Governor's proclamation, for the good of the nation planned, Little Effie was much too young and too flighty to understand, But she comprehended the meaning of preparations to start For Grandma Spicer's; and no one could have a more thankful heart.

But this year the floods had broken away the barriers strong, And over the roads and the meadows went roaring and rushing along, Bearing away the bridges, and whatever else there might be In their track; and the narrow streamlet stretched out to a great wide sea.

There were lives lost, too, in the torrent that was all the while being fed By the great black clouds that hung like a mantle of gloom o'erhead,

And as soon as the sun shone out again the dismal troop to disperse,

Men gathered in solemn crowds, and said, "Thank God that it is no worse!"

Effie had heard her father say, as he brushed away a tear, That he wouldn't be able to travel about very much this year, And the little maiden thought 'twould be a bitter drop in her cup

If the visit to Grandma Spicer's was to be given up.

For how could they keep Thanksgiving all alone by themselves, Even with lots of pies and things spread out on the pantry shelves?

And how could Grandma Spicer give thanks in a proper way If none of them went to see her, to help her keep the day?

Thus reasoned the little maiden, who grew very sad and sedate, As if a puzzle were twisting itself about in her curly pate, And as she'd been always cheerful, and rather to romps inclined, 'Twas feared that her father's troubles had worried the baby mind.

'Twas the day before Thanksgiving, as searching the place around,

From garret to cellar, from barn to shed, little Effie could not be found,

And all the treasures that had been swept away in the vast abyss, Though grievous to lose, could not compare with a loss so great as this.

She was surely stolen from them like poor little Charley Ross And Lizzie Selden! God pity the bearers of such a cross!

They sought for her in the dismal swamp, and off by the lonely church;

They looked in the well, and, as night came on, with lanterns kept up the search.

In a village some ten miles distant was Grandma Spicer's abode, And the way to it was over a rugged and lonesome road, And Effie's father and mother drove over to tell their sorrow, And the reason why in fasting and prayer they'd have to spend the morrow.

But Grandma's eyes had a twinkle in them as she soberly said, "Well, now you're so worn and weary, you'd better go right to bed;

Those only are worthy the sweet who have tasted the bitter drink,

And it may be the dawn is breaking—is nearer now than you think."

They closed the door of their chamber, heavy and sick at heart; In the festival of the morrow determined to take no part;

And turning they saw—what was it?—the old-fashioned trundle-bed,

And there, asleep on the pillow, their own little "curly-head!"

"Effie! Effie!" the mother screamed; "I have found my child at last."

"Effie! Effie!" the father cried, his tears coming thick and fast; And all that the naughty maiden said, as she quietly sucked her thumb,

Was, "It's Fanksgivin'-day to-morrer, and gran'muvver said you'd come."

Oh, that was a rare Thanksgiving! the lifting of soul above The things of earth, to the thought of God's goodness and infinite love;

And when the story of floods and misfortunes the group rehearse, Each looks in a dear one's face and feels there are trials that might be worse.

And when Effie has told her story—the troublesome little elf!—How she started all right for grandma's, and suddenly lost herself, And how scared she was, with many a loving kiss and embrace They forgive the little "goosie" that started this wild-goose chase.

Upon Fone a School-master

Fone fayer those mighty whiskers he do's wear,
 Are twigs of birch, and willow, growing there:
 Is so, we'll think too, when he do's condemne
 Boyes to the lash, that he do's whip with them.

ROBERT HERRICK.

TO many of the readers of YOUNG PEOPLE the name of Herrick is familiar as the author of the beautiful poems "To Daffodils" and "To Blossoms," and when they grow older they will find that he wrote hundreds of equally beautiful lyrics, but in a style not quite easy for them to understand as yet. For Herrick died more than two hundred years ago, and wrote in the manner of his time. The picture on this page, taken from a superb holiday volume of selections from his poems, illustrated by Mr. E. A. Abbey, and just published by Harper & Brothers, shows how the stern school-master of other days was a terror to boys who did not learn their lessons.

MIKE'S "POOR RICH BOY."

A Thanksgiving Story.

BY MARY DENSEL.

THE October sun was shining with all its might on the crimson and yellow maple-trees, turning the whole street into a blaze of glory.

And was that a particularly brilliant leaf which had fallen on the church steps? Far from it. That was the red head of a small boy, who, stretched at full length, was basking in the light and heat, and lazily wondering what that glitter of gold coming nearer and nearer might be.

Suddenly he sat upright and gave a low whistle.

"Well, I never see in all my life so much brass on a harness, nor sich shiny buttons," said he, staring at the approaching carriage, with its liveried coachman and footman.

What with the sun and the leaves and the harness and the buttons, it seemed as if the light of seven days was pouring down that street. Our red-headed friend—no unworthy feature in the landscape—still stood admiring, as the carriage drew up at an opposite house.

The footman opened the door, and after a showily dressed lady had alighted he took from inside the coupé—What was it? A bundle, Mike McShane thought at first. No; that could not be a bundle. Mike caught sight of a boy's face, small, pale, with great black eyes, and then Mike saw two tiny feet dangling from two shrunk legs. He saw no more, for the footman had gone up the stone steps, and the house door had closed behind him.

Mike whistled again, and somehow it seemed as if the sun were clouded; as if the bright leaves danced less merrily; as if even the gilding on the harnesses were dulled.

"That chap's a cripple," said Mike, under his breath.

He sat himself down on the church steps and looked soberly at his own feet. He gave a resounding slap on his own two sturdy legs.

"Precious shabby shoo' and second-hand trowsers, but—"

Mike shook his head and pondered.

"See! see! see!" chirped an English sparrow at his elbow, and, looking round, Mike became aware that the pale face and great black eyes were watching him from between the curtains of the opposite window, which was open.

Mike stared back, and finally tipped his neighbor a friendly nod. The black eyes opened a little wider, but no answering smile appeared. Half bashful, half eager, Mike came slowly across the street and leaned his shabby elbows on the iron fence in front of the window. The face above gazed steadily down at him as gloomy as night.

Suddenly Mike threw both legs skyward, stood a moment on his head, then popped on his feet again with a series of nods and a display of two rows of white teeth.

This time the black eyes opened very wide indeed with astonishment, and a look of amusement erept into them.

Mike turned a couple of somersaults, and then ventured a polite "Hi, you there!" by way of conversation.

"Hi, you there!" answered the pale lips, soberly.

Mike indulged in a series of "cart-wheels."

The boy at the window actually elapped his thin hands. "Do that again," said he.

"I'll dance for you, if you like," suggested Mike, and he was about to begin a wild "breakdown," when a tall female in a white cap and apron appeared, the window was shut down with a snap, and all Mike could hear was a sharp, angry cry as the little cripple was borne away.

"Big horse—two hosses—black velvet trowsers—ring on his finger—lame o' both feet."

Mike had come home to dinner, and was conversing between his mouthfuls of porridge. Biddy McShane, his small sister, was listening.

"Lame o' both feet," cried Biddy, pityingly. "Oh, take me wid ye, Mike, to see him."

But Mike shook his head. "Your elo' ain't that any good warrant ye appearing among folks o' quality, Biddy McShane," said he, loftily, and off he went in all the dignity of his second-hand trousers to watch that house beneath the maple trees. But no glimpse did he catch of its inmates, though he lingered long. Again and again he went, drawn by a most intense pity for that little cripple.

It was more than a week before he beheld the glittering carriage whirling down the street, and as it stopped, lo! there was no footman.

"You can't leave your horses," said the lady to the coachman. "Dear me, where is Thomas?"

Mike sprang to her side, his face all aglow.

"I'm terrible strong for my size, mum," cried he. "Just give me a holt of him, and I can carry him like a baby."

Before the lady could interfere, before the lame boy had time to be frightened, Mike had plunged into the carriage, had lifted its inmate in his sturdy arms, and was staggering up the steps, puffing and straining, but able to land his burden on the plush sofa inside the door.

"How dare you!" began the lady, much agitated and angered; but her son held fast to Mike's rough little hand.

"It's my boy, mamma," he exclaimed. "The one who can kick up his heels so. He was going to dance, but Marie drove him away. Dance now, boy."

But how could Mike cut double-shuffles on that bellowered carpet?

"Houly Patrick! I'll not dance," quoth he, "but I'll give ye some music."

So fixing his eyes on the ceiling, Mike poured forth his soul in song. Very shrill it was.

"Come back to Erin, mavourneen, mavourneen."

But Mike evidently considered it a specimen of high art. So did the lame boy, Adolphe Van Wyke.

"Sing some more," he ordered.

"I don't know any more," said Mike, rather crest-fallen. Then, brightening again:

"I'll tell ye, sommy. I've got a cart. I could draw ye out and not jolt ye half so much as them hosses. Come, now."

"Oh, let him bring his cart, mamma!" pleaded Adolphe.

Mrs. Van Wyke looked disturbed. "I suppose Thomas might walk behind, and make it respectable," said she.

But both boys were too eager to mind her hesitation; all they cared for was that permission was given Mike to race home and race back again with the hand-cart, which had hitherto known no more dignified freight than the baskets of clean clothes Mrs. McShane sent back to her customers.

"And, law! Biddy, ye'd ought to have seen us!" exclaimed Mike, when, two hours later, he appeared under the maternal roof. "There was me a-draggin' the cart, and him settin' on a cushion, and Thomas a-marchin' behind, and shimin' like the mornin'. We was genteel, I tell you. But there, Biddy McShane, what's the odds a bein' rich? I was speakin' to him about playin' ball—jest to make it lively, ye know. But he can't play. He never went sailin' in a punt. He never had a game of 'Espy!' nor 'Wolf!' nor 'Hockey!' He never could shin a tree, nor go clammin'. I declare to gracious, Biddy, it's—it's—"

Mike's voice quite failed him, and as for Biddy, two great tears stood in her eyes from pity for the little rich boy who had so few pleasures.

"Biddy," continued her brother, when they had meditated awhile in silence, "I was tellin' him about the splendid supper the ladies and gents gives us at the evening school Thanksgivin'-day. 'It ain't that I cares much for the readin' and spellin',' says I; 'but the turkeys is illigant, and the cranberry sauce enough to make ye squeal,' says I. 'What do I care for Thanksgivin'-day?'—mind that, Biddy McShane—'what do I care for Thanksgivin'-day?' says he. 'My ma she has a great party, but I can't go to the table; it makes my back ache. I have to stay all by myself in the nursery, and where's the fun?' says he. I tell you that made me feel awful. Him all alone! Biddy"—here Mike's voice grew low and solemn—"Biddy, 'I'll come and stay wid ye, and teach ye to play mumble-the-peg,' says I."

"And give up the supper at the evening school?" asked Biddy, agiast.

"Worse nor that," answered Mike, thrusting his head forward, and gesticulating with his chin—"worse nor that. I can't be beholden to rich folks for my supper, so I shall carry something to eat wid me. And it's not common fixin's I can take to a fine house, so I shall buy—" Here Mike grew mysterious. "I sha'n't say what I shall buy, but it'll cost twinty-five cints, and that I've got in my tin box."

"Mikey," exclaimed Biddy, in utter despair, "them's the pennies ye've been a-savin' of to go to the theayter the night."

"I can't help it. I'll go to no theayter, and I've that chap alone," declared Mike, growing very red in his excitement. "You can do as you choose, Biddy McShane."

Biddy turned red in her turn. "It's my twinty-five cints I'll spend for him too," cried she, in a burst of emotion. "I'll not say what I'll buy, but it's going to be mag—nificent, Mike."

"Biddy, you're a jewel," said Mike, and Biddy was blessed.

Day after day Mike's tender Irish heart grew more pitiful over his "poor rich boy," though it was not very often he saw him, for Adolphe had several times been obliged to lie in bed suffering pain. But whenever he was able to bear it, the little hand-cart was at his service, and his new friend was never tired of drawing him up and down the pavement.

Mrs. Van Wyke gradually lost the suspicious look she had worn at first. Mike was never bold or intrusive. He never sat on her door-steps, however he might haunt those of the church opposite. As the November days grew gray and cold she often saw him there, wistfully eying the windows of Adolphe's chamber. Once she even went so far as to invite him in, but he refused to come.

"It's my old clo' I have on, mum," said he. "My new shoo' they won't be done till Thanksgivin'-day. Then I'm a comin', if ye please, to learn him to play 'mumble-the-peg.'"

But he added not a word about his twenty-five cents.

It was Thursday, November the twenty-seventh.

Poor little Adolphe had had a hard night of it. The morning dragged on; dull out-of-doors; dull enough in that richly furnished nursery.

Adolphe had read all his amusing books until he knew them by heart. He was weary of the volumes of engravings.

His mother was busy arranging flowers for the grand dinner party. Marie was by no means patient when Adolphe fretted and whined. So the day wore wearily on until the dusk began to gather.

Then "rat-tat-tat" on the area door; a clatter of heavily shod feet in the hall. The door of Adolphe's room flew open, and on the threshold, his face shining with its recent scrubbing, every white tooth in his wide mouth gleaming, both hands grasping a big newspaper bundle, a vision of delight from his lobbauled, cow-hide shoes to his sleek, carroty head, stood Michael McShane.

"I've come to take supper wid ye," he announced, breathlessly, and Adolphe actually laughed aloud in his glee.

It was a huge piece of card-board, whereon was embroidered "God Bless Our Home." Were there ever such yellow letters? Was there ever such a wonderful green house, with pink blinds and a purple chimney?

"For me?" exclaimed Adolphe.

"From my Biddy," repeated Mike, proudly. "She done it herself, and it cost twin— Never mind that, though. Here's the note she sent: 'Ples to youse this commun.' Use it common, you know. She was scared you'd put it away in a drawer, it's so handsome."

It seemed as if Adolphe could never admire it enough. "God bless our home—God bless our home," he kept repeating.

"And here's my supper," said Mike at last.

Out of the newspaper package he produced a scarlet lobster. That he had thought food dainty enough for such an occasion.

Where can I find words to tell you of the pleasure which followed?

Marie brought duck, jelly, even ice-cream, from downstairs. But the crowning feature of the feast was undoubtedly the lobster.

Adolphe forgot his pain, Mike forgot his theayter. And when they were nearly at the end of supper there came a fresh surprise.

"Rub-a-dub-dub! Rub-a-dub-dub!"

"It's the 'McShane Body-guards!'" cried Mike, springing to the window.

Sure enough, rallying round the street lamp-post were some ten or a dozen raganuffins armed with wooden guns, and adorned, as to their heads, with newspaper soldier caps. They bore for a banner an ancient political transparency—"The Union, it must be preserved."

"I'm Cap'n of 'em," announced Mike, loftily. "I told 'em to march up here and let you see 'em. They know all about you."

Of course they did. With one accord they sent up three rousing cheers as Adolphe appeared at his window. They waved their transparency wildly. They marched and countermarched about the lamp-post. Then their Captain dismissed them with a "Be off wid ye!" Whereupon they disappeared round the corner, followed in the rear by a remarkable figure wrapped in a big blanket shawl.

"That's Biddy," said Mike. "Hi, you, Biddy! Don't you wisht you could come up here and play wid us? You can't, though. Shut the window, Adolphe. She's mighty smart for her kind, is Biddy, but, law! she's only a girl."

"Mike," said Adolphe, "I'd like to make some epaulets for your company. Marie, there's some colored paper in mamma's room. And bring two pairs of scissors, won't you?"

There was no more dreariness for Adolphe that evening. After the epaulets were made the classic game of "mumble-the-peg" was played. When, every now and then, Marie insisted on Adolphe's resting, Mike was entertained with picture-books. The hours flew by. Could that be the bell for nine o'clock? Where had the time gone? And here was Mrs. Van Wyke herself. Mike had never imagined anything so beautiful as she was in her dinner dress. She was holding out her soft white hand. The tears were actually in her eyes.

"Little boy," said she, gently, to Mike, "I thank you very much for your kindness to my son."

"Law!" exclaimed Mike, twisting his forelock.

"And I'm blest in my sperit, Biddy," explained he afterward, "if I could think of another word to say. 'Woun't ye come again?' says she. 'I wull,' says I. 'Come every day,' says Adolphe, sort o' brisk like."

"And didn't he say 'fetch Biddy?'" inquired that young person, eagerly.

"No, he did not," answered Mike, haughtily. "He thought your worsted-work was lovely, but ye must remember ye're nothin' but a girl, Biddy McShane. 'Come every day, and then they'll all be Thanksgivin'-days,' says he."

THE MAGIC GROWTH OF FLOWERS.

BY HENRY HATTON, MAGICIAN AND CONJURER.

A VERY wonderful and, to my mind at least, the most beautiful trick exhibited is "the growth of flowers," which was first introduced by Colonel Stodare, a once-famous London magician. The idea is taken from "the growing mango-tree" of the Indian conjurers, but it is doubtful whether the original is as good as the copy, for despite the wonderful stories told by travellers, the performances of the dark-skinned magicians are not equal to those of their more civilized brethren.

In "the growth of flowers," as presented by Stodare, three tables draped nearly to the floor are used. On the top of each is a circular piece of metal supported by light wire legs.

The performer first calls attention to a card-board cone open at both ends, which is passed among the audience, that all may see it is empty. Next he brings forward two common red clay flower-pots containing earth. "A third pot is generally used," Mr. Conjuror explains, "but unfortunately it has been broken." Some one is requested to probe the earth with a stick, and everything being pronounced fair and above suspicion, the trick begins.

Each pot is covered in turn with the cone, on removing which a flower bush is discovered. Finally from the same cone is produced both a pot and a bush.

The usual explanation volunteered by the knowing ones in the audience is that the flowers are forced up by a spring. As a general thing, of course, the spring does bring up the flowers, but in this particular case it is the performer who does it.

The apparatus is so simple that any boy of ordinary ingenuity can make it; but even with the apparatus no one could do the trick unless acquainted with the necessary routine.

Before touching on this, however, let me describe the apparatus. Instead of the one cone shown to the audience, four are actually used. These fit one within the other, the one shown being the largest, and consequently the outermost one. Two of the three flower bushes are fastened to round wooden moss-covered vases of a size to fit snugly into a flower-pot; the third bush is fastened into a pot, this pot, by-the-by, being usually of pasteboard painted red. The vases are weighted by pouring molten lead into auger-holes, and sometimes have a spike projecting from their under side.

When about to show the trick, each bush is covered by a cone, within which it is held by a green cord fastened by one end to the vase, the other end having a small brass ring attached, which passes over a flat hook riveted on the inside of the cone at the top.

At the back of each table, near the floor, is a projecting shelf, on which is stood a cone-covered bush, the drapery of the table concealing it. For home use these tables may be made of four-legged stools, each with a pole rising from the centre, and surmounted by a square of wood for a top. The drapery should be tacked on three sides of the top, and fall to a point just below the top of the stool.

The largest of these three cones, which I will call A, stands at the back of the centre table; the next in size, B, on the table at the extreme right; and the smallest, C, which contains both pot and bush, on the table at the left. The two flower-pots rest on the metal disks, which are placed respectively on the centre and the left-hand tables. The purpose of this peculiar arrangement will appear if my readers note well the progress of the trick.

The performer approaches the centre table, and holding the cone with both hands, one at each end, covers the middle pot with it. As he does this, he presses into the earth with the hand which is at the bottom of the cone a short pointed stick, to which is attached a rose-bud.

Now comes the most important and the best move in the trick. Standing with his right side to the left of the table, he lifts the cone with his right hand, and in a perfectly natural way lets it drop behind the table, and over cone A. Almost at the same moment he makes a half-turn of his body to the right, which brings out the two cones, and extending his left hand, points to the bud, to which he calls attention. The movement is so natural, and the cone is out of sight for such a short time, that the spectators are not aware they have ever taken their eyes off it.

Holding the two cones together by means of his right-hand fingers on the inside, at the top, and his thumb on the outside, the conjurer picks up the pot, and carries it to the right-hand table, on which he places it. Again he covers it with the cone, and, as he does so, releases the little brass ring at the top with his right forefinger. Now he raises the two cones together, and, as before, his hand drops behind the table, and this time brings up cone B; the same half-turn of the body, the same extension of the left arm, and he passes to the left-hand table. For a third time he goes through the same routine, ending by picking up both bush and flower-pot. Advancing to the foot-lights, he stands the cone on the crown of some gentleman's hat, and produces the pot with the bush.

It has been suggested that the three cones which cover the bushes might be dispensed with, but without them to confine the branches of the flowers it would be impossible to cover the bushes rapidly.

The trick pleases the eye, and is popular; as a consequence, attempts have been made to improve on it. The one attempted some six years ago at a New York theatre is worthy of mention on account of its ridiculous ending.

The performer in question proposed to exhibit the trick on tables entirely free of drapery, intending to have the flowers thrust up from below the moment the cone touched the stage. The idea was, no doubt, good; but the first night, when the performer gracefully dropped the cone, a trap opened on the opposite side of the stage, and a flower bush was thrust up in full sight of the amused and amazed audience. It is needless to add that the little mishap settled that improvement.

FRANZ SCHUBERT.

BY MRS. JOHN LILLIE.

EARLY in this century the village school-master of Lichenthal, near Vienna, had a very troublesome pupil. He was a boy of about nine years old, with eager eyes, a quick, active figure, and a gay little laugh that, low-sounding as it was, usually upset the gravity of the school-room. But the boy's fun was not the only thing that troubled the master. In and out of hours, between lessons in geography and arithmetic—indeed, whenever he could lay hold of the necessary articles—little Franz Schubert was always scribbling music. He seemed full of musical ideas, and he felt the necessity of writing them down; so I do not doubt that his old tattered school-books would be very precious treasures if we possessed them now, with crotchets and quavers dancing in and out of nine times seven and the rivers and questions of his geography.

Fortunately little Franz's teacher was also his father, old M. Schubert being the school-teacher of Lichenthal. Troubled as he might have been about the boy's restless ways, he yet appreciated his genius, and in after-years was accustomed to say of him, "He was always first among his fellow-students." There had been a large family of Schuberts. This little Franz, born in 1797, was one of eighteen children; but they had nearly all died young, and so Franz was unusually dear to the father.

In those days in Germany, as soon as a boy showed any genius for music he was made to sing in the choir, and also to study the violin. So Franz did both, and he was so successful that before he was fifteen he was first violin in the orchestra. Later in life he bitterly deplored the fact that when he was young he had not more perfectly studied thorough bass or counterpoint. Everything he did in music as a child was so startling and precocious that I suppose the happy old father felt too well satisfied.

While he was at the Free Grammar School, the lad was constantly writing music, and turned off all sorts of work, good, bad, and indifferent, much of which used to be performed on the evening of the very day on which it was written.

It was in 1813, when Schubert was sixteen, that he left the grammar school and returned to his father's house, where he had the rather dreary occupation of teaching small children. But all this time he continued to compose. The school boys, fond of playing practical jokes, used to seize and hide all sorts of articles belonging to Franz, and enjoy the half angry, half good-humored way in which he would hunt for them. But something made them fear even to touch his music. There seemed to be something too sacred about it for their fun or frolic, and so the young teacher could leave his bits of writing on his desk, knowing they were safe from the tricks of the rough, merry little pupils.

He had a small room of his own in his father's house. It was very poorly furnished, yet he had his books and musical works there, his violin and piano. One cold and rainy afternoon he sat down after school-hours to refresh himself with reading. The book he picked up was a volume of Goethe's poems, among them "The Erl King," and on reading it the young musician's brain seemed to burn with a desire to put the words to music. He read, and he seemed to see the whole picture, and before leaving his room, while the wind and rain beat against his windows, he wrote down the song that we all have now, never materially altering one note or beat in it.

The song describes the ride of a father and child through a forest. The child lies in his father's arms, and in the darkness hears the voice of the Erl King, a phantom creature, calling to him to come and live with him. He speaks in terror to his father, who tells him to be quiet. It is only the sound of the wind through withered leaves; but again and again the child hears the dread voice urging him on.

"Oh, father, the Erl King now puts forth his arm!
Oh, father, the Erl King has done me harm!"

and regretting that he and Schubert had not been nearer friends; but the fact was that when Schubert went to visit the great master, shyness or nervousness so overcame him that he returned home greatly annoyed with himself.

Schubert had only one romance in his life, but it lasted always. One winter in Vienna, while teaching the daughters of Count Esterhazy, he fell in love with Caroline, the younger and most gifted of the two. He said nothing then of his attachment to his sweet young pupil, but he was glad to accept an invitation to the Count's castle in Hungary. There he wrote many of his favorite songs—all, it is said, inspired by Caroline and his love for her. But the young girl complained to him that he never dedicated anything to her.

"Ah!" exclaimed poor Schubert, "you have it all!"

He seems never to have thought it likely she would consent to marry him, and so he loved on in silence while Caroline married. It is thought that the elder sister, a gentle, tender creature, and his confidante, loved Schubert herself. Although all music-loving people know and care for Schubert to-day, he had bitter struggles in his own lifetime, and both publishers and artists often failed to appreciate him. Perhaps this, as well as the sadness of his love-story, increased the melancholy in his work, and made him care little to live. During Beethoven's last illness Schubert was often at his bedside with other friends, and they used to think that during those sad, speechless hours Beethoven longed to speak to Schubert, whose work he had only just begun to really know when his fatal illness came. The night of Beethoven's funeral Schubert joined some friends in a tavern, when, "after the German fashion, they drank to the soul of the

SCHUBERT SEARCHING FOR THE ARTICLES HIS FELLOW STUDENTS HAVE HIDDEN.

The father shudders, and finds his child dead in his arms. Wild and fascinating as are the verses of Goethe, Schubert's music is more so. The next time you play it read it line by line, and fit the meaning of each chord to the strange words of the verse.

In 1817 Schubert, who had made several warm friends, was induced to give up teaching little boys, and to live with his chosen associate, a clever, interesting man named Schobler. This gentleman was a bachelor, and had a pleasant little household, at the head of which was his mother. Schubert was welcomed heartily, and in the simple little house he drew a circle about him every member of which was worth knowing. He himself had become rather melancholy in his mode of thought. He had nothing in his personal appearance to attract people toward him, but so many cared for him that his friendship must have been well worth having. He was fond of playing duets, and it is said that all his brusquerie would disappear under the spell of music. But in general society he was often neglected, although by this time his songs had begun to be published, and were well received. Beethoven pored over them in his last days, declaring "this Schubert" to be a genius, great man they had so lately borne to the tomb. It was then proposed to drink to the one of them who should be the first to follow him; and hastily filling up the cup, Schubert drank to himself.

But he lived to add one great work to all the rest. This was the Symphony in C, never to be heard without remembering that the sweetest song-writer was among the grandest of workers for an orchestra. He gave a grand concert soon after composing this symphony. He was ill, he was tired; he longed to go for a little while to the Esterhazys, where the young Countess Marie, his Caroline's sister, often thought of him as she wandered among the hills he knew and loved so well. But there was almost no money in his purse, and his health was giving way. It was in the autumn of that year, 1828, that he expired at the early age of thirty-one.

They buried him near Beethoven, and on his tomb is inscribed,

"Music buried here a rich possession, and yet fairer hopes."

"LITTLE DAME TROT."

IN A FOG.

BY A MIDSHIPMAN.

ON a fine morning her Majesty's frigate M—, in which I was serving as a midshipman, left Halifax, Nova Scotia, for Bermuda.

We had entered the Gulf Stream, and were quietly sailing along, when our signal midshipman reported a Danish bark in distress on the weather bow, and received orders to ask her name, and how we could assist her.

In a few minutes the bunting fluttered at our mast-head, and all eyes were turned toward the stranger. There was some delay, as merchant vessels are not generally very apt at signals. At last the reply came: "Copenhagen: in want of water and provisions."

"Martin," cried our captain, addressing the senior lieutenant, "let Mr. Edwards take my galley, and see what that vessel requires, and have one of the cutters ready to carry what he finds she may want. By the-by, you'd better let an assistant surgeon accompany him."

In accordance with these orders, our skipper's six-oared gig was manned, and Dr. Simple and I, having received instructions, proceeded to board the Copenhagen, find out what she wanted, and signal back to our ship. We, however, carried with us a small quantity of pork, some biscuits, a little wine and lime-juice, as well as some vegetables from the officers' mess, the doctor taking a few medical comforts.

The bark was about two miles off, and as we had our fires banked, and were under canvas only, our captain made no attempt to "close" her; besides, it was but a short pull in his fast galley. Still, we were astonished at the merchant vessel making no attempt to come nearer, particularly as she was well to windward.

We soon reached the vessel, a fine, well-found craft. On her deck lay her helpless crew in the last stage of starvation, her captain being apparently the only man with sufficient energy to speak to us. I have seen starvation in many forms, but never in so ghastly a shape as on board that vessel.

"Hand up the provisions, and bear a hand," I cried, and began serving out the small supply we had with us. There was a strange, eager silence as each man's wants were attended to.

The doctor was also employed applying such remedies as he happened to have with him, while my cockswain signaled to the frigate for what was needed.

So much taken up was I with these occupations that I took note of nothing else, until, having completed what I was about, my attention was drawn to a strange haze forming to windward. In ten minutes from the time I had noticed it we were enveloped in a dense fog, or rather vapor cloud, which hung round the bark, and for a time brought on a feeling similar to that on going into a Turkish bath.

Having lost sight of the frigate, I endeavored to communicate with her by sound signal. I first tried a fog-horn, but it had not been taken care of, so I could only get a grunt out of it. I next experimented on the bark's bell, but it was a miserable article—cracked, and all but useless. All this time we could hear our ship's steam-whistle, with which she was trying to communicate; but as we could not reply to it, we only had the mortification of knowing by its growing fainter that she was leaving us. Such being the state of affairs, I proceeded to see how we stood in the way of provisions, and found that all had been expended except the usual supply carried by all man-of-war boats when at sea, which would only be two days' allowance for seven men, and not a decent meal for half the crew of the Dane, let alone ourselves. Under these circumstances, I determined to lay the bark to, feeling certain that our captain would do the same, and that we should find the M— at no great distance when the fog lifted.

By this time, it being six o'clock in the evening, the galley was hauled up, and a meagre repast partaken of by both officers and men. We were not troubled by the merchant seamen, as whatever medicine or stimulant the doctor had given them had put them in a sound sleep, from which they did not awake until close on night-fall.

But when they did, they were in the most ravenous state, loudly demanding food. What was I to do? Give them our remaining provisions? There was only such a small quantity; what would it be amongst thirty men, the number of the Dane's crew?

I now directed my men in a low tone of voice to be on the alert, and that they must at all risks prevent the provisions from being taken. Whether the Danish sailors understood me or not, I can not say; but, at any rate, it was evident that they thought there was a good stock of provisions in our boat. Arguing with them was all to no purpose. Have the provisions, they declared, they would, and at once!

I saw that there was likely to be trouble; that whatever stimulant Simple had given them had imbued them with a certain amount of artificial strength, along with a good deal of "Dutch courage," and that it would be necessary to act promptly, even though violence might be called for.

At this crisis a thought struck me. Watching for the most prominent of the agitators, my eye fell on one whom to this day I believe to have been an Englishman. Stepping quickly up to him, and drawing my dirk, I seized him by the collar, and the next moment he was a prisoner. I then told the others that if they showed any further signs of insubordination I would hang their shipmate at the yard-arm. Of course this was only a threat, and I scarcely knew how it would result.

The Danes showed dissatisfaction at their comrade being arrested, but after clamoring awhile, went forward, and below into their vessel's forepeak. I felt certain it was only to deliberate, and perhaps return more determined than ever. An idea had suggested itself on seeing them leave the upper deck, and whispering instructions to my cockswain, we silently and hastily ran forward, and clapping on the forepeak hatch, at once secured it with its coaming bar. We had them safe as in a trap.

I now divided my men into two watches, Simple and I taking charge of them. In this way an anxious night was spent.

Morning found us still enveloped in fog, and we began to feel our position more than ever perilous, particularly as the doctor, who had kept the middle watch (12 to 4 A.M.), reported that he had not heard a single gun. The last one had been "logged" about eleven o'clock the night before. Still, judging from appearances, I had every hope that the breeze would freshen, and the fog clear off about noon. Nor was I disappointed. About half past eleven it lifted, and we could see the horizon all around. The horizon, but nothing more.

No frigate!

Here we were on the wide ocean, in the same situation as the crew we had come to rescue from distress and starvation, and, if anything, in a worse position; for we knew not what these desperate men might be tempted to do.

A moment's reflection brought before us the real peril of the situation. It was truly appalling. We had still a few biscuits and a little rum. The food given the Danes had only increased their suffering, and the cries coming through the closed hatch were heart-rending.

All day long we kept a lookout for our ship, but she was nowhere to be seen; and as the sun went down our hearts sank with it. We ourselves began to realize the pangs of hunger in all its dread misery.

Another night passed; again the sun rose in its glorious autumnal splendor, ushering in to many all that was bright and beautiful, but to us hunger and desolation.

The unfortunate Danes had been silent for some hours. Our hearts smote us as we thought of them. But their safety as well as our own depended on our avoiding anything like a collision with them, so I had to keep them imprisoned. Besides, we had now nothing in the way of food to give them; our last biscuit was gone. At this crisis the lookout at the mast-head sung out in a clear voice that rang cheerily in our ears the startling words, "Sail, ho!"

Seizing my telescope, I rushed to the mast-head. With some little difficulty I could make out a ship's royals on our lee beam, my experience telling me they were those of a war vessel. Hailing the deck, I ordered sails to be trimmed, and the Copenhagen's course to be shaped for the other vessel.

In about an hour I could distinguish our "chase" to the first reefs in her topsails, and felt certain, from the rake of her masts, that she was a frigate. Just as I made this discovery a cry came from the deck, and on looking down I saw our men trying to prevent the bark's crew from coming on deck through the after-cabin companionway. Not waiting to ask myself how they could have got aft, I seized one of the main-royal back-stays, and was on deck in a few seconds. The struggle was for a time desperate, but the poor starved remnants of humanity had little chance with man-of-war's men, and in a few moments we had them again safe under hatches.

Suddenly a hail came from Simple, who had taken my place aloft: "Hark! That's a gun."

As he spoke a dull booming sound came across the ocean wave, again and again repeated, until it spelled out the name of our frigate.

The scene that followed is beyond description; we were sighted, and by our own ship. Officers and men forgot the difference of rank, and grasped each other's hands in grim, silent congratulation.

Some laughed, others sang, and Simple wanted to release our prisoners; but this I would not allow; they had but a short time to wait, and then they would be set free, with a good meal before them. How different were our feelings under the setting sun to those experienced at its rising! We were once more on board our ship. We had been in a position of great peril, from which we had been most providentially rescued, and had also been the means of saving the Danes from almost certain death.

AUTHOR OF "MILDRED'S BARGAIN," "AUNT RUTH'S TEMPTATION," ETC.

CHAPTER VII.

NAN spent the next week in a perfect whirl. Had anything been left to her wisdom, or her decision, even, I am afraid the result would have worried Miss Phyllis Rolf very much; but that young lady took everything very calmly into her own hands, and Nan soon learned to find it both an easy and agreeable task to obey her.

Naturally Nan wanted to go and see the Ruperts, but this visit was put off day after day; and finally it was Mrs. Rupert who, with Marian, broke the ice and came up to see Nan.

It happened in this way: Breakfast was over. Nan had, as usual, established herself in the window-seat of the little sitting-room with a book, and was wondering what new excitement the day would bring forth, when, on looking up from the page before her, she saw two figures enter the gate. In an instant she recognized Mrs. Rupert and Marian.

Only three times in her life could she remember having seen her aunt so gorgeously attired, so that she knew Mrs. Rupert felt this to be an important occasion; but after spending even a week with Mrs. Grange and Phyllis, how gaudy Mrs. Rupert's shawl and bonnet looked! Nan involuntarily shuddered, and then, whether it was a half-lonesome or half-ashamed feeling she could not tell, but she began to cry.

Lance was out in the hall, pulling to pieces some mechanical toy he had bought. Nan dashed out to him.

"My aunt and Marian are here!" she exclaimed.

Lance's eyes fairly danced.

"Oh, what fun!" he said. "I'd give a dollar to see Phyllis meet them."

"But, Lance," said Nan, "it isn't—such fun." She barely knew what to say, and turned around as she saw some one coming up the staircase. It was Phyllis. She came over to the two children, and said very gravely:

"Nan, I want you to come down-stairs and see your aunt; and"—Phyllis looked at her earnestly—"I hope you remember all I have said? There must be no offer of intimacy."

Nan stood very still, looking up into Phyllis's beautiful, haughty face.

"Yes," she said, in a low tone, nodding her head gravely.

"See"—Phyllis looked carefully at her dress. "Come in here and put on something else."

To Nan dressing had become a perfect delight, for never before had she thought of owning such clothes. She followed Phyllis into her room, and waited while that young lady turned over various things. In the course of the week four new dresses had come home for Nan, and from these Phyllis, with a little laugh, chose the brightest and prettiest—indeed, the only silk one among them—a soft blue silk, made simply enough, but richer than anything Nan had ever thought of as her own. It seemed odd to wear her best dress in the morning, yet, as Nan followed her cousin down-stairs, she felt a thrill of pleasure to think her aunt and Marian should see her splendor.

Mrs. Rupert, with her daughter, was sitting in the long parlor. They had come determined to reproach little Nan with neglect of them—indeed, if need be, to say something harsh to that fine young lady, Miss Rolf; but the elegance and quiet of the long room, with its pictures and books and soft hangings, quite overcame them. They sat very still on the edge of their chairs, looking at each other and at the door, and only raising their voices to whispers. Marian, if the truth were known, was inclined to be rather defiant when Nan appeared, but Mrs. Rupert kept looking at her menacingly every time she gave her head a pert little toss.

"Keep quiet," she said, just as Nan and Miss Rolf appeared; and then she looked up, and on seeing Nan come up the beautiful room in her blue silk dress, with lace in the neck and sleeves, and shining kid boots, and her hair prettily brushed, she drew a long breath, and exclaimed,

"Well, by the powers above, be that Nan Rolf?"

Even the fine house and the beautiful Miss Phyllis were forgotten. Mrs. Rupert sat still, staring at her little step-niece; and it was Phyllis who came to every one's relief.

"Sit down, Annice," she said, in her gentlest tone, and then, smiling very pleasantly, she continued: "You see, Mrs. Rupert, I could not very well let Nan go away. There were so many things to get for her; her life is going to be such a busy one, studying and all that"—here Phyllis just glanced at Nan's fine dress—"there would, I knew, be no time to buy her things in Beverly."

There was a pause, and then Miss Rolf continued: "Nan, take your cousin upstairs. I will talk to Mrs. Rupert."

And Nan obeyed. She and Marian found very little to say to each other in the luxurious sitting-room upstairs. Marian was still defiant, and Nan was nervous and troubled; so they talked of very uninteresting things, and Nan could hardly put anything into words. She asked for Philip, and begged that he might come and see her.

"I don't like to go out without Cousin Phyllis's permission," she faltered.

Marian burst out laughing.

"Oh, you're a fine lady now, Nan!" she said; "too good for us, that's easily seen," and she gave Nan's dress a twitch.

Nan hardly knew what to say. She was neither ungrateful nor hard-hearted, but she was bewildered and perplexed. It was a relief when Phyllis sent for her. Even when Mrs. Rupert and Marian said good-by, she did not know what to say, and so she said nothing; but she cried as she kissed her aunt, even though she saw Phyllis was annoyed by it.

And no more was said of her going to visit the Ruperts, that morning being the only good-by attempted.

CHAPTER VIII.

No one must suppose that Nan did not regret leaving her aunt's family with so little ceremony. She really longed to spend a whole day with them, but by the time she had been ten days at "The Willows" she had learned to do just what Phyllis told her was best, without thinking much for herself. Only once did she resent her cousin's authority, and that was when she was told by Phyllis she ought not to talk so much of Philip to Lance.

"But I could only talk good of my cousin Philip," Nan said, a little defiantly.

* Begun in No. 157, HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE.

"No doubt," rejoined Phyllis, with perfect good-humor; "but Lance can't know such a boy; and, Nan, Lance has some low tastes of the kind, as it is."

And then Nan flashed out.

"Oh, Cousin Phyllis," she exclaimed, "how dare you! Philip is not low; he could not be; he is better—far, far kinder and smarter—and everything even than Lance, who will, I suppose, one day be a fine gentleman."

And in spite of Phyllis's set, stern look, Nan dashed out of the room and into her own little cozy nest, where she stopped, panting for breath. It was Sunday night. She was to leave the next day for Beverley, and, sitting on her little bed, she determined, come what would, to see Philip and bid him good-bye for herself. But how could it be accomplished? Of course she was not a prisoner; but she hardly felt it right to do anything that she knew Phyllis would have sternly forbidden. Still, her cheeks burned at the thought of what Philip might say of her, if he knew she had left forever with not one word to her old play-fellow. And then came the remembrance of all Philip's kindness: how many times he had saved her a scolding, even a whipping; the books he had bought her with his hardly earned pocket-money. Looking back, all her few luxuries or pleasures seemed to have come through her cousin's goodness and unselfishness. "Not that he hasn't been horrid and cross enough sometimes," thought little Nan, sitting on the edge of her bed, and allowing her tears to fall on her "second-best" dress quite unchecked. "But he always was good to me, really," and this decision seemed to put an end to any idea of what she owed to Phyllis. She rose up very softly, and took out her new hat and jacket, and put them on. Then, with one glance at Phyllis's open door, she rushed swiftly down the hall and the back staircase, whence she knew it would be easy to make her escape. It was about seven o'clock. People were slowly going on their way to church. Nan thought she would risk finding Philip at home, for Mrs. Rupert never left the house and store entirely alone, and it was usually, Marian whom her mother decided to take with her in the evening. She had a general idea that Philip, being a boy, might get into mischief if he went out in the evening, and to Philip these hours of solitude with his minerals and shells and books were most welcome.

"'WHATEVER HAPPENS, I NEVER, NEVER WILL FORGET YOU!'"

Nan sped along the well-known streets as fast as she dared, and reached the butter and cheese store with a sense of relief, for thus far all was right. A solitary light was burning in the little sitting-room, where she had sat for the last time only ten days before; yet how long ago it seemed! Nan stood still a moment in the garden, and then, going up to the side-door, slowly turned the handle. She went along the short corridor, and very gently opened the sitting-room door. She had guessed right. Philip was alone—sitting in the usual disorder, with his elbows on the table, his hands on his head, absorbed in a book.

"Philip!" Nan half whispered. The boy started, looked at Nan in a bewildered way, and then jumped to his feet.

"Nan!" he exclaimed, "come in. I am glad you came. Ain't you going away, after all, with your fine relations?"

"Oh yes," Nan answered, just a little dolefully. "I'm going—to-morrow; and I came—I ran away, Phil, to say good-bye to you. I guessed you'd be alone."

"You're a trump, Nan," said the boy, delightedly. "Oh, ain't you going to write to me about everything?"

Nan looked pained; but Philip did not see her expression, for he had begun to rummage among his shells.

"See here, Nan," he said, turning around before she answered; "here's the old pink shell we used to make a boat of. There! you can have it all for yourself now—a remembrance, don't you see?"

Nan's bright eyes were full of tears. She took the shell, and nodded softly.

"Thank you, Philip dear. I'm afraid I mustn't stay. I must say good-bye now, or they'll come after me. Thank you so much, Phil; and remember, whatever happens, I never, never will forget you. And I'll always love you."

And honest-hearted little Nan squeezed Phil around the neck warmly, and before another word was said had fled away.

Going up the street, she rejoiced that she had so successfully accomplished her errand; yet another idea had come to her mind. Probably no one at "The Willows" would be any the wiser for her little flight; but would it not be what Lance would have called "squarer" to go herself and tell Phyllis? Nan's nature, impulsive and full of faults though it might be, was honest and true in every fibre, and it did not take her long to come to a decision as to what was right. She made her way noiselessly in at the side entrance without being discovered, but once in the upper hall she went boldly to her cousin's door. Phyllis had not stirred from the easy-chair in which Nan had left her. The light from the lamp on a table near her showed Nan a very different room from the shabby parlor in which she had just said good-by to Philip, and as the little girl went in, she had a queer sort of feeling that she had said good-by to shabbiness and dirt and disorder forever. But something else was struggling within her, as she looked at Phyllis's fair, beautiful, cold face. "I haven't said good-by to my conscience, anyway," she was thinking; and with a brave resolve she walked up to her cousin's side.

"Cousin Phyllis," she said in a low tone, "I've been down to Aunt Rupert's and seen Philip, and said good-by to him. I knew you wouldn't like it, but I'm not—sorry I did it." And here Nan's voice broke, and she burst into tears.

For an instant Phyllis felt very angry. Then, before she spoke, the honesty of the child touched her. It touched her, but not as the same thing would have touched my little Nan. The brilliant young lady had to admire the child's fearlessness, yet she also thought quickly how receiving her confession kindly might be a "good thing" in the future—might strengthen her influence over the possible heiress of all Miss Rolf's fortune.

"Very well, Nan," she said, kissing the little bowed head, "we will agree to forget it. Now go away and get ready for prayers. Mrs. Grange will soon be home."

And Nan, feeling a great load off her little heart, went into her own room and put away her shell in the big trunk already full of her new possessions.

OUR POST-OFFICE BOX.

NO doubt you have all taken an interest in the stories of childish heroism which have appeared in YOUNG PEOPLE during the last year. We have great pleasure in adding to the list of brave boys who have shown courage and presence of mind in an hour of sudden peril the name of Harry Meinel, aged eleven, son of Captain Meinel, late of the United States Artillery. His sister Marie sends us the account of her little brother's noble deed.

One bright day last August a number of children were merrily playing around a mill-pond near the Greenfield, Ht., Shawangunk Mountains. One of them, a little fellow six years old, slipped and fell into twelve feet of water. Instantly Harry Meinel sprang to the rescue, plunged into the spot where bubbles were rising over the sinking child, seized, and brought him to the surface. Finding him too heavy for his strength, he called to his sister, a year younger—who was fortunately, in a row-boat not far off—and with her aid succeeded in bringing him to the shore.

Certainly Harry's name belongs on the Roll of Honor.

URICA, NEW YORK.

I am a boy ten years old, and have lots of fun. I like to play tug, and chase, and pins and needles. Perhaps some who read this letter do not know how to play pins and needles, so I will tell them. First some one has to stand; then the first player jumps over him, and then another, and so on, all saying "pins" as they go over. Then they do the same thing again, all saying "needles." Then the next time they say "buncher's grip," and touch as they go over. Next comes "sailor's grip," again touching as they go over. Next comes "spurs," kicking as they go over. This time the one standing has to turn sideways. Next comes "hats on deck." As you go over put your hat on the boy's back. The rule is if you knock the boy over in jumping over him, or if you fail to do any of these things, you must be the one to stand.

Dear me! how glad I am that I am not a boy! I wouldn't play "pins and needles" and "hats on deck" for the prettiest present you could offer me. Is it possible that you never get hurt? and what do your mothers say about the torn jackets and trousers that come home from such jolly sport?

NEW YORK CITY.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS.—Please oblige a little girl twelve years old by publishing her little story in the Post-office Box.

EDITH'S RESOLUTION.

It was a bright sunny day when little Edith wandered about the crowded street. Her little brother had her hand; he was five years old, and was very thin for his age. They were very poor people, and their mother had been dead for a very long time. They were under the charge of their aunt, who was sickly, and could earn but little.

As they were walking quietly up and down the street a young man stopped them, and asked Edith if she would carry his bundle to the hotel. Edith immediately did as he wished, and when she came back he gave her five cents.

"Andrew," said Edith, as soon as they got home, "what shall we do with all this money?" "Oh, I know," said Andrew, "you buy some candy, and then we will have a feast."

But Edith thought for awhile, and then said:

"No, Andrew, we will buy a nice loaf of bread. I know that candy would rather have it than the candy."

But Andrew put on a sorrowful face, which he knew Edith did not like to see.

She looked at him for a few seconds, and then said she might buy the candy when she got to the store.

When they reached a confectionery, little Andrew pulled Edith toward the window, and said:

"Oh, Edith, look at all those good things!"

While he was saying this a nice little boy, with his nurse went into the store and bought some candy, and when she came out she gave it to Edith, who stared at her in wonder and amazement. But the little lady said she heard the little boy remark that he wanted some, and so she bought it for him.

Edith thanked her very much, and said she had but five cents, which she wished for bread. Andrew was also glad to have Edith stop, without spending any money. Edith kept hers for aunt, then bought the bread, and afterward went home, and they had a merry time that night over bread and candy.

NEW HAVEN, CONNECTICUT.

I am a little girl nine years old, and my brother Charlie is seven. Last New Year's some kind friends sent us Harper's YOUNG PEOPLE, and we use them very much. Mamma reads the stories to us, and enjoys them quite as much as we do. We particularly like the Post-office Box, and were delighted with Mr. Otis's story "Their Girl," only wishing it were longer. We have two pets—a country-bird we call Goldie, that sings very sweetly, and a young Newfoundland dog which we call Andy. He is very playful and mischievous. I wrote a letter to HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE last winter, but it was not published. We send the Postmistress a little box of flowers. Mamma is writing this for me.

NELLIE G. R. and CHARLES B. R.

Thanks for the flowers, dear Nellie and Charlie. I am afraid some of my little correspondents are discouraged when, having written once or twice to the Post-office Box, they still fail to see their letters printed there. If these dear children could take a peep at me when I am reading the budgets which the postman brings, could see my bewildered face, and watch me as I try to be perfectly fair to all, they would not complain at the long delays. If you first get me published, wait awhile, and then write another. Some of the letters are very entertaining to me, but are not of a character to interest the great number of children who cluster around the Postmistress every week. I wish the little pens would try to tell of something pleasant or strange about their homes or their daily lives, something besides the mere facts of how old they are, and how many brothers and sisters they have.

If you will pause to think, boys, you will see that a New York boy, for instance, must have opportunities of telling many interesting things about his native city which a prairie boy, or a Rocky Mountain boy, or a lad in California will find charming. And a boy who lives on a far-away ranch, and sees great herds of cattle and flocks of sheep every day, may do much to interest the other, who plays on Boston Common, or passes Independence Hall in Philadelphia on his way to school.

A little girl sends us her composition on "Wonderful Inventions." The Postmistress thinks with you, dear, that, if people would only try and try, and not get discouraged, the world would go on much better than it does. But it is very easy to be discouraged, isn't it, dearie, after all!

An invention is something that is invented, and I think there would be more of them if people would only try and try and try. It is very useful. But some people get discouraged if everything does not happen to go right the first time. They should think of Robert Fulton, who, when others failed, thought he could make his idea successful, although many said he would not succeed. He went to work with a will, and did succeed, to the amazement of the people, and then some were afraid to take the first trip on his steamboat. As we look around us we seldom stop to think of the value of our umbrellas. Even the cotton from which clothing is made was never in so much demand until Eli Whitney invented the cotton gin. The mariner's compass, which is so useful to a captain, was first invented which direction his vessel is sailing, the piano-forte, which affords us so much amusement, the sewing-machine, the umbrella, all were made for our use and comfort.

Yes, my bright little L. C., the sewing machine, and the umbrella, and many other life-saving and case-finding contrivances were hither proposed at first. Many gentlemen and ladies declared they never, never would let a machine stitch their garments; it would surely wear out the material, and the sewing would be certain not to hold. When umbrellas were first introduced in London, he was a brave man who ventured to carry one in the street. He was followed by a jeering crowd, who hooted at him and called him names, or pelted him with mud. But by and by was observed that umbrellas were sensible, and that there was no great merit in getting wet to the skin whenever it rained. Remember that all inventions have their beginnings in somebody's busy brain. Perhaps there are wonderful little inventors among my boys and girls.

So many of you love your dear gray cats, and black and yellow and mouse-colored pussies, and frolfesome kitties, that you will be delighted with some true stories about these domestic pets. The first is from the oven of

A CLEVER CAT.

My cook was honest, and the pantry was always in order. I had missed little things from the shelves and dishes. Several times we had talked the matter over, but could in no way think how it was possible for the food to be carried out of the room, when my cook was in the pantry, she heard a noise, as if something coming down the chimney, and in a few moments out jumped an old and favorite cat, which until then had always borne an excellent character in the house.

I was much puzzled as to how the animal had been able to reach the chimney from the outside, and ordered her to be watched. On being asked, she said that when my father was in the yard she was seen to go stealthily into the cellar. The cook followed, but the cat was nowhere to be seen, when she thought herself in the pantry, and there found the beef enjoying a piece of meat. From the cellar there also ran a chimney, so that I was not a little surprised to find that the cat had gone up one chimney and down the other. Thinking it best to get it out of her power to steal any longer, I had the pantry chimney stopped up.

The next is much prettier:

THE CURIOUS KITTEN.

A very intelligent little kitten was lying on the rug one day, when a young lady took off her bracelet, and playfully fastened it round puss's neck. Nothing could exceed the little creature's anxiety to find out what this new appendage was, and after vainly trying to get it by turning her head about, she quietly got up, walked across the room, and climbed on a chair which happened to stand before a mirror. She looked at herself earnestly in the glass, felt the bracelet with both paws, stroking it first one side, then the other, and when apparently quite satisfied with herself and her beckoning, she stepped to the place, and settled herself calmly to sleep again.

And this is the prettiest of all:

I was one day attracted by the sound of scratching at a door which opened from some cellar steps, and by seeing the black paw of a favorite cat protruding through a very small aperture. The door of the street was open, and the paw of puss's paw being passed through the space, but it stuck a little, and in spite of her efforts she remained a prisoner. After several vain attempts, she paused for a moment, then gave the peculiar cry which cats use to summon their young ones.

Puss's kitten, a nearly full-grown one, heard the call, and ran to her mother's assistance. She understood the state of affairs at once, and inserting her paw from the outside, the mother resumed her efforts from within, and the two together succeeded in opening the door sufficiently wide to liberate the captive.

I live in a very pretty place called Cowansville. It snowed very slightly this morning for the first time this year. I will be so glad when it snows a great deal, so that we can have a dramatic club. We are to play next winter. If you have the entertainment I will write and tell you about it if you want me to. Will you please print as a short dialogue for seven or three girls and four or more boys. I have a nice doggie, but we have one which will sit up and beg and do everything almost that a dog can do, and I have an awful pretty little kitten which sits purring in my lap as I write, and a little bird called Cherry. But I must go and practice my music lesson, so good-by.

We have something in preparation which will suit our dramatic club, Mabel, and which you will certainly like for one of your performances.

The little girl eight years old who saw two birds flying over the house, and made up the following pretty verse, will very likely make other verses when she is older:

I saw two birds up in the sky,
And they prattled merrily as they flew by;
Saw the little male to his wife he said,
Together we'll strive to get bread and meat;
So they both flew off to the far Southeast,
Where no one could find them—man nor beast.

NORWICH, CONNECTICUT.

We are two little girls, and we thought we would like to see one of our letters published. My name is Sallie, and my sister's is Emmie. I have four dolls, and my sister has three. We have a yellow and white cat named Jimbo, and a toy elephant named Toby Tyler, because we liked little Toby so much. We also have a haek lamb. My older sister is writing this for us, and I suppose you will like to publish very long letters, so we must close. Your faithful readers,

SARAH and EMILY T.

I hope your black lamb will not behave, when he grows up, as did a certain old sheep about which you lately read in the Post-office Box.

IPSWICH, MASSACHUSETTS.

I have a cat named Jimbo; she is entirely black, except a white spot on her throat. We have two dogs; one is brown, the other is brown and white. One of the goats in the woods is all white, and they and they brought a little rabbit. I have seen the comet twice. Once it was very large, the other time it was very small. Ipswich is about twenty-eight miles from Boston.

AMY G.

WETHERS' MILL, MISSOURI.

"Marvle," in writing of his visit to the country, says of the dog Major, "Moles he will not eat; neither will cats eat moles." Yes, and what is more remarkable, neither will hogs eat moles. In rambling through the country one will often find that the hogs root up old mole tracks, burrows, or, as supposed, for moles are all off-sets, and they dig for mice (which often make use of mole runs), but not moles, as any one may be convinced who will offer them one.

D.

CHICKERING, NEW JERSEY.

The rest of the little people write, so I thought that I would do the same. I have just been up in New York State for three or four weeks. Where I was visiting they had two oxen; they were used to get on one of them, and take the cows down to pasture. The boys used to go over to the neighbor's and borrow two saddles, and put them on the oxen, and then have a ride. I made them trot. I weigh 115 pounds, and I am only eleven years old, but will be twelve the 26th of June.

AARON B. K.

SOUTHAMPTON, ENGLAND.

I am a little American boy seven years old. I go to Handel College. My grandma in New York sends me HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE. I like the stories very much. I have a little black kitten; its name is Poppy. I have been to a great many ancient places, but I can't remember the names. I have two sisters and two brothers, all older than myself except one brother. I am going back to New York some day. I write this all myself.

PAUL G. M.

It was beautifully written too.

My little son sends you this Wiggle. Let me express to you my sincere thanks for your little paper, which comes each week with such a bright and happy boy's reading for the little ones. It has helped my boys so very much with their reading. The clear type is just the thing for the little beginners.

E. V. C.

A testimonial like this from a mother is very gratifying to those who are trying to make YOUNG PEOPLE a deserved favorite with both parents and children.

BALTIMORE, MARYLAND.

I take YOUNG PEOPLE, and like it ever so much. My sister gave it to me for a birthday present. I go to St. Luke's Hall to school, and I have been attending it three years, and have five teachers. I like them all, and of all my studies I like history best. I have Young Folks' History of England, by Charlotte M. Yonge, and have no trouble in studying it, because it is so interesting.

ANABEL I.

I thought I would write you a few lines which I liked HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE. I like it better than any periodical I have ever read. I take the greatest pleasure in solving out its enigmas and puzzles. I am fourteen years of age. I have neither father, mother, sister, nor brother. My mother died when I was five years old, and my father when I was twelve. I am now living at Clinton with my uncle, but my home is in Shreveport, Louisiana. I am going to school here. The school-boys are divided on a high hill. We have a good teacher, and new scholars are coming in every day. Our teacher has introduced HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE into his school, and has a large class, all of whom are highly pleased with it. Your little friend,

JONAS A. II.

HAMBERG, IOWA.

I am twelve years of age. I have three sisters and one brother. I live in the country, and go to school all the time. I have no pets to tell you about, but I have a dear little sister a year and a half old, who is so cute. She thinks lots of her kitty; it is black and white. We have a good dog. I do not take lessons now, but I like to play on it. Papa takes HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE for us. I wish Jimmy Brown would write a story every week. I must stop now, so good-by.

MISA B.

As Thanksgiving draws near, some of our young people begin to wonder what pretty game they can add to the stock they already know, so that they may be ready to try it when the merry party of cousins and friends has assembled. We propose

FAMOUS NUMBERS.

It may be played by any number of people. We will suppose a family consisting of a papa, mamma, Aunt Mary, Uncle Henry, and several children to be engaged in it on a pleasant winter's evening. Ada begins:

"Papa, how nice it would be if you and mamma and aunt and uncle would have a game of Famous Numbers with us!"

"I have no objection, my dear, if you will tell me how to play it. Famous Numbers do not belong to the toys of my childhood, I am afraid."

"Well," said Ada, "this is what we must do: Charlie or I must write on slips of paper some numbers, such as we please. We twist our papers up, put them on a plate or in a bag, as we can, and you each draw one. Then you open it, and say: 'My famous number is Twelve (or whatever the number is). There were two famous Caesars.' If you don't know enough famous things or people to make the number, you pay a forfeit; but that will be impossible for you, papa."

"I am by no means sure," said Uncle Henry, "that I shall pay the first forfeit myself. Lowey-er, I am ready to try."

Ada and Charlie then prepared their pieces of paper, handed them to the aunt, accepted the two finally left, and resumed their seats. Baby Amy would insist on taking a paper like the rest, so papa promised to help her in finding her famous number.

Mamma opened hers first. "I have drawn the famous number of Four," she said. "I think Spring, Summer, Autumn, and Winter are a famous four."

"I have drawn a famous number," said Ada; "it is Three. Oh! I know who shall be my famous Three—"

"The dauntless three who kept the bridge of old."

"Can you repeat the lines of the lay, Ada?" inquired her father.

"I think I can."
"Then out spake brave Horatius,
The captain of the gate;
To every man upon this earth
Death cometh soon or late.
And how can man die better
Than facing fearful odds
For the ashes of his fathers?
And the temples of his gods?"

"Hew down the bridge, Sir Consul,
With all the speed ye may;
I, with two more to help me,
Will hold the foe in play.
In you strait path a thousand
May well be stopped by three;
And out spake strong Herminius—
Of Titan blood was he:
I will abide on thy left side,
And keep the bridge with thee."

"Then out spake Spurius Lartius—
A Romanian proud was he—
Lo! I will stand at thy right hand,
And keep the bridge with thee—
And out spake strong Herminius—
Of Titan blood was he:
I will abide on thy left side,
And keep the bridge with thee."

"Very well, Ada," said Aunt Mary. "I have drawn the famous number of Six, and my father as your papa has mentioned the twelve Caesars, I will give the twelve months of the year."

"I have drawn a famous number—Nine. Of course I have no names for the number, but I have drawn a famous number; it is Five," said Anne. "The five Senses are very famous—Seeing, Hearing, Smelling, Tasting, and Touching."

"I," said Fanny, "have drawn a famous number—Seven. Seven stars in the Pleiades. They are called 'Seven Stars' sometimes."

"I have drawn a famous number—Eight. May I say an octave in music? It is the most famous eight I know," said Mabel.

"I think we will not make you a forfeit this time," said papa.

"I have drawn Six. Well, Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday, Friday, and Saturday—famous for work, if for nothing else," said Aunt Mary.

"I have drawn Ten. The Decemviri who mis-governed Rome," said Aunt Mary.

"See what mine is about," said baby Amy. "It is one. Tell us a famous one, Amy," said papa.

"My own mamma," said baby. "And so on."

CHARLES G.—It is rather too late this season to gather leaves for skeletonizing. They should be collected in June or July, soaked for some days in water until the green part separates easily from the frame work of the leaf, and then dipped in a solution of soda, which whitens them. Try the process next summer.

HANGING THE WISH-BONE.

THE WISH-BONE.

BY TOMMIE JONES.

They say that boys are horrid things,
 And don't know how to act;
 They're nothing, though, to grown-up girls—
 I tell you it's a fact.
 I saw myself the whole affair,
 And watched the fun begin;
 'Twas Sue that laid the spiteful plot
 To take Amelia in.

At dinner Melia twitted Sue
 About a beau she'd lost,
 And though Sue kept a smiling face,
 I saw how much it cost.
 I knew that something had to come:
 Boys like an honest fight,
 But girls will smile and kiss, and then
 Do something mean for spite.

"Just put the wish-bone, dear," said Sue,
 "Above the parlor door;
 Your husband he the first will be
 Who steps the threshold o'er."
 She helped Amelia mount the chair
 (I watched it with a grin),
 Then beckoned with her finger-tips,
 And called the waiter in.

JUDGE AND JURY.

THE first thing to be done in this game is to select a judge and three jurymen. A piece of paper is then given to each of the remaining company, who, after due consideration, must write down the name of some one in history, the incidents of whose life they recollect sufficiently to be able to describe. All having made their selection, the papers are presented to the judge, who calls upon one after another to submit to an examination.

Let us suppose that the first player has chosen Shakespeare; he would be asked in what year he was born, to what country he belonged, what he did to make himself remarkable, what great men were his contemporaries, and anything else that might occur to the judge. No one, of course, with a superficial knowledge of history should accept the position of judge, nor yet that of jurymen. If agreeable to the company, living characters may be personified, still, historical ones are generally the most interesting, and it is astonishing how much instruction as well as real amusement may be drawn from the game.

HOW LOUIS BROUGHT HOME THE THANKSGIVING TURKEY.

BY JAMES OTIS,

AUTHOR OF "TOBY TYLER," "TIM AND TIT," "MR. STUBBS'S BROTHER," ETC.

"I JEST wish we could have a Thanksgivin' like other folks, with a big roasted turkey, an' everything to go with it, an' pies an' puddin's."

"The best Thanksgiving we could have, Louis, would be your father's safe return home; but such happiness as that I am afraid is almost too much to ask for."

"I don't see why he won't come. He promised to be here ever so long ago."

"Yes," said Mrs. Herbert, with a sigh, "and your father would never have broken his word to us unless some terrible accident had happened. Every one thinks he is dead, or we should have had some word from him by this time; but I can not give up all hope—I can not."

"Don't cry, mother," and Louis seated himself by his mother's knee, trying to soothe the grief his innocent wish had called forth. "I didn't mean to make you feel bad when I said I wished we was goin' to have Thanksgivin' like all the other folks. The boys was tellin' about what they would have at their homes, an' I was only thinkin' about it. But I don't care if we don't have anything if only you won't cry so much."

Five months before, Mr. Herbert, Louis's father, had left his home in Maine on the little schooner Richmond, bound on a trading cruise South. The vessel was loaded with such produce as commanded at that time a high price in the Southern markets, and Mr. Herbert had believed that he should make large profits from the venture. During the first three months he had written home regularly, telling of the prosperous voyage he was making, and then the letters suddenly ceased. Beyond the fact that he had sailed from Hampton Roads with a return cargo for Portland no tidings could be obtained, and it was the general belief in Ellsworth that the Richmond had gone down off Cape Hatteras with all on board.

Mrs. Herbert had long since used the money her husband had left with her, and on this day before Thanksgiving she was absolutely penniless, with such a grief in her heart as the lack of money can never cause.

"If your father never comes back, Louis, you are the only one poor mother has got to look to for comfort and aid. You must try to be a man, my son; and even though you are only twelve years old, remember that you must do all you can to take your father's place."

Just then the clergyman called, as he had done every day during the past month, and Louis went away by himself, thinking earnestly of what his mother had said about taking his father's place, although he was completely at a loss to know how he should begin.

He knew that if his father was there the Thanksgiving dinner would be procured at once, and he thought his mother's words had some reference to the feast. He had been talking with her about the dinners which others were going to have, and such a one as he would like. Almost immediately afterward she told him that he must take his father's place, and he could only understand it in one way: she expected that he would provide the dinner.

With only four cents in his savings-bank, and with no idea as to how he could get any more, the task which he believed his mother had set him seemed a hard one. If it was summer, he might earn some money picking berries, or by driving Mr. Mansfield's cow to pasture; but it was winter, the lake had been prisoned in ice several weeks, and the ground was covered with snow. There was certainly no way by which he could earn any money, and he must think of some other plan of getting the Thanksgiving dinner.

"I'll go over to Myrick Snow's, an' see if he won't sell me a turkey, an' let me pay for it workin' for him next summer," he said to himself finally. Then, not wanting his mother to know exactly what he was about to do, but anxious to tell her so much of his plans that she would not be worried because of his absence, he asked through the half-opened sitting-room door, "Can I go down on the lake, mother, an' skate as far as Myrick Snow's?"

Mrs. Herbert knew that the ice was strong enough to bear any number of boys, for not only had nearly every one in the village been skating on it during the past week, but those who had occasion to drive from Ellsworth to Machias rode down the entire length of it, thus shortening the distance nearly three miles. She gave Louis the desired permission, cautioning him not to remain at Mr. Snow's very long, since she wanted him to be home again before night-fall.

Myrick Snow lived on the shore of Duck Lake, almost directly opposite Ellsworth, and in the winter, when the ice was in good condition for skating, he had no reason to complain of a lack of visitors, for every boy in town thought it a great pleasure, as well as something to boast of, that he had skated six miles, and had a pleasant visit at the farm-house besides.

"Ain't goin' out fur fun, are yer, Louis?" asked Rube

Downs, as he saw the boy seat himself on a log at the edge of the ice for the purpose of putting on his skates.

"Well—no—that is," and Louis hardly knew whether his errand should be called one of pleasure or business, "I'm goin' over to Myrick Snow's."

"Was yer thinkin' of comin' back to-night?"

"Yes, of course."

"Then don't try it, lad. You'll get over there easy enuf, but ther' gettin' back 'll be mighty hard work, an', besides, I reckon it 'll come on to snow like all possessed 'bout twelve o'clock."

"I guess there won't be snow enough to spoil the skatin' before night," replied Louis, thinking how willing he would be to do something even harder than skating in a snow-storm if he could help his mother.

"That's what yer think," replied Mr. Downs, with what was very like a sarcastic tone in his voice; "but I've known of them, an' men at that, what couldn't cross Duck Lake when the snow was flyin'. Why, lad, it ain't more'n five years since Eph Howard froze to death on this 'ere lake, an' when we found him he wasn't more'n a quarter of a mile from this very spot."

"But, you see, I've got to go," and Louis intended to convey the idea that if he was bent simply on pleasure, he would turn back because of the warning.

"Well, of it's must, it's must; but after you git to Myrick's, you stay there ef it begins to snow."

Louis had no opportunity to reply, for the wind had begun to force him along as soon as he stood on his skates, and by the time Rube ceased speaking he was far out on the lake, driven in the desired direction without any exertion on his part.

Louis did not stop to think that a wind that could force him along so rapidly would present a difficult obstacle to fight when he attempted to return against it. Already he fancied that he had the turkey in his possession, and was home again, proving to his mother that he could take his father's place, so far as obtaining food for the Thanksgiving dinner was concerned.

Short as was the time occupied in crossing the lake, the fine particles of snow that appeared in the air told that Rube Downs's predictions of a storm were about to come true. But there was nothing very angry-looking in these few snow-flakes, and Louis was content in hoping that he should be home again before the storm came on.

The walk from the shore of the lake to Mr. Snow's comfortable-looking old farm-house was not a long one, and if Louis had been troubled about the weather, the farmer's cheery greeting would have driven it from his mind.

"Well, Louis, my boy, I'm right glad to see you! How is your mother this cold weather, and have you heard from your father yet?"

Louis's reply to the latter question was given in a tone so sad that the farmer hastened to say:

"But you will hear from him, my boy; perhaps not to-day nor to-morrow, but mark my words, you will hear."

"That is what I tell mother, Mr. Snow; but she says that if father was alive he would have sent us some word before this, and she cries mostly all the time."

It was some time after this before the old farmer ventured to say anything more, and then he changed the conversation by asking:

"Didn't you have anything better to do on such a cold day as this than to come out skating? Even if I was as young as you are, I believe I had rather be by the side of a good fire to-day than on Duck Lake."

"It was pretty easy gettin' over, 'cause the wind takes a feller right along; but, you see, I had to come to-day, if it was cold, an' I'm goin' to start back as soon as I can."

"So you've come on business, eh?"

"Yes, sir," and Louis was not nearly as bold, now that the time had come for him to speak, as he had thought he would be. "You see, to-morrow is Thanksgivin', an' mother told me she expected me to take father's place. She's spent all the money she had, an' we can't have no kind of a Thanksgivin' without I do somethin' 'bout it. I don't know of any way that I could earn any money now; but I come to see if you wouldn't sell me a turkey, an' let me pay you for it next summer. I'll do up any kind of work, an' jest as much of it as you say I ought to, if you'll let me have a turkey. There's only two of us now, so you know we wouldn't want a very large one."

Louis had spoken very rapidly toward the last, more especially when he made his wishes known, and as he paused for a reply, it seemed to him as if the farmer needed a wonderfully long time in which to make up his mind as to whether or no he would agree to such an extended credit. But when Mr. Snow did finally speak, Louis was satisfied with the result of his journey.

"Let you have a turkey? Of course I will, my boy, and you shall have the largest and fattest in the flock without any thought of paying for it."

"But I don't want you to give me one; I only want you to sell it to me, an' let me work to pay for it."

"You shall have it in any way you choose, and in the morning I'll send over everything to go with it. If I'd had any idea that your mother hadn't enough to see herself through nicely, she should have had her Thanksgivin' dinner before this."

It was not long after this before the hired man, acting under the farmer's instructions, brought into the house a nicely dressed turkey, big enough to serve as dinner for a much larger family than Mrs. Herbert's, and Mr. Snow said, as it was laid by Louis's chair:

"There, my boy, I'll sell you that, and when I'm ready for you to pay me I'll call on you. Now if you'll stay all night with us, I'll carry you over to town in the morning when I take the other things to your mother; but if you think she'd worry about you it's time to be startin', for I'm afraid we're goin' to have a storm."

Louis was quite certain that his mother would be anxious regarding him if he remained away from home all night, and after repeating that he would be ready to pay for the turkey in work at any time, he started off, the Thanksgivin' dinner hanging over his shoulder.

From the time he left Mr. Snow's home the air had been full of fine flakes of snow; but it was not until he was nearly a third of the distance across the lake that it came down in a thick storm that prevented him from seeing more than twenty feet in any direction. The whirling flakes bewildered the boy to such an extent that it seemed as if he was turning round and round like a top, while it was an absolute impossibility for him to keep in his mind the direction from which he had come or that in which he should go. He lost all idea of where the town was, and it was only at intervals that he could tell whether he was going against the wind or with it.

The falling snow covered the ice until Louis found it difficult to skate through it, while the turkey, which he still carried on his shoulder, weighed him down more and more, until the time came when he sank down upon the cold, treacherous carpet that was being spread out over the lake, entirely exhausted.

"I'll stay here jest a little while, an' then I'll take the turkey home to mother," he muttered, as he gave himself up to that fatal slumber which the Frost-king throws around those whom he would make his victims. Despite the howling wind, the falling snow, and the piercing cold, Louis Herbert closed his eyes in what was to him a sweet sleep, all forgetful of the fate that had overtaken Eph Howard, when he was but a quarter of a mile from home.

It was Thanksgiving-even, and not far from the shore of Duek Lake a woman waited for the return of her son, even while she mourned her husband as one dead.

"Come, get on there; don't stop here, or we sha'n't get home as soon as if we had stuck to the longest way round!" shouted a man to his horse, as the animal suddenly halted before a mound of snow that lay directly in front of him.

Words seemed to have no effect, but when the whip was used vigorously by the impatient driver, the frightened steed dashed ahead, nearly overturning the sleigh as one of the runners struck the mound which had appeared simply as a drift of snow piled up by the wind.

"Hello!" cried the man, as he tried as hard to stop the horse as he had to urge him on; "what can that be out here on the lake? I'm sure we haven't got near the shore yet."

It is possible the driver remembered the sad fate of Eph Howard, for at the expense of considerable time and trouble he stopped his horse, and getting out of the sleigh, walked back to the mound of snow over which he had so nearly upset.

"Bless my soul, it's a boy!" he exclaimed, as he pushed away the snow with his foot. "It's a boy not much larger than my own little Louis, an' huggin' a turkey that's frozen nearly as stiff as I'm afraid he is."

The situation would not warrant much delay, for each moment was precious if the child's life was to be saved. Hastily placing him in the sleigh, the belated traveller drove on, keenly alive to the danger he himself was in if he allowed his horse to swerve ever so slightly from the right course.

Half an hour later Mrs. Herbert, who had been anxiously watching for Louis's return, ran into the yard, all heedless of the storm, as she saw a sleigh draw up in front of her house.

She had hardly reached the gate before the muffled man who had found Louis on the lake caught her in his arms, covered with snow as he was, and then she knew that the husband she had mourned as dead had returned.

"We mustn't stop to talk now," he said, after the briefest of brief embraces, "for I've picked up a poor boy on the lake who, I'm afraid, is done for"; and in a moment more he had carried the child into the house, where it could be seen who the "poor boy" was.

There is no necessity for saying that everything was done to restore him to consciousness, and while his mother worked over him, the father ran at once for the nearest physician.

Louis had been into the very valley of the shadow of death, and had he not been rescued as soon as he was, he would never have retraced his steps to life. As it was, he was not restored to consciousness for several hours, and then his thoughts were on the same subject that had occupied them when he sank down upon the snow in that slumber which had so nearly been his last.

"I got the Thanksgivin' dinner for you, mother," he said. But in another moment he understood that there was no longer any necessity of his trying to take his father's place, for both his parents were bending over him.

It was a happy day, and one truly of thanksgiving, that followed Louis's rescue and his father's return. There was no lack of dinner in the Herbert household, for Mr. Herbert had not been wrecked, nor had he lost his property. The schooner Richmond had encountered a heavy gale, and had been blown far out of her course; but she had carried all on board of her safely, and the voyage had been a prosperous one.

"You can't believe how glad I was when I found I had brought the turkey an' father home at the same time," Louis said, when he was telling the story of his adventure on the ice, and it is not difficult to believe that his father was quite as glad as he was.

Myrick Snow was paid for his turkey, but not by Louis's work on the farm. When he came over the next morning to bring the "fixings" to go with the fowl that he had promised, it was not difficult to persuade him to go back for his family, in order that they all might partake of the dinner which had so nearly cost Louis his life.

THE SEA EATS UP THE HILL.

BY CHARLES BARNARD.

EVERY boy or girl who has travelled about much in the cars knows that the railroad is made as nearly level as possible. In order to do this, the builders of the roads cut through the hills and fill up the valleys. Where a place is cut through a hill it is called a cutting, and the "angle of repose." By this queer expression he means that the rocks, or clay, or sand will rest or repose, and not slide down any more. Now stones, or loose rock, or clay, or sand have each their own angle or slope. In every sandy hill the slope will be the same, in every clay bank or gravelly hill it will always be the same, each kind having its own particular slope.

Spread a sheet of paper upon a table, and upon it pour some fine salt, so as to make a little conical heap. Near it make a heap of powdered sugar, flour, Indian meal, or house sand. Each heap will have its own angle of repose, and by looking at the heaps across the tops you will see that the slope or angle of repose is quite different in each.

On the shores of Massachusetts Bay, round Boston Light, and along the coast toward Marshfield and Scituate, are many smooth and rounded hills, bare, grassy, and breezy on top, and with the roaring surf beating at their feet. On the east and northeast side of every hill is a terrible scar or torn and ragged place, where the grass hangs in wretched rags along the top, and the sand and gravel are continually breaking off and rolling down into the water. The raised parts over the lowlands are called embankments. In a cutting the banks slope inward toward the track, in an embankment they slope downward and away from the tracks on each side.

Now the curious part of this work is that whenever a cutting is made every hill behaves in a different way. If the hill is composed of hard rock, the cutting may be narrow, and only a little wider at the top than at the bottom. If the hill is full of loose broken stones, the cutting must be wider at the top. If it is made up of pasty and sticky clay, it must be still wider. A gravelly hill will need a wider cutting still, and in a sandy hill the cutting will be very wide. In each hill—the rocky, the stony, the clayey, gravelly, or sandy hill—the sides of the cutting will have a different slope. It is the same with the embankment. If it is made of sand, it will be broad and with gently sloping sides; if it is made of stones and rock, it will be narrow, with steep sides.

Of course the man who makes the cutting would prefer to have a narrow one. It is much more easily and quickly made, and does not cost so much. The truth is, the man can not help himself, for every hill decides the matter for him. He begins to cut into the bottom of the hill, and at once the sides tumble in. He carries away the rocks or gravel, or whatever it may be, and digs again, and more of the sides fall in. After a while this falling down of the sides of the cut stops, and the man says the hill has found its hills are green on top and along the western sides. To the east they are steep and yellow. These broken sides of the hills all face the sea, and are called cliffs. Some of these cliffs are a hundred feet high, and by standing at the edge you can look almost straight down into the surf and far out over the wide blue sea.

There is a great workman busy here. These hills are being undermined and eaten away by the sea. The surf that breaks at the foot of each cliff washes out the clay and sand, and down fall the loose stones, gravel, and soil above. No grass can grow there, nor bushes find a foothold, for the face of the cliff is continually sliding down and melting away in the surf.

On some of these hills the farmers have built stone walls to divide the land into pastures for sheep and cows. Every wintry storm that drives the roaring and foaming surf close up to the foot of the hills causes pieces of the cliffs to fall down. Sometimes a large slice will go down at once. "Slumping," the boys would call it, for the grass goes right down, and sometimes takes a piece of the stone wall with it.

The sea is eating up the hills. It works very slowly. The surf does not reach the foot of the cliffs at every tide, and perhaps in a year you could hardly tell that the hill had changed. Perhaps only a foot or two of the grass at the top would fall; but still the work goes on, never hurrying, never stopping.

Now the wasting away of these hills would not be a matter of much consequence; they are not very valuable, and they are melting away very slowly; but there is something else going on here. We have learned from our rambles by the sea that beaches can walk, that sand and gravel can travel for miles, and overwhelm rivers, and make great changes on the coast. These Massachusetts hills are always accompanied by beaches or sunken bars that join one hill to another, as at Nantasket Beach, near Boston Harbor, and at Scituate and Marshfield beaches. These beaches and bars are the ruins of the hills. The sea tears them down, and spreads them over the bottom of the water, the stones in one place and the sand in another. In one place in Boston Harbor a hill has entirely disappeared, and left only a long and crooked sand-bar in its place. The bar is in the way of ships, and the government had to build a stone beacon on the spot to mark the grave of the hill.

While nobody cares very much for the loss of the hills, the sand-bars that the sea builds between and about them are a serious matter. As long as the sand and gravel kept quiet on shore, piled up in high hills, nobody cared. When the sea ate up the hills, and scattered their bones all about, it became a serious question as to what should be done about it. The sand filled up the harbors, and ships were wrecked upon the hidden bars.

Not long ago I went down among these torn and ragged hills. Here is a picture from a photograph I made upon the beach at the foot of one of the cliffs. In front is the beach at low tide. Beyond is the hill cut right down as if with a gigantic knife. The sand and gravel has slid down till it found its angle of repose, and there it rests. When people found the sea was tearing down the hills and filling up Boston Harbor with the ruins, they decided that something must be done to stop the work. The government surveyors came and looked at the place, and said that a stone wall—a sea-wall they called it—would stop the mischief. Then great blocks of granite were brought to the foot of the hills, and massive stone walls were built upon the beaches. Then a curious thing happened. The surf beat upon the wall, but as it was very strong it could not move the wall, nor could it get over the top to eat into the hill. As by magic the whole thing stopped. The hills were saved, and the bars stopped growing.

The second picture is taken from the top of the sea-wall at Point Allerton, opposite Boston Light. The hill here had wasted nearly all away, and there is not much left. At the right you can see the beach below the wall, and at the left all that is left of the old hill. This same wall also protects the larger hill seen in the other picture, as Point Allerton is farther out in the water, and acts as a breakwater. For many miles along the shore in Boston Bay these great walls have been built. It has cost a great sum of money and many years of labor; but the sea is conquered, and the poor old hills that were being eaten up have been saved. Hotels and houses have been built upon them, and thousands of people go there every summer to roam over the grassy slopes, or along the glorious beaches and by the sea. It is one of the strangest and most beautiful places on all our coast, for the sea has cut the hills into all sorts of fantastic and lovely shapes, and now it has all stopped, and perhaps for many years this curious work of the sea will stand still. What will happen next no one can tell.

CHAPTER IX.

EVERYTHING in Mrs. Grange's large fine house, the sudden change in her circumstances, the new clothes and new prospects, had kept Nan very much subdued before they started on their wonderful journey; but by the time they were fairly on the train and hearing Beverley. Miss Phyllis Rolf found she had her hands full in keeping pace with her little charge. To begin with, Nan's old "fliberty-gibberty" ways, as Mrs. Rupert used to call them, had re-asserted themselves. She had to have her hat and her collar and her tie re-arranged half a dozen times, and even her face washed and her hair brushed twice; and then she asked Phyllis a dozen questions at a time. Finally Phyllis said, rather peremptorily, "Nan, if you will sit perfectly still for ten minutes—we shall soon be in Beverley—I'll answer some of your questions."

They had chairs in the parlor-car, and Nan wheeled hers around with a very bright expression. She wanted to know something more definite of her aunt Letitia and the house at Beverley. It seemed too bad that it had begun to rain, and that it would be nearly dark when they got there; but then everything couldn't go on being just perfectly delightful.

"It is a large brick house," said Phyllis. "There is a short drive up to the front door, but a nice lawn and gardens at the side; and, by-the-way, your aunt will be very particular about your going into the garden without her permission. She never allows any one to pick flowers by herself."

"Is she very cross?" said Nan.

Phyllis laughed.

"Oh no," she answered. "But, Nan—I had better tell you—she is rather peculiar in some ways. She never likes one to contradict her or to have opinions of one's own. You must always seem to think just as she does."

"But suppose I don't?" said honest Nan, opening her eyes to a perfect stare.

Phyllis had a very pretty white forehead, so smooth that every little line showed in it; and though it was a very small frown, Nan saw one distinctly between her eyebrows.

"Then you must try and think so," she answered.

"Now I'll tell you more about the house. There are a great many windows, some looking on the gardens, some toward the street. The street just there is rather hilly; indeed, 'Rolf House,' as it is always called, is near the top of the street. You go in by a wide door, and there is a square hall, with a staircase going up at the left side. There is a big fire-place in the hall; on one side is a room called the black-walnut parlor, on the other a long drawing-room. The library and the dining-room are on the same floor. Everything is very handsome."

"So I'll have to be careful of the things," said Nan, who was perfectly quiet, listening.

Phyllis laughed.

"You won't have to think much of that, I imagine," she answered. "You are to be well looked after, I can assure you, Nan."

Nan waited a minute, and then said,

"Kept very strict, do you mean, Cousin Phyllis?"

"Very," said Phyllis.

"Well, where do you live?" asked Nan, after puckering her face up into a dozen wrinkles on this new idea.

"We live in College Street," said Phyllis, "about half a mile from 'Rolf House.' Ours is a rather shabby house, though it's large. Did I tell you about my sisters and brothers?"

Nan's face lighted up instantly with one of those sweet unselfish or unconscious looks which made her positively pretty.

"No," she said; "but do, please do, Cousin Phyllis."

"Well, there are six of them—Lance and Laura, and the twins Joan and Dick, and the younger boys, Alfred and Bertie."

"All my cousins?" said Nan, feeling as if the world was getting to be a very big place.

"Every one," laughed Phyllis.

And now in the pale wintry dusk they began to see the lights of the town, and Nan's heart beat very quickly when the train stopped, and she found herself following Phyllis out on to the covered platform, where she saw a servant in livery come up respectfully, and stand by while her cousin gave him directions about the trunks.

Nan's education had been of the most fragmentary kind; but it so happened that she had read two or three novels, or stories, in which the heroines had arrived at a railway station, to be met by fine servants in livery, and driven to fine houses, where they were received in great state. Now as she stood, a little half-frightened figure clinging to Phyllis's side, it flashed across her mind that she was just such a heroine, and it gave her a great deal of sudden courage. She thought of the big brick house with all its splendors, and how in a short time she would make a sort of state entry there. Would there be a row of servants in the hall, she wondered? There would be something very especial to welcome her—Nan felt she could be sure of that.

And then Phyllis said, "Come, Nan," and they went out of the noisy station in the dusk, and up a flight of steps, where, just as Nan expected, a very grand carriage was waiting. In a moment more they were whirling away through a pretty, hilly town, where the shop windows were just being lighted, and where there was a long bridge over a river, and a line of hills in the distance. Nan felt sure she was really like one of her dearest heroines, and only regretted that her name was so short and unromantic.

"I shall try and imagine I am called Florizel," she thought, "or Alexandrina." And before she had come to any decision about the two names, the carriage rolled in a gateway, beyond which Nan could see the large brick house, with its many windows irregularly lighted.

CHAPTER X.

NAN quite forgot she was Florizel in the bewilderment of the next few moments. The door was opened widely; a stream of light poured out upon the gravel-path, and in the glow she saw a stately old lady standing with an elderly man-servant at her side. Then in a confused way she heard the lady say, "How do you do, Annie?" and she felt herself being kissed, while as if in a dream she found herself following the old lady and Phyllis down the hall and into a square, primly furnished parlor. Here Nan's heart began to beat a little less wildly, and she took courage to look about her. She looked first, of course, at Miss Rolf, who stood talking to Phyllis in an under-tone about the journey, and was apparently saying something about Nan herself. Stately and severe she no doubt looked, yet Nan felt drawn toward her aunt in a curious way she could not explain. Her face must once have looked like Phyllis's, Nan thought: there was the same finely chiselled outline of feature, the straight nose, and the well-defined eyebrows; but Miss Rolf, for all her years, had something in her face which Nan liked better than anything about pretty, blooming Cousin Phyllis.

Sitting over by the tall, old-fashioned chimney-piece, little Nan took note of the old lady's exquisite silver-gray silk dress, the white lace kerchief and cap, the beautiful white hands, and the flash of opals in a brooch at her throat. Where had the child ever seen anything so queenly and beautiful? Miss Rolf did not guess what was going on in the mind of her little niece that first ten minutes. Inwardly Nan had decided she was quite willing to submit to her aunt's rule, and that she should like to be with her. The room was undoubtedly the black-walnut parlor of which Phyllis had spoken; it was furnished in dark colors, but everything was refined and old-fashioned and comfortable. There were candles lighted in tall silver candlesticks on the chimney-piece and on a side-table, and a wood fire glowed on the hearth. Presently the door opened, and the man-servant Nan had seen came in with a large tray, which he set down on a table in the centre of the room, and then Miss Rolf broke off her conversation with Phyllis, and turned to little Nan.

"I presume you feel hungry, my dear," she said, kindly; "and you too, Phyllis. I thought you would like something to eat in here."

Phyllis had thrown herself down in a large easy-chair near the fire. "How good of you, Cousin Letty!" she said, with a long-drawn sigh. "Everything always looks so home-like and tempting here."

Miss Rolf only smiled in a quiet way, and watched the servant critically while he set out the dainty little supper, to which she invited the travellers, pouring out their tea, and urging the biscuits and oysters and other things upon Nan, who, hungry as she was, felt almost too shy to eat.

"And now I must go," Phyllis said, after she had finished her supper. "Good-by, little Nan; I'll see you in the morning."

"No, Phyllis dear," said Miss Rolf, quietly, "it will be as well not to come to see the child to-morrow. I think she will better be quiet."

Nan said nothing; but as Cousin Phyllis kissed her good-by, she clung to her fervently, a wild longing to run away back to Bromfield, even to the butter shop, coming over her. But in a moment the door had closed upon Phyllis's figure. She was alone with her aunt, and a feeling came over her, for the first time, that a new life really had begun.

"You had better eat something more," Miss Rolf was saying. "No? Well, then, perhaps, my dear, you would like to go to bed. I will not keep you up for prayers to-night. Generally I read them at half past eight."

Miss Rolf touched a bell, and when it was answered she said, "Please send Mrs. Heriot here," and in a moment a pleasant-faced elderly woman appeared, who looked at Nan in a very kindly, critical way.

"This is Miss Annice Rolf, Mrs. Heriot," said the old lady. "Will you take her up to her room, and—you need not stay with her after she is in bed. Good-night, my child."

Nan kissed Miss Rolf very timidly, and went away with Mrs. Heriot, who held her little hand in a firm grasp that was very comforting.

They passed down the matted hall and up a staircase to the left. Above, a narrow corridor led to three little steps which dipped down into Nan's room. It was small and comfortable—not very bright, perhaps, for all the furniture was old-fashioned and sombre; but there was a window with a deep seat in it, and some interesting-looking pictures on the walls. The bed-curtains were of chintz, the pattern of which was a series of pictures, and the wall-paper repeated a design of a garden and a terrace, along which a lady and gentleman were walking. Altogether, Nan thought, as Mrs. Heriot lighted the candles, that she should like her new room and enjoy the walls and the window.

She wished Mrs. Heriot would talk a little more while she helped her to undress, but, except for asking her one or two things about the journey, she made no remarks. When she had tucked Nan into bed, she just nodded at her and smiled, and, taking the candle in her hand, walked away, her footsteps sounding softly until she was downstairs.

Nan lay still, half afraid, but on the whole comfortable. She had so much to think and wonder about! To-morrow would certainly be a wonderful day. But why should her aunt object to Phyllis's coming back? Nan's little brain soon got all sorts of things in a tangle, and she fell asleep to dream that she was in Bromfield, selling butter to Mrs. Heriot.

THE CONSECRATION OF THE KING'S ARMOR.

BY E. M. TRAUQUAIR.

At Goslar, in his chamber deep
The youthful monarch lay asleep,
The gates were barred, and guarded all;
No sound was heard in bower or hall;
You could not hear a footfall creep
Where young King Henry lay asleep.

But what avails the strongest will,
Unless the Lord say, "Peace, be still!"
The storm wind whistles through the hall,
And heavily the rain-drops fall;
The hot and sultry day is o'er,
And loud and fierce the thunders roar.

On tiptoe light the warders glide;
The King must rest, what'er betide.
If 'mid the tempest he can sleep,
They will not stir his slumbers deep;
Till suddenly, with awful crash,
Beside them glares the lightning flash.

Then at their master's danger stirred,
The servants run, a pallid herd;
The crashing thunder's awful roar
And rushing rain are heard no more;
From every side re-echoes then
The hurried tramp of armed men.

The folding-doors they open wide,
And, fearful, through the chamber glide.
Their lord they find still slumbering lies;
Unconscious he of danger nigh;
Upon the pillow lying bare,
The youthful head with golden hair.

But sword and shield above his bed
Show Death had darted overhead.
As in a furnace molten well,
Their former fashion none could tell.
The lightning left its fiery trace
On nothing else about the place.

In deep amazement the warders stand;
The King, awaking, seeks his brand.
But, startled when the weapons bright,
So strangely altered, meet his sight,
Says only, guessing how 'twas done,
"So Thou wert here, Thou Mighty One!"

"Methought, while lying on my bed,
I heard Thy hammer overhead,
And saw, Great Smith, Thy furnace, bright
With fires the steel to temper right,
As, in my dream, I thought I stood Within Thy wondrous Smithy good."

Quick from his couch the monarch sprang,
And in his hands the hammer swung,
To finish, like a valiant man,
The work that God Himself began.
Beneath his blows the weapons yield;
New fashion take both sword and shield.

For many a year he filled the throne,
And many a royal robe put on;
Did oft, in many a coat of mail,
His own and country's foes assail;
But never other sword would have
Saw that which God in thunder gave.

Full two-and-sixty times was used
The shield the lightning's flame had fused;
Full two-and-sixty battles saw
His sword the warlike monarch draw.
And, in the fight, still bright as new,
That sword and shield were ever true.

The thunder dubbed him Knight that day,—
When dead upon the bier he lay,
The crown and sceptre both were there
All tarnished like his golden hair;
Yet brightly still gleamed shield and sword,
As bright as once their youthful lord.

FEEDING THE ORPHANS.

MOSES AMONG THE BULRUSHES.

BY WILLIAM M. TAYLOR, D.D.

THE picture on the opposite page tells most beautifully a part of the story of the finding of Moses. The rest of it is known, we are sure, to all our readers. The hard-hearted Pharaoh, defeated in other efforts to reduce the number of the captive Israelites, enacted a law that every little boy that was born in a Hebrew household should be cast into the Nile. But Amram and his wife, seeing that their infant was "exceeding fair," resolved to disobey the cruel orders, and hid him for three months. Then despairing of being able to keep him longer concealed, they made a little bulrush box in which they laid their babe, and which with its precious freight they deposited on the "lip," or margin, of the river. But with some dim faith in their hearts that somehow deliverance would come, they stationed Miriam, their little daughter, in the neighborhood to watch what might happen. Nor did she watch in vain, for by-and-by the daughter of the King came down to bathe in the river, and finding the little box, she opened it, and was at once moved by the helpless grief of the weeping infant to adopt it as her own. And then the clever management of Miriam came into play, for she went at once to the Princess, and asked whether she would not need a nurse for the child, and being answered in the affirmative, she ran and brought her mother. Thus it came about that the mother was hired to nurse her own child, and the daughter of the Egyptian King became the educator of him who was at length to emancipate the Hebrews from the slavery in which her father held them.

It is a beautiful story, and never loses its charm either for the old or for the young. But we must not tell it here simply for its own sake. Did it ever strike you how nobly Miriam acted through it all? For three whole months she held her peace, and never said a word out-of-doors about the "new baby" that had come into her home. You know how much that must have cost her from the pride and joy you feel when a little brother is born into your family, and from the eagerness you have to tell everybody you know about his loveliness. But in this case Miriam knew that the baby's life would be the forfeit of her speech, and she prudently held her peace. Then how calmly she spoke to the Princess about the nurse! Outwardly she might be all unruffled, but she could hear her heart beat while she waited for the word on which her mother's happiness so much depended. And how nimbly she could run to fetch her mother when she heard that her plan had succeeded! No doubt she had been told beforehand what she should do in the event of any one desiring to take possession of the baby, but she did it all so well that her conduct may well be an example to children of all time. Had she made common talk of all that happened at home, Moses never could have been saved; and had she gone off to play with other companions, and left her post of watchfulness beside the little bulrush box, she would have lost the opportunity of securing that her mother should be engaged as Moses's nurse. Her dutifulness to her parents thus secured her brother's preservation, and so Miriam stands out before us, young as she then was, as a noble illustration of obedience to parents.

Then what an interesting instance of God's providence we have in this simple story! Here is no miracle. The circumstances are all such as, allowing for the differences between ancient Eastern and modern Western life, might have happened among ourselves. Yet see how they fit into each other! If any one of them had been different Moses could not have been saved, but in the union of them all he was preserved. And it is this coming together of so many different things to one end that makes us sure that God's providence was in it. But then that providence is in everything just as much and just as really as it was in this. You have been kept alive through that providence as truly as Moses was. We often talk of "providential escapes," as if providence was only in escapes, but it is in everything; and if they ought to be thankful to God who have been brought out of danger, much more ought those who have never been in danger. So let us be stirred up to earnest gratitude to God for His goodness to us in our life and health. And if we wish to know how to show that gratitude, Moses's history will tell us. The life that God preserved he devoted to the good of His people, and we should do the same with our prolonged existence. Let us seek to live

"For the cause that lacks assistance,
For the wrong which needs re-stance,
For the good that we can do,"

and that will be a noble thank-offering to Him who has given us all our blessings, and crowned us with His favor as truly as He kept watch over Moses in the little bulrush box on the bank of the Nile.

ABOUT CLUBS.

BY SHERWOOD RYSE.

MOST of the clubs with which readers of YOUNG PEOPLE are likely to be concerned come under one of the three following divisions: Game and athletic clubs; literary or musical clubs, including debating, reading, essay, singing, and dramatic clubs; mixed literary and social clubs.

Athletic clubs are organized in the same manner as other clubs, but as they are governed principally by the rules of the game to which they are devoted, we will pass over them for the present.

Literary clubs are a very pleasant means of spending spare evenings, and at the same time of becoming well acquainted with delightful authors, and of exercising one's talent for reading aloud, debating, and writing essays. Perhaps debating is the most popular of these exercises, and in this country, where every gentleman is expected to be able to "make a speech" when called upon, it is a very desirable part of one's education.

To choose subjects for debate is not at all easy. Subjects that require more information than the members can be expected to obtain should be avoided, for no debate can be kept up with spirit unless the members are well "posted" on the subject. Again, only those subjects which admit of a real difference of opinion should be chosen. The writer once proposed the question "that Tom Brown's School-Days is the best book on English school life that has been written." It was a question with which we were all more or less familiar, but we had a very dull debate, because we were all agreed from the first that it was the best.

An essay club, where the members meet, say, every fortnight, and read essays written on subjects proposed at the last meeting, is very pleasant, and leads one to take an interest in matters that would not otherwise be attended to. After the essays have been read a discussion on the opinions of the writers may be held.

Reading clubs generally choose some book to read aloud, say, one of Dickens's or Scott's novels, or one of Scott's poems, or even one of Shakespeare's plays. The characters should be arranged at the meeting before the play is to be read, so that each may read his part over beforehand. It is well to ask the advice of some older person before deciding upon a play or a book, and when Shakespeare is chosen, an edition with notes, such as Rolfes's Plays of Shakespeare, is best. It is not necessary to finish a book in one evening, but one book or one poem or play should be finished before another is begun.

And now for the third kind of club, which is perhaps the most enjoyable of all. Suppose it meets once a week. One evening we may begin a play of Shakespeare; on another we may debate; on a third we may read or recite selected pieces of poetry, or a chapter from one of Scott's novels, or the experiences of Mr. Pickwick at Dingley Dell Farm, or a chapter from Little Women or Alice in Wonder-Land. Several members are appointed to read or recite, while the others play audience. Then on another night there may be acting charades, and in the Christmas holidays perhaps a set piece, with a specially invited audience.

Besides these and similar entertainments there may come a day when Mr. Barnum brings his big show to town; then the club may hold its meeting under the circus tent. And in the fall, when the ground is dry, and the weather bright and cool, the club may arrange an extra day-meeting on Saturday morning, and take part in a "hare-and-hounds" chase; or, in winter, the president, after having obtained a vote of the club, may call a special day reunion for "next Saturday, at nine o'clock, on Jones's Pond, if the ice bears."

It is always difficult to find a good name for a club. For athletic clubs in small towns the name of the town may be sufficient, as the Montrose Base-ball Club; or the name of some part of a city, as the Chestnut Hill Athletic Club. In far Western towns the Pioneer is a good name, especially if the club is the first of its kind in the place. Literary clubs may call themselves after some great orator, or statesman, or author of world-wide fame: for example, Webster, Garfield, Hawthorne, Washington Irving, Dickens, Abbotsford (home of Sir Walter Scott), Waverley, Avon (a river running by the birth-place of Shakspeare), etc. The name of Washington is naturally so commonly used that it would better be avoided.

In the case of clubs of the third kind, all sorts of names may be used, and they need not have anything particular to do with the objects of the club. Such names as the Eteceras, the Whip-poor-Wills, the Katydid, the Owls, and many others equally or more fanciful, may be adopted. If the club meets on Friday evening (which is a good time), it may be called the Man Friday Club, thereby associating it with every boy's friend, Robinson Crusoe, and every member will be known among his club companions as a "Man Friday."

As the laws governing almost every kind of club are about the same, we give below a form of constitution that may be made to fit most kinds of clubs in which our readers are likely to be engaged. Following that we give "by-laws," which may be changed to suit the particular society, either for games or for literary exercises.

Always remember that the life and interest of a club depend on the good feeling and give-and-take spirit of the members. When, therefore, you elect a president, choose that one of your number who, by reason of his age and popularity, is likely to have most influence over the members; he will thus be able to preserve order among the members without causing any jealousy or ill feeling.

The secretary's duty will be to keep the "records" of the club, and he should be provided with a neat blank-book for that purpose. At the beginning of it he should write the names of the officers and members, and the Constitution and By-laws. Of course he should be a good penman.

The treasurer keeps the money of the club, but it is better that the club should have no money in its treasury, and when any is needed, each member should be assessed a sufficient sum to make up what is required.

CONSTITUTION OF THE ETCETERA CLUB.

I. This society shall be known as the Eteceera Club, and its object shall be to read and discuss such matters as shall be agreed upon, and otherwise to promote the reasonable social enjoyment of its members one with another.

II. The Club shall consist of fifteen members. When a vacancy occurs, a new member shall be elected by ballot, and three votes shall exclude. Candidates for membership shall be proposed and seconded at one meeting and balloted for at the next.

III. (1) The officers shall be a President, a Secretary, and a Treasurer, who shall be elected for one year by a majority of all the members of the Club.

- (2) The President shall preside at meetings, and execute the decisions of the Club. In the case of a tie vote he shall have an extra casting-vote.
- (3) The Secretary shall keep the records of meetings of the Club in a book provided for that purpose, and shall do such other writing as the business of the Club may require.
- (4) The Treasurer shall attend to the money matters of the Club, and shall preside at meetings in the absence of the President.

IV. (1) Meetings shall be held once a week at the residences of the members, in order. If it should not be convenient for any member to receive the Club at his residence in his turn, he may, with the consent of the Club, exchange turns with some other member.

- (2) Extra meetings may be called by the President, with the consent of the Club, for any time and place that may be agreed upon.

- (3) Absence from meetings without good cause shall be punished by an extra assessment not exceeding ten cents, to be collected when next an assessment shall be made for the expenses of the Club, as provided for in Article V.

V. The expenses of the Club shall be defrayed by an equal assessment levied on each member as occasion shall arise. An assessment must be voted by two-thirds of all the members of the Club, and shall not be due until one week after it has been voted.

VI. Any member who shall have been absent from three consecutive regular meetings without good cause, or who shall disobey the ruling of the presiding officer after due warning given, or who shall be guilty of unbecoming conduct, may be expelled from the Club by a vote of two-thirds of all the members of the Club.

VII. Eleven members shall form a quorum sufficient to transact business, and, except where otherwise provided, a majority of the votes of those present shall be considered as giving "the consent of the Club."

VIII. This Constitution may be amended by a two-thirds vote of all the members of the Club, notice of proposed amendment having been given at the meeting preceding that at which the vote is taken.

IX. All doubtful questions of club law shall be referred to the Editor of HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE.

BY LAWS.

1. Until otherwise agreed, the regular meetings of the Club shall be held every Friday evening, from seven until nine o'clock.

2. Before proceeding to the exercises of the evening, the Secretary shall read the minutes of the last meeting, and the business of the Club shall be transacted.

3. The exercises for the next meeting, and the subjects, shall be decided upon before the Club adjourns.

4. No member shall recite or read for more than ten minutes in one evening; and no member shall speak in a debate for more than ten minutes, nor speak more than once, except the mover of the question, who shall be allowed five minutes for a reply before a vote is taken. The Club may vote to adjourn a debate to the next meeting.

5. The member at whose residence a meeting is held shall provide a pitcher of ice-water and a glass for the use of members.

GRANDPAPA'S TOWZER.

AS TOLD BY DICK.

IF you want me to tell you, I will; but I ain't used to telling things if they're long, and likely as not I'll get it all mixed up, and the wrong end first. Charley could tell it beautiful, I suppose. He's the smart one of our family, and can do just about everything he sets out to. All the same, it's always him that's getting us into scrapes. Smart folks are that way. They get people into things people would never think of themselves, and then somehow they turn up all right, and it's us that catches it. This whole business was his doing; none of the rest of us would ever have thought of such a thing.

When the invitation came Charley instantly began to talk about Towzer. He said he wasn't going to have Towzer left at home wining about and breaking his heart all alone for any stupid dinner at Grandpapa's; not he—the dog should go. The idea was so perfectly absurd that when Betty said, "Nonsense; hold your tongue!" none of us thought a word more about it.

Grandpa is a very rich man—"most dreadfully horribly rich," Jack puts it. He lives in the city, and has an immense house, nearly as big as our barn; and the furniture is something wonderful, and there are horses and carriages and everything.

Just what relation we are to Grandpa it would be awful hard to make out. Poor mamma, who died when we were little tots, was only his adopted daughter, and somehow we don't think he cared for her much; but Betty says she "knows what's what," and as long as he'll have us young ones there once in a while to dinner and let us call him "Grandpa," we've got to go. Betty talks about our "chances"; but when we wanted to take a chance in a grab bag at a fair she said it was wicked.

It was just a week ago that we were packed in the wagon ready to start. Charley says our wagon came out of the Ark; but it isn't true. A great many things may be very old, but when you come to talk about the Ark, it's nonsense. It looks likely, too, that Noah would have taken such a wagon as that aboard when he was rich enough to have all those animals! I like reason in things, and there's no reason in that.

Our machine looks so funny in Grandpa's big coach-house! I can always hear James giggle when we drive up. But this time I think we looked a little better than usual, for Charley had on his new overcoat; Jack and I, being twins, have got so used to being mixed up that we don't pretend to have anything separate. People never know us apart, and when he's naughty Betty generally whips me. I suppose I wore his clothes, but we both looked nice. Bob's so little he don't count, but the new collar Betty did up for him nearly cut his ears off.

Charley always drives. He's twelve, and, after all, Dobbin couldn't run away any more'n a cow. Besides, it's only ten miles to Grandpa's. We're just outside the city, where rents are cheap.

We hadn't gone two miles that day before Charley gave a whistle, and there was Towzer right alongside the wagon.

"You darsn't!" said I.

"Darsn't I?" said Charley. "He'll stay in the coach-house, and I'll run out now and then and speak to him. We ain't had him a month, and I couldn't leave him behind."

My hair just stood on end. I don't believe there's anything Charley darsn't do. It's just as I said before. He knows three times as much as the rest of us, and he just imposes on it to do as he likes. But then the idea of taking Towzer to Grandpa's! I knew trouble would come of it, and I knew too that if it did, Charley'd get out all right; and if there were any consequences, we'd be the ones to take 'em. You just ought to have seen the trouble we had to get out of that coach-house without Towzer following us. Charley got us all out, and then he shut the door quick, and ran. Towzer howled frightfully, and we heard him all the way into the house.

Dinner at Grandpa's is always a very solemn affair. There's lots and lots of everything, one kind after another; but the trouble is that if we take some of each, and Betty says it's good manners, we haven't any room left for the ice-cream and cake, and all those sorts of things which we like best. Another trouble is Grandpa. He sits up so stiff and stately, and his eye is just awful; not that he scolds, but he looks so severe, as if he was just going to. Bob sits in his high chair and scarcely dares swallow a mouthful, and the next day at home he cries about the good things because he hasn't got 'em.

Now the most wonderful thing about Grandpa's table is the dishes. They are just perfectly beautiful—glasses that you're afraid your breath will blow away, and plates and cups of all kinds just filled with painted flowers and all manner of shapes. David, who waits on the table, says they have names like "severs" and "clothes on you" and "jollyky."

Well, we were just getting to the ice-cream. Grandpa had been very kind, and Bob was so little scared that his plate was half empty, when suddenly we heard a great scratching; then a floundering, skurrying noise. Charley turned deathly pale.

I couldn't think what was going to happen, and everybody else looked perfectly astonished. All of a sudden the door flew open with a bang, and with one tremendous spring in jumped Towzer. Mrs. Davis, who keeps house for Grandpa, and sits at the head of the table, screamed the most awful scream I ever heard.

"IT WAS A MOST TERRIBLE SIGHT."

At first Towzer didn't see Charley. Then he caught sight of him. An awful jump under Grandpa's elbow threw the wine all over his shirt bosom. Then there was a wriggle, and Towzer's big tail knocked pieces and pieces of "clothes on you" and "jolly" into one mass of bits; the ice-cream pyramid went down, and oranges and grapes flew round like big hail-stones.

It was the most awful moment I ever knew.

Charley gave one look. I thought he was going to faint. Then he gave a horrid groan, and in a minute he was gone. Jaek flew after him. I thought it was mean to leave Bob, so I grabbed him by the waist, and downstairs we went.

Charley made for the coach-house, and Jaek and I after him, Bob screaming until I thought he would go into fits. There was a big empty stall in the stable, and in we all went, and covered ourselves up with straw.

"Diek," said Charley, "if they don't look up, we'll crawl out after dark and go home."

This was all very well, but Bob's awful screams were enough to tell the whole neighborhood where we were.

Presently out came James, and Mrs. Davis with him.

Now we had always been afraid of Mrs. Davis, she was so big and dignified; but when she saw us all cuddled up in a heap under the straw she laughed so hard, and James laughed, and finally Bob stopped screaming, and laughed too, so that Charley and I began to feel a mite cheerful.

"What 'll he do to us?" asked Jaek.

Then Mrs. Davis scolded him a little, and finally she ordered us back into the dining-room, and told us she was going to tell us a story about Grandpa. He was gone, of course. No mortal power could have got us back into that room if Grandpa had been there.

"Ever and ever so many years ago—"

"Hundreds and hundreds?" asked Jaek. He always will interrupt a story.

"No, but a good many. When Grandpa was a young man he was very poor, but he had a wife and a little boy that he loved very much. They were so poor that instead of a great big house they could only have part of one. Grandpa went to work every day, and his wife went out to buy things, and there was no one to leave the little boy with but a big dog named Towzer.

"Oh!" groaned Charley. He was still awful pale.

"One day Grandpa came home from his work, and what do you think he saw? It was a most terrible sight. From the high upper window of the room where he lived his little boy was hanging—just hanging there apparently by a bit of his froek, but no one could tell what held it.

"What did?"

"Grandpa had seen the boy before any of the neighbors, but he was so frightened and overcome that they rushed up first, and there they found—"

"What?" screamed Jaek.

"Towzer grasping the little boy's skirt in his mouth, and both paws braeed against the window-sill. The poor dog was not strong enough to pull him in, but he held the child fast till help came."

"Was he all right, then?"

"Yes, indeed; no one knew how long they had been there. But the good dog had saved the little boy's life."

"Where are they all now?" asked Jaek.

"Grandpa is here; the rest are all gone."

Mrs. Davis looked so sad that we knew they were dead. "Is Towzer dead too?" asked Jaek. "Where did he die?"

"We do not know, Jaek. Grandpa had to move away, and the owner of the new house he went to would not let him keep a dog, so Towzer was given away to a kind man, and when Grandpa got a house of his own the good dog had died. Not long after his wife and little boy left him too, and now he is all alone."

Nobody said anything for a few minutes, and then Charley spoke.

"I am going to see Grandpa, and tell him I know about his Towzer; and I'm awful, awful sorry our Towzer broke his dishes, and we'll never come here again to bother him."

Charley is a mean kind of boy. When he came back he gave us some big bright dollars he said Grandpa had sent us, but besides that Jaek and I could hardly get a word out of him. All the way home he was as mute as a mouse. When we got mad and asked him how he liked taking Towzer to Grandpa's, he said,

"Fellers, I want you to understand that a gentleman's house in the city is no place for a great Newfoundland dog."

Nice way for him to talk, wasn't it!

THE MILKMAID.

WHERE are you going, my pretty maid?
I'm going a-milking, sir, she said.

Shall I marry you, my pretty maid?
Oh, thank you kindly, sir, she said.

Shall I go with you, my pretty maid?
Oh yes, if you please, kind sir, she said.

But what is your fortune, my pretty maid?
My face is my fortune, sir, she said.

What is your father, my pretty maid?
My father's a farmer, sir, she said.

Then I can't marry you, my pretty maid.
Nobody asked you, sir, she said, sir, she said.

ing lessons, and some are learning music. I do not envy these girls, but sometimes I wish that the good times might be divided up, so that I might get a share of them.

For one thing, I am not a little girl. I am sixteen. I have a great many troubles, and I feel quite grown up. Aunt Alice says I feel more grown up now than I will when I am thirty. She says she knows by herself. I am sure I shall never be as peaceful and sweet as Aunt Alice if I live to be a hundred. I was a happy girl as long as I could go to school. But though I have not know anything, the doctor has persuaded mamma that it will be better for my health to let me stay at home for a year or two, and take exercise.

Mamma says all young girls should learn how to do housework, so though I hate to cook and such things, I have to learn how. That is my great trial. Then we have a very large family, and so many dishes! and as we do not keep a servant, everybody says, "Let Rosalie wash the dishes." And oh! Postmistress, you never would believe how I hate to wash dishes. I often feel like breaking them, and would, only it would do no good.

Do you think it wrong to like to have soft white hands? Would you like yours to be coarse and red?

I hope I am not making you think that I am a very silly girl, but another trial I have is wearing an apron. I do not like aprons, but I can not help myself, as all the ladies and girls around here have to wear them, and if you don't do so too, you are thought very careless.

Please answer this, and do say you are sorry for me, Rosalie.

Yes, Rosalie, I agree with you that it would be a pity to have coarse red hands if one could help it, and I own that I like mine to be white and soft. But, my dear, I do not think with you that it is a misfortune to have to stay at home awhile and learn to keep house. I have had an idea of getting up a Young Housekeeper's Sociable of my own in Young People, and I give notice now that all the girls who wish to join it may send me their names. I can not tell you all my plans here, but if you and the other girls like the idea, we will all try together to become nice, dainty, and successful housekeepers. From time to time, if you gather around me while the boys are outdoors playing their noisier games, we will have little talks about sweeping, dusting, manging servants, cooking, and doing the work ourselves, and other things. Good housekeeping is happy home-making. Never forget that.

About washing dishes, now. I always take my glass and silver first. I have a basin with two divisions. I wash my pretty things in one side of the basin, and rinse them in the other. Then I keep soft fine towels on purpose for these finer dishes, never using them for the others. We will have a longer talk about washing dishes some day, for though many girls dislike it, it is a lady's work after all. If my little Virginia and Kentucky girls would speak, I am sure they would say that they enjoy washing the breakfast and tea things, and would not trust any clumsy hands to perform this task. Why not get your brother to make you a mop, so that you need not put your hands into the hot water when busy with the dishes?

As for never growing to be like Aunt Alice—well, dear, perhaps she would tell me something else if I could have a chat with her. We grow sweet and patient, not all at once, but day by day.

The apron difficulty must wait until another time. If I should tell you about some pretty aprons that I have seen, and give you an idea how to make them, don't you think you might overcome your dislike to the useful articles? If you wear the hideous gingham, I have often seen on some people, don't wonder at your feeling as you do. And now good-morning, Rosalie, for the rest are waiting.

SIERRA COUNTY, CALIFORNIA.

We had a delightful time at the Mountain House last summer. We had five saddle-horses, on which we went out riding nearly every afternoon. We had a pet deer with a bell on, but it ran away when it was about four months old. It was a great friend of one of the dogs, and they would play together every morning. We had a great many chickens, and would sometimes get twenty-five or twenty-six eggs a day. They were large eggs, and when we cooked all the nice thick cream we wanted. Although our home is in the mountains, we have an ice-house, which is packed hard with saw-wood around it. Sometimes grandma makes ice-cream for us.

Last week we went to grandma's saw-mill; it is five miles from here, and is in a beautiful spot, with stately-looking trees. By the mill a creek runs on, and I had a chance to see the saw-dust in the mill for the men. We took our luncheon with us, and ate it by a spring where there are beautiful ferns, maiden's-hair, and moss. As we go to the saw-mill there is a little stream that winds its way first on one side of the road and then on the other. We ride for three miles through a forest of tall pine-trees, viz., spruce, oak, cedar, and yew, besides hazel and bushes. I know the great Postmistress lives on the side of the road near this.

C. K. T., I. E. C., and M. E. C.

This bright letter has had to wait so long for its turn that by this time the writers are no doubt deep in arithmetic and history, with very little time for picnics. The Postmistress hopes they will write again soon.

ANTWERP, BELGIUM.

I have your paper sent to me here in Antwerp, and I think it is very nice indeed. I want to write to HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, and I think there is nothing nicer to tell your readers about than the Zoo in Antwerp. I have heard it is the best in the world, but I am an American, and have not been here long, and expect to stay two years longer, and I think I can tell in that time. Wherever we go—say, to Paris, or London, or any of those places—I expect to visit the Zoo, and then I can tell you what I think is the best and the best Zoo. I don't think they have very many polite animals. Some of them are lovely, the birds especially; but I had seen the deers before that, and I can't think of a single one which was a deer, and gave it a piece of cracker, and the way it said "Thank you" was that it spit right in my face. I think it was a llama. When I went to the gardens with my little friends, we took a ride on the elephant and it seemed as if we were riding in the air, but you get too many lumps.

I rather fancy the ponies and goats more than the elephants. They have a camel too which they ride, but I have not tried it yet, and do not expect to, because it has a very rough gait; it seems as if you were riding between two mountains. I have heard that a crew of sailors, which was two years, and I think I will buy one and try. The last time I was at the Zoo I took my little basket full of crackers and nice things for the monkeys. You ought to see them fight for a piece of cracker. If one don't get a piece, he will nearly knock it out of the other's mouth. And they have even little nails on their fingers, such as we have, and their whole hands are very much like ours, only, of course, smaller.

I am very anxious to have this letter published in HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, as it is my first letter.

BESSIE B. (12 years old).

A very good letter indeed, Bessie. I hope you will tell us about other zoological gardens when you visit them. One day last summer I went to Central Park to see the animals, and I had with me a wee tot of a girl five years old, and she—little May was her name—her mamma, and myself thought we would feed some of the pretty, gentle creatures. There was a giraffe, a stately animal, with large soft eyes, and a way of turning its neck as I have seen ladies turn theirs. We fed this queenly looking thing with gingerbread, and it really tried to thank us, and did not behave at all like the ill-bred, spiteful llama which did not like your cracker. I can't remember the name of the bear, but he presented a flock of ostriches, some of them so tall that the little folks have to look 'way up to see their heads.

VIRGINIA CITY, NEVADA.

This is the second letter I have ever written. I go to school, and I like it very much. I have never been to school until this summer. Mamma always taught me. I had a governess once, but she did not stay long, because mamma and papa thought it best for me to go to school. Last summer he went away one morning, and never came back. Papa thinks he must have fallen into a shaft, but I have hopes that he will come back some day. I have seen a snow globe, and shall be so glad when the snow comes, we have so much fun coasting.

I am eleven years old. I have no brothers. I have one sister, but she is married and lives in San Francisco. I have two nephews and one niece. Mamma thinks my letter is long enough. I shall like to see how this will look in my dear HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE.

NELLIE A. II.

SAN FRANCISCO, CALIFORNIA.

I am a little boy who was five years old the 1st of October. My sister is writing this letter for me. I have a dog named Pompey Aristotle Washington W. A boy has promised me a little kitten, and I am going to call it "Sylvia." I have never very much, and I catch every Monday for the postman to bring it. I saw four Chinese babies baptized last Sunday. They were all dressed funnily. The mother of one of the babies had two boys. Two of the children were boys, and two were girls.

Sometimes I go to the Chinese school, and like it very much. I have heard the Chinese sing and talk, and I think I have lots of Chinese candy. I have seen and tried to use chopsticks, but I like

"ALL READY FOR WINTER."

OUR POST-OFFICE BOX.

THANKSGIVING-DAY! What a pleasant sound the words have, and what pleasant memories they recall in our minds! I hope the dear boys and girls will each try to make the day a happy one to somebody else. If we get Thanksgiving selfishly, we shall not get its true sweetness into our hearts.

The Postmistress has written a little hymn for the children to sing, and she hopes they will all learn it, and try it by some pretty tune:

Children, sing to Him whose love
Broods your happy lives above;
Raise your tuneful voices high
To our Father in the sky—

For the flowers and for the wheat,
For the cold and for the heat,
For the fruit and for the grain,
For the sunshine and the rain.

Children, sing to Him whose care
Makes the land so rich and fair;
Raise your tuneful voices high
To our Father in the sky—

For the mother's look of grace,
For the baby's little face,
For the morning's smile of bliss,
For the happy good-night kiss.

Children, sing to Him whose hand
Rules and guards our native land;
Lift your joyous voices high
To our Father in the sky—

For the cheery bells that swing,
And for freedom peal and ring,
For our nation's peace and wealth,
For our gladness and our health.

Children, sing to One whose love
Broods your merry days above;
Lift your tuneful voices high
To our Father in the sky.

I shall certainly expect some letters next week telling me how you have spent Thanksgiving, and all about the frolic and the fun.

WATERLEY, NEW JERSEY.

Most girls who write to you, dear Postmistress, seem to have a very good time. They talk about their dolls, and their pets, and their darling little baby brothers, and some of them take paint-a knife and fork better. The Chinese gave me lots of fire-works the Fourth of July, and my big brother Lincoln had them off.

How eagerly you must be counting the days until Christmas, so that you may meet dear mamma again, and want a kiss and a sweetie she will give her little five-year-old boy when she sees him again!

NOLDE, TEXAS.

I am a little girl eight years old. I have two little sisters; their names are Alma and Annie. We have no pets except a little kitten; its name is Blossom.

SHELBYVILLE, KENTUCKY.

I have one pet; it is a pup. I like to see the way from Madison County, Kentucky, in a basket. His name is Don.

THOMAS M. C.

ROCHESTER, NEW YORK.

I am a little girl seven years old. I go to school, and am in the seventh class. I like to go to the drill every time any company comes to visit the school.

FLORENCE B. A.

Certainly, dear, send your puzzle. A great many of our readers will think you a happy girl to have Miss Alcott for a cousin.

ALBANY, MISSOURI.

Can you tell me a new kind of party to have? I live in a country town, and do not hear of much that is new in the way of entertainments.

BESS.

Your contribution, which arrived too late for acknowledgment in the next report, has been sent to Miss E. E. Kellogg, treasurer of the fund for our People's Cot.

Why not have tableaux at your party? They would require a little preparation and practicing beforehand, but there is a great deal of fun to be had in arranging for them, and they always please the lookers-on.

WOLFVILLE, NOVA SCOTIA.

I am twelve years old, and have five brothers and one sister. My uncle, who lives in Ceylon, sent me HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE.

very best uncle in the world. I enjoy reading the stories very much, and my brothers and little sister enjoy them quite as much as I.

To-morrow is Thanksgiving-day, and I am to have a holiday. The last lesson my teacher gave me was a piece called "The Sack Waltz."

The Thanksgiving-day which Lettie anticipated was a special day of rejoicing held November 9, and not an annual holiday like our own.

You could have written nothing to please me more than this, dear. I am sorry you have to walk so far to school, and for your sake I hope there may be more fine days than stormy ones;

"And taking the year together, my dear," as the song says: "There isn't more storm than this sun."

Only a tiny acorn That fell from a bough of the tree, "Of what use are you?" said the wind and the rain.

DEMING, BELLER, TEXAS.

We are two little cousins who live in the country, and are seven and eight years old. We milk seven cows all by ourselves, and can ride horse-back.

LEZ AND OCE.

What wonderful children you are, to be able to milk seven cows your own little selves! I hope the cows are gentle. I will trust you never to tell anybody, for I wouldn't like all the children to know it, but I am very much afraid of cows, and would go a long distance round to avoid meeting one.

CAMBRIDGE, PENNSYLVANIA.

I do not take HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, but we have been reading from it in school. I think it has some very pretty stories. I go to school, and so I have not very much time for reading papers.

CLEVELAND, OHIO.

I am a little girl eight years old. I like YOUNG PEOPLE very much. I want to tell you about my cousin Emma's little dog.

POLAND, NEW YORK.

I am a little girl eight years old. I want to tell you about my dolls. I have a cunning little girl doll. It will turn its head and feet, and its arms.

SANDWICH, OREGON.

I am a little boy nine years old. I live in Canada, but I am a Yankee boy, for I was born in Buffalo, and I long to go back to my own State.

I have another doll that when I was a baby was taller than I was. I spent my vacation at my grandpa's, and had a pleasant time. Now good-by. I am going for a walk.

we put it down in the orchard, thinking it would be so glad of its liberty; but it came right back, and begged to be fed and to go into its cage again; and we could not get rid of it, so we had to take it in again.

I have a big gray cat two years old, and his name is Pseudion. I have a lot of chickens, and a little black puppy called Nellie.

Write to Messrs. Harper & Brothers for the numbers of YOUNG PEOPLE you wish to obtain, inclosing four cents each to pay for them.

"WHAT'S THAT?"

THE CURIOUS FEAST.

BY G. B. BARTLETT,

AUTHOR OF "NEW GAMES FOR PARLOR AND LAWN."

AS feasting is a marked feature of Thanksgiving-time, we present to our readers a feast which will have the merit of novelty and of exercising their ingenuity and taste. Easy-rhymed enigmas or short conundrums should be written on cards of some pretty design, each one of which describes some article upon the table, and the child who first guesses the puzzle retains the card upon which the description was written.

When the appetites of the children have been in some measure appeased the game is usually begun. The lady who presides at the table draws a card from an ornamental basket which stands before her, and, after reading it, calls on all who have guessed it to hold up their right hands. If more than one hand is raised at the same moment, she gives the card to the first player on her right, and another card bearing a number only to each of the others. These cards all draw prizes numbered to correspond if they are retained until the end of the evening. Before giving an account of the funny way in which these cards may be lost, we give a few specimens of the enigmas, in making which, as in all enigmas, the sound and not the spelling is followed; the answers are omitted from the cards used.

Table Furniture.

My first is very good to take; My first will foaming floods restrain;
My second you should not forsake. You'll find my second "Ask again."
Ans. Nap-kn. Ans. Dam-ask.

Vands.

My second finds her wild abode My turbaned first is fierce and free;
Where my hot first is freely strowed. My next unlocks much mystery.
Ans. Sand-wich. Ans. Turkey.

Fruit.

My first is part of every banner, My sounding first is always round;
My last the end of Mordiana. My next is in the kitchen found.
Ans. Banana. Ans. Orange.

In describing articles which have but one syllable the card may bear a simple question in the form of a conundrum, as follows:

No. 19. What letter will you drink?—T. No. 20. What fruit comes from the diary?—Dates. No. 21. What fruit caused the swiftest to lose the race?—Apples. No. 22. What fruit should we make marbling two by two?—Pears. No. 23. What is the chief part of the chief of philosophers?—Plato. No. 24. Which are the most patient of the table furnishings?—The waiters. No. 25. Which are the fastest?—The dish that ran away with the spoon. No. 26. Which fruits are most worthy of trust?—The candied ones.

These cards, having been awarded to the children who have guessed their meaning, are not always sure to secure for them the prizes which are designated by the numbers which they bear; for while the children are all busily engaged in eating, a new trial of their powers is introduced.

By the side of the lady who sits at the head of the table is a small striking-bell, such as is used ordinarily to summon the servant. When this bell is sounded every person must stop instantly in whatever position he may chance to be, and must remain perfectly motionless until he hears two strokes of the bell, by which he knows that the moment for resuming his occupation has come. It is very funny to see the various attitudes in which the merry feasters are held spell-bound by this signal, for if any one makes the slightest movement after it has sounded, his card is forfeited, and becomes the property of a more attentive guest. But should the cards lost by this trial, as is seldom the case, be too few to supply the demand of the winners, the hostess makes up the deficiency by giving out more numbered cards. This signal is repeated several times, thus keeping the attention on the alert, and causing shouts of laughter which render the attempts to keep still more and more difficult.

When the supper is at last over, the children form in two lines across the room. The prizes are then brought in and spread upon a small table, which is wheeled into the middle of the room between the two rows of expectant children. The lady then takes up each prize in turn, and calls out the number with which it is marked on the paper in which it is wrapped. The child who holds the card bearing the number walks down the line to the table and opens his present, to the great interest of the spectators. These prizes are of varied kinds, according to the ages of the children and the liberality of their friends. Among them is a silver spoon, the fortunate winner of which is expected to give the next feast.

Besides being very amusing, this feast is an intellectual one, for after a little practice the children will enjoy making the cards as much as guessing them, and for this reason only a few specimens of each sort are here given.

"DEAR CHILD, YOU ARE LOST, AND I HAVE COME TO FIND YOU."

A CHRISTMAS DREAM, AND HOW IT CAME TRUE.

BY LOUISA M. ALCOTT.

"I'M so tired of Christmas I wish there never would be another one!" exclaimed a discontented-looking little girl, as she sat idly watching her mother arrange a pile of gifts two days before they were to be given.

"Why, Effie, what a dreadful thing to say! You are as bad as old Scrooge, and I'm afraid something will happen to you, as it did to him, if you don't care for dear Christmas," answered mamma, almost dropping the silver horn she was filling with delicious candies.

"Who was Scrooge? what happened to him?" asked Effie, with a glimmer of interest in her listless face, as she picked out the sourest lemon-drop she could find, for no-thing sweet suited her just then.

"He was one of Dickens's best people, and you can read the charming story some day. He hated Christmas, until a strange dream showed him how dear and beautiful it was, and made a better man of him."

"I shall read it, for I like dreams, and have a great many curious ones myself. But they don't keep me from being tired of Christmas," said Effie, poking discontentedly among the sweeties for something worth eating.

"Why are you tired of what should be the happiest time of all the year?" asked mamma, anxiously.

"Perhaps I shouldn't be if I had something new. But it is always the same, and there isn't any more surprise about it. I always find heaps of goodies in my stocking. Don't like some of them, and soon get tired of those I do like. We always have a great dinner, and I always eat too much, and feel ill next day. Then there is always a Christmas tree somewhere, with a doll on top, or a stupid old Santa Claus, and children dancing and screaming over bonbons and toys that break, and shiny things that are of no use. Really, mamma, I've had so many Christmases all alike that I don't think I can bear another one." And Effie laid herself flat on the sofa, as if the mere idea was too much for her.

Her mother laughed at her despair, but was sorry to see her little girl so discontented, when she had everything to make her happy, and had known but ten Christmas-days.

"Suppose we don't give you any presents at all—how would that suit you?" asked mamma, anxious to please her spoiled child.

"I should like one large and splendid one, and one dear little one, to remember some very nice person by," said Effie, who was a fanciful little body, full of odd whims and notions, which her friends loved to gratify, regardless of time, trouble, or money, for she was the last of four little girls, and very dear to all the family.

"Well, my darling, I will see what I can do to please you, and not say a word until all is ready. If I could only get a new idea to start with!" And mamma went on tying up her pretty bundles with a thoughtful face, while Effie strolled to the window to watch the rain that kept her in-doors and made her dismal.

"Seems to me poor children have better times than rich ones. I can't go out, and there is a girl about my age splashing along, without any maid to fuss about rubbers and cloaks and umbrellas and colds. I wish I was a beggar-girl."

"Would you like to be hungry, cold, and ragged, to beg all day, and sleep on an ash heap at night?" asked mamma, wondering what would come next.

"Cinderella did, and had a nice time in the end. This girl out here has a basket of scraps on her arm, and a big old shawl all round her, and doesn't seem to care a bit, though the water runs out of the toes of her boots. She goes paddling along, laughing at the rain, and eating a cold potato as if it tasted nicer than the chicken and ice-cream I had for dinner. Yes, I do think poor children are happier than rich ones."

"So do I, sometimes. At the Orphan Asylum to-day I saw two dozen merry little souls who have no parents, no home, and no hope of Christmas beyond a stick of candy or a cake. I wish you had been there to see how happy they were, playing with the old toys some richer children had sent them."

"You may give them all mine: I'm so tired of them I never want to see them again," said Effie, turning from the window to the pretty baby house full of every thing a child's heart could desire.

"I will, and let you begin again with something you will not tire of, if I can only find it." And mamma knit her brows trying to discover some grand surprise for this child who didn't care for Christmas.

Nothing more was said then, and wandering off to the library, Effie found A Christmas Carol, and curling herself up in the sofa corner, read it all before tea. Some of it she did not understand, but she laughed and cried over many parts of the charming story, and felt better without knowing why.

All the evening she thought of poor Tiny Tim, Mrs. Cratchet with the pudding, and the stout old gentleman who danced so gaily that "his legs twinkled in the air."

Presently bed-time arrived.

"Come, now, and toast your feet," said Effie's nurse, "while I do your pretty hair and tell stories."

"I'll have a fairy tale to-night, a very interesting one," commanded Effie, as she put on her blue silk wrapper and little fur-lined slippers to sit before the fire and have her long curls brushed.

So Nursey told her best tales, and when at last the child lay down under her lace curtains, her head was full of a curious jumble of Christmas elves, poor children, snow-storms, sugar-plums, and surprises; so it is no wonder that she dreamed all night, and this was the dream which she never quite forgot:

She found herself sitting on a stone, in the middle of a great field, all alone. The snow was falling fast, a bitter wind whistled by, and night was coming on. She felt hungry, cold, and tired, and did not know where to go nor what to do.

"I wanted to be a beggar-girl, and now I am one, but I don't like it, and wish somebody would come and take care of me. I don't know who I am, and I think I must be lost," thought Effie, with the curious interest one takes in one's self in dreams.

But the more she thought about it, the more bewildered she felt. Faster fell the snow, colder blew the wind, darker grew the night, and poor Effie made up her mind that she was quite forgotten and left to freeze alone. The tears were chilled on her cheeks, her feet felt like icicles, and her heart died within her, so hungry, frightened, and forlorn was she. Laying her head on her knees, she gave herself up for lost, and sat there with the great flakes fast turning her to a little white mound, when suddenly the sound of music reached her, and starting up, she looked and listened with all her eyes and ears.

Far away a dim light shone, and a voice was heard singing. She tried to run toward the welcome glimmer, but could not stir, and stood like a small statue of expectation while the light drew nearer, and the sweet words of the song grew clearer.

From our happy home
Through the world we roam
One week in all the year,
Making winter spring
With the joy we bring,
For Christmas-tide is here.

Now the eastern star
Shines from afar
To light the poorest home;
Hearts warmer grow,
Gifts freely flow,
For Christmas-tide has come.

Now gay trees rise
Before young eyes
Abloom with tempting cheer;
Blithe voices sing,
And blithe bells ring,
For Christmas-tide is here.

O, happy chime,
O, blessed time,
That draws us all so near!
"Welcome, dear day,"
All creatures say,
For Christmas-tide has come.

A child's voice sang, a child's hand carried the little candle, and in the circle of soft light it shed Effie saw a pretty child coming to her through the night and snow. A rosy, smiling creature, wrapped in white fur, with a wreath of green and scarlet holly on its shining hair, the magic candle in one hand, and the other outstretched as if to shower gifts and warmly press all other hands.

Effie forgot to speak as this bright vision came nearer, leaving no trace of footsteps in the snow, only lighting the way with its little candle, and filling the air with the music of its song.

"Dear child, you are lost, and I have come to find you," said the stranger, taking Effie's cold hands in his, with a smile like sunshine, while every holly berry glowed like a little fire.

"Do you know me?" asked Effie, feeling no fear, but a great gladness, at his coming.

"I know all children, and go to find them, for this is my holiday, and I gather them from all parts of the world to be merry with me once a year."

"Are you an angel?" asked Effie, looking for the wings.

"No; I am a Christmas spirit, and live with my mates in a pleasant place, getting ready for our holiday, when we are let out to roam about the world, helping make this a happy time for all who will let us in. Will you come and see how we work?"

"I will go anywhere with you. Don't leave me again," cried Effie, gladly.

"First I will make you comfortable. That is what we love to do. You are cold, and you shall be warm; hungry, and I will feed you; sorrowful, and I will make you gay."

With a wave of his candle all three miracles were wrought, for the snow-flakes turned to a white fur cloak and hood on Effie's head and shoulders, a bowl of hot soup came sailing to her lips, and vanished when she had eagerly drank the last drop, and suddenly the dismal field changed to a new world so full of wonders that all her troubles were forgotten in a minute.

Bells were ringing so merrily that it was hard to keep from dancing. Green garlands hung on the walls, and every tree was a Christmas tree full of toys, and blazing with candles that never went out.

In one place many little spirits sewed like mad on warm clothes, turning off work faster than any sewing-machine ever invented, and great piles were made ready to be sent to poor people. Other busy creatures packed money into purses, and wrote checks which they sent flying away on the wind, a lovely kind of snow-storm to fall into a world below full of poverty.

Older and graver spirits were looking over piles of little books, in which the records of the past year were kept, telling how different people had spent it, and what sort of gifts they deserved. Some got peace, some disappointment, some remorse and sorrow, some great joy and hope. The rich had generous thoughts sent them, the poor gratitude and contentment. Children had more love and duty to parents, and parents renewed patience, wisdom, and satisfaction for and in their children. No one was forgotten.

"Please tell me what splendid place this is?" asked Effie, as soon as she could collect her wits after the first look at all these astonishing things.

"This is the Christmas country, and here we work all the year round, never tired of getting ready for the happy day. See, these are the saints just setting off, for some have far to go, and the children must not be disappointed."

As he spoke the spirit pointed to four gates, out of which four great sleighs were just driving, laden with toys, while a jolly old Santa Claus sat in the middle of each, drawing on his mittens and tucking up his wraps for a long cold drive.

"Why, I thought there was only one Santa Claus, and even he was a humbug," cried Effie, astonished at the sight.

"Never give up your faith in the sweet old stories, even after you come to see that they are only the pleasant shadow of a lovely truth."

Just then the sleighs went off with a great jingling of bells and pattering of reindeer hoofs, while all the spirits gave a cheer that was heard in the lower world, where people said, "Hear the stars sing."

"I never will say there isn't any Santa Claus again. Now show me more."

"You will like to see this place, I think, and may learn something here, perhaps."

The spirit smiled as he led the way to a little door, through which Effie peeped into a world of dolls. Baby houses were in full blast, with dolls of all sorts going on like live people. Waxen ladies sat in their parlors elegantly dressed; black dolls cooked in the kitchens; nurses walked out with the bits of dollies; and the streets were full of tin soldiers marching, wooden horses prancing, express wagons rumbling, and little men hurrying to and fro. Shops were there, and tiny people buying legs of mutton, pounds of tea, mites of clothes, and everything dolls use, or wear, or want.

But presently she saw that in some ways the dolls improved upon the manners and customs of human beings, and she watched eagerly to learn why they did these things. A fine Paris doll driving in her carriage took up a black worsted Dinah who was hobbling along with a basket of clean clothes, and carried her to her journey's end, as if it was the proper thing to do. Another interesting china lady took off her comfortable red cloak and put it round a poor wooden creature done up in a paper shift, and so badly painted that its face would have sent some babies into fits.

"Seems to me I once knew a rich girl who didn't give her things to poor girls. I wish I could remember who she was, and tell her to be as kind as that china doll," said Effie, much touched at the sweet way the pretty creature wrapped up the poor fright, and then ran off in her little gray gown to buy a shiny fowl stuck on a wooden platter for her invalid mother's dinner.

"We recall these things to people's minds by dreams. I think the girl you speak of won't forget this one," and the spirit smiled as if he enjoyed some joke which she did not see.

A little bell rang as she looked, and away scampered the children into the red-and-green school-house with the roof that lifted up, so one could see how nicely they sat at their desks with mites of books, or drew on the inch-square blackboards with erubens of chalk.

"They know their lessons very well, and are as still as mice. We make a great racket at our school, and get bad marks every day. I shall tell the girls they had better mind what they do, or their dolls will be better scholars than they are," said Effie, much impressed, as she peeped in and saw no rod in the hand of the little mistress, who looked up and shook her head at the intruder, as if begging her to go away before the order of the school was disturbed.

Effie retired at once, but could not resist one look in at the window of a fine mansion, where the family were at dinner, the children behaved so well at table, and never grumbled a bit when their mamma said they could not have any more fruit.

"Now show me something else," she said, as they came again to the low door that led out of Doll-land.

"You have seen how we prepare for Christmas; let me show you where we love best to send our good and happy gifts," answered the spirit, giving her his hand again.

"I know. I've seen ever so many," began Effie, thinking of her own Christmases.

"No, you have never seen what I will show you. Come away, and remember what you see to-night."

EGYPTIAN CHILD AND GOAT.

BOY LIFE ON THE NILE.

BY HELEN S. CONANT.

EGYPT is one of the oldest countries in the world. The great river Nile, which flows through this ancient land, has witnessed many strange things which men would give much to learn about. It flowed placidly while the great Pyramids, which are one of the wonders of the world, were being built, and the thousands of mummies which are found in ancient tombs sailed, perhaps, as children on its waters, or scampered about on its banks, as boys scamper about there at the present time.

Egyptian peasant boys lead a very free and simple life. As the climate is warm, they need very little clothing. If a youthful Egyptian possesses a cotton shirt and a turban of the same material, he needs nothing more. His little brown face is as serious as that of an old man, and to look at it you would never believe that its little owner had a large fund of mischief in him.

When an Egyptian boy is about three years old, all his hair is shaved off except a little tuft on the top of his head. It is a great day in the household when the boy is shaven for the first time. If the parents are not too poor, a great feast is made, and the finest goat of the flock is chosen and sacrificed in honor of the village saint. The little fellow's babyhood is over, and he begins to wear the cotton turban, and take his place among the boys of his neighborhood. He begins to tend the great herds of sheep and goats which live on the vast sandy plains, and soon becomes an experienced herdsman.

When Mr. Bridgman, an American artist, was in Egypt, he made a beautiful painting of one of these peasant boys, from which the engraving given on this page was taken. The boy is in the native costume of his country, and he leans so lovingly against the great goat, which is almost as tall as its little master, that one can see it is his familiar pet and playfellow.

These Egyptian boys have school days also, for in nearly every village along the Nile they are required to attend the classes for a certain number of hours every day. They do not learn much, for the neatly printed and prettily bound geographies and spelling-books of American schoolrooms are unknown among the poor people of Egypt. The school-book of an Egyptian boy is a large tablet of wood painted white, upon which the teacher writes the lesson with a piece of charcoal. When one lesson is learned, it is washed off, and a new one written. To learn to read and repeat the whole of the Koran, which is the religious book of the Arabs, comprises the whole course of education of an Egyptian peasant boy.

The school-room is the queerest place you can imagine. The boys all sit cross-legged on the floor in front of the teacher. They hold their tablets in their hands, and rock back and forth as they study. They all learn their lessons aloud, and the din of their shrill voices is wonderful. The noise can be heard at a distance from the school-room, and you would think that they were screaming and fighting, instead of peacefully studying their lessons.

Undutiful or disobedient boys are rarely found among Arab children, for respect toward their parents and elderly people is one of the first things they are taught.

Unfortunately they do not show the same respect for travellers who visit their country. Toward any foreigner, who is looked upon with dislike because he does not believe in the Koran, Egyptian boys are allowed to show any impertinence which their mischievous little brains can invent. Like their parents, they are born beggars, and set upon any unfortunate traveller in the most furious manner. The moment one lands he is surrounded by men, women, and children, all screaming for alms. With such an example before them, the ignorant boys can hardly be blamed for their bad conduct.

A gentleman travelling on the Nile relates that once he stopped at a landing-place, and went on shore to visit the Sheikh (chief) of the village to whom he had a letter of introduction. The moment he set foot on land, he was surrounded by a crowd of boys all hooting and shouting "Backsheesh! backsheesh!" (alms, alms). He could speak a little Arabic, and tried to silence them with threats, but they only howled louder and louder, and began to throw mud and stones with such violence that he was about to retreat to his boat, when the tall figure of the Sheikh appeared on the scene. The venerable man held up a warning finger to the crowd of young rogues, who instantly became quiet, and vanished as suddenly as a swarm of flies.

In some localities where travellers are very frequent the peasant boys learn that it is better to work for money than to beg for it. They spend all their leisure time carving bits of wood, and making curious ornaments out of seeds and other things, which they offer for sale. These young merchants are very sharp at a bargain, and will not part with their wares except for a fair price. A traveller once, while bargaining with these little peddlers, took out his watch. Immediately a dozen pair of dark eyes were bent upon it. The ticking excited the wildest astonishment, and after the watch had been held to all the tawny ears, it was in vain that the gentleman assured them that it was not alive. They looked upon it as a new kind of animal, and ran away to tell their companions of the strange and wonderful creature which the stranger carried in his pocket.

THE ELEPHANT-KEEPER'S STORY.

BY EDWARD I. STEVENSON.

"Hi no, Squire, I certainly didn't manage to get rich with it at all; but you must recollect, sir, that rolling stones don't gather much moss."

The man who found this old proverb a handy excuse was a swartly thickset little fellow, standing in the stone-paved court-yard of Squire Buckle's stables, talking with the Squire himself. He gave his flaming red neckerchief an apologetic twitch, and was silent.

The good-humored old Squire eyed him thoughtfully. "Well, well, Junket," he responded, "I dare say you're not to blame for ill-luck; and if you're tired of roving, why, you can have your old place again. I'm glad to see you back. But suppose you finish your story where you left off. You were saying that while you were at Lord Haw's that place in the show was offered you, eh?" The Squire began patrolling the stable-yard again. Junket, walking at his side, took up the thread of his adventures:

"No, sir, it wasn't while I was at Lord Haw's at all, but after his death, that one of the gentlemen at Day's got me a post as keeper in that menagerie. I had been some weeks out of work, or I don't know that I should have thought of occupation of just that sort. But I found the other keepers a very decent set of men, sir. Pretty soon, too, I took a particular notion to one of them. Whistler was his name. He had all the charge of the big performing elephant in the show. Juggernaut they called him.

"He was just a monster, Squire, and no mistake. He was very near ten feet high—not so very tall, you'll say; but in breadth and development I never heard of his equal. Well, as I was saying, I saw a good deal of Whistler. In course of a month most all of us remarked what a fancy the elephant had took to me. I could take the creature to water, exercise him, put him through all his acts when only the show folks happened to be around, and mostly do what I pleased with him.

"You see, Squire, an elephant may be willing enough to let outsiders make a pet of him, but as for obeying one of them, that's quite another thing. He generally minds only his keeper, and that only so long as he stays in the humor to do it.

"One afternoon Whistler went off a-pleasuring somewhere up the Thames. He missed his beat, or the trains, or something or other, coming back. They had to go on with the show without waiting for him. 'Mr. Cutts,' says I to the ring-manager, 'you need have no thought about the elephant. I'll take him through the performance.' Mr. Cutts looked a little surprised, but he said, 'All right; go ahead.' And so I did, very nicely too. Juggernaut went through all his acts as quiet as if he'd never had any other trainer except me. All the proprietors were quite delighted. Just while I was taking him back under the sheds, in comes Whistler.

"'You're a good fellow, Junket,' says he. 'I'm obliged to you to death. Toss me down the padlocks. I'll put him up. You must be sick of elephant for once.'

"I was pretty well tired out, not to mention the responsibility of really taking such a creature through a public performance.

"I spoke to Juggernaut accordingly, and he sets me on my feet with his trunk as gentle as if I was wax. Whistler stepped up. I handed him the hook and the keys, and said good-night. Just as I walked out of the shed doors I heard Whistler cry out. I ran back, all of a tremble, too late to be of any good. Directly my back was fairly turned, the elephant had charged on Whistler, caught him round the body, and thrown him, like a bag of sand, smash against the further wall of the shed. It would have made you sick, Squire.

"'Back, Juggernaut!' I managed to call, standing almost under him. He stood still as a rock, no motion, no sound, the moment he heard me. Curious, wasn't it, sir? I called for help. We got Whistler out, knocked senseless as a dead man, covered with blood, and with two ribs broken. It was just a miracle he wasn't killed. That cunning beast had quietly waited for me to get out of ear-shot before he made his attack, which, you observe, was also the reason he was so still about it.

"Whistler lay in the hospital ten days before the surgeons would let him see anybody. I took his place in the mean time. I hadn't a particle of trouble with Juggernaut

"HE CAUGHT ME AS IF I HAD BEEN A MOUSE."

naut. Whether he had had a fit of rage or what not with poor Whistler, he was as tractable as a lamb with me—entirely his old self, in short. Queer animals, ain't they? Queer and bad to the backbone, Squire.

"After the ten days were over, I was allowed to see Whistler up at the hospital.

"'Junket,' says he, 'I've given up my place in the show for good. The Days 'll offer it to you. Take it, and keep it just as long as you dare. Recollect that Juggernaut's like any other elephant; he'll get over his fancy for you some day, and watch his chance to kill you, and only you.'

"Sure enough, when I got back to the show, up comes Mr. Day the younger, and offers me the care of the elephant. Nothing to do but take charge, look after practicing and trainings, and exhibit Juggernaut in the ring. I scarcely thought twice about it before I said 'Yes' to Mr. Day.

"Juggernaut performed his best that night; so he did throughout the week, meek as a Newfoundland dog. I went to work and taught him two new acts on the strength of such a setting out—to grind 'God save the Queen' on a barrel-organ, and point out the biggest fool in the company, which he did with his trunk very cleverly, one evening excepted, when he marches up to a Parliamentary gent whom the papers happened to be making pictures on. The gentleman didn't relish it, though everybody else laughed and clapped like mad. Since then often I've thought to myself that Juggernaut ought to have pointed out me, or whoever might happen to be an elephant-keeper at any time.

"We ended our London season at last, after which we crossed the Channel, and went into France.

"We were busy there all July, exhibiting in Havre, Paris, Dijon, Lyons, and the dear knows how many other towns besides. Next we stopped at Geneva, and then from Switzerland the proprietors decided to go down into Italy. Into Italy we went, Juggernaut and all. He behaved himself as nicely as ever, no stubbornness, no sulks—anything I wanted him to do done at once.

"But when we were drawing large houses in Venice, Squire, I began to feel and see trouble on its way. Twice I had to argue a point with Juggernaut pretty stiffly. Then he turned restless and cross by spells. One day I had to be moving around his stall a good deal on account of our carpenters. Says one of them to me, on leaving in the afternoon, 'I beg the Signor Keeper's pardon, but I have remarked a curious thing while I have to-day been engaged with this labor.'

"'And what may that be?' says I, for I'd come to flourish Italian fairly well.

"'I noticed that wherever the Signor Keeper stands, whatever he does, the great elephant always keeps his eye on the Signor Keeper.'

"Squire, when I heard that, it made my blood run cold, for it's a certain warning to any man who is employed about an elephant. And to think I had been that blind!

"The next night, the show being over, I happened to cross the shed alongside of Juggernaut, with a bouquet of yellow roses in my hand. A lady had sent them to me while the elephant was on. He had been quiet and tractable all day. I faced him, however, as I passed his head. He put out his trunk for the roses. He often made the motion, of course, for anything he fancied. Says I, 'No, sir, you can't have these,' and moved to the left. He simply swung round his head with a scream. 'Juggernaut!' said I, darting backward. He caught me as if I had been a mouse. After he'd thrown me, I managed to roll out from under the shed into the stable-yard. I just missed his charge, but was bleeding from where I struck, and badly bruised. Lucky was it that I got off so quick.

"I didn't need to recollect Whistler's advice. I knew my business, of course, by this date. In the morning I saw Mr. Day, and threw up my position. All they said to me went right out of the other ear. It was life and death for me to be away from or with that elephant an hour longer. Twenty pounds, twenty-five, thirty, forty. I laughed in Mr. Cutts's face. Finally Mr. Day says to me, almost with tears in his eyes,

"'Mr. Junket, if you'll only consent to remain this week out, till I can get a man I know of at Rome, I'll give you sixty pounds, the elephant to perform only twice in the four evenings.'

"Mr. Day, says I, after a minute, 'I'm not taking my life in my hands for your money, but I'll stay till your man from Rome comes, to oblige you and Mr. Cutts.'

"Squire, I wouldn't live that week over for sixty thousand pounds. Think of spending hour after hour of it with the treacherous, cunningest, cruellest monster, sly as a snake, and busy every minute with watching to catch you off your guard to kill you. Once on the third day he sulked, and a while after I caught him designing to squeeze me against the side wall. I brought in the under-keepers, and prodded and pounded him till he roared from pain, not rage, and was blood from end to end. In the evening, in spite of all of that, he disobeyed me twice in the performance—he wouldn't kneel down or something. I let it pass until we left the ring. Then I had him chained, and burned him in six places with a white-hot lawkuss.

"When I walked into his shed the next morning, I looked straight up at his eyes. 'Good-morning, Juggernaut,' says I, quietly. It's an actual fact, Squire, that the beast quivered all over at the sound of my voice, and then down he gets, very slowly, on his knees."

"I should think it very likely he might," observed Squire Buckle, dryly.

"On Saturday," resumed Junket, "sure enough, up comes the new keeper from Rome. He was an Englishman, stranded there from some other show, he said. Mr. Day, Mr. Cutts, and I took him over to the sheds. Suddenly he gives a start, looks Juggernaut all over very sharp and quick, turning a bit whitish. Then he says to Mr. Day: 'Very sorry, sir, but can't take no situation here. I know this animal. I was with him in Scotland four years back. Somebody's changed his name, that's all. He's Sepoy, that used to be with D'Avenant & Co. Sepoy—I say, Sepoy!' he calls out.

"Well, Squire, it was actually a sight to see Juggernaut, as we'd called him. He stood there, with his head up, his ears out, his little eyes like two bits of hot copper. Know his old name? I should say so! Likewise his old keeper. 'Look out,' says I to the other three; 'he's getting up a nasty temper in a hurry.' So they walked off, and I quieted Juggernaut down, after a sort, directly. If the keeper from Rome had staid beside me, I believe we'd have had a murder or two on the spot. Juggernaut, or Sepoy, had tried to kill him twice before, it seems, and remembered it along with the old name. The Englishman left for Rome again an hour after. As for me, 'I hate to do it, Mr. Day,' says I, 'but I shall positively leave your establishment to-night. The under-keepers can easily feed Juggernaut, likewise manage him in his shed. Of course, in case of danger, you'll have to kill him; that's all.' The gentlemen felt rather put out about my going so; but I got my sixty pounds, for all that.

"The steamer I wanted to take wasn't to sail till the Friday following. I staid in lodgings, and didn't go near Day's Imperial Circus and Menagerie. I heard that there weren't any more elephant performances, though. On Friday there was a big float cabled to the quay close by the Ravenna steamer when I got down to it. Likewise was there a terrible big crowd, and a landing-bridge from the float to the quay.

"What's up?' asked I of somebody.

"'English elephant,' 'English elephant,' says every one, very civilly. 'They are going to send the great elephant from the circus of the Signor Day over to Trieste.'

"One has told me that he has nearly killed a man yesterday," puts in another Italian.

"The city authorities have obliged his leaving Venice to-day," says a third.

"Oho!" thinks I to myself; "I see, I see. Sorry for Mr. Day and Mr. Cutts; but I suppose they've had to give up. What could they do? I'll stop a minute, and see the fun a bit, as well as get my last look at Mr. Juggernaut."

"The crowd thickening. All of a sudden we heard shouts up the quay. Sure enough, in a minute along comes Juggernaut, big as ever, four keepers conducting him, Mr. Day and his brother walking a few yards back, Mr. Cutts and Brightwater, the lion-tamer, to the left. Everybody quit chattering as the elephant came on. First he tried the bridge with his foot, then he trumpeted and backed. Plenty strong the bridge was, but he didn't fancy it. Twice more they got him up to it; but cross it to the float? No, sir! They coaxed and petted and scolded and prodded him.

"Now from where I stood I couldn't but remark that every one of the four keepers seemed afraid of death of the elephant. At length I took note of another thing, he was losing his temper badly. Presently Mr. Cutts had occasion to pass close before him with a rope. I trembled, for I saw the beast turn his big head angrily. I couldn't stand it any longer. 'Take care there!' I called out, stepping foolishly just forward of the edge of the crowd. 'Look out, Mr. Cutts! Thompson, you fasten that rope quick, and let him see you do it!' Before I had got the words said, Juggernaut wheeled square around, catching my voice as plainly as if I'd spoken sitting on his back. Then he raised his trunk, waved it, and screamed. So did all the women. For the next second he snapped his hobbles like tow, and turned full upon us—meaning upon me, Squire, for he saw me like a flash. Hadn't I been a precious fool to open my mouth?

"Everybody shrieked at once, and began running for dear life. We all ran, in fact. Some of the folks rushed into doorways and alleys; some ran into side streets; dozens leaped plump into the canal. I saw one woman with a silk petticoat and a red umbrella, and another with two bottles of wine, drop the bottles and the umbrella together, and jump into the water, go down over their heads, swim like ducks, and land on a church steps opposite as wet as drowned rats. I swam stroke for stroke with 'em.

"We three sat fifteen or twenty minutes on those steps, Squire, getting breath. When we got it, to save our lives again we couldn't help laughing at the state we were in.

"'Beg pardon, ladies,' says I, 'but you do beat all. This appears to be a kind of regatta.'

"Just then there was a great discharge of muskets down toward the quay—then another. After that we heard more shouting than ever. We got quite worked up to know how things were going.

"'Here goes, ladies!' says I; 'I'm bound to see what's become of my masters and the elephant.'

"Plump into the canal I went; and, Squire, if those two Italian signorins didn't just bounce in after me as plucky as a brace of water-spaniels! I suppose they thought once wet, the mischief was done; and women always wants to know what's going on as soon as they can. Everybody was running toward the quay now, laughing and shouting. We could see soldiers moving up and down beyond the square. When we came out on the quay, there lay Juggernaut, all of a heap, dead as a door-nail. It seems the Mayor, or whatever they call him there, had privately stationed two detachments of the military back of the custom-house wall, and across a canal. Juggernaut charged straight up the quay, and then stood still a second or two. They fired three rounds before he went down.

"I didn't see Mr. Day, or Mr. Cutts, or any of the menagerie people after I'd heard they all got off without injury—though Mr. Cutts had a very narrow escape, I understood. Of course the crowd's scattering saved the folks' lives by confusing Juggernaut, particularly since he'd had me in his head from the first plunge. If I'd only held my tongue as to Mr. Cutts and that rope!

"I got to Raveinna safely in due time. Then I went up to Florence, and came on here, Squire; and so—"

Junket paused. Squire Buckle completed the story by saying quietly: "And so, Junket, you can send your box upstairs, and go up after it, and take that red neekerehief off. Then you can go to work with Miles, and groom Lady Laura. I want the elephants—the horses, I mean—at eleven o'clock, sharp, to drive over for Mrs. Buckle."

THE SPECTRES OF THE LIGHT-HOUSE.

BY ARTHUR LINDSLEY.

SOME years ago—more years than you young people can remember—I found myself, at the close of a beautiful day in autumn,

"On Wamponomon's far ending, Beyond Neapeague's still sheltering bay."

Now you will ask, "Where is that? There is no such place on any map I ever saw." Sure enough, and yet the place itself is there, and it is not so very far away either. Wamponomon—with the accent on the second syllable—is the Indian name for the extreme eastern end of Long Island, Montauk Point; and Neapeague—pronounced Nappeague—is the quiet harbor nine miles west of it. An abrupt cliff of clay and sand and rocks a hundred feet in height forms the terminus of the island; this cliff is Wamponomon, and, standing on it, the ocean surrounds you, except on the west, from whence you have come. All is water, only that east of you, twelve miles away, rises out of the sea, and if you ask its name you are told that it is Block Island.

"Manisses in her dim and distant lair,"

The sun was just setting as I came to the end of my day's wandering. I did not even go up to the light-house bluff to look out, but betook myself at once to the dwelling of Mr. Hobart, the light-house-keeper, in a sheltered valley close at hand. Though not professing to keep a hotel, it was the custom of the family to entertain such guests as came to the Point, and I forthwith found myself comfortably "at home."

In due season a bountiful supper was smoking on the table. At one end was a noble blue-fish, just caught in the surf by Ben Hobart, the oldest son, while at the other end were two roast ducks—a blaek-duck and a widgeon. To the two birds I paid at first little attention, for there is no better eating in the world than a Montauk blue-fish fresh from the surf. But presently Mr. Hobart remarked, "Perhaps you do not know how it is that we get our ducks down here on Montauk."

"Ben shoots well, does he?" said I.

"Oh, yes, Ben can hit the side of a barn, but that is not it. We save all our ammunition. Suicide, sir—suicide." Here the boys burst out with a hearty laugh at their father's fun and my look of astonishment.

"Arsenic," said I, "or drowning, or pistol?"

"No," said he, "no; that is not the way—nothing of the sort. It is the pursuit of knowledge in the wrong direction. They are the victims of misplaced curiosity, killed at the expense of the United States government, too."

"All that may be very true; but will you be kind enough to put it into English, and tell me what you mean?"

"I will not tell you; but as you have finished your supper, I will show you just how it is done; that is, if you do not mind climbing upstairs for a hundred feet or so."

And away we went, out of the house and up the hill to the light-house. You know that the object of a light-house is to give such a bright light at night that sailors near the coast may see the light at a great distance, and so be able to find their way into the harbors or other places where they wish to go. In order to do this, very large lamps are placed near each other on a frame, arranged in a circle, so that they may be seen in every direction. And to help them give out the most brilliant light possible, bright reflectors are placed behind them, and as they are now made, lenses are put in front of the lamps. But when I was at Montauk that improvement had not been introduced, and there were only reflectors as you see them in this drawing. I ought also to tell you that in some light-houses the frame with its lamps is kept turning by means of machinery, so as to give what is called a flash light, that is, a light appearing and disappearing at intervals, so that sailors may distinguish one from another.

Mr. Hobart and I climbed up the dark, narrow stairs of the light-house, until suddenly we opened the door into the "lantern." This was a room about eight feet in diameter, all brilliant with the flame of the huge lamps. At first I was dazed and bewildered with the intense light, and could really see nothing. But this soon passed away, and I was able to tell what was about me.

The strange room and its singular machinery would have engaged my attention had it not been that I immediately became so interested in what was going on outside that I could think of nothing else. Of course the sides of the room were formed entirely of glass, so as to let the light shine out clearly, and I looked in every direction into the black night. But what was most wonderful to see—it was not black—was a perfect swarm of moving objects close before me. They were darting in every direction, and in the glaring blaze of the lamps, with their reflectors, they all seemed to me white, or nearly so.

I gazed in astonishment, and it was many seconds before I could realize what it was I saw, or could form in my mind a true picture of the scene. They were birds, and only birds! Can you believe it? All my darting objects, flashing and glancing so beautifully, and sometimes striking so violently, were birds of many species, hovering about the brilliant light, and attracted by it just precisely as you may have often seen flies and moths and other insects gather about a lamp or candle in the evening. Every now and then I could not only see but hear one of them strike against the strong plate-glass of which the windows were formed, and one of those which struck in that manner did it with such force as to be stunned by the blow, and I saw it drop down as though dead.

The drawing which you see here represents the scene as I saw it, but it represents it imperfectly. The birds are not shown as thickly as they really were, because if they had been you could not have seen the lamps at all; it would have been only a picture of a mass of birds. Mr. Hobart told me that I was very fortunate in finding them so abundant; some nights I might have found only a very few. He said that the glass plates of the windows were made very thick and strong that they might not be broken by the birds in striking against them, and even with all their strength he had known them dashed through by birds as heavy as some of the large ducks or geese.

There were but few mornings at that season of the year when one or more dead birds could not be picked up at the base of the light-house, having killed themselves—"committed suicide"—during the night.

Sure enough the next morning I myself found three birds there dead; one was a yellow-legged tattler, one a splendid tern, and one a ruddy duck.

This beautiful drawing shows you only a simple truth of what occurs all along our coast at the season when the birds are migrating.

A LITTLE PHILOSOPHER.

BY MRS. MARGARET SANGSTER.

THE days are short and the nights are long,
 And the wind is nipping cold;
 The tasks are hard and the sums are wrong,
 And the teachers often scold.
 But Johnny McCree,
 Oh, what cares he,
 As he whistles along the way?
 "It will all come right
 By to-morrow night,"
 Says Johnny McCree to-day.

THE plums are few and the cake is plain,
 The shoes are out at the toe;
 For money you look in the purse in vain—
 It was all spent long ago.
 But Johnny McCree,
 Oh, what cares he,
 As he whistles along the street?
 Would you have the blues
 For a pair of shoes
 While you have a pair of feet?

THE snow is deep, there are paths to break,
 But the little arm is strong,
 And work is play if you'll only take
 Your work with a bit of song.
 And Johnny McCree,
 Oh, what cares he,
 As he whistles along the road?
 He will do his best,
 And will leave the rest
 To the care of his Father, God.

THE mother's face it is often sad,
 She scarce knows what to do;
 But at Johnny's kiss she is bright and glad—
 She loves him, and wouldn't you?
 For Johnny McCree,
 Oh, what cares he,
 As he whistles along the way?
 The trouble will go,
 And "I told you so,"
 Our brave little John will say.

FOOT-BALL FACTS AND FANCIES.

BY SHERWOOD RYSE.

ALTHOUGH foot-ball is not the national game, the amount of interest taken in it is almost enough to entitle it to be so considered. Most of the boys who read this paper, and many of the girls too, who have brothers at school and college, know that there is one great event in the year which overshadows all others. That is the annual foot-ball match between Yale and Princeton.

There are four colleges which play in the intercollegiate matches, namely, Harvard, Yale, Columbia, and Princeton, and they play under rules which differ from all other rules. Returning from a match in company with a distinguished member of the Columbia Eleven, I asked my companion if anybody knew all the rules of foot-ball, and he replied that he did not believe anybody did. This looks as if the game were one requiring deep study, and at first thought a stranger to the game might wonder at its being so popular in schools and colleges, where study is not always regarded with the highest favor. But if we could take this stranger to see some first-class match, wedge him in among the crowd of excited boys looking on, and let him have a taste of the enthusiasm of the hour, it is very certain that he would change his mind about the studious character of the game.

My Columbia companion was probably right when he said that nobody knew all the rules. They change so often—being, in fact, even now only in course of making—that it is hard work to keep up with them. But what of that? A few games will teach you more than several hours' study of the rules. For instance, what rule had that big fellow in mind when, catching the ball as it was passed back to him, he made that splendid run through the whole opposing team, dodging this man, rolling that one over by simply holding out his hand, and finally touching the ball down behind the very centre of the goal? This gave him a "try at goal," and, as everybody knows, it is by no means an easy thing to kick the ball between the goal posts when the whole of the opposing side starts for the ball as soon as it is placed on the ground. And so the goal was not won, though it looked very much as if it had been from where we were standing. In such cases, however, the decision of the referee is final.

This poor referee is a very hard-worked and much-abused person. He seems to have a great deal of trouble and anxiety, and none of the fun. He may wear his good clothes, and even a "beaver" hat, if he wishes, and he may carry a cane, and as it appears to an outsider he enjoys every advantage for seeing the game. But he knows that the justice of every decision depends upon the closeness with which he watches every movement of the players, and he is very anxious to be a just judge.

There are some games that seem to delight in making players lose their tempers. Foot-ball is one of those games, croquet is another, and shinny is another. All sorts of provoking things are always being done. It is very annoying, for instance, to have a big fellow, weighing twenty pounds more than you do, make a spring at your neck, and clasp it in such a loving embrace that you both fall heavily to the ground, with a deep grunt as the breath is forced out of your body. You may feel, if you are a young player, that he might have used a little less violence; but when you think it over after the match, ask yourself whether you would have stopped unless you were actually compelled to. If you are a boy of pluck, you will answer, No. And then ask yourself if you would not have tackled your opponent with all your might if you had been in his place, and you will answer, Yes.

In truth, it does not pay to lose your temper. With your temper you lose your head—that is, your cool judgment—and any good foot-ball player will tell you that the man who plays with his head as well as his body and limbs is a better man than he who trusts to weight and muscle entirely. Every movement in the game is of consequence, and an error of judgment will often lose the advantage of the whole length of the ground.

Foot-ball is not, and does not pretend to be, a babyish game. It is a true manly sport, and the boy who wants to be a player must put his whole heart into it.

Of course there is some danger in it, but so there is in base-ball, in skating, in riding, and in most of the manly sports. A boy who is afraid to face such dangers as meet him in his play will fare badly when he is called upon to face the dangers that active life in later years will bring. Fortunately few boys in good health know what fear is upon the field when the enthusiasm of the game is at its height.

In the intercollegiate game, which is founded upon the Rugby game so delightfully described in Tom Brown's School Days, when a player has the ball he may either run with it or "pass it back" to another of his own side. It is not always easy to tell which it is best to do, and there is no time for doubt; but whatever you do, do it from the right motive; that is, for the advantage of your side. The wrong motive is to do what you feel is not the best thing to be done, because you want to keep the ball to yourself. It very often happens that some other player on your side will have a better chance to get through with the ball than you have; he may be less thickly surrounded, or he may be a faster, or more "dodgy" runner. In that case you should toss the ball quickly to him, and give up your own chance to make a brilliant rush.

Running with the ball, when near the opponents' goal, is very enticing. It is by all means the most showy part of the game, and when well done it is sure to call forth cheers from the spectators. Then there is a delightful feeling of power and success in a well-executed run that makes up ten times over for the fall that is sure to follow.

In foot-ball, as in some other sports, there is an immense amount of satisfaction in playing the match over again in words. What brilliant feats we could perform had we only that chance again! How we could have dodged that big Smith, or with what ease we could have gone through the whole team if we had not slipped on a miserable bit of muddy ground! If we had only put into practice that trick that Brown, of Princeton, has of warding off his assailants with the one hand, while safely guarding the ball with the other.

Ah, those "ifs" and "buts"! They are always in the way in real play, but in "fighting one's battles o'er again" they are easily passed over. The runs that have been made, the flyers that have been tackled and thrown, the goals that have been kicked in imagination, some day they will be realized perhaps. In the mean time it will do no harm to think them over, and plan what might be done should the opportunity occur. Some day the games played in imagination will come to mind at a critical moment, and you will find yourself doing what you have often thought you would do, and hardly know at first why you did it. Enthusiasm is a splendid thing. Time will come when sterner duties will be required of you, and if you can bring to them the same enthusiasm, courage, and loyalty that animated you in your games, the lesson of the foot-ball field will last a lifetime.

CHAPTER XI.

"MAY 16, isn't it, Mrs. Heriot?"
Nan was standing in the window of the black-walnut parlor, looking out upon the wet lawn and gardens, while Mrs. Heriot was engaged in putting away some fine china in one of the cupboards.

"May 16, in all its particulars, sure enough," rejoined Mrs. Heriot. "You're here just two weeks to-day."
Nan gave a little sigh.

"Well, it seems longer," she said, turning around. "Mrs. Heriot, when will my cousins be here, do you think?"

"Oh, in half an hour, I should say."

"Will they mind the wet?"

Mrs. Heriot laughed.

"Not they—I wish they did; for they're only too likely to come tramping up my floors with their muddy boots."

"But aren't they afraid of Aunt Letitia?" exclaimed Nan, inwardly delighted by the idea of cousins who were fearless.

"Not one bit—now," said Mrs. Heriot, turning around to examine a delicate bit of porcelain more carefully in the light. "You'll have to keep them out of mischief the whole time. If Lance were home he would see to them—though he's no quiet lamb himself—but Dicksee and Joan would bring the house about one's ears if they were let."

"Are they the twins?"

Mrs. Heriot nodded.

Nan returned to her window, eagerly watching the bit of the street which just below the lawn she could see quite plainly.

As Mrs. Heriot had said, she had been two weeks at Rolf House, and in that time she had learned so much of its ways that she felt as if her stay had been much longer. She had lessons every morning from a young lady in whom Nan could not feel much interested, she was so prim and quiet, and apparently so very learned, and Miss Rolf examined her every evening. Between whiles, she spent much of her time with Mrs. Heriot, learning to sew and to do worsted-work; and regularly every afternoon she went for a walk or a drive with her aunt. These occasions were Nan's only periods of real enjoyment, for they usually went into the town either to shop or visit some poor person, and once or twice Cousin Phyllis had been with them. At seven o'clock Nan took tea with Miss Rolf, after which they would sit an hour or so in the drawing-room or black-walnut parlor, where sometimes Nan read aloud to her aunt, and sometimes her aunt talked over the lessons Miss Prior had given her for the next day. Miss Rolf was always kind in her manner, but very, very cold and reserved, yet to Nan there was something very wonderful about the beautifully dressed, stately figure of her aunt. She longed sometimes to draw nearer to her. When she received the chilly good-night kiss which dismissed her for bed, she had often been tempted to fling her arms about her aunt's neck and hug her wildly; but she was always glad afterward to have restrained such an impulse, for what would Miss Rolf have thought of her? Impetuous little Nan shuddered sometimes to think.

But now a diversion was expected. Her cousins from College Street had all been invited to spend the afternoon and take tea, and Nan had been dressed and waiting for half an hour. Miss Rolf was out for the day, but Mrs. Heriot had received full instructions as to what they could and could not do, and the old lady would be home for the usual seven-o'clock tea, they might be certain.

"There," cried Nan, darting a look round at Mrs. Heriot—"there they are!"

"Dear! dear!" ejaculated Mrs. Heriot, coming forward with a cup and the duster in her hand. "Yes; sure enough—there they are."

What Nan, pressing her face eagerly against the window-pane, beheld was a curious, rollicking procession of young people coming up the hilly street. Evidently the twins first—a tall, lank little girl, with black hair and dark eyes, and a boy nearly her counterpart in size and coloring, were amusing themselves by jumping over all the puddles, while behind walked or ran two younger boys and a girl of fourteen, everything being on the hop, skip, and jump with one and all; but could the tall, graceful figure in the water-proof be Cousin Phyllis? Nan could scarcely believe the evidences of her own eyes; yet it was certainly she—there could be no doubt of this; but why should she, of all people, allow such pranks?

I must say that the pranks delighted Nan. She grinned broadly from within her window, and the tribe of cousins saw her, and executed various little antics, before they reached the door, in merry response. Only the girl of about fourteen, walking near to Phyllis, offered her no such salute. Nan decided that she looked haughty, and perhaps disagreeable.

By the time they had reached the door, some degree of quiet seemed to have reached them, though as they poured into the hall they were all panting from the variety of exercises in which they had been indulging.

"Dear me, Miss Phyllis!" said Mrs. Heriot, who had hurried out into the hall, "you must be quite wet. Do let me have your things."

Phyllis submitted gracefully to have them taken from her.

"And the children—perhaps," faltered Mrs. Heriot, "I might take them right out into the kitchen to dry a moment."

The tribe showed signs of joy at this suggestion; but they also looked eagerly at the new cousin standing half-shyly in the parlor door.

And then that involuntary look and air of sweet unconsciousness may come over little Nan.

"Oh, may I come too?" she said; and before any one could say how it was done, she was in the midst of the

* Begun in No. 157, HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE.

"BERTIE, MUCH THE WORSE FOR NUTS, APPEARED."

cousins, who were looking at her and talking to her all in a quick, excited way—all except Laura, who had drawn back close to where Phyllis sat on one of the hall chairs.

Nan looked up shyly toward her. She was very pretty—fairer and daintier than Cousin Phyllis, but how different from the latter's smiling glance was her frown, and the half pout which spoiled the curve of her pretty mouth!

"Oh, do come!" cried Joan, the tallest of the twins. "Oh, Mrs. Heriot—Phyllis—can't we go at once?"

It seemed as if neither of the two appealed to had any idea of resistance. Phyllis, divested of her wet garments, sauntered toward the parlor, closely followed by Laura, while the rest trooped after Mrs. Heriot to the kitchen.

The kitchen at Rolf House was down-stairs, and was a place which had already fascinated Nan, it was so large and bright and home-like. Susan, the cook, though a trifle cross, was a very interesting person, capable of telling long stories, and supplying young people with good things out of tin boxes in her corner cupboards. There were high windows in this kitchen, and to the left were the pantry and dairy-room. Susan had under her a young girl named Martha, with whom Nan longed secretly to make friends. When the cousins trooped down into the kitchen Martha was kneading bread, and Susan was preparing some cheese.

In a few moments they were all sitting about the fire, in spite of Susan's exclamations and Mrs. Heriot's air of dread as to what might happen, and very soon a liberal supply of doughnuts and cookies was dispensed. Then Joan exclaimed: "Mrs. Heriot—please—we want to go to the attic. May we?"

Mrs. Heriot began to look dubious, and Nan said, "What's in the attic?"

"Oh," said Dick, eagerly, "it's the jolliest old place to play in! You'll like it ever so much. Mayn't we?"

"If you'll behave yourselves," said Mrs. Heriot, as gravely as possible. "Now mind, Dickie boy, no tantrantums."

Whatever they were, Dickie readily agreed to give way to none, and as soon as their wet feet were dry, the young Rolfs from College Street were on their way to a part of the house Nan had never seen.

Meanwhile Joan had tight hold of Nan's brown little hand. She had already whispered to her, "Nan, I love you," and Nan had responded by a fervent hug, which, although it nearly stifled Joan, had seemed to produce a complete understanding between them.

CHAPTER XII.

THE attic at Rolf House was a large, irregular place, lighted by queer little windows, and which extended over the entire house. There were some bins in it, partially covered with nuts, and several old trunks, some broken pieces of furniture, and a locked chest of drawers. A swing had been hung from one of the beams, and Bertie and Alfred, the younger boys, had left their carpentering tools in one of the many irregular corners.

"Did you never come up here?" asked Joan of Nan, as they arrived at the last step of the attic stairs. Joan had a thin little face, and a queer way of puckering up her lips after she said anything. She looked, as Nan expressed it to herself, "ready for anything."

"No," said Nan. "You see, I've just gone wherever I was told to."

"Oh!" exclaimed Dick, in tones either of dismay or dis-appointment. "Are you that kind of a girl?"

"What do you mean?" said Nan, trying to laugh. "See here, won't you tell me all your names and ages, and everything?"

Joan's eyes twinkled. "Oh, wait, Nan," she said. "It'll be such fun if you don't know. Now please, we'll make a game of it: see here." For a moment the boys seemed rebellious, but Joan quelled them by a look. "See, Nan, you sit down there."

Nan, quite willing to be amused, especially by Joan, sat down in an old arm-chair, while her spirited cousin had in a moment whisked all the others into the bins. She then went over to one side of the attic, where there was a tall, rather tattered screen, which she dragged across, placing it at an appropriate distance between Nan and the young people who were skirmishing around in the bins. Over this she hung some newspapers, saying meanwhile, "We've often played at theatricals this way."

"Is it to be theatricals?" inquired Nan, from her place as audience.

"Not quite," responded Joan, shaking her elf-locks. "Because, you see, it will be all true."

She then retired behind the screen, and held various half-audible conversations with the children in the bins. Nan could hear Alfred complaining that the nuts hurt his knees, and Dick inquiring if he could say some poetry when he came out; but Joan evidently governed them all satisfactorily, for in a short time there was silence. Then came the sound of a singular kind of music. It seemed to be produced by Joan "murmuring" through closed teeth, and as it had no particular tune, or idea of any, it was, in an attic, rather melancholy; but at last there emerged from behind the screen a figure wrapped in an old red curtain Nan had seen in a corner, and Joan's voice said, "Ricardo Rolfo—appear!" And with some scrambling Dickie came out, standing very still.

"This boy," said Joan, in a sepulchral tone, "is Mr. Walter Rolf's second son. He is nearly thirteen. He attends the high school, and has taken three prizes. He has the honor of being Joan Rolf's twin brother, at-though, alas! he causes her more pain than joy. He will recite."

Whereupon Dicksie began, in a tragic tone:

"And this to me he said:
And 'twere not for thy hoary beard,
The hand of Richard had not spared
To cleave the Joan's head."

He made a dab toward Joan as he said this, and Nan interposed:

"Oh, I know that. It's out of 'Marmion'; but it really says, 'The hand of Marmion had not spared to cleave the Douglas's head.'"

"Oh, well, I know, Nan," said Joan's voice from inside her wrappings. "But you needn't be so particular; we say lots of pieces like that, and put our own names in. Now," she added, in an altered voice, "Ricardo, retire. Next!" And Alfred's curly little head appeared.

"This," said Joan, "is Alfred, so-called the Great, as his appetite never fails. He is nearly eleven. He is most proficient in standing upon his head. Alfred—heads!"

Whereupon Alfred's head suddenly took the place of his heels, the latter dangling an instant in the air before Joan suddenly slapped them downward, and he retired very purple and rather annoyed.

"Next!" Joan exclaimed. And Bertie, much the worse for nuts, appeared. Bertie had Phyllis's soft eyes and gentle look, with Joan's dark hair. Nan felt at once, "He's a darling," and all the time Joan spoke he kept trying to hide a dear little dimpling smile.

"This young person," said Joan, in a most terrible voice, "fears neither parent nor sister. He is aged in years seven. Yet he is old in wickedness, such as running away, tearing his clothes, losing his school-books, and forgetting his lessons. However, people try to love him," and here Joan, in spite of her wraps and her character of oracle, made a sort of jump toward him which ended in a squeeze—"and he does know how to sing. Sing!"

Upon this Bertie began and sang quite through a pretty little childish song, in a voice like that of a thrush. Nan thought she could cry over it; but Joan quickly hustled him away, and throwing off her disguise, said in a very ordinary although fatigued voice:

"Wasn't that fun, Nan? Now I think you ought to talk about yourself."

Nan erinoned, remembering Phyllis's words of warning, yet in the child's heart a sense of honesty arose which grew larger than everything else. She said, trying to laugh:

"It was real fun; how well you did it, Joan! Well, I'll tell you. You know I am the daughter of Aunt Letty's nephew, but I've been living for some time with very poor, common kind of people, you would say—with my step-aunt and uncle Rupert. They keep a butter and cheese shop in Bromfield, Connecticut."

A dismayed group elustered for a moment about her.

"But you are our cousin," exclaimed Joan.

"Of course," said Nan, holding her head up very high, "and you are no relation of the Ruperts at all."

There was silence for an instant. Then Joan said, puckering up her nose scornfully, "Oh, well, where's the difference? Don't let's bother about it anyhow." And with her usual energy she proceeded to think of another game.

"If Laura only chose to do it," she said, looking around the big, fast-darkening attic, "she could tell us a lovely story."

"Oh, do get her to do it," cried Nan. "Shall I go for her?"

Joan thought a moment, and then said, "Yes," very impulsively.

Nan, under the influence of young companionship, had lost all sense of timidity in the large, silent house. She darted down the attic stairs quickly, and along the upper corridors, and down to the parlor where Laura and Phyllis were seated.

Please send me another verse and explain, and tell me who you are.

CANOVA, MICHIGAN.

I am a little girl nine years of age, and have taken YOUNG PEOPLE for nearly three years, and I like it so well that I do not know how our assembled family would get along without it, for not only the young but the middle-aged and old people read it, although we take the MOSBY, WEEKLY and BAZZAR. I have only one little sister, four years old. We live on a farm of 800 acres, and our house is in a forty-acre grove of maple-trees. We have a lot of many pets, among others thirteen cats, which are all night hunters, and bring home their game, such as squirrels and chipmunks. One of them, named Oliver Twist, once had a fight with a woodchuck. ZELDA S. C. P.

NORTH PEMBROKE, MASSACHUSETTS.

I live in North Pembroke. I set traps for squirrels, skunks, etc. Will you tell me in the Post-office Box a simple process of tanning skins? I am twelve years old. HOWARD S. B.

From Camp Life in the Woods, by W. Hamilton Gilson, published by Messrs. Harper & Brothers, we quote a simple method of tanning skins:

TANNING SKINS.

For tanning with the hair on, the skin should first be cleaned, every particle of loose fat or flesh being removed, and the useless parts cut away. When this is done, it should be soaked for an hour or two in warm water. The following mixture should then be prepared: Take equal parts of borax, saltpetre, and sulphate of soda, and with them mix water sufficient to produce the consistency of thin lather.

This preparation should be painted thickly on the hair, and allowed to dry, which is best done should be doubled together, and the pet left in an airy place.

A second mixture should next be prepared. This should consist of two parts salt and three parts borax; four parts Castile or other hard soap all to be melted together over a slow fire. At the end of twenty-four hours after the application of the first mixture, the second should be applied in a similar manner, and the air again folded and left for the same length of time. Next, make a mixture of equal parts of salt and water, and with this wash the skin, and then wash with coarse flour to the consistency of thin paste. Spread this thickly over the skin and allow it to dry, after which it should be scraped off with the back of a spoon. The skin, after being tightly stretched during the operation in order to prevent too great shrinkage. A single application of the last-named dressing is generally sufficient for soft water, five gallons; slaked lime, four quarts; and wood ashes, four quarts. Allow the skin to soak for a couple of days, after which the fur will readily slip off.

PHILADELPHIA, PENNSYLVANIA.

I read in YOUNG PEOPLE about Christmas plans for toys. I have a very good plan. It is to make a cheap clock about twenty-five cents. First you get a sheet of stout paper, and make it used by bookbinders. This will cost you six to ten cents. Get size 27 by 22 inches. Draw two lines the longest way equally distant from each other, and the lines are drawn in three parts of the same size. Now from top measure off ten inches for the face, and then with your knife partly cut the board through the rest of the paper. Cut the face into two equal parts, and glue together by putting a strip of cloth over the edges where they meet. Mark out the face of the clock, and make a hole for the hands. Go to a tinman and get a funnel-shaped spout, which you must glue on the bottom. Then make a spool like a cone, with a point on one end, and eight inches across on the other; wind a string on this cone, commencing on the top, and winding down, just as you would a top; tie to the end a conical ink-bottle filled with sand. Make wooden hands, and put them on the face. Then fill your box, now made, with sand, and wind the string up the sand will run out slowly at the bottom, and as the sand goes out the weights low and turn the clock, which makes the hands go around. How fast it will run will depend upon the sliding of the hole at the bottom. You can paint it, and make it quite an ornament and curiosity in your house. JOSEPH A. B.

WESTPORT, NEW YORK.

Westport is on Lake Champlain. It has a large harbor, five miles across the mouth, a very pretty place. In one day you can drive to the heart of the Adirondacks. There are deer, and a few bears have been seen. I go hunting a great deal. I live four miles from Westport by land and five by water. I have lots of fun on the ice in winter fishing for perch. I expect to have more fun than ever this winter, because I have a skate sail. I ride horseback, row on the lake, and take long walks. I am learning to play the guitar. I took care of the boys from a teacher, and am now teaching myself, and like it very much. Well, it is bed-time now. GEORGE K. C.

CLEVELAND, OHIO.

I want to tell you how mamma once went sliding on the ice when she was about six years old. She lived in the country, and had two dogs for playmates. One day she wanted to slide, and everybody was busy, so they could not pull her. So she took the dogs down to the pond, got down on the ice, took a piece of ice and threw it across the pond, and caught hold of the dog's tail in each hand. Away they went after the ice, and drew her across the pond. She kept that up for some time, till at last she looked up to see if any one was near the gutter. I took her down the downs; company had come, and were watching her. I hope this letter is not too long to print. CORA G. (8 years old.)

That was a very funny way to slide on the ice. I wonder the dogs allowed it.

HASTINGS, MINNESOTA.

I like HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE very much. I like the story of "Nan." I have no pets now, but used to have a cat and two black kittens. The kittens were very playful, and tore down some of mamma's vines, so at last she put them in a bag, and had a man take them off and lose them. I felt very sorry indeed. L. A. LEIGH A.

CANTON, ILLINOIS.

This is the first letter I have ever written to you. I have no pets to tell you about, but I will allow my uncle's black cherry pig was a great pig. He used to be the berries when they were ripe. One day they had 180 pickers there, but the average was 160. It was fun to see the trucks go off in the wagon to take the fruit to the market. I got over the pig's sixth one. The average in hushels was 170 a day. I picked there, and in the spring I picked strawberries for papa, and earned money enough to send for HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, and had some fun. That little girl who wanted to know what she could do to earn money might pick berries in the summer if there was any patch near her. I have a little brother, Sam, and when he gets the gift of YOUNG PEOPLE, it is getting dull now, so I will close. Good-by. HELENA B.

JOHNSTOWN, PENNSYLVANIA.

I have been taking YOUNG PEOPLE for two years and a half. I had two fan-tail pigeons, and one of them died, and I have only one now. I have a dog this time is Spunk, and we have a colored man, Sam, and when he gets the gift of YOUNG PEOPLE, Spunk jumps up on his lap, and takes off his specs, and runs off with them. I am nine years old. JOHS B. L.

LOUISVILLE, KENTUCKY.

I have just received a letter from my papa. He sends this story, and it is true. I am a little girl seven years old. I can not write; mamma writes for me. I have only two pets—a beautiful white dog named Evelyn Pearl, and a china doll named Helen. Please print this letter, because it is the best I ever sent you. And please print my name, too, because my papa says it is my duty to do so. JULIET NOLD P.

CHATTANOOGA, TENNESSEE.

MY DEAR CHICKABIDDIES.—I met a man the other night who told me some funny stories about a bear. Some years ago there was a Fort McArthurson out in the West, where this man was living, and there he saw the bear. The bear was a cinnamon bear, and his name was George. He had been captured by some hunter when he was a small bear, and his name was George. The man where he grew up, becoming a great pet with

OUR POST-OFFICE BOX.

I HOPE the readers of the Post-office Box will enjoy it this week as much as I have while taking the first peep at the letters and little stories which fill its columns. You will enjoy the history of Tatters, sent by his master, who is a very youthful correspondent. Two or three hints for Christmas presents will be found timely and useful, and nobody will omit the monthly report of Young People's Cot.

MARSHVILLE, FRANCE.

I have taken your nice paper ever since the first number, but this is the first letter I have ever written to you. I am a little American girl, but have been living in France for one year. France is a beautiful country, and there are many beautiful and wonderful things to see here, although I love my own home and country the best, and I hope that before many months more pass we shall be in America.

We have just had a lovely journey. We have travelled through England, Switzerland, Germany, Holland, Belgium, and France. I can not tell you in this letter the many things we saw. I will just say that among the many beautiful places we visited one was the Queen's palace. We visited many handsome rooms, and then saw the stables, the horses and carriages, the riding-school, and many other things. We saw the Queen's favorite horse, the one she rides on. He was a handsome horse, jet black all over. Then there was a little pony which the Prince of Wales's children ride. We saw the little baby carriage in which the Prince of Wales and the Queen's other children used to ride.

Nearly all the children who write to YOUNG PEOPLE tell about their pets. Well, I can not, because I have none. But last winter I had a little monkey, and I think it is the best pet any one can have. He kept us laughing all the time he did so many funny tricks. We lived in the country then, and he could run about in the garden, but now we have moved in to the city, and I had to sell him. We are going to spend our coming winter in Nice. I expect to have fun at Carnival-time. From Nice we are going to Italy, and then back to France.

I go to school here with little French girls, and have very nice times, but still I would rather be in Hudson, Wisconsin, going to school with all my little friends. I think the story of the "Crude of the Canoe Club" is splendid. I am thirteen years old. GRACE T.

OSCONOWICZ.

I live near Lake La Belle, and I have a gray cat and one chicken for my pets, and my sister Anna has a nice large dog we call Cap. I go to school, and will be seven years old very much. I love HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE very much.

PHILADELPHIA.

TATTERS'S STORY.

One day we were waiting for a little dog. And one day a little girl came over to our house, and said, "We have a little dog for you. So I went over to her house, and I met a little girl, and she said, 'I will give you a little dog on his lap. It was about a half a foot long. He was a quarter of a foot high; his tail was a quarter of a foot long. His face was very funny. His ears were long, and he would sit up in the corner and beg for a piece of meat. And he would bark very funny, when I would take him up and kiss him. One day I came home, and I met a little girl, and she said, 'Fanny was crying.' I went into the house, and Fanny said Tatters was dead. He would always come up on the bed and play, for we loved him dearly. He died in a fit. He was always glad to see you. He would trisk about you. He would play very funny. And in two or three days we the officers, soldiers, and other people who lived there. Now the main object was keeping a soldier of a store a mile or so away from the fort, on the railroad. The post-office was in his store, and the man from the fort who carried the mail used to go to George's store always to get his money. One day George found some molasses on the floor, and he was very much surprised, because it was something he did not know anything about. He went to the store and he found a man who dipped a claw in and put it up to his nose; then he tasted it, which pleased him so much that he kept on tasting until the molasses was all gone. My acquaintance was one day having a dinner nap, when he was suddenly waked up, and saw a bear standing on his hind-legs by him. He drew a pistol, but the bear was frightened almost to death, and shot it so plainly that the man did not fire at him. Before long he recognized George, the pet bear from the fort. He took a plate, drew some molasses, and placed it on the floor, so that he could see it. He wanted George to smell the plate, and he knew what it was. Then he began curious antics: he ran around and around the plate; he lay down and put his nose against it; he played with it some time; then was a long time eating it up. This was the beginning of a long acquaintance with George, for he used to sometimes leave the fort to go and shoot in the prairie to keep the prairies to the store, and stay around until he was given some molasses, or candy, or sugar.

One day my informant entered the fort by a gate, and shot in the prairie to keep the prairies to the store, and stay around until he was given some molasses, or candy, or sugar. One day my informant entered the fort by a gate, and shot in the prairie to keep the prairies to the store, and stay around until he was given some molasses, or candy, or sugar.

Now is not that a good story? And it is all true, too.

I am in hopes you have all been well since I left home. Be good, and do not give mamma any trouble. Write me often, and love to all.

Your affectionate father, ALFRED P.

It is not often that we read a more charming letter than the one which little Juliet so kindly allows us to print, and which came from her absent papa. I am sure the boys and girls will be in love with the good-natured bear. But probably none of us would like to trust our baby in his care, lest he might hug it too tightly in a forgetful moment.

SAN FRANCISCO, CALIFORNIA.

I have often wished to write a letter to YOUNG PEOPLE, but I have so little to tell that I fear my letter will not be an interesting one. I was seven years old when I had my first school, and my mother and mamma teaches us every morning English, French, German, and arithmetic. She also gives us piano lessons. We speak the three languages. I am in the French, French, the second English, and the Third German Reader. I have two brothers. Sandy, who shares all my lessons with me, is nearly as far advanced as I, for we have been studying together. Little Ben, who will not be five years old until February, and can neither read nor write, but he speaks three languages, of course, in his baby style. I hope my letter will be to you and interest you.

This is a very pleasant letter, and very well written. Now it is Sandy's turn, and the Post-mistress will be looking for a letter from him.

ROCKFORD, MASSACHUSETTS.

I like the story of "Nan" very much. I would like to know if Jimmy Brown is a real boy, and if his stories are true. If really true, I don't wonder that his father whips him.

I am collecting cards, and have about four hundred. We have a large album. We put our other mas cards in it too, and they look very pretty. I have another scrap-book which is an old ledger, into which I paste pictures which I cut from illustrated papers.

The baby sister of whom I wrote last time is now nearly a year old. She can walk around by chairs, or by taking hold of our hands. She can talk like a little "mamma" card, and say "a kitten," "Annie," and "no." We think she is very cunning. She enjoys looking at pictures very much.

I have a darling canary-bird named Cherry. He is a southern bird, and a very sweet singer. I like birds, but they are an awful bother. We have a cat which I do not like at all, for I fairly detest him. I suppose this will not be a letter of indignation from their lovers; but I despise them, and would rather play with anything else than a kitten. But if I don't like cats, I love the boys and girls who love our baby. I hope you would agree with me.

I like your idea of making pretty scrap-books. So you don't like poor Puss!

The next letter is from a girl who evidently likes pussy very unbecomingly.

I want to tell you about our five cats. The first one is a Maltese; she is very intelligent. If we say, "Faint, Maltie," down she goes as though exhausted. We have a little gray cat called Fat, and another which answers to Finky. These two are very merry, and chase each other all around the house. Their mother's name is Christiana. She is so fond of her kittens that she is making it fun to watch them play with her. Nigger is nice, but cross. If you make a fuss over him, he growls at you. Our last pet is a black-bear-and-an-ant dog. I thought I would send him as a gift to an old person, for he has no lower teeth. I think he ought to go to the dentist and have a set made.

ANITA C.

WASHINGTON, D. C.

I am generally too full of play to do much writing. Having sent a letter in which we were asked to give a description of some pretty Christmas presents, I thought I would send you, first, an empty pepper or mustard can. Get some bristol board, silvered; work upon it any design you choose; cut it so that it will just cover the can, and crocheted at both ends. At the open end of the can punch two small holes, and put red worsted through these, twisted, and finished with tassels. Tie it securely on the inside. You will have a pretty receiver for burnt matches.

ERROL E. H.

M. II. II.—Why not call your archery club "The Sharp-Shooters"? There are many ways in which school-boys may earn a little money when out of school, if they are industrious. If they live where they have room to keep bees, and good management. A blue-eyed huddle used to supply my table with new-laid eggs the winter through, and glad I was to pay him a good price for them. There are often errands to be done, little bits of repairing about a place, and odd jobs which are waiting for a handy boy who has nimble feet, ready hands, and bright eyes, and who can be trusted. Remember if you wish to earn money, you must not be afraid of work, but do anything honest which comes in your way, and you will be prompt in keeping your engagements. If you say you will be at a certain place at a given hour, be there. "Mind the sheep, and you will have the sheep," was the advice given by his grandfather to the little boy Jonathan Sturges. Jonathan obeyed, and became a great merchant. A boy who is at school must not, in his desire to earn money, neglect his lessons. That would be wrong. When studying faithfully, he is learning things which will make him useful by-and-by. Nor should a boy go into any little business on his own account, such as working for other people, selling papers or other things, unless his father and mother are perfectly willing to let him do so.

A PRETTY PRESENT FOR LITTLE GIRLS.—Take a large quantity of soft bright worsted, and wind it into a ball. As you go on, hide in the worsted a silver thimble, a needle-case, a gold pen, a tiny pair of scissors, a pearl-handled knife, a pair of gloves—anything or everything you choose. When you present the ball to your little friend, insert two shining knitting-needles in it, and ask her to use them. As she knits she will come upon the various surprises, and so the pleasure of the little Christmas gift will not be gone for days, unless she is a very rapid and diligent knitter.

WARSAW, MISSISSIPPI.

I thought I would write you a letter, as I have not seen any from this place. I can hardly believe that the Young People do not like the letters best of all. My papa gave me two dollars for my birthday present; I am nine years old. I want to give this money to the poor little sick children in Young People's Cot. HETTY LEWIS.

I have read about the children's Cot in HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, No. 108. Enclosed you will find thirty cents, which I have earned myself by picking up apples and selling them. I want to hear from you very soon about the Cot.

A WHIPPING TOP.

A WISE HORSE.

HORSES and dogs are possessed of sagacity. By this we mean something higher than mere instinct—something which in human beings we would call reason. For instance, a man was one night riding homeward through a gloomy wood. He had been paying a visit to a friend, whose house was a mile behind him, when he struck his head against a projecting branch, and was thrown to the ground. There he lay insensible.

The horse stood still a moment, probably to consider—at least so we suppose, for he at once returned to the house his master and himself had left. The door was shut, and the family had gone to bed. But the horse pawed at the door until somebody came and opened it. No sooner did this person appear than the animal turned round and led the way, contented when he saw that he was followed, to the place where his fainting master lay beneath the trees.

THE PAPER WHEEL.

THIS is a curious little toy that a boy might amuse himself by fashioning in a leisure hour. Some thin card-board, one or two sheets of common note-paper, and a bottle of mucilage are all the material that is required. The spokes and tire of the wheel must be made of card-board. The wings, or sails, must be cut from thin paper, and made triangular in shape. One side of the triangle must be fastened to one spoke, while the opposite point is attached to the next in such a way as to leave the wing curved after the manner of a sail filled with wind. Toss the wheel into the air, and move a fan rapidly under it. It will mount high in the air, revolving as it sails about.

HARRY'S JOKE.

BY GATH BRITTLE.

MANY a wise thing sounds absurd
Through the wrong naming of a word:
And oft is caused a world of bother
By using one word for another;
Yet in our glossary words are found
Unlike in sense, yet like in sound.

Though by word-blunders harm is done,
In play on words there's sometimes fun,
As in an apt impromptu pun,
Or in a joke such as I cite—
Yet Hal, methinks, was hardly right.

"These four pears," said cunning Harry,
"I'll share with you and me and Carrie;
I'll neither cut, nor bite, nor break 'em,
And yet in equal shares we'll take 'em."
"How'll you do it," queried Eve,
"So all shall equal shares receive?"

"See here, now," said that cunning Harry:
"There's two for little Eve and Carrie,
And two for me."

"But that's not fair;
You have more than your rightful share.
There's one for Carrie, one for me,
And two for you. That should not be."

"There's two for you two," Hal replied—
"Girls never can be satisfied—
And two for me, too. Don't you see
This is as fair as fair can be?"

CHRISTMAS AT THE DOOR.

BY E. M. TRAUQUAIR.

HEAVY and thick the winter snow
Falls on the frozen pane;
Wild winds over the house-top blow,
Turning the creaking vane.

"None will come to our house to-day,
In such cold and stormy weather.
Mother, tell us a game to play
Merrily all together;

"Or tell us a tale of Fairy-land,
Such as you've often told,
Where elves are dancing, a gleesome band,
'Mid trees of silver and gold."

"Children, over the frozen moor
Some one is coming now,
Who'll tell a tale, when he's crossed the door,
Sweeter than all I know.

"Hark! I hear his step at the gate;
Soon will the summons ring.
Come, make ready our room of state—
There he is! Kling, ling, lug."

Christmas outside.

"Children, open the door, I pray;
Merrily come to meet me,
Many and many a house this day
Has put on its best to greet me.

"All your prettiest carols sing,
Welcome me in with joy,
For see what beautiful gifts I bring
For each little girl and boy.

"And list to the tale of Christmas-day:
How once, in a lowly stall,
Meek and mild in a manger lay
The Lord and Monarch of all.

"Best of gifts for peasant and prince
Was this sweet Baby dear:
To keep you in mind of it, ever since,
I bring you merry cheer.

"And glad I come to each little child
To fill its heart with joy;
For that dear Lord, so meek and mild,
Was once Himself a boy.

"Then open your doors and make them wide—
Wider each little heart;
And the joy I bring you, whate'er betide,
Shall never again depart."

A CHRISTMAS DREAM, AND HOW IT CAME TRUE.

BY LOUISA M. ALCOTT.

II.

LIKE a flash the bright country vanished, and Effie found herself in a part of the city she had never seen before. It was far away from the gayer places, where every store was brilliant with lights and full of pretty things, and every house wore a festival air, while people hurried to and fro with merry greetings. It was down among the dingy streets where the poor lived, and where there was no making ready for Christmas.

Hungry women looked in at the shabby shops, longing to buy meat and bread, but empty pockets forbade. Topsy men drank up their wages in the bar-rooms, and in many cold dark chambers little children huddled under the thin blankets trying to forget their misery in sleep.

No nice dinners filled the air with savory smells, no gay trees dropped toys and bonbons into eager hands, no little stockings hung in rows beside the chimney-piece ready to be filled, no happy sounds of music, gay voices, and dancing feet were heard, and there were no signs of Christmas anywhere.

"Don't they have any in this place?" asked Effie, shivering, as she held fast the spirit's hand, following where he led her.

"We come to bring it. Let me show you our best workers;" and the spirit pointed to some sweet-faced men and women who came stealing into the poor houses, working such beautiful miracles that Effie could only stand and watch.

Some slipped money into the empty pockets, and sent the happy mothers to buy all the comforts they needed; others led the drunken men out of temptation, and took them home to find safer pleasures there. Fires were kindled on cold hearths, tables spread as if by magic, and warm clothes wrapped round shivering limbs. Flowers suddenly bloomed in the chambers of the sick; old people found themselves remembered; sad hearts were consoled by a tender word, and wicked ones softened by the story of Him who forgave all sin.

But the sweetest work was for the children, and Effie held her breath to watch these human fairies hang up and fill the little stockings without which a child's Christmas is not perfect, putting in things that once she would have thought very humble presents, but which now seemed beautiful and precious because these poor babies had nothing.

"That is so beautiful! I wish I could make merry Christmases as these good people do, and be loved and thanked as they are," said Effie, softly, as she watched the busy men and women do their work and steal away without thinking of any reward but their own satisfaction.

"You can if you will. I have shown you the way. Try it, and see how happy your own holiday will be hereafter."

As he spoke, the spirit seemed to put his arms about her, and vanished with a kiss.

"Oh, stay and show me more!" cried Effie, trying to hold him fast.

"Darling, wake up and tell me why you are smiling in your sleep," said a voice in her ear, and, opening her eyes, there was mamma bending over her, and morning sunshine streaming into the room.

"Are they all gone? Did you hear the bells? Wasn't it splendid?" she asked, rubbing her eyes and looking about her for the pretty child who was so real and sweet.

"You have been dreaming at a great rate; talking in your sleep, laughing, and clapping your hands as if you were cheering some one. Tell me what was so splendid," said mamma, smoothing the tumbled hair, and lifting up the sleepy head.

Then, while she was being dressed, Effie told her dream, and Nurse thought it very wonderful, but mamma smiled to see how curiously things the child had thought, read, heard, and seen through the day were mixed up in her sleep.

"The spirit said I could work lovely miracles if I tried; but I don't know how to begin, for I have no magic candle to make feasts appear, and light up groves of Christmas trees, as he did," said Effie, sorrowfully.

"Yes, you have. We will do it!—we will do it!" and, clapping her hands, mamma suddenly began to dance all over the room as if she had lost her wits.

"How? how? You must tell me, mamma," cried Effie, dancing after her, and ready to believe anything possible when she remembered the adventures of the past night.

"I've got it! I've got it!" the new idea. A splendid one, if I can only carry it out," and mamma waltzed the little girl round till her curls flew wildly in the air, while Nurse laughed as if she would die.

"Tell me! tell me!" shrieked Effie.

"No, no; it is a surprise—a grand surprise for Christmas-day!" sung mamma, evidently charmed with her happy thought. "Now come to breakfast, for we must work like bees if we want to play spirits to-morrow. You and Nursey will go out shopping, and get heaps of things, while I arrange matters behind the scenes."

They were running down-stairs as mamma spoke, and Effie called out, breathlessly.

"It won't be a surprise, for I know you are going to ask some poor children here, and have a tree or something. It won't be like my dream, for they had ever so many trees, and more children than we can find anywhere."

"There will be no tree, no party, no dinner, in this house at all, and no presents for you. Won't that be a surprise?" and mamma laughed at Effie's bewildered face.

"Do it; I shall like it, I think, and I won't ask any questions, so it will all burst upon me when the time comes," she said, and ate her breakfast thoughtfully, for this really would be a new sort of Christmas.

All that morning Effie trotted after Nursey in and out of shops, buying dozens of barking dogs, woolly lambs, and squeaking birds. Tiny tea-sets, gay picture-books, mittens and hoods, dolls and candy. Parcel after parcel was sent home, but when Effie returned she saw no trace of them, though she peeped everywhere. Nursey chuckled, but wouldn't give a hint, and went out again in the afternoon with a long list of more things to buy, while Effie wandered forlornly about the house, missing the usual merry stir that went before the Christmas dinner and the evening fun.

As for mamma, she was quite invisible all day, and came in at night so tired she could only lie on the sofa to rest, smiling as if some very pleasant thought made her happy in spite of weariness.

"Is the surprise going on all right?" asked Effie, anxiously, for it seemed an immense time to wait till another evening came.

"Beautifully! better than I expected, for several of my good friends are helping, or I couldn't have done it as I wish. I know you will like it, dear, and long remember this new way of making Christmas merry."

Mamma gave her a very tender kiss, and Effie went to bed.

The next day was a very strange one, for when she woke there was no stocking to examine, no pile of gifts under her napkin; no one said "Merry Christmas!" to her, and the dinner was just as usual to her. Mamma vanished again, and Nursey kept wiping her eyes and saying: "The dear things. It's the prettiest idea I ever heard of. No one but your blessed ma could have done it."

"Do stop, Nursey, or I shall go crazy because I don't know the secret!" cried Effie, more than once, and kept her eye on the clock, for at seven in the evening the surprise was to come off.

The longed-for hour arrived at last, and the child was too excited to ask questions when Nursey put on her cloak and hood, led her to the carriage, and they drove away, leaving their house the one dark and silent one in the row.

"I feel like the girls in the fairy tales who are led off to strange places and see fine things," said Effie, in a whisper, as they jingled through the gay streets.

"Ah, my deary, it is like a fairy tale, I do assure you, and you will see finer things than most children will to-night. Steady, now, and do just as I tell you, and don't say one word whatever you see," answered Nursey, quite quivering with excitement as she patted a large box in her lap, and nodded and laughed with twinkling eyes.

They drove into a dark yard, and Effie was led through a back door to a little room where Nursey coolly proceeded to take off not only her cloak and hood, but her dress and shoes also. Effie stared and bit her lips, but kept still until out of the box came a little white fur coat and boots, a wreath of holly leaves and berries, and a candle with a frill of gold paper round it. A long "Oh!" escaped her then, and when she was dressed and saw herself in the glass she started back, exclaiming, "Why, Nursey, I look like the spirit in my dream!"

"So you do, and that's the part you are to play, my pretty. Now whist, while I blind your eyes and put you in your place."

"Shall I be afraid?" whispered Effie, full of wonder, for as they went out she heard the sound of many voices, the tramp of many feet, and, spite of the bandage, was sure a great light shone upon her when she stopped.

"You needn't be; I shall stand close by, and your ma will be there."

After the handkerchief was tied about her eyes Nursey led Effie up some steps, and placed her on a high platform, where something like leaves touched her head, and the soft snap of lamps seemed to fill the air.

Music began as soon as Nursey clapped her hands, the voices outside sounded nearer, and the tramp was evidently coming up the stairs.

"Now, my precious, look and see how you and your dear ma have made a merry Christmas for them that needed it!"

Off went the bandage, and for a minute Effie really did think she was asleep again, for she actually stood in "a grove of Christmas trees," all gay and shining as in her vision. Twelve on a side, in two rows down the room, stood the little pines, each on its low table, and behind Effie a taller one rose to the roof, hung with wreaths of popcorn, apples, oranges, horns of candy, and cakes of all sorts, from sugary hearts to gingerbread Jumbos. On the smaller trees she saw many of her own discarded toys and those Nursey bought, as well as heaps that seemed to have rained down straight from that delightful Christmas country where she felt as if she was again.

"How splendid! Who is it for? What is that noise? Where is mamma?" cried Effie, pale with pleasure and surprise as she stood looking down the brilliant little street from her high place.

Before Nurse could answer, the doors at the lower end flew open, and in marched twenty-four little blue-gowned orphan girls singing sweetly, until amazement changed the song to cries of joy and wonder as the shining spectacle appeared. While they stood staring with round eyes at the wilderness of pretty things about them, mamma stepped up beside Effie, and holding her hand fast to give her courage, told the story of the dream in a few simple words, ending in this way:

"So my little girl wanted to be a Christmas spirit too, and make this a happy day for those who had not as many pleasures and comforts as she has. She likes surprises, and we planned this for you all. She shall play the good fairy, and give each of you something from this tree, after which every one will find her own name on a small tree, and can go to enjoy it in her own way. March by, my dears, and let us fill your hands."

Nobody told them to do it, but all the hands were clapped heartily before a single child stirred; then one by one they came to look up wonderingly at the pretty giver of the feast as she leaned down to offer them great yellow oranges, red apples, bunches of grapes, bonbons and cakes, till all were gone, and a double row of smiling faces turned toward her as the children filed back to their places in the orderly way they had been taught.

Then each was led to her own tree by the good ladies who had helped mamma with all their hearts, and the happy hubbub that arose would have satisfied even Santa Claus himself. Shrieks of joy, dances of delight, laughter and tears, for some tender little things could not bear so much pleasure at once, and sobbed with mouths full of candy and hands of toys. How they ran to show one another the new treasures, how they peeped and tasted, pulled and pinched, until the air was full of queer noises, the floor covered with papers, and the little trees left bare of all but candles.

"I don't think heaven can be any gooder than this," sighed one small girl, as she looked about her in a blissful maze, holding her full apron with one hand, while she luxuriously carried sugar-plums to her mouth with the other.

"Is that a truly angel up there?" asked another, fascinated by the little white figure with the wreath on its shining hair, who in some mysterious way had been the cause of all this merry-making.

"I wish I dared to go and kiss her for this splendid party," said a lame child, leaning on her crutch as she stood near the steps, wondering how it seemed to sit in a mother's lap, as Effie was doing, while she watched the happy scene before her.

Effie heard her, and remembering Tiny Tim, ran down and put her arms about the pale child, kissing the wistful face, as she said, sweetly, "You may, but mamma deserves the thanks. She did it all; I only dreamed about it."

Lame Katy felt as if "a truly angel" was embracing her, and could only stammer out her thanks, while the other children ran to see the pretty spirit, and touch her soft dress, until she stood in a crowd of blue gowns laughing as they held up their gifts for her to see and admire.

Mamma leaned down and whispered one word to the older girls, and suddenly they all took hands to dance round Effie, singing as they skipped.

It was a pretty sight, and the ladies found it hard to break up the happy revel; but it was late for small people, and too much fun is a mistake. So the girls fell into line, and marched before Effie and mamma again, to say good-night with such grateful little faces that the eyes of those who looked grew dim with tears. Mamma kissed every one, and many a hungry childish heart felt as if the touch of those tender lips was their best gift. Effie shook so many small hands that her own tingled, and when Katy came she pressed a small doll into Effie's hand, whispering: "You didn't have a single present, and we had lots. Do keep that; it's the prettiest thing I got."

"I will," answered Effie, and held it fast until the last smiling face was gone, the surprise all over, and she safe in her own bed, too tired and happy for anything but sleep.

"Mamma, it was a beautiful surprise, and I thank you so much! I don't see how you did it, but I like it best of all the Christmases I ever had, and mean to make one every year. I had my splendid big present, and here is the dear little one to keep for love of poor Katy; so even that part of my wish came true."

And Effie fell asleep with a happy smile on her lips, her one humble gift still in her hand, and a new love for Christmas in her heart that never changed through a long life spent in doing good.

TURN ABOUT IS BUT FAIR PLAY.

BY MARGARET ETTINGE.

Turn about is but fair play:
Grandpa's been just half the day
Harnessed to the children's sleigh,
Giving rides to Will and Jess,
Jolly Jack and little Bess.

Now, to sound of laughter shrill,
Jolly Jack and Jess and Will Play at horses with great skill.
Ne'er did team in any weather
Go so merrily together.

And 'tis grandpa takes a ride—
Major running by his side,
Barking in delight and pride—
On his dear old face a smile
Brightly beaming all the while.

"Faster! faster!" Bessie cries,
Watching them with dancing eyes.
"Nay, not so, or I'll capsize," Grandpa says. Oh, it is gay;
Turn about is but fair play.

THE GREGORIAN CALENDAR.

A CALENDAR is the means of reckoning time. Our calendar begins with the birth of Christ, from which time we count up eighteen hundred and eighty-two years. The Jews and the Russians begin with the creation of the world. The Chinese and Egyptians reckoned by the lives of their kings. The Romans began with the founding of their city, 753 B.C. The Greeks counted the years by Olympiads of five years each, beginning with the first Olympic Games, in 776 B.C. The Mohammedans reckon from the flight of Mohammed to Medina. Savages notch upon trees a mark for each year as it passes.

Years are of two kinds, the solar and the lunar. The solar or sun year is founded upon the revolution of the earth around the sun. The lunar is composed of twelve revolutions of the moon. Our calendar uses solar years, and divides each year into twelve months of different lengths. It is founded upon the Roman calendar, which was reformed by Julius Caesar and an Egyptian mathematician, Sosigenes. Caesar found the Roman calendar in great disorder. The true regulation of time had been forgotten. The summer months had become autumn or winter months. Caesar corrected these errors, and nearly all modern nations use the mode of reckoning time this famous Roman devised. It is known as the Julian calendar.

Caesar made the year consist of three hundred and sixty-five days and six hours. He divided it into twelve months, and every fourth or leap year added a day to consume the hours unprovided for. His reformed calendar began the forty-sixth year before Christ, and the names of the months were nearly like our own. January became again winter, and March and April spring. The Romans counted their years from the founding of their city, but about the seventh or eighth century the Western Christians began to date from the birth of Christ. A monk, Dionysius, is said to have introduced the new method, and it was soon in use among all the Western nations.

The Julian calendar was not perfectly accurate. The true solar year is only three hundred and sixty-five days, five hours, forty-eight minutes, and forty-six seconds long. The Julian year was therefore nearly twelve minutes too long. It gained more than three days every four hundred years, and hence in 1582 what should have been the 15th of October, dating from the Council of Nice, 325 A.D., was known as the 5th. Pope Gregory XIII., aided by intelligent mathematicians, resolved to correct the error, and provide a calendar that should be exact for all time. It is the one we now use, and is called from him the Gregorian calendar. It omitted ten days, making the 5th of October, 1582, the 15th, and for the future provided that three days should be dropped in every four hundred years. The years 1700, 1800, and 1900 each lose a single day, while the year 2000 will be a leap-year. Thus every century not divisible by four loses one day.

The Gregorian calendar was slowly adopted in Protestant countries, and has never been adopted in Russia. It was not received in England until 1752. Eleven days were then omitted from the month of September, 1751; the 2d was made the 14th, and the Gregorian method of computing time became obligatory over England and English America. Much opposition was made; the terms New and Old Style arose, and before 1752 it is always necessary to allow for the change in the calendar. The New Style began January 1, 1752.

On the 15th of October, 1882, occurred the three-hundredth anniversary of the reform introduced by Gregory XIII. It recalls the fact that we are computing time by a method first arranged by Julius Caesar, and corrected by Gregory, but whose origin reaches so far back into the history of man, that we can never discover what race or what man of science first measured the solar year.

TOO MUCH CHRISTMAS DINNER.

WILLIE'S CHRISTMAS.

BY HELEN S. CONANT.

"MOTHER! wake up, mother!" said Willie Dawson. Mrs. Dawson turned her head feebly on her pillow, and as she opened her eyes slowly, tried to smile at the little boy who stood anxiously at her bedside.

The daylight struggled feebly through the frost-covered windows of the room. It was not a comfortable room. There was no carpet on the floor, and the very small stove was cold and dark. On a table in the corner lay a heap of unfinished sewing, and there were three chairs besides the bed.

"If I build a fire, and make the room nice and warm, don't you think you can get up, mother?" said the little boy, as he struggled to keep a bright face, although big tears were crowding into his great blue eyes.

"Yes, Willie," said Mrs. Dawson, faintly; "I must get up and finish that work for the lady in the village. I promised to take it home last week."

"But you couldn't work, mother, when you were so sick. Now I'll make a fire right off, and then you'll feel ever so much better."

Willie went out into the small shed adjoining the cottage, where was some brush-wood he had dragged in the day before. The snow had drifted in through the broken window during the night, and the wood was almost covered up, but Willie dug it out bravely, and carried an armful in to the tiny stove.

"Now, mother, I'll have a jolly fire in two minutes," said he. But the wood was wet and green, and however carefully he held the match to the smallest twigs, he could not produce a spark.

At last he gave up in despair, and stood thoughtfully considering what to do next. His mother meanwhile had fallen into a feverish sleep, and Willie felt that a terrible responsibility rested on his small shoulders. To-morrow was Christmas-day, too, and somehow that seemed to make things a great deal harder. He could not help thinking about last Christmas, when his father had come home from sea, and brought so many pretty things for his mother and himself. And now his father was dead, and his mother was sick—very sick, perhaps—and he thought with terror that she might die too. He crept softly to the bed and looked at her. Suddenly the thought flashed across his mind that she must have a doctor. She had said the day before that she did not need one, but he was sure she must have been mistaken. He had read stories of doctors who were very kind men, and did lots of nice things for people. Perhaps the doctor in the village was a kind man, and would know just how to make his mother well and happy again. He thought he would go that very minute and see him—perhaps bring him back, and surprise his mother when she waked up.

He went on tiptoe for his cap, which hung on a nail in the corner. It was a pretty little fur cap, a relic of Willie's happier days. But the cap alone was not sufficient protection against the biting wind of a snowy morning in December, and Willie had no overcoat, and his summer jacket was thin and worn. But the stout-hearted little fellow did not think of the cold; but what he did think of, suddenly and with great sinking of heart, was that he had no money to offer the doctor. He knew there was none in the house, for he had spent the last cent the night before for a little tea for his mother.

Willie wondered how much the doctor would ask. He thought ten cents would do, perhaps, for ten cents seemed a great deal of money to him, and he must manage to get it somehow. He had heard boys in the city talk about getting jobs to do, and he must try to get one now. But here in the country there were no gentlemen's horses to hold, nor any sidewalks to clean off, and what could he do? He went to the door and looked out. A great deal of snow had fallen in the night, and it lay level and sparkling all over the fields. There was no house very near, and everything was so still and deserted that the lonely little boy's courageous heart gave way, and he began to sob bitterly.

"Is breakfast ready, Susan?" said Uncle Tom Parsons, as he entered the warm kitchen of a large New England farm-house. A bright fire was snapping in the cooking-stove, and a hot breakfast was smoking on the table, Aunt Sue and Lucindy the "help" were bustling about, and altogether it was as cheerful a place as you could have found anywhere.

The whole house was cheerful, for that matter, for Lucindy had already kindled big roaring wood fires in every room. The great south parlor was the best of all, for it was bountifully trimmed with hemlock boughs, which filled the room with a spicy odor, and in the centre stood a gigantic Christmas tree, covered with rosy apples, little lace bags of candy, and other pretty ornaments. Among its branches were gingerbread and short-cake elephants and rabbits, and dogs and cats, and if you had pulled aside the curtain, and peeped through the glass door of the cupboard, you would have seen a wonderful array of toys on the shelves inside. But these were not to be taken out and put on the tree until evening.

"It snowed pretty heavy all night, I reckon," said Uncle Tom. "It took me 'most a half an hour to shovel a path out to the barn, and the hen-house is all blocked up yet. That big drift by the gate must be broken up, too. It'll take the oxen to do that. Lucky Madge and the boys are not coming till the afternoon train. Don't believe I could get the sleigh over to the station now if I tried."

"Hope the railroad isn't blocked up," said Aunt Sue.

"Them big snow-ploughs they have now will clear it out before noon if 'tis."

Uncle Tom and Aunt Sue were the last brother and sister left of a large family. Every one of those who had made the old farm-house merry on Christmas-days long past were sleeping in the grave-yard by the village church, and the only one these two kind-hearted people had left to love was Madge, their niece, whom they had tenderly brought home to the old farm years before, when her parents had died and left her an orphan. Now she was married, and her holiday visits with her husband and four rollicking boys were the bright days in the old farm-house.

"Have you been to see that woman yet that moved into the house down beyond the pasture?" asked Uncle Tom, as he finished his cup of smoking coffee.

"No, I haven't been yet," said Aunt Sue. "I was going to send Lucindy over to-day with some pies and things, but she says there hasn't been a mite of smoke coming out of the chimney this morning, and I thought maybe she'd gone off to spend Christmas with her folks somewhere."

"Give me the things, and I'll drive round and leave 'em when I go to the station. I saw a light in the house last night. I guess she's home," said Uncle Tom. "She must be awful poor," he added; "that shanty ain't actually fit for a woodshed. You ought to go and see her, Susan. She may be suffering, when here we are with more'n we know how to eat up."

"Well, I did mean to, right off; but she's kept herself so close that I thought maybe she didn't care to see folks. She ain't been nowhere except to Marm Davis's to ask for some sewing-work. She told Marm Davis that her husband was a sea-captain, and that he died ashore last summer with fever. She came here to live because it wouldn't cost her so much as in the city, and she thought she could get plenty of sewing to do in the village. Marm Davis gave her some, but she said yesterday she hadn't brought it back yet, and she thought likely as not she'd gone off with it, same as that woman did who settled down to the lower parish two years ago."

"I don't care a straw what Marm Davis thinks," said Uncle Tom; "she's always ready to throw stones when there ain't nothing to hit. Why didn't she go round to see if the woman wasn't sick?"

"She was going, she said, but Mary Jane's home for Christmas with all her children, and she's been awful busy."

"Hasn't the woman got a child with her?" asked Uncle Tom.

"Yes, she has," said Aunt Sue. "I don't know whether it's a boy or girl. Mr. Pinchem he gave her the house rent free, I heard."

"Rent free!" said Uncle Tom, indignantly. "Why, he wouldn't house his own hogs in that rickety old place."

At that moment there was a knock at the door.

"Shouldn't wonder if that was Sam Emmons come to get help in breaking out the roads," said Uncle Tom.

"Hullo!" he said, in astonishment, as he opened the door, for instead of the portly form of Sam Emmons, the village stage-driver, there stood on the door-step a very small boy with a fur cap pushed down over his golden curls.

"Please, sir," said the small boy, timidly, "could I have a job to shovel paths?"

Aunt Sue and Lucindy were both at the door in a twinkling, and before Uncle Tom could say a word, Aunt Sue had seized the small boy and seated him in a big chair close to the stove.

"Well, I never!" she said, as she brushed the snow from the boy's clothes. "How that mite found his way here through the drifts is more'n I can tell."

Aunt Sue was sure that it was the poor stranger woman's boy from the little house beyond the pasture, for she knew every child in town, and this one she had never seen before.

"Did your mother send you out to get a job this dreadful snowy morning?" she asked.

"No, ma'am," said Willie, as well as he could, for he was still shivering so he could scarcely speak. Then he told his sad little story, and how anxious he was to earn some pennies to give the doctor.

It was strange how violently Uncle Tom began to cough just at this time behind his red silk handkerchief, and Aunt Sue's eyes grew as red all of a sudden as if she had been peeling onions. As for Lucindy, her face twitched so that you would have thought she was trying to swallow some bad-tasting medicine.

Aunt Sue was a very kind-hearted woman, there was not the least doubt about that, but sometimes she was so busy with her own affairs that she forgot to look about and see what good was waiting for her to do, just as a great many of us neglect kindnesses which we ought to think of. But once get Aunt Sue started, and it was wonderful how much she could accomplish.

"Thomas," she said to her brother, "the horse and sleigh must be harnessed up right off."

Uncle Tom evidently had thought the very same thing, for he was already pulling on his great overcoat and strapping his fur cap down over his ears.

"Guess I'll put an armful of dry wood in the bottom of the sleigh," said he; "you'll know what else to take, Susan."

Aunt Sue bustled about in a hurry. She did not fill a basket with tea and sugar and oranges, as people often do when they go on such an errand, for she had another plan in her head, and she meant to carry it out if possible. But she took from the great chest of drawers upstairs a warm flannel wrapper, a great fur cloak, and a whole armful of shawls and blankets. Then she got a bottle of her best currant wine, and a painful of white jelly that looked very much like cold chicken broth.

Lucindy, meanwhile, was giving Willie the biggest breakfast he had eaten for months.

It was not long before Ponto, the horse, pranced up to the door with a merry jingle of sleigh-bells. Aunt Sue and Uncle Tom put Willie between them in the big sleigh, and covered him up with buffalo-ropes so that only the top of his little cap was visible, and off they started down the hill. Ponto seemed to understand that he must go as fast as he could, and it would have done your heart good to see the way that noble horse ploughed through the snow-drifts.

Down at the corner Uncle Tom stopped for a moment, and asked a neighbor to go to the village and tell the doctor to come to the little wooden house as quick as he could.

Willie was so excited that he could hardly wait until Ponto stopped at the cottage, to jump out of the sleigh, and rush in to find his mother.

Oh, it was so bitter cold and dreary in that little room that the Uncle Tom had another dreadful coughing fit behind his red silk handkerchief as soon as he came in.

It didn't take two minutes to start the wood blazing in that little stove. The stove apparently understood just what was expected of it, for it grew red-hot right away, and made the room warm as fast as it could.

Mrs. Dawson opened her eyes in wonderment when Willie cuddled up close to her and began to tell all that had happened. She had slept all the time he had been away, and was feeling a little better; but she was so weak and feverish that Aunt Sue would not let her say a word until she had swallowed some of the currant wine, and had taken a cup of the chicken broth, which was already bubbling on the stove.

When the doctor came he looked very serious at first, as he took out his great gold watch and studied it intently, while he held Mrs. Dawson's wrist, but in a moment more he stroked Willie's golden curls, and made the boy's heart dance with delight when he said there was nothing the matter with his mother except overwork and lack of nourishing food, and that she would be well in a few days, only, as he told Aunt Sue afterward, if she had staid in that cold wretched room many hours longer she would have been past all help.

And now Aunt Sue had a private talk with the doctor, during which he nodded his head several times, and was heard to say, "Just the thing; it won't hurt her a bit," which made Willie wonder very much what it was all about.

Well, the result of it was that Uncle Tom and the doctor arranged all the blankets and shawls in the big sleigh, while Aunt Sue dressed Willie's mother in the flannel wrapper and great fur cloak, which covered her from head to foot. Then Uncle Tom lifted her in his big strong arms and laid her gently in the sleigh, and soon Ponto was speeding away for the farm-house, with Aunt Sue, who had her arms tight around Mrs. Dawson, and Uncle Tom with Willie cuddled down between his knees.

When they arrived, how Lucindy did fly around to make things comfortable! Mrs. Dawson was put in the great four-post bed in the room opening out of the south parlor. And when she said how sorry she was to make so much trouble, Aunt Sue only kissed her, and went immediately to the closet to get another jumble for Willie.

"Just to think of that pretty creature and that boy a-starvin' right under our very eyes!" said Lucindy. "But they ain't starvin' now, that's sure."

You never saw such a day as it was in the old farmhouse. The sunbeams danced in through the windows, and the great brass candlesticks on the mantel-pieces caught them and danced them back into all corners of the room.

Before dinner-time Willie had been all over the barns with Uncle Tom, fed Ponto with apples, and made acquaintance with all the cows. He helped to dig the snow away from the hen-house door, and Uncle Tom solemnly assured him that without his help he didn't believe he could have got that door open till spring, which made Willie feel very happy and important.

"I guess I can do lots of things round the barn," said Willie.

Uncle Tom said he was sure of it, and that if Willie was there he didn't think he should need to hire any man to help about the haying next summer. Then he laughed very loud, as he looked down at the wee mite of a boy, and picking him up, set him astride of his broad shoulders, and strode off through the snow toward the house.

It was wonderful what a way Uncle Tom had of making everybody around him feel happy.

It was almost time to light the candles when Madge and her husband and the four boys arrived. Uncle Tom brought them from the station, and they filled the sleigh so full that he had to get Sam Enmons to bring along the trunks, and some large and very mysterious-looking packages which Madge said must be handled very carefully.

Mrs. Dawson was already feeling well enough to sit bolstered up in a great chair by the fire, and with the glow of happiness on her face she began to look like a young and very pretty woman.

But the best of all was when Madge came into the room. She gave one look at Mrs. Dawson, and then she ran and threw her arms around her neck, and for the next five minutes all you could hear in that room was "Oh, Hattie!" and "Oh, Madge!" until Aunt Sue didn't know what to make of it.

Then Madge, laughing and crying at the same time, explained that this was Hattie Shaw, her dear, dear, dear old companion at boarding-school, whom she had talked about so much, and always wondered where she had vanished to, and Aunt Sue declared that such a remarkable thing never happened in the world before, and that it couldn't have happened now if it had been any time in the year except Christmas-eve.

Then Madge had to kiss and squeeze Willie, until his little cheeks were almost purple. And the next thing she did was to open one of the trunks, and get out a warm woollen suit of boy's clothes, which fitted Willie as if they had been made expressly for him.

Somehow it came to be understood among them all right away that Willie and his mother would go on living at the old farm-house just as if they had always belonged there. Aunt Sue maintained that ever since Madge got married and went off she had been "most too lonesome to live"; and that if Mrs. Dawson hadn't come along just then, she didn't think she could have stood it much longer. And Uncle Tom, with a very sly twinkle in his eye, reminded Willie of the conversation they had had about the next haying season.

"THEN UNCLE TOM LIFTED HER IN HIS BIG, STRONG ARMS."—DRAWN BY HOWARD PYLE.

You would think that enough had happened for one day; but if after supper you had seen Aunt Sue and Madge disappear into the south parlor, you would have felt sure there was something more to come.

When the door was thrown open, how Willie and Madge's four boys did rush in! There never was such a wonderful Christmas tree. It was just loaded down with pretty things. The toys were all stood on the great round claw-foot table, and there were so many that Uncle Tom must have been busy for a long time bringing them home. There were some very large Noah's arks, some boxes of soldiers, tin horses and wagons, toy steam-engines, and no end of picture-books and boxes of candy.

The mysterious packages had been opened, and proved to contain a large easy-chair for Uncle Tom, covered with soft leather, and a gorgeous work-table for Aunt Sue, all hung around with little bags of pink satin and lace.

There were so many toys that the boys didn't know what to play with first. Uncle Tom gave Willie one of the very largest Noah's arks, and he soon had all the animals trained along, two by two, on the carpet near his mother's chair. Madge's four boys were all galloping round the room, mounted on bright red and yellow sticks with shaggy horses' heads at the end, and Lucindy declared she never heard such a racket in all her life before.

When the bell in the steeple of the village church rang nine, Uncle Tom took the large family Bible from the shelf under the portrait of Madge's grandfather, and the boys all grew quiet as he began to read St. Luke's beautiful account of the birth of our Lord Jesus Christ.

The wintry wind whistled and howled around the old farm-house, but to Willie's happy heart it sounded like bright angels singing of peace on earth, good-will toward men!

THE SHRINE OF ST. NICHOLAS.—

WE ARE ALL GOOD CHILDREN."

FRANÇOIS FRÉDÉRIC CHOPIN.

BY MRS. JOHN LILLIE.

I NEVER hear any of the music of François Frédéric Chopin without involuntarily thinking of a scene described to me by an old friend.

It was in Paris, when Chopin was about twenty-five years of age—a slim, refined-looking young man with a gay smile, though very melancholy eyes—and my friend and her painter cousin met him in a market-place buying violets and some other gentle flowers, and then they all went back together to his apartment, and Chopin played for them until nearly evening. He improvised a little, and would turn his head back from the piano, looking from one to the other, well knowing the sympathy he would read in their faces. My friend told me that her memories of Chopin at the piano were very wonderful and precious to her. Sometimes he would grow absorbed, and look like the embodiment of some of his own most melancholy music, but his touch was light and flexible—no one, unless it were Moscheles, or Liszt, or Rubinstein, ever played his impromptus as he did himself.

I wished that my friend had had more to tell me of that one day in Paris. Somehow, as I have said, his music always brings it to mind. I like to think of him buying the early spring flowers, and then going back with them for the music that has always lived in my friend's memory—part of the man, as it were, himself, for Chopin's music is distinctly like his own nature. Some critics think it overlain with sentimentality, an element young players are very apt to get into their style, and certainly to be strictly avoided; but Chopin, it seems to me, had too much real genius to make this predominate. Everything he wrote has its tinge of melancholy; everything has a little under-current of fanciful feeling, which breaks out now and then, like the spray of a fountain, into something which ends in thin air before you can catch all its lights; but the foundation is solid, and when you play any of Chopin's music remember not to be carried away by the idea that it is all to be expressed in lightness and delicacy. Try to find the deeper thought first, and then weave your daintiest feeling of the music about it.

Chopin's history was brief, and melancholy at the last. He was born February 8, 1810, at Zelazowa-Wola, a Polish village near Warsaw, and he died at Paris in 1849. His father, who was French, settled in Warsaw, where he was a professor at the academy, and where he had also a first-class private school. Little Frédéric was brought up with lads of refinement and good-breeding, so that, as a child, he saw little of the roughness of life. His mother, who was a Polish lady of extremely sensitive temperament, gave him his first ideas of poetry and romance, and perhaps from her he inherited the tinge of melancholy which followed him through life. But as a youth he was gay enough, fond of amusements and all sorts of fun.

Before he was nineteen he had become a finished pianist, and as this was only in 1828, it was more of a feat than it could be now. His teachers and friends were anxious for him to be known and applauded in the world, and so he went from Poland to Vienna, where he quickly gathered a circle of friends about him, who listened and admired as much as his dearest masters could wish. At this time every one interested in any way in music, whether as an art or in performance, was full of curiosity to see and hear the young Pole, and when he arrived in Paris he created a sensation in society as well as in musical circles.

Besides his art young Chopin had the reputation of being an enthusiastic patriot. The revolution in Poland was just over; every one who came from that unhappy country seemed to have an air of romance about him, and the young musician, with his graceful beauty, his melancholy eyes and smile, playing as no Parisian had ever heard waltzes and polonaises played before, was naturally a strong attraction in the capital, and so he was soon established there, and gathered a wonderful circle of people about him. He knew all the famous men and women of the day. If some people found him cold and selfish, at least he seems to have truly loved some of his chosen friends, and by many, both among his pupils and his friends, he was absolutely adored.

Unfortunately Chopin's health, never very strong, began to break soon after his twenty-fifth year. He went to Majorca to seek health, but returned to Paris only to break down again, and yet he had, like many people of his artistic nature, an energy and feverish activity which kept him up. So, in spite of remonstrances, he went to London, played there, and went constantly into society, burning out with a rush his feeble little lamp of life. He hastened back to his beloved Paris, where a favorite pupil, M. Gutman, had everything in readiness for him.

But Chopin's strength had entirely failed. He passed his days in weariness of mind and body, grateful for the loving attentions of friends, and particularly soothed by music. His pupil Gutman, his sister, and the Countess Potocka nursed him constantly, and they wheeled his piano to the bedroom door, where they could play and sing for him when he desired it. One evening about five o'clock he seemed dying, but suddenly he opened his eyes, and looking at Countess Potocka, murmured, "Sing."

She was weeping bitterly, but she went to the piano, and there sang the canticle to the Virgin, that wonderful song which Hæweli tells us once saved the life of Stradella.

These were among the last sounds that reached the musician's ears. He died the peaceful death so often accorded to those who have suffered much with his disease, and while he lay in his last sleep friends came, filling all the room with flowers. Every one knew of his passionate love for them, and so late roses and early autumn blossoms, and even spring violets and pansies, were strewn about him, until he seemed, they say, to be resting in some strangely sweet garden of God.

Chopin's great art was in his harmonic progressions, a term better to be understood after some study of thorough bass, though even without this some idea of the meaning may be obtained, and improved upon by studying different parts of different works. A progression in harmony is strictly the following up of one key into another; and what endless beauties may be wrought in this, Chopin's music shows in perfection.

In Chopin's impromptu his peculiar power is most evident. An impromptu is a piece written down, yet in the style of extempore playing, or improvisation. Many musicians have been noted for their fine ideas in extempore playing. This is to take up some musical idea, sit down, and at the piano elaborate it just as the ideas came. In impromptu the musician gives the idea that he is doing likewise, and the result in the music of Chopin and Schubert is something very fascinating. It may be as well to say that Beethoven and Mendelssohn never used this term for any of their music, but Chopin seems to have created it as something too dignified not to take a first place among musical significations. When you can play with ease Chopin's impromptu in C sharp minor, or his Impromptu Opus 36 (Opus stands for work), then you may feel that the drudgery of finger exercise is at an end.

AUTHOR OF "MILDRED'S BARGAIN," "AUNT RUTH'S TEMPTATION," ETC.

CHAPTER XIII.

WHEN the children went upstairs, Laura Rolf followed her elder sister into the parlor, almost crying. To her way of thinking, Nan was a real little intruder. It was she who had been hitherto old Miss Rolf's favorite, she who had been treated with most deference when she came to the house; and the idea of this queer, vulgar girl coming in to take her place was unbearable.

The parlor looked rather gloomy on this rainy May afternoon. Even cheerful Phyllis felt it. While Laura sat sulkily in the window, she drew near to the little smouldering fire, and tried to divert her mind by reading. It would have been a great comfort to Phyllis had she known just how to help and govern her younger brothers and sisters, but unfortunately her life had been led with no standards for human conduct. Her father was a happy, idle man, who cared only for his own pleasure and comfort.

Her sisters and brothers had been left wholly to her guidance. This was well enough while the children were very young; but now they were growing older, beginning to develop instincts and ideas and have purposes of their own. Phyllis would not have admitted it to herself, but sometimes she felt dismayed, having no rock of guidance—no place to go and seek the help she needed.

* Begun in No. 137, HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE.

While Laura sulked in the window, beating her heels against the wainscot and trying to pout as visibly as possible, Phyllis sat down by the fire with a book in her hand, which she could not read. Then Laura began:

"I do think, Phyllis, this is disgraceful. The idea of Cousin Letty's having to hunt about for some one to be her heiress. I do think it's too mean."

Laura paused. Phyllis turned her finely cut, sweet face around toward the window, where the rain beat, and where her little sister was sitting, the picture of wrath and ill-temper.

"And I'm sure we'll all be ashamed of her," Laura went on. "How can we help it? Right out of such a set!"

"Laura," said Phyllis, suddenly standing up, "there was no set, as you call it, about it. This child is your cousin quite as much as she is the niece of those Ruperts, and I think it wicked of you to feel like that. I—"

And then the door opened upon Nan herself. She had come down, breathless, from the attic, and just the sight of Cousin Phyllis's face seemed to cheer her as she came into the room. Laura turned away, resolutely pressing her face against the window-pane. She was determined that, at all events, this interloper should not make friends with her.

Nan stood still a moment in the doorway. She had on the brown dress Phyllis had bought her, and with dainty lace frills in her neck and sleeves, and with that sweet, kindly look upon her face, she looked anything but the vulgar interloper which Laura had considered her.

"I've come for—Cousin Laura," she said, timidly. "Joan says you could tell us such a lovely story if you would. Will you please, Laura?"

Phyllis said nothing. Laura turned a very contemptuous gaze around upon her unwelcome cousin, but the darkening color at her back quite hid her face. Nan saw only the pretty, wavy blonde hair, the outline of cheek and chin so like Phyllis's.

"Will you?" she repeated.

"Yes," said Laura. She got up, still very sullenly, and walked toward the door. Phyllis knew she was in a bad temper.

"Laura!" she called out, but the door closed, and, whether she heard or not, Laura walked on entirely unmindful of the voice.

"They are in the attic," said Nan, on the staircase.

"All right," rejoined Laura. It was all that she would say until the attic was reached. The children greeted her tumultuously, but by this time Nan had begun to feel very uncomfortable, for it was clearly evident that her cousin Laura was quite unlike Phyllis or Joan. Nan felt she might admire her, but could she ever love her? And Nan, who never before had known the association of cousins whom she felt were well-bred and refined, longed to make herself at once one with these girls.

When they reached the top of the stairs Laura drew back a moment, but Joan sprang forward, exclaiming,

"Lollie! Lollie! do come and tell us a nice story!"

Laura frowned. She hung back against the railing of the staircase for a moment before she decided to join the group above.

Joan evidently valued Laura's capacity for telling stories. She placed an easy-chair, and commanded the children to be silent, while she motioned Nan imperiously to the next best seat, she herself coddling against Laura's knee. All this seemed to mollify Laura, who looked out upon the little rain-washed garden below the window, and then said:

"I'll tell a new story I've just made up."

"Um—um—um," murmured Joan, convulsively clutching Laura's knee. "You see," she added, looking up at Nan, "Laura is perfectly wonderful about stories."

"Well," began Laura, "there was once a princess—"

she paused now and then to think it over—"who didn't know exactly where she was from; that is, she knew she was a princess, and had a right to a crown, yet she couldn't tell how it was. One day an old fairy appeared to her and said, 'Come home with me; I am your guardian genie, and I have care of your fortunes.' And so she took her to a wonderful palace all loaded with precious stones, and where the princess had everything. She had all she liked, or imagined she could care for. And so she lived on and on, and the fairy loved her and treated her like her own child. Well, one day she went out for a walk in the by-ways—"

"What are the by-ways?" interrupted Alfred.

"By-ways are streets belonging to princesses," said Joan, giving Alfred's foot a push with her own. "Don't interrupt."

"Well, you interrupt, miss," grumbled Alfred.

Laura went on: "When the princess returned from her walk she found the whole palace changed: the servants and everybody refused to let her in. They said she was a mere nothing," and here Laura curled her lips disdainfully as possible; "that the fairy had now a new favorite. This made the princess ery very hard, but she sat down outside the gates, and as every one would come out, she asked something about the fairy's new favorite, and she was delighted to hear she was very unhappy. So time went on, and—"

Here Laura's story suddenly came to a close, for Miss Rolf's voice was heard below, and Alfred the Great sprang up, exclaiming:

"Tea—ee—ee—tea. I know!"

Laura rose with a very grand air, and Joan said,

"I didn't feel much interested in that story, anyway."

"Well," said Laura, sharply, "it would have been very interesting, and," she added, with a glance at Nan, "it was about true people."

Nan stood up with the others, and, catching Laura's meaning glance, she wondered just what it was intended for. Perhaps, she thought, Laura would explain it later.

Romp as they would, the cousins knew that Miss Rolf expected them to look neat and clean when they came to the table. So they all trooped down to Nan's room, where Laura looked at everything very critically, while the younger ones washed their hands.

"Nan," Joan whispered, "we'll have to go down and see Cousin Letty first before tea, and we must walk as straight—as straight!"

Joan's face puckered comically as she said this, and Nan answered by a tight hug. The two walked down the stairs arm in arm, and so entered the long, old-fashioned drawing-room where Miss Rolf and Phyllis were seated.

Nan's little face was beaming, and in spite of her coldness old Miss Rolf looked at the child with a pleased air. She liked the smile and the gladness about Nan's mouth and eyes. She put her hand out, drew Nan toward her, and kissed her more tenderly than ever before. Then she turned to Laura, saying:

"Well, dear, how are you to-day? Haven't you a word for your old cousin?"

Nan had never heard Miss Rolf's voice so gentle, nor had she ever seen her look just as she did at Laura. It was very evident that Laura was her favorite.

"Oh," said Laura, laughing, "I've plenty to say, Cousin Letty; but I don't suppose I'm any consequence now."

She knelt down by the old lady, who smoothed her fair hair softly, while Nan and the others walked over to the big, low window which overlooked one portion of the gardens. An animated though whispered conversation went on. Joan had decided that she would tell Nan what she called the "secret," and Alfred tried to rebel against it.

Meanwhile Nan sat curled up in one end of the window, trying to suppress her desire to laugh, and Joan, kneeling down in front of her, and pressing her elbows into Nan's knees, held her thin little face in her hands, and looked unutterable things at Alfred.

"AN ANIMATED THOUGH WHISPERED CONVERSATION WENT ON."

"I will tell," said Joan, in a determined whisper. "Nan, see here: we belong to a society; it's us all and some of our friends, and early in June you will be inshated."

"In-itiated," corrected Alfred.

"Well, whatever you call it," said Joan, with a toss of her head; "and then it will be great fun!"

Nan's eyes danced. "Oh, won't it!" she exclaimed. "Is it hard to be in—initiated?"

Joan smiled in a superior manner. "Oh"—she looked at Alfred—"I should say it was! But, Nan," she added, quietly, "won't you make it very frightening. At least it has to be some frightening, but we'll do our best."

THE TURKEY'S MISTAKE.

BY F. E. HAMILTON.

THE day after Thanksgiving young Red Cap, the gobbler, called a meeting. It was held back of the chicken-house. Red Cap sat on the fence, and acted as chairman. Wiping his eyes with one wing, he said:

"Dear turkeys, ducks, and chickens, we meet as a party of mourners. You all remember that only one week ago my father and mother were with us: now they are gone! One week ago Diekey Daddles's handsome sisters were here: now they are gone! One week ago Speckle, the rooster, and Cluck, Scratch, and Cackle, three of his wives, were with us: now they are gone! My friends, why is this? You all know: Thanksgiving dinner! The blow is terrible, but even in our sorrow we must think of ourselves. Thanksgiving-time is bad, but Christmas-time is worse. Seven have disappeared from our happy flock in a week: who knows how soon as many more may go? We must do something to protect ourselves, or we are lost."

Top Knot, the drake, arose.

"I am not a coward," he said, "but I agree with Red Cap. Something must be done. Has any one anything to propose? I should like to hear Mother Gray's views upon this subject."

Mother Gray was the oldest hen in the yard. With a little cackle, she flew to the top rail of the fence:

"My dear companions, we have felt the cruel hand of man among us. We have seen two great boys come into our house after dark with a frightful lantern, and seize and carry away our beloved relatives by the legs while we all squaled dismally. We have seen those relatives no more; but from suspicious feathers floating about the yard, and from stains upon the chopping-block, we may easily conclude what was their cruel fate: they have been killed and eaten. As Mr. Top Knot says, something must be done. I can think of but one thing. My dear friends, if we do not wish to be killed and eaten, as our lost ones have been, we must flee to the woods."

Dickey Daddles, a young and impudent duckling, leaned toward Henny Penny, his companion, and whispered: "Old Mother Gray needn't flee. Nobody'll try to eat her: she's too tough."

An ancient goose, the only one of the flock remaining, heard this naughty speech, and hissed sharply. Dickey and Henny chuckled together slyly.

"I am of the notion," said Red Legs, who was a son of old Speckle, the rooster, "that Mother Gray's advice is good. But I am also told by those who have greater experience than myself that Thanksgiving-day having passed, no great danger comes until Christmas-time. Now if any one can tell when Christmas-time is, I move that we remain here in our comfortable quarters until the day before, and then flee until the hour of peril is past. If we go away now, we may starve, or freeze to death, or the foxes may eat us: whereas if we wait, our absence may be much shorter and less dangerous."

"Good! good!" gobbled the turkey from where he sat. "I can tell when Christmas-time comes, and I will give good warning. Let us decide to remain until the last moment of safety, and then disappear."

The hens cackled assent, and the ducks joined them, but Miss Goose stepped daintily forward, and stretching her long neck, said, in a hissing tone,

"May I ask my young friend how he knows when Christmas-time comes? In a matter so important we can not be too particular."

Red Cap raised his comb angrily, and stared at Miss Goose.

"Age," he replied, in a husky voice, "is supposed to bring knowledge, and I should therefore think my fair questioner able to judge for herself. However, to quiet all doubts, I will state that I overheard little Tommy up at the house say that Christmas came on the twenty-fifth of the month. I am sure," he continued, triumphantly, "that no one can doubt as good authority as that."

There was a general cry of agreement, Henny Penny and Dickey Daddles shouting, "Put her out! put her out!" at the top of their voices, and the meeting dispersed with the understanding that they were to remain in peace and quietness until warned by Red Cap, the gobbler, of the approach of the fatal day.

Time passed. The snow came and covered the ground with its blanket cold and white, and the wind howled dismally. Night after night the fowls gathered undisturbed in their cozy house, and chuckled in low tones to themselves that they were safely sheltered. No one worried about the coming Christmas-time, for the gobbler knew the date, and would surely tell them in season to escape.

One day—it was nearly a month after the time of the meeting—a great storm arose, and the wild snow swept in white clouds through the air, drifting about the yard, and half covering the hen-house, so that its inmates were compelled to content themselves with hopping from roost to roost, or scratching among the dry grass-seed on the floor, for they did not dare to venture out.

Night came early down, and, tired enough of their confinement, the fowls were willing to tuck their heads beneath their wings, as its first long shadows appeared. Soon silence and sleep reigned—but not over all. Red Cap, the gobbler, was awake. His mind was troubled, and he could not sleep. All day he had noticed an unusual stir up at the house. People coming and going through the storm, and teams driven into the great barn. What was going on?

Suddenly a new and terrible idea occurred to him. Quickly jumping to the floor, he hurried toward a corner where he had hidden certain kernels of corn, one for each day since Thanksgiving. Hastily he searched for them, but in vain. With a wild gobble he awoke his friends.

"Save yourselves! Save yourselves! Something is wrong! The corn by which I was counting the days has been eaten! This may be the twenty-fourth of the month! To-morrow may be—indeed, I fear that it is—Christ—"

He was interrupted by a loud banging at the door; it opened, and by the light of a frightful lantern the terror-stricken Red Cap and his friends saw two horrible boys enter.

"We are lost! We are lost!" cried the poor turkey. "Christmas has come! Flee for your lives!"

But it was too late. Seized in spite of his struggles, brave Red Cap was borne away, together with two of the ducks, Dickey Daddles and another, and five of the hens, among them naughty Henny Penny. Then the boys and the light disappeared, the door was closed, and the inmates of the house were once again left in darkness.

Hidden then from behind a barrel in the corner came the voice of Miss Goose, laughing scornfully.

"Age is supposed to bring knowledge, but geese are known to eat corn!" she hissed. "My sorrowing friends, vanity is not as good as experience. Had they listened to Mother Gray and me, Red Cap and his young friends would now be alive and in safety, instead of hanging by the legs waiting to be cooked for to-morrow's Christmas dimer!"

"SEIZED IN SPITE OF HIS STRUGGLES, BRAVE RED CAP WAS BORNE AWAY."

Christmas Number

HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE.

DECEMBER 19, 1922.

CHRISTMAS is coming! How many weeks have you been thinking about it, little people? A good many, have you not? Well, now, how long do you suppose the publishers of HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE have been thinking about it? How you will laugh when we tell you that last August, when it was so warm that people went about in straw hats, waving fans, and cooling themselves with long draughts of ice-water, the publishers of HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE had already begun to consider what should be done for Christmas. Wasn't that an early start? You were eating peaches and bathing in the surf, and we were here, hard at work, getting ready for Christmas.

Well, now you see what comes from all this activity and industry. Old Santa Claus, easy-going and lazy, hasn't begun to think of harnessing his reindeers yet, and here we are all ready to give before the time. This week you will see that HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE is nearly all given over to Christmas, and yet it is only a foretaste of what we have in store for you when the "Christmas Number" appears. Next week open your eyes wide, and look out for "The Christmas Number of HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE." You remember what it has been in other years, and this year it will be better than ever. Mother Goose and Santa Claus will come flying along in the cover; Miss Sophie will tell you of a delightful story of "The Girl who Saved Up Christmas"; Jimmy Brown will describe the awful scrape he got into, all through the "Snow Man" he and the other boys built on Christmas-eve; Mr. Will Carleton will tell you a lovely story in verse of what came to a little girl through "A Christmas Prayer"; Mr. Matthew White, Jun., has a charming story to tell about a young boy who was "A Christmas Knight"; and Miss Olive Wilson will give you a delightful little play called "The Old Woman in the Shoe," which you can all get up with a flourish for Christmas-eve or some other pleasant holiday-time.

Then, last but not least, Mrs. Margaret Sangster will give you a "Christmas Carol," which has been set to sweet and simple music. Many of you can play, and nearly all of you, we know, can sing. Now will you not learn this carol, and sing it at least once during the happy holiday season in simple, humble adoration of the Heavenly Babe to whose birth we owe the glorious flood-tide of joy that is now sweeping over the world? We would like to think that in all the fun and merriment, among the trees and turkeys, the laughter and the games, not one little heart has forgotten the wonderful story first told to men by angels on the plains of Bethlehem:

"UNTO YOU IS BORN THIS DAY IN THE CITY OF DAVID A SAVIOUR, WHICH IS CHRIST THE LORD."

BROOKLYN, NEW YORK.

How delighted we are, dear Postmistress, that you have proposed having a sort of grand conference, whereby we may all get our thoughts fixed on presents for the coming Christmas! We take great pleasure in contributing the little we know. To make gifts with as little expense as possible, we will presume to suggest a few plans with which most of us little girls, as well as all have quite a number of relatives, and we don't want to leave any of them out in the cold on Christmas morning.

First, get some old honey or mustard bottles. Select those that have a nice shape; paint them (by pairs) either in terra cotta, black, or a very pale shade of olive; when thoroughly dry, touch the neck and top with gold leaf paint, and then some pretty scrap picture pasted on the front. You will be richly rewarded for your trouble when you see what a tasty pair of vases you have made. A box of gold paint can be had for twenty-five or thirty cents, and with it you can work wonders. It adds greatly to the beauty of plaques to touch their outer rim with gold paint.

If you have a fancy straw hat that is out of season, rip it to pieces, being careful not to cut the braid; cut a piece of pasteboard the shape of a cornucopia; slightly dampen the straw, and sew on the pasteboard in rows, or spiraling each other, the pieces of braid. Give it one or two thin coats of gold paint; line the inside with pale blue silesia; trim the top edge with a row of red pleated ribbon, join neatly in the back, put a strip of gold braid on the top, and a bow and ends of ribbon on the lower point. This will be an elegant hair-receiver for mamma.

Get a stout round box about as large as a tea set, and cut it four inches deep; cover neatly inside with pale blue or old gold silesia; paste a scrap picture on the inside of the cover; cut out of cardboard (Canton flannel a round piece, the outside of the cover, or velvet, or fur, or either silk, satin, or velvet; put a straight band of the material around the side of the cover, and stitch lining and outside together on the strip around the bottom part in the same manner, and finish with a fancy ribbon put straight around the bottom part, and fastened on one side; a bow on the top of the cover completes a hair-box for papa. A set may be made—one box for collars, and one for cuffs. A box of this kind makes a pretty receptacle for tobacco.

Beautiful ties can be coaxed out of cast-off ribbons. Take two strips six or ten inches long, according to width; sew lace insertion between the two strips of ribbon, and finish with lace edging all around the ribbon, and then cut the ends. Embroidery patterns may be traced on ribbons or squares of poplin or satin by the aid of carbon paper.

School bags may be crocheted out of macramé cord, and they are both durable and pretty. The things that can be made from the bright and pretty Canton flannels are indeed wonderful—small table spreads, stand and chair scarfs, and numerous other articles useful in a home.

We fear that by this time the dear Postmistress is looking fierce. We will give you just one idea of a chair scarf, and from this you can form many others. Cut a wide, wide, wide, wide, wide, wide length and width the chair requires; a piece of old gold flannel is put across the end eight inches on one side and three on the other, and sew fur on the ends. The ends are cut, and the fur is joined in the raw edge, and work with silk (red striped) in herring-bone stitch. The edge of the sides is finished in the same manner; or narrow fur, and on the edge first, and then the sides worked with fancy silk in herring-bone. Cretonnes may be used with pleasing effect.

GRACE AND MABEL D.

You dear little women, how can you imagine that a Postmistress could look anything but delighted with so bright and so well-expected letters as these. You dear little women, how can you imagine that a Postmistress could be so very plainly that I think a good many small finers will set to work to see what lovely things they can contrive from odds and ends by the aid of a little home magic and a few inexpensive materials.

GREENSPOT, NEW YORK.

The boys in our street have asked me to write to the Postmistress, and ask her to give them a few dollars, and a few of fellows from another part of the town who keep coming at us, and attacking us with clubs and stones, whenever they get a chance. Father says if they don't stop they'll find themselves arrested soon, for they have broken some windows and carried off area covers. He says we must ask the policeman to drive them off. Mother wants to give them some money, and she says she and the other ladies are going to get up a Christmas tree, or something like that, to please them. I shan't go to it. But we boys think the best way will be to fight, and fight, and fight, and fight, and fight. We mean to fight and drive them off, and our captain, Harry D., isn't afraid of anybody. Please tell us your opinion. Charlie B. writes this, but we don't know where our names are.

CHARLIE B., JOHN N., JOHN S., and FRANK T.

I suppose if I say that I agree with your mothers that in the long-run nothing succeeds like kindness, you will say: "There! just what we expected from the Postmistress! Women never approve of fighting for one's rights!" I own, boys, that I dislike all round quarrels, and think that they should be avoided if possible. And yet there are times when it is necessary to show that a boy has courage and pluck. I am afraid that you boys are a little bit of a fool, for you are acting as though you were better than they. Perhaps you have aroused their anger by boasts, or by daring them to come on your ground. I would not fight if it can be helped; but if obliged to fight, I would, if I were a boy, do my part manfully. If I saw a boy of my size ill-treating a little one, do you think I would walk off and not interfere? And if I saw a crowd of boys worrying a poor dog, or going to attack a poor cat, would I stand by and say nothing? And would not join in the wicked merriment of ill-bred boys who make fun of people because they are not quite bright in their minds, or have a defect of some kind.

If the trouble must come, and you are not in any way the offending party, then stand up for your rights. If they should attack you, your captain must first be sure, like a good general, that his forces are strong enough to meet the aggressors, and then, if possible, drive them away, and frighten them so thoroughly that they will never annoy you again.

Have you ever heard what Thomas Hughes has to say on this subject in "Tom Brown's School Days"?—a book which every boy should read:

"After all, what would life be without fighting, I should like to know? From the cradle to the grave, fighting, rightly understood, is the one business of every man, every boy, every girl of every sort of man. Every one who is worth his salt has his enemies, who must be beaten, be they evil thoughts and habits in himself, or spiritual wickedness in his place, or Hussings, or Border-ruffians, or Bill, Tom, or Harry, who will not let him live his life in quiet till he has thrashed them . . ."

"As fighting—keep out of it if you can, by all means. When the time comes, if it ever should, that you have to say 'Yes' or 'No' to a challenge to fight, say 'No,' if you can—only take care you make a good fight. It is not because of 'No' that you get the profit of the highest courage, if done from true Christian motives. It's quite right and justifiable, if done from a simple aversion to physical pain and injury. But don't say 'No' because you are afraid of being, and say or think it's because you fear God, for that's neither Christian nor honest. And if you do fight, fight it out; and don't give in while you can stand and see."

PETERSBURG, VIRGINIA.

Please tell me who will charge for putting an exchange in your paper.

I go to school. I am in Division of Fractions. I got a paper from Indian Territory to-day. I got a lot of papers, and was in the house at night and read them and study my lessons.

CLAYTON S. T.

There is no charge for the insertion of an exchange.

One sentence in your letter pleases me so very much, Clayton, that I must call the attention of the boys to it. It is that you spend your evenings in the house studying and reading. This is a much better and, on the whole a happier, way of spending them than those boys have who are not contented with merry play by daylight, but want to go out for evenings as well.

Did you ever hear a jingle I used to say when I went to school:

"Multiplication is vexation,

Division's just as bad,

The Rule of Three it puzzles me,
But FRACTIONS drives me mad!"

NAPLES, ITALY.

I am a little girl nine years old, and love fun and novelty, and I would like to tell the little boys and girls in America about a fair which was held in the public garden here in Naples for the relief of the sufferers from the earthquake in Calabria. Papa, my mother, and I went to it. At the principal entrance to the garden, which is called Villa Nazionale, were four great elephants, not live ones, but frame-work covered with canvas. There were the greatest many bazars inside. One was a doll bazar; this was shaped to represent a tremendous doll looked out from a walking-basket, such as the Neapolitans put their babies in. There were also many other things. Outside of this basket bazar were hung drums, dolls, and all sorts of playthings, the selling of which went on at the door. Just opposite to this was a row of booths, and the first was a bazar against the wall. And what do you think the back was? A looking-glass. This bazar was like a bower of willows dotted with flowers that had the faculty of staying in the wind, and the least breeze would be a cigar booth which looked very much like an Indian wigwag; it was built of mock cigars, each one reaching from the ground to the top of the bower.

In the garden where the fair was held there is an aquarium. The director of it gave all the money made by it that day for the benefit of the fair. I went to the aquarium, and saw the outside of the fair, so of course a great many went in to see the aquarium. One of my dearest friends, a little girl named Beatrice, went in. She ascended to the top of the tower, and saw the view from the top of the fair, and fell through a skylight into the room below, which was locked. She was unconscious when she struck the floor. The key could not be found, and when they were about to break down the door, she came to her senses, and called out, "I'm all right." Just then the key was found. The fair closed with fireworks in the evening, which I did not see. I was disappointed because there was an electric Funclinedio, which must have been funny.

MAMIE D.

What a pity your little friend met with such an accident! I hope she soon recovered from the shock it gave her.

Your description of the fair is very well written, and I wish I could have gone with you to see the wonderful make-believe elephants, the flower bazaar, and the lovely dolls. The best thing about it all was that the money, which no doubt flowed freely into the treasury, was given to help those who were in need.

Now we will take a journey from Naples to New York.

Little folks who go shopping in this busy city are familiar with the shrill cry of "Ca-a-sh!" by which the energetic summer-time girls go to carry parcels and go on errands in the crowded buildings. I sometimes look at these quick-witted and light-footed little errand-girls, and wonder what sort of homes they have, and hope, especially when I see a tired look on their faces, that their parents will not be themselves too weary with the day's work to give them a kind welcome home at night. And now, when you read the true story which a lady writes for the Post-office Box, I am sure you will feel that one little girl deserves credit for being brave enough to tempt fate to take what was not her own.

Very recently in one of our large shops on Sixth Avenue a little "cash girl" picked up some money. The rule in all these establishments is that articles dropped or forgotten by careless customers shall be carried to the "found" desk; but if a girl is dishonest, this rule can be evaded. The little girl was honest, and therefore took the money to the proprietor of the shop. Some time during the day a young man came in, asking if a hundred dollar bill had been seen. The answer was positive, but he thought he had lost it there. It was proved that he was the owner of the found money, and so pleased was he to know that a dishonest person had been honest enough to place it where it could be claimed that he asked to have her presented to him, and gave her forthwith twenty-five dollars. The proprietor of the store had been trying to allow the child to go home alone with what was, for her, so large a sum of money, for the untalented street children are bold little thieves, who went home with her. He found the family dreadfully distressed. The mother and older daughter were both ill and in bed; the rent was due, and but for this timely gift all the family would have been turned into the street. There were not the means to allow the child to be so easy and kindless beautifully bleibled; and do you not think that little girl must have been glad and proud thus to have saved her dear ones so much suffering?

In your pleasant planning for Christmas, dear children, I trust you are all remembering those who are forgettable as you are. There is a great deal of suffering in the world in the merry winter days, when the snow flakes fall, and you, who are warmly clad, have so much fun. You will be the happier if you do your share in making some cold hare home brighter and warmer.

NEWARK, N. J.
Hurrah for the snow! With a jump out of bed this morning, and saw the street all white, I was so glad I gave three cheers. My brother Ned woke up, and he ran to the window and opened it, and made a snow-ball of the snow on the sill, and threw it at me, and we had a snow-did and cold! We had a grand pillow fight then, and made such a racket that papa came to the foot of the stairs and called, "Boys! boys! what are you about? Then sister came to the door, and said there were buckwheat cakes, and we must hurry and get dressed for breakfast.

I have a sled, and I take my little cousin Helen and I like to skate, and we have Ned and Clark, my two brothers. On holidays papa and Uncle John go and skate too. And you ought to see papa, he skates so nicely! Good-by.

HARRY J.

EAST LIVERPOOL, OHIO.
I take your delightful paper, and read all the letters in the Post-office Box, and I thought I would write one myself, although I have not anything very interesting to say. But I guess I will tell you about an owl that made a visit at our house one night. Mamma and I were just going to bed, when we heard a noise outside. It sounded like an animal; it flew, and alighted on the gas fixture. Mamma and I were so frightened that we didn't know what it was. I ran for papa, and he found it, and found it was an owl; he did not keep it, but let it out in the yard, and that was the last we saw of it.

Dear Postmistress, it is about time to make these you about it. I think that I haven't got very many made yet. Have you?

EDNA P. S.
The owl was probably as alarmed as you were, when he found himself in such strange quarters. I have not time to make many of my Christmas gifts, dearie; this Post-office Box keeps me so busy. But if you read the letters in this number you will get a good many bright ideas, and you may try to put some of them in practice.

HOBOKEN, N. J.
I am a little boy seven years old, and have a brother thirteen years old, both of us of Providence, R. I. like "Nan" very much. We have a big tame turtle, but he has buried himself for the winter.

I'm just getting over the measles, and thought I would write to you. This is my first letter.

ATHELSTANE K.
I am glad you are over the troublesome measles.

DETROIT, MICHIGAN.
I am a little girl eight years old. I like YOUR PEOPLE very much. I have a sister ten years old, and a baby sister one and a half years old. Jessie and my oldest sister has a dog named DOD, who was a Christmas present. My mamma and papa are going to New York. Jessie and baby and I will be left alone with my aunt Lizzie. I would like to write about pets, but I have none except my baby sister; she is very cunning. I take music lessons, but don't like to practice, and my papa did not know anything about it until I played a piece for him one evening, which was much surprised. My sister does not know I am writing a letter, and she will not know it until she reads it in the Post-office Box.

EDITH L.
Did you not feel rewarded for the trouble of practicing when papa kissed you for that piece, and called you his dear little persevering daughter, as I am sure he did?

HOBOKEN, N. J.
I am a boy almost eight years old. I have a pet dog; his name is Watch. We have some corn in a bag. One went away because he did not like me; he thought I would hurt him some way. I like to see the boats land at the river, and I have been trying to make a model of a locomotive the other day. I used a block of wood, and cut it round for the main part, and took eight checkers for wheels, a spool with one end cut to write a number on, and a paper strip, and a square block of wood for a cab, and a stiff piece of card board for the top of the cab, pasted on. For the tender I used two spools and a small paper box. I fastened the spools on the paper box. It looked pretty well when done. My big sister Sue begged it away; she said she wanted it to keep, and would show it to me when I was a man. I like the "Canoe Cruise." I hope my letter isn't too long.

GRACE P.

LEEDSBORO, FLORIDA.
I am a little girl five years old. I have taken YOUR PEOPLE all this year, and no one reads it to me, as I can read it all myself. I am a little New York girl, as we only left your city a few weeks ago, and we are all very much pleased in Florida. The climate here is delightful, and we have plenty of bananas, oranges, etc. We see many things that would seem very strange to my little Northern companions, but I suppose I should attempt to tell about them you would not print my letter. I can not write with pen and ink, but I can write with my papa's typewriter; but it is now broken, and so my papa writes this for me. I suppose it must be very cold in New York now. Isn't it?

GRACE EMERSON M.

You are a clever little maiden if you can write with papa's type-writer when only five years old. Yes, it is cold in New York now, and I am glad you are enjoying yourself in the land of flowers and birds. Still we have good times snow-balling, skating, and sled-ridding in the winter days, and we don't care for Jack Frost. Do we, children?

EDNIE SHIFFLER.—This dear boy was one of our most interesting correspondents. He was very fond of YOUR PEOPLE, and took an interest in all its stories, sketches, and pictures. His sister Nellie, writing from Mansfield, Ohio, tells the Postmistress of the death of her brother in August last. Desiring to earn a little money for himself, he asked his father to let him sell newspapers out of school hours in the railroad depot, where trains were frequently arriving and departing. On the 14th of August Eddie, with his papers, stepped on board a train which he supposed stopped there. Instead, it immediately started at a quick rate of speed, and the little fellow, jumping off, was so terribly injured that he soon died. Nellie's sorrowful letter filled my heart with sympathy, and I am glad to publish here what his teacher wrote of him soon after the sad event. It is a noble record for any boy:

"From his early youth he was never known to speak falsely, and it was always remarked of him that if Eddie said so, it was enough, and could be depended upon. He was generous and open-hearted, and if he was induced to spend money on himself or his own pleasures, he would delight in buying presents that he thought would please his mother. And although he earned a good deal, for he was industrious, he never wanted to spend money unless it would do somebody some good; he also laid by in bank quite a sum for so small a boy. His father would say to him sometimes that the dearest thing he had was not that he ran a great deal of risk, and that he would rather he would give it up; but Eddie pleaded that he would be careful, and he liked to feel that he was earning money himself, so that he was known to be careful and thoughtful beyond his years. He was allowed to keep on. It was remarked to his father afterward by one of the officials at the depot that the boys that were constantly on the platform Eddie was the only one who never gave occasion to be reproved. In his daily intercourse with his family, friends, and neighbors he endeavored himself by his sweetness of temper and his consideration for others, and to his afflicted mother and father and sister he was a devoted son and brother. To his subscribers he was ever prompt and obliging in his dealings, so that his grateful happy face was well known and ever welcome."

THE SNOW.

BY CHARA BROUGHTON.

Snow, snow, soft-falling and slow,
Where do you come from, pray?
And whither, O pretty flakes, do you go
When the bright sun melts you away?

The pure white clouds give the snow-flakes birth,
When we drop in feathery showers,
And when we sink in the kindly earth
We nourish the springing flowers.

"FICTION."

BY C. W. FISHER.

THIS is a very entertaining game, and especially adapted to winter evenings when families and friends gather about round tables and open fires. One of the party selects and writes down a half-dozen short phrases and sentences, of as varied character as possible, indiscriminately mixing sense and foolishness; the others copy the list.

The game consists in writing a short sketch, anecdote, poem, or any species of composition, in which all of the selected sentences are included, and in the precise order in which they were given. The sentences, and also the sketches, should be short, and the diverse results from their combination are often very funny. There is ample scope in the play for the exercise of keenness and wit, and it can be made to afford a number of persons a very pleasant evening's amusement. As an illustration, the following were given out to a family circle a short time ago: "Blackwell's Island." "A buzzing mosquito." "A coal-black negress." "A frolicsome pup." "It's a pleasant evening."

One of the products was as follows, which is not at all bad for a twelve-year-old girl: "Early in June little Bobby Fitzhugh started with his father to go to Boston. Bobby was much interested in the work of blasting out the channel at Blackwell's Island, through which their steamer passed, and asked numerous questions about it, and was so much engrossed in Mr. Fitzhugh's descriptions that for a long time he did not heed the attacks of a buzzing mosquito. A pause in the talk, however, gave him the opportunity to rid himself of his unwelcome guest, and he was about to continue his questioning, when he was attracted by loud voices. He turned, saw a large coal-black negress scolding and shaking a ducky boy, who was sobbing bitterly. 'Didn't I tell you not to go near that dog, chile?' she said; 'white folks call um a frolicsome pup, but de pups bite little niggers, so don't go nigh um. You jes' mind what I say.' No other incident occurred on the trip, though Bobby was mightily pleased to see the Captain, in passing him, remarked, 'It's a pleasant evening,' which condensation on the part of a real live captain Master Bob has since made much of in talking over his summer's doings with his companions."

CHRISTMAS.

BY ELEANOR A. HUNTER.

The rounded hills in quiet lay;
The shepherds watch were keeping;
Clothed in soft fleece, in warmth and peace,
Their gentle flocks were sleeping.
No sound was there in earth or air,
Through wind-swept, star-lit spaces;
O'er field and hill the wind blew chill,
And o'er the shepherds' faces.

When suddenly through parted skies
A wondrous light was beaming,
And crowds of angels filled the air
From out heaven's portals streaming;
Abroad their glorious wings they spread,
Their throats with song were swelling;
In garments bright, with looks of light
The shepherds' fears dispelling.

Ah, long ago that song was sung,
Of "Glory in the highest,
Good-will and peace to all mankind,"
When heaven to earth drew nighest,
Because that night the Lord of Light
Came down to earth a stranger,
Was born within a stable old,
Was cradled in a manger.

The brown-eyed cattle watched His sleep,
The shepherds sought and found Him,
Led by the Star that shone afar,
The wise men knelt around Him;
Spices and gold they brought of old,
With joy rich gifts left with Him;
And you have too, my golden head,
A little heart to give Him.

'Mid crash and clang of Christmas bells
That ring so loud and cheerily,
Forget not that He came a child
Because He loved you dearly.
Give sweeter kisses, give closer clasp,
Give gentler Christmas greeting,
Remembering Him whose blessed name
It is you are repeating.

THE GIRL WHO SAVED UP CHRISTMAS.

BY SOPHIE SWETT.

"THERE'S one thing about Christmas that I don't like," Minty confided to Horatio Erastus, her brother, in a low tone, and with a glance around, to be sure that nobody else was in the room, as if she realized what a very dreadful thing it was to say.

Horatio Erastus—called Rasty for short—looked up from his interesting occupation of dressing up Cleopatra, the old gray cat, to look like a monkey, in the greatest surprise. There were a great many things in the world that didn't suit Rasty; he considered that boys had a very hard time, what with lessons full of stupid long words that didn't seem to mean much of anything, and being sent to bed at a particular time, and on holidays always finding the ice too thin or the snow too thick, or something. And it was hard to have been born after the world had grown so dull; when giants and fairies and all such entertaining people seemed to have vanished out of it; when nobody had a wishing-cap, and nobody was turned into a white cat, and you couldn't possibly ride on a broomstick after the fascinating style of Mother Goose's time. Oh yes, there were plenty of things in the world that Rasty didn't approve of, but he never had thought of finding any fault with Christmas.

It was queer that Minty should be the one to do that.

She was only a girl, and liked silly things; she could "make believe" things as boys can't; she called her dolls "children"—stupid things that bled sawdust when they got a cut.

"What I don't like about Christmas is that there's too much all at once. To-morrow comes just as soon as if Christmas were any other day, and almost all your presents are sure to be broken or spoiled; there are so many of them that you don't take care of them as you would if you had only one or two, and Christmas trees don't seem very pretty, and you wish you had had a different kind of a doll, and plum-pudding seems the very hatefulest thing in the world, and you think you never want any more candy. Christmas is all gone; there isn't a scrap of it left. If there wouldn't be too much all at once, and then not any; if you could some way save it up—"

"Save it up! You're a pretty one to save up, ain't you? How much money is there in your bank? Only just a few pennies to make it rattle, I'll warrant," said Rasty, scornfully. Minty grew very red in the face. She did like caramels and butter-scotch very much indeed, and just as she had resolved not to spend a single penny for a whole week Mr. Lollipop, around the corner, was sure to put a fresh and tempting supply in his shop window, and almost before she knew it Minty would have her hand in her pocket and her foot on the door-step of the shop.

"I suppose you couldn't possibly save up Christmas; that's what I don't like about it," said Minty, with a sigh.

"Girls think such silly things!" If you were a boy, and studied Latin, you would know better," said Rasty, thrusting Cleopatra's paws into the sleeves of a red jacket which had originally belonged to a very slender Paris doll of Minty's, and was a very snug fit for the cat. Cleopatra was inclined to be fat, and, moreover, did not accommodate herself so readily to a snug fit as if she had not felt serious objections to appearing in the rôle of a monkey.

"You had better be helping me dress Cleopatra than talking about such foolish things. If she would stand up on her hind-legs I don't believe anybody would look much at the Christmas tree!"

"I would, only Cleopatra does hate it so dreadfully; and do you think she would look so very much like a monkey, anyway? I do wish you had a truly monkey, Rasty, you have wanted one so long!"

"I sha'n't get one this Christmas, you see if I do. Everybody says, 'Oh no, you don't want a monkey, Rasty, they are so troublesome!' As if a feller didn't know what he wanted himself!"

"It is very hard, Rasty," said Minty, with a sympathetic sigh. And then she wondered if the three dollars that she still had left to buy Christmas presents with wouldn't buy Rasty a monkey.

She had bought something for everybody else, and as the aunts and uncles and cousins who were coming to spend Christmas were almost innumerable, it was quite wonderful that she had even three dollars left.

The market price of monkeys was something with which she was entirely unacquainted, and though she had made numerous inquiries, nobody seemed to know. Her father or Uncle Demetrius might have found out, but they were the very ones who said monkeys were troublesome things, and wouldn't take the least interest.

That very afternoon an organ-grinder with a monkey happened to come around, and Minty ran out and asked him how much his monkey was worth, and he said fifty dollars.

So Minty was forced to the sad conclusion that she should not be able to buy Rasty a monkey this Christmas.

But perhaps a porcelain monkey on an elastic cord would be better than no monkey at all. It certainly seemed a more interesting present than the sleeve-buttons which she had intended to buy.

But when the monkey was bought, he seemed a very poor apology for a real monkey. He was pink and blue—colors which one would certainly not expect to find in any well-ordered monkey—and his grin, although it seemed fascinating at first, grew very tiresome, because it never changed. And of course the only movement of which he was capable was a monotonous little hop as one jerked the elastic.

Minty was very much afraid that Rasty wouldn't like him at all, and would say it was just like a girl to buy him.

There was one good thing about the porcelain monkey, though. He had cost only two dollars, so she still had a dollar with which to buy something else for Rasty, so that she needn't feel too badly if he should despise the monkey.

Aunt Eleanor was going down town to buy some things which she had forgotten, to deck the Christmas tree, just at night-fall on Christmas-eve, and Minty begged to go too.

It so happened that Aunt Eleanor had to go into a great many shops to find just what she wanted, and Minty found it very hard to decide what she should buy for Rasty with her one dollar. Just as she was wishing that she had bought him a shaving set, which he might want some time, and would be very proud to have, but of which Aunt Eleanor didn't seem to approve, a most fascinating little monkey capered across the sidewalk almost under her feet. Minty instantly looked around to see if she could discover whom he belonged to. He was attached by a string to a small Irish boy who stood on the sidewalk singing, in a hoarse little voice, a song of which the words were unintelligible, except the refrain, which declared that "Christmas comes but once a year."

A girl of about the same age sat on the curb-stone in a dejected attitude, playing on a wheezy old accordion.

Minty rushed up to the boy. Aunt Eleanor had disappeared within a shop door, and there was nobody to interfere with her movements.

"Oh, don't you want to sell your monkey? I will give you a dollar for him."

"He don't be ours at all, at all, but Micky Moriarty's, that's afther lindin' him till us," said the boy.

"Would Micky Moriarty sell him?" asked Minty.

"Not if ye'd give him the wide wurruild. For it's the b'y that tuk care iv him wid the faver that give the monkey tuk him, for himself tuk the same faver, jist, an' was afther dyin', an' if the monkey was his own grandfather, Micky couldn't think more iv him, an' he wouldn't be afther lindin' him till us the night if it wasn't that on-lucky we've been the day that we didn't get a penny, an' it Christmas!"

"Is that why she has been crying?" asked Minty, pointing to the girl, whose red and swollen eyelids she had noticed.

"She's kind of wakeny, an' she don't be that stout-haired that I am, an' she's afther losin' her place wid a grand milliner this afternoon be raison iv gettin' ashray whin she was sint to carry home a bonnet, an' a foine lady was near havin' to go to church Christmas mornin' widout her new bonnet. The mistress turned Biddy aff, an' kipt back her pay. An' ourselves thinkin' we'd be afther havin' a bit iv a Christmas!"

"Haven't you anybody to give you anything?" asked Minty.

"Oh, it's not stairvin' we do be," said the boy, with some pride. "The widdy Moriarty, where we hires our bit room, is that good till us that she's afther sharin' the bit an' sup wid us whiniver she have it. But it's a tinct job iv puttin' in coal I'm afther gettin' the promise iv to-morrow marnin'; an' it's a bit iv bridled liver wid practices for all there'll be the night, Micky's afther tellin' me; so it's not down-haired I am, though Lord George, wid all his coaxin' ways, is not afther gettin' a cent."

"Is Lord George the monkey?" asked Minty, whose attention was about equally divided between the children and the monkey.

"Folks is afther thinkin' it's a quare name for a monkey, but the felly that owned him he was kind iv grand feelin' be raison iv oncet workin' for a lord, an' it's out iv compliment till his masther he give the monkey his name. I'm sorry ye can't have him, miss, if ye're wantin' him bad, but if ye offered him as much good as the full iv the say, Micky'd not sell him. Iv ye'll excuse us, miss, we'll be afther movin' on, for the singin' sounds sweeter like where there don't be such a crowd, an' maybe they're not all afther bein' in such a hurry ivery where."

"I wish there was afther bein' Christmas enough to go round," said the little girl, with a wistful look at the shop windows. "Do you s'pose Santa Claus is that old that he gets tired out before he gets round till the likes of us? That's what the widdy Moriarty is afther sayin'."

"I wish you would tell me your names, and where you live," said Minty, a sudden vague idea shaping itself in her mind.

"It's Teddy and Biddy O'Brien, No. 3 Peaceable Court, we do be," said the boy.

The monkey took off his hat to Minty, and they disappeared in the crowd, and Minty stood looking after them, still doubtfully fingering the dollar that was to buy Rasty's present.

"I wish—oh, I wish that I had given them the dollar!" she said to herself. But it was too late; they were already lost in the crowd. Rasty was always saying that Minty "never made up her mind till afterward."

Aunt Eleanor came out of the store, wondering where Minty had been, and saying that it was late, and they must hurry home; and Minty got into the carriage in silence, even forgetting that Rasty would have no present from her but the pink and blue china monkey.

For once Minty was making up her mind beforehand. A plan had come into her mind that seemed to her the most delightful plan that ever was thought of, and she meant to try her very best to carry it out. And a bright little star in the dark sky overhead kept winking and blinking encouragingly at her as much as to say it would help her if it could; and Minty remembered what a very old star it must be—older even than Santa Claus—and how many Christmas-eves it must have looked down upon, even upon the first one, when God sent down to the earth that wonderful gift of a little Child. That gift was for everybody, even for "the likes of" Teddy and Biddy O'Brien, thought Minty. He must have meant Christmas to "go round."

The sleigh-bells jingled out, "You can do it—do it—do it!" the hard snow crunched out, "Save up Christmas—save up Christmas!" and a solemn old bell up in a church tower that seemed to have grown young and glad in spite of itself, because it was Christmas-eve, rang out as plainly as if its tongue were made of flesh and blood instead of iron, "Make it go round—make it go round!"

If little Biddy O'Brien could have seen the Christmas tree that greeted Minty's eyes that night, when the mysterious preparations were completed, and the doors thrown open to the uncles and aunts and cousins and grandfathers and grandmothers, and brothers and sisters, and friends and neighbors, that swarmed in, she might well have thought that Santa Claus was tired out before he could get around to Peaceable Court.

But it didn't seem quite fair for him to empty his pack, as he must do, in this house every Christmas, and never get as far as Peaceable Court.

These were the thoughts that were dancing in Minty's head all through the merry Christmas games; and before she laid her head on her pillow that night, just as the Christmas bells were ringing their midnight peal, she had confided her plan to her mother, and to a great many of the aunts and uncles and cousins, and even to Biddy the cook, for Biddy was a little cross sometimes, and needed coaxing when her services were needed for a special occasion; and they had all agreed to help.

"Christmas isn't all gone; there's some saved up," murmured Minty, drowsily, to her pillow.

And you would have been sure to think so if you had seen what happened about night-fall of the next day. A very large covered express wagon stopped in front of the door, and into it went the Christmas tree, with its innumerable little tapers and its gayly colored balls still upon it. Heaps upon heaps of gifts followed; everybody contributed something. Rasty gave everything he had except a bicycle and the pink and blue china monkey. Minty was very much gratified that he cared enough for that to wish to keep it, especially as they would not be likely to value it highly in Peaceable Court, where they enjoyed the privilege of Lord George's society.

Next a store of Christmas dainties, which had been left after everybody had eaten more than enough, went into the wagon, besides a turkey and a plum-pudding, and some very toothsome cakes and cookies baked by Biddy expressly for the occasion.

It was Cousin Harold who mounted to the driver's seat. He had dressed himself up to look like Santa Claus, and you would certainly have thought at first sight that he was Santa Claus, even if you were ever so well acquainted with that fine old gentleman.

Biddy went also, to attend to the distribution of her goodies. She was very good-natured and very much interested after she was told that the children to whom the Christmas gifts were to be carried were Irish, and their name was O'Brien. Biddy had a strong feeling for her race, and had she not had a brother, Timothy O'Brien, who came from the "ould country" before her, and of whom she had never been able to find a trace? Whenever she heard the name, Biddy was seized with an idea that she was going to find some clew to Timothy's whereabouts.

Two carriage-loads of children followed the wagon, and as many more trooped along the sidewalks, keeping the express wagon in sight.

It is safe to say that such a procession never entered Peaceable Court before, and when it stopped at the door of No. 3, almost every window in the court was thrown open and had a throng of wondering heads thrust out of it.

The widow Moriarty, in a starched white apron and a clean frilled cap, evidently hastily domed, stood in her doorway, with her son Micky leaning on his crutch behind her, and Teddy and Biddy peeping out, one at each side, while Lord George gravely walked out to the sidewalk and extended his paw to Santa Claus.

"Sure it do be ould Santa Claus himself!" cried Teddy.

"Indade an' it's Christmas intirely, how iver it's afther findin' its way to Peaceable Court!" cried Biddy, clapping her hands and dancing for joy.

The boys and girls flocked into the house, carrying their arms full of presents, and Santa Claus carried in the tree, and Biddy brought up the rear with two great baskets full of good things to eat. But the moment that Biddy caught sight of Teddy and little Biddy she set down her baskets and seized them in her arms.

CHRISTMAS AT MINTY'S AND RASTY'S HOME.

"Sure is it lone orphins ye are? And the very image iv me foine young brother Timothy!"

As soon as they could get their breath after the vigorous hugging that Biddy gave them they told her that their father's name was Timothy, and that he had a sister Biddy whom he was always trying to find. And Biddy cried for sorrow one minute that her brother Timothy was "in the cowl'd ground and his sovl wid the saints," and for joy the next that she had found "his childer that were the image iv him, jist, and should niver know the want iv a fairther agin while their aunt Biddy lived, sure!" And the widow Moriarty rocked herself to and fro and wept until the starch was all out of her apron, and even the frill of her cap was limp, and she said "it was the foineest Christmas that iver she saw, barrin' 'twas the day afther."

By that time the Christmas tree was all lighted and laden with gifts in the widow Moriarty's living-room, which, though poor and bare, was shining with cleanliness.

It was hard for the children in Peaceable Court to believe that it wasn't all too good to be true. Little Biddy drew Teddy into a corner, and made him give her a good hard pinch to be sure that she wasn't dreaming.

"You do be raal good to bring Santa Claus till us!" she said to Minty. "It's meself was thinkin' last night, be the plisant way ye had, mebbe ye was some relation till him."

Biddy the cook, whom Rasty declared they should hereafter be obliged to call Big Biddy to distinguish her from her niece, said that Minty was "a swate child, and she'd niver forget to be grateful to her for the blissid Christmas presents she'd given her of her brother Timothy's lone orphin childer."

And indeed there was nobody who seemed much more delighted with the presents received than Biddy. She had been very industrious and prudent, and had saved up a snug little pile of money, and Teddy and little Biddy would never again be likely to know a time when Santa Claus was too tired to get around to them. Uncle Demetrius wanted a trustworthy office-boy, and found that Teddy just suited him; and Teddy finds the situation much more pleasant and profitable than gathering shavings, which business he used to be in, and he is so faithful and honest and energetic that it seems quite probable he may some day have an office of his own.

Little Biddy did not return to the millinery business, her aunt Biddy believing that she "had the makin's iv a seholar intill her," and preferring to send her to school.

The contents of a good many dainty little purses that had hung on that Christmas tree on the first night of its blossoming were poured together, and given to the widow Moriarty to keep the wolf from her door, while she had rest and medicine to relieve the pain in her side and her cough, and while Micky went to the hospital and was cured of his lameness.

So Minty's saved-up Christmas lasted all the year round, and more too. Indeed, I don't think, myself, that it will ever come to an end.

There was only one thing about it that was not perfectly agreeable: Micky showed his gratitude by lending Lord George to Rasty "for jist as long as iver he loiked," and luxurious surroundings proved to disagree with Lord George's disposition. From a gentle and serious-minded monkey he changed into such a cross and mischievous beast that there was no living with him. He wrung the parrot's neck, and chewed up Minty's dearest doll; he lighted the gas all over the house in the daytime, and put it out at night in the midst of a dinner party; he smashed the window-glass in an effort to get out and follow a hand-organ; he pulled off the table-cloth, and broke all the dishes, and danced a jig upon the ruins. But it was only when he pulled up all the plants in the conservatory, and was found replanting them upside down, that his presence in the house became unendurable, and a stern decree went forth that he must go.

Rasty carried him back to Peaceable Court, where he immediately resumed his former amiability and sobriety of conduct.

And Rasty says he never wants another real live monkey. The pink and blue china one, if not so lively, is more satisfactory in the long-run.

OUR SNOW MAN.

BY JIMMY BROWN.

I DO love snow. There isn't anything except a bull-terrier that is as beautiful as snow. Mr. Travers says that seven hundred men once wrote a poem called "Beautiful Snow," and that even then, though they were all big strong men, they couldn't find words enough to tell how beautiful it was.

"WE BUILT THE BIGGEST SNOW MAN I EVER HEARD OF."

There are some people who like snow, and some who don't. It's very curious, but that's the way it is about almost everything. There are the Eskimos who live up North where there isn't anything but snow, and where there are no schools nor any errands, and they haven't anything to do but to go fishing, and skating, and hunting, and sliding down hill all day. Well, the Eskimos don't like it, for people who have been there and seen them say they are dreadfully dissatisfied. A nice set the Eskimos must be! I wonder what would satisfy them. I don't suppose it's any use trying to find out, for father says there's no limit to the unreasonableness of some people.

We ought always to be satisfied and contented with our condition and the things we have. I'm always contented when I have what I want, though of course nobody can expect a person to be contented when things don't satisfy him. Sue is real contented, too; for she's got the greatest amount of new clothes, and she's going to be married very soon. I think it's about time she was, and most everybody else thinks so too, for I've heard them say so; and they've said so more than ever since we made the snow man.

You see, it was the day before Christmas, and there had been a beautiful snow-storm. All of us boys were sliding down hill, when somebody said, "Let's make a snow man." Everybody seemed to think the idea was a good one, and we made up our minds to build the biggest snow man that ever was, just for Christmas. The snow was about a foot thick, and just hard enough to cut into slabs; so we got a shovel and went to work. We built the biggest snow man I ever heard of. We made him hollow, and Tom McGinnis stood inside of him and helped build while the rest of us worked on the outside. Just as fast as we got a slab of snow in the right place we poured water on it so that it would freeze right away. We made the outside of the man about three feet thick, and he was so tall that Tom McGinnis had to keep climbing up inside of him to help build.

Tom came near getting into a dreadful scrape, for we forgot to leave a hole for him to get out of, and when the man was done and frozen as hard as a rock, Tom found that he was shut up as tight as if he was in prison. Didn't he howl, though, and beg us to let him out! I told him that he would be very foolish not to stay in the man all night, for he would be as warm as the Eskimos are in their snow huts, and there would be such fun when people couldn't find him anywhere. But Tom wasn't satisfied; he began to talk some silly nonsense about wanting his supper. The idea of anybody talking about such a little thing as supper when they had such a chance to make a big stir as that. Tom always was an obstinate sort of fellow, and he would insist upon coming out, so we got a hatchet and chopped a hole in the back of the man and let him out.

The snow man was quite handsome, and we made him have a long beak, like a bird, so that people would be astonished when they saw him. It was that beak that made me think about the Egyptian gods that had heads like hawks and other birds and animals, and must have frightened people dreadfully when they suddenly met them near grave-yards or in lonesome roads.

One of those Egyptian gods was made of stone, and was about as high as the top of a house. He was called Memnon, and every morning at sunrise he used to sing out with a loud voice, just as the steam-whistle at Mr. Thompson's mill blows every morning at sunrise to wake people up. The Egyptians thought that Memnon was something wonderful, but it has been found out, since the Egyptians died, that a priest used to hide himself somewhere inside of Memnon, and made all the noise.

Looking at the snow man and thinking about the Egyptian gods, I thought it wouldn't be a bad idea to hide inside of him and say things whenever people went by. It would be a new way of celebrating Christmas, too. They would be awfully astonished to hear a snow man talk. I might even make him sing a carol, and then he'd be a sort of Christian Memnon, and nobody would think I had anything to do with it.

That evening when the moon got up—it was a beautiful moonlight night—I slipped out quietly and went up to the hill where the snow man was, and hid inside of him. I knew Mr. Travers and Sue were out sleigh-riding, and they hadn't asked me to go, though there was lots of room, and I meant to say something to them when they drove by the snow man that would make Sue wish she had been a little more considerate.

Presently I heard bells and looked out and saw a sleigh coming up the hill. I was sure it was Mr. Travers and Sue; so I made ready for them. The sleigh came up the hill very slow, and when it was nearly opposite to me I said in a solemn voice, "Susan, you ought to have been married long ago." You see, I knew that would please Mr. Travers, and it was true, too.

She gave a shriek, and said, "Oh, what's that?" "We'll soon see," said a man's voice that didn't sound a bit like Mr. Travers's. "There's somebody round here that's spoiling for a thrashing."

The man came right up to the snow man, and saw my legs through the hole, and got hold of one of them and began to pull. I didn't know it, but the boys had undermined the snow man on one side, and as soon as the man began to pull, over went the snow man and me right into the sleigh, and the woman screamed again, and the horse ran away and pitched us out, and—

But I don't want to tell the rest of it, only father said that I must be taught not to insult respectable ladies like Miss Susan White, who is fifty years old, by telling them it is time they were married.

THE CHRISTMAS PRAYER.

BY WILL CARLETON.

I.

The winter day was growing old;
The evening's breath came hard and cold;
Great flocks of clouds, with wings of gray,
Shed feathery snow-flakes on their way;
And all the city streets among
A troupe of breezes danced and sung,
But though the frost was keen and bold,
And though the air was biting cold,
A thousand gayly stepping feet
Went up and down the lighted street;
A thousand hands, with pressure tight,
Were grasping presents rich and bright;
A thousand hearts were hastening home
To hearts that longed to see them come;
For wondrous gladness filled the air,
And Christmas-eve was everywhere.

Sweet Christmas-eve, serenely glad!
When all the love that Jesus had
For little ones, as, smiling, He,
With bending head, in kindness said,
"Forbid them not to come to Me";
When this sweet love, with little lack,
Seems all at once reflected back,
As the great sun, though long time set,
Against the clouds in splendor crowds,
And leaves a trace of glory yet!
When all the kind thoughts of the year
Each leaves the day wherein it lay,
And to one blessed time draws near!

There is no space that can possess
So many smiles of happiness:
If days and nights could feel and see,
How happy Christmas-ere would be!

But it has not so sweet a sound
In homes where children are not found;
And in one mansion rich and grand
A wife and husband hand in hand
Were sitting by the fire-light's glow,
And gazing on the streets below,
And, with sad hearts unreconciled,
Were thinking of a long-lost child.
Grief can its heaviest hand employ
When all around is heard the sound
Of silvery mirth and golden joy;
And hearts that mourn oft heavier weigh
When hearts that laugh are over-gay.

So on the Christmas cheer without
This lonely couple gazed about,
While hungering once again to greet
The reckless rush of childish feet.
Unstudied ease was all abloom
About the richly furnished room:
The coal-fire's soft and languid glare
Wrote "Comfort" on the tempered air;
Unto the walls great pictures hung,
And treasures everywhere were flung;
High mirrors, free of stain or flaw,
Were telling over what they saw;
No place the pleased eye could explore
But wealth had lingered there before.
And yet, in many a humbler room,
A warmer comfort fought the gloom,
And Happiness more visits made,
Felt more at home, and longer stayed.

II.

Out in the country, near a wood,
The little old brown school-house stood,
And waited, while the winter day
Looked darker from its eyes of gray,
For the rough door to open wide,
And noisy youngsters rush outside.
A whistle came sharply from within
The country school's peculiar din;
Then with glad shouts the children strode
Through the dim day their winding way
Along the white hard-beaten road,
To where farm-houses cheered the sight,
And lamps already glistened bright,
With unassumed, unconscious grace,
And pleasure dancing on each face,
They brought the presents all to mind
Which they that eve were to receive
Or in the early morning find.
"Old Santa Claus," that famous king
Of childish lore, was handled o'er,
And all the treasures he might bring.

But look! with shouts and faces gay,
They passed a poor-house on their way,
And a sweet homeless-looking child
From out a window gazed, and smiled
To see the other children glad;
But her poor wistful heart was sad.

You children who, with laughter gay,
And joy that gleams e'en through your dreams,
Have presents on each festal day,
And, guarded by the efforts true

Of those who love and cherish you,
Look forward to the winter's prime
As to a sweet and joyful time,
Till in your calendar enrolled,
Each Christmas-day is marked with gold,
Pity poor children who must grieve
Because no presents they receive!
They look at yours with wistful eye,
They smile to view each token new,
But in their hearts they moan and sigh.

That night our little friendless one,
When her poor evening meal was done,
Bowed low in grief her childish head
Upon the ragged poor-house bed,
And in a sweet and pleading tone
She made a short prayer, all her own:
"O Jesus! you who loved so well
The little ones, of whom they tell
That when these came to you one day,
You would not have them sent away:
You said to all those who believe,
If they would ask they should receive.
O Jesus! please for me to find
Two good nice parents, sweet and kind,
And ask them if they will not spread
Some little presents by my bed,
That they my heart may cheerful make
To-morrow morning when I wake,
And I be made as happy so
As other children that I know."
She said "Amen" with reverence deep,
Closed her blue eyes, and sank asleep.

III.

Still sat the childless couple where
The lights of luxury were fair,
And still, with thoughts all tempest-tossed,
Each silent mused, with sad heart bruised,
Upon the child that they had lost.
But listen! with a sudden clang,
The loudly speaking door-bell rang,
And a detective's face they viewed,
With patient lines deep marked and shrewd.
And scarce the parents' questioning eye
Was met before he made reply:
"I come at last with tidings new.
The child I've sought so long for you,
The child you lost five years ago,
Has lived, and lives. Her place I know.
The beggar who, with Satan's aid,
Stole her to help his piteous trade,
Died in a country poor-house, where
He left the child, and she is there.
Mistake or doubt can not befall:
Here are the proofs; I have them all.
She is not very far away;
And you, if bold to bear the cold,
May see her ere another day."

"To bear the cold! What has she borne?
She shall not longer friendless mourn.
The horses—quick!" And soon, in spite
Of cold and sleet, the champing feet
Of swift steeds dashed into the night,
Until they halted just before
The great poor-house's dingy door.
And soon the parents softly crept
Into the gloom of one small room,
And watched their darling while she slept,
And, weeping, listened to the prayer
Which she that night had offered there

(For the old matron overheard,
And told it to them, every word).
Her sleeping face appeared to them
As some fair flower at evening's hour,
Low drooping on its weary stem;
But that soft prayer—in heaven now—
Had left its touch upon her brow;
Its grief and comfort they could trace
Upon the well-remembered face.

The mother yearned the child to press
In all her piteous loveliness,
But would not yet her slumber break,
And said, "My darling shall not wake
Until her prayer we answered see
As well and nearly as may be."

And soon the sleek swift horses flew Back where proud presents, rich and new,
Hung in the lamp-light's brilliant rays,
The envy of all children's gaze;
Which, ere another hour had fled,
Hands softly bore, and placed before
The little sleeper's lowly bed.

She woke at last; and, wondering, threw
A swift glance keen upon the scene
That burst upon her startled view.
A vast amazement filled her face:
The room was like a fairy place.
No toy she wished but it was there;
Bright presents glittered everywhere.
No gift her thought had learned to prize
But it was spread before her eyes;
And presents made her young heart glow
Whose very names she did not know.

But look! a man with step of pride,
And a sweet lady by his side,
More beautiful and high of mien
Than any she had ever seen,
Came, and above her wept and smiled,
And called her their poor long-lost child!

The Christmas morn rose clear and bright;
And through the flashing fields of light
A band of angels sweet and fair,
It seemed to me, came far to see
That answer to the Christmas prayer.

A CHRISTMAS KNIGHT.

BY MATTHEW WHITE, JUN.

GUY MELTON was fourteen, and had always been a quiet, odd sort of boy, and it was therefore not so very surprising that he should want to have something queer for Christmas.

"You see," he confided to his older sister Ruth one day in November, "I've had so many presents that I can't think of anything that would be quite new, so if you and mother will just give me, about the first of next month, the money you'd spend for knickknacks, and let me do with it just as I please, I'll be ever so much more obliged."

Just then Mrs. Melton came into the room, and Ruth exclaimed: "Only think, mother, Guy doesn't want us to give him any Christmas presents this year!"

"Oh no, I don't mean that," her brother hastened to explain. "Haven't I just told you that I want the money instead of the things? May I have it, mother, and the house too, for one day, to do just as I choose with?"

"The horse, Guy!" cried mother and daughter in a breath.

"Yes," went on the boy; "that is, I want permission to entertain any one here I like from Christmas-eve to the morning of the twenty-sixth."

"Certainly, Guy," replied his mother. "You know we are always glad to see your friends."

"But—but it isn't a friend; at least, I mean not yet," continued Guy, coloring confusedly. "I'd like to have him stay in the hall bedroom next to mine, and have you and Ruth treat him just as nicely as you do Rob Billings or any of the other fellows."

"Why, of course, Guy," put in his sister, "any of your chums— But I forget; you say this isn't a chum. Who is it, then?"

"I don't know exactly myself yet," answered the boy, drawing imaginary figures on the carpet with his foot, "and—and if you and mother will only trust me, I'd rather not say anything more about it until I bring him here, because my courage might fail at the last moment, you know, and then I'd feel foolish. You'll think it queer in me to make such a mystery of it, but everything's all right, mother, and I'm sure you won't object when you know."

Now if there was a boy in New York who could be trusted not to abuse any confidence that might be reposed in him, that boy was Guy Melton. Seeing that he was only shy and not ashamed of revealing his plans, his mother readily consented to do as he wished, promising not to bother him with questions. So about three o'clock in the afternoon of the 24th of December he started out in a disagreeable storm of snow and sleet for the nearest Elevated Railroad station.

"I'm afraid I'm a little early," he said to himself, as he struggled on against the wind, "but I can't put it off another minute."

It was very comfortable in the cars, whirling along so far above the mud and slush of the streets, and Guy was tempted to remain where he was when the brakeman called out, "Park Place."

But he shook the lazy fit off, muttered "Christmas knight" under his breath, and struck boldly out in the direction of the City Hall. On reaching Broadway he stopped a minute, and leaned against a telegraph pole, while he bent his head in a listening attitude.

"Too soon! just as I thought!" he exclaimed, half aloud. But suddenly a cry of, "Extra! big fire! terrible loss of life!" smote upon his ear, and the next instant found him standing in front of a panting newsboy, whom he had caught by the shoulder as he flew past.

"Look here, boy," said Guy, as he fumbled in his pocket for two cents, "how do you expect to spend your Christmas?"

But just then a second newsboy appeared on the scene, shouting more shrilly than the first, and snatching the money from Guy's hand, the latter tore off up Broadway after his brother vendor, determined not to lose any time on an "extra" afternoon by answering silly questions for a lad not much older than himself.

Guy pulled his umbrella down close over his head, and set his teeth hard together for a minute.

"I won't give up yet," he muttered, and then began walking slowly down the street.

"Black yer boots!" called out a voice at his elbow, proceeding from a small boy, who was splashing along in shoes that were scarcely more than sieves serving to reveal the stockingless feet inside of them.

The child wore a long man's coat, reaching nearly to his heels, and buttoned so tightly about his neck as to give rise to the suspicion that there was no other garment under it, while his legs were but imperfectly covered with a pair of trousers which he surely never could have got into had he not been so thin and they so ragged.

"He's a smaller chap than I've provided for," thought Guy, as his eye hastily took in these details; "but I don't know where I could make a better investment." Then he smiled, and asked the young polisher if anybody ever had their boots blacked out-of-doors in such weather.

"In course they does," replied the urchin, cunningly keeping pace with the umbrella over his head. "Gents goin' in ter make a call at the Astor House 'll let me shine 'em up under their 'brellies 'n' then run fer the door. Saves five cents, yer know, 'cos they allus charges ten inside. But then 'twon't do fer ter pend on it."

"I should think you could do better at one of the uptown hotels," suggested Guy. Then laying his hand on the boy's wet shoulder, he added: "At any rate, come ride up in this car with me; I'll pay your fare. I want to talk to you."

The boot-black stared in surprise for an instant; then with a whooping, "I'm there!" he bounded ahead through the slush to the street car indicated, which was just about to start. Guy followed as quickly as a careful picking of his way would permit, to find his young charge engaged in a wordy fight with the conductor, who wanted to put him off.

Order being restored by means of a ten-cent piece, young Melton took his boy inside, and having suggested that he put his box under the seat out of the way, began at once: "I want you to spend Christmas with me. I'll take you home with me now, give you a bath, furnish you out with a complete suit of clothes to keep, and let you hang up your stockings to-night for—" But here Guy came to a sudden stop, as he recollected that very probably his companion had never heard of either stockings or Santa Claus.

"What d'yer mean?" exclaimed the boot-black, eyes and mouth wide open. "Hire me ter black yer shoes fer Chrissmus?"

"No, no," explained Guy. "You see, I've had so many presents myself that this year I thought I'd try something new, and give instead. They won't worry about you at home, will they?"

"Home!" echoed the little fellow. "Well, I guess Mrs. Brooklyn Bridge 'll let me off fer one night."

"Is that where you sleep?" inquired Guy, with a glance out of the window at the storm.

"You bet. It's a bully place, too, under one o' them arches, if the cops don't go fer a chap. But I'll come along o' you; yer don't look as if yer was a-goin' ter kidnap me," and the lad gave a laugh that caused the other passengers to stare curiously at the oddly assorted pair in the corner.

But Guy determined not to care what anybody might think or say even; he had resolved to make a Christmas knight of himself in order to defend some poor boy from the hardness of his lot on that joyous day, and while he could not help feeling that his mission would have been a much easier one with a bright, clean, good-looking child for its object, he knew that his boot-black, lacking these graces, stood all the more in need of his care and attention.

Before the ear reached the up-town street in which the Meltons lived, Guy learned that his guest's name was Dave McCue, that his father had been an Irishman and his mother an American, both being now dead, leaving their son to fight his way alone in the world as best he could, selling matches or papers, blacking boots, and always mingling with a set of lads whose influence and example could be traced in the street slang, and even worse, with which the boy's conversation was plentifully sprinkled.

"How old are you, Dave?" asked Guy, as they left the car and started to walk toward Fifth Avenue.

"Dunno. Somewheres 'tween ten and fifteen, I s'pose."

"Can you read?"

"Some. Kin tell the names o' the papers and spell out the big letters on the ice-carts. Cracky! do you live in a house like these yere?" pointing to the rows of brownstone fronts on either side the street.

"Yes," said Guy, as he led the way up the steps, and opened the door with his key.

"You're pretty wet, aren't you?" he added, as Dave's muddy boots left their marks on the marble. "I tell you what: suppose you take off your shoes here, then scud upstairs and get ready as quick as you can for your bath."

"But yer just said I was awful wet, so what d'yer want me ter get in any more water fer?" and young McCue sat down on his blacking box with a mischievous twinkle in his eye that convinced Guy it would need all the inspiration of knighthood to combat.

"I'm sure you don't want to put on your new clothes over your old ones," he returned; "and as long as you are at the trouble of undressing, you might as well take a swim."

"A swim!" cried Dave, springing to his feet.

"Pretty much the same thing," continued Guy. "We've got a big bath-tub upstairs, and you can have the water just as hot or cold as you like."

That word "swim" settled matters. The boy's thoughts immediately flew back to July and the joys of the free baths along the river-front, and his shoes were off in a trice.

"Now you can carry them and your box up to your room, on the third floor, next to mine," directed Guy, as he hung up his coat. "And—" But on turning around at this point he found that his guest had vanished.

He mechanically started for the front door, when a discord of sounds from the piano in the parlor warned him that he must look in the other direction.

"Oh, please ter sense me," pleaded Dave, as his young host met him in the doorway. "I jest wanted ter be able ter say I'd teched one o' them pannies. Guess I didn't hurt it."

"Oh no, of course not," said Guy, glad to remember that his mother and sister were out shopping.

There were more "Mys!" and "Ohs!" and "Ahs!" of surprise and delight when the little street boy was ushered into the to him palatial apartment that was to be his "very own" for two nights and a day.

"I do hope the suit 'll fit," observed Guy, anxiously, after he had personally superintended the bathing process, and had induced Dave to put on the under-clothing—a portion of dress with which he evidently had very little acquaintance.

The trousers were a trifle long, but that was not a bad fault where a growing boy was to wear them, and his happy owner declared that he had never "seed a coat fit so fine."

With his own hands Guy buttoned on the shirt collar, tied the pretty cravat, and brushed the stubborn hair, while a pair of stout boots and an Astrakhan cap completed the boot-black's transformation. Not an article of the outfit was second-hand, for the generous provider had resolved that everything connected with his enterprise should possess the added charm of newness.

By this time it was nearly six o'clock, and as Guy had heard his mother and sister return in the carriage a few moments before, he gave Dave an illustrated story-book to look at, and then went down to the next floor to reveal his secret.

"I've got a boot-black upstairs," he announced, briefly, as he entered the sitting-room. He then went on to explain his Christmas-knight scheme, concluding by telling as much of Dave McCue's history as he knew.

Ruth listened in silent amazement, and then, "Aren't you afraid he may—may steal something?" she suggested, nervously.

At this Guy looked first surprised, and then hurt. Such a possibility had evidently never entered his head.

"Oh, I can't think the boy would do such a thing, after all your kindness to him!" Mrs. Melton hastened to interpose, frowning aside at her daughter. "How does he seem, Guy—quiet or rough?"

"Well, I rather guess he's a mixture," laughed the young knight. Then he added, gravely: "But I'm afraid you don't quite yet understand what I want to do. You see, my idea is to have this fellow treated exactly as if he were a gentleman's son: let him sit at the table with us, play games, take him to drive in the Park, and give him as good a time for a day in winter as the free excursions and fresh-air funds do in summer. Maybe the plan won't work, and I'm awfully sorry I can't carry it out all by myself, but I—"

"Why, my dear boy," interrupted his mother, "I'm only too glad to find your thoughts running in such channels; and even if the first attempt doesn't succeed as you would wish, you'll know better how to go to work next time. At any rate, Ruth and I will help you all we can; won't we, Ruth?"

"Indeed we will, mother; and now that I understand what Guy is really doing, I feel quite ashamed that I haven't accomplished more in that line myself. Now run up, Sir Knight, and bring your Arab down-stairs to be presented, for it's nearly dinner-time. Perhaps I can get him to join my mission class."

Much elated by this display of sympathy with his undertaking, Guy hastened back to the hall bedroom, and invited Dave to come into his own room. The latter stood quite still in wondering admiration as his quick eye took in all the elegance and comfort of the apartment.

The heavy curtains, the well-filled book-case, easy-cushioned furniture, and odds and ends on mantel-piece and table made it seem to the homeless little lad a perfect museum, and he wandered from one article to another in silent amazement.

But, "Are all them clothes yours?" was the sudden exclamation that rather startled our hero, as he opened the closet where he kept his suits.

"Why, of course they are," he replied, as he slipped on a black coat, and looked down smilingly at the thin little face that was now twisted into a pondering frown.

"Cracky! what a lot on 'em! I—I should think yer'd have ter git up in the night sometimes an' dress yerself, so's ter help wear 'em out," and Dave broke into a loud street laugh, which he cut off in the middle by clapping both hands over his mouth.

"Come," said Guy, "we'll go down now and see my mother and sister. They expect you, you know."

This last was added to re-assure the boy, who at mention of the ladies had stolen up close to his new friend's side, and hesitatingly put out two fingers to touch the latter's hand. The young knight gathered all five of the now white little fingers into a warm grasp, and thus hand in hand the two went down the broad stairways to the dining-room back of the parlor, where the lights and fresco and shining silver, the cheery gas fire, and the warm greetings of Mrs. Melton and her daughter, fairly made Dave's head spin round with receiving so many new impressions at once. His friends, however, were thoughtful enough not to begin talking to him right away, so he had time, while he ate the soup which the imposing-looking butler handed him, to grow more at home amid his queer surroundings, which he took the opportunity to stare at comfortably between the courses. By-and-by, however, he began to ask Guy questions about different pictures in the room, and so by degrees Mrs. Melton and Ruth were drawn naturally into the conversation, and when the ice-cream came on, instead of freezing everybody into stiffness, it seemed to melt all constraint away.

When they had adjourned to the parlor, Ruth told about one of her Sunday-school boys who had been run over by a fire-engine, and as Dave remembered when the accident had happened, he took much interest in hearing about the lad, whose name had been in all the papers.

Then Guy proposed that his sister should play for them, and Dave stood at the corner of the piano, and watched every movement of her fingers with the greatest delight, asking for "more, more," until she declared that she must stop, or it would be too late to explain to him about hanging up his stocking.

After this mystery had been made clear, they all went upstairs, the ladies to the sitting-room, and the boys to Guy's "den," where he caused the late boot-black to sit in rapt enchantment for half an hour or so while he displayed his proficiency as an amateur conjurer.

"But it's high time you went to bed on this 'night before Christmas,'" cried young Melton, suddenly producing a long white stocking in a most mysterious manner.

This he presented to Dave, and then the two went into the hall bedroom, and hung it with much ceremony on the door knob.

"We don't have breakfast till half past eight, but I guess Santa Claus 'll wake you long before that. Don't bother about the gas; I'll put it out for you. Good-night, Dave;" and Guy held out his hand.

The other grasped it in both of his, and held it tight, while he gave a swift glance around at the snowy bed, soft carpet, and spotless curtains, and then said, so low that the older lad could scarcely hear, "You're awful good ter me." Then he broke away, went over to the window, and lifting the shade, looked out into the street at the blinding snow-storm that had set in, as if eager to make the wondrous contrast between his present lodgings and the Brooklyn Bridge all the more forcible.

Guy felt a big lump rising in his throat, which presently seemed to burst and send a happy sensation all over him.

Christmas morning dawned upon a city all ready for a sleighing carnival, and the milkmen's bells awakened our hero early. For an instant he forgot what day it was, and thought only of the snow; then he remembered the gladsome anniversary, and instinctively turned his eyes toward the table upon which his presents had always been placed, when suddenly the recollection of his knighthood swept down upon him in a flood, and he felt jollier, as he afterward expressed it, than a dozen new cravat pins or expensive rings could have made him.

Springing up, he hurriedly dressed himself, and stepped into the next room with a cheery "Merry Christmas!" for Dave, whom he found sitting up in bed, gazing, spellbound, alternately at the contents of his stocking in his lap and at the table from Guy's apartment by his side, on which latter lay a winter overcoat, a rubber suit, and a pair of skates.

"It's a sight better nor even Barnum's parade!" cried the happy boy, as our knight sat down and examined each article, to their owner's no small delight.

Out of the stocking had come forth a knife, a ball, a top, an orange, packages of candy, funny little figures and pictures, and numerous other articles of like dimensions, dear to the boyish soul, while down at the toe glittered a bright five-dollar gold piece, whither Dave had restored it for safe-keeping.

"Jimminy! I'm awful rich, ain't I?" he exclaimed, joyously, spreading out his arms over his treasures.

Then Guy helped him arrange them on the bureau, and proposed that he get ready for buckwheat cakes and breakfast. In the dining room our hero found some little presents for himself from friends who had not been "warned," and as soon as the meal was over, he started out with Dave for a brisk tramp through the snow. At half past ten they all went out in the big sleigh, with prancing horses, gay plumes, and silvery bells. Away up to the end of the Park and out into the country they drove, returning just in time for lunch, after which Guy crowned the pinnacle of delights for Dave by taking him to the pantomime.

When they came back, Ruth went with Dave into the library to show him some pictures, while Mrs. Melton beckoned her son into the parlor.

"Guy," she said, "I am going to ask you to hand Dave over to me when your time with him is up in the morning. I want to send him out West with a party that starts to-morrow afternoon. Ruth and I have looked into the matter, and have already paid the necessary expense. He'll have a good home with a farmer a friend of mine happens to know personally, and I am sure it is a much better opening for him than anything we could find here in the city, where he has lived such a life."

"Oh, mother!" was all Guy could say, but Mrs. Melton saw his joy and gratitude in his eyes, and then sent him to tell Dave, who was immediately in raptures at the prospect of going off to live among horses, cows, trees, and barns.

"But won't I ever see you again?" he asked, suddenly, in a sober tone, turning to the boy friend who had been the means of bringing to him all this happiness and start in life.

"To be sure you will," interposed Mrs. Melton, who had come in to note the effect of the news. "It isn't so far West as to prevent our all going out there to board for a month or so next summer, while I drink the waters for which, you know, the place is already becoming quite famous."

"Hip, h——" began Dave, tossing up an imaginary cap; then recollecting that he was not in the City Hall Park, he stored away his enthusiasm until he found an opportunity to ask Guy to come out into the hall and see how long he could stand on his head. This feat was interrupted by the butler's appearance to announce dinner, causing Dave's heels to come down unpleasantly close to that pompous individual's face.

During the evening there was company in the parlor, so the street boy, who was to be such no longer, passed the time in Guy's room, telling the latter curious stories of his past life, and showing himself so fondly devoted to the lad who had befriended him, as to prove that he was indeed looked up to as a knight and hero.

"I'll learn ter write soon'er ever I kin," were the last words our friend heard, as the train moved out of the station the next afternoon; and now, in a pigeon-hole of Guy's desk, there lies a pile of letters, each an advance on the other in penmanship and grammar, and the whole labelled, "From my boy."

“THE OLD WOMAN WHO LIVED IN A SHOE.”

A Christmas Play for Little Folk.

BY OLIVE WILSON.

SCENE I.—A GROVE. In the distance the toe of an enormous boot.

Enter MOTHER MADGE, followed by NINA, JACK, SPITFIRE, TOM FYE, and a throng of children. The children sing plaintively.

Oh dear! we are tired and hungry and cold,
 And poor Mother Madge is both weary and old.
 We would work if we could—give us something to do,
 If it's only to dance a cotillon for you.
 We'll sing for a supper, we'll skip and we'll dance,
 And gayly for supper we'll hop and we'll prance;
 For poor Mother Madge is both weary and old,
 And all of us children are hungry and cold.

MOTHER MADGE (in a hoarse and croaking voice, her cap rattles shaking, and her crutch tapping the ground impatiently).

Hush! such nonsense! children, do. I will make you sing a tune,
 Who will heed such chits as you? If you are not silent soon!

Then turning to the audience, she speaks with a whim.

Pity, kind friends. Was there ever before
 A woman like me in so dreadful a plight?
 All these poor children were left at my door,
 Their spirits are high, but their poor feet are sore.
 Please won't you help us to-night?

MOTHER MADGE (soliloquizing, or talking to herself). I've always thought that sooner or later their fathers and mothers and uncles and aunts and cousins would come home, and bring me that pot of gold that lies at the far-away end of the rainbow. For indeed

I've been good to them. When I've had plenty I've shared it with them, and growing children do have tremendous appetites. They have had a whipping now and then. You can't bring up boys without it; and as for Spitfire, poor child, if it wasn't for my rod she'd laugh in my very face, and hide my best cap, if she took the fancy. We got along well enough till the fire that burned up my house, and the robbers that plundered my purse, and the grasshoppers that ate up my crops, came all in a week. Now how can I keep a whole orphan asylum without bed or board, porridge or potatoes? And Nina's so pretty, and Jack's so brave! I love them and am proud of them; but, oh, what a charge for a poor worn-out old woman! Dearly me! Dearly me!

[She throws her apron over her head, rocks herself to and fro as she sits in an old splint-bottom chair, which has been left in the grove by a picnic party, and sobs aloud. At this the CHILDREN all cry in chorus. MOTHER MADGE jumps up and flourishes a switch.]

Behave yourselves, children.
 For I am a witch,
 And I've got a great switch.
 There, Tommy, there, Spitfire, see (Striking the two lightly)
 What you get when you fret,
 And make fun of my pet,
 Stop shouting, you children, at me.

[They all wipe their eyes, and JACK disappears, while NINA flies around, kissing one child, coaxing another, and hiding MOTHER MADGE'S switch behind the chair.]

MOTHER MADGE. I seem to be cross, but I am only at my wits' end. How ever shall I feed and clothe and shelter such a crowd of little ones any longer? Even if somebody helps me now, what are we to do in future?

JACK (returning). I am going on an expedition. I may find a deserted cabin, where we may spend the night comfortably. Now, Mother Madge, take a nap; and, Nina, have those children any handkerchiefs?

[Exit JACK, while NINA, taking a large handkerchief from MOTHER MADGE'S bag, wipes the faces of the little ones.]

“I have so many children, I don't know what to do,” croons the old woman in her sleep.

Enter JACK (trillily scolded). Mother Madge, what do you think? I have discovered a place where we may all stay. Nothing less than a tremendous shoe, which looks as though it might belong to an immense giant.

TOM FYE (scornfully). Ho! How can we eat a shoe?

JACK. Be still, Tom.

SPITFIRE. More likely the giant who owns the shoe will come along and eat us.

TOM. Devour us. Of course he will!

JACK. Mother Madge, there is your rod. It has fallen under your chair. Please shake it at them, or something.

The CHILDREN sing in chorus.

We're in a land of giants; But Jack will make a castle
 We don't know what to do. Of some old giant's shoe.

Esc. Maclean

NINA. Brother, let us all take hold of the shoe and drag it here, where we can look at it.

[Ere CHILDREN. They return, dragging the shoe, and place it at the back of the stage.]

ALL. Hurrah! Here it is!

MOTHER MADGE. Oh, Grandmother Goose, what a huge foot!

SPITFIRE. I could hide in the toe.

NINA. We might all live in it. It is big enough.

MOTHER MADGE. So it is, and we will live in it. We will tear it down on the side and make a door, and you, my children, shall stay within while I keep guard without.

JACK. The giant may return.

MOTHER MADGE. Little danger. Probably it hurts his corrus. I think he has abandoned it, and here in the grove he will never think of looking for it. Giants are stupid creatures.

[THE CHILDREN climb over and into it, SPITFIRE making a pirouette, on tiptoe, as she gets ready to spring over the top. Presently her curly head is seen peeping out of a hole she has made in the toe.]

JACK. For shame, Spitfire! Don't make holes on purpose.

MOTHER MADGE. Not in our only shelter.

JACK (holding up a large placard he finds in the shoe). sings.

Here is his number: Wears, as I live,
Old Giant Macomber A good 365.

JACK hangs it up, saying: When our ship comes in they'll know where to deliver our goods.

MOTHER MADGE. Now, my chicks, cuddle up closely and go to sleep. I want to reflect. I think I can find you a breakfast. To-morrow will be Christmas.

CHILDREN sing.

Will to-morrow be Christmas? How hang up our stockings
Pray what shall we do? In such an old shoe?

(They all begin to cry.)

MOTHER MADGE seizes SPITFIRE, and gives her a shake. The others scramble into their places as fast as they can, singing:

Don't, don't whip us; we'll be good.

Curtain falls on Scene I.

SCENE II.—Stage rather dark. Shoe seen in the shadow. JACK and NINA in the foreground; the latter leaning against her brother, and just asleep.

JACK. Poor little Nina! She was so very tired. Heigh-ho! I am the same, but I will keep awake until Mother Madge comes back. I must not sleep on guard.

NINA (glaucing). I am not asleep, Jack dear. I only closed my eyes for a second. I wish Mother Madge was here. I shiver with dread lest the giant should return.

JACK. Do not fear; I will be your valiant defender. If he comes [Jack rises and flourishes his arm], I will say, "Avaunt! base craven; this shoe is mine."

NINA. But that would not be true, Jack.

JACK. Why, I found it, and our family fills it. If he attempted to take it from us I would kill him.

CHILDREN swarm out of the shoe, singing.

Jack would kill the giant; Jack would kill the giant—
Jack is very strong; Thus we sing our song.

[At this moment they discover the placard on NINA's back and shout with laughter. JACK attempts to punish TOM for having put it on, and the others take his part. In the squabble the shoe is upset, and in the confusion MOTHER MADGE re-enters.]

MOTHER MADGE. Hoity-toity! Is this the way you perform when I go out, quarrelling and pulling the house down about your ears? Jack, set it up, while I chastise these naughty children. (She flies around, brandishing her rod. When order is restored she says): Now, Nina and Jack, the time has come to tell you an important secret. Many moons ago your father, King Thunderbolt, was summoned away to a great war. He marched off with a grand retinue, colors flying, drums beating, and bugles sounding, and before he went he gave me, an old retainer of the court, you, his darling children, to care for, and also his little nieces and nephews, children of the chiefs who went with him. I had a large and pleasant house, and plenty of gold and silver, and you know how carefully I have watched over my charge till yesterday, when we were driven away by a cruel band of rebels and robbers. It is well they did not dream whose children you were, or they would have killed you.

JACK. But King Thunderbolt and his army—will they never return?

MOTHER MADGE. Alas! I fear they have all perished.

Chorus from the Shoe.

Oh, never lose heart when the days are so dark;
Through the storm and the rain there is help coming. Hurk!
And, kind Mother Madge, you must never be blue,
For plenty of sunshine will come to the shoe.

NINA. Hush! children; the ground shakes as if with an earthquake. What can be the matter?

B—T—T—T. BURRT. BURRT.]

CHILDREN (shrinking in terror). Oh dear! the giant! the giant! NINA (flying into Jack's arms). Dear Jack, he will crush us all under his mighty feet.

MOTHER MADGE (bravely). No, children; giants are ponderous creatures, but they are kind. I would be much more afraid of a spiteful dwarf.

JACK. I suppose he wants to have his shoe half-sole.

TOM FYE. In that case we are all sold.

NINA. Puns are vulgar; and, oh, Tom! how can you pun at such a moment?

INVISIBLE GIANT (groaning fearfully). I certainly left my best shoe here, I remember. It pinched a little, and I threw it off after dinner, when I lay down for a nap. It must have rolled farther than I thought. How I do hate new shoes! The fairies sell so few nowadays, and leather is not what it used to be when I was a boy. Burrt!

JACK. Just hear that!

SPITFIRE (with a giggle). When he was a boy! I thought giants were always as big as a house, even when they were little.

GIANT. Well, I'll find that shoe, as sure as my name is Gruff. I believe it's over in that grove. I'm going to see. Am I to go flippy-top, hoppy-hop, all my life for the want of it? Not I.

[GIANT approaches, with slow and heavy tread, rolling as he walks. He sees the shoe and catches it, giving a shake, which tumbles all the children out in a bunch. THE GIANT drops the shoe, and raises both hands in dismay.]

GIANT. Well, what on earth! mice, hares, robins, little fishes, BABIES! What have we here? Babies, on my honor, actually asleep, a crowd of 'em, in my poor old shoe. Horrors! They're going to cry! I can not stand children's crying. It upsets my nerves, and gives me a headache. Will somebody not a baby tell me what this means?

NINA (leaving back). MOTHER MADGE. Oh, Giant Gruff, you dear, good, darling, beautiful Giant! if you'll forgive us for taking such a liberty we'll never, never do so again. We saw the shoe—such a pretty one too!—and we thought it would not be wrong—poor mother and my brothers and sisters were so tired—and so we—borrowed it for a little while; but we'll draw it back for you again, dear giant.

GIANT. Hump! you're a little lady, if ever there was one. It's hard for me to go barefoot, though, especially on one foot. But I'll tell you what: I'll lend you the shoe, while I take another nap, if that baby (pointing to SPITFIRE) will come here and give me a kiss.

SPITFIRE (pointing). I'm not a baby, but I'll oblige you. Only how am I to climb to your cheeks without a step-ladder?

GIANT. Ha! ha! ha! Why, I'll stoop down and kiss you, little Spitfire. Good-bye.

GIANT withdraws. In the distance are heard horns, drums, and trumpets. CHILDREN, scrambling into the shoe, sing softly.

We are ever so sleepy, we're hungry and sad,
And so we will sing, and we'll try to be glad;
Though poor Mother Madge is so awfully blue,
And soon we must leave the dear giant's nice shoe.

NINA. For pity's sake, children, be silent. The music is drawing nearer. Here comes a splendid gentleman in a purple velvet coat, faced with gold lace.

[MOTHER MADGE, stepping in front of the shoe (out of which the children flutter like a throng of birds) and extending her skirts, drops a low courtesy.]

Enter the KING. His men remain visible at the edge of the grove, and he advances alone.

KING. Why, madam, what may this be? Who are you, and what sort of establishment is this?

MOTHER MADGE. Generous sire, they are my children, and I will die rather than see a hair of their heads hurt.

KING. Who wants to hurt them? Not my friend, good Giant Gruff, who has just gone to sleep on the slope of the hill around which we came. Upon my word, your house looks as if it might be the poor giant's lost shoe over which he was lamenting. We heard his groans, but our music put him to sleep. Nobody will hurt you, good woman, but I want your children to sing for me merrily.

MOTHER MADGE. You hear, children; you are to sing merrily now for his Majesty. Be quick, or I'll have to get my rod.

CHILDREN. Merrily, cheerly, tra la la!
Here is a King come home from war.
Merrily, cheerly we will sing—
Supper at last the King will bring.

MOTHER MADGE. Pray pardon them, sire. They are almost starved. We have been plundered and robbed, and our home was destroyed—

And the best we could do was to live in a shoe.

KING. Whose children are these?

MOTHER MADGE. King Thunderbolt, who went far away to the wars, was the father of Nina and Jack; and their little cousins too are all of royal blood.

KING. And are you, good dame, my faithful Madge, and you do not know me! I am Thunderbolt!

MOTHER MADGE (courtesying bow). Parlon me; for indeed, my King, you are changed. Here are your children. Here is Prince Jack; there is the Princess Nina.

(The two step forward and kiss their father's hand. He lays his hand on JACK's head and kisses NINA. The other children rush forward crying, "Papa, papa! Uncle Thunderbolt! welcome home!")

KING. Enough to drive one crazy. How have you ever survived?

MOTHER MADGE (gayly). Oh, I've rocked them, and kissed them, and calmed them—"My dear,"
And watched them with pleasure, sire, year after year;
And now and then given them milk, broth, and bread,
And whipped them all soundly, and sent them to bed.

KING. Mother Madge, you are a little general. Now, then, for supper in camp, and these famed appetites shall be satisfied.

Curtain falls on Scene II.

SCENE III.—KING and MOTHER MADGE seated near each other, and surrounded by courtiers. Music of instruments. CHILDREN dance merrily to a light measure. At a signal they pause, and each, holding the hand of his partner, sings.

No more we are tired and hungry and cold;
Our hearts are as light as our foot-steps are bold.
The King has come home, and we bend at his feet;
We love him, we serve him—our good King we greet.

KING. Now, Jack and Nina, on this Christmas-day
Be good, and with your kind protector stay.
Ere long my palace shall re-opened be,
And there you all shall come and live with me.
And on the wall we'll paint a mighty shoe,
Like that which yesterday your praises drew.
You, Jack, shall learn the ways of martial men,
And Nina be a Queen's sweet child again;
And all the little ones be kind and true;
And don't forget the Giant's friendly shoe.

Parting Song. We'll all be good, we'll all be kind,
And Mother Madge we all will mind,
The only thing we wish to-day
Is that her rod were thrown away.

As any number of children may take part in this play, it is well adapted for school exhibitions. MOTHER MADGE should have a round, rosy face, to contrast with her assumed character of a deceitful old woman. The shoe may be made of pasteboard, and covered with black muslin.

COSTUMES.

MOTHER MADGE, in scarlet petticoat, broadened over-dress, snowy cap, and embroidered apron; high-heeled slippers, reticule, and rod at her side.

JACK wears knee-breeches, blouse, cap, and long castrich feather.

NINA, quaint dress, in rich colors. The COURTIERS, prettily dressed.

KING, in velvet and gold, with crown and sceptre.

GIANT. A young gentleman with a deep voice should take this part. The GIANT's height may be added to by his holding up a very large broom, which may be draped by a full military cloak or an old-fashioned water-proof, and crowned by a freeman's hat. The GIANT must keep well in the shadow. He might even remain invisible in case there should be any great difficulty in arranging his height and costume.

Repeat the dear story
How, leaving His glory,
The Hope of the ages came down to the earth.
Oh, worship Him lowly,
The lofty and holy,
Our Star of the Morning shone out at His birth.
See Mary enfold Him
While shepherds behold Him,
And sages are bent at His beautiful feet.
Come, haste to adore Him,
And, bowing before Him,
The Christ who redeems you in reverence greet.

This wonderful Stranger,
His couch is a manger,
His cradle is made with the cattle in stall;
Yet God of creation
In blest incarnation,
He stoops to our nature to ransom us all.
Rock, bells, in the steeple,
Shout loudly, good people,
And, children, oh, merrily, merrily sing!
O'er land and o'er ocean
With joyful commotion
Send forth the glad tidings that Jesus is King.

CHRISTMAS GREENS.

"So now is come our joyful'st feast;
Let every man be jolly;

Each room with ivy leaves is dress'd,
And every post with holly."

PERIL AND PRIVATION.

BY JAMES PAIN.

A CASTAWAY AMBASSADOR.

I.

IN all narratives of ordinary life, and even in fiction, the fact of the persons described being foreigners (i. e., speaking another language), or of the incidents having taken place many years ago, is found greatly to detract from the interest of the story.

This holds good even in accounts of shipwrecks. The perils of a crew of Malays or Chinese would but slightly move us in comparison with those of English or Americans. Nevertheless, there are a few cases, of which the following is one, in which the foreign element, by reason of its strangeness, and also of a certain unfitness to deal with dangers with which our own sailors are familiar, is of itself attractive.

Imagine three Siamese ambassadors, unaccustomed to the sea, accompanied by a retinue of long-robed attendants, and full of the most artificial and fanciful ideas of human life, suddenly finding themselves thrown upon their own resources, having to climb mountains, swim rivers, deal with savages of the most ignorant type, and devour mussels and sea-weed, contrary to their religion.

It is a picture which would be ridiculous but for "the pity of it." Its absurdity is immensely increased by their conviction of the importance of their mission, and of the greatness of the King their master, to whose dispatches (which had probably nothing in them but observations on the weather or on the state of his own health) they cling with a loyal persistence that could not have been exceeded had they been the original MSS. of the sacred Scriptures.

The name of one of these voyagers is peculiar: Occum Chamnam, a mandarin of Siam, bound with two other great mandarins, six others of inferior rank, and an immense retinue, on an embassy to the court of Portugal. They embark on the 27th of January, 1686, on board a Portuguese vessel of thirty guns and 150 men, with many passengers besides themselves, "including three monks of different orders, and a number of Creoles, Indians, Portuguese, and Mestees, a people of color." It was what is called in these days rather a "scratch lot," which one can easily imagine at any crisis of peril or misfortune would fly asunder from one another like the contents of a burst shell.

When in sight, as they imagined "by certain marks" (in which they were quite wrong), of the Cape of Good Hope, the huge unwieldy vessel struck on a rock, and stuck there. Occum Chamnam describes the scene in a simple manner, which is quite refreshing. "I can not picture the terror and consternation which then prevailed. Who can figure the emotions excited by certain death to so many? Nothing was heard but shrieks, sighs, and groans. People rushed rudely together." Ceremonial, which was poor Occum's natural atmosphere, seems to have been neglected altogether. "Those who had been the bitterest enemies were now reconciled in all sincerity. The tumult was such that it deafened the crashing of the vessel, breaking into a thousand pieces, and the noise of the waves dashing with incredible fury against the rocks. . . . My own affright was not less than that of others until, being assured that there was some chance of escape, and seeing that I personally should not lose much by this shipwreck, I summoned up some resolution. I had two good habits, which I put on, and then committing myself to several planks tied together, endeavored to reach the shore. Our second ambassador, the strongest and best swimmer of the three, was already before me, carrying the King's dispatches, fastened to a sabre with which his Majesty had presented him."

They had neither water, wine, nor bread, and the cold, in spite of his "two habits," struck to the very marrow of the poor Eastern. The next morning he accordingly returned to the wreck upon a kind of hurdle, trusting to find food and raiment. Everything, however, was full of water, and he could only obtain some pieces of gold stuff, a small case containing six flasks of wine, and a portion of biscuit, "so bitter from the salt-water that I could not swallow a single mouthful."

As many Siamese had escaped quite naked, Occum shared the gold stuff with them, but "sensible that the wine would not last long in their hands," he intrusted it to a Portuguese, "who had testified great friendship for me, telling him it was at his command, providing he would give me some of it when required. I soon, alas! had occasion to learn the weakness of friendship when opposed to the impulse of necessity, and that self, under the pressure of want, is the first consideration. My friend daily supplied me with half a glass of wine for the first few days in the confidence of our discovering a spring or rivulet; but finding ourselves disappointed, my requests for what I had bestowed in the warmth of friendship were vain." Indeed, the Portuguese gave him so effectual a repulse, saying that "even his own father should not have a drop of it," that the unfortunate ambassador felt that he had exhausted the resources of argument, and did not try again.

I am sorry to say that the conduct of this scoundrel was only an instance of the whole behavior of his countrymen toward the Siamese. Above two hundred of the ship's company had reached the land—a barren and uninhabitable shore; and on the second day they started along the coast—just as the crew of the Grosvenor were fated to do a hundred years afterward—in the expectation of reaching the Cape of Good Hope. The pilots and captain calculated that it was but twenty leagues away, so that "most of the company left behind what provisions they had obtained from the ship, so as not to be embarrassed by them."

They soon, therefore, began to feel the pinch of hunger, though it was almost unnoticed in the pangs of thirst. Their road was through bushes which afforded no shelter from the burning sun, and in forty-eight hours they only came upon one well, the waters of which were so brackish as to be undrinkable. The chief ambassador being in feeble health, the Siamese could not march quickly, and the Portuguese went on ahead, always watched by the former with a touching anxiety, since they had confidence in their skill and endurance, in which they knew themselves to be deficient; but they soon became secretly aware that the Portuguese did not wish their companionship, and in fact were deserting them.

Presently the first ambassador became so ill that he insisted on being left behind, so that the rest should no longer be delayed, but hasten on to the Dutch settlement, whence help might be sent to him. "A youth of fifteen, the son of a mandarin, between whom and the ambassador existed a mutual affection, refused to leave him, and this conduct inspired an old domestic, who also remained with his master."

Once, and even twice, the Siamese came up with the Portuguese, but without either signs of welcome or repulsion; famine and fatigue were doing their accustomed work, and nothing but the possession of food or drink had much interest for any one. Their principal support was mussels, and certain bitter leaves which grew above high-water mark. Their signs and dumb entreaties for food, joined doubtless to their strange appearance, were only responded to by the natives "with shouts of laughter." When they evinced their desire to purchase some of the sheep and oxen, which were grazing in great numbers throughout the country, they replied, "Tabac" (meaning tobacco), or "Patafac" (meaning patacas, the only coin they knew. The pilot, indeed, had a few of the latter, and bought an ox with them, but divided it solely among his fellow-countrymen. None of the Siamese obtained a single mouthful.

Occum offered two large diamonds for a sheep, which were refused with disdain; but when one of the mandarins adorned his head with certain gold ornaments, the natives gave him a quarter of a sheep for them, which was eaten raw. A Hottentot once took a fancy to the gold buttons on an unfortunate diplomatist's robe, and "I made signs that he should have them in return for something to eat; but judge of my disappointment when he only brought with him a small vessel of milk"—probably the dearest milk that was ever sold.

The last solid food of which they partook was the skin of the ox purchased by the pilot, and which the Portuguese had thrown away. After that they were so fortunate as to find a peninsula covered with mussels, where they remained two days, as in an oasis of plenty. "A slender serpent, killed with a dagger, was eaten head, skin, bones, and all"; and then, as they dragged themselves upon their weary way, starvation set in with all its horrors. It was on awaking from a heavy sleep, induced by extreme exhaustion, that the poor Siamese discovered one morning that the Portuguese had finally deserted them. "In vain we looked around, shouted, and sought everywhere; but not only were we unable to see a single one of them, but could not discover the route they had taken."

BY MRS. JOHN LILLIE,

AUTHOR OF "MILDRED'S BARGAIN," "AUNT RUTH'S TEMPTATION," ETC.

CHAPTER XIV.

"THERE!" exclaimed Nan, shutting her exercise book with a bang. "There, Miss Prior, it is finished!"

"I should say it was," Miss Prior answered, very calmly. "Look how you have blotted it."

Nan's countenance fell. Her own idea had been haste, and it was quite true that the exercise, though all written, was blotted heavily.

"What shall I do?" she said, grumblingly.

"Write it over again," rejoined the governess, in her icest tones.

"Oh, Miss Prior, I can't! I shall be too late."

"You know my rule, Annice," was the answer. "I can never hope to correct your giddy, disorderly ways if I once overlook anything. Come: 'La Cigale ayant chanté.'" And Miss Prior, without relaxing a muscle of her face, began to dictate the exercise which Nan had just written.

The room in which Nan and her governess were seated was one which had, half a century before, been Miss Rolf's own school-room. It had been unused so long that everything looked faded and more old-fashioned even than in any other part of the large house. The first time Nan entered it she thought what a lovely place it would be to romp in, for it was so large and the furniture so scant; but under Miss Prior's rule romping anywhere, Nan discovered, would be considered most unpardonable.

A faded Turkey carpet of indefinite reds was on the floor; some old-fashioned maps and charts hung on the walls between the four windows—one at each end, two at the side; there were globes and one or two desks. A piano of more recent date than the rest of the furniture—though rather a "tin pan" at best, Nan thought—stood between two of the windows, and there was an elaborate chemical apparatus, which Nan longed to have some day entirely to herself. Nan's desk was in the middle of the room—Miss Prior objected to her being near the windows—and the governess always occupied a stiff chair near a little table at her right.

Now, with all Nan's lack of education and the vulgarity of her recent surroundings, she dearly loved to see pretty objects about her, to have bright soft colors in view—something to please her eye as well as her heart. The dreary school-room oppressed her even in this soft May weather; but Miss Prior oppressed her still more. "That lady," Joan Rolf remarked, "would freeze a canary with a look"; and with Nan, for all her high spirits, the process of chilling went on very successfully when she was with her governess.

Yet Miss Prior never for an instant suspected that she was not the very wisest and kindest and most comprehensive of Nan's new friends. In person she was rather small, with thin blonde hair, which she wore gathered into the smallest possible knot at the back of her head, light blue eyes, perfectly regular, cold features, the lips as thin as they could be and ever open, the chin decidedly square. Unfortunately for herself, Miss Prior was one of those persons who consider themselves as injured by having to work for her living, and it seemed to her as though she ought always to enforce upon others a sense of her "dignity."

Whenever she did unbend with Nan, it was to tell of the comforts and elegancies of her life before "poor papa" died, and she never discovered that Nan was not impressed either by a sense of her former glory or any feeling that she was not acting the part of a perfect lady in being a governess. Miss Rolf had engaged her through the recommendations of Western friends, and because she was really highly educated, so far as book-learning went. But Nan needed a warmer, finer kind of association. Just then her governess should have been her dearest friend.

On this morning Nan's haste and her impatience were partially excusable, for she was to pay her first visit to the cousins in College Street at three o'clock; and Mrs. Heriot would keep her "forever," thought Nan, doing her hair and looking over her dress, and it was already one, and in two minutes, she felt sure, the dinner-bell would ring—and, there! went another blot. Nan's little brown head bent lower and lower over her writing, while her feelings arose in rebellion. She crooked her elbows out more and more, and received a "fillip" of an exasperating kind from Miss Prior's thimble, and at last, flurried and nervous, let a tear splash down and mingle with a very blackly written word in a little inky stream.

"Annice!" exclaimed Miss Prior. She stood up in perfect horror.

Nan leaned back in her chair, two more tears gathering under her dark lashes. She felt humble and ashamed, although it seemed as if she could not write another word.

"You can go away now," said Miss Prior, very icily, "and get ready for dinner, but the work must remain where it is; and when you come to your lessons to-morrow, the exercise shall be written twice instead of once."

Nan's penitence vanished, for here she felt was injustice. How much more would a gentle word, even of rebuke, have done for her! But she was glad to escape. She went away to her room, dried her eyes, and listened to the dinner-bell with a sense of relief.

But as she went down the long staircase, which was flooded with May sunlight, a curious feeling of loneliness came over little Nan. She knew that everything money could buy was given her freely, and that every one about her meant to be good and kind. But there was something wanting—a lack which made Nan's heart swell and a sob rise involuntarily to her throat. What was it? And why, with all their common ways and vulgar ideas, had she not missed just this one thing in the Ruperts household? She walked slowly across the hall, thinking how much she would give for one sight of her cousin Philip's homely, gentle countenance, one hour with him on the beach, or among his shells and poor little collection of curiosities. Yet it was only one month since she felt herself such a proud heroine of romance!

Miss Rolf was waiting for Nan at the head of the dinner table. Seated behind the glittering silver and glass, dressed, as usual, faultlessly, with her rich old laces and dark silks, the old lady looked to Nan the very personification of comfort and luxurious ease. Of course Nan did not define it in this way to herself; on the contrary, it made her only feel confused and sad, and long for something, she knew not what. She came into the room timidly, still very near to tears; and then she saw Miss Rolf look at her with a curious glance, half pity, half affection, altogether something gentler than Nan had ever seen.

The old lady put out one of her beautiful white hands, and Nan seemed to know what she meant. She came up very quietly, and laid her own little trembling fingers in it.

“Nan,” Aunt Letty said, “you look sometimes so like your father!”

Nan’s restraint soon gave way at this. It was certainly queer, in the middle of a bright sunshiny day, and just at dinner-time, for no apparent reason, to burst into tears; but that is precisely what Nan did. She flung her arms about the old lady’s neck, and sobbed passionately against the rich brown silk dress, while, what was more singular, Miss Rolf just let her cry away, holding her tenderly, and kissing the rough mass of brown hair softly.

Robert, the butler, luckily did not come in on this scene, or I am afraid he would have thought his mistress had entirely lost her senses. To the servants, as well as to Nan, Miss Rolf was like a queen—proud, reserved, and certainly not a person before whom to betray any weakness; but the tenderness of the arms about Nan was unmistakable.

When the little girl lifted up her flushed, tear-stained face, she seemed to feel as if everything danced in a glad light about her, and Miss Rolf had a delicate pink flush on her old cheeks. She looked almost as transformed and as excited as Nan.

“Dear, dear,” she said, very quietly, “by-and-by you’ll tell me all about it.”

She held the little girl’s hot head closely, and looked at her with something about her own eyelashes that glistened; for she was thinking of a day, thirty years ago, when Nan’s father had been her idol. No child had ever wept in her arms, or looked as if it wanted to kiss her, since those days, and perhaps the perfectly natural outburst on Nan’s part had made her feel what she had lost through pride and self-will.

“Nannie,” the old lady said, earnestly, “I’ve a long story to tell you some day about your father. Some day I mean you to hear it. Now sit down, my child. There,” added Miss Rolf, quickly, her old stern look coming back—“there is Robert. Robert, you were a long time bringing in the soup. I must make Susan understand promptness better.”

Nan glided into her seat, wondering if Robert noticed how red her eyes were. But that distinguished person did not betray it if he had. He moved about noiselessly as usual, and attended to Miss Rolf’s slightest look with his usual quickness.

ROB.

A Christmas Story.

BY EDWARD I. STEVENSON.

MR. WALTER DIX sat toasting his feet before the bright fire in his studio on Christmas eve. The studio looked a very cozy and pleasant place, with the fire-light flickering over the gay Japanese fans tacked against the chimney, and the gilding on the books and ornaments of the mantel-piece. But Mr. Dix was not exactly cheerful. “Too bad to be away from home on Christmas,” he was saying to himself. “Here I am, all alone down here in Florida, and father and mother and Fanny away up in Massachusetts. Well, merry Christmas to all of you, although you can’t hear me wish it.”

One, two, three! Hands rapped at the studio door as if to break off Mr. Dix’s dull reflections. Slowly the door opened. “Look out dar, you Link! Fotch her long steady,” a darky voice was saying, with a gleeful chuckle. Mr. Dix turned his head. With another chuckle two negro lads walked up the room, pulling on a rude cart a square box covered with express labels. “Good-ebenin’, Mars’ Dix!” “Merry Christmas to Mars’ Dix!”

"Why, Rob! Why, Link!" cried the young painter. "I'm glad to see you. And have you come all the way up from the station, this windy night, with that heavy box?"

Rob's broad face sparkled with pleasure. "Yes, Mars' Dix. She come down by de tug, she did, an' ole Uncle Cato he 'lowed 'twas a Crissum box from yer folks, an' said Mars' Dix muss hab her—sholy!"

"An' pleeze, Mars' Dix," burst forth Link, with shining eyes and teeth, "'plee-ee-ze can't Rob an' me stay an' see you open it?"

Stay they did: and each gift from the home circle to Mr. Dix put the two into a more electric state of tickle than the one before it. The various articles were all pronounced wonderful; but the one that drew out a special storm of applause was a large and beautiful opera-glass. "Hi! ain't dat miraelas!" ejaculated Link, turning around and staring at Rob through its larger end. "Dar you goes, half mile off. 'Pears like dis heah eud jes knock a man into de middle o' nex' Crissum!"

Shuffling steps outside interrupted Mr. Dix's merry answer. In another moment a new knocking at the studio door, and lo! Rob's decidedly "cheeky" invitation, "Come in," admitted to the rosy fire-light all the other members of Mr. Dix's little Sunday-school class down at the station—Henry, with his round head and solemn little face; the two brothers Coot and Will Jackson, with their sedate little phizzes; and Tom, the blaekest and plumpest-cheeked and most quick-witted of all the six.

"Well, well," exclaimed Mr. Dix, kindly, giving up his letter-reading for the present, "this is a surprise, boys! How do you all do on Christmas-eve?" After—thanks to Rob's petition—every single article from the box had been duly again gone over and exhibited, for the benefit of the new arrivals, Mr. Dix said: "Now, boys, I want you all to sit down there on the rug before the fire. First, we must have a little Christmas talk together; shall we?—and after that I've a plan to propose to you."

Down they sat accordingly; and with at least six tellings, each to the other, to "stop a-serugin' into me wid yer ellabow!" and to "quit a-bu'stin' out lullin dat ar way!" the little group grew more serious as they sat around Mr. Dix's feet.

"Boys," said the painter, "who was it was born on Christmas-day; that same One of whom we have talked so many Sunday afternoons together?"

"Jesus Christ, Mars' Dix," answered Rob and Link, soberly.

"Well," said Mr. Dix, when another question or two had been put and met, "do not forget that He was always doing a kindness to some one, even to those who hated him the most; always carrying their and our sins and faults, from the time He lay, a tiny baby, in the manger at Bethlehem until He came to His cross. Ay, and ever after."

The six black faces were very thoughtful by the time Mr. Dix had finished; but how did the twelve flashing eyes dance when, after a little pause, the young painter said,

"Boys, I suppose you've all heard about youngsters like you hanging up stockings on Christmas-eve?"

"Oh yes, Mars' Dix," came Rob's voice, leading the rest.

"Ah," resumed the young man, stirring the coals; "and are any of you going to try hanging up stockings down at the station?"

"Guess not, Mars' Dix," came Tom's thick voice, accompanied with the usual chuckle. "Ole Aunt Asia she say she won't hab no sech a tomfoolery roun' her way."

"An' anyhow," exclaimed Link, "'twouldn't be no use. Santy Klaw's ain't goin' ter bring nothin' to black folkses. Too many white chil'ren fer to 'tend to."

A laugh greeted this state-

THE BOYS EMPTYING THE STOCKINGS.

ment. Mr. Dix joined in it. "Well," said he, after it had subsided, "I want each one of you boys to-night before he goes home to hang up a stocking on my mantel-piece, there, and then you can come here, as early as you choose, to-morrow morning, and see if Santa Claus has not brought something for you, at least. He'll never dare to pass by my studio, you see."

This delightful idea was received with such a burst of joy that Mr. Dix's breath was nearly taken away. Rob and Link, in fact, found themselves obliged to walk on their hands half across the room before they could entertain the plan entirely. Then came the fresh excitement of each choosing a red or blue striped stocking from out Mr. Dix's drawerful, and, succeeding to that, the thrilling sensation of pinning each one of those same stockings up along the edge of the mantel-shelf. And each must needs have a label fastened to it, so that Santa Claus should make no mistake as to whose stocking it might be. The studio rang with fun by the time the row dangled in the fire-light complete.

"Mars' Dix," said Link, a few moments after, "now dat all dem stoekin's is done ready, wouldn't you like to heah a little musie befo' we staht fo' home?"

"Indeed I should, Link," replied Mr. Dix, "and suppose you give me a dance into the bargain?"

A dance to wind up the evening! That was precisely what was wanted.

"We'll gib you, Mars' Dix, our celebrated new Lady Kortet Aek, if you like," suggested Rob, after a deal of whispering and giggling with his mates in a corner.

"By all means, the Lady Quartette Act, Rob," laughed the young painter.

So Rob and the inseparable Link, along with Will, disappeared behind a tall screen at the far end of the studio together, while Mr. Dix glanced through his letters. Out the three boys came presently, however—Rob with his banjo, and Link shaking his elappers merrily, while Will, most comical to behold, had managed to slip his little black self, clothes and all, into an ancient and wonderfully flowered sacque, which must have belonged to tall old Aunt Asia at the station herself; since when tied around the middle with a flaring red and yellow sash, probably borrowed by one of the company from the same source, it made a kind of droll Bloomer dress. Below it appeared Will's ragged trousers and boots to testify to his sex. Evidently the three had come up to Mr. Dix's studio prepared to be entertaining.

"But I thought I was to hear a quartette," remarked Mr. Dix, as the other boys, having placed chairs for the orchestra, and furnished Will with a big newspaper to hold as his music, contentedly squatted in a row along the far wall of the room.

"My, Mars' Dix, you has it," answered Coot and Henry together. "Dar's Willy, an' dar's Link, an' dar's Rob."

"So I see," responded Mr. Dix. "But I thought that a quartette was something played or sung by four people—eh? It seems to me I see only three."

The performers stared at each other. This was clearly quite a new notion to them.

"Well, Mars' Dix," answered Rob, presently, "you see— I—dat is, we—we kin o' sort o' disremembered dat ar faek until jes' dis minute. But—" and the boy stopped with rather a mortified grin.

"Oh, never mind, Rob," rejoined the painter, with his gay laugh, and anxious to smooth away so unpleasant a perplexity. "It really don't make an inch of difference to-night. We'll jest call it the 'Quartette Aet' all the same. Go ahead!"

Rob clapped his hands, much relieved. His banjo struck up a frolicsome air; Link's clappers galloped in; Will's voice followed in a rollicking verse, to the chorus of which he executed a quite astonishing little dance; while Henry and Coot and Tom patted the time friskily.

Song followed song after that, until Mr. Dix was really too tired out with laughing and applauding to listen any longer—especially since it was growing late, and he had those stockings to look after. The party broke up.

"Good-night, boys," said their kind host, as he watched the six file out of the door into the dark road to the station—"good-night, and don't forget to come at six o'clock to-morrow morning to empty those stockings. Pete will let you in, in case I'm asleep."

"No, sah!" "Nebber fear, Mars' Dix!" came the half-dozen merry voices.

Mr. Dix returned to his fireside quickly to put into the six gaping hose the gay colored books, the candy, the knives and tops he had provided. The "Kortet," meantime, were leading their companions into the little station, and singing at the tops of their lungs a verse Bob must certainly have composed on the way:

"O Crissmass-day in de ebenin',
How happy you makes me feel!
Ye-e-e, Uel' Santy Klaws,
How happy you makes me fe-e-e-ell!"

It seemed to Mr. Dix that he had scarcely slept an hour before he opened his eyes again. It was Christmas morning with a vengeance, for from the other side of the bedroom door came an uproar that Mr. Dix knew could mean nothing except Rob and Link, Coot and Will, Henry and Tom, out of their six wifs because of "dose stoekiu's."

"Merry Crissmass, Mars' Dix!" met the painter on all sides as he entered the studio; and he sat a full hour with them, joining in their glee over each simple gift before he sent them home "jes too happy fer anything," as Coot expressed it.

Toward noon on this same bright Christmas-day Mr. Dix returned to the studio from a walk. As he put his key into the door, what was his surprise to hear quick footsteps inside and the banging down of a window-sash! Old Pete was at the station, so the noise was none of his. But still greater was Mr. Dix's surprise to perceive, as he flung back the door, Rob struggling half outside, half inside the window-frame. Its sash and a certain crooked nail had caught him firmly as he was leaping out.

"Why, Rob!" cried Mr. Dix, hurrying to his release; "you here?"

Rob swung himself down. Then he stood in the middle of the floor, looking terribly confused.

"How in the world, Rob, did you come to get into my studio while I was absent?" exclaimed Mr. Dix, not very well pleased. "Did you forget something?"

Rob made no reply. Mr. Dix suspected all was not right.

"You ought not to have come in by that window, or by any other way, Rob, without leave," he pursued, looking narrowly at the boy. "I hope—I hope that you meant nothing mischievous or wrong."

Rob looked up to Mr. Dix; then he hung his head. At the same time he appeared to make a motion to hide something beneath his coat. Mr. Dix stepped forward quickly. Rob drew back, tripped over the rug's edge, and fell over. The hidden object was dashed from its hiding-place to the carpet. It was Mr. Dix's opera-glass!

"Robert!" exclaimed the young man, very sorrowfully, as he recognized and took it up. "Did you come here—while I was out, to—steal my glasses?"

He remembered how they had been admired the night before.

Rob had uttered a cry of shame as the opera-glasses dropped. He got up and stood before Mr. Dix, unable to raise his eyes.

"Can it be possible that one of my boys will steal?—and steal upon Christmas-day!" continued Mr. Dix. "And you, Rob, of all the rest! For what else can I think? Speak, Rob, if it is not so."

The detected boy stood as if dumb, his breast heaving. Suddenly he looked up and replied stubbornly, "Mars' Dix, no, sir—no, sir! I didn't take dem glasses from de drawer!"

Mr. Dix's face reddened. "I don't understand you, I'm afraid. There are the glasses; and you have just named the place in which I left them. Pete is out. Come, come, Rob," he continued, kindly; "confess that you either wanted to play with these glasses, or something of that sort, and thought that I wouldn't miss them for an hour. Better make an honest story of it, my boy"—and the speaker laid a gentle hand on Rob's shoulder.

Rob bit his lip; then he repeated, in a low, obstinate voice, "I tell you I nebber took dem glasses."

"You need say no more, sir!" exclaimed Mr. Dix, sternly. "I am ashamed of you! My trust in you is gone until I find you more worthy of it. Go! I do not wish to see you again until you are willing to admit your fault. You need not come up with the other boys to our Christmas-day reading this afternoon. After all that I have done and said to make my boys true and honest lads, is this the way one of them acts—and toward me!" Mr. Dix stopped. "Rob," he added, appealingly, with earnest eyes bent upon the boy—"once for all, will you not own the truth to me?"

Rob's head drooped lower. He muttered something. "I ain't a-goin' to say 'nuther wo'd about it!" he exclaimed, doggedly, and then walked hurriedly out of the room.

Very sorrowful was Mr. Dix during his quiet Christmas dinner. "Too bad!" he kept saying to himself. "And I fancied them all improving so much lately! Rob, especially, seemed to be growing up such an honest, good little fellow."

When the class came up to the studio at four o'clock, Henry remarked, "Rob's sick, Mars' Dix—said he couldn't come; an' Link's got ter go 'long o' Uncle Cato, up to Poco Swamp." Mr. Dix was not surprised to hear that Rob had preferred giving himself out as ill rather than tell the rest that he had been forbidden to accompany them. But the little feast passed off pleasantly for the others, and Christmas day itself ended, rather sadly for Mr. Dix, a little later.

Nothing did he see of Rob the next day nor that following. All the rest of the class said that he was somewhere about the station, but that he kept aloof from them. Link, likewise, appeared wonderfully busy, and seemed to keep out of Mr. Dix's way nearly as much as Rob. "How disgraced the little fellow feels by his friend's conduct," thought Mr. Dix, when meeting Link one day on the road, the boy slipped into a side path, scarcely having spoken to the young painter.

The pleasant Christmas week sped by. Mr. Dix was standing just outside the studio door, watching the last saffron sunset of the old year, when all at once flying footsteps approached. The form of a boy was seen running up the road. It was Link. Covered with mud and sobbing, he fairly cast himself at Mr. Dix's feet. "Oh, Mars' Dix, Mars' Dix," he gasped, "Rob's hurt—he's a-dyin', an' he wants you!"

"Rob—dyin'?" cried the young painter. "What do you mean, Link? I saw him this noon."

Between his bursts of grief, Link told the story. A ruined chimney of the burned mills, the pulling down of which, for its brick, Uncle Cato had been superintending, had crashed over upon poor Rob. A doctor had been found on board the afternoon boat, but the boy had only a brief hour or so left of life. "An', oh, Mars' Dix," repeated Link, "he miss see you, he miss splain something—something!"

In a few moments Mr. Dix was entering Uncle Cato's humble cabin. Link clung to his hand in a tempest of grief and fear. "Oh, Mars' Dix, I muss go in too. Rob'll ask fo' me. He got to tell you, an' I muss be dar to heah it."

A new suspicion darted into Mr. Dix's mind. He took Link's trembling hand. Aunt Asia and the doctor left them to enter the little bedroom together.

There, propped upon his pillow, little Rob seemed to be resting quietly. But he opened his eyes and smiled feebly as he recognized Mr. Dix and Link.

"Dear Rob," said the young painter, seating himself by the bed and taking the boy's hand, "I am so very sorry to find you thus."

"Mars' Dix," came Rob's faint voice. "I wants fo' to tell you somethin' right away. Link, heah, he wants it too. Mars' Dix, does you still b'lieve I was a-tryin' to steal dem ar glasses o' yours Crissmuss-day?"

Mr. Dix hesitated. What answer was best to make? Rob saved him the trouble of framing any by continuing, "'Cause, Mars' Dix, I didn't take 'em. Link," and he turned his eyes upon the miserable Link, who knelt weeping beside the bed—"Link, heah, he took 'em." And Rob stretched out his other hand and gently took Link's in it.

"You see, I muss jes splain it all to you now, Mars' Dix," went on Rob, eagerly, his failing voice rising with excitement, "'befo' I leaves yer. Dat ar mornin' befo' you went out a-walkin' you lef' de window open, an' Link an' I, we come by jes after you'd gone. An' so Link, he—pleeze forgib him, Mars' Dix—he got in an' took dem glasses. He's very sorry, sir, I know. I made him give 'em baek to me and elar right out, an' I'd jes a-got into dat ar window my own se'f an' stood dar onloekin' de drawer w'en you come outside. An' I was so frightened I jes tried to run away too. Does you un'stand all about it now, Mars' Dix?" the boy whispered, painfully, "an' does you forgib poor Link? You know you hain't done 'structed him half so much as you done 'structed me."

Tears were dropping down Mr. Dix's cheeks as he replied, "Indeed I will, dear Rob. But why, my poor fellow, why have you allowed yourself to be so wronged?"

"Ah, Mars' Dix," exclaimed the dying boy, a smile shining out upon his dark face that made it radiant forever in Mr. Dix's memory, "don't you remember how on Crissmuss-eve you tole us how de good Lord"—and Rob lifted his tired eyes—"bo' all de sins of his enemies? An' sholy, den, I ought to be willin' to save poor Link heah from losin' his good name—willin' to b'ar poor Link's 'sgrace until he could git courage to confess t' all to you, Mars' Dix. W'y, Link's been jes de best friend I ever had in de world. Hey, ole Link? Don't cry so, ole feller."

The miserable Link groaned aloud, with a buried face. Poor coward, what were now his feelings?

"Dear Rob," cried Mr. Dix, "how must I ask you to forgive me for thinking so ill of you?"

"Oh, Mars' Dix, don't go fer to 'lude to dat ar," answered the boy, pressing the young painter's hand. "Dat's all right—dat's all right! I knew you'd un'stand every bit w'en I done splained it to you." Rob's faint voice ceased. His strength seemed exhausted. "Good-by, Mars' Dix," he said, gently. "Good-by, dear Link! Dat One who was bo'n on Crissmuss-day fer to b'ar our sins has jes done took mine. Mars' Dix," and this last came very, very softly, "I b'lieve I shall wait fo' to wish you an' Link a merry Crissmuss—up dar." And so believing, little Rob, bending a last look of love upon teacher and friend, left them—to begin his waiting.

Long was it ere the wretched Link ceased to suffer for his cowardice and fault. What bitter memories of that last Christmas-week with poor Rob were his! Yet those very memories strengthened the boy in doing right thenceforth. Before another Christmas-day Mr. Dix had come northward, bringing Link with him. And under his kind care Link is growing up to-day in such a way that Bob will some day surely be able to wish him that "Merry Crissmuss."

GOING FOR CIDER.

BY MARY D. BRINE.

LITTLE Miss Betty is every one's girl;
There is always something for her to do;
Every one wants her, and no one can wait,
And Betty is watchful, willing, and true.

And Betty is brave? Oh yes; none can deny
She's as brave as a lion, I'd have you to know,
Until (keep the secret) when evening has come,
And after the cider poor Betty must go.

Ugh! deep is the cellar, and dark is the way,
And ghostly the shadows that flicker and glare;
What wonder that Betty stands still on the stair,
Her little heart filled with a terrible scare!

But courage, my girl, for the cellar's the same
As when in the morning for wood you must go;
All cellars at night have a terrible name,
But—it isn't the fault of the cellar, you know.

OLGA'S RIDE.

A STORY OF SWEDISH LIFE.

BY ZADEL BARNES GUSTAFSON.

I DON'T think there could be such a thing as a boy or girl who would not like the great Swedish musician, Astolf Mozart Möller, from the first moment he or she saw him. He is a very kind, simple man, with quick, sparkling black eyes, and a smile that is like water twinkling in the sun. Little people gather round him instinctively, and he is always as glad to see them as if they were his wisest and most learned friends.

He can do anything with the organ or piano. He writes and plays beautiful anthems, and solemn organ music that is like the deep breaking of waves along the sea-coast, and his music is even better known and admired in France and Germany than in Sweden.

But—what you children would like best of all—he can tell stories, and then he can go to the piano and play them—a real musical Hans Andersen! I'll tell you a little story he told to his own little girls, and afterward played it for them on the piano. He has three of them—three as pretty little Swedish girls as you could wish to see. The oldest, now ten years old, is named Mona Johanna Axelina Mathilda, and always called Mona. The next is Eva Anna Emilia Julie, eight years old, and always called Emilia. The youngest, five years old, Vega Maria Carolina, always called Vega, is, they think, the first child who was given that name in Sweden. You have, of course, all heard of the ship Vega, with which the famous Nordenskiöld made the Northeastern passage. After so many other explorers had failed, his brave and persistent Swedish scientist accomplished his great purpose.

One evening when it was getting near bed-time little Vega went up to her father, who was playing on the organ—for he has a wonderful organ that he made himself that shakes the very house with its deep melody when he plays—and pulled him by the elbow for a story. Mona and Eva sat by their pretty blue-eyed mother on the sofa, listening to the music, but quite willing to have Vega put a stop to it, for a story.

So Professor Möller wheeled around, picked up Vega with one big hand, and having set her gently on his knee, began, just as if he had been a hand-organ, and little Vega had turned the crank:

"Once upon a time there was a little girl, a very little girl, who lived in a remote village where there was very seldom anything bright or amusing going on. Little Olga thought she had a very dull time. She wanted to see the world, and teased her father to take her a-travelling. But her father was poor and too old besides, so he said:

"Na, na, my little Olga, papa can not go. But if you'll wait for Christmas-time, perhaps the Julgrisen will take you, if you're a very good little girl."

"Julgrisen! What's Julgrisen?" said Olga.

"Why, he's the little Christmas pig that comes round every Christmas-eve—the little pig that never grows old and is never killed."

"Why isn't he killed, papa?"

"Because he's always journeying, always trotting along so fast, around and around the world, that he never gets fat, and so the butchers don't want him."

"Couldn't catch 'im, p'aps," said Olga.

"Of course not," nodded her father.

"Olga sat still, thinking for a while,

"How could he take me?"

"On his back, my dear."

"Does he go all roun' the whole worl'—evvy-where's?"

"Oh yes."

OLGA SPEEDING AWAY OVER THE WORLD.

"How can he git over big osun?"

"He runs so fast he can't sink."

"Olga puckered up her forehead, and sighed, 'I'm fe-ayd he would sink, wiv me on his back.'

"Hoh, not a bit, not a bit; little girls are light."

"Then Olga's father went out to his work in the garden, and thought no more about it. But Olga remembered, and tried all summer long to be a very good little girl such as Julgrisen liked; and as Christmas came near she felt surer and surer that Julgrisen would think her good enough to take around the world with him.

"At last it was Christmas-eve, and when Olga kissed her old father at bed-time she said, 'good-by,' but the old man, who had kissed her as usual, was lighting his pipe, and didn't notice that word. Olga went to the window of her room and looked out. The moon was shining, and the stars winking away at a great rate, and there, up the hill beyond their cottage, ycs, in the middle of the road and coming like the wind over the top of the deep snow, was a little pig, sure enough. Olga opened the window; her heart was beating as fast as the tiny second hand of a watch.

"What was that on the little pig's back? A saddle—a blue and gold saddle, and tied to the pommel a soft white hood with a long warm cape to it. The little pig, whose bristles were like threads of silver, stopped right under her window.

"'Ur-rak-urrak-urrak! Come, Olga.'

"Are you Julgrisen?"

"Ya, ya. Come. Koo-wick-koo-wick. Put on the hood and hurry ur-rup, ur-rup. It's a quick ride to see the world-eruld and back by cock-crow."

"In a moment, with the warm hood tied under her chin, and the warm cape folded around her, and sitting snugly in the blue and gold saddle which fitted her exactly, Olga was speeding away over hill and valley, river and brook, on Julgrisen's silvery back.

"What did she see? Everything. Cities, houses, people, horses, dogs, boats and cars, men and women, little boys and girls, thousands and thousands of them; but her pig-pony went so fast she could not see anything well, and when she begged him to wait he simply granted:

"We stop three times; can't stop any more. If you hadn't been such a good little girl all summer long, shouldn't stop at all." And just when he had said this, he granted 'Urrak-ur-rak-ur-rak,' and stopped so suddenly it nearly tossed Olga out of the saddle.

"They were in the middle of a great city, in front of a big, handsome house, and through one of its long windows Olga saw a little girl no larger than herself in a room pretty as fairy-land and full of beautiful things—books, playthings, dolls, and an elegant dolls' house all furnished from top to bottom, and big enough for the little girl to go in, and go up and down the stairs, or sit on its little sofas and chairs. Olga had never even heard of such beautiful things. But the little girl, dressed like a princess, was stamping her feet, and kicking—yes, kicking the dolls and the dolls' house.

"Take them away!" she screamed. "I hate 'em. I'm tired of everything. Give me something new."

"Away flew Julgrisen with a scornful snuff of his round pink snout; and now it was over the ocean, and so swiftly and lightly went Julgrisen over the waves that not so much as the foam of the great green billows wetted Olga's feet. Once in the middle of the sea he came to and skipped over a smooth brown hill without stick, or stone, or bit of green on it.

"What's that?" said Olga.

"A whale," snorted Julgrisen; and by the time the whale, who had felt Julgrisen's sharp little hoofs pricking his back, got ready to spout his wrath, Julgrisen was on land again. Little villages, patches of woods, stretches of open country, more villages, and now a city again.

"Dear me! How many big towns there are in the world!" thought Olga.

"Julgrisen turned from the wide, lighted street into a narrow and very dirty lane, and stopped short as before. In front of the poorest hut Olga had ever seen, right on the ground, sat a little girl with no other clothing but a torn and dirty saek a great deal too large for her. Her legs and arms were bare, with marks of cruel beating on them.

"This little girl was playing with—not dolls or dolls' houses this time, but with three old broken clam shells, and some little round pebbles, which she took out of her mouth and filled into the wet sand in the clam shells. She was singing, too, in a merry full voice:

"Four'n'-twenty blackbirds all in a pie, Wasn't that a poaty deesh to set er fore er king!"

"'Urrak-ur-rak-ur-rak!' grunted Julgrisen, running away faster than ever, so that if any one had seen him flashing by with Olga in the little blue and gold saddle, they might have said, 'What a strange, bright-winged bird flew over the field just now!' But nobody saw or said anything of the sort, for the hood Olga wore, though she didn't know it, hid them both from every eye.

"Away and away past so many things, strange and wonderful, lovely and sad, frightful, curious, beautiful, glad, which Olga longed to see nearer. But already a little pale light was growing redder in the east, and Julgrisen went like the lightning. Then all at once, with a very soft 'Urrak,' as if afraid of waking somebody, he stopped. Where?

"In Olga's own father's room, by his bedside, where he lay tossing and talking in a troubled dream:

"The children—ya, ya—they all go away, and leave the poor old fathers and mothers to die alone. But my little Olga she is a good child. She is willing to wait; she will not have to wait long. In a little while Olga can go out to see the big world."

"I don't want to go," cried Olga, creeping into the old man's bed, and putting her arms tightly around his neck. Julgrisen, with a merry snort, had skipped off like the wind, with the blue and gold saddle and the warm white hood on his silver-shining back. Olga didn't even notice when he went. Her old father, half awake, was clasping her up to him, and rubbing his eyes.

"What! what! my little Olga! Christmas morning already! I had a bad dream, but I can't think a word of what it was now. Ya, ya! A merry Christmas. Go see thy stocking, little one. Nothing but a bit o' candy and a new silver kronor; the best thy old father could do, eh?"

"Olga smiled. She was very happy, and looked much at her father, and never said one word to him about her ride in the blue and gold saddle.

"And now," said Professor Möller, putting little Vega in her mother's lap, "here's the way Olga went on her pig-pony." He sat down at the piano, and laying his hands, with their long, quick fingers, over the keys, played, oh, so fast! and yet every note was clear. You could hear the pig grunting in the bass, squeaking again in the treble, and then scampering away on the light, crisp, lively keys, so that the piano really told the story over again. And this was the music that Professor Möller played:

HOW TO SKATE.

A SHARP frost has set in, and the weather-wise say it will last a long time. The large pond in the Park is already frozen hard as steel, and young men and maidens, boys and girls, are all bent upon making the most of the opportunity. Watching them from the bank, and envying their swift, stealthy motion, and a resolution is taken to join at no distant date the merry throng. But we are tyros in the art, and on its very threshold are met by a difficulty—that of choosing the articles necessary for its enjoyment. What to buy?—that is the question. There would seem to be almost as much variety in skates as there is in skaters.

"Within our breast a noble ardor burns,"

Skates made with the best steel are, of course, proportionately expensive; but it is very requisite that the steel should be good. Choose skates that are exactly the length of the foot, not those which have the iron cut off an inch within the heel. The iron should extend backward to the extreme edge of the heel, and the corners should be rounded. Pay attention to the depth of the blade, for it is desirable that the foot be as near the ice as possible, and yet necessary to have it so high that, in leaning over, the edge of the sole should not touch the ice. As to the fastenings, there are many modes equally good; the main point is to see that the skate is so perfectly secured to the foot that it can not move in the least, and the importance of this can not be overrated. Any fastening that aids in supporting the ankle is good.

Now let us suppose that you have donned your skates. At first you will have enough to do to prevent them running away with you. So begin by attempting, as gently as you like, and with the very shortest steps you can take, to walk upon the ice. After a little practice you will find yourself instinctively striking out a little. It is then time to learn the first movement, which is called forward striking, or running, and is done in this way: The toes are turned out so that the feet are nearly at right angles with each other; the position is important, because it is only thus you can obtain pushing power. From that position each foot is lifted alternately, and set down on the inside edge, when it immediately slides forward, all the more readily since the other foot (held at right angles) can bear against the ice without sliding. Perfect regularity in stepping from foot to foot is essential.

When you can time your strokes evenly, and gain the necessary impetus, you may occasionally vary the proceedings by bringing your feet together, and running in that way for a considerable distance. In this, which is called the "serpentine," the feet are placed parallel, instead of at right angles, and they remain parallel throughout the movement. If you would learn it easily, take a few strokes forward to gain force, and then bring the feet parallel, but well apart, keeping the knees bent, and while going along in this manner try to make the line wavy by turning both feet at once (without lifting them) in the same direction, say to the right, swinging the body with them; then both to the left, with a swing to that side, and so on.

The common backward motion on both feet is exactly the same as the "serpentine," except that it is backward instead of forward. To learn this backward motion take a few strokes forward, then spin quite round, and while the impetus lasts turn the right toe inward, and push yourself back from that foot; then turn the left one inward, pushing from it, and so on alternately, leaning forward all the time. Practice will make it easy not merely to keep up the first impetus, but to increase it, and even to begin it without any forward strokes.

How delightful is the swift motion! Exulting in your growing confidence and in the progress already made, and feeling that you are at length attaining your wish and becoming indeed a skater, it is crushing at this juncture to be told by some friendly proficient that you are only at the very threshold of the art, since you know nothing yet of moving on the outside edge. Moving on the outside edge! It sounds alarming.

Take courage; it is really not so formidable as it seems, and, moreover, there are few difficulties, you know, which do not vanish before patience and perseverance.

The first thing you have to do in order to get yourself on the outside edge is to endeavor to skate round in a circle, as large a circle as you please at first, but to be gradually reduced as you improve. As you lift each foot for the next stroke try to cross it in front quite over the other and set it down; then the other in front of that, and so on alternately. Now, as the iron always circles toward the side on which it rests, it follows that the foot nearest the inside of the circle must work on the outside edge of the iron. Consequently your object will be to dwell as long as you can on that foot, and as briefly as you can on the other, which works on the inside edge. The foot that is behind must be kept behind until it is to be set down in front; it must not be carried in the air in front for an instant.

It is scarcely necessary to remind you again that the left foot must be exercised equally with the right. In fact, it is a good rule in this and all figures to give the left double practice. So after skating with the right foot to the inside of the circle, go off in the opposite direction, and make a circle with the left foot to the inside of it. Some difficulty is sure to be experienced in putting down the foot quite across the other; but diligent practice will soon repay you with the discovery that you can dwell for a few yards on the outside edge, and perhaps—keeping the raised foot well back in the mean time—nearly complete the circle.

After this is accomplished you may congratulate yourself on having become a skillful skater. If you wish to learn figure skating, however, you have much work still before you. The key to it is being able to turn rapidly from one edge of the skate to the other, but long and arduous practice will be required before the graceful "grapevine" twist and other figures can be successfully accomplished. Written directions will avail you little. Figure skating can only be learned by watching some one proficient in the art, and imitating his movements with care and patience.

MR. THOMPSON AND THE HORNED TOAD.

BY ALLAN FORMAN.

MR. THOMPSON sat in his office trying to write an essay. He had just returned from California, and the literary society of which he was a member had asked him to write about "The Effect of Mongolian Immigration upon California." He had just written at the top of a large sheet of foolscap "The Mongols"; then he scratched it out, and substituted "The Chinese"; then he added "are"—"The Chinese are." Then he stopped. "What are the Chinese?" he murmured. "I believe I haven't a single idea in my head."

"That's so," piped a saucy little voice.

Mr. Thompson looked down, and saw on the floor near his feet one of the horned toads he had brought from San Francisco with him. "That's so," it repeated.

Mr. Thompson was provoked. "I suppose you think you have an idea," he snapped. "You impudent little reptile, you must have a great many ideas!" he added, sarcastically.

"I have," replied the toad, calmly, "a great many ideas. I have often thought of having you write them out, and getting them printed. Do you suppose that if I should tell a story, and send it to the YOUNG PEOPLE with my picture, they would print it?"

"I don't know," said Mr. Thompson, doubtfully; "you might try." Then he added, with an eye to the main chance, "I'll copy your story, and if they take it, we'll divide."

"All right; but, by-the-way, I don't see why they call us toads. We are really lizards. We don't hop like a toad, but run like a lizard; and we have tails. Toads don't have tails. But I'd rather be called a toad than by my real name, that is as long as I am—Phrynosoma. How's that for a name? The old monks had a better name for us. They called us some Spanish name that meant Toad-lizard; called us toad 'cause we are speckled like a toad, and lizard 'cause we run, and have tails. When they first saw us they were awfully frightened. They thought that we must be very poisonous; so they sprinkled holy water around, and prayed for us to go, but we knew better, and staid. They soon found out that we did no harm, and caught the flies and bugs off their plants; so they let us stay.

"My grandfather lived for a great many years in the garden of the Mission Dolores. That's in San Francisco, you know. It was built there long before San Francisco was any city; founded in 1776, my grandfather used to tell me. There was not a white man in the place then except the monks. After a while people came in ships worth as much as a dollar a piece, or ten dollars a dozen, and a friend of mine who lived in the garden of a restaurant used to tell me how the miners would come to town with a bag full of gold-dust, and order a dozen boiled eggs for breakfast. Eastern merchants, hearing of the scarcity of provisions, sent at one time ship-loads of potatoes, at another tobacco, and for the time the supply was so much greater than the demand that tons of the potatoes were dumped into the bay because they would not bring enough to pay for boating them ashore, and full cases of tobacco were used to pave the muddy street crossings.

"Thousands who came to the mines could not find accommodations in houses, and slept in tents, and rolled in their blankets on the bare ground. We used to have lots of fun then. We would crawl under the miners' blankets to keep warm, and when they felt our rough backs they would jump and yell, for many of them were as afraid of us as they were of tarantulas or scorpions. At last they got used to us, and many of them did not mind having us around, only they did not like to have us crawl over them. See here, now," he added, interrupting himself, "are you putting this all down? I want you to write what I have told you to the paper."

"I'm writing as fast as you talk," answered Mr. Thompson.

"That's right," replied the toad, with a satisfied air. "Tell them that I am interested in papers. I have caught flies off this pile for more than a week; great place for flies when the sun shines. And tell them that I know of a place right in the city of San Francisco where there is lots of gold, piles upon piles."

"Where?" inquired Mr. Thompson, excitedly.

"Will you have my picture taken so as to go with what you have written?" said the toad, with a cunning twinkle in his black eyes.

"Yes," answered Mr. Thompson, eagerly.

"Honest? Will you promise?" insisted the toad.

"Yes, yes. Where is the gold?"

"In the Mint," answered the toad, with a sly laugh.

This provoked Mr. Thompson. To be taken in and made fun of by any one is bad enough, even if the joker be your equal; but to have a horned toad get the best of you, as this one had done, is doubly humiliating.

"You miserable little cheat!" shouted Mr. Thompson,

"I'll pay you for this!" and as I came into the room he was shaking his fist at the toad, which was perched upon a pile of papers, calmly catching flies, and winking and blinking in the sunlight as if it had never provoked the wrath of its angust master. When Mr. Thompson saw me he stopped scolding the toad, and told me the story as I have told it to you.

"You were asleep," I ventured to suggest. "I heard you snore as I came up the stairs."

"Asleep!" cried Mr. Thompson, in high dudgeon. "Asleep! Did I write this while I was asleep?" and he laid his hand on a sheet of foolscap. As he glanced at it he saw "The Chinese are—" The rest of the page was blank. He looked confused for a moment; then picking up a history of California, he looked it over rapidly, and exclaimed, "I don't care if I did dream it; I dreamed the truth."

Mr. Thompson told me the other day that though he had had the toad's photograph taken, it obstinately refused to speak, and only used his nimble little tongue to catch flies with.

THE HORNED TOAD.

from New York and Boston to buy hides and tallow, for the monks owned a great many cattle, and there were some Spanish farmers in the San Joaquin Valley. That was in 1802, and I have heard my grandfather say that there were not more than eight hundred people in San Francisco.

"The Yankee traders carried back word to the East of the delightful climate and fruitful soil, and a few families emigrated. Still, the increase of population was very slow, and in 1848 there were only about fifteen hundred people in the town. Suddenly in June of 1848 everybody left, and there were only about a hundred women and children remaining. I was very small then, and I asked grandfather the reason. 'Gold, my dear boy, gold,' he answered. Then he went on to tell me that Captain Sutter had discovered gold at Coloma, on the American River, January 19, 1848, and that all the people had left the city to see if they couldn't find some too.

"But the city wasn't deserted long, for people began to flock in from the East and from Europe. Whaling ships would stop for water and provisions; the crew would hear of the gold, and would desert; and in '49 and '50 even the Chinese began to come to do servants' work. Money was plenty then, and provisions were high. Hens' eggs were

LET old Santa Claus come in,
 With his grisly bearded chin,
 And his wondrous packs of toys
 For good little girls and boys.

What care we for ice or snow,
 Or how cold the wind may blow?
 Let the tempest beat and roar;
 We hope it can not pass the door.
 By the fireside, warm and bright,
 We will merry be to-night,
 For the Christmas Child is near,
 Bringing pleasure and good cheer!

WHAT SANTA CLAUS BROUGHT.

OUR POST-OFFICE BOX.

A VERY few days, and we must say good-by to 1882. It is almost gone. A Happy New-Year to you, boys and girls! We will all try together to fill 1883 with sunshine by being diligent, as faithful, as kind, and as cheerful as we can. Shall I tell you, children, the secret of a happy year? It is to make each day delightful as it comes along. It depends upon ourselves far more than on other people whether we are happy or miserable. I wish my children would remember day by day to take their tasks and duties merrily, and never to put off to-day's work until to-morrow. Will you keep this in mind, little women and little men?

BOSTON, MASSACHUSETTS.

I am the eldest sister of a little boy eight years old, who has taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE for two months, and who enjoys every bit of it—stories, pictures, poetry, and all, but especially the Post-office Box. He would like to send you a letter very much, but does not write well enough yet. He thinks, as he has not been at school long, and only left off printing a little while ago. But as he is anxious to send some contribution as well as all the other little boys and girls from so many far-off cities, and as you have promised to write for him, and ask you to tell them about a real little dog that he knows, and then put his name at the end of the story, so that he can see it with his own eyes in print.

This little dog has only lately arrived in America. He was born in a great palace in Genoa, Italy, about four years ago, and is an Italian poodle. He is called King, and is as dainty a little creature as was the white cat Princess in the fairy tale, for he is also pure white, from his moist black nose, as pointed almost as that of a fox, to his long tail, which has so much silky white hair upon it that it droops heavily on the ground, like a branch of a tree when the snow lies thick on it. His hair is fine and soft and wavy, shining like satin, and of a pure white color, his eyes large and brown, and oh! so wise, and his little white paws look as if they could not step upon anything rougher than velvet.

This little fellow has travelled a great deal in Europe with his master, and his travelling carriage was a large straw luncheon basket about twelve inches long, with two strong handles. This basket was also his bed, during the night, and I have often seen the little fellow stow himself away in it, and a pretty sight it is. His master holds up the cover, and says, "Now, my little King, it's bedtime," and then marches King, gravely and obediently, to the edge of the basket, puts first his two fore-paws into it, then his two hind ones, then lays his head upon the fore-paws and curls up his tail—and then he is just a round white ball, and nothing is to be seen but the glitter of two black dots of eyes in the middle of it. Then his master shuts down the cover, fastens it with a little clasp, and then never stirs until morning. The straw of which this basket is made is very coarse, and there is enough air inside, and light too, to prevent him from feeling shut up in the dark.

He is a very knowing little fellow, and once, when in a strange place in the country, his master shut him up in the house one Saturday morning, and walked off to church. He thought that King was securely fixed until he should return to let him out; but when he had walked about two miles he heard a little fainting noise behind him, and there was the rogue running along in the dusty road, looking as if he meant to come too. He had followed his master all that distance in a strange country, and must have run very fast, as he was very tired and hot, and was not able to take off his white fur coat either, even although it was in the summer-time. HUMPHREY T. N.

What a darling little dog, and what a beauty! But I lost the children's eyes shine as they read the pretty description so kindly written for Humphrey by his eldier sister. Do you know, I think those little boys very fortunate who have such affectionate sisters. By-and-by our little mau will write for himself.

Now, little housekeepers, here you are bright and early! I could not tell you, if I tried for a month, how pleased I am that so many of you have sent your names in as members of the Sociable. Some of you want to know about rules, and some inquire who is the President. I think you will have to elect me to be both President and Secretary, and I will promise to fill both offices as well as I possibly can. We will have no rigid rules. It will, however, be a good plan for you to form little cooking clubs, if your mother do not object, and when you meet you may send me a report. Please send any specially good receipts which you have tried and found satisfactory.

On the other day I saw a little cook descend to the kitchen with her hair flying wild, and no apron over her pretty dress. She was intending to make cake in that rig! Did you ever hear of such a thing? I told her to tuck her hair up into a knot, fastening it securely, so that no loose ends should escape, and to tie on a nice big kitchen apron, which she did very pleasantly.

A lady never covers herself with flour when she is cooking, never spoons herself with heaps of unnecessary spoons and dishes, and never wastes the slightest scrap. I wish my small housekeepers to learn to work like ladies. So they must be tidy and neat and economical.

It is a good rule to wash and put away each dish as soon as you are done with it. If any older person in the house must be consulted—your mamma, Aunt Libbie, or Bridget—try to manage your cooking so that it will not interfere with their convenience.

I have been wondering what I should teach you to make this week. Will you forgive me, dears, if, instead of anything very rich or difficult, I give you simply a receipt for something homely and wholesome? It will tell you of three methods of making it for breakfast.

OATMEAL PORRIDGE.—Take a full cup of oatmeal, and cover it with a quart of cold water; let it stand all night, and in the morning add a teaspoonful of salt, and let it boil one hour.

This is Mother B's way, and is a very good one. Mrs. Henderson, in her Practical Cooking and Dinner-Giving, says:

"Take a heaping cup of oatmeal and a teaspoonful of salt, to a quart of boiling water, and boil the porridge two tiny minutes; sprinkle the meal with one hand into the salted and boiling water, and stir as little as possible."

Now I will tell you how to make it à la Princesse. I always use a double boiler for gruels, farina, etc., so that I have no need to stir the porridge. I sift and look carefully over my meal in the morning, directly after breakfast. Then I pop my cup of meal into my quart of cold water, and sprinkle in my silver tea-spoonful of salt, and I set my porridge on the coldest part of the range, and let it stand and simmer and simmer for hours. Nothing but salt oatmeal like I describe is used. About noon I set it off, and next morning, after the fire is lighted, it is put on again, and comes steaming hot on the table for breakfast. Eaten with cream, this porridge is delicious.

JERSEY CITY, NEW JERSEY.

I am twelve years old, and have taken your paper for a long time, and like it very much. I send you letters to Santa Claus, written by my little sister. Perhaps you will think it good enough to print.

ROBERT D.

Although this number of YOUNG PEOPLE will appear one day later than Christmas, I publish this bright little rhymed letter, so that if the good old saint forgot or omitted any of the things Corn so ardently desired, he may still bring them to her before the holidays are over:

Dear Santa Claus,
In your rounds I wish you'd pause
Over the chimney of 135,
And stop there, if you're alive;
Leave me a bag of writing-paper large,
And a pair of shoes for my doll named Marge;
A book I would like on your list to set,
The name of it is Fred Bradford's Debt.
I want a pair of Cissel, Pratt, Galpin, & Co.'s, 739 Broadway O.

I want a little toy caster,
Made of tin, and not of plaster,
Leave me a tin of ink and inkball;
I had one once before in my life,
But I lost it right away,
So bring it this time in your sleigh.
I want my dolls to have something nice,
Even if it's no more than some little toy mice.
Alice, my oldest, a new dress needs;
Her old one is through with its kindly deeds.
Marge wants a good warm cloak,
Only not black, and quite a long sacque,
I have the fur to trim it for her,
Then very nice tails I know,
And your wife can't let it go;
I'll put the box up the flue,
And if any one gets it 'twill be you.
But what to get for Emma
I am sure I don't know,
She is such a particular child
She nearly drives me wild.
So get what you think best,
I want my dolls to be all test,
Otis (the baby) wants a rattle,
If he don't get it I'll have a hattle.
And Nettie—what was it she said?
Oh, I know, never heard of,
And I want an inkstand, a box, and a pen,
Not a quill from a hen,
But a gold one that shuts up and is gone,
So I can write letters in the early morn.
Now, Santa, please send these things on Christmas-eve,
No sign you must leave,
But crawling down slow, take a good look,
And leave the name of their or book
Some Christmas soon I hope you'll see
Your little friend,
CORA D.

GRINSELL, IOWA.

I noticed the letter from "One of your Older Readers," and thought that perhaps you would like to have me send you directions for making a pair of slippers.

Take a piece of thirteen stitches, and when you go back, crochet two stitches in the same place in the middle. Keep on doing this until it is thirty-eight stitches wide. Then beginning at the end, crochet eleven stitches, and then go back and forth eleven times, or until you have six ridges; then widen one stitch every time at the top until you have sixteen stitches; then go back and forth eleven times, and then narrow one stitch every time at the top until you have eleven stitches. Go back and forth eleven times, and then crochet it to the front of the slipper. Crochet around the top of the slipper in scallop, giving the slipper to the sole loosely around the heel and toe, stretching it a little over the instep. Then run an elastic around the top of the slipper and hold it tight.

The cork soles may be obtained at any shoe store for eight or ten cents. The directions given are for a No. 3 sole.

MYRTA L.

Crocheted slippers are a very acceptable present to any one, but they are particularly nice for a lady to wear in her dressing-room, for an invalid, or for any one who is watching with the sick at night. It is a pity that we could not have published this in time for Christmas gift-makers, but somebody may still like to crochet a pair of slippers for a birthday present.

WASHINGTON, IOWA.

As other little girls were writing you letters of things that were happening at their homes, I thought I would tell you of a mouse that seemed fond of music. A neighbor of ours was very much bothered by a little mouse which was too smart to get out of the house. One day a gentleman in the house was playing a violin, when out came Mr. Mouse and danced all over the room, and seemed so taken up with the music that he could not be frightened. I took The Pussy and your paper, and like them both so very much! I would like to have my papers of this year bound. How much would it cost me? Can I put them in the covers myself?
JENNIE S.

Messrs. Harper & Brothers will send you a beautiful cover by mail on receipt of fifty cents, but you will have to get a book binder to put it on for you. The price of The Child's Book of Nature is one dollar.

WALNUT HILLS, OHIO.

I thought I would write you a few lines and ask you if among the little friends who read HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE you know any who are deaf and dumb? I am not dumb, but I am so deaf that all my friends have to talk on their hands, or in the deaf-mute language. I have been deaf three and a half years, caused by a very much of a cold. Do you think I have to stay home always, now that I am deaf? No, indeed; I go to school every day in town, on Ninth Street. November 22 was the nineteenth anniversary of my father and mother's wedding day. We have four boys and three girls in our family. I began taking Young People at the ninth chapter of "Toby Tyler," and liked it very much. The teacher and the teacher reads the stories out of them every Friday afternoon by signs. You would laugh till the tears came in your eyes to see her. I am four years old. Who christens comes. I don't wish you a merry one. Good-by, dear kind Post-mistress. L. McN.

It is a great misfortune to be deaf, and it shuts you out from hearing many sweet sounds. But it also prevents you from listening to quarrelling or to silly conversation; and I see that you have a cheerful spirit, and make the best of things day by day. Perhaps you may recover your lost hearing in time. I am so pleased that YOUNG PEOPLE delights you so much. Your letter made me think of a favorite Bible verse, "A merry heart hath a continual feast."

DEAN YOUNG PEOPLE.—We are the family of a very busy doctor, but we all take time to read YOUNG PEOPLE. The boys are often annoyed at other papers copying the stories from their paper. They amuse themselves by guessing which of the Young People's sketches will be in our other weekly papers. I do not need to give any praise to the writers for your paper, for they are all good. Mrs. O. B. CHUMBAKER.

Accept our thanks for your graceful words of commendation. The quotations which vex your eyes may be a compliment to you, and we are always pleased to have our bright and sparkling articles widely copied, if due credit is given to HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE.

CENTREVILLE, INDIANA.
My charity is pined, Joe. I think he is a canary-bird. I have two pets, a rooster and a canary-bird. My canary is named Joe. I think he is the prettiest bird I ever saw, and I also think he is about as smart a bird as I have yet heard of. He knows me as far as he can see me. When I come home from school he begins to call me. I am afraid he will never sing again very well; last summer he spoiled his voice by singing so loud and so much that now, when he goes to sing out loud, he breaks down. His rooster is what is called a game-cock. He is red and black in color. I call him Pet. I want to tell you about a hen we had last year. She was coal black all over, and she did not have a white spot on her. But this summer she shed her feathers, she turned a purplish white; her feet, legs, and bill, which were formerly black, are now white. In this letter I send you a bit of a fuchsia. You will notice it has a bud out of the side of it. I never saw anything like it before—did you? B. J. L.

No, I never saw any fuchsia precisely like this. Thank you for sending it. I hope your birdie may recover his voice.

MARION, ILLINOIS.
I thought I would write to YOUNG PEOPLE and give a short account of my journey to Chattanooga. As little girls do not travel alone, my aunt was with me. I went to Slippery Rock in a carriage. I played with two little girls in the paper takes YOUNG PEOPLE for them. We made a little pond, and caught some minnows to put in it and hoped they would remain there, but they did not. They ran all away. I don't like to say good-by to my fish. I let them with the hope of fishing in the Allegheny with a thread and bent pin or a small hook. I visited the Pennsylvania Grounds, Grand Rapids, and saw some very large fish. They were fed with chopped meat, which was thrown upon the surface of the water, and they would swim so swiftly that the water seemed to boil as they caught the morsels and dived out of sight. I don't like this fish story, hoping that Santa Claus will bring me YOUNG PEOPLE until I am old enough to read HARPER'S MAGAZINE. MILLIE.

CHICAGO, ILLINOIS.
I am a hoy eleven years old, and my home is in Chicago. We spent last winter in San Antonio, Texas. It is a very queer old place. A great many Spanish Mexicans, Germans, and colored people live there. The streets are very narrow and crooked, but there are plazas, or large squares, where the people sell wood and hay. At about five o'clock in the morning, the Mexicans sell all kinds of Mexican goods. It looks very funny to see people taking their meals out of doors by lamp-light. They have many kinds of fruit, and vegetables, and early to get meat, fish, and vegetables, and a mile from the city are three or four beautiful springs bubbling out of the lime-stone rock, which is the Rio River. About three miles from town is another spring, which forms the San Antonio River. There is a government depot, where the supplies are kept for the other soldiers, and the soldiers, both infantry and cavalry stationed there. There are many objects of interest in San Antonio, among them the Alamo, on the Alamo Plaza. It is an old stone building, in which the hundred Texan soldiers defended themselves against seven thousand Mexicans. Colonel Bowie and Davy Crockett were killed there, and of all the people in the Alamo only one woman and her baby were saved.

Visitors always go to see the missions. They are the ruins of churches built by the Franciscans for the conversion of the Indians, about four hundred years ago. They are about two miles from town, is still in good condition, but service has not been held there since the close of the Mexican war. The second one, two miles farther, is a much finer one, but not in such good repair. Service is held in one room for the Mexicans who live around there. This line of missions extended from the city of Mexico to San Francisco, and east to San Antonio.

We spent two years in Colorado, and I know what a bucking broncho is, and a bucking burro too.

I have a little sister Bertha, who says many funny things. She hurt her neck one day, and she said, "I sprained my ankle up by my shoulder."

I hope you will print my letter, as it is my hope. EWIN C. R.

ABEVELLE, SOUTH CAROLINA.
I thank you, and all who help to make YOUNG PEOPLE, for the nice paper we enjoy. We have been subscribers for three years, and have had many pleasant hours reading or listening to the stories and letters. I am a boy nine years old. I have a sister older and a brother younger than myself. We live in the land of cotton, and George and I had a cotton patch this year. We had hard times in Christmas holiday season, but after it was sold we had money enough to buy a nice saddle and bridle. I ride on grandpa's horse; for we live with grandpa and grandma. I have many little cows, with whom I like to play and play. I like to work with my pigs. I have seven pigs and two goats, but the goats are so wild that they run away from me when I go into the woods. Christmas was a very sad time for me, not wish for many things—only plenty of fire-crackers. My school is closed now, but I will be ready for study when it opens again. I like short lessons. The Bostonians call this kind of grandpa, who says, "Be steady boys." J. M. C.

WARWICK, RHODE ISLAND.
As you so seldom have a letter from "Little Rhody," I think I will write to you. YOUNG PEOPLE is my favorite paper, and I like the Post-office Box the best part of it. I like the stories too, and the puzzles. I live in the country, go to school, and take music lessons, but still have time to be out-doors. I am eleven years old, can feed and water the horse, harness and hitch up. I get the eggs every night. I have a dog and a big cat who will kiss me at any time. He sleeps with me, and is as good as a blanket. Mother once had a cat that was great hunter. One day she brought in a little gray squirrel, and put him down on the sitting room floor, when he ran up my aunt's dress, and perched himself on her shoulder, out of passy's reach. She carried him out in the meadow, and he scampered off in the grass. We all send love to you. Good-by. FRED J. W.

Tell Marie M. to rub her cat's throat and breast with castor-oil once or twice a day, and if it has choking spells, force a little into its mouth. I cured two cats that way. E. McG.

If Marie's cat still coughs, she may try the above treatment.

SEWISKEY, PENNSYLVANIA.
I wish to tell you about a club of children that meets here once a week, and has a very good time. There are fourteen members. It is called the Wide-awake Club, because we are all lively. We play games. I will mention some of them: "Grandmother's Questions," Dr. Felt's "Gueses," "Authors," "Picture Gallery," and many others. I am eleven years old, and my sister Marian is nine, and my brother Freddie is almost thirteen. Our papa has brought YOUNG PEOPLE home for us every week since it was first published, and we have a great pile of papers. You will probably hear from the members of our club on one of our meetings. We meet on Thursdays. Our aunt started it, and besides having fun, we manage to learn a good many things. ZINA M.

The club might send me a Round Robin. Do you know what a Round Robin is? It is a letter in which the whole fourteen may write by turns. I will be looking out for it.

So many of your letters crowded in while the Christmas Number, with its beautiful stories and pictures, was crowding Our Post-office Box out that I must make a little paragraph for some of the contributors whose letters I can not find room for: Lulu S., your cat, Jimmie G., is the first cat I ever heard of that died of grief.—No, dear, I do not at all like the new style of spelling, for the reason that if it be adopted, we will lose the idea of the derivation of our words. The English language, you know, is the child of other and older languages in part, and a great many words are real pictures, which will be spoiled if their spelling shall be changed.—Bessie G., your little rhyme is very clever.

A (ISLAND OF THE EAST INDIES) STORY.

WE (lake in Ireland)s were not at all a rich family, but on this particular (mountains in New Guinea) (island of the East Indies) day you could not have found in the whole town three happier children than (river in Asia), (town in Turkey), and I.

We went to (town in New Zealand) in the morning, and the minister preached a long sermon on (river in British Columbia) and (bay in Labrador), and told us the legend of the (island off the coast of England) (one of the Leeward Islands). Occasionally our thoughts would wander to the presents we had just received. Mine was a lovely (island of Malaysia) fan, (town in Turkey)'s, a necklace of (cape of Madagascar) beads, with a pendant in which was imbedded a tiny (river in Anstria), and (river in Asia)'s, a (one of the Caroline Islands) new sled.

Our cousins (island off the coast of Ireland) and (river in British Columbia) (city in Massachusetts) came to spend the evening with us, and helped us decorate the rooms with (mountain in Vermont). Some one expressed a (river in Patagonia) to try the sled; so as it was (lake in California), bright moonlight, we put on (town in England) jackets, and sallied forth into the (river in France) that is behind the house. The (mountains in Africa) shone like (mountains in Africa), and the coast was so slippery that we met with numerous (river in Oregon); but we were too (headland on Martha's Vineyard) a (town in England) to mind trifles; mishaps did not make us (cape of Africa), and we braved the (cape of Alaska) (river in Wyoming) for several hours, until at last a terrific blast caused us to make a (town in Ireland) for the house, and a (river in Turkey) to bed soon followed.

THE CUNNING DONKEY.

AT a gentleman's seat in Ireland the cows used to escape daily out of their own field, but as the gate was always found shut and fastened, no one knew how this happened. But there were the cows, nevertheless, daily invading the corn fields, instead of grazing in their own meadow. So at last a boy was set to watch, and he found that they regularly called up the donkey at a certain hour, who lifted the latch of the gate, let them through, and then, after carefully putting the latch down in its place, returned to his own pasture. Animals, notwithstanding that they are unable to talk with us, must have some means of communicating their desires and thoughts to one another, or the above true incident could not have occurred.

Jack thinks he will hang up his stocking.

And as usual, hangs it near the chimney.

Goes to bed early, feeling somewhat excited.

Drowns his anxiety in peaceful slumber.

He hears a noise.

Gets up and looks at his stocking.

There is something in it.

Good gracious! it's a mouse.

Exciting chase around the room.

It hides behind the wash-stand.

Thinks he has got him now.

But gets badly wet instead.

Goes back to bed in a very bad humor.

Wakes up in the morning and wonders if it all happened.

No, it was nothing but a dream. He finds his stocking full.

FLORIO AND FLORELLA.

A Christmas Fairy Tale.

BY MRS. W. J. HAYS.

I.

THERE was once a child named Florio who had neither father nor mother, uncle nor aunt, and so it happened that he was adopted by a witch. He might have had a fairy godmother if anybody had remembered to ask one to the christening, but as no one took enough interest in him for that, it was neglected, and poor Florio became the property of a hideous, hateful old hag, who was never so happy as when she was making trouble. Of course Florio was compelled to do her bidding. Naturally inoffensive and gentle, he was continually obliged to do violence to his conscience by obeying the witch.

For instance, the witch—who was known by the name of Fussoldfuri, and lived in a miserable cavern when she was not travelling about—had great delight in spoiling any one's innocent amusement or upsetting his or her plans; she even started children quarrelling and disputing; indeed, she found this one of her particular pastimes, when she was not engaged in annoying older people.

It was among children that she made Florio particularly useful—so useful, in fact, that he never had a friend. If she found him amusing himself with a happy little company, she made him do some selfish or ugly thing which at once put a stop to all the cheerfulness; and often, before he knew what he was about, he would be struggling and kicking and screaming and flinging himself upon one or the other of his comrades, while Fuss—as we must call her for convenience—laughed till she shook, and tears of joy ran down her ugly leathery cheeks. Then Florio, ashamed, miserable, and unhappy, would creep off to a corner and weep as if his little heart would break.

It was after one of these dreadful occurrences one day that Florio, hiding in the woods, heard a strange rustling among the bushes. He was so used to wandering about after old Fuss, and living anyhow and anywhere, that he was more like a little creature of the woods himself than anything else, and it took a good deal to frighten him. Patter, patter, patter it went. What could it be? He peered in and out and under the bush, but he saw nothing except a nest full of little blue eggs, which he would not touch for the world; no, he knew too well how pleased old Fuss would be to have him disturb this little bird family, and he concealed it again. As he did so, the sweetest little voice said,

"That's right."

Florio jumped as if a wasp had stung him.

"Yes," continued the voice, "you couldn't have pleased me better."

"But who are you?—where are you?" asked Florio, to whom kind words were unknown, but on whom they had the effect of making his heart beat with a new and strange emotion.

"I can not tell you anything just now very well, but if you will meet me here in the moonlight this evening, Florio, I will be glad to see you."

"To-night?" questioned the boy, who did not like the darkness.

"Yes, child; have no fear. I am the fairy Florella. Adieu."

The days were generally too short for Florio, who hated the nights in the dismal cavern, when Fuss pulled his hair, and pinched his nose, and tripped him up over her staff by way of amusement; but now he longed for the night to come, although it must be confessed he was not without fears. Fuss was uglier than usual, but this did not affect Florio as it might have done had he not had something unusual and exciting to think of. Soon as the witch tumbled down on her heap of straw for the night, and showed by her heavy breathing and frightful snoring that she was asleep, Florio crept softly from the cavern.

It was a beautiful evening, soft and balmy, but to leave the bright roadway and enter the dark woods demanded some courage, for ill usage had rendered Florio timid in the darkness, though, as I have said before, he did not fear wild animals. Indeed, when a young fox came cautiously out of the thicket, and glanced about, Florio approached near enough to touch his bushy tail.

It was somewhat difficult to find the precise spot of the day's occurrence, but he noticed that whenever he went in a wrong direction a crowd of fire-flies would start up and show him the right way, and thus he was enabled to find the sweet-brier bush. As he reached it he heard the same patter, patter, patter on the leaves of the bush, and looking up, he saw what caused the sound. Troops of tiny creatures were fluttering from leaf to leaf. Each had little silvery wings like butterflies, and each carried sprigs and sprays of blossoms, while following them came elves of most grotesque appearance, bearing platters of fruit and wild honey. In a moment they had formed a circle on the grass, and danced about, singing as they went, while the elves arranged a feast.

When all was in readiness, one—of largest size and of apparent superiority—beckoned to Florio to come near. Afraid to disobey, yet equally fearful of treading upon them, Florio approached, and in a moment he was surrounded, and with gentle pressure obliged to take their various offerings. One gave him grape-leaf cups and baskets woven of perfumed grasses, another filled them with honey and fruit, while all laughed to see what appeared to them the enormous quantities necessary for one so large.

"Florio, you have done well to obey me," said the same sweet voice he had heard in the daytime. "This, added to your consideration for the bird's-nest to-day, has pleased me, and your evident misery has aroused my compassion. Fussoldfuri is an enemy of ours, and I never expected to see one trained by her show a pitiful or kind spirit. It proves to me that there must be something in you worth cultivating. Are you willing to be guided by me? Do you want to leave old Fuss, and become one of my servants?"

Florio was not quite sure that he fully understood all that was said to him, but he was delighted at the idea of leaving Fuss, and said so.

Florella smiled upon him, and continued: "It may not be so easy as you imagine; those who serve me have to stand a test of faithfulness, energy, and courage. Our life seems one of careless mirth, but it is not so. We, of course, are happy, and enjoy ourselves; but we have many duties, and are not altogether free, as would be supposed. I am at the head of this little band. We are Flower Fairies, consins to the Wind Fairies and Herb Elves. I am familiar with every wild flower that grows, and I am now desirous of getting for our forests some seeds of the Swiss Edelweiss. If you can procure them for me I will reward you handsomely."

Poor Florio heard this speech with consternation. He had never in all his life known one flower from another. Where, when, how, could he go? And if he went, how should he escape Fuss? These thoughts made the poor child falter and grow pale. It would have been so much easier to say he could not do it, and have done with the matter, but the remembrance of his horrible slavery, and the thought that Florella believed in his ability to aid her, stimulated his courage, and he said:

"I know nothing of flowers, dear lady; I am a very ignorant fellow; but if you will direct me and tell me where to go, I am ready to try."

"Spoken well, my lad," said the fairy. "I do not expect impossibilities. We are the only ones who can do what seems impossible to man. The Edelweiss is a mountain flower, growing on the highest Alps, and many a man has lost his life striving to pluck it for one he loved. It is much esteemed for its rarity, and because of the often great difficulty of getting it. See; here is a dried blossom;" and she put in his hand a small white flower like an immortelle, though Florio thought that it looked as if it were made of flannel, it was so soft and woolly.

"This you must keep; see, I will put it in this case of birch bark, and you had better place it in your bosom. Now I must tell you about the journey. To leave Fussoldfuri immediately might make the task more difficult.

She is about starting for the mountains, and if you keep with her awhile longer you will be able to find the place you need much sooner than if you went alone. But when you reach Geneva you are to leave her. Can you remember that?"

"Oh yes, the rhyme will help me:

"When I get to Geneva,
Then I must leave her."

"Exactly, and then you are to seek the Edelweiss, and when you have gathered the seeds you are to meet me here in this forest, whether it be winter or whether it be summer. Adieu."

The fairy vanished, and with her went her band—nodding, waving, and kissing their finger-tips.

Oh, how dreary the woods seemed without the little troop! The wind sighed in the pines, and the moonlight cast fearful shadows from the gnarled and knotty boughs.

Florio rose with a sigh and stretched his limbs, wondering if it was worth while to try and do the fairy's bidding, when he had to go back to hear the dreaded voice of old Fuss. Then he made sure of the birch-bark case, and again with the aid of the fire-flies found the road. Fuss was sound asleep still when he laid himself down on his bundle of straw in the farthest corner of the cavern. One thing he did not notice, and that was the young fox whose bushy tail he had touched going into the woods. It had followed him home, and crept in under the straw beside him.

THE TRUSTFUL SPARROW.

BY ELIZABETH A. DAVIS.

"This crumb is mine," said Sparrow Gray,
The only one I've had to-day,
And I should be a silly bird
To give you half, or even third;
For see! the ground is white with snow,
And may be weeks for aught I know."

"If 'tis," replied the younger bird,
I'll tell you what I overheard:
I heard some little children say,
In that great house across the way,
How they should scatter crumbs of bread,
That every bird might be well fed,
Till all the ice and snow were gone;
So cheer up. Pray don't look forlorn:
I'd rather gaze on miles of snow
Than see a bird with looks of woe."

"You simple!" twittered Sparrow Gray,
"That's always just your heedless way.
No matter whether foul or fair,
It's chirp, chirp, chirp! without a care,
And now you think you'll be well fed,
I hope you haven't been misled;
But time will tell. Good-day, good-day."
And greedy Sparrow flew away.

The little bird was left alone—
Poor wee, wee Sparrow, scarce half grown!
The cold winds soon began to blow;
No shelter offered, high nor low;
But mindful of the promised crumbs,
To the great house at length he comes,
A little shivering hungry bird.
Then to the window where he heard
The children's voices straight he cries,
And with his chirping Sparrow cries
Soon brought them thronging to his side.
Then quick the sash they opened wide,
Strewed thick with crumbs the sheltered ill,
Till wee, wee Sparrow had his fill,
And chirping soft, as if to say,
"I thank you, thank you," flew away.

Dear little children! dear wee bird!
Could we but heed the promised Word
Of One who keeps both great and small,
And notes a single sparrow's fall!

THE TOY-SHOP WINDOWS.

BY AUNT MARGORIE PRECEPT.

IF I knew where to find a fairy godmother this bright winter's day, do you know what I would ask her to give me? Three wishes, of course. With wish number one I would whisk all the far-away readers of YOUNG PEOPLE right here to the city in a twinkling. With wish number two I would show them the beautiful holiday sights on which I have been feasting my eyes; and with wish number three I would give every child of them the dearest desire of his or her heart.

Alas! the days of fairy godmothers are past. It is not possible to bring you all here on some magical piece of carpet, and let you see for yourselves the wonders of this great city at Christmas-time. But there is one thing that can be done. Our artists are here with their busy pencils, and they are always ready to do whatever they think will please the little folk. Miss McDermott has made you a series of pretty drawings from the wonderful windows of the toy shops, which you will find on page 137, and I am going to try and tell you about some of the lovely things that are displayed in such profusion.

When I was a little girl I would have gone fairly wild had I seen Santa Claus's land, with its hills and dales, plain to view in a store, on my way to school. As it was, I wondered at the children who did nothing more than to dance up and down, and say "Oh!" and "Ah!" and "Oh, mamma! there truly is dear Santa himself!" when in a great window there was the ground white and shining with snow, and there too were the reindeer as large as life, just ready to prance, and the big horse in the distance where St. Nicholas lives, the green trees, and the presents with which his bag was crammed to bursting.

"That Christmas girlie in the picture has her arms full," you say. Yes, indeed. Well, hundreds of Christmas boys and girls have tripped along, their eyes sparkling, their hands overflowing with parcels and bundles, in these merry holiday times. Really, we were quite ready to envy that old fellow in the mythology who had a hundred hands. We could have used as many if we had had them.

The prettiest and most charming part of it all was that the children wanted the dolls, the elephants, the whistles, the boxes, the woolly dogs, the enchanting illustrated books, the rings, the pins, and all the wonderful gifts, not for themselves, but for those they loved.

There is nothing selfish in the spirit of Christmas. Every train which rolled into New York or slackened speed at Jersey City for days beforehand brought troops of merry little ones, with eager faces and voices. They were to have a taste of Christmas pleasure in looking at the magnificent pictures which the shop-keepers had made for their enjoyment. It was just like seeing a story-book come to life to walk along Broadway or the Avenues. The whole of Mother Goose, the best part of the fairy tales, and the most entertaining things which ever happen to grown-up people, were exhibited in dramas with dolls for actors.

There were brides and bridemaids, mammas and nurses with babies in the cradles, and tots of two or three years toddling about, school-girls and school-boys, sailors, soldiers, old ladies and gentlemen, and, in fact, everything in the way of a doll which could be thought of. Some were going to church, some were embarking for Europe, some were flirting, and some were behaving primly. I wish you all could have been here to see them.

I hope, now that Christmas is only a pleasant memory, that we may go on, the year through, trying to make everybody as happy as everybody was when the Christmas greetings were flying from lip to lip. Just think what a beautiful world this would be if nobody was ever impatient, and if the young and gay were always kind to the ill, the poor, the aged, and the weary!

AN ARMFUL OF POSIES.

N A N.*

BY MRS. JOHN LILLIE,

AUTHOR OF "MILDRED'S BARGAIN," "AUNT RUTH'S TEMPTATION," ETC.

CHAPTER XV.

IT had been arranged that Mrs. Heriot was to take Nan down to the house of the Rolfs in College Street, and my little heroine had to go through the worryment of mind that had become usual whenever that good woman did anything for her. Since not only did Mrs. Heriot never by any chance hurry, but it seemed to be one of her inflexible rules to be late on any such occasion.

Nan, in a pretty new gingham, with her new summer hat and a parasol, had waited half an hour before Mrs. Heriot came slowly along the hall, looking very warm in a red shawl and a bonnet covered with flowers and feathers.

Nan could hardly walk through College Street any more composedly than the twins had done on their visit. But it was not raining to-day; the sky was bright and blue, the air delicious, and in the gardens which they passed were all manner of spring blossoms; the lilacs seemed to nod their heads at Nan over the walls, and the syringas were, she thought, like big white "daytime stars."

Rolf House was at one end of a hilly street, and all along toward the sea-side part of the town were fine old-fashioned houses, with gardens and box-walks, and the look of old-time comfort which one sees in comfortable New England towns. Nan thought she would like to see inside some of the houses she passed, they looked so well kept and contented. Sometimes young faces appeared in the windows, and then Nan always said, "Mrs. Heriot, who lives there?" And Mrs. Heriot would cough significantly, look around, and give the names of the residents, with bits of their family history. Some of the names impressed Nan very strongly, because of the young people in the windows. In one small, dreary-looking house she saw the face of a little boy, evidently an invalid. He leaned against the window, and pulled the tassel of the curtain with a thin, restless hand, while his sad eyes looked out upon the street, seeming to Nan to say how he longed to be there.

"That is Captain Hand's house," Mrs. Heriot explained, "and that boy is his grandson. He's had spine disease for years." Nan fancied the poor little fellow smiled at her as she looked up with a sweet, compassionate glance. She determined to ask Joan whether she knew him, and if they couldn't try to amuse him.

Below this long, irregular street lay the business part of the town and the shipping-places; but a river intersected the city, running back of College Street, and Nan remembered, with a thrill of pleasure, that Joan had talked of a boat all their own. Nan had a love of out-door sports, which was more powerful, I fear, than even her desire to be practical and well educated. She had learned to row and to skate and to coast, and even to play ball, during her Bromfield life, and her secret desire at present was for a horse and a dog of her own. Mrs. Heriot took a short turning to the right, where the trees seemed to be closer and the street more countryfied. At its upper end were the colleges—large, red brick buildings, with the shade of many elms. Nan had no interest in them, however; she wanted to see Cousin Phyllis's home.

It was a large though somewhat shabby frame house, with a wing in which was a long two-storied balcony. It stood back from the road, and had a wandering garden and lawn in front, and a porch with tall pillars, on which, as Nan and Mrs. Heriot appeared, the tribe of cousins were disporting themselves. Joan was busy on some fishing-lines, an operation which Dickie was critically regarding, kneeling on the step below her; Alfred and Bertie were marching up and down in a regimental manner; and Laura was working just within the wide open door. The hall ran through the house, with wide doors at either end. Nan saw a big, straggling garden beyond, and had a glimpse of the river. Cousin Phyllis, in a fresh muslin dress and pretty blue ribbons, was standing on the back steps.

The cousins greeted Nan tumultuously, except Laura, who, of course, was more dignified in her method of welcome. Mrs. Heriot went out to speak to Miss Phyllis, and Joan immediately laid hold of Nan.

"Now," exclaimed Alfred, "what are we to do? what would you like to do, Nan?"

"Oh, anything," said beaming Nan.

Joan pondered; then she said, looking very earnestly at the rest, "Shall we show her the theatre first?"

"I suppose so," said Dick.

Laying aside her gloves and parasol, Nan gladly allowed herself to be taken around the house and down toward the stables. There was here an old unused carriage-house, and Joan, as they went, explained that their father had allowed them to make use of it for some theatricals they were getting up as a surprise for Phyllis's birthday. It was Joan who did the talking, but here Laura seemed to have been the manager or organizer of the enterprise. She said, rather coldly, to Nan,

"Don't you want to take one of the parts, Nan?"

"Yes, please, if Aunt Letty says I may."

"Oh!" cried Joan, "can't she be the Captive, Laura?" And she added, quickly, "You see, Laura wrote the play all herself, and it's perfectly beautiful!"

Laura looked rather pleased by this, and she said perhaps Nan could be the Captive. The carriage-house consisted of one large room, with a sort of frame-work of a partition at one side, which they intended to curtain, and at the back were two big windows, which with care might be used as exits. Indeed, the amusement to be derived from them seemed to appeal more than anything else to the boys, who immediately began tumbling in and out of them, Alfred's facility for putting his heels in the air coming in most usefully.

Laura showed Nan how they meant to divide the audience from the stage. It could readily be done. "But," she sighed, "if only Lance were home, he would do it all."

And, singular to say, at this moment a shout arose from the twins, who were just outside the door:

"Lane! Lance! here he is!"

There was a general seramble toward the house. Sure enough, it was Lance himself, though what had brought him home before vacation no one could imagine. But there he was striding across the garden, Joan and Dickie clutched him violently, and Alfred performing his wild-est antics near his heels.

Nan felt as if old Bromfield days had suddenly come back. She saw the store, the streets, Mrs. Grange's house, and the first glimpses of her new life. She drew back, almost wondering if Lance remembered her. But there was no doubt in her mind a moment later, for Lance, with his bright smile and pleasant voice, had come up and grasped her hand affectionately.

"Well, how are you, little Nan?" he said, cheerily, and Nan laughed and dimpled gayly. She made one of the group about him while Lance told how illness had broken out in the school, and the boys had all suddenly to be dismissed.

"Well," remarked Joan, "if it wasn't a perfectly killing kind of illness, I must say I'm glad; and oh, Lance! Lance! Lance! you're just in time!"

"There's always something to be in time for with you, Joan," laughed Lance, pinching his little sister's ear softly. "What is it now?"

"Oh, it's Laura's play," whispered Joan. "It's to be a surprise for Phyl's birthday."

"Is there a very sanguinary part for me, Lollie?" said Lance. "Remember, the last time, I killed every one beautifully."

Laura colored and bit her lip. "If you are going to make fun of it, Lance—" she began.

"But I've no such idea," he said, good-humoredly. "Now when I can get something to eat, I'd like to hear more of it. I feel a raving craving within me."

Alfred's eyes grew big. "There's a whole row of pies cooling down-stairs," he said, "and doughnuts. I saw them!"

"And The Great didn't eat any of them?"

"Didn't he?" said Joan, with her mouth curled almost out of sight. "He just went for them."

Lance laughed heartily, and they all turned back to the house, where Mr. Rolf stood waiting to see his son, and Phyllis was bustling about in the dining-room, preparing an impromptu sort of dinner for her favorite brother.

Nan followed Joan into the dining-room. She was greatly interested in seeing everything about the house, and almost directly the influence of Cousin Phyllis's pretty, dainty taste had reached her. The dining-room was a large one, and full of sunshine and flowers; it seemed to Nan, and it looked very plainly, the sort of room in which a large, merry family of young people would like to eat their meals. Phyllis might look to Nan a very grand young lady, but she was evidently not above setting the table, and arranging the little dinner which Martha, the house-maid, brought in on a tray; and between whiles Nan saw her dust one or two places on the sideboard, and put things straight here and there, quite with the air of a person accustomed to performing such household duties.

Why, pondered Nan, as she stood in one of the windows—why had Phyllis seemed so "fine" a lady in Bromfield, so anxious to cut Nan adrift from her step-aunt's family? Had the girl been a little older and wiser, she would have understood it better, or have been able to make clearer distinctions. Phyllis's one point of pride was family. To her it was everything that she was a Miss Rolf of Beverley. She knew better than the others how many times they had had to pinch and save, and turn here and there, to keep up what she called "appearances"; but, at all events, nothing "vulgar" had ever come near them. Did she, I wonder, think it more honorable to be a "Rolf," and often owe the butcher and the baker, than to have been a plain somebody or nobody, who knew not the dishonor of debt?

Lance professed himself well satisfied with his dinner, and he sat down between Phyllis and Laura, and talked eagerly. The younger members of the family sat on the ledges of the windows and looked on admiringly, while Nan crept close to Joan, who kept up a little whispered murmur about the play.

By this time Nan knew its plot. It was as follows: A person, called simply a "Knight," takes captive a young person who speaks an unknown tongue. He brings her to his people, among whom is a Magician, who alone can understand her. To him she tells her sad history, how she is a princess of the "Gondulfo tribe," and to prove it she calls upon the Magician to light up his lamp, and rub a certain ring she wears, and he can see her family. These personages appear, one after another, at the back of the stage. The Magician recognizes among them his own long-lost nephew, the Princess's brother, and as the spirits vanish he cries out, "You are, then, my niece, Artemisia Gondulfo." She admits that she is; the Knight appears, and a general understanding follows. The Magician pours upon Artemisia the wealth he has gathered for years, while she marries the Knight, who leads her back to the Gondulfos with rejoicing.

"Don't you think," whispered Nan, "that perhaps the people will want to know where the princess came from?"

Joan looked really troubled. "Now, see here, Nan," she said, as serenely as she could, "I can just see how you are always going to take things: you want them so—illiterate!" Joan stammered, and added, "No, I don't mean exactly that; I mean literal. Did you ever hear people in a real theatre, for instance, stand up and ask questions?"

Nan found she knew of no such occasion; but she had only twice been in a real theatre.

"Oh dear!" said Joan. "I don't mind telling you a secret, Nan: I think, when I'm older, I shall be an act-ress."

"Oh, Joan!" came from Nan, in a dismayed under-tone. "Well, I think so," said Joan, looking very grave. And Nan hardly knew whether to be most horrified or awe-struck.

But just now Joan had other things to think of. While Lance was finishing his dinner, she suggested taking Nan up to the room she shared with Laura. The two went out and up the stairs to a breezy bedroom, which at once showed that two people with very different tastes or ideas occupied it. One side plainly showed Laura's finical, sentimental sort of fancies; the other Joan's restless, careless, active spirit. There were two little iron beds; the floor was covered with a bright-flowered carpet, and the walls were full of pictures; some, it is true, only cuts from illustrated papers, but all well selected. There were dormer-windows, and in one a cage with two canaries. Joan displayed her special treasures to Nan, sitting on the floor before an old trunk, in which were some dolls' clothes, some bits of finery saved for theatricals, and which Joan called "properties," and various books and shells, and even some minerals.

"Oh, Joan," exclaimed Nan, "I wish you knew Philip!" The sight of the minerals brought back the crowded little parlor in Bronfield, where, perhaps, even now Philip was busy among his precious belongings.

Joan looked up, her gray eyes widely open.

"Who's Philip?" she asked.

Nan told all about Philip, and something of Marian. The two girls decided they would ask Phyllis or Aunt Letty if Nan might not write to Philip. Joan entered very heartily into this idea, and it produced so many puckeringings of her nose and mouth that finally Nan burst out into an irrepressible laugh.

"Oh, Joan," she exclaimed, "you do draw up your face so funnily!"

"Yes," said good-humored Joan, laughing with Nan, "don't I?" She jumped up and went over to the looking-glass, where she scrutinized her thin little face very carefully. "See here, Nan," she said, turning round, "just see how my flesh hangs." She pulled at her cheeks, and made various other demonstrations of the kind. "Papa says I must fill out, or I'll be so ugly—here Joan made her very worst pucker—"that no one will be able to look at me without—well, nearly fainting away."

Nan laughed again until the tears streamed down her cheeks.

"Joan," she said, sobering finally, "I'll promise to love you always."

But Joan only stood still, shaking her head solemnly.

"Are you sure, Nan?" she answered.

"Perfectly sure," said Nan; and upon this Joan dived into her little trunk and produced a small note-book.

"Let's write it down," she said, very earnestly. "What's the day of the month?"

Nan said it was May 29; so Joan entered the date, and underneath it wrote: "Annie and Joan Rolf this day decide to be perfectly true friends. They will never let anything separate them."

"Now," said Joan, "let us each sign it; but, Annie—or Nan—first we ought to do something a little solemn; throw beans over our heads, or something like that."

Nan hesitated, and her face flushed. "Joan," she said, quietly, "I don't think that is half so solemn as—something—like a little—kind of a prayer."

Joan looked a trifle puzzled. "Well," she assented.

Nan took her cousin's hand very firmly.

"Suppose," she said, "we say—together—'God bless this.'"

Nan could think of nothing more elaborate; but the two children, standing, together signed their names to the queer little compact, and then together said, not knowing half how solemn it really was, "God bless this."

For a moment or two they did not speak; but when the tea-bell rang they went down-stairs very merrily—on the last flight, indeed, Joan showed Nan how to slide down on the balusters, a performance Alfred and Dieksie greeted with cheers from the porch below.

LEARNING A TRADE.

BY JAMES OTIS.

"DEAR EDITOR,—How can a boy fifteen years of age get an opportunity to learn a good trade? Does it make any difference if he isn't very far along in his studies, and how much can he earn? WILLIE L. B."

In order to be able to answer letters similar to the one above, the editor of YOUNG PEOPLE sent to Messrs. Tiffany & Co., the great jewellers and silversmiths of New York, to learn what their method of teaching boys the business was. The information was readily given, as will be seen.

Let Willie fancy that he has entered the jewelry house spoken of with the intention of applying for a situation as apprentice in some branch of either gold or silver smithing. The gentleman who has charge of the manufacturing portion of the business will be very certain to ask him about his studies, providing he has first been able to show by letters from his teachers and acquaintances that he is a peaceably disposed, well-behaved boy. Combined with a willingness to work, every employer wants a boy of correct habits, studiously inclined, and cleanly in his ways.

In either of the trades, if a boy has any desire to rise above the purely mechanical branches, a knowledge of drawing is indispensable, for the designer is the chief among the laborers, and the progress which the applicant has made with his pencil determines which department of the business he shall enter.

In the factory are many rooms, each one of which is devoted to some particular portion of the work. For instance, where the solid silverware is made, the first department in which apprentices are employed is the "spinning-room." Here Willie, if he succeeded in his efforts to become one of the Messrs. Tiffany's apprentices, would be taught to "spin" a disk of silver into the required form shown by the mould, or "chuck," which comes from the designing-room. This he would do on a lathe, forcing the metal into the desired form by certain tools especially used for that purpose. In this department he would, in time, be taught to turn silver into all shapes; but he would be obliged to work with mathematical exactness from the drawings which would be given him.

The next department is where the silversmiths proper work, those who put together the different pieces that go to make up the entire article. There all the finishing work is done, the article going from one department to the other in course of construction, but returning to the silversmiths from time to time for the work of soldering, joining on of different pieces, and such labor as that.

Then comes the finishing department, where, after the ware has been completed, it is buffed, or rubbed smooth, polished, and in every way made ready for sale in the store.

The next department in point of importance is where the dies or patterns for the wares are made, the work being done in steel according to the designs sent from the artists. Equal in importance is the moulding department, where from brass patterns a mould of sand is made, leaving a recess in which the molten silver is poured, much as boys mould objects in lead.

The engraving department is one where only boys with an aptitude for drawing can be employed. There the patterns of vines, leaves, or figures are cut in the metal, letters or monograms engraved, and all such artistic work done.

The operation of embossing or "snarling," as it is technically called, requires as much if not more skill than the engraving, for in that case the design is raised on the metal, instead of being cut in, and this is done by striking on one end of a tool, the vibration at the other end striking against the inside of the vessel into which it has been introduced and held in position by the workman's hand. There are departments where etching is done, others where the ware is enamelled, and, in fact, one for each particular branch of the business; but over them all are the designers, those who originate shapes and styles, drawing them carefully on paper for the others to work by. The designers are the most important of all the workmen, since from them come all the ideas, and Willie should strive to reach that department, for no boy should give up trying to excel all others in whatever he does.

Now if a boy has but little taste for drawing, or, having such a taste, has cultivated it but little, he is set at work in such department as he seems best fitted for, from where the road to the designing-room is ever open to him, industry and close application being the only aids he needs to enable him to reach it.

If Willie can show that his character as a boy is good, that he has no bad habits or evil-disposed companions, if he shows any aptitude for the trade, and seems anxious to learn, the Messrs. Tiffany will give him an opportunity to go to work in their factory for two months, during which time his employers have an opportunity of learning what kind of a boy he is, and he can learn whether the work pleases him. During these two months both employer and apprentice are on trial, and the latter is paid in proportion to the amount of work he does.

At the end of that time he and his parents will be asked to meet the member of the firm who is in charge of the manufactory, and then will come the question as to whether he is willing to remain with the firm until he is twenty-one years of age; that is, of course, providing his employers are pleased with him.

If he is willing to remain until he has become a man, it being conceded that he may have learned the trade thoroughly even before that time, an agreement is drawn up and signed by Messrs. Tiffany & Co., Willie, and his parents, whereby it is agreed that he shall remain as an apprentice in the factory until his twenty-first birthday. A certain amount of wages is fixed upon, and this is increased each year until, when his time has expired, Willie is earning a man's wages. This agreement does not bind him as the old forms of indenture did an apprentice, but leaves him free to go at any time, for a boy who has no pride or interest in his work had better be out of any shop rather than in it.

If at the expiration of the two months of probation Willie is not quite decided as to whether he prefers the trade of silversmith to that of any other, he is allowed more time in which to make up his mind, the idea being that he shall be thoroughly content with it before he agrees to remain.

After he has been apprenticed, Willie's desire will probably be the same as that of his employers—that he shall advance toward the designing-room as rapidly as possible, since that is the fountain-head of the trade. To this end he is aided in every way. A valuable and extensive library, where he can study the methods used by the goldsmiths in the olden as well as the present time, is open to him, and he can also examine models or drawings of all notable works in gold and silver that have ever been done by the masters of the craft. In fact, it is necessary for him to study his trade in his leisure as well as in his working hours, and his employers give him every opportunity, for it is of quite as much interest and profit to them that he should become a good workman as it is to him.

He, in common with a hundred and twenty-five other boys, begins work at seven o'clock in the morning, ending at half past five at night, with half an hour for dinner, and a half-holiday on Saturday. Each week that he works the full number of hours, and has done what he has been set to do faithfully, he receives from the foreman of his department an order on the cashier for one dollar, which is given to him in addition to his regular wages as a reward for punctuality and industry.

After a boy has served his time as apprentice he can always have work from the Messrs. Tiffany, or if he leaves the factory thinking to better his condition elsewhere, he can always return to it with a certainty of being employed, so long as his record is good, the policy of the house being to give employment to those whom they have educated in the business, in preference to any one else.

Of course each apprentice is obliged to do his full share of work, and hard work, for it is only by industry that any one can rise in life, and it is only those who are anxious to become artists in their work, even at the expense of considerable labor, that any such house wants.

To learn a trade is by no means play, but labor and perseverance; and the boy who is not willing to do his best to excel had better make up his mind to earn his livelihood by the simplest of manual labor. But he is wise who perfects himself early in life in some trade where skilled labor is always in demand, for by so doing he provides for himself constant employment; and whatever position he may occupy, he can never regret the time nor labor expended in thus making himself in a measure independent, whatever changes may befall him.

The experience of the house referred to in establishing what is really a training-school wherein boys may learn, to provide for themselves has been a pleasant one.

"Ten years ago," said the gentleman who was giving the writer the above information, "we had very few applications for the position of apprentice from boys who had received even fairly good educations, so great was the prejudice against learning a trade which existed in the minds of the people in this country. Now, however, a decided reaction has taken place, and among our apprentices may be found the sons of men who occupy good positions in society. Constantly striving as we are for artistic work in the greatest variety, we naturally desire the brightest and most intelligent boys, who may have the benefit of everything which money can purchase to enable them to rise in the business."

Willie, or any other boy who desires to make himself useful in the world, can readily see from this that even if there was no other reason for it, whatever trade he may decide to learn, it is necessary that he should first attend faithfully to his studies, unless he is willing never to rise above the common class of workers.

"Whatever is worth being done at all is worth being done well" is an old maxim that is worthy of repetition, and the best foundation for a good trade is a good education. But also remember that a boy's reputation for honesty, morality, and industry is quite as valuable to him as is a business man's, for it is that which is first inquired about when he applies for the situation of apprentice.

Whatever occupation in life you intend to choose, boys, lay the foundation for a successful following of it now, and that once done, the rest will be comparatively easy.

A Christmas Girl

SOME
DOLL

A BRAND-NEW YEAR.

BY SOPHIE SWETT.

THERE were so many of them!—Tommy and Aleck, Jack and Jill (Jill's name was really Geraldine, but everybody called her Jill because she and Jack were twins, and always together), Becky and Taddy, and little Sam and the baby, to say nothing of George Washington Lafayette Robert Lee Lincoln, Aunt Patra's boy, who when it came to mischief was the equal of all the white children put together.

Once it had been only a cause of rejoicing that they were so many; they could have no end of fun by themselves, and they were so sorry for the little Fergusons, who were only two, and could play hardly any rousing game at home of a rainy day; and as for Thanny Thorpe, who had not one single brother or sister, he always made them think of the poor giant Pewobbet, who was shut up in an iron tower, and wept so for loneliness that he trickled all away.

But, oh dear! everything was sadly changed now.

Papa had lost all his money, and they had been obliged to leave their beautiful home in the South, and come away off to this little New England town, where a house and some land had been left them by a relative, and then papa had died suddenly, and they were left alone among strangers, and with hardly any money.

Mamma tried to keep the tears out of her eyes, and taught music, and sewed for people, working sometimes far into the night, and doing her very best to earn money enough to make them all comfortable. But there was a mortgage on the house, and the interest had to be paid very often, and there were so many of them! And there was "that boy Linkum." That was what his old mammy always called him, and they had all fallen into the same habit.

Linkum wore out two pairs of shoes to the other children's one, and his knees and elbows seemed to have such a fondness for the open air that they would make their way through the thickest cloth in less than a fortnight.

And Linkum's bump of destructiveness was developed to an alarming extent. He could not be trusted to take anything into his hands that could by any possibility be broken, and he declared himself that if he looked at a dish it "done fell over and split open."

In the bottom of her heart Annt Patra was very fond of Linkum, but she was always saying that "dere was enuf moufs to feed widout dat lazy nigger's, an' it was high time dat he done went off an' earned his own libin'."

It made all the children very sad to hear Annt Patra say that, for in spite of his pranks they had a great affection for Linkum. He was devoted to them, and always so good-natured and merry you must be feeling very badly indeed if Linkum couldn't cheer you up. When mamma was so pale and tired that it would make one's heart ache to look at her, she would laugh, just as she used to do, at some of Linkum's droll sayings. And it made her feel as badly as the children to think of letting Linkum go away, especially as she was afraid he might not find people who would bear with his troublesome pranks. But one day she said she was afraid he would have to go. She had lost two of her music scholars, and her eyes were beginning to trouble her so that she was afraid she should not be able to sew much longer, and the interest on the mortgage was overdue. And a man over in Lancaster wanted to hire Linkum to cut wood.

It was the last day of the year, and things did seem very sad. Christmas had not been in the least like any Christmas that the children had ever known. It did seem a little too bad that Santa Claus should turn the cold shoulder upon one because one was poor. And now, with all the rest of their troubles, they must part with Linkum—poor Linkum, who doubled himself up as if he were in pain at the mere mention of his going, and uttered most melancholy howls.

Tommy, who was the oldest, and felt himself to be the man of the family, although he was only twelve, shared his mother's confidence, and realized what sore straits they were in. He agreed with his mother that since there was nobody in the neighborhood who wanted to hire Linkum, he must go, although it seemed almost too hard to be endured.

"Well, to-morrow is New-Year's Day; perhaps something very nice will happen," said Jill. Jill read fairy stories, and was always expecting things to happen just as they did in the stories.

"Sometimes things go on happening just the same, if it is a new year," said Aleck. "I wish this would be a brand-new year!"

It did seem very sad that Linkum should have to go on New-Year's Day, but the man who wanted to hire him came for him, and they all resolved to put a brave face on the matter, for it never would do to begin the new year with tears, and besides, their tears gave renewed impetus to Linkum's howlings, which were really frightful to hear, and caused his new employer to inquire if he wasn't subject to cramp in the stomach.

At the very last Tommy took Linkum behind the shed door for a little private interview.

What was said there nobody knew, but when he emerged from the retirement the cramp in Linkum's stomach seemed greatly improved, and he responded with a faint semblance of one of his customary grins to the good-byes showered upon him.

Tommy took his way to his daily work with a resolve to ask Mr. Savage, the lawyer, whose office-boy he was, to raise his wages. But when he opened the office door there was a strange young man at the desk, and Mr. Savage was occupied with several gentlemen. He turned his head to say, carelessly, to Tommy:

"I shan't have any further need of your services, as this young man, who is to study with me, will attend to your duties. I believe there is a small sum due you, and if you will call some time when I am not busy I'll give it to you."

Poor Tommy! he left the office without a word, his hopes all crushed. There were very few chances for a boy like him to get work in the town. He might have to go away as Linkum had done, and that would break his mother's heart.

It was just possible that there might be some work that he could do at the iron-mills; a few odd jobs would be better than nothing.

Mr. Forbes, the superintendent, was always busy, and a man of few words. Tommy dreaded to go to his office, because he held the mortgage on their house, and he might say something about the unpaid interest; but as it was the only chance for work that there seemed to be, he summoned all his courage, and knocked at his office door.

"Want a boy?" said Mr. Forbes. "Well, if we do, there are plenty of big ones in the world, so we needn't take up with a little chap like you." But there was a pleasant twinkle in his eyes, so Tommy didn't mind that his words were not very polite.

"You're Tommy Woodford, are you?" continued Mr. Forbes. "Well, we do need an office-boy, but I was thinking of having one older than you, who could help the clerk with his accounts sometimes. Are you quick at figures?"

"I am not so very slow, sir," he said, modestly. "You might try me."

"Well, that is not a bad suggestion," said Mr. Forbes, who was looking him over carefully all the time. "You may come to-morrow morning, and I will try you." Tommy flew home as if he had wings, and told the good news.

He found that there was hard work in the office of the Iron Company, and the clerk was not so pleasant as Mr. Forbes; and when he found that Tommy was both quick and exact at figures, he left work for him to do that did not rightfully belong to his share, and he sometimes went away when he ought not to go, and left Tommy in sole charge of the office.

But Tommy was determined that nothing should daunt him, and he never complained, and Mr. Forbes's attention was attracted from what was going on in the office by disturbances in the mills, owing to the dissatisfaction of the men and their threatening to strike for higher wages. One night, at the end of Tommy's second week at the mills, the clerk, who had been absent for half the afternoon, failed to return at six o'clock, the usual time for closing the office. Tommy had no authority to close it, and as Mr. Forbes had gone to a distant town to secure a new corps of men in case there should be a strike, Tommy had no alternative but to wait until the clerk returned.

Night had closed in before six o'clock, and a storm was threatening, and Tommy thought of his long, cold walk, and longed for the home fireside, and the eakes that Aunt Patra loved to keep hot for him. Then he remembered that some of the next day's work might be done while he was waiting. But just as he sat down at the desk and opened the account-book the door was suddenly thrown open.

Tommy arose with a sigh of relief, but when he turned, instead of the clerk whom he expected to see, two rough-looking men stood before him. One of them turned the key. Tommy was sure that they were mill hands, although he could not see their faces.

"All we want of you, youngster, is the key of the safe," said one of them.

How they knew that he was acquainted with the whereabouts of the key of the safe Tommy wondered, the natural supposition being that Mr. Forbes carried it about his person, as indeed he habitually did; but from the fact that some valuable papers which were kept in the safe were being copied by the clerk and Tommy, the key was deposited in a little secret drawer in Mr. Forbes's desk.

"What right have you to ask for the safe key?" demanded Tommy. He was conscious of a little inward quaking, but his tone was firm.

"We don't mean to waste words with you," said one of the men. "We'll trouble you to tell us where that key is, or—" and he drew a pistol from his pocket, and laid it down where Tommy could see it.

Tommy remembered that he was alone in the building, everybody leaving at six o'clock, therefore to call for help would be useless; but even while he thought of it one of the men thrust a gag into his mouth, while the other tightly pinioned his arms.

"We'll try our luck at finding it, and if we can't do that we'll make him tell," said one of them, with a fierce oath.

The gag choked him almost to suffocation, and the ropes cut his arms so that the pain was almost unendurable. Footsteps sounded in the corridor, and some one tried the door. Oh, if he could only cry out!

As the footsteps died away, it seemed to Tommy as if all his hopes of seeing mother, brothers, sisters, and home went with them. But a sentence from one of Jill's old stories kept repeating itself in his mind: "so Sir Cuthbert did his duty as a true knight, knowing that God had created him for nothing less."

Sir Cuthbert fought dragons, and serpents with innumerable heads, and ferocious wolves. Tommy wondered, vaguely, in the midst of his pain, whether Sir Cuthbert ever got home to his mother; he didn't remember to have heard the end of the story.

The men were growing fiercely angry that they could not find the key, and one was blaming the other that they had not tools with which to break open the safe. Tommy knew that they would waste no more time, but would force him to tell now, if they could. Something very like despair came over him, when, suddenly pressed against a window-pane, he saw a face—a black face, surmounted by a woolly top-knot—Linkum's face!

It seemed to Tommy that he must have died and gone to heaven when he saw that face. But it was only the beginning of a merciful unconsciousness.

There was a crash as if the whole world had tumbled to pieces, and when Tommy opened his eyes it was upon Linkum's face close beside his, some officers putting handcuffs upon the men, and a crowd of people pouring into the office.

"You 'member what you done tole me behind de shed door?" Linkum was explaining. "How if dis yere nigger was dat homesiek he couldn't stand it nohow, to done fotch hisself home, an' you wouldn't eat a bit but what he done had his share ob? Dis nigger was dat miserable homesiek he tought for sure he'd die, an' he done come home. He look all roun' de winders ob de house an' couldn't see nuffin' ob yer, an' he hear 'em say mighty quar yer done stay so late, an' he come to de office, an' he see light an' hear voices, but couldn't get in, an' it seem mighty quar, so he done climb up de spout, an' look in de window! Didn't take him long to fotch a ossifer an' break in dat do'!"

So the safe, which contained a great deal of money, as well as valuable papers, was untouched, and Tommy was the hero of the hour. Everybody was crowding around to have the privilege of shaking hands with him. And Linkum was not without his share of praise.

But the best is yet to tell. Mr. Forbes made Tommy a present of the mortgage deed cancelled. He said Tommy had saved him a great deal more than that, and it was only his due. He also raised his salary, for he said the company could afford to pay for such services as his. And he gave Linkum a situation in the mills, so he didn't have to go away again. Aleck said "it really was a brand-new year!"

PERIL AND PRIVATION.

BY JAMES PAYN.

A CASTAWAY AMBASSADOR.

II.

AT this terrible crisis—for, left to themselves, these poor Easterns were almost as helpless as children, and were conscious of the fact—the second ambassador called his people round him, and addressed them with a courage and charity such as would have done honor to an apostle of the holiest creed:

"Faithful Siamese, though all was lost by our shipwreck, we had still some consolation. . . . While the Portuguese remained, they were our guides, and in some sort our protection. . . . and I would fain persuade myself that urgent reasons alone can have induced them to leave us. Were not we ourselves constrained to forsake our first ambassador amidst a frightful desert, though with the full design of proeuring him aid when it should lie in our power? The conduct of the Portuguese may not perhaps be less laudable. At all events, it will not avert the evils with which we are menaced to bewail their insincerity and want of faith."

No Christian sermon, to my mind, had ever more charity and good sense in it than this. The latter part of his speech, though it does not recommend itself to our intelligence, is even more characteristic, and breathes a spirit of exalted loyalty which would be chivalrous indeed were the object of it a worthy one. The King of Siam was a potentate, it seems, so sacred that no one was allowed to mention his name, but in this supreme hour his faithful servant thus ventures to allude to him:

"Perhaps," he says, "in requital of the transcendent merits of our great King, Providence will not allow us to remain destitute of succor; and without further deliberation we ought to follow the coast, according to our previous determination One thing more. You have witnessed my invariable respect for the dispatches of the King, my master. My first, or rather my sole, anxiety during our shipwreck was for their safety. When encamped on mountains, I have always placed them still higher, and always above the rest of our body, and myself withdrawing lower, guarded them at a respectful distance; and in the plains, they were affixed to the top of the highest plants I could attain. During this journey they have been borne by myself, and never intrusted to others, until I was unable to drag my limbs along. Now, in our present uncertainty, should I not be able to follow you long, I enjoin the third ambassador [our Occum], in the name of our great King, to act precisely as I have done But should it be fated that none of us reach the Cape of Good Hope, he to whom they shall be at last intrusted must lay them, if possible, on some eminence, so that they may not be exposed to insult, and then he may die before them, testifying as much respect in death as he was bound to show during life. Such is what I recommend."

From this date poor Occum Chamnam's miseries became almost intolerable; his whole body began to swell, attended with dreadful pains. "Without actual experience," he observes, with touching simplicity, "I could not have believed in the power of the human frame to resist so long such an accumulation of evils;" and yet in proportion to their extremity so, strangely enough, did his anxiety to prolong his life increase. All that remained to them of solid hope was in regaining the Portuguese, and when, now and then, they came upon some traces of their course their hearts revived within them. Once they found a pouch of powder, with which they kindled a fire, and Occum broiled his shoes, which had long become useless to him through the swelling of his feet.

"We cut them to pieces, and eat them with great avidity We tried the same with the cap of one of our attendants, but it was so tough that we had to reduce the pieces almost to a cinder, and then they were so bitter and disgusting that, in spite of our famished condition, our stomachs refused to receive them." Presently they came upon one of the interpreters lying dead. "Since his limbs were contracted together, though on a spot abounding with herbs, we judged that he had died of cold." This sight was not unwelcome, since it showed that they were on the right track; and "since it was a charming spot, covered with verdure, we halted, and each laid in a stock of palatable leaves."

This relief, however, was but temporary, and the condition to which they were reduced may be conceived from the fact that, proud as they were by race and nature, they at last resolved to sell themselves to the Hottentots as slaves. "Surely," says the unhappy Occum, "our wretchedness must have been intense since we were willing to become subject to a people the most abject, vile, and beastly under the sun, and whom we should be reluctant to receive into our homes even in a menial capacity." Nay, such was their extremity that they actually resolved to go back to the peninsula where mussels were plentiful, and reached it in three days, with the ardor of exiles seeking some promised land.

Unhappily, though they got their mussels, they could get no fire-wood to cook them with, while the intense cold at night paralyzed all their energies. On the fifth day they again started on their weary journey, and after terrible privations came on some Hottentots who had intercourse with the Dutch settlements, and undertook to guide them thither. Many of the poor Siamese had to be left behind, with a store of dried mussels to support them; the rest followed their guides for six terrible days, during which time their chief food was certain large black beetles.

On the thirty-first day after the shipwreck they met with some Dutch settlers, who brought them bread, meat, and wine. "Our acknowledgments were boundless. We threw ourselves at the knees of our preservers. For my own part, my gratitude was beyond all bounds. When the first ambassador had ordered us to leave him, he gave us some jewels which had been presented by the King our master to be bestowed in presents. I received five large diamonds set in rings of gold, one of which I presented to each of the Dutchmen as an acknowledgment of the renewal of my life."

What seems very strange, the survivors of the Portuguese party, who arrived at the settlement eight days before them, seem to have suffered even worse privations than the Siamese. A monk of St. Augustine, who was of the party, drew tears from Occum's eyes by the recital of them. "We should have been as relentless as tigers," he says, "not to have melted at the cries and groans of those who dropped by the torments of hunger, thirst, and fatigue. They implored our assistance; they conjured us to procure a drop of water. Every one seemed insensible to their sufferings, and to avoid the semblance of cruelty, when we saw them fall, which happened frequently, we exhorted them to recommend their souls to God, and then, without further remark, turned away, stopping our ears that we might hear the groans of the dying no longer."

One incident in that terrible journey stands out above all others, and seems to have affected all witnesses, however wretched in their own circumstances, with its horror and pathos. The captain of the ship, a man of high rank and station, had carried out his only son with him to India, that he might make an early acquaintance with life at sea. He watched over the boy's safety during the shipwreck, and since his strength soon failed him, caused him to be carried during the march by his slaves. But when these grew too weak to bear him, the youth was reduced to such a state of feebleness that he lay down to die.

"His limbs were stiff and swollen, and he lay stretched at all his length unable to bend a joint. The unfortunate captain was driven to despair. Lifting the poor lad on his shoulders, he tried to carry him, but could make but a single step, when he fell to the ground with his son, who seemed more distressed at the other's grief than at his own sufferings. He entreated the others, in the most impressive manner, to carry his father away with them, whose presence only augmented his miseries. The priests endeavored in vain to represent to the captain the sinfulness of thus endangering his own life by useless delay, and at length he was removed by force." The violence of his grief, however, continued without abatement, and though he reached the settlement, he died of a broken heart on the second day.

Occum Chamam himself lived to return to Siam, and behold the gracious countenance of the sovereign whom nobody was allowed to name; and, what is very creditable to him after such an experience, he actually tempted the sea again as ambassador to the court of France.

WATCHING.

WATCHING for somebody, wide brown eyes.

Waiting to give him a rare surprise?
Oh, is it father, whose horse's feet
Fall in the distance smooth and fleet—

Father, whose heart for many a mile
Forward has leaped to the dear old stile.
Oh, how they'll kiss him, and hold him fast,

When father is home with his bairns at last!

"Hist!" cries sister to Baby Will;
"Listen, darling! he mounts the hill.
Oh, how Selim flies over the ground!
Nearer and nearer the hoof-beats sound."

Flowers for father, and looks of joy,
Sweetest words shall their tongues employ.

Somebody's coming—the dear, the wise:
Shine out to greet him, you bright brown eyes.

M. E. SANGSTER

OUR POST-OFFICE BOX.

CHERRY HILL, PENNSYLVANIA.

You want some letters to tell you how we enjoy our Thanksgiving. I will tell you first about ourselves. There are five of us. My little brother Ned takes YOUNG PEOPLE, and my little brother uses it at his school every day to read in. We all love it. Even mamma says she enjoys it in the evening when she is alone in the library. We live in the country, and we had a snowy day to go in to grandpa's. I had a good sleigh ride before starting, and if it had not been so fine, we would have staid home and had another ride.

We had a jolly dinner, and afterward we recited pieces, sang songs, and played games until we were tired out. I do not know which laughed the most, grandpa, who is seventy, or my little sister, just two years old, when we played "Going to Jerusalem" and "Rachel and Jacob." Oh! they are funny games. Then we sang "Oh, Susanna," and papa played it on the piano for us. We had to sleep with a good many in every room, but we did not care, for Thanksgiving comes so seldom, and we were very thankful this year to think our sister, who has been so sick, was well again, and could eat turkey and ice-cream.

If you like my letter I will write again, for I have a good deal to tell you if you want to first about our lovely old nursery, our cat who will not stay away when she is sent, and our dogs. I am so glad we have such a big family—there is so much fun in the house.

A. C. N.

Now having told us about Thanksgiving, you must send a postscript and tell about Christmas. Did you go to grandpa's again?

WINNIPEG, MANITOBA.

I am a little boy nine years old. I can't go there three months ago. I was born on the Ottawa River, above Montreal, and used to have good times there fishing, boating, and hunting. It took me four days to come here from Montreal. There are no trees up here, and prairie all around. The Red and Assiniboine rivers flow past here, and they are about the middle streams of the river. I go to the Manitoba College, and am in the Fourth Book. We have had a good deal of snow already, and it is very cold. My mother is writing this for me as I am sick in bed to-day. Men and boys wear large buffalo-skin coats in winter. People have to buy water, and men bring it in barrels and water-carts. There are a great many kinds of people up here, such as Scandinavians, Swedes, Jewish refugees, Mennonites, and many Indians and half-breeds. My letter may be getting too long, so good-by.

BENNIE W. S. T.

You needed huffal-skins to keep you warm when that cold snap came a fortnight ago, did you not, Bennie? I think it must be a strange experience to buy water. Perhaps you are more careful of it than we in New York, where it seems free as air.

YARMOUTH, NOVA SCOTIA.

I am a little girl eleven years old. I have no sisters living, and only one brother, who is now away from home, so I have to depend on my dolls and my pets for company. I have a large family of dolls of all sizes, and they have dolls of their own. I had five nice kittens, who, with their uncle Popsissaway and their mother, made quite a menagerie. My brother obtained for their uncle Frisky a situation in a grocery store as a mouse-catcher, to save him from a watery grave. My kittens are fond of riding in the carriage dressed up in hats, cloaks, and collars, and holding a doll in their arms, and purring to show their pleasure.

My most precious pet was a parrot, which my grandma brought me from Boston. It was only one year old, and could not speak a word. We called him Paul. He soon learned to say "Pretty Polly," "Good-morning," and "Look here." Beautiful! "Where's Bertie?" "Kiss me pretty, oh, kiss me pretty now!" in a very coaxing way, and making a sound just like kissing.

When mamma used to read a funny story aloud, I would be catching Paul would come down from his perch, walk close up to us, and exclaim, "Beautiful! beautiful!" He admired bright colors, and when he saw pretty flowers, or a gay piece of cloth, he would say, "Beautiful!"

He was just learning to sing "Polly, put the kettle on," and he made a very good attempt at it, but he could not sing. Paul would feel very sorry, but we had him stuffed, and he now sits on a little table in the parlor.

I have not been to school much, but I have had lessons at home. I went for a short time to a private school, but had to leave off on account of headaches. Besides my usual school studies, I am learning music, drawing, Italian, sewing, and cooking. Mamma is my teacher in all except drawing.

Papa gave me YOUNG PEOPLE for a Christmas present two years ago. We all like it very much. It would be a real pity for you to long to tell us anything about our town or our people.

Have I written too much? If so, dear Postmistress, please excuse

BETTIE B.

Your description of your cats and dolls is quite fascinating. I was visiting a friend one day, and saw a very pretty canary hanging in its cage in her parlour, and among the vines and flowers. I noticed that it did not stir, so, after a while I said, "Why, Lo, that is the stillest bird I ever saw in my life." "No wonder," she replied; "poor Muff is stuffed." So I suppose your pretty Polly may impose now and then on callers in the parlor.

LITCA, NEW YORK.

I like HAPPY NEW YEAR PEOPLE very much. I am very glad Christmas is so near at hand. I hope Santa Claus will bring me a nice train and a steamer. Papa sells beautiful Christmas cards.

I am six years old, and can read (so my teacher says) very well. I can spell words of four syllables, and I can write good long when I don't get into mischief. I have no sisters nor brothers, and I have nobody to amuse me, and I do so like to be amused. I suppose all little boys do, don't they? I ever wrote, and I commenced it myself, about Thanksgiving, and I made up my mind to be a good boy all day long Thanksgiving, and I think I was. I didn't get in any mischief, and I had splendid time, or, rather, dinner, at grandpa's.

I have two grandmas and no grandpa. I love my grandmas very much, but I guess they sometimes get a little tired, for they write me some topsy-turvy whenever I go. Mamma is writing this letter for me, and says you won't trouble to answer it, but I guess you will, for it is the first letter I ever wrote, and I commenced it myself, but got so tired I could not finish it.

WILLIE R. P. R.

I don't think either of those good grandmas ever calls Willie boy horrid. Your letter came before Christmas. Now that it is over, I hope you have the steamer and the train of cars, and are enjoying them very much.

GOVERNMENT, NEW YORK.

My sister Grace and myself have had so much fun with our donkeys that I will tell about them. They were called Mexican burros, and were sent by express from Iowa by Judge Hale, now Governor of Wyoming Territory. The biggest one was three and a half feet high, and of a brown color, and we called him Popsy. The little one was of a mouse-color, and known as Miss Jumbo. All the little girls and boys in town rode or drove them, and I had the best of them. Popsy and his cousin was riding Miss Jumbo, when she came to a mud-puddle, and deliberately dropped her head and kicked up her heels, landing him on the other side of it. I had to get up in the morning that we cared to get up led us to part with them. Miss Jumbo was offered as a prize for three hundred little boys to run for at the fair, and I won it. Popsy and papa exchanged Popsy with a circus company for a beautiful little pony. He would trot, walk on two feet, stand up, lie down, or sit up, and was a fine waltzer in the circus. He accidentally bit the fingers of my sister Grace while she was feeding him some candy, and finally he sick and died, and is now buried just out of town. We have not any pets just now. ELVA C. (10 years old).

What a pity the pony died! If you have any more entertaining pets, be sure to write about them.

MONROE, NORTH CAROLINA.

I gladly send in my name as a member of the Housekeepers' Sociable. Not that I dislike washing dishes, like Rosalie, for we often have pleasant times over our work, but I think the Sociable will cause us to talk as if we knew one another. I am fond of cooking; I made the bread to-day. I keep a book to write down the cakes, etc., when made, but the recipes may not be forgotten, but I do not get much, as my studies take up some hours; then I am sketching from nature, and painting. I milk the cow, and help mamma with the baby; then my sister and I have the care of the chickens, over one hundred in number. The egg money is ours. Our chickens are good rat-catchers—better than the cats. I am fond of natural history, and often find some singular things in this part of the country, but my letter would be too long if I mentioned them. This summer our sweet-potato vines bloomed freely, contrary to the general way. Can you raise so many chickens and cats, and not another? Our cat Smitty will growl like a dog at strangers, and Sandy sits up and begs at meal-time; both learned their tricks from a little dog we had. My sister Lila has had her tomsit cut twice. She is six years old, and I am eleven years old to-morrow, and we will have a candy pull then.

NELLIE B.

BARTOW COUNTY, GEORGIA.

I have been living in Georgia four years. We came from Charleston, South Carolina. I think I would like to go back there one of these days, but I like the country because we can ride horse-back, raise so many chickens and cats, and have animals too. I have a little pet calf named Rosalie; it has no mother. I have had rabbits and owls for pets, but I think I like dogs best. My sister Lila has had her tomsit cut twice. She is six years old, and I am eleven years old to-morrow, and we will have a candy pull then.

We are two little boys, aged seven and nine years. Mamma reads YOUNG PEOPLE to us in the evening. We are so interested in the Post office Box that we raise so many chickens and cats, and money, we would send it; but with the money we earned last summer carrying water for the men mamma subscribed for Our Little Ones for Bertie, and the Young People for me. We came from Pennsylvania last spring, and live out on the prairie. We have a large pond, and last week it was frozen over, and we had lots of fun skating out on it. We have a pony

WILLIE AND BETTIE U.

ELK CITY, KANSAS.

I have just been reading your paper, and I came across a good deal of writing and pictures. I am sure I agree with her, for week-days we have nine to do for, and I do get so tired of the dishes. I think it would be very nice to join that club. My sister Lila has had her tomsit cut. I am fourteen years old.

MAY F. W.

Annie V. and Dora S. here is a game which I think will please you. When your little friends next meet, you may try it:

THE BIRD-FANCIER.

A cage of chairs must be made in the middle of the room; then a number of pieces of paper must be cut out, as many as there are players. On half of them the names of birds are written. Then they are folded up, and put in a box. Each player, who must each draw one. Those who draw a blank sit still.

When the birds are all in the cage, the Merchant stands in the middle of them; and from that moment they must never look away from him, unless penalty of paying a forfeit.

On the merchant's order, the birds must round the cage and try to make the birds break this rule by any artifice they can—talking to them, calling them by name, etc., etc.

"One of the players says," "I have a good many fine birds here—a wise owl, a fat goose, a merry lark, etc.; who will buy?"

"One of the players says," "I will." Describe your

The merchant must then repeat all their names, and enumerate their good qualities.

A great deal of fun may be produced by the description of the birds. The names of the birds, which should be appropriate to their characters and appearances, and by which, sometimes, the purchaser may divine the player who is the paragon. The names of the birds may be written on a bird he likes, and she is immediately released from her cage. Then the bird vender pays her a bobson forfeit, and all the birds not selected pay forfeits to their owner. Example of the game:

MERCHANT. "I have here a choice aviary of birds; will any one buy?"

Any one of the company who pleases may walk round the birds, as if they were to be seen, then look away from their proprietor. If they do, they have to pay a forfeit.

At last the purchaser comes forward, and the merchant says: "Buy a nice parrot, sir? Very fine bird. Feathers very bright and beautiful, eyes like diamonds, and a wonderful talker; she chatters all day, and repeats everything she hears."

PURCHASER. "Thanks; but I prefer a song bird. Have you a nightingale?"

MERCHANT. "Yes, sir; a very charming singer, to make a daisy bird, with a nice nest, with a plumage of a modest brown, soft, elegant, and lady-like; and she sings charmingly! Only she has the fault of turning day into night, and of troubling people's sleep, by keeping them awake with delight."

PURCHASER. "I will buy her at once. Name your price."

The merchant sets a high price on her bird. The player who represents the nightingale leaves the circle. The merchant owes her a forfeit of a bonbon; the wretched ones give bonbons to the B. A. and E. T. B.

In giving the report of our Cot fund this month, we call special attention to the letters published in connection with it, particularly the one signed Anna Edna. Sister Miriam, whose voice was so kind and loving, has been taken hence. The children will not forget her goodness, we are sure.

MY LITTLE COT FRIENDS.—Most of you may remember, in a letter, my telling you of Sister Miriam, who had charge of our ward, and who was so sunny and bright; it always made you feel better to see her. How have I to tell you that she is no longer with us. God has taken her away from the painful sights she daily saw to that bright home above, where "there shall be no more death, neither sorrow, nor crying, neither any more pain." After a very short illness, she died at the hospital October 24, 1882.

In the early time I visited our ward I found in our Cot—the one Sister Miriam had selected to be Cot—a funny old-fashioned-looking little girl named Mary Murray; but if I had not had the help of the ticket over her cot I am afraid I could not have told you her name, as she said it so faintly. She has some trouble with her back; but as she is able to walk round the room now, I hope she will soon be better. Most of the little cots were filled, and I can assure you the talking and noise was great. Two little lame ones were shown me how they could run a race, so you see they felt very bright, and I know when any of us who have denied ourselves for this object visit the ward and our Cot some day—when it is really ours, I mean—and see some little one resting in it, and in comfort although sick, we will be very happy and thankful to God.

Affectionately yours, AUNT ENNA.

BALLETON CENTRE, NEW YORK.

I have a little sister Alice not quite six years old. I am eight. We live in a little house with a big yard, and all over the front porch. We have not any pets except a white cat and a sister. Mamma does not like cats, because they kill our birds. Last summer we had orioles, robin-red-breasts, and yellow-birds' nests in our yard, and a little chippie-bird's nest in the tree, and one in a flowering currant-bush under our bedroom window. We have a great big chestnut-tree close by the house, and Alice and I have picked up and sold chestnut-tugs for one dollar, and we want to send it to you for Young People's Cot. We have had HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE for a year, and think of getting up a club for next year. GRACIE L. MONROEHOUSE.

HARRISBURG, PENNSYLVANIA.

I WAS very much interested in Mrs. John Lillie's story about Haydn. I hope she will continue a series of stories about the great musicians, for I think that the little boys and girls who are taking music lessons would like very much to know about the composers whose pieces they are afterwards studying. I also liked the story about "Miriolo's Mulatto" very much. I enclose a dollar for Young People's Cot. EMMA D. BAILEY.

FORT KEOGH, MONTANA.

I am a little boy in Fort Keogh, Montana. My father is an officer in the army. I had fifty cents, and I thought I would like to give it to Young People's Cot, so I send fifty cents in stamps, because I can not send silver through the post. I will try to get some of the boys to send some. I hope I can send some more some other day. Very truly your little friend, FLOURNOY CARTER.

FLORENCE, OHIO.

I have never written to YOUNG PEOPLE before, but my brother and I have taken it ever since it came. All the children in our school have their pets. I have an indigo bird, one of three found in a nest in a currant-bush. We have opened its cage door to let it go, but it seems to like its home with us. I have a sister who is older than myself; she is taking lessons on the violin. Her name is Fanny Adele. Florence Wynn, Charlie Parmie, Bert Alcorn, Willie Lamb, Fanny, and I got up a fair to raise some money for the Cot. We made paper dolls and other things besides, but nothing sold so well as the candy. Each one got some sugar, and so helped to furnish the paper. Kindly enclosed two dollars for Young People's Cot. KATE WATSON.

BOSTON, MASSACHUSETTS.

I enclosed find two dollars, which two boys—Herbert L. Felton and Walter E. Felton—received for an impromptu fair which they got up themselves. They wished to send it for Young People's Cot. Herbert takes HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, and read of it there.

NEW YORK CITY.

When I sent the first money to the Cot, and promised to send more, I did not mean to be so long about it, but every time I saved up, something came along, and I had to begin all over again. First it was the fund for dear Mrs. Garfield, then the Michigan sufferers, and after that Christmas. With the beginning of June I had two dollars, but a neighbor came in to see mother and her for a poor woman with three or four children, the big one not five years old, whose husband had been dead six weeks, and who thought she could support herself and them by making a sort of store of her front room, and selling things. She had no money, but had got the goods on credit. Now she was in great distress, for the robbers had broken in and stolen everything. The only way of paying for the goods had been her hope of selling them, and now she had no goods, and had to pay all this money. I went to the Cot, and I wanted the money for the poor woman, and after thinking for a while, gave it to help raise the one hundred and fifty dollars for the poor woman, for I thought the poor woman while to get all the Cot money, and perhaps I might, by trying hard, save another two dollars, but the other could not well wait. Monday finished the two dollars, and I was glad to have it reach you on Thanksgiving-day. I tell you all this only that you may know when you can say those things that make me feel so badly. I can't little girls do no better than that. I have heard of the Cot?—and though the result is not much, I have really tried. A SICK ONE.

A CHRISTMAS CAROL.

WHO WAS HE?

BY L. A. FRANCE.

HE was born in the year 1780, in a town now called Franklin, but formerly Salisbury, situated near the centre of New Hampshire.

State by President Harrison, and again, in 1850, the same honor was conferred upon him by President Fillmore.

His name is connected with almost every public interest of his time, and he was a noted speaker and political leader.

He was thrown from his carriage and received severe injuries in May, 1852, and died in October of the same year.

His father served in the Revolutionary war, and it was to him that General Washington said, on the night when he was posted as guard before the General's headquarters, "Captain —, I believe I can trust you."

He was a very delicate boy, but grew to be a very strong man.

He was taught to read at home, and attended the town school at intervals until he was about fourteen years old, but on account of his delicate health he spent more time in out-door sports than at his studies.

His particular friend and companion at this time was an old British soldier who had come to live in a house on his father's farm. From him he learned the delights of fishing, and heard wonderful tales of adventures.

He was fond of reading, but had access to but few books.

He attended an academy in Exeter when he was about fourteen. Although he afterward became a most eloquent speaker, he could not, when a boy, deliver even the most simple declamation before the school, and failed whenever he was persuaded to make the attempt.

He entered Dartmouth College when he was fifteen, and graduated in 1801. He was not considered more than an average scholar during his first two years in college, but in his third year he began to show considerable talent both as a thinker and an orator. He became the principal debater in the college society, and at the end of his Junior year was the best writer and speaker in the college.

After he graduated he studied law, and worked at times to get the money to continue his studies.

A short time after he was admitted to the bar he removed to Portsmouth, and soon rose to distinction.

He was elected to Congress in 1812.

He ranked among the most distinguished jurists in the country.

When the two-hundredth anniversary of the landing of the Pilgrims was celebrated, he delivered the address.

In 1841 he was appointed Secretary of

FLORIO AND FLORELLA.

A Christmas Fairy Tale

BY MRS. W. J. HAYS.

II.

HIGH up in the Swiss mountains a storm was brewing. On their cloud-capped summits nothing could be seen but snow, dazzling, blinding white snow, and wreaths of vapor which congealed as it fell. All day the people of the hamlets had been preparing for the visitor, knowing full well that they should be housed for weeks after its descent, and as Christmas was approaching, it was needful that much should be done.

As the day grew darker each hurried to complete his or her work, and none essayed more eagerly to do this than young Franz, the goat-herd; but try as he would, the heedless, wanton little flock were constantly escaping from him, and if it had not been for Jan, the great mastiff of the famous St. Bernard breed, he would have been still more troubled. As it was, he found one goat missing when he went to house them, and again he had to take his alpenstock and try what he could do.

By this time the storm was indeed upon them, and between the wind and the snow, the icy atmosphere and the darkness, Franz had about concluded to let the goat go, when Jan began to sniff about and bark, and show by signs as easily read as print that he was seeking something. Franz thought it must be on account of the goat, but just then old Nan appeared with her customary capriciousness, and made no resistance to the cord with which Franz bound her.

Still Jan kept up his scratching and sniffing and barking, and Franz knew only too well that there was no use in opposing him, although his fingers and toes were half frozen.

As soon as the dog saw that Franz recognized the necessity of following him he quieted down, and with a zealous industry nosed the path from side to side, as if in search of something; nor did he have to go far, for they presently descried what seemed like a big snow heap on one side of the now undiscoverable path.

Here Jan halted and looked intently; then he began scratching and whining again, and Franz saw a bit of cloth. Soon an arm appeared, and next a leg, and after vigorous work from both Franz and Jan, the whole figure of a child, clasping something in its arms, was uncovered. Dead or alive, Franz knew not which it was; but very well he knew what it was the child carried, for its big bushy red tail showed it to be a fox, and it too was as motionless and lifeless as the child.

The goat-herd had braved the dangers of the mountains all his lifetime and knew how to be cool and decided in the presence of danger. He had his knife and drinking-cup beside him, and his horn slung over his shoulder. In a moment he had made Nan stand still while he milked her, and then he pried open the stiff lips of the lad, and forced the warm liquid within. As he did so, the child revived and swallowed, for he had not been long unconscious. Then putting him on Jan's back, and driving Nan before him, Franz made his way home as best he could.

It was late when tired Franz, whose mother was in the doorway looking anxiously for him, arrived. All the children were within, and the fire was burning brightly. On the table the soup was steaming. An exclamation of surprise arose from all as Jan and his burden marched in.

"Who is it? Where did he come from? Where did you find him? What was he doing all alone in the storm?" burst from all their lips.

"So, so; slowly, please," answered the cool and courageous Franz. Then he told them his adventure.

"A stranger lad lost on the road-side," murmured the mother, as she took the boy from Jan and carefully un-dressed him, the children meanwhile attending to the nearly frozen fox.

"Poor child! poor child! he shall be welcome. A sorry Christmas it is for him."

"Not when he fell into your hands, good mother," said Franz, lading out the soup.

"No indeed!—no indeed," said one and all.

But the mother's words seemed to be the truth, for though the child revived and was able to take nourishment, a fever set in, from which it did not rally. Day by day he lay in the little curtained recess where he could see them all with his great wondering eyes, watching them carve their beautiful toys—for this was their winter work—but saying nothing, for he knew not their language, and only one word had he uttered which they could understand.

This word was simply "Edelweiss." "Edelweiss," he muttered, when the fever was at its height, and "Edelweiss," he softly whispered when dreaming.

The children called him "Little Edelweiss," and fed his fox, which lapped their hands, and brought a sweet smile to the face of the little sufferer.

Christmas-eve would be on the morrow, and all were busy dressing the room with boughs of evergreen. The tree stood in the corner waiting for its glittering fruit. Outside the sheaf of grain had been tied to a pole for the snow-birds. All had some trifling gifts prepared for a joyful keeping of the day, Franz only seemed to be uneasy. He would glance at the pale face of his little foundling, and then he would look out to see if the weather was fine, and at last he reached up for his thickest wrap and staff, and away he went up the mountain-side. Nothing could be seen up that way but the red roof of a convent, and peak after peak of ice piercing the blue sky.

It was late when he returned and put something carefully behind the tree. All were waiting for their supper, for they were anxious to go to bed that the dear Christmas might the sooner come.

His mother scolded a little, but the stranger boy put up his thin hand reprovingly, as if he could not bear to have Franz rebuked, and then they all laughed, for they all loved Franz.

But soon they were sleeping quietly, and the moon shone upon happy faces—only the little guest tossed and murmured "Edelweiss."

The morrow came, and with it many a merry greeting. And now they could hardly wait for the day to pass. Long before dark the table was set with its sausages and spiced cake, and beside each plate a mysterious packet—for the tree bore only glittering trifles. And when the girls in their pretty scarlet bodices and whitest chemisettes sat down, and the mother reverently asked God's blessing on their food, all broke into a joyful carol. Then they examined their gifts, and the little stranger was given his share of the good things.

But just then Franz arose and brought from behind the tree a curious-looking box. Tearing off the papers a small but hardy plant was revealed, and, putting it in the hands of the invalid, Franz pointed to its buds and said the one word, "Edelweiss."

A cry of joy burst from the boy's lips, and he clasped his treasure as if it had been indeed a flower from paradise.

"Edelweiss! Edelweiss!" was all he could utter, but the sweet and grateful tone thanked Franz better than a thousand other words could have done.

"Why, Franz," they all asked, "where did you get it at this season? It does not grow in winter."

"No," said Franz. "I know that it does not, but I have often found it in summer, and I just happened to remember plucking some by the roots last spring for Father Gluckner up at the convent—he is always gathering roots and herbs for the sick, and he has a great curiosity to transplant wild flowers that he may see what they will produce under cultivation. See! this plant already has flowers—months too soon. He has several others, so he gave me this quite willingly."

While they were talking, the little stranger had drawn a small case of birch bark from his pocket, and was earnestly comparing the faded and pressed flower it contained with the blooming one beside him. His face glowed with happiness, and from that moment his restoration to health began.

THE TWINS OF ITALY.

BY MRS. WILLIAM S. CARTER.

LONG years ago, across the sea,
Two lovely baby boys
Filled a small home with merry glee,
With laughter, fun, and noise.

Their young Italian mother sat
Beside her door and spun,
While by her side her lovely twins
Rolled laughing in the sun.

Till, tired at last, they'd leave their play,
And by her side recline,
While she of little Jesus told,
The babe of Palestine.

One day a handsome stranger passed
The humble cottage door,
And standing at their mother's knee
The pretty pair he saw.

Not laughing now, but rapt and still,
With calm uplifted eyes,
Hearing the oft-repeated tale
With ever-fresh surprise.

The stranger heard the story too,
And to the mother said:
"And will you bring your boys to see A picture I have made?"

"A picture of the Jesus-child
Held on his mother's arm,
If you will bring your lovely twins,
They shall be safe from harm."

And so, ere many days had passed,
The mother brought her boys
To where the handsome painter lived,
Who gave them sweets and toys.

And played with them and fondled them,
And so acquaintance made,
Till they to come there every day
No longer were afraid.

And then each day he painted them
As first he saw them stand,
One chin upon the folded arms,
One resting on the hand.

And made of each an angel-child
With wings like little bird;
And placed them at the feet of Him
Whose story they had heard.

And still, though centuries have passed,
The glorious picture stands
Just as it left, so long ago,
The painter Raphael's hands.

And still the fair Italian twins
With earnest eyes you see
Just as they stood that summer's day
Beside their mother's knee.

THE MERRY ADVENTURES OF ROBIN HOOD.

BY HOWARD PYLE.

I.

IN merry England in the time of old, when King Henry II. ruled the land, there lived in Sherwood Forest, in Nottinghamshire, a famous outlaw whose name was Robin Hood. No archers ever lived who could excel him and the sevenscore merry men that gathered about him, all outlaws like himself.

When Robin Hood was a youth of about eighteen years of age the sheriff of Nottinghamshire proclaimed a shooting match, offering as a prize to the best bowman a cask of stout old ale. Then Robin Hood said to himself, "I will go too"; so up he took his stout bow and a score or more of broadcloth-yard arrows, and started off all in the dawn of a sweet May day, from Locksley Town to Nottingham. Onward he walked briskly until in Sherwood Forest he came upon a party of the King's Foresters, all clad in Lincoln green, and seated beneath the shade of a great oak-tree, making themselves merry over a huge pasty and a barrel of ale.

When they saw Robin one of them called out, "Halloa! where goest thou, little boy, with thy penny bow and thy farthing shafts?"

"Now," quoth Robin, "my bow and eke my arrows are as good as thine, and, moreover, I go to the shooting match at Nottingham Town to try my skill with other yeomen there."

Then all shouted with laughter, and one said, "Why, boy, thou hast scarce lost thy milk-teeth, and yet thou pratest of standing up with the best archers in all Nottinghamshire."

Then Robin grew angry, and, quoth he, "I'll hold the best of ye twenty marks that I cleave the elout at three-score rods."

At this all laughed louder than before, and one cried, "Well boasted, boy, when no target is nigh to make good thy wager."

"Harkee!" cried Robin, his cheeks red with anger; "yonder at the glade's end is a herd of deer. Twenty marks upon it I cause the best hart among them to die."

"Now done!" cried he who had spoken first. "Twenty marks that thou causest no beast to die."

Then Robin took his stout bow and strung it, and drawing a gray-goose shaft to his ear, loosed the string. Straight flew the shaft, and the noblest hart of all the herd leaped aloft and fell dead in the forest path.

"Ha!" cried Robin, "I wot the wager were mine were it a hundred pounds."

Then all the Foresters were filled with rage, and he who had lost the wager was madder than all the rest. "Nay," cried he, "the wager is none of thine, and get thee gone, for by the law of the land thine ears should be clipped close to thy head."

"Catch him!" cried another.

"Nay," said another still, "let him e'en go, because of his tender years."

Never a word said Robin, but he turned on his heel with a grim look and strode away, but his heart was full of anger. Then he who had lost the wager, and whose head was dizzy with ale, seized his bow, and crying, "I'll hurry thee anon," sent an arrow whistling after Robin. But for the ale, Robin had never taken another step, for the arrow whistled within a palm's-breadth of his head. Then he turned quickly, and bending his own bow, sent a shaft back in return. "Ye said I was no archer," cried he, "but say so now again." But the Forester never spake more, for he fell upon the grass, his shafts rattling about him, and Robin's arrow in his heart. But all before the others could gather their wits, the youth was gone.

ROBIN ON HIS WAY TO NOTTINGHAM.

Then the other Foresters lifted the dead man up and bare him away to Nottingham Town.

Meantime Robin ran through the greenwood, and all the joy and brightness was gone from everything, for he had slain a man. "Alas!" cried he, "thou hast found me an archer that will make thy wife wring her hands in sorrow."

So a hundred pounds reward was set upon his head, and he became an outlaw, and lay hidden for two years within Sherwood depths. But in those two years many others joined him, and formed a famous band, and chose him to be their leader and their chief, and many merry adventures they had, as you shall read hereafter.

TWO UNEXPECTED NEW-YEAR'S CALLS

BY MARGARET EYTINGE.

"PEARS to me if I had some of 'em, 'pears to me I'd git well right away," said Tony, in a fretful voice. "Don't you 'member 'em, Sabie?"

"Yes, I 'member 'em good," replied Sabie, fanning the sick boy with an old straw fan she had picked up somewhere. And then she went on to say the same thing she had said a hundred times or more before when asked the same question.

"They wuz a-growin' longside that place they called 'wood,' though it didn't look much like wood to me—oh, sich lots of 'em—red as your flanning shirt, Tony, an' a-kinder a-hidin' under their greens. An' the man wot wuz a-cuttin' a tree says, 'Eat away, young 'uns, they's free.' An' us 'at away an' away, an' oh, they wuz puffickly 'licious. An' there wuz jes' as many wen us stopped a-eatin' as wen us beginned. They wuzn't a bit like the strawberries they gives me to the markit sometimes wen they can't sell 'em. Them's smashed an'— But wot you a-cryin' for, Tony?"

"'Pears to me," sobbed Tony, "if I had some of that werry place I'd git well right away. They wuz so 'freshin', Sabie!"

Poor little fellow, with nobody to look after him but Sabie and an old grandmother! And the old grandmother, who had been growing feebler and feebler year by year for many years, could now do nothing but sit in her big rocking-chair and knit coarse stockings and mittens, singing the while, in a sweet, quavering voice, the old-fashioned hymns she had learned in her girlhood.

Sabie sold these stockings and mittens during the cold months from door to door in poor neighborhoods, and on what money was earned in this way the three just managed to live. But in warm weather, had it not been for the kindness of a jolly fat man who kept an eating-saloon near by, they would have often gone hungry. He saved for them the best of the food left by his customers (some of whom, thinking themselves hungrier than they really were, ordered more than they could eat), and often when business had been unusually brisk he added two or three rolls, a handful of crackers, or a yesterday's pie.

A very good girl was Sabie. Not pretty, though she might have been if her face had not been so pale and thin, for she had soft gray eyes with long lashes, and curly brown hair; and not clever, for she did not even know her letters. She was nearly ten, three years older than Tony, and yet she had never been to school a day in her life. Her mother dying, after a long illness, when she was but six years old, the care of her little brother fell almost entirely upon her, Granny then being able to go out with the mittens and stockings herself. But now that Granny had forgotten her way about the streets, and could only see enough to knit, Sabie had to do the selling, the marketing, and the house-work, all three. She was a shy child, and made no acquaintances either in the tall tenement-house in the cellar-basement of which they lived, or abroad, and so, you see, her world was a very small one, containing only Tony and Granny and two or three of the market people.

Tony had been delicate and almost helpless from his birth, but Sabie loved him none the less for that. In fact, I think she loved him more because he was so dependent on her. That's a way girls and women have, as perhaps you know. And when, just after Christmas, he began to cough so badly that he grew so tired he could no longer sit up, her heart ached for him, and all the time she could spare from her work she spent at his bedside trying to amuse and cheer him.

Now the summer before the winter of which I write these two children and their grandmother had been taken by the cook of the eating-saloon to spend the day in the country, where some friends of hers lived. Sabie and Tony had never been in the country before, and at first, awed by the silence broken only by the rustling of the leaves, the hum of the insects, and the song of the birds, they spoke in whispers; but soon after arriving at the very small cottage of their friend's friends they left Granny and the other older folks to chat and drink tea, and wandered off hand in hand together, mocking the birds as they went. They kept straight on through the wood in which the small cottage stood, turning neither to the right nor the left lest they should get lost, until they reached the extreme edge, and there they found a patch—a long patch—of wild strawberries.

"Strawberries-a-growin'! strawberries-a-growin'!" they shouted, and down went Sabie on her knees before them, an example which Tony soon followed.

"They's littler than market strawberries," said she, "but they's cummin'er, an'"—tasting one—"sugarer. I wonder if us kin take some."

"Kin us, man?" called Tony to a man who was cutting down a dead tree on the other side of the road.

"Can you what?" asked the man.

"Take some of them strawberries?" answered Tony.

"Take away; they're free," was the reply.

And they did take away. They picked and ate until their faces and hands were stained a strawberry red, and only stopped when their friend came to look for them and tell them it was almost time to go home.

That day was like a rainbow set in their dreary life, and though the good-natured cook to whom they owed it had returned soon after to Germany, her native land, they had never ceased to think of her with love and thankfulness, and to remember her in their prayers.

It had been a day in June—that beautiful day—and now it was the last of December, but still its brightness came back to the sick boy, and with it a longing for the sweet red berries that grew on the edge of the old wood.

"Pears to me, if I had some, this pain in my breast would go away," he moaned. "They wuz so good, Sabie. I kin see 'em now wen I shuts me eyes. Pooty red strawberries. Oh! if you could on'y git some fur me, Sabie, dear Sabie!"

And at last, on New-Year's Day, Sabie put on her shabby felt hat and her patched jacket, and said to her grandmother,

"Granny, I'm goin' 'way a little while fur somethin' fur Tony. Take good care of him till I gits back." And the old woman stopped singing, "Come, ye sinners, poor and needy," long enough to say "Yes, yes, dearie."

Then Sabie took ten cents from behind the clock on the mantel, and a little basket some one had given her from the closet, and kissing Granny and her brother good-by, started off in search of the wild strawberries. It was a bitter cold day, but she drew her jacket tightly about her, and running as fast as she could—she had not forgotten a step of the way they had gone that lovely day—she soon reached the ferry-house, and timidly handed her ten cents to the ticket-seller.

"Where do you want to go?" asked he.

"Apple'ill," said Sabie, meaning Appleville.

"The fare is thirty cents—twenty more. Here are only ten."

The child shrank back, while her eyes filled with tears.

"Stop a moment," said the ticket-seller, seeing the tears.

"Why do you want to go to Appleville?"

"To git somethin' for me poor little sick brother," she answered, with a sob, "an' I haven't another penny. Neither has me gran'mother."

"Well, there's a ticket that'll take you there and back. And now cut along. The boat's just in."

Sabie grasped the ticket, gasped "Thank you, sir," and "cut along" at such a rate that—the boat having yet five minutes to wait before starting—the people already on board and those going on board looked at her in surprise.

In fifteen minutes more she stood in New Jersey, holding her ticket tight in her hand, and looking about her in a half-frightened way.

"Apple'ill—I want to go to Apple'ill," she repeated to every one who passed her.

But every one was so intent upon getting somewhere himself or herself that no one noticed her. At last, in sheer desperation, she clutched the silk cloak of a lady who was hurrying by.

"Apple'ill—oh! Apple'ill," she said, desperately.

The lady stopped and took the ticket from her cold red hand. "Appleville," she said; "that's not on my road, but I'll show you your train, child, and the conductor will let you off at the place."

So the lady led her to a train of cars that was waiting for passengers, saw her seated in one of them, and then hurried away again.

And Sabie was no sooner seated than the train, the locomotive of which had been snorting and whistling and screaming for some time, started, and she found herself whirled along at great speed.

"I'M SO TIRED AND SLEEPY I CAN'T TRY ANY MORE NOW."

But how different everything looked from the time she was whirled over this road before! Then there were green grass and green trees and lovely flowers on every side. Now there was nothing to be seen but snow—snow—snow. The ground was covered with it, the trees and bushes were laden with it. Poor Sabie! she had thought that the snow came only in the city—that the country was always bright and green.

"I wonder if them 'll be under the snow?" she said to herself. "An' me with no shovel to dig 'em out! But I'll try to scoop out a few with me han's anyhow."

In a moment or two more the conductor called "Apple-ville!"

"That's your place, little girl," said the man who sat next to her, and getting up in haste, she stumbled through the car and out on the platform, from which a brakeman lifted her down and placed her on the steps of the station. Sabie climbed these steps as the train flew away, and when she had reached the top one there lay the broad road they had travelled that June day before her. But it, like all the other roads, was covered with snow, with the exception of a narrow pathway made by a snow-plough on one side. But Sabie's stout little heart would not give up. "Poor Tony!" she said, and began plodding along the pathway.

It grew colder and colder; her ears and feet ached, her hands were numb; but still she toiled on. "They wuz by the end of this street," she said, and her breath froze on the air as she spoke. "Maybe there's a few left. If there be, I'll git 'em somehow." And on and on she trudged, with all the patience and endurance born of love, until the wood was reached.

But, alas! the spot where the strawberries had grown was one vast heap of snow.

Then, for the first time since she started on her quest, Sabie's heart began to sink. It would do no good to "seep" there with her hands. Despairingly she looked about her for something with which to dig. The branch of a tree, half buried in the snow, lay across the path. She tried to pull it from its resting-place, but her hands were so cold it slipped from her grasp.

"If I could only git a few—only five or six!" she murmured, as a drowsy feeling came over her; "but I'm so tired an' sleepy I can't try any more now;" and down she sank beside the fallen branch, and fell into a sleep from which she never would have awakened had not a sleigh, full of merry boys out making New-Year's calls, come dashing along that way.

"Hello!" shouted the boy that was driving. "What's that I came near running over?" and he stopped the horse suddenly.

"A bundle of old clothes, I guess," said one of his companions. "Drive on, Sherry, do please. We want to get to Aunt Hannah's by dinner-time. Just think of the mince-pie and doughnuts awaiting there, and start along your fiery steed."

But Sherry jumped out instead of driving on. "Look here, boys," said he, bending over Sabie, "it's a poor little girl, almost if not quite frozen to death." And raising her in his arms, he carried her to the sleigh, where the boys, with many exclamations of pity and wonder, soon had her wrapped snugly in the buffalo-robe, and on her way to make a totally unexpected call on Farmer Joy, his good wife, and pretty daughter.

"Here they are! here they are!" joyfully cried the pretty daughter as the sleigh stopped at the gate, and running to the door, she called out, cheerily, "Happy New-Year!" while her mother smiled the wish over her shoulder.

"Happy New-Year, Aunt Hannah and Cousin Dora!" shouted the boys in answering chorus.

"And we've brought you a ealler we picked up on the road," added Sherry, laughing outright in his joy as he peeped into the buffalo-robe and saw that Sabie had unclosed her eyes, and wasn't anything like frozen to death after all.

And then he lifted her out, and with Ned Morningstar bearing part of the buffalo-robe, as pages in olden times used to carry the trains of the great ladies, he staggered up the path and up the stoop, and placed his astonished burden before his equally astonished aunt and cousin.

"I couldn't git 'em—I couldn't git 'em," were the first words Sabie said.

"Couldn't get what, dear?" asked kind Aunt Hannah, as she placed her on the dining-room sofa, and pulled off the old shoes to rub the icy feet.

Sabie was unable to tell just then; she was so full of tingling aches and pains, and her head buzzed so strangely.

But two hours later, when warm from head to foot, and dressed in some comfortable garments that the pretty daughter had outgrown, and after a dinner the like of which she had never even dreamed of, she told her simple story.

And when it came to an end, Sherry went out into the hall, making a sign to his comrades to follow, which they did immediately, for they were all true to the "General," as they called him.

"I say, boys," said he, "let's make up a good New-Year's present for her—she hadn't any Christmas, poor little thing—and take her home. We can make a New-Year's call on Tony and Granny at the same time, and be back plenty early enough for Cousin Dora's party too."

"All right, General," chimed in Ned Morningstar; "and we'll get Aunt Hannah to give us a jar of her preserved strawberries, and they'll bring the young chap around; that is, if strawberries can do that same. They aren't wild, but I'm wild after them."

"I'm with you," said Austin Hovel. "She's a real good sort, she is. Why, one of our sisters couldn't have done more for us."

"Mine wouldn't do half as much for me," declared Sherry. "Why, it was only this morning she refused point-blank to bake more than fifteen buckwheats for me because I was late at breakfast."

"A most unisisterly, not to say shameful, proceeding," said Ned Morningstar, with mock indignation. "But come, we must straight to our aunt and cousin our plans unfold. Tempus fugit."

You may be sure Aunt Hannah and Cousin Dora heartily approved of the plans when they were unfolded. And they showed their approbation by packing into a bushel basket—an honest and true bushel basket—as their share of the New-Year gifts, a loaf of home-made bread, half a boiled ham, a roast chicken, a bowl of butter, a tin pail of fresh eggs, a paper bag filled with doughnuts, and some potatoes, onions, turnips, tea and sugar, not forgetting two jars of preserved strawberries.

And Matt, the hired man, brought out the two-horse sleigh, and putting the heavy basket in first, got in himself, took the reins, and waited for the others. Sabie, wrapped in a blanket, which she was to keep, was placed in the bottom of the sleigh beside the basket.

"She'll be warmer there than anywhere else," said Aunt Hannah.

Then the boys tumbled in, and the horses pranced, and the bells jingled, and away they went, to stop, in just one hour and three-quarters, in front of the tall tenement-house the cellar-basement of which Sabie called "home."

And didn't the turn-out cause a great excitement among the people in that neighborhood! Such a thing had never been seen there before, and the windows on each side of the block were filled with curious faces—faces that showed every stage of astonishment as Sabie was lifted from the sleigh, and the six fine, manly-looking boys followed her to call on Granny.

The old woman stopped singing "How tedious and tasteless the hours!" and looked at them with a glimmer of surprise as they trooped in.

"Happy New-Year, grandmother!" said they all; and Sherry laid a purse filled with silver half-dollars in her lap.

"Happy New-Year, my brave lads," said she.

And Matt brought in the bushel basket, Sherry going out to mind the horses as he did so, and opened a jar of strawberries in the twinkling of an eye.

"They's not the verry same, Tony," said Sabie, eagerly, "but I got 'em near that place, I did. And oh, Tony, I got lots an' lots of other good things too."

"Did you go 'way out there fur me, jist fur me?" asked Tony. "You's the bestest an' smartest sister ever wuz, an' I feel ever so much better this verry minnit. Happy New-Year, Sabie!"

And the General and his company got back to Joy Farm just as the party began, and when the guests had all arrived.

Annt Hannah told the story of Sabie's search for the strawberries, and the boys told about their visit to Tony and his grandmother, and the result was at least thirty more good friends for the family in the cellar-basement.

And in consequence of that result the cellar-basement was "to let" in a few weeks, and Sabie, Tony, and Granny were living in a comfortable four-roomed cottage only a stone's-throw from Farmer Joy's farm-house.

And there they are living still. And when Sabie reads this story, as she is sure to do, she'll wonder how I came to know all about those two totally unexpected New-Year's calls.

WHEN I'M A MAN.

BY MARY A. BARR.

An eager youth with beaming eyes
 Looked out into the world,
 And cried, "My ship's in harbor yet,
 My banners still are furled,
 But I will do the thing I can
 When I'm a man!"

"There are such wrongs to be redressed,
 Such rights that need defense,
 I'll give my heart to all that's good,
 My scorn to all pretense;
 I'll work out many a noble plan
 When I'm a man!"

"I have so much to see and do,
 So much that I must say;
 When childhood's happy days have gone,
 With lessons and with play,
 Then I shall try the best I can
 To be a man."

CONCERNING WILD BOARS.

BY EDWARD I. STEVENSON.

HOW would some of the readers of YOUNG PEOPLE fancy being suddenly carried back a few hundreds of years to Christmas-tide and a royal Christmas-day banquet at the castle of some prince or proud knight living in those ages which we call "Dark"?

First of all to be stared at, up and down and round about, would be the stately hall, flashing with torches and great wax tapers. Running the length of this hall would be seen a long line of tables, covered with curiously flavored dishes (mostly prepared from meats) all served up in various splendid platters; and with them a vast array of wine flagons and drinking cups. Seated at these tables one would surely behold scores of merry knights and ladies, all eating and drinking and talking gayly together—eating and drinking a pretty good deal, too, most of them. The torch-light would flash and glimmer upon their dresses of gaudy silk and velvet, gold embroidered, and upon the burnished armor and banners hung along the walls above their heads.

Presently there would be a hush in the noisy fun, and every one would be seen to stand up before his trencher, and join in a wild cheer, as the head butler came marching in with a half-dozen pages at his heels. In that head butler's hands, upon a huge silver platter, would be borne an enormous wild boar's head, cooked to a turn, but wreathed with the plant called rosemary, and with the tusks and ear-tips gilded. This mighty dish, the king of all Christmas dishes of the time, would the butler set in the centre of the table.

Thereupon many a stout knight would drink a Christmas health in its honor, and vow, with his hand upon its head, some bold deed to be done ere another Christmas-tide should come round. And so (whether the good knight's vow was or not) would be kept one of the oldest and queerest of our ancestors' Christmas customs.

A good long time is it since the wild boar, at a certain season of the year one of the most ferocious of animals of the chase, grunted and trampled in an English forest. In France, Germany, Italy, and Greece, as well as in South America, Asia, and Africa, he still keeps his surly state. But when Henry the Second, about the year 1100, reigned, and was anxious to chase wild boars, there were no wild boars to be chased by his Majesty or anybody else. In fact, that savage creature had grown so scarce in the time of William the Conqueror that a law was passed causing the careless woodsman who should kill one to suffer the outrageously brutal punishment of having his eyes burned out. For what was the ruin of a poor peasant's life to those hard-hearted lords and fine gentlemen compared with a morning's sport?

Centuries after William the Conqueror and his turbulent sons had all passed away, Charles the First, or some of his subjects, tried to restore the race of wild boars to Britain. It was too late. The creatures had utterly vanished.

Both history and what Pat called "histhry that isn't thurc"—mythology—have much to say on the wild boar topic. For one example you must, when you are older, read Sir Walter Scott's novel Quentin Durward, which tells about the terrible William de la Marek—him they called "the Wild Boar of Ardenmes," from his hideous face. And then there was the great boar of Mount Erymanthus, in Greece, which stout Hereules caught in a net; and the boar of Calydon, and the cruel beast that gored pretty Adonis to death, besides a dozen more notable tuskers.

In Hindostan "pig-sticking," as the hunting of the Indian boar is called, is still considered fine sport. The beast is pursued on swift little horses. The great art is to bring him to bay, and stab him between the shoulders, from the saddle, with a broad-pointed steel spear expressly made for the purpose.

The Indian wild boar is small and vicious, and his tusks can inflict cruel gashes. But none of the race can surpass in bulk and ferocity the great wild boar still to be hunted in the deep forests of Germany and Holstein. The hunter needs plenty of courage and coolness to bring down this monstrous beast, whose glistening tusks can inflict frightful wounds. Nor does he lack agility and cunning. Woe to the hapless young nobleman, proud of his skill and splendid accoutrements, who is caught at a disadvantage as the battle finishes!

A rather touching little tragedy, two of the actors in which our artist has contrived to bring face to face with the readers of this paper, has been described by a foreign writer upon hunting subjects. A wealthy Pomeranian noble, Count M—, who owned a castle situated in a particularly wild region of that country, was making a winter visit to his estate, when he found himself laid on his back with a severe illness.

While slowly regaining enough strength to stand a fatiguing journey on horseback to the nearest railroad station, he ventured out-of-doors one bright winter day for a little exercise. He carried only a walking-stick in his hand, and was accompanied by a mongrel cur, the property of one of his tenants, which had shown a great liking for to have escaped this terribly out-of-place stranger's notice. But he had been too late. The hideous rover had both seen and heard the Count advancing up the path. He uttered a wild roar, and charged toward the spot from which the luckless Count had turned aside. He must have certainly darted after and discovered the invalid nobleman had not the dog, whose spirit was as brave as his breed was worthless, as if fully aware of his patron's helpless condition, stanchly stood his ground, barking furiously.

The bold little creature accomplished thus what he had undoubtedly tried to do. The attention and anger of the boar were instantly drawn upon him. The dog leaped about his foe's flanks, skillfully avoiding the boar's furious charges, and all the time seeming to do his best to confuse an adversary five times his bulk. He wisely seemed to make no effort to sustain any other than a purely defensive battle. In the mean time the trembling Count had with great difficulty managed to crawl up into the only sizable tree near at hand, a close-boughed fir.

He could see little of the gallant fight in progress upon the spot he had been able to quit. Full of admiration for his four-footed deliverer's pluck, he called as loudly and as often as he could for help. With wonderful strategy the dog had actually managed to escape the boar's tusks. Both he and his foe, who was now nearly blind with rage, were in the thick of their unequal contest, and filling the woods with their warcries, the dog panting, but full of pluck. Alas! the sound of the Count's voice was the poor creature's ruin.

Apparently understanding in a second that the Count was in a place of safety, and that he could think of himself, the dog suddenly turned and fled. Probably a tangle of frozen vines clutched fast one of his paws for a moment. Before he could loosen himself the boar was upon him, and with a lunge his cruel tusks had ended his small opponent's struggle and life together. The boar disappeared, to be overtaken in the afternoon by Count M—'s servants. Coming up in alarm and almost without weapons, they delivered their master from his perch half fainting, and joined with him in his grief over the little strategist to whom he owed his life.

In the course of the year, it is stated, Count M— erected a monument upon the spot where his humble friend met his death, setting forth gratefully the circumstances under which it happened.

THE BOAR TURNS UPON THE DOG.

his lordship's society. Unluckily Count M— walked further than he had intended. He found himself, all at once, nearly exhausted.

Deciding to make a short-cut for his door by a path running across a thickly grown corner of his park, he turned into it. How great was his terror when there appeared in the path, a little beyond his helpless self, a stray wild boar of immense size and ferocious appearance. Taking in at a single glance all the dangers of his situation, Count M— stepped hastily into the underbrush, hoping

PETER COOPER AND HIS INSTITUTE.

BY G. W. SHELDON.

THE boiler of the furnace in Mr. Peter Cooper's house having leaked one day, that gentleman sent out to a steam-engine shop to get a repairer. "Whose boiler is it?" asked the foreman. "Mr. Cooper's," was the reply. "If it is his," answered the other, "I will do the work myself." A few hours afterward Mr. Cooper heard somebody tinkering in the cellar, and on going down-stairs saw a bright young fellow in the ashes. "I am indebted to you," said the workman. "Through my studies at the Cooper Institute I have become a foreman."

Ten years afterward Mr. Cooper was invited to a dinner given by the architects of New York city, and whom should he see presiding at the festive board but the grateful repairer of his boiler. The next he heard of him was that the clever workman had invented a steam-pipe, and taken out a patent for it in England and in this country. His English patent he sold for a royalty of $50,000 a year, and so profitable was his American patent that he employed three hundred men to fill the orders of buyers. Only two years ago this successful graduate of the Cooper Institute died of hasty consumption, and left an estate worth a million of dollars. His name was Cameron, "and his integrity was equal to his talents," added Mr. Cooper, while telling me the interesting story a few days ago.

It is possible that some of the boys and girls who read YOUNG PEOPLE would like to become students in the Cooper Institute. If so, they will be pleased to know something about the institution and its founder.

On the seal of the corporation of the Cooper Institute Mr. Peter Cooper describes himself as "a mechanic of New York." When a boy he attended school only one year, and during that time only one-half of each school day. He helped his father make hats. At seventeen years of age he was apprenticed to a coach-maker. On becoming a man he invented a machine for shearing cloth. Next, he made furniture. Next, he became a grocer. Last, he manufactured glue and isinglass, and has stuck to the business for nearly sixty years, and made a fortune out of it. He is ninety-one years old, has lived in the days of every President of the United States, and was himself a candidate for the Presidency in 1876.

"While I have always recognized that the object of business is to make money in an honorable manner, I have endeavored to remember that the object of life is to do good," he said in his eighty-fourth year. "For all my public services," he remarked to me recently, "I have received only sixty dollars. That was a long time ago, and the pay was for sitting on the bench when I was an alderman." Among those public services were his advocacy of the building of the Croton Aqueduct, his contributions to the financial literature of the country, his efforts in laying the first Atlantic cable, his experiments in navigating canals by steam, his labors as a Public-school Commissioner, his construction of the first locomotive ever used in America, and, chief of all, his founding and endowing of the Cooper Institute for the Advancement of Science and Art.

About the year 1828 Mr. Cooper learned from a gentleman who had just returned from Europe that the Polytechnic School in Paris was a great success. "That which interested me most deeply," he remarked many years after, "was the fact that hundreds of young men from all parts of France were living on a crust of bread and undergoing great hardships in order to get the benefit of the lectures and instruction of that institution. I then remembered how glad I should have been if I could have found such an institution in my youth in New York city, with its doors open to give instruction at night—the only time I could command for study—and I reflected upon the fact that there must be a great many young men in this country situated as I was, who thirsted for the knowledge they could not reach, and would gladly avail themselves of opportunities which they had no money to procure.

"I determined, if ever I could acquire the means, I would build such an institution as would open its doors at night with a full course of instruction calculated to enable mechanics to understand both the theory and the most skillful practice of their several trades, so that they could not only apply their labor to the best possible advantage, but enjoy the happiness of acquiring useful knowledge, the purest and most innocent of all sources of enjoyment. By this means I hoped to contribute to the elevation and happiness of the industrial classes to which I belonged. Finally my plan also provided for a school of art suited to the wants of females during the day, with a reading-room and library open to both sexes from eight o'clock in the morning until ten o'clock at night."

Not until twenty-six years afterward did he "acquire the means." The corner-stone of the Cooper Institute was laid in 1854, and the large brown-stone edifice on Astor Place was thrown open to the public in 1859, having been built, said Mr. Cooper in an address at its public opening, that "the youth of my native city and country might gain that kind of useful knowledge which is needed to make them wise, good, and useful to themselves and their country." So much in earnest was the founder that he has spent more than two millions of dollars—twice the sum that young Cameron earned—in carrying out his purpose.

One result of this great generosity is that the boys and girls who go to the Cooper Institute to get the "useful knowledge" of which Mr. Cooper speaks do not have to pay anything for it. They can receive competent instruction in algebra, geometry, trigonometry, analytical and descriptive geometry, differential and integral calculus, elementary mechanics, natural philosophy, engineering, astronomy, chemistry, geology, oratory, telegraphy, drawing of all kinds (perspective, mechanical, architectural, industrial, and free-hand), modelling in clay, wood-engraving, and painting, and it won't cost them anything; and they can learn most of it in the evening, so that if necessary they can make money during the day to pay, or help pay, for their board and clothes.

During the school year that closed in the latter part of last May, 1227 pupils were admitted to the free night school of art; 936 pupils to the free night school of science; 756 pupils to the free art school for women; 60 pupils to the free school of telegraphy for women, and 403,449 persons to the free reading-room and library. To say that 1227 pupils were admitted to the free night school of art is about the same as saying that there were enough of them to fill a big church. The large hall of the Cooper Institute, where free lectures are given during the winter, is one of the very best in New York city for hearing, for safety, and for ventilation.

"You must be gratified, Mr. Cooper," I said, "with the success of your Institute, especially with the opportunities for earning a living which it has given to so many young women."

"I am more gratified with that," he replied, "than with anything else. It was one of the things that I was most concerned about, and I made a statement of it in my 'Deed of Transfer' of the building to the trustees. We have graduated two hundred and fifty women telegraphers in two years and a half, and the Western Union Telegraph Company, which has provided the Institute with a first-class teacher of telegraphy, gave most of them places right away, paying from five hundred to a thousand dollars a year, and not one of them had to wait a fortnight. For railroad telegraphing young women are better adapted than young men. They are always on hand, and hear the first ticking of a message passing through the instrument. This often prevents an accident to a train. Young men are apt to be flitting about when waiting for a message to arrive, and do not suit nearly so well.

"You must come and see the splendid arrangements we have for teaching telegraphy. Pupils come to our place," he added, "and behave themselves like gentlemen and ladies. They come because they want to. For ten years not a single complaint of misconduct has been made to the trustees by any one of our twenty or thirty teachers. Nine boys whom we graduated are now professors in colleges. An old German called to 'tank' me the other day for his son's success. The lad, once a pupil of the Cooper Institute, is now a professor in the great University of Berlin, and much esteemed. So little is written about the Cooper Institute that people hardly know of its possibilities and results. Every year it instructs three thousand young men and women. For myself, I try to keep the building in good shape. I was looking at my books to-day, and I find that I have spent on it $130,000 in the last two years."

To be admitted into the schools of the Cooper Institute a boy or girl must be not younger than fifteen years, and must be acquainted with the rudiments of reading, writing, and arithmetic. Young people of each sex can attend the lectures, and enter the night school of science, but only young women can enter the day school of art, there being a night school of art for the young men. The regular course of instruction is five years, and pupils are admitted by the simple rule "first come first served," the preference, however, being for those who express a purpose to earn their living by the instruction which they are to receive, else the classes would soon be filled with those who do not need the founder's bounty. Last year the pupils in the Art School for Women earned nearly thirty thousand dollars while pursuing their studies in the Cooper Institute.

There is room in New York city for several Cooper Institutes. Of 1397 students who last year applied for admission to the Art School for Women, 686 were rejected because the school was full, and a similar state of things has existed for several years.

CHAPTER XVI.

NAN awoke early the next morning. A stream of light flooded her room; everything looked bright and inspiring, and the little girl ran down-stairs gayly humming one of Bertie Rolf's songs.

It was Saturday; except for the exercises to be rewritten, there would be no work; and above all reasons for joy was the fact that Lance had promised to come and take Nan and Joan out in his boat. Aunt Letitia's consent was given. Nan needed nothing further, she believed, in the way of enjoyment, since the sun had chosen to shine out so gayly, and she felt so happy since yesterday, when Aunt Letty had folded her in her arms and let her cry unrestrainedly on her shoulder.

"Where is Lance going to take you, Ammie?" her aunt asked while they were at breakfast.

But Nan could not say; and just then Lance himself appeared in a flannel boating suit.

"But where is Joan?" Nan asked.

"She had a cold," said Lance, "and Phyllis wouldn't hear of her coming." The boy seemed to feel thoroughly at home. He sat down at the end of the table, and asked Robert for a glass of water, while Miss Rolf offered him a cuplet and some cakes.

"No, thank you, Cousin Letty," said Lance; "I've had my breakfast. How soon can Ammie be ready?"

Nan commenced hurrying every mouthful, until she caught a stern look from her aunt.

"She can't go for half an hour after breakfast," said the old lady. "Do you think me crazy, Lancelot? The idea of any one's taking violent exercise directly after eating!"

This settled it, although a little defiant look came between Lance's well-marked eyebrows and around the curves of his handsome mouth. Nan felt a trifle afraid that perhaps Lance was high-tempered. Certainly he looked now as though he was not always the laughing idol of the family he had seemed to be yesterday.

Breakfast was finished at last, and Lance followed Miss Rolf and Nan out into the garden, where the old lady sauntered about among her rose-bushes, and Nan kept her gaze almost fixed upon the town clock, the face of which she could see gleaming through the trees.

Mrs. Heriot appeared at a side door to say a word of welcome to Lance, whose face brightened visibly, and Nan saw what a favorite he was with this old servant. Then at last, with what seemed aggravating slowness, the hands of the clock moved around to nine o'clock. The half-hour was over! Nan gave a little skip, and darted in for her shade hat and her gloves, and in a few moments more, after many injunctions from Aunt Letty, she was with Lance going across fields at the back of the house to the river.

Almost at once Lance said: "Nan, your cousin Philip is at our school."

"What?" ejaculated Nan.

"Yes," said Lance. "He came last week, and I must say he passed very well; and it's a shame we had to break up so soon."

"But, Lance," said Nan, with a very serious face, "isn't yours a very expensive school?"

"Of course, but"—Lance shrugged his broad young shoulders—"there he is, that's all I know."

Nan remained wonderingly silent, but of course she felt full of delight, well knowing how very much Philip had desired a thorough classical education. What the Bromfield public school afforded him had never half satisfied the lad's longings. But now he could do what he chose. Nan gave Lance's hand a happy squeeze.

"I'm so glad!" she said, earnestly. Lance nodded, as much as to say he appreciated her feelings, and in a few moments they were by the river-bank, where Lance's boat was moored. It was a light little boat, with nice cushions and a fine pair of oars, and its name was Phyllis. Lance seated Nan comfortably, and asked her if she knew how to steer, and then they pushed off.

As soon as they were well under way Lance inquired of Nan, "Do you want to go and see an old boat-builder I know?"

Nan professed herself only too delighted. Lance rowed on. The river ran very widely just here, and Nan many years later remembered just that moment—the look of the clearly flowing water, the May sky, Lance's strong young figure. She felt more hopeful than she had thought it possible ever to be the day before.

The boat-builder's workshop was a roomy though rather dilapidated building, near the water's edge, just above a little bank of tangled greens. He kept a dozen boats for hire, and these were rocking gently near the bank. When Lance pulled up and helped Nan out, the boatman came to the door of his workshop, and nodded pleasantly. He was a tall, grizzled old man, with a face full of puckers, some of which seemed to have gotten there by laughing.

"How do you do, Mr. Blake?" said Lance, pleasantly. "May I bring my little cousin in to see the boat you're building?"

"LANCE, FOLLOWED BY NAN, CARRIED THE 'CHILD.'"

"Certain, certain," said the old man; and he turned around and led the way into the shop, where a long shell was turned upside down on trestles, and which Lance examined with delight, for he had all a young collegian's enthusiasm for boating. Nan looked on, interested in the conversation which went back and forth rapidly between Lance and the old man. Then she sauntered back to the river door, where she was suddenly attracted by the sight of a little boy.

He was a child apparently nine or ten years of age, and his face was pinched and pitifully haggard. He stood very still near Lance's boat, from which he now glanced up timidly at Nan in the shop door.

"Please," he said, in a tired sort of voice, "is there any job about I could get?"

"Oh!" said Nan, quickly (her heart was impulsively full of compassion). She ran down nearer to the little boy, who suddenly turned whiter than before, and staggered against one of the posts of the small pier.

"Lance!" cried Nan, so eagerly that her cousin darted out, and with once glance sprang forward and caught the boy's now fainting figure.

Mr. Blake was soon with them; and after they had revived the boy so that he languidly opened his eyes, the boatman said: "It's hunger has done it. Poor little chap, we'll settle that. Come, my lad, can ye get as fur as my house?" And he jerked his head to the right of the workshop.

But the poor little fellow only laid his head back wearily against Lance's shoulder, and the latter said,

"I'll carry him, Blake. He's as light as a feather."

So they made a procession quietly through the workshop and out across a bit of roadway to where Blake's cozy, old-fashioned white cottage was standing. The box walks smelled pleasantly, and the lilac bushes were in profusion near the door; but, for all the cool sweetness of things, the poor little boy showed no interest in what was being done for or with him. Lance, followed by Nan, carried the child into the little parlor, the door of which Blake opened quietly, after which he turned and called down the passage, "Love!"

"Yes, father," came back in cheery tones from the kitchen, and a bright-faced, tidy young girl of about fifteen appeared.

Her father made her understand very quickly what had happened, Nan thought, for she was upstairs and down again in a moment, with a pillow and a shawl, and helped Lance very skillfully as he laid the boy on the horse-hair sofa. In another moment she was back again with a glass of milk, with "just a trifle of wine in it," she said, and a fresh-looking roll, which would have tempted any one.

But half dead though he was of starvation, it seemed hard for the boy to eat. He swallowed a few mouthfuls, and then closed his eyes as if exhausted. Blake was questioning him, when his daughter, in her gentle, motherly way, lifted a hand, and said,

"Not now, father; wait a little. He must rest first."

Nan thought she had never heard a sweeter voice. It was girlish and soft, but it had in it such womanly tones that one wondered at her youth, for she was plainly not older than Lance; indeed, the curve of her cheek was very childish, and her eyes, though they were quiet, motherly eyes as they looked at the poor boy, had the peculiar sweetness and innocence of a child.

"Shall I go for a doctor, Love?" Blake asked. He seemed to be full of respect for his little maiden.

"Well, yes, father, perhaps you had better," she said, carefully.

"I'll go," suggested Lance.

And then Nan said, almost in Love's ear, "Can I do anything?"

Love nodded. "Yes," she said, "supposing you were not to mind helping me get a better place ready for him."

Nan looked her pleasure, and Love added:

"Father, will you sit here? Now come with me, please."

Nan liked her gentle authoritative ways very much. She followed the little mistress of the house upstairs, and into a cool, clean room, evidently kept for company; for although the white curtains were fresh in the windows, the bed was only covered over with pink netting.

"Love," as Nan called her in her mind, took out her keys and opened the drawers of the old-fashioned bureau, from which she took some lavender-scented sheets and pillow-cases and a snowy counterpane. Without any apologies, she allowed Nan to help her make up the bed.

"Aren't you Miss Rolf's niece?" she said, smiling at Nan across the sheet they were tucking in.

"Yes," said Nan; "and do you keep house here all alone with your father? and is your name really Love?"

The young girl laughed. "Oh," she said, "that's always been father's name for me. My name is really Margaret. Yes, I keep house for father. Mother is an invalid; she never comes down-stairs. There! for a young lady, you did very well."

Nan was about to say she had done house-work for two years past, but checked herself as Margaret Blake exclaimed:

"There is the doctor! Young Mr. Rolf was quick."

The two girls went down-stairs, and found a young doctor bending over the boy, who certainly looked a little better. When Margaret told of her preparations upstairs, the doctor said he had better have a warm bath and be put to bed; "that is," he added, "if—"

"Oh yes," said Love, cheerily; "of course we'll keep him here awhile anyway."

Half an hour later the languid little figure was lying comfortably in a sweet-smelling bed, and his new friends were able to learn something of his history.

He had come, he said, with his mother a long way—they had walked it nearly all. Since father had died, and mother been so ill, they had nearly starved; but they had come here to see the manager of the Beverley theatre, hoping mother could get something to do.

"Had she been on the stage?" the doctor asked.

"Oh yes," the boy said, "and she heard the manager here had known father."

"And where is she now, my boy?"

"Oh, she's down at the theatre, sir, waiting to see Mr. Burton. There's a matinee going on. I just came along the river to see if I couldn't get an odd job."

Nan listened with growing fascination. What would Joan say to this! and how more than ever awe-struck was she when the doctor said:

"Then I'll go down to the theatre and find her. And, Lance," he added, "will you come? I may need you."

Lance was almost as delighted by the novelty of the idea as Nan had been; for, like all young people, a theatre, and, above all, "behind the scenes," seemed to him the most fascinating and mysterious of all places. He needed no second bidding, and promising Nan that he would send word of her whereabouts to Aunt Letitia, they started off.

Meanwhile, Nan sat by the boy's bedside, while "Love" went down-stairs to the performance of some household duties.

Nan looked at the little white sleeping face, wondering what he could tell of that vaguely mysterious and wholly delightful place—the theatre.

THE PINK OF POLITENESS.

BY M. HELEN LOVETT.

THE tailor and the elephant

Were going to a ball;

The tailor took his goose along,

The elephant a shawl.

The tailor, bowing, said, "Go first;

The road won't do for two,"

"Oh no," replied the elephant;

"I'd rather follow you."

The tailor and the elephant

Stood bowing there till night;

For each to take the precedence,

You see, was too polite.

The ball went on without the pair.

Perhaps I may be wrong,

But I believe they kept their stand,

And staid there all night long.

A NEW-YEAR'S CALL IN THE WOODS.

OUR POST-OFFICE BOX.

WE are very sorry to keep our little correspondents waiting, but the nimble pens have been so industrious, and the mails have brought the Post-office Box such heavy holiday budgets, that we can not help ourselves. The bright letters for which we have not room this week shall appear next week or the week after; so be on the watch, children dear.

Now, my boys and girls, that we are fairly in the new year, let us try to spend every shining day of it in the best way we can. I expect to hear of wonderful things accomplished in the way of study after the splendid times you have had in the way of play.

ROCHESTER, NEW YORK.

I read YOUNG PEOPLE, and like the letters very much. I am only seven years of age, but mamma says I may write you a little story about my grandpa, who is dead, and call it

A SKETCH OF PIONEER LIFE.

My grandpa lived, when a young boy, in a little log house in what is now Mount Hope Cemetery. He wanted to go to a party. His father said, "If you want to go to the party, you must chop and sell wood enough to pay your way, and there are the oxen and sled to take it to town with."

So grandpa went into the woods in Mount Hope, and chopped a load of wood, and piled it on the sled, and drew it to the city, and toward night he sold it to a man on Main Street. He carried the wood upstairs, and piled it up in the man's office, when he got a dollar for it. Before he started for home a store-keeper wanted him to do some work for him with the oxen, and for that the man gave grandpa a jug of molasses. Then he started for home about dark. He had gone a little way, when he saw something lying in the road. He picked it up, and found it to be a red handkerchief full of real mites. He was the happiest boy in the country. He sang and shouted all the way home.

He had a dear mother at home, just as we all have, and she began to worry about him as it grew dark, for there were no voices in the woods around Rochester then, and one time they had come close up to the house and barked or cried in some way. Almost every minute she would go to the door to listen. After a while she heard her boy singing so merrily that she felt very happy, for she knew he was coming, and must have had good luck. He gave the molasses and nutmegs to his mother, but kept the doll and the

His mother said, "Daniel, I have a present for you," and brought out a nice long pair of warm woolen stockings, with white toes and heels and tops, for him to dance in the next night, just such stockings as Uncle Josh Whitcomb dances in when everybody laughs so, and grandpa and everybody danced just so too. FIDE.

A very good letter indeed for the first effort of a little girl of seven, as Fide's papa testifies that this is.

Our next epistle is from a young lady who, for her age, has been a great traveler:

TORONTO, CANADA.

I do love you so, dear YOUNG PEOPLE! I delight in you. I have five dolls; their names are Bertha, Georgina, Louisa, Lillian, Alle, Isabella, Bertrand, Arthur, Christopher, Minny, Idela, Etta, and Carolina, Lavinia, Christolena. I have also for other pets two little ponies called Pegasus and Handy Andy, a greyhound (Attica is his name), a darling little toy dog called Frills, and four cats—Lady Franklin, Mlle. Bloua (called that because she was born when I first saw that lady), Peter Piper, and Noah, which is twelve years old. I am an only child, and am a great pet. A pretty thing may be made out of a horseshoe. First paint the shoe black, and lay putting cards on board in behind it, with a round hole cut in it, your picture may be put in nicely; cover the card-board with velvet, plush, silk, or any other pretty material. I have been to England, Scotland, Ireland, France, Italy, Greece, Egypt, India, and China. I am thirteen years old, and was born in New York city.

AGNES EBLE N.

SAN JOSE, CALIFORNIA.

I am a little girl eight years old. I went to Fresno a good while ago; it is about 200 miles from here. Before we started we had a little cat and dog. We gave the kitten a way. The dog was just a little ball of curis, and we took him with us. Some time I am going to write a story about the dog. My father was already at Fresno. We boarded at a hotel. My uncle lived there. He had two boys and one girl; they lived in the country. Then, after a while, we had our own house built, and lived in it. I went to the country very often to see my cousins.

We had a cat, and she had four little ones; one died. We kept them under the house, and one night a cannibal cat ate another one up. We had lived in our house for three months, and one Sunday, when we were out to our place in the country, we saw smoke. We went to town just as fast as the horses could run. When we got there many houses were burning, and our house burned just as we got there, and five blocks were swept away. Then we came back to San Jose to live. I am not going to write any more.

BERTHA B.

NURSERY RHYMES.

BY PHIL ROBINSON.

A little snail crept up a wall—
Poppy, poppy, can't you crawl?
And from the top he down did fall—
Oh! poppety, poppety can.
And let him creep, and let him crawl,
He'll never get to the top at all.
For he's so small and the walls 'so tall,
Poor poppety, poppety can't.

Higgledy-piggledy—one, two, three,
Here's a bitterly come to tea,
Bringing with her a bumble-bee.
They found some jam in a buttercup,
And the bee and the butterfly gobbled it up,
And when they'd done they'd got no more—
Higgledy-piggledy—two, three, four.

Meat! meat! the cat's-meat man—
Run away, pussy, as fast as you can.
Some of it lean,
Some of it fat,
Some for the kitten,
Some for the cat.

A mouse looked up from a hole in the floor,
And saw two kittens at play;
The mouse didn't stay to see any more,
And the kittens they went away.

Dicky bird, Dicky bird, up in the cage,
Tell me I pray you, what is your age?
Four, did you say? Why, you're older than me,
For I am only just turned three.
With, you, head and your-toes and your feet—
You're still, for your age, little Dicky, very small.

Buzz, said the busy bee; huzz, said the fly,
Aren't we working hard, you and I?
Yes, said the bee, you huzz as much as I do,
But as for making honey, what can a fly do!

These pretty rhymes were made by the author in just a half-hour by the clock, the prize he gained for them being a lump of sugar. Don't you all think he deserved several lumps? I do.

FOR THE LITTLE HOUSEKEEPER.

ORANGE SNOW-BALLS.—Boil some rice for ten minutes, drain, and let it cool; pare some oranges, removing the thick white skin; spread the rice, in as many portions as there are oranges, on some dumping cloths; tie the fruit separately in these, surrounded by the rice, and boil the balls for an hour; turn them carefully on a dish, and sprinkle with sifted sugar; serve with sweetened cream.

SATCE.—A little butter and sugar beaten smoothly; a spoonful of corn starch cooked in two cups of boiling water. Flavor with orange juice.

CAKE-MAKING.—Have everything ready before you begin; and your materials measured and weighed, and your tins buttered. The sooner you mix the cake and put it into the oven the better, after everything is ready. Sift the flour three times for delicate cakes; roll the sugar; mix laking-powder or cream of tartar, when used, with the dry flour, passing it through the sieve; beat eggs very well, the yolks and whites separately; add soda the last thing, if that is in the receipt, dissolving it in milk or in warm water; bake in a rather moderate oven at first, so that the batter will be evenly heated through; increase the heat after the first ten minutes.

GINGER-BREAD.—A half-pint of molasses; a half-pint of boiling water; a half pint of an egg; a tea-spoonful of ground cloves, the same of cinnamon, of ground ginger, and baking-soda; a half-pint of flour. Make this cake in this manner: first put the butter, partly melted, into the molasses; then add the spices; stir this into the flour; dissolve the soda in boiling water, and pour it in. Never use cream of tartar with molasses.

Girls who have receipts for either soft or hard gingerbread may send them to the Postmistress.

NEW YORK CITY.

I have not taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE very long, but I like it so very much I think I shall continue to take it. I wrote a little Christmas story not long ago, and I thought you would send it to you. I am twelve years old, and go to school. I like the Post-office Box very much. Here is my story. Please print it.

JUSTA V. N.

LITTLE NELL'S CHRISTMAS.

It was the day before Christmas. The snow was falling thick and fast, covering the ground with a soft whiteness which looked like fur. Little Nell stood at the window watching the snow, and flattening her nose against the window-pane, which was cracked in two places. She knew that many were buying gifts which would give pleasure to those receiving them; but she felt sure she wouldn't get anything in her stock for any money to give her mother or her little brother Ben.

Nell was eight years old, and Ben was five. They had no money, but the mother did all she could to make the children comfortable and happy, but not much could be bought with her small earnings.

In spite of the cold, little Nell put on her little red coat and shawl, and went out to see if she couldn't do something to earn money for her mother.

Into the cold halls, and down the long pairs of stairs, and out into the street she went. After walking for nearly two hours without getting a penny, she thought she would go home.

"But first I will look in the store windows, and then home," she said.

She looked, but the many good things she saw made her turn away, for there were so many dolls, dolls' houses, horses, sleds, etc., that she made her way home, but she was so tired that she sat down, and blew her little fingers to make them warm.

At last, looking up, she saw a lady and little girl looking at her, and stepping forward, the lady said: "My child you will freeze. You had better go home."

Then Nell said, "Oh, but I have no Christmas presents for my mother."

"Come with me, child, and I will buy you some things for your mother. Where do you live?"

I live in Mulford Street, and you can only have enough to eat, and sometimes we are hungry and cold. I am looking for something to do to earn money, for to-morrow's Christmas, and we will have nothing to eat."

The lady looked at her blue hands and face, and said, "Come into this store, and I will buy some gloves for you."

Nell followed, and before long found herself near home, with new mittens, hood, and shawl, and a great many bundles. When she arrived home her mother was there, and the lady talked to her mother, while Flora, the little girl, played with her. The next day was a happy one for Nell, but pleasant for Flora and her mother, who had gladly given a few gifts, and made these hearts glad. Ben was happy with a warm coat and hat, and before long was counting on a new sled. Nell was happy with dolls, also her mother, and I think Flora and her mother had made it a very "Merry Christmas."

A very pretty story it is for one of your age to have written.

PHILADELPHIA, PENNSYLVANIA.

Seeing so much said in the Post-office Box about cats, I write this letter to tell about some I am acquainted with. We are the owners of five of these domestic pets—three kittens and two large cats. They do all manner of strange things, such as jumping through panes of glass, being down in a barrel for a day, drinking the milk in the morning, and other odd performances. Our cats can also sing, after a fashion, quite sweetly.

One strange cat, with yellow fur, and blind in one eye, got into our house the other night by climbing on the roof of our porch and jumping through the window-pane, knocking down a favorite fly in the descent, and making a fine racket. We saw it all down stairs, and could not imagine what was the matter. I went upstairs, with my mother and brother following me, the latter shouting wildly all the way, scaring the poor cat, which came tearing down at a furious rate to the parlor. She climbed up the Christmas tree, where she staid for a minute, and then fell down, Jip, our dog, going for, and sending her up the lace curtain, leaving it considerably.

We thought the cat had gone wild. Then Jip chased her upstairs. My aunt tried to put her out, but she ran up, in a dry dress and over her coat, down stairs, and out in the kitchen, Jip and I running after her at full speed. There puss ran into the closet, and climbed up in the top shelf of a cupboard full of reach, but seeing a bag of red pepper after her, which gave us a small dose, and herself a little too much for her comfort.

She jumped down on Jip's back, and Jip ran out in the yard, where poor pussay dropped off, giving several long howls, as if to call her sisters and her cousins and her aunts. She then, with a few more desperate yaws, gave a few jumps over the back fence, and we saw her no more.

HERBERT.

Are you a far-away relative of our little friend Jimmy Brown, Herbert? I suspect so. I fear this strange story of the yellow cat is a romance, and indeed I hope so, for if it were true, how sorry I would feel for a poor frightened wretch pursued all over unknown premises by quick-footed hunters like you and Jip!

CINCINNATI, OHIO.

I have been a subscriber ever since your paper was first sent me, and I think it is the best one. It is instructive to old and young. Our principal came into our school-room the day before Thanksgiving, and began to talk about what nice papers they had. Some of the school boys gave him the papers they took. I got up and told him that HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE was the best paper in the world. He said, "Oh, yes, I take it." The Jimmy Brown stories make me laugh. I like all the stories and letters in the paper. I have a sister and two brothers. We take turns about every year. The first volume my sister had, and I had, my oldest brother; the third, myself; the fourth is my sister's turn, my other brother being too young. He is only a year old. I will be very thankful to any one who will tell me how to take the outside coating of shells and polish them. I am making a collection of specimens, and am saving money to buy a cabinet. I am thirteen years of age.

HAROLD WEST K.

Although we have a Housekeepers' Social here for the little girls, it is not our intention to give them all the space in the Post-office Box. We want the wide-awake brothers to exchange ideas and bits of information as well as curiosities and postage stamps. Which young mineralogist will be first to answer Raphael, and tell him how to polish shells?

OAKLAND, CALIFORNIA.

I want to tell you about some hair-pin cushions I make. They are made over the boxes on which ribbon comes. The dry goods merchants throw them away when the ribbon is used, and they can be made to suit any fancy; I made mine about three or four inches across the top. You crochet a single loop, stitch around and around until it covers the top of your box, widening all the time. Then you stop widening, and it will turn down like a skull-cap. Keep on until it reaches the bottom of the box. Then widen again, and crochet on the wrong side, and it will make it curl over like the brim of a hat. Then get some hair, such as they stuff furniture with, to fill your box. Fit the hat over the box, and tie a piece of ribbon around the sides, and the hair-pin cushion is finished. Two ounces of worsted will make three hats, and a quarter of a yard of ribbon will go around one hat.

DAISY II.

BLOOMINGDALE, OHIO.

We had a present of a small turtle a few weeks ago, and would like you to ask the other correspondents how to give it the very best care. The dear auntie who gave it to us said she had kept a year in December, and fed it flesh and fresh meat. It is about two and a half inches across the hard-shell back; has a red edge underneath; the head resembles a snake's; it has a big mouth, yellow scales, and little bits of eyes. I call it Pretty Boy, and it allows mamma to handle it, takes bits of meat from her hand, and comes up to the top of the water when called.

The other day mamma looked into the candy jar, when away went Pretty Boy, under the rocks and into the mud, showing great fear. We thought it was frightened at mamma's dusting cap, or hard soft water best, can we get more variety of food for it, to what family does it belong, and does the shell ever soften, or is it because of lack of exercise?

Two little lovers of HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, DORA and AMY.

Will somebody who has had experience write very soon, and tell Dora and Amy all about their turtle and how to care for it?

BROOKFIELD, NEW YORK.

I have taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE since the fifty-third number, and like it very much. I was sick Thanksgiving, so I could not attend church, and my mother thought some of my cousins, who seem almost like a brother to me and his wife and two little boys ate dinner with us. I am not very strong. I had several fever when two years old, and that partially paralyzed the four muscles of my right limb. I can not run like other boys, but have to be contented with more quiet pleasures. When twelve years old I had bronchitis, and now I am thirteen, and I remember a little girl who wrote you that she could not walk. She is worse off than I am. I have a kind father and mother. About three years ago my father took me with him to West Virginia. We went through Scranton, Philadelphia, and Baltimore, and stopped a short time in Washington, where we went into the Senate-Chamber. I saw the Chief Magistrate, and went through tunnels from half a mile to a mile in length.

We have an excellent graded school here. I am in the Intermediate Department, and have a splendid teacher, Miss E. S. S. Our principal is Professor L. B. B. Miss C. is the teacher in the Primary. I like the stories of "Toby Tyler," "The Cruise of the Ghost," and "The Boy's Adventure."

WILLIE J. T.

I trust you were well enough to enjoy Christmas and New Year's better than you did Thanksgiving-day, Willie.

I hope no boy who reads the Post-office Box needs to be warned never to play with that dangerous little weapon, the toy pistol. A few days ago three children were playing happily together in New York, expecting in a few minutes to set out on a merry holiday excursion. Suddenly there was a terrified scream. A boy aged twelve had accidentally shot his little girl friend and guest with a toy pistol, the tiny bullet lodging in her brain. Do not keep such perilous playthings in your possession, my boy friends.

TO THE WIGGLERS.—So many of the little artists who send us Wiggles reside at such long distances from New York City, that their communications do not arrive until after "Our Artist" is ready to make up his page. In order, therefore, that these far-distant Wigglers may have a chance to appear in YOUNG PEOPLE, it has been decided to give but half a page of any new Wiggle at a time, the upper half being devoted to examples of the preceding Wiggle which were received too late to be included in the former page. Thus on our sixteenth page will be found drawings one-half of which represent Wiggle No. 29, while the other half represent Wiggle No. 30. We should be glad to receive the addresses of E. B. Wall and L. W. Hanson, who have been successful in reproducing our artist's idea of Wiggle No. 29.

JACK, THE BUTCHER'S DOG.

BY W. M. CARY.

JACK was a good-natured dog, and though some of the children in the neighborhood were afraid of him, and would run home when they saw him coming, he was really very kind and amiable, and only full of fun and fond of play.

One bright chilly morning, seeing a little boy dragging his sister on a sled, Jack concluded to have some of the fun himself, so he rushed out, grasped the rope of the sled in his mouth, pulled it from the boy's hand, and tore down the street as fast as his legs would carry him. The little girl screamed at the top of her voice, and made a great effort to keep her place on the sled, but Jack ran so fast that at last she was upset, and rolled over into a snow-drift.

Jack returned to the butcher's shop dragging the sled, and left it at the door. He seemed to be delighted with what he had done, and often performed the same trick afterward. At last the older boys of the neighborhood would send one of their number—usually the smallest of the party—past the store with a sled on purpose to bring Jack out. Jack always came with a rush, and seized the rope, while the boys would jump on the sled, and Jack would drag the whole party.

One day so many boys got on the sled, and made it so heavy, that Jack evidently thought the joke was getting tiresome, so he dropped the rope, and with much dignity walked home.

This seemed to cure him of his fancy for dragging sleds. Often the boys would send a little sister past the butcher's shop with a sled to tempt Jack. But it was of no use; Jack would have nothing further to do with the business.

FLORIO AND FLORELLA.

A Christmas Fairy Tale.

BY MRS. W. J. HAYS.

III.

A GAIN the summer-time had come, with all its warmth and beauty. The fairies were thronging all the wild-wood one lovely summer evening, when a tall, handsome lad, with light, quick tread and merry glancing eyes, entered the woods, followed by a red fox, and boldly shouted, "Florella! Florella!" making the woods ring with his voice.

You would not have supposed that this could be the same boy whose sobbing aroused Florella's compassion, the poor, trembling little creature, spiritless and unhappy, who had hardly dared to say his name was Florio. But so it was; and when he called so loudly in his cheery voice, Florella quickly came forth from the sweet-brier bush and stood before him.

Doffing the cap which covered his curly pate, and bending one knee, Florio presented without words the small plant which he had guarded with the utmost care.

A look of gracious sweetness came into the fairy's face, and she examined the flowers with the eye of one accustomed to look at things closely. Having assured herself that it was the desired plant, she turned to her assistants and invited them to examine it also. All agreed that it was the far-famed Edelweiss, and there was a great fluttering of wings, and soft exclamations of delight and excited surprise, until Florella with a gentle wave of her hand commanded silence.

"Now, young knight of our fair domain," she said, addressing Florio, "give me some account of your journeying, for not only have you done all that I desired, but more: here are not only seeds, but flowers and root. I pray you be seated while I listen."

Florio had learned to be mannerly, so with cap in hand he only leaned against a beech-tree, and began:

"When you bade me depart with that dreadful old Fuss, dear lady, my heart failed me entirely, and I thought I should not be able to do your bidding. So long had I been used to her cruel power that the thought of opposing her filled me with alarm; but curiously enough the very night I hastened from you to the miserable cavern we called home, a young fox followed me, and unknown to me slept by my side. When I awoke, the witch was preparing for her journey, for on her back and by her side she carried bags of all shapes and sizes, with everything in them that could do mischief. In one was snuff, in another was pepper, and in a third was mustard, and in all were flinty pebbles and bits of glass. Some of these were for people's eyes, and some for their feet, and she had hardly room for the mouldy old crusts and pieces of cheese which furnished us with food.

"As soon as she saw the fox, which I was petting with delight, she made a pass at it with her stick, which I am sure would have killed it had I not caught the blow. The little fellow sprang from my arms and bit her heel, which made her so very angry that I had to run for my life, but, strange to say, after that he was my only protection.

"Although she bade me drown him, and although I, remembering your commands, disobeyed her, she did not dare come near me when I had him in my arms. Day after day he followed me, night after night he slept beside me, and though I had fewer beatings, old Fuss watched me closely; she seemed to know that I wanted to get away from her.

"We toiled along on the road-sides begging from house to house.

"At last one day we came to a beautiful sheet of water, blue and sparkling in the sunshine. Everywhere I went I had gathered flowers—sometimes they were only weeds such as dandelions and daisies, but here on the banks of this lovely lake I found the sweetest blossoms. From every one I had tried to learn the names of the plants, but it was a very difficult matter, for half the time they misunderstood my signs, and supposed I was only making game of them; besides, when Fuss came up with her horrible jargon, every one was so disgusted that he would have nothing to do with me.

"But every day I repeated as a lesson the one word 'Edelweiss,' and whenever I had the chance I would say this to a stranger. Generally they took no notice—sometimes they would smile and point to the mountain-peaks before us.

"The day we reached the lake, Fuss was in one of her ugliest moods: she had not received a penny from any passer-by, and she had not been able to make a young boatman quarrel with his companions, although she had sprinkled pepper about until they were all sneezing as if they were crazy. I was weary and disconsolate, sitting paddling in the water, and the fox was not by me, having run after a rat that had crawled from the wreck of an old unused craft. Without a word of warning, Fuss came up behind me and gave me a push.

"Over I went into the water, head and heels both submerged. Strangling, puffing, battling for my life, I rose to the surface. I had fallen just where the water was shallow, but where grasses and water-plants so entangled my feet that I could not swim, and should certainly have been drowned had not one of the boatmen thrown me a rope and drawn me to the shore.

"'Hang her!' 'Drown her for an old witch!' were the exclamations I heard from the rough by-standers, and also, 'Take her to the jail at Geneva.' This aroused me. Now I knew the name of the fine town toward which so many were wending their way.

'When you get to Geneva,
Then you must leave her.'

"Oh, joy! Then I need no longer follow my dreadful guide! And there were people about who spoke English.

"As soon as I could discover who these English people were I made inquiries of them, and found they were servants of some persons travelling in their own conveyance. Tattered and draggled and wet, I dared not do more than run after the carriage at a respectful distance, with my fox in my arms, and so fearful was I of being overtaken by old Fuss that I darted into the woods whenever a way-farer approached. But my fears were needless, for so alarmed had the witch been at the threats of the boatmen that she disappeared suddenly. Some said they saw her flying over the woods on a broomstick, with all her wretched rags and tags fluttering behind her like the tail of a kite.

"After this I toiled on, often hungry, always weary, but frequently meeting with kindness. I only wanted to find some place of shelter from the cold until the warm weather should return again, and I could renew my search for your flower.

"At last, one bitter day, striving to reach a convent where I had found out they received poor people like myself, I fell, during a blinding storm, and had neither the courage nor the wish to make the effort to rise. Gradually a heavy sleep came on. I forgot my woes, and dreamed of a garden of roses, among which floated brilliant butterflies and golden bees.

"I was aroused from this sleep by a barking and scratching, and the foreing open of my mouth to make me swallow some warm milk. A goat-herd had found me, and putting me on the back of his great dog, carried me home. From that moment my troubles ended. Franz, the boy who found me, had a warm heart. His home became mine. I was ill, but all did what they could to make my sufferings less. I had only the one word 'Edelweiss,' at my command, and but the one hope, that of procuring the flower.

"Christmas-day came. All were rejoicing, all were happy; but none could appreciate my joy when the noble Franz put this plant in my possession, his Christmas gift to me. I recovered immediately, and happiness so inspired me that I learned their language, and was enabled to tell them my story. All agreed that I must return to you, but must wait till I was strong for the journey. While with my friends I watched them carve their beautiful toys, some of which I have brought you, and learned to do their exquisite work myself. I also went often to the convent, and learned much from the celebrated Father Glückner about herbs and flowers. See, I have brought these packets of seeds, and a good collection of remarkable specimens. And all the time my little fox has been my pet, my companion, my solace. Accept, then, dear lady, these proofs of my obedience."

So saying, Florio finished speaking. As he stopped, his cheeks flushed with pleasant emotion, a nightingale poured forth a warbling stream of melody. The fairy drew her hand around her and thus spoke:

"Happy mortal, thus to have achieved success! Your faithfulness and courage shall be well rewarded. Look! this is your home, this we have prepared for you. Our emissary, the young fox, had warned us of your approach, and we have all in readiness."

Saying this, she led the astonished Florio to a cottage of twisted vines and roots, built by herself and her attendant elves. The walls were brilliant with innumerable glow-worms and fire-flies, which sparkled like living gems. The floor was soft with scented rushes. Garlands of roses festooned the rooms, in one of which was a table filled with fruit. Smiling with glee, Florella watched her young friend's admiration, which ended in complete astonishment when from an adjoining apartment came Franz and Rosa, the goat-herd and his sister. His joy was now complete, but when he turned to thank Florella she was nowhere to be seen.

Thus it came to pass that we know of the famous gardener and seedsman Florio, whose plants are of boundless celebrity, and whose cultivated blossoms outrival the famous exotics of the world. In this forest he lived and raised from season to season every flower that grows. No frost seemed to touch them, no drought withered them, for Florella was true to her promise of reward, and in addition to giving Florio a home, gave him also health and wealth and fame.

The elves were always on guard against moles and injurious worms, the fairies sprinkled the seeds and protected the young buds, and basking in the sunshine outside the cottage door was always to be found Florio's pet, the red fox, whom Florella for a time had chosen to be his guardian. Franz and Rosa also induced their family to leave the Alpine snows for the beautiful land of flowers.

THE END.

PLANTS CAUGHT NAPPING.

BY SOPHIE B. HERRICK.

AS we come to be more intimate with plants, and know all about their doings and see into their daily lives, we continue to find things which remind us of animals. Plants, we already know, eat and drink and breathe and move. Besides all these things, they sleep; and they must get their sleep regularly, or they lose their health completely.

Nowadays inventors spend their lives trying to find out useful things—things that will make life easier and pleasanter: such things as steamboats and railroad cars, and telegraphs and sewing-machines, and a thousand others of the same kind. In old times all the inventions were made to compel men to believe this or that religion by the use of ingenious tortures. There was no end of different kinds of suffering which poor miserable people who had their own ideas on religious subjects had to suffer. Among these was the horrible torture of keeping people awake night and day till they died. Such dreadful things are no longer practiced on people in Christian lands; but many and many a poor plant dies and makes no sign from just this cause.

People can sleep where there is a light in the room; hardly so sweetly and soundly, I think, as they can in the darkness; still they can go to sleep in the light. But plants can not. Until the darkness comes they go on working and working, no matter how tired they are, till the plucky little creatures drop in harness and die. The work they do, I have already told you, is to separate the poisonous carbonic acid gas of the air into two useful things—carbon for themselves, and oxygen to keep people and animals alive. But they need rest as much as you or I do. Working night and day is too much of a strain, and finally their health breaks down, and they die.

Many plants are not contented merely to stop working. That does not give them all the rest they need. The leaves want to lie down or to hug close to each other, in order to sleep comfortably, and rise refreshed. If you notice carefully a spray of locust leaves, for instance, by daylight, you will see it look something like this (Fig. 1). I drew this, one bright August day, just as it grew on the tree. The leaves are all spread abroad to catch the light and the breezes. The thousand little mouths are open, breathing in the air. One evening, after it had grown dark, I went out and drew the same spray asleep (Fig. 2). There was just light enough for me to see, but not enough to wake the locust leaves. There they lay, huddled up to keep warm, their little mouths pressed close against each other.

It may seem as wonderful to you as it did to me when I first learned it, that all your lives the plants and trees around you had been going to sleep and cuddling up in this way, and you had never noticed it or known it. When you think of it, it is not really so strange, for most of the time that the leaves are asleep you are asleep too, and any light which under ordinary circumstances would show them to you would keep them from going to sleep. In order to see these sleeping leaves you would have to take a lantern and go out after it was dark, and examine sprays which you had particularly examined by day, to see just the difference.

The young leaves, like young babies, sleep most, and cuddle up closer than the older ones do. I examined a great many plants, and found no very common plant more interesting than the locust-tree. Some wistaria leaves, especially the young shoots, not only close up but turn over on their stems, to get their rest.

The most remarkable plant of all that I examined was a mimosa-tree, or sensitive plant, as it is often called (Fig. 3). This tree, however, grows full thirty feet high. You can sit and watch the branches against the evening sky, and as the twilight falls, the entire tree seems to be thinning out until it looks as if the season had gone backward, and we were looking at the tree in its early spring dress of delicate sprays (Fig. 4). It puts one in mind of Keats's beautiful line, when speaking of a lovely girl going to sleep:

"As if a rose should shut and be a bud again."

It sometimes happens that plants which usually close their leaves when they sleep are very heavily shaded during the day. When this is the case they do not seem to be much affected by the darkness of the night, and do not change the position of their leaves. It would seem as if they had been half asleep all day, and so had spoiled their night's rest. Darwin tells us of a plant which he says he watched carefully, and for two nights after having been violently shaken by the wind it did not cuddle down to sleep. It was probably too much excited to rest properly.

Fig. 1.—LOCUST BRANCH AWAKE.

out giving it a drop to drink. Its leaves became dry and dusty, so that some of them would drop off from the stem every time he shook the pot. It became like the dust on a summer road.

Fig. 2.—LOCUST BRANCH ASLEEP.

In some plants the leaves stand up to go to sleep, as horses do; in others they droop down, or lie close to each other like little children. One kind of clover which has a yellow blossom sleeps very curiously (Fig. 5); it has, as of course you know, three leaflets on each stalk.

Fig. 3.—MIMOSA AWAKE.

This movement of sleep is so much affected by the presence or absence of water, which you remember is the cause of all vegetable movement, that if the ground in which the plant grows is allowed to get very dry, or the air becomes extremely parched around it, it makes no sleep movement at night. The "touch-me-not" and mallow are affected in this way by drought. Mr. Darwin tried to see how long a little plant he had from Chili would live without water. He watched it for three weeks without water. Its leaves became dry and would drop off from the stem. The earth about the roots did not close in sleep at night. Finally, at the end of twenty-one days, he watered the earth and sponged off the dry and thirsty leaves. The next morning it seemed as fresh as ever, and when night came it nestled itself down comfortably to its rest.

Some plants will go to sleep if they can make themselves comfortable, while if they are very much chilled by exposure to the cold night air they will not make a sleep movement. There is something almost human in all these freaks of wakefulness in the plant world.

Each of the three twists itself around through the quarter of a circle, turning one of the side edges to the sky. Two of the leaflets—the side ones—face toward the north, one a little to the east of north, the other a little to the west. The middle leaflet turns sometimes eastward, sometimes westward; in doing so it twists itself over so as to protect its own upper surface and one of the other leaflets at the same time. The common white clover also sleeps very curiously.

There is a very singular plant which bears three leaves on a stem, the middle one being large, and the other two long narrow leaflets which stand straight out from the stem just below the bottom of the large central leaf. They look like a pair of oars poised in the hands of a rower when he is waiting to dip them into the water. When this plant goes to sleep the small stem which holds the leaf stands straight up, and the leaf turns directly down flat against the stalk. The plant hardly looks like the same thing awake and asleep.

Fig. 4.—MIMOSA ASLEEP.

Besides the sleep movement this plant has some wonderful motions, which seem to be without any particular reason, and to come generally from change of temperature. Mr. Darwin put the stem of one of these leaves into some water cool enough to be pleasant to drink, and then changed the water for some about as warm as lukewarm tea. The leaflets began to move, and in a minute and a half had made a complete circle. In very young plants of this kind the leaflets jerk all the while, very much as a baby kicks its legs and moves its arms, without having any particular reason for doing it.

When leaves get sleepy they do not sink steadily and quietly down. There is nobody to take them and lay them down to sleep when they feel drowsy, so they go off by themselves in a slow sort of nodding motion. Fig. 6 shows the path that one of these little sleepy heads moved over before it went off sound asleep.

The cause of all these movements is, as I have said, the shifting of water from cell to cell, but the reason for them is the same which makes two little children sleeping side by side draw closer together when they feel chilly, and nestle down together in the bed. The warmth of their bodies then is not lost, but passes from one to the other.

BY MRS. JOHN LILLIE,

AUTHOR OF "MILDRED'S BARGAIN," "AUNT RUTH'S TEMPTATION," ETC.

CHAPTER XVII.

LANCE thought that he would remember that morning's expedition all his life long. Dr. Rogers knew his way perfectly to the stage entrance of the Beverley Opera-House, having more than once been sent for in cases of sudden illness; but Lance wondered how he could take the visit in such a very cool sort of way.

"I suppose you never before went behind the scenes of a theatre," he said, looking at Lance's eager young face.

"No, sir," Lance said. "I don't suppose my father would object to my going now with you."

"I'll make that all right," the doctor said. And Lance, feeling his only misgiving removed, went on full of suppressed excitement.

Dr. Rogers had known many people in what is always called "the profession"; but to Lance it seemed, from what he told him, as though he knew chiefly the sad and toilsome sides of their lives. The hard work—both of appearing gay when most weary, and of being morning, noon, and night either rehearsing, or acting, or hanging about managers' or treasurers' offices or doleful green-rooms.

Now to Lance a "green-room" meant such a place as he had seen described in the life of Garrick or Goldsmith, where the great beaux and wits of the day gathered, and where the sparkle of gems, the clinking of glasses, and the gaiety of voices aided a brilliant scene.

"This way," Dr. Rogers said, as they turned down a little alley at one side of the theatre. Outside were flaring placards of the "Great Spectacular Drama," being performed with one hundred dancers, some real horses, and a chariot—all splendors which he would fain have witnessed from the front of the house; but while Mr. Rolf encouraged his boy to see first-class theatrical representations, he would have forbidden his attending this lower order of vulgar display, and Lance led too frank a life to do in secret what he knew his father and Phyllis would condemn.

Some warehouses were on one side, and wedged in between them Lance saw a narrow doorway with a flight of steps leading under-ground. Above the door was written in half-legible characters, "Stage-Entrance. No Admittance." The doctor, however, pushed on, descending the stairs, followed by Lance. A rough-looking lad was standing at the foot of the steps, evidently on guard; but the doctor simply said, "All right," and passed on, with Lance close beside him. They groped their way along a dark passage, to the left of which was a flight of rickety steps, and up these they hurried, Lance wondering how soon the air would feel anything but damp and draughty. Below he had remarked various pieces of stage-carpentry, and Dr. Rogers explained to him that it was there that much of the necessary stage-work was done.

THE DOCTOR AND LANCE FIND MRS. TRAVERS.

At the top of the staircase they found themselves in a labyrinth of side scenes, beams, and pulleys—all the mechanical part of the Grand Spectacular Drama about to be performed. Men were running here and there; from high up in what looked like scaffoldings Lance could hear voices—the stage-carpenter calling out this and that direction with various strong expressions—while already in the narrow spaces behind the scenes the actors and actresses were beginning to move about. There was some gas-light, but usually a cold stream of daylight fell in upon the painted faces and tawdry-looking costumes, which would soon have the aid of the foot-lights and the illusions of a happy country audience. But here everything looked what it really was; and oh, in spite of paint and powder, how weary some of the faces looked! A group of young girls thinly dressed were gathered together near one of the side scenes, and Lance overheard them discussing whether they would have much to pay in fines out of their salaries that night. One girl, who, singular to say, was occupied in darned stockings, declared if she were to be fined again for being "just one minute late," she couldn't stand it. "I'll starve next," she said, with a sad laugh.

* Begun in No. 157, HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE.

"Do you know where Mr. Burton is?" the doctor asked of one of these young people.

"Yes, sir," she answered, very politely. "I think he's in the greenroom."

The word greenroom sent a thrill of delight to Lance's heart, and Dr. Rogers led the way directly across the stage, where already a fairy scene was set; but Lance could not help a feeling of surprise and disappointment as he found himself passing pasteboard trees and a grotto made up of the queerest odds and ends, while at one side the most coarsely painted stream trickled over painted rocks. But the greenroom was ahead of him. Dr. Rogers made his way into a small, neatly furnished room, bare and completely dismal. Here were gathered two or three people in costumes of a somewhat better description than the girls they had seen grouped together. One young man was putting some additional touches to his eyebrows at a cracked mirror, and a stout, elaborately dressed lady was talking earnestly to the manager. Only a few chairs and a table of the roughest description furnished what Lance had to believe was actually a greenroom. His illusions were certainly gone, but he was glad to have seen it, at all events, and he began now to think more earnestly of their errand.

Dr. Rogers courteously explained to Mr. Burton that he had come to inquire the whereabouts of a woman named Travers. At this one of the company near the door said, "Oh, Travers is in my dressing-room. Do you want to see her?"

"I'm sure I'm very sorry for her," said Mr. Burton, well knowing that Dr. Rogers's errand was charity; "and I've taken her on with us a few weeks as dresser; but I'm afraid she won't hold out. She's a pretty sick woman."

The lady who had spoken said, "Will you come and see her, sir?"

Mr. Burton seemed very busy, and Dr. Rogers followed the good-humored actress, who was glittering with spangles and paste jewelry, up a rickety staircase to a little box of a room, noisy and ill-ventilated.

On a half-broken-down chair there sat a thin, hollow-eyed woman, who apparently felt too listless to move, and scarcely looked up when the actress said, kindly, "Mollie, here's a doctor who says he has the boy."

At this she brightened, and on hearing what had occurred at Mr. Blake's, she expressed a desire to go at once to the child; but as she rose it was only too evident that her strength would not admit of her walking one block, and so the kind-hearted doctor whispered to Lance, "Suppose you get a hack, my boy, from the depot; and here, a little port-wine wouldn't hurt her."

"Oh, sir," said the actress, "we gave her all the dinner she'd take; and I'm sure we'd all do anything we could for her. She was with our company six months before Travers died. But I'm sure, as a physician, you can tell she's not fit for work."

Lance and Dr. Rogers assisted poor Mrs. Travers into the carriage. As they left the theatre Lance could hear the orchestra playing gayly, and the voice of the stage-manager calling to the dancers, "This way, my dears; hurry up; no nonsense now!"

And as he looked at the pale, haggard face of Mrs. Travers, he wondered how she had thought of renewing a life in which it already seemed to him there could be nothing but weariness and pain.

CHAPTER XVIII.

NAN'S brain worked very busily with schemes for the Travers's future while she sat by little David's bedside. She determined to do all Aunt Letty would allow her to for the boy, whom she felt as if she had "found," and she thought it seemed almost in answer to the talk she and Lance had had in the boat that very morning.

While her mind was working with a dozen highly colored fancies for the future, she heard the sound of wheels outside the little garden, and stealing to the window, saw to her great joy the Rolf House carriage, from which Aunt Letitia herself was descending.

Nan fairly held her breath while she heard Miss Rolf speaking below to Love, and then came the rustle of silk along the little corridor, and Miss Rolf gently entered the room.

Nan started forward, catching her aunt's hand, and looking up at her with beaming eyes.

"Oh, Aunt Letty," she whispered, "how glad I am you came!"

"I wanted my own little runaway," said Miss Rolf, smiling good-humoredly; "and, Nan, tell me more about this poor little boy." So Nan repeated the story, and then, while she stood in the window by her aunt, she begged that he and his mother might be provided for.

"If you'd let me, aunt—my pocket-money," faltered Nan, who had been just two weeks in receipt of an allowance of half a dollar.

Miss Rolf smiled. She remained thinking a moment, and then said, very gently: "I'll see that he is cared for, Nan, and then, if it turns out well, I'll speak to you of a plan I have."

Nan pressed her aunt's hand warmly, and as Margaret came up now, Miss Rolf turned to her and asked if it would be quite convenient to her father and herself to let the poor wanderers board there a week or two. Margaret said she was sure of it, and a querulous voice across the hall calling her name, she added, in an under-tone, "Perhaps, Miss Rolf, you wouldn't mind speaking to mother about it?"

And Miss Rolf, who thoroughly understood Mrs. Blake's caprices, went across the hall into the room where the invalid sat in an easy-chair, every comfort about her that the hard work and the tenderness of her husband and child could procure. But Mrs. Blake, as somebody said, would be one to complain that her heavenly crown was uncomfortable, so completely dissatisfied was she with everything. Miss Rolf, however, was in her eyes the one human being she could submit to. When she was a young girl she had known the old lady, who had procured for her a place as district-school teacher, from which she felt she "descended" to marry honest Joel Blake. It was easy for Miss Rolf to make Mrs. Blake consent to the Traverses boarding there until she, Miss Rolf, decided what permanent home could be found.

While they were discussing the matter Lance returned to say that the doctor had been obliged to take poor Mrs. Travers to the Cottage Hospital he superintended, and which was largely under Miss Rolf's patronage. The poor woman was certainly very ill. So only little David was to be left on Margaret's willing hands. Miss Rolf departed, promising to send Mrs. Heriot over directly to see what Margaret needed; and leaving his boat in Blake's charge, Lance drove home with Nan and his cousin Letty.

The morning had been to Nan full of excitement, but the afternoon was to contain even a greater amount. Nan knew that her aunt was very thoughtful, and when she sent word at four o'clock asking Dr. Rogers to call at Rolf House to take tea, something in the way she spoke of to Nan impressed the little girl as though plans were being made in which she was concerned.

After tea the mystery was solved. Nan and Lance were in the drawing-room, the latter eagerly relating his experience at the theatre, when they heard Dr. Rogers leaving the house, and in a moment Nan was sent for to the black-walnut parlor.

GOING TO SCHOOL.

BY MRS. MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

THERE'S an army that musters its legions,

And marches to roll-call each day;

And happy and blest are the regions

Which lie in that army's bright way.

They troop over hillock and hollow,

They spring across brooklet and pool,

And gayly and cheerily follow

The summons which bids them to school.

By thousands the army is numbered,

Its soldiers are fresh as the morn;

Not one is by sorrow encumbered,

Not one is by care overborne.

At decimals sometimes they stumble,

And sometimes by verbs are perplexed;

And the proudest grows saddened and humbled

When a question is passed to the next.

But forgot at the briefest vacation

Are problems and puzzles and prose,

The grief of the stern conjugation,

That late was a fountain of woes;

And the army goes back to its duty

The hour that play-time is done,

Resplendent in love and in beauty,

Unmatched 'neath the light of the sun.

They gather, this wonderful army,

In field and in grove and in street;

Their voices are music to charm me,

So ringing and eager and sweet,

Their cheeks are as red as a cherry,

Their eyes are as pure as the day,

And the sound of their marching is merry,

Wherever they pass on their way.

There are people forever a-sighing

And saying the world is all wrong;

But somehow their doubts take to flying

At sight of this wonderful throng.

The world may be clouded and weary,

Of trouble and toil may be full,

But at least there is hope where the chery

Dear children are going to school.

THE TROUBLESOME BURGHERS.

BY GEORGE CARY EGGLESTON.

PHILIP VAN ARTEVELDE was a Dutchman. His father, Jacob, had been Governor of Ghent, and had made himself a great name by leading a revolt against the Count of Flanders, and driving him out of the country.

Philip was a quiet man, who attended to his own affairs and took no part in public business; but in the year 1381 the good people of Ghent found themselves in a very great difficulty. Their city was subject to the Count of Flanders, who oppressed them in every way. He and his nobles thought nothing of the common people, but taxed them heavily and interfered with their business.

The city of Bruges was the rival of Ghent, and in those days rivals in trade were enemies. The Bruges people were not satisfied with trying to make more money and get more business than Ghent could, but they wanted Ghent destroyed, and so they supported Count Louis in all that he did to injure their neighboring city.

Having this quarrel on their hands, the Ghent people did not know what to do. Count Louis was too strong for them, and they were very much afraid he would destroy their town and put the people to death.

A public meeting was held, and remembering how well old Jacob van Artevelde had served them against the father of Count Louis, they made his son Philip their captain, and told him he must manage this quarrel for them.

Philip undertook this duty, and tried to settle the trouble in some peaceable way; but the Count was angry, and would not listen to anything that Van Artevelde proposed. He said the Ghent people were rebels, and must submit without any conditions at all, and this the sturdy Ghent burghers would not do.

Count Louis would not march against the town and give the people a fair chance to fight the matter out. He preferred to starve them, and for that purpose he put soldiers on all the roads leading toward Ghent, and refused to allow any provisions to be taken to the city.

The people soon ate up nearly all the food they had, and when the spring of 1382 came they were starving. Something must be done at once, and Philip van Artevelde decided that it was of no use to resist any longer. He took twelve deputies with him, and went to beg the Count for mercy. He offered to submit to any terms the Count might propose, if the Count would only promise not to put any of the people to death. Philip even offered himself as a victim, agreeing that the Count should banish him from the country as a punishment, if he would spare the people of the town. But the haughty Count would promise nothing. He said that all the people of Ghent from fifteen to sixty years old must march half-way to Bruges bare-headed, with no clothes on but their shirts, and each with a rope around his neck, and then he would decide how many of them he would put to death and how many he would spare.

The Count thought the poor Ghent people would have to submit to this, and he meant to put them all to death when they should thus come out without arms to surrender. He therefore called on his vassals to meet him in Bruges at Easter, and to go out with him to "destroy these troublesome burghers."

But the "troublesome burghers," as we shall see presently, were not the kind of men to walk out bare-headed, with ropes around their necks, and submit to destruction.

Philip van Artevelde returned sadly to Ghent, on the 29th of April, and told the people what the Count had said. Then the gallant old soldier Peter van den Bossche exclaimed,

"In a few days the town of Ghent shall be the most honored or the most humbled town in Christendom."

Van Artevelde called the burghers together, and told them what the situation was. There were 30,000 people in Ghent, and there was no food to be had for them. There was no hope that the Count would offer any better terms, or that anybody would come to their assistance. They must decide quickly what they would do, and Philip said there were three courses open to them. First, if they chose, they could walk up the gates of the town and die of starvation. Secondly, they could accept the Count's terms, march out with the ropes around their necks, and take whatever punishment the Count might put upon them. If they should decide to do that, Philip said he would offer himself to the Count to be hanged first. Thirdly, they could get together 5000 of their best men, march to Bruges, and fight the quarrel out.

The answer of the people was that Philip must decide for them, and he at once said, "Then we will fight."

The 5000 men were got together, and on the 1st of May they marched out of the town to win or lose the desperate battle. The priests of the city stood at the gates as the men marched out, and prayed for blessings upon them. The old men, the women, and the children cried out, "If you lose the battle you need not return to Ghent, for you will find your families dead in their homes."

The only food there was for these 5000 men was carried in five little carts, while on another cart two casks of wine were taken.

THE BURGHERS PREPARE TO DEFEND THEIR CITY.

The next day Van Artevelde placed his little army in line on the common of Beverhoutsveld, at Oedelem, near Bruges. There was a marsh in front of them, and Van Artevelde protected their flank by a fortification consisting of the carts and some stakes driven into the ground. He then sent a messenger to the Count, begging him to pardon the people of Ghent, and having done this, he ordered his men to go to sleep for the night.

At daybreak the next morning the little army was aroused to make final preparations for the desperate work before them. The priests exhorted the men to fight to the death, showing them how useless it would be to surrender or to run away, as they were sure to be put to death at any rate. Their only hope for life was in victory, and if they could not win that, it would be better to die fighting like men than to surrender and be put to death like dogs.

After these exhortations were given, seven gray friars said mass and gave the sacrament to all the soldiers. Then the five cart-loads of provisions and the two casks of wine were divided among the men, for their last breakfast. When that meal was eaten, the soldiers of Ghent had not an ounce of food left anywhere.

Meantime the Count called his men together in Bruges, and got them ready for battle; but the people of Bruges were so sure of easily destroying the little Ghent army that they would not wait for orders, but marched out shouting and singing and making merry.

As their column marched along the road in this noisy fashion, the "troublesome burghers" of Ghent suddenly sprang upon them, crying, "Ghent! Ghent!"

The charge was so sudden and so fierce that the Bruges people gave way, and fled in a panic toward the town, with

Van Artevelde's men at their heels in hot pursuit. The Count's regular troops tried to make a stand, but the burghers of Ghent came upon them so furiously that they too became panic-stricken and fled. The Count himself ran with all his might, and as soon as he entered the city he ordered the gates to be shut. He was so anxious to save himself from the fury of Van Artevelde's soldiers that he wanted to close the gates at once and leave those of his own people who were still outside to their fate. But it was already too late. Van Artevelde's column had followed the retreating crowd so fast that it had already pushed its head into the town, and there was no driving it back. The five thousand "troublesome burghers," with their swords in their hands, and still crying "Ghent!" swarmed into Bruges, and quickly took possession of the town. The Count's army was utterly routed and scattered, and the Count himself would have been taken prisoner if one of the Ghent burghers had not hidden him and helped him to escape from the city.

Van Artevelde's soldiers, who had eaten the last of their food that morning in the belief that they would never eat another meal on earth, supped that night on the richest dishes that Bruges could supply; and now that the Count was overthrown, great wagon trains of provisions poured into poor, starving Ghent.

There was a great golden dragon on the belfry of Bruges, of which the Bruges people were very proud. That dragon had once stood on the Church of St. Sophia in Constantinople, and the Emperor Baldwin had sent it as a present to Bruges. In token of their victory Van Artevelde's "troublesome burghers" took down the golden dragon and carried it to Ghent.

WRECKED ON AN ICEBERG.

A SAILOR'S STORY.

BY WILLIAM J. LACEY.

AND so, lads, you would like to hear the story of what I am a little too fond, it may be, of calling "My strange Christmas-day on an Iceberg."

Ay, strange enough I did think it at the time, too. As you must know, boys, it was only my second voyage, and I wasn't very much bigger than Master James here, then. Very likely, if the truth was all told, I was a bit wayward and wild, as lads are apt to be still, I fear. But, bless you, that voyage, or rather its ending, was enough to sober anybody. I've never forgotten it, and if the rest of my mates are still alive, I don't expect any one of them has either.

Well, when the time came for me to leave school, and my parents—who were comparatively well-to-do—wished to send me up into a London counting-house, where I should have had a very good chance indeed of rising, I rebelled. My mind was set on going to sea. My locker was cram-full of Marryat's novels, naval wars, maps, compasses, and a big treatise on navigation that I had picked up at a book-stall, and could no more comprehend than Joanna the cook. I pleaded with all the hot, eloquent force of boyhood in favor of the ocean life of my fancy.

It was no use. I could not convince my parents, and the end of it was I ran away to sea.

When I came back from that first voyage, after an absence of nearly eight months, I was still in love with the briny, and still resolute in my determination to be a sailor.

I had undergone not a little hardship of one kind or another, but it had not altered me. Thus it came about that I sailed again on board the Vanthy, a merchantman bound for the cod-fisheries of Newfoundland.

This time, likewise, I had a comparatively safe and pleasant voyage, until within a few days' sail of land.

It was now the latter half of December, and captain and crew alike were in high hopes of spending the approaching Christmas-day in port.

Alas! not a few of their number, poor fellows, were destined to spend it in the last haven of all—in this case, fathoms under water.

As we neared the Newfoundland Banks, heavy fogs again and again overtook us, and the morning of the 24th of December found the Vanthy enveloped in one, if possible, denser and thicker than before.

A great quantity of watching and working had fallen to my share during the small-hours of the night that was past, and so I seized the first chance I could get to slip below and take a brief rest.

It was not to be.

Hardly had I tossed myself into my hammock when a terrific shock dashed me out again with much violence upon the boards beneath.

My experience was limited, and the first thing that struck my mind was that we had run on shore.

Hastily I scrambled to my feet and up on deck, to see there, looming weirdly up in the fog, that, now the mischief was done, was beginning slowly to evaporate, the awe-inspiring form of a gigantic iceberg—a sight that would have appalled—nay, had appalled—stouter hearts than mine.

Upon that iceberg it seemed we had struck, with irretrievable damage to the Vanthy, stout and thoroughly sea-worthy though the good ship was.

The Captain's voice broke through the tumult. Curiously calm it seemed to me, for I barely gave it a thought that at such a crisis a single moment's indecision or want of self-control on the part of authority may mean the loss of many a valuable life, let alone a vessel's cargo.

"Order, my men," he said. "This will never do. We have, as you know, been rammed by this iceberg. The ship has sprung leaks which no carpenter can repair. The collision has stove in our boats. Our only hope is to take refuge on the ice-floe; the part nearest looks too steep, but I think it may be done farther round. What do you say? Shall we try? Luckily the sea is calm, or even that might be impossible," he added, in an undertone.

"Ay, ay! Try, sir," gruffly responded the men.

They were willing, and more than willing—eager, as the Captain well knew—to embrace this chance of at least temporary safety.

So we set to work, as men only can work when life or death is the issue.

Some, by plugs, did what was possible in the way of stopping the leaks; some, in gangs, kept the pumps going; the remainder, under the carpenter's directions, toiled at the making of the raft which was to carry us across.

It was a great pity, the disaster to our boats, for if they had been spared us we might have got away to shore without difficulty.

They were gone, however, and it was of no use crying over spilled milk; we worked instead.

A light skiff packed away below—a whim of the chief mate's, it was said to be—was fished up, and sent off, with the one occupant it alone had room for, on a trip of discovery around the berg.

The sun returned with the welcome news that the Captain's surmise was right. On the opposite side, he said, there was both space for a landing (on ice) and accommodation within reach for us all. Once thereon, we might easily contrive to rig some sort of a shelter.

Then began the task of filing off the crew.

We were obliged to divide our company into three sections to get them over in anything like safety, for both the raft and the space of time in which to use it were narrow—the latter much more narrow than anybody thought; and it was doubtless owing to this unfortunate miscalculation that the disaster which followed came.

Two of the parties had been conveyed across in safety, myself in the second batch; the raft had been piloted back for the last time, and the men were seen climbing down the ship's side on to it, when, as we watched from that corner of the floe from which we could get a distant side view, the battered Vanthy was seen to be going down, dragging with her our raft and the poor fellows who were already on it. So we were compelled to witness, in terrible agony of soul and utter inability to help, the sinking into a watery grave of those who for long months had been our companions and friends. It was an awful sight—one that even now, boys, almost overwhelms me. One man, and one only, of all those left behind for that fatal third trip, managed to swim close enough to be picked up and rescued by the skiff.

That one proved to be the Captain.

When I parted with him in port, many days afterward, he seemed, I declare, fully ten years older than when we first sailed together from the shores of old England; and not much wonder, eh, lads?

The rest of that memorable day we occupied in making ourselves as comfortable as was possible in our cold quarters, sheltering ourselves as best we might under the overhanging brows of ice.

Night came slowly on. The cold was simply intense.

One by one the pale glittering stars of the Northern constellations broke in upon our loneliness, and the clear, calm moon drifted pitilessly up into the sky.

We needed no telling that if one of our number should fall asleep there unnoticed, and hence unmolested by his comrades, it was more than probable that he would wake no more in the land of the living, rescue or no rescue.

We talked, we told stories—grim ones they were—we even tried to sing; and thus the long dreary hours of the night paced on.

Morning dawned, gray and misty again—the blessed Christmas morn! Rations were served out in the usual order, and a sharp lookout was kept, I'll warrant you, by all without exception, for some passing vessel that might be to us an angel of rescue. None came, nor any sign of any, and that "strange," as I truly called it, Christmas-day left us as it found us—cold, miserable, and tormented with a sleepiness we dared not indulge.

Not many miles away—for we could not be far from land now—happy households were keeping the festive season in merry, orthodox fashion: we kept it on our iceberg, doubting much whether there would ever again be any chance of our joining in such merriment.

In what direction the iceberg was drifting, or if, indeed, it moved at all, was very hard to say.

We waited, and well-nigh despaired.

However, the next morning, as we were trying to swallow the sorrowful meal that did duty for breakfast, a joyful shout rang from the man on the chief watch:

"A sail! a sail!"

How those brief syllables nerved anew every heart in our little group! What wild pulsations of joy and reviving hope they kindled in our veins! With eager, straining eyes we gazed out over the boundless water waste to the distant southern horizon.

Would those on board note the tragedy that lay before them? That was for us now the all-important question.

For some time the ship kept on in her straight-ahead course, apparently bearing right down upon us. But at length we grew conscious of an alarming change of tactics. As might have been expected, the vessel's course was being altered with the intention of giving the floe in front as wide a berth as was practicable. For her eye was just an ordinary measure of precaution, nothing more and nothing less, but to us it meant very probably sheer destruction, and that by one of the most awful of all lingering deaths. Ah, the agonized despair of that moment, lads, stamped as it is upon my memory!

Hurriedly one of our party—it chanced to be myself—climbed with numbed limbs and hands and feet, that soon became torn and bleeding against the rough, jagged edges of ice, to the highest attainable peak overhead, and hung out thereupon a signal of distress—a patched blue jacket stripped from one of the shivering wretches below. Anything to attract attention to our forlorn and desperate condition.

Then with parched lips, but still lusty voices, we shouted together. Once; no answer. Again; and every instant now those on deck of this passing ship were becoming less and less likely to have their notice drawn by any means to us. Again, and with redoubled force in the extremity of our woe, we shouted. And, again, no answer. Again, and yet again, we cried aloud, with all the concentrated energy of our sailor lungs. This, the fourth time several of our fellows fancied that a faint answering shout broke the harassing stillness that succeeded our efforts. Once more we hallooed together, and launched the skiff as well.

But this time there could no longer be any doubt of the joyful fact that we were heard. A half shifting of the vessel's course, a louder, more distinct cheer, followed by the booming of a gun, proclaimed it; and very soon a boat was seen putting off from the ship's side and coming toward us.

It was, however, but too clear that their boat could not be safely brought near enough to the ice mass for us to have merely to step down into it as we had previously stepped up from our raft. We were therefore under the necessity of going to the ledge of ice nearest our deliverers, and from thence leaping into the sea and swimming to them.

But what cared we for that?

Life was in the deed, and one by one we accomplished it; those who could barely swim a yard (not so uncommon a thing amongst sailors as you might think) being very unceremoniously hauled into the boat by their comrades. Four of our wrecked crew, even then, were obliged to stay on their disagreeable refuge a bit longer, to prevent the risk of overcrowding. It was not a great while, though, and we were soon together again—a nice little bundle of castaways. Once privileged to find our tired feet again on wooden boards instead of cold, glittering ice, more than one or two of our poor fellows pretty nearly "knocked under," as the saying goes. What with the intense cold, the want of rest, the awful danger they had fronted, the alternate despair and rapture of the rescue, I don't think that that is at all a matter for surprise.

A short period of quiet, and the kindly attentions of the ship's doctor and his medicine chest, soon, however, brought them round. As for myself, I was well again in much less time than any one would have imagined, considering my youth and the tender sort of bringing up I had had.

The vessel that had effected so opportune a rescue was the General Washington—her destination New York, at which port she was not long in arriving. We landed, and from thence I soon found an opportunity of sailing back to England, after writing a long and thankful letter to my friends.

Many and many a voyage I've taken since then, as you well know, my boys, to all parts of the globe almost, and not few are the "hair-breadth scapes"—as folks call them—which I have had. But somehow, whether because of my comparative inexperience at the time I can not say, not one has impressed me so much as "My strange Christmas-day on an iceberg."

THE MERRY ADVENTURES OF ROBIN HOOD.

BY HOWARD PYLE.

II.

UP rose Robin one bright morning, and said he to his merry-men all, "For fourteen days have I seen no sport, so abroad will I go; but if ye hear me blow my horn, come quickly, for I will need your aid." So saying he strode away until he had come out from the forest.

Now he met a gallant knight, now a pannier-laden ass, now a merry whistling page, now a couple of buxom lassies, and now a fair lady on an ambling pad, but adventure found he never a one.

At last he took a road that led to a broad stream spanned by a narrow bridge made of a great log of wood. As he drew nigh, a tall stranger approached from the other side; thereupon each quickened his pace, seeking to cross first.

"Now stand back," quoth Robin, "and let the better man pass."

"Then stand back thyself," answered the stranger, "for the better man am I."

"That we will see," quoth Robin; "meantime stand thou still, or I will show thee good Nottingham play with a shaft betwixt thy ribs."

"Now," quoth the stranger, "I'll tan thy hide if thou dost touch a finger to that bowstring."

"Thou pratest like a fool," said Robin, "for I could send thy arrow through thy heart before thou couldst wink."

"And thou pratest like a coward, to shoot at one who hath but a hawthorn staff to meet thee with."

"Now," quoth Robin, "coward's name I have never had; and if thou darest abide my coming, I will go cut me a staff to meet thee with."

"Ay, gladly will I abide thy coming," answered the stranger, and leaned right sturdily upon his staff.

Then Robin stepped quickly to the cover-side, and cut a good staff of ground-oak, straight, without flaw, and six feet long; then presently came back trimming away the twigs and branches.

Tall and stout was Robin, but taller and stouter was the stranger, for the old songs say he was a good seven feet high.

"Nevertheless," said Robin to himself, "I trust I can baste him right merrily." Then he said, aloud: "Lo! here is my staff; now meet me if thou darest," and straightway stepped upon the bridge.

Then came the stranger twirling his staff, and met Robin midway over the stream.

Never did knights of Arthur's round table meet in stouter fight than did those two. For one good hour they fought with stroke and parry, the blows rattling like hail on pent-house shed until here and there were sore bones and bumps; yet neither gave way a single foot. Now and then they stopped to rest, panting, and each thought in his heart that never had he met so stout a youth in all his life before. At last Robin gave the stranger a blow that made his jacket smoke, and nearly tumbled him off the bridge. But the youth quickly regained himself, and gave Robin a crack on the crown that fetched the blood, and then, ere he could regain himself, another that fairly tumbled him heels over head into the water.

"And where art thou now, good lad?" shouted the stranger, roaring with laughter.

"Oh, in the flood, and floating adown with the tide," cried Robin, laughing at his own sorry plight. Then gaining his feet, he waded splashing to the bank.

"Give me thy hand," cried he, when he stood on dry land. "I must own thou art a stout lad with the cudgels. Marry, my head hummeth like a hive of bees." Then he clapped his bugle to his lips and blew a blast both loud and clear, and after a space the thickets swayed and rustled with the coming of men, and presently Will Stutely and a score of yeomen burst from out the covert.

"Good master," cried Will, "how is this?—thou art all wet from head to foot."

"Why," quoth Robin, "yonder stout fellow hath tumbled me into the water, and beaten me into the bargain."

"Then shall he not go without ducking and drubbing himself," said Will. "At him, lads!" Thereat all leaped upon the stranger; but he struck right and left so that though he went down with press of numbers, many rubbed cracked crowns thereat.

"Nay, forbear," cried Robin, laughing until his sore bones ached. "He is a good man and true. Say, merry blade, wilt join with us? Three suits of Lincoln green shalt thou have every year, and share and share alike with us. Thou shalt be my own good right-hand man, for never did I see thy like in a merry bout at cudgels."

"Why should I join ye?" said the stranger, surlily. "Who be ye that fall a score upon one man?"

"I am Robin Hood," said the outlaw, "and these are some of my merry-men."

"Ha!" cried the stranger, "art thou Robin Hood indeed? Marry, had I known that I would not so have thwacked thy ribs. Truly I will join with you gladly."

"Well said," cried Robin Hood. "And what is thy name?"

"Men do call me John Little."

ROBIN ENCOUNTERS JOHN LITTLE.

Then up spake Will Stutely: "I like thy name, good fellow, and yet I like it not. John Little hast thou been called, Little John shalt thou be called henceforth."

Then all shouted and laughed and clapped their hands, and Little John was be called forever afterward.

Then they all entered the forest, through which they travelled until they came to the great oak-tree beneath which the band slept through all the mellow summer nights. And there they held a great feast, which Will Stutely called the christening feast. And thus it was that Robin Hood gained his good right-hand man, the famous Little John.

THERE was an old man in Tobago
Who lived on rice, gruel, and sago;
Till, much to his bliss,
His physician said this:
"To a leg, sir, of mutton you may go."

HANDY SPANDY, Jack-a-dandy,
Loves plum-cake and sugar-candy;
He bought some at a grocer's shop,
And out he come, hop, hop, hop.

A DILLER, a dollar, a ten-o'clock scholar,
What makes you come so soon?
You used to come at ten o'clock,
But now you come at noon.

JACK be nimble, Jack be quick;
And Jack jump over the candlestick.

THREE LITTLE SISTERS.

KITTY, ELOISE, and PRUE,
Just as sweet as they can be!
Golden locks and eyes of blue
Have these little sisters three.
Hats and feathers like as peas,
Trim and trim from top to toe.

"Won't you kiss us, if you please?
For to church we mean to go."

Six small hands in three small muff's
Six wee feet that skip along;
Let the snow come down in puffs,
They will greet it with a song.

OUR POST-OFFICE BOX.

GARDEN CITY, NEW YORK.

DEAR YOUNG PEOPLE.—We have enjoyed this evening singing to the chapelful of happy people your beautiful carol,

"Come, children, with singing," the words of which we learned by heart. There are eight of us, and standing in a row, we just filled the space on the second step of the chance, between the two outer Christmas decorations.

Grateful to you for this pleasure, we sign ourselves

HELEN, RUTH, CELIA, BERTHA, MABEL, KATIE, EDITH, VIOLET.

Holy Innocents' Day, December 28, 1852.

These eight dear girls have done a very graceful and courteous thing in sending us this pleasant note. It must have been beautiful to see and hear them. And we are very happy to know that our carol added to the enjoyment and aided in the worship of those who assisted at the Christmas festival of the little people of Garden City.

We are always grateful to teachers who, taking an interest in the progress of their pupils, encourage them to write for the Post-office Box. Of the little budget received from Miss M. E. T., Amesbury, Massachusetts, we can not print all the letters, and we select two—Gertrude's because she is the youngest of the correspondents, and Charles's because we imagine it cost him the most trouble to write his little story. Miss T. will please ask her pupils to write again some other time.

AMESBURY, MASSACHUSETTS.

I want to tell you about my cat. She is very gentle, and will play with me. One night I had come home from work, as I work nights in the hat shop; the cat came and jumped upon me. While I was reading the story of "The Cruise of the 'Caracul'" my cat would come and jump upon the table, and walk around, and then come down in my lap, and make me stop reading, and play with her; and if I didn't, she would play with me until I did, and when I went to bed she would follow me. I put a little box under my bed, which I kept for her to sleep in. She would jump into it and go to sleep. When she heard me get up she would get up too, and go downstairs with me for breakfast.

I am already reading in the Fourth Reader in school. I was twelve years old on the second day of October.

CHARLES E. T.

A VISIT TO POHILL.

My dear friends, I hope you will be satisfied with my story.

One day we went on a large hill in the town of Salisbury, and it is called Powow, or Pohill. It is about a mile from my father's house, which is in the town of Amesbury.

I don't know how high the hill is. In the distance I saw some mountains in New Hampshire, and a mountain in Maine, which, I suppose, is Mount Agamenticus. I could also see the hills of Mount Beach, Hampton Beach, and the Isles of Shoals. Below were the towns of Amesbury and Salisbury on the west is a beautiful lake. The hill got its name from the Indians, who used to hold powows on it. There is a river by the same name. There was a very bad fire on the top of Pohill when I went up. I am nine years old, and go to the Littleton School, and my name is GERTRUDE C.

ESOLEWOOD,

NEW JERSEY.

All the girls and boys are writing about their pet animals. I would tell you about a little monkey we owned once. His name was Nip, and he was a little fellow, very affectionate and cunning, but an awful little mischief. One of his many pranks I am going to tell you about. It was played upon the whole week, ready to bring upstairs, but left it in the kitchen overnight. Master Nip got hold of the clothes, and put them in the boiler of soap-suds. So when the cook got down-stairs that morning, she found all her beautifully laundered clothes ready to be done up afresh.

When we were coming away from New York we gave him to a friend of ours, who wanted him very badly. He saw this gentleman one day making sad dressing, and when the gentleman had gone away, Nip took the bottle of sweet-oil and the mustard cruet, and mixed them together on the handsome new lounge. That was more than the gentleman could stand, so he sent him to Central Park, and there he is now, I suppose.

Please print this letter, if it is worth your while written, and I am sick in bed. Good-by.

GETTIE S. W.

Monkeys are droll creatures certainly, and yours is quite worthy a place in the Post-office Box. When I next go to Central Park I will look out for Nip. I would rather see him there, if I were you, than to be afraid of his playing some funny prank in my home at an inconvenient time.

NASHVILLE, TENNESSEE.

I am a little boy twelve years old. I live in the country two and a half miles from Nashville, and I go to school on a little black pony. I like Harper's Young People so much that I have one dollar and a half to renew it for next year. I have two brothers (Duke and Jim), and as soon as the paper comes there is a scramble for it, and sometimes a quarrel. I like Jimmy Brown's stories very much. I am just getting over a bad sore throat, and I have to stay at home. We have a large black Newfoundland dog named Jet, and four pet Kittens. We put two in the wagon to send away. One jumped out and ran back to the house, but the other jumped out on the road somewhere and was lost. I am fond of drawing, and I draw a good many maps. I am making collections of bullets, Indian arrows, etc. Last week when the creek was frozen hard, I went down to try to skate on it. I skated very well for a while, but got tired of it so I tried to get a smoother place, and I slipped down.

W. O. J.

I hope you three brothers will not quarrel over the possession of your favorite paper, though I am very glad you care so much for it that you are happy when you see its bright face week by week. I used to skate, though I fear I could not now, and I remember the pleasure of gliding swiftly over the smooth ice. It was such a pleasure that I did not mind an occasional fall, and I suppose my little skating friends find a tumble now and then a part of the fun.

GREEN BAY, WISCONSIN.

Merry Christmas, dear HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE. I am having a good time getting ready for Christmas. Tell Jimmy Brown not to do anything but eat, sleep, and sit in a chair, and then see if he gets into any more scrapes. But that will be hard for a boy so lively as Jimmy. I think it is not right for his father to tell him his conduct has been such so often, for I do not think he means to do any harm. My cousin thinks she ought to get the whippings sometimes, and I think so.

I wish Miss L. M. Alcott was my cousin, or that I could even see her for a month or two. I would ask her an awful lot of questions. We have got the books she wrote, Little Men and Little Women. I hope she will keep up that story, or else write a new one.

We have not got one pet. My mamma has weak eyes, and the doctor won't let her read much. I went to the play of Uncle Tom's Cabin when it was here last, and I thought it was nice.

I was not feeling so good looking at it. I hope my letter is not too long to be printed. I have never seen but one letter from Green Bay in the Post-office Box.

SADIE E. L.

Of course Sadie shall be a member of our Social. Jimmy Brown will be comforted by her sympathy.

Will Sadie tell papa that we are very much obliged to his kind words about the letter of my daughter's letter? We hope there are a great many parents who consider YOUNG PEOPLE "almost as good as school" for their children.

Mrs. Mary C. L., whose kind New-Year's message is appreciated, will please accept our thanks for her encouraging words.

FOREST HOME, ALABAMA.

I am a boy twelve years old. I am going to school at home to my eldest sister, who has just returned from school, and I like her very much as a teacher. This is my first letter to YOUNG PEOPLE. I like it ever so much. We have only taken it about six months. I have got so many letters with my little ones when I ditch them up. Their names are Dick and Shad. Dick can open a gate with his horn.

Gus J.

The next is from Gus's little sister.

FOREST HOME.

This is my first letter to YOUNG PEOPLE. Papa began taking it this year for my little brother and myself. I like the story of "The Cruise of the 'Caracul'" very much. I have read the best of all the stories I have read yet. I am very fond of riding, and my sister and I often go together for long rides in the afternoon. We live in the country, and our horse is named Pinkie, and I can milk her myself she is so gentle.

BETTIE K. J.

WHAT THE CHILDREN SAID.

BY RUBY ROSSER (AGED 9 YEARS).

Four little stockings
Hanging in a row,
Crammed with nuts and candies
From top to toe.
What did the children say
When they woke at break of day?

"Here are nuts

And here are candies,

Here are dolls

And dancing dandies."

That is what each one did say,

When they woke at break of day.

RUTLER, MISSOURI.

ARREVILLE COUNTY, SOUTH CAROLINA.

As I have not sent a letter in the Post-office Box from this part of the country, I will write one. We had fine weather—the sun shining warm, and the birds and flowers here with us—until the 20th of November last, when it grew cold, and sleet fell; the next day it snowed. I have two brothers, but younger than myself. I can not play snow-ball with them, because my eyes are not so well. I have given my box flowers a warm corner in the house, but I am afraid they will die. I have no pit for them. I think "Nuts" is a splendid story, and even grandmas says she is interested in it. I like Jimmy Brown would write every week. I wish to draw, but have never taken lessons. I saw for my dog, George has a little white hantam rooster, that crows very often.

We go to Sunday-school. On the first Sunday in December prizes will be given to the scholars who have been punctual and recited good lessons this year. My papa is the superintendent of the school. We do not deserve so much credit for being punctual boys and girls who walk a long way and come to our Sunday-school. We try to know our lessons every time. When I am older papa says he will take me to Florida to see his orange grove. Grandpa has been to New York. LUCY M. C.

These funny jingles are gravely repeated to the amusement of the family, by a wee lisping maiden three years old.

A BATRACHIAN BALLAD.

When Bully Frog
Was Polly Wog
He had a lovely tail;
He wriggled in,
And wiggled out,
And thought himself a whale.

The old Cow Frog
Sobbed on a log
Because she had no tail,
But living Frogs
From distant bogs
Took up the dismal wail.

For her son Tad,
The naughty lad,
Porriaged out to sea;
His heart was like
A railroad frog,
So hard to his Ma-mee.

"His tail he'll lose—He'll work it loose!"
She croaked in such a note
So hoarse and sad
You'd think she had
A frog within her throat.

Soon Polly Wig,
Of late so big,
Felt full of kinks and sore;
His weary snout
He turned about,
And headed straight for shore.

Land, land at last!
He leaped from the crest,
But dried up with his tail.
With eyes now dull,
He's sitting bowl,
Frog croaking in the dale.

IRVINGWOOD, VIRGINIA.

I have just read Rosalie P.'s letter, and I can sympathize with her, for I too am delicate, and can not study all the time and "hardly know anything," though I am nearly sixteen. We have a large family, too, and only one servant, so I generally "wash the dishes," but I do not dislike it, as I follow very nearly the plan of our dear Postmistress.

This summer my mamma was very poorly, and the doctor said she must go to the Rawley Springs for a rest and a good deal of strong mineral water. It was all so sudden that mamma was gone almost before I knew it. We were without a cook then, but I got along very nicely, considering that we had a good deal of company, and I had never been left alone that way before. I had to learn things as best I could. It seemed so strange not to have dear mamma to go to for help in my difficulties. I did everything except make bread, so we had to use baker's bread. I determined such another occasion should not find me unprepared, so when mamma came home, after a month's recuperation, I learned how to make yeast-bread, biscuit, pies, and cake. I am real glad now I had all that to do, for I know that it did me a lasting good. I intend to be a nice Virginia housekeeper, like some ladies I know here.

As to aprons, I feel sorry for Miss Rosalie, but I enjoy making them pretty, and wearing them, too, though I am not compelled to wear them constantly.

Dear Postmistress, I hope you will have a "Young Housekeepers' Sociable." I think the idea is splendid, and will send my name. Did you witness the contest of "onus"? I saw it through a piece of smoked glass, at school intermission, low down on the sun's disk, to the right of the centre, looking very different from the brilliant Venus of a few weeks ago. We like HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE more and more.

MAX H. S.

Please describe to the Sociable your method of making bread. Yes, I tried to see the transit.

Perhaps some of you would like to try your skill at playing

WORDS AND QUESTIONS.

ANA. As we have so many papers past twelve years old this evening, I think we had better have a game of Words and Questions.

COSIN WALTER. You must first tell us what it is. I do not recollect it. I have seen it played.

ANA. We are to write on slips of paper a number of questions (let us each write one), fold them up, and put them in a hat or basket. Then we take an equal number of papers on which we write nouns—a noun on each slip. Now let us do that first. Charley has brought us some paper and pencils. We will write a question and a noun each.

For a few minutes afterward silence prevailed, while the merry party assembled round the drawing-room table busily concocted and wrote down their questions. An occasional but instantly suppressed titter intimated that some few at least were of a laughable description.

WALTER. Well, Ada, our papers are written; what shall we do now?

ADA. Charley will hand them round separately, and we must each draw a question and a noun. Then we are to answer the question in rhyme, and bring the noun into the answer.

PHILIP. It sounds rather difficult. How if I am not poetical?

ADA. The more absurd your rhymes are, the better; they will afford us more cause for laughter.

CHARLEY. Well, mine won't disappoint you, then.

WALTER. But I don't approve of being laughed at.

CHARLEY. Then give us something very "stunning." But, in reality, no one can be laughed at personally, for questions and answers are read out by Nora, who will not tell us the author's name of any one of them, even if she recognizes the handwriting.

They answered their questions. Each player, as his slip is written, rolls it up and puts it into a basket before Nora, who at last shakes them about, and selects one at hazard.

Nora. The question is—If you had your choice, which would you be a dragon-fly or an eel? The word to be brought into the answer is loses.

The dragon-fly at eve reposes
Upon the clust'ring scarlet Roses;
The eel lies buried in dark green slime;
Can you say, cousin, which choice is mine?

PHILIP. Bravo! That's first-rate.
NORA. Here is another. I guess the author by the style. Word—kope-dancer. Question—Which do you prefer, Caesar or Pompey?

Great were old Caesar and Pompey,
Seldom their equal you see;
Great is Boudier the rope-dancer;
Which is the best of the three?

ADA. I never could write rhymes.
NORA. Oh! it will do very well. What is here? Word—North Pole. Question—What do you think of the Crystal Palace?

From the North Pole to the South
You won't find such another,
This is the true opinion
Of your very intelligent brother.

ADA. That's Charley!
CHARLEY. You do not to reveal authorships; we are all Great Unknowns here. But it is as good as lost.

Nora. This is a nice one—What do you think of travelling in an air-balloon? The noun drawn was Cowbeb. The rhyme on the two is

I confess I should not greatly care
To float like a Cowbeb in the air.
Next comes—How many feet has a spider?
Word—Noneuse.

Not being a naturalist, like White of Selborne, I really can not such wonders tell. It was necessary to ask a few questions. How much stuff. Farewell.

Thus the game went on. Our young readers are so bright that they will probably surpass the examples given them here when they try this game themselves.

Will the boy who exchanged with Frank Marion, Syracuse, New York, please send his address that he may receive his package in return?

ORPHANISM.—Attention, young ladies and gentlemen of the spelling class! Take your places in order, and listen. How many good English words can you make from the letters which appear in the word "Orphanism"? Write out your lists plainly, and send them to HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE. Be sure to see whose list will be the longest. You will find it pleasant work for a winter evening.

We repeat, for the information of new subscribers, that there is no charge for the publication of exchanges. Do not offer or ask for birds' eggs or fire-arms; both are prohibited in the exchange list. Please state, in the first place, what you have, and then what you wish to receive. Write plainly with black ink, and be very particular to give your name and post-office address correctly. Your exchange will appear in four or five weeks after the date of its reception at the office of YOUNG PEOPLE. To avoid disappointment and misunderstanding, it is always well to arrange the details of an exchange by correspondence before sending away any article which you value. It is prudent to state as precisely as you can, what sort of curiosities, stamps, or other articles you desire, as exchanges which simply announce lists of curiosities or other things for "offers" are not inserted. Articles for sale can not be included in the Exchange Department, which is intended only for the pleasure and instruction of our young readers.

A GEOGRAPHICAL JEMBLE.

A thrifty lady in a dress of town in New South Wales, and carrying (one of the Sunda Islands) fan, went out to buy a new set of an empire in Asia. She had a desire to shine in islands in the Pacific, and sent for her mountain in Oregon (a city in Idaho, a city in Georgia, and a city in Illinois) to aid in the selection. Having bought some delicate cups and saucers from a beautiful city in France, she bought plates from a city in Prussia, and carved platters from the mountains in Switzerland. She proceeded to order a supper. She bought (vegetable from Minnesota), fruit from Spain and Italy, fish from the Mediterranean, and many other things. Lighting her saloon, she found the town in North of Scotland of the candles troublesome. She called her servant from mountain in Scotland, and ordered him to bring her oil from the sea on the east of Siberia. Her carpets were (a city in Belgium, her perfumes came from a city on the Rhine), her curtains from a town on the Trent, her coat from a town on the Tyne, and her knives and forks from (two busy manufacturing towns of England). "WE'RE COMING TOO."

THE FEAST OF LANTERNS.

BY G. E. BARTLETT.

THE name is borrowed from the Chinese, but the entertainment itself has little reference to their ancient custom. It may be performed in many ways more or less simple, but will here be adapted to a large hall with all the various performances, any of which can be omitted when desirable to condense for use in a parlor.

The costume is arranged to go over the full dress of a gentleman or lady. The chief robe is made as scant as convenient to the wearer, and consists of a straight gown reaching from the throat to the feet, with long flowing sleeves. It may be made of any material, to suit the taste and fancy of the owner, of black trimmed with various colors, and ornamented with pictures, fringe, bells, or any other decorations. The cheapest and most effective head-dress can be made of a bright colored paper lamp shade or a wire cake cover lined with paper; from this hangs a long queue of braided yarn, list, or hair, and a wire mask serves to conceal the face. These masks can be bought at any fancy-goods store, can be made of cloth or paper, or, if no mask is worn, the face can be very much disguised with chalk and rouge, and by altering the curve of the eyelids.

The lanterns and candles can be purchased in large quantities at some wholesale store at a very reasonable rate, and can be disposed of at auction at the close of the performance, as they are always in demand for decorative purposes. The smaller ones are best adapted for this purpose; but when not too costly, those which are adorned with flowers are desirable.

If spectators are admitted without the Chinese dress, they must be seated around the sides of the room before the entrance of the others.

The Grand March is formed outside in the entry, unless an anteroom can be obtained, and as the leader of it enters the hall the lights are darkened in order to render the gleam of the lanterns more brilliant. It is led by a very tall person, who nods his head often and bows low to the assembly, in which act of homage he is imitated by each couple as they enter the room. They all carry lanterns, some on high staffs, some hanging from umbrellas from which the cloth has been removed, and some bear huge drums made of two Chinese umbrellas tied together, with the space between filled with cambric or oiled paper.

The performers all follow their leader, marching first by pairs, and saluting as they turn each corner by bowing low once and then nodding their heads rapidly three times. Having gone twice around, they counterchange, then come up the centre by fours, then move in single file twice around the room, forming in two lines, facing each other, twelve feet apart. They then salute each other in line twice, and the right line countermarches to the left and the left line to the right, when they join and march up the hall in line, or in as many lines as the width of the hall will allow. They are then divided into sections of six, and keep time to the music of a military march, each one waving his lantern or staff above his head.

After forming again in line they wind around in serpentine curves. They then rest, standing in a circle, or seated on the floor on rugs or cushions, while tea is served to them in small cups. They may sell these cups of tea to the spectators, if the entertainment is designed as a means of aiding any cause, and in this case a pagoda may be erected in one corner for the sale of candy, and another opposite for the exhibition of curiosities.

The pagodas can be copied from any picture, and made brilliant with lanterns and transparencies. They are concealed from view, until wanted, by curtains, which are drawn aside at a signal given by the leader, who strikes three blows on a gong which is hanging on the wall in a convenient place. The attendants who have been chosen to serve in the pagodas then take their places, and a general promenade is commenced, so that those who have occupied the seats can walk around, enjoy the music, and patronize the pagodas if disposed.

At the next signal the seats are resumed, and a little dance or march is executed by eight of the performers, who may go through the common right-and-left figure which is used as the last change in the Lancers. After this is over, the gong again calls the masqueraders to place. The leader withdraws a curtain which has hung at the back of the room, and the lights, which had been turned up at the conclusion of the march, are again darkened. Each one of the Chinamen then advances in and hangs up a small lantern on a nail which has been driven into a board concealed by the curtain. This board is constructed so that a huge bush of bright flowers is made by the lanterns when they are hung up.

Later on a supper is served in another hall, or if this is not convenient, the guests are served at small tables or tea-poys which are brought in by the Chinese, who wait upon the guests, and afterward partake of refreshments themselves. Songs and games may conclude the entertainment, or social dances may follow.

AN OPEN-AIR PRISON ; OR, CAPTAIN HARCOURT'S ADVENTURE IN THE TERAI.

BY DAVID KER.

"I'm off to the Terai for a month."
"Then you're a very lucky fellow, that's all."

In one way certainly Captain James Harcourt, of the —th Native Bengal Infantry, might well be considered lucky. He was the keenest hunter in his regiment, and the district where he was going to spend his month's leave of absence was one which is a kind of "happy hunting ground" in the eyes of every East Indian sportsman, native or European.

The Terai, whither our gallant Captain was bound, is really nothing more than one of the ledges or steps of the great mountain stair of the Himalaya, the highest range in the world. But this one ledge is broad enough to cover the space of an entire province, and to contain forests in which a man might wander for days without finding his way out. These forests swarm with game of every kind, and are specially famous for producing the finest breed of tigers in all India; and many a native prince has paid thousands of silver rupees (half-dollars) to enrich his menagerie with a good specimen of the "Terai wallah" (man of the Terai), as these striped gentlemen are nicknamed by the Hindoos.

Travelling by railway as far as the railway could take him, and then going up the mountain paths in a bamboo litter which was carried at a swinging trot by four sturdy natives, Captain Harcourt lost no time in reaching the border of the Terai. He had made up his mind to add to his collection of hunting trophies the skin of at least one Terai wallah, in addition to the dozens of tigers which he had killed elsewhere; and he had scarcely entered the famous forest when he learned to his no small satisfaction that he had come just in time for some good sport in this very line.

A monstrous tiger had recently appeared in the Terai, and was making terrible havoc among the native villages. If half the stories told of it were true, it must have travelled by telegraph, or at least have gone quicker than any tiger ever went before; for it was declared by the peasants to have done mischief on the same night in two villages fully fifty miles apart. The accounts given of its appearance and habits were so utterly contradictory as to drive poor Captain Harcourt almost out of his senses; but all agreed in representing this mysterious beast as the largest, strongest, and most ferocious tiger ever seen in that part of India.

What a chance for the sporting Captain!

The moment they heard that an English "burra sahib" (great master) had come among them, having already killed plenty of tigers, and meaning to kill as many more as he could, the inhabitants of all the neighboring villages came trooping in a body to Captain Harcourt's camp to offer him their services in tracking down the tiger, and to beg him to make an end of it as soon as possible.

This was just what our hero would have been very glad to do; but however anxious the Captain might be to see the tiger, the tiger did not seem at all eager to see the Captain. One night almost have thought that some one had warned the beast of his coming, and that it was keeping out of his way on purpose.

One day passed—two days—three days. The Englishman and his Hindoo guides scoured the forest in every direction, but not a sign of the beast could they see, and Captain Harcourt, enraged by his disappointment, was almost as savage as the tiger itself.

But on the morning of the fourth day things took a better turn. An old hunter came into the camp who had actually seen the tiger but a few hours before, and was able not only to give a pretty exact account of how it looked, but even to tell whereabouts it was likely to be met with. Before the man had got half-way through his story Captain Harcourt sprang from his seat, and flinging his cap right up into a big tree overhead, danced frantically round and round the tent, singing at the top of his voice a verse from one of his favorite songs:

"A pork barrel's nice when you're hungry at sea,
But a well-loaded gun-barrel's nicer to me;
A bright yellow prunose looks sweet, if you will,
But a bright yellow tiger looks prettier still."

The Captain and his new ally lost not a moment in starting off into the forest, toward the spot where the tiger had been last seen; but although they saw plenty of the great round paw-marks which it had left, no tiger was to be found. At last even these traces disappeared, and Harcourt, furious at the thought of losing this splendid chance, sent his attendant to scour the forest on the left, while he himself struck off to the right.

The Captain had not gone far before he came upon a very curious structure of bamboos laid close together, which might have been taken for a hut, except that it had no chimney, and apparently no door either. But on the farther side he at length discovered a square opening quite big enough for him to creep through, above which, as if ready to fall and close the opening, hung a strong heavy plank, kept in its place by a cord of twisted bark. The moment the Captain saw this he knew that the seeming hut was really a tiger trap.

Then he was suddenly struck with the idea of hiding himself close by, waiting until the tiger came to sniff around the bait, and then shooting it. But before doing so he thought it just as well to creep in, and make sure that there was any bait for the tiger to sniff at, for the inside of the trap was so dark that he could see nothing from without. In he crawled, and had just made out a fine quarter of buffalo beef tied to a stake, when a loud snap was heard, and down came the hanging plank, like a window-sash, right over the entrance. The Captain's head had touched the cord that worked it, and he had trapped himself instead of the tiger.

Just at the first moment Captain Harcourt was more inclined to laugh than to be disturbed; but he soon saw that it was no laughing matter. The plank fitted so exactly into the opening that he tried in vain to lift it, and its fall had left him so completely in the dark that he could hardly see his own hand. True, he was quite safe from the tiger, for the bamboo poles were so close together that neither tooth nor claw could find any hold upon them. But if the tiger could not get in, just as little could the Captain get out.

There he was imprisoned. Fret against it as he would, he had fallen into a trap laid for a ferocious wild beast, and how long he might remain there was a question that could not be answered. True, he had plenty of food, but it was not of a kind that suited his taste, and no one had thought of providing water or anything else that could be drunk.

One chance, however, still remained. The bamboos were dry and sapless, and might not be proof against the edge of the broad-bladed hunting-knife at his side. Anyhow, the chance was worth trying, so to work he went.

He had been cutting away for some time, and had made, with considerable difficulty, a hole just wide enough to pass his arm through, when there was a rustling and a crackling in the thicket, and out into the clearing broke a monstrous tiger, in which by the pale yellow skin and cross-striped face he recognized the famous "man-eater" described by the Hindoo, which he had hunted so long in vain.

All the Captain's prudence was gone in a moment. Instead of waiting until the tiger came right up to the trap, as it was sure to do on scenting prey, he thrust his rifle through the cleft and let fly. As a matter of course he missed the head, and only hit the fore-shoulder.

The wounded monster gave a roar that shook the air, and darted toward the cage like an arrow; and the terrible teeth and claws began to enlarge the hole cut by the Captain with a speed that made his blood run cold.

No time to reload now. Harcourt flung down his useless rifle, and seizing his hunting-knife, slashed and stabbed like a madman at the grinning muzzle and great yellow paws. But although every gash drew blood freely, the monster continued to crunch and tear the bamboos until there was room for its head to pass through; then followed one fore-paw, and then the other; and Harcourt, giving up all hope of escape, set his teeth savagely, and drew himself together for a struggle to the death.

But just then the crack of a rifle echoed from the thicket, and the tiger, in the very act of springing, reared up and fell back dead. In another moment a broad, sun-burned visage peered through the gap, and a hearty voice, which Harcourt recognized as that of an old dragoon officer who was one of his special friends, shouted:

"Hallo, Jim! have the tigers been shutting you up in a menagerie, by way of a change? Well, you've got your cage and your food; why don't you begin to sing?"

"I'd have begun to sing out long ago," answered Harcourt, "if I'd known that anybody was within hearing; but if you hadn't come up when you did, old boy, my singing would have been stopped once for all."

From that time forth, however, it was noticed that Captain Harcourt always made haste to change the subject when any one began to speak of tiger-traps.

JOLLY OLD WINTER.

BY E. M. TRAUQUAIR.

A STURDIER, kindlier, jollier wight
Than Winter seldom is seen;
His hair, his beard, his mantle are white,
His muscles like iron, I ween.

Healthy and strong from the crown of his head
To the sole of his foot is he;
A fire he scorns when he goes to bed
In his chamber lofty and free.

For a palace is his at the far North Pole,
Of ice he built it, and snow,
And a hunting lodge on each mountain top,
Where keenly the frost-winds blow.

His sheets he makes of the snow-drifts white;
At chinks and crannies he sneers.
He pricks up his ears and laughs with delight
When the merry sleigh-bell he hears.

But no pleasure he has in the song-bird's note;
No beauty in flowers he sees;
He hides them away 'neath his white fur coat,
And strips off the leaves from the trees.

The lakes and the rivers he fetters tight,
To hinder their flowing tide;
The ring of the skates is his great delight
As over the ice they glide.

A mighty despot for good as for ill,
A king, though his reign is short,
The sunshine would soften his iron will,
But dares not come to his court.

Yet kindly he welcomes the girls and boys,
Who gay to his presence go;
And blithe and brave are winter joys,
In the wake of the ice and snow.

LASHED TO THE WHEEL IN A STORM.

BY AN OLD SAILOR.

I WAS aboard a little schooner belonging to Weymouth. In the English Channel it came on to blow, and the skipper, thinking shelter necessary for our safety, brought up near Dungeness. About noon the wind moderated, and he said he wanted some provisions, and would go ashore to get 'em. He left me and a boy aboard, and went away with the other hand.

About an hour after he was gone it came on to blow again. By night-fall it was as dark as a pocket, the wind groaning like thunder, and the heads of the seas breaking off afore they touched the vessel, and smothering me and the boy as we stood looking and waiting and wondering on what was to happen. We had both anchors over, and she had as much chain as we had to give her, and the lead line was alongside to let us know if she drifted. Presently I had occasion to go below for a minute; but whilst I was groping for a light, I hears the boy singing out as if he was being murdered, and running on deck, found that both cables had parted, and that we were adrift.

Mates, ye can guess what that situation would be like. If there was any comfort to be got out of such a mess, it lay in the knowledge that we weren't blowing ashore, but right away out to sea. I called to the boy, and between us we made shift to close reef the gaff-foresail, and to show enough of it to enable us to lay to. All I could do was first to lash the helm, and then lash the boy, and then lash myself. The storm of wind lay as solid and cold upon us as an iceberg. Roll! ye should have seen her. Had ye asked me, afore we got into that weather, if the schooner would live in such seas as them, I'd ha' turned from you in contempt of the silliness of such a question. Yet she did live—ay, and she did as well as if she'd been full of air instead of coal.

Her name was The Maria, and when I talk of her I feel as if I ought to pull off my cap. Well, the night passed, and when the morning light came the boy was all but dead. His hair was thick with icicles, and he lay on his side as stiff and helpless as a capstan bar.

At last—and it might ha' been an hour after daybreak—I sighted a tug coming our way. I made shift to bend on the ensign, jack down, and send it aloft. The tug seeing this, drove alongside and hailed me, and I told 'em the story with what voice the cold had left in me. On this they got a bit of a life-boat over, and took us aboard.

Being a hearty man, I pulled through all right; but though the boy lived, he lost his right foot and the use of his left hand, was in the hospital three months, and remains to this hour as sad a human object as ever ye saw. And now, sir, the most part of this here is that it took place on New-Year's Day. As I live to discourse upon it, it was the worst New-Year's Day I ever passed, though I've gone through others that came pretty near to it in suffering.

CARL MARIA VON WEBER.

BY LUCY C. LILLIE.

DURING the year 1784 a German nobleman named Von Weber arrived in Vienna with his little children, whose musical abilities were so marked that the father determined to give them every advantage within his power. But Baron von Weber was poor and reckless. He had always been a spendthrift, and was noted for his eccentric habits and ideas. Being the uncle of Mozart, he imagined that in Vienna he might force his children into a place as prominent as that filled by the famous young composer. But this was not to be the case. His sons were placed under the care of "Papa Haydn," but did not distinguish themselves; and meanwhile the peniless, good-looking father, a widower of fifty, fell in love with the very young daughter of his landlord, a beautiful girl of sixteen, who seems to have consented readily to marry him.

The newly wedded pair went almost at once to the town of Eutin, where the Herr Baron was offered the place of Stadtmusikant, or town musician. This was rather a downward step, but it at least gave his little wife food and shelter. Old Weber seemed to have no idea that she needed more in her life than its actual necessities. He treated her harshly, if not with absolute cruelty, and in 1798, when her one child, Carl Maria von Weber, was eleven years of age, the poor little mother faded out of life.

Carl was born at Eutin in 1786. He was always delicate, sensitive, and overstudious, and from his birth his rough-tempered father determined to make a musical prodigy of him. What hours of suffering he must have endured as a mere baby, forced to sit at the piano, his little fingers strained upon the keys, while his father, with a baton that could any moment become a rod, stood over him!

As a mere child Weber began to compose, and his father carried him about from place to place, sometimes staying long enough to have one master really influence the boy, but rarely giving him time to think out carefully the music that he was urged on to compose. Much of his time was passed behind the scenes of provincial theatres, and although the influence of this sort of life on his moral character could not have been good, it helped him when he came to write for the stage. He learned by constant observation everything connected with the workings of the opera.

After a youth spent in many wanderings, and with hardships and disappointments of various kinds, young Weber, at twenty-one, was appointed private secretary to the brother of the King of Württemberg, and in this position he might have been successful but for a curious quarrel with the King. This monarch was a man of low tastes, coarse manners, and extremely bad temper. Poor Weber was often his victim, for in his character of the Duke's secretary he had to beg from the King whenever his Majesty's very reckless brother needed money or any other royal favor. On such occasions the King vented all his wrath on Weber, and treated him at times with insult and contempt. One day, after an unusually wild scene with the King, Weber left the royal apartments, feeling as if he could no longer endure such an existence. He stumbled against an untidy-looking old woman, who inquired where she could find the royal washer-woman.

Weber was still boiling over with the rage he had been compelled to conceal in the King's presence, and on a mad impulse he pointed to the door of the King's cabinet, saying, "There!" In walked the unsuspecting old woman, who, without recognizing the King, informed his Majesty that the young gentleman outside had told her she would find the washer-woman there. The King, who was well known to hate old women, sprang up, poured forth a volley upon the terrified intruder, and ordered Weber to be thrown into prison at once. Later he was released; but the incident was never forgotten by the King, who, when an opportunity came, revenged himself.

Weber's father had become involved in business difficulties, and Carl generously tried to shield the old man from disgrace. But while Carl's opera of St. Sylvana was in rehearsal, and likely to make a great success, the King had both father and son arrested. A mock trial was arranged, and the King himself presided over it, with his usual fury of temper and expression. Young Weber remained calm and dignified, even when he listened to the sentence of banishment pronounced upon his father and himself, and left Württemberg completely resolved to devote all his heart and mind to the pursuit of music.

A new era in his life followed. He wrote with clearer mind and greater success; and as soon as he freed himself from certain evil influences of his life, the very best part of his nature developed. It is comforting to think how happy Weber was in his marriage. His wife was a young artist, of exquisite temperament and disposition, whom he loved devotedly, and who made his home-life as perfect as it could be, when we remember how many cares he had, and that for years he had suffered with a fatal disease. It was for his wife, his dear Lina, that he composed the "Invitation to the Waltz," ever since so famous as a piano-forte piece, and it was under much of her inspiration that he wrote the opera of Der Freischütz.

This great work was performed for the first time in Berlin in 1821, and Weber and his wife spent some time in that city preparing for its production. In those days, even more than at present, musicians suffered greatly from the efforts of their rivals to lower them and their work in public estimation, and Weber was not spared such annoyances. But he felt an enthusiasm in his art which entirely mastered this petty side of life: and Sir Julius Benedict, then his pupil, tells us how Weber spent the very day preceding the production of the opera. He passed some time at the piano, going over a new work upon which he was engaged, and gave Sir Julius and Lina the ideal story he had in it. The music was the since famous concert piece in F minor, and it seemed that never had the master played better or been in a calmer and loftier mood. He then took a light dinner, and had a little rest; and so, with his wife and favorite pupil, went to the opera-house. A great audience was assembled, and among them a little bright-eyed boy, who sat entranced, an eager listener, at his father's side. The boy was destined later to be famous as Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy. The success was complete. The composer was received like a hero of victory, and slight and awkward as he was, he stood among his friends great for that hour at least. The royalty of genius was about him, and every one paid homage to it.

Unhappily Weber was not always destined to such triumphs. Five years passed away, and we find him in London, where he was already famous as the composer of several operas—Der Freischütz, Euryanthe, and Oberon. But though the latter proved a great success, the public did not receive Weber as his friends felt that he deserved to be received. Moseheles, the composer and musician, the loyal, earnest friend of art and its disciples, with Sir George Smart and several others, did all that they could to make Weber a successful, happy visitor in the English capital; but Weber was fast dying, and every trouble in his public life seemed to reduce his failing strength.

A dear old friend has told me of her last visit from Weber—how he toiled upstairs to her bright drawing-room, and sinking into a chair, declared himself too ill to have ventured out. But even at the very last he continued patient and gentle. On the evening of the 4th of June, 1826, his friends saw him for the last time. As usual, he retired alone, and bolted his door. In the morning the servant who went to call him got no response. He hastened to Sir George Smart, who, with Moscheles, burst into his room. They found him lying dead, as in a peaceful sleep, his head resting on his arm, his expression one of pure and gentle repose.*

* A dear friend of Weber's told me that it was quite untrue that the so-called "Weber's last Waltz" was found under his pillow. It was not even written by him, but by one of his pupils.

HUNTING THE RHINOCEROS.

BY JIMMY BROWN.

WE ought always to be useful, and do good to everybody. I used to think that we ought always to improve our minds, and I think so some now, though I have got into dreadful difficulties all through improving my mind. But I am not going to be discouraged. I tried to be useful the other day, and do good to the heathen in distant lands, and you wouldn't believe what trouble it made. There are some people who would never do good again if they had got into the trouble that I got into; but the proverb says that if at first you don't succeed, cry, cry again; and there was lots of crying, I can tell you, over our rhinoceros, that we thought was going to do so much good.

It all happened because Aunt Eliza was staying at our house. She had a Sunday-school one afternoon, and Tom McGinnis and I were the scholars, and she told us about a boy that got up a panorama about the Pilgrim's Progress all by himself, and let people see it for ten cents apiece, and made ten dollars, and sent it to the missionaries, and they took it and educated mornahundred little heathens with it, and how nice it would be if you dear boys would go and do likewise and now we'll sing "Hold the Fort."

Well, Tom and I thought about it, and we said we'd get up a menagerie, and we'd take turns playing animals, and we'd let folks see it for ten cents apiece, and make a lot of money, and do ever so much good.

We got a book full of pictures of animals, and we made skins out of cloth to go all over us, so that we'd look just like animals when we had them on. We had a lion's and a tiger's and a bear's and a rhinoceros's skin, besides a whole lot of others. As fast as we got the skins made, we hung them up in a corner of the barn where nobody would see them. The way we made them was to show the pictures to mother and to Aunt Eliza, and they did the cutting out and the sewing, and Sue she painted the stripes on the tiger, and the fancy touches on the other animals.

Our rhinoceros was the best animal we had. The rhinoceros is a lovely animal when he's alive. He is almost as big as an elephant, and he has a skin that is so thick that you can't shoot a bullet through it unless you hit it in a place that is a little softer than the other places. He has a horn on the end of his nose, and he can toss a tiger with it till the tiger feels sick, and says he won't play any more. The rhinoceros lives in Africa, and he would toss 'most all the natives if it wasn't that they fasten an India-rubber ball on the end of his horn, so that when he tries to toss anybody, the horn doesn't hurt, and after a while the rhinoceros gets discouraged, and says, "Oh, well, what's the good anyhow?" and goes away into the forest. At least this is what Mr. Travers says, but I don't believe it; for the rhinoceros wouldn't stand still and let the natives put an India-rubber ball on his horn, and they wouldn't want to waste India-rubber balls that way when they could play lawn tennis with them.

Last Saturday afternoon we had our first grand consolidated exhibition of the greatest menagerie on earth. We had two rows of chairs in the back yard, and all our folks and all Tom's folks came, and we took in a dollar and sixty cents at the door, which was the back gate.

I was a bear, first of all, and growled so natural that everybody said it was really frightful. Then it was Tom's turn to be an animal, and he was to be the raging rhinoceros of Central Africa. I helped dress him in the barn, and when he was dressed he looked beautiful.

The rhinoceros's skin went all over him, and was tied together so that he couldn't get out of it without help. His horn was made of wood painted white, and his eyes were two agates. Of course he couldn't see through them, but they looked natural, and as I was to lead him, he didn't need to see.

I had just got him outside the barn, and had begun to say, "Ladies and gentlemen, this is the raging rhinoceros," when he gave the most awful yell you ever heard, and got up on his hind legs, and began to rush around as if he was crazy. He rushed against Aunt Eliza, and upset her all over the McGinnis girls, and then he banged up against the water-barrel, and upset that, and then he fell into the hot-bed, and broke all the glass. You never saw such an awful sight. The rhinoceros kept yelling all the time, only nobody could understand what he said, and pulling at his head with his fore-paws, and jumping up and down, and smashing everything in his way, and I went after him just as if I was a Central African hunting a rhinoceros.

"THEN HE FELL INTO THE HOT-BED, AND BROKE ALL THE GLASS."

I was almost frightened, and as for the folks, they ran into the house, all except Aunt Eliza, who had to be carried in. I kept as close behind the rhinoceros as I could, berging him to be quiet, and tell me what was the matter. After a while he lay down on the ground, and I cut the strings of his skin, so that he could get his head out and talk.

He said he was 'most dead. The wasps had built a nest in one of his hind-legs as it was hanging in the barn, and they had stung him until they got tired. He said he'd never have anything more to do with the menagerie, and went home with his mother, and my mother said I must give him all the money, because he had suffered so much.

But, as I said, I won't be discouraged, and will try to do good, and be useful to others the next time I see a fair chance.

WORK IN SHEET METAL.

BY C. H. V.

TO those of our readers who are fond of mechanical amusements we would recommend tin, or, more properly, tinned iron, as a material that may be used for the manufacture of objects of every description, from a doll's cradle to a rotary steam-engine. One advantage of it is that it will cost nothing, as in every house there is apt to be more than a sufficient supply.

Take some empty fruit cans; wash them clean, stripping off the paper labels; set them on a hot stove, so as to melt off the bottoms and the remnants of the tops; and then lay them on their sides where they are joined. In this way there will finally be obtained a nice flat piece, five or six inches wide and ten or twelve long.

With a pair of shears this can be cut into any shape. A tinman's shears of small size are the best; but if these can not be had, a large pair of old scissors that have served out their time in cutting cloth will answer, though they are likely to be hard upon the hand. Another tool that will be useful for joining the pieces is a soldering iron, as it is called, but it is made of copper. To use this successfully will require some practice, but the advantage of knowing how will richly repay the trouble of learning. The iron is heated in a fire until it will melt the solder. Then it is requisite to get a little of the solder to stick to the end of the iron; this is done by brightening the point with a file as soon as the iron is taken from the fire, and then quickly pressing the point upon the solder; when it adheres the solder can be taken up on the point and applied where it is needed.

The next step is to make the solder stick to the material. A little powdered resin should be spread along the edges to be joined; then the hot solder will adhere to them nicely. As soon as the solder cools, which will be in a moment, the pieces will be united very securely. When a soldered joint is properly made its strength is surprising to a beginner. If it is desired to fasten together pieces of iron that are not coated with tin, a little muriatic acid with some zinc dissolved in it will be useful; it is best to have a small quantity of this mixture on hand in a phial to be used whenever there is any difficulty in making the solder unite with the metal. Apply it with a small stick sharpened somewhat at the end.

A tube is probably the best thing to learn to make at the outset. Cut a strip of tin one inch wide, and about six inches long; get a piece of iron rod a quarter of an inch in diameter. The strip of tin can be easily folded around this, and with the aid of a light hammer it can be shaped into a tube, having one edge neatly and closely overlapping the other. Only a little practice is needed to make the whole round and straight. The hammer should be used lightly and carefully, so as not to leave dents and creases in the metal. When the true shape has been obtained, the rod should be slipped out, and the seam nicely soldered from end to end. Such tubes can be added to one another by inserting the end of one into the next and soldering, or by lapping a short piece over the two ends. They will carry steam or water without leaking a particle. They answer finely also for posts in any small structure, as they are very strong for their weight, and will resist a great strain before they will either bend or break. A smaller tube can be made with a narrower strip over a one-eighth-inch wire. For the larger sizes a round piece of wood will do as well as the iron rod.

As boys are usually more fond of machinery than of motionless devices, we will show them how to construct a small windmill. Make first the shaft over the quarter-inch rod, and about eight inches long. Then make the arms of one-eighth inch, and about six inches long; six of them will be a good number. To fasten them on the shaft, pass the latter through a block of wood to hold it during the process, allowing about one inch to project above. Then place the six arms in a circle round the shaft (Fig. 2), using some carpet-tacks to keep them in position on the block until they are soldered to the shaft. A file will be useful in smoothing off any unevenness that may remain on the work after the soldering. Next cut the sails (Fig. 1), of the usual shape, and solder them on the arms, sloping so as to catch the breeze. The movable part will then be complete. The stationary frame-work can be made of wood; and if our young mechanic has been able to follow our directions thus far, his own ingenuity will, we are sure, guide him in fitting the shaft into two uprights, and putting the whole in successful operation.

THE FAST FREIGHT.

BY ELIOT MCCORMICK.

WALTER CARLISLE had climbed into a freight-car that was standing on a side track in the Wentworth depot, and concealed himself as well as he could in the far corner. He was playing hide-and-seek, and his companions were searching for him outside the car-yard fence.

"They won't be likely to find me here," he said, gleefully, to himself, while he listened to their cries.

Presently he heard them sealing the fence near to the car, but just at that moment a man came along and pushed to the heavy door.

"Thank you," said Walter, half aloud. "Now they'll never find me."

With the closing of the door, however, the noise of their cries was shut out, and Walter could no longer tell how near to the car they might be. In a moment something bumped against the far end of the car with a jolt that sent it back quite a distance on the track, and would have knocked Walter over if he had not already been sitting. Then the car began to move slowly forward. They were going to shift it to another track, Walter concluded; but as this would throw the boys still further off the scent, and give him besides a free ride, he did not mind it.

So he sat still while the car bounced over the switch, and felt somewhat disappointed when it came to a stop a little way beyond. That was only for a moment, however. Very soon it backed down, until with another jolt it bumped into a car behind. Walter supposed that the shifting process was now done, and, getting up, went to the door with the intention of opening it and jumping out. He had hardly risen, however, before the car began to move forward again, and this time it seemed to be part of a heavy train. They must be making up the fast freight, he determined; and then he began to wonder how near it was to five o'clock, when the fast freight would start on its eastward journey.

Meanwhile the car was moving faster and faster, and Walter found it difficult to walk as far as the door. He would roll it back, he thought, and be ready to get out when the car stopped. But try as hard as he might, he could not roll it back, and the speed of the car kept all the time increasing. With a growing sense of alarm, Walter pulled out his watch, and looked at the face by a ray of light which streamed in through the door.

It was as much as he could do now to keep on his feet, and he had to hold on to the frame-work of the car with one hand, while he steadied the watch with the other. Was his watch fast? That could not be; it had not gained nor lost a minute in a month. But the hands pointed to ten minutes after five; and while the car jolted over switches and swung around curves, until he could no longer stand, the dismaying thought forced itself upon Walter that this was the fast freight, already on its way.

For a moment he hardly realized the situation; but as he began to think over what he knew about the train the outlook became very unpleasant indeed. Except for water, it would not stop until it reached New York. Even if it did stop, the sides of the car were so solid that he might kick and pound and call out all night without being heard by the few brakemen who had the train in charge, and who it was quite likely would not come near his car at all. It was called fast, but a fast freight is very different from a fast express, and Walter could not hope that it would reach New York within thirty hours. By that time he might be starved to death. The very prospect of so long a fast made him hungry. How long could people live, he wondered, without eating? The recollection of Dr. Tanner gave him some comfort, but then Dr. Tanner had had all the water he wanted, while Walter did not have a drop.

By this time he had crept back to his corner, where he braced himself as well as he could, though as the train went still faster, and the empty car swayed from side to side like a ship at sea, the boy was shaken and jolted until every bone in his body began to ache. Before him stretched out the long and weary hours. How should he ever endure them? If he could stand the hunger and thirst, how could he bear the cold of the autumn night, already beginning to creep in through the cracks of the car? What report would the boys carry back when they did not find him? And what would his father and mother think? He had never staid away from them a night in his life. How frightened they would be! and how completely at a loss for any clew to his whereabouts! If Walter had been a fugitive from justice he could not more completely have covered up his tracks.

On and on went the train, around curves, over bridges—as Walter could tell from the sound—past other trains, through towns and villages, battering and bruising the boy's slender frame with every bounce and jolt, until at last, out of weariness, Walter fell asleep. Once or twice in the night he woke up, cramped, hungry, and chilled, though it was not so cold as he had feared it would be, and the light of time gave him a little more courage.

By-and-by, through the crevices of the door, he discovered the welcome daylight. So much, at any rate, of his journey was accomplished; but what would he not give for a good breakfast? As the day went on, and his watch told him it was nine o'clock, he fancied the boys going to school, and wondering why he did not appear; his father and mother, filled with increasing alarm, going here and there in search of him; the papers getting hold of it, and announcing in startling head-lines, "Boy lost!" But all Walter could do, though he was tired and faint and anxious about the anxiety of those at home, was to wait—and this is always the hardest duty in the world.

It wanted a few minutes of noon when Walter was suddenly startled by feeling the onward motion of the train checked, and the car in which he was imprisoned violently shaken from side to side. For a moment, as he himself was rolled about on the floor, he thought that the car was going to upset; but presently it righted and stood still. Evidently an accident had happened, though as to what it was Walter could not form any idea.

Now, when the train had stopped, however, was his chance to make himself heard. With all his might he kicked against the door, and cried out at the top of his voice; but no one came. He thought of stories he had read about people who were shut up in dungeons, and imagined himself to be one of them. If he had been uneasy before, he was almost wild now. What could be the matter? How could he make any one hear? He was putting these questions to himself, when all at once, from the rear of the train, came a terrible roar and crash, with the sound of splintering wood. Before he could think what had happened his own car rose up on end, and Walter found himself swiftly hurled down its inclined floor.

As the boy's senses cleared he realized that a second accident had occurred. Looking up to the rear end of the car, now above his head, he saw that it was broken away, and through a wide gap he could see the blue sky. If he could only climb up to it, here was a way of escape. Fortunately, though a good deal bruised, he was not hurt, and the excitement of the occasion gave him strength. The car had been raised up at an angle of more than forty-five degrees; its floor was smooth and slippery, and it was with the greatest difficulty that Walter could scramble to the end.

When, after several reverses, he finally reached it, and put his head out of the opening, he witnessed a scene of the wildest confusion. Whatever might have happened before, this time the train had been run into from behind. Cars were piled one upon the other, and across both tracks, and their contents were scattered everywhere around. The car in which he had been imprisoned had been the last one, it seemed, to feel the force of the shock, and was thrown up by a platform-car passing underneath. Not a man was anywhere in sight.

Walter did not waste much time in getting down from his elevated position and walking back to the scene of the collision. Here he discovered that it was a "wild-cat" engine which had done the mischief, and had wrecked itself in the operation. There was no one around, but as Walter drew near he began to hear dismal groans coming out of the debris, and to realize that of all the people on the train—conductor, brakemen, and engineer—he alone had escaped injury. For a moment he felt sick, but as he heard a voice calling to him from the ruins of the caboose, he hurried up, and presently discovered the form of a man, whom he took to be the conductor, underneath a mass of wreckage. The voice was very feeble, and Walter had to bend over to hear it.

"Say," the conductor exclaimed, "what time is that Chicago express due here?"

Walter stared. He did not know anything about the Chicago express, except that it was due at Wentworth at midnight. Why should the conductor ask him? And why should not the conductor be more concerned about his own escape?

"I'm sure I don't know," he said. "It isn't due now, is it? Hadn't you better let me help you out of that?"

The man shook his head. "No, no," he cried; "the express is due presently, and if it isn't flagged it will come around the curve ahead and run into this wreck. Is there a man around to run up the track and flag it?"

Walter looked up and down the track. It was a lonely place, miles it seemed from any settlement, and not a person could be seen. His own heart began to beat more quickly.

"No," he said, "there isn't any one."

"Then you'll have to go," said the conductor. "We're all smashed up here. First the engine went off the track, and that broke up the engineer and fireman; and while the brakemen and I were getting our wrecking tools out of the caboose, something ran into us from behind, and broke us up too. I suppose it was a 'wild-cat,' or else there would have been somebody around."

Walter nodded his head. "Yes," he said, "it was a wild-cat, and I guess the engineer of that came to grief too. But is there anything I can do for you before I go?"

The conductor uttered an exclamation of pain.

"Oh, do go ahead," he said. "Don't mind me; there are only half a dozen of us here, and there'll be five hundred people in the express. We'll hold out, I guess, till you get back, and if we don't—Say, young fellow, just take down my wife's name, will you? It's Mrs. James"—he stopped a moment.

"What was that?" he asked.

Walter listened, while his face grew pale. Faraway up the track sounded the faint note of a locomotive whistle.

"Run!" cried the conductor. "Never mind me. There's a red flag lying on the track. Go as far as you can, for it's a down grade, and the train will be coming like the wind."

Before the conductor was through, Walter had snatched up the flag and hurried off. He had not realized before how shaky his limbs were, nor how faint he was from lack of food; but as he ran past the overturned engine of his own train, and around the curve that lay ahead, it was as much as he could do to keep from falling down. He had not failed to take in the conductor's last warning. The express was the fastest train on the road; it would be running over forty miles an hour, and he must meet it far enough away from the wreck to give it time to check its tremendous momentum and come to a full stop. Once more he heard its whistle in the distance. Presently it would be thundering down upon him. On he ran as fast as his trembling legs would carry him, until, turning a curve, he could see the thread of smoke far down the narrowing track. Walter unfurled the flag and waved it over his head. His heart thumped up and down in his breast, his legs shook so that he could scarcely stand, and it was all that he could do to hold the flag in his nerveless fingers. He felt as if he were going to faint. What if he gave out before the train came and the engineer did not see him! With one arm he grasped a telegraph pole, while with the other he continued more and more feebly to wave the signal. Nearer and nearer came the train, but before it reached him Walter's strength had given way. He dropped at the foot of the pole, and the engineer, as the train dashed by, looked down from the cab window on a boy's still form pillowed on a red flag.

Among the passengers on the express that day was the President of the railroad—Mr. Watson—who, with his wife, son, and party of friends, occupied a hotel car at the rear of the train. They were running at the highest speed, when Mr. Watson suddenly felt the pressure of the air-brakes upon the wheels; and Hiram, who was looking out of the window, perceived at the same moment a motionless figure lying by the side of the track.

"Oh, papa!" he cried, "I believe we've run over somebody!"

Mr. Watson started hurriedly for the rear platform, followed by Hiram, who could with difficulty be kept from jumping off when the train stopped, and before it began to back down. In a moment, however, it was moving slowly back to the spot

"Oh yes: it's all right," he said; "and we'll take you right into our car."

The other breathed a little sigh of relief.

"There's a smash up just ahead," he murmured. "Tell the conductor to go slow."

Then he closed his eyes, while Mr. Watson and one or two other gentlemen, who had meanwhile come up, lifted him in their arms and carried him on board the car. Here, however, while the train moved slowly ahead, Mrs. Watson's ministrations restored him to consciousness, if not to strength.

"It was awfully silly in me to go and faint," he exclaimed, apologetically, as soon as he could speak. "But, you see, I ran pretty hard, and then I had not eaten anything since yesterday noon."

"But I don't understand," said Mrs. Watson. "Don't you live round here?"

He laughed a little nervously. "Oh no," he said; "I'm a sort of stow-away. I got locked up in the freight-car at Wentworth last night. We live in Wentworth, and my father is Judge Carlisle. If the collision hadn't stove a hole in the car, I'd be in there now."

"And where would we be?" asked Hiram, soberly.

Walter turned pale again. "The wreck lies across both the tracks," he said. "If you had kept on, you would have run into it. There are half a dozen men buried in it now.

sir"—turning to Mr. Watson. "Everybody in the train was smashed up but me. And the conductor wouldn't let me stop to pull him out. He began to give me a message to his wife, but he wouldn't even finish that, because he heard the train coming. Here we are now, sir"—as the train slowed up, and finally came to a stop. "Please let me get out. I'm all right now, and I want to tell that conductor I wasn't too late."

It was not long before the train hands were hard at work extricating the injured men, none of whom, happily, were seri-where the engineer had seen the boy, while Hiram waited in a fever of impatience on the platform steps. At the first glimpse of the red flag, before the cars had stopped, he jumped off and made haste to the telegraph pole, where the figure lay. He could see at once that the boy had not been run over, and as he gazed at the motionless form the dark eyes opened and looked up questioning into his.

"Is the train safe?" the boy asked, faintly.

Hiram nodded.

ously hurt. How they escaped death no one could tell, but no one suffered more than a few bruises or a fractured limb, which time would easily repair. To Walter's great delight, the conductor recognized him at once.

"Ah," he said, as cordially as the pain of his wounds would allow, "you're the boy that saved the express. Well, I guess Mr. Watson won't forget it."

Walter turned red.

"I only did what you told me," he said.

"Well, you did it right," said the conductor, as he limped away to the express. "Not everybody would have had sense enough to do that. Only I don't see where you dropped from just at that moment."

The boy laughed.

"Oh, I live in Wentworth," he said. "I was a passenger on your train. You locked me up in that Blue-line car yonder."

A look of amazement spread over the man's face.

"Locked up in the car, were you? And then brought to this place on purpose to flag that train! Well, I call that Providential. Because if it hadn't been for you, you know, that express would have been a total wreck." He paused for a moment as if the Providence were more than he could take in. "Well," he added, heartily, "I'll never forget it, and I guess the company won't either."

And the company did not. A few days after Walter got home, and when the excitement of his departure and return had passed away, he received by express a little parcel, and by mail an official letter from the railway company. The parcel, when he opened it, disclosed a beautiful gold watch, while the letter, which was signed "H. S. Watson, President," begged him to accept the watch from the directors of the company in recognition of his services in saving from destruction the Chicago express.

Along with the letter came a note addressed in a boy's scrawly hand, and reading as follows:

"DEAR WALTER,—You didn't know papa was President of the road, did you? I wanted to tell you awfully that day, but papa wouldn't let me say anything about it. Isn't the watch a beauty? I hope it will keep good time. What a lucky fellow you are, anyhow! Not only to get a gold watch, but to have the chance of riding 500 miles on a freight train. Papa says I may some day, but I suppose I shall have to go in the caboose. What I'd like is to be a brakeman."

"Now what I want to know is this. Next month papa and some of his friends and I are going out on the plains to shoot buffaloes, and papa is going to ask your father to let you come along. We have a special car, you know, and if you can only come we will have immense fun. Don't you think your father will let you? Please let me know right away."

"Your friend

"HIRAM WATSON."

To this urgent appeal Judge Carlisle could not say no, and Walter cherishes eager anticipations of a buffalo-hunt and a long ride in a car which will be more commodious and agreeable, notwithstanding Hiram's preferences, than the fast freight.

THE GREAT STONE PICTURE-BOOK.

BY CHARLES BARNARD.

YOU remember how from time to time in YOUNG PEOPLE we looked at the strange work of the waves: the queer walking beach at Sandy Hook, the long fight between the beach and the little Neversink River, the strange flats and marshes that grow up behind the travelling beaches. Then there was the work of the tide in the East River, and the fantastic carved hills cut out by the sea in Boston Bay.

Many of you who live in the country may say that you have no chance to go to the sea-shore and examine the work of the waves and tides. This does not make so much difference as you think, for in nearly all parts of

New England, New York, and the Middle States you can find a beach. It is dead and dry now, and the waves went away long, long years ago, yet at one time they did roar and tumble there as they do now on Long Island.

You know that the world has been many millions of years the workshop of the winds and waves. If any one had been in North America, say ten, twenty, or thirty thousand years ago—for no one can say exactly when it happened—he would have found that it was a pretty cold country. North America was nearly the same shape that it is now, but a strange thing had happened. All the upper part had been lifted up out of the sea, and it was so terribly cold that the whole country was covered with a thick sheet of ice. The ice covered all New England and the Middle States, and stretched clear across Long Island Sound and Long Island, and out into the sea, just as it does in Greenland to-day. There were glaciers such as we see in Switzerland and in the valleys of the Connecticut, the Hudson, the Mohawk, and the St. Lawrence.

Then the land began to sink down again into the sea, and the summers grew warmer, and the ice began to melt and form lakes and pools, shallow bays and rapid rivers. The whole mass of the ice began to slide down into the sea. It ploughed up the loose earth, and tore off the rocks, and rolled them over and over, crushing and grinding them into sand and gravel. If we had lived then we should have said the sea was invading the land; the fact is, the land was sinking in the water, and every year the beaches moved farther and farther into the country. There were travelling beaches, and there were great fights between the rivers of ice-water and the stormy waves that tore up the sand and flung it down before the floods from the hills. There are hundreds of places in New England, and many places in all the Northern and Middle States as far west as Ohio, and all through the South, where you can find these old beaches. Every railroad cutting made through a gravelly hill will show you rounded pebbles and stones, layers of sand and gravel, all sorted out exactly as we see them on the shore to-day.

Look about and see if you can find a sand-bank or a gravel-hill. Sand is used in house-building, and the masons in your town will be pretty sure to find a place where they can dig it out to put in their mortar beds. Look at one of these sand-pits. The sand is arranged in layers and sheets. Take these round stones sorted out according to their sizes in the hill. You can not think the sand made itself. You can not imagine the Creator rounded all these stones and placed them in layers merely for amusement, or to make something to puzzle us. Everything we see in the world had a cause, and if you find something far back in the country that seems just like the sea-shore, you may be very sure the sea was once there. Sand and gravel are made by the waves where they meet the land or roll down the river, so we feel sure wherever the sand is now that once the waves were there.

If you were ever down upon a low flat beach when the tide was coming in, you may have seen that as the water crept up, little capes, straits, islands, and so on, were formed along the edge of the water. Every change of level in the water changed the shape of the miniature continents. So it has been with the real continents. Neither Europe nor the Americas, Asia, Africa, or Australia are now of the shape they were years ago. They have been lifted up out of the water and let down again, and each time the coastline moved backward or forward. Continents became archipelagoes, and then scattered islands, and at last sank in the sea. Rivers turn into bays, and valleys became sounds and straits. Europe was once much larger than now, and once of wholly different shape. Ireland joined England, and England touched France. The Connecticut Valley was a bay, and the Hudson another, with a big cape between.

Everywhere there has been change; not suddenly, but slowly, just as it is to-day. No man has seen Sandy Hook growing, but it does grow. No one can measure how fast the hills fall into the sea near Boston, yet the work goes on all the time. The gravel heaps and sand-banks of New England and the sandy barrens of South Carolina and Georgia are comparatively new. That last change, when the beaches extended far back into the country, was really only a little while ago, perhaps half a million years, more or less. Behind all that were older seas and more ancient shores. As soon as there began to be land there was a beach. Perhaps the first land was only a sand-bar. Volcanoes threw out hot rocks and ashes, and these fell in the sea, and were ground up into sand. These old, old beaches, so venerable no man can count the years that have passed since the sea roared about them, are dead and turned to stone. To-day, as we know, they are called sand-stones. You can see the ripple marks and even the old shells in the stones we put into our houses.

People who have looked at the different kinds of rocks and have studied, as we have done, the work of the sea, the tides, and waves, have tried to make a science out of it all. They call it geology. Perhaps you fancy that a dry dull science. Why, you are a geologist yourself. I have told you where these queer things about the rocks can be found, and if you have seen them or have tried to imagine how they look, then you have studied the science too. The next thing is to try for yourself, and see if you can turn over a few more leaves of the great stone picture-book in which I have shown you a few of the most curious pictures.

N A N.*

BY MRS. LUCY C. LILLIE,

AUTHOR OF "MILDRED'S BARGAIN," "AUNT RUTH'S TEMPTATION," ETC.

CHAPTER XIX.

IT was still daylight, and as Nan entered the parlor she saw Miss Rolf seated in one of the windows before her writing-table, and on it were strewn some papers, evidently recently in use.

Never had Aunt Letty's voice been kinder than when she said, "Come over here, Annice, and sit down. I want to tell you my plan."

So Nan did as she was told, and then Aunt Letty, after a little fumbling among her papers, said: "I told you I had a plan; but I wanted to discuss the wisdom of it with Dr. Rogers before I spoke of it to you."

"Yes, aunt," said Nan, with her eyes fixed on Miss Rolf's face.

"It is this, then, my dear. If—I if I see fit to leave you in my will any large sum of money, you must know that the use of it is a great—a great responsibility. Money is not given us just for ourselves, Annice. We owe our use of it not only to God, who let us have it, but to those who have daily need of it. I should suffer greatly if I thought I was the means of your misusing any money I might leave you. I would rather see you work hard for your daily bread than have you sin by ill-using any fortune. I wear rich clothes, but these I always care for, and you do not know how little I really spend; but were I to buy simply for the sake of decking my person I should call it a misuse of the money God has seen fit to let me have. Nothing is more odious than a pompous, a purse-proud, or a miserly rich person." Aunt Letty broke off here with a smile. "I must not make my sermon too long, dear. I wanted first to make you feel the importance of the trust I am going to repose in you. Now, then—"

Nan's whole heart shone in her face; she felt impressed, excited, yet bewildered.

"Now I have thought," said Miss Rolf, "for some time, of making you give away certain sums in charity, and it occurred to me to-day that a very good plan would be for you to have, in a certain way, the charge of this poor mother and her child."

"Oh!" cried Nan.

"I would not give you the money outright to spend for them, for you are too young for that; but at certain stores in town you could have credit, and while I would superintend everything, you would buy everything for them. What I would exact from you would be a strictly kept account-book. My bills would come in once in six months, but you would have to show me your book every week or month."

Nan's eyes nearly danced out of her head.

"Of course, if I found you were too young for this," Miss Rolf continued, "it could be given up any time; but Miss Prior assures me your strongest point is figures, and you can at once learn to keep accounts regularly. Then I shall expect you to think out plans for your people, and we will talk them over."

But as to talking now, it seemed to Nan impossible. She could find neither words nor thoughts which would answer, only within her heart was something like a quiet prayer that nearly ended in sobs.

When Miss Rolf had discussed her plan with Dr. Rogers, she had said: "I feel sure I am right about this child. She has a real taste for good works, and this plan of mine will steady her, while the work will please her thoroughly."

And Dr. Rogers had agreed with Miss Rolf fully.

Lance was summoned soon after, and Miss Rolf and he and Nan talked over a good plan for comforting the wanderers. I say talked, but Nan only listened, with glistening eyes and a beating heart. How she longed to confide in Joan! It seemed so long to wait to see her, but it would not do, she felt sure, to indulge impatience of this sort just at the very outset.

Early the next morning Phyllis came over, by Miss Rolf's request, to continue the fascinating discussion. It was evident that she scarcely believed Nan old enough for such a charge, but of course, as Miss Rolf said, it could so easily be taken from her that it was certainly worth the trial.

Miss Rolf's idea was that a cottage could be taken for Mrs. Travers, and that David could go to school in the mornings, and work at Rolf House in the afternoons. Miss Rolf had no idea of bringing the boy up to idleness. Should he ever show any special talent for one of the higher professions, that could be developed later, or even if he showed talent for classical study, time could be given him for such.

Driving to church, Nan looked eagerly at every possible cottage; but it was not until some days later, when Mrs. Travers was decidedly better, and David quite well enough to sit up nearly all day, that the cottage was found. One morning Dr. Rogers came into Rolf House, saying:

"Well, Nan, I've just what will suit you, I think, in the way of a cottage."

Nan blushed and smiled.

"May I take her with me, Miss Rolf?" the good doctor went on. And Miss Rolf answering "Yes," Nan was soon in the doctor's gig, driving along the river road near to Mr. Blake's.

He explained that he had come upon a widow who with her daughter occupied a very comfortable cottage so much too large for their requirements that they were very willing to let one-half of it to Nan for Mrs. Travers. As Mrs. Travers must always be an invalid, it would be better for her to have some one else in the house with her while David was so young.

"I had thought of that, doctor," said Nan, shyly.

"Ho! ho!" laughed the doctor; "so you really can think, puss. That's a good beginning."

NAN MAKING HER PURCHASES.

Nan would have been much better pleased had Lance and Joan been with her; still she certainly enjoyed herself. The cottage stood in a little garden of its own, and there was nice pasture for a cow, and Mrs. Holt, the occupant, was very well pleased to show the doctor and Nan the rooms she designed to let. There were three—a sitting-room, quite comfortably furnished, and a small and a large bedroom, and Mrs. Holt was willing to undertake Mrs. Travers's cooking. Everything looked bright and cheerful, and four dollars a week for the rooms did not seem too much. But Nan hesitated: ought she to make the bargain then and there? She glanced at the doctor, but he said nothing until she whispered the inquiry. Then he said:

"You didn't ask about her charges for cooking. Better have Mrs. Travers send in her own food."

Nan felt, foolishly, as though this had been a great oversight on her part; but she soon arranged to pay fifty cents more a week for the cooking, and then the doctor handed her a little note-book, in which she was to enter these negotiations.

Nan had a sort of feeling that Phyllis would not like the rooms. The little parlor was certainly very gaudy, and its ornaments cheap-looking; but she reflected—perhaps they might change that before Mrs. Travers took possession. She would ask Phyllis's advice.

CHAPTER XX.

JOAN stood outside of the school-room door in Rolf House, knocking very timidly. It was half past three; lessons must be over; but then, thought Joan, with a little screw to her nose, that Miss Prior would probably keep Nan until the very last possible minute.

"Come in," a cold voice said; and Joan opened the door, looking in on the large bare room, with Nan in its centre, and Miss Prior, with her head bound up from toothache, listening to her arithmetic.

Things were going better just at this moment, for Nan had quite a genius for figures, and Miss Prior enjoyed anything mathematical. The lesson was just over. Miss Prior was glad to go home and take care of her suffering face, and so Joan soon found herself alone with her cousin.

"Well, Nan," she exclaimed, "Cousin Letty thinks it best for Laura to go out with us when you buy the things,

That, I suppose, is to keep me in order."

Joan grimaced and laughed, and Nan said, quickly: "Well, let's not mind, Joan. Do you know, I fancy Laura hasn't much real pleasure."

Joan, who had seated herself in the window, looked around with a laugh.

"Oh yes, she has, Nan," she said; "she is always with those Phillipses we go to school with, and the Tempets; and they have all the fun they want. And she considers herself quite a young lady now."

"She is only fourteen," said Nan.

"Well, she feels two hundred and four," said Joan. "Come, Nan, tell me what you're going to buy."

Nan was on this eventful morning starting out to make her first purchases, as it were, on her own account. She was to buy clothes for David, some dresses and other things for Mrs. Travers. Miss Rolf preferred leaving her entirely to herself in these matters for one week. After that, when the first accounts were presented, she decided that she could judge of Nan's fitness for her new responsibility. The old lady had notified various merchants in town that her niece was to be given credit, and so everything was in train.

Nan hardly liked to confess even to Joan her sense of importance and excitement as she started out in the big family carriage with Laura and Joan, and Mrs. Heriot, who had come to matronize in a way the youthful party. Joan busied her dark head over Nan's list, calling upon her every now and then to help with figures or writing. In the generosity of her nature she felt no jealousy of Nan's position, only a pleasurable sense of her cousin's importance. Laura liked the excitement of it, but, although impressed by Nan's new power, was inclined to be ill-tempered. She smiled upon Joan's little enthusiasms, and looked at Nan rather crossly.

They stopped first before Messrs. Ames & Ames's large dry-goods store, and there Nan was reminded of her first purchases with Cousin Phyllis. How long ago it seemed! and how little she had then thought to be so soon in such a position herself!

Two nice suits for David were bought, and various minor articles, and then Mrs. Travers's dresses had to be chosen. Here Laura became decisive in her opinions, and Mrs. Heriot gave some sound advice, while Nan's fancy wavered between a green camel's-hair and a nice dark linen, and a light brown wool and a gayer calico. The former were chosen at last; and then it was that the clerk asked the address, and Laura, whose spirits had risen, leaned forward over Nan's shoulder, saying,

"Miss Rolf said, I believe, it was all to be charged."

"Oh, certainly, miss, certainly!" rejoined the clerk; and Laura looked well satisfied.

Nan felt indignant for a moment or two. Why couldn't Laura have left her alone? But suddenly the thought came to her—was this all done for her pleasure, or to teach and help her to help others? This brought peace. Nan was able to move to the next department, and bring herself to ask Laura's advice in a gentle voice.

Miss Rolf had suggested buying some books, and at Ames's were two well-stocked counters, from which Laura was asked to select one or two nice volumes of history, and the same of romance and poetry. Laura's taste, like Phyllis's, was good; and the books, if a trifle sentimental, were well chosen. The carriage was loaded with parcels, and then the girls drove to Margaret Blake's.

Miss Rolf had desired Nan to choose little Love a silk dress—an article such as she had certainly never dreamed of possessing—and Nan had been delighted with the idea. She chose a pretty dark brown silk. Laura said Margaret would like a trimming of lighter silk; yet when Nan remembered Love's quiet eyes, the sober, happy little face, she could not think of her in anything but pretty and simple gowns.

"I don't think, Laura," she said, gently, "that Love would like—a fashionable kind of a dress; she wants something just nice!"

So Laura had laughed and turned away; and the result was that Nan had chosen the plain, pretty brown silk.

As they drove down the river road toward the Blakes' cottage Nan leaned back in the carriage, happy and excited, and no doubt feeling rather important; yet something of the sermon she had heard on Sunday ran in her mind. She could not have given the text, but the words pointed to a spirit of humbleness when happy things seemed to come suddenly. Poor little Nan! Hers had been a hard life, and she was scarcely fourteen; and judged by the standard of Cousin Phyllis, or Laura, or Miss Prior, she was not "brilliant." Yet in her heart was a steadfast longing to do whatever God had meant she should. Nan was a child; she could not tell what she ought to do, but yet heart and soul and meaning were all pure. If she had ever cherished a personal dislike, it was toward her cousin Laura Rolf; but before the drive had brought them to the Blakes' door, she forced herself to look at Laura, and say, gently, "Are you tired? Thank you for helping me." There was a real sense of comfort in feeling that she had so far conquered herself.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

THE GNOMES AND THE SNOW MAN.

BY S. S. CONANT.

Oh, the full silver moon made it brilliant as day,
When a party of gnomes came out trooping to play,
Trooping out of their caverns in earth far below
For a frolic and tumble about in the snow.

But as they ran merrily over a hill,
Lo! a terrible sight made them suddenly still;
For just at the edge of a shadowy wood
A threatening monster before them there stood!

"What is it?" they questioned, in whispers low—
"Some horrible giant from Barmn's show?
Some terrible ogre, with teeth like stones,
Who will mangle our bodies and crunch our bones?"

They were all too much frightened to scamper away,
Staring right at the monster who'd spoiled their play;

But he stood stock-still, as if sleeping or dead,
And the little gnomes soon lost a part of their dread.

Then nearer and nearer the bolder ones crept,
Still gaining in courage as onward they stept;
'Till they burst out a laughing, "Ha! ha! and ho! ho!
See, the wonderful monster is made out of snow!"

And then the whole party went trooping pell mell,
And with snow-balls and fists on the monster they fell;
In a very few minutes demolished it lay,
And with three ringing cheers they went on with their play.

When they told their adventure, once safely at home,
"Let me hope you will learn," said the wrinkled King Gnome,
"When you fancy a danger, a bold front to show, that was impracticable. There was trouble to get them all packed in.
And perhaps it will turn out a mere man of snow."

We had a dear friend with us, whose whole heart is in missionary work, and she remarked that the "Doctor and Ida had packed them away like herrings in a box," every head showing. Doctor distributed the candy, while Ida and I gave the gifts from the tree. All were happy and delighted, growing more pleased as the things came off.

Doctor thought it best to call their attention to the fact that the best and most faithful scholars had better and more gifts than the others and I think many of them determined then and there to be very punctual the next year. Then we gave very pretty Christmas cards as prizes to the three best scholars in every class. The faces of the recipients expressed perfect ecstasy as their names were called.

After this we sang that old hymn for Christmas, "Shout the glad tidings," and really it was a shout that went up from many happy hearts, and as they all went home there was a chorus of whistles and laughter at the performances of the mumping jacks and other toys, while the nice hats and clothes were bagged up in a careful and loving manner.

Our dear little church has had many nice presents on this its first Christmas-day. Our dear friend, who is head of a band of young missionary workers called St. Mark's League, brought us a font from the dear little Leaguers. It is of beautiful white porcelain, with a cross on the cover as a cross. On one side of the bowl, beautifully done, are the letters "I. H. S." On the other, "For the Church of Our Saviour, from St. Mark's League, Christmas 1887." Also a silver chalice and paten from the same source, and engraved in the same way.

A dear young friend sent an altar cloth, frontal for the lectern, and markers, all made of cardinal felt and plush, and finished with gold fringe. You can not think how pleasant it is to be remembered in such needed presents by far-away friends. We were to have a silver set of cups, but the order was not given in time to the society to have it finished and sent home by Christmas. We will have for very soon, and it is pleasant to be thinking of it.

We have had thirteen baptisms since we have had the font. Our hard-working rector in L., who is a great missionary, gives us two services each month—one in the afternoon of the second Sunday, and on the Thursday night nearest the full moon. Our people can come better when there is moonlight, as some of them do not live near the church.

We have also had some very delightful services from a young clergyman who visited some missionary locations. He has a delightful voice, and we always use a chorus when he adds music to its beauty, and helped our singing by practicing with us while he staid at Woodside. We found him yet are happy to think and feel that the church is too small, and that it will need transcripts and a recess channel to make it large enough. This will make it the shape of a cross. We are of our mixed congregation of white and colored people so well, and will make it very much prettier than it now is. We have had so much given to us that one would think we could not receive more, but we do still need the chairs for the church, and a white linen cloth for communion.

The Sunday-school does very well indeed. The census is regular, and seem very much interested. We can not teach them as much now as we shall do, when the days grow longer.

I must tell you one instance of gratitude. They all came the 23d of December, bringing greens to dress the church, and one brought also a bag and in it eight very large, beautiful sweet-potatoes—one for each member of the family. Was it not pleasant to receive such a proof of gratitude?

I hope this long letter has not tired you, dear children and friends; and with wishes from our dear friends, I am, as usual, truly your grateful friend, Miss. RICHMOND.

P. S.—It would give me more pleasure than I can say to see a list of all your names, my dear friends, but it would, I know, take up too much space in the Post-office Box.

WASHINGTON, IOWA.

I thought that I would write a letter to the Post-office Box; and tell of a number of things.

It was in the summer-time, about the 1st of July, that I had my adventure. Father was away, and we had a man named Mac and his son Frank, a boy about fourteen years old, to take care of our horses. A man who lived a few blocks from us had a fine gray colt, but as he was not much of a horseman, he said that he could not have the spot on his forehead, and he would like to sell it. So, father was away, and I was very anxious to take a ride on that gray colt. Mr. Mac would not let me do so, as he had only been ridden once.

So one day, as he had only been ridden once, I went out to see the colt, and I went out to the barn and saddled and bridled her myself. She went right off for me, but I was not to be so easily fooled. Frank, with a tin in his hand, called me "Tommy." "Take me up town," said he.

So I said, "All right; come up to the fence, and jump on behind."

He got on all right, but, like foolish boys that we were, we hung his tin pail on the horn of the saddle. We got her on a nice little gallop; but when she got into the pail, she fell, and it did some things worse than gallop—she ran like a streak straight for our barn.

Frank had lost his hat, and had his arms around me, hanging on to the horn of the saddle for dear life, and shouting "Whoa!" as they ran on. When she turned up the alley that leads to the barn she turned so short that Frank flew right out straight, and pulled the saddle off. It was not buckled very tight under her, and she fell in the middle of the road. But I clung to the saddle, and was thrown under, and she jumped square over me. Was not she a knowing horse? I was up to my ears in mud, and she was dangling under her, about the worst scared horse in the State of Iowa.

Well, we managed, with the help of some friends who came up to take the saddle and bridle off. I kept very quiet about it, but the story got out, and when father came home I had to take a lecture.

Which the Postmistress thinks you deserved.

FORT DAVIS, TEXAS.

My home is in Kentucky, but I am spending the winter with my uncle at this place. Fort Davis is situated near the head of a beautiful cañon, and is a very nice place to live in. Fort Davis is 5800 feet above the level of the sea. There are six companies of soldiers stationed here. More than half of the inhabitants are Mexicans.

The Mexican women wear long dresses very long behind, and about a foot from the ground in front, and always wear shawls over their heads. All the houses are made of adobe, except a few of the best, which are of stone. In this country it rarely rains here in the winter. The houses, being covered with mud, would suffer if it did. The wood is generally brought from the mountains on the Texas coast.

This is a great country for little ponies, little donkeys, little dogs, and mice. You rarely see a horse or mule that does not belong to the government, and you rarely see a dog or mouse that is not a pet. I saw a very nice mouse one afternoon, and I say my lessons to my grandma every morning. I think "Nan" is so sweet. I wish everybody a happy New-Year.

EMILY A.

NEW YORK CITY.

I am a little boy eleven years old. A kind gentleman has been sending me Young People for some time, and I have been reading it with the delight of a child. I have read all the letters, and like them very much. When I tell you about my pets, you will think it strange because they are not school-boys. I will not make my letter too long, but this is the first I have written to any paper, and hope you will publish it.

WILLIAM S. K.

If you make pets of your school-boys, I am sure they are always neat and clean, which is more than I can say of some boys' books.

Here is a pretty little story about one of the greatest women and best Queens in the world:

"When Queen Victoria was yet a child in short frocks, she was very much interested in her family spent some time at Malvern. They staid in a large house on what, out of compliment to her Majesty, has since been named Queen's Road. The royal child is spoken of both as a pomp and a rattle. Her two particular weaknesses were climbing walls and trees, and cantering about on a donkey. One day she had climbed an apple-tree, and was very much frightened. She remained there, sobbing bitterly, until she was rescued by her father, the gardener, attracted to the spot by her cries, got a ladder, and brought her, safe and sound, to the ground. The first girl was so deeply grateful for the man's assistance, that she immediately opened her purse and presented him with a piece of gold. Davis is alive to tell the tale to this day, and at the same time to exhibit his to the curious the royal gaine—a neatly framed which the Queen, when a wee lassie, gave him."

AFTER THE HOLIDAYS.

Little children, just fancy old Santa Claus starting off some starlight night to survey again the scenes of his late triumphant march through the beautiful kingdom of child-land.

What do you think he will find when he finds Clara's beautiful doll with its face all soiled, and its pretty frock faded and torn? Ah, see that shadowy figure in the room! Is it the ghost, or does he not remember the bright young child, and his lovely cardinal silk that adorned it when taken from the shop window, so many it stood on exhibition, but now so many little hearts? No wonder he feels sad.

"And can it be possible," he says, "that that hack-ribbed creature is all that is left of the noble horse that brought little Charley? Where is his flowing mane, kee, and his fine and well-fitting saddle that graced the finest specimen of his race?"

Alas! he has the almost defaced blocks that fairly shone with their rozen letters. What a sad spectacle for old Santa to contemplate!

FREEZING EFFECTS.

RESULT OF FOOLING OVER THE WASH-BOWL IN COLD WEATHER.

DEAR children, take warning—Don't stand in the morning, Like little Tom Noddy, whose fate you behold; "Oh dear," he cried, "mother, It is such a bother, A fellow mist bath when the days are so cold!"

He shivered and pouted, He fretted and houted, And dipped in a finger, and took up a drop, "Oh, little coward!" So cross and so froward!" Said angry Jack Frost then; "I think I will stop."

Then came the elf tripping, And gave him a dripping, And with a shudder from forehead to toes, Jack Frost, with a feather Of stern arctic weather, Just touched the wet child, and you see bow he froze.

An icicle helmet Around him is well met; He's blue as a little pinched mortal can be, "Ho, ho," says Jack, dancing And shouting and prancing, "Henceforth you'll take care bow you trifle with me."

So, children, take warning—Don't stand in the morning, And whimper and quiver, but, eager and bold, Just plunge in the water, Each son and each daughter, And rub your cheeks quickly, and laugh at the cold.

Poor little Tom Noddy! They came in a body, His father, his mother, his brothers, and all; They found him quite frigid, They shrieked, "He is right!" Then wrapped him to thaw in a thick woollen shawl.

And never, oh! never, Will poor Tommy shiver, And while that is cold, and he don't want to dress, Jack Frost is so crafty, So sly, and so naughty, Tom Noddy will shun him hereafter, I guess.

OUR POST-OFFICE BOX.

WOODSIDE (DEAR LEXINGTON), NORTH CAROLINA.

MY DEAR YOUNG FRIENDS, NOW that Christmas is really over, I want to tell you a few things about our Christmas at Woodside. As I have told you before, our scholars all began in September to count the weeks until Christmas, and grew more eager as the weeks went on, growing intensely anxious as the time drew near.

We had boxes sent the school by kind-hearted and generous friends, and I hope that Christmas-boys was perfectly lovely, not cold enough to keep any child away. We had the tree in the church, and the scholars all marched in, singing, "Carol, brothers, carol," the white children first, followed by my sister and Dr. Richardson; then the colored school (I playing the organ), my sister and Dr. K. stowing them away as they filed in. We did not desire to have them march around the tree, but they soon saw that Toys, little children, are given you to play with, but can you not do so without destroying them? I would not advise you to do as did a little boy whom I once knew. His mamma bought him a lovely kite. It was made of very pretty, with its tissue covering and fine centre picture.

The child was so delighted with the gift that for safety for his treasure he carried it into the parlor, and placed it in a conspicuous place out of the matter. Then several times a day he might be seen peeping in to have a fresh look at his kite. He would not fly it lest it should get broken, and so his mamma finally vetoed any in gazing at what was intended for use.

Play with your nice toys, but while you do so, be very careful not to destroy or injure them. There is no prettier sight than to see little girls playing tea.

The most delicious cake I ever tasted was on one of those wet plates, around which my little mates and I were gathered. What a riot we were compressed in one little hour of real enjoyment at the child's tea party.

Be careful not only of your china, but of your dolls, your blocks, horses, and whatever may have the honor of the bright Christmas. Do not forget the little pinched faces of the poor. How glad they would be to own some of your cast-away toys. Many a sick child has been diverted from its suffering by even an old doll. Handle toys carefully, and you will soon be intrusted by mamma with more valuable things, and Santa Claus will be pleased to find that you appreciate his gifts. A. E. THOMAS.

VELA EHRHART, OREHAM, MERAN, TYROL.

I am a little boy ten years old. My papa has taken YOUNG PEOPLE two years for me, and I like it very much. I like "Mr. Stubb's Brother" and "The Talking Leaves" best.

I have been over three years in Europe. We are in Meran, a watering-place of Austria. Every day I go out to walk and hear the music which plays in the Park.

I have no pet, but I had a kitten, which I gave away when I went to Prussia last year. She was very gentle, and when I had been a small boy found her waiting for me on a chair by the door.

I am afraid my letter will not be printed if it is too long. EUGENE V. F.

I am always delighted when a dear reader sends a greeting like this from over the sea. We like to see each other in the Post-office Box, don't we, children? Whether your homes are far or near, you all have your own places in YOUNG PEOPLE; and I am sure Mr. OGIS and Mr. Stoddard will be glad that a little boy in the Tyrol has watched for their stories and read them with interest.

NEW YORK CITY.

DEAR DORA AND AMY,--I read your letter in No. 167. The turtle buries itself in winter under the mud of dried creeks. You can take a small box filled with mud and put your turtle in it. He will not need any food until he crawls out. The box should be left out-of-doors. I guess the reason why he went under the rocks and mud was because it is natural. That is why so few turtles can be had in winter. ALBERT B. C.

JEFFERSON CITY, MISSOURI.

My papa has commenced to take HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE for me and for my little brother. I am a little boy six years old, and so my sister likes to write for me. I love to look at the pictures, especially the one about the cat and the funny name for a little boy? Good-night. BENNIE.

TORONTO, CANADA.

This is the first time I have written to the Post-office Box. I like the stories in YOUNG PEOPLE very much, especially "Nan." I have two cats and two dogs, and we have also a small two-year-old, but I will soon be eleven. I generally have a party on my birthday. I will soon have to begin school again, for we opened the school here. There are a great many children's parties here, and I enjoy them very much. I received a great many Christmas presents, and 37 cards. J. A. H.

THE ROSE-BUD.

I was once a little red ball with a green stem. Then I was plucked by some fingers, and I came out.

The next year I had a bud, and that opened into a pretty rose. Every night I was kissed by the dew, and I was plucked by a little maiden from the bush.

Then I was put in a pretty vase with some fresh cool water in it.

In a few days I withered, and they threw me in the fire. MALVINA O. R. (9 years of age).

WOODSIDE, NORTH CAROLINA.

WASHINGTON, D. C.

I am a little boy six years old, and have three sisters. I have never written to you before, but have a bank, and all the money I get I put into it.

I have a pet dog named Spot. We sent him to the country to get fat. I miss him very much. All my sisters go to school, and I am very lonely. I am afraid my letter is too long to send. Assets W. P.

Spot seems to be a favorite name for pets this week.

PORT ARTHUR, MICHIGAN.

I have read the letter of L. McN. in your issue of December 26. I am a reader of your YOUNG PEOPLE, and like it very much, especially the Post-office Box. I am deaf and dumb. It was caused by a fall when I was two years old. Now I have been spending the holidays at home, at the State School at Flint, Michigan. There are about two hundred and fifty boys and girls attending it. They are as happy as any other children. We learn to write, read, and have arithmetic, geography, and various other studies. Some of us are being taught articulation, so that we can speak. Our noble State has been very good to us. I have been spending the holidays at home, at Wishing L. McN. and all your readers a happy New Year. I am yours, GERTIE F. C.

Gertie's letter made me feel very thankful that one shut out from the pleasures of hearing and of speech could be so happy and contented. I am glad to think that those silent children are full of enjoyment, just like others.

Little housekeepers must know how to sew as well as to cook. Let me tell them how to darn their stockings. In darning you use a long thread one way across the hole. Then hedge-side ways, and take up every other one of these long stitches, so that a soft line netted work fills the hole. Do not draw your stitches tightly, or try to make the hole smaller, or you will have a rough instead of a smooth surface when you have finished your work.

RECIPTS FOR THE LITTLE HOUSE-KEEPERS.

FRUMMLES.--Two cups of sugar, three eggs beaten separately, one cup of butter, and just flour enough to roll it out. MIX quickly, and roll it thin. Cut out the cakes with a round cake-cutter, cutting them again in the centre with the top of a chisel. When in the pans, use the top with the white of eggs slightly beaten, using a feather for the purpose. Sprinkle them with very coarse powdered lump-sugar, and bake.

PLAIN COOKIES.--One cup of butter, two cups of sugar, one cup of milk, two eggs, a scant quart of flour, one teaspoonful of cream of tartar, and half a tea-spoonful of soda. Bake in a quick oven.

THOMAS P.--There is no charge for the publication of an exchange. Postmarks should be cut square, with a sufficient margin to allow of their being neatly pasted in an atom.--J. E. B.; We do not repeat exchanges in the paper during several weeks. We can allow, as there are a great many awaiting their turn; but in a few weeks from now you may, if you choose, send another and different offer.--HARRY M.G.: Address the firm of whom you inquire, at Union Square, corner of Seventeenth Street, New York City.

SUSIE McDELMOTT, a dear child in Oroville, California, has been taken away by death. Her little brother Artie now takes YOUNG PEOPLE in her place. Susie was a little girl of rare loveliness of character, and her loss has made a sad vacancy in her home.

Minnie R.--If you are only nine years old, you may play with your dolls without a thought that they are too big for such an amusement. Why, dear, I like dolls yet! Coasting and snow-balling are just as proper for girls as for boys, in moderation.

HOPE, BIRDIE, and MARY B. are three happy sisters, who build houses of pine brush in the woods, and play at keeping store. When I was a little girl I went to a school in the shadow of a grove, and at recess Letty and Lucy, Bob, Charlie, and Bella, and ever so many of us, used to play store and keep house under the trees. There was a great fat rock, which was our dining-room. We used to have oak-leaf plates and acorn cups to play with, so I know all about your good times, Hope.

The boys and girls who are interested in making collections of postage stamps are invited to read this paragraph with attention:

By application to the Third Assistant Postmaster-General, Washington, District of Columbia, you may obtain specimens of the several varieties of United States postage at their face value. In sending your application you must inclose the full amount necessary to pay for the stamps you desire, and also a sufficient amount for return postage and registry fee, as the Department will send the stamps in a registered letter.

Some of the issues are now obsolete, and possess a historical value to the collector. Newspapers, official, and periodical stamps of the different denominations will be furnished in sets. Official stamps can be used only for the official business of the department for which they are provided. They will have the word "Specimen" printed across the face in very small type.

Those who desire further information as to prices, stamps, and dates of issue should write to the Third Assistant Postmaster-General at Washington, inclosing a stamped envelope addressed plainly to themselves. They will, in return, receive circulars giving many details for which we can not make room in the Post-office Box.

MORE STRING TRICKS.

BY HELEN P. STRONG.

SLIP the string, with the ends tied together, over the post of a chair, passing the right-hand string a second time around the post to make your prisoner doubly secure; then with the forefinger of the right hand slipped upward through the opposite loop, hold the middle of the string with the left hand, as indicated in Fig. 1, passing the thumb under the first and over the second string, and the forefinger over the first and under the second.

Holding both strings firmly in this position with the left hand, carry the loop held on your right forefinger over the left hand, and lay it, loosely spread apart, upon the double string in such a way that, having released your right hand from above, you may grasp the same loop from below, as shown in Fig. 2, by passing a finger through it on each side of the double string.

Observe carefully the position of the strings upon the left forefinger in Fig. 2, and be sure that the string which before passed under the thumb now drops below the forefinger. Now transfer the two loops from the left forefinger to the chair post, turning the hand so that the finger points toward you, in order that the loop nearer the base of the finger may pass first over the chair post, as shown at a, Fig. 2.

Finally, covering the top of the post with your left thumb, release your hold of the string, except from the middle finger of your right hand. By this finger the whole string may be drawn freely out of its apparent tangle, and, if done quickly, with the effect of having passed through the solid wood.

A more simple trick, not unlike this in effect, is performed as follows: Pass the string over the chair as before, without winding it a second time about the post. Follow the directions for the previous trick as far as Fig. 1. Then place the right forefinger, with the string still upon it, firmly on the top of the chair post, and releasing the string from the thumb of the left hand, use the forefinger of that hand to pull the string from the post.

In the two tricks which follow, not one finger, but four, seem susceptible to the free passage of your wonderful string. Thrusting all the fingers of each hand through an opposite end of the string still tied, use the right hand to bring the two sides coming from the palm of the left hand back between the fingers and around the thumb, precisely as indicated in Fig. 3. Then lifting the right hand, allow the lower string to pass again around the little finger, this time from left to right, and the upper string around the index finger from right to left, thus bringing the loop once more toward the palm, place it between the two middle fingers, letting it hang as in Fig. 4. With the thumb and forefinger of the right hand remove the two loops from the thumb, and pass these also between the middle fingers. Lastly, with the forefinger of the right hand passed under the string at a, you may release it entirely by drawing it toward you.

In the next trick you shall begin by what seems a thorough interweaving of string and fingers. With the left hand in the position of Fig. 5, begin at the little finger and weave the cord in and out between the fingers in the manner shown at a, until you come to the thumb, when, after crossing the strings, you pass them both outside of the thumb, and then (without crossing) over the forefinger as in Fig. 5, which represents the trick thus far clearly.

Continue to cross the strings between the fingers as shown at b, Fig. 5, returning in this way to the little finger. Your hand will now seem quite surely tied fast—an illusion which you speedily dispel by slipping the loops from your thumb, and with your right hand drawing the string, whole as ever, directly through the base of all your fingers.

ANSWER TO REBUS.

THE answer to the Rebus on page 144 of No. 166 is a Christmas verse written over two hundred years ago by George Wither, born 1588, died 1667.

So now is come our joyful'st feast,
 Let every man be jolly;
 Each room with ivy leaves is drest,
 And every post with holly.
 Now all our neighbors' chimneys smoke,
 And Christmas blocks are burning;
 Their ovens they with baked meat choke,
 And all their spits are turning.
 Without the door let sorrow lie;
 And if for cold it hap to die,
 We'll bury 't in a Christmas pie,
 And evermore be merry.

BABY.

BY EMILY HUNTINGTON MILLER.

Now what shall we do for the baby,
To make her a birthday sweet?
She came in the wintry weather,
In blustering wind and sleet,
There is not a flower in the garden,
There is not a bird to sing,
And all in a row on the leafless vine
The sharp white icicles cling.

Oh, what does it matter to baby!
Her world is warm as a nest;
The song that her mother sings her
Is the music she loves best.
She laughs to hear in the twilight
The bleak winds whistle and blow,
And the small white icicles swing and ring
Like crystal bells in a row.

THE FORT ON ABBOTT'S HILL.

BY JAMES OTIS.

AUTHOR OF "TOBY TYLER," "TIM AND TRIP," "MR. STUBBS'S BROTHER," ETC.

"THERE won't be any school to-morrow, you know, an' we'll have all day to work at it. We can commence right after breakfast, an' by the time the Dean boys know what we're about, it'll be all done."

"But where'll we build it?"

"On the top of Abbott's Hill, by the school-house. You see that's the best kind of a place for a fort, 'cause then when the boys come to take it, they'll have to come up the hill, an' we can pop 'em off as easy as anything. Here's the way we'll build it," and Billy Chick marked out on the snow a very elaborate plan of the fort he proposed to build on Abbott's Hill.

"But if the Dean boys an' Art Pierce see what we're doin', they'll try to stop us," said Tommy Eaton, timidly; for he knew, as well as did all the boys in Bucksport, that the three boys he had spoken of had openly declared that no one but themselves should have a snow fort that winter. These three had announced their intention early in the season of building the biggest snow fort that had ever been seen in that section of the country; and in order that they might not by any possibility be outdone, they had threatened instant destruction to any other that should be put up. But it was already the latter part of January, and yet this proposed monster fort had not been seen. Therefore after school on Friday night Billy Chick had proposed to a number of his companions that they should defy these other boys, and by working as secretly as possible build their fort before the others knew what they were doing.

"I don't care whether they know it or not," and Billy spoke bravely, even if he did beckon his companions to follow him behind the school-house wood-shed a moment later, when he thought he saw Arthur Pierce coming up the street. "We've got just as good a right to build a fort as they have, an' if we've got any spunk about us at all, we can keep 'em from troublin' us till after it's built, an' then I guess we can hold it against a hundred just like 'em."

"If we can't do it we ain't smart," said Fred Bolen, decidedly, as he made a snow-ball and threw it at a knot-hole in the shed to show how good a marksman he was. "They don't own this town, but they think they can frighten us outer tryin' to do anything. Now I'll get up as soon as it's daylight to-morrow, if the rest will, an' I'll bring my dinner with me, an' we can have it all done by noon."

The remainder of the party agreed to follow the example of the warlike Fred, and the question of whether or not the fort should be built having been decided, the details of the work were discussed. Each member of the party was to be on Abbott's Hill as soon after daylight as possible; three were to bring snow-shovels, and the others were to bring pails of water, for Billy had decided that the fort should be well washed, both outside and inside, after it was completed, in order that the blocks of snow should be well cemented and coated with ice.

Now talking about getting up very early on a winter morning, and actually doing it, are two very different things; but yet every boy who was to take part in the building of the fort on Abbott's Hill was at the rendezvous by seven o'clock, and each had brought that which it had been agreed he should bring.

Billy not only had a snow-shovel with him, but he also had a broom, with which the water could be laid over the snow to form the armor of ice, and his dinner, which he carried in his father's satchel, was quite enough for three boys. All were bent on work, and if their fort could have been as strong as their resolutions were, nothing but the sun could have destroyed it.

A spot on the brow of the hill had been selected as the place where the fort should be built, according to Billy's plan, as announced the night before, and when the party were there it surely seemed as if they might build such a defense of snow as would resist almost any ordinary attack. Abbott's Hill was steep, and if the enemy should approach from the front, as it seemed only reasonable they would do, the defenders would have the advantage of shooting down-hill, while the attacking party could hardly be expected to aim correctly when throwing their shot up a steep incline.

But Captain Billy forgot one very important thing. The school-house stood just behind the fort, and the solid stone steps formed a vantage ground whence an enemy might open a galling fire upon the garrison. The idea that this situation might be taken advantage of had not occurred to him, and it was just this particular lack of foresight that worked the ruin of himself and his army.

The snow was nearly three feet deep on the hill at the spot selected for Fort Defiance, as Billy had proposed calling it, and after a hollow ten feet square had been made there was already so much shelter in it that Captain Billy and his party felt certain of success in their undertaking.

"Why, them fellers never can git up here," he said, as he cut out big blocks of snow which the sun was beginning to soften sufficiently to make them hold well to each other. "It won't be long now before we have the walls up, an' after our snow-balls are made, as many as wants to can try to tear it down, an' they'll find it hard work even to get up to it."

The snow was sufficiently moist to cut well; but the sun was so warm that the plan of coating the fortification with ice by drenching it with water seemed well-nigh hopeless, for there was no chance that it would freeze.

Every boy worked with a will, knowing how necessary it was to have the building well along before the enemy should discover what they were doing, and the walls of the main structure were fully two feet above the surrounding snow, when Tommy Eaton cried out, excitedly:

"There they are! There's a whole crowd of 'em comin' now!"

Captain Billy leaped on to the parapet of snow, while all his soldiers, save Tommy, who seemed incapable of action, began to prepare a quantity of snow-balls for immediate use. It was some moments before any of the "crowd" Tommy had spoken of could be seen, and then they had dwindled down into a very small crowd indeed, for there was no one in sight but Art Pierce. Even he had not come there on any warlike mission, for he was drawing on his sled a basket which he was evidently taking to his grandfather's, and he might have passed by at the foot of the hill, ignorant of what Billy's army were doing, had not Tommy's cry of alarm attracted his attention.

"Come out here an' look at your crowd," cried Captain Billy, as he brandished his arms as if he were about to fire a shot at the solitary enemy, even though he knew he could not send a snow-ball half the distance.

But Tommy was spared the trouble of replying, for almost before Fred ceased speaking the boy at the foot of the hill shouted:

"What are you fellers doin' up there?"

"Come up an' see when you think you can get here," answered Billy from the wall; and his army set up such a warlike shout that there could be no doubt as to their intentions in case Art should attempt to come up.

"Are you buildin' a fort after we told you what we was goin' to do?" and the errand to his grandfather's was forgotten for the time being by Arthur, as the fact that these boys were disobeying the command of himself and his friends dawned upon him.

"Looks like it, don't it?" replied Captain Billy; and then, in a lower tone, he ordered his troop to make up a quantity of snow-balls, in case they should be attacked by this one boy.

"Well, you wouldn't be doing it long if I didn't have to go up to grandfather's with this molasses," shouted Arthur, as he sent a snow-ball half-way up the hill as a token of what he would do if he could. "But you jest wait, an' see how long that thing will stand."

"All right; we'll wait," shouted Fred, tauntingly; and Arthur started away at full speed, not because he was afraid he might be attacked, but that he might do his errand quickly, and then rally his forces for a battle.

"They'll all be here pretty soon now," said Captain Billy, as he leaped from the wall, and began to labor at lifting the heavy blocks of snow that had been cut out ready to form the defense. "We must rush things along just as fast as we can, an' while we're buildin' the fort Tommy had better be makin' up a lot of snow-balls, for while he's doing that he can be behind the wall if the other fellers should come."

Tommy could make no reply to this rather ungenerous remark, for he knew he deserved it; but he obeyed the order at once, hoping by his activity to atone for his lack of courage.

"It won't take him more'n five minutes to go to his grandfather's, and then he'll be up here with the other fellers," said Fred. "We shan't have any chance to cover the fort with ice, for they'll get here before we have it done."

"Work fast, an' make it as high as we can before they do come," shouted Captain Billy, and he set the example to his soldiers by working as he had never worked before, even when he had tried to dam Grant's Brook the year before, and nearly flooded the clover field.

It was really astonishing how rapidly the walls of Fort Defiance rose after Arthur Pierce had made his appearance; inch after inch was added to the structure, until it was nearly as high as the boys' heads, and Billy had dashed water on now and then, although the sun shone so warmly that it did not freeze, as had been expected.

Tommy had made a large pile of snow-balls, and was bringing more material into the fort, when a cry from Captain Billy caused him to drop the shovel, and shelter himself as before.

The Captain had caught sight of a party of boys at the foot of the hill surveying the fortification that had been erected against their express commands.

"Here they are! Everybody get inside, an' pepper the first one that starts to come up."

"Now I wonder if them fellers are foolish enough to think they can come up here, an' tear down this fort with us in it?" and Fred mounted to the Captain's lookout as he surveyed the motionless enemy.

"I guess they'll try it, an' we'd better all be makin' snow-balls while one watches," said Captain Billy; and leaving Fred to act as lookout, he set the example to his men, moulding the snow rapidly and deftly into smooth round shot, which, it was hoped, would do much execution.

In a few moments the attacking party sent a few shots through the air, which were answered by a volley from the fort. There was a lively rain of snow-balls on all sides. Then, suddenly, Art Pierce and his party ceased fire, and Fred, who kept his companions aware of what the enemy were doing by announcing each move they made, called out: "They're lookin' up here an' talkin' now. I guess they're getting ready for a rush. Now Art Pierce is pointin' down toward the village, an' now—well, they've gone, actually runnin' away;" and Fred jumped outside the fort with a cry of triumph, as if he believed the battle had been won even before it had been begun.

But Captain Billy, even though he saw the enemy apparently in full flight, knew that they had not abandoned the attack, and he encouraged his soldiers to work on quite as hard as ever, preparing for the defense.

"They've only gone after some more of the boys," he said, as he began to work again at the walls. "This thing looms up kinder big to 'em when they come to look it all over, an' it didn't take 'em long to find out that there wasn't enough of 'em to do any good."

The walls were added to until they were higher than the defenders' heads, and platforms of snow were built for the soldiers to stand on when firing; the front was strengthened on the outside at the base to resist any assault that might be made, and the stock of snow-balls was increased, until it surely seemed that they had sufficient to last them during a very long siege.

Captain Billy did not neglect any precaution which might make their chances of a successful resistance any better, so far as the fort was concerned; but his qualities as a commanding officer might well have been questioned, because he never gave a thought to any attack save on the front. All his work, after the enemy had been seen, was directed to strengthening the front wall, and that portion of the fort which would be exposed to a fire from behind had been quite neglected. The rear towered up quite as high as did the front; but no pains had been taken to strengthen it, and it was hardly more than a high wall of snow that might be toppled over very easily.

When the enemy moved off in the direction of the village every one in Fort Defiance expected they would return with re-enforcements in a few moments; but after nearly an hour had elapsed, and no signs of them were to be seen, Captain Billy grew very uneasy. He feared a snare of some sort was being prepared for himself and his brave troops; but yet he did not have sufficient forethought to send out skirmishers. He thought that he was doing all that prudence demanded by keeping a watch and piling up vast supplies of ammunition.

"Now we'll stay right here till they come," he said in a tone of satisfaction, "an' when they get pretty close up we'll pelt the snow-balls right into them until they'll be glad to go back." and Billy paced back and forth in the narrow limits of the fort, feeling every inch a soldier and an officer.

How different would have been the fate of Fort Defiance if scouts had been sent out to watch the enemy. It would have been only necessary for Captain Billy or one of his men to take a short trip toward the back of the school-house, and then the delay of the enemy in making an appearance would have been fully understood.

Instead of going to the village for recruits as had been supposed, the enemy had simply gone around behind that building to hold a consultation.

Their plans were quickly laid. It would be necessary to divide the party into two detachments. The first would arm themselves with ammunition, and crawling round the corner of the school-house, mount the steps, and from the vantage ground thus obtained pour a most confusing fire in upon the garrison. In the mean time the second detachment would crawl quietly around below the steps and charge the fort furiously in the rear with battering-rams made of brooms and shovels.

The soldiers in the fort were on the alert, and ready for any move of the enemy's that might come from the front or either side. It had been so long since anything had been seen of those who objected to the building of a fort in Bucksport, that the defenders of Fort Defiance were already feeling like victors. The lookout was still kept, but when any of the watchers glanced back at their store of shot, and then at the thick wall of snow in front of them, they felt as if no ordinary attack need concern them.

Even Tommy was brave then, and began to explain that he had been frightened only because the fort was in such an unfinished state that it seemed certain they would be obliged to surrender at once.

"The way things are fixed now," he said, boldly, "I could keep the whole crowd of them out alone, an' you just see what—"

"Hark!" cried Captain Billy, holding up his hand warningly, as a wild halloo was heard. Before he could say another word there was a fierce rain of snow-balls falling apparently from the sky. Then before the garrison could recover its lost wits a singular crunching sound was heard. In a moment the entire back of the fort was pressed in, while it seemed as if whole tons of snow had suddenly been launched upon them.

Every soldier in the fort was knocked down by the terrible avalanche, and each one was animated by the same desire—to escape before they were buried in the ruins of their own fort.

Whenever the head of one of the brave defenders of Fort Defiance appeared above the covering of snow that enveloped them all, the enemy on the school-house steps pelted it with snow-balls, until it was apparent to every one of the soldiers that the destruction of their fortification had not been an accident, but the work of the enemy.

Fort Defiance was nothing more than a snow-bank; the immense pile of shot but a shapeless mass of snow. And the enemy occupied the choice of positions which the defenders thought they had secured.

Under the circumstances, what could Captain Billy do? It was useless then to think of resistance, and, instead of issuing any command, he set an example of retreat, in which he was speedily followed by all his men, while from the brow of the hill the enemy poured into their disordered ranks a well-directed volley of hastily made shot.

It was not until nearly evening that Captain Billy and his men ventured back for the shovels and other things they had taken with them to Abbott's Hill, and there, on the ruins of Fort Defiance, they vowed that they would never embark in such an enterprise again without first counting the chances of defeat as well as those of success.

SOME DAINTY MORSELS FOR THE WIALES.

BY SARAH COOPER.

DID you ever think how hard it would be to describe a soap-bubble to a person who had never seen one? It would even be difficult to paint a picture that would convey an idea of its delicate beauty. I find the same difficulty in describing to you a class of animals almost as fairy-like as soap-bubbles, although they swim about in the ocean, and are honored with the high-sounding name of Ctenophora.

At the first glance ctenophora may look like a hard word, but drop the "c," and you will find it very easy—"te-noph'-o-ra." Were it possible for you once to see these charming creatures darting about in their native sea-water, their name henceforth would have a pleasant sound, and even a pleasant look, recalling to your minds lovely images of floating balloons and fairy bubbles.

Ctenophora are too small to be seen at the distance we usually are from the surface of the ocean, so the best way to observe them is in a large glass jar. On a calm day a jar of water dipped from the surface of the ocean is pretty sure to contain some of these beautiful creatures, although it may be that several jarfuls will have to be raised before the search is successful.

Upon looking closely at the little captives you will find them to be jelly-like melon-shaped bodies, with bands running from end to end like the ribs on a melon. They are almost transparent, and if it were not for the prismatic colors that play upon their sides as they glide through the water we could scarcely see them. If the ctenophora sporting about in the jar should swim in between you and any object beyond the jar, you can still see the object distinctly through the transparent bodies of these interesting animals. Fig. 1 shows the form of one of the ctenophora, but it gives no idea of its delicacy.

The soft bodies of the ctenophora and their manner of life may remind you of jelly-fish. Still, their structure is far more complicated, as we may observe through the clear substance of which the body is composed. When taken from the sea-water they lose their shape, and nothing is left but a film which is almost invisible.

The thought has perhaps already occurred to you that such animals as these, with jelly-like bodies, could live nowhere but in the water. Many of them have no means of pursuing or of catching their prey, and they obtain only such food as is floated to them by currents in the water.

Although the ctenophora look so fairy-like, they devour a large number of animals, and they seem to prefer their own kindred. The mouth is at the upper end of the body, and when it opens, the food floats in and is quickly digested. In addition to the cavities necessary for digesting food, there is a set of canals within the body for the circulation of water.

The ctenophora swim about with exquisite grace, still they have no arms, no legs, no fins, to swim with. What need have they of any such organs? Their cilia are quite sufficient (the word cilia, you remember, means eyelashes). Those eight stripes we see running from one end to the other in Fig. 1 are bands of muscles on which are arranged comb-like fringes of cilia, which wave rapidly in the water, and give to the animal its lively motions. Indeed, it seems as if the fairy-like creature could not keep still. How can it keep still when these impatient cilia are striking the water? They send the little thing round and round, darting up and down, till we wonder which way it will go next. The cilia, being worked by muscles, are under the control of the animal, and are used upon the same principles that are applied by the oarsman in steering and propelling his boat.

These eight bands of cilia add greatly to the beauty of the dainty creatures. Their rapid motion separates the rays of light that fall upon them, and produces down each band a flash of rainbow colors. In fact, the cilia are so important and characteristic a feature of the ctenophora that I want you to become perfectly familiar with them. The appearance of these hair-like organs is much the same wherever they are found, and they show very distinctly on the gills of the mussel (Fig. 2). These gills are fringed with countless cilia, which under a microscope may be seen in rapid motion, producing a continual current of water in one direction. Their motion is regular, like that of the heart. The little plates forming the gill lie side by side naturally, and unless we looked very closely, we might think the gills consisted of only one piece. The plates are pulled apart in the drawing to show the cilia more distinctly.

It is interesting to notice the various uses of cilia in different positions in which they occur. Sometimes, as in the ctenophora, they propel the animal by striking the water like a multitude of tiny oars. Sometimes they surround the mouth, "and by their incessant action produce a small whirlpool, into which the food is sucked." In other cases their office seems to be to supply the needful air by keeping up a continual current of water, there being as much air in the water as these animals need. On the other hand, we must not imagine that cilia are confined to the lower animals living in the water. They serve important uses even in our own bodies. For instance, the air-passages leading to our lungs are lined with cilia, which are constantly lashing the air, and beating back particles of dust and other impurities which it contains. Were it not for the cilia, these impurities would reach our lungs, and produce irritation.

The beautiful ctenophora, idly sporting in the water, and seeming to have no aim but enjoyment, do not lead lives that are entirely useless, since they form the chief food of the Greenland whale. Do you not think these are dainty morsels for whales to feed upon? There must be a good deal of nourishment, though, in their transparent bodies, for the whales grow enormously large and fat. It takes a great many ctenophora to make a meal for the monsters. Large shoals of them are met with in arctic seas, and as the whales swim through the water with their large mouths hanging open, they catch the ctenophora on their whalebone fringes, and swallow a mouthful at a time.

In certain parts of the Arctic Ocean the water is of a grass green hue, and is quite opaque. It is commonly spoken of as the "green water." Its peculiar appearance is caused by the immense number of ctenophora it contains. These frolicsome little beings, living so thick and close as to color the water, are too small to be seen without a microscope. The rose-colored idyia, a species of ctenophora, is three or four inches long. It sometimes occurs in such numbers as to tinge large patches of the sea with its rosy color.

All the ctenophora are phosphorescent. They are abundant on our own coasts, and are often left on the shore at low tide, yet their beauty can only be seen as they glide through the water like fairy balloons. The eggs of some species escape singly, others are laid in strings or masses of jelly, and the young ones hatch out in the same form as the parent.

A jarful of sea-water dipped from the end of a pier one bright summer day contained four ctenophora, and made a whole party glad for an hour. It was a great delight to watch these dainty creatures darting hither and thither, sinking and rising again, or resting on their oars, according to their own sweet will. Sometimes we could not see them at all, though we knew they were in the clear water before us; then a flash of bright colors burst upon us, and we followed their devious course by their glitter and sparkle. How we wondered and admired as we gazed, longing to know more of that mysterious thing we call life, and yet know so little about! These animals, we say, are constructed upon a simple plan, yet the secret of their existence is past our finding out.

One of these captive ctenophora was smaller than the others, and more nearly spherical. It belonged to the species Pleurobrachia, which you will see represented in Fig. 3. This was our especial favorite. At times it would throw out two long slender tentacles, which were ornamented on one side with delicate tendrils. Upon some sudden fancy of the animal these tentacles were instantly drawn in out of sight, while at the next moment they were floating behind it for nearly half a yard. One might have supposed the exquisite creature was amusing itself by trying in how many different ways its tentacles could be curved and twisted.

THE CRICKET AND THE TEA-KETTLE.

BY SUSAN HARTLEY SWETT.

THE first star peeps within the pane
This cold and frosty weather,
When the cricket and the tea-kettle
Commence to sing together;
O churr, churr, churr, O bubble, bubble, bubble—
There's nothing like a song to charm away life's trouble.

THE cricket 'neath the hearth-stone bright
Is piping summer glories;
The kettle o'er the glowing coals
Is telling sweet home stories.
O churr, churr, churr, O bubble, bubble, bubble—
There's nothing like a song to charm away life's trouble.

Puss sits upon the warm soft rug
With eyes that dance and glisten;
The old folk lean back in their chairs,
And snile, and softly listen.
O churr, churr, churr, O bubble, bubble, bubble—
There's nothing like a song to charm away life's trouble.

THE children gather round the hearth,
Their faces bright with laughter;
The fire-light sheds its rosy glow
On each old beam and rafter.
And churr, churr, churr, and bubble, bubble, bubble—
There's nothing like a song to charm away life's trouble.

Oh, in the farmer's kitchen
These winter nights are cheery;
The bare boughs creak, the wind complains,
The world without is dreary.
But churr, churr, churr, and bubble, bubble, bubble—
There's nothing like a song to charm away life's trouble.

BITS OF ADVICE.

BY AUNT MARJORIE PRECEPT.

WHAT TO DO IN CASE OF FIRE.

THE papers have lately told us of a number of distressing deaths by fire. Great hotels and warehouses have suddenly burst into sheets of flame in the night, and frantic people have either perished in the dreadful blaze or, throwing themselves from windows, have been dashed to pieces in the street. I hope that none of my young friends may ever have to pass through so awful an experience. But if you should be surprised, at night or in the daytime, by the presence of smoke in your rooms, do not lose your wits if you can help it.

Remember at such a moment that although you are in great danger, there are friends near who will try, if possible, to come to your assistance. Do not open doors or windows wildly, and waste no precious moments in standing and screaming for help. Instead, think if you can of the straightest way out, quickly wrap a thick shawl or blanket around you, covering your head and your hair, and then creep on your hands and knees to the door or the stairway. There is always air to breathe near the floor.

If you are in the room with others, and a lamp is upset or some floating drapery takes fire, recollect that you must smother the flames by throwing a rug on them, pulling curtains or hangings down, and covering them with a carpet or a quilt, or in some similar way stop the current of air on which fire feeds. If a child's apron catches from the grate or stove, wrap a shawl or blanket about the little creature promptly, and roll her on the floor.

You can not be too careful with regard to matches, candles, and lamps. Those of you whose homes are lighted with kerosene or other oils should ask the person who takes care of the lamps always to fill them in the morning, never doing so after night-fall. A properly filled lamp is not likely to explode. Servants should be warned to be extremely careful in the use of kerosene. They should not be allowed to pour it upon their kindling-wood in order to light a fire quickly. Make it a rule never to trifle with fire, which is a great comfort in its proper place, but a dreadful foe when beyond our control.

REG.

BY MATTHEW WHITE, JUN.

CHAPTER I.

THE train was rushing along so fast that Reg was forced to give up counting the telegraph poles, and still Aunt Susan fretted lest they should be too late.

"Twenty minutes behind time—twenty minutes, do you hear, Reginald?" she kept repeating, fixing her sharp gray eyes on her nephew as sternly as if it were his fault that a coupling had broken two miles back.

"How we are ever to get through that dreadful city and down to the ferry by four o'clock I don't know— Now, Reginald, do stop twisting about so in that chair; you make me dizzy;" and poor nervous Aunt Susan Brax patted one hand against the other, as if she longed to box somebody's ears—a thing she had never done in her life.

"Well, I don't like these palace-cars half as much as the other kind, anyway. You can't get a bit close to the window;" and as he spoke the boy began playing a spiteful tune on the one leg of the parlor chair with the heels of his shoes.

"There, now!" cried Aunt Susan, in an angry whisper. "Did any one ever see such an ungrateful boy? Two dollars extra I paid to ride in this car, and this is the thanks for it! But we've only one life to live, and— Oh, deary me, if we miss that boat! It's nearly three now, so—" But the conductor came along just then, and for the space of five minutes Miss Brax forgot everything else in trying to ask all the questions she could think of concerning trains and ferry-boats.

She was the only sister of Reg's mother, and had never had anything to do with children until Mr. and Mrs. Robinson went to Europe for their health. Then there being no one else with whom to leave Reg, on the way from Maine, where the Robinsons lived, to Boston, where they were to take the steamer, he was dropped at the little New England town in which his mother had been born, and where Aunt Susan kept house by herself in the old home-stead.

Now Reg was not a bad boy, but then he was a boy, and having had very slight previous acquaintance with Miss Brax, he shocked her at the very start, not only by attempting to call her "Aunt Sue," but also by lying in bed on the first morning until the second bell had rung.

Life at Broadfarms was not very exciting, as most of the people in the place seemed to be grown up. There was one boy, however, Phil Fairlock, who lived next door, with whom Reg had formed quite a warm friendship; but just as he began to rejoice in the fact, a letter came from one of Aunt Susan's second cousins in New Jersey, stating that she was laid up with a broken arm, and begging Miss Brax to come on at once and "see to things."

"Are the things—I mean, are there any boys?" asked Reg, when told to prepare himself for the journey.

"Boys? No indeed," retorted his aunt. "There's only Cousin Sarah herself and her husband, John, ten years older, and quite deaf."

"Oh dear!" sighed Reg. And Aunt Susan thought it very good in him to take the afflictions of others so to heart, until he unluckily added, "Couldn't you leave me behind—at the Fairlocks'?"

"Mercy on us, child! what are you saying? Two boys in one family!" and Miss Brax looked a whole series of exclamation points at the bare suggestion.

So the front part of the rambling old house was shut up, and the cook, with her husband, the gardener, left to live in and defend the rear, while Miss Brax and her nephew departed for— But Reg did not even know the name of the place, as whenever he attempted to ask questions on the subject Aunt Susan implored him not to bother her, adding that "children should be seen, not heard."

But then the good lady was very nervous about traveling, especially as on this occasion she would be obliged to pass through New York, and it was in the fear that something horrible would happen to her while in that city that she had arranged to make the connection with the New Jersey train as close as possible. And now she was alarmed lest she had overreached herself.

As soon as the conductor had torn himself away, Miss Brax, with nervous fingers, noted down in her little blank-book the directions he had given her, and then announced in solemn tones to her nephew: "Reginald, we shall be obliged to make use of that contrivance of this modern age upon which I have always looked with the supremest horror—the elevated railroad. Otherwise, the conductor tells me, we shall be left. Oh, deary, deary me! why did Cousin Sarah stumble over that water pail?"

Reg's heart gave a quick bound of joy. Phil Fairlock had told him something about the cars in New York, which ran along as high as the second-story windows, and now to think he was not only to see the wonder, but actually to become a part of it! Just then, however, the train entered the long series of tunnels leading to the Grand Central Depot, and Aunt Susan kept him so busy hunting about among the racks and hooks for possibly forgotten articles as to leave him no time to think about future delights.

"Keridge, ma'am! Keridge! ker-r-idge! Right this way, anywhere you like, ma'am!"

Poor Miss Brax! these cries nearly drove her wild, as, clutching Reg with one hand and her well-worn carpet-bag—which she would trust to no one else—with the other, she passed from the station to the street. Then she had no sooner escaped the hackmen than a small boy stationed himself at her side, and stretching out his hand toward the precious satchel, was about to ask leave to carry it, when Aunt Susan, mistaking him for a thief, called, "Police!" and fled faster than ever in the direction of the elevated road on Sixth Avenue.

On reaching the latter they rushed up the nearest stairway only to find, after the tickets had been bought, that they were on the up-town side, and consequently would be obliged to go down-stairs again, cross the street, and ascend to the station opposite.

When informed of this fact Aunt Susan, flushed, with bonnet awry and her gray curls dancing up and down excitedly, looked so terrible in her anger that Reg trembled as he followed her. By the time they had reached the street, however, she had grown so white and walked with such tottering steps that he was about to venture a word of consolation, when she suddenly dashed forward, and pushing Reg on ahead, hurried up the other steps almost two at a time.

"Run, Reginald, run!" she cried. "Don't you see the train coming?"

But unfortunately Reg had at that instant caught sight of a balky horse in the street below, and was craning his head over the railing to look at it, which so exasperated his aunt that she boxed his ears, and gave him a push which sent him sprawling up the stairs.

Now Reg ought to have comprehended Miss Brax's state of mind and carefully avoided giving her any cause for anxiety; but then, he argued to himself, he had only halted for the least fraction of a minute, and his ear tingled so, and no one had ever struck him before; so Aunt Susan must— But just then Miss Brax gave him a second push, dropped two tickets into the box, and— But Reg did not wait to be shoved a third time. With a bound he rushed for the cars, which were about to start, gained the platform of one of them, the gate clashed to behind him, and—he was off down-town alone, for Aunt Susan had been left!

It took Reg quite five minutes to comprehend his situation, and it was not until he had walked twice through the four cars composing the train, without discovering a single familiar face, that he sat down in a corner to seriously confront the fact that he was lost. If he had only known what ferry they were to take, or even the name of the town to which they were going, he might have inquired his way to the river and waited there for his aunt.

"I'll get off at the next stop and run back as hard as ever I can," he resolved, never dreaming that the distance was ten blocks, and that before he could have covered half of it Aunt Susan would be off searching for him elsewhere.

As soon as the conductor sang out the name of the next station Reg was on his feet, and eagerly waiting for the cars to stop, when he ran down the stairs and up the crowded avenue like a deer.

But as he tore along, a new difficulty occurred to him. Before he could reach the station platform he would be obliged to pay his fare, and as a fifty-cent piece was all the money he had, he began to wonder what might become of him should he fail to find his aunt. He therefore doubled his speed, and bounding up the steps, recklessly threw down his money. Then on receiving forty cents and his ticket, he dashed out on the platform only to find a man smoking a cigar at one end of it, and a girl with a baby in her arms at the other.

"Did you—did you see a lady," Reg began, tremulously, approaching the gateman as a last resort—"a lady with—"

"Yes, yes," interrupted the man, impatiently, as he let Reg's ticket down with his sort of pump-handle arrangement, "I've seen a hundred on 'em."

The boy turned away, and walked slowly down the stairs. A hundred ladies on one spot! Then how many there must be in the whole city, and how could one poor little boy, with only forty cents in his pocket, ever hope to find his aunt Susan among them?

"Where is she now?" he wondered. "Is she very sorry she's lost me? Maybe she's glad." And as the evil thought entered his head it appeared to find a snug little nook there all ready to receive it, where it grew and flourished, until at last Reg was almost ready to believe that his aunt had brought him to the city on purpose to get rid of him, and that he was a very much abused boy, and consequently quite a hero. That he was awfully hungry he realized only too keenly when, in the course of his aimless walk along the avenue, the inviting odors from a bakery drew him to the window, and then into the store, where he lavished twenty cents on a cake which it would have horrified Miss Brax to have seen him even look at.

While he ate it, standing there by the counter, he tried to feel very brave and manly, taking care of himself in New York, and free to go where he chose; but it was no use. When he thought of the night, and of his three meals for the next day and the next, and only twenty cents left in the pretty little purse his mother had made for him, the sob that wanted to come up and the last piece of cake which was just going down met in his throat, and he hurried out into the fresh air of the street.

But which way should he go? He brushed a tear away with his coat sleeve, which he noticed was covered with dust and dirt, for in his wild course from one station to another he had run against all sorts of things. However, he could not bear to stand still, and he was endeavoring to decide in which direction lay the depot, when his eye was caught by a fancifully decorated sign-board across the way, setting forth the fact that here was situated "Smith's Theatre."

To Reg the words had a sort of magical appearance. On two glorious red-letter days of his life he had been to the circus, but the inside of a theatre was known to him only by Phil Fairlock's glowing descriptions of a pantomime he had once witnessed.

"THE GATE CLASHED TO BEHIND HIM."

For the moment Reg forgot his dismal prospects as he gazed at this temple of all joys, as he considered it. People were going in now, and as the boy stood watching them, he wondered if he could not take just one peep. The temptation to try at least was not to be resisted, and hurrying over, Reg mingled with the crowd. The next moment, to his extreme amazement, he found himself in the auditorium without a word having been said to him about tickets.

A STORY ABOUT MR. DU CHAILLU.

BY MISS L. M. CRANE.

"WHAT shall we do with you, and what will have become of us by the time your visit comes to an end?"

That is what a South Carolina lady, whom we will call Mrs. L., said to a gentleman who was her guest.

"What!" I hear on all sides. "Why, the geographies say Maine is noted for ice, lumber, and fisheries; Connecticut, for clocks and cutlery; New York, for wheat; and South Carolina, for its hospitality. Is that South Carolina hospitality, for a lady to suggest that she may feel relieved when the time comes for a gentleman, her guest, to leave her house?"

Besides that, the gentleman was the valued friend of her husband, and was the great traveller Mr. Du Chaillu. More eyes open now, I think. Well, I'll tell you how it came to pass.

When the terrible war between the Blue and the Gray ended, the schools of the South were found to be all broken up. Many Southern families had neither homes nor means of any kind, whilst many who still had their homes had no means for employing teachers in their families. And then it was that the lady of our story, Mrs. L., and her husband, Rev. Dr. L., resolved to do what they could for the education of their poor country people.

By the expenditure of much of their limited income, and at the cost of great self-denial, they built in their own yard several halls for recitation purposes, and added to their old family home several rooms for teachers and boarding pupils.

Having then secured accomplished teachers for all the substantial branches, they invited parents to try the school.

The girls, large and small, flocked in from all quarters of that State, and from some neighboring States. Those who could pay at all were expected to do their share; but many could pay little or even nothing. Dr. and Mrs. L. now felt that a great and responsible charge was theirs, though there was to be no gain in purse to them.

Toward the close of one winter it was noised through the school that Mr. Du Chaillu was coming to visit Dr. L. If the scholars had been asked, "Who is Mr. Du Chaillu?" they would have said, "Why, he is the great traveller in Africa; he is the man who discovered the gorilla, and he is coming to see Dr. and Mrs. L. because he knew them in Africa and then in New York."

You see, Dr. L. had talked to the girls about Africa, and about Mr. Du Chaillu, and had lent all his books to this one and that one, until every one felt almost as if Mr. Du Chaillu was a personal friend.

At last the train left the expected guest at the station, and Dr. L. and his man Friday, named John, actually brought the gorilla-hunter, all alive and well, home to the white house amongst the pines and mock-orchards, just in time for tea.

Every one, I think, felt perfectly at home in about half a minute with the hero of the place.

As soon as the scholars began to assemble the next morning, Mr. Du Chaillu was on the play-ground to make the acquaintance of— Ah! I forgot to tell you, didn't I, that some of the scholars' names were Bob, Jim, Frank, Norwood, and plenty more which did not apply to girls, but meant some of the little boys of the neighborhood who attended the "Institute."

It was to see these boys and the little girls that Mr.

THE GORILLA.

Du Chaillu went out. Scarcely had he reached the playground when there came back such a peal of laughter, such shoutings and clappings of hands, that all the grown folks ran out to see what could be the matter.

But the school bell soon put an end to the excitement, and it was renewed only at recess.

After school, however, came the genuine fun. The little ones were out-of-doors at play, and the older ones were in the school-room preparing lessons, writing letters or compositions, or amusing themselves.

Mr. Du Chaillu having told the little ones gorilla stories, proposed they should "play gorilla." One of the number was chosen to personate the curious animal, while Mr. Du Chaillu explained to him how the gorilla would act in his native forests.

Then such scamperings followed! Over the fences they flew, through the garden, over the balustrade, around the houses, and finally into the school-room, barring the doors and windows. All this time the gorilla was here and there grinning, beating his breast, chasing sharply his flying victims, and now he followed to the school-room, banging at the doors, beating at the windows, assailing in every direction, and roaring terribly. Ah! it was exciting to the utmost.

Within, the hunted ones were shrieking, laughing, trembling, fully imagining they were in fearful danger.

And this sort of fun went on every day for two or three weeks, until the teachers declared they had no control over the scholars. They talked in study hours, whispered in school, and all that could be heard was "gorilla," "snake," "Africa," "Du Chaillu," "Ashango Land," "dwarf." On slates and blackboards, instead of the ordinary examples and problems, they drew snakes, lions, and gorillas. In short, every idea of every pupil, every day and all day long, seemed to begin, continue, and end in gorilla-hunting.

At least one boy even dreamed of him; for, crying out in sleep, he was asked, "What's the matter?" and replied, "Chally gorilla did say boo to me."

By this time Dr. and Mrs. L. began to feel uneasy. They said, "Here are all these young people intrusted to us for the culture of their minds, and although work must be mingled with amusement, everybody knows what too much play does with Jack and Jill; so we must really try to bring our young folks back to work."

Then Mrs. L. called Mr. Du Chaillu to her, and said to him what stands at the beginning of this story of ours. She said more than that to him, for she told him how every one had enjoyed his visit more than any other visit that had ever been made by any one else to that neighborhood. She told him that the boys and girls were beginning to forget how to work at their books, and if they cared only for fun, and not for learning geography and grammar and arithmetic and algebra, "why, you know, sir, they will never be great travellers or writers like you."

So Mr. Du Chaillu laughed and said he would not teach the boys and girls any more games, but would allow them to settle down again to their books. He paid some farewell visits, and everywhere he played dolls with the little girls, and said pleasant things to the big girls, talked guns and hunting and horses with the older boys, frolicked with the small boys, and greatly delighted the hearts of the fathers and mothers.

One lady was so well pleased with him that she named her little son "Paul Du Chaillu." Little Paul, or Paul junior, says, "When I get to be a man I mean to take my gun and go to Africa, like my Chally."

Now you know why Mr. Du Chaillu left us; and he has not yet paid us another visit. I think he will come again, however, for every few months some of his friends amongst the pines and mock-oranges are asking, "When is Mr. Du Chaillu coming to see you, Mrs. L.?"

And Mrs. L. replies, "Some time or other, we hope."

SWIMMING FOR LIFE.

A STORY OF THE SOUTH PACIFIC.

BY DAVID KER.

"NO sign of a sail yet, Jim?"

"Nary one, Jack. I guess our time's come."

Jim Hackett had indeed some cause for saying so, and he said it in a dejected tone, which was rare indeed with him. To be afloat on a boundless sea without knowing where one is, or having any means of finding out, is an awkward matter at best; but to be afloat in the middle of the Pacific, without food or water, in an open boat, under a scorching sun, with not a sail in sight, might well make the bravest man despair.

Slowly and wearily the two worn-out men (sole survivors of the fearful disaster which had destroyed their vessel and all their shipmates) rose to their feet and strained their blood-shot eyes over the bright, merciless sea.

"Not a sail anywheres," repeated Hackett, despondently; "and we can't catch one o' them fish that's a-frolickin' around the boat by hundreds. God help us!"

"So He will, my boy, never fear. D'y'e remember how, when we two were at school together in the old Bay State, our old teacher used to be always spinning a yarn about some captain who (when his ship was aground and likely to go to pieces any minute), after he'd given his orders and done all he could, said his prayers and lay down to sleep; and the Admiral, when he heard of it, said he was the bravest man he'd ever known? Now, Jim, let's just say our prayers, and then have a nap; for I reckon we've done all we can, and the rest's in better hands than ours."

No ear but God's heard the short, simple prayer which the doomed men uttered, in their extremest need, from the midst of the desolate sea. A few minutes later both were sound asleep under the scanty shelter which the rag of sail could give against the life-destroying heat of the sun.

They slept for some time, but at length the increasing coolness of the evening air after the scorching heat of the day began to have its natural effect upon the two sleepers. They awoke almost at the same moment, rubbed their eyes, and then sat up and looked around them.

The sun was beginning to sink, but everything was still as light as noonday, and a fresh breeze had sprung up, ruffling the smooth surface into countless ripples.

"Jim," cried Jack, suddenly, in a tone of great excitement, "your eyes are better'n mine: look out there to the nor'west, and see if you make out anything."

"I guess I do," cried his companion, joyfully. "Hold on a minute till I make sure. Yes, it is, sure enough—it's a sail!"

With clinched teeth and straining eyes the two east-aways stood watching the distant speck on which hung their only chance of life. All at once a kind of spasm shook their rugged faces as it became terribly evident that the course which she was steering would not bring her anywhere near their boat.

They tried to signal with the remnant of their sail, but it was neither large enough nor high enough to be seen at such a distance. They made frantic efforts to shout, but the feeble cry which their parched throats could utter would not have been heard fifty yards off.

Suddenly, just when all hope seemed gone, the wind shifted, and the vessel was seen to alter her course.

The eastaways raised a faint hurrah; but in another moment Jim's keen eye perceived that although this new tack would bring the ship much nearer to them than before, she would still pass at a considerable distance from them, and might very easily miss seeing them altogether.

"There's only one way now, mate," said he, firmly, "and I'm a-going to try it, for it's neck or nothing with us now. God bless you, my boy!"

A loud splash followed the words, and Jim Hackett, looking up with a start, saw his comrade's round black head already several yards away from the boat. But he saw something else, which startled him even more, and that was a huge black object, which rose suddenly through the smooth, bright water, and darted swiftly and silently in pursuit of his unconscious comrade.

"Look out, Jack!" shouted he, with all the power of his failing voice: "here's a shark!"

Scarcely had he spoken when a second shark appeared, and the daring swimmer found himself beset on both sides at once. His only chance was to make as much stir and splashing in the water as possible, thus keeping the cowardly sea-pirates at bay; but the effort exhausted even more rapidly his fast-failing strength. What a terribly long way off the vessel seemed! and supposing she were to alter her course again, where would he be? Instinctively he glanced back toward the boat. The boat was gone!

Gone, as if it had never been—hidden behind the long smooth swells that rose high above his head every moment! There was no return for him now, for he knew not even which direction to take; and on he went, struggling for life with limbs that grew weaker at every stroke, while the cruel eyes and gaping jaws on either side drew closer and closer, hungering for their prey.

"Sam," said a keen-eyed sailor to his chum, glancing over the vessel's port quarter, "ain't that mighty like a man, somehow?"

"A man!" echoed the passing Captain, bringing his telescope to his eye. "Thunder! so it is! Put her head about, smart, and stand by to lower the boat!"

The help came none too soon, for Jack was so spent that he could only gasp out, "My mate—yonder—boat." But it was quite enough. Half an hour later Jim Hackett was safe on board likewise; and the two rescued men lived to tell their children and grandchildren the story of their adventure in the Pacific.

N A N.*

BY MRS. LUCY C. LILLIE,

AUTHOR OF "MILDRED'S BARGAIN," "AUNT RUTH'S TEMPTATION," ETC.

CHAPTER XXI.

MARGARET BLAKE was in the garden with little David when the happy party arrived; and Rob, who had already grown well acquainted with Nan, hurried forward with beaming eyes to open the gate for her. Then they all went into the parlor, where Love's dress was duly inspected, and David's heart delighted by a game Nan had bought for him.

"Father," Love exclaimed, "just come and look!" She held up the pretty dark silk, arranging it in a most fascinating fold. Laura was near her.

"Oh!" said Love, turning around with a pretty smile, "how well it looks with Miss Laura's hair!"

Poor Laura! vanity was her very weakest point; and as Margaret Blake shook out the brown silk near to her pretty blonde hair, she turned toward the glass with a most self-satisfied expression. It might have grown more complacent had not the mirror also reflected Joan grinning, and Nan's simple young face looking at Laura's very gravely.

"Nonsense, Margaret!" she exclaimed, coloring; but she thought how hard it was she could not always have—that Jane Phillips had, for instance—becoming and stylish costumes. Laura's standards were regulated by a few very over-dressed young people at the Beverley Academy.

When the party drove home, Nan was filled with anxiety to tell her aunt everything. For just in those few days a close understanding had grown up between the old lady and the child. Nan felt like a new being from the lonely little girl who had one day, two weeks ago, walked down the staircase wishing herself in Bronfield. Her aunt's heart had opened to her, and she found love enough in it to satisfy her own.

After tea Miss Rolf and Nan went into the parlor, and there on the writing-table lay two books, bound in Russia leather, and with "Annice Rolf" printed in gold letters on the covers.

"You see," said Aunt Letty, "one is for your accounts, the other is a sort of note-book in which you can enter anything you think the Traverses will need."

Nan was delighted, and Aunt Letty said she would leave her alone a little while that she might enter in her account-book the expenditures of the day.

Nan sat down in the window overlooking the terrace, and prepared her accounts carefully. Yet I am afraid this first page was rather wild in appearance. So far as figures and items read it was correct, and stood thus:

2 dresses for Mrs. Travers,	14 50
There were two suits of clothes for David, and they were 9 00
4 collars,	30
2 shirts,	2 00
10 yards of unbleached muslin,	80
A dark skirt,	75
game and books,	8
	33 35

Nan summed up her badly spelled account, and wondered if Aunt Letty would think she had spent too much money. She wished Lanece were there to help her decision as well as her figures; and she sat looking out of the window, biting the end of her pen, and wondering if she really could manage these business matters successfully. But, she reflected, if she only could, what a useful life she might lead. Aunt Letty would give her money, she felt sure, for every useful enterprise; and Nan was made, as her aunt had kindly said, to be a "helper."

CHAPTER XXII.

THE day upon which Mrs. Travers and David were to take possession of their new home was one of intense excitement for all the young Rolfs. Mrs. Travers had been visited by various members of the theatrical company, one of whom—the lady in whose dressing-room Dr. Rogers had found the sick woman—had called at Rolf House to express her gratification, and offer a little purse made up among the company.

"You see, madam," said Mrs. Landor to the old lady, "we thought we couldn't go off without sending Mollie something; so we just made up this little sum, hoping it would help things along."

"I'm sure you were all very thoughtful," said Miss Rolf; "and you will be glad to know that Mrs. Travers will be well cared for."

"Well, 'n," said the other, fanning herself vigorously, "you see she wasn't brought up in the profession as I was, and she always took things hard. Travers, her husband, was a capital comedy man, but he got to drinking, and I think she led a hard life with him. She's one of those that couldn't get along even for herself; but she's as sweet and as good a creature as I ever knew. We're doing a good business now on the road, and so we thought it only fair poor Mollie should have something."

Before Mrs. Landor left, Miss Rolf asked her whether she would not like some flowers; and Nan conducted her into the beautiful garden, where she gathered a heaping basket of roses and heliotrope and other blossoms, to Mrs. Landor's great delight.

"Well," she said, standing in the garden and surveying the large handsome house among the trees—"well, I think Mollie Travers has found friends." A wistful look came into the good-hearted woman's face. "I wish my Nancy were going to do half as well in life as I know David will now. Thank you, I'm sure," she added, as Nan laid one or two more exquisite "Jaquie" roses in the basket. "I must say good-by; and if our company comes this way at Christmas, perhaps we'll find Mrs. Travers well again."

* Begin in No. 157, HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE.

Miss Rolf said she hoped, if the company did return, Mrs. Landor would call again; and so the good woman departed, well pleased by her visit.

That afternoon had been determined upon for the taking possession of the new rooms, and Mrs. Landor had no sooner departed than Phyllis and Joan and Lance appeared, to go with Nan for the final survey and arrangements of the room. Phyllis came up the garden path with a funny little half-satirical smile just curving her lips.

"HOW WELL IT LOOKS WITH MISS LAURA'S HAIR!"

"Who in the world was your strange visitor, Cousin Letty?" she inquired.

Miss Rolf was still standing on the steps, where she had watched Nan gather the roses, and she looked a little disapprovingly upon pretty Phyllis.

"That was a very good-hearted friend of Mrs. Travers," she answered, "who brought a little purse she had made up among her associates for our poor friend."

Now there was one peculiarity about Aunt Letitia which appealed most strongly to Nan. She rarely used strong words of approval or blame, yet in all that she said it was not possible for a person, even of ordinary judgment, to mistake her meaning. Phyllis felt rebuked, and she hastened to change the subject. It was this young lady's unchangeable rule never to annoy Cousin Letty.

Nan was soon ready to start, and walked along with Joan's hand in hers, eagerly describing Mrs. Landor's visit.

"Oh," said Joan, "how much harder I should have looked at her if I had only known that she was an actress!"

But, at all events, it was consoling to hear Nan's bright description; and as Joan remarked perhaps she would come again some day, Nan promised immediately to send for her.

They found Mrs. Holt anxious to show them how well she had cleaned the rooms, and evidently eager to know what two or three large packages which had come from Ames's contained. These were opened in the little sitting-room, and disclosed a pair of muslin curtains, some sofa cushions, and two sets of hanging book-shelves, with some cheap though well-colored blue Japanese china bowls, and a few ornaments of the blue and white ware.

Nan had not been mistaken in relying upon Cousin Phyllis's exquisite taste, even in arranging the simplest things; and added to this was so much tact that she induced Mrs. Holt to put away the tawdry ornaments of the room without in the least affronting that good woman.

"My Mirandy made that," she said, dusting the glass shade of some hideous wax flowers, starting fuchsias and lilies-of-the-valley, and big white roses.

"Oh, then," said Phyllis, sweetly, "hadn't you rather put it away now, Mrs. Holt?" And so one such thing after another was disposed of, and then the little sitting-room, with its matted floor and clean walls and windows, the chintz-covered sofa and chairs, looked invitingly ready for their final touches. The bookshelves were hung at each side of the chimney-piece, and on the lower shelves they put some of the Japanese ware, in which fresh flowers could be kept. Then the few pictures—good cuts from illustrated papers, and well framed in plain oak—were hung, the sofa cushions adjusted, and the curtains nicely draped and tied back with dark red ribbons. The white marble centre table was covered with an olive green cloth, and on it were arranged a lamp and a few books, and a lacquer box in which were pens and pencils, while an inkstand and blotter were at one side. Nan looked around the room with delight; and it certainly looked most inviting, though there was nothing in it or about it which suggested luxury. It was a simple abode; but everything was in good taste and refined.

In the widow's bedroom a few comforts for an invalid were placed—a low table which could be near her bed, a nice bath, and a warm wool rug, with one or two cheerful pictures on the walls. David's little room beyond they felt they could leave more bare, since, as Nan said, "Boys are only boys." And Joan added, "And they never know what they have about them."

By three o'clock everything was ready: flowers were in the vases and bowls; the windows were open, but shaded; and Mrs. Holt was instructed to have a nice substantial tea ready when the mother and child arrived. And then

Nan told Phyllis what Aunt Letty had suggested—that Mrs. Heriot and Love should bring them to Miller Street cottage.

“Aunt Letty says,” said Nan, “that they may feel shy if we are here.”

Phyllis quite agreed to this, but Joan felt as if she would like to have watched the Traverses taking possession of their new abode; and Nan had some trouble to console her on the way home.

OUR POST-OFFICE BOX.

CHILDREN, did you ever think about the sun, and what a mighty wonder-worker it is? Of course you like sunshine, and are always glad when, after a period of stormy weather, the clear old sun looks out again, and sends the gloomy clouds. Let me tell you what Professor Young, of Princeton College, lately said about the sun to an audience of delighted New-Yorkers. As it was a learned lecture, I fear the children may not have read it when it was reported, although I think most of my boys and girls are quite old enough to understand what the Professor told the grown people so simply. The quotation is from the New York Tribune:

"We can trace to the direct action of the sun almost everything in the way of power that occurs upon the earth. Take, for instance, the water-wheel. You go into a mill and find the spindles running. The power that drives them is in the sun in this way: water runs down the channel of the river because it has been pumped up by the action of the sun and dropped upon the hill-tops, and then finds its way down to the sea again, and is pumped up again and dropped again, and again runs to the sea, and really the power that drives it is the power that works those pumps. Let the sun stop its radiation for a few days, and the water would run into the ocean, and the ocean would be filled, and that would be the end of things. Just as the man who winds his watch drives it through the next day, so the sun winds up the world. Take the wind, again. The currents of the air are produced in that way, only in a more roundabout manner, and we can trace the power of the steam-engine, when we get out energy from the burning of fuel, to the sun also.

"I suppose you know that the growth of a plant is, in some respects, very like the building of a tall chimney. The carbonic acid in the air is picked to pieces, and the carbon is united to hydrogen and other materials, and built up into an organic structure that we call a plant. The work done in building up a plant is done in much the same way as in building up a brick furnace. The iod-carrier in taking the bricks from the ground to the top. When the building comes down, if the bricks are allowed to fall, they do it all the time, and the work is done away from work that was done in carrying them up. So when we burn a tree built up by celestial heat we are merely recovering again the bottled sunshine that was stored up in the tree, and the work. Coal is the sunshine of the ages long past, probably. In fact, animal power can be traced to the same source. If I speak, or move my hand, the energy that does my work was stored away in my body some time ago by the taking of food, and that food has built me up in precisely the same way as plants are made. It is nothing but the action of the sun that makes the plants that supplies me to reach you with my voice to-night. There is hardly any work in the world that we can not trace in this way to the power of the sun. There are some slight exceptions, but it is not saying a word too much to say that if the sun should stop shining to-day, within a month all activity on this planet would practically cease. It would stop only a few minutes, but nothing would be going on. There would be complete stagnation throughout the whole universe that composes the sun's system."

S.W. HOKEY, PENNSYLVANIA.

I would like to describe some of the doings of our Wide-awake Club. We meet at Aunt Eva's, as we call our kind friend, though she is not our real auntie. We stay at her house, and go out to meet every Tuesday evening. We play games most of the time. We have a new game now, Auntie made it up last Thursday. The game is this: five of us are to go into the other room, put on masks, and play that we are robbers; then we spring out on the rest, who are passengers in a palace-car. We ask for a thing which is certain to be found in it, and stand as if in the answer you put that letter in, you have to stay under the table as a prisoner, and are not allowed to come out until all the rest come down. The one who stays up the longest wins the game. Another game ammie made up we call "Picture-Gallery." We have the clothes-horse covered with newspapers, in which holes are cut. Then some of us stand in it, and stand as if you can see the face through the holes. Then one stands up, and goes from one to the other, and says funny things, to see if he can not make them laugh. We call him the showman. The ones who keep grave take turns in being showman. The audience may make comments upon them if they wish.

We have two artificial owls—one with feathers, and one made of metal. The one with feathers is called Minerva, and the one of metal is called Diogenes Solon Franklin Zsop. We have six other members; they are five gold-fish and one water-bug. The largest gold-fish fell on the floor this morning, but it is not hurt. We used to have six gold-fish, but one died; and we once had two water-bugs, but one died. This is all I can say to-day, so good-by. BAYARD.

The story of four little girls given next in the Post-office Box was written by a very young contributor, who will very likely weave stories like Mrs. Lucy C. Lillie and Mrs. W. J. Hays and other of our fairer sisters, who shall be older. The Post-mistress is much pleased to receive original rhymes, compositions, and stories from her youthful correspondents, and whenever she can she will publish them in these cozy little columns, which are so popular with the children:

FOUR LITTLE FRIENDS.

"Oh, mother, when we were out this afternoon we met two little girls about our age, and oh! they were dressed beautifully, and their names are so pretty—they are Averie and Maggie. Please send the boys and me to come and spend the evening with us!"

"My dear children," said the mother, "I know nothing about these little girls, and, my dear, you are all older, and you and Ethel should not speak to strangers in the street."

"But, mamma, they are very nice girls, we are sure."

"I should not like to let them come here, my dear, unless I knew their parents."

"The girls were deeply disappointed. They had felt so sure of their mother's consent that they had already planned what games they would play when their new friends came."

Seeing their discontent faces, the kind mother said she would find out about Averie and Maggie, and send them to their mother.

Maud and Ethel Melville were very well brought up. Their mother was a very good woman, and very kind to the poor.

When Maud went to see the strange children, she found that their mother was an invalid, and they had mostly to take care of themselves, so they were very rude and ignorant.

She told them of the man who had come and their mother gave them permission to go. Under Mrs. Melville's sweet smiles and kind words their soon became improved. Averie and Maggie, indeed, were soon just like Maud and Ethel.

One day a merry little party set off to visit a pond about a mile from the house. They played there awhile, and then they went to explore some cave which was in the mountain. In about ten minutes when Maggie and Maud were tired, and asked Mrs. Melville if they might go back to the pond.

She said they might.

After they went. By-and-by Maggie saw a certain stick. Reaching for it, she fell in. Both Maggie and Maud gave a scream. The pond was deep and cold, and when in the water they were covered with water except her head. Maud gave another scream, and Mrs. Melville came rushing up to the other children just as Maggie was all covered with water.

Mrs. Melville, regardless of the danger, plunged into the deep pond and saved Maggie, who was as white as death and unconscious a long, long time.

After that Maggie was very ill, and Maud nursed her night and day. At last she was well, and then on Christmas-days and birthdays the four girls had splendid times together. MARY L.

ST. CATHARINES, ONTARIO.

Will you please admit little Canadian girl, aged twelve, into the Sociable? I do not often bake, but when I do, I wish my boys and girls to help. My mamma lets me make a cake or something to help her. I have a recipe of a cake, which I have tried many times, and felt very proud when mamma read the recipe, and I wanted to send the recipe, that the other girls might try it, but mamma said you would not care about it. I like to sew. During the holidays I have often washed the dishes, but I don't like to do it. Rosalie does, though perhaps I would if I had to do it three times a day, and for a large family. We have but seven in ours, and a very happy family we are too.

I have a married sister, a brother, and two of the "cutest little ones"—Bible and Daisy—living in Brooklyn, N. Y. They were here in the summer. I would like to tell about some of Daisy's antics. I have often thought that I would like to see the dear Post-mistress read her picture, since she writes so kindly to the little folks, and I am sure the other readers would like the same. FLORA C. M.

FLORA C. M.

Flora dear, the moment you sent this number of YOUNG PEOPLE sit down directly and send us that receipt, specially want the little house-keepers to see that receipt, and read it. I shall be the watch for yours. If you ever come to Brooklyn to visit those little nieces, perhaps you will take a trip across the river to Franklin Square, see where YOUNG PEOPLE is printed, and let me give you a kiss for those pretty words of affection to the Post-mistress. But as for having you all, hundreds and thousands of you, see my picture, why, the very idea makes me quite faint.

PORT JERVIS, NEW YORK.

I am a little girl eight years old. I enjoy your paper ever so much. My papa gave it to me for a Christmas present a year ago. I thought Bertie B's letter in No. 166 was real good. I shall love to like Mr. Stubbs' Brother, and Jimmy Brown's stories, and "Talking Leaves."

One day a carriage drove up to the house, and what do you think was in there? The driver handed me a great big black and white cat. We call him Spot. He is a big fat fellow, and a great hunter. One day he caught an owl, and he has caught two or three squirrels. The woods are near us, and Spot has a good opportunity to go hunting. He is in my lap while I write.

I have two sisters and no brother. I wish I did have one. We have another cat named Muff; it is gray. Bertie has put all the time. We do not like snow. When she is out-doors she jumps up to the window and meows to be let in. Spot is real pretty. With love I will close. E. S.

AN ACROSTIC.

Radie, my baby, she wonders, I know,
At papa for staying away from her;
Can't understand why so much he must roam,
How always "bizness" won't let him come home.
Eyes like twin violet, so blue and so bright;
Fur like a great black and white cat.
Far off in fancy, I hear of and o'er
Her dear little feet trotting over the floor;
Upstairs and downstairs all the day long,
Trilling and chirping all the time,
Coaxing gray kitten to shut up its eye,
Hanging her dolly's wet clothes out to dry;
Ironing, scrubbing, and sewing things too—
Nobody knows what she will do to-day,
Says baby, were you sitting upon my knee,
One arm round my neck as tight as could be,
Now how many kisses would you give to me?
PAPA.

CHICAGO, ILLINOIS.

MILBURY, MASSACHUSETTS.

I am twelve years old, and I have a little sister nine years old who has taken YOUNG PEOPLE about two months, and we like it very much, especially the Post-office Box, and I thought I would like to write a letter. I saw in one of the letters that B. J. L.'s bird could not sing without breaking down, and I thought I would write and tell you what I gave our bird. We took a tin piece of salt pork and covered it with Cayenne pepper, and then gave it to the bird, whose name is Dicky, and he has sung almost ever since. We have a little dog named Tippy. E. M. M.

ANNA L. M.

I am glad the pepper prescription answered so well with Dicky. I once gave red pepper to two little mocking-birds which I was trying to raise, and they both died. So if B. J. L.'s bird is to have a pepper tonic, let it be given sparingly.

CRAWFORDVILLE, INDIANA.

Your paper is a weekly visitor at our house. I had it in my ever since it was published. I have a cat; his name is Pileas. I read it every week. I call it Dickey's Young Folks. I have a serial in my paper; it is not as good as "Toby Tyler," but mamma says it is a good story to be printed by a boy nine years old. I like the "Moral Pirates" was a splendid story. I want to write one as good as that in a few years. I will be a great big lumberer, and collected a nice lot of stories from Travellers. I have collected one of them myself. ALFRED E. D.

SPRING HILL, VIRGINIA.

I have for pets only my kitten and dolls. I live on a pretty farm named Spring Hill, about seven miles from Petersburg, and I have a school here, and have never been to school much, as there are no schools near us, and mamma thinks I am too young to be sent to a boarding-school yet. Mamma teaches me to read, and she says that the YOUNG PEOPLE is the best paper for boys and girls in the world. I like the story of "Nan" very much, and hope that the next serial story will be as interesting. I noticed that you said all girls who would like to join the Housekeepers' Sociable must send in their names; so please put mine down. I must tell you about my Christmas presents. One was a writing desk, one a book, and I had some other things. I hope that you had a merry Christmas and a happy New-Year. MAIE G.

It is very pleasant to be taught at home by a dear mamma, and I am glad little Maie does not have to go away to a distant school, where she would very likely be lonely and homesick.

SPICELAND, INDIANA.

We have taken almost every number of HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, and I like it very much. I have been sick for three or four days, but am able to sit up in the bed now. I have just read it better when I draw it than when I have it read to me.

I like to read so well! I draw a great deal, and almost all my pictures I draw from the YOUNG PEOPLE. I am twelve years old, and study Fifth Reader, arithmetic, language, spelling, and geography. I will finish geography in two weeks, and have a sister fourteen years old, and a brother nine years old. We have a piano, which I enjoy playing on very much. My sister and I have taken lessons on it. We have a pair of birds in the woods. We got it before it had any feathers, and fed it on hard-boiled eggs. It is grown up, and has had two green, spotted eggs. It is now out, but the parakey are there both. We have a little spotted bird once that was the prettiest I ever saw, except the two white ones we have now. It hung itself in the wires of the cage, and I buried it in the garden.

TALLAHASSEE, ALABAMA.

We live in the country, and go to school in Tallahassee, three miles from home. It is a pretty and picturesque village. There are four of us, and we drive to school in a little spring wagon, and have a merry time. I have a classmate, and summer is beautiful for wading. Our teacher gave us a lovely Christmas tree the day our school term closed. We trimmed our home with holly and evergreen, and had a Christmas party at home, for the father and mother for Santa Claus to visit us. I have a lovely little baby sister and brother—twins; they are just as sweet as sweet can be. I think "Nan" is a very good story, and I have many times read it to my mother to get my paper. I hope you will publish this letter, as it is my first. I forgot to tell you of our pranks on Christmas—of putting little leaves and nuts and string strings to our toes and then to the head, to awaken us when we turned over, that we might be the first up Christmas morning.

Wishing you, dear Postmistress, a happy New-Year, I am your friend, LILLIE S. B.

CAMDEN, SOUTH CAROLINA.

We take HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, and like it very much indeed, and have persuaded several of our friends to take it too. We live very near the water, and have a beautiful view of the Hobkirk Hill, the scene of a famous battle during the Revolutionary war, and within a stone's throw of the stream where Gates' army surprised the British while washing their clothes. It has been made a very beautiful park, and is a beautiful view. The stream is very shallow, and forms a lovely pond, dotted over with little islands, which join the shore by little fancy bridges in some places; steep hills rise on each side, and on the south it is terminated down to the water; lovely rocks climb over the stately oaks and graceful evergreens on every side; willows dip their graceful sprays in the water. It is a great resort in summer, and used for a bathing-place. The school-children wade in the stream.

When I next write I will tell some other historical items about our little old fashioned town.
MISSA B.

PHILADELPHIA, PENNSYLVANIA.

I am a little boy eight years old, and have a little sister four. I go to school when I am well, but have been sick a great deal this winter, first with bronchitis, and now the croup, and I can't go to school. I have taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE for over a year, and like it very much. I love to have it read to me. I can read some of it myself, and am learning to write too.

I like "Nan" very much, but I like to hear the letters read too, and hope you will put this in.

Isn't Jimmy Brown a funny boy?

Our cat's name is Grant, and our bird is Beauty. I had a little visitor the other evening. A little sparrow tapped at the window. We let him in, and he stood all night. In the morning we let him fly out the window.
EDDIE H. B.

MARY, N. Y.

I am less fortunate than many boys, as I have no parents living. But I have a sister. She is the best, dearest, sweetest, and prettiest girl I ever saw, and very good to me. I attend a college near here, and study Latin, Greek, algebra, philosophy, zoology, and other things. Charlie (her right name is Clarice) has studied Latin, and she helps me lots. She has graduated herself, but she keeps on with her studies, and takes German and Italian, and reads Virgil to keep her Latin from getting rusty.

Whenever I bring any of the boys home she is just as sweet and polite to them as you and I. I am very happy to see you, and I am glad to hear that you are well, and some of the boys about eighteen or twenty years old, who would not be expected to care for my society, as I am younger, often come to me with me, and are as good to me as I were their own age.

I have two pretty ants, who are very young. Aunt Sue is the jolly one, and Aunt Flo is the good one; one is sixteen and the other eight years old.

K., our class poet, wrote some verses once to Charlie, beginning:

"Beautiful eyes of azure hue,
Brown hair all of a curl,
And here you have set before you
My beat ideal of a girl."

There was a lot more—about four pages in all—and Charlie laughed heartily at it.

A boy with a pretty sister and two pretty ants, like yours, ought to be a perfect gentleman.

LANCASTERVILLE, NEW JERSEY.

I am quite a little carpenter, and just a week before the YOUNG PEOPLE came with the story telling how to make a tool chest I had made one for myself, and I have thirty-two regular carpenter's tools.

HARRY W. D.

It is very pleasant to have about a home a handy boy who can use tools, and takes good care of them. I suppose if a gate does not hang just right, or a picture needs a nail, or sister wants a work-box, Harry is the person to niftle to the work.

CHARLESTON, WEST VIRGINIA.

Please tell me where Jimmy Brown lives; I want to write to him and ask him if he really has a sister Sue. I wish YOUNG PEOPLE would come oftener than every week, as I am impatient to read "Nan". My papa, who writes stories, told me just as I told you that his friend named Jimmy Brown; maybe that is the reason why he always enjoys the Jimmy Brown stories just as much as I do. I make up a great many stories, which my mamma says are very funny. She says when I can write a good hand I may send a story to YOUNG PEOPLE. I have no pets—not even a cat; but our next-door neighbor has Oliver, which, as Jimmy Brown would say, is "more enough."

CENTREVILLE, CALIFORNIA.

I have taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE since the first number, and find it very interesting. Many of the boys and girls write to you about their pets. I have none, unless it is my mother, which I like just as I tell you about my mother. She says many things. Not very long ago the Justice of the Peace had a difficulty with a man, which ended in blows. One evening we were speaking of the impropriety of a Justice of the Peace striking a man, when my father said, "A Justice must not strike." At this, my little brother broke out with "I didn't strike anybody, and ain't in place to do it." I am a whole boy. It was very several days before he found out what my father really meant.

MOUNT VERNON, NEW YORK.

I want to tell you something. It is about what my mother found in a potato the other day. It was a groundnut, about half an inch in diameter; it had a shell, which was covered with short hairs. I would like to know if any other of your readers ever found ground-nuts in potatoes?
OLD PUTNAM'S PET.

SCHENECTADY, NEW YORK.

Here is a little incident which, contrary to the usual school-boy story, has had a laugh on the other side.

In one of the higher departments of the large school in the city of Schenectady, there were a party of between teacher and scholars as to who should rule. It was not yet decided when a new teacher, apparently quite inexperienced, entered the field.

The innocent veridancy of Miss M. may have been the cause, but certain it was that the pupils gradually left the ways that were bad. They still cling to one reservation, however. They were not disposed to discountenance the terrible sin of our schools—i. e., whispering. Everything that had been tried had failed. There was one cure—that was finally to expel the pupil.

The warning had been given, and seemingly with good effect; for this had not been anxious to meet the grim-visaged personage from whom they would receive the dismissal. The classes were called, and the scholars waiting attentively, when Miss M. distinctly heard the word "Donkey" from some one on the second bench. She turned her eyes upon the culprit. It was already thinking of the discretion to follow, and was ready for any escape. It came.

"Master L., were you talking to yourself?" calmly asked Miss M., her eyes twinkling.

"Yes, ma'am," was the ready reply.

He was not dismissed, but the shot went home.

NEW YORK CITY.

I am a little boy eight years old, and have taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE for two years, and like it very much. I had a jolly time on Christmas. Christmas morning when I awoke I found my stockings as full as it could be. Santa Claus was very good to me, and brought me a lovely big gun, and everything else I wanted.

Please find enclosed $2 for Young People's Cot, which I have been saving for a long time.

Your contribution has been sent to Miss Fanshawe, treasurer of the fund for Young People's Cot, and you will see it acknowledged, with your name in full, in her next report.

neath the rain tub in the yard, according to the custom of his kind in winter. Before this, however, he had a plentiful supply of beetles, which might serve to sustain him for many a day. He lived in a closet underneath the staircase, from which he sallied forth into his hunting ground, the kiteben. As with other beasts of prey, this occurred during the dead hours of the night.

When beetles became scarce, however, his operations were watched by the dim gas-light, and it was evident that he was guided more by scent than sight. He worked the floor as a pointer dog works his field; and when he crossed the trail of a beetle, even a few inches from him, he became excited, and putting his nose to the fresh scent, followed up his prey. Further evidence of this habit was observed by watching him at a crevice in the floor. Discovering by smell that his game was there, he inserted his hind-leg—the front one probably being too short—and grasping the black beetles with his claws, dragged them out one by one and gave them quick dispatch.

But the tameness and apparent intelligence of the animal are his most interesting characteristics. He will eat any pickings he can get, sharing the bones with the dog, lapping from his dish of water or milk, not sucking it up as a pig does.

It is very remarkable to find him "tapping at the door." If, after taking a stroll in the back yard, he finds the door of the house shut, you hear a gentle tap, tap, tap, often repeated if you don't answer. You go and gently open the door, and the little animal actually tries to look you in the face, by turning up its nose and small pig-like eyes, which you at once interpret, "Oh, thank you! I have been waiting here for some time,"

"TOMMY."

THE writer's house being overrun by beetles, caterpillars, and various pests in the way of insects, and other efforts to get rid of them having proved useless, he applied to a farmer friend to supply him with a hedgehog, which he has now had about four years.

During the first year, Tommy, as the cook christened him, retired for about two months to a bed of withered grass under-as he mounts the step and walks in. Country boys on meeting with a hedgehog but too often think it a duty at once to kill the poor creature, utterly ignorant, like many bigger boys and older men, of the services such animals perform in the economy of creation.

THE RESTING WAND.

IT is necessary in playing the Resting Wand that at least two people should be acquainted with the mystery attached to it, and that they should make an arrangement beforehand to understand each other's movements. One of these two persons is blindfolded, and placed with his back to the company, while his companion, with a staff in his hand, stands facing them. The latter of the two then begins an animated conversation with his friends, trying when talking to them to make frequent mention of their names. Stopping occasionally, he touches some one with the wand, saying at the same time to his friend who is blindfolded, "On whom does the wand rest?" Strangers to the game will not all at once perceive that the wand is always made to rest on the person who was the last but one to speak, and that it is on account of this arrangement that the blinded person is able to mystify his friends by answering correctly the question, "On whom does the wand rest?"

be taking turns like boys on a sliding pond. They would crawl up to the top of the hill, and then go flying down on to the ice and into a hole caused by the escape of the air. This they repeated continually, and seemed to be enjoying themselves immensely.

Jack was the first to speak. "Isn't

THE QUEER LITTLE ANIMALS THAT SLIDE DOWN-HILL.

BY W. M. CARY.

JACK and his friend Larry were making their way through the woods one winter afternoon to look at a rabbit trap that Jack had set a few days before. As they reached the edge of a little pond they saw something that made them stare at each other with open-eyed astonishment.

At a little distance from them, on a bank slippery as glass, were three small animals which they had never seen before, sliding down-hill on their stomachs, with their short legs stretched straight out behind. They seemed to be taking turns like boys on a sliding pond. They would crawl up to the top of the hill, and then go flying down on to the ice and into a hole caused by the escape of the air. This they repeated continually, and seemed to be enjoying themselves immensely.

At that moment Larry reached out and broke a twig to get a better view of them. It made a loud snapping noise, and away went the three little creatures down the slide into the water, and that was the last to be seen of them.

"Why didn't we shoot them?" said Jack.

"I never thought of it," said Larry.

"Nor I," said Jack, and they both laughed to think how stupid they had been.

"I wonder what they are? We must hurry home, for it is getting late, and tell Grandpa. I have no doubt but that he will be able to tell us all about them."

On reaching home they found the old couple sitting down to tea, not knowing when the boys would be home. They told Grandpa all about it.

"Now what do you call these little animals?" asked Larry.

"Why," said Grandpa, clearing his throat, "they are otters. They must have been young ones that you saw. The old ones grow sometimes to be five or six feet long from the nose to the tip of the tail; but they are very sly and are very difficult to catch. They are very expert swimmers, and are always found where there is plenty of trout and salmon, which they feed upon."

"Old trappers say that they are the wisest of animals, being even more sagacious than the fox. I have trapped them; and disguise your trap as you will, the chances are that they will find it out, and get the bait without springing it. They will sometimes even drag it a considerable distance, chain and all. The young ones are very playful, but the old ones are always on guard to protect them and give the alarm when danger is near."

"Their skins are very valuable, owing to the beauty and fineness of the fur, and the growing scarcity of the animals. Large sums are paid for the skins, which vary in quality, some being much finer than others. Many an otter-skin have I sold, and for a good price, for in my young days they were very plenty in this neighborhood. Get that book upon the shelf there back of the clock; it is very worn, but it will tell you all about the otter family, and to-morrow I will take out my old rusty traps and see if I can't catch one for you."

"WHAT SHALL I DREAM ABOUT, MAMMA?"

BY CHARA BROUGHTON.

"WHAT shall I dream about, mamma?"

"Tell me some lovely and pleasant things."

"A green meadow frosted with daisies white,

Where butterflies flutter on yellow wings.

"Dream of a little brook that lies

Cradled in leaves and mossy stones,

Like a sweet child lying with half-shut eyes,

It smiles and murmurs in low, soft tones.

"Gently its waves o'er the pebbles creep.

And it will dance in the sun's bright beams,

But now—little rogue! he is fast asleep;

May the brooklet murmur all through his dreams!"

A VISIT TO MUSCAT.

BY LIEUTENANT E. W. STURDY, U. S. N.

"HERE we are!" said Captain Fairweather, standing on the quarter-deck, as the ship entered the harbor of Muscat.

"Why, so we are," cried Tom. "I never should have believed it. I thought there were nothing but rocks, and here is a town. But what a funny little harbor!"

As this was said the vessel rounded the great rock, cousin to the one at Gibraltar, and steamed into the cove. A fort on a high cliff commanded one end of the harbor; a fort on an opposite cliff commanded the other end. Back of the town were other fortified towers, so that Muscat bristled with more defenses than one would suppose necessary for the capital of the little Arabian Kingdom of Oman.

"Not a very attractive place," said Captain Fairweather. "It looks to me as though it had been thrown up by an earthquake, and indeed all these rocks are of volcanic origin. They must be between four and five hundred feet high. These precipitous cliffs make the little harbor look smaller than it really is. In fact, it only measures a half-mile one way and a quarter of a mile the other. It is completely open to the north, you see, from where we entered, and when the northwest monsoon blows the sea comes in with great fury. But the harbor is entirely sheltered from every other wind."

"How awfully close together the houses are built, father!"

"Yes, everything seems to have been built with an eye to defense. Look at that wall on the land side strengthened by eight towers. Altogether the Muscatines ought to feel tolerably safe from their enemies."

"When are we going ashore?" asked Tom.

"We might have time for a little stroll now before dark," said the Captain, consulting his watch.

Accordingly father and son were pulled ashore. "I never did see such narrow streets," Tom said. "Try, father, whether you can't touch the walls on each side as you walk along. There! I knew you could. Are all the streets as narrow, I wonder?"

"Yes, so I am told. Let me see—this street should lead to the suburbs. There the streets are wider, but we have not the time to go there to-night. The Beloochees live there in very primitive dwellings, built of sticks and mats. How odd it is to see no horses or mules or camels in the streets! People have to foot it here. Two men can hardly pass each other without jostling."

"The people are all different shades of brown, scarcely two alike. How does that happen?" asked Tom.

"Muscat is made up of half a dozen different nationalities. Besides the Arabs there are Banians from Western India, Beloochees from Mekran, Abyssinians, Somalies, Nubians, and Persians. But I see no white faces thus far."

In fact, the Captain learned afterward that in a population of 40,000 there were but two Europeans, one the Political Agent, and the other a merchant in a large way of business, the agent of the British India Company.

"I must send word to his Highness Sayyid Tookri, the Sovereign of Oman, that we are here," said Captain Fairweather, on their way back to the ship. "I suppose his Highness will ask us to call. Would you like to see him, Tom?"

"Indeed I should," answered the lad.

Information of the ship's arrival was sent to the Sovereign, who immediately appointed an audience for the officers on the following day at four o'clock. The officers were also invited to go over the forts, where preparations were made to receive them, and several native officers ordered to accompany them on their tour of inspection.

Their way led through various business streets, where it was a hard enough matter for them to see their way, these streets being roofed in at a height of some twenty feet by poles or frames, on which were laid mats plastered over with mud. The only light that found its way in was through an occasional hole broken in the mud.

"It is like walking in the catacombs," said Tom, drawing on his imagination, for he had never been in Rome.

"It is not as close as one might expect, however," said his father. "They sprinkle earth and ashes around plentifully, and, besides, the heat of the outside atmosphere causes an upward current through the holes, which ventilates the streets somewhat. But, comfortable or uncomfortable, these people seem to be driving a flourishing trade in their under-ground stalls."

"What a lot of dates one sees, father! they seem to be in every stall."

"Yes, they are one of the chief articles of trade. They sell a great deal of their hulwa besides. Here is some of it," and the Captain bought some, and handed it to Tom to taste.

"It isn't half bad," said Tom. "What is it made of?" The man of whom they bought it replied to this question in broken English: "Not the camel milk," said he. "Some says so, but not so; ghee, dat is butter, sugar, and sesame. Fruit, sir; vegetables? Very fine, sir!"

He was right—they were very fine. Apparently the living in Muscat was good. Every one looked well fed, and clean too. There were no boggars, and, what is more, no squalor.

"Those Arabs look as though they were out on the war-path," remarked Tom, staring about him. "Their girdles are stuck full of pistols and daggers; and there are some fellows armed with guns."

"But there goes the most formidable weapon," said his father, indicating a man standing in front of them. "That sword he carries is a two-handed one, with which an experienced swordsman could actually cut his adversary in two at a blow. The small round shield that man carries over his shoulder is made of rhinoceros hide."

"The Arabs look so slight and thin! Is that the reason they go armed to the teeth?"

"They are formidable swordsmen, I can tell you. What is more, they are all nearly six feet tall, I should say, but they carry very little superfluous flesh. That is the reason they look puny in comparing them, for instance, with the burly negroes who do the rough work of the place."

By this time they had reached the forts, which they examined at their leisure, Tom picking up various scraps of history meanwhile. He learned that Oman had preserved a sort of rude independence since the eighth century. Oman, by-the-way, is about the size of England. It has had to struggle for its existence with the predatory tribes around it from time to time, but it has contrived to hold its own.

Once an English gun-boat was called upon to fire over the town at a crowd of Bedouins who were trying to force an entrance into Muscat for the purpose of sacking it. The shells created great consternation, the Arabs never having seen such missiles before. They thought the shells had eyes which guided them on their mission of destruction. One shell fell in a field, and did not explode. It was immediately surrounded by a crowd of excited Bedouins, who determined to put out the eye (the percussion fuse). They struck the eye with their lances, whereupon the shell exploded, and killed eleven of them on the spot. Then the marauders departed.

On their way back to town they passed rows of dwelling-houses. These were all two stories and sometimes three stories high.

The upper stories were all divided into innumerable openings by long narrow windows, through which the air passed freely. The ground-floors were used as lumber-rooms. The roofs are the bed-chambers.

During the hot season no one can possibly sleep in-doors on account of the stifling heat. When the shamal, or hot wind from the desert, blows over Muscat, the sleepers are watered like plants. In consequence they have muscular rheumatism in Muscat.

Captain Fairweather's party included an intelligent Arab interpreter, who now pointed out to them the Sayyid's palace close at hand.

"Some people call his Highness the Imam of Muscat," said he, "but that is wrong; he is the Sovereign of Oman."

The street in which the palace stood was full of armed men, Arabs and Beloochees, his Highness's body-guard. In answer to the interpreter's knock at a ponderous gate a wicket was opened, and they were invited to enter through a small doorway in the great gate. They found themselves in a court-yard around which the palace was built, a very simple two-storied edifice. To their left, close to the gateway, was a good-sized room, in which reclined a splendid African lion, his apartment being barred off from the court.

The royal brute regarded the strangers with a certain dignified curiosity.

"He is here to awaken emotions of awe in the visitor's breast, I suppose," said Tom's father. "From one king to another, eh?"

Perhaps in order to heighten the same impression, a leopard occupied a cage in the centre of the court-yard. The animal kingdom was furthermore represented by eight or ten Arab mares of great beauty and value; their groomers lay about them on the pavement, looking comparatively insignificant.

The ascent to the audience-chamber was sufficiently primitive—a large ladder with a hand-rail. At the top of this Tom and his friends found themselves in a sort of whitewashed antechamber, in which half a dozen Arabs were standing. One of the most unpretending of these, advancing, held out his hand.

His costume was of the simplest; unlike the others, he wore a white skull-cap instead of a turban—and this was his Highness himself.

He shook hands with the party, and then himself ushered them into the next room, the hall of audience. This was also a plain whitewashed room, with a row of chairs ranged against one side, in front of which a small carpet was laid. His Highness motioned them to sit on the chairs, and then seated himself on a sofa a little apart. There was no carpet in front of him; he put his sandalled feet on a small bed about four feet long by three feet wide, and made of common bed-ticking.

Thus seated at ease, he conversed through the interpreter.

He looked about thirty-five years of age, and was tall and spare like most Arabs. His manner was grave and dignified, his expression melancholy. Tom said to himself that no sovereign could possibly be more unassuming.

"I am very glad to welcome you to Muscat," said his Highness, in substance. "I hope you are well, and that the climate will agree with you. Our weather is called very hot, but after all it is as healthy as in most places. I understand you are making a voyage around the world. I am extremely interested in foreign countries, especially in Russia and Turkey. I shall be very glad to obtain fresh information in regard to them."

Upon this suggestion Captain Fairweather began to describe points of interest in the countries named. Sayyid Toorki listened attentively, asked questions here and there, and showed himself remarkably well-informed on topics of general interest.

While the conversation was in progress coffee was handed around. Some minutes later orgeat was offered the guests—a preparation of almonds, sugar, and water.

When they arose to depart, his Highness accompanied them to the outer room, where they found the Governor of the town in waiting, and the Prince himself presented his visitors to the officers, including Tom, who tried his best to be equal to the dignity of the situation.

Finally Sayyid Toorki shook hands all around once more, and so the interesting interview ended.

"What a melancholy looking man for a King," said Tom, as he stepped through the little doorway in the big gate, and out again on the street filled with Arabs.

"He has had a hard time," Captain Fairweather replied. "No wonder he is melancholy. His father was murdered by his elder brother, and he himself spent two years in exile in Bombay before the opportunity came for fighting his brother for the kingdom. He was considered the most daring soldier in Arabia during the warfare which ended in placing him on the throne. Now, however, he is mildness personified. In fact, he seems to lack the qualities necessary for controlling the turbulent and for organizing Oman."

"You have four seasons in your country; we have only two here," said the interpreter to Tom, as they were getting into the boats. "We have a cool one, and a hot one, which will come on presently. Then the heat will be something fearful. The nights are as hot as the days, for these black rocks of ours never cool off; no furnace could be hotter during the whole twenty-four hours."

"I begin to think there is no place like home," Tom remarked, as they pulled off to the ship.

"Then you wouldn't change places with the Sovereign of Oman?"

"Indeed I wouldn't. I feel very sorry for the poor fellow."

N A N.*

BY MRS. LUCY C. LILLIE,

AUTHOR OF "MILDRED'S BARGAIN," "AUNT RUTH'S TEMPTATION," ETC.

CHAPTER XXIII.

THE next few weeks passed very rapidly. Nan had not only to think of her changes in Miller Street, who were certainly thriving, but preparations for Phyllis's birthday were going on in a very elaborate and exciting manner. A great deal of secrecy was required in the doings at the carriage-house, where there were now daily rehearsals, Nan performing the part of the Captive, and Laura that of the Knight.

There was some difficulty in making Dieksie, who was the Knight's intimate friend, conduct himself satisfactorily, as he was so exceedingly anxious to see and hear everything that was going on between his own parts that his curly head was constantly popping in; and when on one occasion it was necessary for him to appear in disguise—wrapped in some thick cloak or muffling—he absolutely refused to put anything around him but an old Nottingham lace curtain, through which, of course, every line and feature were ridiculously apparent.

Joan, as the Magician, was very terrible, especially when at one thrilling part she had to produce some music, which she did in a most extraordinary manner on a comb. She insisted upon Nan's telling her how Mrs. Landor had moved and walked, feeling sure she ought to get some "hiits" for her own performance; and Nan went into wild fits of laughter over Joan's grimaceings and daneings when the final discovery is made that the Captive is the Magician's dearly beloved niece.

There was some difficulty in arranging for the appearance of the Captive's relations, when summoned by the Magician; but here the back window came into use, Lance offering, as he said, to "shove" them in. Bertie and Alfred represented these shadowy forms, and Lance made a frame-work, on which some pink tarlatan was stretched, and behind which the Captive's relations looked a little more ghostly than they had during the first rehearsals. But it was certainly an anxious moment when the Magician said,

"Arise, spirits of the house of Gondulfo" and a scrambling noise, suppressed laughter, and labored breathing were heard outside, with such whispered remarks as, "I say, Lance, you're pinching me!" and "O-o-oh, that's too tight!" and a very heated and panting personage would half tumble into the little space between the curtain and the pink tarlatan screen, while the Magician, with his back to the audience, played wildly on his comb, and the Captive seemed in a half-fainting condition. However, the children found a great deal of enjoyment from the rehearsals; and when Phyllis's birthday dawned their anxiety and excitement were scarcely less than if they were to appear before a real audience.

Lance wrote out formal invitations to Miss Rolf and Miss Prior, who highly disapproved of the whole thing, to Mrs. Heriot and Mrs. Travers, and David and the Blakes. Besides their home party half a dozen young friends were invited; and the morning of the performance was spent in decorating the carriage house with boughs and trailing vines. Lance and Nan had contrived to make a very pretty banner, with Phyllis's name on it, which they hung directly above the stage.

"I say, Lance," said Dieksie, as if a wonderfully happy thought had occurred to him, "let's put on it 'In memory of her thirtieth birthday!'"

"Hold your little tongue," laughed Lance, from the top of the step-ladder. "Fancy Phyllis's look on reading such a thing! Come here, Laura, will you, just for one moment?"

Laura was in the little dressing-room they had contrived at one side, and Lance, from his perch among the greens, could look directly down upon her. Nan, at his side, could do the same, and, for some reason she could not define, a strange feeling—like distrust—swept across Nan's mind.

Laura was on her knees under one of the little windows. Before her, on a chair, was the looking-glass which they had borrowed from one of the bedrooms, and she was trying the effect of various glittering ornaments on the helmet she was to wear as the Knight.

They were cheap things; yet it was strange, when every detail of their costumes had been so openly discussed, that Laura should feel it necessary to go off by herself with something new to decide upon. The ornaments were lying in an open paper on her lap. Nan never forgot just what they looked like.

Laura started, and looked around up through the aperture where now only Nan's wistful face was discernible, Lance being occupied with some critical piece of his work. She saw Nan looking at her, and colored scarlet and jumped up, wrapping the paper jealously around the trinkets, and putting them with rather a defiant air into her pocket.

"Lance wants you," said Nan, wondering why her own voice sounded so low and constrained.

Laura came out very quickly, and busied herself for a few moments with handing Lance what he wanted. When Nan descended from the ladder, she said, carelessly,

* Begun in No. 157, HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE.

"I was just seeing how some things I got—at—school would look on my helmet."

"Why," said Nan, "I thought you said the other day that school was all over."

"Well, school-girls aren't!" exclaimed Laura, positively angry. "I meant—the girls—"

Nan could not possibly have told why an atmosphere that was curious and painful seemed to hang about the rest of that morning. Not all of Lance's fun nor Joan's grinning and dancing could dispel it; and she was much relieved when Lance proposed her walking with him down to the Blakes'. He said he was afraid Love would be too shy to come, and they had better go and urge it.

"Oh no," said Nan, quickly; "Love isn't like that, Lance—she is shy, but it isn't just that way. She and I have long talks, and she only gets shy sometimes when she is giving me her advice about anything."

Still Lance insisted upon the walk; and when they were well on their way, going along the river-bank leading to the boat-house, he stopped suddenly, and said:

"Nan, I feel lately as if something queer had come over Laura. Can you think what it is?"

Nan felt more strongly than anything else a desire to do Laura the very fullest justice, and she went too far in saying: "Oh, Lance, what could there be? You know Phyllis has lately had to send for Dr. Rogers for her. She seems to be 'running down,' he said."

Lance put his lips together and drew up his eyebrows in the way Nan had learned to know meant annoyance or perplexity with him.

"It isn't that," he said, shortly; and Nan was relieved to find he let the subject drop.

The cousins found Love with her sleeves rolled up, and her plump hands busy making cake. They went around by the side door, and Love nodded to them brightly through the vines across her kitchen window. How cool and sweet and bright it all looked! was what both Lance and Nan thought; and Love, in her clean gingham dress, with a dainty apron, was the personification of what you would call a "nice" little maiden.

She was evidently pleased by their coming, and promised not to fail in her attendance at the play, with Mrs. Travers and little David. Lance wanted to linger for a chat with old Blake. Nan hurried him, but not before Love had whispered, "I'm going to wear my silk dress!"

"Oh, Lance!" exclaimed Nan, with glowing eyes, as they left the cottage, "isn't it worth anything to be able to make people happy as Aunt Letty can with her money? How can rich people ever keep their money to themselves?"

Lance did not tell his little cousin, but he had begun to learn a great many lessons from her.

What Lance had said of Laura took deeper root in Nan's mind than she would have allowed. It was eleven o'clock when they got back to College Street, and her first thought was to see Laura; but she was upstairs, Joan said, from behind the scenes, and on going to her door Nan found it locked.

A cold lunch was prepared for the children, and Phyllis begged of them to eat it promptly.

"Now, Nan, Lance, Dickie," she called out from the second landing on the stairs, "do come down. You must remember all there is to be done to-day and this evening besides." For in the evening Phyllis was to have a "grown-up" party, at which the children had, one and all, permission to assist.

Down scurried the children, full of delightful excitement, even Laura looking a little brighter as they assembled in the dining-room where Phyllis, never to be flurried or put out of temper, quietly dispensed bread and butter and cakes and cold meat.

After this came the rush to the carriage-house, the doors of which were now resplendent with large sheets of paper bearing in red paint the following words:

THE CAPTIVE AND THE KNIGHT
A MAGICAL PLAY
IN TWO ACTS
BY MISS LAURA ROLF
IN HONOR OF
THE BIRTHDAY OF
MISS PHYLLIS ROLF
AT
Two o'clock.

The barn doors were flung open at the appointed time; the guests were assembled in a few moments, and the play began.

Joan was quite the success of the piece; Laura was too conscious, Nan too much given to bursts of laughter quite out of keeping with a Princess in captivity; and the usual scurrilities took place with the spirits of the Princess's relations. One horrible moment occurred when Bertie, being flung too violently into the window, upset the pink screen, and called out,

"There, Lance, I told you I would!" This produced a laugh, of course, but it was quelled by a most awful look from Joan, who, as the Magician, had painted her face in a way which made her expression very unpleasant, and certainly had the desired effect upon the laughing audience when she turned it toward them.

The play ended, the children who had looked on remained outside waiting for the Rolfs to appear. Nan dashed into the dressing-room to enjoy a good laugh. She found Laura hastily putting away the ornaments which had decked her helmet and flowing cloak.

"Oh, why do you take them off?" exclaimed Nan.

"Because I want to!" snapped Laura. She was dressed first and hurried out. Nan was just folding up the last of her stage finery, when she saw one of Laura's ornaments on the floor. She picked it up, thinking how vexed her cousin would be to lose even one of the pretty things; but when she went out into the barn Laura had vanished. Nan put it into her pocket until she should find her cousin; but an hour later had forgotten all about it. How much reason she had to regret it later!

"YE" AND "Æ."

BY GEORGE CARY EGGLESTON.

IT is a favorite practice of persons who give entertainments for churches and Sunday-schools to dress themselves like their great-grandfathers and great-grandmothers, and to give an "Olde Folkes" concert. In their advertisements, as all the boys and girls have probably observed, they always spell in an old-fashioned way, and use the word "ye" instead of "the."

Perhaps some of you who read this have asked why this is done, and it is pretty safe to say that not many of you have had a satisfactory answer. The most that people generally know about the matter is that our great-grandfathers nearly always wrote "ye" for "the," and "yt" for "that." And yet the explanation is very simple. In Anglo-Saxon, the language from which English came, there were two letters each representing the sound which we represent by th. One of these letters was β , and the other δ . Originally one of them had the sound of th in the word "thin," and the other the sound of th in the word "that"; but gradually this distinction was lost, and people used either letter to represent either sound. For a long time after English took the place of Anglo-Saxon, people continued to use one of the old letters instead of th, and gradually the shape of the letter changed till it came to look like y. Then people got to using y in its place. But in writing "ye" they did not think of calling the word "ye"; they called it "the," just as we do, because the y meant th, and not y at all.

Another question that most boys and girls have asked without getting an answer is, Where did we get the character "&"? It is not a letter, and it stands for a word of three letters. But we have other words of three letters which are just as much entitled to be represented by a character as "and" is, and the puzzling thing is that we have a character to take the place of "and," but none to stand for "but," "the," "man," "boy," "for," etc. I never could read this riddle; but one day I asked the poet Mr. William Cullen Bryant about it, and he gave me the explanation at once. Let me see if I can make it plain with type.

All my readers know that the letters etc. stand for the two Latin words "et" and "cetera," which mean "and the rest," the word "et" meaning "and." Now about the time that our great-grandfathers played shimmy at school, people were fond of odd tricks and conceits in writing. They were so fond of making anagrams out of people's names that sometimes judges did it while trying cases. It was natural enough that people so fond of conceits should fall into the habit of writing certain short and familiar words backward, and many of them, instead of "and," used the Latin word "et," but they wrote it backward, thus—et

Look at it as thus written, and you will see at once that our modern character "&" is only a modified form of "et" written in that way. But "et" with e after it is the regular abbreviation of "et cetera," and so "&c.," which we commonly read "and so forth," is simply "etc." with the "et" written backward.

REG.

BY MATTHEW WHITE, JUN.

CHAPTER II.

"OH, my!" exclaimed Reg, under his breath, as fresco and gilding, velvets and mirrors, flashed their combined charms into his eyes.

Then he looked nervously about him, half expecting to feel a hand on his shoulder, and hear a stern voice ordering him out. But no one seemed to notice him, and with feet sinking noiselessly into the heavy carpet, Reg crept around by the wall toward the stage.

"I wonder if they always let boys into theatres for nothing?" wondered Reg, as he stood still for a minute to stare at the score or so of men with their hats on who sat chatting and laughing together in the middle of the parquette.

Then he caught sight of the private box directly in front of him, with its door ajar, through which he had such an enchanting vision of soft cushions, dainty curtains, and shining gilt lattice-work that he was seized with an irresistible impulse to enter and rest his weary limbs for at least an instant in one of the velvet-lined arm-chairs.

Somehow it seemed to him as if he had suddenly found his way to fairy-land, for the memory of Aunt Susan and of his own homeless condition had faded from his mind, and when he had curled himself up in a corner of the luxurious box, the buzz of conversation in the parquette gradually appeared to change into the humming of the bees on—the—farm—at—home.

Reg's ideas came very slowly now; he was so tired, the arm-chair was so comfortable, and the curtained proscenium box such a glorious spot in which to have pleasant dreams that not a word did Reg hear of the auction sale of seats for the first appearance of a famous singer, except as the auctioneer's monotonous tones may have merged themselves into the whizzing of the train bound for the pantomime, in which the sleeping boy imagined himself to be rushing along on a level with the second-story windows.

"Wh-e-w! By all the white mice, what—are—you—a-doing—here?" and as each word of the last sentence was emphasized by a shake that fairly made Reg's teeth rattle, he was soon wide awake enough to be able to answer the question.

Instead of doing so, however, he cried out: "Let me go!" and breaking loose from his persecutor, who was a lad of about sixteen, with a red face and dirty hands, he sprang out of the box and straight into the arms of a gentleman who was just coming down the aisle.

"Hello! what does this mean, Danderby?" exclaimed the latter, as he plumped Reg down into one of the parquette chairs, and held him there with a hand on each shoulder.

"Mean, sir?" returned the call boy, hurrying forward. "It's the meanest piece of business that—"

"Oh, come now, Dan, I've no time to listen to any of your jokes. Where did this boy come from?" and Mr. Wellington Smith, junior manager of the theatre, tapped Reg on the head with a snap of the fingers, as if he were a piece of furniture.

"Why, sir, he come out of the box there. Didn't you see—I mean, feel him?"

Perhaps this last effort at wit on the part of Master Dan Danderby would have resulted unpleasantly for that young man had not Reg at that moment attracted Mr. Smith's entire attention to himself by making several desperate efforts to throw the hands off his shoulders, and during the struggle for mastery between the two Dan hurried off to attend to urgent duties behind the scenes.

"Well, well, young fellow, you've quite a deal of muscle, haven't you? It does you credit; but still I think you'd better keep it in reserve;" and Mr. Smith pinioned Reg's arms to his sides, while he took his station in front of him, with his back braced against the next row of seats. "Now, sir," he continued, "answer two or three questions I am going to put to you, and perhaps I will let you off easier than you think for. How did you get into that box?"

Reg had by this time resigned himself to whatever fate awaited him; so, clearing all traces of a sob from his voice, he replied, frankly, "If you please, sir, I walked right in from the street; nobody asked me for a ticket, and I only wanted to take a peep."

"But it strikes me as a queer way of getting 'only a peep,' when you take possession of a private box as if you had paid for it. I suppose you were hiding there until evening, when you hoped to see the show for nothing."

"No, sir; I never thought of that. I was asleep."

"You were asleep, eh?"

Then there was a pause in the strange interview, during which Mr. Wellington Smith stood off in the aisle, though still keeping a clutch on Reg's jacket, and stared at the boy from head to foot, exactly as if he were measuring him in his mind's eye for a suit of clothes. And this is just what he was doing.

It was a queer sight, only these two in the great auditorium, which was now only lighted by a solitary gas jet here and there, while on the stage carpenters and scene-shifters were going about their work of constructing a royal palace for the abode of the Twin Princes, which was the name of the "brilliant new spectacular drama" to be produced that evening. Reg watched them in a dreamy sort of way, wondering if Phil Fairlock knew that stage marble was only stretches of painted canvas, which flopped about flimsily while it was being put up.

"Where do you live, boy?"

This question was asked in a tone of voice so much pleasanter than the one in which the gentleman had previously spoken that Reg looked up at him curiously, as he answered, "At Broadfarms, sir."

"Then what are you doing here in New York alone?"

"I'm lost."

On hearing this Mr. Smith made Reg move on a seat, and himself taking possession of the vacated one he put his arm about the boy, and asked him to tell the whole story.

Reg obeyed, quite melted at the sympathy expressed for him, which made the memory of Aunt Susan's blunt ways seem terribly cruel by contrast. It was this idea of her, as he sobbingly told of the smack and the push, that he gave to Mr. Wellington Smith, who muttered: "Good!" when the little tale of woe was finished, and then asked Reg what his name was.

"Reginald Robinson, eh? Would look well on the bills if we dared put it there." Then to Reg: "Well, Reginald, will you trust to me to take care of you until we can find this aunt of yours, or think of some plan of sending you back to Broadfarms? It may take some time, a day or two at least, and meanwhile you can repay me for my trouble by becoming a Prince."

Reg stared.

"I mean," explained Mr. Smith, "by taking the part of one of the Twin Princes in the new piece to be produced to-night. They neither of them have to say a word, and Billy and Sammy Tinburn were to do the characters, but Sammy's broke out with the mumps, and as you're just about his size, I think his costume will fit you nicely; so if you'll be so obliging as to consent to the bargain, I'll teach you your part as quick as you can say 'Jack Robinson,' or 'Reg Robinson' either," and the manager laughed gayly at his joke, as he patted Reg affectionately on the shoulder.

Go on the stage himself, and be a prince, in silk tights and velvet doublets, like the pictures of heroes in the story-books! Reg thought this must be but a continuation of his dream; but whatever it was, he resolved not to let slip the golden opportunity offered him. So with his face all aglow he fairly cried:

"Oh, yes, sir; I'll do whatever you say; but do you think I can act? I never was in a theatre before in my life."

"So much the better," replied Mr. Smith. "You'll be all the more natural, and won't have any bad habits to be broken of. Now come with me;" and taking Reg by the hand he led the way down the sloping floor, around by a narrow passageway, and so on to the stage, which was cold and cheerless enough, with its bare brick walls and strong draughts blowing back and forth between the stacks of scenery.

"First of all," began Mr. Smith, briskly, as he preceded Reg down some very dirty stairs, ending in a dismal black space cut up with trap-doors, machines for shooting people up with a bounce, and feather-beds for catching them when they came head-first down again—"first of all, we must try on the suit;" and opening one of a number of doors on either side, he lit the gas and introduced Reg into one of the general dressing-rooms for men.

Tights, cloaks, caps, swords, belts, daggers, wigs, and pistols were scattered everywhere, but this apparent confusion did not seem to cause the manager much trouble, for after rooting about on the floor, through a closet or two, and along a row of hooks, he presently held up a pretty little blue cloak, slashed with silver, a velvet cap of the same color with a feather sticking jauntily out of one side, a pair of spotless white tights, a tiny sword, silk stockings, pumps with blue bows—in short, the complete outfit of a young prince of the olden time.

In this dazzling costume, then, he assisted Reg to array himself, all the while rapidly explaining what would be required of him in the character.

Reg had a generous supply of the imitative faculty in his composition, and by the time the sword was buckled on and the cap placed atop of his powdered wig, he was able to strut up and down the dressing-room with a very fair copy of the princely stride set him by Mr. Smith.

If he had not forgotten all about Aunt Susan in his wildly excited state, he would have wondered if she could have it's a risky thing to let you appear without giving you a regular rehearsal with the company, but as long as you don't have a word to say, and seem to take to the clothes so naturally, I don't see but what you'll do every bit as well as Sammy himself. But mind, if you speak or laugh while on the stage, you may know what to expect;" and Mr. Smith's black brows met in a frown terrible enough to frighten any boy into a promise of the strictest obedience.

"Half past five! What a piece of luck that I should stumble over you just in the nick of time!" continued the young manager, as he assisted Reg to disrobe without ripping any seams. "I suppose we could easily have found a boy to take Sam's place; but then I don't fancy having any little ragamuffin from the streets fill the rôle of a prince. You, now, have quite an aristocratic air about you, a royal glance of the eye, so to speak;" and with like pieces of flattery artful Mr. Smith proceeded to feed the mind of poor, silly Reg until they ascended to the stage again.

"Now let me see, what shall we do for you in the matter of board and lodging? I'd like you to be with Billy as much as possible before the performance, so suppose we try and get Mrs. Timburn to keep you until we hear from your aunt? I think Billy told me that they'd sent Sammy out into the country somewhere, so you can just step into his place. This way;" and Reg was conducted by his new acquaintance through a damp winding brick passage, and out by the dingy stage-door into a side street, along which Mr. Smith led the way until they came within sight of the river; then entering the ill-smelling hallway of a tenement house, he preceded Reg up three flights of worn stairs, and knocked at the door of a back room.

A woman whose bared arms held a screaming baby opened it. As soon as she caught sight of Mr. Smith she dropped an awkward courtesy, and then looked curiously at Reg, who in turn stared with round eyes at the wash-tub, cooking-stove, bed, and other like articles with which the room was crowded. In a very few words the manager explained what he wanted done, adding that he would pay Mrs. Timburn the same price for boarding Reg as he would have given Sammy had he appeared in the play.

This offer the woman was only too glad to accept; and with a hasty "Good-by—remember, seven sharp," Mr. Smith hurried off, leaving Reg alone with the fat Irish woman, and the mixed odor of soap-suds and onions.

recognized him, as, standing before the cracked looking-glass, he practiced a gracious waving of the hand and the correct style of a royal bow. Indeed, he scarcely knew himself, and when his face came to be "touched up a little" for the performance, Mr. Smith declared that he would almost be ready to believe that he was either the real Prince Budaway or else "Master Cecil Scotrini," poor Sammy Timburn's stage name, as it was printed on the programmes.

"Good! good!" cried the delighted junior manager, applauding softly, as Reg, with stately tread, walked to and fro in front of him, as proud as a peacock. "I know

HARE AND HOUNDS.

BY SHERWOOD RYSE.

EVERY boy who has read that delightful book Tom Brown's School Days will recall with pleasure the spirited description of the celebrated "Crick" run, which, after an existence of perhaps half a century, still holds its place as one of the greatest triumphs of school-boy life in England. The famous old school at Rugby was indeed the birth-place of the sport of hare and hounds, as it was also of the modern game of foot-ball. Both sports have grown, and spread themselves over the English-speaking world, because they are manly, invigorating, and delightful pastimes for those who would harden their sinews, strengthen their lungs, and build up for themselves men's bodies to do men's nobler work in the battle of life.

The desire for fame in the matter of "records" has in some clubs caused one of the principal pleasures of this mimic chase to be lost sight of. It is a common thing nowadays for a club to run over well-known trails, the distance of which is known within a few yards, thus changing the character of the sport from a "chase" to a "steeple-chase." This is certainly a mistake. The run should be over a line of country unknown, except in a general way, to both hares and hounds. Who does not know the tediousness of the road that is often traversed, and the attractions of a ramble along by-paths whose every turn brings the explorer face to face with something new and unexpected? Even in the middle of a hard run the influence of novelty is felt, and the unknown has always a charm for adventurous youth.

The "meet" should be at some friend's gate, or at some retired though easily found spot, such as a place where roads cross each other.

"Here on this verdant spot, where Nature kind
With double blessings crowns the farmer's hopes,
Where flowers autumnal spring, and the rank mead
Affords the wandering hares a rich repast,
Throw off thy ready pack."

So sings the English poet of the chase. To be sure, the hares in our case would prefer to find their "rich repast" at their own tables rather than in the "rank mead"; nor should the repast on a hunting morning be too rich. Nevertheless, the quotation is apt, for the pleasant surroundings of the meet will give a cheerful color to the whole day.

Both the hares (of whom there should be two, for companionship's sake) and the hounds should be suitably dressed in flannel shirts or boating Jerseys, old trousers tucked into the stockings, and stout well-fitting boots. Those of the hounds who have not yet arrived at the dignity of "long pants" will do well to wear their thick winter stockings, since the trail will lead them "through brake, through brier"; and the stouter the stocking, the bolder the defiance of the clinging blackberry thorn.

One of the best runners should be "Master of the Hounds," and it will be his duty to lead the others, and to "pick up" the "scent" when it has been lost. About the middle and end of the line of hounds—and it is surprising to find how long a line it becomes before even the first mile is run—should be two steady, long-winded runners, whose duty it is to keep careless hounds on the scent, and to encourage those whose courage begins to cool down as they find their "first wind" deserting them.

Only the Master should carry a horn; and it should be a real brass hunting-horn,

"Whose clanging voice
Awakes the mountain echo in her cell."

The universal Fourth-of-July fish-horn is at best a disagreeable instrument, whose only title to respect lies in the patriotic sentiments that it is supposed to express. The Master should use his horn sparingly, so that when it is blown it may mean something. Its principal use is to call the hounds on to the scent when the Master, in skirting the field or exploring the wood, has found it.

Each of the two hares carries a bag filled with white paper cut into long strips. This is the scent, or trail. It can be cut by the hares and hounds of idle evenings; but it would be a pity to waste so much paper, unless it be old newspaper, when almost any quantity of it, that would otherwise be sent to the paper-mill, can be had for a trifle—some two or three cents a pound—at a printer's or book-binder's. The best kind of bag is one of canvas, shaped like a pillow-case, but much smaller than an ordinary pillow-case. At the two corners on the long side should be two broad straps made of leather or canvas. These should be carried round the hare's back, over the right shoulder, and buckled in front, the bag being carried under the left arm, with the open end forward. A tape should be run through a hem, so that the bag may be closed when it is being carried to the meet, or when the hare who is carrying it does not want to use his scent—which sometimes happens, as we shall soon see.

The hares should be allowed a start, or "law," as it is called, according to the proposed length of the run. For an ordinary run of four or five miles ten minutes' law would be quite enough. As soon as they are out of sight the hares begin to throw out the scent, and if they are fairly good runners they should have put at least a mile between themselves and their pursuers before the Master blows his horn and puts his pack on the scent.

Let us "run with the hare" a little before we "hunt with the hounds." Though not so crafty an animal as the fox, the human hare may resort to a few wiles in order to defeat his pursuers. Should he have reason to think that the hounds are pressing him, he may "double on his tracks"—that is, he may run back over the same line—and when he comes to a convenient fence he may strike off again at right angles. Thus he gives his pursuers some little trouble to find the trail. Another little dodge is sometimes practiced late in a run. One of the hares skirts two sides of a large field, scattering the scent as he runs, while the other walks leisurely in a straight line to meet his friend at the corner, and throws down no scent the while. A little later, and the one who has had his two or three minutes' breathing-spell starts off to lay the scent around the field, while his companion walks across. As the hounds must follow the scent, the hares have gained a distinct advantage by this manoeuvre. These dodges, however, while they are perfectly lawful, should not be indulged in too frequently, as they are apt to put the hounds in a bad temper, and one cross hound may, like "one black sheep," spoil the pack. Before leaving the hares it may be said that if they can keep ahead of their pursuers they should so arrange their course that they will arrive at some point known to all, and not too far from home, so that the stragglers may know whither to make their way. It is sometimes convenient to run in a circle and "kill your hare" at the same spot whence you started in pursuit of him. Thus the hounds may put on their jackets without delay, and so run no risk of taking cold.

And now, when the fleeing hares have been making good use of their ten minutes' law, the impatient hounds are anxiously looking over the shoulder of the Master, who, with watch in hand, calls off the minutes as they crawl by—"Five minutes. Eight. Nine. Time's up!" He shuts his watch with a snap, and,

"Hark! hark! the merry horn calls, Come away!"

The Master, with his eager pack close at his heels, leads the way to the gap in the fence through which the hares disappeared from view, and they all plunge headlong into the piece of woods. A blast from the horn is the signal that the trail is found; the pace is quickened, and even thus early in the chase the breathing becomes short and hard. Never fear; but a few rods more and you will catch your "second wind"—in other words, your lungs will have become accustomed to the work demanded of them—and you will feel as if you could run forever. This second wind is one of the delights of athletics. It brings with it the consciousness of strength and endurance, while the lungs act so easily and regularly that the work seems to be done almost without effort, and entirely without discomfort.

But even second wind blows itself away after a while, especially when the trail leads up stony hill-sides or through heavy undergrowth, where there are many fences to be climbed, gates to be vaulted, or drains to be jumped; and the cunning hares will lead you over as many of such obstacles as they can. Then comes the true test of a good wind—then the regret for that extra slice of pumpkin pie last night, for those buckwheat cakes which it seemed a shame to pass by without eating freely of them this morning. Pie, cakes, candy, cocoa-nuts, and many other things beginning with a "c" are not a good preparation for hares or hounds when a meet is announced. But when the day's work and fun are over—when you have captured your hare or run him close, and have taken your bath, briskly rubbing yourself down afterward with a rough towel until you feel like a new boy—then you will have such an appetite as will make light of roast beef and pumpkin pie, or whatever else the good people at home have provided for their hungry hunter. And as between the mouthfuls you hunt your hare over again for the entertainment of the family, some of whom may have been present to see the start, and recount with busy tongue the mishaps and triumphs of the chase, you will feel no envy of the hunter with his horse and hounds, and will wish for nothing except, when the clock tolls forth the lengthening hours—except that perhaps you may wish it was permitted for a boy to go to bed without undressing, when he is very, very sleepy.

There are other rewards to be won in a hare and hounds chase besides the fun, and the excitement, and the fatigue, and the grateful long night's sleep that follows. In many clubs a handsome prize, such as a silver cup or a hunting-horn, is the reward of him who comes in first; and the young winner may well regard the trophy with pleasure and pride, for it is no mean thing to be the swiftest and most "plucky" among one's fellows. Nevertheless, a prize is not necessary to the enjoyment of the sport, and doubtless the most delightful runs in your experience will be those in which there has been no other reward at the end than the satisfaction of knowing that you have had a good time, and have done your best.

A FIGHT WITH A BIG SNAKE ON THE AMAZON.

BY DAVID KER.

"NOW, Professor, tell us a story," said one of our party, as we clustered after dinner upon the veranda of one of the prettiest little country houses in Venezuela, and watched the moon rising above the feathery palms that crowned the opposite ridge.

"Well, I think you must have heard most of mine by this time," said the person addressed, who, with his light linen jacket, brawny chest, and bluff sunburned face half buried in a huge red beard, looked as little like a professor as he could well do. "However, I don't think I have ever told you my adventure at Terra Calente, and if it serves as a warning to my friend Smith yonder not to fall asleep at the wrong time, I shall not have suffered in vain.

"Three or four years ago I was upon one of the forks of the Upper Amazon, having gone there to try if I couldn't manage to add to my collection a specimen or two of a rare bird that was said to haunt those parts. The house at which I was staying belonged to an old Brazilian friend of mine, who had a plantation there, which he called Terra Calente.

"Now 'Terra Calente' means 'hot earth,' and if he'd tried for a week he couldn't have found a better name for it. I'd seen India, and I'd seen the West Coast of Africa, but compared with this place they were a mere joke. Every time I went out I came back like a lump of molasses candy wrapped in paper; and the night was every bit as bad as the day. Even the negroes seemed to feel it; and as for my host, Señor Valdez, he never stirred out from morning till night.

"I could see that he thought me no end of a fool for taking so much trouble about a few birds, especially as I didn't mean to eat them. However, he was very indulgent to my 'folly,' good fellow, and let me have the use of his guns, mules, negroes, and what not, whenever I liked to ask for them.

"But I soon saw that my only chance of getting what I wanted was to go alone, for the negroes kept up such a jabbering all the time that they frightened away every bird for a hundred yards round. It was no use telling 'em to be quiet, for they couldn't do it if they tried; so I made up my mind to try my luck single-handed, and early one morning I took a canoe and started up the river by myself.

"You've been in the tropical forests yourselves, boys, so you can guess what a pretty concert I had to listen to just at first, from the roar of the jaguar down to the screeching of the parrots and the chattering of the monkeys. But as the sun mounted, and the day grew hotter, all this uproar died away, and a silence came down upon the whole forest that seemed to weigh on one like a nightmare. Everything seemed to be asleep at once. The great banner-like leaves of the fan-palms and bananas drooped lazily on the hot, moist air, the thick brown water of the river looked as if it were standing quite still between its low, muddy banks, the great mass of forest in the background was silent as death, and far overhead a few white clouds were floating dreamily upon the warm rich blue of the tropical sky as if they were sleeping too.

"If I hadn't had to paddle against the stream, I almost think I should have gone to sleep myself, but all at once I caught sight of something that fetched me up broad awake in a moment.

"Right in front of me, not fifty yards off, one of the very birds that I'd been hunting for so long in vain was sitting on a projecting bough, motionless as a statue. I pushed up the stream toward it, holding my breath, and moving my paddles as gingerly as if there was a box of nitro-glycerine at the end of each, till I was quite sure of my shot, and then I let fly, and brought it down, and had it snug in the boat almost before the echo of the shot had done ringing.

"Having got what I wanted, I drew in my paddles, and let my canoe float down stream again. But I soon found myself getting so sleepy, with the heat and with the long pull I'd had, that I was afraid of napping off altogether, and floating right past the house without knowing it. So I ran my boat in under the shade of a huge 'locust wood,' jammed the bow firmly among the enormous reeds, which were higher than a man on horseback, and without ever thinking what a fearful risk I was running, fell fast asleep.

"Then I had a very queer dream. I dreamed that I was an Eastern king, sitting on a great high throne, and a lion standing before me with a bootjack between his paws trying to pull my boots off. But Mr. Lion naturally handled his instrument rather clumsily, and joggled my foot to and fro so awkwardly that at last I awoke with a start.

"I've had one or two pretty bad frights in my time, but nothing like that moment. The first thing I saw was the head of a monstrous boa-constrictor (the rest of it was hidden by the reeds), licking my foot, preparatory, as it instantly flashed upon me, to swallowing me whole.

"For an instant I was so scared that I couldn't even think, but just lay still and looked at the creature. But there was no time to be lost. I knew that if I startled the snake it would attack me at once, so, keeping my foot as still as I could, for my flesh was fairly creeping with disgust at the brute's slimy touch, I felt for my gun. By good luck I was so placed—with my back against the side of the boat—that I could fire without getting up. I let fly, and hit it full in the head.

"Instantly it reared up in the air with a horrible sharp hiss, showing enough of its length to let me see what an enormous size it must be. Quick as lightning, I seized the paddles, and shot down the stream like a rocket, looking back just in time to see that the boa must be hard hit, for the blood was dropping fast from its head.

"When I got home with the news, old Valdez jumped up like a boy, for he hated all big snakes mortally ever since one had killed his favorite horse some years before. He ordered out his negroes, got down his big Spanish trabuco (blunderbuss), which would throw half a dozen balls at once, and away we went.

"It was easy to find the spot again, the tree under which I'd slept being the tallest anywhere near, and the serpent had left us traces enough in the crushed reeds and the red stains upon them. Suddenly one of the negroes jumped back with a halloo. Instantly there came a crash among the reeds, and a thud like a sail flapping in the wind, and down went poor Sambo, squealing and roaring, with his shoulder-blade broken by a whack of the snake's tail.

"This, however, was the old fellow's last exploit, for while another negro smashed his tail with a club, I dosed him with two charges of buckshot, and Valdez gave him all the bullets in the blunderbuss, and he couldn't well do less than die after all that. When we came to measure him, he was a little over thirty-seven feet in length without the head. Valdez had him stuffed and hung up in the house, and, for all I know, he may be there yet."

THE SNOW-BALL JURY.

BY WILLIAM O. STODDARD.

"BOYS! Come out! Here's some fun!"
"What's a-going? What is it?"

The shouts were excited and long-drawn, and so was the answer:

"The girls are pelting Bill Henderson 'cause he sassed the school-ma'am. Come o-o-on!"

They were coming, for school had not been out three minutes, and none of them had gone far from it. There had been trouble in the little school-house of late, and Bill Henderson had been at the bottom of a good deal of it.

It was not altogether because he was so very bad a boy, but he felt it a little hard to be as big as he was, and to be bullied for his blunders by so very small a woman as the school trustees had chosen for a teacher that winter. It might have been different if there had been any boy a little taller to set him a good example, but all the tall boys in the district were attending school at the Academy. Thus Bill was left to settle his difficulties in his own way, and he had not yet been able to settle them at all, for little Miss Varick refused to have mercy on his mistakes of any kind. What made it worse was that she told him, three or four times a day, that she was his best friend, and wanted to help make a man of him.

Bill could have stood a great many things better than he could that, for he felt that he was quite near enough to being a man to be sent to the Academy.

There were other boys in the District School, but none of them were large enough to interfere much with Bill, and he had his own way a good deal in any out-of-door matters. There were not even any large girls, but there was a perfect swarm of small ones, and Miss Varick had somehow persuaded them all that she had come among them as a sort of guardian angel.

That was why there was such a sudden silence along the lower benches, and such a buzz after it that afternoon, when Bill Henderson roundly declared,

"I won't spell it again!"

"You won't, William? Did you say 'I won't? Spell it again, sir.'"

"I won't. I don't mean to let any woman boss me."

"Spell it, sir!"

Bill held down his head sulkily, but he did not open his lips again in reply to Miss Varick's further remarks, of which there were many, except at the end of them, when he again blurted out,

"I won't be kept after school, neither—not by any woman."

He had not been looking at the rows of little faces on those benches, and if he had it would not have occurred to him how many little women were sitting there, not one of them comparing in point of size with even little Miss Varick.

Particularly he had failed to see the look of wrath in the black eyes of Polly Burbank, and he had no notion of what made her buzz around so among the other girls the moment Miss Varick struck the small brass tea-bell on her desk, and said:

"School is dismissed. I will see William Henderson again about this half an hour before school opens to-morrow morning."

There was a sound of something to come in the clear tones of the school-ma'am's voice, and Bill's head was still hanging a little when he slouched out of the door, and began to trudge along the road toward home.

"Now, girls, let's pelt him."

It was Polly Burbank's shrill treble that he heard saying that, and she had a snow-ball ready-made to show what she meant. It was not a very big or hard one, but it hit him just under the left ear, and Kate Sullivan followed it with another that went into his neck. At any other time he might have set to work and snow-balled back again, but he knew somehow that Miss Varick was watching the fun from the window, and that she heard Polly Burbank shout again: "Pelt him, girls. He said she was nothing but a woman."

That was the crime he had committed, and he felt meaner and meaner about it with every small globe of packed snow that hit him.

"Pelt him, Polly! Pelt him, girls! We'll stand by you."

Bill hardly cared what boy it was that said that; but he knew they were coming back, and following along to see fair play, and that they would all be against him if he dared rebel too savagely against his small tormentors. They grew worse and worse as he walked faster and faster, and he was thinking whether or not it would pay to run, when who should drive along but Mrs. Dillaway, the minister's wife, in her old red cutter, with old Miss Burns beside her.

"Girls! girls!" exclaimed Mrs. Dillaway, "what are you all about?"

"Yes," said Miss Burns, "what on yearth are they up to?"

"Pelting Bill Henderson," shouted Polly Burbank, "because he sassed the school-ma'am. Said he wouldn't mind a woman."

"He did, did he?"

"He wouldn't, would he?"

Bill lifted his head, and was just about to say something, when a small girl with very red hair threw a big ball of half-packed snow with so good an aim that his mouth was too full of it for a word to come out.

"Drive on, Mrs. Dillaway," said Miss Burns. "Let 'em make an awful example of him. It's high time sech talk was put an end to. Nothing but a woman! I declare!"

If Bill had run just then, it would have looked as if he were trying to catch a ride on that very cutter, and he could not bear the thought of that. He walked as fast as he knew how, but so did all the other boys, and by common consent not one of them threw so much as an ounce of snow at him. They left all that to the girls; but they could not help packing a few first-rate snowballs, and handing them around, like so many ready-made cartridges in time of war.

Polly Burbank was everywhere, all around her victim, and so was Kate Sullivan, and so was the little girl with the very red hair; but some of the others were beginning to get tired, and drop off toward their own homes, when Bill drew near the gate of his father's house. He had been walking somewhat more slowly for the last few rods, and had looked up now and then as if he wanted to know if there was any one in that front yard.

The girls had done the same, but there had been no one visible until just as Bill reached the gate, and Polly shouted:

"Give him one more pelt, girls!"

She was barely ten years old herself, but the tall, Roman-nosed woman who came suddenly out on the doorstep was four times that at least, and the youngest of the three shorter ladies who followed her was nearly twenty.

"What does it all mean? William, my son, what's the matter?"

William had no answer in a good shape to give, but there were four or five eager voices quite ready to explain the matter, and then he almost wished he had gone in the opposite direction when he left the school-house. His mother and his two aunts and his sister—not one of them but took the words right out of Polly Burbank's mouth, and said them all over, with a good many more like them.

"Pelted home from school by all the girls!" exclaimed Mrs. Henderson at last, with a very red face. "Come right in here, William. I'm a woman myself. We'll see about this. Go home, girls, all of you."

"Mother," said his sister, "we'd all better go to the school-house with William to-morrow morning."

"Of course we will," said both his aunts in a breath; but they could hear Polly Burbank say to little Kate Henderson:

"Did you hear that? Guess he'd rather be pelted, don't you?"

"Guess he would; but we've done all we could for him."

So they had, and that was the last rebellion of the kind that took place during all the time Miss Varick taught in that district.

WINTER SPORTS IN NORWAY—A SLING-SLED.

NEAR DEERFIELD, MASSACHUSETTS.

My papa says that he can discover something worth reading in almost every paper. Still, of all juvenile publications, he seems to favor YOUR PEOPLE the most, and sends it to me regularly, no one here having a copy. I am very thankful for it, so excellent that even my much older brother delights in reading it. The pictures are so appropriate, and the story of "The party" in particular has become so popular that I can scarcely wait the time until the next number arrives. I am a girl of about twelve years of age. My dear mother died nearly five years ago. The kindest of aunts takes her place as far as she can.

We live on a farm four miles from school, and with nine other children, the youngest only five years of age. We go to school every morning, and return at nearly five o'clock in the evening. We love to go to school, and have lots of fun on our way. At this season of the year we take our sleds with us, or go sliding on the ice through the thick woods. In spring and summer we pick dowers on the road, and our teacher explains them to us. There are quantities of berries all along the road-side in the season, and we can't help stopping to pick some of them, but we seldom are too late for school on that account.

Of course we take a fair supply of luncheon with us out during recess. Fresh-boiled eggs, apples, sandwiches with corned beef, ham, or cheese we prefer to pies and cakes, and you ought to know that apples and chickens are the things we bring home. Are not we to be envied in spite of some disadvantages? Children in the city have no better times.

I will gladly give Raphael West K. the desired information about polishing shells. It is a common practice to remove the strong epidermis by the use of acids, but this is a hazardous and tedious mode of operating. The best method is to put the shells into a pan of cold water with a quantity of quicklime, and boil it from two to four hours, according to the thickness of the shells. After the shells afterward must be gradually cooled, and some strong acid applied to the epidermis, when it will easily peel off. Two hours are sufficient for the boiling of the common mussel shells. The shells are afterward polished with rotten-stone and oil put on a piece of leather. The epidermis of the Uva marginifera requires from four to five hours' boiling. After it is removed, a layer of matter resembling lime will be found, which must be started off with a knife or other sharp instrument. Various turbid and troublesome deposits of the epidermis are removed by means of fine pumice-stone, sand-paper, etc., until the pearly appearance is obtained. After the operation of polishing, a little Florence oil should be rubbed over to bring out the colors.

Epidermis is a hard word, and some little reader may wonder what it means. It is the outer skin simply.

DELAFIELD, WISCONSIN.

I think that Rosalie K. was right about the red heads. I don't like my mamma to be very red-headed. Will you please tell me how to make a little mop for mamma to wash dishes with? I live on a large farm about eight miles from the beautiful city of Springfield, in the State of Illinois. A great many people come to spend the summer in Waukesha County, and the children like it. It is very much cooler than in the city. I am nine years old, and have never been sick, except for when quite a small boy I had the rheumatic fever, and mamma thinks it better for me to remain at home for a year or two. T. F. S.

Take a smooth round stick, and with your pen-knife cut a little groove about half an inch from the end. Then the long loops of soft darning cotton very tightly to the stick, fastening them with little knots around the groove. You need not know a boy who wishes to save his mamma's hands. I am sure his feet run on errands, and save hers from many steps.

FORT SCOTT, KANSAS.

I am a girl ten years old. I have not seen any letters from this place, so I thought I would please to have no pets of my own to tell about, but my sister Nellie has a female bird, and my mamma a male, and brother Harry has a dog named Prince. Nellie also has two cats, the biggest one is black and yellow, and the smallest one is black and white.

I like HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE very much, and like to read the letters in OUR POST-OFFICE BOX.

have two little cousins who live in Florida, on the bank of Lake Santa Fe. They have all the oranges they can eat; they are both girls. They row on the lake with grandpa, and have lots of good times. I wrote a letter a long time ago, and forgot to mail it. COLE B. L.

FORT ERIE, ONTARIO, CANADA.

You will perceive from the heading of my letter that I am a subject of her Majesty Queen Victoria. I am the eldest of a little family of four—two boys and two girls, all of them very good. We live on the bank of the Niagara River, a short distance above where the International Bridge crosses to Buffalo, and are very much attached to our city, and to our country. My father (Benjamin Wintemute) by King George the Fourth just after the war of 1776. My grand-uncle, to whom it now belongs, was born on this spot at the latter eight years ago, and is a wonderfully bright old lady still, but, I am sorry to tell you, is almost blind. I have a great deal of pleasure attending to her many wants, and helping to nurse her when she is not very well. I am afraid you will laugh at the idea of a little girl of ten years being a nurse, but she fancies I do everything for her better than any one else. My father is a school-keeper, and I am the first from the first number, and I read it to my brothers. We enjoy the Post-Office Box exceedingly; also the many interesting stories. I have not been at school very much, but I went for a while to a private school in Buffalo, but my old auntie fretted so continually about my crossing the river every day on the ferry-boat that mamma thought it best to have me taught at home; but I do not get on as well as she would wish, and fearing you might not be able to read my letter if I wrote it myself, I have asked mamma to write for me. We love our city, and our country, and our baby; but Polly is very naughty to Baby Margaret, and gives her a bite every chance she has. Perhaps she intends them as kisses.

We are very glad to hear that you do not think my letter too long to publish, for I would so like to see it in the Box. MARY E. L.

I think that, even if you do not learn quite so many things from books as you might by attending school, you will suffer no real loss, but will make it all up when you are a little older. It is a very beautiful thing you are doing in adding pleasure to the life of an aged relative, and I have made a pretty picture in my mind of a fair little girl, sitting at the feet of a white-haired lady in her easy-chair. Lessons of love, patience, and tenderness are worth as much in education as lessons in grammar and geography.

BALTIMORE, MARYLAND.

I am a little boy, I have five years old last month, and I like to play with my sled, and I had a sled one year old, and a velocipede that was new Christmas. My uncle gave me some ten-pins. I have an express wagon and a cat like show, besides a number of other things. I have a dog, and my mamma's canary-bird, which is a pet for all of us; he is named Pete, and will be eight years old the 1st of May. When papa points his finger at the children, and says, "That's the way to do it," he is in a very cross way, but never pecks him, as he only means to play. I have no brothers or sisters, like most of the children who write to me. My father and my brother died last year, and another brother died a long time ago. I have been taking YOUR PEOPLE since the Valentine number; mamma or papa reads it to me. I have been going to school to mamma since the summer vacation closed, and can read in my primer all that I've been over. "Wound" and "could" are the biggest words I've learned, and I can't remember how to spell them. I can read as fast as I can, so that I can read YOUR PEOPLE for myself. I have about five hundred picture cards, some very pretty ones, some very funny; and I have a book of letters, but the pictures which was given to me Christmas. Mamma is writing, and I am telling her what to write. I have been too sick to go out since Christmas; my mother says I can't stay in bed, but when the weather gets good; then I am going to get a train of ears for taking my medicine. It has been pretty hard to stay in the house when there was such nice snow. My book is nearly done, and is not too long to print. I will write again some time. HOWARD F. W.

I hope the train of cars puffs along like lightning, and quite pays you for having taken bitter medicine like a little man.

HENTVELLE, ALABAMA.

I've got a cat and a little dog, and my name is Claude Verdier C. I mean my little sissie has that name; and she is beautiful, too, so Laura says. Laura is nurse. My cat is named Nora Winter. I am five years old, and I talk with my mamma in French, and when I talk with my brother, I talk to me, and has taught me French, so that I shall know the language of her ancestors. That's a good thing to know. My father and mother have promised me a pair of copper-toed boots for next Christmas. Oh, but didn't I pop fire-crackers that day? Dot didn't like it much—Dot is my dog. I reckon I ought to mention papa, because he is a good out cousin. I've got a letter from a beautiful young lady who is visiting at Selma.

Yours very fondly, LE VERT C.

You are a happy boy to have a beautiful young lady writing letters to you, in addition to having a good papa, a kind Uncle Frank, and so many pets besides.

NORTHVILLE, MICHIGAN.

Tell Dora and Amy that I had seven turtles last summer. I kept them in a pen, and had a pair of water in the middle of it. I gave them well water. I fed them bugs and snail-worms. They lived very long, and I kept them about two months. Then I got tired of digging worms, so I took them down to the creek, and let them go. Their shells were always hard. I am nine years old, and have been helping my father's YOUR PEOPLE this year, and I like it first-rate.

RECEIPTS FROM LITTLE HOUSEKEEPERS.

CAKE WITHOUT EGGS.—One and a half cups of flour, one cup of sugar, two spoonfuls of baking-powder, three scant cups of flour, one cup of milk, and spices to suit the taste. Beat the butter and sugar to a cream; sift the baking-powder in the flour, dry and add them about two months. Then I got tired of digging worms, so I took them down to the creek, and let them go. Their shells were always hard. I am nine years old, and have been helping my father's YOUR PEOPLE this year, and I like it first-rate.

LEMON CAKE.—The grated rind and juice of one lemon and one cup of sugar, boiled together for five minutes, make a jelly; spread it between four layers of cake made of one cup of sugar, half a cup of butter, two cups of flour, and one spoonful of baking-powder. Let it bake.

SOFT GINGERBREAD.—Half a cup of melted butter, two cups of molasses, one cup of sour milk, one egg, one table-spoonful of ginger, two table-spoonfuls of soda, half a tea-spoonful of salt, and flour to make a soft batter.

HARD GINGERBREAD.—Lub one tea-cupful of butter into one quart of sifted flour; add one table-spoonful of ginger, one pint of molasses, and one wine-glassful of warm water in which is dissolved one tea-spoonful of soda. Add sifted flour until you can make a stiff dough. Roll it out thin, and bake on buttered tins.

ROSIE W.

AUNT ALMENA'S GINGERBREAD.—One cup of molasses, two cups of flour, two tea-spoonfuls of ginger, one cup of sugar, and one tea-spoonful of soda dissolved in a cup of boiling water, and put in last.

The little cooks who try these receipts may write and tell me how they succeed, and what papa said when he tasted their cake at the table.

A member of the Sociable writes in a sprightly way about the trouble she had in her mother's absence in managing her "help," who, having been her school-mate the previous winter, felt that she could not do her youthful mistress's part. This young lady lives in Washington Territory. The members of our Sociable are scattered so widely that their circumstances naturally differ. In new countries, for instance, people have to avail themselves of any help they can obtain, and regular servants are not to be had. Some of our little girls are learning how to do all sorts of work from their mothers, who keep no domestics, and manage beautifully without them. Others are accustomed to households in which a number of servants attend to the various duties of the home.

One rule, dear girls, applies to you all, wherever you may be placed. Always control your tempers in speaking to those whom you employ. Always ask Bridget or Dinah to do what you require. Never order her in a lofty way, but request her politely to do this or that, and do not forget to thank her for doing it.

In case a neighbor's daughter or a school-mate comes to help with the family work, with the understanding that she is to be one of the family, do not keep her coldly at a distance, but treat her as you would yourself wish to be treated if you were to change places with her.

SABETHA, KANSAS.

Papa is holding my hand to write to the Post-Office Box. He says my Christmas presents have reduced him to extreme poverty, and he says I never continues to rattle in his pocket, I think he is not so very poor. My papa is my pet, and he is the nicest papa in the world; my mamma is another pet, and she is the nicest mamma in the world, whose name is Campbell, is my third pet. My papa writes for many papers, and wants me to educate myself for an artist. He draws nicely, and is teaching me to draw, and he says I do very well. My papa, mamma, and Campbell, who are so good and kind to me, are all the pets I want, and I can not love nor pet them enough.

I suppose the young people who read the Post-office Box will think my love is wasted because I have no dogs or cats. It blows awful hard here nearly every day, and the weather is very cold. Papa says he is tired.

GENESEE, ILLINOIS.

I want to write to the Post-office Box to tell you about a dear little girl who used to write me the arrival of YORGE PEOPLE. Little Clemie Rockwell. I wish I could give you a correct word-picture of her. She was bright, loving, sympathetic. I would like to tell you a good many of her little sayings, and you would be appreciated, you should have heard them from her, told in her pretty, cute way. When she was quite small there was a bank failure in the town where she lived. When her papa came home that evening Clemie asked him why he had not brought her some candy. He answered, "The bank has burst, and so I haven't any money." The man she quickly replied, "Well, if the bank burst, and you were there, why didn't you pick up some?" HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE was Clemie's very own paper—a Christmas present from her papa in Kansas. She had a special light to her, as it is to many little folks. She was a Sabbath-school scholar, a Band of Hope girl, and a member of a little Mission Band. About the first of July this little girl had a picnic in the country, and it was a part of their programme that each little girl should tell a story. Just think of it, YORGE PEOPLE—twenty different stories, one on each table, and all by the girls! I think they all enjoyed this novel picnic game, and no one more than little Clemie, who repeated some of the most interesting to her mama and sister. Just think of her! She was a little more than two weeks after this picnic July 31 Clemie died of malignant diphtheria. After she was taken sick her greatest desire seemed to be to see her papa, and when he came to her and came to her bedside, she asked him if he thought she would get well, and when he seemed to evade a direct answer, she said, "Tell me truly, papa, I am not afraid to die." And so we think of the little song she used to sing, "Jesus hold my little hand," we feel assured that Jesus held her by the hand as she passed over the river to her "beautiful home above."

Mrs. GEO. E. W.

JEAN.—I liked your bright letter, and will be happy to answer any questions you may send, unless they are too deep and puzzling for a busy Postmistress. You are right in your idea that it is interesting to know why we do this or that.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S COL.

MEMBER, MARYLAND.

We—that is, my two sisters Rachel and Marian and I—became very much interested in Young People's Col, and we resolved to have a fair, and had the proceeds to be given to our work during the summer vacation and in all our spare moments, and managed to make quite a number of pretty things. The fair commenced on Friday, the 14th of December, and closed Saturday night, the 20th. We had tables one for the night. We had only three tables one for fancy goods, one for flowers, and one for refreshments, but we made one hundred dollars, and sent it to you, hoping it will be of use to you.

We had a few nice contributions from friends in the neighborhood, and Miss Maggie Maber made us some nice fancy articles and helped us at the fair.

I enclosed please find the check and a sample of our tickets. We hope to see this in YORGE PEOPLE, and send our best wishes for the success of the Col.

MATTIE L. COFFIN.

PHILADELPHIA, PENNSYLVANIA.

After receiving your kind letter, we immediately set to work to make our arrangements for our little fair. We held our fair on the afternoon and evening of December 20. We made about $100 dollars, and we are only sorry that it is not as much more. We hope that the poor sick children will soon have their Col, and we are glad to add our mite. We are nearly all readers of HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, and greatly enjoy the Post-office Box. It would please us very much, if you have received this, to let us know through YORGE PEOPLE.

GESSIE MINDEL, MABEL ROSE, NELLIE J. RIERNACK, IDA R. STONE, BLANCHIE M. BAINBRIDGE, LIZZIE BAINBRIDGE.

WATERBURY, MASSACHUSETTS.

I am a little boy seven years old. I have earned some money, and been saving my weekly allowance for Young People's Col. I send one dollar for February, I hope it will be of use to you. My brother takes HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, and we both dearly love to read it. My mother writes this for me. I am afraid I can not write well enough for you to read.

J. LIVINGSTON PITMAN.

St. LOUIS, MISSOURI.

I thought I would like to send some money to you for the poor little children who are not able to take care of them when they are sick. I have been very ill myself—so ill that I was not expected to live—and I know how pleasant it is to have a dear mamma and papa and so many kind friends to take care of me. I have sent a very little, but it is all my own, and I thought Jesus would like me to give it for them.

BESSIE KINGSLAN.

PUTNEY, VERMONT.

Please accept the inclosed three dollars for Young People's Col, with many kind wishes for the coming year, from the Merry Cleaners, of Putney, Vermont. They raised the money on a guess doll at a fair which they held the last of summer. The doll was named by our President's daughter, Ellen H. Arthur, and brought in five dollars. They send you three, and the other half goes to the Orphans' Home at Burlington, Vermont. Happy New-Year from the Merry Cleaners.

The Merry Cleaners is an organization of boys and girls connected with the Universalist Sunday-school of Putney, Vermont, and they feel a deep interest in the Children's Hospital.

Yours truly, Mrs. L. M. SMILEY.

DEAR CHILDREN, I was authorized to ask through the Post-office Box to make something for a fair that will be held in Easter Week in New York City to help on the fund for Young People's Col. It is to be in charge of some of the ladies connected with our society, Holy Innocent's Guild, of which I am one, and we hope to reach $2000, from which point it will not take a great while to reach the hundred mark. So, if any little girl or boy would like to make anything for us, we would be very glad, and hope that those of you who live near enough to the city will come and see us at the fair.

Those who wish to help are requested to send their articles either by mail or express, prepaid, to my address, not later than March 20, and I will acknowledge their safe arrival by note if the mail and address are sent with the package. Send to Miss V. NELSON, 33 E. 29th St., New York City.

Will those who accept the invitation contained in the note from our friend Miss Nelson be very careful to send their contributions directly to her, at her address given above, and not to the office of YORGE PEOPLE?

Contributions received for Young People's Col, in Holy Innocent's Ward, St. Mary's Free Hospital for Children, 407 West Thirty-fourth Street:—

ANSWERS TO PUZZLES IN NO. 168.

No. 1. A thrifty lady in a dress of Parumatta, and carrying a Sautal-wood fan, went out to buy a new set of China. She had a desire to shine in Society, and to get her three sisters, Florence, Augusta, and Annona, to aid in her selection. Having bought some delicate cups and saucers from France, plates from Berlin, and curved plates from the Alps, she proceeded to order a supper. She bought wheat, peas, grapes, sardines, and many other things. Lighting her saloon, she found the Wick of the candles frolicsome. She called her servant, Ben Nevis, and ordered him to bring her oil from the Sea of Okhotsk. Her carpets were Brussels, her perfumes came from Cologne, her coal from Newcastle, and her knives and forks from Sheffield and Birmingham.

And through the hawthorn blows the gale,
With solemn feet I tread the hill
That overflows the lovely vale.

Where, twisted round the harrow oak,
The summer vine in beauty clings,
And summer winds the stillness broke,
The crystal icicle is hung.

Alas! how changed from the fair scene
When birds sang out their mellow lay,
And winds were soft and woods were green,
And the song ceased to be a merry day.

DIDN'T CARE A BIT.

BY MARGARET EYTINGE.

Of all the naughty, naughty dogs
That ever I did see,
You are the very naughtiest,
To run away from me.
And stay so long lost in the snow,
Here I have searched for you
Since twelve o'clock to-day, and now
It's more than half past two,
And you—why, you don't care a bit,
As I can plainly tell,
And if I didn't love you so,
I'd surely whip you well.

WHO WAS HE?

BY I. R. OQUOIS.

HE was born in England, in a town a few miles northwest of London, in Warwickshire, on the 23d day of April, 1664. His father was a justice of the peace at one time, and a somewhat extensive dealer in wool. He was the eldest of a family of ten children. He received his early education at a free school, and afterward was for some time in an attorney's office. He was married when he was eighteen to a lady eight years older than himself. He joined a gang of deer-stealers, and was caught robbing a gentleman's park. He was prosecuted, and to escape imprisonment he was obliged to leave his family and business and take shelter in London.

He was twenty-two years old at this time. Soon after he went to London he became connected with a theatre there, first in a very low position, as call-boy or prompter. Later he became an actor, but did not gain much of a reputation on the stage.

He bought an interest in one of the theatres in London. He wrote a number of plays, which were produced during his lifetime.

He was a great favorite with Queen Elizabeth and with King James. The latter wrote a letter praising his works, and sent it to him. After 1614 he did not write any, but lived at ease in the same town in which he was born.

He died on the fifty-second anniversary of his birthday, Tuesday, April 23, 1616. He was buried in the north side of the chancel in the great church in his native town, and a monument to his memory was placed on one of the walls.

He had two daughters and one son. The son died when he was twelve years old, but the daughters outlived their father.

In 1741 a monument was erected to his memory in Westminster Abbey. The Dean and Chapter donated the ground, and performances were given in the London theatres to pay expenses.

A KNOWING CARP.

THE wonderful instinct of animals has been proved by hundreds of anecdotes, so that when another true story is added to the already long list we are scarcely surprised. Nevertheless, the following incident, which took place in Vienna, Austria, is not without interest.

A cook went down to the fish-market to make her purchases, and stepping on board one of the boats in the canal, she was at length successful in coming to terms for an unusually fine carp.

Now, as is well known, the carp is very fond of life, and will live out of water for a long time, if only its gills be kept moist. When, therefore, the woman placed the fish on the top of her open market-basket, the fisherman gave her a friendly warning, saying the carp was not to be trusted, and would be sure to leap from her basket if it found a favorable opportunity. The cook only greeted these remarks with laughter; and indeed the fish lay as quiet as possible, looking the picture of resignation.

When, however, the woman stepped on the board which led from the boat to the quay of the canal, she suddenly became aware of a movement in the basket, and, looking down, she had only just time to see the carp bent in the form of a bow before he was in the air. In another second, much to the amazement of the woman, he was far out of reach and sight at the bottom of the water.

WHAT ST. NICHOLAS FORGOT
AND ST. VALENTINE REMEMBERED.

BY CHARLES S. PRATT.

YOUNG Geoffrey Hilliard, lithe, dark, was very handsome that Christmas-day, gliding up Beacon Street on his shining bicycle.

He had been having a brisk run down the Back Bay—had raced, had won; and now, as he traced a graceful curve across the broad driveway and vaulted to the sidewalk, his cheeks were flushed and his eyes a-sparkle.

It was the work of an instant to tilt the airy wheels against the iron fence of No. 40a, and deftly strap them there.

Then he rang the bell; and while yet he could hear the faint ting-a-ling-ling, the great polished door swung back noiselessly.

He had no chance to ask for his chum Thad of the white-gloved, pompous porter (who was very like the walnut-finished hall in polish and color), for that young fellow, moved by the common instinct of chums, had spied him from above, and come plunging down the stairs, and pitched headlong into his arms.

"Hello, Geoff! And so you've got it! How are you? Come in—come up! Jolly fun in the den—open grate, apples, oranges, caramels, and—"

"Yes, yes, anything; only hold in a bit till we're there, and I'll answer," cried Geoff, as he got his breath.

Up two flights Thad dragged his chum, and into a boy's room—"as was a room," Geoff always declared. Would that every boy had one like it!—large, sunny by day, and airy always, looking out over the beautiful Public Garden and lower Common; no stuffy carpet, but a polished oak floor, with a great Turkish rug in the centre; bed, easy-chairs, lounge, all of light springy rattan, with a ribbon run in the edges; a bamboo table littered with books, pencils, brushes and colors, knives, boxing-gloves, base and foot balls, the late magazines, and numberless articles nameless save to a modern boy. In one corner were bats and a pair of carved Indian elubs; on the walls were crossed a pair of fencing foils, and a rifle hung from branching deer horns. And there were pictures of warm color and noble suggestion. There was a large photograph of Bacon's painting of Boston boys demanding of the British General Gage (just above on that same Beacon Street a hundred years ago) the liberty of the coasting-ground on the Common, and a strange, fascinating picture of the Children's Crusade. In the window hung and swung and sung a frivolous mocking-bird.

Thad's father believed in study and schools, but he believed also and had always taught Thad that brain was of little account in this world without muscle, so, as you see, Thad was growing both.

"I have a lounge, Geoff. How do you like it? Was it in your stocking?" chattered Thad.

"Like what—the lounge? First-rate."

"No, your bicycle. Shiny, ain't it? Goes like the wind, too; saw you down the drive."

"Oh, oh, that's Tom's, and this suit's his—cap, leggings, and all. You see I'm as big as he is, thanks to your muscle-makers, I's'pose, eh, Thad?" Geoffrey nodded at the Indian clubs and dumb-bells.

"No 's'pose' at all; sure as sure," and Thad struck out two sneyw arms with a look of pardonable pride.

"But I did have a bicycle in my stocking, at least what will soon change to one." Geoff took a folded paper from his pocket-book, and tossed it to his chum.

"Check on North National for fifty! Good enough, Geoff! 'Twill pay for bicycle and all the fixin's. When 'll you get it? Pope Manufacturing Company's the place—went down there the other day—told papa 'twould take that for the right kind. That's how I came to have just fifty, I suppose."

"What! did you get a check too?"

Thad smilingly handed his friend a second North National check, and for the same amount. The two fathers were partners, and had evidently conspired.

"Hurrah, that 's good!" cried Geoff, and he threw the foot-ball he had been blowing up at Thad's head.

Thad seized the missile by a flying catch, hurled it back, and a skirmish ensued, which only the boys who have been there can imagine.

Peace restored, Geoff exclaimed, "Old fellow, we'll get 'em to-morrow; yes, to-morrow morning!"

"I'll go with you, and give you any amount of advice, but— Well, the fact is, Geoff, I'm not going to invest myself."

"Not—going—to—invest! What do you mean?"

"What I said."

"No, you don't mean you're not going to buy a bicycle?"

"Just that."

Geoffrey sat bolt-upright and stared at Thad. "Well, Thaddeus Prescott," he said at last, "you always were an odd one. What's up? Some new muscle machine, or are you going to turn the attic into a gymnasium, or what?"

"Good idea that about the attic, but I guess it's the 'what.' Have an apple, Geoff, and I'll spin you a little yarn. 'Twas the other day—you see I'd been down to the bicycle loft, and was coming home across the Common—"

"Whistling?"

"Course I was. Any fellow'd whistle like a mocking-bird after choosing such a bicycle's I had," and Thad puckered his lips to a high operatic trill, which the bird in the window took up, and which even Geoff could not resist.

"Well," started Thad once more, "as I got along by the Frog Pond where the old apple-woman—"

"The wrinkled one?"

"Yes, the hundred-year-older that always sits on her heels at the foot of the big elm. Well, as I got along, there I stopped."

"What for?" broke in Geoff.

"To buy an apple, of course," retorted Thad. "No; come to think, I didn't quite stop; only slowed up, for I wanted to see the trade."

"What trade?"

"Why, there was a little chap there—newsboy, with papers under his arm, and a twinkly sort of face—smart, you know. 'Ragged?' Yes, but awful clean; face shone like the old woman's apples—'pon my word it did. And he stood there with a penny in his hand, first on one foot and then on t'other, and looking mighty wishful. Then he reached over and just touched an apple—big two-center—and then he shook his head and stepped back, and looked wishful again. And the wrinkled old woman tried to smile a temptin' sort o' two-toothed smile and look pleasant. After a jiffy the little chap reached over toward the one-centers; but he didn't touch 'em. He shook his head and jerked back, said something about 'ma' and 'money,' gave his papers a litch, and started on."

"And Thaddeus," broke in Geoff—"Thaddeus put his last quarter into two-centers, and skipped after the little chap and filled his pockets full—didn't he now?"

"Maybe—ought to," answered Thad, with a redder touch to his cheeks.

"But what's all this to do with a bicycle?"

"I'm a-telling you; a fellow can't spin a whole yarn in a minute, Geoff. Well, the little chap came down this way, and I along behind, and a minute after another newsboy came up with mine, and says he, in a shrill voice:

"'Hi, Skimp, Kismus comin', d'ye know? Gwine ter hang up?'"

"What 'd a chap hang?"

"'Stockin's,' says t'other.

"'N't got 'ny,' says Skimp.

"'Boots,' says t'other.

"'N't got 'ny,' says Skimp.

"'An'thin', then,' says t'other.

"'N't got 'ny—never had 'ny,' says Skimp; 'an' nothin's as good, anyway.'

"'What d'ye mean, old chap? don't ye b'lieve in Santa Claus?"

"'Never did,' says Skimp. 'E never brought any of us nuttin'. 'E's old, older'n ma can 'member—old 's two o' Anny Applesed. 'E forgets fearful—allus forgets me, 'n' allus forgot ma too. 'No, I'd never hang up—no use.'

"'Then they turned down a side path, and I came home.'

"'And what next, Thad? Spin away.'

"Well, do you know, Geoff, this blessed morning, as I looked out the back parlor, there in the yard was Skimp. He'd a big basket, a clothes-basket—our washing, you know. And I up with the sash, and says I, 'Merry Christmas, Skimp,' and he looks up, and says he, 'Merry Christmas'; but somehow he didn't look a bit merry. So I ran down and took his basket, and asked him in, and gave him a big orange, and—"

"Of course you did, Thad; just like you."

"And, oh my! how his eyes did shine. And I asked him lots of questions. The little chap's got a 'ma'—she does the washing—and a baby brother, and no 'pa'; and they're dreadfully poor, and they live just back here in Acorn Street. And he wants to go to school, and can't, 'cause it takes every penny he earns for bread and butter—no, I don't s'pose they ever have butter—and his name's not Skimp; that's a nickname, 'cause once the newsboys were all a-going to buy hot pea-nuts, and he wouldn't; and one chap was mean enough to call out 'Skimp!' and another, who knew all about it, told 'em 'twas on account of his 'ma'; and as they'd all had 'ma's,' most of them, they gave three cheers and filled his pockets with pea-nuts, and liked him better'n ever. But always after that they called him Skimp. I talked with the chap half an hour; and fact is, Geoff, he's a real little man."

Thad brought down his sturdy palm on the knee of his friend with one of those explosive whacks which are so singularly expressive to boys.

"And what next?" cried Geoff, impatiently, yet not a little moved by Thad's earnestness. "Spin away."

"Spun out," said Thad; "leastwise as far as facts go. Anything further would be of the stuff that dreams are made of."

"Shakspeare," commented Geoff, under his breath. "Well, suppose you do turn prophet; a little prophecy may be a help to both of us; and likely as not I can help you if you come to any hitches. You begin thusly: And it came to pass that the youth Thaddeus, his great heart touched by a divine pity, vowed to sacrifice his treasures, and devote himself to the lifting of his humble human brothers to—to—well, the heights of Boston culture!"

Geoff laughed as he folded his wings over this flight of fancy; but the laugh had a tone in it which hinted that perhaps it would not be so bad a thing to do after all.

"Nonsense," said Thad, the tinge of an honest blush on his cheeks; "and yet," he added, with a quick light in his eyes, "Thaddeus will do something of the sort."

"And the bicycle check?"

"Will go to Skimp in some shape."

"And next you'll call 'presto!' and the gymnasium attic will change to an orphan asylum, with blackboards instead of spring-boards, and books instead of dumb-bells, O Thad!"

"And that isn't a bad idea, either—the two together. Why, Geoff, you're going to be an immense help to me; I might have known it."

And he was. As Thad took him into confidence, and told all the thoughts and plans that had flashed through his mind since the occurrence on the Common, and the chance discovery of the morning, his laughing sallies and playful satires were full of sensible suggestion.

And by-and-by, as the handsome fellow balanced himself on the shining bicycle for the home run, Thad—his face glowing with a boy's enthusiasm—ventured the prophecy that another Christmas would see a dozen Beacon Street boys carrying out the plans they had planned that day.

Thad believed in having an active hand in the fulfillment of prophecy. So that very week the gymnasium went into the attic, and with it went blackboards, desks, books, globes, charts, and all sorts of tempting appliances.

The next week a keen little fellow, known in front of the Herald Office as Skimp, sat at one of the desks every other night. The next week two more desks had occupants; by the middle of February the number was six; and the "asylum," as Geoff persisted in calling it, was decidedly interesting to its originators, and the one or two friends who had been admitted under bond of profound secrecy.

The training of brain and muscle was happily blended after a somewhat original theory of Thad's own.

As St. Valentine's Day drew near, an air of mystery set flled over Thad's private den; and once, on going in suddenly, Thad's young brother saw, as he afterward affirmed, a cloaked something with long white hair and beard, "like Abraham in the Bible, or Santa Claus," whisk into the wardrobe.

And again, on St. Valentine's Eve, the same mysterious stranger whisked by him in the upper hall, and disappeared down the back stairs.

Whether this strange visitant really was St. Valentine has never been settled entirely to his satisfaction.

But Skimp, in his humble little room in one of the poorest streets of Boston, has never had a doubt of it.

For did he not, ten minutes later, sit down on the edge of his meagre bed in the moonlight to pull off his boots for the night? and did not just then a shadow fall across the floor from the curtainless window? and did he not see a dark figure with saintly white hair and saintly white beard all a silvery shimmer in the moonlight? and did he not hear a gruff kindly voice, that, after all, had the thrill and freshness of youth in it? and were not these the words "St. Valentine's love and remembrance to you and your folks, my boy"? and as his eyes grew big with wonder, did not the saint vanish, and a white packet fly through the broken pane and fall at his feet? and was there not written on it, "St. Valentine remembers what St. Nicholas forgets"? and did not the little packet bring to his tired hopeless mother's face a smile that never faded? and from that St. Valentine's Eve was not his face hopefully set toward what he had never dreamed of before?

The weeks flew by; the winter melted away; the venturesome snow-drops and gay crocuses came bravely out into the sun along Beacon Street; the bicycle season was coming on—still Geoff had not invested. And one day, as he and Thad were crossing the old Common by that same path where Thad first met Skimp, Geoff told him why.

"Fact is, old fellow, that night I played St. Valentine for you, my cheek went into the packet with yours. That was why I held back, and came so near being discovered by that sharp-eyed little brother of yours. I didn't mean to tell you, but I never could keep a secret."

Thad seized his hand with a quick firm grip. "Of course you couldn't, Geoff—of course you couldn't. And why should you from me?" And then a swift light flashed in his eyes as he added, with a glad thrill in his voice, "Now I know, Geoff, that my 'prophecy' will more than come true."

A WOLF'S DISLIKE FOR MUSIC.

IT is well known that domestic dogs dislike music, but the hatred of it seems to be much stronger in a wolf. Dogs become familiar with it, and have learned to endure it; but to the wolf it is intolerable. It would be well for those who live in countries infested by wolves to arm themselves with some loud-sounding musical instrument, as the following anecdote would suggest.

A Scotch bagpiper was travelling in Ireland, when he encountered a wolf, which seemed to be very ravenous. The poor man could think of no other way to save his life than to open his wallet and try the effect of hospitality. He did so, and the savage beast swallowed all that was thrown to him with such voracity that it seemed as if his appetite was not in the least degree satisfied.

The whole stock of provision was, of course, soon spent, and now the man's only resource was in the virtues of his bagpipe. This the monster no sooner heard than he took to the mountains as suddenly as he had left them. The poor piper did not wholly enjoy his deliverance, for, looking sadly at his empty wallet, he shook his fist at the departing animal, saying: "Ay! are these your tricks? Had I known your humor, you should have had your music before your supper."

THE CARRIER-PIGEON.

THE valentine that thou hast brought
I well know who has sent it;
And every word he says therein
I know full well he meant it.

Thou lovely messenger, pray wait
The while I am inditing
A little answer. Thou canst stay;
I won't be long in writing.

"I'm true to thee; be true to me!"
It is enough. I'll fold it.
Come, birdie, come; the silken string
About thy neck will hold it.

THE DEFENSE OF ROCHELLE.

HOW THE CITY OF REFUGE FOUGHT FOR LIBERTY.

BY GEORGE CARY EGGLESTON.

IN the old times, when people were in the habit of fighting each other about their religion, the little French sea-port Rochelle was called "the city of refuge." The Huguenots, or French Protestants, held the place, and when the armies of the French King tried to take it, in the latter part of the sixteenth century, they were beaten off and so badly used in the fight that the King was glad to make terms with the townspeople.

An agreement was therefore made that they should have their own religion, and manage their own affairs; and to make sure of this the King gave Rochelle so many special rights that it became almost a free city. After that, whenever a Protestant in any part of France found that he could not live peaceably in his own home, he went to Rochelle, and that is the way the place came to be called the city of refuge.

For a good many years the people of Rochelle went on living quietly. They had a fine harbor of their own, their trade was good, and they were allowed to manage their own affairs. At last the new King of France made up his mind that he would not have two religions in his country, but would make everybody believe as he did. This troubled the people of Rochelle, but the King sent them word that he only meant to make them change their religion by showing them that his was better, and that he did not intend to trouble them in any way.

In those days promises of that kind did not count for much; but the King's Prime Minister, Cardinal Richelieu, who really managed everything, knew very well that Rochelle could give a great deal of trouble if it chose, and so perhaps he really would have let the town alone if it had not been for the meddling of the English Prime Minister Buckingham.

This Buckingham, with an English fleet and army, sailed into the harbor of Rochelle in the middle of July, 1627, and undertook to help the people against the French King. If Buckingham had been either a soldier or a sailor, he might have made himself master of the forts near Rochelle at once; but although he had command of a fleet and an army, he really knew nothing about the business of a commander, and he blundered so badly that the generals of the French King got fresh troops and provisions into the forts, and were able to hold them in spite of all that the English could do.

Seeing how matters stood, Richelieu at once sent an army to surround Rochelle, and at daylight on the 10th of August the people found a strong force in front of the town. Rochelle had not made up its mind to join the English, and the magistrates sent word to the French general that they wanted peace. They said they were loyal to the French King, and even offered to help drive the English away, if their King would promise not to break the treaty that had been made with Rochelle many years before.

It was too late to settle the matter in that way, however. The French general meant to make the town surrender, and so, while the English were fighting to get control of the island of Rhé, at some distance from the town, he began to build works around Rochelle. His plan was to shut the people up in the city and cut off their supplies of food; and when the Rochelle folk saw what he was doing they opened fire on his men.

The war was now begun, and the Huguenots made terms with Buckingham, hoping, with his help, to win in the struggle. Buckingham promised to help them, and he did try to do so in his blundering way; but he did them more harm than good, for when he found that he could not take the forts, he sailed away, taking with him three hundred tons of grain, which he ought to have sent into the town.

It was November when the English left, and Rochelle was in a very bad situation. Richelieu set to work to shut the town in and seal it up. He built strong works all around the land side, and then, with great labor, brought earth and stones and built a mole, or strip of land, nearly all the way across the mouth of the harbor, so that no boats could pass in or out.

The situation was a terrible one, but the people of Rochelle were brave, and had no thought of flinching. They chose the mayor, Guiton, for their commander, and when he accepted the office he laid his dagger on the table, saying: "I will thrust that dagger into the heart of the first man who speaks of giving up the town!" He then went to work to defend the place. He strengthened the works, and made soldiers of all the men in the city, and all the boys, too, for that matter. Everybody who could pull a trigger had to take his place in the ranks. England had promised to send help, and the only question, Guiton thought, was whether or not he could hold out till the help should come; so he laid his plans to resist as long as possible.

The French in great numbers stormed the defenses time after time, but the brave Rochellose always drove them back with great loss. It was clear from the first that Guiton would not give way, and that no column, however strong, could force the city gates. But there was an enemy inside the town which was harder to fight than the one outside. There was famine in Rochelle! The cattle were eaten up, and the horses went next. Then everything that could be turned into food was carefully used and made to go as far as it would. Guiton stopped every kind of waste, but day by day the food supply grew smaller, and the people grew weaker from hunger. Starvation was doing its work. Every day the list of deaths grew longer, and when people met in the streets they stared at each other with lean, white, hungry faces, wondering who would be the next to go.

Still these heroic people had no thought of giving up. They were fighting for liberty, and they loved that more than life. The French were daily charging their works, but could not move the stubborn, starving Rochellose.

The winter dragged on slowly. Spring came, and yet no help had come from England. In March the French, thinking that the people must be worn out, hurled their heaviest columns against the lines; but do what they would, they could not break through anywhere, and had to go back to their works, and wait for famine to conquer a people who could not be conquered by arms.

One morning in May an English fleet was seen outside the mole. The news ran through the town like wild-fire. Help was at hand, and the poor starving people were wild with joy. Men ran through the streets shouting and singing songs of thanksgiving. They had borne terrible sufferings, but now help was coming, and they were sure that their heroic endurance would not be thrown away. Thousands of their comrades had fallen fighting, and thousands of their women and children had starved to death; but what was that if, after all, Rochelle was not to lose her liberties?

Alas! their hope was a vain one, and their joy soon turned to sorrow. The English fleet did nothing. It hardly tried to do anything, but after lying within sight of the town for a while, it sailed away again and left Rochelle to its fate.

Richelieu was sure that Guiton would surrender now, and so he sent a messenger to say that he would spare the lives of all the people if the town were given up within three days. But the gallant Guiton was not ready even yet to give up the struggle. "Tell Cardinal Richelieu," he said to the messenger, "that we are his very obedient servants;" and that was all the answer he had to make.

When the summer came some food was grown in the city gardens, but this went a very little way among so many people, and the famine had now grown frightful. The people gathered all the shell-fish they could find at low tide. They ate the leaves off the trees, and even the grass of the gardens and lawns was used for food. Everything that could in any way help to support life was consumed; everything that could be boiled into the thinnest soup was turned to account; everything that could be chewed for its juice was used to quiet the pains of fierce hunger; but all was not enough. Men, women, and children died by thousands. Every morning when the new guard went to take the place of the old one, many of the sentinels were found dead at their posts with starvation.

Still the heroic Guiton kept up the fight, and nobody dared say anything to him about giving up. He still hoped for help from England, and meant to hold out until it should come, cost what it might. In order that the soldiers might have a little more to eat, and live and fight a little longer, he turned all the old people and those who were too weak to fight out of the town. The French would not let these poor wretches pass their lines, but made an attack on them, and drove them back toward Rochelle. But Guiton would not open the city gates to them. He said they would starve to death if he let them into Rochelle, and they might as well die outside as inside the gates.

At last news came that the English had made a treaty with the French, and so there was no longer any hope of help for Rochelle, and truly the place could hold out no longer. The famine was at its worst. Out of about thirty ty thousand people only five thousand were left alive, and they were starving; of six hundred Englishmen who had staid to help the Rochellese all were dead but sixty-two. Corpses lay thick in the streets, for the people were too weak from fasting even to bury their dead. The end had come. On the 30th of October, 1628, after nearly fifteen months of heroic effort and frightful suffering, Rochelle surrendered.

Richelieu at once sent food into the town, and treated the people very kindly, but he took away all the old rights and privileges of the city. He pulled down all the earth-works used by the defenders of the place, and gave orders that nobody should build even a garden fence anywhere near the town. He made a law that no Protestant who was not already a citizen of Rochelle should go there to live, and that the "city of refuge" should never again receive any stranger without a permit from the King.

OUR FIGHT WITH THE SNAPPING-TURTLE.

BY ALLAN FORMAN.

IT all happened one day last summer. We started for home with the most peaceable intentions. Nothing was further from our thoughts than a fight, and, to tell the truth, we did not do much fighting. As my cousin Ben remarked, after the affair was over, "The turtle could fight enough to answer for the whole party." But that was after we had run away, and the wholesale praise tended to lessen the humiliation of three boys who had been routed by one turtle. But I am commencing at the wrong end of my story, so I will begin at the beginning, and start over again.

There were three of us—my cousins Ben and Charlie and myself. We had started for a swim in a small lake not far from our house, and after rowing across to a little bend where we could be free from observation, we undressed, and jumping into the boat again started to push out into deep water, so that we could "dive off." Just as we had got fairly under headway, the oar which Ben was using to push with stuck in the mud, and was wrenched from his grasp.

"There goes the oar," he said, ruefully, as the boat shot ahead.

"Here we go, you'd better say," commented Charlie. "The oar is perfectly still."

"Well, give me a stick or a bailer, or something to paddle with," replied Ben. There was nothing of the kind in the boat; we had taken out all the movable articles, intending to turn her over, and give her a good washing. "See if there isn't an old tin pan under the forward seat," said Ben; "Uncle John generally keeps one there."

Charlie thrust his hand under the seat in the bow, and poked around for a moment.

"Yes, there is—" Interrupting himself with a shriek, he exclaimed, "Here's a snapping-turtle," and jumped on the seat with the agility of a monkey.

The turtle crawled out from his place of concealment in no very good humor. His little red eyes glared and his jaws snapped like a strong steel-trap. Something evidently disturbed him. Perhaps he was offended at having been mistaken for a tin pan. At all events, he made excellent time toward my bare feet, which I promptly removed to a place of safety on the thwart. He then waddled over toward Ben, who lost no time in securing an elevated position on the stern seat.

There we sat, Charlie in the bow, I in the middle, and Ben in the stern, perched on the seats, while a miserable little snapping-turtle practically had possession of the boat. To be sure, he couldn't make the boat go where he wanted it to, but he could keep us from doing so. We dared not jump overboard, for it was too far to swim ashore, and, moreover, we were afraid that the turtle would get at us when we clambered in.

We sat for some time in silence, and the turtle seemed to be thinking also, but it was not for long. He had evidently made up his mind as to what course to pursue, and he started for me again. This time he jumped and missed me but by a few inches. Then, as if to show no partiality, he jumped at Charlie. It was surprising how rapidly that turtle could get about. He rushed up and down the boat, snapping his jaws and jumping at us.

Finally Ben spoke, calmly but seriously. He said: "Boys, I suppose that you are so busy thinking about that turtle that you haven't noticed that we are floating toward the hotel, and will be in front of it in about five minutes."

Horrors! To think of making such a ridiculous figure to our friends at the hotel! What could be done?

"Let's jump out and push the boat ashore," I suggested.

"We'd be tired before we got half-way, and we couldn't get in again," objected Charlie.

"I'll tell you," said Ben, a sudden thought flashing over him. "I'll jump into the water and take off my trunks, then let him bite 'em and drop him overboard."

This seemed the only practicable plan, and it was adopted. Charlie took the trunks and held them in front of the turtle. He closed his jaws on them with a snap like a spring lock. Then Charlie lifted him carefully over the side of the boat and dropped him into the water. But here was another difficulty. The turtle refused to let go. Charlie bobbed the trunks up and down and shook them, but without success. Finally, becoming disgusted, he grasped the trunks firmly, and whirling them around his head half a dozen times, suddenly let go. A party of summer boarders from the hotel, who just came round the bend, were astonished by the sight of a turtle flying through the air with a pair of striped bathing trunks in his mouth. The turtle dropped into the water about forty feet from us, and by dint of pushing and resting by turns we managed to get back to our clothes.

We found out afterward that Uncle John had caught the turtle and had forgotten to throw it overboard. We did not refer to the matter at home, for though it was no joke to us at the time, it seemed very ridiculous to admit that one small turtle could put us to so much trouble. Ben contented himself with arousing the curiosity of the family and making us feel uncomfortable at the supper table by inquiring solemnly,

"I wonder what that fellow is doing with my bathing trunks?"

And judging from the grip with which he held on to them, I should imagine he had them yet.

ST. VALENTINE AND HIS DAY.

BY A. R. B.

WE are bound to confess that when the month of February arrives St. Valentine becomes a very important person to our young folk. For a month or more his power seems supreme; and we also know that all the year round deft fingers are busy upon the offerings suitable to his day.

Who was St. Valentine, and what has he to do with this strange custom?

It is more easy to answer the first question than the second.

All that is known of the saint is soon told. The origin of our present custom is not so certain. More than one explanation has been given, and the following has much in its favor.

Isaac Disraeli has pointed out that many of our children's games, the tumblers and street acrobats, the carnivals and speaking pantomimes of Italy, were all once common in ancient Rome. And so the custom connected with St. Valentine's name may also be traced to a rite that was practiced in the same city.

In the month of February a feast called Luperclia was held in honor of the rustic god Pan. Then took place a ceremony no doubt much in favor with the young people at Rome. The names of young girls were placed with proper solemnity in a box and shaken up. The young men then drew these names, and thus each obtained what we should call a Valentine.

But the leaders of the early Christian Church, wishing to do away with heathen rites and superstitions, made a change in this. The young men, instead of drawing the names of young girls, drew those of early saints, and each was supposed to imitate the example of the saint whose name he drew.

As the heathen rite took place about the 14th of February, that day was fixed on for the new ceremony. Then, that being St. Valentine's Day, his name has come down to us linked with the custom.

So we can fully acquit St. Valentine of having aught to do with our present style of celebrating his day. He was a Christian martyr who suffered death at Rome under the Emperor Claudius.

The extraordinary number of letters now posted on the 13th and 14th of February is scarcely credible; but without the aid of figures we can obtain some idea from the lateness of the postman's call and the strange figure which he generally presents on those days.

Poor man, he has something for nearly every house on that morning, and has to make his round hung about with bags and bundles like a beast of burden. And yet he makes the best of it, and has a kind word for the youngsters who hurry to the door to meet him.

N A N.*

BY MRS. LUCY C. LILLIE,

AUTHOR OF "MILDRED'S BARGAIN," "AUNT RUTH'S TEMPTATION," ETC.

CHAPTER XXIV.

"DOES it rain here often in the autumn?"

It was Nan who asked the question as she sat perched in the window of Mrs. Heriot's store-room, while that good woman was busy bottling the last of her preserves. The store-room was hardly on a lower floor than the dining-room and black-walnut parlor; that is to say, it opened off a little corridor reached by a descent of only three steps, and Nan was always ready to spend an hour there with Mrs. Heriot or Susan, for there was a peculiar fascination about the shelves, and the big, deep window with its little flap of curtain, and the space between the cupboards, where were a large, low table and two big, old-fashioned chairs. Sometimes Nan had helped Mrs. Heriot pare apples or peaches there, and one delightful day she and Joan had helped label preserve jars and stick cloves into the pickled pears. In these last they had made various initials with the cloves, intending to keep a keen eye open all winter for their re-appearance.

"Does it rain often?" rejoined Mrs. Heriot, looking up absent-mindedly from her work. "Well, I don't know what you'd call often. Where I came from in England we thought nothing of ten days' rain together; but then—don't bother, child!—Christmas will bring you a good frost and maybe some skating."

"Oh, Christmas!" exclaimed Nan. She rubbed a clear place on the window-pane and looked out. Everywhere the lawns and garden beds were drenched, and there was a melancholy sound in the half-leaftless trees. Yet Nan felt very happy. She had so much to fill her life now-days that even rainy days were pleasant. It was assuredly a cause of regret that Lance had been sent to school in Paris, and Nan had to feel sorry that Laura was not well; but Laura had never been her playfellow, and, besides, of late she had been more than ever distant; Joan remained the happy, brisk, loving Joan of the spring and summer time; and, best of all, she had succeeded admirably with her charges, Mrs. Travers and little David.

Every week the accounts were satisfactory. Even Miss Prior was beginning to look kindly upon the arrangement, and so pleased was Aunt Letty that there was talk of Nan's doing something more extensive next year. Phyllis was no longer doubtful about it, or, at least, she only smiled in her peculiar way once in a while; and Nan had grown to be really good friends with Love Blake. Love had given her the soundest kind of counsel, encouraged her when she felt sad, and even helped her in purchases.

Now Nan knew that to her cousin Phyllis Rolf the boatman's daughter seemed a very ordinary person, yet Nan loved her, and Miss Rolf had never interfered. She had never murmured, like Phyllis, that it was a common taste; and Nan felt that little Love, with her quiet, peaceful eyes, and her ready, unselfish heart, could teach her many very noble lessons.

"There is Susan calling," said Nan, suddenly. Mrs. Heriot put her pickle jar down and listened, and at that moment Susan appeared, quite breathless, in the doorway.

"Oh, Miss Annie!" she said, "it's your aunt's carriage come for you. She's in College Street, and you are to go at once, if you please, miss."

Nan sprang down from her perch. She could not have said why, yet an undefined dread took possession of her. What did it mean? She knew Miss Rolf had gone out shopping; but why should she have sent for her to come to College Street?

"Is Laura ill?" asked Nan, trembling, as she hurried upstairs to put on her things. But no one seemed able to answer. It was the only thing she could think of; for of all the College Street cousins Laura was the only sickly one.

Nan hardly knew—long afterward it was difficult to remember—just how she got into the carriage, and, with that nameless dread upon her, was driven down the familiar streets. It was fast growing dark, and the wet pavements shone under the street lamps. The little girl in the carriage strained her gaze against the window-pane, looking out eagerly for the iron gateway and the galleried wing of the pleasant house. But everything was curiously quiet as she went in, and, according to custom, she ran upstairs to lay off her things in Joan's room. After all, there was nothing so remarkable in being sent for to a house which she was in and out of every other day. Nan smiled at her own fears as she pushed open the door of the girls' room.

The darkness was not absolute here. Nan could see a figure on the bed; and Laura's face, white and haggard, started up from the pillows. On seeing Nan she gave a little shudder, buried her face again, and then looked up with a strained, feverish gaze.

All Nan's tender heart was filled with pity. "Oh, Laura darling," she said, kneeling down by the side of the little bed, "what is it?—are you worse?"

But Laura shrank back a moment, and then said, in a hoarse voice, entirely unlike her own, "Nan! Nan! listen to me: if you tell of me you will kill me!"

"What, I tell of you?" exclaimed Nan. "What do you mean?"

"Oh! oh!" moaned Laura, moving restlessly about in the bed. "I am so ill! what can I do? Go down-stairs, Nan—you will hear—go down."

Wonderingly Nan laid aside her hat and jacket, and went down the stairs. Midway she met Phyllis, who stopped and looked at her very strangely. There was only the light of the hall lamp on the faces of the two cousins, but it showed Phyllis's full of pain and anxiety, and Nan's fearless, sweet glance raised to hers, now only touched by something wondering and perplexed.

"IF YOU TELL OF ME YOU WILL KILL ME."

Phyllis gazed earnestly a moment, and then said, "Go to Aunt Letty in the study, Nan." She added, in an instant, "I know you will make it all right."

"What?" asked bewildered little Nan; but Phyllis passed swiftly on, and Nan had nothing to do but to seek Aunt Letty in the small library, known as the study. When she opened the door of that room it was a relief to find Miss Rolf seated in the window, alone.

CHAPTER XXV.

MISS ROLF made a quick movement as Nan shut the door quietly after her; and as the little girl stood still, hesitatingly, in the twilight, she exclaimed,

"Come here, Annice, there is something I want you to explain at once; come, come."

Miss Rolf seemed feverishly impatient and unlike herself. Nan saw in her hands a long bill headed by Ames's mark and address.

"I have got in the account," Miss Rolf continued. "There are things here— Oh, Annice!" the old lady exclaimed, piteously, "if you wanted anything—a new sash, or even those tinsel things, or lace collarettes—why didn't you tell me? It would have been so much better than to buy them in secret."

"I!" Nan gasped out the word. She was more bewildered than ever.

"Look!" exclaimed Miss Rolf again, sternly. "Read this." And she pushed the long bill toward the child.

Nan mechanically took it in her hands and began reading as well as she could. Scattered among the articles she had purchased for the Traverses were various others, unknown to her—pink sash ribbon, lace collarettes, collars, cuffs, tinsel ornaments, beads. The number and the strangeness of it bewildered poor Nan, while her aunt threateningly stood over her. Suddenly, like an awful shock, as it were from the very heavens, it flashed over her. She had seen these very things in Laura's possession!

What it all meant Nan could not even then tell, but, coupled with Laura's wild supplications "not to tell of her," she felt there was guilt somewhere, and that not her own. Nan was too young to be entirely self-possessed or equal to knowing what to do. The paper shook in her hands. What could she do or say? Little by little occasions came back to her mind when she had seen Laura quickly hiding these things. And the tinsel ornaments! How clearly Nan now understood what Laura's anxiety to hide them after the play had meant!

For Nan those moments were horrible. What could she do? It was not in her heart or nature suddenly to speak and condemn her cousin. But there was Aunt Letty waiting, with her features all drawn and haggard, all too anxious to restore Nan to favor, yet evidently thinking the worst.

"Oh!" cried Nan, suddenly, looking up wildly at her aunt, "please—let me wait a moment; give me a few moments and I can tell you."

She flung down the paper, and started up the stairs to Laura's room. As she entered she saw the white face on the pillow, and heard the sick girl moan. She flung herself down beside the bed, whispering, "Oh, Laura, I must tell, you know—you know! Oh, let me tell them!" Her voice broke down in sobs.

"You shall not!" whispered Laura back. "You will kill me if you do. Wait a little while. You must not!" Laura really grew faint, and Nan looked at her half in pity, half in contempt.

"And you will not own to it?" Nan asked, slowly.

But Laura only buried her face and sobbed convulsively. Had not Phyllis appeared, Nan would have said more; but on seeing her elder cousin the little girl turned and left the room, returning to the study. What was there for her to do or to say? She could not tell. How could she blame Laura? how stand up and disgrace her cousin—Phyllis's sister? And even were she to do so, would she be believed? And Laura was really ill, worn out, Nan did not now doubt, by her wretched secret.

Everything seemed to be in a whirl about her as she re-entered the study, where Miss Rolf still stood as she had left her.

"Well?" The old lady spoke sharply.

But Nan, for the first time, only hung her head.

"Explain this, Annice," her aunt said, coldly.

Nan tried to find her voice, and failed. Then she said, slowly, "I can not."

"Is it that you will not?" demanded her aunt.

No answer.

"Annice, did you hear me?"

"Yes, Aunt Letty."

"And can you not answer?"

"No."

Nan's voice sounded even to herself a far-away whisper. There was silence for a moment—silence, at least, in the little room. Outside, the rain beat furiously, and for a long time Annice Rolf never heard the same sound without a recollection of the faint, sick feeling that possessed her as she stood with bowed head before her aunt.

"You may go," said Miss Rolf, presently. "Go home at once in the carriage, and send it back for me. And go at once to your room. Do you hear, Annice? Go at once."

It seemed like a dream to Nan—her going up the stairs, knocking at Laura's door, and mechanically asking Phyllis for her things. How she put them on; how she got into the carriage and gave her aunt's orders; how she drove home through the dark, wet streets, and reached the house and her own little room—seemed afterward all recollections in the mists of a nightmare. But there she was at last, in the window of her room, and crying as if her heart would break. Oh, for one word with Lance, or Love Blake! And if Laura should never tell! And in the midst of all, and, I rejoice to say, the very worst of all, seemed to Nan to lie in the fact of Laura's double deceit. What could have induced her to it? Wayward, thoughtless, forgetful as was Nan, her conscience was unstained by any actual sin, and not for worlds could she have been tempted to a lie.

IN THE WESTERN OCEAN.

BY RICHARD DOWLING.

"IT is many a good long year ago since what I'm going to tell you about happened," said Captain William Grant, of the brig Dolphin, as he crossed his legs, shook the ashes out of his pipe, and settled himself comfortably for telling a yarn. "It is many a good long year ago, my lads. I was then a boy thirteen or fourteen years of age, and what I'm going to tell you happened aboard this very brig Dolphin.

"She was then not more than four years old, and not one of the liners could touch her running free. We loaded oats in Limerick for London, and put to sea on a heavy February day. We were hardly clear of the land when the glass began to fall, and all the heavens thickened up with the clouds like dirt. I heard the captain saying to the mate, as they stood at the skylight—this very skylight over our head now, boys—that he didn't like the look of it at all. Then he looked aloft and into the wind, which was nearly due east, then walked aft. As he came back he said, 'There aren't three hours between us and bare poles.'

"I agree with you," said the mate; 'and we're too far off to beat back.'

"In less than an hour we were close reefed. In less than two the stow was upon us. The wind was something terrible, lads. Before it struck us with its full force we had taken everything off her except the fore double-reefed topsail; and when the gale struck her it took that topsail out of the bolt-ropes as easily as I chuck that tobacco-pouch across the table.

"What went after the topsail I can't tell. There was a terrible crash, and—remember, lads, I was a younger then—in a few minutes it seemed as if everything aloft had come down by the run. Some rope or spar, I don't know what, knocked me over, and all the men were busy with their knives cutting away the wreck before I came to. By that time both topmasts were gone, short of the trucks, and the great danger was that the wreck, which we were towing upon our port side, would stave in the planks of the hull. Some of the stanchions and bulwarks had been carried away by the wreck, and although we had a dry deck—not a bucket of water had come aboard yet—the Dolphin looked as though she had been hammered and tongs at it for a fortnight.

"For six-and-thirty hours that gale blew. Then the wind died away, and it fell a dead calm. This was even worse than the gale. Every minute I expected the brig would founder. Now she was in the trough of the sea, broadside, now stern foremost, now bow foremost, now with her quarter to the sea. She was utterly helpless, and during the gale we had lost two men overboard.

"All this time we had no exact notion of where we were. The captain had no knowledge of navigation, and no man aboard was a bit better off in this way. But even if the captain had had all the science in the world, we had no chance of taking the sun, no chronometer aboard, and, to the horror of all, it was found out that, in the excitement and the danger, no one had thought of winding watch or clock, and we were without the time. You can see, my lads, we were in a nice fix. We were hundreds of miles out in the Western Ocean; the boat and the galley had been swept away; we could hardly show a rag of canvas even if a breeze sprang up; we were dismantled; we had no man aboard who knew anything of navigation; we hadn't the time, and we had provisions for but one month.

"Days and weeks went by, and still we saw no sail. For the first fortnight we were allowed the same grub as usual; but then we were put on half-allowance. We had, by some fortunate good chance, an extra barrel of water aboard; and whether it was owing to the weight of the barrels, or the secure way in which they were lashed down, they had not been washed away. If they had, we should, of course, have died. The grub was safe enough in the harness-casks at the foot of the companion and in the lockers.

"At the end of six weeks we had one barrel of water, and two days' half-allowance of grub. Still we saw no sail. We gave ourselves up for lost. In six weeks and two days the last biscuit was gone, the last pound of beef eaten. We still had a cask of water untouched, and with that we could manage to live for a few days longer; but I think by this time we gave ourselves up. Still the sea was rolling and tumbling around us, every now and then sweeping the decks. We were all as weak as children by this time, and if the pumps had wanted tending for more than fifteen minutes out of the two hours, we could not have manned them regularly. What made matters worse was that, beyond tending the pumps, we had nothing to do. We had plenty of coals yet, but we had nothing to cook.

"I have been often out in a bad gale since, but I'd rather ride out the biggest storm of wind that ever came out of the heavens, than lie another six weeks helpless like that in the Western Ocean, with the waves running mountains high.

"There was one man among the crew, Jim Clarke by name, I never liked. He was a tall, thin, dark-bearded sea-lawyer, with a list to starboard. I will say he was a thorough sailor, and knew his business as well as any man in the brig. But he was always grumbling and growling, and ever since we came to be put on short allowance his grumbling and growling grew worse and worse.

"None of the men liked Clarke. He was always trying to stir up a mutiny about something or other, and the first day we were put on short allowance, when it was his watch below, I heard him say:

"What I want to know, men, is this: Here we are, sticking by this brig out in the Western Ocean, and now we're cut down to half-victuals. Are the owners going to make up to us for half starving us while navigating this brig? While I'm aboard this brig my wages are running on, and why shouldn't my full victuals be running on also?

"I'll tell you what it is, Clarke,' said one of the men, with a grim laugh, 'if I were you, and didn't like my berth, I'd pack up my bag and chest, and step ashore.'

"At this the other men laughed, and Clarke knocked off, and said no more about the matter.

"But now that we hadn't a pound of beef or a biscuit, and were already weakened by exposure and short grub, Clarke spoke more openly. He said:

"Here we are now without a blessed mouthful of grub aboard; and all this time since we were put on short victuals we've been saving the owner ninnepence a day each man. The cargo and the ship are insured, and if we don't live to get ashore the owner will have all the value of the brig from the insurance people, and all the wages too except those who drew on advance notes. Now I'm blowed if I'm going to let the owners have all my money, for I got nothing on an advance note. I'm not one of the sort that want to die. I want to live, and I mean to live; and I want to get my money.'

"The other men said they all wanted to live, but how was it to be done?

"Clarke suddenly looked round, and there was something in his evil eye which made my blood run cold. Never in all my life before did I see so horrible an expression in any man's face. There was something in it like you see in the eye of a rat when he turns on you in a corner. Then he said, in a low, clear voice: 'There are nine of us; we have nothing to do but tend the pumps. Why shouldn't one of us go for the good of the others?'

"The three men gave a groan of horror. 'No,' said one of them, indignantly; 'we were messmates together, and we can die together, like men—not like brute beasts.'

"I think these words and the way they were taken by the other men showed Clarke he had no chance of arguing them into what he wanted them to do. All the remainder of that watch below there was no other word spoken; and when we went on deck (we had to guess the time, of course, for we had no watch or clock going) the men avoided Clarke, and when he caught hold of a pump handle with another of the men, that man dropped the handle and walked aft. I tell you, my lads, that if the men were disgusted, I was frightened well-nigh out of my life. I sat or lay thinking on the deck all that watch, wondering what would become of us.

"I thought to myself, 'Can it be possible that we are aboard this brig, with close upon two hundred tons of oats, out of which no doubt some sort of food could be made, and that, while we have water to make it with, we must either die of hunger or turn cannibals?'

"Just as the captain and his watch came on deck a thought suddenly struck me, and I went up to him—he was a kind man, and I wasn't a bit afraid of him—and said, 'May I speak with you aft, sir, for a minute?'

"'Certainly, boy,' he said. 'Come this way.'

"'If you please, sir, Jim Clarke said in the cabin, in our watch below, that it was better one of us should be killed than that all should starve.'

"'If Clarke,' said the captain, 'talks any more such horrible nonsense, I'll throw him over the side to cool him.'

"'And, if you please, sir, I thought just when you came on deck that we might be able to get some oats.'

"'But, boy, we can't touch the hatches. You know that very well; and even if you got at the oats, what could you do with it? We're not horses; we can't eat oats?'

"'No, sir; but if we broke through one of the after-bulk heads we could get some oats, and we could grind it up in the coffee-mill, and boil it and make porridge.'

"'Hurrah!' said the captain. 'Well said, youngster. We ought all to be keel-hauled for not thinking of that before. Our brains must have got stupid with hardship and hunger. Come on, men. Cheer up. The youngster has done the trick, and we ought all to be ashamed of ourselves.'

"In a very few minutes the carpenter was at work boring an anger-hole in the bulk-head between the hold and the captain's state-room, and in a very few minutes more we had a couple of buckets of oats. We put on a pot of water; we roused up the fire; we clamped the coffee-mill to the cabin table; and while one man attended the fire, another ground away as hard as he could.

"When all was ready the captain called all the men down to the cabin and shut the companion on the inside so as to keep out the water. Then he said: 'My lads, we have to thank this youngster here for this fine supper of porridge when we are on the point of starving. There is one amongst us who shall have no porridge to-night. Jim Clarke wanted us to turn man-eaters. He shall make his supper to-night of the top of a belaying-pin. But to-morrow morning, just to show him we're not as great brutes as he, we will give him half a plateful. Now, my lads, let us all thank God, and then you fall to.'

"The captain did not eat a mouthful until all of us had finished, but I warrant you that did not take us long. Jim Clarke begged and howled for some, but the captain would not give him a spoonful. 'No, my sonny,' said he; 'you'll do to-night on cold water, and if the night's fasting kills you we promise not to eat you up, but to throw you overboard as if you were a good shipmate and no man-eating sea-lawyer.'

"For five days more we drifted about in the Western Ocean, and were then sighted by a homeward-bound bark. She bore down upon us, and sent a boat aboard. Soon we had plenty of provisions. The captain of the bark offered to take us all off, but our captain refused to go. The bark fortunately had some spare spars, which were thrown overboard, and towed to us by the boat. The captain also gave us some spare sails, and enough provisions to last us for a month, and he sent his own second mate, who had passed in navigation, aboard us.

"When the captain of the bark had done all this he promised to stand by us for a day or two to see how we got on. At the end of that day we had got a jury-mast rigged to the foremast, and on this we set a large square-sail. Next day we rigged up another sail, and, to make a long story short, erept slowly back to the coast of Ireland, and at last arrived in Kinsale.

"It was three months before the Dolphin was again ready for sea. I have sailed in her pretty much ever since, and met with no accident of any account. One good thing those two months in the Western Ocean did me was to show me that every ambitious boy who goes to sea ought to know navigation. It is thirty-five years since I passed, and I am now qualified to take any kind of a craft to any part of the world."

REG.

BY MATTHEW WHITE, JUN.

CHAPTER III.

"SIT down by the fire whilst I hurries up the tax," said Mrs. Tinburn, casting about her in search of a chair that was not filled with articles of one kind or another. "Billy 'll be in omny minute now. But shure 'n' where's yer clothes?"

Reg's first impulse was to answer that he had them on; then understanding what the woman meant, he replied, gravely, "In Aunt Susan's bag."

"An' where's yer Aunt Susan, an' why don't yez stop wid her?"

But Reg was spared explaining this delicate point by the entrance of Billy, his twin Prince. He was perhaps a trifle older than Reg, and had a pale, freckled face, reddish hair, and a turn-up nose that lent him anything but a princely cast of countenance.

"Shure, Billy," cried his mother, waving the loaf of bread she was cutting toward Reg, "here's the bhiy Mr. Smith's hired to take poor Sammy's place in the play to-night; an' yer both to be at the theatre at seven prompt, as this new un hasn't had any rehearsin'."

The two boys stared at one another, as boys always do on being introduced.

Reg had his mouth open to ask some more questions, when Mrs. Tinburn exclaimed, "Shure an' it's toime yez were off," and five minutes later the two boys were on their way to Smith's Theatre, to make their début as the Twin Princes.

"Will to-night be the first time you ever acted?" asked Reg, keeping close to Billy's shabby coat as they hurried along.

"No, I played in a piece last winter over a hundred times."

"Don't you ever feel kind of—kind of trembly?" continued Reg.

"No, there ain't nothin' to tremble about or be scared of 'ceptin' Dan Danderbry. He makes fun o' me foine clothes, an' says they ought to reduce me wages, 'cause I'm so pale, an' 'use up so much paint,' and poor white-faced Billy gave a weak little laugh as he tried to make a joke of his persecutions.

"Use up so much paint!" exclaimed Reg, inquiringly. "Oh yes, I remember Mr. Smith said I would look better when I had some on. Does it hurt when they do it?"

"Not a bit, but yez must kape orful still, or Madame York, the ould lady what fixes us up 'll stick the brush in yer eye. But here's the theatre; now kape close to me, which is what yez must do the whole evenin';" and as he spoke Billy hurried in at the stage-door.

BILLY AND REG IN THE COSTUME OF THE "TWIN PRINCES."

For an instant Reg shrank back, but Billy pulled him in, whispering sharply, "Don't be scared," and presently the two boys were helping one another dress as the Twin Princes.

Billy's costume was exactly the same as Reg's, and very queer he looked, with his pale, pinched features set off by such splendid attire. However, as soon as the wigs had been adjusted, he told Reg to come with him upstairs, where, in a little room off the stage, a very cross old woman, with a bundle of colored sticks in her hand, speedily gave a vivid flush to the pale cheeks, and an inky blackness to the straggling eyebrows.

When it came Reg's turn to be "touched up," he sat down on the rickety chair with much the same sensations he had experienced on his first visit to the dentist's, but remembering Billy's caution, he scarcely breathed while Madame York's skillful fingers did the necessary work.

"Now come," directed Billy: "yez must get used to the stage, yer know, so ye won't be afther gapin' all about, loike a wild Injui, whin ye go on in the perversion—but what's the matter wid ye?" for Reg had suddenly grasped his brother Prince by the arm with a clutch that was not a little startling.

"Look there! What's that?" and Reg with trembling finger pointed to a row of hideous skeletons grinning at them from behind a side scene.

"Oh, shure an' those be only the remains found afther the big battle in the third act; an' moind, don't ye go to bein' afraid o' the firin', for it won't hurt yez, though ye can't see for the smoke."

Poor Reg! What with skeletons, battles, and blinding smoke to look forward to, life on the stage did not seem half so inviting as it had in the afternoon; and then everything was so different here behind the curtain. No gilding, not even paint or plaster to hide the bricks; all the lights inclosed with cage-like wire screens instead of handsome glass globes; no soft carpet on the floor, but dust and dirt everywhere, and— "Hello, youngster!"

This exclamation, accompanied as it was by a tremendous slap on the shoulder, so startled Reg that he fell back heavily against one of the shaky pillars of the palace, causing it to tremble from its foundations.

"Good evening, Prince," went on the irrepressible Danderbry. "Do you think you will be able to get along until eleven without taking another nap?"

But at that moment some one called "Dan! Dan!" and Reg was left in peace and solitude, for the call-boy's appearance was the signal for Billy Timburn's instant disappearance.

In vain did Reg seek for him among the stately corridors of the castle; not a boy was to be seen, only carpenters and scene-shifters, in their shirt sleeves, putting the finishing touches to the abode of the Twin Princes.

"Where can he be?" wondered the boy, anxiously; for without Mr. Smith or Billy at his side, he felt quite awed by the strange sights around him.

So, hurrying in and out between scenes representing houses and forests, streets and prisons, he finally reached a piece of canvas, the flapping of which tempted him to draw it aside to see if Billy had not vanished behind it. But he had no sooner put his head in at the opening than he drew it back again with a jerk, for he had seen, not a possible hiding-place for Billy Timburn, but the half-assembled audience in the parquet.

"Here, you young rascal, what do you mean by exposing yourself before the curtain in that style?" and Mr. Wellington Smith's voice did not sound at all friendly, as he pulled Reg toward him by the ear, and threatened him with a box on the same if he did not behave himself. "Now do you know what you have to do? Have you gone over the part with Billy Timburn, as I told you to?"

"If you please, sir," answered Reg, as evenly as he could with his heart beating in between the words. "I can't find Billy."

"Not find him? Why, didn't he come here with you? Bring him to me instantly—instantly, I say;" and the angry junior manager glowered at Reg so fiercely that the latter dashed off right among the dangling skeletons without so much as giving them a thought.

He met the object of his search just coming up from the dressing-room, whither he had retreated to escape the merciless Danderbry, and hastily and with inward trepidation the two boys returned to stand before Mr. Wellington Smith.

That gentleman greeted them with some very unpleasant remarks, and after having caused them both to hang their heads as if they had been caught stealing apples, he ordered them to retire to the wings, and march in with the air of princes.

But now the musicians in the orchestra could be heard tuning up, and the next moment a throng of courtiers, soldiers, servants, and pages swarmed over the stage, effectually putting a stop to any more impromptu rehearsals. Reg was then handed over to the stage-manager, an old man with spectacles, ruffled hair, and such a wild look that poor Prince Budaway fairly quailed before him.

"Now stand right here," was his command to the boys. "You're on in all acts except the second;" and then he rapidly explained how, where, and when they were to sit down, stand up, bow, wave their hands, and walk off.

Meanwhile the orchestra in front of the curtain was playing a lively march; men, women, and children, in all sorts of costumes, were rushing in and out among the wings. Mr. Smith was seen flying back and forth, scolding, advising, re-arranging, and scattering, all of which sights and sounds combined nearly drove Reg distracted, although he tried not to mind them, but to think only of the work before him.

Presently the music ceased, a bell rang, and with a rushing sound, the curtain went up on the first act of The Twin Princes.

Ordered to stand back against the wall, Reg could only catch fleeting glimpses of what took place on the stage, although Billy at his side was trying to explain to him the plot of the piece, and "who was who." Every now and then men and women in knee-breeches, long trains, and powdered wigs, would brush by them to be ready to enter at the proper moment, and Reg decided that all the school-masters in the country could not look as cross nor speak as sharply as the stage-manager, who appeared to be able to read the book in his hand, watch the play, and frown at the waiting actors all at one and the same time.

But now the wings began to fill up with the red-coated soldiers from the dressing-room down-stairs, among them being included a full military band. A thin little man then set about the task of forming the procession which was to escort the Twin Princes to their throne, and dazzle the audience with its splendors. Eight pages, four in front and four behind, took their places next Reg and Billy, while the line of court ladies and noblemen extended quite a long distance toward the rear of the building.

But Prince Budaway never felt more like Reg Robinson in his life, and the hand he was told to rest gracefully on his sword hilt shook so as to call forth a sharp rebuke from the thin little drill-master, who spoke with a funny French accent, and who seemed to think that it was his duty to jerk people into their places as if they were so many wooden puppets.

Oh, how heartily Reg wished himself back at Broadfarms with Aunt Susan! for how was he, who had never even seen a play in all his life, to satisfy the requirements of all these cross people, who twisted his shoulders straight, raised his head by hitting him under the chin, and trained him for his rôle by various other exceedingly practical methods?

"Second scene, ready!" suddenly called out the Argus-eyed man with the book, and the next instant the drums began to beat, then the military band burst out with a crash of sounds, and the "grand, unequalled pageant" moved forward.

"SUCH A HEAVY LOAD!"

TRAP PLACE, LOUISIANA.

I am a little girl living in North Louisiana, and I want to tell you about a trap set by my brother Harry, and what he caught in it. He and a little colored boy named Sam set a trap in the garden under a pear tree. The next morning, when they went to look at it, it was sprung, and under it was mamma's speckled hen. She had gone under to get the meal, and had sprung the trap on herself. She was so big that the trap fitted on her back, and she would raise it up every time she fluttered her wings, but she couldn't get out, and there she was, squawking and fluttering like everything.

I wish that I could draw a picture to show you how funny Harry and Sam looked trying to get her out, for she was as fierce as a cat. The boys were both on their knees, Harry so very, very white—even his hair is white—and Sam so very, very black.

Harry and Sam go to the gin-house every day to get cottonseed to feed the sheep and calves with, and it is very funny to see them both on old John the horse, Harry in front, and Sam behind holding the sack of seed, and sometimes old John throws them both up in the air.

Harry's aunt gave him HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE for a Christmas present, and I read it too, and like it very much. Some time I will write and tell you about a wonderful dog of ours.

VIRGINIA H. J.

GOLDSBOROUGH, NORTH CAROLINA.

My brother and I have taken Young People ever since it was published, and he has written letters so much that I want to write one too. We have a little dog named Trotty, and we love him as much as Toby Tyler loved Mr. Stubbins. We had last summer a kitty named Jumbo, and one day we found her in the back yard dead. My little brother threw himself on the bed and cried, and then Cousin Josie got a box and put the kitten in it, and made a wreath of daisies around her head; then Clintie came and looked at her, and didn't cry any more, and helped us bury her.

BERTIE D.

It certainly is a great comfort to find a poor dead pet a nice funeral, is it not, children?

NEW LONDON, CONNECTICUT.

Not long ago I saw in the Post-office Box a letter from a boy named Charles E. T., living in Amesbury, Massachusetts, who said he was twelve on October 21 or 22 of last year. I would like to ask him if he knew he had a twin in New London. I was twelve years old on the same day. The only trouble is, our names are the same. I have been sick with scarlet fever, and had a relapse, and was sick with the relapse longer than I was with the fever. I have been sick eight weeks in all, and have to do all sorts of things to amuse myself, as I am alone a good deal of the time. My principal occupation has been reading over the back numbers of Young People and St. Nicholas. I have a brother Charles a year older than myself, and I should like to see my twin and see if he is anything like my brother.

LOUISE H. A.

Let me tell you of my dear little baby brother. His name is Cadwalliger; rather an odd and odd name for such a small child, perhaps, but it is a family name. We call him Wally for short, and he is so sweet, and he sends me all sorts of crazy after picture-books, and even balls dear Young People when it arrives.

Dear Postmistress, I often wish I had the sweet, good disposition of my baby brother, and would give so many letters which must go through your hands. Good-by.

LULU C.

Thank you, dearie. The more letters the merrier. If you should all stop writing, just think what a forlorn Postmistress I would be.

BALTIMORE, MARYLAND.

Will you oblige a little girl ten years old by putting her little story in the Post-office Box?

LITTLE MAY'S REWARD.

There was once a little girl named May. When she was seven years old she had a great habit of running away, and once, when she was wandering about in the yard, she found a bright five-cent piece. At first she thought she would keep it, for her mother was not very well off, with two or three little ones besides her; but when she remembered what her Sunday-school teacher had told her, that she must never take a pin which did not belong to her, so she went into the house and told her mother all about it.

Her mother was just then talking to a lady, who told her that her little boy had lost the five cents, and then she kissed Little May, and told her that it was very nice of her to find and tell the owner, and the very next day a box came for May, and in it was a beautiful doll, and that was May's reward.

MARY A. M.

Miss C. L. H., of New York, incloses to the Postmistress, precisely as he wrote it, a composition by one of her pupils—a boy of eleven. The interest taken by teachers in the Post-office Box is very gratifying.

THE COW.

The cow is a very useful animal in many ways. There is always something sleepy-looking about a cow. Some cows are very pretty. And when the weather is hot, and the flies worry them, they feed in some neighboring stream or river and cool off; that is, if a river or stream runs through the pasture in which they are. I said before that the cow was useful, she gives us milk, and from the milk we make cream, butter, and cheese. And when they kill her we make leather of her skin, and glue of her hoofs and horns.

In the winter we keep her in the barn, and we feed her on turnips, pumpkins, and hay. But in the spring and summer they lie and roam about the pasture or woods all day long, and feed on grass and clover until it is time for them to be milked. I could say many things about the cow, but I will reserve them for the next time.

NEW YORK CITY. DONN B.

Thanks are due to Miss E. M., of Pittsburgh, for her kind words about Young People, and for the clever budget for her little pupils. There is room to publish only one of the letters, but while Charles W.'s appears in the Post-office Box, George D. W. and Ella W. may be glad to know that the Postmistress thought their letters very well written, and a credit to themselves and their teacher. As these children have but lately begun to write, they will no doubt make wonderful progress the coming year.

PITTSBURGH, PENNSYLVANIA.

My name is Charlie W., and I live in Pittsburgh. We have a big blood-hound; it will pull a cart. We had a cat, and the dog killed it. I have a little brother, and he has a goat; and it pulls a cart, and he has a set of harness. My uncle has two horses and a cow, and it is a wild cow. I have a dove, and I call it Joe; it is a tame dove. I let it out one day, and it flew away and staid a week. I like pets, and take good care of them.

CHARLIE W.

ENCLERWOOD, ILLINOIS.

It is so cold to-day (January 29) that the schools have been dismissed, the temperature has fallen to thirty degrees below zero. I used a very pretty experiment, which I hope some of you will try. Take a bottle with a very large neck, and fill it with water up to the neck. Go to the drug store and get about three cents' worth of sugar of lead. Pour the lead into the water, and let it dissolve. Then take a small string and tie the end of the string to the neck of the bottle. Next get a match, and tie the other end of the string to the middle of it. After this is done, lay the match across the mouth of the bottle, and let the end of the string hang by the corners of the depth of the bottle into the water. If the bottle is not jarred, it will be very pretty in about five days.

FRANK C.

SEWANE, TENNESSEE.

I have not seen a letter from this place. This is my first attempt for the paper. I am a little girl seven years old. I have two sisters. We are very happy. I wish you would send me some of the Texas winter. I have a dog named Ring, and some beautiful chickens, which I love very much. I like "Nan" very much, but like Jimmy Brown's very much better. I wish you would send me some of the paper. My cousin Juliet gave me HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE this year. I have enjoyed it very much. I would be glad to see this letter in print; it would surprise my auntie, and please her.

JOHNNIE T.

WAYNOR, MISSISSIPPI.

I am a little girl eight years old, and have just commenced to take HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, and am just beginning to read; I cannot write, though, because I am so unfortunate as to have my right arm paralyzed. I have three little sisters and one little brother, all young, but I am. We are delighted with the dear little paper, and greatly interested in the Wiggles. I send you one in answer to No. 31, which I do hope may be in your paper. Your little friend,

CARLIE W.

FORT CONCHO, TEXAS.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS.—You invited me to write again, so I thought I would do so. I said in my letter that I would like to make a seat for putting and Indian pony riding. Early in the year there are loads of peacan-ants along the banks of the Concho River, on tall trees. We children get a big government wagon drawn by four mules, take gunny sacks to put the peacans into, and when we get to the place our big brother climbs the tree and shakes it hard, and down come the nuts. Oh! we have so much fun, and the nuts are so nice while they are fresh!

All the children here who can afford it have ponies. Harry is a gentle little steel gray one, called Harry, and he will take Harry for a ride every day, and I the next. We just go flying over these wild prairies, and feel splendid. There is a "post school" here, but we are taught at home; papa hears our book lessons, and mamma attends to our music. We are learning the piano and guitar. Our brother Guy has gone North to school.

We read Young People and two cavalry (colored) and five infantry (white men). The cavalry soldiers ride fine big horses. This is the headquarters of our regiment. The regimental band plays at the camp every day, and we have dress parade twice a week. There are a great many officers with their families at this fort.

We read Young People and St. Nicholas. We are not allowed to read novels. I think "Nan" is the best story I ever read.

Dear Postmistress, I would like to hear how you like the drawings I send. I am fond of drawing.

Good-by. I send you my love, because it seems as if I knew you so well.

KIRTH W. P.

I like your drawings very much, especially the cow, which is quite life-like. And I like your letter, and am sure the readers of the Post-office Box will be pleased with it too.

THE FROST ON THE WINDOW.

Bright pictures of fairy-land etched on our windows.

Etched by Jack Frost's bright silvery pen, Showing us truly the abode of the fairies And elves in a picture again and again.

A delicate picture in glistening silver, Destroyed by a touch, or even a breath; Then lost to its cover, forever, forever.

The beautiful picture that thus met its death.

They show us the rivers, the hills, and the valleys.

The mountains and plains of that hidden land; They show us the trees and the flowers of the elves.

They show us the forms of that mystic band.

This in our hearts are the queer-woven fancies And dreams of the future, so pleasant and sweet.

Seen through the day, when we gaze at the world, And woven and dreamed in the mist of the night.

HELEN M. CHASE (33 years old).

MAPLEWOOD, ILLINOIS.

I am interested in the Post-office Box, and like Young People very much. I am just twelve years old. I like history very much, and I have a Universal History, Barnes's Brief History of the United States, Sacred History, Peter Parley's Universal History, and Primer of England through. I do not study modelling, but I have been modelling for two years in wax only for amusement. I study drawing, and I have been going to school for only four months. I study biology at home. I made my first bust out of wax, and I have a column, which my parents think is worth keeping; it is two inches high. I am making a collection of minerals, old stones, etc. I make pony-boots, and eight inches long, with my pocket-knife; they have wax occupants in them.

When I was at my grandpa's on the prairies of Kansas, and he brought me a young prairie-wolf, and I kept her about a week, and she was very tame, and she adopted it. It would have starved the kittens if mother had not taken it away. Then we fed it with milk, and it became a great pet, as well as a watchdog, and I had to have a gun to kill the chickens that it could find. At last the vacation it thus occasioned became too strong to be borne, and it was killed.

ANTONIO M.

KIDDERWINSTER, ENGLAND.

I have never seen a letter from this place, so I thought I would write one. My dear papa, who is in Philadelphia, sends me HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE every week, and I like it very much. I am a member of "The Cruise of the Canoe Club," "Nan," and those tales by Jimmy Brown. I am very anxious to go to the postman to bring it. I have not any more of it, but I have a white column one, a little thrush, which I call Jacko. He will say almost anything that I try to teach him. I have already taught him to call "Percy" a little blue bird, and he does not like to be trained. He will call out, "Look at the wet." I go to a private school, and I am in the first class, and I study reading, spelling, arithmetic, grammar, geography, history, and French. I like to play the piano, music, and dancing. My mamma and I live by ourselves, but I have lots of little friends, who also read HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE with me, and they like it very much. I have been to my own country very much, but I do not like crossing the water. My papa likes it a little better than he did at first, and he goes to the postman to tell me about America and the places he goes to visit.

The weather here is very mild, and we have violets and pansies in full bloom. I hope you will print this, so that my dear papa may see it, as it looks all the better for sending to me; he will be pleased to see it. Trusting the Postmistress had a merry Christmas, and hoping she will have a happy New-Year.

With best love,
ANNIE W. (aged 11 years).

SALEM, NORTH CAROLINA.

You were so kind as to publish my letter, and in the note after it you asked me to write to you about our Holiday Club. Well, we meet every Wednesday at 4:30 p. m. I am the president. I can tell you best about it. I call the roll first to open the meeting (we have eight members); then I read the "Holiday Journal," edited by our secretary, each member contributing something to it piece. After that we allow our members to make any motion they want to. Then we read a chapter or two out of Alice in Wonderland. We have already read Tom Sawyer. After that the meeting closes.

Every month we elect new officers, but no officer may serve more than two terms. I am on my second term this year. Our officers are: President, W. A. B. ; president, Howard E. R. ; secretary, Rufus L. P. ; treasurer, and Addie L. F. ; Mary E. F. ; Will F. S. ; C. Etta L. ; and Wiley G. G. are members. I hope I have not made this letter too long.

ANDREW H. P.

What a charming little order of arrangements you have in your club, and how pleasant it is that you have both girls and boys as members, and that each contributes something to the enjoyment of all. I hope the Holiday Club may long flourish.

PROVIDENCE, RHODE ISLAND.

I have a dear little kitty named Frizzie, and I have a bird named Gypsy, and Ellery, my brother, has a bird named Jerry, and he takes HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE. I like to hear the letters come from Frizzie, come from the country, and two or three days ago she caught her first rat.

We have a little square mat made of wool, and she likes to sleep on it very much. I am five years old, and my brother Ellery was nine the 17th of November. Ellery stands at the head of the second class, and I learn at home; I am in the First Reader. My mother wrote this, but it is not all the way, and I will be glad to write the letters. I send my love to you. Will you please print it? Good-by.

CLINTON S. W.

NEW YORK CITY.

I was disappointed that Agnes Esie T. had not visited Spain, as I was born there, within twenty miles of the Alhambra at Granada, of which perhaps you have read. I am thirteen years old, and my papa gave me a hundred-dollar bill for my present, which is to be put in the bank for my "future good." On the last day that I was eleven years old I dressed up all my dolls, and sent them to a mission in which my aunt is interested.

Next year we are going to my Spanish home, Lindersbush, and I can hardly wait for that time to come. I am a visitor in England, Ireland, France, Switzerland, Germany, Russia, Austria, Italy, Greece, Egypt, and Jerusalem. I would like very much to go to China and India, but papa has hitherto had no business calling him there. I have been here three years, and, next to Spain, I think it the most beautiful country I ever saw.

IDA B.

CHICAGO, ILLINOIS.

I live eighty-one miles south of Chicago, in a little town in Iroquois County. I have not seen any letter from this neighborhood. I was playing with my schoolmates and I broke my "Whip-Cracker" five weeks ago last Thursday. I can't sit up in a chair yet, but the doctors say I may sit up next Thursday.

I do not have any pets. I have two canaries, named Dick and Goldie; the latter is so named because she is just like gold. We caught her in the street in June two summers ago. My aunt is very kind to me.

Last summer papa used to take me bunting with him. One afternoon we walked twelve miles. When we were coming in on the railroad we killed a snake that was three feet long and had two rattles. Mr. H. put two charges of No. 6 shot in it; that was all that it took to kill it.

Last summer we were in Pennsylvania, and my two cousins and myself were out in the woods with two dogs, when we came across a snake that was five feet long. A man happened to come along, and killed the snake for us. We tied a string around its neck, and dragged it home.

There is a place in Beaver County called Backbone, where there is a line of solid rock. There is a cave up in the rock about twenty feet, with a great number of bats in it.

I am getting a collection of cards, and have 156 choice ones. Yours truly, WILLIE C.

When I read that you broke your leg playing "Whip-Cracker," I inquired of a friend of mine, about your age, how it was played, and I concluded from his description that it was a dangerous game. I hope your leg is as strong as ever now, and that you may always come off victorious in a fight with rattlesnakes.

CHICHESTER, PENNSYLVANIA.

I am a little girl nine years old. I have the nicest baby sister. Her name is Mary. She is nearly five months old. I made this verse up all myself. Here it is:

Darling little Daisys
And their mornings are bazy
Takes her umbrella out,
And she does not frown nor pout.
JESSIE M. L.

LANCASTER, KENTUCKY.

I have just received my first number of YOUNG PEOPLE, and seeing so many nice letters from little girls and boys, I thought I would write one. I am eight years old. I have no brothers, and but one sister. She is six years old; her name is Sadie. I go to school when I am well. I have been sick, but I am improving now.

I have no pets except one little dog; his name is Gypsy. He is a nice dog, but he killed my sister's kitty, which was very naughty of him. We had a beautiful little white dog named Zip; he could stand on his hind legs, and walk across the floor. He was stolen out of our yard one night, and we never saw him any more. I wish you would please explain what Young People's cost is, for the benefit of your new subscribers.

A. C. L.

St. Mary's Free Hospital in New York is under the charge of some kind ladies who are very sorry for the sick and crippled little children of the poor, whose parents can not take good care of them at home. It costs $3000 to endow a cot in this hospital. Your papa, if you ask him, will explain to you how it is that the interest of this sum will pay all the expenses of a cot from year to year, so that they shall always be one little suffering child taken care of in this little bed. When the children who read YOUNG PEOPLE shall have sent all the money, the cot will be theirs, and their child will be in it.

PATRIOT, INDIANA.

I have not taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE very long, but this year I have read it so much that I am reading the letters, so mamma says I may tell you something about myself and pets. I am a little boy ten years old. I live in the country, and have almost everything I wish for. I have a very big pony; his name is Dick; I can ride him any place, and turn him loose, and he will follow me almost like a dog. Then I have a nice big Newfound-land dog, and his name is Bill, and so we name the name for a dog, but it was his name when he was sent to me, so I did not change it. He will carry a big basket of corn, or almost anything I give him to carry. Papa has just got a little boy. I got a set of harness for him, and then I can drive him in my little wagon. I had a present of a pair of skates, and have been trying to learn to skate. I want very much to go to a little boy. I got a few very hard falls, but I did not mind them.

LUCIAN H.

SPRING BANK.

Papa gave us your interesting paper on Christmas, and of all the periodicals we take we enjoy it the most. We have a beautiful country home in the northern part of Georgia. Our spring is very large and beautiful, and so we name the place for it "Spring Bank." We like "Nan" very much; it has such lovely illustrations. We have four dear little ponies, Phoebe, Lightning, Gypsy, and Guy Maudering; the last of our spring riding's novel My Maudering. Things seem to be going up in our little age, as we had an old horse named Rosalie that was thirty-five years old when she died, and we had a dog named Ponto thirteen years old, and several other old animals. This is our first letter to a paper.

ELLIE NELLIE, and GEORGE.

OAKLAND, CALIFORNIA.

I have a dog; his name is Snub. He takes the cat by the back of the neck, and drags her all around. I have some bantam chickens, and when they were hatched they looked like little mice. I was nine years old last August. I take HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE every week, and it gives me much pleasure.

ROY M.

This is what the Oxford (Ohio) Tribune said the other day about one of the little readers of the Post-Office Box—a girl of whom the Postmistress is quite proud:

"Miss Laura Shenkenberger has attended school five years without being absent a single day, or even tardy. She has received some tokens from each of her teachers, showing their appreciation of her promptness."

A great many spellers have entered the lists, and tried their skill in making words from the letters which compose the word "Orphanism." The Postmistress looks on the rapidly increasing pile with great satisfaction. We will announce the names of those whose lists are fullest, so soon as you have all had an opportunity to compete.

George and James L., whose home is in Arampo, California, are having what the other boys will think a splendid time in the woods. George has caught a beautiful white crane, four rabbits, and five rats. James trapped a rat, but his prisoner had sharp teeth, and speedily gnawed his way to freedom. These boys are both studying hard, and write a clear business hand, very creditable to young gentlemen of ten and eleven years. I hope they will write again.

BENEDICT M.—I am glad you like the stories, puzzles, and letters so well, and shall expect to have your name often among the bright-eyed and quick-witted boys who solve puzzles and unravel tanglers.

MAY E. B.—I too think a little girl very fortunate to be the cousin of Miss Abbott. Write again, dear, and play with your dolls as much as you please for three or four years to come.

CARNIVAL-TIME—LITTLE COLONIALS.

BONNIE'S VALENTINE.

BY MARGARET EYTINGE.

BONNIE got a valentine,
Gay in colors blue and gold,
But she could not read it, for
She is only four years old.
So she listened while mamma,
With a smile, the verses read,
And until the very end
Not a single word she said.

"Dearest of dear little maids"
(This way ran the valentine),
"With red cheeks and flaxen hair,
And brown eyes that brightly shine,
Answering to many names—
'Birdie,' 'Darling,' 'Wee Wild Rose'—
You are sweeter, sweeter far
Than the sweetest bud that grows."

Then, with prettiest disdain,
Bonnie said; "Of that before
I have heard a fonsand times—
Yes, a fonsand times, and more.
Great old valentine, I fink"
(And her lip began to curl),
"Telling fings a girl has known Ever since she's been a girl!"

AN ELEPHANT'S REVENGE.

THE Rev. Mr. Watson gives a very curious story in illustration of an elephant's long recollection of a wrong suffered. One of those pests of society, "a practical joker," visited a caravan in a west of England fair and tried his stupid tricks upon an elephant there. He first doled out to it, one by one, some gingerbread nuts, and when the grateful animal was thrown off its guard, he suddenly proffered it a large parcel wrapped in paper. The unsuspecting creature accepted and swallowed the lump, but immediately began to exhibit signs of intense suffering, and snatching up a bucket, handed it to the keeper for water. This being given to it, it eagerly swallowed quantities of the fluid.

"Ha!" cried the delighted joker, "I guess those nuts were a trifle hot, old fellow."

"You had better be off," exclaimed the keeper, "unless you wish the bucket at your head."

The practical joker took the hint only just in time, for the enraged animal having finished the sixth bucketful, hurled the bucket after its tormentor with such force that had he lingered a moment longer his life might have been forfeited.

The affair had not, however, yet concluded. The following year the show revisited the same town, and the foolish joker, like men of his kind, unable to profit by experience, thought to repeat his stupid trick on the elephant. He took two lots of nuts into the show with him—sweet nuts in the one pocket and hot in the other. The elephant had not forgotten the trick played upon him, and therefore accepted the cakes very cautiously.

At last the joker proffered a hot one; but no sooner had the injured creature discovered its pungency than it seized hold of its persecutor by the coat tails, hoisted him up by them, and held him until they gave way, when he fell to the ground. The elephant now inspected the severed coat tails, which, after he had discovered and eaten all the sweet nuts, he tore to rags and flung after their discomfited owner.

"THREES."

BY JAMES OTIS.

AS many as choose may play the game of "threes," or "tierce," and the more the merrier. With the exception of two players, the party arrange themselves in pairs, as shown in the figure. One of the two that remain makes "threes" of one couple, as shown by the position of No. 1. The other player remains outside the circle, as seen at No. 2, and tries to catch the outside boy of the line. If he can do this, and touch the outside boy, he takes his place in the circle, and the player just touched becomes outsider.

The outermost boy of the row of three, therefore, when he sees the outsider coming his way, slips from his place into the middle of the ring, and stations himself in front of some other pair at a distant point in it, thus making a new "three," to which the outsider has to hasten, only, perhaps, to be disappointed as before.

When there are many players, and the ring of course large, there should be two or more sets of threes, and thus the game will be made more lively.

TOMMY'S FISHING ADVENTURE.

"Ha!" says Tommy, "I feel a nibble." And he was right. Though nearly drowned he would not leave go the line. "I knew there was something on that line," said Tom, as he journeyed homeward.

YE DANCE OF OLDEN TIME.—[SEE "THE MINUET," NEXT PAGE.]

THE MINUET.

BY MRS. M. E. SANGSTER.

"Then Alys at the spinet sits and warbles
The sweet old ballads that we ne'er forget;
And Ruth and Phyllis courtesy to the pictures,
While Bridget steps in stately minuet."

MANY of you have heard your parents speak of some stately personages of their acquaintance as belonging to "the old school." If you have observed the people thus described, you have noticed that their manners were fine—what, indeed, we might call finished—and that they were more ceremonious in their politeness than some of the rest of us are in these busy nineteenth-century days. The deep bows, the low sweeping courtesies, and the formal speech of such ladies and gentlemen are very beautiful, and all the more so that "the old school" seems to be on the decline.

The period to which this polish was natural was the period of the minuet. That elegant and graceful dance came, in the first place, from Poitou, in France; and as the peasants danced it, the rustic belles in their pretty holiday finery, and the beaux with their gay caps and feathers on, it was a quick, sprightly dance, with little steps, whence comes its name.

Minuet is akin to minute, you see. But in the days of Louis XIV., le Grande Monarque, the simple country dance was taken to court, introduced, in caprice, perhaps, by some lovely lady who had watched the lads and lasses go through its mazes at a rural fête. It changed its character when it was adopted by the nobility, and became grave, sedate, and a little solemn—just as different as possible from the giddy waltzes and flying quicksteps of to-day.

For two centuries it was the drawing-room dance, taking precedence of every other. The time regulating its movement consisted of two strains of eight bars each, in three-crochet time.

Perhaps some of you have seen your grandmothers perform the minuet on a great occasion—a birthday, house-warming, or Christmas party. You have been impressed with the queenliness of their bearing, for the minuet admits of no familiarity. The touching of the finger-tips was all that was considered au fait by the gallants of Washington's day.

Looking back over our country's history, one sees in the pictures of the past, Governor John Hancock in sea-let coat and lace ruffles, leading forth the stately lady, his wife, Dorothy Quincy that was, while she is brave in "gloss of satin and glimmer of pearls."

Washington, whose birthday a grateful nation is about to celebrate, and who was as dignified in the drawing-room as he was commanding on the battle-field, was accustomed to dance the minuet. Once, soon after his inauguration as President, he was visiting at a hospitable mansion in Uxbridge, Massachusetts, the home of the Tafts. The two pretty daughters of the house, Polly and Patty, did their best to entertain General and Mrs. Washington, and after returning to New York, which at that time was the national capital, the great man sent a present to his little partners of the evening.

And pray what do you think it was? To Polly and Patty, whose "modest and innocent looks" had delighted him, he gave each a piece of chintz for a new gown; but to Patty, whose name was the same as Mrs. Washington's, five golden guineas, "to buy any little ornaments she may want, or to spend in any way she may choose." The only stipulation affixed to the gift was that Miss Patty should acknowledge it in a line addressed to "The President of the United States, New York."

Those early days of the republic were full of sparkling life. The dinners, assemblies, receptions, and balls were on a generous scale. An elderly lady who had been young and beautiful when they were powdered hair and high-heeled slippers, and danced the minuet, was once heard to give a wee bit of a soft sigh when a tiresome guest had departed.

"Aunt," said a smiling niece, "you haven't much patience with dull people."

"Ah, no, my dear," was the reply; "I have never been used to them."

Every age has its peculiar advantages and pleasures, and we would be foolish if we undervalued our own. We have many luxuries and delights which they had not in sunny France when they first danced the minuet at Versailles, and of which the Livingstons, Clintons, Jays, and Madisons never dreamed when our dear country was young. But it would be well for us were we to cultivate the courtesy of look and speech, the grace of deportment, and the gentle dignity which distinguished the period when the minuet was at the height of its popularity.

MICK'S VALENTINE.

BY MARY D. BRINE.

ONLY a boot-black was Micky Magee—
Hatless and coatless and shoeless was he.
"Twas little he cared for a "Valentine," Unless in the form of "ten cents for a shoe."
He stood on the corner one Valentine's Day,
Shouting "Shine, sir?" to all who were passing his way;
But nobody heeded, and nobody cared
Whether ill luck or good luck poor little Mick shared.

Down the street, with her mother, approaching the lad,
Came a wee little maiden all daintily clad.
Her hand clasped a flower, a lily as fair
As the white baby bow 'neath the soft golden hair.
She clung to her mother, the while her blue eyes
(Blue as the bluest of sunny June skies)
To Micky were lifted, with just a slight trace
Of wonder and fear in the dear dainty face.

"Poor, poor little boy, with no shoes on his feet,
And no one to love him and make him look neat!"
So whispered mamma. Oh, the dimples that grew
In the soft rosy cheeks, 'neath the young eyes so blue,
As with sudden sweet impulse the wee little maid
Her one cherished flower in Micky's hand laid,
Then ran to mamma, hiding quickly from sight,
Her heart beating fast, half in shyness, half fright.

When night came at last, and St. Valentine's Day
In the silence and darkness had faded away,
Ragged Mick in his shanty went sweetly to rest
With the purest of Valentines safe on his breast.

CHAPTER IV.

NEARER and nearer toward the foot-lights advanced the Twin Princes between their escorting pages and their imposing body-guard of troops. Clash, bang, rub-a-dub-dub! What a terrible uproar it all made! and now Reg, who had been placed on the outer edge of the line, comes within full view of the audience, as the procession sweeps in a grand half-circle around the stage.

How many people there must be looking at him! But he dares not remove his eyes from the back of the page in front of him, to the utter despair of Mr. Wellington Smith; for in spite of his magnificent costume and brilliant surroundings Reg is as stiff as a poker, and seems as melancholy as if he expected to have all his teeth pulled on the spot.

How he managed to tread the unsteady steps leading to the throne without stumbling Reg scarcely knows, but when he sat down in the gilded arm-chair confronting that immense sea of faces he felt as if a spell had been cast over him which made him motionless with terror.

"Ah, the little rascal's doing better now," muttered Mr. Smith, as from his post of observation in the wings he noted the fixed, apparently scornful, expression on Prince Budaway's countenance.

Meanwhile the dialogue among the regular actors went on around him, interrupted every now and then by outbursts of applause from the audience. But still Reg sat there with a look in his blue eyes that seemed to pierce beyond the last seat in the gallery, and see Aunt Susan wringing her hands in despair as she wandered up and down the streets of the great city in search of her nephew; then there appeared to sound in his ears the click, click of the ocean cable as it carried to papa and mamma far across the sea the terrible tidings that their little boy was lost.

“Rub-a-dub-dub, bang, clash, bang!”

“‘Comme along; shure an’ what’s the matter wid yez?” whispered Billy, as he gave Reg’s arm a pinch.

At this Prince Budaway actually so far forgot his royal dignity as to rub his eyes with his fist, as if he had just waked up.

“By all the white mice if he isn’t sleepin’ again!” exclaimed Dan Danderbry, as he watched the action from behind one of the skeletons.

But Reg was not asleep; he was only very, very tired. His brain had never before been so overcharged with excitement; the noise of the drums and the glare of the gas-light dazed him; so when Billy nudged him he started up suddenly, then fell forward in a dead faint, and rolled down the steps to the foot of the throne, where he lay quite still, with his white face turned toward the audience, who applauded loudly, under the impression that it was all in the play.

Fortunately the act was almost over, so the curtain was rung quickly down, and Mr. Wellington Smith, with the assistance of Madame York, hastened forward to bring Prince Budaway back to consciousness.

“I guess he wasn’t hurt by his tumble,” remarked the manager, as he chafed the cold little hands; “but it’s lucky he’s not on in the next act.”

Reg presently opened his eyes, and fixing them on Mr. Smith, asked, in a broken voice, “Have you—have you sent for Aunt Susan?”

“Yes, yes; that is, I’ve put an advertisement in to-morrow’s paper that’ll tell her where to find you.”

“Thank you, sir; I’m better now,” returned Reg, and he was soon able to get up and walk to a quiet corner of the wings. Here he reclined on a pile of cushions, while Billy Tinburn instructed him in his duties for the third act, which began about half an hour later, and in which the Twin Princes were to appear in a gilded car drawn by an old blind horse.

This was the famous battle scene, and after the boys had been driven twice around the stage in their chariot, the vehicle was hauled to one side, so that only the body of it showed, and the horse detached, lest the noise of the firing should frighten him into long-forgotten liveliness. The shafts of the cart were propped up with an old barrel, the two Princes were seen to peer anxiously forth, and then the battle which was to decide the fate of their kingdom began.

Deafening reports, flashes of fire, clouds of smoke, the creeping up of the foe, the dropping of the dead, the cries of the wounded—all this turned the stage into a perfect Bedlam for the time being, in the midst of which Reg and Billy trembled in spite of themselves. The spectators stamped and cheered to testify their delight at the realistic representation, the band played furiously, and the victory was almost won, when with a piercing scream a woman burst through the battling ranks, and throwing her arms about Prince Budaway, cried aloud (although of course nobody could hear her), “Oh, Reginald, and I find you here!”

It was Aunt Susan.

The confusion of the fight was so great and the smoke so dense, that Miss Brax’s sudden appearance on the scene did not much affect the play, and as the curtain fell on Reg leaning out of the chariot with his arms around her neck, it formed quite a pretty tableau for those who could see it.

“No, sir-ee,” asserted Dan Danderbry, when Mr. Smith took him to task for allowing an outsider on the stage, “I don’t believe even a true-for-a-fact fight would ‘a stopped her.”

“But I wonder how she came to know so soon that her nephew was here?” muttered the manager to himself, as he approached the reunited pair, whom Billy Tinburn was eyeing as if they had both fallen from the sky.

“Well, sir,” said Aunt Susan, when Reg had duly presented Mr. Wellington Smith, “I don’t know whether I ought to thank you or not for what you’ve done for this boy. To be sure, you took him in from the street, but then you made a play-actor of him; and when his mother hears that her son has been seen on the stage of a—” Here Miss Brax paused, with a sudden recollection of the fact that she had just trod the boards herself.

“But, madam,” urged Mr. Smith, persuasively, “there is still one more act to be given, and if you take your nephew away with you now, you will greatly inconvenience us. Remember that I made a verbal contract with Reginald here, to the effect that, in consideration of my endeavors to restore him to you, he would play the part of Prince Budaway for one night at least. Is not that so, Reginald?”

“Yes, sir.”

Miss Brax looked thoughtful. She had never approved of theatres; indeed, until that evening, she had never even seen one; but then she was a woman of very strict business principles, and a great lover of justice.

“Well, sir,” she answered, after a moment’s hesitation, “since you put matters in that light, we will leave it to the boy himself. Reginald, do you think that if I permit you to make a show of yourself for twenty minutes longer, you will be seized with a desire to adopt this vain life, and always wear these gaudy clothes?”

“No, no,” cried Reg; “I never want to be a Prince again; but if you think I ought, I don’t mind being rowed across the stage in a boat with Billy; and then, you know, Mr. Smith was very good to find you for me.”

At that instant the stage-manager clapped his hands, and the curtain rose on the final act of The Twin Princes, during which Aunt Susan sat in state in a private box; and as she watched Reg’s jerky progress across the canvas seas she discovered that she really loved the boy with all her heart.

Mr. Smith came for her as soon as Reg had put off his plumes and paint forever, and as she took her nephew by the hand she made the manager a queer little bow, with the remark, “We are even now.” Then she gave her skirts the slightest possible shake to express in what esteem she held the dust of the theatre, after which she walked out, holding Reg by the hand. They went across the street to a hotel, where her fortitude deserted her at last, leaving her to laugh and cry over the boy for half an hour.

“But how did you find me so quick, Aunt Susan?” inquired Reg the next morning at breakfast. Then he learned how poor Miss Brax had been driven nearly frantic with terror when she found that he had been carried off in the cars, and how she had followed in the next train to the station below, then hurried on to the end of the road, whence she had returned to the Grand Central Depot, down-town again to the ferry, afterward to the police station, and finally to a newspaper office, where she was about to advertise for the missing boy, when the clerk read to her a counter-advertisement of the same character that he had just received, upon which she had hastened with all speed to the theatre.

“And I am that wore out, Reginald,” she concluded, “that I have telegraphed Cousin Sarah to hire a nurse and charge her wages to me, so we can go straight back to Broadfarms,” which they did that very morning.

MR. SMITH AND MADAME YORK RESTORING REG TO CONSCIOUSNESS.

And what a story Reg had to tell Phil Fairlock! The latter listened almost with open mouth, and looked very grave when the late Prince Budaway finished with these words:

"I wouldn't be in Billy Timburn's place, no, not if he got fifty cents a night, for I tell you, Phil, you and I can have more fun up here in Broadfarms than a hundred Twin Princes in all the theatres in New York."

THE END.

VIC VINTON'S VALENTINE.

BY AGNES CARR.

"OH, Vic! have you heard the news? Isn't it perfectly splendid?" burst from a chorus of girls clustered about the school-room register on a cold frosty morning early in February, as a bright-eyed, golden-haired maiden entered and joined the group.

"No; what is it?" asked the new-comer, drawing off her gloves, and endeavoring to warm her hands.

"Why, Maidie Seymour is to give a Valentine party on the 14th, and every one of our class is to be invited," explained Clara Townley.

"And there is to be a letter-box, through which we are to send valentines to each other," continued Bella Osgood, "and Maidie's little brother Fred, dressed as Cupid, is to distribute them. Isn't it a pretty idea?"

"Lovely!" responded Vic; "but Maidie ought to have let us known sooner, so we could have saved up our pocket-money."

"Oh, you always have plenty, and can favor us all," laughed Nellie Frost, twining her arm around her friend's waist.

"Don't be so sure," said Vic. "I have drawn pretty heavily on my month's allowance already, and father always objects to advancing me any money. He says I will never learn the value of it if he does. But there goes the bell, and I haven't learned a word of my French yet." As the gong sounded, the girls dispersed to their respective seats, but little was thought or talked of during the ensuing week except the coming entertainment and the dainty missives to be sent on the occasion.

Every school has its belle, or leading girl, and at Madame Berger's Vic Vinton was certainly that one. Handsome, brilliant, and withal kind-hearted and generous to a fault, few could help loving her, and with both teachers and scholars she was a general favorite, while a certain royal manner of her own had won for her the title of "Queen Vic" amongst her school-mates.

But perhaps her most ardent admirer was one quite unknown to herself—a little demure lassie, the poorest and plainest of the class, to whom she had scarcely spoken a dozen words throughout the year, and of whom she rarely thought. Milly Melville looked upon Vic Vinton as her ideal of every beauty and grace, although she never ventured to do more than gaze and admire her from a distance, being much too timid and reserved to mingle and make many friends amongst the girls. So she was only known in the school as "Milly the book-worm" (for she was very studious), and at recess she was left alone and unheeded in her distant corner.

In due time the invitations were issued, and on Valentine's Eve, Vic, warmly wrapped up, for it was bitter cold, wended her way down-town in quest of the fancy missives for her mates, to be distributed by Cupid on the following evening. As she walked briskly along, her busy brain was calculating how far the five dollars in her purse would go, for having always taken the lead, she felt some pride about having her gifts as handsome as any that would be sent; and Maiddie, she knew, had invited a large number of friends to do honor to St. Valentine.

So engrossed was she in her own thoughts that she almost ran into another girl, who was coming up the street, and was only roused by a timid "Excuse me, Miss Vinton."

"Why, Milly, is that you?" exclaimed Vic. "I think I am the one to apologize. My head was so full of valentines I did not see where I was going. You will be at the party to-morrow night, of course?"

"No, I think not," said Milly, mournfully, while the tears started to her eyes. "I never go to such places."

"But why not?" asked Vic, impulsively. "Maiddie expects all her class, I know." And then as Milly blushed and hesitated—"But pardon me, perhaps you do not care to tell your reason."

"I don't mind telling you," stammered Milly; "but I really have nothing to wear."

"Like Miss Flora McFlimsey, of Madison Square," laughed Vic.

"No, not like her, for this is truly the very best dress I own;" and Milly glanced from her rather shabby black cashmere to Vic's stylish winter suit.

"Why, how is that? Come, walk down the street, and tell me about it;" and urged on by Vic's sympathizing manner, Milly overcame her reserve, and told her of the strict economy her widowed mother was obliged to practice to send her to Madame Berger's school, and how impossible it would be for her to procure a dress suitable for an evening party. "I am being fitted for a teacher, you know," she sighed, at the end; "but I never shall like it."

"What do you fancy?" asked Vic.

"Oh, painting above all things! The dream of my life is to study art; and I particularly wished to go to this company to see Mr. Seymour's pictures, of which I hear he has a fine collection."

"Yes," said Vic, "and Maiddie's artist uncle is to be there. Who knows, perhaps you may go yet; anyway, promise me that you will not send your regret before to-morrow."

"No, I will put it off as long as possible, but it will be of no use. This poor Cinderella has no fairy god-mother."

"But perhaps St. Valentine may take pity on you," said Vic. "Good-by, and I shall come and see you very soon."

"Good-by;" and with a lighter heart than she had known for weeks, Milly turned down a side street toward her modest home.

"I never would have believed, mother, that I could have talked so freely to any one," she remarked that night, "and to Victoria Vinton, of all persons! But she is even more charming than I imagined, and distance did not lend a particle of enchantment."

And the mother smiled with pleasure at her quiet daughter's unusual enthusiasm.

And while Milly was thinking about Vic, Vic was thinking about Milly. "Poor Milly! I had no idea she was so poor; but then I am afraid I never thought much about her," said Vic to herself, as she came to a pause before a gayly decked window festooned with valentines of every hue and description. "I will send her the embroidered muslin Cousin Charlotte gave me, and which will just about fit her; but what use will it be without the 'chicken fixings,' as brother Tom calls them?"

THE GIRLS ADMIRING MILLY'S COSTUME.

Vic thought a moment longer. Then she announced, as though she were speaking to some one: "So, my dear friends, I fear you will have to dispense with any love tokens from me, for hearts and darts, although very tempting, must give way to gloves and flowers." And turning resolutely from the stationer's dazzling display, she hurried across to a dry-goods establishment across the way.

"A messenger boy just left this valentine at the door for you, Milly," said Mrs. Melville, early the next morning, as she entered the tidy little parlor where her daughter was bending over her painting table.

"For me! Who in the world would send me a valentine?" And Milly glanced inquiringly from her mother's face to the large box she carried in her hand. But the brown orbs opened still wider when the lid was lifted, displaying the snowy skirts with their delicate embroidery, the dainty gloves and slippers, and the cluster of crushed rose-buds, so natural that Milly uttered a scream of delighted astonishment as they were drawn forth.

"This is Vic Vinton's work, I am sure," she exclaimed. "Oh, how grand she is! just like her royal name!" And her mother nodded a glad assent.

Neither Vic nor Milly appeared at school that day, but each member present of the first class was surprised to receive a tiny note containing these words:

"I have decided to send no valentines to-night, so please do not put me in debt if you love

"Your friend and school-mate, Vic."

"What new whim is this the Queen has taken up?" asked Nelly Frost. No one could answer her.

Mr. Seymour's brilliantly lighted house was a vision of youth and happiness on that St. Valentine's evening, and graceful little Maidie, dressed in pure white with knots of true-blue ribbon, welcomed her guests with easy courtesy.

Vic was radiant. But of all the girls that flocked the spacious dressing-room none was so great a surprise as Milly Melville.

"I had no idea she could look so pretty," exclaimed Clara Towleley.

"Yes, the little brown grub has come out quite a gorgeous butterfly," said Bella Osgood.

Vic, meanwhile, was being plied with questions, which she parried for some time with considerable skill, as to her new notion of neglecting her friends, some of whom were inclined to be a little indignant. They pressed her so hard that at length she was forced to confess.

"Well, girls, the truth is, I did send one valentine, but it was too large to go in the letter-box, so I dispatched it a little ahead of time."

"And I am that valentine," said Milly, who had stolen softly up behind. Then in a few words she told of the gift she had received.

"Three cheers for Queen Vic!" cried all the girls.

"I did not mean them to know," said Vic.

"But I am very glad they do," said Milly; and taking her friend's arm, they descended to the parlor together.

Vic was now a greater favorite than ever, while Milly that evening appeared so bright and merry, her school-mates all agreed that they had never half appreciated her before.

Swiftly and gaily the hours sped by, and when the tiny curly-headed Cupid spread his silver wings and fluttered about the room with his tender missives, none could equal an exquisite little picture painted by Milly and presented to her "dear friend Queen Vic."

Mr. Seymour, the artist, was in raptures over it, and next day, having heard Milly's story from his niece Maidie, paid Mrs. Melville a friendly call. The result was a great joy to Milly, for through his influence she secured a good price for all the cards and pictures she could paint, and in time the demand for them came to be so great that she was finally enabled to abandon the distasteful idea of becoming a teacher, and realize her dream of studying art.

Her first prize was won on a portrait of her dearest friend; and when any one asks who it is, she tells them, with grateful tears filling her eyes, the story of Vic Vinton's Valentine.

"ROUSER."

BY L. A. B. CURTIS.

WE never knew where he came from; but one frosty morning when we went out to the diggings there he sat, dejected and forlorn, beside Doc Furber's rocker.

"What have I done?" exclaimed Doc, striking a tragic attitude.

There was a shout of laughter, for certainly no one had ever seen an uglier dog. Snub-nosed, crop-eared, one eye white and the other yellow, his fleshless skeleton covered with a coarse yellow coat—there he sat, statue-like, without taking the least notice of us, neither raising his eyes nor wagging his tail. Indeed, the poor brute had no tail to wag. And in addition to his long list of misfortunes, he seemed to have been badly wounded in some recent conflict, for his wounds were still bleeding.

"Lend me your revolver," said Charley Hines to Fritz Muller.

"No," said Dutch Fritz, "don't waste powder. I lays him out mit dis rock."

Davy Blake caught up a shovel, and would soon have ended the dog's career, if Hank Howley had not interfered, to the surprise of all.

In all the three months we had picked and shovelled and rooked and panned together in the Sky High claim, no one had ever discovered any softness in Hank Howley.

We had come together, a party of five, from different parts of the world, and formed a partnership to work out a rich mountain claim in the Sierras.

We had been strangers to each other when we consolidated our claims into a partnership, for purposes of economy in labor and living. But we soon became acquainted, and we were speedily in possession of all the early "history" desirable with regard to each other, except that of Hank Howley; he never talked about himself, and seemed to resent any curiosity concerning his personal affairs. He was rough, reserved, and somewhat surly; but he was always ready to take upon himself the hardest and most unpleasant tasks. His giant frame and iron muscles seemed made for hard work and endurance.

The laugh went round as Hank went up to the ugly brute, patted his head, and examined his wounds in what seemed to be a professional manner.

The dog preserved the utmost indifference while his case was discussed, never appearing conscious of a human presence. But when Hank's examination was ended he licked his hand in a gentle, melancholy way, and then followed him to the cabin. The cruel wounds were dressed, and the poor wail was sumptuously regaled with some bacon rind and three generous flapjacks left from the morning meal.

Old Butte, the camp dog, greeted the new-comer with a vindictive growl; but Hank bade him "get out!" so fiercely that Butte retreated from the cabin, and the stranger took his place by the camp fire.

The more the miners and Butte abused the new dog, the more Hank petted him. He let him sleep at his feet in his bunk, and fed him from his own tin plate.

One Saturday night the air was more piercing than usual, and Hank Howley indulged in considerable grumbling at himself for leaving his coat at the head dam, a mile distant, where we had all been working. He was sitting on a bench wrapped in his blanket, and smoking a home-made manzanita pipe, when Fritz exclaimed,

"Hank, vere's de dog?"

"He hasn't been in for supper," suggested Doc.

"Base, ungrateful pup!" said Charley.

"You've seen the last of your coyote, Hank. I told you so," added Davy.

"He was a cur of low degree," resumed Charley. "A high-toned dog like Butte would never go back on his friends in that manner. Eh, Butte?"

"Don't you worry yourself about that dog," growled Hank. "He ain't your dog. I'll bet four bits he's all right."

No one took the bet.

Presently Andy Anee offered to sell Hank a fine fox-hound.

"I've no use for him," Hank replied. "I've got the best dog in the Sierras, and maybe you'll find it out if you live long enough."

We did.

All day Sunday no pug-nosed dog appeared, and all day a running fire of jest and comment was kept up about the vagrant. The neighboring miners, as they dropped in to smoke and chat by our fire, never failed to say, "Why, Hank, where's your dog?" until at last Hank's temper, never of the best, fairly gave out.

On Monday morning, when we went back to work at the dam, there was the dog faithfully watching Hank's coat.

All through those bitter nights he had watched by it, without food or shelter, not even lying down upon it for warmth. He was shaking as with an ague fit; but the look he gave Hank seemed to say, "I can not do much for you, but I have kept your coat safe, my friend."

"Didn't I tell you so?" said Hank, proudly.

Public sentiment instantly turned in the dog's favor, as we gathered around him, and showered upon him such terms as "Good dog!" "Nice pup!" "Poor fellow!"

"Why, he's a rouser of a dog, after all!" said Doc, giving him the biscuit he had brought for his own luncheon.

He was christened "Rouser" on the spot, and from that time he was the prime favorite of the camp. Even Butte's selfish heart warmed toward him, and many a merry tussle they had together.

That same day it began to snow. It snowed and it snowed. We gathered up rockers, shovels, and pans. The snow covered the bowlders; then it buried the chaparral and manzanita bushes; then all the miners' cabins; and still it came down. It nearly filled the valley full.

There were eight or ten miners' cabins in the vicinity, their locality being indicated by one or two holes in the snow, and marked by stakes bearing inscriptions like these:

"Twenty feet to Billy Brooke's Cabin." "Cabin of the Merry Miners, three yards below." "Doc Furber, Hank Howley, & Co., twenty-five feet." "Grand Hotel: Beans and Bacon at all hours; two rods."

We kept the fire roaring, read the old papers over and over, went out and shot game now and then, had games of rough-and-tumble and snowballing, told stories, and smoked our pipes under the snow as cheerfully as the greasy Esquimaux.

A hole in the snow let in the light; to a hole in our cabin, and at this window Butte or Rouser invariably took his station at meal-time; it was not large enough for both at once. Our table was under this window, and refuse bits of bread and bacon were tossed to the lucky dog in the window. Butte, being of a lazy turn, could wait more patiently, so he usually took his station at the window as soon as the savory fumes of frying bacon ascended to the upper air. Rouser would come to the hole and bark savagely, but he could not frighten Butte away. At last Rouser resorted to artifice. One dinner-time he rushed into a little clump of pines barking furiously, as if he had found some choice game. Butte could not withstand this, so he came out of his window to join in the fun, and artful Rouser quietly slipped into his place.

Day after day Rouser continued to play this trick on poor Butte, and always with the same success.

But this same little window was a source of sorrow to Camp Square Comfort as we called our quarters. One day we all went out hunting, and forgot to shut the window. When we returned, we found that the coyotes had carried off all our bacon. This was a serious loss. We could borrow a little, of course, but it was necessary for some one to go to the nearest trading post for a fresh supply. Hank Howley volunteered to perform the mission, and as he was the strongest of the party, and more used to travelling on snow-shoes, he seemed best fitted for the service. It was about forty miles to the trading post, but Hank was sure he could make the trip in three days, or four at farthest.

"You better tie up Rouser until I am well on the way," he said. Then he started.

Rouser was greatly dejected. He whined and howled and cried all day, the tears running down his face and dropping on the floor. At night we untied him, but his spirits did not appear to improve. On the third night Hank had not returned, but Rouser was gone. We did not feel anxious on Hank's account, for he had suggested that he might prolong his stay in case he found himself too fatigued to start back immediately.

About daylight on the fourth day Rouser, or what was left of him, came back to camp. His condition was even worse than when he first came to us. One leg seemed broken, and several ugly wounds gave evidence of some fierce encounter. To his neck was fastened a scrap of paper, on which was traced with blood, in scarcely legible characters: "Broke my leg. Cal. lion. Be quick."

We lost no time in going to the rescue. A party of twenty men, on long snow-shoes and with good rifles, started out. A light fall of snow rendered it easy to follow poor Rouser's track. An hour's run brought us to the object of our search. Hank was lying under a thick pine-tree, on the snow. At first we thought we were too late. His form was cold and almost rigid. One bone of the left leg was broken. Fortunately brandy had not been forgotten, and Doc Furber, who was a real physician, succeeded in restoring him, with the help of many rough but willing hands.

We did not worry him with questions; he could not talk. But all around the spot were marks of a ferocious battle, and tracks of a large California lion. A broken snow-shoe, the pieces bristling with hair, indicated the nature of the battle. There was a deep wound on Hank's hand, and his coat was badly torn. Watt Morgan picked up his bloody pocket-knife in the snow. I found his revolver, with all the chambers empty.

Following the track of the ferocious animal, his dead body was found about half a mile from the spot. It was the largest specimen of the puma that I ever saw, measuring fully nine feet from tip to tip. We secured his skin, and slowly returned to camp.

It was two days before Hank could briefly recount his adventures. It appeared that he had started out early on the morning of the third day to return. He had bought a hundred pounds of bacon, and was lucky enough to have it brought out fifteen miles by a pack train. Then he packed it on his back ten miles further, until he reached the snow where he left his hand sled. He had come on faster than he expected until nearly sunset, when he heard the familiar cry of a California lion. Upon that he started forward as fast as he could go, and looking back for the lion, he made a false step; his snow-shoe hit a stump, and broke, throwing him down with great violence, and breaking his leg. Fortunately the night was warm, so he had no fear of freezing. He had a few crackers in his pocket, and, with the bacon, he was well provided against hunger, and he did not feel entirely hopeless.

Then the cry of the California lion sounded nearer.

No doubt he scented the bacon. Hank drew his revolver, and crawled to a large tree. He partly succeeded in burying the bacon in the snow. The fearful cry sounded still nearer. The sun had set, and it was nearly dark. Intently watching, he at length discerned the animal, his eyes gleaming through the branches of a tree. He decided not to fire until his only chance required it, lest the wounded beast should attack him. He shouted, waved his broken snow-shoe, threw snow-balls; but the creature still skirmished around him, evidently taking in the sitmal retreated, closely pursued by Rouser, and Hank could hear the conflict raging for an hour longer. Then Rouser returned in a pitiable plight, but joyful and triumphant.

Hank thought the time could not have been far from midnight. But he probably fainted from pain and exhaustion, for the next he knew it was morning, and he was nearly dead with cold. He managed to stir a little, and from the bleeding wound on his hand, where the fierce brute had scratched him, he obtained the blood to trace the warning we had received. He had written it with a match, and fastened it to Rouser's neck. With the same match he had been able to light a little fire, which he fed for some time with bark and cones from the pine-tree. He ate a cracker, and then probably fell asleep.

Thanks to skillful surgery and good nursing, he came out all right, and was able to do his part when we resumed work in the spring.

And Rouser, who shared his convalescent couch, with one of his legs splintered and bandaged, like his master—oh, he was the hero of the camp! If a dog's head could be turned with compliments and flattery, Rouser would have been a spoiled dog. But his nature was too noble and unselfish to be moved by any sentiment of vanity.

Through the long weeks in which our two helpless patients lay in their rude bunks we learned a lesson from their brave and uncomplaining patience.

Hank's hardness and reserve seemed to melt away in a generous gratitude for the attention and care we bestowed upon him. And it was a good thing for us that we had some ennobling occupation to expand and elevate our hearts.

As for Rouser, he got bravely over his injuries; and I am sure there was not a man in Round Valley that did not think him as worthy of being carved in marble as any of the world's great heroes.

That exquisite poem of the late Dr. Hollland, "To my Dog Blanco," is a fitting tribute to dear old Rouser:

"For all of good that I have found Within myself or human kind
Hath royally informed and crowned
His gentle heart and mind.

"I scan the whole broad earth around
For that one heart which, leal and true,
Bears friendship without end or bound,
And find the prize in you.

"I trust you as I trust the stars;
Nor cruel loss, nor scoff of pride,
Nor beggary, nor dungeon bars
Can move you from my side."

"ROUSER SPRANG UPON HIM FROM BEHIND."

uation. He drew nearer and nearer, crouching as if for a spring. When he was within a couple of rods Hank fired his first shot, hoping to hit him in the eye. But the bullet seemed to glance from the skull. The maddened brute was about to leap upon him when a champion appeared. Rouser sprang upon him from behind.

Then began a fearful conflict. Rouser, who was small and more active, could avoid the onset of his heavier foe for some time, until he grew weary. Hank fired several shots, but failed to hit a vital spot. Once the battle surged so near him that he beat the lion off with his broken snow-shoe, and succeeded in inflicting a sharp wound in his throat. This was probably a mortal wound, for the ani-

LITTLE SNOW-SHOES.

WASHINGTON IN YOUTH.

FORTUNATELY for himself and his country, Washington was educated in poverty, the son of a Virginia farmer. From his childhood he was probably employed in active labors. His father had large tracts of land that apparently produced little money. The house in which the young Washington was born was small, and built of wood. The country around was wild and thinly settled. Washington went to a country school, where the teaching was very poor. At home in the plain country farm-house he could have learned little. His mother was an excellent woman, and taught her son industry and honesty.

His father died when he was a child, and his mother, who was his father's second wife, was left to support herself and her children from her farm. She lived in comparative poverty in a small wooden house. Her son George was a strong healthy boy, and gave her, no doubt, all the help he could. He studied well at school. He was always industrious. Like many useful men, he educated himself. His mother would no doubt have been glad to have sent him to college at Princeton or Harvard; but the cost was great, and the poor widow's son could hope for none of the advantages of a higher education. John Adams and Samuel Adams could pass through Harvard with success; Hamilton was at Columbia College, Jefferson at William and Mary. But Washington, the most eminent of the patriots, was obliged to educate himself in the midst of his labors on the farm. Like Franklin and Burns, Shakspeare and Virgil, he probably read as he worked at the harvest or guided his plough.

Washington had never any leisure to learn Latin or Greek, or even French. His object was to make a living. He kept no journal of his youth. He never desired to become a "great man," but he was resolved to be an honest one, and to maintain himself. At one moment he thought of going into the navy, but his mother opposed it. She said it was a "bad scheme," and she kept him at home to become the founder of the republic. The warrant for making him a midshipman was already signed, when she interfered so happily for all. She would not part with her eldest son, the stay of the family. She feared to expose him to the temptations and dangers of a naval life. A mother's love saved him to his country. Forty-two years afterward, in 1787, he could still write to her and subscribe himself, "I am, honored madam, your most dutiful and affectionate son, G. Washington."

At fourteen Washington became almost accidentally a surveyor. He had already taught himself to write a clear, round hand. He drew well, and was a careful mathematician, very correct and methodical in all that he did. He had left school, and went to stay with an elder half-brother, who owned the fine estate of Mount Vernon. He seems to have resolved already to become a surveyor. He had surveyed the land around his school-house, and was fond of wandering over the country. He had not sufficient knowledge to become a teacher, like John Adams, or a lawyer, like Jefferson. He seems to have found farming a pursuit that brought in little money. He passed a winter in preparing himself for his duties, and was employed, when under sixteen, by Lord Fairfax to lay out his large estate beyond the Alleghenies.

In this pursuit he plunged into the wilderness, slept on the ground in chill weather, swam streams on horseback, climbed over rocks and precipices, and performed his work well. Everything that he did was well done. He grew tall and strong; he could bear hardship and constant labor. He was trusted for his honesty and good faith. At nineteen he became the most active of the surveyors of the colony. He received large sums of money; he was never again in want of it until late in life, when his patriotism had made him poor.

But his work was constant. For three years he was always busy in the wilderness. He climbed mountains, explored valleys, became familiar with the red men and the wild tenants of the forest, and evidently loved his border life. This was the school and college in which Washington was trained. He was the product of a laborious youth. Had he been accustomed only to the luxurious life of a city he could never have borne the toils and cares of his camp life. Had he been less honest and true he might have sought a crown and a tyranny instead of the love and gratitude of mankind.

It was because he learned to labor in youth that Washington became useful to all men. We celebrate his birthday because he labored, not for himself, but for his country.

N A N.*

BY MRS. LUCY C. LILLIE,

AUTHOR OF "MILDRED'S BARGAIN," "AUNT RUTH'S TEMPTATION," ETC.

CHAPTER XXVI.

IT seemed to Nan hours afterward that she heard her aunt's step along the corridor. Miss Rolf paused a moment near the door, and then went on to her own room. The door closed; the house was still. There was no one to advise her. Nan could only pray in an agonized, dumb sort of way; but God can hear thoughts as well as words, and she was comforted when she had asked His help. She crept wretchedly into bed, and cried herself to sleep.

She awoke to find her room full of sunlight, and Mrs. Heriot standing over her with a grieved face.

"My child," said good Mrs. Heriot, tenderly, "what ever has happened? Miss Rolf doesn't want to tell me, but it's something you won't own to her. Now do it—do it, dear, I say."

Nan looked up wistfully.

"I can not," was all she could say.

Mrs. Heriot turned away to the window with a sigh.

Nan lay still, trying to think what to do; but there was only one idea in her mind. She must guard Laura's secret until Laura chose to tell it.

"Then I'm afraid," said Mrs. Heriot, turning from the window, "you'll not see your aunt to-day. I was to come and ask you. Am I to just tell her you can not?"

Nan nodded tearfully, and slowly Mrs. Heriot left the room. When she returned Nan was sitting, dressed, in the window.

"You're to go to breakfast," said Mrs. Heriot. "But your aunt says you're not to speak to her."

What a meal it was! It seemed to choke poor Nan, who gladly escaped even to Miss Prior, and for the first time she plunged ardently into her lessons. Miss Rolf did not appear at dinner nor at tea. The rest of the time Nan passed miserably in her own room. After tea she was sent for to the black-walnut parlor, where she found her aunt standing by her desk.

"Nan," she said, very gravely, "I wish to tell you that—making no remark about what I must say I consider your dishonest conduct I paid the bill at Ames's. This, I hope, will lead you to a candid and full confession to me. You must know that the credit was only given for articles to be bought by you for the Traverses. In looking over your clothes—your summer clothes—to-day, I found this in one of your pockets." Nan started as her aunt held up the little tinsel ornament she remembered having picked up that day long ago in the carriage house. "Of course," continued Miss Rolf, "this only confirms what your silence indicated."

There was a long pause, during which a sound of sobbing rose in Nan's throat.

* Begun in No. 157, HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE.

"Have you nothing to say, Annice?" asked her aunt, very sadly.

But Nan could only shake her head, and say "No."

"Will you tell me nothing of it?"

"I can not," again said Nan.

"Go," replied her aunt, in a stern voice. "Go! It is a terrible blow to me, child, to be so disappointed in you."

Nan turned and fled along the hall up to her own room. It seemed to her as if some strong decision had been made by Miss Rolf as she spoke the last words, and so the next morning proved. Mrs. Heriot came to her while she was at her lessons, and called her into the hall. Then she said, in a quiet voice, which Nan did not know was full of half-suppressed tears:

"My dear, you're to go back to Bromfield. There! don't be so startled. Your aunt means to pay your board and have you taught; but you're to go to-morrow."

Poor little Nan! What could she do or say? She did not see her aunt again. Through Mrs. Heriot she begged to see Joan, or Mrs. Travers and David, but this was denied her; and on the next morning, while she was again sitting forlornly in her room, Mrs. Heriot brought her the following note, written in Miss Rolf's delicate, old-fashioned hand:

"I can not trust myself to see you, my child. It would grieve me too much. I am sending you back to Bromfield, where your board will be paid and a suitable sum allowed to procure you good teachers and clothing. I do not think it wise for you to go to a school while you have your present ideas of honor. Do all you can to improve your mind; and, above all, pray to God to spare you further wrong-doing. Your step-aunt, Mrs. Rupert, is expecting you. She knows nothing of what you have done."

Nan read the letter in a dazed, stupefied way, sitting in the window of her once home-like room. She was quiet then, but later in the day, when she found herself being driven away from Rolf House with Mrs. Heriot, all her repressed feelings asserted themselves. She flung herself upon the good woman's shoulder and burst into tears. Not one good-by even! Not one parting glimpse of Joan's kindly little face! Not one word with David and Mrs. Travers! Oh, it seemed a cruel ending of her happy life!

CHAPTER XXVII.

EVENING usually found Mrs. Rupert very tired and rather cross. On days when trade was not brisk she was apt to be particularly acid in her manner, and on this October evening things were in a very unpleasant "condition of working," as she called it. To begin with, Marian had gone to spend the day with a friend, and had not returned. Mary and Georgie, the two younger children, had been very troublesome about going to bed, and to crown everything, the gas would not light, so that Mrs. Rupert had been compelled to run out herself for oil, and get ready two lamps, one for the store and one for the parlor.

Nan was expected back. Mrs. Rupert, as she poked the miserable little fire in the sitting-room, wondered why this re-arrangement had been made.

"I know how it will end," thought Mrs. Rupert, nodding her head sagely: "the old lady 'll die and leave her quite on my hands again."

It was only five o'clock, but it was as dark as any winter evening; and as the carriage from the station containing Nan and Mrs. Heriot drove to the door, the little house and store looked dismal enough.

"Eh! my! is this the place?" exclaimed Mrs. Heriot.

Nan could not answer—her heart was too full. She followed Mrs. Heriot out of the carriage, and showed her the way to the house door, which speedily opened upon Mrs. Rupert's portly figure and large face.

"Well, Nan Rolf!" was her greeting. A stare at Mrs. Heriot was followed by, "And who is this, may I ask?"

"My name is Heriot, ma'am," was the very bland answer. "I was sent by Miss Rolf here with Miss Annice. And now, my dear," she added, standing inside the dingy hallway for a moment only, "I think I'll just leave you and go. Good-by, love"—with a hearty kiss, which Nan passionately returned; "do you mind and write to your aunt soon." And almost before Nan knew how it was done the door had closed and she was alone with her step-aunt.

Mrs. Rupert led the way up the well-known stairs and into the sitting-room, which it seemed to Nan she must have left ages ago, instead of only six months. How dingy and disorderly it looked after the quiet neatness and comfort of Rolf House!

"Well," said Mrs. Rupert, setting the lamp down on the table, "I don't suppose you expected to be back from your fine relations so soon, Miss Nan, did you? I'm sure I don't think the board she's to pay is so much!"

"Oh, aunt!" cried poor Nan, blushing, "don't please don't speak of that. I'll work; I'll do what I can."

"Oh, you will, will you?" said Mrs. Rupert, turning around, with a laugh. "Well, we'll see. Now I suppose you want some supper."

In spite of her woes Nan was hungry, and very honestly glad of the plate of hot sausages and potatoes and the pie Mrs. Rupert placed before her. Her step-aunt plied her with questions about her life at Rolf House, all of which she answered so listlessly that at last Mrs. Rupert jumped up, exclaiming:

"Well, I don't know as I ever took much stock in those people. Make up your mind they've thrown you off once and for all. And, Nan, see here: I don't believe as you'll get more than a year's board and schooling out of them; and I've made my mind up as you'd oughter learn some trade. I can't keep you, and there's nothing else for you to do as I can see."

Poor Nan! It struck her only too forcibly that this might be the case, and she spent a wretched and, if the truth must be told, rather a rebellious evening, considering her future. There was one comforting feature in her new life at Bromfield; she had a room to herself. It was only one of the attic rooms, bare and miserably gloomy, but it was all her own. There she felt she could sometimes be free from intrusion. It would be a place to think of Lance and Joan in; perhaps a place to cry in.

She helped Mrs. Rupert upstairs with her trunk, and before she went to bed unpacked her little belongings, trying to arrange them with Rolf House precision in the small bureau and cupboard. Oh, for one hour in Beverley!

When her aunt left her, Nan pressed her face against the window looking out on the weedy, dank garden, and felt as if her heart would break. Much as she desired to be alone, it was a relief to hear Marian's high-pitched voice, about eight o'clock, when that young person burst into the room.

"Well, Nan!" she exclaimed, kissing her rather boisterously; "I do declare! who'd have ever expected you back!"

Nan tried to laugh. "I hope you're not sorry, Marian," she said, quietly.

"Oh no; I don't suppose I am," rejoined her cousin, "unless you're too fine a lady to suit our ways."

"I don't think I'm a fine lady," said Nan, laughing.

Marian sat down on the little bed, and stared some time at Nan.

"Well, you're changed some," she remarked, finally; and then, standing up and giving her dress various little "perks," she continued, "Do you think I'm changed?"

"Yes," said Nan, very honestly.

In the six months Marian had developed into what she considered a "young lady." She was only fifteen, but she had left school, was in a dressmaking establishment, and had acquired all the worst airs and graces of her companions. She wore the latest fashions in cheap imitations; had "banged" her pretty blonde hair so low over her eyes that every bit of the smooth white brow was concealed; screwed in her waist until her shoulders and hips looked like caricatures; and wore a great deal of tawdry lace, cheap jet, and imitation jewelry.

"The girls at our place are awfully stylish," Marian said, evidently thinking she had made a profound impression upon her cousin, "and we have to dress a great deal, I can tell you. Well, good-night, Nan. I'll see you to-morrow. Dear, what a sober face you have!"

"HER AUNT HELD UP THE LITTLE TINSEL ORNAMENT."

And Marian, laughing loudly, ran out of the room and down the stairs, humming bits of "Champagne-Charlie," a song just then coming into fashion.

"What would her life here be?" Nan questioned herself, lying in the dark, long after the house was still. She had not known until now how much the quiet, refined associations of her life in Beverley had done for her. Now, all that she had seen jarred upon every nerve. And was it just? Then there came into Nan's mind the words of a little hymn Love was fond of singing—

"God's time for waiting Shall be mine."

"Oh, can it be?" thought poor little Nan, closing her eyes tightly; but the words were like a prayer, and she tried with honesty to repeat "Shall be mine."

KING'S COURT.

BY JAMES OTIS.

AN old game is that of "King's Court," or, as it is sometimes called, "Save your Leader," but one so seldom seen now that to most of the readers of YOUNG PEOPLE it will be new.

The board may be marked out on paper, or any boy who delights in mechanical work may make a very beautiful one by inlaying the hexagons with dark and light colored woods as is shown in the diagram.

There can be but two players, each of whom has a king and six men, which may be almost anything; but such as are used in checkers or draughts are the best, since each player's men can be readily distinguished from the other's.

The men are arranged for the game by placing the white king on the hexagon numbered 76, and the black king on 91. Black's men are placed on 74, 78, 70, 82, 87, and 65; White's men on 72, 80, 67, 85, 63, and 89.

The aim of the game is to place the king in the centre hexagon with his courtiers around him in the circle 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, and 7.

Each player moves in turn from one hexagon to the other, always toward the centre, never backward. In thus playing, when any man is caught in a position between two of the enemy, so that the three pieces form a straight line, he must be taken from such position and placed anywhere in the outer circle, the act of doing so counting as one move to its owner. For example: suppose Black moves to 16, and White already has a man on 15; White then moves, if possible, a man to 17, making a yoke for his adversary. Black, instead of being allowed to move any other piece, must take his man from 16, and place it in the outer circle; then White moves again; and so on.

Should the piece caught in the yoke be a king, it must be removed, but may be placed anywhere on the board its owner chooses, provided it does not form, by thus jumping it, the third of a yoke, and provided the hexagon desired is not occupied by another piece. For example: White's king is on 8, while his courtiers are on 25, 30, 23, 67, 33, and 6; Black's king is on 5, and his courtiers are on 26, 29, 21, 49, 7, and 12. Now White must remove his king from the yoke, and may place him on any unoccupied hexagon save where he would form a yoke for Black, as would be the case should he put him on 27, 28, or 40.

It can readily be seen that it is not wise to move the king too far toward the centre of the board in an early stage of the game, for since it can not be moved backward, its usefulness is impaired when too near the home, unless well supported by the courtiers.

The player should endeavor to so place his men that by a consecutive number of moves he can "yoke" his adversary, thus sending so many of his (the adversary's) men to the outer circle that he will have time to get his courtiers home. It is good policy to crowd your adversary's pieces toward the centre, if possible, and then take your station where "yokes" may be easily formed.

If a player gets his king on the centre hexagon, and is unable to get the courtiers around him, it is wise for him to try to force his adversary to "yoke" the king, and thus send him back on the board, where he may be of some service. Therefore this mode of attack should be guarded against carefully.

The rules of the game are:

None but kings shall occupy or move on to the centre.

No piece shall be moved into a yoke; that is to say, no black man shall be allowed to move between two white men for the purpose of being yoked.

No piece shall be moved backward.

If two pieces, one of them being a king, are yoked at the same time, the king must be moved first. If two or more men are yoked by one move, it is at the option of the owner which one shall be retired first.

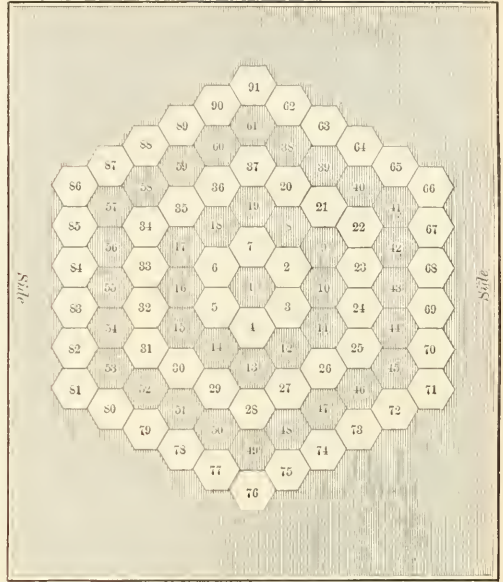

Any piece touched must be moved, or the player forfeits his move.

Should any player put his six men on the inner circle while his king is yet outside, he loses the game, and rightfully, since by so doing both are prevented from accomplishing the purpose intended.

Pieces may be moved forward or sideways, but never backward; hence a piece once placed on the centre hexagon can not be removed unless forced to retire because of a yoke.

The game may be commenced by each player alternately placing one of his men anywhere on the outside circle instead of on the hexagons as given above, with the exception that the two kings must be placed on 76 and 91, as in these positions they are in a direct line from the goal.

The number of combinations which may be formed by these men is almost as many as in the game of checkers, and study is quite as necessary to become a good player. Simple as King's Court appears at first, it will be found reasonably intricate, and those who move after they have considered all the consequences, rather than before, will most often be victorious.

WHY SO TEARFUL?

"Why so tearful, my sweet little maiden?"
 My brothers have been so unkind,
 They have one and all gone off asleighing
 And left me forgotten behind."

Now this is indeed cruel treatment.
 If I had a horse and a sleigh,
 You should ride from sunrise 'til sunset;
 But the teardrops forgotten should stay."

H. Brown
 1883

THE Postmistress would like to hear from the boys. What are your pursuits out of school hours? How much time do you spend in your lab at home? Do you have any regular work to do around the house or grounds in the morning before school, and in the afternoon between daylight and dark?

Another thing, boys: do you please write and tell me what you do in the evenings, when your sums and exercises are finished and ready for the next day?

City boys and country boys are invited to write. I would like, too, to receive letters from my boy friends who are in offices and stores, giving me some idea of what they do with their leisure.

If you are fond of reading, please name your favorite author, and tell us how many of his books you have read, and which, upon the whole, you like best.

Send me, please, these four things: your favorite book, your favorite game, your pleasantest amusement, and your favorite motto. I shall expect a great many letters from my boys.

This charming letter comes from a mother:

COLORADO SPRINGS, COLORADO.

I send a list of words made from "orphanism" by my little son one fearfully cold day, when he could not go out, and your suggestion came as a perfect godsend to mamma as well as the boy, for I was truly at my wit's end to find amusement for him. Some of the words being found in the "Ladies' Dictionary," and some being proper names, I feared they might not be legitimate, so in copying his list I have placed them by themselves, with ? after them. I also send an enigma of his making. I hope he had a book like you to write with pen and ink, so mamma will not need to be his amanuensis.

We sent for the cover, and have had Vol. III, bound in a beautiful book. A young man from the East, an invalid, whose health has broken down from over-study, saw it one day, and after looking over it with admiration, said, heartily, "I wish I had had a book like this when I was a boy, and less mathematics; I would not be then where I am now." I wish you would call the attention of your young readers to the "Leatherstocking Tales." I have been reading them to my boy, and I am more than ever impressed by this penial with Cooper's greatness, while I fear he is too much overlooked by the boys of this generation.

Edward will find his enigma in the present number. His list, which is of very creditable one, has been placed with the others, which have crowded the Post-office Box for the past fortnight.

I agree with Mrs. S. about the "Leatherstocking Tales." A young gentleman of twelve who always comes to me, when he has found a book particularly delightful, to tell me about it and talk it over with me, says that the "Leatherstocking Tales" will bear readings of all kinds. They are thoroughly manly and wholesome, and full of the brisk life and excitement which boys enjoy.

NEW YORK CITY.

I am a little girl not quite eight years old, and live in New York. I am very fond of you, and I had a little black kitten, but it ran away while I was in the country. Now I have only one bird, and he is very tame; he seems to think as much of me as if I were his mother. I like to sit on his back, and I can do it all around the room; then he will perch himself on my finger, and kiss me in a cunning way. But sometimes he does not like to be kissed, and I have to let him go. Mamma says perhaps she will get me two rabbits in the spring. Like the YOUNG PEOPLE very much. This is the first time I have written a letter for the Post-office Box, but I hope to do it again. I like Santa Claus came to see me, and brought me a number of pretty presents. LILL B. T.

DEBRA, NOVA SCOTIA.

I am a little girl seven years old. My papa says we are doing pretty well for "bricks and mortar." I had never seen it before. I like it very much, especially "Nan," and the Post-office Box is just lovely; I can read that best. Some of the pictures are very funny, and I like the old goose dropped my Christmas-box; it was too nice. It must have been old Santa Claus himself, with his beautiful reindeer. I see almost all the children who write for the YOUNG PEOPLE live in the United States; I live now away down in Digby, Nova Scotia, a very beautiful and healthy place—in fog in summer, not too warm, fine clear weather in winter. I like to go to school. I like to am; here, my health was so poor the doctors said I must not study any, or even look at pictures. But I am getting better now, and I am so glad to be allowed to play with dolls. I love books so much better, and I can soon go and see papa and mamma and dear little sister and brother. I have no pets here, but my uncle says I am not enough for one. That is why my papa and mamma sometimes, so I thought I would like to write to you, only you see, I have to get some one to put it on paper for me. I wrote like a letter, and I had some very good words to write at a Sunday-school concert when I was a little mite of a girl. If you think best to put them in the YOUNG PEOPLE, please do so. If this is too long, please excuse. SADIE P. D.

Here are the quizzes:

THE NEW YEAR.

Glad the New Year!
What will it bring?
—Brightness and cheer,
Makings hearts sing!

Sad the New Year!

What will it bring?
—Darkness and fear;
Bowing with care?

Happy New Year!

God ruleth all,
We will not fear,
Whatever befall.

AMBERT, NOVA SCOTIA.

I am a little boy eight years old. Most of the little boys and girls tell about their pets, but I have none. I have three little sisters, and the youngest has no name; my mamma and papa can think of none good enough for her. Can you send us a pretty name for her? I have taken "Margie" for my dog, so she will be Margie, and would not give it up for anything. I had a kitten, and my sister had one too, which she called the mate; and when they got big she could not tell which was the kitty and which was the mate; so she did not like them after that, as she wanted to play only with the mate. I like the stories by the little boys and girls very much. This is my first letter, and I want to see how it looks when it is printed. HARRY V. B.

I can not help you to a name for the beautiful baby girl, because I do not know what names her sisters have. A lovely child whom I know is called Pearl. How would that do? What a funny reason your little sister had for playing with neither of the kittens: She ought to have kept a blue ribbon round the neck of the mate, or given it a pretty little collar to distinguish it from its twin.

NORTH TOPEKA, KANSAS.

It is nearly two years since we came from Ohio. We are living in the city now, but papa has a farm twelve miles in the country. We expect to move to it as soon as my mamma is able to go. She has been sick since Thanksgiving.

Our house in the country needed some repairs, so papa took me out to keep house for him while he works on it. I have enjoyed this very much. When I get my cooking, dish-washing, and cleaning done, I go to the creek, and spend my leisure time skating and playing on the ice. I am sure you will like this, and I hope you will like me for it is a beautiful and natural one. With love, BESSIE M.

What a bright little girl, to be able to keep house for papa, and how pleasant to do it, when there is the delight of watching repairs, and thinking how cozy it will be by-and-by for mamma! I am pleased to hear from this little house-keeper.

NEVADA, IOWA.

I am ten years old, and live with my aunt and uncle to be company for them, as they have no daughter of their own, and also to have the advantage of my school. My mamma lives in Nebraska, on a farm, have four girls besides me. We had one brother, who died. I visited my parents last summer, and I had a great deal of fun, fishing and playing with my sisters, came back to Iowa all alone on the cars.

YOUNG PEOPLE came to me for a Christmas present, and I was well pleased with it, though I haven't as much time to read as I want, for I must dry the dishes, and do other work besides, after school, for aunty says I must learn to work, so that I shall become a useful woman.

ISEZ B. H.

CHEYENNE DEPOT, WYOMING TERRITORY.

I want to tell you about my magpies. If the readers have not seen one, I will tell them that they are very tame, and will sit with long tails and bills, and they will bite if you are not careful when near them. They will talk very nicely. Mine will say, "Polly want a cracker," "Put him out," "Maggie," "Jack," and many other things. I hope my letter is not too long. I am eight years old, and I have never been to school; mamma teaches me. Good-by. M. E. L.

To M. E. L.'s little letter her nurse added a postscript saying that while the little girl was writing a blizzard was blowing furiously, making the wind fly in every direction, and stinging like whip-cords. However, she says some hizzards are even worse, fairly lifting people off their feet. There is nothing much more terrible than a violent storm of wind. I hope the magpies and their mistress will never be caught in one.

I am a little boy nine years old, and have two brothers; Carl is four, Reid is almost two. I go to school, and we have me sport sliding down the snow-drifts. I shall begin taking music lessons this week. I had an old-fashioned wooden doll. I traded them for a little dog (this morning), and then traded him off for five sticks of candy. I help ma, and sometimes put on an apron and wash the dishes; and when she is well I do twelve five cents each time. That is the way I have earned the money to pay for my paper. I like all the stories and letters, but some of the stories I just love. I am almost afraid you will not think this letter worth printing. EARLE R. S.

This is just the sort of letter I like to print. I think a great deal of boys who are willing to help mamma with the dishes, or with sweeping, or any other house-work in which she needs help. One of the most splendid soldiers I ever knew, as brave as a lion in danger, when a little fellow ten years old helped his mother wash the dishes, but what he possessed was, my boy, to exchange your doggie for five sticks of candy? That wasn't a very good stroke of business, in my opinion.

AUSTIN, TEXAS.

This is the second year a kind friend has given me your splendid paper, and I like it more and more every time. I had a letter from a boy who had heard it read to them very much. I am very much interested in the story "Nan," and think it very good indeed.

We have a cat, and her name is Muff, and a dog named Tamerlane, but we call him Tam for short. I have a beautiful wax doll named Marguerite, and I have a doll's trunk for her. I can make up my mind to give her a new dress, and a new coat. I think Rosalie P. has made herself fatter by her letter, as so many have spoken of her. She seems to dislike washing dishes more than most girls, though I suppose they nearly all agree with her. But I don't think they ought to complain, as cheerfulness lightens labor. Don't you think so, dear Postmistress? NELLIE B.

Rosalie did not mean to complain, I am sure. By-the-way, she must write again, and reply to some of the Little Black-caps who were interested in her letter. Please, Nellie, send your receipt for corn-bread.

KANEYVILLE, WEST VIRGINIA.

I thought that I would write a letter to you, as I have just finished reading the letters in your dear paper that afford me so much pleasure. We have three pet kittens and three cats. I think "Nan" is very nice. I enjoy all the pieces very much. I live on a farm in Virginia. Yesterday was the first day we have had snow enough to coast; we enjoyed it very much, particularly my little sister Lella, who is only three years of age. SADIE C. B.

Take one quart of molasses, one pint of butter-milk, two table-spoonfuls of ginger, two of soda dissolved in the milk, two cups of melted butter or lard, and two quarts of flour.

Little girls who try this may take half the quantity of everything, as this receipt will make a very large cake.

PARK, ILLINOIS.

I love so much to read our Post-office Box. I thought I would write to you. I am eleven years old, and attend the High School. I would like to tell you about our school and the handsome new school building, but can not this time. I took YOUNG PEOPLE when it was first published, and liked it so much that I persuaded papa to subscribe again this year. Papa likes to get us any good books or papers that he thinks will be instructive and entertaining for us to read. I was very much interested in the work a man sold my paper to some one else; but he ordered another copy for me, and I go every evening to the book store to see if it has come.

I want to tell the boys and girls about my dog. He is four years old, and a great pet with us all. On Christmas-eve (which was Sabbath) we were all sitting around the fire, before the lamps were lighted, and I thought I would have a walk out door, when all at once George gave a scream and a bound across the room, crying, "Look! look!

Here he is! here's Santa Claus coming right over the tops! He's got a silver cap on, his mamma! Get my shoes off before he gets here, so I can hang up my stockings. We all looked out of the window, and there was the great round moon peeping through the pine-trees. How wild and wonderful it all looked! "Mamma said it was a beautiful thought, and we all kissed George a sweet good-night as he hurried off to bed before Santa Claus would 'det here." FREDIE D.

BRADFORD, INDIANA.

I am a boy fourteen years old. I live close to Bradford. I am the youngest boy of the family. I have been taking Harper's Young People for about a year. I like it very much. I find it interesting. This is the first time I have written to it. I am going to school. I have a good many cousins, and if any of them are taking the paper, I wish they would write to it. There is very few game about here. I do not go to hunting very often. I have a large black dog which is very fond of hunting. I sometimes hitch him up in a little wagon and haul wood with him.

He will shake hands with me if I hold out my hand, or he will take hold of my hand and lead me. I often take a chair out and lay it down; he will jump on it, and he will knock it down. He will jump over anything two or three feet high.

When he was little he was so mischievous that he would tear up my books and hats. Don't think I'm afraid about my pet dog, for as long as I am the youngest of thirteen children, you may know I have been petted. I hope this letter is not too long. ANNA W. H.

LINDSEY, NEBRASKA.

We are four little children, and live with our mamma. Papa has been dead nearly three years, and sometimes we are very lonely. We have an uncle who lives near Rockford, Illinois, and he sends us one of the nicest presents every week; it is YOUNG PEOPLE. We like "Nan" the best of all the stories.

It has been very cold and stormy this winter. Walter keeps the paths clean, and does many other things out-of-doors. Alice is learning to keep house, and would like to join the club. We don't like to school, but mamma and papa like us. We have a horse, and when it is pleasant we have such nice rides. Our best pet is a little dog; we tie notes on his neck, and he takes them seven blocks to grandma's, and brings answers to us. We call him Tell, but his name is Telephone. Abel is just recovering from a severe attack of influenza; rheumatism; baby cough; "rheumatism;" and "stomach troubles;" and he has to wash his clothes. It was very nice that Tell would carry notes and tell grandma how Abel was; we think more than ever of him. You can not imagine how nice it is to have our brother well enough to play with us once more.

ALICE (aged 9), ABEL (aged 5),
WALTER (aged 7), JOSEPH (aged 3),
PER MANNA.

A story told by three-year-old Joseph: One day there was a little boy, and he went 'way out in the woods, and he came to a great tree. The little boy ran and ran, and he came to a great barn, and he climbed up on the hay-loft, and the little boy did not get him. Then a man came and shot the bear in the neck; but it did not kill it, so he shot it again, and it did. Then the little boy ran home to his mamma, and never ran off again.

I shall be glad to hear again from Tell's little owners.

GAME OF CHRONOGRAMS.

The players are seated round the table. A number of dates are written on scraps of paper, and put into a bag. Each player is provided with a piece of paper and a pencil, and has to find names of poets, sovereigns, historians, or other notable characters, the first letters of whose names will make, in Roman characters, the date he holds.

When all the players are ready, the leader of the game calls out the papers, and reads aloud the names selected for their initials. A forfeit is paid for every mistake, and for every figure for which it may be impossible to find an initial.

LURA, KANSAS.

I live with my papa and mamma in the country. The nearest town and railroad are twenty miles from here. We have a large sheep ranch. There has been a very long time since I had any little kids, which are nice pets. They will go up-stairs as easily as a person will. We have to go two miles and a half to school. Mamma takes us with a horse and buggy most of the time. I have a brother ten years old. I am a little girl of eight. Maybe my brother will write you a letter some time, and tell you how well we like HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE. Papa has taken me to school for a year, and we are always glad when it comes. KATE M. C.

BROOKLYN, NEW YORK.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS.—Did you ever take part in a snow-fight in years gone by? It is splendid fun. In fact, there is no better fun than snowballing anyway.

This is how to fight: the balls are thrown as fast as they are made generally, but each side ought to get a good supply ready, for those who have the most balls, and can hold out the longest, will win the day.

If you don't like to be in the front row, then slip quietly to the rear. A READER.

What a droll boy this is, to be sure! Did Z a identified Postmistress, ever charge in a snow-fight? Fancy my surprise when I read that question! And then that slipping away to the rear! If ever I do go snowballing, you may depend on my staying in the front line.

"I'm going out to walk," she said
(A little maid of three),
"And if you will be good," she said,
"Why, you may go with me."

So first we found the silk hood,
And then we found the furs;
The whitest, softest, dearest stuff,
You may be sure, was hers.

And then we tried the sunny side,
This little maid and I,
And merrily she made a bow
To all who passed us by.

"I'm going out to walk," she said
(A little maid of three),
"Why, you may go with me," she said,
"Why, you may go with me."

Two good receipts come from a Little House-keeper:

SMALL SPONGE-CAKES.—Beat well together two eggs; stir in a tea-spoonful of powdered white sugar, and beat for five minutes; add slowly a tea-spoonful of flour and half a lemon, grating the rind into it. Bake in small party-pans.

COCA-NUT PUDDING.—Scald one quart of milk, leaving out a little, in which stir one large tea-spoonful of corn-starch, three eggs, cup of sugar; stir in the milk, and a cup of cocoanut, a small piece of butter, and a tea-spoonful of lemon. Bake half an hour.

PATRICKSBURG, NEW YORK.

I have been wanting to write to you for quite a while. I have a white pet kitten; his name is Snowflake. This is the second year I have been taking HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, and I like the paper very much. I like Jimmy Brown's stories and "Sun" best. I want to save all the numbers, and get them bound. I have a little printing-press. It came off the Christmas-tree; I guess papa put it on. It is not so big a press as Mr. H. has to print the Pratt-street Vegetable. I read about your papers and books in the Vegetable. I go to school. RALPH L. VAN T. (aged 8 years).

CHALCEDONY.—In reply to a little exchange who wishes to know about this pretty variety of quartz, the Postmistress will describe it as well as she can. It occurs in its native chak-dony, where it is found in quantities. Its color is white, grayish, pale to dark brown, black, and sometimes a delicate blue. There is a gray variety found in Hungary. The kind of quartz which most of you have in your cabinets, and call chak-dony, is a milk-white opaque variety. A student of geology tells me he has often found it as a coating for other minerals.

Some of you, my dear girls, have more dolls than you know what to do with. I met two little girls the other day who had more dolls at all. But blessed be their little merry hearts; they managed to very well without them. And what do you think they had dressed up in their own hats and shawls, and were playing with in the jolliest fashion, when I happened to walk down their street and past their door? You will never guess in the world, so I'll tell you. They had made believe the two front posts on either side of the railing of their front porch were dolls, and there they were chirping to the posts like little sparrows, calling them pretty names, and playing that they were mamma and papa, and trying to tea with their babies, just as you do with your early dressed dolls.

I was glad that the winter day was almost as warm and sunny as spring, for I feared the little girls would take cold. And I was glad that I had happened to walk through the narrow street where these children lived, because I saw that brave and happy hearts and smiling faces are sometimes found in very poor homes, as well as in those which are rich and comfortable.

"Sally." The tailor took his goose along? Why is a tailor's snuff-box often called a goose?

Because the curved handle of the iron is supposed to resemble the neck of that stately fowl. The term "printer's devil" was formerly applied to the lowest boy in the establishments where printing was done. His work made him black and lanky, and he was obliged to perform the most disagreeable offices, and run on everybody's errands.

CAT AND MOUSE.

A NEW IN-DOOR GAME.

TWO rows of chairs are placed, back to back, across the room, not close together, but with room to pass between each chair and the next, and with a space enough for running about between the two rows.

In that middle space one player stands blindfolded—the Cat. On each side, behind the chairs, are all the other players, the Mice, each having a number, black and plainly written on a round piece of paper or card about the size of an egg plate. They may exchange numbers with each other as often as they like, to prevent the Cat from knowing where the numbers are or who bears them. So long as they do not come into the middle space they are as safe as mice behind the wainscoting, but in the middle between the two rows of chairs the Cat goes about and listens to catch what she can.

The Cat calls the numbers, two at a time, and the Mice called for must cross to the opposite side. Even if they are caught they may slip away again, for the Cat has to guess which of the two numbers she has. The other Mice may try to help the unlucky ones called for by running out of their holes and teasing the Cat by touches or little squeaks; but if they be caught, there is no guessing of numbers for them.

Whenever she likes, the Cat may gravely remark, "The Cat's away," and going to the wall, lay her face against it at either end of the space in which she runs about. At this signal there is a cry of "The Mice may play," and they begin to venture out and across. If the Cat is wise she will remain "away" a long time, until the Mice are all out and close to her. She must give a "mew" before she stirs, but the moment after it she may turn round and catch whoever she can, or even two or three, and then there need be no guessing of numbers. The Mouse caught is blindfolded in place of the Cat; and if more than one has been caught, the Mice may expect hard times.

THE CROSS OLD COBBLER.

BY JOEL JORDAN.

"BEEN skating, hey, my little man? Mend your boot? Of course I can. If I don't do it, well tanned you'll be? Come here and give your boot to me.

"You haven't coppers three and ten? Then you must take your boot again. New soles your father's slippers had This day a week, my little lad.

"Then ho, my little man! Well tanned I'm sure you'll be," And the cross old cobbler cobbled At the shoe upon his knee.

PAWNEE JOE.

BY ELIOT MCCORMICK.

I.

DICK COOPER'S father would not let him go to spend a week in Boston; in consequence of which Dick was sullen and discontented.

"There's nothing to do in this dead-and-alive place," he muttered, as he leaned over the front gate and slung a stone at a passing dog. "When I get to be twenty-one I'll clear out pretty quick. There's the Pawnee now," as a dark-complexioned boy came up the road toward the house; "I'm tired of him and his Indian airs. Well, what do you want?" he asked, rudely, as the other stopped at the gate.

The boy, who was a tall, handsome fellow, in spite of his high cheek-bones and copper skin, flushed.

"Want to get in," he said, simply.

"Well, get in," said Dick, still blocking up the way.

The Indian's face darkened. He hesitated for a moment, then, placing one hand on the paling, lightly vaulted over it, brushing Dick's shoulder as he went by. Dick was ready on his part to pick a quarrel at the slightest offense.

"Look here!" he cried, turning quickly around, "did you mean to hit me?"

The Indian shrugged his shoulders.

"Don't make fool, Dick," he said.

Dick's face grew red with passion.

"Don't call me Dick, you Indian beggar," he cried, brushing his open hand against the Pawnee's cheek. "If my father won't teach you your place, I will."

The Pawnee's eyes flashed; he drew back his arm, and in another moment the blow would have been returned, had not Mr. Cooper suddenly appeared upon the scene.

"Fighting again!" he exclaimed, in a tone of annoyance. "Education don't seem to do much for you, Joe. I guess I'll have to let you go back to Carlisle. But if Joe don't know any better," turning to his son, "you should; you weren't brought up in a wigwam."

Dick scowled. "Might as well have been," he muttered, "as in Stonefield."

"Well," said Mr. Cooper, sternly, "you've got to stay here, that's all. Go up to the house now, and don't let me hear anything more from you. Joe, you come to the barn, and I'll see if I can't find work enough to keep you from quarrelling."

The Pawnee frowned darkly, but followed Mr. Cooper without speaking; while Dick walked slowly and sullenly up to the house, kicking the snow before him as he went. As he entered the kitchen he met his little brother Harry coming out.

"Where's Joe?" the child asked, eagerly.

Dick brushed him aside. "How do I know where Joe is?" he exclaimed, crossly. "I don't take care of him."

"I thought you might have seen him," said the little boy, timidly.

"What if I did?" demanded Dick. "All you think of is Joe: he'll be scalping you some of these days."

Harry's lip quivered. "Joe wouldn't do such a thing," he cried, indignantly. "He's a good deal nicer than you are, Dick."

"Well, go to him, then," cried Dick, angrily. "If you are so fond of him, go back with him to his tribe and be an Indian yourself."

Harry looked reproachfully at his brother while the tears filled his great black eyes. "I don't want to be an Indian," he half sobbed. "Only Joe's kind to me and you ain't."

"Better go to him, then," was Dick's only response as he went out of the room and slammed the door. Left to himself, Harry concluded to take Dick's advice, even though it was unkindly meant, and find consolation in the society of his Indian friend. Most likely Joe was at the barn; so putting on his woollen muffler, Harry turned his little feet in that direction.

It was now a year since Joe had come from the Pawnee reservation in the far West to be a student at the Carlisle training-school. At the beginning of the summer vacation he had been sent to Mr. Cooper's farm in Stonefield, and though the vacation was long since over and the winter holidays had come, he was still remaining at the farm. He was steady and industrious, and proved as useful a help as Mr. Cooper ever had had; but he did not get along with Dick. The boys were too much alike in their quick, passionate natures to pull together; though the Indian knew how to control himself better than the white boy, and Dick did not hesitate to take an unfair advantage of his own superior position, of which Mr. Cooper did not always know. It was clear, however, that if Dick staid home from boarding-school, Joe must go back to Carlisle. The farm, though it covered a hundred acres, was not large enough for both.

Little Harry, however, was the Pawnee's firm friend. No one knew so much about the birds as Joe; or could make such alluring snares and traps for the rabbits, woodchucks, and squirrels; or shoot at a mark with such steadiness of hand or directness of aim; or tell in such fascinating broken English such wonderful stories of Indian life. Joe, too, in his quiet reserved way, seemed to return the affection; and Mr. Cooper, though he could never rid himself of a lingering distrust as to Joe's disposition, made no objection to Harry's spending hours in his company. On this particular afternoon the little boy found his friend at the barn with Mr. Cooper, harnessing one of the horses into the cutter.

"Is Joe going to be busy this afternoon, papa?" he asked.

Mr. Cooper had got in the sleigh and taken the lines. "Yes," he said, "Joe is going to take Dobbin with the sled up the mountain and bring down a load of wood."

"Oh, papa!" the child cried, "can't I go too? I can help load up, you know."

The father hesitated. Harry had been off with Joe fifty times before—there was no reason why he should not go this afternoon.

"Yes," he said at length, "you can go. Get back before dark, Joe. We'll have some more snow, I guess, by sundown. It's half past two, now," he added, looking at his watch. "I'll be home myself by six."

He drew the robe tight around him, gave the word to the horse, and started off. The sky was dark and threatening, and the air was keen. Dick's quarrel with the Indian had vexed him, and the recollection of Joe's dark and sullen face made him wish more and more, as he drove on, that he had directed Harry to stay at home. Joe should go away next Monday; that, at any rate, he had determined upon.

During the entire drive his mind was filled with these disturbing thoughts, and when at length, a little before six o'clock, he turned in at his own gate, it was with a mingled sense of relief and dread. Driving directly to the barn he called through the dark for Joe. There was no answer; and when he opened the barn door the wood sled was absent and Dobbin was missing from his stall. Mr. Cooper tied up his horse, shut the doors, and went quickly up to the house. His wife met him at the door.

"Where's Harry?" she asked. "Didn't he go with you?"

Mr. Cooper frowned.

"Why, no!" he said. "He went to the wood-lot with Joe. Haven't they got back yet?"

A surprised look came into the mother's face.

"I haven't seen anything of them," she said. "I thought he went with you. But if he's with Joe, it's all right. Now come to supper, and they'll be here before you're half through."

But the supper progressed, and they did not come. Finally, when it drew near seven o'clock, Mr. Cooper, who had been moving restlessly about, took up his hat and coat.

"Come, Dick," he said, "I ain't going to wait any longer. Fetch a lantern, and we'll drive up the mountain and find out what's the matter."

The horse had not yet been unharnessed, and driving him out of the barn, they were quickly on their way. Half a mile beyond the house they turned into the road that led over the mountain, nearly at the top of which was Mr. Cooper's wood-lot. It had been but little travelled since the snow had fallen, and by the light of the lantern Dick had no difficulty in discovering the fresh tracks made by the heavy runners of the sled and Dobbin's large feet. They led, however, up the mountain—none appeared coming down.

"They're up there yet," he cried, getting back into the sleigh; "at least they haven't come back this road."

"Well," said Mr. Cooper, "there's no other road unless they go twenty miles around."

By this time snow had begun to fall lightly, and it was not long before the tracks were covered. So far, however, they knew they were all right. If they did not meet Joe coming down, or find him at the lot, they could only conclude that for some purpose he had gone on. Mr. Cooper urged the horse ahead, and the musical sleigh-bells echoed up the mountain-side. No answering echo, however, came from the road above, though they strained their ears to catch its jangling sound.

By-and-by they reached the wood-lot. The bars were down, and Mr. Cooper drove in toward the spot where he knew Joe would have gone. Stopping the horse and giving the reins to Dick, he jumped out himself with the lantern and raised it above his head. There at a little distance stood the sled half loaded with wood. A little way off lay Dobbin's harness—all except the headstall and reins. Mr. Cooper strained his eyes through the darkness, but nothing more could be seen. Of Dobbin and the boys there was not a trace.

"Joe!" he called, as loud as he could. "Harry!" But only the mountain echoed back their names. What had become of them? Why was Dobbin gone, and the harness and sled left?

"I'll tell you what it is," said Dick, his voice shaking with excitement, "the Pawnee has carried off Harry on horseback. Get in, father, and we'll follow him up."

Mr. Cooper, now greatly alarmed, re-entered the sleigh, and drove out of the lot. The road, as they went up the mountain, grew steeper than ever, and was so unbroken that it was with difficulty that the horse could get through. The snow, too, was now falling thickly; no tracks were left to guide them, and they could only guess that the boys had gone this way. Presently, however, from the road ahead of them came the whinny of a horse.

"That's Dobbin!" cried Dick. "I'd know his anywhere. We've got them now, father, sure!"

Mr. Cooper whipped up his horse. In a moment more he recognized through the darkness the familiar form of Dobbin. Jumping down from the sleigh, he found the animal tied by the reins to the fence.

"Joe!" he cried once more. "Harry!"

There was no reply. Mr. Cooper turned with a face as white as the falling snow to his son.

"Here is the horse!" he cried. "But where are Harry and the Pawnee?"

II.

It had not taken Joe long, after Mr. Cooper's departure, to harness Dobbin in the wood sled, and with his little companion get under way. He was glad to escape for an afternoon from the farm, and the chance of encountering Dick. Why did Dick want to quarrel with him? he wondered; and why did Mr. Cooper always take Dick's part? The thought of that afternoon's trouble made him feel sad.

But now that he was off for the afternoon, with Harry to keep him company, he would not be distressed any longer. His spirits rose, and he was soon talking about himself, and his life at the West, and his hopes for the future, as only Harry knew he could talk. In a little while they were toiling up the mountain road, and after some time and effort on Dobbin's part reached the lot. The wood was already cut, and all the boys had to do was to pile it in the cart. At first Harry did his part eagerly, but he soon grew tired, and putting his cold hands in his pockets, watched Joe place the sticks in an orderly pile. Presently he recollected that when they were there a few days before Joe had set one or two snares.

"Oh, Joe," he cried, "I'm going to see if those snares have caught anything."

The Indian straightened up. "Don't get lose," he said, gravely. "I make finish here pretty soon. Must get home before dark, father said."

"Oh, I won't get lost," the little boy said, "and I'll be back in a minute."

Joe watched the sturdy little figure tramp out of the lot, and then, with a warm glow at his heart, bent again to his work. Somebody cared for him after all. When Dick struck him that afternoon his heart had been full of hate. But now everything seemed different. He could even forgive Dick, for Dick was Harry's brother. Even his work was lighter, and he lifted a great armful of wood without feeling its weight. As he transferred it to the sled, the ring of sleigh-bells attracted his attention. Looking out toward the road, he saw a cutter with two men pass rapidly by. A moment later the ring stopped, and at the same instant a boy's scream pierced the air. Then the bells began again; and rushing out of the lot, Joe could see the sleigh disappearing around a turn in the road. As he listened, another scream, half-suppressed, came back on the air. In the snow ahead lay a black object which he recognized as Harry's cap. It did not need that, however, to tell him that the men in the sleigh were kidnappers, and Harry had been carried off.

Running back to the sled with all possible speed, Joe hurriedly unharnessed Dobbin, leaving only the headstall by which he might be driven, and jumping on his back, urged the old horse up the road. It was a steep pull yet to the top, and the snow was heavy. Dobbin floundered along as though he had weights to his feet, and before he had gone half a mile began to show signs of distress. Finally he came down to a walk, and not all of Joe's spurring could persuade him to go faster. It was quite clear that in this way Joe could not hope to overtake the sleigh. Among the boys of his tribe, however, he had always been one of the fleetest runners, and even without a horse he did not despair of keeping up with the fugitives. Guiding Dobbin to the side of the road, and tying him to the bars, he set off himself on an easy run toward the top of the mountain, which now lay only a few rods ahead. The road wound so that he could not see any distance, but he knew there was no cross road before reaching the foot of the mountain. He pushed forward over the level on top of the mountain, and down the other side, until, through an opening in the wood, he could see the little railroad station in the valley below.

Joe's heart stood still as a sudden thought occurred to him. What if the men should escape by the railroad? There was a train due before long—that Joe knew because he had come in it himself—and if they got off by that, how could he hope to overtake them? He might be able to run as fast as a horse, but he could not keep up with a locomotive. But if he could only get to the station before the train he might capture them there. This thought lent new energy to his purpose, and swiftness to his feet. Nearer and nearer he drew to the foot of the mountain and the railroad. In five minutes more he would be at the station. All at once his quick ear caught the sound of a whistle, and presently he heard the rumble of an approaching train. He rushed forward with added speed, but the distance was too great. The train slackened, stopped, and then went on again. When Joe dashed down to the track, it was only a speck in the distance.

Perhaps, however, the men had not taken the train. The station-master, who was standing on the platform, would know this, and hurrying up to him, Joe asked, in his broken English, "Did you see a sleigh with two men into it and a little boy?"

The man looked at him curiously and with great deliberation. "Sleigh?" he questioned. "Yes, I did see a sleigh about ten minutes ago. It's gone on," he added. "Any of your friends in it?"

"Yes," cried Joe, excitedly, "the little boy he is my friend. Which way did it went?"

"Oh! the little boy," said the man. "Well, he didn't go in the sleigh."

"No?" exclaimed the Indian. "But where did he went?"

"Well, the boy and one of the men went in the train," observed the man, now seeming to grow interested. "Was anything wrong?" he asked. "I didn't like the looks of the fellow myself, and the child seemed scared, but it weren't my place to interfere."

"They was thieves!" the Indian cried, stamping his foot. "Kid—what do you call it?"

"Kidnappers," suggested the man.

"Yes," cried Joe, "kidnappers. They have stole Mr. Cooper's little boy; and now they have went off by the cars. Where do they went? Did they buy ticket?"

"Why, yes," said the man, "I sold them a ticket for Middlefield; that's as far as they can go by that train."

"Ah!" cried the Indian, "and can I went after them? Is there more trains?"

The man nodded.

"There's an express that goes by here in an hour," he said. "You can take that, and get there almost as soon as they. But I 'low they'll get off at Baker's Corners, and take the train to Boston there. I'll tell you what I'll do—you're Mr. Cooper's Indian boy, ain't you?"

"Yes," said Joe, gravely, "Pawnee."

"Well," said the other, "then I guess it's all right. I'll telegraph along the road to stop the man wherever he gets out, and hold him until you come. If it's a station where your train don't stop, I'll tell them to flag you. But I 'low it'll be Baker's Corners. Feller didn't think you'd follow him so close, I guess."

An hour later Joe was again in swift pursuit. The conductor had been told the circumstance by the station-master, and would be on the lookout for a flag, or ready to assist Joe if they should overtake the man at Baker's. As the train flew on the Indian's thoughts went back to the house at Stonefield. What would they think, he wondered, when Harry did not come back? How frightened they would be! His heart beat the faster as he began to share their alarm, and to fear, on his own part, that after all the man might escape him. How could he go back without Harry? and if he did not go back, might they not believe that he had stolen Harry himself? Station after station went by without showing any flag, and at length the train drew near to the Corners. Would Harry be there?

Presently the brakes were put on, and the wheels slackened their speed. From the window Joe could see a crowd on the platform. Rushing out of the car, and jumping off the steps, he pushed through the crowd. There in the grasp of a station official stood a hard-featured man, and near by a small hatless boy, who, when he saw the Indian, rushed with a loud cry of delight into his friendly arms.

"Oh, Joe," he exclaimed, rapturously, "I knew you wouldn't let me be carried off!"

As long as he lives Dick Cooper will never forget the terror of that search after his little brother. The gloom and silence of the woods, the noiseless fall of the snow, the echo of their own cries, the disappointment which met them at every step, made it an experience always to be remembered with dread. They hunted in the neighborhood of Dobbin, but could find no trace there, and then went back and explored the wood-lot with equal lack of success. Finally Mr. Cooper gave it up, and the unhappy father and his remaining son got into the sleigh and drove drearily toward home.

PAWNEE JOE IN PURSUIT OF THE KIDNAPPERS.

"We can't find them," said Mr. Cooper, gloomily, as he entered the kitchen.

His wife did not display any particular surprise. "No, of course you couldn't," she said, calmly. "I told you there wasn't any use in going."

"What do you mean?" her husband asked.

"Why, I mean the child was safe enough with Joe. That's what I said before you went out. Read that telegram," she added, handing him a bit of brown paper.

Mr. Cooper took it mechanically, and read it, while a look of relief spread over his countenance.

"Thank God!" he said, reverently; and sitting down, he covered his face with his hands.

Dick picked up the paper, and read these words:

"BAKER'S CORNERS, Jan. —
 "Mr. John Cooper, Stonefield:
 "Your son, stolen by two men, and rescued by Indian boy who followed them here. Meet him and Indian at Stonefield Depot nine o'clock."

"Station-master."

The boy walked over to the window and leaned his head against the pane. Not only was his little brother safe, but it was the Indian who had saved him. Like a great black wall all the bad and angry thoughts he had been entertaining rose up before him. How wicked he had been! how unkind to Harry! how mean and uncharitable to Joe! His conscience convicted him, and he could not say a word in his own defense. Indeed, he did not want to defend himself. It relieved him to confess his fault. Turning abruptly round, he came over to where his father was sitting. His face was flushed, and there were tears in his eyes.

"Oh, father," he cried, "I've been awfully wicked! I've hated Joe. I struck him first this afternoon. I've made him mad lots of times. I made you think he had taken Harry away."

Mr. Cooper looked gravely up at the distressed boy. "Well," he said, "I'm glad to hear you acknowledge it. But you'd better tell Joe. I'm going to the depot for them now."

As the father left the room Dick went back to the window. How could he tell Joe? He knew that he could never feel easy until he did; but how should he ask the Indian to forgive him? He stood there debating the question a long time, until at length he heard the bells of the returning sleigh. His mother opened the door, and in a moment her little boy was folded in her arms.

"Oh, mamma!" he cried, "the men told me they'd kill me if I hollered or told anybody, and they were going to take me so far off that I couldn't ever have got back again. I was awfully scared, but the minute I saw Joe, I knew it was all right. Nobody could hurt me then," he added, looking up confidently into the Indian's dark eyes.

Meanwhile, Dick had come slowly forward.

"Look here, Joe," he said, awkwardly. "I've treated you mean a good many times. I behaved like a brute this afternoon. I dare say you hate me, but I'm sorry for it all the same."

A flush of color came into the Pawnee's face.

"I did mean too," he said, simply, "and I sorry for it. But we good friends now."

The boys shook hands warmly, while Harry looked on with approving satisfaction.

"It was worth while being stolen," he whispered, delightedly, to his mother, "for the sake of bringing Dick around."

"THIS IS OUR COMPACT OF ETERNAL FRIENDSHIP—NAN'S AND MINE."

NAN.*

BY MRS LUCY C. LILLIE.

AUTHOR OF "MILDRED'S BARGAIN," "AUNT RUTH'S TEMPTATION," ETC.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

PHILIP'S absence from home was an unexpected disappointment to Nan; but the reason for it gave her some comfort. It appeared that he had developed a decided talent for painting, and so had been sent abroad by the same gentleman who was paying all his expenses.

* Begun in No. 157, HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE.

"I declare," said Mrs. Rupert, as she and Nan were at work the next morning in the kitchen, "it's wonderful the fancy that Mr. Field's took to Philip. Just saw him a few times, and put him to Barnabas; and now sent him abroad. He says he'll do well. Now Marian, she's doing splendid, if only they don't turn her head with compliments. She's so good looking and so stylish."

Nan listened, thinking more of Philip than of Marian. She wondered if he would ever do anything, or seem to do anything, to cause Mr. Field to send him home in disgrace. She hoped that no such fate would befall him.

"Now, Nan, work smart," called out Mrs. Rupert; "your teacher 'll be here soon." And Nan hurried with the breakfast dishes, so that she was ready for her new teacher by nine o'clock.

Miss Rolf evidently had employed some one to engage this governess—a gentle, quiet-looking lady about thirty years of age, who began the lessons without any questions as to Nan's recent life. Altogether, the morning was not unhappy, except that Nan had grown so painfully conscious of the dust and disorder about her that she watched Mrs. Leigh's glance every time it rested on any one object with a deep sense of mortification.

But good came of this. Nan felt certain she might make something of the room; for her ideas had developed greatly since she left Bromfield as to household matters. Accordingly, to Mrs. Rupert's great surprise, she asked permission to have the sitting-room to herself for an hour before the children returned from school; and it was wonderful what she contrived to do. Soap and water, dusters, and a broom made the place seem entirely different. And then Nan begged to be allowed to hunt in the attic for some bits of carpet. These she managed to sew in patches under the ragged places, and after mending a few tears in the curtains she felt quite triumphant. It mattered somewhat, however, that Mrs. Rupert and Marian laughed at her, and that the children coming home created fresh disorder; but still she felt conscious of well-doing.

When, after dinner, Nan carried her books up to her little attic room, she was cheered by a feeling that, in spite of the misery of her false position, she could do something. She would set herself to make the shabby house brighter and cleaner and more home-like. After a time Mrs. Rupert and Marian would feel differently about her motives in so doing.

No one must suppose that Nan worked wonders suddenly, nor that she grew very happy in doing her little work. On the contrary, it was a tedious process all around. It was hard to keep any place tidy or even tolerably comfortable. And her heart ached for news of Beverly. Miss Rolf wrote, but only to send her board and the money needful for her expenses; and as October and November dragged by, Nan's loneliness increased. Nothing could have been much more comfortless as a home than the Rupert household; and Nan used to think the "waiting-time" was more than she could bear.

CHAPTER XXIX.

PHYLLIS only knew the reason why Miss Rolf had sent Nan to Bromfield, and as the winter wore on it puzzled and perplexed her more and more. She had seen a great many evidences of what she considered a "common taste" in Nan, but never anything like untruthfulness or dishonesty.

But if Phyllis was unhappy, Miss Rolf was doubly so. She felt a strong purpose taken right out of her life, and it was hardening her into the cold, reserved woman she had been so long before Nan crept into her heart.

One afternoon shortly before Christmas Phyllis was sitting alone in her own room by the fire, busily working on some present for the approaching festivity, when she heard some one in the adjoining room sobbing. It was

Joan, who appeared with a piece of crumpled paper in her hands, exclaiming:

"Oh, Phyl! this makes me so unhappy! See, this is our compact of eternal friendship—Nan's and mine—and it's as bad as telling a lie never to write to her."

Joan held out the little paper she and Nan had written that May afternoon so long ago; and as Phyllis read it, the words so innocently written, "God bless this," awakened new belief in the child's honesty. Phyllis comforted Joan, all the time revolving the question in her mind, and was suddenly startled by hearing Joan say,

"Where has Laura gone, do you know? and may I have this to make Nan a Christmas present?"

She held up a piece of pink satin, from which some bits had been cut, and a yard or two of Valenciennes lace.

"Where did you get that, Joan?" exclaimed Phyllis.

"In the other room," explained the tearful Joan, "in a little broken box on the floor."

Phyllis made no answer; she arose and went into the next room, closing the door after her. It was a room rarely used; but since Laura had been so delicate she had often slept there to be near Phyllis, and used it in the daytime to sit in, so that her things were often about. The box of which Joan spoke lay half in half out of the flounce of the chintz lounge. Phyllis drew it out with trembling hands.

There was no mistaking its contents. They were certainly in part the articles charged to Nan at Ames's store.

Phyllis hardly knew what to think. All that she could feel sure of was that Laura was involved in the affair, but how far she could not tell. One thing, she knew, must be done at once—that was to find Laura and make her explain it.

Poor Phyllis! Pride had always been her strongest point, and belief in the uprightness of the children she had in reality brought up was almost a sacred thing to her. How could she face Miss Rolf and say, "It is my little sister who has at least been involved in this, not only poor Nan, whom we pitied because she had been badly brought up?" And then there flashed upon Phyllis a sickening feeling lest through Laura gross injustice had been done poor Nan.

"Joan," she said, looking in upon her little sister, "if Laura has gone out it must have been to Rolf House, as she never goes anywhere else. I'm going there at once—and don't let them wait tea for me. I'll be back as early as I can."

Whatever Phyllis's faults may have been, her sense of what was justly due under such circumstances was keen and pure. Though feeling half ill with dread of what she might discover, she put on her things and walked quickly up College Street to Rolf House. Her first inquiry was if Laura were there, and the answer, "Yes, miss, she is reading in the library," sent a new flutter to her heart. But she walked straight into the room where Laura, looking very white and languid, was lounging with a book before the fire.

"Laura," the elder sister said, going up to the little girl and kneeling down beside her, "I want you to tell me at once, dear, how you came by all those things Nan was supposed to have bought at Ames's."

Laura stared a moment, and then burst into tears; but to Phyllis's amazement it seemed a relieved sort of weeping. She rocked back and forth a moment, and then exclaimed between her sobs:

"Oh, Phyl! Phyl! have you found out? I'm so glad! I've come here day after day trying to confess it. Oh, I know how bad I am—and Nan is so good!"

Phyllis knelt very quietly by her little sister a moment; then she said, "Lollie, try and tell me all about it."

And then the miserable story came out. The girls at school, Laura said, were in the habit of wearing so many little bits of finery, such as she never possessed; and one day, having saved her pocket-money for a special ribbon, she went into Ames's and bought it. Just as she was about to pay for it, the clerk said, "Aren't you Miss Rolf's niece, who has things charged to her?"

Poor Laura! it was her first moment of temptation. She answered yes; had the ribbon charged, meaning to pay for it later, as in her ignorance of such matters she believed she could; and then, little by little the fascination for buying, "like the other girls," grew upon her. She kept hoping always to save money before the end of the month to pay it up, believing the bill would not be presented until January. It was, indeed, only by a chance that Miss Rolf had asked for it earlier. Then had come a desperate fit of terror, and believing Nan would be forgiven, she had meanly kept silence. What followed, Phyllis knew. Certainly Laura told the whole story now unreservedly.

It seemed to Phyllis in that hour as though something in her very heart gave way. Nan, for whom they had all secretly entertained a feeling that she was not their equal—Nan had shown herself the bravest and most upright of all.

"Laura," said poor Phyllis, "you must tell Cousin Letty." Laura gave a gasp, and put out a detaining hand as Phyllis was moving. "I will go first, and speak to her about it; but she must know at once. There must not be a moment lost."

Laura sobbed more violently than ever; and Phyllis went away and across to the black-walnut parlor, where she was tolerably sure to find her cousin.

There the old lady was seated, with listlessly folded hands, in the window where Nan had made out her accounts that first evening. She was looking across the wintry garden beds, and thinking of the lost child who had been so dear to her, who had come in her lonely old age to open the secret springs of love in her heart.

Phyllis had a choking feeling in her throat as she went in, and for a moment she could hardly speak. But nothing could have been better than her first words:

"Oh, Cousin Letitia, I know all about it! Nan—Nan is perfectly innocent! She never deceived you, except that she did not tell what she knew of others."

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

THE TAILOR'S APPRENTICE.

"WHEN shall we know that the enemy has given in?" asked a lad who had once been a tailor's apprentice, but had afterward entered the British navy, as a common boy, about the year 1680.

"When that flag is hauled down," answered the sailor addressed, "the ship will be ours."

"Oh, if that's all, I'll see what I can do!"

The vessel on which the speakers stood had had the fortune, a few hours earlier, to fall in with a French squadron, and a warm action, bravely fought on both sides, was maintained. After a time the boy had become impatient for the result, and addressed the above question to a sailor. No sooner was he told that the withdrawal of the flag from the enemy's mast-head would be the signal that the action had been decided than he determined to "see what he could do."

At that moment the vessels were engaged yard-arm to yard-arm, and were obscured in the smoke of the guns. In an instant the boy mounted the shrouds, passed from the yard of his own ship to that of the enemy, ascended with agility to the maintop-gallant-mast-head, struck and carried off the French flag unperceived, and got back to the yard-arm of his own ship in safety.

Before he could get down to the deck the British saw that the flag had disappeared, and shouted, "Victory! victory!" The French crew, seeing also that the flag was gone, and thinking that it had been struck by order of the Admiral, fled from their guns; and although the officers attempted to rally them, the confusion was hopeless. Then the British, availing themselves of the opportunity, boarded the French vessel, and captured it.

In the midst of the excitement the new boy came down from the shrouds with the French flag wrapped round his body, and displayed it with no little glee to the astonished tars. The news spread quickly to the quarter-deck, and the blushing boy was led into the presence of the Admiral, who praised him for his gallantry, and rated him there and then as midshipman.

It was not long before promotion followed promotion, and the tailor's apprentice became known as one of England's most gallant sailors.

PERIL AND PRIVATION.

BY JAMES PAYN.

THE BURNING OF THE "NEW HORN."

WILLIAM BONTEKOE, a Dutchman, who sailed from the Texel as Captain of the New Horn in the winter of 1618, has left behind him an interesting record of the fate of that unhappy ship. The catastrophe which destroyed it was all the more terrible as up to that point the voyage had been a singularly fortunate one.

The crew had suffered from sickness, it is true, but they found on the island of Mascarenhas, in the neighborhood of Madagascar, a natural health resort of quite a surprising kind. No sooner had they landed than such as were able "rolled themselves on the grass," from which alone they seemed to receive an immediate benefit. The blue pigeons overhead were so tame that they were taken by the hand, and two hundred of them killed and roasted the first day, which to the seamen who had been so long used to salt meat was a banquet beyond expression. Other birds had only to be caught, and their cries brought whole flocks within easy reach. Turtle were so plentiful that as many as twenty-five were found under a single tree. They filled their casks at a fresh-water river, "with banks covered with trees in regular order, presenting such a beautiful view that nothing in the world could be more delightful."

This "summer isle of Eden" was uninhabited save by the gentlest and most nourishing creatures, and even from the palm-trees there flowed a mild and nourishing liquid. The water round the island was so crystal clear that through seven and even eight fathoms they could distinctly see the bottom. All the sick were cured here in a very short time, and returned on board not without great unwillingness.

At St. Mary's Isle, a few days' sail from this, they met with some pleasant savages, who, understanding nothing of their language, "imitated the cries of cattle, sheep, and poultry, to inform them that such supplies were at their disposal. They brought them milk in baskets made of leaves so closely interwoven that it was drawn off by a hole pierced through. Among the crew was a man who played the violin, and who put these simple people fairly beside themselves with the delights of his music.

The crew of the New Horn had altogether a very pleasant voyage until one evening, in the latitude of the Straits of Sunda, the dreadful cry of "fire!" was raised. The steward had gone below decks with a candle to fill his keg with brandy, "that a small glass might be served out to each person in the morning, according to the Dutch fashion," and a spark from the wick had fallen into the bung-hole. The flames blew out the ends of the cask, and set fire to some coal underneath it, the smoke from which was unendurable. Upon this the Captain ordered the powder to be thrown overboard, to which the supercargo, who was answerable to the owner of the ship, "would not consent." The launch and cutter were lowered to clear the decks, and into these many of the crew quietly slipped by the chain-wale, or swam to them, having dropped into the sea. Presently, while the poor Captain was battling with the smoke and flame, one of the sailors runs up to him, and exclaims, "Dear Captain, what are we to do now? the launch and cutter have deserted us." Which indeed they had. For the moment he was transported with rage, and hoisted all sail in hopes of running them down, which, in truth, they richly deserved; "but within about three ships' lengths they got the weather-gauge, and escaped."

What a dramatic scene! The burning ship, with its tenants, within a few minutes of a horrible death, yet filled with the desire of revenge, and the miserable deserters, full of shame and fear, only escaping them by a hair's-breadth. Yet a few weeks before these people had been the best of friends, and fancied themselves in Eden.

Though little hope was left—for the oil with which the ship was laden had taken fire—the crew now betook themselves, too late, to casting out the powder. "Sixty barrels had been got overboard, but three hundred still remained. The fire at length reached them, and the vessel blew up in the air with one hundred and nineteen souls. A moment afterward not a human being was to be seen. "And believing myself to be launched into eternity," writes Bontekoe, "I cried, 'Lord, have mercy upon my soul!'"

On reaching the water, like a spent rocket, he "fetches a little breath," and perceiving the mainmast floating near him amid the other debris of the wreck, contrives to gain it. At the same moment he sees a young man rising from the water, who exclaims, "I have got it!" (meaning a spare yard). "My God!" cried I to myself, "is it possible that any one can have survived?"

With two wounds on his head, and bruises all over his back, he could do little to help another, but what lay in his power he did do. While seated with his co-survivor on the mast, the sun, the great hope-giver to all in calamity, "went down, to our great affliction," leaving them destitute of all hope of succor. When morning dawned they found both launch and cutter beside them, "and I cried out to my people to save their Captain," which they were very willing to do, though in great amazement at his being in life. But being quite unable to move, a rope was tied round him, and he was dragged on board, and deposited in a hole in the stern, "which," says poor Bontekoe, he thought "convenient" to die in.

A few hours ago meat and cheese had been floating in such quantities about his legs that it had been difficult to get rid of them, but all that these stupid sailors had managed to pick up were seven pounds of biscuits. Without their Captain they were indeed without their head. Their strength was exhausted with rowing, and when he murmured "sail," they stared at him. "Where," they asked, "were they to get sails from?" Then he told them to take their shirts, and to use all the cordage about the boat for thread; "but when I offered mine, they refused it as necessary to my feeble health." A dressing gown and pillow were also supplied him, and the surgeon applied chewed bread, "for want of a better remedy," to his wounds.

There were forty-six persons in the launch, and thirty-six in the cutter. This ingenious invalid Captain of theirs engraved a chart of the straits (of Sunda) on a plank, by which they steered, and also "constructed a compass." Each had a biscuit of the size of a man's finger daily, but nothing amid the scorching heat of the day to drink. Presently it rained, however, and they filled a cask, out of which they drank from a shoe. "They all besought me to drink as much as I liked, but I restricted myself to the same allowance as the rest."

As the launch sailed more quickly than the cutter, the people in the latter besought to join their fellows, and their entreaties were complied with. There were thus eighty-two souls crowded together on the launch, "a deck being made of the oars where some could sit, while the others crouched below." Then, as their miseries increased, and starvation set in, they began to murmur at their leader, whose only fault was the endeavor to inspire them with hope. The rage of hunger urging them beyond all bounds, they announced their intention to kill and eat the boys on board; and it was with the utmost difficulty that Bontekoe persuaded them to give them a respite of three days. If they did not sight land within that time, the boys were to be sacrificed.

Bontekoe had some confidence in his scientific calculations, but chiefly in his prayers that the Almighty would preserve them from a crime so horrible. No one could stand upright through excessive weakness, but the Captain crawled from one end of the boat to the other encouraging his men. On the third morning the quartermaster suddenly cried out, "Land! land!"

This land was inhabited by a barbarous people by whom many of them were killed, but the survivors escaped in their boat, and once more put to sea. In the end, as indeed throughout, they owed their safety to the intelligence of their Captain, for looking around him in all directions he discovered "two great blue hills," and calling to mind that he had heard from an experienced navigator that on the extreme point of Java there were two hills of this description, he steered for them, and found a haven and European help.

It is pleasant to learn from other sources that this intrepid fellow arrived in safety at his native town, "where he led an exemplary life, and died in the esteem and admiration of all who knew him."

THE snow upon the barren fields is folded white and thick,
 There are no scattered seeds or crumbs for hungry birds to pick.
 The rippling brooks are frozen hard, the golden-rod is dry,
 And Earth is lying fast asleep beneath the open sky.
 But see, with eager haste and stir the happy feathered throng
 Are all alert. The gray doves coo, the wee birds try a song,
 And Chanticleer, with head erect, uplifts a joyous crow,
 For well they know the friend who steps knee-deep across the snow.
 Old Don is patient; whirring wings go flying round his head,
 And pensive hens about him grope, nor fear a clumsy tread.
 He too awaits the gentle pat, the fond and thoughtful care
 Which all within the farmer's round in daily kindness share.
 Somehow the pretty picture brings a pleasant thought to me
 Of Him who keeps in safest watch the world's wide family.
 Since not a sparrow to the ground may fall without His sight,
 Well may we trust our Father God when wintry fields are white.

BIBLE-READING.

BY THE REV. CHARLES H. HALL, D.D.

"PIP," as we call him in certain moods, is a youngster of nine summers. He had gone to bed, after saying his prayers, and was "being read to" by his mother. Pip hardly remembers when this daily reading began, and now looks on it as one of the fixed laws of nature, like the going down of the sun. He is careful to tell any chance reader in his mother's absence to read first the selection from the Bible, and to be sure to say out loud "Comment" when he reaches the notes of Miss Charlotte Yonge.

Pip was lying quietly listening to the story of Balaam's journey. It was duly announced B.C. 1452, Numbers, xxii, 22-35, and began: "And God's anger was kindled because he went." Then came the story of the meeting of the angel, and the beast on which he sat rebuking him for his folly. Then followed "Comment." Listen to a few words from this part. Balaam "was like a child, who, when a father has once forbidden a pleasure as dangerous or mischievous, does not submit, but begs and frets to have the restraint removed, not caring to please his parents, only to escape punishment and have his enjoyment. . . . Many a time when we begin something, not sure that we are doing right, some little accident will serve to turn us back. In that mood it often makes us cross. Would it do so if we remembered that angels unseen may stand in our way, as in Balaam's, to save us from ourselves, and give time for our conscience to speak again?"

Thus far the "Comment." Now Pip's father was hearing the reading from his study, and by this time was turning over in his mind the doubts and perplexities which skeptics have started on the incidents of this Bible story. If we dare say it of a venerable dominie, he was somewhat in the condition where Milton leaves the fallen angels in his poem, "in wandering mazes lost."

The voice of the reader ceased, and the gas was put down, when Pip recalled his mother to his bedside, and putting his arms around her neck, drew her down to him and said, "Mamma, I do try to do right—I do indeed; but then sometimes I forget and get angry, or say something cross before I think. But I am sorry for it, and I try again to do better. Won't you forgive me?" Then followed a murmuring between the two, far inward at the secret shrine, over which we reverently drop the curtain, and leave them together. They had found suddenly that this strange old story had led them up to "the gate of heaven," and where angels and ministers of grace start out in ways of their own to touch the sacred nerves of the heart. The dominie found himself saying over, "Except ye become as one of these ye can not see the kingdom of God"; and again: "Where is the scribe? Where is the disputer of this world?" Many American boys would answer even an apostle, "Nowhere!"

While he was thus musing he turned over the introduction of Miss Yonge's excellent book, and read these words (she is deeply interested in revealing truth, especially for the help of young people): "Every one engaged in education must at times have felt some difficulty on the subject of Holy Scripture with children. . . . Nearly a century ago the estimable Hannah Trimmer endeavored to meet some of these difficulties" by selections and annotations of her own. For many years this was a class-book in almost all English schools; but it was found on experience to be too dignified with "Johnsonian English," and proved to be dull. Miss Yonge speaks also of "a few expedient omissions" in Bible-reading, and of her efforts to select such passages as she found "to suit with children's ordinary powers," which could be dwelt on "without weariness."

This was the book which had sent Pip to the shrine of his mother's love to make his humble confession and to hear such absolute, not without tears and kisses on both sides, as she could give him.

And now, ye young folk of all ages, who are all the little children of the Great Teacher, what are the Sacred Scriptures read for? What do you wish to get out of them?

We would condense our answer for the young folk into the words of the Master: "In them ye think ye have eternal life, and they testify of Me." Jesus said this of the Old Testament, as the New was not yet written. Two reasons are given by Him. "Ye think ye have eternal life" in those old records. "Ye find in them the witness to Me." Yes, Doctor, but can children understand either reason? Well, let us see.

Can a boy understand the Declaration of Independence? Perhaps not. But he can receive into his inward sap and marrow the stories of the American Revolution, the lives of its heroes, the examples of their courage in resisting wrong, the battle of Lexington, Paul Revere's ride, the ring of Patrick Henry's indignant eloquence, and the rush of Otis's fervor for liberty. He can feel all that the Declaration means. Now suppose that the judges of all the Supreme Courts in the United States should become legal missionaries, and should travel over the land to lecture in our schools to the children and expound to them learnedly that document—how clear, solid, and majestic it is—would it pay? would it make better patriots of another generation? We think not.

Have our learned divines possibly been trusting too much to that sort of head-knowledge, and forgotten that the Old Testament, and certainly the New, have cared very little for it? Moses charged all the parents in Israel to teach their own children the sacred words and institutions of the Law, which had in them "eternal life." No one else was to do it for them, because no one else could do it as well. Hear him: "These words which I command thee this day shall be in thine heart [where they must be, to come warm out of it], and thou shalt teach them diligently unto thy children, and shalt talk of them [not preach them, nor be learned and Johnsonian about them, but talk of them as the heart inclines] when thou sittest in thine house, and when thou walkest by the way, and when thou liest down [as Pip did], and when thou risest up; and thou shalt bind them for a sign upon thine hand [to guide all actions], and they shall be as frontlets between thine eyes" [to guide all seeing]. This was the intention of the Lawgiver. He suited his laws to this sort of domestic instruction. Has it ever failed? Can it fail?

Every Israelite child took his earliest education from the bosom whence he drew his mother's milk, which can hardly ever give place to other food without danger. Actual life in motion is God's element of instruction in the Bible. If the poet tells us,

"Lives of great men all remind us
We can make our lives sublime," what shall we say of a Book which we believe that the wisdom of God prepared to this one great end for ever and ever? No matter just now as to certain difficult parts of it. There are dark sayings, forgotten customs, things that have perished in the using—many things that we do not know much about and never shall know. Life in this Book was real and earnest. It began as a stream far up in the wild region of idolatries, where nature reigned in grim solitude.

"Look," said the poet-prophet Isaiah, "to the rock whence ye were hewn, saith the Lord; look to Abram your father, for I called him alone." It worked its onward way like a stream through the lives and actions of certain men, now in shadow, now in sunshine, taking in other streamlets, sometimes clear and again turbid. Then it ran onward into national history, and rolled between the Two Tables of Law engraven on stones, and on the cliffs were marked old runic signs of temple worship and royal dynasties. Moss has gathered on the cliffs, but none on the river. All were to end in visions of "One like unto the Son of man," who was to receive a kingdom of saints, and reign forever. Can a boy in any way receive this Divine instruction? Can he read the lesson for himself of the Life which is eternal, which is to know God and Jesus Christ whom He hath sent?

Let us consider. Greek boys used the Iliad very much to this end. Roman boys were taught to look upon the Æneid in this way. The Buddhists hold up Gautama before their pupils with this intent. And Christian instruction for children is perforce the nurture and admonition of the Lord of life. Bible-reading, then, no matter for many places dark to science and dogma, is the reading by children of lives of great men, who were sinners all; following them through scenes of fall and recovery, in deserts of sin and on battle-fields with spirits of evil; always looking into the true life of life, to find and feel the spiritual manhood with its law and ordinances, which shall teach them how sin is the one evil of all alike, how repentance is the one medicine, and pardon the one peace of the true soul.

This eternal life—not some future condition of it, but the life now and here—that is under all other life, Jesus saw hidden in the Old Testament, and bade the proud men about Him to search for it there, if haply they might find it. Parents are wise, Sunday-schools are useful, and children are fortunate who, refusing to be scribes, seek to dig out this refined gold and mint it into the shekels of the sanctuary. Pip had dug out of the sad story of Balaam's obstinacy the lesson which was needed for him by love rather than by science.

Again, Jesus said, "They testify of Me." All along the ages,

"From Adam's loss until the end of years
From east unto the west the Son of Man appears."

Christ is the ideal manhood. He is God manifest in the flesh. His life was pure and sinless, and only His. Did Abraham deceive Pharaoh? Did Jael assassinate Sisera? Did David offend in the matter of Uriah? How fatal it is for a parent or teacher to boggle at the reply! They were sinners, all of them; imperfect all. But did a shadow of sin ever darken the Sun of Righteousness? The others only pointed to Him. The high-priests, the seers, the faulty saints, only told the need and the power of His coming. The law had its end in Christ. He revealed the "Way, the Truth, and the Life." So wrote the best beloved disciple, very tenderly, of that love for Him which fulfills all law, purifies all hearts to the righteousness of Christ, and brings God down to dwell in the humblest soul. The truth as it is in Jesus, the spirit and mind of Christ, is the secret of all religious life, in boys and men the same.

Read the Bible, then, with open eyes. Don't be afraid of it. Don't be afraid for it; it can stand alone, and take all risks. Read it in the sacred silences of home. Think it over by the way-side. Ponder it as Pip did, to hear "the Unction from above" speaking words very holy and practical.

Or we may recall another boy who was lying awake at midnight on his pallet near the tabernacle, and heard a voice in the darkness talking to him words which the old priest could not hear, because his ears were heavy with sin. That voice sounds ever. For such readers and thinkers in all lands and all ages the Old Book is always God's book, and teaches boys and all of that eternal life and that Saviour who brought it to light.

"Oh, say not, dream not, heavenly notes
To childish ears are vain;
That the young mind at random floats,
And can not reach the strain!"

"Dim or unheard the words may fall,
And yet the heaven-taught mind
May learn the sacred art, and all
The harmony unwind."

TRAPS.

BY JIMMY BROWN.

A BOY ought always to stand up for his sister, and protect her from everybody, and do everything to make her happy, for she can only be his sister once, and he would be so awfully sorry if she died and then he remembered that his conduct toward her had sometimes been such.

Mr. Withers doesn't come to our house any more. One night Sue saw him coming up the garden walk, and father said, "There's the other one coming, Susan; isn't this Travers's evening?" and then Sue said, "I do wish somebody would protect me from him like that stupid don't I wish I need never lay eyes on him again."

I made up my mind that nobody should bother my sister while she had a brother to protect her. So the next time I saw Mr. Withers I spoke to him kindly and firmly—that's the way grown-up people speak when they say something dreadfully unpleasant—and told him what Sue had said about him, and that he ought not to bother her any more. Mr. Withers didn't thank me and say that he knew I was trying to do him good, which was what he ought to have said, but he looked as if he wanted to hurt somebody, and walked off without saying a word to me, and I don't think he was polite about it.

He has never been at our house since. When I told Sue how I had protected her she was so overcome with gratitude that she couldn't speak, and just motioned me with a book to go out of her room and leave her to feel thankful about it by herself. The book very nearly hit me on the head, but it wouldn't have hurt much if it had.

Mr. Travers was delighted about it, and told me that I had acted like a man, and that he shouldn't forget it. The next day he brought me a beautiful book all about traps. It told how to make mornahundred different kinds of traps that would catch everything, and it was one of the best books I ever saw.

Our next-door neighbor, Mr. Schofield, keeps pigs, only he don't keep them enough, for they run all around. They come into our garden and eat up everything, and father said he would give almost anything to get rid of them.

Now one of the traps that my book told about was just the thing to catch pigs with. It was made out of a young tree and a rope. You bend the tree down and fasten the rope to it so as to make a slippermoose, and when the pig walks into the slippermoose the tree lies up and jerks him into the air.

I thought that I couldn't please father better than to make some traps and catch some pigs; so I got a rope, and got two Irishmen that were fixing the front walk to bend down two trees for me and hold them while I made the traps. This was just before supper, and I expected that the pigs would come early the next morning and get caught.

It was bright moonlight that evening, and Mr. Travers and Sue said the house was so dreadfully hot that they would go and take a walk. They hadn't been out of the house but a few minutes when we heard an awful shriek from Sue, and we all rushed out to see what was the matter.

Mr. Travers had walked into a trap, and was swinging by one leg, with his head about six feet from the ground. Nobody knew him at first except me, for when a person is upside down he doesn't look natural; but I knew what was the matter, and told father that it would take two men to bend down the tree and get Mr. Travers loose. So they told me to run and get Mr. Schofield to come and help, and they got the step-ladder so that Sue could sit on the top of it and hold Mr. Travers's head.

I was so excited that I forgot all about the other trap, and, besides, Sue had said things to me that hurt my feelings, and that prevented me from thinking to tell Mr. Schofield not to get himself caught. He ran ahead of me, because he was so anxious to help, and the first thing I knew there came an awful yell from him, and up he went into the air, and hung there by both legs, which I suppose was easier than the way Mr. Travers lunged.

Then everybody went at me in the most dreadful way, except Sue, who was holding Mr. Travers's head. They said the most unkind things to me, and sent me into the house. I heard afterward that father got Mr. Schofield's boy to climb up and cut Mr. Travers and Mr. Schofield loose, and they fell on the gravel, but it didn't hurt them much, only Mr. Schofield broke some of his teeth, and says he is going to bring a lawsuit against father. Mr. Travers was just as good as he could be. He only laughed the next time he saw me, and he begged them not to punish me, because it was his fault that I ever came to know about that kind of trap.

Mr. Travers is the nicest man that ever lived, except father, and when he marries Sue I shall go and live with him, though I haven't told him yet, for I want to keep it as a pleasant surprise for him.

A BOYS' SKATING MATCH.

THE boys and girls who read HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE have of course heard a great deal about the great Ice Carnival at Montreal—the palace that was built out of blocks of ice, the snow-shoe parade and steeplechase, the curling and hockey games, the tobogganing, the races on the river, and the great ball. For two or three weeks all the papers were full of these proceedings, and hardly any one can have missed hearing of them. One of the most interesting features of the Carnival, however, was quite overlooked by the papers. That was the boys' skating match, which took place on Tuesday evening of Carnival week, and of which the readers of YOUNG PEOPLE will enjoy an exclusive report.

Skating in Montreal is mostly done indoors. Large houses, or rinks, are built, with a central space for the skaters and a raised platform around the sides for spectators. When the floor has been flooded and frozen it presents such an icy surface, unruffled by wind and with no treacherous cracks, as those who have skated all their lives on rivers or ponds—even park ponds—can hardly imagine. In these rinks skating lasts with scarcely a break from the 1st of December to the 1st of April. No wonder the Montreal people are good skaters, and that even the boys do such clever feats as I saw them perform at the match. We in New York think we are fortunate if the "ball" is up two or three times in a winter for a few days at a time; and even then the ice is soon cut up and ruined.

It is at the Victoria Rink that the match which we are to see comes off. On the ice are twenty or thirty people, mostly boys, with one or two gentlemen to serve as starter and judge, while the platform and galleries are occupied by a large crowd of spectators. The first performances are only trials of speed by men around the rink, which measures one-fifth of a mile; it is when it comes to the barrel races by boys that we find something more lively and diverting.

What a barrel race may be, we American visitors have no idea. Seven barrels, open at both ends, are laid side by side upon the ice at each of the four corners of the rink, and in our ignorance we fancy that the seven boys, who have already formed into line, are going to leap over them. It must be a sort of hurdle race, we conclude; and when the boys, having started off, drop on the ice before the first row of barrels, we suppose that they have stumbled. What a pity! we think; and how very odd that all should have tripped at the same time! But before we can frame this thought, to our great surprise the boys proceed to crawl into the barrels. Then it flashes upon us. The skaters are expected not to jump over the obstacle, but to wriggle through it, and in fact one of them has already extricated himself, and is dashing along toward the second row.

Meanwhile the others are picking themselves up and in a moment pressing hard upon the heels of their more agile companion. But number one holds the lead. When he drops again he seems to aim directly for the barrel. Turning on his back as his head shoots through the opening, and using his feet and arms to push away the incumbent, it is not a moment before he is free and the barrel left spinning around on the ice. Others, however, are less skillful, and one small boy, whose wild struggles have turned the barrel completely around, starts off, when released, in the opposite direction from that which he was previously taking. It is needless to say that he does not win the race; nor do any of the rest succeed in outstripping the one who beat them at the start. Indeed, while they are still engaged in kicking off the last bar rels, amid the laughter and applause of the spectators, he sails quite easily up to the goal.

Another race of the same kind follows in which small-leaves the potato, and hurries off to the third. By this time the line is very much broken; some of the less active ones are only through the first row, others have just attacked the second, while one is already starting out for the fourth. Watch him as he darts up to the row, as yet untouched; skillfully and without stopping he picks up the first potato, hurries back to the basket, drops in the vegetable at arm's-length, and without losing a second of time or an inch of space returns to the one remaining row.

THE BARREL RACE.

er boys engage, and which is not less funny. The small boys, indeed, look even more like tadpoles as they sprawl on the ice, and are even less expert in wriggling out of the imprisoning staves. When this has been run, the winner—a little fellow not more than ten—is matched against the larger boy who had won the previous race; but here the superior strength and size of the elder enable him to gain an easy victory.

After this comes a hurdle race. Sections of fence, each about three feet high, are set up at intervals across the track, over which the skaters are expected to jump. In a running jump the momentum which one gains is a help, but in skating it is rather a hinderance, since it carries the feet along the ice when they ought to be in the air. To one who is only looking on, and has never tried it himself, it seems quite improbable that, with so little purchase as the ice affords, the skater can suddenly convert a rapid forward movement into an equally rapid upward one. But, as a matter of fact, when he reaches the hurdle, he rises as though he were shot up by a spring-board, clears the barrier, and coming down with a ring on the other side, goes on as before.

Another feature of the evening is the potato race, contested by eight or ten boys. Rows of potatoes, as many in each row as there are boys, are laid the depth of the rink, at intervals of thirty or forty feet, on the ice, while at the starting-point is placed a basket for each boy. At the word "go" the boys dash off, and hastily snatch the potatoes in the first row. Bringing his prize back to the goal, each one deposits it in his basket, and then scuds away to the second row. Returning in like manner from this, he

Here the process is repeated, and though another boy is pressing him close, his skill does not desert him, and he brings back in triumph the first potato of the last row, being the earliest to fill his basket, and so winning the race.

From this skating match, and indeed from all the festivities of the Carnival, I bring back a single thought—why might not these delightful sports become popular in the States? One does not need to do more than look at the Canadian young men to observe how hardy and robust they are; and it is not difficult to discover what makes them so. Their fondness for out-of-door life and vigorous exercise is the source of their strength and good health, and it is something which American boys, and girls too, would do well to cultivate. There is no American village or town, where the winters are cold enough to supply snow and ice, in which skating, tobogganing, lacrosse, hockey, and snow-shoe clubs might not be formed, to the great advantage of the young people. The benefit of a club is that it organizes the sport and encourages the members to indulge in it more systematically than if they tried it separately and on their own account. If it is too late to do anything this winter, organize for next winter; so that when the frost comes again it will find everything in readiness for the fullest enjoyment of the season.

THE HURDLE RACE.

CAMBRIDGE, NEW YORK.

I wonder if any of the other little girls who have YOUNG PEOPLE know what fun it is to play "Nan." I am four years old, and I delight in both the story and the play.

My baby-house is Aunt Letty's home, and under the table is the cottage where Mrs. Traverser used to live. I put some of my letters in that, and I have a store where Nan goes to buy, and a corner for Love's home. My sweetest doll is Nan; and as I have only eight dolls, I had to cut paper dolls for some of the doll children, there were so many. I hope every paper will have a picture of Nan.

ETHEL H. L.

This is a dear little letter from a bright little girl. Perhaps some others among our readers may try the plan of turning Mrs. Lillie's beautiful story into a play.

WEST BERGEN, NEW JERSEY.

I am nine years old, and take HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, and enjoy reading it ever so much. It would please me to see my letter in next week's Post-office Box. I am just learning to skate, but I am afraid the ice will not last much longer. I must soon go to work, so as to help my mother, and I hope I may get a good place. I have a new suit piece, I think they are very pretty. Will you please tell me how to keep rabbits?

WILLARD P. W.

In No. 92, Vol. II, you will find an article which tells all about the care of rabbits. Many of you express the wish that Willard does, that your letters may appear in the next Post-office Box. This, dear boys and girls, is impossible. There are so many of you, and your letters come in such numbers, that some of you must be kept waiting a long time.

BELMONT, MARYLAND.

I am the eldest of five children. I have a very pretty doll, and a great many pictures. I have some very pretty goldfish, two beautiful canaries, and a dear, sweet little sister, the pride of all our hearts. She is just as cunning as she can be. This is my second letter to the Postmistress. My first letter was published in E. V. K.

After waiting awhile, if your letters do not appear, follow E. V. K.'s example, and write again. As has been said before, if every letter which comes to the Post-office Box were printed, you would not have any of the serials, the Jimmy Brown stories, or the pleasant and instructive articles. I am sure you would not like that.

CASSOPOLIS, MICHIGAN.

There are two lakes in our town, and a large island in one of them. My parents, little sister, grandma, some friends, and myself went out camping on Diamond Lake Island last summer. Some days the lake was so rough that the waves dashed upon the beach. Perhaps you would like to know how old I am, and what I study at school. I am ten years old. I study geography, reading, and spelling. I can work examples in long division, and read in The Child's Book of Nature. I learn a good deal about the body, plants, and animals in this book. I guess I have written enough for the first time. When next spring I come back from Boston, I will write another letter, and tell you all about my trip if you would like to have me.

MELLIE S.

Certainly, Mellie, write again.

BOSTON, MASSACHUSETTS.

I am going to tell you a pretty story called "The Fairy Dream."

"I wish there were real fairies," said Maudie, as she walked down the path one late May day. She said this she saw a blue light in the distance.

"I will go and see what that is," said she. Pretty soon she came to the place where she saw the light. As she stood there a tiny fairy came before her.

"Are you a fairy?" said she.

"Yes, child," answered the fairy.

"And you can give me the three wishes?"

"What are they?"

"A baby sister, a lovely doll, and a room full of gold."

"I will if you will not tell that you have seen me until a week from to-day," said the fairy.

Maudie promised. But before she thought she told her mother almost as soon as she reached home, and then she told her father what a pity —

"What is a pity?" said her mother.

"I've had such a pretty fairy dream, just as good as a story."

"What is it?" said she. After she had told her mother the story they both went down to dinner.

ALICE S.

MY TALK WITH DOLLY.

Sleep, little dolly dear,
I will stay and watch you here,
And soon as you awake
You and I will have some cake.
So sleep, dolly dear,
In the cradle sleep.

I will sit and watch you here,
While you play and have good cheer;
When you've slept we will have tea,
Then go to visit Tommy Lee.
So sleep, dolly dear,
In the cradle sleep.

THE SLOW GIRL.

I am a little girl indeed,
And little I do know;
But I will try and be more prompt,
And no more be so slow.

When I reached the school-room door
I saw a card marked "Late."
I heard the very last bell ring
When I stood at the gate.

And so I missed a lesson hour
That I had tried to get;
I'm sorry that I was so slow,
But I'll try not to fret.

LOUISA CAROLINA N.

EAB, PENNSYLVANIA.

PHILADELPHIA, PENNSYLVANIA.

I am a little girl eleven years old, I have no pets like other little girls, but have two brothers and one little sister. Their names are Larry, Willie, and May. May will talk to Willie in a very old fashion. She can sing a song called "The Harvest" very nicely. This is my first letter to YOUNG PEOPLE, and I hope you will print it, for I want to surprise papa.

BESSIE B.

YPSALANTI, MICHIGAN.

I am a little girl ten years old, and have no mother, no father, no sisters, and no brothers, but I live with my grandpa and grandma. I have ten dolls and a cat. We have lots of chickens and hens. I have a pet hamster. I go to school, and walk a mile and a half.

EMMA F. H.

HOT SPRINGS, ARKANSAS.

I am a little girl eleven years old. I have lived here nine years. There are many interesting curiosities here. The Hot Springs Mountain is a spur of the Ozark range. A number of warm springs (the hottest of which will boil an egg) flow from the base of this mountain into Hot Springs Creek—a small tributary to the Onatchita (Washi-tai) River. About thirty miles west of here are the Crystal Mountains, where are found fine and rare geological specimens. This is a health resort for invalids from various parts of the world. I would like to join the Little Housekeepers' Sociable, so please put my name down.

ANNE D. W.

CANTON, VERMONT.

I do not go to school this winter. I never have been but two terms, but I study at home with my mamma. I read in the Fourth Reader, and study the little arithmetic.

I have not got any sisters or brothers. I think I ought to have, but I have a good big dog. His name is Prince. He is taller than the table, he keeps away the tramps; he is an English mastiff. Papa says he is thorough-bred. I do not know what that means; I suppose you do, for editors are good reading. I bought my dog from an editor down in New Hampshire, Mr. C. And I have got a pony; her name is Golden Hair, and she is English. Papa got her in Canada. I do not like to ride, but I like to give my money. Papa does not stay at home much, for he is a lawyer, and has to go off for folks a lot of times. I wish he could stay at home more, so he could take care of me and my mamma. This is when he is at home. I like to ride. I read the letters from children in your Post-office Box, so you may please print mine for other children to read.

ARTHUR D. L.

SPENCER DUYVAL, NEW YORK.

I have never seen a child in the Post-office Box from this place, so I thought I would write you. I started my little brother, took the paper last year, and this year my uncle sends it to me. I am eight years old, and have three brothers and one sister. I think the Postmistress a very nice woman. My little brother, George, and my mamma is giving me lessons on the piano, and I like to practice very much. I have three dolls—one girl and two boys. One boy is in kilt and the other in a kilt and a bonnet. I have a doll much prettier in baby clothes, so I keep him in them most of the time.

All the boys and girls tell about their pets. We have none but a cat that is cross. We have had several dogs, but in some way they are all gone now. Our first dog, a setter, ran away when a puppy; then papa gave away two of my little terriers, and got an Irish setter, but when we went to the country he was so big that he was too big for me, and had another puppy, whose name was Tam of Shanter, and we loved him best of any. One morning my brother came in and said, "Grace, please come and help me find Tam." We looked out the lowest door of the barn, and there lay our poor little doggie, unconscious, and all the time having the most dreadful convulsions. Mamma took a doctor, who said Tam had broken his backbone, and could not live, so we managed to get him on some straw, and covered him up. When he grew worse papa had to shoot him.

I like "Nan" and "Leg" best of all the stories I have read. I would like to see them published, for I would like to see it in my paper, as I have not written before. Good-by.

GRACE H.

Poor little Tam of Shanter! It was kinder to kill him than to let him live in misery, but I know your hearts were heavy that day. The Postmistress thinks her eight-year-old Grace is a sweet girl. Don't you wonder how she found out how many birthdays you had kept, dear?

MILLARD PARK, NEW JERSEY.

I am a little girl ten years old. I have a sister seven years old. I have a great many pets, and I am going to tell about them. I have two cats, their names are Spot and Bunnie. Spot has eight young ones. I have two dogs and two cats; one dog's name is Polo, and the other is named Beppo. We sleep in the same room, and I go to school to meet us when we get to the bottom of the hill to bring out sleighs up to the top, and he takes them home. This is my first letter to HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, and I hope all my friends, Christmas and a happy New-Year.

HESSIE W. S.

CALUMET, MICHIGAN.

We have been playing forfeits, blind-man's bluff, school, and several other things. We have had a lot of writing a small letter to you. There are four of us jolly girls here. Dear Postmistress, I hope you will have no objection to print this letter, for we all would like to see printed in your paper to become one of your Housekeepers; I can make white bread and gingerbread. We all sign our names.

NELLIE M. KATE S.

ANNE D. MARY Q.

MEADVILLE, PENNSYLVANIA.

I am five years old, and, with my sister, who is nine, have taken your paper for the last two years. We like all the stories very much, and always read the letters in the Post-office Box; so we have written you a number of letters, but you do not like ever so much to see it published by us. I was learning to ride horseback last summer, and one day fell off. Papa then said I must wait till I was older. I have a nice little pony named Susie; he is a water-spaniel, and is very kind and full of play. I go to Sunday-school, and sister Susie goes to every-day school. Next spring mamma has promised that I may wear pants.

Susie and I send you $1 for Young People's Cot. We hope it will help to make some one comfortable.

SCOTT D.

Your contribution was sent to Miss Fanshawe, treasurer of the Cot Fund, and you will see it acknowledged in her next report. Very glad to hear from you and Susie is the Postmistress.

UNCLE JOHN'S VISIT.

Little Millie Bassett lived in the country, and was what some people called a regular little country girl. She had been in the world, and was nearly twelve years old, and had gone through all the studies which the simple little country school required, and that was not very much. She had a nice little pony named Susie in the city, and enjoy the many advantages city children of her own age enjoyed, more fortunate than herself. But Millie was a poor little girl, she had an aunt, and she lived with her. Her aunt, who took sewing into the house of small cottage in which they lived, and was very often pinched, and had a hard time to make both ends meet, but had a few success in keeping the rent paid. Sometimes kind Uncle John sent affectionate letters with money in them; but he thought they were very comfortable, while they were very useful to her.

"Well," said Aunt Jennie, as Millie came from the post-office one day, "what have you in your hand, Millie dear?"

"Oh, Aunt Jennie," from Philadelphia; it must be from Uncle John."

"Open it, child," said the aunt; and Millie hastily tore it open. It was a little note saying that Uncle John was going to make them a short visit, as he had not seen them since the last time, and had never seen his niece, and now, as he had a business trip taking him in that direction, he would be home in a few days.

The days flew by until the day came when Uncle John was expected. An hour before the train came to the little station Millie and Aunt Jennie saw that the welcome home. After a very long waiting the train came, and with it no Uncle John—not a sign of him.

They very slowly walked home, and Millie went to bed early that night, unhappy and disappointed. And Aunt Jennie not very much better.

The next morning Millie was going to the village on an errand, when she was stopped by a venerable middle-aged gentleman to inquire if she knew where Miss Jennie Taylor lived. Millie smiled, and said it was her aunt; and when the good man informed her he was her uncle John, they walked home together very quickly. It is needless to describe the joy and gladness Aunt Jennie and Uncle John, and the numberless presents he brought. And when he saw the way they were living he insisted they should come to his home in the city to live, and Millie should have the best education money could procure; and, besides, he needed a little girl to brighten his home.

Millie grew up, under her uncle and aunt's guidance, a good, useful woman, and often tells her children the story of Uncle John's visit.

G. J. L.

NORTH WINDSOR, CONNECTICUT.

I have wanted to write a little letter to you for a long time. YOURS PEOPLE has been my Christmas present from my uncle B. W., in Boston, for two years. I have a sister twelve years old, and a brother ten, and they receive the Youth's Companion and the Wide-awake from the same uncle.

We have a large black and white cat we call Sambo; he is about eight years old, and so am I. Mamma had the doctor call on her because it was the best week, because it made him sick, and he couldn't eat. The doctor did him all up in a sheet, except his head, when he pulled it. He has been all right ever since.

Like the story of "Sam" ever so much, and like to get him Tuesday, as that is the day my paper usually comes.

With much love to you, dear Postmistress.

GRACE A. C.

This is the first time that I ever heard of a cat which had had a tooth extracted. I am glad the operation was successful.

NEW YORK CITY.

I am a little boy eleven years old, and am a great admirer of your valuable paper, which I think is the best juvenile paper in the United States. I like Jimmy Brown's stories very much indeed. I do not go to school, but am taught at home by a visiting governess, whom I love dearly. Her name is Miss B. My two sisters and myself are employed very much under her tuition, and I like being taught at home a great deal better than going to school. My eldest sister and myself study history, arithmetic, spelling, definitions, grammar, geography, etc. My mother and mamma came to pay us a visit for a month or so, and brought with him some tropical fruits and sweetmeats.

DANIEL L.

Manly boys always admire their teachers. One of these days, I suppose, you will be wanting to return Uncle Charles's visit in Panama. And what will you take to him from New York?

MONTREAL, CANADA.

I am a little girl eleven years old. I like YOURS PEOPLE, and I think "Nan" is a beautiful story. My papa and mamma always read Jimmy Brown's stories. I would like to cultivate that boy's acquaintance. Besides the Postmistress would like to hear a description of the Ice Palace we had here. The tower in the centre is quite high, and on top of that is a lot of evergreens formed into a tree. Then on each corner are the walls of the same small evergreen trees. The walls of the Ice Palace are all pillars. When it was illuminated by electric lights it looked beautiful, for the electric lights cast a rosy hue all over the Ice Palace. I have a letter to be among those in one of the numbers of YOURS PEOPLE. I have a little sister Laura, who is five years old. Laura and I have each got a little bird. Laura's is Dicky, and mine is Signor Campanini, but we call him simply for short. They are both beautiful singers. Now good-by.

LITTLE HOUSEKEEPERS.

FRESNO, CALIFORNIA.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS,—I am an old girl, with two little girls of my own, and I have two experienced artists of cakes; so, encouraged by their approbation of the "hereinafter mentioned" cakes, I venture to send you one or two receipts, hoping that the young members of the Sociable may find them as much as we do.

The first is an auile belou Mississippi
GENERAL RECIPE.—Three and a half cups (about one cup more than a quart) of cream, one cup of brown sugar, one cup of butter, one cup of cream or milk of the latter, allow an extra table-spoonful of butter, one cup of molasses, five eggs, one ounce of ground nutmeg, one dessert-spoonful of ground clove, and one tea-spoonful of soda. Cream the butter very light; beat the eggs separately very light; beat the soda dissolved in boiling water into the molasses; mix all very thoroughly; mix as follows: into the yolks beat alternately sugar, milk, and butter; then the molasses and the spices; then the stiff whites; flour last. Bake like pound-cake. This is very rich and very delicious.

DANISH COOKIES.—One and a half pounds of flour, twelve ounces of butter, twelve ounces of sugar, three eggs, three table-spoonfuls of sweet cream, and two tea-spoonfuls of yeast powder. Cream the butter; beat the eggs separately; roll very thin; cut and bake like cookies.

DANISH EASTER CAKE.—One pint of cream (or fresh milk), one pound of flour, and twelve ounces of butter if milk is used, thirteen ounces of butter. Mix the cream and flour; then roll out, dot with butter, fold, and roll; do this several times. Then fold in the cream, lay on a rag-slop, brush the top with the beaten yolk of an egg, and sprinkle thickly with sugar. Let them be about an inch thick before baking. Bake quickly.

These are all very delicious cakes, as I hope many of your correspondents will prove. Yours always appreciatively.

Mrs H. B. D.

Many thanks for your kindness in sending us these receipts.

MARSHALL, MICHIGAN.

MY DEAR LITTLE FRIENDS.—Perhaps I am not enough of a cook to join your Sociable, but I know I am fond of all things that some one else has cooked. However, as I am going to try and learn, perhaps you will let me in, and as I sometimes make very nice candy, I will send a receipt.

CREAM ALMONDS.—Two and a half cups of fine sugar and half a cup of water; boil four minutes; then beat until cold enough to handle; mound over almond nuts, and roll in coarse sugar. Will somebody who tries this write and tell me how she succeeded?

AMELIA F.

ST. CATHARINES, ONTARIO, CANADA.

We have a splendid pudding which we use all very fond of, and perhaps it may be of use to the other little cooks, as it is plain, not expensive, and very good.

FLORA C. MACGREGOR.

SURPRISE CAKE.—One large cup of sugar, one cup of sweet milk, half a cup of butter, two and a half cups of flour, two tea-spoonfuls of cream of tartar, one tea-spoonful of soda, and one egg.

REVELRY-TIME Pudding.—One cup of molasses, one cup of sweet milk, one cup of mince, one table-spoonful of butter, one tea-spoonful of soda, and one cup of flour, two cups of salt, flour enough to make a stiff batter; put in a mould, and steam two hours.

NEW JERSEY.

I send you a receipt of "doll's cup cake," which I have tried and found very nice.

EMILY L. B.

DOLL'S CUP CAKE.—One doll's cup of butter, two doll's cups of sugar, three doll's cups of flour, one doll's cup of milk, one egg, one salt-spoonful of baking-powder, and nutmeg.

A NEW SERIAL.

"THE RAISING OF THE 'PEARL'"

BY JAMES OTIS.

AUTHOR OF "TORY TYLER," "TIM AND TIP," AND "MR. STURGE'S BROTHER."

In our next issue our young readers will find the familiar name of Mr. Otis at the head of a new serial story. It is always a pleasant occasion when Mr. Otis begins to tell us a new long story, and at such a time HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE is sure of a specially enthusiastic welcome in every household. The author of "Tory Tyler" is justly regarded as a prince among story-tellers for the little people, and the fact that he tells a story is a sufficient guarantee of its interest. The boys will be delighted with "The Raising of the Pearl," for, in addition to its being the work of their favorite author, it is also a boating story, the Pearl being a jaunty little yacht first rescued from a watery grave by a party of boys, and then fitted up into a sea-worthy craft, in which a cruise is made, catching thrilling adventures and entertaining experiences of all kinds.

KAKEMONO.

BY FRANK BELLEVUE.

HERE is a new game that I have learned, and I think the young people would like it. Each one of the company writes on a piece of paper a subject, for example, "A Boy Chasing Cows," and then doubles the paper over. Then the next takes it, and draws a picture illustrating the subject. The second, who draws the picture, can look at the subject, but the next must only look at the picture, and then make a piece of poetry describing it. Here is one example of what we accomplished one day when we were playing Kakemono.

SUBJECT.—"Southern Life and Customs."—A scene in the sunny South before the war; slaves at work in the cotton field. To which was written the following poetry:

"Ah, what a mess this is!
I can't make head or tail out;
I don't know what it means,
I don't know what they want.
Men, women, and children all,
As they stand in a row in the sun,
Seem to be attacked by bees,
And if they had sense they'd run.
But what the Indians are doing
Passes my comprehension,
Children unless they are chopping up,
To decrease the population."

One rule more: Whoever draws the picture must not write anything to explain it.

EXPLANATION.—Those down below who were taken for Indians are negroes killing and picking chickens.

THE BEETLES' BANQUET.

IT must not be supposed that elegant dinners are confined to human beings alone. Rich feasts are often enjoyed by animals, and even insects, as the following account of a naturalist's experiences will show.

He was lying in his garden one warm afternoon in summer, under the shade of an old oak-tree, when a peculiar rustling noise struck his ear. Shortly afterward a black object fell to the ground, which, on examination, proved to be a stag-beetle. When he saw it it was preparing to climb the tree from which it had tumbled down. Looking upward, the observer noticed a curious brown mass seven or eight feet up the trunk.

Desiring to know what it really was, the naturalist obtained a ladder to examine into the matter more closely. He found that sap was coming from the bark, and that around this dainty dish a large number of different insects were collected. Large ants were there, and groups of flies and angry hornets. But most conspicuous among the self-invited guests were the stag-beetles, of whom twenty-four were counted, besides more than a dozen that had fallen to the ground, having clearly eaten more than was good for them.

The latter seemed, however, to be having a quarrel among themselves. They fought in couples, their antler-like horns interlocked, and each pair struggled madly together until one or other dropped to the ground exhausted, leaving the victors to lick up the sap like greedy gluttons.

In the midst of all the rage of battle, however, the slightest noise put them quickly on the alert. On the breaking of a twig they would raise themselves at once, as if on the lookout for a danger more alarming than the quarrels in which they were engaged. Toward night-fall most of the roisterers buzzed away homeward, and the naturalist soon followed their example.

HUMBBUG!

THE derivation of this word, now in such common use, is not generally known; but it is of Scotch origin. There was in former years residing in the neighborhood of the Mearns, in Scotland, a gentleman of landed property, whose name was Hume or Home; and his estate was known as the Bogue. From the great falsehoods that "Hume of the Bogue" was in the habit of relating about himself, his family, and everything connected with him, it soon became customary, when persons heard anything that was remarkably extravagant or absurd, to say, "That is a Hume of the Bogue!" The expression spread like wild-fire over the whole country, and by those who did not understand the origin of the phrase, and applied it only to any extravagant action or saying, contracted it into one word, and corrupted it to "Humbug."

We must define humbug. It is not naked untruth. A draper's assistant who tells a lady that a dress will wash when it will not, does not humbug her, he merely cheats her. But if he persuades her to buy a good-for-nothing unshin by telling her that he has sold such another to a duchess, he humbugs her, whether he speaks truly or not. He takes advantage of her vanity and small mind in order to persuade her to buy his goods. Humbug thus consists in making people deceive themselves, by telling them something from which by reason of their ignorance, weakness, or prejudice, they draw wrong conclusions.

CHAPTER I.

CAPTAIN SAMMY'S OFFER.

"I'D risk the chances of raising her if she was ours, and it wouldn't be such a very hard job, after all. She must be within ten feet of low-water mark, and the water there at ebb-tide can't be more than four feet deep."

This remark was made by the eldest of three boys who were standing on the shore of Hillsborough Bay, about half a mile from the little town of Tampa, in the State of Florida; and it referred to a small steam-yacht, the spars and smoke-stack of which were just visible above the surface of the water.

These boys, Darrell Evans, his brother Charley, and his cousin Robert Hayes, were New York boys who had been permitted to accompany Mr. and Mrs. Evans to Florida in the latter's search for health. There had been some discussion as to whether the boys should be allowed to make the journey, but on its being proposed they pleaded so hard to be allowed to go that the doubts of their parents had been finally overcome.

One argument the boys used was that there would be no occasion for them to neglect their studies because they were in a different part of the world from where their homes were located. Books could be carried along, and there was no reason why their lessons should not be continued as regularly as if they had remained at school.

Tampa had been selected by the physicians as the place where the invalid should spend the winter, and the boys on their arrival were greatly disappointed at finding that they were not on the coast, where they could realize their dreams of turtle-fishing and sponge-gathering.

On the second day after their arrival one of the boys of the town had told them of a famous little steam-yacht which Captain Sammy Basset owned, but which had been run on a rock, a short distance from the town, and sunk.

Captain Sammy, whom this boy represented as being a sturdy, ill-tempered old sea-captain, who had lost one leg by a pressing invitation from a shark, had not done anything toward raising his property from her watery resting-place, and had even been heard to say that she might lie there until she went to pieces, for all he cared about her.

Of course the boys were very anxious to see the craft, even though they could have no idea that they would ever own her, and on the first opportunity they visited the spot where she lay, regardless of the heat which, even in November, was uncomfortable.

From what it was possible to see of the boat beneath the water she was not large, but to the boys she appeared to be the exact fulfillment of their idea of a craft for their own sailing. It seemed a shame that so beautiful a boat should be left to go to pieces, more especially since the boy who had first given them information regarding her told them that the only injury she had sustained was a hole that had been stove in her bow.

"It's a shame to let such a handsome boat stay there, when a little work would make her as good as new," and there was a very decided shade of envy in Charley's tones. "There certainly ought to be some way of raising her."

"Don't you suppose we could buy her?"

"There is only one thing that would prevent us, Bobby, and that is our not having the money," laughed Dare. "I don't think this party has got more than ten dollars in cash, and that amount wouldn't buy the paddle-boxes."

"Perhaps Captain Sammy would let us have her cheap, since he says he won't do anything toward raising her, and we might get father to buy her for us," suggested Charley; but he did not speak as if he had any very great belief in such a possibility.

"That boy who told us about her said that Captain Sammy was a regular old shark himself, so I guess there isn't very much chance that he would sell her unless we should pay him all she is worth;" and Dare shook his head sadly at the thought that the owner of such a beautiful craft should be such a disreputable citizen.

The boys were so deeply engaged in conversation that they had not noticed the approach of a short, fat man with a wooden leg, who was stumping along the beach at a furious rate, as if he was thoroughly angry with himself and every one around him.

"Now, then, what mischief are you boys up to? Are you thinking of burning my boat?" he growled, rather than said, as he reached the yacht-admiring group, and his presence there was so unexpected that the boys started as if they had really been planning some act of mischief.

"Well, why don't you answer me?" he demanded, furiously, as the boys were still too much surprised by his appearance to speak. "Tell me what you're doing here;" and the little man jammed the wooden stick that served him as leg into the sand much as if he was trying to make a passage through which he could go when he was ready to take his departure.

"We came here to look at the yacht, sir," replied Dare, angry that the little man should speak in such a way, and conscious that they were doing no wrong. "We surely can't do any mischief to a sunken boat."

"I don't know about that," was the fierce reply, and the one-legged man began to grow red in the face, as if making every exertion to keep his anger within bounds. "We'll see whether you could or not, after you tell me what you came here for."

"We came to look at the yacht."

"Well, what were you going to do then?"

"I'm sure I don't know, sir," replied Dare, with a smile, as he began to think that the greater part of Captain Sammy's savage manner might be assumed.

The little man bored at the hole in the sand in an impatient way, and then asked, speaking each word with a jerk of the head as if it was only by a muscular effort that he could utter it, "Well, now that you've seen the yacht, what are you going to do about it?"

"I don't suppose we can do anything about it," replied Dare, with a laugh; "but we can't help thinking that it is too bad to let such a nice boat lie there under the water."

"So you set yourself up to tell Captain Sammy Basset what he shall do, eh?" and the little man appeared to grow furious again. "If you think that craft ought to be floated, why don't you bear a hand and do it?"

"We'd be glad to if she was ours," said Charley, eagerly, as a sudden hope came to him that perhaps, after all, some bargain might be made with the owner.

"So you couldn't do it for the sake of helping any one else, eh?"

"Indeed we could and would if you wanted us to," replied Dare, quickly, for he had no idea of being considered selfish even by this curious stranger.

"Well, I don't wait you to help me," snapped Captain Sammy, "and I suppose I can do as I want to with my own property, even if she does go to pieces. But I don't see why you boys should have come away out here just to look at a sunken boat, for even if she was yours and afloat and ready to sail, you wouldn't know where to go with her."

"Indeed we should," said Charley, quickly; "we should sail straight for the Caloosahatchee River, and go through that into Lake Okeechobee, in order to get into the Everglades."

"What do you know about the Everglades, and why do you want to go there?" snarled Captain Sammy, at the same time seating himself on the sand as if he intended the conversation should be a long one.

"We don't know very much about them, and perhaps that is the reason why we are so anxious to go. I have read that scientific men think the entire lower portion of the State was originally formed of coral reefs, and that in the Everglades the form of the reefs can still be seen."

"And the hunting is so good there!"

"And the fish so plenty!" Charley and Bobby added, eagerly.

"I guess it is the hunting and fishing rather than any scientific question that makes you want to go there!" and as Captain Sammy spoke he came very near smiling—an act so entirely out of keeping with his supposed charaeter, that had any of the village boys seen it they might have been seriously alarmed.

Dare thought it best not to contradict the little man, for in his guessing he had come too near the truth to admit of any denial.

"Now look here"—and Captain Sammy assumed a stern air again—"are you boys so foolish as to believe you could float that yacht if she belonged to you?"

"I believe we could," was Dare's decided answer. "I don't exactly know how we should go to work to do it; but I am sure that we are able to get it done in time."

"She is forty feet long."

"Larger boats than she have been raised from a greater depth."

"She is ten feet wide."

"Then it would be easier to raise her than if she was narrow."

"And she has a ten-horse-power engine on board."

"A good deal of that could be taken out at low water."

"Then her port bow is stove in, and in repairing that it will be necessary to put nearly a new bottom on."

"But one of the boys told us that she was flat, so it would not be such a hard job."

Captain Sammy looked at Dare a moment as if he was angry with him for making light of all his objections, and then said, in a musing way, which raised Charley's hopes very high: "There couldn't be a better boat built to cruise around Florida in than that same little Pearl that lies under the water there. She can steam eight miles an hour, only draws fifteen inches of water, and can stand a pretty heavy sea, which is more than you can say for some larger crafts."

"Is her name the Pearl?" asked Bobby, his eyes growing larger, and his desire to own such a boat growing more intense, as Captain Sammy spoke of the good points of the sunken steamer.

"The Pearl, of Tampa Bay," continued the little man. "I built her at odd jobs, thinking it would be handy to have a steam craft to run around in, for I own a good many turtling and sponging schooners, and have to run back and forth a good deal. But I found that there was nothing like the motion of a sailing craft, and when a greenhorn who had borrowed the Pearl sunk her there. I didn't care so very much."

"How much would you sell her for, just as she lies?" asked Dare, forgetting the remark he had made a short time before as to the finances of the party.

"I ain't trying to sell her," said Captain Sammy, with another show of anger; "and I haven't said I wanted to; but if you boys have got pluck enough to raise and repair her, you shall use her as long as you stay in Florida."

"Do you mean that?" asked Dare, in surprise, and Charley gave Bobby such a triumphant poke with his elbow as to make that young gentleman's ribs sore for some hours.

"Of course I meant it, or else I shouldn't have said it. But mind what I say, if you don't do the work in ship-shape way I shall take a reef in my offer."

Not one of the three boys could overcome his surprise at the little Captain's proposition in time to thank him for it, for as soon as he had spoken he arose and hobbled rapidly off, as if he feared they might attempt to detain him.

When he was some distance away he turned around and shouted loudly:

"Remember that the job has got to be done properly, or I shall back out of the bargain, even if you have floated her;" and then he started off at full speed again, while the three boys remained looking at that portion of the yacht which was above water, as if they needed such evidence to convince them they had not dreamed of instead of heard Captain Sammy's offer.

BY-AND-BY AND NEVER.

BY JOEL BENTON.

[A Spanish proverb says that "by the road of By-and-by one arrives at the house of Never."]

THERE'S a dangerous little Afrite who accosts us day by day, Upsetting every purpose in a soft, enticing way.

Saying, "Rest from this, I pray you, for to-morrow you can try— If hard work is to be done, you can do it By-and-by."

Though he tell you not to do it,

Mind him not, or you will rue it,

For his words so smooth and clever

Take you to the house of Never.

His voice is like a siren's, and he always aims to please; He's as idle as a zephyr, and he bids you take your ease;

If your spirits seem to falter, at your elbow he is nigh,

Saying, "Wait a little, brother, you can do it By-and-by."

Though he tell you not to do it,

Mind him not, or you will rue it,

For his words so smooth and clever

Take you to the house of Never.

He commands an endless future, and has youth upon his side, So he makes your little horoscope magnificently wide;

Quite disturbed by earnest plodders, he appeals with witching eye:

"What's your hurry—wait a little—you can do it By-and-by."

Though he tell you not to do it,

Mind him not, or you will rue it,

For his words so smooth and clever

Take you to the house of Never.

He's a tricky little prompter, and he always lingers near, Knowing just the proper moment when to whisper in your ear;

He can span your pretty rainbows, and make fanciful your sky,

With his magical proviso of the golden By-and-by.

Though he tell you not to do it,

Mind him not, or you will rue it,

For his words so smooth and clever

Take you to the house of Never.

On your eyes he presses poppies, on your will he puts a brake— Just to keep you soothed and idle, any trouble he will take;

When he trains you to his harness—oh, so mischievous and sly!

Then you'll doze away the Present in a dream of By-and-by.

Though he tell you not to do it,

Mind him not, or you will rue it,

For his words so smooth and clever

Take you to the house of Never.

MR. BARNUM'S BRIGHT BARKERS.

BY EDWARD L. STEVENSON.

IT is just as well that Mr. P. T. Barnum is so good a friend to young people and the YOUNG PEOPLE. Otherwise the writer of this article might not have found himself where he did on the only sunny day of last week—safely within the Winter-Quarters of the Great Show, at Bridgeport, Connecticut.

A beautiful trained horse was careering furiously round and round the practicing ring; and during the intervals when Mr. Fryer was not smacking his whip or calling out, "Steady, Jerry!—look out, Jerry!" he busied himself with telling his visitor something about his wonderful performing dogs.

In a few moments the white horse dashed off. Mr. Fryer summoned his pets, Sprite, Jemmy, Frank, Nelly, Cronian, Sport, Jerry, and little Major, to entertain his guest. Their pictures had been already taken by Mr. Church, as you see them on the following page. Very extraordinary were the doings of this canine family.

At a signal from Mr. Fryer, a grand entering march takes place. The eight dogs step daintily around the ring, and then, after bowing with modest tail wags to the audience, they seat themselves in a row. Mr. Fryer thereupon stands up and "calls the roll." Each dog, when his name is spoken, promptly answers it with a joyful "Bow-wow!"

Sprite's turn to be conspicuous usually comes next. She dances as pretty a polka as a dancing-master would desire to see; and the polka having gone on long enough, she respectfully asks Cronian for the honor of a waltz with him—leap-year fashion. Cronian bows and stands up; the remainder of the party pair off gracefully, and for a little while the circus ring looks like a ball-room.

The clever feats of walking on a rolling barrel, balanis held. Major hangs his head sorrowfully, and puts up his paws for mercy. Alas! in dumb show he is sentenced to his dreadful fate.

Nelly, Cronian, and a wooden wand constitute the gallows, upon which, after pretending to be in great terror, Major actually suffers himself to be drawn up by his executioners, and suspended for some seconds several inches from the ground. The rope is secured to his own collar in such a way that the little dog will not choke in good earnest. Mr. Fryer has lately introduced a "real" gallows into this warring scene. It was the last feat on the programme, and as Mr. Fryer called his pets up to be caressed and stroked it was a pretty sight to see them all standing there with their bright eyes and gently wagging tails.

THE BRIGHT BARKERS GOING THROUGH THEIR PERFORMANCES.

cing upon a seesaw, and some less remarkable tricks succeed. A steeple-chase race, in which the little dogs ride the larger ones, and stick on capitally as they leap over hurdles of quite respectable size, follows the waltzing. Jenny is always mounted upon Sport, as you see her in the picture. Soon after bright little Major is told to go through his difficult swing-rope act. He climbs a small ladder, which is presently taken away, and balancing himself in the trying position in which you see him, he suffers himself to be swung backward and forward with a good deal of speed, contriving never to fall off.

But the most complex and interesting performance of Mr. Fryer's little actors is the grand trial scene and execution of a thief. Major, Nelly, Sprite, and Cronian have the principal parts in this moral drama. It is begun by Nelly's dropping her collar, which has been unloosed for the purpose, as she walks across the ring. The moment her back is turned little Major runs up, finds the collar, pretends to look around to see if he is watched, and finally manages to stick his own little head through it and hic to his seat. Nelly quickly feigns to find out her loss. She looks for the collar, and goes to each dog to make inquiry. Quick as a flash she spies Major and his prize, and sends Sprite to arrest her dishonest brother.

A sharp mock fight ensues between thief and constable, but Major finally surrenders, and submits to having a rope put about his neck and to being dragged before Frank, Rick, and Jerry, for trial. There, after Sprite has slipped the rope about a stake to more securely hold the culprit (still keeping the end in her mouth), a short court-martial is held. On making a first appearance these little actors are not troubled with something that attacks nearly every grown man or woman under such circumstances—the terrible complaint called "stage fright." Without timidity or embarrassment each new-comer goes sensibly and quietly through his tricks, as if no eyes were looking at him except his tutor's. Sometimes, too, they introduce of their own accord little variations of the feats in hand—perhaps one ought to write "in paw."

When Major first began to act his thievish trick with Nelly's collar, and to be pursued, captured, and brought into court by Sheriff Sprite, he made very small resistance, surrendering himself to his fate quite meekly. Gradually he played his part with more spirit, until nowadays, without a word of instruction from Mr. Fryer, Sprite has a downright chase to take him prisoner and bring him before his judges. On her part, Sprite one day found out that she could not hold Major so readily when before the bar by twisting the rope only once around the stake, to which he was confined as prisoner. Accordingly she suddenly took to walking twice around it with the rope in her mouth, thus making the culprit doubly secure.

"It is a curious fact," said Mr. Fryer, as his gentle pupils walked off with a self-satisfied air, "that I can never deceive Sprite as to what sort of spirits I am in on any day when my dogs must appear in public. For instance, suppose I have not been well the night before, am tired, or have managed to catch a headache or something of that sort. No matter how much I may laugh and talk loudly and seem as jolly as you please to the audience, that dog sees perfectly well that I am really making an effort, and I assure you that it makes a great difference in the zest with which she enters into her duties. Her great eyes are on me, and she seems to see through my acting perfectly well. When we are all through she will come up as meekly as a lamb and stand beside me, looking up into my face, as much as to say: 'You didn't feel like working a bit to-day, did you? I didn't either. Let's sit down and be quiet.' Ah, they are all of them marvellously sympathetic and affectionate creatures! I don't know which of us, master or pupils, thinks more of the other."

Sprite is about seven years old. None of the dogs are of unmixed breed; a dog partly of the bull and partly of the spaniel species seems to give the best results after careful training.

In leaving the quarters Mr. Fryer led the way through the immense elephant-house, where twenty-nine elephants, tethered in a huge square, were fed and cared for by Mr. Arstingshall, the great trainer, and his force of under-keepers. The air was full of a close and not very pleasant odor, and now and then a roar or a shrill scream broke the stillness. Jumbo, who was chained in an exclusive corner at the end of the line, seemed more gigantic than ever, as he swung his mighty trunk about in what appeared to one of his visitors a shockingly careless manner. It is not remarkable that the giant elephant should look more enormous than he did, for a winter of rest and feeding has filled out his formerly lean and lank sides with fat, and even added an inch or two to his height. He looks like quite a different creature. He expects to receive his big and little friends at the Madison Square Garden again during the latter part of this month.

THE SAD STORY OF A BOY KING.

BY GEORGE CARY EGGLESTON.

LONDON took a holiday on the 16th of July, 1377. There were processions of merry-makers in the streets, and the windows were crowded with gayly dressed men, women, and children. The great lords, glittering in armor, and mounted upon splendid steel-clad horses, marched through the town. The bishops and clergymen in gorgeous robes made a more solemn but not less attractive show. The trade guilds were out in their best clothing, bearing the tools of their trades instead of arms. Clowns in motley, merry-makers of all kinds, great city dignitaries, lords and commons—everybody, in short, made a mad and merry holiday; and at night the houses were illuminated, and great bonfires were lighted in the streets.

All England was wild with joy; but the happiest person in the land was Richard Plantagenet, a boy eleven years of age. Indeed, it was for this boy's sake and in his honor that all this feasting and merry-making went on, for on that day young Richard was crowned King of England; and in those times a King of England was a much more important person than now, because the people had not then learned to govern themselves, and the King had powers which Englishmen would not allow any man to have in our time.

Richard was too young to govern wisely, and so a council was appointed to help him until he should grow up; but in the mean time he was a real King, boy as he was, and it is safe to say that he was the happiest boy in England on that July day when all London took a holiday in his honor.

But if he had known what this crowning was to lead to, young Richard might have been very glad to change places with any baker's or butcher's boy in London. The boy King had some uncles and cousins who were very great people, and who gave him no little trouble after a while. He had wars on his hands, too, and needed a great deal more money than the people were willing to give him, and so when he grew older and took the government into his own hands he found troubles all around him. The Irish people rebelled frequently; the Scotch were hostile; there was trouble with Spain, because Richard's uncle wanted to become King of that country; and there was a standing war with France.

But this was not all. In order to carry on these wars the King was obliged to have money; and when he ordered taxes to be collected the common people, led by Wat Tyler, rose in rebellion. They marched into London, seized the Tower, and put to death the Treasurer of the kingdom, the Archbishop of Canterbury, and many other persons high in the government. Tyler was so insolent one day that the Lord Mayor of London killed him; but the boy King—who was only sixteen years old—seeing that the rebels were too strong for him, put himself at their head, and marched with them out of the city, and so the King, against whom the rebellion was made, became the leader of the rebels. As soon as matters grew quiet, however, he broke all the promises he had made, and punished the chief rebels very harshly.

Not long after this one of the King's uncles made himself master of the kingdom by force, and it was several years before Richard could put him out of power.

But the greatest of all Richard's troubles were yet to come. His cousin, Henry Bolingbroke, the son of old John of Gaunt, had misbehaved, and Richard had sent him out of England, not to return for ten years. But while Richard was in Ireland putting down a rebellion there, Henry came back to England, raised an army, and was joined by many of the most powerful men in the kingdom. When Richard came back from Ireland Henry made him a prisoner, and not long afterward the great men made up their minds to set up Henry as the King instead of Richard. They made Richard sign a paper giving up his right to the crown, and then, to make the matter sure, Parliament passed a law that Richard should be King no longer.

Richard was only thirty-three years old when all this was done, but after so many troubles he might well have been glad to give up his kingship, if that had been the end of the matter. But a King who has been set aside is always a dangerous man to have in the kingdom, and it would not do to let Richard go free. He might gather his friends around him and give trouble. So it was decided that the unfortunate man should be shut up in a prison for the rest of his life.

But even this was not the worst of the matter. Richard had a wife—Queen Isabella—whom he loved very dearly, and if the two could have gone away together into some quiet place to live, they might still have been happy in spite of being under guard all the time. But the new King would not have it so. He gave orders that Richard should be shut up closely in a prison, and that Isabella should go back to France, where Richard had married her.

This was a terrible thing for the young man and his younger wife, who might have had a long life of happiness still before them if Richard had never been a king. But Richard had been King of England, and so he had to give up both his freedom and his wife.

In his play of King Richard the Second, Shakespeare makes a very touching scene of their parting. In the play their farewell takes place in the street, as shown in our picture. Isabella, anxious to see her husband once more before they part forever, waits at a point which she knows he must pass on his way to prison. There they meet and talk together for the last time on earth. The words which Shakespeare puts into their mouths are terribly sad, but very beautiful. You will find the scene at the beginning of Act V. of the play. The picture shows the two at the moment when Richard moves away to his prison, leaving Isabella to mourn for him in a nunnery for the rest of her life.

It is not certainly known what became of Richard after he was taken to prison. It is believed that he was murdered there—perhaps starved to death—but there is a story that he got away and lived in Scotland, dying there in 1419. It is not at all likely that the story is true, however, and the common belief has always been that he died or was killed in Pontefract Castle, where he was imprisoned.

However that may be, Richard's life was a terribly unhappy one, and all his sorrows grew out of the fact that he was a king. If he could have looked forward on that July day when the people were making merrily in his honor, and could have known all that was to happen to him, instead of being the happiest boy in England on his coronation day, he would have been the most wretched.

THE HERMIT OF MUGGINSVILLE WOOD.

BY SUSAN HARTLEY SWETT.

TOM SWIFT was spending the winter with his grandparents away off in the country where there were deep pine woods and logging camps, a mountain that looked like a huge loaf of frosted cake in the snow, and a pond two or three miles long, where there was such skating as Tom had never seen before.

But Tom was a very busy boy, and had little time to indulge in skating or any other sport; for as his father was dead and his older brother John a cripple, he considered himself the head of the family, and was very anxious to become its support. John possessed a good deal of talent for drawing and painting, and it was predicted that he would become a great artist some day if he received the right instruction. But Mrs. Swift, though she worked very hard at her needle, had as yet been unable to procure any teacher for him, and it was to this end that Tom was saving his money now.

All the men in the neighborhood who were not either too old or too infirm were at work in the woods, so Tom was employed not only to do the chores, such as bringing in wood and water, feeding the cattle, and going to mill, about his grandfather's farm, but on several others near by, and he had already placed fifteen dollars in his bank. He bravely renounced the molasses taffy and marshmallow paste at the village store, turned his back on the thrilling shows at the Town-hall, sported a broken jack-knife in the face and eyes of all the other boys, and, take it altogether, was quite a hero in the way of self-denial.

But one day, in the frostiest winter weather, grandpa suggested that he should take a holiday. Joe Crandall was to be at home to-morrow, and was willing to take Tom's place for the day, so that he could spend it wherever and however he pleased.

"Well," said Tom, delighted with the prospect, "I will go into the woods with Israel."

It was a cold sparkling morning. Tom was obliged to scratch the frost from the pane when he got out of bed at five o'clock in order to get a peep into the witehing starlight of this early hour. Israel was already in the barn with his gleaming lantern, the cocks were crowing like mad, and Debby was stepping briskly about the kitchen with a lighted candle. The fire snapped as if it had been charged with gunpowder, footsteps crunched in the snow, and one's breath was like smoke in the frosty atmosphere.

At half past five breakfast was smoking on the table; at six Israel had his horses harnessed, and away they started for the woods; a lantern, still burning redly, hung upon one of the stakes in the sled. The bells stirred the still air with a merry holiday sound; the lights commenced to vanish from the village windows; the pale sky brightened to crimson, and east rosy reflections on the snow. Israel, as usual, when not singing his favorite song about the "turtail-dove," was deeply reflective, but Tom was in the highest spirits, and whistled and chattered like a magpie.

When they reached the logging camp, deep in the blue gloom of the pine woods, the men who inhabited it were already at work chopping logs, and the merry ring of their axes echoed from the distance. But they left a bright fire, which was composed of nearly a cord of wood, burning on the large flat stone which served for a hearth, and the place presented a very cheerful appearance. There was no chimney, but the smoke escaped from a large hole in the roof overhead. One could see out-of-doors through the chinks in the logs which formed the walls, and yet enjoy the pleasant warmth. The bunks where the men slept at night were filled with clean, fragrant pine boughs, and across the poles which projected from the foot of these bunks was placed the "deacon seat"—a long bench which faced the fire, extending from one end of the apartment to the other; so that when one grew weary of reading and story-telling and watching the blaze of the great fire, he could tip back into one of these soft, yielding beds without any effort whatever.

Various cooking utensils, guns, and fishing-rods were hung on the wall. A group of barrels stood in one corner, over which was a hanging shelf piled with earthen dishes and an array of bright tins. A great board, which would become a table at dinner-time, was fastened against the wall.

"Now don't get lost in these pesky woods, youngster," said Israel, as he thawed his half-frozen fingers by the fire. "Better stay 'round where we're a-choppin', 'n' not stray off no great distance."

"I shan't go far away, because I want to be sure to be back in time to help John get dinner. It's jolly fun to get dinner in camp. But I'm not afraid of getting lost. Why, I've been through the woods all alone in summer," said Tom, grandly.

"Oh yes, you can go through by the road any time if you keel to walk fur enough; but if you go roundabouts, you'll find there ain't no end to the woods. They reach clear through ter North Pole, whar the bears 'n' wolves live, most likely. I've been round here considerable, 'n' hev got some idee what they be."

"I guess the North Pole must be Mugginsville, then," said Tom, contemptuously; "you can see the Mugginsville steeple from any tree you chance to climb."

"Well, be careful, boy.

"My love she sent me a turtail-dove,
'X' a-tooral-loo, 'n' a-tooral-loo."

And Israel hastened out-of-doors to join the choppers.

There was nothing that Tom enjoyed so much as a "prowl" in the winter woods. It seemed like a place in a fairy tale, dim, mysterious, enchanted. The sky which peeped in through the spaces between the tree-tops seemed like quite another sky than that which arched over the village. Even the breeze which brushed the pine twigs seemed to have a sort of magic in it, and whichever way Tom peered through the long dim vistas he imagined that there were hidden wonderful things. In this bowery nook the White Cat's palace might be lifting its airy towers. In the midst of that tangled thicket the giant's house which poor little Hop-o'-my-Thumb found might be concealed. And who would wonder to meet any of the fairies and goblins of the old stories in this lovely glade where an under-ground brook is singing?

For a moment or two he watched the men as they fell a huge tree, and then wandered away by himself over the firm white snow crust, which did not show the least signs of breaking with his weight. He skimmed over the bogs, which were quite impassable in summer, but were frozen hard now, with their tall reeds pricking through the snow. Then he discovered fox tracks deeply printed in the crust, which was soft snow only the day before yesterday, and followed them eagerly for a long time, hoping to find the den of the sly old fellow, which was doubtless the one that made his way into the camp one day when the men were out, and helped himself to a plump chicken which was waiting to be cooked for dinner.

So intent was Tom in making this discovery, that he did not realize at all how far he was going, but followed on and on until finally the prints of foxie's feet came to a sudden end before a great tract of brush ground, which was so wide and piled so high that the tallest giant that ever lived could never have stepped over it.

"Sold!" exclaimed Tom, leaning back breathless against a big tree; and then it suddenly occurred to him that it was past dinner-time, and he must retrace his steps to the camp. So he hurried along in what seemed to be the right direction, never thinking to still heed the fox tracks which had led him in such a circuitous way. On and on he went through bright little openings, through nooks so deep and dark that it seemed as if night had already fallen. But there was no sign of the path which led to the camp, not a human foot print to be seen, not a sound to be heard but the strange muffled din of the woods, which is like silence speaking. He climbed a great stump and shouted with all his might; but nothing but the echoes and a startled owl answered him. He was not at all frightened as yet, however; the loss of his dinner was his only source of anxiety.

"Well," thought he, "I will walk until I reach somewhere, either the camp, or Mugginsville, or the North Pole, where Israel says the wolves and bears live, or to some place or other on the southern side of the woods."

But walking didn't seem to bring him anywhere. The woods were just as deep and dark as ever. He climbed a tree, but the open world looked miles and miles away, and in the mean time the sun grew lower and lower.

Oh, how cold it was as the day grew later! Tom's teeth chattered, though he was walking with all possible speed, and the exercise would usually have made his blood tingle. The ends of his fingers pricked as if there were needle-points in them, and his feet fairly ached as he trudged along.

It was midnight darkness in the deep woods, but in a little opening, where there were low juniper bushes, the yellow sunset light was still lingering. Some glossy sprays of wintergreen were pricking through the snow crust, and thinking that their bitter-sweet leaves might appease the gnawing at his stomach, Tom ate some, and finding that they did so in a great degree, he was looking about him for more, when he espied some strange black object which had lodged between two boughs of a juniper bush.

He reached down and picked up the plumpest leather pocket-book which he had ever seen in his life! It had evidently been there for days, for it was frozen stiff, and had some time been soaked with rain or dew. Tom opened it with eager fingers. It was crammed with bank-notes, and one large shining gold piece was tucked carefully in the midst of the paper. But it was growing so dark that he did not stop to count the money, for if night should overtake him while still in the woods, he would never be able to find his way out of them.

The growth was becoming less and less dense. There were little openings everywhere, and finally, when the stars were gathering in the pale twilight sky, he emerged into an open space where there was an old ruined mill, its broken roof white with snow, its eaves fantastically fringed with icicles. Beyond this he found a narrow bit of road with faint sled and foot tracks, and not far along on the road the most blessed sight that ever dawned upon his vision—a thick column of smoke arising from a cottage chimney.

Tom felt more exhausted than ever at this point, but making a brave struggle, he pressed on with what little strength he could summon to his aid. An old man, with a great pile of juniper twigs, pine boughs, and other greenery on his back, came from the woods, and down a path to the road, and with his white beard blowing in the wind, looked like the genius of Christmas. He was gazing intently under every bush and twig as he came along, pushing the branches of the tiny evergreens back with his feet.

"TOM OPENED IT WITH EAGER FINGERS."

"Have you lost anything?" inquired Tom, at the same time keeping the pocket-book prudently concealed under his jacket.

"I should think so. Three weeks ago to-day I lost a pocket-book with a thousand dollars in it somewhat about these pesky woods, or on the road leadin' to it, 'n' I'm lookin' fur it yit. I didn't dare to leave it in the house while I was out gittin' my medicine stuff fur fear o' thieves, 'n' I kep' puttin' off carryin' of it to the bank till 'twas clean gone. Say, sonny, you hain't seen anythin' of it, hev ye? 'Twas a black leather pocket-book, fastened with a rusty steel clasp, 'n' tied up with a twine string too. There was a twenty-dollar gold piece in it 'mong the rest. But Lor' sakes alive, boy! be ye sick or froze ter death? Yer face is as white as snow all on a suddint."

Tom produced the pocket-book, but no sooner had he placed it in the old man's hand than he fell, a white heap, on the ground at his feet.

When he recovered his senses once more he found himself lying on a lounge in a rough, dingy apartment, lighted by a single candle, and with a great boiler steaming and bubbling over a roaring fire. The atmosphere was filled with the spicy odor of pine and other woodland growths, and a great black cat was eying him intently from her post beside the stove.

"Where am I?" he inquired, lifting his head, and looking about him in amazement.

"Oh, you're all right, 'n' in my house, sonny. You're with a friend. Don't you remember you found my pocket-book, 'n' I met you down in the road by the woods? I guess you got pritty well used up with the cold or suthin, 'n' fainted away," said the old man, appearing at his side with a tumbler in his hand. "Here, now, you take a good dose of my 'Healer.' It's the best medicine in the market, 'n' if you drink it down now while it's hot it will keep you frum gittin' cold, 'n' git your stomach in order to take some food. I reckon you feel kinder hungry."

Tom hardly knew whether he was hungry or not. He felt rather comfortable than otherwise, only that his toes and fingers, his nose and cheeks, were commencing to smart and burn like fire. He swallowed the medicine as directed, though with rather a wry face, and then the old man brought him a bowl of thin but savory broth, which he ate with quite a relish.

"Now I'd go right ter sleep, 'n' git kinder rested, 'n' then we will talk about matters 'n' things a leetle when you wake up agin."

"But the folks at home will be so worried about me, Grandpa 'n' grandma will be scared almost to death, 'n' then they'll blame Israel coz I got lost. Is this Mugginsville, or where is it?"

"Lor', no, 'tis a leetle corner o' Tatnick. Do you live over ter Mugginsville? I thought I never seen you in these parts afore."

"No," said Tom, "I live over at Sprigtown, or at least grandpa does. I'm spending the winter at his farm. He's Mr. Samuel Swift. Do you know him?"

"Bless you, Sprigtown's as much as ten miles off round by the road. Yes, I know Squire Swift by sight, 'n' it's likely he knows me. They call me ole Hermit Sawyer. I s'pose you've heard tell of me. The boys all round the diggin' thinks it fine fun to make game of me, 'n' yell out after me, 'Hello! ole medicine-biler.' Now, sonny, I want ter know why you was so anxious to git rid o' that pocket-book 'n' all thar was into it. Every dollar's there, coz I counted it. Didn't you hev no use fur it? Your grandpa's lost 'most all his property, I know."

"What!" said Tom, indignantly; "would you keep anything that didn't belong to you, if you wanted it ever so much? Of course I knew it was yours when you described it to me so well, and of course I gave it to you. What else could I do? But I really must go home, no matter how far it is. They'll be out searchin' for me, you know."

"Why, boy, it's the coldest night that ever was—cold ernuff ter crinkle the hair ov an Injun. 'Twould be your death to get out now; but I'll harness up my ole nag, 'n' ef I ken't git a neighbor that I hev in my mind ter drive over ter Sprigtown, I'll go myself. I'm old 'n' tough as sole-leather."

The neighbor drove over, and Tom and the old man had a very jolly and confidential time together that night, while the "Healer" bubbled over the fire and scented the room, and the black cat purred, and the candle flared and sputtered.

In the morning Israel came over in a pung, with a plenty of warm fur wraps, to take Tom home. The old hermit was very unwilling to let him go; but Tom promised to make him a week's visit soon if his grandfather would consent, and that softened the parting considerably.

When Tom got into the pung the old man, who had followed him out-of-doors, slipped something into his hand, which upon investigation proved to be two fifty-dollar bank notes.

"You see, I'm pritty well off, sonny; I sell the 'Healer' to the druggists everywhere. There's a great rage fur it, 'n' it brings me in money. Let the lame brother hev the lessons, 'n' p'raps there'll be a little spendin' bit fur you too. I never did take ter boys, but I guess I know when I see one ov the right sort, ef I be a miserable ole hermit."

A NEW ACQUAINTANCE.

For the very Little People.

SUCH a white world as Baby Ben saw when he opened his eyes this morning! Snow on the roofs, the fences, the fields, and the trees, and not a creature stirring anywhere. Even the old rooster, and the fussy little red hen, and the dainty white one, and all the feathery tribe were out of sight. Baby Ben, at the window, had drummed upon the pane, and thought what could possibly have become of his pets.

Then, with a whoop and a halloo, brother Artie had appeared with his sled and his mittens. But Ben did not care for Artie. He clapped his little fat hands for the old rooster to come out, and then, while he waited, he saw something ever so much prettier.

Such a darling, trim, pert, little brown birdie, hopping around over the snow, and saying, "Chirp, chirp, peep, peep—hurry, somebody, and bring me my breakfast."

The Baby had had his own breakfast of bread and milk from a china basin with a silver spoon. So he wasn't hungry. Birdie was. Sister Maggie said, "Bennie, will you feed the little dear?" And you may be sure what Bennie's answer was. So in a moment Maggie filled her pocket with seeds and erumbs, and then, stepping out on the porch, she lifted her little brother in her arms, and in his pretty way he called the bird. Dropping the seeds from his dimpled fingers, he looked with great brown eyes full of love to see the little stranger eat.

Make haste, birdie; Maggie's arms are tired. Which of the new acquaintances is the shyer, I wonder?

This is March snow, and it will soon melt. Instead of one brave bird standing out-doors and waiting for food, we shall soon have hundreds singing for joy among green leaves. But the summer long will not bring us a prettier picture than this.

"MAKE HASTE, BIRDIE; MAGGIE'S ARMS ARE TIED."

OFF THE LINE.

BY JOSEPHINE POLLARD.

THE boys stood up in the reading class—

A dozen or so—and each one said
That those at the foot should never pass,
Or find it easy to get up head.

Harry was studious; so were Jake,

Jim, and Robert, and Tom, and Jaek;
For men of business they meant to make,
And it wouldn't do to be dull or slack.

There wasn't another boy on the line

More anxious than Jimmy to keep his place;
For to be at the head was very fine,
But to go down foot was a sad disgrace.

But Jim delighted in games of ball,

Polo, tennis, or tame croquet,
And his mind was not on his books at all
When he took his place in the class that day.

'Twas his turn to read, and he started off

With an air attentive—a vain pretense;
For the boys around him began to cough
And nudge and chuckle at Jim's expense.

"You've skipped a line," whispered generous Ben,

Who often had helped in this way before.
"YOU'VE SKIPPED A LINE!" shouted Jim; and then,
Of course, the school-room was in a roar.

As down to the foot Jim went that day

He learned a lesson that any dunce
Might have known; for we're sure to stray
If we try to be in two places at once.

Sport, when you sport, in an earnest way,

With a merry heart and a cheerful face;
But when at your books think not of your play,
Or else you'll certainly lose your place.

CHAPTER XXX.

I CAN hardly describe Nan's state of mind as Christmas drew near. Bromfield began early to show signs of the approaching festivity; and as Nan walked about the snowy streets—often just for the sake of turning her mind from sad thoughts—the gayety of the shop windows, the blithe air of the passers-by, all jarred upon her painfully.

Mrs. Rupert had begun to treat her niece very coldly. More and more was she certain that Nan's "folks" at Beverley meant gradually to cast her off, so she insisted on Nan's making herself useful in every way; and the child rose early and worked late in order to accomplish all that was required of her. But occupation, she knew, was better than sitting idle with her thoughts; only sometimes Nan's head ached painfully over her sums, and often kind-hearted Mrs. Leigh had to excuse her from her lessons entirely.

The Ruperts began to feel the effect of Nan's efforts at tidiness in the house. She had rummaged out some old muslin curtains, but when washed and starched they looked very well; and by dint of close saving she had contrived to have the furniture mended, a new cover put on the mantel-board, and chintz slips on the easy-chairs.

Mrs. Rupert was willing enough to accept Nan's labors so long as they did not interfere with what she wished her to do; and Marian seemed better pleased to bring her young friends home with her, now that the sitting-room had an air of cleanliness and something like comfort.

It was the 20th of December; Nan was sitting in the parlor late in the afternoon, with Georgie and Mary beside her, and a big pile of stockings waiting to be darned in the basket at her side. She was trying to work, but somehow her thoughts kept wandering away to Beverley. She could just imagine how delightfully they were preparing for Christmas. There would be genuine "fun" at College Street, and she felt sure that Aunt Letty would provide presents for Love and Mrs. Travers and little David. At the thought of these Nan fairly broke down, and her tears were falling on the stockings, when Georgie cried out,

"Hi! there's a hack before the door! Who's that, Nan?"

Nan hastily dried hereyes and looked out of the window. It was a hack. Could it be Mrs. Heriot who descended? Nan's very heart stood still. She sprang up, holding her work in her hands as in a vise. Mary and Georgie fled away down-stairs to know who the visitor was, and so Nan was left alone in the little parlor.

Five minutes seemed to pass before the door opened, and then Mrs. Heriot came hurrying in, and in a second Nan was clasped in her motherly arms.

"Oh, my child! my dearie!" the good woman exclaimed. "Whatever was wrong is right now! and they can't wait to get you home again quick enough. Come, haste! get your little hat on, and come."

But Nan had, for the first time in her life, fainted dead away. When she opened her eyes it was to see Mrs. Rupert and Mrs. Heriot bending over her with a collection of restoratives that smelled horribly. But the first thing she did was to smile from sheer happiness.

"I think, mem, if you please," Mrs. Heriot was saying, in iciest tones, to Mrs. Rupert, "we'll get her down to the hotel, where her cousin, Miss Phyllis Rolf, is waiting for her."

Mrs. Rupert was very much impressed, particularly by the box of Christmas presents Mrs. Heriot had brought with her for the entire household; and she helped forward Nan's departure, saying nothing more unpleasant than: "Well, I hope they'll either keep her or leave her, one and for all, this time."

But Nan was too dreamily happy to care for anything Mrs. Rupert could do or say now. Once more she drove down the streets of Bromfield on her way to Beverley. Everything seemed confused; but it was clear enough that they stopped at the big country hotel on Main Street, and went upstairs and into a cheerful room, where Phyllis stood waiting.

How differently her cousin met her this time from the first! Then Phyllis had been all condescension and superiority; but now she opened her arms, elaped Nan in them, and murmured, lovingly,

"Oh, my dear child, you must forgive us—we understand it all, and never again shall you go away."

This one half-hour would have seemed joy enough to Nan; but it was delightful to have a cozy tea with Phyllis, and then, before they went to bed, to hear how Aunt Letty was ardently expecting her "home again."

Phyllis did not ask Nan why she had not spoken of Laura's deceit. She knew well what had governed the humbler cousin; and Nan was content to know the merest outlines of what Laura had done. It was, indeed, enough that all was explained, and that they wanted her home again at Beverley.

Meanwhile, at Rolf House, Aunt Letty was in a state of genuine excitement. Her darling was coming back, and great had been the preparations for her return. To Laura Miss Rolf had said very little, for the girl's remorse and penitence were entirely sincere. She begged so humbly to be allowed to help prepare for Nan's return that Miss Rolf had kept her with her, and her dear Love Blake was there too, to whom Laura seemed to cling as to something or somebody who suggested Nan.

There was a great deal of dusting and moving about of furniture in a large sunny room near Nan's school-room, and which had always been closed except for certain elderly visitors. Indeed, Nan had rarely seen it. Everything was what she called "stuffy" in it; but had she looked in on the work going on there during these days she would have changed her mind.

CHAPTER XXXI.

THE next few days passed like some happy dream in Nan's life. All the joyousness and tenderness of the Christmas season seemed in the very air she breathed, and hours of every day were devoted to preparations for the great festival. Miss Rolf had determined to make this an important occasion. She issued invitations for a large party in Nan's honor; and she intended to impress upon every one the fact that her niece was henceforth to be considered her adopted daughter—the young mistress of Rolf House. Nan went about with a happy light shining in her eyes, but her aunt, who watched her critically, could not see that the sudden change in her circumstances had not made her overexultant. She seemed chiefly delighted by the fact of again being "at home"—near to the Rolfs, first and last; able again to plan for Mrs. Travers and David, to have chats with Love Blake, and to know that the approaching Christmas would bring a "good time" for her friends, both rich and humble.

Her new room was a source of the greatest delight to her, and she never tired of sitting in the pretty easy-chairs, reading the books, or admiring and using the contents of her desk and work-table. And in these days it came about that Laura spent most of her time on the large chintz-covered lounge drawn up at one side of the wood fire, for Laura's malady was increasing so fast that they all feared it must settle into a hopeless spinal complaint. There was nothing dangerous in it, but it might be that for some time she would be a prisoner, and Aunt Letty, Phyllis, and Nan all decided that it was best to say very little of her wrong-doing to her.

In the long quiet hours of her suffering and weakness she was learning more than she could have done in years of health and vigor, and more than any one but Nan could have believed possible was she suffering from honest shame and penitence. Nan and Joan would bring their Christmas work to this bright fireside, while Laura lay still, enjoying their gay talk, and for the first time learning to understand the sweetness and generosity of Nan's nature. The younger girls asked her opinion about everything except some very privately executed articles which were intended as surprises for Laura's own Christmas.

"I suppose," said Mrs. Heriot, on the morning of the 23d—"I suppose we'll have to prepare for a hundred people at least. Dear! dear! it's a long time since we've had such doings. And just think: first the Christmas tree, and then the party, and then dinner the next day, and—well, I don't know how we are to get through it all."

Nan laughed gayly. She and Joan were in the store-room tying up greens, while Mrs. Heriot was making out a list to be sent to the grocer's and confectioner's.

"I know," said Nan, "we'll get through with it perfectly beautifully. We'll all be so happy—and I hope," she added, half sighing, "we'll all see fifty more such Christmases."

"Just hear the child!" exclaimed Mrs. Heriot. "Oh, I quite forgot, my dear: Miss Rolf wants you for a moment upstairs."

Nan darted up willingly enough, and found Miss Rolf in her own room, looking very pleased, and with the kindly smile Nan loved to see in her eyes and on her lips.

"See here, Nannie," she said, drawing her niece toward her, "I'm going to tell you something. It was I who had your cousin Philip sent to school."

"Oh!" gasped Nan—and then she gave Miss Rolf rather an alarming squeeze—"oh, Aunt Letty!"

"I had it done through Mr. Field, so that he might not, later in life, feel under any special obligation to us. And now I want to speak of your cousin Marian. Of course they are not really any kin to you; but, after all, they gave you as much as they could when you were homeless, and I should like to do well by them."

A strange little wondering look had come into Nan's face. "Aunt Letty," she said, suddenly, "will you tell me one thing truly? What had papa done that his grandfather should have cast him off?"

Miss Rolf looked pained. "My dear," she said, slowly, "he did not act openly with my father; he had debts which he tried to hide; he was never quite frank about anything; and so at last it came to an open quarrel. Nan dear, you see that was what frightened me when I thought—you understand, my darling—the old lady clasped Nan closely to her side—"I thought I could not live over again scenes such as we used to have with him, bright, lovable boy that he was, and that before I learned to love you too dearly I would send you away."

Nan was very silent for a moment. Her father was a dim memory to her, yet she could vaguely recall scenes which she now understood better; times when debt seemed to be her mother's horror, and when her father, recklessly extravagant, would leave them alone and often hungry.

"It shall never be, Aunt Letty," Nan said, firmly. And Miss Rolf understood her, and believed her child with all her heart.

"And about Marian," said Aunt Letty. "I thought of suggesting that if she liked to go for three years to a good school I would pay the expenses—I mean all her expenses. What do you think?"

Nan's whole face brightened. "Oh, Aunt Letty!" she exclaimed, "how like you! Then we could see for ourselves just what a fair chance would do for her."

"And what do you say," continued Miss Rolf, smiling, "to asking her here for Christmas? I can make up my mind better than."

"That would be—kind, I suppose," said Nan, a little doubtfully; but in a moment she was ashamed of her own hesitation, and gave a heartier assent.

"Do you know, aunt," she said, "that nice, quiet Mrs. Leigh who taught me at Bromfield wants to open a school in Exeter, and Mrs. Grange and some other people are getting pupils for her. Now she knows Marian so well—why wouldn't that be a good beginning?"

"Very good," said Miss Rolf, after a moment's thought. "I might write to Mrs. Leigh about it. Now, run away, my darling. I hope you and Joan are not working your fingers actually to the bone."

Nan laughed, and darted off to tell Joan the last piece of news. And before the next morning an answer had come, accepting Miss Rolf's invitation for Marian.

Nan could imagine the satisfaction with which Marian told her companions of her great good luck, but she hoped she would be moderate in her display of bugles and bangles at the Christmas party.

But Miss Rolf's thoughtfulness had gone further even than Nan's. Marian was expected about two o'clock on Christmas-eve, and in the morning two boxes arrived from Anes's, the contents of which only Nan and Miss Rolf knew. One of these contained a pretty ready-made dark silk, which would, Nan thought, fit tolerably well, and might in any case be altered; and the other a perfectly simple pale blue cashmere, so lady-like and elegant, however, that Nan felt Marian would appear another being when dressed in it. These articles were hung up in the wardrobe of the little room near Nan's, which had been prepared for Marian's reception.

MR. THOMPSON AND THE RATS.

BY ALLAN FORMAN.

MR. THOMPSON sat at his desk writing. It was late, and he was very sleepy.

Scratch, scratch; gnaw, gnaw, gnaw; squeak, squeak, came from behind the wainscot. Mr. Thompson threw down his pen in disgust.

"Bother those rats!" he exclaimed. "I believe the house is full of 'em. Either they or I will have to find another boarding-house."

Scamper, scamper went the rats; rattle, rattle went the plaster between the walls.

"There they go again!" complained Mr. Thompson. "I don't see why they can't keep still. And then that eternal gnawing! I should think that they would wear their teeth out."

"That's just what we do it for," replied a squeaky voice on the floor.

Mr. Thompson looked down, and there sat a large brown rat eyeing him compositely.

"That's what we do it for," repeated the rat. "If we didn't, our teeth would grow so long that we could not eat. You see, our teeth keep growing all the time, and if we don't gnaw something hard, so as to wear them off, they would soon get so long that we could not close our mouths. Cases have been known where when one tooth has been broken off, and the tooth opposite, having nothing to gnaw against, has grown, if a lower tooth, up into the skull; if an upper tooth, it has been pressed outward until it has made a complete ring."

"You don't say so!" ejaculated Mr. Thompson.

"Yes. I could show you a good many curious things if you would come with me," continued the rat. "Will you, now?"

"Yes, I'll go," said Mr. Thompson.

No sooner had he given assent than he began to grow smaller, and at last, as he jumped from his chair, he found—not to his surprise, for he was getting used to these changes, but somewhat to his amusement—that he was neither more nor less than a big brown rat with stiff whiskers and a long tapering tail.

He said nothing, but trotted contentedly after his guide under the wash-stand, and diving through a hole in the corner, he found himself between the floor and the ceiling of the room below.

"Run along on this beam," said the rat; "you'll find the walking better. We always use it. You notice it has got to be quite black and smooth from constant use."

They ran along the beams and down between the side walls until they came to the basement, which Mr. Thompson and his guide entered through a hole behind the flour barrel in the store closet.

Here the rats were holding high carnival, running from one to another, squeaking, jumping on the kitchen table, and fighting for scraps which the cook had left. Mr. Thompson and his friend joined the throng.

"Allow me to present you to my wife, Mrs. Rodentia," said the latter.

Mr. Thompson bowed to a graceful-looking brown rat somewhat smaller than his companion. Mrs. Rodentia was accompanied by her daughter, a young rat scarcely larger than a mouse.

"There seems to be quite a jubilee going on," said Mr. Thompson, searching for a subject for conversation.

"Yes," replied Mrs. Rodentia. "Tom, the cat, has been shut up in a room upstairs, so we have the basement all to ourselves." She was walking along slowly as she spoke, and Mr. Thompson was following her, considerably embarrassed by her long tail, which she switched coquetishly from side to side as she walked. At last Mr. Thompson stepped squarely on the tail.

"I beg your pardon!" he exclaimed.

"Don't mention it," answered Mrs. Rodentia. "Clumsy fellow!" she whispered to her daughter, with a contemptuous glance toward poor Mr. Thompson.

"What a polished lady of society she would make if dressed in silk instead of fur!" thought Mr. Thompson, recollecting similar occurrences in his every-day life. Mr. Thompson felt uncomfortable for a few minutes. Then his attention was diverted.

"What are those fellows doing?" he inquired, pointing toward three or four ruttily looking rats who were swaggering toward the store-room.

"MR. THOMPSON STEPPED SQUARELY ON THE TAIL."

"Those are pie-rats," replied Mr. Rodentia. "Wait for a moment, and you will see why we call them so."

"It is, it is a glorious thing
To be a pie-rat king, to be a pie-rat king," sang the leader, and his followers kept time to the march.

Mr. Thompson watched them. Before long they came out of the closet, the leader with his hand upon his sword, issuing his orders in nautical phrases, and his crew rolling a large mince pie along on its edge.

"There! you see why they are called pie-rats," said Mr. Rodentia. "They get lots of pies and cakes. Don't you ever remember having heard the landlady say, 'Bridget, where is that other pie?' and Bridget answered, 'Shure the rats ate it, mum—bad luck to thim!'"

Mr. Thompson remembered, but he had always had a strong suspicion that the rats were blamed for the appetite of a stalwart policeman who used to lean over the area railings, and then go up the street wiping his mouth with the back of his hand in a very suspicious manner.

"Tell me," said Mr. Thompson, "where your family came from."

Mr. Rodentia smiled good-naturedly, and replied:

"The history of our family is buried in a mass of tradition, some of which is no doubt true and some false. It is said that we used to live, many thousand years ago, under-ground in Persia, but being disturbed by an earthquake, we migrated westward, driving before us our weaker cousins the black rats. It was about the time of our migration that the incident occurred upon which the legend of Bishop Hatto's tower in the Rhine is founded. We penetrated the whole of Europe, but were unable to get to England on account of its being surrounded by water. Some of my direct ancestors, however, went from Norway to England in a ship-load of lumber, and we were consequently called for many years Norway rats. From England to this country the passage was easy, as there were so many ships going to and fro. Since we came here we have flourished, and now there is hardly a house which is not inhabited by one or more families of rats."

"How came you to change your habits from living under-ground to living in houses?" asked Mr. Thompson.

"Merely for convenience," replied Mr. Rodentia. "We have a large family of cousins now living in California who have houses under-ground. Living in houses as we do we are nearer the kitchen, which is the source of supply with us."

"Humph!" said Mr. Thompson.

"You must not think that we are entirely useless," said the rat, quickly, observing Mr. Thompson's contempt. "In China they make pies of us, and many of the best kid gloves are made of our skins."

Mr. Thompson yawned; he was getting very sleepy, and wished that he could change back into his own shape, so as to go to bed. Mr. Rodentia did not notice this, but continued:

"Now I am going to see if—" What he was going to do Mr. Thompson will never know, for just at this point he gave a shrill squeak of alarm, and crying, "The cat! the cat!" he dashed under the wash-stand. Mr. Rodentia jumped with a sudden involuntary fear, and found himself sitting at his desk, with his pen still in his hand. He looked toward the wash-stand, and there, with his green eyes gleaming and his tail quivering with excitement, stood Tom, the landlady's cat. Mr. Thompson rose slowly and looked at his watch; it was half past three.

He said nothing about his adventure to his fellow-boarders, for he was getting tired of the fun they made of him. But he told me in confidence the other day; so if any of you see Mr. Thompson, don't let him know that I have repeated the story to you.

"THOSE ARE PIE-RATS," REPLIED MR. RODENTIA."

THE dreadful floods which have distressed some of our friends in the West have, no doubt, been seen in their wild terrors by many of our little readers. One of them, writing to the Postmistress, gives a graphic description of what she has seen through, and the children far and wide will be full of sympathy as they read her letter:

BOSTON, MASSACHUSETTS.

I write to you and tell you of my dreadful experience on the Ohio River. I live in Cincinnati, and I was staying a little outside the city, in my grandpa's house, when the river began to rise awfully. It came up around the house, and got higher and higher. Grandpa said that if it did not stop rising, the house would be carried away. It did not stop, and grandpa began to try and get a boat to come and take us off. The water was then seven feet deep around the house.

No boat could be found, and in two days the house floated off with us. We floated around for two days, and our food was nearly gone. At last we stuck on some high ground ten miles from where we started, and we got taken off in a boat. Grandpa has sent mamma and my brothers and sisters and me to Boston to our aunt's to be safe until he and papa get us another home, for our city house is all flooded.

My dear Charles writes this for me. I would have written it myself, but my wrist is sprained. I am twelve years old. I like YOUNG PEOPLE very much.

ALICE S.

SAN FRANCISCO, CALIFORNIA.

I live at the Cliff House, and I am going to tell you about it. You can see the Seal Rocks, which are covered with seals, and when a storm comes the seals go to the top of the rocks, and when it is windy they go into the water. My sister Alice and I go down on the beach, and take the Newfoundland dogs Barney and Mose. We throw stones at the water and the dogs rush in and bring them back to us.

My uncle brings me my paper every Saturday, and I am so glad when he brings it. I like to read a little of the paper, and I am so pleased with the story of "Nan." My name is Etta A., and I am nine years old. My sister's name is Alice A., and she is six, and Edna is my youngest sister, and she is four years old.

We all play together, and have very good times. We go to ride in the Golden Gate Park, and go into the big conservatory; it has a great many things in it, and it is so nice. We also go where we wade in the water on the beach, and about every time I get sick. I am taking lessons on the piano. I go to school, and I am in the Sixth grade. I made some dolls, clothes, the Museum, the Tussand Wax-Works, etc. We thought the English country very beautiful; it is like a park. We went to Stratford-on-Avon, Warwick Castle, the north Kenton Lather lives, and to the Westburg Castle; it is very beautiful. We saw the room in which Luther translated the Bible. Before some of you have not read the story of St. Elizabeth, so I will relate it as the guide told it to us at the castle.

Queen Elizabeth was a very good woman, and once, when she was going to relieve the poor, she visited her apron with leaves of bread. On her way down the hill she met the King, her husband, who was sometimes very stern. He asked her what she had in her apron. Flowers, she proudly replied. He pulled down the apron to see, and sure enough the leaves had been changed to roses. After a while her husband was killed, and she and her children were turned out of the castle by his brother, who became King, and she left her little children and went into a convent. One of the children starved to death, one was killed, and the other lived to grow up. It was made a saint.

I think a good mother is the best kind of a saint. When we came to Dresden. At first we thought it a beautiful city—such nice streets, and galleries of wonderful pictures—but soon my sister was taken ill, and then I had scarlet fever, and Tom was at the hotel with papa and brother Frank, and now we have come to Italy, where it will be warmer. Tom and I have been to school here, and study out of German books, and I like to read and speak the language very much.

These are the best times that we still have HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE. I have just made two Wiggles, and send them to you. Please choose which you think the better. This is my first letter.

Both Wiggles are good, and I have sent them to our artist with a number of others. If you will turn to No. 143, Vol. III., you will find the story of St. Elizabeth of Thurgia beautifully related by Mrs. Helen S. Conant, and also a lovely picture of her. She was a very beautiful and noble woman, and although she made some mistakes, we shall not do very wrong if we imitate her. Few people were to be seen in the street as ten o'clock approached. The working people were at their tasks, the children were at school, and so the street, usually very well adorned, was almost empty.

In the top-floor front room of a rather poor-looking structure a little girl was hastily donning street attire in a manner eager and solemn one.

The morning of St. Valentine's dawned clear and cold. The sun's bright rays seemed to penetrate everywhere without giving warmth or cheer.

In the top-floor front room of a rather poor-looking structure a little girl was hastily donning street attire in a manner eager and solemn one.

The little girl was Valentine? Yes; and she was only seven years old. Presently she began to talk to herself. She knew she was alone. "Poor child! she usually was."

Charity wanted me to, and I can go and get papa's violets. He always loved violets. Last Valentine's Day he brought me a great big bunch. He never liked the paper valentines. He told me I have to be his Valentine, and nothing else is needed 'cept violets. I'll get all I can, and then"—her lips quivered slightly—"I know he'll see them, and know his little Valentine came to him."

Then eagerly little Valentine took from behind the clock a ten-cent piece, and after depositing it in one of her red mittens she descended the stairs and went out. So she was on her way, and threading her way among the busy crowds of people.

But why was she going for her violets all alone? What was her plan? Ah! it was almost a year since her father had died and left his little girl an orphan. Since then Aunt Charity had taken care of her. But that she was a seamstress, leaving her every day, and the little girl was often alone.

Valentine's search for the girl who sold flowers was successful after walking a few blocks. She gave her the money, and received in return a bunch of sweet early violets. They were very, very few.

"Very early for violets," the girl explained, "because I have just started to dig them."

Valentine smiled bravely, and started for home. "They're real, but such early pretty ones. I'm sure papa will see them. He said mamma was little when she was a girl, 'isn't it?'"

She was crossing Broadway now. The street was slippery, and she must step carefully. Ob, there was a stage coming; some one called, "Watch out, there!" She looked about in an uncertain way. She tried to step forward, but the danger seemed too near. Her feet gave way beneath her; she fell heavily, and then she knew nothing but pain. She lay there in a small way, with a gentleman bending over her, and a lady sitting by her side holding her hands.

"There is no hope," the doctor said. "The injuries are too serious. She looked about in an uncertain way. She tried to step forward, but the danger seemed too near. "The dark eyes opened slowly. In spite of pain, a smile lit the pale little face.

"Oh, may I go to papa?" she asked, tremulously. "Oh, how are you better?" the doctor answered, soothingly.

The smile faded from her face; she looked disappointed. But the pain came on, and for a little while she lay there in a small way, with a gentleman bending over her, and a lady sitting by her side holding her hands. "What is your name, little one?" she asked.

The answer was spoken slowly and softly. "My name is Valentine." "What is your name, little one?" she asked.

"What is your name, little one?" she asked. "My name is Valentine." "What is your name, little one?" she asked.

"What is your name, little one?" she asked. "My name is Valentine." "What is your name, little one?" she asked.

"For papa. To put—in my room—so papa would know his little Valentine—had remembered." The last words were scarcely audible. Presently she spoke again. "I'm tired now. I want to sleep." She opened her hands and closed her eyes softly, she repeated, "Now, my name." Then the dark eyes opened for a moment; a smile played about her lips. She closed her eyes again, her hands remaining quietly folded.

The room was very still. A ray of sunlight fell upon the child's quiet, peaceful face. The doctor felt her pulse.

"All is over," he said, softly. "All my fears are at an end, if I but remember only."

"Such as these have lived and died."

NELLIE.

The writer of "Valentine's Violets" is a little girl of thirteen, and the story was composed by her as a school exercise and given to her teacher, who had requested the members of her class to write something appropriate to St. Valentine's Day. Although the day is past, our little readers will enjoy Nellie's story, and our thanks are due to her teacher, who kindly sent it to the Post-Office Box. Perhaps one of these days we may have the pleasure of numbering Miss Nellie among the regular contributors to YOUNG PEOPLE.

While on the subject let me tell you, children, that the Postmistress was not forgotten when the pretty little love missives were flying about as thick as snowflakes. She received a sweet little letter which she could plainly see was the work of childish fingers, and with it this dainty bit of rhyme:

"To our Postmistress fine
We send our Valentine,
We love her very much—
Would that there were more such!"

NEW YORK CITY.

Although I am a young man of twenty-one, I read and appreciate HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE. I have bought it every week since it was issued, and I can remember distinctly that it was I, my two nephews, aged ten and seven respectively. YOUNG PEOPLE is far superior to the papers I used to read at their age. I was reading about the Hounds and I can remember playing that game or something similar in the city. The way we played it was this. Two or three boys would be the Hares, and start on a run. Each would have a piece of chalk in his hand, and would mark on the stones a figure like the letter A, thus giving the trail. They would be five or six blocks in advance, and then the Hounds would start to follow. The boys would run any way they chose, so long as they would mark the trail, and sometimes would write short sentences on the stones. To finish the game the Hounds would have to find the trail, and hide themselves until they were found. I do not see it played now in this city.

To conclude, will the Postmistress answer this question: Is it right to be so inquisitive through negligence, and can it be used?

Your liking for YOUNG PEOPLE and your interest in it are very gratifying to its conductors, who appreciate the compliment you pay it. City boys will be glad to hear that, notwithstanding difficulties, they may play Hare and Hounds if they like. I can remember playing that game or something similar in the city. To finish the game the Hounds would have to find the trail, and hide themselves until they were found. I do not see it played now in this city.

To conclude, will the Postmistress answer this question: Is it right to be so inquisitive through negligence, and can it be used? Your liking for YOUNG PEOPLE and your interest in it are very gratifying to its conductors, who appreciate the compliment you pay it. City boys will be glad to hear that, notwithstanding difficulties, they may play Hare and Hounds if they like. I can remember playing that game or something similar in the city. The way we played it was this. Two or three boys would be the Hares, and start on a run. Each would have a piece of chalk in his hand, and would mark on the stones a figure like the letter A, thus giving the trail. They would be five or six blocks in advance, and then the Hounds would start to follow. The boys would run any way they chose, so long as they would mark the trail, and sometimes would write short sentences on the stones. To finish the game the Hounds would have to find the trail, and hide themselves until they were found. I do not see it played now in this city.

"No more Hares and Hounds in your good English. It is a form of speech which we call tautology, an unnecessary repetition of the same thing, which is weak and inelegant.

SOUTH PLAINFIELD, MASSACHUSETTS.

My darling Tom is so dear, I think you are lovely. I like a young man, but I like you best, but I am away at school now. I board with a very sweet young lady, and go home every other week. I have a very nice room, and I have seen my love seven dogs and ten cats—what do you think of that?—and two of the cuttiest little puppies that ever were seen.

I send lots of love and kisses to the Postmistress.

JESSIE B. H.

Seven dogs! And ten cats! Bow-wow-wow! And meow, meow, meow! I should think you would be perfectly wild with such a chorus. Do the seventeen march out to meet you when you return from school each fortnight? And do you ever tuck a kitten into your satchel or struggle a puppy into your pocket when you start to go to school?

By-the-by, I wish the children who make pets of their chickens would write to the Post-office Box. A little later in the season and some of you will have pretty broods to feed, I'm thinking.

What would you do if you had written to a boy whose exchange was printed in No. 130, inclosing four stamps, and had written five times since then and never received an answer? I have done all that. I hope it is because the boy is sick or has gone away somewhere, for I don't want to think him dishonest. Now for my exchange. I will give three foreign stamps for any one stamp not in my collection, and six for any uncollected one not in my collection. No torn or badly cancelled stamps taken. Do not send stamps in letter, but send list, and I will select what I want at once. Please print this. With lots of love to the Continent, I will say good-by.

CLINTON B. FISK, JEN.,
531 Fifth Av., New York City.

We call the attention of the delinquent boy to this letter, and hope he will write at once and explain his silence. If exchangers would in every case arrange the details of their exchanges by letters or postals, we think these misunderstandings, of which complaints are occasionally made, would not occur. Please send the notice at the head of the Exchange column.

BRANDFORD, MASSACHUSETTS.

I have taken YOUNG PEOPLE about a year. I have been pleased with it from the first; but as I learn better how to read, I grow more and more interested in it. I have got a little axe, and if the wood is small I can chop all the wood we burn. Papa says, "Don't cut your foot; you may cut your hair." I have no pets, except a brother for my friend and a sister two. Levi and Rose. Levi is a cute, black-eyed little fellow, has a good nature, speaks freely in public, and has some songs ever since he was two years old. Well, dear Postmistress, good-by for this time. I am only eight years old, and can not write very well.

MYRON D.

I think your letter was very well written, and you are a sturdy little fellow to handle an axe at eight.

NAVILLE, TENNESSEE.

The letter from A. C. N., in No. 128, gave me a great deal of pleasure. I hope he will write again and tell me how to play "Going to Jerusalem" and "Rachel and Jacob," and be sure to describe the "Nursery," and tell what they all do rainy days. There are seven of us—four boys and three girls. The oldest will be twelve next month. My brother and I have roller skates, and we have lots of fun in the long gallery.

L. T. W.

PICKNEY, NEW YORK.

Papa, mamma, and my little sister went to the State Fair last fall, and I staid at home with grandma to keep house. I cut my fingers paring potatoes, and burned them too. Mamma said she knew I had worked by the looks of my hands. I would like to join the Little Housekeepers. I am eleven years old. I like "Nan" and "Reg." Grandma gave me a gold ring for my birthday present. Jimmy is a funny boy.

ALICE G.

DAVENPORT, IOWA.

We are four little Hawkeeyes who have taken YOUNG PEOPLE from the first number. We have two rambles bound. We have a pet turtle. We have had him nearly four years. In summer he lives in a tub of sand, and we drilled a small hole through his shell, and we often tie him in the strawberry bed. He likes strawberries when they are ripe, and ripe tomatoes, but he eats worms best of all. We have a canary-bird. His name is Lemon; his mate's was Ade; and we called both of them Lemonade. Good-by.

JENNIE II.

OLYMPIA, WASHINGTON TERRITORY.

I live in Olympia, a pretty little city surrounded by oysters and clams. I have two dogs, a horse, and a rabbit. I had two rabbits, but my dog killed one, and my sister who is five years old, I am, cried all day. Girls are such babies! Their eyes are always full of tears. It snowed last night, and it now it is raining, and my mother won't let me go to school. I have a tape, and when they are ripe, and ripe tomatoes, but he eats worms best of all. We have a canary-bird. His name is Lemon; his mate's was Ade; and we called both of them Lemonade. Good-by.

time. My sister thinks I am like Jimmy Brown. I think Jimmy Brown is a splendid boy, and I wish he would write oftener.

H. W. R.

Well, well, well, girls are such babies! I see nothing babyish in crying over a dead pet nor over a sprained arm; but if I should say what I think about fretting when mothers say that boys ought to stay in the house, why, I might hurt your feelings. So I won't say a word.

HAUNTINGTON, MASSACHUSETTS.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS.—I send a list of 154 words formed from letters contained in the word "orphanism." I think if Jimmy Brown would spend some of his time reading words like that he would get out less trouble. My dear mamma, Jimmy Brown is one of the kind of boys that mamma are made of, but I don't think so.

NELSON E. P.

Your list has been placed with the others; it is a very good one. I hope Master Jimmy will see what you say, and try to improve his mind.

ORPHANISM.

One hundred and forty of our young readers have sent us the results of their efforts to form various other words from the letters contained in this one. Of these fifty-two have sent us lists containing more than fifty words, fifty-six have sent lists containing more than one hundred words, and eighteen have sent lists containing more than one hundred and fifty words.

The honor of having collected the largest number of correct English words belongs, in our opinion, to Master John R. Glen. His is not the longest list; but that of Master Willie Ryder, which exceeds it in number, containing two hundred and sixty-eight words, includes too many terms which can not be said to come within the required limitation of "good English words."

We publish Master Glen's list, in order to show the number of words that may be formed from those nine letters:

DEAR YOUNG PEOPLE.—I enclosed I send a list of words, all of which are formed by the letters contained in "Orphanism," numbering 232, leaving out all slang, plurals, obsolete words, and prefixes. Respectfully,

JOHN R. GLEN, Nacochee, Georgia.

Enclosed is $1 for the fund for YOUNG PEOPLE'S COT. Part of it I earned by drawing in wood in my express wagon for my mamma, and the rest was given me. I am seven years old, have a kind papa and mamma to take care of me when I am sick, and am very sorry for poor little children who have no one to love and care for them.

I enclose $1 25 for the Cot fund. I will tell you how I got it. I with four other boys had a minstrel show. We are all sons of officers stationed here, and our ages are from seven to eleven. I am the eldest. All the officers and ladies came to our show. The admission was ten cents. We thought the best thing we could do with the money was to send it to you for the Cot.

CHAPTER II.
 THE AMATEUR PIRATE.

AFTER the boys recovered from the surprise into which Captain Sammy had plunged them, they at once began to lay plans for the raising of the craft which had come into their possession so unexpectedly. The conversation soon took a very lively tone, and it was nearly dark before they realized that they had spent the afternoon in almost useless talk, and yet had a walk of half a mile in prospect before they could get any supper.

"TIM THOMAS TUCKER!"

With the twofold purpose of getting something to eat and of consulting Mr. Evans as to the best method of settling about the work they had so suddenly undertaken, they started toward their boarding-house at full speed.

They were nearly home, when a small-sized boy with a very large-sized coat appeared from behind one of the buildings, making the most frantic signals to attract their attention. He presented such a comical appearance as he stood there holding his large coat from actually flying out on the breeze that the boys would have stopped to listen to him even though they had been in a much greater hurry.

The stranger came toward them stealthily, as if he had an idea some one might try to prevent him, and when he was as near as he could get without actually touching them, he said, in a most mysterious whisper,

"Come down to the beach in half an hour."

He made no attempt to say anything more, but as soon as he had delivered his message, or command, he darted back behind the building again so quickly that hardly anything could be seen save the fluttering of one ragged and patched coat tail as its owner turned the corner.

It was too mysterious a summons to be disregarded. The supper was eaten hastily, Mr. Evans given a very brief account of Captain Sammy's proposition, and then the boys started at full speed for the beach, their curiosity to know what was wanted of them driving nearly all thought of the yacht out of their mind for the time being.

Had the large-coated boy been a traitor to both State and friends he could not have acted in a more mysterious manner than when he was delivering his message. Bobby could almost feel his hat lifted from his head by his hair, as it tried to stand on end, when he realized that they were hastening at the height of their speed to the place where all sorts of horrible trials might be awaiting them.

Only the dread that his cousins would think him a coward prevented him from refusing then and there to take another step seaward, and he moved along a few paces in the rear of the others, feeling as if he were hastening to some horrible doom.

Prompt as they had been in obeying the summons, they found the mysterious stranger at the appointed place before them. He was standing in the shade cast by some mangrove-trees, and as soon as the three boys came in sight he started toward them, his manner suggesting that he fancied every person in the town to be on the alert to prevent him from keeping his appointment. He stepped lightly and cautiously, as if he feared the very sound of his footsteps might betray him, and glanced behind him every few moments to make sure he had not been followed.

His excessive precaution in a quiet town like Tampa increased Bobby's fears to an alarming degree, and he was obliged to exercise the full power of his will to prevent himself from running away.

As when he had met them earlier in the evening, it was not until he was so near to them that a whisper could be heard that the new-comer spoke, and then he asked, as he glanced suspiciously around:

"Did anybody know you was comin' here?"

"No one but my father and mother," replied Dare, wondering what all these precautions could mean; while Bobby was now more positive than ever that a plan was on foot to rob them.

"What made you tell them?" asked the boy, in an angry tone. "Now just as likely as not they'll tell the rest of the folks, an' they'll come down here an' nab us."

"They won't tell any one," replied Dare, "but if they would, why should any one trouble us?"

"Hush!" exclaimed the boy, warningly, as he crept carefully around on his tiptoes, looking suspiciously at each shadow as if he thought an enemy might be near. Then, having examined the place thoroughly, he beckoned them to come down nearer the water, where he crouched behind a small clump of bushes.

Now Bobby would not have been frightened by this one boy; but from the manner in which he had spoken it seemed almost certain that there were others somewhere near, who would spring upon them at a given signal.

"Get down here where nobody can see us," said the boy, as he crouched closer behind the bushes; "an' if you hear a lot of men comin', run jest as fast as you can."

"What for?" asked Charley, in surprise.

"What for?" repeated the boy. "Why, don't you know who I be?" and he spoke as if he felt greatly injured because they had not recognized him.

"I never saw you before," said Dare, looking at the boy more closely, thinking it was just possible that he might have met him somewhere.

"I don't s'pose you ever did; but ain't you heard of me 'round Tampa yet? Didn't Cap'n Sammy tell you all about me?"

"No," replied the boys, in one breath, and Bobby forgot his suspicious fears in his desire to know what distinguished person they had among them.

"Then cross your throats that you won't tell nobody you was here with me," said the boy, sternly.

Dare was about to take the required pledge, when he remembered that his mother would surely ask some questions about how they had spent the evening, and he said, quickly,

"We won't tell any one beside mother, but she'll have to know all about it."

"Well! when I saw you fellers I thought you'd have more nerve than to run right to your mother with everything you know."

This remark had very little effect on Dare. He was a boy who would never have thought for a moment of doing anything he could not tell his mother, and he had not the slightest desire to embark in any venture about which he could not talk freely with her. He considered her the truest friend a boy can ever have, and he said, quite sharply,

"I don't want you to tell me anything I can't tell my mother, and I'd have you know that it would take more of the boy you call 'nerve' for me not to run to her."

That was evidently abashed, and to cover his confusion he went through the form of scurrying around to see if any one was concealed near them. When he came back he said, in the lowest of whispers, which he tried to make sound as hoarse as possible, in order to add to the effect,

"I'm Thomas Tucker!" Then he started back as if he expected to hear an exclamation of surprise from his listeners.

But none was heard. The name sounded peaceful enough, and they could not understand why so much caution had been used in telling it.

"Don't you know who I am now?"

"I never knew of any one by that name," said Dare, and the others declared that they were equally ignorant.

"Well, I don't see what the matter is. You can't have been 'round this town much if you never heard of me, an' I thought sure Cap'n Sammy would have told you; but I s'pose he didn't want to scare you at first;" and Master Tucker seemed to find a deal of comfort in the thought.

"Why, who are you?" asked Charley, impatient at the delay in learning who this very important though small and dirty person was.

"I'm a pirate!" and Master Tucker spoke in a fierce whisper as he gave this startling information. Then he added, more quietly, "That is, I shall be as soon as I get a crew an' a boat an' some pistols."

It was impossible for the boys to make any reply, for they were even at a loss to know what he meant.

"I'll tell you all about it," said the pirate Tommy, in the most friendly tone, and without the slightest tinge of blood-thirstiness about him. "I've turned a reg'lar pirate, an' I've got a black flag that I made out of a piece of mother's dress, an' the folks in this town know all about it, 'cause I tried to get some of the fellers here to join me, an' they went an' told. Folks is awfully afraid of me, an' I don't s'pose Cap'n Sammy would go out in one of his boats after dark when I was 'round—not if he knew he could get six turtles for nothin'. That's why I had to be so careful when I asked you to come here to-night, 'cause if any of the folks thought I was shippin' a crew they'd be sure to come down here an' arrest us all."

Bobby looked around timidly, as if he expected to see at least a dozen officers of the law ready to pounce on him at once, and he bitterly regretted that he had thus put himself in the power of a regular pirate. Dare and Charley did not appear to be troubled in the least, and Bobby could not account for their unconcern, unless it was that the pirate was so small.

"But why did you tell us who you are?" asked Charley, not understanding why these disclosures had been made to them.

"That's the very thing," said Tommy Tucker, eagerly. "I want to get a crew—I've got one now, but he can't come out after dark, an' so he ain't much good—an' the very minute I saw you fellers I knowed you'd be jest the ones as would like to turn pirates."

It was not much of a compliment to their personal appearance; but Master Tucker did not appear to think he had said anything out of the way, and he hastened to add:

"I heard that Captain Sammy had told you that you might have the Pearl if you could float her, an' I've had my eye on you since, 'cause she'd make the best kind of a boat for a pirate, an' if you'll join me we'll have a boat an' a crew all at once. Of course I should be Captain, but you fellers could be mates, an' Ikey Jones—that's the other feller—could be the crew. You see, the first thing that made me want to be a pirate was so I could serve Captain Sammy out. He thinks he's awful smart, he does, an' one day he took off his leg an' give me a whippin' 'cause I was tryin' to have a little fun with his turtles."

"Took off his leg!" repeated Bobby, forgetting the little Captain's infirmity.

"His wooden one, you know; he can take it off awful quick when he wants to. Now I jest want to catch him, an'—an'—well, I'll serve him out in some way. Now, say, will you join me?"

Aside from the wickedness of the business, no one of the boys had any desire to become pirates, for though it had not occurred to Tommy, they wisely concluded that it was not such a business as would flourish any length of time, more especially if Captain Sammy should come after them with his leg in his hand.

"No, Tommy, we don't want to turn pirates," said Dare, thinking the matter too foolish and trifling to talk much about.

"You're reg'lar cowards, that's what's the matter with you!" shouted Master Tucker, angrily, as he retreated to what he considered would be a safe distance. "But you'll hear from me again, an' then you'll be sorry you didn't join me. Remember Thomas Tucker and his vengeance!"

Then the pirate with neither crew nor vessel disappeared in a stealthy way, as if the officers of the law were already on his track.

And the three boys did hear from Master Tucker again, although at the time they did not think it possible that they should.

THE OLD DAME'S PRAYER.

BY E. M. TRAQUAIR.

AH, dark were the days of winter
On the Pomeranian strand;
The snow fell fast in the wintry blast,
And foes were in the land.

It was in a humble cottage,
Apart from the village street,
An old dame spun by the fire and sung,
And the words were trustful and sweet:

"And what though the foe assail us,
We need not faint nor fear;
For God in their need can build with speed
A wall round His people dear."

A step is heard in the doorway:
'Tis the widow's only son,
Who with moody brow is entering now,
When his long day's toil is done.

"Mother, the Cossacks are on us,
The cruel and ruthless foe;
With the beat of drum I heard them come
Through the wind and the driving snow.

"Plunder and rapine and murder
Go with them hand in hand.
The psalms that you sing will no succor bring;
God has forsaken the land."

"Fear not, my son," said the mother,
"For God, who reigneth on high,
Can scatter this host like leaves in frost,
And save us from danger nigh.

"Nor dread, although they be coming
With drum and with trumpet sound:
The Lord at our need can build with speed
A wall to compass us round."

"Fond is the fancy, my mother;
For wonders are done no more.
Ere an hour can pass they'll be here, alas!
To plunder our little store."

"Build, Lord, a rampart around us;
Stretch forth Thy mighty arm!"
Was all that she said, as she knelt and prayed—
"Shield, Lord, and save us from harm!"

By the blare of the enemy's trumpets,
Borne on the wintry blast,
By the roll of the drum, she knew they had come,
And the tramp of their feet as they passed.

Thick and fast fell the snow-flakes,
While blew the wintry blast;
Dark was the night—not a star shed its light—
And slowly the hours went past.

Sounds were heard on the midnight,
Wailings of bitter woe,
That told in their rage nor childhood nor age
Were spared by the pitiless foe.

"Build, Lord, a rampart around us!"
Meekly the mother prayed,
And the drifting snow on the fields below
A wall round the cottage made.

Few were the words, yet the angels
Had carried to heaven her prayer,
And ere night was done it was clear to the son
That the hand of the Lord was there.

Noon came. The sun at the dawning
Shone, but they saw him not;
And no foe's eye through the snow-drifts high
Had lit on their tiny cot.

Later, when winter was over,
The Cossacks gone from the land,
No cot was seen like the dame's, I ween,
On the Pomeranian strand.

For the peace of God was upon it.
No longer with moody brow
Did the widow's son, when his work was done,
Enter the cottage now.

He had learned the faith of his mother;
He knew that the Father's arm
Could build at their need a wall with speed
To shelter His people from harm.

LEARNING A TRADE.

HOW BOYS ARE EDUCATED FOR MACHINISTS.

AMONG our boy readers there are perhaps hundreds who are just now wondering what their life-work is to be, and to which one of the world's great industries they are going to devote themselves as men. Some weeks ago there was published in YOUNG PEOPLE an article showing how the way is opened by one of the great business firms of New York city to a limited number of boys who may desire to become silversmiths and jewellers. In this article I propose to tell them what another great firm is doing in the interest of active and industrious lads whose tastes may lead them to become machinists.

There is a very curious school in Grand Street, New York. It isn't called a school, and nobody thinks of it as such; but I call it that, because, when I went there the other day, I found two hundred and fifty boys studying with all their might under a great many teachers.

They were not sitting at desks, they had no books in sight, and none of them were reciting lessons. I do not suppose they know that they are in a school at all, or that they are studying, but for all that I never saw any set of boys studying harder. They study all over, with eyes and ears and hands and backs, as well as with their minds, and they have all sorts of teachers. Some of the teachers are men, but some of them are machines, and the machines are just as good teachers in their way as the men are.

The school belongs to Messrs. R. Hoe & Co., the great printing-press makers, and they call it a factory. But it is not at all like a common factory, where workmen can go on doing their work, as you can say your alphabet, without thinking about it. It is a place where every man and boy must study what he is doing, and where every piece of work must be done right, even to the thousandth part of a hair's thickness. Let me tell you how this is.

In the middle of one of the large rooms, when I was there, I saw some of the men and boys at work around one of the wonderful printing-machines which are built in this factory. The men were just then finishing this one, which is to be sent to London to print newspapers there, because there are no machinists in England who can make so perfect a printing-press as this.

I call it a wonderful machine because it really does do wonderful work. The paper to be printed is not in sheets, but in one long strip, wound upon a great roller, like thread upon a spool. This strip is twice as wide as a newspaper sheet, and it is the business of the press to turn the great roll of white paper into complete newspapers. The roll spins round with lightning speed; the paper is drawn into the machine at one end, and two streams of newspapers, printed on both sides, and folded up ready for the newsboys, pour out at the other. The machine does it all—splits the sheet, cuts it off into newspaper lengths, prints both sides, and folds up the papers, turning them out at the rate of many thousands every hour. They come from the press faster than one can count.

Now it is easy to see that a machine like this, made up as it is of thousands of parts, each exactly fitting into its place, and each so arranged that it will do its part of the work at the right time to the smallest fraction of a second, must be made perfectly, or it would not work at all. And a great many different workmen in different parts of the factory have parts of it to make. If any one of them makes his part wrong, even by so much as the thickness of a sheet of tissue-paper, the machine will not do its work perfectly. And the two hundred and fifty boys in the factory are there to learn how to do this kind of work in this perfect way. They must be carefully educated in their business before they can be trusted as regular workmen in such a factory; and that is why I call the place a school, so far as the boys are concerned.

Now let us see how these boys are taught. They are mostly the sons of working-men who can not afford to keep them in school after they get old enough to work. When they ask for a place in Messrs. Hoe & Co.'s factory to learn the trades that are taught and practiced there, they have generally been at work for two or three years as errand-boys or something of that kind.

Each boy, when he asks for a place, has to tell, in answer to questions, what his age is, how far he has gone in his studies, where he lives, what his father's business is, and what kind of work he has done. The answers to all these questions are set down in a book, so that the superintendent can learn something about each boy before seeing him.

If the boy lives in the country he is told at once that he can not have a place, and that he had better stay in the country. This is because boys who come to town to work, and have to live in cheap boarding-houses, are almost certain to fall into bad ways, and bad ways make bad workmen.

Another thing: the superintendent will not take any boy who has not made up his mind to stick to his work, learn it well, and make it his business for life. Boys of any other kind never become really good workmen, however bright and quick they may be.

When a boy is taken into the school—that is to say, when he gets a place as an apprentice in the factory—he is set to work at once. The first work given him to do is hard and uninteresting, and he must keep at that until he can do it as well as the oldest workman before he is allowed to take a step in advance. This is the rule of the shop. Each step must be taken in its turn, and no boy is allowed to pass out of any department until he is a master of the work done in that department.

Work begins at seven o'clock every morning, and at that hour every boy must be in his place, in his working clothes, ready to begin. To do that they must take their breakfasts at six o'clock, winter and summer. They work from seven o'clock in the morning until six o'clock in the evening, except during one hour, which is allowed for dinner.

But when work stops at night the boys are not yet free to go home. They still have their lessons to learn, just as other school-boys have, but the lessons these boys have to get are not to be learned at home; they are to be studied in school, under the eyes of the teachers. I have called the whole factory a school for the boys, because they are being educated there for their life-work; but in the evening they attend a regular school, which the owners of the factory keep up at their own expense for the benefit of their boys.

This school opens at half past six and closes at eight o'clock, and all the boys must attend it, whether they wish to do so or not.

But as there would not be time enough between the stopping of work and the beginning of school for the boys to go home and get their suppers, Messrs. Hoe & Co. give them a plain supper at an eating-house near the factory. When work stops, the boys wash themselves and go to supper. By the time they have eaten, the half hour is over, and they go into school.

In the school they are taught arithmetic and mechanical drawing very thoroughly, because these things will be of great use to them as machinists, making them much better workmen than they could be without that kind of knowledge. All the parts of a piece of machinery must be drawn on paper, and drawn very correctly too, before the machine is built, and some of these boys—those that are best at the work of drawing—will spend their lives in the drawing-room of the factory, making designs for the others to work by; and the others must learn to draw too, so that they may know how to work by the drawings. The boys are also taught something of geography, history, etc., but arithmetic and drawing are the main things.

Once a month the foreman of each room in the factory makes a report about all the boys under him, telling how each one gets on in learning his work, and how he behaves. There are a few of the boys who soon show that they have special ability, and they are selected to be pushed forward. They are set to work under those of the men who are the best teachers, and their chances are good to become foremen of departments after a while. Whether a boy is quick or slow to learn, he must remain an apprentice for at least five years.

I saw one splendid-looking fellow at work by himself, managing a piece of machinery. "That is a very delicate piece of work," said the superintendent, "but that is one of our brightest lads, and we can trust him with it."

In another room a boy was working over a machine. "That boy," said the superintendent, "has not been here very long, but he applies himself closely, and gets on. He has just been picked out to run that machine, and he is learning something from it, too."

In the drawing-room I saw two lads hard at work over designs. "Those boys," said the superintendent, "have just made a step upward. We needed more draughtsmen here, and on looking over their work in the school I found that they were fit for the place, and put them in it."

It is a very common mistake on the part of boys to think that only lawyers, doctors, ministers, and other professional men are educated. The two hundred and fifty boys in this factory go through a five years' course of study in order to become fully prepared for their business as moulders, machinists, etc. The number of hours spent each day in the factory is such that one year's study there is equal in time to more than three years in the ordinary school, and as the course of study in the factory lasts five years, it is equal to more than fifteen years of school. It must be a pretty thorough education that these boys get in order to fit themselves for life.

WHY TED BURNED THE KITCHEN.

BY GEORGE CARY EGGLESTON.

I.

THE baby always had been Ted's pet. Ted was about eight years older than the baby, and so he made it his business from the first to do all he could to make this little sister happy. He would sit for hours amusing the baby or rocking her cradle without a sign of worry, and he would carry her about, too, even after she grew heavy, to show her the pigs and chickens, until his sturdy short legs could stand the burden no longer. In short, he was the best brother that a little baby girl ever had, and by the time that she could walk and talk a little, Miss Baby had learned to think he was her own private property. She wanted Ted to lead her, Ted to talk to her, Ted to show her whatever there was to see, Ted to sit by her cradle until she went to sleep, Ted to do everything for her. And Ted liked it all, because he loved the baby better than anybody else in the world.

But this is not telling my story. The way of it was this: Ted's father, who lived in central Indiana, used to go to Cincinnati every year, driving a big drove of hogs to sell there, and he took with him all the men and big boys he could hire to help him drive the hogs, for the trip was a long one, and there were no railroads in that part of the country in those days.

It was at a time like this that Ted's mother was sent for to see her sister, who was very sick. This sister lived a good many miles away, and the weather was cold and stormy. Ted's mother did not know what to do. She could not take the baby with her in such weather, and there was nobody to leave with her and little nine-year-old Ted.

"I'll tell you, mother," said Ted: "you just go along, and I'll take care of the baby till you come back."

"But it is a long way, Ted," said the mother, "and I may not be back till very late."

"Well, what of that?" asked the stout-hearted little fellow. "You don't s'pose I'm afraid, do you? If you're gone till midnight I don't care. Just leave the baby with me and go along. If you don't get back by bed-time, I'll go to bed, and you can bang on the door to wake me."

The good mother hardly knew what to do. She did not like to put such a load of care upon the little fellow, but the case was pressing, and there seemed to be no other way. So after looking to see that there was food enough cooked for Ted's dinner and supper, she mounted her horse and rode away.

Ted held the baby up to the window and made her kiss her hand to their mother as she looked back from the top of the hill. Then he set to work to "make a day of it" with Baby. He played horse and let the baby ride on his back; he showed her all the pictures in the big Bible; he made a house out of the chairs and tables, and did a hundred other things to make the day pleasant for his little sister, and she laughed at his funny pranks until she could laugh no longer. Then he gave her some bread and milk, and, taking her in his arms, sat down in the rocking-chair and sang her to sleep. Ted couldn't sing, as a matter of fact; he could only shout the words without getting within a mile of any tune, but Baby thought his singing the very best she had ever heard, and so it answered every purpose.

Before the baby waked it had begun to snow, and so Ted had a new thing to show her. The snow was beautiful to look at, as it fell very fast, and the little girl was full of the fun of watching it through the window. So the day passed and night came on. It was still snowing hard, and a fierce wind had begun to blow. After Ted had put the baby to bed, and piled a lot of wood on the fire, he sat down in the big rocking-chair to wait for his mother, who had not yet come. The wind was blowing like a hurricane, and it made him restless and uneasy. He was not afraid, for he was a very plucky little fellow, but as he listened to the wind howling through the tree-tops and moaning around the house, and heard the windows rattle, he thought of his mother, who must be somewhere out in that terrible storm, and he was uneasy about her. Still, he had no fear for her safety, as he knew that she was used to getting over troubles, and so at last he went to bed and to sleep.

II.

When Ted waked he was puzzled. It was dark still, but somehow it did not seem to be night. He could hear the wind blowing, but it sounded a long way off, or as it might have sounded to him if his head had been wrapped up in a blanket. There was no more of its moaning around the house.

He jumped out of bed with a queer feeling, as if something strange had happened. He stirred up the fire, and threw on some wood, which made a blaze. Then he looked at the clock.

"Half past eight!" he said to himself. "Why, how is that? I went to bed at ten, so it can't be half past eight at night. But it isn't half past eight in the morning, for it's dark. I wonder if I've slept all night and all day?"

With this he opened the back door to get some wood from the pile. But instead of going out, he started back in surprise. The doorway was blocked up with a wall of snow. He ran quickly to the front door and opened it. The wall of snow was there too, and all the windows were blocked up in the same way. Ted understood now. It was half past eight in the morning, but the house was completely buried in a snow-drift. He and the baby were snowed in alone.

I have said that Ted was a plucky little fellow, and so he was; but this was a terrible state of affairs, and for a few minutes he was seared. Snowed in, with the baby to take care of, and without any chance of help coming to him, he might well feel alarmed. His mother had not got home, and he could not guess what had become of her. The very nearest neighbor lived five miles away, and there was no knowing how long it would be before anybody would find out what had happened.

But Ted soon saw that getting seared would only make matters worse.

"I can't help mother," he said to himself, "wherever she may be; and what I've got to do is to take care of Baby till the snow melts. Wonder how long that will be? Two or three weeks, I should think. And what are we to eat, I wonder? Let's see."

With that he lighted a candle and went to the cellar. There was only a little milk left—about enough for Baby's breakfast, and Ted brought that up and set it to heat by the fire. The baby was awake now, and so he dressed her and gave her her bread and milk. Then he cut some bacon and fried it for himself, but he would not eat any bread, because he knew there was only part of a loaf left, and he must save that for Baby.

After breakfast he began to lay his plans. At first he thought of digging out, but he gave that up, because, even if he should get out, he could not carry the baby five miles in such a snow. He knew enough to be sure that the snow was not so deep everywhere as it was around the house. He remembered how the wind had blown, and knew that the house was buried in a drift; but he knew that there must have been a very deep snow-fall to make such a drift, and it would never do for him to try to carry the baby through a deep snow to a house five miles away. He must just stay where he was, and take care of the baby.

The first thing to do was to see how much wood there was at the house. So he dug a hole in the snow at the side of the door, and brought in all there was there, except one big back log which was too heavy for him. As he looked at the pile he saw that it would last till night, and by that time he meant to get the back log in by some means. He was worse troubled about milk for the baby. There was none left now, and he wondered if he could get to the cow-shed in any way. It was a long way off, but he must have milk if he could get it, and he must try to feed the cows too, for if nobody fed them they would have to live on the hay which stood in a stack at the end of their shed.

Bravely the little fellow set to work to make a tunnel to the cow-house, but it was very slow work. He began at the door of the summer kitchen, and threw the snow, as he dug it out, into that shed. The further he went, the more slowly he got on, for he had to bring all the snow back to the shed kitchen and pack it in there. He kept at work, however, until he was tired out and very hungry, and yet he had hardly made a fair beginning. He saw that he must give up the idea of digging his way to the cow-shed, and get on in some way without milk. He was very sorry on Baby's account, but there was no help for it, so he set about getting dinner.

There was no difficulty about his own dinner, for there was plenty of bacon to fry, and he could roast as many potatoes as he liked. But the baby's dinner was the puzzle. She would eat a little roasted potato with him, but a baby only a year and a half old could not live on potatoes. She always ate more bread and milk than anything else, but milk was out of the question, and bread and water would hardly do.

"Wonder if I could make her a pudding!" said Ted, after thinking the matter over. "Mother puts eggs in puddings, I know, and there are two eggs in the cupboard. I wonder what else she puts in? Milk? Yes, and I haven't any milk. Maybe it'll do without milk. Let's see."

And with that he carefully planned a pudding. He tried to remember what his mother did when she made a dish of the kind, but he could not remember much. He believed she beat the eggs, so he would do that at any rate. Taking one of the eggs, he broke it and beat it with a spoon, but as he did not keep the yolk and the white separate, the beating did not make it look quite right.

"It'll have to do anyhow," he said, after wondering what was the matter, and so he set down the bowl of egg and prepared the rest of his pudding. Breaking up what bread there was left, he wetted it with snow-water, put in a good deal of sugar, and set the mixture by the fire to heat. When it was hot through he stirred in the egg, and then tasted the result. It was not much of a pudding, but he had talked to Baby about it till she was sure it was the greatest pudding anybody ever made, and, as it was sweet, she ate it without finding out that it was not a real triumph of cooking skill.

When dinner was over, Ted set to work to get the big back log into the house, and this was a new frolic for Baby to watch. The log was very heavy, but his mind was made up. He dug the snow away from the log, and then tried to swing the end around; but the wood was frozen to the ground, and would not move. He brought out the big tongs for a lever, and after bending them nearly double in trying to start the log, he succeeded. The log gave way suddenly, Ted fell over it, and a great mass of snow fell upon him, completely burying him. He scrambled out in a moment, and shook the snow off, making Baby laugh at what she thought was one of Ted's jokes. The log was now loose, but it took Ted a long time, with very hard work, to get it over the door-sill and into the house. By the time that he got it into its place in the back of the great chimney he was quite tired out; but he knew he must have some wood to go with it, else the log would never burn at all, and he had made up his mind what he would do for wood. The tunnel that he had begun to dig toward the cow-house would lead past the big wood-pile, where there was plenty of wood, and Ted meant to go on with his digging the next day, so as to get to that wood-pile at least. But for to-night he was going to burn the summer kitchen; that is to say, he was going to burn all the planks and timbers of the summer kitchen that he could knock loose with the axe.

"It's only an old shed," he said to himself, "and if it was the finest parlor in the world, I'd burn it up before Baby should be cold. And if mother don't come, and I don't get to the wood-pile, I'll burn the chairs and tables and bedsteads, and all the floors in the house. I won't do that if I can help it; but one thing's sure, and that is that Baby's got to be kept warm."

So he took the axe and knocked the summer kitchen to pieces, and piled the wood in the house ready for use. For the baby's supper he boiled the egg that was left, and after putting her to bed he was glad to go to bed himself.

Morning came again, but still no word or sign from the absent mother. Ted was very uneasy about her, but it was of no use to worry, and he had the baby to care for. The eggs were gone now, and so for Baby's breakfast he made a sort of gruel of corn meal, and, to help out, he gave her what was left of the bread, first wetting and sweetening it and making it hot.

But now he was growing very uneasy. The bread was all eaten up, though Ted had not touched a crumb of it himself, and he did not know what to give Baby to eat for dinner and supper except gruel. He tried to make soup out of bacon, but it was only greasy salt water, and he could not give her that. Then he remembered that the hen-house was near the wood-pile, so he made up his mind to keep on working at his tunnel until he should get to the hen-house, no matter how tired he should be. But first he mixed up some corn-bread and set it to bake. By the time that was baked he had got as far as the wood-pile with the tunnel, and this was lucky, for the wood from the old shed was nearly all burned up.

After carrying in wood and building up a big fire he went back to his digging, leaving the baby tied in a little chair so that she might not get to the fire. In order to keep her from crying, he made it a rule to run in every few minutes and make a funny face or do some queer prank to make her laugh. His legs and arms ached with the hard work, but he was getting on, and he must have a chicken before he quit digging. At last he reached the hen-house, and a few minutes later Master Ted sat in the house showing Baby "how to pick a chicken." Baby was very hungry, and a little cross on that account, but Ted kept up his jokes, and managed to amuse her. She stood by while he cut up a part of the chicken, and watched him put it on to boil.

Ted didn't know much about cooking, but he made a pretty good broth that night. He thickened it with flour as he had seen his mother do, and was about to put pepper into it, when he remembered that pepper would spoil it for the baby. At last it was ready, and the two sat down to their supper. The corn-bread was not very good, because Ted had forgotten to put any salt in it, but it did very well to crumble into Baby's soup, and she ate very heartily, and then fell asleep in Ted's lap.

That night Ted lay awake for a long time, thinking about his mother. He was sure something must have happened to her, or she would not have left him and Baby so long. At last he fell asleep, and long after the fire had died down to a dull red he was startled by the sound of a noisy banging on the door, and loud voices calling him.

III.

Now let's see what happened to Ted's mother. When she rode away to visit her sick sister she hoped to get home again before dark, though the distance she had to travel was very long. By the time she had done what was needed at her sister's the snow had begun to fall, and so she hurried away on her homeward ride. But the wind blew in her face, and the snow-drifts were so deep that she had to travel very slowly. Night came on, and the storm grew worse. In a little while she could not tell where the road was, but still she kept on. She was frightened about her children, and in her anxiety she grew nervous and confused. She had lost the road, and was plunging about helplessly in snow-drifts, not knowing where she was or in what direction she was going. At last her horse became worn out, and fell as he was trying to struggle over some fallen trees covered with snow. The poor animal was unable to rise again, and the half-frozen, half-dead woman went on on foot, toiling through the great snow-banks, and staggering with giddiness from cold and fright and weariness. Hour after hour she kept on, going all the time further away from home, for she had entirely lost her bearings. It was morning before the poor woman gave up. Then she sank down in the snow, and knew no more.

A farmer passing by that way in the early morning to look after his cattle saw her dress, from which the wind had blown away the snow, and he quickly dug her out and carried her to his house. She had wandered twenty miles away from her own home, and so neither the farmer nor any member of his family knew who she was. But they did what they could for her, and got her to bed as soon as they had rubbed her to a life-like warmth again.

All that day and night she was out of her head and lay in bed talking of her children and moaning. On the next day she came to herself, and as soon as she found out where she was, and how long she had been away from home, she told the good people about Ted and Baby being all alone in the house. It was a bad time to travel, but the farmer with two other men set out at once to save the little ones, and in spite of her weak state Ted's mother went too in the farmer's wagon. As they neared the house, after dark that night, they found it buried in the snow-drift; but the farmer had brought shovels with him for use if the road should be blocked anywhere, and with these he and his men began to dig. It was midnight before they cleared a passage to the front door, and then they shouted and banged upon the door until Ted awoke.

IV.

There was no more sleep for Ted or his mother that night. A great roaring fire was built up, hot coffee was made and drunk, and Ted had to tell his story over and over again in answer to his mother's questions.

"I burned up the summer kitchen, mother," he said, "and I ruined the big tongs, and I s'pose I've made an awful mess in the house; but I told you I'd take care of the baby, and I've done it."

"Never mind about the kitchen, or the tongs, or the mess, my brave boy," answered the mother, as she drew him to her side and kissed him. "You and the baby are safe, and that's enough."

ANOTHER VISIT TO THE SHOW.

BY EDWARD I. STEVENSON.

It was the writer's second visit to the Winter-Quarters of Mr. Barnum's mighty Show, at Bridgeport. While he stood chatting with a young man whose special duty it is to instruct new and uneducated horses in the way wherein they ought to run, Mr. Johnson, the superintendent of the menagerie in the next room, approached.

"I want you to come in here and see a new turn-out of mine," he said, smiling. "I fancy you never saw one like it before."

No wonder that curiosity was WASHING THE HIPPOPOTAMUS.

3 Minute Turnouts

CHURCH

excited at such a speech as this. I declared myself quite ready to go anywhere. Mr. Johnson led the way into an adjoining building.

At first sight it was hard to tell what in the world was causing the pretty light carriage, in which three bright-eyed young people sat, to move at the rate it did. Paul, Clara, and Jenny, the driver of the establishment, had their backs to the door when it was opened, and it was not until a second or two that the long pink neck of an ostrich, surmounted by his wise head, became visible. Presently, as the equipage passed further around the circle, the fluffy body, legs like walking-sticks, and harness of this strange horse were fully displayed. There was a good deal of laughing among the three or four older folks looking on, and the children in the carriage, whose fathers belonged to the Great Show, joined in the merriment from their moving seat.

"No," said Mr. Johnson, "I did not teach this great creature to play horse. I am glad I did not have the job, for I think he was very likely a kicking and plunging customer to tackle. Did you know that one good blow from his foot will break a man's leg without further trouble? Our solemn friend with the pink neck is from the great Hippodrome at Paris, and he came to Mr. Barnum already educated. He is much more gentle now than during his first months in this country, and is very fond of being fed by the children about the Quarters. You will notice that he is not driven with a bit, but simply with a headband, and you can see for yourself how obedient he is to the rein."

"Do your ostriches ever eat the curious things that others of their race are said to?"

"I am sorry to say that they sometimes do," replied the Superintendent of the Menagerie; "I know it to my cost. Only a few weeks ago a large and valuable ostrich found and swallowed a piece of pine board several inches in length. It was too much for him, poor fellow! he died."

The ordinary food given to these birds in captivity is bread and certain vegetables chopped into small pieces and mixed together. A dishful of it was to be seen inside the rude pen in which they were confined, and they apparently had leave to help themselves à discrétion, as they used to say in French restaurants. Speaking of an ostrich's diet reminds one of a very little girl who told her brother that when she ate ice-cream she wished she had an ostrich's neck, so that she "could taste it all the way down."

Any grief that may have been felt at the sad story of the greedy ostrich was forgotten when Mr. Johnson said, cheerfully: "And now, since you have seen one of these queer turn-outs of mine, you may as well see two others. Here they both come."

Every one present looked up toward the folding-doors, which at this instant were opened mysteriously from behind.

"Giraffes, as true as I live!" exclaimed one of the party. And giraffes they surely were, which advanced slowly into the ring, drawing after them a gorgeous little chariot, painted and burnished to resemble a peacock's brilliant plumage. It was guided by a little girl coachman. The graceful, stately creatures seemed thoroughly at home in their duty as they paraded along.

It was not until they had carried themselves and their chariot well past the party of spectators that there appeared behind them a fresh wonder. Mr. Johnson could scarcely call the third "turn-out," which then appeared, his own. For upon the box of a fashionable kind of buckboard, made of precisely the right size, sat one of Mr. Fryer's dogs—little Major, of whom our readers heard something a week ago. Major held in his mouth the lines by which he guided Nelly, one of the canine household; and other members of the family, Cronian, Sprite, Jerry, had turned themselves into the gentlefolk out for an airing, while Frank acted as footman.

"The giraffes also were taught by our French friends," said Mr. Johnson. "They came to us perfectly trained, and have behaved themselves beautifully when in the ring ever since."

"Is a giraffe a difficult animal to break to harness?" inquired somebody.

"Not especially," replied the Superintendent. "He is extremely shy, but not vicious at all, and he develops a real affection for his teacher and keeper. Did you ever notice a giraffe's eyes? If you talk of the beauty and gentle expression of the eyes of a gazelle, you have never looked at those of his hundredth cousin."

And truly when, a few moments later, the party had a chance to examine those deep black orbs, fringed by such thick dark eyelashes, all agreed that there could be no more lovely eyes in the world. The next time that the Great Show is in their neighborhood our readers can make up their minds as to this fact for themselves.

As Mr. Johnson's "turn-out" turned in and disappeared, the quartette of sight-seers left the building, and passed into the menagerie again. There was the usual screeching of cockatoos going on, and now and then an unpleasant howl from the panther's cage.

It was now nearly noon, and the greater part of the animals were taking naps. The black-maned lion lay cuddled against his savage mate fairly snoring—just imagine a lion snoring! Of the four royal Bengal tigers only one seemed disposed to sit up and make himself agreeable. The leopards stretched their supple limbs, and blinked, not very amiably, at a certain black sister whose rare color made her an object of dislike to all in the den. Over on the other side of the open space the hippopotamus was enjoying a good scrubbing from one of the keepers, as you see him in the picture.

"Let me tell you something," said Mr. Karl, the keeper in charge of the great beasts of the eat kind in the Show. "Whenever a man is in doubt about the sort of humor one of these fierce fellows happens to be in, what do you think is the safest way in which he can find out? By a common broom. Let him be sure and take a broom with him into the cage, and then go quietly around sweeping for dear life. The creatures will snarl at the broom, and attack that before they will touch him. So long as he keeps that broom in his hands he is in a measure a safe man; but let him once contrive to lose it out of his grip, or permit one of his charges to claw it away from him, and he is in danger at once."

One of the little audience at once took pains to assure Mr. Karl that whenever he had occasion to go into the tiger's cage he would be particular to take a very large and durable broom—several brooms if necessary. And so he will—when he goes.

Before bidding good-afternoon to Mr. Barnum's wonderful establishment a few minutes was spent in watching Mr. Conrad give a lesson to the huge baboon, Tom, which recently came into his hands, and which he is very carefully educating in a variety of tricks. At present the cunning beast has only learned to come to his keeper when called, to walk upon a rolling wooden globe, and to be tame enough for further lessons. He is an unusually large specimen—about the size of a Newfoundland dog—and when first given to his master four men could not manage him. He was exceedingly savage, and on one occasion, catching Mr. Conrad at a disadvantage, he actually tore all the clothes from the keeper's back, and gave him several ugly wounds. He is now much more tractable, but even yet has his hands secured in leather gloves and his mouth muzzled while "school is in." By the middle of the season he will doubtless have his name on the bills of the Great Show, and make the acquaintance of many of the readers of HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE.

SOME CRAWLING LEAVES.

BY ELLA RODMAN CHURCH.

WHEN Australia was first discovered by the English, as many strange stories were told about the wonderful things to be found there as we used to hear in the early days of California. Among other things it was said that the leaves of a certain tree had a habit of descending from their proper place and walking along the ground.

A party of English sailors had left their ship to roam along the coast and "see what they could see." They were resting under a tree, lying on their backs probably, and naturally gazing upward, when a sudden breeze shook down a number of leaves, which turned somersaults in the air, after the manner of leaves generally, and then floated to the ground. The sailors were surprised at this shower, because it was not the fall of the year, but midsummer, and these falling leaves looked fresh and green. It was strange to see leaves deserting the tree without any sort of reason; but this was nothing to what followed.

After a short rest these able-bodied leaves began crawling along on the ground toward the trunk of the tree from which they came, and the amazed sailors started up in terror. They probably knew from experience that people who come in contact with the ground may also expect to come in contact with various crawling insects, but walking leaves were something altogether out of the common way; and they took to their heels at once, and lost no time in getting on board the vessel. The land was certainly bewitched, and one of the men said, in relating their adventure, that he expected every minute to see the trees step out and dance a regular jig.

Fortunately this singular phenomenon has been fully explained by later travellers who were not too much frightened to stop and examine the matter. It was discovered that these queer leaves are really insects that live upon the trees, and are of the same color as the foliage. They have very thin, flat bodies, and their wings are like large leaves. When anything disturbs them—like a breeze, for instance—they fold their legs away under their bodies, and then the leaf-like shape, with stem and all, is complete.

Not only are they of a bright green in summer, like the foliage of the trees at that time, but they actually change when the leaves do to the dull brown produced by frost. Another peculiarity of these leaf-insects is that, although they have a generous supply of wings, they seldom use them, but when they have been shaken to the ground, after lying there for a few minutes as if they were really leaves, they crawl toward the tree, and ascend the trunk without seeming to know that they have the power of getting back to their quarters in a much quicker and easier way.

CHAPTER XXXII.

"THERE!" exclaimed Phyllis, triumphantly, from her place on a ladder in the hall at Rolf House—"there! the last bit of evergreen, thank goodness! and how does it look?"

The chorus of voices, young and old, from below declared it was a perfect success. And so it was. The fine old hall seemed to bloom with the freshness of evergreens and flowers, and at one end the huge tree was standing behind a screen, which was to be removed at the fitting moment after tea. Half a dozen of the invited guests had arrived—those who were to remain over Christmas-day—and Nan was now anxiously waiting Marian's appearance.

The door-bell gave a quick peal, and Nan turned around, her heart beating from a mixture of feelings connected with Marian. A gust of wind, a little drift of snow, and then Marian's figure appeared.

Every one was very quiet while Miss Rolf, with her usual courtesy, went forward and said, "How do you do, my dear?"

As the old lady extended her beautiful hand it was seized rather boisterously by Marian. She had come here fully determined not to be "patronized" or "snubbed"; so, although everything she saw in that first glance was rather awe-inspiring, she said, with her jauntiest air,

"Well, yes, here I am, alive at least. How do you do, Nan? Putting up greens, are you?"

The girl glanced confidently about her, staring at Phyllis on the ladder, at Joan and the boys assembled by the fire-place, and at Mrs. Heriot and old Robert, who were helping carefully here and there. Finally her free gaze came back to Miss Rolf, and there something in the old lady's tranquil face and figure, with its air of unconscious dignity and good-breeding, seemed to check her loud voice and independent manner. She stood very still.

"Will you go upstairs, my dear, with Nan?" said Miss Rolf's quiet voice again.

"Oh yes, m—thank you, m." And Marian crossed the hall with Nan, and went up the wide, curving staircase, looking down once in a while at the pleasantly active group below, and enjoying the sense of luxury and space about her.

The two girls had to pass through Nan's room, and here Marian would have liked to stop and examine all the dainty furnishings and ornaments within it; but the sight of Laura sleeping on the sofa made Nan hurry her cousin on, and into the comfortable little room assigned to her.

How to give her the dresses she hardly knew; but while Marian was busy at the mirror taking off her hat and pulling down her "bangs," Nan said, rather timidly,

"Marian, we thought—aunt and I—that perhaps you'd have no time to prepare a party dress, and aunt bought these—if you like them."

Nan swung open the wardrobe door, and Marian turned around with an exclamation of delight. She felt no hesitation about accepting the gift. Her eyes danced as she exclaimed,

"Well, I never!" She was not ten minutes in getting her dress off, and flying into first one and then the other of the two pretty dresses. And it certainly was a comfort to see how much their simplicity improved her whole appearance.

Nan left Marian with Laura, when the latter awoke, and went back to help with the Christmas preparations. Altogether it was an enchanting afternoon. The Blakes and Traverses arrived early, and were all comfortably settled in the black-walnut parlor, where Mrs. Heriot had a most delightful supper prepared for them. Little David having owned to a weakness for plum roll, there was enough there to satisfy a dozen like him; and Nan fitted in and out once or twice to make sure that her protégées had everything they needed for their happiness and comfort. She declared afterward that it was equal to any picture to see that table—Mrs. Heriot at the head, Love at the foot, and Mrs. Travers and David on either side, and between them such a sparkling array of china and glass and silver.

The supper party in the dining-room was to Nan rather alarming, since there were present various new relations

* Begun in No. 157, HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE.

"NAN CLASPED THE NECKLACE ABOUT HER SLENDER WHITE THROAT."

—an elderly cousin, Jane Marsh, and her two quiet daughters; a tall boy cousin, named Val Paton, who teased her all the time; Mrs. Grange, from Bronfield; and Dr. Rogers, whose eyes kept twinkling at Nan; and all the College Street Rolfs; and the minister, Mr. Hammen, and his delicate young daughter.

Just before supper Laura had been declared unable to come down, so Nan contrived an excuse, and slipped away upstairs with a plate of good things for her cousin.

She sat on the low bench by the fire, while Laura slowly ate the cake and sweetmeats, and remained so long that the latter finally exclaimed,

"There, Nan, it is half past seven; you must go and dress."

And Nan jumped up, and ran down-stairs to find Marian. That young person was engaged in a very animated conversation with Val Paton, and she looked as if she were enjoying herself thoroughly. It was a new excitement, however, to go upstairs and dress for the party. Nan staid with her to give her any help needed, and when the last touches were put she could not but admit that Marian looked very well, and very much like a "little lady." "And school will do the rest to her manners."

Nan's own toilet was speedily made. It was only a simple white mull with blue ribbons; but Mrs. Heriot stopped her in the corridor to make sure everything about "her bairn" was right.

I can not describe all the delights and wonders of that Christmas. First came the tree, when the whole party, servants and all, were gathered about, and Nan distributed the gifts. Of course all proved satisfactory, from the joint offering of the Rolfs—Nan included—to Aunt Letty, of a dainty blue and white tea service, to little David's enormous army of tin soldiers, cannon, forts, and all war-like contrivances. There were not wanting useful presents as well: Marian had a set of furs, and Love Blake a fine winter jacket. As for Nan herself, she had what she prized most, an exquisite gold watch, with Aunt Letty's portrait on the inside. And then Phyllis's gift had a peculiar meaning. Nan had said to Aunt Letty, when the presents were talked over: "Aunt, I do want Phyllis to have something beautiful;" so together they had chosen a pearl necklace—just a string of beautiful pearls, from which fell little fine-pointed glittering gold drops.

Phyllis was standing near the tree, looking very beautiful in her white lace dress, when Nan clasped the necklace about her slender white throat, and she did not see the tears that came into her cousin's eyes. Phyllis was thinking of how grandly she had expected to mould Nan to something worthy of her new position—and was it not from little Nan she had learned her deepest, purest lessons?

Of course the party was a success. By nine o'clock the rooms were all filled with a gay, laughing company, but the younger ones best enjoyed keeping by themselves. The band was stationed in the hall, and the young people danced in the walnut parlor, the utmost good cheer prevailing. Once in a while Nan ran up to report progress to Laura, who had her presents on her sofa, and seemed to enjoy things from the distance.

It was midnight when all but the home party had gone. Nan had kept wishing Lance had been there, and Phyllis said, as they all gathered about the hall fire, that she meant to write to him that very night. Marian looked as if she began to see something in life better than the attempt to be the most "stylish" of Mrs. Delille's "young ladies"; and Joan could only "hold on" to Nan, as she expressed it, declaring she was too happy to live.

So with all these happy feelings the party separated for their various rooms. Just before they went to bed, Marian said to Nan, with a little half mortified laugh,

"See here, Nan: I don't think you a bit stuck up, as I thought you'd be, and I think it was awfully good of Miss Rolf to ask me."

Little as it was, this remark pleased Nan greatly, and made her hopeful for the future.

Every one was in bed, and it might have been thought asleep, but Nan felt wide awake after the many excitements of the day.

It was a glorious night. Although the ground was white with a covering of snow, the moon silvered everything, and Nan knelt in the window of her new room looking out with grateful eyes upon the place she now felt to be really home. She was thinking of so many things that she scarcely heard any sound within, until Phyllis's step sounded just at her side, and there was her oldest cousin in her dressing wrapper. Nan welcomed her with a quickly outstretched hand.

Phyllis sat down by Nan in silence for a minute; then she said, very softly,

"Nan, will you always help Laura, and Joan, and all of us?"

"Of course," whispered Nan; "all I know how."

The two cousins remained silent a little while longer, and then Nan said, looking out at the quiet snow in the moonlight:

"What were the words of that old Christmas hymn, Phyllis!—

'And unto us a Child was born,
Whose mark of sorrow must be worn.'

Phyllis," she added, "do you suppose we must all have sorrow?"

"Sometimes," said Phyllis. "But, Nan dear, I think it is going to be your part in life to help other people's sorrows."

"If I can be good enough and wise enough," answered Nan.

And then in a moment Phyllis kissed her good-night, and went away, glancing at Laura, sleeping in Nan's bed.

How many changes had come since, with all pride and curiosity, Phyllis had gone to Mrs. Rupert's for Nan! Not one could have defined the child's power among them; but I think that somewhere beyond the quiet starlit sky at which Nan was gazing that Christmas morning, One knew that the gift of sweetness and truth given to her had not been wasted.

And so we will leave her, hoping, if we meet her again, it will be seen that Miss Rolf's trust was not an idle one.

THE END.

THE GRAND TRUNK LINE.

I AM very glad to tell you that many of the boys have answered the questions I asked them in No. 173, and that while some of their letters appear in this number, others are held for next week's Post-office Box.

Some of the little girls are beginning to be tired of their winter clothes, and wish that mamma would see about getting their pretty new spring dresses. Mother Nature is quite busy and important in the same direction, for her trees must presently come out in full suits of bright green, and her flowers are waking up and looking about for something to wear.

Let me tell you how some little Chinese girls were dressed when they were taken by their parents to call on Miss Bird. Miss Bird is an English lady who is a great traveller, and in the course of one of her journeys she visited Malacca. Of course you know where to find Malacca on the map. What is it, my dear—a peninsula or an island, and what are its boundaries? If you have read the little lesson in geography so that you can answer those questions, I will tell you something of what I read in Miss Bird's narrative.

Life among the Malays is rather easy-going and pleasant, except when tigers are around, as happens now and then to be the case. When one of these ferocious monsters is seen on the streets, the people bar their houses and shut their shops, and nobody dares to go abroad until the hunters have come out and killed the beast.

The Chinese children who came to pay their respects to the party of English visitors were four in number—a boy and girl of five and six years old, and two younger children. Their papa was a very rich merchant, and they were attended by a train of Chinese and Malay servants.

The little girl wore a yellow petticoat of thick satin, with a broad box pleat in front and behind, embroidered with flowers in blue silk. Over this there was a robe of crimson brocade, with a broad border. It was cream-white satin, which also was embroidered with lovely blue flowers. Above this was a tiptop of three rows of embroidered lozenge-shaped pieces of satin.

On the little head was a black velvet cap shaped like a crown. Blazing on top of this was a cluster of large diamonds, and smaller ones were fastened over it, flashing like dew-drops in the sun. The slender little neck was wadded down with no less than seven necklaces, the first of which was the second of emeralds, the third of pearls, the fourth of hollow golden beads, the fifth of diamonds and sapphires, the sixth of finely wrought chains clasped by a filigree fish, the seventh a massive gold chain from which hung a golden shield, on which, among flowers and fishes, the child's name was raised in rubies. Besides all this splendor the poor child wore heavy gold bracelets and wonderful ear-rings.

The other children were dressed in the same showy way. It was a relief to see two little things who afterward came to make their call simply dressed in blue and white, with only here and there a gem set in silver. They were in mourning for their mother, and thus the plainness was accounted for.

Do you know, dear children, that I think you look much sweeter in your pretty white aprons and comfortable dresses, in which you may run and jump to your heart's content, than these little creatures did. When they stooped down to pick up some sugar-plums their jewels and stiff satin clothes were in the way. If any they must have the sharp stones and heavy chains around their necks. They don't have the good times you do, my chicks.

DRESDEN, GERMANY.

I don't want you to think me a little German girl when I am a little American at school in Dresden—a very charming place. The floods in Europe have been terrible. The Elbe (Dresden is on that river) has been a great many feet higher than its usual height, before I left America. Everybody told me Dresden was very cold, but we have had only one or two snow-storms, not deep enough for sleighing.

I have been to the Dresden Gallery several times, and I think the pictures are simply perfect. I like Raphael's "Madonna di San Sisto," best of all. I saw the Queen in church, and I was disappointed because she looked like any other lady. I met the King in the Park the other day; he looks very old.

I have been in the Vault yesterday. It would fill the paper if I should tell you of everything there. For one thing, I saw the only green diamond in the world. There was also a silver brooch about six feet long, with the Great Mogul and all his attendants in precious jewels upon it. Then there was a fire-plate of white marble, also set with jewels, and many other things.

I think you must be tired and sad by this time, but this summer, when I travel, I will tell you all about the places we visit.

They are very cruel to the dogs here; they keep them muzzled, and the peasants make the lame ones take the place of horses. There are a great many tame pigeons in the streets. They have ostriches in the Grosser Garten, and the prettiest pink crane I ever saw. There are about twice as many animals as in Central Park.

MEXICO C.

Thank you, Mignon, for your letter, which is very interesting. I would like to see the green diamond and the pink crane, and I feel very sorry for the poor dogs which have heavy loads to draw.

FITCHBURG, MASSACHUSETTS.

I found some pussy willows to-day (February 18), and I think I am about the first person who has found any this year. I live in the country, and go to school every day unless it storms very hard. I have a brother and sister younger than I am. I have a canary-bird, which I call Smutty, on account of two little dark places behind its eyes. I have taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE ever since it was published, and I like it very much. I am taking painting lessons in water-colors, and have painted some pretty things.

A. GREENE, W.

You are the very first person to write to me about finding ticks of spring. I am glad you found the pussy willows. Have you ever tried to paint them? I would change birdie's name to something prettier if I were you.

CHESTER, PENNSYLVANIA.

I have a trained goat; her name is Nell. When I drive her from home she gets talky, but when I drive her back she runs all the way. She will be bad and untrained, when I hitch her up again, because she is getting lazy. While I was sick with the measles I had a skive-trip, a name was Zib. Christmas week he was killed by the cars, so that made my holidays end very sadly. I take HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, and so does my friend Clara in Harrisburg.

MARY H.

SEVENTH HIGH SCHOOL, HUBERTS, NEW JERSEY.

I am twelve years old, and go to the High School. I am very fond of reading, but have so many nice books that I hardly know which I prefer, but I think that I like best Longfellow's poems, and my brother, Arthur's stories, and Zola's stories, and Klox's Boy Travelers for travel. I have four volumes of the Boy Travelers. I do not like to study very much out of school, as I don't like to read, and write my exercises when I have, and only copy them afterward.

I take music and dancing lessons. My favorite game is base-ball. In the evening, when my lessons are learned, I generally read. Last Friday day I went over to New York and helped my instructor make out the reports, and he gave me $1.50. I have taken YOUNG PEOPLE ever since it was published, and like it very much indeed. A constant reader.

HARRY H. M.

NEW YORK CITY.

I am a boy ten years old, and take HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, and think it is lovely. Once when I was in the country we went to the beach, and the crabs began to bite fast the sky grew suddenly black, and papa said, "We must get home as fast as we can," so pulling in our lines, and picking up our baskets and net, we ran. The sky grew blacker, and the wind blew very hard, and as we reached a bridge not far from home, papa said, "We shall have to stop at the house, for the boys are waiting to get us over," which we did, and then went home and cooked the crabs.

I take delight in reading Jimmy Brown's and James Otis's stories.

NEW YORK CITY.

DEAR POST-MISTRESS,—You said you wanted to know something about boys, so we are going to tell you what we do. We twelve boys are great, and we are all very good. We have a tutor, who teaches us at each boy's house for a month, from 9.30 A.M. to 2 P.M. The top floor of my father's house is divided into two rooms. One is comfortably furnished with a bed, a desk, easy-chairs, fire-place, etc., while the other has nothing but dumb-bells, trapezes, etc. The former we call our study, and the latter our gymnasium. Wednesdays we play at our Royal Tennis Club with our sisters and cousins. Other afternoons we play base-ball in a lot a block from our house. Evenings we read our papers and books until 9 P.M. We take turns all dining at each other's houses on Saturdays, and have lots of fun.

Our favorite books are the "Leatherstocking" tales, our favorite amusement is reading, and our favorite play is base-ball. About our motto we had a good deal of fun. One of our mother told us to get one of our study calendar, and always keep it, so this is what it is. "Two ears to one tongue, therefore hear twice as much as you say."

With three cheers for YOUNG PEOPLE, we remain,
REGINALD R. (aged 14), FRANK S. (aged 14),
RAY S. (aged 12), DAVE L. (aged 15),
TOM L. (aged 13), LOUIE M. (aged 11),
JACK J. (aged 14), ALMA E. (aged 14),
PHIL J. (aged 12), GEORGE P. (aged 15),
DICK J. (aged 13), MAX W. (aged 13).

THE TRUE HISTORY OF FIVE KITTENS.

Oh, Postmistress dear, you should have been here.

And so, the five kittens I had,
Four sweet little dears; I almost shed tears
When I think of the fates they have had.

There were five of 'em—five small kittens—alive,
And, O, such cute antics they'd put out;
It would make you laugh if you'd but hear half,
Their names were Pat, Pet, Pit, Pot, Put.

My papa, you see, went and named 'em for me
After I had called one Pet, you know;
He said that he thought 'twould be fair, and I

To give all the vowels a show.

Black and white were three, 'ceptin' Pat, and she Was kind of a yellowish-pale,
And little black Pot, who only had got
Some white on the tip of his tail.

They were warm, and well fed on nice milk and bread.

And 'enough-bones, soup, and spare ribs,
And varied their diet by mucking nice quiet
Out in the big barn and corn-cribs.

Well, then, Patsy she had on a sloping tree
A warm, sunny spot where she bunked,
Then a big dog there crept one day as she slept,
And left little Patsy defunct.

A farmer one day bundled Pat in his sleigh
And to his home, five miles off, drove;
That night he heard scratchin', and lifting the Walked Put, and crept under the stove.

Soon Pit got to mumm; at last he left home,
And then never more could be found,
He always 'cose wild; I'm afraid the poor child
Has gone off somewhere 'n' got drowned.

Poor little black Pot in the horse stable got
One day when the horses were fed,
An' I fear had a kick—she was very much sick,
An' pretty soon, presently, dead.

But dear sweet old Pet, she lives with us yet,
Is now at my feet lying thinking;
She's 'specially cat, therefore she does nothing but purr.

'Cept occasionally lazily winking. C. H. II.

ANGELIA, NEW YORK.

I am a little girl eight years old. I live in the little village of Angelia with my aunty. Most of the children write about their pets. I have had one for more than two years, and that is my dear black cat, and I do love it better one. I have read them all aloud to aunty. I look anxiously for it every Tuesday, the day it comes. I do not go to school, but study at home. I have finished the Fourth Reader, and am in the second geography and arithmetic, and have kept a journal more than two years. I hope my letter is not too long to print, as it is the first one I have written.

MARY E.

WARREN, OHIO.

I saw your invitation to the boy readers of HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE to write. I live in this little town, and work during my spare time in the printing-office. I have a telegraph instrument with which to spend my leisure. I also take great pleasure in reading, especially Jules Verne's works, his Twenty Thousand Leagues Under the Sea is splendid. But my telegraph is best. There are ten of us boys on the line, and more coming. Not wishing to tire you, I say good-by. E. M.

BROOKLYN, NEW YORK.

I live with my papa and mamma. I am thirteen years old. About three years ago I caught four land-turtles, and last summer I raised four young ones. The old one dug a hole in the ground, and then she laid her eggs. My father and I watched her dig the hole. I also have a small water-turtle which I caught last summer. I keep it in a glass, with stones in the bottom. I harness one of my large land-turtles, named Dick, to a small wagon, and drive him. He knows his name very well; he will also come when I call him.

This is the first time I ever wrote to the paper. Tell Dora and Amy I would like very much to have them see my young land turtles. I bury the large ones every winter in the ground. I go to school, and I am only four classes from the graduating. I have taken music lessons four years. Love, B. E.

The boys have given us quite a picture of their busy lives. Next week we shall have to hear from more of them.

HELSING, ST. HELENA, CALIFORNIA.

I am a little girl nine years old. I want to tell you about our country up here. It is a little valley with mountains all around it. It is very very fine, because the grass is green only in the winter, and in the summer the creeks are all dried up. We have a little place with three springs on it. I usually go there to have snow here, but this winter it had no because it was unusually cold. I have five cats, two guinea-pigs, and a dog. My cats' names are Spottie, Topstyrtur, Nig, Dandelion, and White-foot; my guinea-pigs' names are Dimple and Daisy; my dog's name is MARY LOUISE C.

CARLTON, CANADA.

I saw a letter in the Post-office Box a little while ago from my cousin in Winnipeg, and it made me think I would like to send you one. Carlton is a little village on the Ottawa River. Nearly all the people are French-Canadians. We live in a great big stone house that was once a barracks. In the cellar there is a great deep hole, where they used to put the bad soldiers. We have such a lot of snow here; the drifts at the sides of the roads reach away about a foot. I would like to see you, and my little brother Max and I have such fun playing in it. We often go out snow-shoeing and sliding. I wonder if you ever went down hill on a "bob." I don't want to, I would like to see you, and your old bill; you would like it, I know. I am ten years old. Your loving little friend,

DAISY.

How delightful to live in an old house like yours—a house that was once occupied by soldiers, and that has a mysterious hole in the cellar! I am afraid I would not enjoy riding down-hill on a "bob."

MILWAUKEE, WISCONSIN.

This is my first letter to my dear HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, but I love it very much, and so do papa and mamma. I am just six years old, and my sweet little sister Verne Eleanor is two and a half years old. She has ten dollies, and she will have many names. Last summer she used to swing in the hammock, and called it the "hammer." Now she can recite most of the rhyming little rhymes in my YOUNG PEOPLE each week. I have two lambs bound, and I want to save this year's numbers to bind. We have a pet bunny named Snowball; he is all white, with pink eyes. In my aquarium I have a large golden-fish named Pickwick; we had a small one named Weller, Mr. Winkle, and Pearl, but they died a while ago. One day when mamma came home she found our Maltese cat Cleopatra playing with Pickwick on the carpet. Mamma threw him in the water again, and he soon revived and was all right. The cat has since died, and so has our canary-bird. I am fond of animals; have been to China's times, and like to go to Lincoln Park to see the bears. Jimmy Brown's stories are so funny! I have had a splendid snow-man of my own in our front yard for some time, and he has not yet melted. I have a very good friend, Jimmie, who has a dog named Sam. On my last birthday papa gave me Junco's Picture Book of Natural History, and on Christmas grandpa gave me a box of sliced-up pictures of animals that I have seen in the ones.

ATTIE MARIAN L.

EVANSTON, ILLINOIS.

I wrote a letter to you once before, but I have not seen it printed, so mamma told me I might write again. I think Jimmy Brown's stories are so funny. I like "Nan" very much, but I don't see why Laura don't tell that she got those things, and not let Nan get blamed for her. I am eight years old, and will be the 12th of March, —and am in the Third Reader. I study Gray's Geography, arithmetic, and writing. Maunna teaches me my lesson on the piano. I have a dog named Sam, and I love him very much, and all of them, but I love one the best; her name is Julie. She will be three years old on my next birthday. Julie got a pretty willow cradle lined with blue cloth. I had a dog named Sam, my bed, and put her in it every night. When I wake in the morning I always find her eyes open looking me. I hope you got lots of presents on your birthday, and just what you wanted. I had a pretty tree, and a nice time. I got three such lovely books! I was Diddle, Dumps, and Tot. It has all about Ole Billy, just the same as was in YOUNG PEOPLE. I have read it through about six times. Bob has too, and we both laugh just as much every time. Another book was Papa's Little Doughnuts. I have read it several times too, and am glad there is to be a sequel to it next year. I hope somebody will get it for me. My third book is How Babies. It is so beautiful! I saw one of the birds, and I got tired looking at the sweet baby pictures. I love to draw and paint. Grandpa teaches me how. I have Kate Greenaway's Birthday Book, and I paint one of the pictures in it each day when the date comes.

I received many pretty valentines from Valentine's Day; I have filled a window with them; then the girls and I stand outside and look at them. It is such a rainy, misty day I can't see across the street, and I very much like to have to stay in the house. Now that I've begun this letter I don't feel quite so bad.

My brother Bob has just finished a fire-screen for mamma. It is covered with strong muslin, on which he has pasted Christmas cards close together, so the muslin don't show. He made it all himself. It is very pretty, and mamma says she much likes with it, and finds it very useful. The frame-work is pine-wood, and Bob stained it brown.

We went to see General and Mrs Tom Thumb in Chicago just a few days before that dreadful fire at the Newhall House, Milwaukee. I was so glad they escaped unhurt. I think Mrs. Thumb is too sweet for anything.

OLIVE T.

Write again, dear, and tell Bob I expect to hear from him.

WASHINGTON, D. C.

I have a cat, but I do not play with her, for I have more fun without her. I have a younger bird, and it is covered with scabs seven years old. We have a large garden, and I have a hot-bed of my own.

I saw the transit of Venus through one of the great telescopes in the world, and she is here at the Observatory.

NANNIE W.S.

CHARLESTON, SOUTH CAROLINA.

I am a little girl seven years old, and my name is Pearl. I did not get a name until I was three months old, and then my mamma was reading Enjor's book, The Island Pearl, and I named me after Queen Pearl, for she thought her such a sweet little girl. I have five brothers and two sisters; the eldest is eleven years old; I also a canary-bird pet, and two dogs, Nero and Tiger. We live on the banks of the Ashley River, and I have six very large groves of beautiful oaks and two hundred rose-bushes. My mamma has just finished reading "Uncle Remus" to us. He reminds me of our old mamma Silvey, who was my papa's nurse, and is eighty years old, and is so smart and active now. She lives with us, and tells us about papa when he was a little boy.

PEARL II.

MEMPHIS, TENNESSEE.

I have been taking YOUNG PEOPLE for two years, but have never written you a letter before. I have read all of the stories; I liked "Nan" and Jimmy Brown's stories very much indeed. I am ten years old, and my next birthday is May 1st. The time for flying kites will soon be here, and I have already made me a large one. I expect to have a jolly time flying my kite. I am going to school to a nice lady teacher. I have a good many studies, and am kept pretty busy during the day.

Your friend, JIMMIE S.

And this is from Jimmie's sister:

I suppose you will be very much surprised to receive a letter from a little girl who down in Tennessee has not a subscriber to the paper. But my brother takes it, and I take great interest in hearing the pieces read, and especially the letters from the little girls and boys all over the Union. I am a little girl six years old, and I just commenced to go to school. I am learning to read, but can not write much, so my sister writes this for me. I have no dolls, but when I am not at school I play with my pets, and games.

ALICE S.

ANNIE D.—"Book" comes from "hoc," an Anglo-Saxon word meaning a beech-tree, the bark of which was at one time in use for writing purposes. "Library," a collection of books, is derived from the Latin word "liber," which also signified the inner rind or coating of a tree. The old Greeks and Romans found this convenient to use as we use paper. "Scholar," a student, it may seem to a busy school-girl, traces its pedigree all the way back to ancient Greece, and comes from a word meaning leisure, which the polite Athenians applied to "school." People who had time on their hands, and were not in a hurry, went to school to hear the philosophers talk under the spreading shade of trees. "Coin" is derived from the Latin; it is simply a piece of metal stamped. "Diamond" comes from the same source as adamant; it means something extremely hard—hard enough to resist fire. "Portrait" means only a picture drawn with brush or pencil.

BREAKERS AHEAD—WHERE IS THE HEAD?

SILHOUETTE CHARADE.—GROCER.

BY G. B. BARTLETT.

ANY number of players can join in this fascinating amusement. They are arranged in equal sides, each occupying one-half of a darkened room, with a cotton sheet tightly stretched between them like a curtain. This sheet is made semi-transparent by dampening on both sides with a wet sponge, and a large lamp is placed on the floor against the wall on each side of the room. A few caps, bonnets, shawls, hats, and coats, and plenty of paper and pasteboard, with scissors and sewing materials, are near at hand, and each leader has a piece of board with which to darken his lamp while the opposite side is acting. The figures one, two, three, and four are cut from paper in Roman numerals, and are pinned on the sheet to denote the number of syllables in the word about to be performed, and the acting of the syllable is always followed by a representation of the whole word. In these scenes the sound of the word is always followed, without regard to the spelling, and no one is allowed to guess the charade until the whole word has been acted. The leader of the side which is to act the first charade calls out "Ready," and the leader of the side which is to guess it darkens his lamp slowly by means of the board. For example:

SCENE I. GROW.—A table covered with a cloth is placed near the sheet on the side occupied by the performers, a small flower-pot drops down from above on the table, a lovely maiden in a huge poke bonnet plants some seeds, on which the sun slowly rises and pours his genial rays, this luminary being made of a sieve covered with cloth, lighted by a candle, which is drawn up by a string in the hands of a boy who is hidden behind the table. The maiden eagerly watches the process, and occasionally waters the earth supposed to be in the flower-pot with a sprinkler, and also fans it with a huge palm-leaf fan; a few leaves slowly appear, and gradually the plant grows until it reaches the ceiling. The maiden claps her hands in rapture, and smells of the plant until it grows above her reach, when she begins to grow herself, and continues to become taller and taller until her head touches the ceiling, when the leader darkens his lamp and a dark curtain seems to fall over the sheet. The plant is managed by a boy behind the table, who pushes a twig up by means of a long stick on which paper leaves are tied. The maiden grows taller as the light is moved slowly toward her.

When the leader of the acting side darkens his light to show that the scene is over, both lights are shown while the next scene is being prepared.

SCENE II. SIR.—A King is seated on a throne made by placing an arm-chair on a table with a foot-rest and hassock before it to represent steps, an esquire marches in and kneels on the lower step of the throne. Two attendants enter; the first hands a sword to the King, bowing profoundly. The King rises, strikes the kneeling figure on his shoulder with the flat side of the sword, and thus makes him Sir Knight. The second attendant then fastens the sword on the side of the newly made Sir, and with great ceremony presents him with a huge pair of spurs. Having placed a helmet on his head and the spurs on his feet, the attendants congratulate the knight by shaking hands, and retreat, bowing very humbly several times to the King. The Knight then follows his attendants, having also taken a formal leave of his Majesty, and the scene is closed by darkening the light as before. The crown and sceptre of the King and the spurs and helmet of the Knight are easily made of paper at a moment's notice, as of course only the shadow of these objects is needed.

GROCER.—A man with a paper cap and apron stands behind a long counter dealing out groceries to eager buyers. First a boy with a large hat buys a salt fish, which flaps its tail and his him on his ears as he turns to carry it home. A little girl then buys some eggs, and is surprised to see a chicken rise slowly from the covered basket in which they have been placed. A woman brings a can, and after much hard bargaining in pantomime buys a quart of milk, which is poured into the can; but as she turns away, the cover flies off and a cat's head lifts itself from the can, which she brings back to the man, who shows great astonishment at the result of the bargain. These effects are very easy to produce, as only the profile of these various objects is needed, and the chicken and cat's head are already placed so they can be lifted without being seen by the spectators on the other side of the sheet. At the end of each charade guessing is allowed to all the spectators, and the incorrect guesses are counted on the side of the actors. The spectators must then in their turn act a charade in the same manner, and at the end of the game the side that has made the fewest incorrect guesses is declared the victor.

PUSSY.

DID you ever think why we call the cat puss? A great many years ago the people of Egypt, who have many idols, worshipped the cat. They thought she was like the moon, because she was more active at night, and because her eyes changed, just as the moon changes, which is sometimes full and sometimes only a little bright crescent, or half moon, as we say. Did you ever notice your pussy's eyes to see how they change? So these people made an idol with the cat's head, and named it Pasht, the same name they gave to the moon, for the word means the face of the moon. That word has been changed to pas or pns, and has come at last to be puss, the name which almost every one gives to the cat. Puss and pussy cat are pet names for kitty everywhere. Who ever thought of it as given to her thousands of years ago, and that then people bowed down and prayed to her?

CHAPTER III.

OPEN PIRACY.

THE idea of a boy as small as Tommy Tucker turning pirate, in the belief that he could thereby better revenge himself on Captain Sammy, was very funny to our three boys, and as they walked home they had quite a discussion as to how long he might continue his piratical career.

Mrs. Evans, on being told the story, did not think Tommy was such a dangerous character as to make it necessary for her to inform the authorities of his whereabouts, and, greatly to Dare's relief, she promised to say nothing about the matter. But she did insist that the boys should not become friendly with him, unless it was with a view to persuading him of the evil and folly of his ways.

Bobby was not in favor of acting as missionary to Master Tommy, for he was rather inclined to be afraid of him; but Dare promised to try to do the would-be pirate chieftain all the good he could, although he hardly thought he could effect as much with his tongue as Captain Sammy could with his leg.

That night, after the question of Tommy's piracy had been discussed, the boys laid Captain Sammy's offer before Mr. Evans more in detail than they had done before supper, and to their great delight were told that they might suspend their studies during the time they were engaged in raising the Pearl, provided they gathered all possible information as to the supposed formation and history of the Everglades. Mrs. Evans also suggested that they should study, from such authorities as were obtainable, the cause and formation of the coral reefs which inclosed the State of Florida in a net-work so dangerous to navigation.

Such study as that seemed but play, and they were perfectly willing to give the required promises.

On the following morning they were at the scene of the wreck nearly as soon as the sun had peeped over the trees at the little town of Tampa, and they had brought their dinner with them, in order that they might not be obliged to waste any time in going back to the hotel for something to eat.

As yet they had no idea how they were to go to work to raise the sunken steamer. Dare had asked his father to advise with them as to how they should proceed; but Mr. Evans had refused to have anything to say about the matter. He said that, since Captain Sammy had made such an offer as he had, it was but right that they should work and plan unaided, for that was the price they were to pay for the use of the boat after she was afloat.

It was high-water when they arrived at the beach opposite the point where the Pearl lay under water, and it seemed much more of a task to raise her than it had at low tide, when a portion of her upper works was visible.

Both Charley and Bobby looked upon Dare as the leader of the enterprise; therefore, instead of making any suggestions as to the work on hand, they looked to him for orders.

Dare was almost at a loss to know how they should set about their task, even though he had spoken so confidently the day before; but he did not care then to acknowledge that fact fully.

"I don't exactly know how we are going to raise her," he said, after as long a delay as he dared to make, lest his companions should discover how entirely he was at a loss to know how to proceed; "but there is one thing sure, and that is we must build some stout rafts which we can anchor alongside of her."

As he said this a very good plan for raising the boat presented itself, and he added:

"If we could make rafts large and stout enough, we could get some chain-cables, pass them under the Pearl at low-water, and make them fast to the rafts. When the tide rises, of course the rafts would raise the steamer, and we could float her in nearer the shore, doing the same thing each day, until we got her where she would be wholly uncovered at low-water."

The plan seemed so simple that the other boys came to the conclusion that raising steamboats was the easiest thing in life, and the question of how large the rafts should be was being discussed when Captain Sammy was seen stumping along the beach toward them.

"Well, boys, have you got the Pearl afloat yet?"

"We've hardly had time for that yet, sir," replied Dare; "but we shall do it."

Then Dare asked the little man what he thought of the plan he had just proposed, and was delighted at the hearty approval it met with.

"I have got some small chain-cables that will be just the thing, and you can go to my dock for them whenever you are ready to use them. Of course the success of your plan depends more upon your raft than anything else, and if you'll row me over to that little island there, I'll show you some trees that will make excellent timbers for the heavier portions, although of course it will take you some time to get them ready for use."

As he spoke Captain Sammy pointed to a small island about two miles from where they were standing, and which appeared to be covered with a fine growth of heavy timber.

Dare's idea had been that they could buy some thick planks which would make better rafts than any they could build of trunks of trees; but thinking Captain Sammy might have some reasons of his own for wanting to visit Dollar Island, as it was called, he agreed to the plan, and all started for the little Captain's boat.

Before Dollar Island was reached the boys found that Captain Sammy could be quite a tyrant when he was on the water, for he kept them pulling at the oars, while he sat in the stern-sheets and steered, much as if they were a crew which were obliged to serve him.

But it was not such a remarkably hard pull, after all, and when they stepped ashore on the beautiful little island they felt fully repaid for their work.

"Now one of you stay by the boat, while the others come with me around the shore," said Captain Sammy. He placed the luncheon the boys had brought with them carefully under the stern seat, and then started along the shore, leaving them to follow as they chose.

Bobby was anxious to be left as boat-keeper, a position which Dare and Charley were only too willing to accord him; so they started off after the little Captain, while Bobby curled himself up on the bank where he could watch the boat and take his ease at the same time.

He had been on guard in this leisurely fashion for more than an hour when he was startled by a sound from among the trees just behind him, and at the same time he saw a little round head, surmounted by a wonderfully large and gaudily trimmed hat, just moving out from behind the trunk of a tree.

"Who's that?" he asked, quickly.

"Captain Thomas Tucker," was the bold reply, in a very thin, squeaky voice, as the rather diminutive form of the pirate chieftain came into view, closely followed by another boy of about the same size and appearance, whom Bobby concluded was the pirate crew, Ikey Jones.

Master Tucker still wore the long coat, but he had made several additions to it. On each shoulder was sewn a piece of yellow cloth, evidently intended as epaulets; around the waist was a large piece of red flannel tied as a sash, and in this was stuck an old pistol without a lock. The hat was evidently the pirate's crowning glory; it had several strips of red and yellow cloth tied around it, with long ends hanging down on one side, while in the gay-colored folds were fastened several feathers that gave a startling appearance to the whole costume.

The crew, as represented by the meek-looking person of Ikey Jones, wore no distinguishing marks of their bloody calling save a leathern belt around the waist, in which was placed a not very dangerous-looking table-knife.

Now Bobby was rather a coward, more especially when he was alone, and the appearance of these two avowed pirates, when he thought his party were the only ones on the island, rather frightened him.

"Where's the old heathen gone?" asked Master Tucker, as sternly as his thin voice would permit.

"Who?" asked Bobby, in surprise.

"The old heathen—Captain Sammy?"

"He's somewhere along the shore, with Dare and Charley. How did you get here?"

"Took an old boat that would just hold together, an' started after you did."

Bobby trembled with fear, for if the piratical crew had followed them so closely, they must have had some dreadful motive.

"Look here, now," said Tommy, as he and Ikey went toward Captain Sammy's boat, "here's me an' Ikey Jones, an' there's you. Now that's enough to make a little pirate's crew if you say you'll come with us. You shall be the mate, an' boss Ikey 'round as much as you want to. Will you do it?" And Tommy began to push the boat off as though there was no question but that Bobby would accept the offer.

"No, I won't; and you mustn't touch the boat, or Captain Sammy will be angry," said Bob. But his courage was not sufficient to admit of his going down to the boat and pulling her up on to the beach again.

"I'll tell you what I'll do if you'll come," said Tommy Tucker, persuasively, having now launched the boat until she was held only by the anchor-rope. "Ikey has to go home every night at seven o'clock, an' I'll let you go too, so's you won't get into any trouble with your aunt."

This idea of being a pirate by day and a peaceful citizen by night was a new phase of life to Bobby, but yet he was not pleased with it.

"I tell you I don't want to be a pirate," he repeated; "and you must pull the boat up again, for Captain Sammy will be here pretty soon."

Tommy glanced over his shoulder quickly to assure himself that the little man was not in sight, and then he said, sternly, while Ikey Jones got behind him in order to be safe in case Bobby should be made angry:

"There's no use talkin', for I'm a reg'lar pirate now, an' you don't want to fool 'round much with me. I come here to get this boat, an' to have you fellers join me; but if you won't, I'll take the boat anyhow, an' I'll serve you out awful if you try to stop me."

"But it's stealing to take her, and we can't get home again if we don't have her."

"I can't help that, for I'm a pirate," was the brief reply of Master Tucker, as he motioned his crew to get on board, and then giving the boat a vigorous push, he jumped into her, and the pirates were afloat.

It was not until the little craft was at such a distance from the shore that it was impossible to get at her that Bobby had sufficiently recovered from his fear and surprise to run down to the beach. There he called imploringly:

"Come back, Tommy! come back, an' don't be so mean as to steal Captain Sammy's boat!"

Tommy paid no attention to the appeal. He had come out that morning all equipped for his piratical work, and he proceeded to business at once.

He took from his pocket the symbol of his new calling—the horrible black flag, which had been made from pieces of his mother's dress. The material, which was about one yard long and half as wide, had originally been black, but was now a sort of dingy green. In the centre was what had probably been intended for a skull and cross-bones made of white cloth, but which really looked like an unskillfully made jack-o'-lantern with the face chalked.

This terrible symbol of death Master Tucker tied to one of the oars, and planted it firmly in the bow of the boat, where it hung as innocently as ever it did on Mrs. Tucker's back.

Then seating himself in the stern-sheets with the tiller-ropes in his hands, the newly fledged pirate gave the order for his crew to pull at the oars, and the piratical craft slowly left the island, while Bobby stood on the beach in a state of alarm not easily described.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

FELIX MENDELSSOHN-BARTHOLDY,

BY MRS. LUCY C. LILLIE.

ABOUT the year 1820 Ferdinand Hiller, a musician in Berlin, used to watch with interest the games played by certain clever little fellows, led by a particularly handsome lad of ten years. This boy, whose name was Felix Mendelssohn Bartholdy,* was quaintly dressed, and had the air of distinction which was natural to the Mendelssohn family. He entered into every game with such spirit and delight that Hiller was amazed to learn that he was a musical genius, whose compositions and performances were already known to an intimate circle of friends.

Mendelssohn's father was a banker living in the Leipzigerstrasse, Berlin, and Felix, his eldest son, was born in 1811. He had one brother and two sisters, and never was a family circle more thoroughly happy and harmonious. Music was highly esteemed in the household, but it was a disappointment when Felix decided upon a musical career. However, the parents were wise enough to see that their son possessed real genius, and so they set to work to give him the best possible education.

Felix composed, as I have said, while he was still romping with little playfellows in the Berlin streets, and once a week his father allowed him to assemble certain young musicians and lead them through some orchestral work. One of his most enthusiastic friends has given a charming picture of these "practices"—the group of earnest performers, the boy conductor, still wearing his childish costume, with its round jacket and deep collar, standing on a raised platform, baton in hand, solemnly and perfectly directing the players.

Felix's sister Fanny was his special favorite and companion. She was a brilliant musician, and composed readily, although with less genius than Felix. Several of the "Songs without Words" were written by her. Never was there the slightest jealousy or misunderstanding between the two. When Felix composed anything he could scarcely wait to show it to his dear "Fance," as he used to call her. Everything the two liked they had to share with each other, yet the two younger ones, Paul and Rebecca, were not shut out. It was a charming quartette, and no wonder that the friends of the Mendelssohns used to fear the young people would be spoiled by knowing only the happy, prosperous side of life.

Felix made a famous journey in 1821. With Zelter, his old master, he went to Weimar, where he passed a fortnight in the house of the poet Goethe. It was certainly a memorable occasion, and Felix, although only eleven years of age, wrote the nicest little letters to his parents and sister describing his experiences. From the first of these I quote:

"He [Goethe] does not look like a man of seventy-three; rather of fifty. After dinner Fräulein Ulrike, Frau von Goethe's sister, asked him for a kiss, and I followed her example. Every morning I have a kiss from the author of Faust and Werther, and every afternoon two kisses from father and friend Goethe. Think of that! In the afternoon I played to Goethe for about two hours, partly fugues of Bach and partly improvisations. In the evening they arranged a whist table, and Professor Zelter, who took a hand, said, 'Whist means that you are to hold your tongue.'"

The attention that he received during this youthful visit does not seem to have touched Felix's sweet nature with anything like affectation or vanity. All his life he was simple, genial, and too thoroughly a genius to care for praise in any way that would have done him harm. He wrote the overture to the Midsummer Night's Dream, and many other now famous works, before he was twenty, and soon after began to dream about his greatest work—the oratorio Elijah.

* Bartholdy was a family name which the elder Mendelssohn adopted, but, except in print, it was rarely used.

Fanny Mendelssohn's marriage did not remove her from the charmed family circle. Just back of her father's house was a beautiful villa known as the Garden House, and here she and her husband, the artist Hensel, took up their abode. Here she organized the celebrated Matinées of music, at which the flower of Berlin musical and aristocratic society was present, and where the noblest compositions were performed week after week.

Felix's English journeys which he made from time to time were full of pleasures both social and musical. With his dear friends, the Moscheleses, he staid constantly, and in the house many pictures and other reminders of those happy busy days when Felix and Moscheles worked together still remain. Moscheles had a fund of delightful humor, and he and Felix seemed just fitted to draw out that which was most entertaining in each other.

and Moscheles undertook the guidance of the Leipsic Conservatoire, Felix's house became a new social and artistic circle, and Hiller has given a graphic description of it.

There was a large dining-room, with a sitting-room and bedrooms opening from it. To the left was Felix's study, a water-color drawing of which now hangs in Madame Moscheles' London home. Here were his piano, desk, and some favorite pictures, and the small portable easel or writing stand, now also in Madame Moscheles' possession, which he constructed himself, and on which he composed most of the Elijah.

One evening a friend found Mendelssohn seated, buried in thought, before his Bible. He looked up with one of those sudden gleams which used to transfigure his whole face. "Listen," he said, and then in a voice full of agitation he read that part of the First Book of Kings beginning, "And, behold, the Lord passed by." It had inspired him for the Elijah.

Those few short years in Leipsic must have afforded delightful memories for the friends who flocked to Felix's house. Not only was there constantly good music, but on birthdays and other festive occasions the Moscheleses and Mendelssohns would improvise most delightful entertainments, into which the great artists entered with child-like enthusiasm. On one of these occasions, in which Joachim, the celebrated violinist, took a part, Moscheles writes that "Mendelssohn was sitting on a large straw arm-chair, which creaked under his weight as he rocked to and fro, and the room echoed with his peals of laughter."

Felix was at Frankfort when news was brought him of his sister Fanny's sudden death. She had been playing at one of her Matinées—her fingers suddenly dropped from the keys—she was carried into an anteroom, and soon breathed her last. From that time Felix's spirits drooped. Not only did he mourn his sister's loss, but her early death seemed to be prophetic of his own.

On the 9th of October, 1847, he composed his last work, "The Night Song." That same day he came to see the Moscheleses, walking slowly through their garden, and then going out with his friends for a stroll, during which he talked of Cécile and her coming birthday. From this he went to the home of an intimate friend—Frau Frege. There he attempted some music, but was forced to give it up. He went home, and a little while after his wife found him pale and cold upon the sofa. The next day the symptoms of brain trouble began, and on November 4, 1847, he expired, at the age of thirty-eight years.

It has been given to few human beings to pass a life so unclouded by care or sadness, so full of love and sympathy and the joys of success, as Felix Mendelssohn's. In the thirty-eight years of his life he included more work and more simple joy than many who live beyond the allotted threescore years and ten, and it is a relief to turn from sad lives such as Mozart's, or Weber's, or even Beethoven's, to one like his. Everything sweet—everything that was tinged with the sadness which comes over any artistic spirit you can find in his "Songs without Words"; everything grand and sublime in his oratorios of Elijah and St. Paul. When he lay dead his earliest intimate friend, Edward Devrient, tells us that he seemed to be buried in flowers, for to his bier his friends brought everything that was rare and fragrant in that November season. He looked, Devrient said, once more as he had looked when a boy. Devrient, who had been his tenderest companion, stood touching his brow for the last time, and of that moment he writes: "The span of time in my remembrance inclosed the whole of happy youth in one perfect indelible thought."

FELIX MENDELSSOHN-BARTHOLDY.

Sometimes, after hard work, Mendelssohn would come into Madame Moscheles' drawing-room, tired and worn. Then that ever-ready friend knew just what should be done. She would insist upon his lying down in a darkened room, where he would often sleep for hours. These long sleeps were his salvation, for there was in his family a disposition to sudden brain prostration.

It was Mendelssohn's habit to compose rapidly, and then to correct and re-correct some of his best phrases, until sometimes Moscheles would have to insist upon his friend's leaving his MSS. further untouched. But Mendelssohn was never satisfied; he would yield grumblingly, and declare he never could write just what he wanted. But to what genius is any work perfect?

Mendelssohn's wife, Cécile, was beautiful, amiable, and sympathetic, and she proved a devoted companion to him and a most careful mother. When Mendelssohn

A NIGHT IN A SUGAR CAMP.

BY ADA C. STODDARD.

OUR eyes looked eagerly at Nate as he came bursting through the kitchen door.

"Hi, boys, don't ye want to go into Uncle Zeb Haskin's sugar camp 'long o' me?"

It was on a Friday morning. The Tyler twins, Will and Win, were in their mother's kitchen eating a luncheon, because they had gone out coasting on the crust very early, and had not returned in season to breakfast with the family. Both looked toward the door at the same minute, exclaiming, with great delight,

"Oh, Nate! of course we do, if mother'll let us."

"I know she will," cried Win, excitedly, and he proceeded to empty the contents of the cream-jug into the coffee-pot. "There! now see what I've done. Come right in, Nate; we'll be ready in a jiffy."

Nate complied, grinning broadly. He was a long, lank youth, very awkward, and very good natured, and the Tyler boys were his especial favorites.

"I lay out to stop overnight," said he. "Uncle Zeb is a-goin' to sugar off."

That was the signal for another outburst of enthusiasm, which continued until the boys had finished their luncheon. They had only recently removed from the city, and their ears and eyes were open wide to the new and delightful country sights and sounds.

"Isn't it jolly?"

"How do you sugar off?"

"I never had any real maple sugar—only the store kind, in little scalloped cakes, thin as a wafer."

"And sanded to boot."

"Will used to think they grew on maple-trees, like apples," said Win, with a sly glance at his brother.

Nate laughed. "Sho, now, he didn't! Ho! ho! ho! ho!"

"As if apples grew on maple-trees!" retorted Will, with a great deal of scorn. "Anyhow, I—"

"He's afraid of sheep, too—of our old Billy," said Win, teasingly.

But Nate, fearing a storm, prudently interposed. "The crust's a-thawin', boys," said he; "an' you'd best ask your mother 'bout goin'."

Mrs. Tyler said, "Yes, if Nate would look out for them"—a suggestion which the boys secretly resented; for, weren't they nearly as large as Nate, and within two or three years of being as old? But they were too much delighted at the prospect before them to remain long under a cloud, and, after all, the fact that Nate was born and brought up in the country ought to count for something.

So they set off, Nate with Win and Will, who carried a huge well-filled lunch basket between them; and they went blithely across the fields and over the river and through the pine woods, to Uncle Zebulun Haskin's sugar orchard. The sugar season, that delightful time of frosty nights and crusty mornings and sunny melting days, was drawing to a close. At the same time winter had not lost his power as yet, and a thick shower of snow-flakes was coming down as the boys reached the camp.

Uncle Zeb made his sugar in a very old-fashioned way. Here was no neat sugar-house with its arches of brick and patent evaporators; instead, the boys saw a great iron kettle swinging over a blazing fire in the open air, and directly alongside a little hut, built of the odds and ends of any convenient material. The trees for some distance around were tapped, and the sap collected in huge iron kettles, which were brought to the camp on a sled drawn by Uncle Zeb's stout team of horses, Jerry and Dick.

The old man made his young visitors heartily welcome.

"I'm right down glad to see ye," said he, shaking hands all around. "Now make yerselves to hum, in the shanty and out on 't."

There was no need that Uncle Zeb should tell them to do so, since who ever knew three wide-awake boys that would fail to make themselves at home under such happy circumstances? Still it showed a hospitable intention, and put them at once at their ease.

They enjoyed themselves thoroughly exploring the camp and helping Uncle Zeb as he placed log after log on the great blazing fire. The odor of the syrup bubbling in the big kettle was very appetizing, and not many moments had passed before the boys had made for themselves ladles of wood, which they dipped into the syrup, trying it from time to time on some snow to see if it were boiled enough for candy.

It required a great deal of trying, and by the time it was quite done the boys had already eaten all they could. But they helped Uncle Zebulun lift the kettle from the fire, and then stood around to watch him stir the sweet mass until it began to grow thick and grainy, much like lumpy pudding; and then they helped him again to dip it out into birch-bark boxes pinned together at the corners with little bits of wood. It was great sport for Win and Will; but Nate, who had watched the operation many times before, thought it a very trivial affair indeed, and would much rather have been playing at snow-balling, or firing at a mark with Uncle Zeb's old musket, that was standing in a corner of the hut—a sport which the boys practiced at pleasure during the afternoon.

It was while they were sitting around the fire eating their evening meal, and drinking maple sap from birch-bark dippers, that Uncle Zeb said, quite as a matter of course, "I guess I'll take a run out to the store, boys; I'm all out o' tobaccaker."

Will and Win looked at each other: somehow the prospect of remaining all night there in the woods was not so pleasing as it had seemed to them in the morning. The air had grown very chilly with the going down of the sun, and the great trees looked lonesome and ghost-like, holding their skeleton arms against the pale yellow sky. Dusk was closing around them, and the woods were full of shadows.

BRINGING THE SYRUP TO CAMP.

"I—I don't believe but what we'd better go too," said Will, clearing his throat with an effort.

"Bless ye," said Uncle Zeb, "you couldn't git there. I've got to snow-shoe it. I'll be back consider'ble airly in the mornin'."

There was nothing more to be said. The three boys watched the old man fasten the unwieldy snow-shoes upon his feet, and they strained their eyes in the direction he had taken long after he had disappeared among the trees. Over the Tyler boys at least there crept a feeling of utter loneliness, and they were conscious of a queer uncomfortable swelling in their throats. Even Nate, who was fourteen years old, shivered a little, it had become so very cool.

"Say we go in and light up," he suggested. "Uncle Zeb's got some candles."

So into the little hut they went, and having found a candle in a candlestick made of a potato, they lighted it and sat down and looked at each other. The stillness was almost painful. Away off in the woods an owl hooted mournfully, and once, when some bits of icy snow rattled down the roof, the boys started, and each one of them looked behind him.

"I'm a goin' to load up the musket," said Nate. "Some kind of a wild critter might come prowlin' round in the night; no knowin'."

They all felt very solemn when this preparation for defense was completed, and the musket, well loaded with powder and ball, placed again in its corner; and each of them went more than once to the little window in the front of the cabin and looked out. The snow had stopped falling long ago, and the moon had come up above the tops of the trees, so that the scene without was flooded with the silvery light, and made the interior seem all the more dismal by comparison. The candle flickered in the air which drew through a broken window-pane, and altogether the boys felt very, very cheerless and alone.

"Hadn't we best turn in," asked Nate, after a little, "so as to be up early—before Uncle Zeb gets here?"

His companions readily agreed to this proposition, and presently the three slipped into Uncle Zeb's bunk. It was not at all a downy couch—only a little shake-down of boughs spread with one or two blankets; but the boys were very tired, and the spicy fragrance of the cedar was very soothing.

Will could not tell how long he had slept, when he awoke with a sudden start and a feeling of fright which seemed to have come from his dreams.

For an instant he could not remember where he was, everything looked so strange and out of place to him. Then he heard a sound which seemed to have mingled in his dreams—a steady solid crunch on the crusted snow outside, as of some heavy body moving slowly along. Will's first thought was that it was morning, and that Uncle Zeb had come. Then he waited a moment, and felt sure it could not be so.

The moon shone broadly in through the window, making the cabin almost as light as day. Will lifted his head and listened a very long time, as it seemed to him, before he tried to wake Nate, who was sleeping so soundly that a whisper close in his ear, accompanied by a good shake, failed to arouse him. Finding that this was so, Will said to himself that it would be a pity to disturb him or his brother at least until he had made some effort on his own account to discover the cause for his alarm. He knew if he should hoax them in his fear, they would laugh at him unmercifully in the morning, and no boy cares to be laughed at. So he stepped cautiously out of the bunk and up to the window to reconnoitre. The moon was descending the western sky, and by its light Will saw, standing beside the kettle in which Uncle Zeb had sugared off, a great black unwieldy creature, with a stubby tail, short ears, and a snub nose.

It was a bear.

He was eating the crumbly bits of sugar from the sides of the kettle; and even while Will stood gazing out at him motionless with terror and delight he put his nose in the air and lumbered a step or two backward, as if scenting danger.

There was no time for thought. Will—though afterward he wondered how he had the courage to do it, trembling with fear and excitement as he was—snatched the old musket, pointed it out through the broken window-pane, and fired. Almost at the instant of the discharge there was a hoarse growl from the bear, as he turned and went plunging away through the frozen snow, while a loud cry of dismay came from the two boys in the bunk.

It was certainly a time of great excitement; and when Will had told his story, which he did with a great many breathless interruptions, the three boys went in a body to the window, keeping tight hold of each other all the while.

But everything was silent out-of-doors, and finally they sat down together to wait for daylight, Nate first reloading the musket that had done such good service. They said they would not shut their eyes again, but such tired eyes could not be trusted, and before a half-hour had passed they had stretched themselves upon their bed of boughs and were fast asleep.

They were still asleep when Uncle Zeb came in the morning, early, as he had promised, and it was his cheery voice at the door that awakened them. You may imagine what a welcome they gave him, and with what breathless eagerness the story of the night was poured into his ears.

"Now do stop an' git yer breath," urged the old man, though he himself was visibly excited. "'Twouldn't be a mite surprisin' if there were a bar round. He's ben here once afore, quite a spell ago. Le's go 'n' take a look."

He went out, followed closely by the boys, and, in the soft half-light that precedes the dawn, together they scanned the tracks around the big kettle. There were spots of blood on the snow.

"You teched him, anyhow," said Uncle Zeb to Will, whose heart was almost standing still, "an—an—why, boy," he cried, excitedly, "ye've killed the critter! Look 'er there!"

It was quite true. Scarcely half a dozen rods away lay the huge black motionless bulk.

"Had—hadn't we better take the gun, sir?" asked Will, as Uncle Zeb stepped briskly forward. "Is—is—maybe he isn't quite dead."

"Dead's a door nail," declared Uncle Zeb presently, amid a storm of excited exclamations. "'Twas the critter's ugliness as kerried him off. Pretty well done for a twelve-year-old! Pretty—well—done!"

But Will with many blushes protested against receiving so much praise. "I didn't mean to, you know," said he. "I didn't think I'd kill him. I don't know what made me shoot; but somehow I couldn't help it."

"I won't say maple sugar on a tree again, old chap," laughed Win, "nor anything about sheep. But I just wish I'd ben the one to wake up."

"You better not," said Nate. "Hooray for hooray, and hooray for Will!"

And the woods echoed.

THE MAGNETIC NEEDLE.

THE magnetic needle is one of the most sensitive and delicate of instruments. It quivers like the aspen leaf at the approach of any object that repels or attracts it. It shakes with every tremor of the earth or sea. It is seldom at rest; almost as if alive, it wanders around its limited circle. It seems to have its likes and dislikes, its feelings and its impulses. Sometimes a magnetic storm sweeps over it and drives it from its course. Sometimes it seems roused to a wild excitement by some opposing influence. But soon again rest comes, and the delicate, feeble needle points forever to the north.

Upon its firmness and unchangeable nature rest the most important human affairs. It guides the steamers that cross the Atlantic, and brings them safely to their harbor. Without this feeble instrument the Alaska would never venture to rush over the ocean in cloud, mist, or night, or the Serria reach her destined aim. It leads the great host of immigrants safely to the land of plenty; it carries back the crops of America to feed the people of Europe. Without it Columbus could never have found the New World, and centuries might have passed before the two hemispheres were united. Its delicate guidance leads the explorer through tropical forests and over the polar ice.

No one can tell when the magnetic needle first came in use. It was once thought that it was invented at Anafifi, a famous sea-port of Italy, about the year 1302, but it was known in Europe long before. A French poet, Guyot, about 1150, sang of the wonderful needle that always pointed to the north star when the sea was dark and gloomy. It was known in Sweden in 1250. It seems to have come first from Holland. But the Chinese assert that they used the mariner's compass before the tenth century, and it may have been brought to Europe from that singularly inventive people.

The Western races took up the invention, and have made it the foundation of a new science. They have built upon the magnetic needle the science of electro-magnetism. Magnetism not only guides great steamers over the seas and explorers by land; its delicate vibrations are made to carry knowledge around the world, and enable nations to converse with each other, however far apart. The system of electric telegraphs depends upon the peculiar properties of the magnet. The strange, mysterious power that was first unfolded in some Eastern city by the shores of the Pacific has been turned to new uses. It lights our streets, conveys messages, writes, and may one day drive the rail-car and conduct most of the operations of labor. The steam engine has found a rival.

The needle does not always point to the pole. Even Columbus discovered and was alarmed by its variations. It varies; it changes. And careful observers in all parts of the earth have studied its peculiarities, and endeavored to account for them. But in vain; no one can explain the mystery of the needle. Scientific men have offered probable theories; careful observers have noted its changes in different latitudes and places. It is still everywhere the same delicate, restless, variable thing that seems often half alive. But with all its variations it is yet sufficiently true to afford a safe guidance. It returns from every vibration to point again to the north. It is the symbol of constancy in all its changes.

TED AND THE CHICKEN-POX.

WHEN Ted was told by the family doctor that he had the "chicken-pox," and couldn't go to the party given in honor of Dick Swinton's little sister's eighth birthday, where there was going to be a magic lantern, and ices for supper in the shape of all sorts of funny little birds and beasts and fishes, and German mottoes with full suits of uniform and all manner of other things inside, made up into little bundles, he was just as unhappy as he could be.

"I hate the chicken-pox," said Ted.

Just at this moment Aunt Lucy came in.

"Why, Ted?"

In about half a minute Ted, big boy though he was, found himself in Aunt Lucy's lap.

"But, Ted," finished up Aunt Lucy, after having allowed that it was just "too awfully awful, and those other fellows getting all the things, and me home here, don't you know?"—"when I was six years old I had the chicken-pox, and I had a perfectly splendid time."

"Aw, no-o-o-ah," said Ted.

"But I did."

Then Aunt Lucy smoothed Ted's hair, which was just one-quarter of an inch long, buttoned up his jacket, fished the end of his collar from somewhere down his neck, and began:

"It was one Sunday after dinner, and the first I knew of it was hearing my mother say she wanted a fire made in the Red Room, for Lucy had chicken-pox, and must be kept away from the other children.

"So I went to the Red Room, where everything was as comfortable as possible, and where, for about a week, I had a perfectly delightful time.

"For one thing I had my best doll to play with the whole time, and her bed right near mine, and then my mother staid with me nearly all day, and I had the copy of Moore's poems off the parlor table whenever I wanted it, and my sister read aloud 'Lalla Rookh.' That is a beautiful story, told in poetry, about a Princess who went on a long journey on camel-back. Altogether I liked having the chicken-pox. My brother and sister used to come and shout through the key-hole, and I'd shout back. They were very anxious to know if I would get marks on my face, and they would say, 'Are you pock-marked?' and I would scream back, 'Not yet.' I think we were all rather disappointed that I came out of the Red Room no worse than I went in.

"Then I knew a little boy who lived opposite. His name was Towsey. His grandfather had fought in the Revolution, and Towsey had his epaulets and his sword and cap. Well, to amuse me, Towsey would come to the window first with the epaulets on, then with the cap, then with the sword, which he would brandish about, making believe he was fighting. I would clap my hands at whichever I liked best. Then I would show him my doll, first dressed one way, then another, and Towsey would only laugh, because he was a boy, and I suppose he didn't like dolls. One day he painted his face like an Indian, and came and danced before the window, and I danced back. I wonder what any one would have thought passing through Thirty-fourth Street to see the two windows.

"When I got better, Towsey sent me a candy basket with a dove in it. I regret to say my little sister and I resolved not to eat the basket; but we each used to go and take a little kind of lick of it once in a while, until one day we found that it had begun to disappear. I am sure you and May wouldn't do that if you had chicken-pox ever so!

"On Sunday I spent the day at such a funny old house. The little boy of the family was about your age, and just think! his grandfathers have lived two hundred years in that same house. It has a great big hall, and a big staircase, and rooms with deep fire-places and wainscoted walls. And the drawing-room furniture came from the court of Louis XIV. Do you know about him, Ted? The house was an old colonial manor—your governess will tell you what that means. After dinner the little boy read aloud from an interesting story-book, which we all found very pleasant."

KITH AND KIN AND KISSES.

All this time Ted had been listening with his eyes and mouth wide open.

"Now, Aunt Lu, I don't think that was so much fun. I'd a great deal rather have gone to Dick Swinton's; and just think! those ices, and they say that in the mottoes there's just the most wonderful things, and you pull 'em, and they go snap! and, o—o—oh! oh! oh!"

Just at this moment Aunt Mary came in.

"Why, Ted!"

Before he knew it he was in Aunt Mary's lap.

"Just let me tell you what a time I've been having among the shops. You know the windows are all full of pretty things for Easter. There are beautiful picture cards, flowers arranged in all kinds of lovely ways, and eggs of all sizes daintily colored and ornamented with beautiful designs for people to exchange as gifts on the great day that is so near.

"I felt so sorry for two poor little children who came to these windows just to look, for they knew they couldn't buy any presents. I began to wonder what they would choose. Two years ago I had such fun at Easter. I captured two poor little children in London on Easter-ve, and gave them a good dinner. While they were eating

I asked them what they would like best to buy for Easter. Now could you believe that they were too ignorant to know why we celebrate this wonderful day, or what happened to make us regard it as one of the most sacred days of all the year?

"I told them the marvellous story, and then I took them out to buy something, so that they might remember that Easter and what I had told them of the wonders of the Resurrection, when the Saviour of the world arose from the dead.

"What do you suppose the little girl wanted to buy? 'A pair of kid gloves.' Only think! when she had scarcely any clothes!

"We went into a shop and bought the gloves and a nice shawl, and the boy bought woollen gloves and a muffler. After this I noticed she looked very sad, and I asked her what was the matter, and she said because 'mother hasn't anything.' So I asked her what her mother would like best, and she said her mother had consumption, and would like something warm; so we bought a knitted wool jacket with long sleeves.

"You never in all your life saw such happy children. Just think! they had never been told about Easter, and every year had seen the stores full of things, and happy-looking children going here and there in carriages with warm clothing on to make their purchases. A kind gentleman I knew sent the mother and children a nice dinner, and I am sure they enjoyed it very much."

Just at this moment Ted's mamma came in. "How's my boy?"

"Oh, dear, dear!" wept Ted. "I ain't anyhow. Aunt Lucy and Aunt Mary have been here talking to me: I think it's what papa calls 'diverting my mind.' But I want to go to the party, and I don't like the chicken-pox, and I never, never, never will."

Now I might preach all you little folk a sermon on this text, and tell you that Ted ought to have been more patient, and grateful for what Aunt Lucy and Aunt Mary had done to "divert his mind" from the troubles of chicken-pox. But I am not going to do so. I have only told you about Ted because some of you may have the chicken-pox somewhere, and there's nothing like good company when things are uncomfortable. Just say to yourself:

"There, that other fellow has got it too! It's got to be put up with; there's no doing anything about it, and we must just stand it the best we can."

'HARDLY WORTH DARNING.'—FROM A PAINTING BY J. G. BROWN, N. A.

MARCH.

BY SUSAN HARTLEY SWETT.

THE loud winds play their trumpets gay;

The days march to their ring;

And here's the bridge across the ridge

That leads to happy spring.

Over they go beneath its arch,

A merry troop, for this is March.

Come, green grass, lift above the drift

Your fringes to the air;

Come, silver boot, come, rosy foot,

And leave your gay prints there;

Come, bluebirds, and come, glad new leaves,

To flutter round the homestead eaves.

Through meadows damp, with your bright lamp,

Oh, yellow cowslips, haste;

Come, south wind warm, with one light arm

Around the willow's waist,

And call and call the violets dear,

For morning's here, and spring is near.

Come, silver streams, the winter's dreams

Break with your ringing feet;

Wake, rivers gay, and flit away;

Come, rains, with fingers sweet,

And hang new tassels on the larch;

Come, all glad things, for this is March.

THE NEWSPAPER CLUB.

BY THE SECRETARY.

I WILL state at once that the Newspaper Club is not, as one might perhaps be led to think from its name, an association of editors. The President, it is true, is an editor, and as for that, so is the Secretary; but as the latter's publication is nothing but a modest little amateur paper, his editorship is far from important. The club selected their name for the excellent reason that at the time they could decide on no other.

From the beginning it was only intended as a temporary one, but somehow the name has grown familiar to the members, and now after a year's use there is not any positive sign that we shall adopt another. However, it describes, I think, the club's object about as well as anything else, which object is, as our constitution states, "by study of the newspapers and magazines to gain an acquaintance with the prominent events of the day, and to acquire a facility in imparting information about the same."

The club itself grew out of our President's Sunday-school class, comprising ten boys, whose ages range from thirteen to sixteen, and who, I regret to say, could not succeed in keeping the discussion of the current topics interesting to boys entirely out of the lesson. Our teacher accordingly proposed that the class should band itself together into a club, which should meet on every other Saturday evening, and there discuss as much as we liked the subjects which we would persist in bringing into the Sunday-school.

We boys thought this a good idea, and on the 11th of February, 1882, seven of us met at our teacher's house for the purpose of organizing a club. The first thing "in order" was to elect a President, which we did by unanimously choosing our teacher, after which the others complimented the writer by electing him to the position of Secretary and Treasurer. Then a committee was appointed to prepare a constitution, which at the following meeting was reported and adopted. For the information of any who may want to get up a similar club it may be worth while to give briefly the main points of our constitution here.

Name and Object.—(Already given.)

Membership.—Members to consist of class No. — in W— Sunday-school at the time of the adoption of the constitution, and any others proposed by the Executive Committee, and elected by a majority of the members present. Number limited to fifteen.

Dues.—Five cents each meeting.

Officers.—President and Secretary, the latter to act as Treasurer. Elected for four months.

Committees.—Executive Committee, appointed by the President, consisting of two members—President also a member ex-officio—to which all questions affecting the club are referred.

Meetings.—Every alternate Saturday evening at 7.30 P.M., unless otherwise ordered.

Library.—Under the care of the Executive Committee, to be provided by donations of members and purchase of books out of the funds of the club. Any member keeping a book out over three meetings liable to a fine of five cents per week.

It will be seen from this that the machinery of the club is very simple. The officers are as few as possible, and not so important that any one need covet their position. We have already had three elections without any change being made, and begin to feel that we are illustrating the theory of civil service reform, which we are just commencing to understand.

The fortnightly place of meeting of the club is the front basement of our President's house, in one corner of which stands a not unimportant feature of our association—the club library. This is made up, as the constitution already quoted states, of books contributed by the members, and also those which our President generously adds; and each member is at liberty to take a book at any meeting, providing he returns it within a reasonable time. Frequently the club has the pleasure of entertaining at the meetings visitors, friends of the President and of the members, and not many weeks ago we welcomed a gentleman whose name is very familiar in the columns of YOUNG PEOPLE—the author of "Reg.," and of many other equally interesting stories that have appeared in these pages. He had with him, when he called, the manuscript of a story which has not yet appeared in print, and which he was so kind as to read to us and submit to our criticism.

Perhaps it will not be out of place to describe or at least give an idea of the proceedings of one meeting. The members assemble in the "club-room," where seats are provided around the cloth-covered dining table. When a "quorum" is present the President raps with his ivory gavel (which, by-the-way, was a present from the members last Christmas), and order being secured, the Secretary calls the roll, after which he reads the minutes of the last meeting, which, as is usually the case with minutes, are not remarkable for their variety or interest. The club then proceeds at once to the business of the evening. Probably a debate will come first, generally on some historical subject, and after that has been hotly but good-naturedly contested a reading—often one of Jimmy Brown's much-admired articles—follows.

At the previous meeting one of the members has been appointed to give what we term the "topics"; that is, the most important events which have occurred during the two previous weeks. These are now presented, and discussed in an easy, unconstrained way—an exercise which, I feel sure, gives each one of us a very satisfactory idea of current history. One of our more intellectual members then reads an original essay on some popular topic in which we are all deeply interested, presumably on account of his originality; or perhaps our President reads us one of his stories previous to its publication.

By this time the clock points to the hour that denotes bed-time, and when the books are selected from the library, a "motion to adjourn is in order." The club steal cautiously upstairs, don their coats and hats, and depart with the satisfactory conviction that the Newspaper Club is a "good thing," and bound to prosper.

One thing I should like to add, for the benefit of any who may have become interested enough in this account of the Newspaper Club to wish to get one up of a similar character: Be sure and get some one older than yourselves to help you with the organization, or else I am afraid it will lack the vitality which the Newspaper Club seems to possess.

NOTE BY THE PRESIDENT.—It is hardly necessary to add anything to the Secretary's account, unless it may be to speak of a small bulletin or programme which is usually prepared by him for each meeting. This programme gives the usual order of exercises, as they have already been described by the Secretary. Of these exercises the "topics" are not the least important feature. It is this feature, indeed, which gives the club its name and its motive. Besides the one person appointed to present the topics, each member is expected to come prepared with the news of the fortnight, so that what the first omits the others can supply. If any readers of YOUNG PEOPLE are anxious to get up a Newspaper Club, the President of this one will be glad to send them any aid in his power, though the Secretary's full and clear account seems to furnish all the details that are necessary.

"WILD DOLLY."

BY JULIA K. HILDRETH.

ONE of the loveliest spots in the world is a nook by the old saw-mill on the Asluetot River. Grand old trees interlace their branches overhead, and the rocks are covered with a soft carpet of moss and flowers. One side of the mill is built against an enormous rock that rises out of the water to within a few feet of the roof.

The back of the mill on which the wheel is placed is covered with a wonderful vine, as old as the mill itself; this vine clings tightly to the worn gray stones above the wheel, and is kept fresh and green by the spray. It completely covers the upper part of the wall, concealing with a curtain of leaves and tendrils a small window under the eaves.

One sunny morning Dolly Wild and her brother Will came down to the old mill and peeped into the open door. The great saw was in motion, filling the building with a queer humming sound as if a colony of gigantic bees had taken up their abode in the place.

The sawyer turned as their shadows fell across the floor, and said, with a smile, "Well, Dolly, where are you going this morning?"

"To fish behind the mill," replied Dolly.

"Ever catch any?" inquired the man.

"No, sir," answered Dolly, scraping up the sawdust with the toe of her shoe, "but Will does sometimes."

"That's the way, is it?" said the sawyer, looking at Will, and laughing. Then turning to Dolly, he inquired, "Was that you walking on the plank over the race the other day?"

"Yes, sir," answered Dolly. "But how did you know? I did not think you could see the plank from this side of the mill."

"There," said the sawyer, pointing up to the small window under the roof, through which long tendrils of the vine had grown and were stretching out toward the beams—"I was up there trying to catch a white owl. The vine's full of the pesky things. Now see here, Dolly, that plank is an awful dangerous place; it's right over the race, and if you should slip in when the mill's running, nothing short of a miracle could save you from being crushed up against the wheel. It's full a quarter of a mile around over the bridge, and a body might scream till they were black in the face before I heard them, unless they stood right in the door. So don't you try it again. I shouldn't like to think of my wheel crunching your little bones to flinders."

"Well," answered Dolly, "I won't go there again if you feel like that; but I never fall."

"Neither does she," put in Will. "She can climb and run and jump ten times better than I can."

"There's a last time to most things, remember that," answered the sawyer, "and don't let her go there again." Then he turned and resumed his work.

"Good-by," cried the children, and started off pell-mell down the road and over the bridge to their favorite haunt, Dolly skipping and jumping from one slippery stone to another as though she had wings, and Will following more slowly with his basket and rod. The sawyer's words had made him a little thoughtful, and as he watched his sister's careless movements he called out,

"Dolly, do take care! I don't wonder the fellows call you 'Wild Dolly.'"

"Do they?" said Dolly, stopping and looking around. "Then I think they're very mean. I never hurt them, I am sure."

"Oh, they only do it for fun, so don't be mad. But I wish you would take care, and look where you are going. You'll fall."

"Take care of yourself," answered Dolly; "I am sure you need it more than I do."

"How cross you are to-day!" replied Will. "What's the matter, Dolly?"

"Nothing," said Dolly; "only I don't want everybody saying, 'Take care,' calling me 'Wild Dolly,' and all that."

"Very well," responded Will, soberly; "only I don't want you to hurt yourself."

"All right," said Dolly, smiling; "I'm not angry."

By this time they had reached the spot which they had chosen for a fishing place. It was on the same bank of the river with the mill, and a few yards above it. Above, a great beech tree spread its arms far out over the stream, and beneath, a flat rock arose out of the water, making a most excellent spot for fishing.

At this point the river, rushing by perhaps for hundreds of years, had worn a little circular basin or bay in the hard rocks. Here the water was very deep and still close inshore. You could see down into the green depths for many feet, and when the sun shone directly upon it, you might now and then catch a glimpse of a trout turning his bright sides hither and thither. Will said it was a sort of "resting-place" for the fish before they took the plunge through the race.

Twenty feet from the shore, however, the river shot by like an arrow; a branch or log floating upon it would fairly seem to fly. A little beyond the bay the whole current was compressed into a great wooden trough or gutter, called the "race." This gutter delivered the immense power of the stream directly upon the paddles, or buckets, of the wheel, causing it to fly around in a continuous cloud of foam with a noise like thunder.

Just where the water poured out of the race upon the wheel there was a strong frame-work of plank which ran across the race, close to the surface of the swiftly running water, and very near the wheel. This frame-work was for the purpose of giving strength to the gutter, and to prevent the water from bursting it to pieces. Over this plank Dolly had often walked without the slightest fear, though it was always wet and slippery, and a single misstep must have surely dashed her to pieces upon the wheel. The sawyer had forbidden her to cross it again, and though she looked at it longingly as she wandered up and down the banks while Will was arranging his lines, she did not mean to disobey.

At the other end of the race—that is to say, farthest from the wheel and nearest the fishing rock—was another frame-work of different character. It was called the "gate," and was used for the purpose of shutting the water out of the race, and turning it another way. Of course, when the gate was shut, no water could get into the race; what was already in it would run out, and the wheel would stop.

This gate was simply a square of thick plank, bolted together, of the exact size of the race trough, so that when down it would exactly close the end of it. It was arranged to run up and down in grooves made in two great posts standing upright on each side of the race. When the mill was in motion the gate was hauled to the top of the posts by means of a rope running over a pulley, and tied fast. When the sawyer wished to stop his wheel, all he had to do was to untie his rope; the gate would drop into his rod. In his eagerness his foot slipped upon the wet rock, and the next instant he fell forward upon his face into the water. Before he could make one effort to save himself he was caught in the eddy, and whirled round and round like a cork.

Dolly gave a piercing scream as she saw his mishap. She stood panting on the bank an instant as her brother was drawn more and more swiftly toward the centre of the stream; then she flew down the bank, and upon the plank next the wheel.

"They told me not to cross it," she thought, "but I must. If Will is drowned, I don't care whether I fall in or not."

Will's basket had fallen in with him, and, being lighter than he, had been drawn into the current first, and was swept down toward her like a rocket. It passed beneath her feet, struck the wheel, and was dashed high in the air. She nearly fainted as she thought that this was what must happen to Will.

Not two minutes after his fall Will's body came driving down the race toward her. She uttered another cry, and crouched down, holding on to the plank with one hand and extending the other toward him. The brave girl never thought that, even if she could catch her brother, the force of his motion would be nearly certain to drag her in with him.

On he came, striking now one side of the race and then the other, until the trough of its own weight, and the water would be shut off from the wheel.

"WILL'S BODY CAME DRIVING DOWN THE RACE."

After a while Dolly went back to where Will was fishing. He seemed to have very poor luck, for not a nibble had yet rewarded his patience. Dolly sat down beside him, and began to cut up her bread into squares with her knife.

"You'd better eat your bread," said Will, contemptuously; "the fish won't touch it."

"I'm sure they would like it better than those nasty flies and bugs," said Dolly; "I know I would."

"But you're not a trout, are you?" asked Will. "How do you know what fish like?"

"Well, they don't like your bugs, that's plain," returned Dolly. "You haven't had a bite for half an hour."

"That's because I've got an old grasshopper on my hook," said Will, "all bones and no taste in him. Here, Dolly, just watch my line, will you? I'm going to hunt up a cricket, a large fat one, and then you'll see."

Will laid his rod upon the rock, and began hunting along the bank for his cricket. Dolly was sure her bread would have been better bait, and she would have liked to have drawn up the line and put a morsel of it upon the hook. But she knew Will would be angry, so she sat watching the float bobbing upon the water, until all of a sudden it gave a great jerk, and sank out of sight.

"Will! Will!" cried Dolly, excitedly, "you've got a bite. Quick! quick! he's running away with the rod!"

Will ran down the bank, and sprang forward to seize he shot directly toward her. As he was passing, she succeeded in catching him by the hair with one hand, while she clung to the frame-work with the other. Of course her strength was not sufficient to have held him up for a moment. But the tug she gave him directed his course toward the side of the race, and the very instant he was about to be flung upon the wheel, his arm caught in the frame-work upon which Dolly stood, and he was wedged fast. The water tugged and jerked at him, but now its power only fastened him firmer in the frame-work. His jacket was torn off, his hat was gone, his upturned face was cut and bleeding, and his eyes were closed.

Dolly clasped her hands and looked round for help. She sprang from the plank and ran toward the mill. The sawyer and his man were near the front of the mill on an upper floor. She screamed to them, but the saw was going, and they never heard her. She thought of climbing the high bank, and running around to the front to alarm them. But would there be time? Any moment Will might be torn loose, and then help would be too late.

As she ran wildly along the bank her foot struck the rope which held the gate in place. She stopped and looked up at it. She knew that if the gate were closed Will could be saved, because no more water could get into the race, and the wheel must stop.

She caught hold of the rope and tried her strength upon it. She could not stir the gate; it took the strength of the sawyer and his man to raise or lower the heavy planks, and what could the strength of one poor, half-fainting little creature do with such a weight? If she could untie the knot which held the rope, the gate would drop of its own accord. She tore at the knot until her fingers bled, but it would not be untied.

She arose and looked around again. Will was still hanging in the frame-work. Perhaps there would be time to climb the hill and warn the sawyer. She started at the top of her speed, but suddenly turned aside with a cry of joy, and sprang toward the flat rock where they had been fishing. The knife with which she had been cutting up her bread still lay there; its gleam had caught her eye. It was very sharp, and she thought she might cut the rope with it.

She seized it and ran back to the gate. Stooping down she pressed the blade against the tightly strained rope with all her might. There was a sharp snapping sound, then the rope parted with a dull report, and the gate splashed heavily into the water.

The knot of the parting rope had struck Dolly a violent blow, and her cheek was cut open to the bone. But she crawled to the edge of the race and looked over. The gate was in place, and the water was rapidly lowering; already the wheel had stopped. Will was saved!

The sudden stoppage of his saw had astonished the sawyer, and Dolly saw him thrust his head out of an upper window.

"You vixen!" he cried, "what have you been doing?"

"Saving Will," said Dolly, faintly. "He fell into the race, and I cut the rope and let the gate fall. Oh, come down and help him out, please!"

What with her cut and her fright Dolly was so weak that she could not move, but lay upon the edge of the race, while the sawyer and his man drew Will out of his dangerous position. He was yet insensible, and his arm was broken, but he was alive and in no danger of dying.

"Safe, Dolly!" cried the sawyer, as he came up carrying Will. "Jump up and run ahead."

Dolly rose and tried to do as he told her, but she was so weak and sick that she staggered and fell down again.

"Why, the poor darling is hurt too!" cried the sawyer to his man. "Lift her up, Jim, and carry her into the mill. Cheer up! that's a brave girl; we'll have you safe home in a jiffy."

"I don't mind," said

Dolly, with a faint smile. "It don't hurt much. I am so glad Will is safe I don't feel anything."

The two children were carried into the mill. The sawyer then harnessed his horse to the mill wagon, and, making a soft bed of sawdust in the bottom of it, laid Dolly and Will upon it and carried them home.

Will was sick for many weeks, but Dolly was out in a day or two. The sawyer told everybody what had happened, and Dolly was very much astonished by what people said of her. The village paper had a long account of the accident, in which it spoke of Dolly as a "heroine" and a "brave little woman." Dolly could not understand why so simple a matter as doing your very utmost to save the life of one you love should be thought so wonderful.

Will never forgot what his sister had done for him, and years afterward was fond of telling the story of the old mill, and of asserting that there never was another such girl as his sister Dolly.

HARPER & BROTHERS,

FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.

KITE time and top time and hoop time and skipping rope time! What fun you are having, to be sure, when

Cheerily O

The March winds blow,

And we say good-bye to storms and snow!

PORT JERVIS, NEW YORK.

I live in Orange County, on the Delaware River. If the boys and girls will look on their maps they will see very near my home a spot where the Delaware joins. It is called Carpenter's Point, and sometimes Tri-States Rock. If here, you could place one foot in New Jersey, and one in New York, and a hand in the water of the river which is the line of the State of Pennsylvania.

My grandmother lives in Milford, seven miles away, and my little dog Fritz lives with her. He was frightened at my coming, and when I came and chattered to him, he wiggles all over his body and shows his teeth when he sees me, as if he were laughing.

I go to the Mountain House School; it is called so because a very steep hill is just behind it. It is four stories high—I mean the Mountain House, not the hill—and we can step out on the ground from three of the floors. There are oak and chestnut trees all around it, the little squirrels race all over the roof, and bad boys go up the mountain-side sometimes and throw stones on the roof. We can look down on the canal, the railroad, and two rivers—the Neversink and Delaware.

G. W. V.

Was I no older than I suppose you are, Master Gus, when I climbed the very mountain of which you speak with a merry party of friends, one summer day. But I think the school was not there at that time. It must be pleasant to have the squirrels for such friendly little neighbors.

GRAND ISLE, VERMONT.

I have written to the Post-office Box before, but my letters have not been printed. I do so, as Jimmy Brown says, "If at first you don't succeed, cry, cry again." I wash dishes for mamma, and like it very much. I think Hope would be a good name for Harry W.'s little baby sister. My papa gave me a new Waterbury watch this morning. I have had lots of fun sliding on the ice. Mamma puts meat in the tree and crumbs out the birds. I like to see the birds, and sometimes there are four kinds of birds there at once—the chickadee, sparrow, woodpecker, and sapsucker.

GRACE P. M.

BROOKLYN, NEW YORK.

I am a little girl eleven years old, and I made a patchwork quilt with 1764 pieces two inches square in it, and when it was done my father gave me five dollars for it. I have three bound volumes of YOUNG PEOPLE, and I like them very much. I have a little sister, and she is very cunning, and can repeat pieces and sing songs as well as if she were six years old. There is a picture of a little girl in YOUNG PEOPLE who looks just like her. The name of the picture is "Where did you come from?"

MAMIE L. B.

Both Grace and Mamie must accept the Post-mistress's very best wishes. Grace has shown good sense and perseverance in writing more than once to the Post-office Box, and I like her for watching the birds, and telling me the different kinds that have had their breakfast at her door on chilly mornings. Little Mamie, the darling, deserves great praise for her patience in making that quilt with its 1764 pieces. The present her father gave her was earned very honorably. Now she must make a crazy quilt. In a crazy quilt the pieces are taken just as they come, of all shapes and sizes, and if of silk and velvet, they are all the prettier. If any reader is making one, she may write and describe it to her other girls.

BROCKVILLE, CANADA.

I am a little girl ten years old. I live in Brockville, on the bank of the river St. Lawrence. I have one brother and one sister. I have a dog named Carlo and a cat, which I love very much. I have been sick, and have not been good to school yet. Papa has a boat, in which we go out in summer, and we have great fun building sand castles. I can row very well. Papa used to let me go out in the boat alone. I enjoy HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE very much. I will send you my receipt for ginger-sauce.

One cup of molasses, one cup of melted butter, one cup of sugar, two tea-spoonfuls of ginger, one tea-spoonful of cinnamon, one tea-spoonful of soda, and three table-spoonfuls of water.

KATIE M'CL.

Now for our boys.

PHILADELPHIA, PENNSYLVANIA.

I was thirteen years old on Washington's Birthday. I have two sisters; one is named Mary, and the other Nan. Mary is ten years old, and she helps with the house-work. Nan goes to school, and she is learning very fast. She was six years old the 1st of March. I work in a bond broker's office on Third Street, and when I am at leisure I play checkers; I also play dominoes. The books I like best are Lives of the Presidents and Robinson. I am going to sea next year as a cabin-boy.

JACK C.

My advice to you, Jack, is not to go. What would Mary and Nan do without you?

JERSEY CITY, NEW JERSEY.

Will you kindly inform me in the Post-office Box whether, in the game of hare and hounds, in the start of ten minutes which the hare receives must he throw the scent (paper) when he starts, or not until the ten minutes have elapsed?

F. C. W.

The hare is supposed to throw the scent from the time he starts, but it is sufficient to begin as soon as he is out of sight of the hounds.

DAYTON, NEW YORK.

I am twelve years old. I attend school regularly. I have a good many chores to do out of school hours. I take the entire care of a cow and twenty hens, and I take care of two coal and two wood sledges. I like to see the boys bring in the coal and wood, and in the morning I build two wood fires. Evenings I play games—dominoes, go-bang, and others. The grand prize game, and checkers. Now even I read in a book called The Kangaroo-Doctors. I am very fond of reading. My favorite authors is J. T. Crowbridge. Of his books I have the "Jack Hazard Series" and "The Silver Medal, Bound in Honor, and His Own

Master. Of Jules Verne's books I have read The Mysterious Island, Twenty Thousand Leagues Under the Sea, and Around the World in Eighty Days. The name of the other books are The History of England, by Charles Dickens. Lost in the Jungle, by Paul Du Chaillu. Drifting Round the World, God Crusoe, Six Steps to Honor, and others. My favorite motto is, "Do the best you can where you are."

Ask the boys and girls for me how they would write an article to the hardware merchant for two of the articles of other books and get for me three dollars, and two brothers, all younger than I am. I had a little brother called Ward, who died three years ago with diphtheria. I hope you will print my letter.

NOELMAN T.

It is a real pleasure to have so straightforward and wholly a letter to print. Your life is a busy and wholesome one, full of work and play very well mixed, and your books are good books for a boy's library. And your motto, it is a splendid one. The boys may answer your funny question.

JERFERTON CITY, MISSOURI.

In No. 173 you say that you would like to hear from the boys, and so I take this opportunity to write to you. I was in an office all day from 7 A. M. to 6 P. M., and like work very well. My motto is the same as Davy Crockett's was, viz., "Be sure you are right, then go ahead." I don't invest in games any more, as I have more at the disposal age of seventeen and a half years. My favorite amusement is stamp and coin collecting. I have already about 1500 varieties of stamps and 2000 of coins. I like to read the newspapers, the daily papers and stamp and coin papers, and have also read many books. My favorite author is Mark Twain.

There is a great deal of excitement here today. We have the State penitentiary at this place, and have convicts in it from all over the State, and they murdered to-day, and set the penitentiary on fire, and burned it all to the ground. But the warden called out the citizens, and gave them arms and ammunition, and had them mount guard until they got the fire under control.

H. L. G.

SHANAWAHT, OHIO.

I am a boy who will be ten years old next Tuesday. I have no pets at present. I had a nice squirrel, but it died; its name was "Cute Tommy." Don't you think that was a funny name? I have a dog named "Cute," and a cat named "Edwin"; he is seven years old. My papa has taken YOUNG PEOPLE for us since Christmas. My dear mamma often reads to us.

I like to play a great deal next door to us. She entertains us in many ways. She plays on the piano, and helps us to find out the puzzles. Don't you think I have a good mamma and auntie? I go to writing school, and like it very much. My auntie writes this for me. I am fifteen years old. What do you think of her writing?

A. N. D. (per Z.)

You may tell your auntie that her writing pleased me much, though I would like to see your own.

LA PORTE, INDIANA.

I live near a church in La Porte. When I get home from school at noon I eat my dinner, and then I sit down and read in The Life of President Lincoln. I am very much interested in that book; I have almost finished it now. It is not a very long book, but it tells me a great deal of his history of his life. After I get through reading, I go out and play until school-time. After school in the afternoon I play a little, then I come and make a fire in the cook-stove. After I have eaten my supper I read in HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE if I have a new number. I like the stories of the authors in YOUNG PEOPLE better than any other books, but I intend to get a few books. I like to play checkers too pretty well. I am ten years old, and my playmate is seven. My motto is, "Try till you get what you want."

ALBERT H. B.

Yours is a good motto too, Albert, and I like your letter very much.

CREATION, ONTARIO.

I am a larger boy than you. I have never taken YOUNG PEOPLE before this year, and it comes to me from Toronto. I am eight years old, and I live on the shore of Lake Ontario, and I wish you could see the ice, but I don't like the sliding of the spray against the land. I am very fond of reading, and sincerely wish that the paper were twice its size.

CHARLES P. C.

Not a stranger, but a little friend.

Now for the girls again.

MONTICELLO, ALABAMA.

Mamma has promised for a special privilege to write you a letter for me, but she has never quite time enough, so now my auntie Cecile is writing for me. I am seven years old, and have a little sister Juliet, aged five, and a baby sister Jean; she isn't two. The other day I asked sister Julia if she had an orange in the bureau drawer, & I said I thought that was good enough to go into the papers.

I have been taking Young People for two years, and like it so much. I think Nan is a lovely girl, but I don't think that Laura is a good girl at all, and especially for such a large child. I almost can't remember her.

My teacher, Mrs. C., is a charming woman, and I hope she will soon be able to teach me to write my own letters. Grandmamma has been visiting us for some time, she is the bestest grandmamma in the world, but she did not get well long enough. Papa has just planted out a great many rose-bushes, and when they bloom in the summer I want to send you a box of them. I am not like Rosabelle; I like to work, & fill the salt-cellar every Saturday morning. Down at my grandpa's house there are seventeen Japan tea-trees, and they have thousands of flowers on them; my mother is too long-peace excuse me. With love, your little friend,

MARY MARTIN C.

Not a bit too long, dear child; and you signed your name beautifully.

INDIANAPOLIS, NEW YORK.

I am a little girl thirteen years old, and I have taken Young People ever since it was first published. I like it very much, especially the story of "Nan." I have one pet; it is a little dog, named Chick. I expect to enjoy myself at a Slesha surprise party on Friday. I go to school every day, and I love to study. I have lots of fun doing house-work on Saturdays. I can bake plain cake and pudding, and a great many other things. Write to the Post-office Box; every letter is read by me.

GRACE M.

A Slesha party is something new. I hope it went off nicely.

The next letter is from a little fellow whose penmanship is as plain as type-writing.

NEW LEXINGTON, OHIO.

I do not go to the public school; I spend from three to six hours with papa in the study; I am studying Latin, United States history, and arithmetic. I like Young People very much. I like Anna's Family Robinson, Robinson Crusoe, Anderson's Wonder Stories, Arabian Nights, Esop's Fables, Chatter-box for 1882, Abraham's Voyage, and Traveler's Story of the Happy Bay. Henry Martin is one of the other less noted books. I read HARPER'S Young People and Young Companion; I am very much pleased with Young People. Among my books I like Young Family Robinson best. I spend my evenings reading and playing games. I play a number of games, such as authors, checkers, backgammon, chess, dominos, dominoes, etc. My pleasantest out-door amusement is playing ball and tennis. My regular work is to take care of Barney, our horse, morning, noon, and night. For this papa gave me a watch; he will soon give me a playing-press.

GEORGE H. L. B. (aged 11 years 6 months).

PHILADELPHIA, PENNSYLVANIA.

I saw that no one else had written from this town, so I thought I would write a little letter. I have a Maltese kitten, and if I whistle it will jump up into my lap and snuggl my mouth, and it will stand on its hind feet just like a dog. I got four very pretty valentines yesterday. I have lots of fun on my roller skates in both winter and summer, and I love to ride with my papa on a pair. I guess I can't write any more now. Good-by.

AGNES T.

Every boy must read what J. K. has to tell:

EAST NEW YORK, NEW YORK.

This is the first time I have written to the Post-office Box, but I have read many letters in it, also what you said about that dangerous weapon, the powder-box. I have had some boys who, on the 21 of July a boy told me of a nice little cannon he had seen in a store window for ten cents. I thought that would be a good chance on the Fourth, so I ran home, got my money, and bought the cannon without telling mamma anything about it. How I had to regret it afterward! The next evening I went out to show the cannon, and when I was about to fire, the powder-box was left open, and as I was bending over it a spark flew in, and all the powder exploded in my face. I was badly burned, and had to stay in bed for a week. I hope no other boys will have to go through the same thing, but I have learned a good lesson—never to play with powder or pistols. I am eleven years old.

MORRIS, TEXAS.

As you will perceive by the heading of my letter, I live "away down south in Dixie." I am ten years old and a farmer's daughter, and live in the country five miles from town. I helped my papa and brother pick cotton, but we have finished now, and as there is no school for me to go to, I stay at home and help mamma. I have five sisters and one brother. My oldest sister Emma is thirteen years old, and is at a boarding-school in Waco.

I have no pets except my little sisters. Our baby's name is Tommie. That is a queer name for a girl, but papa says he never expects to have another boy, so he named her. I don't think she have had a severe winter for this latitude—more snow than for many years. We have had some fine skating on the pond.

IRA R.

CONTRACT HIRE, MASSACHUSETTS.

I am a little girl thirteen years old, and I have a big bulldog named Crib; he dislikes me very much; whenever my elder sister plays on the piano Crib cries and growls so that we have to put him out doors. I don't know what will print this letter, as it is the first one I have ever written.

BESSIE D.

THE BOY WARD, ST. MARY'S FREE HOSPITAL, NEW YORK.

Not long ago we read in HARPER'S Young People about a pet turtle that two little children have, and Sister says she thinks they would like to hear about ours. Last summer, when we were down at our Seaside Hospital at Rockaway Beach, Theodore was coming from the Post-office, and he had a little turtle in his pocket, and I took it to the hospital in his pocket. We all became very fond of Pete; that is the name we boys decided to call him—and when we came home, I took Pete to the hospital, and he was in his pocket again, and we have him yet. Our turtle is an iron one, the stands on legs, and Pete stays under it most of the time. About once in three days he gets hungry, and comes out into the dining-room to let us know it. The turtle will drink the water run in the bath-tub, and after we put Pete in we give him a piece of raw meat, so that he can eat and swim and take a drink. Theodore got well, and went away, but he sometimes goes to see Pete and the boys.

Little friends who are interested are informed that a fair for the benefit of Harper's Young People's Lot in St. Mary's Free Hospital for children will be held in Republican Hall, 55 West Thirty-third Street, on Wednesday, March 28, from 12 until 10 p. m. The admission will be ten cents.

AT ST. EDNA.

Annie Davison, St. Edwards, Boone County, Nebraska, has received from correspondents in answer to her exchange, several packages of silk pieces which are not accompanied by name or address. She will be glad if any little friends who have sent articles to her, and have received nothing in return, will, upon seeing this notice, write to her describing what they sent, so that she may send them what they desire.

WALLINGTON, ONTARIO.

I am a little girl, and will be ten years old next Friday. I go to school, I have a lovely pet kitten; her name is Snowdrop; she is perfectly white, every hair of her; she is very fond of playing. I have two brothers and two sisters. I was born in Canada, but when I was two years old I came to Canada with my papa and mamma. I have been to Minneapolis and back seven times, and to New York and Philadelphia three times. We did not visit New York for the first time for a Christmas present; we hope we may take it all ways after this. We are delighted with "Nan."

EMMA M. W.

DEAR POSTMASTRESS.—I wonder if a grandmother may have admission to the charming circle of the readers of the Post-office Box. Having seen that one of your little correspondents is in trouble about her canary, which has strained its voice, I, having had one similarly situated, thought I would tell her to give it rice, and it will recover its voice. Eggs given while the birds are molting will keep them well, so that they will not stop singing. I keep one in the cage all the time.

Perhaps some of your little girls would like to know how to dispose of some of their pretty picture cards. If they take four fans that open, take off the outside handles, join the ends, and stretch the stems outside, unite them in the centre by a ribbon bow, draw a cord through so the fans open, then tack it on the wall, the handles make a very pretty receptacle for the cards. The fans may be all alike, or two alike; either way makes a very bright little beauty spot on the walls. And now grandmother will bid the little boys and girls good-by.

Thank you very much. Grandmothers are always welcome where there are groups of loving children.

PITTSBURGH, PENNSYLVANIA.

I am nine years old, and I have a pocket kite, and I have a box of blocks with which I can make a picture of Gulliver and the little people of Lil-liput. I got a present of a cup and saucer. I have a circus wagon and an express wagon. I go to the Franklin School, and I am in class No. 15. I can do long division. I go to Sabbath-school. I am going to get a new suit, and I have my money.

THE MOUSE AND THE MARROW-BONE.

A mouse peeped out of a marrow-bone
 Which Bruno had been munching;
 The bone was hard and tough and strong,
 The hole within was narrow.
 This opened Bruno's great brown eyes
 In wide and comical surprise;
 He'd gnawed, and gnawed, and gnawed so long
 On that great bone so tough and strong,
 And yet been only lurching,
 While this wee beast crawled in to feast
 Upon the very marrow.

SPIDERS AND THEIR WEBS.

THE apparatus by means of which a spider constructs its web is situated in the hinder part of its body, and consists of five principal vessels, or internal reservoirs, in which the gum-like material is stored, with a number of small ones at their base. From these little flasks or bags of gum tubes proceed to the outside spinnerets, five in number, which may be seen by the naked eye in large spiders, and look like fine tiny knobs surrounded by a circle. On examining them through a strong magnifying-glass they will be seen to be studded with about a thousand minute bristle-like points, each of which is a tube connected with those reservoirs inside the little creature's body; these points are called spinnerules.

In rope-making manufactories it is well known that in ropes of equal thickness that is the stronger which is composed of many small ones twisted together. This principle has been carried out by the all-wise Creator in the spider's web. From each of those five thousand spinnerules issues a thread which is made up of many of quite inconceivable fineness. A great naturalist, who spent much time in studying spiders through a microscope, calculated that it would take four millions of the fine threads spun by a tiny spider no bigger than a grain of sand to be as thick as a hair of his own beard. Spiders have the power of shooting out these gossamer-like threads from their little bodies, and they generally choose to do it in the direction of the wind, so that the thread is carried by it to a distance until it meets with something to which it sticks.

There are people who believe that the spider flies when they see her pass from branch to branch, and even from one high tree to another, but she transports herself in this manner: she places herself upon the end of a branch and there fastens her thread, after which with her two hind-feet she presses out one or more threads, which she leaves to float in the air until they be fixed to some particular place. A naturalist made an experiment in this way: he procured a small branched twig and fixed it upright in an earthen vessel which contained water, and on the twig he placed several gossamer spiders. The water was to prevent them getting away by any other means than by their web. Then he set himself to watch them. If there was a natural current of air, or if he blew softly with his breath, the spiders turned themselves toward the direction whence the wind came, and partly raising themselves, shot out from their spinnerets threads which were carried out in a line by the moving air. Next the spiders were careful to find out whether the ends of these lines had become firmly attached to any object or not by pulling at them with the first pair of legs; when satisfied of this, after tightening them sufficiently, they made them fast to the twig; then they discharged from their spinnerets a little more of the liquid gum, which they applied to the spot where they stood, and, committing themselves to this bridge of their own construction, they passed over in safety, drawing this second line after them to use in case the first gave way.

EASTER.

BY THE REV. GEORGE R. CROOKS, D.D.

FOR nearly two thousand years Christians have observed Easter in memory of the day on which Jesus rose from the grave. The people long ages ago made ready for it by fasting, at first for forty hours, and then for a longer time, until the fast reached the length of forty days.

If we go back fifteen hundred years we will find Constantinople, which is now ruled by the Turk, the capital city of the Christian world. It was a more beautiful city then than now. The people were gay, and fond of the chariot races which were given for their amusement. The chariot-drivers were known by the colors they wore, and there would be among the people a blue-ribbon party and a red-ribbon party, and they would shout for their favorite chariot-drivers as if their lives depended on the winning of the race. On Sundays they went to hear their great preacher, John, called the Golden Mouth, and when he pleased them with his eloquence they clapped their hands and shouted at the top of their voices.

When the long fast began, the bright city underwent a total change. The races were suspended, the street cries were subdued, people moved to and fro in the markets quietly, and the nights were still. But all this was very tiresome to a part of the population, and now and then there would be a chariot race in spite of the rules of the Church. During these fast-days the whole city lived on plain food, so that it was said "there was no difference between the table of the Emperor and the table of a poor man." On the Sunday before Easter the "great week," as it was called, began. This was Palm-Sunday, and was observed in memory of Christ's entry into Jerusalem, when the people gathered about Him, and marched with Him down the slope of Mount Olivet, carrying green branches in their hands.

The Emperors made this a special day for pardoning criminals, so that many prisoners were glad to see Palm-Sunday come. Every day of the "great week" was kept with a solemn service. In one city it was the custom on Good-Friday to worship in the grave-yard beyond the walls, because, they said, Christ was crucified outside the gates of Jerusalem. The next day, Saturday, was the "great Sabbath," so called because on that Sabbath, according to Jewish reckoning, Christ lay in the grave. Thousands were now baptized, and put on white robes as a sign of purity.

When the evening came, Constantinople and all the chief cities of the empire were illuminated. They appeared to be masses of fire; the people went through the streets to their churches carrying lighted torches, and there they watched all night for the dawning of the Resurrection-day. When the light of Easter appeared there was a universal shout of joy.

Besides expressing joy by song and worship in the church, it was customary to seek out and relieve on Easter-day the poor and the needy, as we do now at Christmas. But the week after Easter was a holy week too, and at the end of it, on the Sunday, all who had put on the white robes of baptism laid them off; as this was the last day of their appearance in white, it was called the "White-Sunday." All through the fourteen days beginning with Palm-Sunday the courts were closed, no lawsuits were tried, and the people tried to live in peace with each other.

Such were the means used by the Church in those far-off times to express its thanks for what Christ has done for the world by His death and resurrection. But old customs pass away, and new customs come in; still the world does not forget Easter. In Russia the people greet each other on Easter morning, saying, "The Lord is risen," and answering, "The Lord is risen indeed." In Jerusalem a church has been built over the place where it is supposed Christ was buried. Here the half-barbarous Greeks wait on Easter-eve for the bursting of the holy fire from the hollowed rock. Thousands gather about the spot, and as soon as the fire appears, candles are lit from it, and carried to the churches and their homes. In the rushing from the sepulchre after the flame is kindled many are trampled down, and some at times have been killed. Different from these scenes is the quiet remembrance of Easter in Protestant Europe and America.

In many Protestant churches Easter is the day for receiving new members, especially the young.

Many beautiful hymns which celebrate the glories of Easter have come down to us from the far-off times. One of them has been turned into English thus:

"Tis the day of Resurrection;
Earth, tell it out abroad!
The Passover of Gladness,
The Passover of God!
From death to life eternal,
From earth unto the sky,
Our Christ hath brought us over
With hymns of victory.

"Our hearts be pure from evil,
That we may see aright
The Lord, in rays eternal
Of resurrection light;
And listening to His accents,
May hear so calm and plain
His own All Hail! and hearing,
May raise the victor strain!

"Now let the heavens be joyful!
Let earth her song begin!
Let the round world keep triumph,
And all that is therein:
Invisible and visible,
Their notes let all things blend,
For Christ the Lord is risen,
Our Joy, that hath no end."

More than a thousand years ago this hymn was written, and in those years has been read and sung by Christians. But in all languages which Christians speak Easter hymns have been written. Old monks, whose lives were hid away in cells, and who talked to each other in crabbed Latin, made the Latin musical when they wove its words together into Easter songs. And men who, like Luther, came out of the cells wrote and sang too of the Easter-day. One of Luther's hymns has this verse:

"That was a wondrous war, I trow,
When life and death together fought;
But life has triumphed o'er his foe;
Death is mocked and set at naught;
'Tis e'en as Scripture saith,
Christ through death has conquered death."

This is the meaning of the Easter festival. It is the festival of the East, that is, of the rising Sun, which drives the darkness of night away. Men are only too glad that Christ has conquered death, and their joy keeps alive the remembrance of Easter from age to age.

CHAPTER IV.

ON DOLLAR ISLAND.

WHEN Bobby stood on the beach watching Tommy Tucker and Ikey Jones as they sailed slowly away, he realized that it was no longer possible for him to leave the island until some boat should pass that way, or come directly to their assistance.

Bad as such a position was, Bobby did not look upon it as the worst of his troubles. He had yet to meet Captain Sammy, and explain what he, who had been left in charge, was doing when the pirates stole the boat. This he considered was a trouble by the side of which being obliged to remain on the island any number of days seemed like a pleasure.

Bobby knew that he ought to have resisted with force any attempt to take the boat, and he feared that Captain Sammy, in the absence of the real culprits, might punish him.

He continued to run back and forth on the beach, exploring Tommy to return, but making no attempt to warn the others of the evil that had been wrought, for Captain Sammy's coming was worse than Tommy's going.

But Bobby was not left long in uncertainty as to what the little man might say or do, for while he was still intent on trying to persuade the runaways to return, he heard a most unwelcome and gruff voice call out from the thickest behind him:

"Hello! What's in the wind now? What are you kicking up such a row about?"

For a moment the unhappy boy could make no answer, and while he thus hesitated, the little Captain came into view, and looked in surprise at Bobby, without missing his boat.

"What's the matter with you? What are you yelling so about?" he asked, impatiently.

"They've gone! they've gone!" cried Bobby, pointing to the boat, whose occupants were now making every exertion to get away even from the sound of the one-legged man's voice. Tommy had laid aside his dignity of Captain for the time being, and was tugging away at one of the oars as if he feared pursuit, even though he knew it was impossible.

Captain Sammy gazed out over the water, shading his eyes with his hand, as if it was difficult for him to believe that he was not deceived, and then he looked down at the place where his boat should have been, too much surprised even for words.

Dare and Charley had come up beside him, and they too were at a loss to understand it all.

"It's Tommy Tucker; he's taken the boat," cried Bobby, growing more frightened at this unaccountable silence on the part of the Captain. "They've stolen her, an' gone off to be pirates!"

"Come back here, you rascals!—come back here!" shouted Captain Sammy, as he realized all that had been done; and then, with a quick, angry movement he unfastened his wooden leg, and stood with it in his hand as if uncertain whether or not he should throw it at them. "Come back here, or I'll break every bone in your body!"

The boys in the boat made no reply, but rowed with all their strength, until Tommy, in his eagerness, dipped too deep, "caught a crab," and fell over backward in the bottom of the boat, a confused mass of gorgeous piratical uniform and frightened boy.

Dare and Charley ran down on the beach, as if they thought they might do some good by thus getting nearer to the runaways, while Captain Sammy, without stopping to think that he still held his leg in his hand, attempted to do the same thing.

Of course there could be but one ending to such a start, and when the angry and forgetful little man attempted to step on the leg that was no longer in its accustomed place, he very nearly turned a somersault, and came rolling down on the beach, very much to his own disadvantage, and frightening Bobby almost out of what few senses still remained to him.

Captain Sammy choked and sneezed, because of the sand that had gone down his throat and up into his nose, while Dare and Charley had considerable trouble to keep from laughing at the comical appearance he presented.

This accident did not lessen Captain Sammy's anger, and when at last he succeeded in standing on his one foot, he was in a fine state of rage. He began to realize that he could effect nothing by holding his wooden leg in his hand, while he might work himself further injury if it was not placed where it belonged; so he put it on at once.

"How did it happen? how did they get her?" he demanded, furiously, as he turned to Bobby with a threatening gesture.

Although Bobby was not a brave boy, he could never be accused of lying, even when the truth was as much against him as it was in this case, and with no little hesitation and shame he related the events as they had occurred.

"Why didn't you stop them? Why didn't you chew 'em all up?" demanded Captain Sammy, furiously.

Bobby thought it was absurd in the Captain to talk about his chewing two pirates up, and he replied, almost piteously.

"I couldn't; there were two of them, and they said they'd serve me out if I tried to stop them."

"Serve you out!" sneered Captain Sammy. "Why, they couldn't have done anything if you'd only dared to go up an' knock their heads together."

There was a difference of opinion between Bobby and the Captain as to what Tommy and Ikey could have done; but Bobby thought it would be useless to attempt to make the angry man view the matter in the same light he did, so he remained silent.

"How did they get over here?" asked the little man, after he had relieved his mind somewhat by shaking his fist savagely at the retreating pirates.

Then Bobby told what Tommy had said about coming over in an old boat, and Captain Sammy started around the beach to find her, filled with the hope that she might serve as a means of pursuit. But one glance at the boat, after they had found her, was sufficient to show that nothing could be done with her. She was so old and worm-eaten that it was a wonder she had held together long enough to bring the boys over. The Wise Men of Gotham who went to sea in a bowl had a better craft than she was.

Captain Sammy looked at her in silence for some time, and then he said,

"Well, this is a nice kettle of fish, an' no mistake!"

"How are we going to get home?" asked Dare, thinking of what his mother would suffer if they were not with her by night.

"That's jest it! that's jest it!" cried Captain Sammy, again giving way to his anger. "Oh, how I wish I had hold of them precious villains for a little while! They'd wish they really was pirates. I'll tell you how we're goin' to get home. We're goin' to stay here till somebody comes along an' takes us off, an' we may be here a week, for the matter of that, for nobody would understand any signals we could make from here. It's worse than a regular shipwreck."

For some time the party stood in silent despair, the boys thinking of the fears which would beset Mr. and Mrs. Evans at their absence, and Captain Sammy wondering if sleeping in the open air would not be sure to bring on an attack of his old enemy the rheumatism.

"It won't do any good to set here," said the little man at length, speaking in a more cheerful tone. "We're here for a while anyhow, an' we might as well make the best of it. How are we off for provisions?"

There was no need for any one to reply to the question, for the moment it was asked each one knew that the only things they had taken out of the boat on their arrival were the axes, and the pirates had not only captured a boat, but they had gotten one that was provisioned for several hours at least.

"Well, we shall have to suck our thumbs for a while, at any rate," said the little Captain, as if he had resolved to bear his troubles as cheerfully as possible. "We will build up a fire in the hope that some one in Tampa may see the smoke an' come over here to find out the meaning of it. And since you boys came here for timber for your rafts, the best thing you can do is to begin cutting it. The work will keep you contented, and you won't be wasting your time."

Bobby, who should have done something toward preventing the misfortune that had come upon them, was charged with the work of building the fire signal and keeping it going, while Dare and Charley started about what was really the first work connected with raising the Pearl.

It was then hardly more than ten o'clock, and they had quite a long day before them in which to work, even if they were prisoners on a lonely island.

All hands went to work with a will, and while Dare and Charley were blistering their hands in

The little Captain had had no voice in the selection of the camp, for after he had given the boys all the oysters they wanted for dinner, he seemed to have lost his cheerfulness, and had fallen into a moody silence.

It was after Dare and Charley had decided upon the camping ground that they went to the point of reef on which Captain Sammy was sitting, enveloped in a cloud of tobacco smoke.

"We think we had better camp for the night near the fire, sir," said Dare, "and if you have no objections, we will put up some kind of a shelter."

"It don't make much difference where we lay, my lad," said the little man without looking up. "I'll be sure to have the rheumatiz anyhow, an' it's no odds to me whether it comes when I'm layin' on the ground or settin' here by the water. But I'll show that Tucker boy what a pirate is when I get hold of him."

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

"WHY DIDN'T YOU CHEW 'EM ALL UP?"

their efforts to hew down the largest trees, Captain Sammy busied himself with gathering the tiny oysters that were fastened to the rocks just below the surface of the water.

These little shell-fish were very acceptable to the boys, who had grown hungry the moment they knew their food had been carried away, and thanks to the lunch the little man brought them, they were able to keep at their work all the more closely.

Captain Sammy had a small canteen of water with him when he left the boat, and the contents of this he doled out very sparingly, but in such quantities that they did not really suffer from thirst.

By six o'clock the boys had felled and trimmed off the branches of ten trees, a sufficient number, in Captain Sammy's opinion, to form the heavier portion of the rafts they wanted to build. It was then time to make some arrangements for a place to sleep that night, since it was hardly probable any one would come to their rescue before the next day.

Bobby had kept the signal fire burning all day, and after some consultation it was decided that they should use the level piece of ground just back of it as their camping place.

FOREIGN PARTS.

BY WILLIAM O. STODDARD.

THE big south room in the "wing" of Promethe Centre Academy always had more boys and girls in it than any other room in the building. Some of the others had boys in them, and some had girls, but this was what old Squire Cudworth called "the mixed pickles room." Miss Eccles had made a quiet place of it ever since the first time she rapped on the table with her ruler, but there had never before, during any five minutes, been so little breathing done in that room as there was at the close of school on the first Friday in May.

It took Miss Eccles just five minutes to tell the scholars that to-morrow would be Saturday, and that the new railroad had offered to take the whole Academy, except the building and the desks and benches, on a free excursion to the city, thirty miles north of Promethe Centre. All were to be at the railway station at nine o'clock in the morning, and bring their lunches with them; and every five children could bring along a grown-up person to take care of them; and they would have three hours in the city to see the sights, and they would all get home safe if nothing happened.

Such long breaths as they all drew when she finished her speech! And half the girls waited, after school, to ask questions, but not one boy had a thing to ask till they got out on the green. Then every fellow turned to the nearest other fellow and said, pretty nearly what Ben Gates said to Rube Hollenhouser:

"Isn't it great, though?"

"Guess it is," replied Rube—"only it can't be done."

"I'd like to know why it can't."

"'Cause there's two hundred and fifty that go to the Academy, and all the fellows that have brothers and sisters 'll bring them; and the fellows that don't go to the Academy they'll all come; and there'll be all the grown-up people. Do you s'pose any one railroad can carry such a crowd as that?"

"I don't care, anyhow. Guess we'll be there in time.

A fellow can see a good deal in a city in three hours."

"It isn't the biggest kind of a city."

"It's bigger than Promé Centre."

There could be no dispute as to that, but when the excursion train coughed and whistled up to the platform at the railway station the next morning, there was a large amount of vexation because Rube's prophecy had been looked out for.

There was Miss Eccles at the door, and all the other teachers had been standing by her ever since a little after eight o'clock, and they had been mean enough to point out to the man who gave the tickets around just which ones really went to the Academy. They even shut out three boys and a girl who went there last year, and six of all sorts who said they meant to begin to come in the fall.

It was easy enough to arrange about the older people, for the railway man said there weren't half enough of them to keep such a crowd out of mischief, and old Squire Cudworth and Dolf Zimmerman actually bought and paid for tickets for themselves.

The railroad was very popular that morning with all the boys and girls who managed to get through the station-house and into a car, but there was a bitter feeling against it left behind among some of the most active young people in or about Promé Centre.

"Bun," exclaimed Rube, at fifteen minutes past nine, "did you hear that thing whistle? She's a-going."

"Hold on tight, Rube. She'll jerk when she starts."

"No, she won't. See there, now! She goes off just as easy!"

It was wonderful the ease with which that locomotive walked away up the track, with all those cars behind her, and every car packed full of happiness and a little anxiety. The railway had only reached Promé a few weeks before that, and it was hardly in good running order now, and Squire Cudworth declared:

"This ere's a mighty risky business, but I s'pose they must do something for popplearity and to keep people from stage-riding and going afoot. I ain't in any hurry to-day, and I thought I wouldn't walk this time."

Squire Cudworth made a good deal of fun for the young folks in his car, but the Academy boys and girls were more in awe than ever of Miss Eccles. That daring woman went from end to end of that train while it was in motion. She ventured right on from car to car until she had told them all to sit still and not put their heads out of the windows and have them knocked off.

"Hear that, Rube?" said Bun Gates.

"Guess I did. They wouldn't stop this train, the way it's a-going now, just to run back and pick up a fellow's hat for him."

It was grand fun, though, to look out of the windows and see the trees and houses and fences go by so fast. Bun Gates just had time to point once and say,

"See that cow?—she's just like old Chittenden's new brindle," when Rube was justified in replying,

"Cow!—that's a flock of sheep."

"They're gone too now. Isn't this a great way of travelling? It's awful, though. If you run off the track, there's no telling where you'll go to."

"There wouldn't be anything left of Promé Centre Academy."

"I don't believe it would kill Miss Eccles. She knows all about railroads."

The very excitement and novelty of it kept them all reasonably still, and the conductor said he was proud of them, and so was Miss Eccles, but the other teachers did not make any remarks, and the Academy Principal was in the very front car, with his wife and his mother-in-law, and six of his own children and two of their aunts, and about half of the Board of Trustees. Everybody knew that he had all he could attend to, and so they did not expect any more of him.

"Rube," said Bill Chittenden, just a little before they reached the city, "ain't you tired? I've been trying not to sit down heavy till I can't stand it much longer."

"Have yez, thin?" interrupted Felix McCue. "Wud the railroad be troubled if wan more fly lit on it some-where? Ye'll have to ate more'n ye do now before the weight of ye'll comit wid a railroad."

Bill Chittenden was about the thinnest boy that lived at his end of the village of Promé Centre, but it was cruel of Felix McCue to tell him so in that way. Before he had time to say anything about Felix's fight with the railroad men when they tore down his mother's pig pen the locomotive whistled to let the city know the train had come, and the whole Academy knew at once where it was.

"THEY ARE PULLING THE MULES OUT."

"Bun," said Rube, "we've got three hours. Where are you going, first thing?"

"Going to see the canal. Father told me to. It's right in the middle of the city, and maybe they'll take it away now they're making so many railroads. Mother says I rode on it once with her when I was a little chap, but I don't remember a word of it."

Rube agreed that the canal must be worth seeing, but insisted that he had seen it before, and would know when they came to it. Felix McCue saw them slipping away from the crowd, and he darted after them as a matter of course.

"That's it, b'ys. There's more fun wid three than there is wid three hundred. I'm wid ye."

Felix was a good fellow to have along, and they were a full square down the street before the Academy "procession" could be formed at the city railway station. There was another railroad that ran through the city from east to west, and there might be a dozen for all the boys knew, but they could plainly perceive that the street they were following led right on toward where the houses seemed to be tallest and thickest. The further they went, the more people they met, and Felix McCue remarked, "If they'd lock arms and walk slow, there'd be a procession of 'em."

"That's what our Academy's doing now," said Rube. "They won't see half what we will."

"Boys," exclaimed Bun, "there's a bridge straight ahead. That's where the canal is."

They walked a little faster for a couple of minutes, and there it was, right before them. It was wide enough for three canals, and all the way between two high-arched bridges, but when it came to either of these it narrowed to the width of a common road.

"That's what father called the basin," said Bun. "Look at the boats!"

There were several of them, long, heavy-sided affairs, and no two were alike. There were three at the bank, as if they were unloading, or loading, or taking a rest, but all the others were in motion.

"Takes two horses to pull 'em," said Bun. "Look over yonder."

"That boat's only got one horse."

"Luk at the nixt wan," said Felix. "Thim's mules. Oh, but the ears of thim's worth seeing!"

There were not many mules in use near Prome Centre, and this was an especially interesting pair. The one in front, on the tow-path of the canal, was, as Bun said of him, "very small for his ears," and the mule behind was described by Felix McCue as "the biggest mule that iver had ears put onto him."

He was large, indeed, but his goodness was not in proportion to his size, for at that very moment he was preparing to make a disturbance. His driver had rashly halted him, for some reason, and there was no telling when he would make up his mind to go on again.

"Rube," said Bun, "he's backing."

"It's the way of thim," said Felix. "It's the ounly way yiz can get worruk out of some of thim. Put thim wid their heads to the waggin and they'll back wid yez all day."

However that might be, the big mule was backing now, and there was a tremendous hubbub on the tow-path and on that boat and on another boat a little behind, and a great many people seemed to find the matter worth looking at.

"Bun, he's pointed wrong," shouted Rube. "If he backs three feet more in that direction—"

"He's pulling the little mule right along with him," said Bun.

"He'd pull the canal," said Felix. "There he goes!"

A great shout along the tow-path greeted the perverse success of the big mule, for he not only backed into the canal on his own account, but he drew after him his unlucky companion.

"It's the big splash they made!" exclaimed Felix. "But they can both swim, and they're not backin' now."

The sudden plunge into cold water may have cooled the big mule's temper, but it seemed as if everybody else's temper were lost entirely, and the boat also lost her steerage-way and began to yaw around. Just at that moment a still bigger boat was coming through under the bridge, and the man who was steering it looked at the mules in the water instead of minding his business.

It was all the fault of the big mule, of course, but Felix hardly had time to say,

"B'ys, luk at them!" when the two boats came together with a great thump, and you could hear the crash of something breaking.

"Boys," exclaimed Bun, "I wouldn't have missed it for anything! Would you? Hear that fellow!"

They could hear the man on the deck of the mules' own boat shout to the man on the other deck,

"You've done it now."

"Guess you're stove in."

"Stove? Guess so. We'll be on the bottom in five minutes."

"Hear that?" said Rube. "Isn't he a brave fellow, though? Not a bit scared, and his boat's a-sinking under him. I've read of sailors going down with their ship, but I never saw it done before."

"Where's the rest of the crew?" said Bun. "Guess they haven't any passengers to speak of."

They heard the man on deck say just then, in answer to a question:

"Cargo of salt in barr'ls. Wish they'd salted down them mules 'fore ever they hitched 'em on to haul for me."

It was very bad for the salt, and for the mules, and for that boat, and for the canal.

Down she went, lower and lower, faster and faster, until just as the boys drew a long breath, and Bun whispered, loudly, "Six inches more, and she's under," the boat stopped sinking, and the man on deck shouted,

"Touched bottom! Here we are! Now you just get by us if you can."

"That's the throuble," said Felix. "D'yc see what it's done, b'ys? It's corked up the canal jist at the mouth of the bridge. Niver another boat 'll git by till they pull out this wan."

"They're pulling the mules out down yonder," said Rube. "Come on, boys. We must see something more before we get home."

Whatever else they saw had to be seen quickly, but they were on hand at the railway station when the regular Academy procession marched up the street.

Of course they had to give an account of themselves, but Miss Eccles was in excellent spirits for some reason, and she actually responded to their first somewhat misny reply with "Well, and what did you see that the rest of us did not?"

"Is it what did we see?" exclaimed Felix. "Sure an' we saw a mule commit suicide an' pull another mule into it after him, an' there was a shipwreck on top o' that, an' the canal's turned into salt-water."

It took Rube Hollenouser and Bun Gates all the rest of the time before the train started to make that explanation clear to Miss Eccles and old Squire Cudworth, but all three of the boys had enough to talk about after they got home that evening.

BITS OF ADVICE.

BY AUNT MARJORIE PRECEPT.

ABOUT TEASING.

THE trouble about teasing is that it makes nobody really happy, and it always causes somebody to feel annoyed. I do not know that big brothers are more in the habit of teasing than other people are, but it often happens that my many little nieces run to me and say, "Please, Aunt Marjorie, won't you speak to Willie?" or, "Won't you ask Hugh to let my pussy alone?" And when I look at the grieved faces and quivering lips, although I am a very amiable person indeed, I assure you I want to give Hugh or Will a shaking.

It is very unmanly to tease little sisters. Once in a while, too, it happens that the little sisters grow up and write books, and put the teasing brothers into them, and then the whole world finds out what naughty boys they were. That is what befell the brothers of Madame Michélet, a French lady, who was not very happy as a child. Her brothers worried her cat, and stole her darling doll, and hanged it to a tree. Is it not terrible to think that in these days hundreds and thousands of children know just how badly those boys behaved so long ago?

But I have met teasing girls in my time. I suppose you will think it strange that a grown-up lady should be so silly as to be afraid of caterpillars, and indeed your Aunt Marjorie is very much ashamed to confess so absurd a fear. Still, it is a fact, and can you imagine anything more cruel in a little girl, knowing this, than to put a poor innocent caterpillar on my arm one day? I am sure you would have felt indignant had you been there.

Then, besides being very annoying, it is quite possible that a serious injury may result from what is simply meant as innocent teasing. A boy or girl who is never timid nor nervous may play some trick that will frighten a more delicate and sensitive brother or sister into real illness. It seems dreadful to think of, but cases have been known where poor little children have been frightened into convulsions, and actually to death, by heartless and ignorant people.

Teasing is wrong, because it implies a desire to have fun at another's expense. Perhaps to have pleasure at another's pain would describe it more precisely. No noble boy or girl can enjoy a pleasure which makes a companion uncomfortable. For this reason you should never take part in a practical joke, or in anything which is not fully up to the standard of the Golden Rule. You all know what that is.

THE STORY OF THE EASTER HARE.

From the German.

BY EMILIE MORE.

OLD King Frost was obliged at last to take his departure, for each day the sun grew warmer and staid longer in the sky. So he quickly packed up his snow and ice, and went off to the North Pole.

Scarcely had he gone when Spring, a beautiful boy with bright blue eyes and rosy cheeks, came tripping through the woods, and as he passed along the grass sprang up fresh and green, and the trees burst into buds; the little squirrels peeped out, and seeing him passing, leaped to welcome him.

Sweet Spring rejoiced in all this beauty, and amused himself as he went gayly through the land by touching with his wand the plants and bushes. As he did so great clusters of lovely flowers sprang up on all sides.

But when all the flowers he loved best were growing around him, when the little birds had built their nests, and the humming bees were busily seeking their golden store, Spring seemed sad and lonely; shadows crossed his bright face; he sighed as he said:

"Where are the good folks who have always come to welcome me, and to enjoy the delights I have prepared? Do they not know I am here? can it be they have not heard my herald, the cuckoo, telling of my arrival for days past? Where are they all hidden? Perhaps they are still sitting by the fires in their narrow close chambers, where they have kept warm all the winter, and do not know that King Frost has gone and my reign is begun. I must send a messenger to them to tell them I have come. But whom shall I send? The little birds are all busy finishing their nests or sitting on their eggs, the butterflies are too frail for such a journey; squirrels are not to be depended on—none of these will do. I am puzzled whom to send."

Just then a little hare ran under a hedge near by.

"Stop, here!" cried Spring, joyfully. "I want some one to help me, and I think you will be the very one."

The little hare was at first so timid that he feared to come, but remembering all the sweet food and pleasant things that Spring had brought him, he took courage and came slowly nearer. Sitting modestly down, he asked Spring what he wished him to do.

"Little hare," said Spring, "I want you to run quickly into the villages and towns, and tell the men you will meet, with Spring's best love, that he has arrived, and that they are invited to come into the fields to see and enjoy all the beautiful things he has brought with him."

But the little hare did not move. Instead, he sadly scratched one of his long ears with his little paw, and, sighing, said to Spring:

"Dear sir, spare me this task. You know we hares are a timid race, and the dogs and their friends the men have always been our enemies. It would make you weep were I to tell you the sad end of most of my own family. My father died of a gunshot wound, and my mother was killed by a dog; and if I should go into their dwellings, how could I hope to escape?—some cruel dog might catch me, and his master would give me to the cook for his Sunday's dinner."

But Spring only laughed, and replied:

"Oh, timid little hare, it is not so bad as that. Men only eat hare in autumn and winter; so they will not harm you now, and the dogs, who are truly not much your friends, are now all chained up, and what is still more, to their great displeasure, have muzzles on their noses, so that they could not bite if they would. But, so as to make you quite content, I have an idea. You shall take a present with you, for I know that those who bring presents are always kindly received."

So Spring went round to the little birds and begged from them some of their pretty colored eggs. Some who had only two or three felt they could not spare any, but most of them cheerfully gave at least one. Then Spring went to the side of a pond, and from the osiers on its banks wove a basket, so that the eggs could be carried safely.

"Take these, little hare, and give them to the people you meet, telling them they contain gifts from me. This pretty blue one the robin gave me will make them brave and bold; this larger speckled one from the sweet thrush will make them contented in a lowly home. They all contain some choice gift."

The little hare now started cheerfully on his journey, but when he came in sight of the houses and churches his courage failed him; he dared not go to the big men and women, but crept up to the little children, timidly offered his gifts, and gave his message. How delighted they were with such treasures and such news, and how quickly they ran to their parents to beg them to take them at once to see if it was all true that the little hare had told them!

When they got out into the country they found it all more beautiful than they could have imagined. Some played on the soft grass in the meadows, some sought the hidden flowers in the shady nooks Spring had told them of, and made them into lovely wreaths, and the parents were delighted to see their children so happy.

When at last it was time to return, flower-laden, to their homes, they all wished to thank the little hare, but as soon as he had delivered his message and gifts he had scampered back to his little hole in the hedge, and could not be found. Then they all agreed, in order that his kindness should ever be remembered, that every year at this season they would have little hares made of sugar, and pretty colored eggs, in memory of Spring's little messenger. And this is the reason that all the little children do so to this day.

A SLY OLD RAT.—By PARMENAS MIX.

THREE rats, a trio sleek and keen,
Walked out to take the air,
And note the beauties of a scene
A bright full moon made fair,
When suddenly they spied a prize—
Some hen with little wit
Had laid an egg of goodly size
Where rats might capture it.

Congratulations were exchanged
Between the lucky three
As they, about the treasure ranged,
Scanned it, in ecstasy.
But ah, they had no means at hand
To take the prize away,
And earnestly they planned and planned
Until 'twas nearly day.

At length the eldest proved most wise:
Said he, "Take me in tow,
Upon my back; I'll seize the prize
With all four paws—just so—

While you two, grasping tight my tail,
With your united power
Can drag me home (you can not fail)
Within the next half-hour."

Arrived at last with progress slow,
The two who'd tugged so well
Turned to unload their friend, when, lo!
They found an empty shell,
With anger flashing from their eyes,
They charged their crafty friend
With sucking, while en route, the prize
By puncturing one end.

Then said the culprit, with a sigh,
"Your anger wings my breast;
What's done, my dear companions, I
Did only for the best.
Fearing at times a total wreck,
So much I pitched and rolled,
I moved the cargo from the deck,
And placed it in the hold."

THE ELEPHANT ACT.

but many others quite as curious and wonderful.

When the Great Show is in full working order, and an entertainment is being given at any place, among the other performances of the evening the audience will find announced on the show-bills, "The Great Elephant Act; or, the Clown and Elephant as Two Mischievous Boys." And an extraordinary act it is!

First, the Clown and Elephant enter, and salute the audience, after which they march around the ring, indulging in some very amusing pranks and capers. The Clown then lies down, and the Elephant marches over him. After he has done this, without hurting so much as a hair of his master's head, the great creature rolls himself, or as much of himself as he can, in a tub. Finally he gets up, turns the tub upside down, and dances on it, while the Clown plays the organ.

Fancy an elephant dancing! But he does it, and on the bottom of a tub which is hardly large enough to hold his four great feet at once. It is no wonder that he soon tires of such fun, and wants to try something else. He thinks he will be a musician, and so he pushes his master from the instrument, and grinds out the music for himself, while the Clown dances. This he tires of, too, and his next prank is to play "seesaw." He gets on one end of the plank, while his master mounts the other. Of course his great weight brings his end to the ground, and the poor Clown is tossed up aloft, and comes down on his head.

After all this, such an accomplished Elephant may be supposed to want his supper. A table is brought in, and he begins his meal, with his master sitting opposite. Alas! he is very greedy. He eats up all the food, but otherwise he behaves very well; he takes his wine from a bottle instead of a glass, but he uses his napkin in a very careful and polite way.

SKETCH.

MR CONRAD AND HIS ELEPHANT AS THE TWO MISCHIEVOUS BOYS.

During the meal some one in the audience usually throws a bouquet. The Clown and Elephant both bow in acknowledgment; but while his master is busy taking away the remnants of the meal the Elephant sits carelessly down on the poor flowers. The Clown searches for them, and is quite in despair at their ruined condition.

Finally the Elephant and his master lie down for a nap; but the Elephant, instead of being quiet, roars so loudly that the Clown reproves him severely for "snoring." After a little while they seem to find sleep impossible, and they both march off the scene. As they depart, a shoeking accident happens. The Clown, happening to seize the Elephant's tail, it comes off in his hand, and the poor animal disappears tailless behind the curtain.

THE COURT MUSICIAN;

OR, THE LORD MAYOR'S RIDDLE.

A Play. In Three Acts.

BY ELIOT McCORMICK.

CHARACTERS.

Taddeo Vermicelli	A fiddler.	Second Alderman.
Antonio Macaroni	An organ-grinder.	Monks, afterward Paul.
The Lord Mayor.	Luisa Vermicelli	Tessa Vermicelli
First Alderman.	Luisa Vermicelli	Taddeo's Sisters.
	She Newsboys.

ACT I.

SCENE.—A poorly furnished room. At the right a lounge, on which LUISA lies asleep. TESSA sits by her side, darning a stocking. She advances to front of stage and sings.

Solo: TESSA.

Air: "For Riches and Rank,"

Luisa has just now gone to sleep—
At last I shall have some rest;
From morn till night she's done nothing but weep,
And her temper's been none of the best;
And when she wakes she will weep again;
But what is her grief, or what her pain,
Why she is moaning,
Crying, groaning,
I've asked her time after time in vain.

Whenever I'm not kept here at home
I sing in the streets all day;
The people to hear me gladly come,
Or else to hear Taddeo play.
For Taddeo goes wherever I go—
He carries along his fiddle and bow;
And while I'm winning
Pennies by singing,
He plays the melody obligo.

Enter TADDEO (L.), a fiddle in his hand.

TESSA (holding up her hand warningly). Don't make a noise, Tad; Luisa has just fallen asleep; she has been crying all day.

TADDEO (coming near, and looking down into LUISA'S face). Have you found out what she cries for?

TESSA. She will not tell. Whenever I ask her she cries the harder. Have you made much money to-day, Taddeo?

TADDEO (gloomily). I made eighty cents, but Antonio Macaroni stole it.

TESSA (anxiously). Ah, Taddeo! he will steal your fiddle some day. Did you make the money by playing?

TADDEO (turning away). Yes.

TESSA (following him). Playing your fiddle?

TADDEO. No; playing marbles.

TESSA (decidedly). Then you deserved to lose it. But have you nothing left?

TADDEO (emptying his pockets of marbles, bits of string, a knife, a few sharp, and various other articles). No; nothing at all.

TESSA. Then we shall have no dinner to-morrow. Indeed, there is nothing for supper to-night. (Luisa wakes up and begins to cry.) See! Luisa is awake. We must amuse her. Take your fiddle, Taddeo; and I will sing another verse of my song. (Taddeo plays an accompaniment, while LUISA sobs.)

Solo: TESSA (air as before).

When summer appears we frequent the boats
That ply to and from the sea-shore;
I warble my songs, and Tad plays his notes,
Till the passengers clamor "No more!"
But we know that so long as they're out to sea
They can't get away from Tad and me;
So whatever they're saying,
We keep on playing
Till they pay us to stop and let them be.

[While TESSA is singing the LORD MAYOR and ALDERMEN, carrying lighted lanterns, enter stealthily at left. They survey the scene unperceived, and hold up their hands in wonder. At the close of the song they come forward. TESSA and TADDEO retreat in surprise. LUISA continues to weep.]

LORD MAYOR (turning to children). Pray tell me what all this is about. Why should one person be fiddling, another singing, and another crying? In all my experience I think I never saw so extraordinary a sight. Did you? (Turning to the ALDERMEN.)

FIRST ALDERMAN. I We never did.

SECOND ALDERMAN. I We never did.

LORD MAYOR. And probably you never will.

FIRST ALDERMAN. I We never will.

SECOND ALDERMAN. I We never will.

[The children shrink back. LUISA has stopped crying, and looks in astonishment toward the intruders.]

LORD MAYOR. Come, do not be afraid. We will not hurt you. TESSA (timidly). We were trying to amuse Luisa, sir.

LORD MAYOR. Does Luisa always cry when she is amused?

TESSA (taking LUISA'S hand). She cries all the time, sir. She has cried ever since our little brother Paul was lost. And I am afraid we don't know how to amuse her. Do you think a doll would amuse her, sir?

LORD MAYOR. I think it would. (He looks at the ALDERMEN.) ALDERMEN (in concert). We think it would.

TESSA. Well, you see, we could not get her one, at any rate. Taddeo had all his money stolen to-day. (The LORD MAYOR starts back in horror, and the ALDERMEN follow his example.)

LORD MAYOR. What? Stolen! Where are the police?

FIRST ALDERMAN. I What? Stolen! Where are the police?

SECOND ALDERMAN. I What? Stolen! Where are the police?

TESSA. Oh, they're never around when one wants them. It was Antonio Macaroni stole it. (The LORD MAYOR notes the name in his memorandum-book.) And we haven't got anything for supper. (Luisa begins to cry.) Oh dear! there she goes again.

LORD MAYOR. How very unfortunate! (He takes a handful of silver out of his pocket.) I would give you twenty-five cents; but, you see, there is a law against giving charity except through the proper officers. (He rejects for a moment.) Suppose I give you an office instead?

TADDEO (joyfully). Then we wouldn't have to do any work!

LORD MAYOR. Quite right. But you are Italians.

TESSA (cagerly). Yes, sir; but we have been six weeks in this country.

LORD MAYOR. Oh, that will do. A month is long enough. (To the ALDERMEN.) Is any office vacant?

FIRST ALDERMAN. The office of Musician to the Court, your honor.

SECOND ALDERMAN. But it can not be filled without an examination.

LORD MAYOR. Must the candidates be examined in music?

FIRST ALDERMAN. Oh no, your honor. If they understand algebra, that will do.

TESSA (mournfully). But we don't understand algebra.

SECOND ALDERMAN. Does she understand puzzles?

TESSA (inquiringly). Puzzles?

LORD MAYOR. Rebuses, cross words, magic squares, riddles, enigmas, charades, anagrams, double acrostics.

TESSA (doubtfully). We have done them in HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE. (The LORD MAYOR and ALDERMEN nod their heads.)

LORD MAYOR. All right, then. The Examination will be a riddle. Bear your hunger until to-morrow, and all will be well.

FIRST ALDERMAN. I Yes, all will be well.

SECOND ALDERMAN. I Yes, all will be well.

[The sound of boys singing is heard outside.]

Solo and Chorus: NEWSBOYS (invisibly).

Air: "Hearforth, Stephon, east away,"

FIRST NEWSBOY.

We are Arabs of the street,
And our patrons thus entreat:
Buy the Herald, Sun, or Times—
Leave us only your half-dimes.

ALL. Leave us only your half-dimes,
Out of your large generosity.
Here's the very last atrocity
In the Herald, Sun, or Times.

LORD MAYOR. What was that, pray?
 TESSA. Oh, those are the Newsboys. They are on their way to the "Home."

LORD MAYOR (approvingly). Oh yes; a very useful institution. I must call there some night. I make it my business to call on all my people. For, you know—

Song: THE LORD MAYOR.

Air: "When Britain really ruled the Waves."

When good Al-Raschid, termed the Great,
 In Bagdad lived and reigned,
 He used to wander forth by night,
 And—as he had a perfect right—
 To be a poor man foined.
 All kings and caliphs did the same
 When good Al-Raschid won his fame.

And now, though many years have passed
 Since that illustrious time,
 I try to make myself appear,
 By rigging up, as you see here,
 A King or Porte Sublime.
 All kings and caliphs looked the same
 When good Al-Raschid won his fame.

And, thus disguised, we go about
 The town upon the sly,
 From Tompkins Square to Bowling Green
 We wander, lofty and serene,
 The Aldermen and I.
 For kings and caliphs did the same
 When good Al-Raschid won his fame.

We prowl through dark and dirty halls,
 Where not a single ray,
 Except the gas-lamp in the street,
 Lights up the gloom, or shows our feet
 The inviting way.
 But kings and caliphs did the same
 When good Al-Raschid won his fame.

And when we reach an open door
 (As we have done to-night),
 Behind the jamb we safely hide,
 And, peering cautiously inside,
 See many a strange sight.
 Ah! kings and caliphs did the same
 When good Al-Raschid won his fame.

Curtain falls on Act I.

ACT II.

SCENE.—The City Hall Park.

Enter six NEWSBOYS, from opposite sides of the stage. All cry out together.

NEWSBOYS. Extra! Herald! Times! Terrible accident!

Enter (L.) LUISA, in shabby costume. The boys offer her newspapers.

LUISA (loftily). Pray do not make so much noise. Is there anything in the papers about the Examination? (The boys look at one another and hesitate.) Why don't you answer? How stupid!

NEWSBOYS (in concert). What examination?

LUISA. Why, the Examination at the City Hall for a musician. Haven't you heard about it?

NEWSBOYS (in concert). We have not.

LUISA. Well, you'd better look in the papers and see. (They all open their papers at the same time and look eagerly down the columns. Having found it, they thrust their papers eagerly toward LUISA in dumb-show.) Have you got it?

NEWSBOYS (as before). We have.

LUISA. Very well. Read it, then.

NEWSBOYS (reading in concert). "There will be an Examination at the office of the Lord Mayor this afternoon at three o'clock, for the purpose of selecting a Chief Musician to the Court. The office will be given to the one who can answer the following riddle:

"A fiddler played, and a maiden sang,
 While one in grief sat weeping—
 Ah! who shall tell what hidden pang
 That heart held in its keeping?"

LUISA. Will some one cut it out? (Each of the boys immediately hands LUISA a paper. She accepts them all, and bows her thanks.) Ah! that will do. Thank you. Shall you all try for the prize? (They look at one another.)

NEWSBOYS (in concert). We will.

LUISA. Well, I hope you may get it.

NEWSBOYS (in concert). We will do our best.

LUISA (turning aside). Very well. You may go now.
 [Exit NEWSBOYS (L.), singing.]

Solo and Chorus: NEWSBOYS (as before).

FIRST NEWSBOY.

For the prize we mean to try,
 Though we know not how or why
 Riddles should be made the test
 In determining which is best.

CHORUS.

In determining which is best—
 Who sings with the most facility,
 Plays with liveliest agility—
 Riddles never are any test.

LUISA. At last I am alone. I thought I never should get away from Tessa. Let me read his letter: "Dear Luisa,—Meet me in City Hall Park.—Yours, Antonio." What can he want? Ah! he comes! (Turms away, and pretends not to notice his coming.)

Enter MACARONI (R). He carries a hand-organ on his back, and leads a monkey by a string.

MACARONI. Luisa!

LUISA (turning round). Ah! Antonio! (She sees the monkey.) What a beautiful monkey! Is he a new one?

MACARONI (stroking the monkey's head, while the animal gambols around on the floor). Yes. He is a young gorilla. (Proudly.) I am the only organ-grinder in New York who has a gorilla.

LUISA. You are indeed fortunate. But what did you want, Antonio?

MACARONI. Oh, I wanted to show you my gorilla. But before I forget it, can't you get me Taddeo's fiddle some day?

LUISA (shaking her head). I don't believe I can. He carries it with him all the time, and at night he sleeps with it. It's a very valuable fiddle, you know.

MACARONI (contemptuously). Oh, it's an old thing. It isn't worth twenty-five cents. I tell you what I'll do—I'll give you another one, which you can put in its place at night, and Taddeo will never know the difference.

LUISA (vehemently). I don't think I ought to.

MACARONI. Ah, Luisa, you don't know how much I think of you! Just think of it: I am going to give Taddeo a fine new fiddle for an old one! Isn't that a proof of my devotion? See, I will give you this ring besides. (He holds out a finger-ring, which LUISA takes and examines eagerly.)

LUISA. Ah! will you? Then I will do it. You may bring the fiddle to the Examination this afternoon.

MACARONI. What examination?

LUISA. Why, in the Mayor's Office. It is for the place of Chief Musician. Have you not read it? (She hands him a paper, which he reads eagerly, while LUISA holds the gorilla. The animal meanwhile stands on its hind-legs and shows signs of playfulness. LUISA drops the cord and retreats.) Oh, Antonio! I am afraid!

MACARONI (contemptuously). Girls are always afraid. (He returns the paper and takes back the monkey.) You don't expect me to guess any such silly riddle as that?

LUISA (tossing her head). You wouldn't think it was silly if you knew the answer.

MACARONI. Do you know it?

LUISA (mysteriously). Perhaps!

MACARONI (convincedly). Ah! tell me, Luisa. See, if you will tell me I will make Jocko go through his tricks. (He motions to the monkey, who begins to dance clumsily about the floor.)

LUISA (moving away). Ah! No; he is too big.

MACARONI. Well, then, tell me because I ask you.

LUISA. I will tell you—to-morrow.

MACARONI (complaintfully). But that will be too late for the Examination. If you will tell me at once, Luisa, I will let you have the ring now.

LUISA (turning the ring on her finger). Oh! will you? But I am afraid Tessa will be angry.

MACARONI. Do not mind Tessa. Think of the ring.

LUISA (still admiring the ring). Well, I suppose I must. (She is about to speak, when TESSA and TADDEO enter hurriedly from R. TADDEO seizes MACARONI by the collar, while TESSA takes LUISA'S hand. LUISA bursts into tears.)

TADDEO. Thief! Where is the money you stole from me?

MACARONI (examining his purse). I haven't it with me now. But I will give it back to you. It was only in joke, you know.

TADDEO (taking the monkey's cord). Very well, I will keep the monkey as security. (MACARONI resists, but the monkey breaks away from him and jumps up on TADDEO with signs of delight.) You see the monkey recognizes me.

MACARONI. Yes, as a relation.

TADDEO (advancing threateningly). Go! get that money!
 [Exit MACARONI, R.]

TESSA. What is the matter, Luisa dear? What is it that distresses you?

LUISA (sobbing and shaking her head). Oh! I can't tell.

Enter MACARONI, unperceived, at L., and NEWSBOYS at R., also unperceived.

TESSA. But, Luisa, if you will only tell us, we can guess the riddle. We know it all but the "hidden pang," and you are the only one who can tell what that is. (LUISA continues to shake her head and weep. TESSA looks at TADDEO.) We must amuse her, Taddeo.

Song: TESSA and CHORUS.

Air: "With Strepchon for your Foe, no doubt."

We've nearly found the riddle out,
For I'm the one who sings, no doubt,
While Taddeo plays,
And people praise
His fiddle and his bow.

But why Luisa cries all day,
What trouble wears her life away,

And whence the grief
Beyond relief,
We do not surely know.
[During the singing MACARONI and the NEWSBOYS come forward. All join in chorus.]
CHORUS. But why Luisa cries all day,
What trouble wears her life,
Curtain falls on Act II.

ACT III.

SCENE.—The Lord Mayor's Room in the City Hall. At the back of the stage, on a raised platform, is seated the LORD MAYOR, with an ALDERMAN on each side. At the right are the NEWSBOYS, and at the left TADDEO, TESSA, LUISA, and the monkey; and at a short distance from these stands MACARONI.

LORD MAYOR. Are you all ready?

NEWSBOYS. Yes.
TADDEO. Yes.
TESSA. We are.
LUISA. Yes.

MACARONI. LORD MAYOR. The purpose of this examination is to select a person to fill the office of Musician to the Court. The candidates must be able to solve a double-barrelled acrostic, and to tell a jew's-harp from a snare-drum at sight. Can you all do this?

TADDEO. Yes.
NEWSBOYS. We can.
TESSA. Yes.
LUISA. Yes.

MACARONI. LORD MAYOR. Then let us proceed. You must write the answer on the slips of paper. The boy who gets it first may raise his hand. (TESSA raises her hand.) Well?

TESSA. Suppose it's a girl, sir?
LORD MAYOR. She may raise her hand too. (They write rapidly for a moment, when MACARONI'S hand is raised.) Well?

MACARONI. I think I have it, your honor.
LORD MAYOR. Bring it here. (MACARONI takes the paper to the LORD MAYOR, who hands it, unopened, to one of the ALDERMEN. TESSA'S hand is raised.) Well, is yours done too?

TESSA. Please, sir, I am writing for Taddeo. He can not write.

LORD MAYOR (shaking his head). Then that counts him out. Are there any others? (He looks inquiringly at the NEWSBOYS, who are consulting together.)

NEWSBOYS (in concert). Here is ours, your honor. (They all rise at once and take it up to him.)

LORD MAYOR. Now have we got them all? (There is no reply.) Read the first one, Mr. Alderman.

FIRST ALDERMAN (opens MACARONI'S paper and reads):

"A fiddler—his name it was Tad—
Played so exceedingly bad,
That his sister Luisa
Thought he did it to tease her,
And became uncontrollably sad."

LORD MAYOR (shaking his head). That does not tell why a maiden sang. And, besides, the boy is not a bad player. I do not believe that would make his sister cry. Read the second answer, Mr. Alderman.

ALDERMAN (reading TESSA'S paper):
"Our little sister wept the live-long day,
While Tessa sang and Taddeo played his fiddle;
Though why she wept I'm sure I can not say,
And so suppose I have not guessed the riddle."

LORD MAYOR. Very good. But that does not tell us what the pang was. Let us have the next one.

ALDERMAN (reading the NEWSBOYS' paper):
"While Taddeo played and Tessa sang
Luisa sat a-weeping—
We can not tell what was the pang
Her heart held in its keeping."

"LUI SA IS AWAKE: WE MUST AMUSE HER."

LORD MAYOR (puzzled). Dear me! none of them have guessed it. Isn't there anybody here who can tell us what the hidden pang was? Why did Luisa cry? That is what we want to know. (The monkey displays great excitement, while LUISA, rushing forward to the LORD MAYOR'S seat, breaks into sobs.)

LUISA. Oh! I will tell. I didn't dare to tell before—I was afraid Tessa would scold—but I can't keep it any longer. It's because I lost my little brother Paul. Tessa thought he ran off himself. But he didn't. I lost him; and I've felt so dreadfully about it that it made me cry all the time. (As LUISA proceeds the monkey's costume drops off and discloses a little boy. He rushes forward, while all rise up in excitement.)

PAUL (taking LUISA'S hand). Ah, dear sister! I am Paul! I was stolen by a wicked magician, who changed me into a gorilla, and forbade my retaining my natural shape until you should tell how I was lost. Now it is all right; and you need not cry any more.

LORD MAYOR. Ah! This is very satisfactory. The riddle has been guessed, and the little boy has been released from his uncomfortable disguise. But to whom shall we give the office? (He looks at the ALDERMAN, and then at the candidates.)

ALL (except MACARONI). Give it to Paul!

LORD MAYOR. Very well; since you insist upon it I will give it to Paul. But who is the one (pointing to MACARONI) who did not speak?

NEWSBOYS (in concert). Antonio Macaroni.

LORD MAYOR. Macaroni? The name is familiar (consults his memorandum-book). Ah! Macaroni, come up here. (MACARONI comes forward.) You are charged with stealing eighty cents from Taddeo Vermicelli. What have you got to say for yourself?

MACARONI (nervously). It was only in joke, your honor, and I have given him security.

LORD MAYOR. How is that, Taddeo? Have you got security?
TADDEO (doubtfully). I had, your honor; but the security has gone away.

MACARONI. I gave him the gorilla for security.
LORD MAYOR. Ah! you did? Well, the Court decides that there is no gorilla, so you must pay him the eighty cents.

MACARONI (complainingly). Then I want my gorilla back.

LORD MAYOR. But there isn't any gorilla.

TADDEO. Never mind, your honor. It's worth a good deal more than eighty cents to get Paul back. He can keep the money; only I don't want to have anything more to do with him.

LORD MAYOR (approvingly). Very good. You hear, Macaroni? Taddeo generously allows you to keep the money, on condition that you never speak to him or his brother or sisters again. Do you agree to that?

MACARONI (sullenly). Yes, your honor. (Aside.) I've lost the fiddle.

LORD MAYOR (coming forward). Then it is all settled, and everything is satisfactory. The Court has secured a musician. By-the-way, can Paul play or sing?

TESSA (shaking her head). No, sir; Paul has no ear for music at all.

LORD MAYOR (thoughtfully). Could he play a hand-organ?

TESSA. Perhaps he could, sir, with a good deal of practice.

LORD MAYOR. Very well, then, we will get him one, and he can practice three hours every day until he can play the "Sweet

"THE RIDDLE HAS BEEN GUESSED"

By-and-By"; for, you know (the nods to the others and begins to beat time)—

ALL (in chorus):

All kings and caliphs did the same
When good Al-Raschid won his fame.

Curtain falls.

NOTE.—The properties of this little play are very simple, and it may be performed in any parlor or drawing-room. The costumes of the children are supposed to be shabby; though Paul, when the monkey disguise is thrown off, may be better dressed than the others. A little effort will easily manufacture a monkey's-skin out of gray Canton flannel, and it should be so contrived that it can be instantly dropped off. This may easily be done, since the monkey is already on the stage when the curtain rises on the third act, and does not move until the time comes for dropping the garment. It should be attached to a string leading off to the side of the stage, and immediately pulled out of sight. Antonio's hand-organ may be made out of a soap or starch box, by painting it the color of black walnut, tacking a piece of red muslin or cloth to the front, and attaching a wooden handle to the side. If a violin can not be procured, a rough one may be readily made with a cigar box and a few bits of wood and string. It makes no difference whether it can be played on or not. The Lord Mayor's costume is a purple gown, bordered with gold, and slashed with gold on the sleeves. A gold collar or band hangs from each shoulder, where it is fastened by purple ruffles. The Aldermen are attired in scarlet robes with fur trimmings. Of course anything in the way of a showy outside garment will answer the purpose. The airs are all taken from Gilbert and Sullivan's new opera, Totenthat, which can be obtained from any music dealer for one dollar. In arranging the "business" of the stage it would be well for the young performers to have the advice and assistance of some person older than themselves.

I HAVE a word this week for my dear little housekeepers. I lately overheard one of them saying to a friend that she thought it very silly for people to take so much care about food. In her opinion the mind was of far more importance than the body.

I would be very sorry indeed if I supposed that any of my young correspondents were so devoted to eating nice things that they were on the way to dyspepsia or any other troublesome disease. If you eat too many hambos, pea nuts, or dainties, you may pay for the folly by being unable by-and-by to enjoy a plain dinner.

If you were ever on a steamboat you have been interested in watching the engine which keeps it in motion. If there were no fuel put on the fire, however, the engine would stop. That little engine, the stomach, must have its fuel too, or else the brain will not work, and the hands and feet will grow heavy and become useless.

So I hope you all take a good wholesome lunch on to school, and put it up so nicely that it looks tempting when you open the basket or box at noon. And I hope those who go home to dinner have a recess long enough to let them take the meal without fretting lest they may be late for the afternoon session. Do not eat between meals, nor nibble chocolate creams and other confections in the evening. A girl or boy who has been studying hard all the evening will not be hurt by a cracker or a piece of bread and butter at bed-time.

Do you think you can remember all this?

Can any little reader tell me which of the great poets drew this pretty picture of a little girl?

"A basket on her head she bare;
Her brow was smooth and white;
To see a child so very fair
It was a pure delight.

"No fountain from his rocky cave
Ever tripped with foot so free;
She seemed as happy as a wave
That dances on the sea."

Some of you find quotations in prose and verse as school exercises. Some, I hope, learn by heart the pieces you like best. Now whose hand shall first be held up to name this poet, and to tell the name of the poem from which these stanzas are taken?

This little correspondent has seen some wonderful sights, and has a queer raft and some odd passengers to tell us of:

VENON, INDIANA.

I am a boy ten years old. I live near the Ohio River, where there was a great flood. A great deal of property was destroyed by the water. The people from here sent food to the people at Lawrenceburg, who were almost starving. At Madison a corn stalk was seen floating down the river. I saw this in the lower part of the Upper Peninsula, just across the straits from Mackinac Island. This is a very pleasant place in the summer-time, but is very unpleasant in winter, for the snow is very deep, and there is so much cold wind. Papa has several lumber camps seventy-five miles above this place, and my brother and I

VENON COUNTY, MISSOURI.

I am a little girl eleven years old, and I live on one of the broad prairies of Southwest Missouri. We had a queer visitor this winter; it was a little prairie-bird. My uncle brought it in half-frozen one of its wings was injured so that it could not fly. It hopped around, and ate and drank, and seemed to be very happy, when one morning mamma opened the window while sleeping after it had staid with us two weeks, and it flew out, and we never saw it again. My uncle Willie gave me your interesting and instructive paper for my birthday present. I think the story of "Nan" is so nice.

MARY L.

ST. LENOX, MICHIGAN.

I thought I would write my first letter to the Post-office Box. I am a little girl eleven years old. I live in the lower part of the Upper Peninsula, just across the straits from Mackinac Island. This is a very pleasant place in the summer-time, but is very unpleasant in winter, for the snow is very deep, and there is so much cold wind. Papa has several lumber camps seventy-five miles above this place, and my brother and I went up to them during the holidays. I study one of your books called Harper's School Geography. There are four churches here, and the organ in the First Congregational Church every Sunday morning. Good-by. FLOY M.

I am glad to have among my friends a little girl who at eleven can play the organ in a church.

ROCKCASTLE SPRING, KENTUCKY.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS,—I have been taking YOUR PEOPLE since last November, and have fallen so much in love with it and with you that I can scarcely get through my week and don't want to have taken another magazine, and was so afraid I shouldn't like YOUR PEOPLE, but I am delighted with it.

I have been staying all winter at Rockcastle Springs. My papa and uncle own it. It is a beautiful mountain resort. The hotel-vesties between two high mountains, near the brink of a most magnificent and rocky strand, and from 1200 to 1300 and throw pebbles into the water. There are all kinds of game fish in it. I caught a large pike and a white salmon, for which I have received a great deal of praise, as they are both very game and difficult to land. We have a number of row-boats, and I can row splendidly.

I am ten years old, and daily recite English history, that I have geography. My mother, mother, and I have just laid another bird. My father. I have a little brother seven years old; his name is St. Clair. He is in the Second Reader.

I can row on the river beautifully. I have two lovely birds—a German canary named Be-be, and a linnet named Fraud. Be-be is the smartest bird I ever saw. I will peck your finger, kiss you, and if you do not say, "Kiss me," he will peck you. He will take a little slip. When he let him out of his cage he follows us about like a poodle, and will fly on our heads, and play hide-and-seek. Fraud laid thirty-four eggs, and he did not do it.

We have a splendid playfellow—of course it is a dog—whose name is Fern. But she did such a dreadful thing; the other night she got in our bed, and she curled up with me, and I could not bid them. How I did cry! Your little friend,

NAUCERLE C.

I am six years old, and I live a little way out of town. I have seen so many letters from the girls that I thought I would like to tell you about my pets. My elder sister Lil and I have each a lovely pony; mine is white, and hers is black. I have a little dog, and I like him very much. I am just learning, and like it very much, though I am first I was afraid. I hope this letter is not too long, and that I shall see it in the Post-office Box very soon. Lil is writing this for me, as I can not write well.

Where does little Madge live? She must ask Lil to write again and tell me. I like to know where my pets are when I am reading their letters.

CHENEA, MASSACHUSETTS.

I am a little girl nine years old. I go to school every day. My brothers take YOUR PEOPLE, and I like to read it very much. I have a cousin about my age in Kansas on a sheep ranch, and after we read our paper we send it to her. We have at home a little Japanese dog. His name is Jap, and he is very cunning. I have had my picture taken, and Jap was taken with me. He was very much frightened when we took him to the photographer's, and was sick all the next day.

HATTIE T.

Now these boy friends who have been waiting so politely to make their bows may step forward:

FUSHING, MICHIGAN.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS,—In No. 173 you earnestly invited the boys to write to you, so I thought I would. My favorite sport just now is skating, and I think it is very fine sport. I am thirteen years old, and am publishing a paper called Boys and Girls, which occupies nearly all of my time out of school. I send you a copy, which I think is pretty good for a boy of my age. Don't you ever love to read the books and stories written by Trowbridge. I think that a printing-press is a good thing for a boy, for then he is not idling away his time, but is doing something useful and good. My brother takes HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, and we all like to read it very much.

ROBERT M. R.

Your paper is very clever and very neatly printed. I make a quotation which expresses my views precisely. Boys and girls, read it, please—

"It is better to yield a little than quarrel a great deal. The habit of standing up, as people call it, for their little rights is one of the most disagreeable and unindulgent in the world."

BRIDGPORT, CONNECTICUT.

I am eight years old. I have no pets, like other boys, but have a little sister. Her name is Ada; she is the pride of all our hearts. My love,

HOWARD II.

FORT SKEELING, MINNESOTA.

I have been taking YOUR PEOPLE since the beginning of the year, and like it very much, particularly the letters in the Post-office Box. Mamma reads the paper to me every week as soon as it comes. I have seen letters from other posts, but have not written from Alaska nine years ago, will oblige me, dear Postmistress, by putting my little letter in the box, for I am anxious to see it in print. It being the first mamma has written for me to put her. She often writes to my little cousins for me.

I am a little boy six years old, and have for pets a dog, a cat, a pigeon, and some chickens. My dog's name is Rover. He is a very old dog. Papa and mamma came from Alaska nine years ago. I have a puppy then. I have travelled a good deal, we think, for a little boy, and I expect you will think so too when I tell you where I have been. I was born near San Francisco. I have travelled 9000 miles, and lived at many different posts—Presidio, San Francisco, Fort Canby, Wyoming Territory, Fort Warren, Massachusetts, and Fort Snelling, Minnesota.

This has been a very cold winter here—the coldest in many years, so persons say who have lived here all their lives.

W. F. S.

WEST NEWTON, MASSACHUSETTS.

We are a little boy and nine children and ten years old. We study at home with papa. We and our little neighbors have formed a society to protect poor dumb animals. Our only pets are two lame cats and a bird named Tom. I have a pretty story about our horse Verincetorix. Aunt Daisy told us how to spell that word. Verincetorix is very fond of jaguartha, our cat, who climbs up in his bark and goes to sleep. One day a large white dog ran into the stable and tried to seize the cat, but it leaped up on the side of the stall, and Verincetorix wouldn't let the dog get him, and he had to jump.

Our uncle has just come back from China, and brought us many rare things. We would like to exchange. We are writing this all ourselves, and hope it will be published. We are writing a story on her birthday. We are afraid this is too long, but we like to write to the Postmistress.

ROSE and FRANK.

The Postmistress hopes that mamma has not had her birthday yet, but whether she has or not she is a happy mother to have two such darlings. It is a very good idea to protect the poor dumb animals, and I wish more children would form such societies. If you send an exchange, it shall be tucked into the proper place.

GREAT BARRINGTON, MASSACHUSETTS.

I am in a board school, and have fine times here up among the Berkshires. Last week the boys wrote "compos" on Washington, and two of them received prizes in the shape of a just of the great and good man. One of the big fellows will be the school mascot at the next election. We have had beautiful skating, and I made a skate sail, on which I towed some of the boys on a tippie here.

I am in a board school, and have fine times here up among the Berkshires. Last Saturday a school-mate and myself went to see Crosby, the Hermit of the Housatonic. He is a very well-read man, and also a hunter, but he is a very kind people think not quite in his right mind. We boys like him. He showed us his guns, and a cannon which he calls his baby. He catches the squawks and puts them in his house, and has promised to give me one.

In the evenings I practice on the piano, and have a study-hour. Sometimes this routine is pleasantly varied by the boys and girls who come to the moonlight. On our coasting ground there is what is called the second bumper. It is a sort of jumping-off place, where the boys have jumped fifteen feet on papers and on their heads.

We have very little weather which prevents out-door sports, but it has been too stormy to go out, and then we employ ourselves in cutting tracks with the boys. I have a very nice set of boys had to take turns and use them by the hour. My favorite stories are Dobbin, The Quibble, and Among the Ladies. Like William G. Steadard's stories, and wish T. B. Aldrich would write more for boys. My favorite game is base-ball, or was until I was presented with a bicycle, which I cannot get to enjoy. It is a 50-inch Standard Columbia.

I have no room-mate this term. Last half I had, and he left a calendar, a verse of which I had taken for my motto:

"Howe'er we be, it seems to me
"Tis only noble to be good."

The scenery here is very beautiful. I mean to photograph it next summer, and get some fine views. I have walked three miles up Prospect Mountain to East Rock. This rock is to be seen in Peter's composita. It is a thick rock about twenty feet high.

C. C. W., J.V.

You are, I fancy, at a very good school, and are leading just the sort of life you ought to. But that jumping-off feat sounds alarming to a lady in her easy-chair. I am relieved that you and your comrades are not likely to do it very many times this spring.

NOTHURST, MICHIGAN.

The Postmistress wanted to hear what boys do out of school. I bring in wood and draw water. I like to play marbles as well as any game. My favorite amusement in winter is sliding down hill and skating; in the summer, swimming and going barefoot. I like animal books and books of adventures best. I think my favorite author is C. A. Stephens, and his two books by him, The Knave-of-Club and The Young Man of the Year. One of my Christmas books was named Wild Adventures in Wild Alaska. I have read it through three times. I wonder if any of the boys have read Paul De Chaillos's books, and how they like them?

I have a horse named Kitty, and my sister Grace has a dog named Roy. I had a dog named Tombo, and I sold him for fifteen dollars. Grace made some little sponge-cakes after the receipt in YOUR PEOPLE, and they were splendid.

EDDIE H. L.

ROSELLE, KANSAS.

I am a little boy eight years old, and live in Roselle. The stories in YOUR PEOPLE are all interesting; my favorite is "Nan." I haven't any pets living now, but once had two cunning little parakeets. I have a little sister Mattie, four years old, with long golden curls and blue eyes, who says a great many quaint things. My favorite book is The Swiss Family Robinson, my favorite game hide-and-seek. Papa has a library, and I have an immense number of books. I can't read all of them, but I like very much is entitled Travels Around the World by a Boy. My motto is, "Honesty is the best of all policies." I have a number of orphaned children out of their poverty when I get to be a man.

WALTER J.

Here is a story from one of our bright girls, and it is very well told indeed:

MATTIE'S ADVENTURE.

"Oh, mamma, I am so lonesome!" sobbed Mattie, as she stopped rocking the baby. "Since we moved here I have not seen a person except Fannie, and that was two months ago."

Well," answered Mrs. Brown, in a comforting tone, "Fannie is the eldest of a family of six, and she has a great deal of work to do; besides, she lives two miles away; but if your father is willing to let you go alone, I will try to spare you this afternoon, and you may go and see her."

Mattie jumped up, clapping her hands, and went to work with a will for the rest of the morning.

Mr. Brown did not consent very readily, for he said, "There is a thick strip of woods about a mile from here, and it is very likely that if Mattie stays late she may encounter a bear."

But after much protesting that she was not afraid, and would not stay late, he consented. At two o'clock, bright and happy, Mattie started off. "She was very brave, still she thought she would not like to pass through the woods alone at night. Now, however, it was daylight, and she lingered quite a while picking the roses that grew along the road-side. She reached Fannie's house in safety, and spent a very pleasant afternoon."

Meanwhile her father felt very anxious, and was sorry he had been persuaded to let her go alone. At supper-time he said, "I think, mother, I will walk down toward the woods and see if Mattie is coming," and off he started.

He saw nothing of Mattie until he reached the woods, and there he saw a sight to make his heart stand still. He saw a bear, and he saw a girl all aglow, hair streaming out behind, and apron caught up. Just behind was a large, fierce black bear.

"What shall I do?" thought the poor father; "I can not get to her or she to me." Suddenly he cried, "Drop what you have in your apron!"

Mattie obeyed. When she reached her father she said, "I fear, papa, I was a little late. I had three of the cunningest little black kittens, that I found playing at the foot of a tree."

She was very much surprised to hear that her father never thought of her being in danger, and was chased by the mother bear. Everybody was very thankful for Mattie's escape, and she never went through those woods again alone.

BESSIE D.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.

I am a little boy who will be eight years old in April, and I want to write a few lines to tell the little readers of the Post-office Box how I caught an owl. One day, soon after Christmas, it was snowing hard, and I was standing at the window looking into the yard. I saw upon the fence a bird which I thought was a very large sparrow. I called my mamma to look, but she, upon seeing my eyes, told me it was a small owl, and that I might try to catch it. So I went up to the bird and me take it in my hands and carry it into the house. I am sorry to say it lived only three days; but my papa let me get it stuffed, and it looks very nice to me, as an owl, I imagine, is not to be caught in a city every day.

I am trying to find a motto to be mine, and when I find one, if you print this, I shall write again and tell it to you.

VICTOR E. S.

I shall not forget your promise about the motto.

FREDERICKSBURG, VIRGINIA.

All the little girls and boys write about their pets; I have none but my dolls. I take HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, and like to see no number of it. It is a splendid story, and I can hardly wait from one week to the other to get the paper. I am writing this letter myself.

LIZZIE B.

Now that "Nan" has been concluded, I hope you will be equally pleased with the "Raising the Pearl."

PERUVILLE, NEW JERSEY.

My home is twenty-four miles from New York city. I am twelve years old. We have a very good school here, and I like my teacher very much. On the 27th of February we celebrated Longfellow's birthday by the children giving quotations, reciting some of his poems, reading his life, and singing. We had a few visitors, and all enjoyed it very much.

We have four kittens. Mine is named Pansy; the others are Daisy, Punch, and Judy. We have a magpie. She is very cunning; she coughs and whistles, calls her own name, Maggie, and my name, Kattie, and Nettie, the little dog. She says, "Get away," "Pretty, pretty," "Naughty bird," and some other things which are very amusing. I like all the stories in the children, but the story of "Nan" was splendid.

KIRTIE W.

HACKENSACK, NEW JERSEY.

I am a little girl eight years old. I have no pets. I have a baby brother; he will be two years old on the 10th of June. We are going to move to Brooklyn on the 1st of May. I want to live in Brooklyn very much, but have never lived there, and do not know how I shall like it. I have a good many cousins there. I have six dolls; one, a funny baby, is a Chinese doll that turns his head all around, and when you pinch him he will make a noise and blink. I like it makes me laugh, and mamma and papa too. I hope you will print this, as it is my first letter to a paper. I have written some to my grandpa and nuntle.

ANNE S. H.

TROY, N. Y.

Last Christmas I received a violin, and one of my aunts gave me a nice ring, and my uncle a large history of the United States and, best of all, a book of the latest of a family of six, and she has a great deal of work to do; besides, she lives two miles away; but if your father is willing to let you go alone, I will try to spare you this afternoon, and you may go and see her."

FRANK H.

MASON CRY, IOWA.

I am a little boy nine years old. I live in Northern Iowa. It is quite cold here; the thermometer has been thirty or two degrees below zero. The snow has been eleven or twelve inches on a level. I read nearly all the contained stories in YOUR PEOPLE. I liked "The Prince of the Snow Club," and "Mr. Stubbs's Brother," and always enjoy Jimmy Brown's stories. I didn't take HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE when "Toby Tyler" was published, but have got the book.

JAMIE M.

Maudie came to me the other day, saying, "Won't you tell the Little Housekeepers how to set in a patch neatly? Tom does tear his jacket so often, and I mend it, so as to save dear mamma the trouble."

When you have to mend a garment, take time and take pains, so that you may do it well; mending can not be hurried. Baste the patch very smoothly on the wrong side of the torn article, turn the edges in, and hem them down. On the right side cut the hole into a square shape, turn the edges in, and hem them neatly on the patch. Sometimes you get them the hole on the patch, and I have seen this done, on the knee of Jack's pantaloons, for instance, so very nicely that nobody would imagine they had been torn.

One of the most annoying things some of my Little Housekeepers have to encounter is the sewing of shoe buttons. They are forever popping off. It is a good plan to sew them on very strongly with waxed thread when the shoes are new. Then keep at hand in your basket some strong linen thread, a large needle, and a supply of buttons, and if a button is loose, why, presto! a moment's work, and it is fastened as it should be.

WHO WAS HE?

BY L. A. FRANCE.

HE was born in London, October 14, 1644, and was the son of an Admiral. He was the oldest child, and had but one brother and one sister. He studied at Oxford, and stood high as a scholar, but was expelled from college for attending the meetings of a certain religious sect whose views he held.

His father sent him to travel through Holland and France, and he remained there several years, devoting as much time to study as to amusement.

After his return home he was sent to Ireland to attend to his father's estates, but he turned more firmly than before to his former views, and when he returned again to London he began to preach.

He was imprisoned, but soon obtained his freedom. He was imprisoned again, and sent to Newgate for six months. When he was set free he travelled for a time in Holland and Germany.

He was married in 1672 to Galielma Maria Springelt.

He had a claim against the government for £16,000, in settlement for which he was given the grant of a large territory in America, with the right to form a colony with laws in accordance with his views. He came to America in 1682, when a charter was issued and a city planned.

He returned again to England, was accused of treason and deprived of his title to the land, but was declared innocent in 1693, and the title re-issued in 1694.

He returned to America in 1699, and remained two years. He died on the 30th of July, 1718.

He was noted for uprightness and justice.

HENRY THE EIGHTH PLAYING TENNIS.

THE ROYAL GAME OF TENNIS.

VERY different indeed from our modern game, lawn tennis, is the original and ancient game of tennis, now sometimes called court tennis. People who are fond of going back to the beginning of things have no difficulty in tracing tennis back to the reign of the English King Henry III. When they have got thus far they find that even in those days the game was considered an ancient one, and they discover that the Romans had a game of tennis, which they called pila.

Now, think they, we have the "way-back" origin of tennis. But, oh dear, no! The ancient Greeks played tennis; and possibly before them the more ancient Phrygians, and so on. Arrived at the Greeks, the historian of games generally gives up the search, and contents himself with the thought that the origin of tennis lies too far back in the history of the world to be discoverable at this late day.

Both in England and France tennis was a favorite game among the wealthy. The French royal families played in a court at Versailles, which is now used as a gallery for statues. The English monarchs, beginning with Henry VIII., used the court at Hampton Court, the palace which Cardinal Wolsey built for himself, but was obliged to give to his envious sovereign.

Our illustration gives a view of the tennis-court at Hampton Court, and in the foreground we see the King himself. A less illustrious person might perhaps have been a more active and skillful player, for King Harry was no light weight, but few people seem to have enjoyed the game more. On one occasion there was a brilliant array of royal players, Henry and the Emperor Maximilian of Germany playing against the Prince of Orange and the Marquis of Brandenburg. The Earl of Devonshire was not too proud to "chase" balls for the two monarchs, nor Lord Edmond for the players of less exalted rank. The result of this game was quite satisfactory, for it is recorded "they departed even-handed on both sides, after eleven games fully played." What puzzles the modern reader is how they could have played eleven games and yet "depart even-handed."

Although it was a rare thing for ladies to take part in tennis, it was not unknown, for we read of a damsel named Margot who was not only a match for many of the gentlemen of the time, but played equally well with the palm and the back of the hand. In those days (when Charles V. was King of France) the game was called palm-play, for it was played with the hand covered with a glove. Later, tennis-players bound cords around their hands; and later still, some one—we do not know who, but we have a tender regard for his memory—fastened cords across a pear-shaped frame, and put a handle to it. Hence our familiar racket.

And now, having seen that the game of tennis is of highly distinguished origin, let us see what manner of game it was and is. The court in which it is played is ninety-six feet long by from thirty-three to thirty-nine feet wide. It is inclosed on all four sides, and is covered by a roof. But its interior walls are not at all like the sides of a box; they are broken up into all sorts of queer angles by buttresses and roofs and what not. Along the two end walls and one of the sides runs a long gallery with a sloping roof, which comes to within about seven feet of the floor. At one end of the court this gallery is open, and here, protected by netting, the spectators sit to watch the game. This is called the "dedans." The whole of the long gallery is called the "pent-house," and its sloping roof plays an important part in the game, as it requires a great deal of practice to judge at what angle a ball will fall to the ground when it has struck in its course a perpendicular wall and the roof of a shed.

The man who planned the first tennis-court must have laughed to himself as he laid those additional traps for unskilled players called the "grille," the "passe-line," and the "tambour." The "passe" is simply a line, but it must be carefully avoided in serving; the "grille" is a recess in the corner of the pent-house, and when a ball falls in it one is counted against the striker. As for the "tambour," it is nothing but a provoking and unnecessary angle in one of the side walls, and must have been put there out of pure contrariness, to add one more to the difficulties of the beginner.

Very few people in this country, even among those who have travelled in Europe, have ever seen a match at court tennis, for the courts are very expensive to build, and are rare even in England and France. There are only two courts in this country, one at Boston and the other at the Casino at Newport. Those of our readers who may visit the latter delightful resort next summer should not fail to pay a visit to the court, and see the game which has endured for centuries upon centuries, and been the favorite pastime of kings.

FLO AND FLORA.

BY ADA C. STODDARD.

"IT'S too bad!" declared little Flo Stetson, pulling off her hat. She had come to spend the sunny half-holiday with her cousin, whose name was the same as her own, but who didn't begin to be so rosy and dimpled. "I don't call such doings as that fun!"

"What?" asked Flora, glancing up listlessly from a lapful of canvas and worsteds.

And Flo told her. It was at school the day before, which had been the last day of March, that the boys were recounting the tricks they had played in other years, and little Micky Lanahan asked in his funny way, "Sure, an' who bees April-Fool?"

Micky was a new boy. He stood leaning against the school-yard fence as he spoke, with his small red hands in his pockets and an anxious look on his face as he gazed down at his boots. Those boots were a sad trouble to Micky; they were very large, and the toes turned up and gaped wofully, and they were all he had.

A shout arose in answer to Micky's question from that merry, thoughtless group.

"He don't know April-Fool, boys."

"Oh, Boots!"

"We've been acquainted with him ever so long."

"And we'll give you an introduction when the time comes," laughed Fred Stetson. "Won't we, boys?"

"And they're going to," said Flo—"Fred and Teddy Blake—and I don't think it's fair. His folks are real poor, and his mother's sick almost all the time. They make fun of his boots, you know—and they are dreadful things, really—and so they're going to hang one of the boxes that new shoes come in on the door, with a bundle of papers in it, and 'April-Fool' printed on the inside piece. And they're going to look in the window and see Micky when he gets it. Fred's fooled me lots of times to day, but I don't care for that. I don't think it's much fun, though, and it's mean to fool that little Micky Lanahan. So!"

Flo's cheeks glowed cherry red, and she talked rapidly. Flora listened with kindling eyes.

"Flo," she cried, "I'll tell you what to do. All the time my ankle's been sprained, you know, I haven't spent my pocket-money. I've got two dollars now, and I was going to buy you a birthday present; but I'll spend it for a pair of shoes for Micky instead, if you're willing."

Was Flo willing? She almost screamed with delight.

"Oh, you dear Flora!" she cried. "And I'll change the boxes! Oh, Flora Millings, what fun! Such a joke on Fred and Teddy! And Fred said he wouldn't be fooled once this April. Oh, oh!"

Flo could not wait. She put on her hat and almost flew down to the shoe store and home again. Fred's box neatly tied up was on the hall table waiting for night, and it was only the work of a moment to replace the little bundle of papers with a pair of stout shoes.

"Such fun!" said Flo to herself, and she almost burst out laughing when, after tea, Fred took the box from the hall table and went off with Teddy Blake.

"After all, I don't half like this," he said to Teddy. "If it was any other fellow I wouldn't care a snap. But of course it's only in fun. I told him we'd introduce him."

"Of course," laughed Teddy; and so they made their way down a cross street and through an alley to the little tumble-down house Micky Lanahan called home.

Fred put the box down quietly at the door and rapped.

They had plenty of time to dodge around the corner of the house to a window; and they were looking in even before Micky had his hand on the latch.

It was such a poor little room, bare-walled, bare-floored, and scantily furnished! A thin-faced woman sat bolstered up in the only rocking-chair it contained, and a lamp burned dimly on the rickety table. The big boots stood in a corner, and when Fred's gaze fell upon them he suddenly turned it the other way.

"Ted," he whispered, "I wish we hadn't. I do wish we hadn't, Ted."

There was a shrill cry of joy from Micky then. He had opened the door and discovered the box, and his trekked face was beaming with delighted surprise when he came back into the room.

"Och, mother, it do be shoes!" he cried.

The thin white face in the rocking-chair was turned eagerly toward the boy.

"Sure it can't be the truth, Micky."

"Deed it is, mother!" cried Micky, tugging at the string. "What else should it be now?"

Fred at the window gromed inwardly.

"Such a miserable thing to do!" he said. "I'd give a dollar to be out of it, Ted. I don't see—"

"You did it yourself," said Teddy, not very good-naturedly. "You thought of it, and all, but I'd give another dollar if we hadn't, and that's a fact. Let's go."

"Wait," said Fred. "We'll make this up—Hallo! Why, Ted—Ted Blake!"

For Micky had got the troublesome twine unknotted at last, and had pulled from the box those stout thick shoes. And he was capering about the room wild with joy.

"Beant they illegant, mother? Oh, mother, look! Did ye iver see the loikes? An' 'twas April-Fool that fetched 'em—it says April-Fool on the paper! Sure it's a foine odd gentleman he is. Oh, mother, it's cryin' for gladness I am, sure! 'Twas April Fool fetched 'em till me."

"Then April Fool never did a better piece of work," said Teddy, feeling not a bit ashamed of the tears that filled his own eyes almost to overflowing. "But, I say, old fellow"—and he began to laugh.

I think you can not imagine two more astonished boys than those who slid softly away from Mrs. Lanahan's window and hastened off home in the darkness.

"Such a good joke!" laughed Fred. "I never was so glad of anything in my life."

"We'll pay for those shoes, anyhow," said Teddy. "Can't you guess who did it, Fred?"

"I think 'twas Flo and Flora," Fred answered. "Anyway, I'm almost sure Flo had a finger in the pie."

He was quite sure of it when, a little later, he opened the hall door at home. For a plump little form glided up to him, a dimpled little hand tucked itself under his arm, a rosy little mouth was placed close to his ear, and a soft little voice whispered, "April-fool!"

A DIVE, A PLUNGE, AND A CATCH; OR, HOW MY MAN CAUGHT THE IGUANA.

BY J. W. CARRINGTON.

THE sketch of the iguana, by Mrs. Conant, published some time ago in YOUNG PEOPLE, recalls an incident of one of my journeys that the boys may like to hear about. Thirty years ago I was going up the Chagres River on my way to Panama for the second time. It was before the Panama Railroad or the town of Colon, which we call Aspinwall, was built. At that time we used to land at the town of Chagres, at the mouth of the river, and go up the river in canoes either to Gorgona or Cruces, and from there on mule-back to Panama.

The journey up the river was a very long and crooked one, of from sixty to eighty miles, and of course against the current, which was very strong. It was slow work, and I have often spent from two to three days in getting up to the landing-point. The canoes were what we called "dug-outs"—Robinson-Crusoe boats—hollowed out of a single log, and the large ones were heavy and strong.

My largest—I had two—was about twenty-five feet long, and amidships about five feet wide. On the lower half of the river my men rowed; on the upper part, in shallower and more rapid water, they laid a plank along each side of the canoe, on which they walked while "setting" that is, pushing the canoe up-stream with long poles. These poles they would plant firmly on the bottom of the river, and then push against them as they walked back toward the stern along the plank. So, you understand, they sat when they rowed with the oars, and stood when they "set" with the poles.

It was heavy work, and frequently through the day we would haul up to the bank under the shade of the trees, and give the men a rest. The banks were heavily wooded; the tropical forest was very thick, and came down to the edge of the water. One day, about three o'clock, I let my men run the canoes in under the shade of a large tree right at the mouth of a little brook which emptied into the river, and from which we knew we could get cool clear water for our water kegs.

It was in a hot climate, remember, and the water of the river was muddy and warm. So we all took a drink, filled our kegs, and then settled ourselves for a rest, my passenger friends lazily lounging on the bright clean mats under the tollo, or palm-leaf roof, over the after-part of the canoes, and my crew napping on the setting planks.

One of the men, however, sat on the plank next the shore, with his feet hanging overboard, eating his lunch. As a general thing these canoe-men wear very little clothing, usually a head-covering, and light cotton drawers reaching from waist to knee.

As we were thus taking our ease we suddenly heard on the bank above us a noise of men calling in the depths of the forest, a rustling through the thick underbrush, and the barking of dogs. We sprang up from under the tollos to see the hunt, for that it evidently was.

In a moment or two we heard a rush through bushes or boughs close to us, and then out on a large branch which stretched high above and over the canoe ran a huge iguana—the hunted game. Apparently surprised by seeing himself confronted with more human enemies he paused for a second, and then dived into the river, scarcely two feet from the knees of the lurching canoe-man.

Instantly the man sprang from his seat, straightened himself, and down he plunged, feet foremost, into the deep water, as rigid as an iron bar shot down by a strong hand; away on a gentle eddy quietly floated the best part of his dress—his grass hat.

We all drew a long breath, and wonderingly awaited the end. For a moment or two everything seemed to remain quiet. Then there was a splashing in the water as if a mighty battle were going on. Our little boat rocked as if there were a tempest about us. Every instant we expected to see the water grow red with the blood of our unhappy canoe-man, and the huge beast rise to the surface with some fragment of his victim in his jaws.

We had not calculated upon the awkwardness of the iguana, however, or the wonderful sharpness of our black boatman. There were a few more moments of breathless expectation, during which one might perhaps count five. Then came a break in the water, and almost where he went down up popped the black head of the canoe-man, and, gripped hard and fast by his tail and the back of his neck so as to prevent his biting, was the iguana held firmly in his grasp.

As soon as we grasped the situation, a hearty laugh went round. Then with one accord we went to work to help our valorous canoe-man. In spite of his struggles the clumsy prisoner was got on board, securely bound, and deposited in the bow, after which we resumed our journey.

Just before sundown, finding a cleared space on the banks, we beached our canoes, and tied up for the night. The men made a fire, slaughtered, dressed, and cooked their game in a sort of fricassee, and, with characteristic courtesy, extended a polite invitation to their captain and his passengers to partake of the delicacy. It was "respectfully declined with thanks." It certainly looked nice and tempting—white as young chicken—and (after I learned to eat frogs' legs) I have been sorry I did decline, for I have never been able to find iguana meat offered for sale or served at any table.

"OH, THE MERRY, MERRY SPRING-TIME!"

GENTLEMAN JACK'S REVENGE.

BY SYDNEY DAYRE.

IT was the 1st of April, in a pleasant village situated in the northern part of Vermont, under the shadow of the Green Mountains. Jack Forbes walked alongside of a picket fence where the pickets were high and the spaces between them narrow. As usual he wore rather a dignified air, which was slightly ruffled when his hat, tilted back by an invisible thread above his head, fell off behind him. He looked very crossly over the fence at two boys who were shaking with merriment at the success of their trick.

"I knew that was you, Rob. You're in big business now, ain't you?" said Jack, noticing at the same moment a quarter lying on the walk tied to a string. "If you must play the fool, can't you get up something newer than these baby tricks?"

"It's April-fools' Day, and a fellow must do something, mustn't he?"

"Come here and have some fun with us, Jack," said Rob. "See, there's old Peebles coming. Watch now how neatly his hat will go off."

"Not I, thank you." Jack looked back at a feeble, shabby old man who came with uncertain footsteps. "You wouldn't really annoy such a poor old chap, would you, Rob?"

"It won't hurt him any," said Rob, doggedly.

Jack stood quietly till the old man came up, then raised his hand and broke the slender black thread, and as he did so set his foot on the quarter until Rob's intended victim had passed on.

"I'll pay you up for this before night, you'll see, Gentleman Jack," cried Rob. "What business have you to come here spoiling our fun?"

Jack walked on with a laugh, leaving Rob and his companion to arrange their plans for revenge. He knew Rob would keep, or make every attempt to keep, his promise, for if there was one thing which good-humored, fun-loving Rob Mudget excelled in, it was the playing of small jokes and the taking of solid enjoyment therein.

Jack, however, kept quietly on the watch, and skillfully managed either to ward off Rob's tricks, which, as he had said, were stale and babyish enough, or to turn them upon their author in a fashion which exposed him to well-merited laughter. April-fools' Day had, in fact, almost worn away without giving Rob a fair chance of "getting even" with Jack.

There was an amateur concert in the Town-hall that evening, given by the young people of the village for the purpose of raising funds for a new branch of the Young Men's Christian Association. The room was crowded, the pupils of the school occupying the front seats.

A young lady from a neighboring place was about to sing, and there was perfect quiet as she took her place upon the stage. Just at this moment Jack heard a slight movement behind him, followed by the peculiar sound made by a little round of smothered laughter. Knowing Rob was near, and having every reason to suspect some of his trifling pranks, he would not look around, even though he presently felt a light touch on his back.

His quickened ear had just caught a whisper of "Shame!" and "Take it off," when his attention was drawn in another direction. A light music stand, which was none of the staidest, had been placed to receive the music of the young singer. A little nervous movement of her hand as she turned a leaf had unfortunately overbalanced it, so that not only the music went flying off toward the audience, but the stand itself fell to the floor, which was two or three feet lower than the stage.

No one but the lady who was singing and one who accompanied her on the piano were on the stage. Within the moment of painful embarrassment which followed, Jack Forbes quickly stepped from his seat and gathered up the music. As he did so he perceived that the rickety little stand had gone to pieces. He sprang lightly upon the stage, and bringing another from the rear, placed the sheets upon it, and with a bow to the performer turned back to his seat.

It was a graceful little act, gracefully done, and more politeness and thoughtfulness were shown in the prompt action than could have been looked for from most country boys; it was the outcome of a self-possession born of careful home training in good manners. The boys were more or less inclined to make sport of the politeness of "Gentleman Jack," but he had wisely accepted the assurance of his elders (which many boys with equally good training think it manly to refuse) that good manners go a great way in the make-up of character, and he believed that, given high principles and hard work, a boy with good manners will soon outstrip one without.

But, stepping from the stage, he was surprised to see more of a sensation in the audience than what had happened seemed to call for. Little outbreaks of laughter came from some of the younger boys, and a broad smile appeared on faces which should have been sober. One of his friends drew him to his seat with a hurried whisper.

"Here, Jack—you went up there on such a run-and-jump that I hadn't time to stop you; it's too bad—see!"

"I— Jack, I'm sorry," stammered Rob Mudget. "I only wanted to make the boys laugh a little. I never thought of your getting out of your seat."

Jack's face blazed as friendly hands took from the back of his well-fitting new coat a paper card on which were displayed in staring capitals the words,

JACK A. DANDY.

He now understood the smiles. "The figure I must have made bowing and scraping before all these people!" was his first galling thought. Very few among them, he knew, would feel anything but disgust at sight of such a mean trick, but that did not take away the mortifying sense of having been made to appear an object of ridicule. He turned away from Rob's eagerly whispered apologies, and left the hall, when the entertainment was over, without waiting to speak with any one, thus avoiding his schoolmates till the next morning.

As he came up to the playground by himself just before school opened, he heard shouts of laughter. All who were there seemed too busy about something which was going on to heed him, and he joined the gazers almost unnoticed.

Rob Mudget, still intent on playing the part of buffoon, which seemed to suit him so well, was the centre of attention as he went through some performance which Jack did not at first understand.

He had upon his back the same placard which Jack had worn on the evening before. As Jack came up to him he was in the act of sticking the handle of an old broom in the ground, upon which he arranged with great care a piece of newspaper. All was done with absurd gestures and an over-acting of politeness to some unseen personage.

But as he finished his acting with a mocking bow, and walked away in mock dignity, and with a most absurd expression of self-approval, Jack Forbes strode into the circle with lips trembling with rage. Last night's mortification was bad enough, without making sport of him to-day. He might have forgiven the first, knowing it was not entirely intentional, but this never.

The boys gathered around fully expecting a fight, although some of the more peaceably inclined cried:

"Don't, Jack." "It is awfully mean, though." "He deserves it if ever any one did."

But Jack did not strike him. Rob was somewhat smaller than himself, and he would have despised an unequal fight. He snatched the placard from his back, and folded it with quiet self control.

"As sure as you and I both live, Rob Mudget," he said, in a voice husky with passion, "I'll keep this till I'm revenged on you."

One afternoon a week later a boy brushed from his clothes snow which told of a vigorous tussle with drifts, and scraped and stamped more from his boots, at the door of the village drug store. There had been one of those heavy falls of snow that are sometimes known in New England even as late as the first part of April.

"Robert Mudget! What business brings you here on such a day as this?"

"Very important business, Mr. Watson. My father's sick. Please put this up quick; I want to get back as soon as I can."

"You can't go back to-night, boy—you must be crazy to think of it. How did you get here?"

"Over the hills. The lower road's all blocked so horses can't get through; but there are places where the snow's blown off on the hills, so a body can pick their way along."

"But there's a dreadful storm coming atop of the other one. You mustn't go, Rob."

"HOW CHILDISH ALL THAT SEEMED NOW!"

"I must." The boy busied himself getting his clothing in order for his homeward walk while the medicine was being put up, tying his trousers about the ankles of his boots with bits of rope, and winding his comforter closely about his neck.

"To keep out the snow," he explained. "I don't always bundle up so."

"I don't like it at all, Rob," repeated the druggist. "Seems as if I'd ought to make you stay," he added, un- easily, as Rob opened the door and stepped briskly out.

"You couldn't do that," laughed the boy. "Then, more soberly, "Thank you, but my father needs the medicine."

Two or three anxious pairs of eyes followed his figure as he turned out of the village street and began to climb the nearest hill. Everything betokened a heavy storm in the opinion of these men who knew well that a snow-storm among Vermont hills is not a thing to be made light of. They watched him on as he went, now faster, now slower, as the ground or the snow happened to favor him, sometimes wading through a drift, and again skirting slopes which the wind had swept bare. And they shook their heads forebodingly as he at length disappeared from their view beneath the gathering shades of the threatening clouds, hoping he might reach and pass the summit before the full weight of the storm fell upon him.

It was the next day that a neighbor of Farmer Mudget opened the door of the drug store, and asked,

"Anything been seen of Rob Mudget?"

"I told him he ought not to go back," was the answer, given with a blank face.

"He got here, then?"

"Yes."

A company of men soon took their way up the hill with resolute faces but sinking hearts, as they thought of the intense cold which had been borne on the wings of the storm.

The news quickly spread through the village. Jack Forbes, after a moment of thought, said to his mother,

"I am going after the searching party."

"You, Jack? What can you do that they can not do without you?"

"Perhaps nothing, but I am going."

He was determined, and his mother made some strong coffee, which he put in a tin flask wrapped in a newspaper. He had recalled a time when Rob and himself, a year or two back, had, while on a hunting expedition among these hills, taken refuge from a rain-storm in a cave. It had proved a dry and comfortable retreat, and it had instantly occurred to him that there was a chance of Rob's having attempted to reach it, in case that he found it impossible to make headway against the wind. He hoped to overtake the men, and followed their tracks for some distance, but finally abandoned them to work his way in the direction of the cave.

It was work, sure enough. Long before nearing the point he sought his hope of ever finding Rob alive grew fainter and fainter. If it was difficult for him now to advance by daylight and in fairly quiet weather, what must it have been to the boy in the storm and the darkness?

Night was closing in as he approached the cave, and to his exceeding joy he saw that a small space about its opening was beaten down as if by much treading, although the light snow had partially covered it again. All weariness was forgotten as he sprang to the entrance, shouting, "Rob! Rob!"

No answer came, and with beating heart he made his way in, and touched a form huddled in a corner.

"Rob! Rob!"

Still no answer. Jack shook him with an energy increased by excitement and alarm, but with no effect. He was evidently in the dread stupor which always results from long exposure to excessive cold; had it passed into death?

Quickly Jack gathered some fragments of wood which lay around, and took from his pocket the flask with the paper wrapping, on which he depended for starting his fire. To his sore dismay he found that a slight leak from the flask had made it too damp to burn. He hastily empried his other pockets, and from an inside one came a paper which, as he unfolded it, brought into view the words "Jack A. Dandy."

He started in surprise. He had not seen the words since he had folded the paper in wrath at the boy who now lay motionless before him. The heat of his anger had long ago cooled, but he had always cherished a determination to revenge himself when the chance offered. It was this that had led him some time since to transfer the placard to this pocket of his winter coat. How childish all that seemed now, as he watched the smoke rise from the burning paper! In the dead hush and the fading light Jack found himself wondering if on the quiet of the eternal shore all the strife and struggle and hates and revenges of boys, and men too, will not look just as trifling as his quarrel with Rob looked now.

Soon he forced some hot coffee between Rob's lips, repeating the dose from time to time, while he rubbed the unconscious boy with snow to the full extent of his strength. And when at last Rob opened his eyes, Jack did not feel how the tears streamed from his own as he thanked God for this revenge which He had granted him.

"What is it? You, Jack? What are you doing, and what am I doing anyhow? Oh, I know now. My! ain't I stiff, though! Gi' me some more. Say, how did you get here? Asleep, wasn't I? Well, I tried to keep awake—walked and walked on that snow till I was clear tuckered out, and couldn't take another step. There ain't a bit of feeling in my feet. Got anything to eat?"

The ringing shouts which Jack sent through the frosty air awoke such a cheery echo among the hills as quickly to reach the ears of the men in search, and the lost boy was soon at home, stoutly declaring that all he wanted was something to eat.

"Seems to me, Jack," said one among the school-boys some time after, "that revenge you used to talk of is rather slow. When is it to come off? It was a promise, you know, and we want to see the fun."

But Jack never told any one except Rob how he had fulfilled his promise to keep the placard until his chance of revenge came.

"Jack!" said that young person, with a solemn shake of the head, "if everybody took the same kind of revenge as you took on me, what an everlasting jolly world this would be, hey!"

CHAPTER V.

SEA-URCHINS.

THE labor of putting up a shelter for the night was not hard, since all that it was necessary to do was to pile up against two trees the branches they had hewn off in finishing their timber.

After this was done the question of supper presented itself; and since Captain Sammy showed no disposition to do anything about gathering more oysters, the boys started out to get some for themselves.

Bobby had an idea that in order to gather oysters successfully he should wade into the water after them, instead of reaching down from the top of the rocks, as he had seen Captain Sammy do; so his shoes and stockings were off in a twinkling, and his trousers rolled up as far as possible.

His example was closely followed by Charley; but Dare, who was doubtful as to whether such a proceeding was wise or not, concluded that it was safest to try first for their supper as the little Captain had done.

* BEGIN IN NO. 175, HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE.

Both Charley and Bobby plunged into the water when they came to the line of reef where they expected to find the food, while Dare crept along the top of the rocks.

Bobby had taken but a few steps in the desired direction, and was congratulating himself upon having been wiser than Dare, when suddenly he screamed in a way that was almost blood-curdling, while his face showed signs of the greatest fear.

"What is it? What is the matter?" cried Dare, as he jumped into the water, regardless of the fact that he was not prepared for a wetting, and ran toward the screaming boy.

Bobby paid no attention to his questions, but continued to scream, while he held up first one foot, and then the other, thus showing that they were in some way connected with his pain or terror.

"It's a shark! It must be a shark!" cried Charley, now stepping around in the greatest excitement, but attempting neither to aid Bobby nor to gain the shore.

At the suggestion that it was a shark Bobby redoubled his efforts at screaming, with such success that the din was almost deafening.

Dare tried in vain to quiet Bobby long enough to learn what the matter was, but finding that an almost impossible task while Charley was doing so much to add to the excitement, he said to his screaming brother, in tones that were not exactly mild:

"Now, see here, Charley, you are not hurt, and I want you to stop your noise. See if you can hold your tongue long enough to help me get Bob ashore."

It seemed as if Charley had just realized that he was not injured in any way, for he ceased his screams almost as soon as Dare spoke, and, like the sensible boy he usually was, at once commenced to do what he could toward aiding his cousin.

When the two boys waded up to where Bobby was standing he had become quiet for the moment, and was about to tell what had caused the outcry. But he was interrupted by Charley, who commenced to scream loudly—this time from pain rather than fear—and he went through the same peculiar motions with his feet that Bobby had been indulging in.

Dare stood for several seconds as if he had lost the power to move; he was as thoroughly surprised a boy as ever visited the Florida coast.

"What is the matter?" he cried, forgetting that he was in the water above his knees, and trying to stamp his foot in order to command attention. "Tell me what the matter is, or I shall think you are both crazy."

Charley paid no attention to the question. He managed to stagger to the reef, across which he leaned, kicking his heels high up in the air, as if only in that position could he find relief.

The situation Charley was in helped to restore Bobby to one or two of the five senses he appeared to have been frightened out of, and he started in a very painful way for the shore, saying as he did so:

"We've been bitten by something. It must have been a scorpion, I am sure, and just as likely as not we are poisoned."

"Don't be so foolish," cried Dare, impatiently. "You're old enough to know that scorpions don't live in the water." And then he added—for he was really afraid they might have been bitten by some poisonous creature, although he did not want them to know of his fears—"Even if a scorpion had bitten you, it wouldn't kill you."

By this time Bobby had crawled high up on the beach, and was examining the sole of one of his feet, which was bleeding considerably.

"Tell me how it felt," asked Dare, who was anxious to learn as nearly as possible just what had caused the trouble, for the sight of Bobby's bleeding foot added to his fears.

"All I know about it," sobbed Bob, as he wiped away the blood and sand with the sleeve of his shirt—for his handkerchief was in his coat pocket, tucked snugly away in one corner of the camp—"is that when I went to step, after I got out where the water was over my knees, I felt something sting me."

"What's the matter now? Who's killed? Have more pirates come?"

It was Captain Sammy who asked the question. The outcry had broken in upon his smoky dream, and he had hobbled along the beach at such a rapid pace that his usually red face was now almost crimson, while the perspiration was running down his neck in small streams.

"Bobby and Charley waded in to get some oysters, and something stung them," explained Dare, feeling relieved that Captain Sammy was there to share his anxiety.

"Stung, eh?" said the little man, as he carefully adjusted his spectacles, and examined Bobby's foot with the air of a doctor.

What he saw did not appear to frighten him very much, for he took out his knife very quietly, and after some little cutting of the flesh, which caused Bobby to scream again, he drew out of the foot a long dark greenish splinter, which he held up laughingly.

"They've stepped on some sea-urchins, that's all; and the next time they wade around this coast they had better keep their shoes on."

Great was the relief of all three of the boys at finding out that the matter was no worse; but the faces of the two sufferers clouded again very quickly as Captain Sammy went to work with his knife, and they learned that each of the spines of the sea-urchins must be dug out.

Owing to the fact that his eyesight was not very keen, Captain Sammy was not remarkably quick about his work, and more than once Bobby cried aloud and pulled his foot back from the grasp that held it, but all without troubling the little sailor in the least.

He continued at his work until he had taken out thirteen of the needle-like spines from the feet of the two boys, and then, after advising them to bandage the injured members with their handkerchiefs rather than try to put on their shoes, he hobbled back to his perch on the rocks to resume his pipe and vengeful dreams of Tommy Tucker.

There were no further thoughts of oysters after the surgical operations were ended, and in fact it seemed as if the fright and pain had quieted their hunger so far that they no longer thought about it.

With Dare's assistance, Charley and Bobby limped back to the rude brush camp, and there they lay, with feet smarting with pain, thinking over the same subject that was occupying Captain Sammy's attention—the pirates and their work.

Dare, from whose clothing the water was trickling in little streams, had commenced to undress for the purpose of hanging his clothes before the fire, when Captain Sammy shouted from his rocky perch,

"Here! what are you going to do now?"

"Going to dry my clothes," replied Dare, still continuing his work.

"Stop it!" roared the little man, as he hobbled toward the camp. "It would be worse than wading into the water barefoot to undress here."

"Why?" asked Dare, in surprise. "My clothes are soaked with water, and I don't see any reason why I shouldn't dry them."

"You'd see and feel more'n ten thousand reasons why you shouldn't as soon as you were undressed. Haven't you been complaining of the mosquitoes all day? They are active little fellows down here in Florida, especially just at night-fall, and I had rather step on two sea urchins than give them a chance at my naked body."

"THEY'VE STEPPED ON SOME SEA URCHINS, THAT'S ALL."

There was no need for the Captain to say any more; Dare realized at once the trouble he would have been in had he done as he proposed, and he contented himself with wringing the water from his coat and vest, and squeezing it from his trousers legs as best he could. Then he sat down as near as possible to the fire that the heat might have full opportunity to drive the dampness out.

When the sun set and the shadows began to lengthen, the wind came up from the sea, causing the fire to roar and crackle in a cheerful way that had a soothing effect upon the one-legged man.

The warmth was grateful to all; the smoke that was driven closer to the ground served to keep the mosquitoes away, to a certain extent, and in case anything should have been learned of their misfortunes by those on shore, the flames would serve as a beacon.

"Now make yourselves just as comfortable as you can," said Captain Sammy, seating himself so near the blaze, in order that he might ward off the expected attack of rheumatism, that he ran great danger of setting his wooden leg on fire. "It ain't any kind of use to grumble at what you can't help, an' you might as well have a good time as to sit mopin' round."

This was good advice, but it sounded rather strange, coming as it did from the one who had been doing all the grumbling, while the boys had made the best of the adventure.

From the first moment Dare had seen the little Captain with his wooden leg he was sure that he had a perfect fund of stories from which he might draw without fear of exhausting it, and he thought the time might be pleasantly occupied by listening to them.

"Can't you tell us some stories, sir?" he asked, both fearing and hoping that the request would call forth one of those fits of scolding for which Captain Sammy was famous, and out of which the desired stories would finally come.

"Stories?" growled the little man. "Do you's pose I went to sea just for the sake of gettin' a lot of stories to tell to boys who have got me in such a scrape as you have?"

"No, sir," replied Dare, thinking the latter portion of the Captain's speech referred to Bobby. "But you would have had the adventures, whatever you might have gone to sea for, and now that we are here and where we can't get away, we would like very much to hear about them."

It seemed as if Captain Sammy was about to grant their request, for he resettled himself in a more comfortable position, and gazed out over the water as if he expected that from it would come memories which would aid him in the task.

Dare, who was watching him closely, saw his face suddenly light up, and he was certain that thoughts of some pleasant event in his life had come to the little man. But just when he expected to hear him commence a story, Captain Sammy jumped to his feet, and cried, joyfully:

"Here's a boat now! Those little rascals must have told where we were, and some one has come for us!"

Then he stood gazing out over the water with as much anxiety as if he had been a shipwrecked sailor who had waited months in the hitherto vain hope of seeing a sail.

APRIL GOLD.

BY MARY A. BARR.

Tom and his brother Antony
Lived with their grandfather Gray.
You'd never guess how Tom was fooled
Upon an April-day.
"Boys," said the old man, cheerily,
"Go down to the village store;
You'll find there's something there for you
That you never saw before."

Tom said he would, but Antony
Just shook his head and smiled,
"Grandfather dearly loves a joke,
But I'm not to be beguiled—
I've not forgot it's April-day;
I'm off to the mountain pool.
You may go to the village store,
But you'll be an April-fool.

So Antony went to the mountain pool,
And Tom to the village went,
And on the way was oft inclined
His going to repent.
But at the store he found a box
Addressed to Thomas Gray;
With many a hope and many a doubt
He carried the box away.

Antony said, "Don't open it;
It is just two years to-day
Matt Herrick got an April box—
It was full of moss and hay."
But Tom made answer to the doubt:
"That folly I do not mind;
I know who sent Matt Herrick's box,
But grandfather's far more kind."

Oh, but Antony laughed in glee
As off the covers were cast;
Twenty covers were taken off,
But the box was found at last.
Five golden dollars in the box,
And a little note that said:
"Dear lads, it isn't the smartest wit,
It isn't the wisest head,

"That always wins in this busy life,
We must love and trust always;
And, Tom, I'm glad your heart could trust
That even on April day
Grandfather would not cheat your hope
For doing what you were told;
And don't forget when you're a man
How you won your April gold."

AN OLD STORY FROM DENMARK.

THE BOY WHO FOUGHT AGAINST NELSON.

BY DAVID KER.

THERE are many things well worth seeing in the old town of Copenhagen, the prettiest of all Danish cities. There is the Exchange, built 260 years ago, with a queer old spire shaped like seven serpents all twisted up together. There is the great white mass of the Round Tower, with the winding path up which Peter the Great once went on horseback. There is the Frue-Kirke, with its marble figures of Christ and the twelve apostles, carved by the famous Danish sculptor Thorwaldsen, whose grave you may see in the middle of the Royal Museum, with the statues which he made standing around it like sentinels. There is the royal park, in the centre of which lies the ornamental lake where old King Frederick VI. used to row himself alone in a small boat, with crowds of people looking on. And then, last but not least, there is the tall house at the corner of the Oester Gade, or East Street (the Broadway of Copenhagen), at which the little Danish children looked up sadly one morning in 1875 when they heard that dear old Hans Christian Andersen was dead, and would never write fairy tales for them any more.

But the prettiest sight of all is the Soldiers' and Sailors' Burial-ground, which lies on the slope of a low ridge a little way north of Copenhagen, overlooking the white houses and red roofs of the city, and the bristling masts in the harbor, and the bright blue waters of the Sound, and the purple hills of Sweden beyond it.

There are no splendid monuments or long epitaphs here; nothing but plain wooden crosses, each marked with a simple date and the words "Fällt for Fædrelandet" (fallen for his country). Most of them bear the date of "1864," when poor little Denmark was crushed by Austria and Prussia together; but on a few of the older ones you will see "1801." This too was a memorable year for Denmark, and one of the stories connected with it is the story of the boy who fought against Nelson.

It is a fine morning in April, 1801, and the sun is shining brilliantly over Copenhagen. But his brightest rays can not pierce the thick clouds of rolling white smoke that drift upward, hot and stifling, from the batteries along the Danish shore, and the scores of stately ships on the smooth waters beyond, the thunder of whose cannon brings an answering echo from every hollow among the Swedish hills. Vice-Admiral Horatio Nelson, the terror of France and Spain, has come with an English fleet to punish Denmark for allying herself with England's mortal enemy, Napoleon; and this day it shall be seen how Danish men can fight under the eyes of their own people, with the Prince of Denmark himself to lead them on.

For more than three hours the battle has raged, and it is still as hotly contested as ever. Thick as a November fog lies the hot sulphurous smoke, through which a fierce red flash breaks ever and anon like lightning playing in a cloud. Unseen ships exchange volleys with musket batteries. Stone walls crumble and masts fall as if by magic, and death comes blindly, no man knows whence or how.

All along the harbor wall, despite the flying shot that plump into the water at their feet, or dash fragments from the parapets around them, are gathered crowds of pale faces and trembling figures—old men hardly able to crawl, weeping women, young girls clasping their hands tighter at every fresh burst of cannon-thunder, and round faced children gazing with wide wondering eyes at the maddening uproar around them. In all that great throng there is not one who has not a son, a brother, a husband, or a near friend in the heart of that rolling smoke, behind which Death is so busy; and well may they shrink and tremble as the gradual slackening of the Danish fire at length begins to tell that the day is going against Denmark.

Suddenly there issues from the thickest smoke, cast up by the tide at the very feet of those in the Tre-Kroner (Three Crowns) Battery, a mass of floating spars and clinging men, foremost among whom is a bright-eyed lad in the uniform of a Danish midshipman.

"Who are you?" asks a tall, fine-looking man in a richly embroidered suit of navy blue, for whom every one makes way respectfully.

"Oscar Villinves, midshipman of the Dannebrog, your Royal Highness," answers the boy, raising his hand to his wet, powder-grimed forehead in salute; for this tall man is the Crown Prince of Denmark himself. "We fought the Admiral's flag-ship till there were only a dozen of us left; and then, as we didn't choose to surrender to the Englishmen, we jumped overboard and floated ashore upon these spars."

The Prince's brow darkens, for the Dannebrog has been one of his finest ships. But before he can speak Villinves turns to those around him.

"Lads, who'll help me to make a raft? We'll show these English that a Dane's not beaten just because his ship has been sunk."

Fifty willing hands were instantly at work. The young midshipman gives his orders as coolly and clearly as the oldest captain afloat, and in a wonderfully short time a strong frame-work of beams and spars, with planks fixed crosswise upon them, lies all ready on the water.

"And now a couple of guns," cries Villimves, "and away we go!"

"But what are you going to do, my lad?" asks the amazed Prince.

"Get alongside the English flag-ship, and at her again. Her guns can't reach so low, and she'll soon see what our guns can do."

And the raft, impelled by as many men as can safely crowd themselves upon her, glides straight toward the huge three-decker that bears the flag of Admiral Nelson.

For this little patch of floating logs to assail the mighty line-of-battle ship seems as absurd as for a fly to attack an elephant; but it soon appears that Villimves is right. Lying right underneath the guns, and safe from their shot, he quickly makes himself felt. Splinters fly like snow from the stern of the Victory, and men fall right and left before the English can even tell whence the mischief comes. But at last an officer looks over the side, and sees with amazement that the cause of all this havoc is a small raft commanded by a boy.

"Get away, you young fool!" cries he; "you'll be shot if you don't."

"I'll be shot if I do," replied Villimves, laughing.

"Well, if you will have it, you must," said the other, in a tone of gruff admiration. "Marines, jump up here, and give these fellows a dose."

And now it begins to go hard with the poor little raft, for although the cannon can not reach her, the muskets of the marines deal death at every volley. But as each Dane falls another takes his place, and the fire never slackens for a moment. Villimves, his clothes torn with shot, his blood flowing from more than one wound, his men lying dead or wounded all around him, fights stubbornly on until only five of his crew are left.

Suddenly there comes a lull in the firing, and presently it ceases altogether. Then there looks over the stern of the British flag-ship a pale, worn face (at sight of which all the English sailors take off their caps respectfully), and Villimves hears a clear, sharp voice saying to him:

"Well done, my boy. You can leave your post now, for the order has been given to cease firing. Come on board and dine with us; we'll all be proud to have you, for you're the best man we've fought to-day."

The young hero's white face flushes proudly, as well it might, for he who praises him thus is no other than Admiral Nelson himself.

The morning after the battle there was a great gathering of English and Danish officers at the King's palace in Copenhagen. There were many splendid uniforms there, and many fine-looking men; but the object upon which all eyes were fixed was a small, slight, pale-faced man with one eye, and his empty right sleeve pinned to his breast. The Danes who had seen him before bowed to him with the utmost reverence; but those who had not, found it hard to believe that this little maimed sickly figure could really be the terrible Nelson who had destroyed their finest fleet at one blow.
