THE SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES.—"I cannot conceive of anything more grand and imposing in the whole administration of human justice, than the spectacle of the Supreme Court sitting in solemn judgment upon the conflicting claims of the national and State sovereignties, and tranquillizing all jealous and angry passions, and binding together this great confederacy of States in peace and harmony, by the ability, the moderation, and the equity of its decisions."—Kent.

Judge DOOLITTLE then responded as follows:

MR. PRESIDENT AND GENTLEMEN: This is indeed an unexpected honor, to be called upon to respond to the toast of the Supreme Court of the United States. As the president has already said, until I came here I had no expectation that I should be called; but it is a subject upon which I cannot, when called upon, refuse to speak. And if what I have to say has no other merit, it will have at least that of brevity, which is sometimes said to be the soul of wit. Allow me to call your attention, sir, and you gentlemen, to my first introduction to that great tribunal. Imagine to yourselves a youth just fresh from the schools, imbued with that respect for the institutions of our country which every youth then was taught to cherish next to the sentiments he felt towards the God of Heaven. Entering that chamber forty years ago this very month, there sat the judges, clothed in their robes. The chamber was still. Not a voice was heard nor a whisper, except of the counsel who was speaking, and that counsel was Daniel Webster. It was in the case of the Charles river bridge. There was the great counsel, with his face lit up, beaming with every expression of the soul. Listening with deep interest to the great lawyer of the Constitution, Daniel Webster himself, you can imagine the effect upon a youth under such circumstances.

Gentlemen, the Judges of the Supreme Court of the United States are called upon to discharge all the highest duties which devolve upon the House of Lords. We inherit all that there is in English jurisprudence—all that has been developed in Centuries, and we have inherited something more. We have a written constitution, defining substantially the powers and the duties of the United States as a nation, and the powers and the duties of the several States as sovereign and independent communities, limited only by the Constitution. While our Supreme Court passes upon all questions arising between individuals and corporations, all questions growing out of commerce, railroads, and all the other questions which concern communities, it is called upon to discharge a much higher duty, I believe, than was ever devolved upon any judicial tribunal in the whole history of the world—to hold the balance of power between sovereign States, the United States as a sovereignty and as a nation, between us and all the world, and in many respects as between the States on the one hand and the States themselves; with their reserved rights and sovereign powers limited only by the Constitution itself. And this Supreme Court, this high tribunal, is called upon to hold this balance, to adjust these delicate and difficult questions—to decide where the powers of the Union begin, where they end—where the powers of the States begin, and where they end. Without this great tribunal, the balance-wheel of our system, our Constitution would have been a failure. While the Constitution itself, as a gentleman expressed it to me, might have constituted the skeleton, the frame, the bone, so to speak, consists of the constructions and decisions of the Supreme Court. This court has given life, muscle, and vitality to our Constitution and made it a living and a practical government. I cannot, therefore, conclude any better than by repeating the words of Chancellor Kent: "I cannot conceive of anything more grand and imposing in the whole administration of human justice, than the spectacle of the Supreme Court sitting in solemn judgment upon the conflicting claims of the national and State sovereignties, and tranquilizing all jealous and angry passions, and binding together this great confederacy of States in peace and harmony, by the ability, the moderation, and the equity of its decisions."

Judge DICKEY was also called upon to respond, and met with an enthusiastic reception. He spoke as follows:

MR. PRESIDENT AND BRETHREN OF THE ASSOCIATION: I feel not a little embarrassment in being called upon to address you on a subject of such grandeur and gravity, and especially after so eloquent an address as we have listened to from Senator Doolittle. I, too, have had my experience in my first observation of that dignified and imposing court. I first entered its hall some eighteen years ago, utterly inexperienced in the usage of Eastern courts, familiar only with our log court houses in the West, and I felt much diffidence in approaching it. Next to the imposing dignity and grandeur of the surroundings, I was impressed with the kindness and urbanity that pervaded the court and its offices. It was not long before I felt myself at ease, and during my experience of several years, I may say that I never found any court in which a lawyer would feel that his imperfections would not be criticised with severity. Illinois has contributed her share to the greatness of that court. In an after-dinner speech I suppose one may be allowed a little latitude, and it may not be amiss to call attention to the fact that Illinois has added largely in proportion to her age and population to the list of great men of the nation. In this connection, the Judge mentioned the names of Judge Young, Mr. Douglas, Mr. McDougall, Col. E. D. Baker, Judge Davis, John A. McClernand, all of whose names were greeted with applause.

The judge continued: I have been proud of Illinois, and especially have I been proud of the bar of Illinois. One word upon another subject, not at all germane to the subject, and I shall occupy your attention no longer. Our honored president has referred to the usefulness of this association in cultivating a high standard of work in the profession. I have been practicing and looking on in Illinois now for forty years. When I first thought of entering the profession, I met with Cyrus Walker, the best nisi prius lawyer I ever saw. He suggested I should study law, and I told him that my father had said it was a difficult thing to pursue that profession and strictly maintain his dignity. Mr. Walker threw himself back in his chair and in the most emphatic manner said: "I am an elder in the Presbyterian church; I have practiced law for twenty-five years, and I give you my word as a christian and a gentleman that I can keep my conscience as clear at the bar as at the plow-handle." Having removed that obstacle from my mind I entered upon the study of law, and, after an experience of forty years, I have no hesitation in saying that the practice of law, as it is condcted in the State of Illinois, is calculated to cultivate and elevate the standard of honor and integrity, and that, as a class, the members of the bar of the State of Illinois have a standing that is not second to any other employment or class of men upon the face of the earth. I have known some young men who have consented to enter the profession without having that obstacle removed from their minds as it was removed from mine, and under the belief that, in order to practice law successfully, it was necessary to be a little dishonest. And I have known such young men, by association with members of the profession, gradually and steadily educated up until they became men of firm integrity and high character. From my experience of forty years, I have no hesitation in saying that the practice of law as practiced in Illinois has a tendency to elevate the standard of morality as high, if not higher, than the pursuit of any other calling.

"Federal and State Judiciary."

The next toast was:

THE FEDERAL AND STATE JUDICIARY—While to the former pre-eminence may be ascribed in the weight of its influence, the authority of its decisions, and in the attractiveness of their materials, the true interests and the permanent freedom of this country requires that the jurisprudence of the individual States should be cultivated, cherished and exalted, and the dignity and reputation of the State authorities sustained with becoming pride.

JUDGE CATON, in response, spoke as follows:

MR. CHAIRMAN AND GENTLEMEN: Before I address myself to the sentiment which you have read, I think before this Bar I should vindicate myself and explain the cause of action I have against some of its officers, and it may be necessary to call upon some of those courts that you expect me to speak of in the course of what I have to say. I came here under a solemn promise that I should not be called upon to speak. And I will submit to you, sir, and to the gentlemen of this association, if I have not a cause of action for a breach of promise in being called upon at this time. The subject of your sentiment, however, Mr. President, is a serious one. The relations which are home to the community at large by the Supreme Court of the United States, and by the judiciary organizations of the several States are so important that surely no lawyer can have failed to have reflected more or less upon the subject. Their organization presents a complexity of system unknown to any other country, and their conflicting jurisdiction to a certain extent calls for a forbearance, a discretion, or a deliberate wisdon, to prevent lamentable clashings which, I venture to say, can be found in no other profession or calling of men. When you remember that the line between the jurisdiction of the Federal and of the State courts has never been and never can be defined, it is not difficult to see the tendencies and the temptations of the clashing between these several jurisdictions and the wonder is how they have not got into actual warfare. I only hope and trust that the same spirit of moderation and wisdom which has kept in harmony the wheels of those various institutions which still prevail. Let each one remember that it is better to concede something, to concede what is doubtful at least, rather than to insist upon what is doubtful, for in no other way can the harmony which is indispensable to the peace and security of this community be maintained between these two systems of jurisdiction. I assure you, sir, that during the whole course of my life the greatest apprehension that I have felt for the safety and the permanency of this government has been the danger of the conflicting jurisdiction of these two tribunals, the State and the national. And I tell you, sir, that whenever prejudice or jealousy enter into these courts, a collision will take place that will shake this government to its very foundations. I wish all my professional brethren would reflect upon this, and remember that all their influence should ever be exercised in such a way as to endeavor to harmonize these tribunals rather than to antagonize them. In conclusion, I wish to express the gratification which I feel at again meeting those who have come after me. I have long retired from the active practice of the profession. I have done what I could to maintain and to uphold it, and I am proud to see that those who are following the steps which I have trod are doing more than I would ever be able to do. I rejoice to meet you now, and I hope that I may have the pleasure of meeting you again and again.

Attorney General EDSALL responded as follows:

MR. PRESIDENT: The relations of the Judiciary and the Bar are of such nature that one cannot well exist independently of the other. Either, without the other, would find itself in the condition of Othello—its occupation gone.

Whatever therefore concerns the authority, dignity, or respect due the courts, whether State or Federal, is of especial interest to the Bar.

We all cheerfully assent to the sentiment just read, which ascribes to the Federal Judiciary a pre-eminence, by reason of the weight of its influence, the authority of its decisions, and the gravity of the questions confided to it for final determination. The Supreme Court of the United States is intrusted with higher functions than any other department of the government. The Executive, while he executes, must obey the laws enacted by Congress. The Congress must conform its action to the written Constitution, which constitutes the chart of its powers.

The ultimate authority rests with the Supreme Court of the United States to determine whether the Executive and Legislative Departments in their action transgress the fundamental law under which they all act. Not only so; it rests with that high tribunal to determine whether the legislation of the respective States is repugnant to the Federal Constitution, and in this regard it may exercise an appellate jurisdiction above the highest courts of the States.

Upon this court has devolved the delicate trust of guarding the Federal Constitution against the encroachments of all other departmants of the Government, both State and national, and at the same time it is the final judge of the extent of its own powers and jurisdiction. A seat upon the Bench of that court, by one qualified to fill it, is equal in dignity to any other official position under our Government.

Nevertheless, as high as are the functions of that exalted tribunal, under our system of government, its decisions constitute the supreme judicial authority but upon a limited class of subjects —upon those only which pertain to, or in some manner spring out of, the exercise of the powers conferred upon the Federal Government.

As to the subjects upon which the States possess the exclusive right to legislate, the judiciary of the States must be recognized as the highest authority in the construction and interpretation of such legislation. This is necessary to the harmonious working of our complex system of government.

In fact, the great mass of statutory law which protects us in our persons and property, regulates our domestic and social relations, and which furnishes the law controlling the principal commercial and business transactions of the country, lies chiefly within the domain of State legislation. Upon these vast interests, so far as regulated by statutes, the decisions of the highest courts of the respective States are, and should ever be, regarded as the ultimate judicial authority. Their interpretation of their own statutes and Constitutions should be received in every other judicial tribunal as a part of the law itself I need not say in this presence that, from the foundation of our government, this principle has been constantly recognized and acted upon by the Supreme Court of the United States.

If in some few instances it has been apparently disregarded, even there it will be observed that the rule itself has been asserted, but an effort has been made to show that the particular case did not fall within its principle.

Nothing would more certainly lead to jealousies, and even collisions, between the State and Federal authorities than that the same law should receive variant constructions in their different tribunals. This would virtually make the law of the case depend upon the forum in which the cause was litigated. This tantalizing uncertainty, and unseemly conflict, can only be avoided by the frank and cheerful recognition of the principle, by both the State and Federal courts, that the decisions of each involving simply the interpretation of the Constitutions and stututes of their respective governments shall be accepted as final and conclusive authority by all other courts. The respective powers of the legislative departments of the State and Federal governments thus become the measure of the supreme judicial authority of each.

While we thus recognize the pre eminence of the federal judiciary as the expositors of the powers conferred upon the national government, and concede to it the right to construe and enforce the limitations upon state authority imposed by the Federal Constitution, we have faintly brought into view the broad field of jurisprudence confided to the State Judiciary. It is commensurate with the legislative power of the state.

It is true, then, that "the true interests and the permanent freedom of this country require that the jurisprudence of the individual States should be cultivated, cherished and exalted; and that the reputation and dignity of the State courts be sustained with becoming pride."

Every member of the Bar has, and should feel, a personal interest in this matter. Our admission to, and right to practice in, the Federal courts was through the door of the State courts. We all must have first entered there.

No man ever very much advanced his own reputation by defaming his mother. No member of the Bar ever very much advanced his own professional standing by disparaging the just authority and dignity of the courts in which he has the privilege of practicing. We may without disparagement to either, accord to both the State and Federal courts the highest measure of our professional fealty, and sustain the authority of each in the discharge of their appropriate functions.

While the sight of the flag which represents our national existence, independence and power should ever inspire us with patriotic ardor, may we ever take equal pleasure in beholding the undiminished lustre of each particular star emblazoned like a jewel upon its ample fold.

Judge E. S. WILLIAMS was next called on, and responded as follows:

MR. PRESIDENT: The sentiment to which we have just listened alludes to the pre eminence of the Federal Judiciary in the weight of its influence, the authority of its decisions, and in the attraction of the materials of such decisions.

This pre-eminence is due in part to the nature of the jurisdiction exercised by the Federal Judiciary, and in part to the character of the men who have exercised that jurisdiction. The authority of the decisions of such courts is due to both causes combined.

The United States Supreme court will serve as my best illustration. It exercises a more extended original and appellate jurisdiction than any other court. To the enlarged jurisdiction of the English equity, common law, and admiralty courts, is superadded the power of passing upon the constitutionality of the laws of the general and State governments, so far as they may be made the subject of judicial controversy, and its judgments upon such questions are conclusive. The functions of the executive and legislative departments of the government are thus under the limited control of the judiciary, and so law is not the mere expression of the legislative will, but the constitutionally-expressed will, in the construction given to the Constitution by the Supreme Court. More than this: This court adjudicates upon the conflicting rights of sovereignties, and becomes sub modo an arbiter of the disputes of nations. In no other country is there any court of co-extensive jurisdiction. The courts at Westminster Hall are limited in their jurisdiction by the omnipotence of the British Parliament, and by the framework of the government. Not so with the Supreme Court of the United States; and it is in part the greatness of this jurisdiction that gives to the court, and all who preside therein, its and their dignity and pre-eminence of influence and authority.

The contemplation and study of great themes develops greatness in the student, provided he possesses the capacity to comprehend them. A judge, compelled by his official duties to pass upon great questions of constitutional law, and upon the conflicting questions which disturb contending sovereignties, must grow greater on account of the subjects of his thought.

But this pre-eminence of influence of which I have spoken is also due in large part to the character of the men who have presided in the Supreme Court. In that bright judicial galaxy that spans the dome of English jurisprudence, all the luminaries of which it is composed have not been fixed stars, shedding upon the beholder only a pure and benignant radiance. Comets have not infrequently appeared, creating apprehension, if not consternation, by their eccentric movements. Meteors have flashed, and as suddenly grown dim. Eminent judges have been found whose ermine has been sadly soiled by corruption. Some have quickly succumbed to the seductions of a licentious court, and have made themselves the servile instruments of despotism. Some have forgotten the legitimate limits of their jurisdiction, and have substituted arbitrary will for the proper exercise of judicial functions. These lapses from integrity may have been few as compared with those who have remained faithful to their high trusts, but that they have sometimes occurred cannot be denied.

Not so with that bright constellation of judicial luminaries who have shone upon the Bench of the Supreme Court,—Jay, Rutledge, Ellsworth, Marshall, Taney, Chase, Story, not to mention many more of the illustrious dead and the honorable living,—have by their personal endowments, by their wisdom, learning, and virtue, reflected honor upon the Court in which they presided, and the age in which they lived. Of these names two stand out in bold relief upon the pages of judicial history—Marshall and Story—the one pre-eminent for his wisdom, the other for his learning; both great in intellect and in virtue. Marshall, always clear in his instructions, concise and logical in his reasonings, and singularly correct in his conclusions; Story, learned as well as logical, both luminous and voluminous, always exhausting his subject and often his reader; surprising you by the extent of his research and a display of an inappreciable mass of foreign wealth. • I have spoken briefly of the Supreme Court and its Judges, not forgetting that they are only a small number among the eminent names of the Federal Judiciary. I have spoken of them as the representatives, and the most honored representatives, of the entire body of United States Judges, who, with a few exceptions, richly merit the respect and admiration of their fellow citizens.

The latter part of the sentiment you have read, Mr. President, is in these words: "The true interests and the personal freedom of this country require that the jurisprudence of the individual States should be cultivated, cherished, and exalted, and the dignity and reputation of the State sustained with becoming pride."

The obligation to do this is rendered all the more imperative on account of the very pre-eminence to which allusion has been had, and the sense of obligation is none the less because of the just pride we take in that pre-eminence. It has been said to be a fault of all Judges to err on the side of amplifying their jurisdiction. If so, it is no more a fault in the Federal than in the State Judiciary. The necessity referred to in the sentiment is not so much on account of any action of the Federal Judiciary as from the legislation of Congress.

The repugnance which has been felt by the loyal portion of our citizens for the last twenty years to the extreme State's rights doctrines so generally promulgated during that period at the South and which culminated in the late rebellion, has contributed to bring about a legislation upon the part of Congress which has not only largely extended the jurisdiction of the Federal courts, but has seriously curtailed the heretofore acknowledged and exercised jurisdiction of the State courts.

It cannot be denied that this centralization of power in the United States courts, to the prejudice of the State courts, is regarded with jealousy by some and by apprehension by others. Were it certain that the tendency of Federal legislation for the next decade would be the same that it has been for the past, such an apprehension would be well founded. But the movements of our body politic are oscillatory. When the political pendulum has reached the extreme, the good common-sense of the American people, like the unerring law of gravitation, draws it back in the opposite direction. It is not the first time in American history that the tendency to centralization of power in the United States courts has been manifested.

In the case to which I refer its manifestation was by the judicial, not the legislative power. It found expression in the decision of the United States Supreme Court, delivered at Philadelphia at the February term, 1794, in the case of Chisholm v. the State of Georgia.

That case decided that a State was amenable to the jurisdiction of that court at the suit of a citizen of another State, and the decision was acquiesced in, and the centralizing tendency it embodied and expressed became a part of the then governmental policy. But the pendulum had reached the extreme of its vibration in that direction, and the sober sense of the American people compelled the abandonment of that policy and the introduction of the present constitutional limitations of such power, and in the year 1798 the Supreme Court unanimously determined that no jurisdiction should be exercised by it in any case where a State was sued by a citizen or citizens of another State.

The disposition now manifested by Congress to extend the jurisdiction of the United States Courts to the detriment of the jurisdiction of State Courts, has not apparently actuated the judges of those courts. They have not sought to extend their own jurisdiction by strained interpretations of the law, but have (except in a few instances) only exercised the jurisdiction manifestly conferred by law. If there has been any reason for jealousy upon the part of State judges, it has been because of legislative, not judicial, enroachments. It is the manifest duty of every judge to exercise his constitutional and legitimate authority whenever it is rightfully invoked, even though he may deprecate the existence of the power in his court.

If in the meantime the American people shall manifest its hostility to the centralizing tendency of the legislative branch of the government so as to cause a return to the former law, the apprehensions of many will be quieted, and the United States Judiciary eased of a portion of their undesired and onerous labors. I close with this sentiment: The Federal Judiciary—honored and admired by all classes of the community, and most by their brethren of the Bar and upon the Bench of the State courts, for their ability, learning, integrity, and virtue—we can wish nothing better for them than that the record of their judicial acts in the future should equal the glorious record of the past.

JUDGE BLODGETT was called upon to respond, and met with a hearty reception. After a few preliminary remarks, he said: This assemblage is made up, I am glad to see, of judges and lawyers. We judges are not so much in the habit of talking as being talked to. Now my idea of good times for our profession, both for judges and lawyers, is not to make speeches. My idea is to get together and exchange mutual congratulation and good fellowship without speeches, because speech-making is our trade. I am called upon, however, to respond to the toast of the Federal and State Judiciary. The history of the former is interwoven with the entire history of the country; it speaks for itself. With regard to the latter, the State of Illinois may well be proud of its State judiciary. It may well be proud of its Supreme Court, of its decisions, which are cited as authority all over the United States and in foreign countries. It may well be proud, not only of the ability which has been displayed by its courts, but of the integrity of the courts. So far yet in the history of this State, no smirch or stain, I say it with pride, I say it as one whose life has been spent in this State, whoes destiny is cast in it—no stain rests upon the judiciary of this State. It is a thing of which we may well be proud. I hardly know how I can add another word of praise to the judiciary of the State.

"The Legal Fraternity."

The next toast was:

THE LEGAL FRATERNITY—It is theirs to strengthen the pillars of the temple of justice, and raise its august dome still higher in the skies.

The response to this toast was made by W. H. BARNUM, and was eloquent, exhaustive, and learned. He spoke of the sages of the bar in the palmy days of Greece and Rome, compared them with the present, and claimed that the members of the bench and bar of the present day were equal in ability, learning, and integrity to those of any age.

Professor SWING, who is held in such high esteem by the members of the bar, was next called upon. He said he was unaccustomed to speak to so many legal gentlemen, and felt more than ordinarily embarrassed. "It is your custom," he said, "to invite one clergyman to your banquets to enjoy the result of the comparison, and I suppose on the day of judgment you will expect to become one of the Lord's little ones for having once fed one of His children, and when he was hungry having taken him in and given him drink. It is very pleasant to sit and see so many of you, gentlemen, here, and to hear the sentiments of to-night in regard to the conception of the principles of justice. But I come here as a representative of the cloth, and I want to say a word or two regarding the two professions. They are part of the same profession, and both were concerned about the ideas of justice. It ought to be a rule that a lawyer should be compelled to go to church regularly to keep up with the discussions of the pulpit, and conversely a minister ought not to be qualified to preach unless he had sat a year in the Supreme Court. The tendency of the two professions was to grow narrow. Every man started out with a determination to read widely, but he began to fall off rapidly, like the traveler who, being lost, came across a wagon-track and followed it, expecting to reach town, but the road first led to a farm-house, then to a pig-stye, finally changed into a squirrel-track, and then ran up a tree. Civilization was like the confluence of many rivers which descended from a mountain, and floating on that wave was man.

Mr. R. E. WILLIAMS, of Bloomington, followed, advocating the necessity of a pure and honorable Bar. The Roman Bar was one of the grandest that the world ever saw, but when it grew corrupt the whole civil structure fell. Even though the laws were not the best, as long as they were honorably and impartially administered they would be obeyed. An intelligent and honest Bar always furnished materials for a good judiciary. No dishonest or corrupt man could ever be selected for a judge. The law should be like the shadow of a rock in a dry land, which would be a refuge.

E. W. PATTERON, of the St. Louis Bar, and member of the Bar Association, followed. The legal profession, he said, had been maligned more, perhaps, than any other profession. There never was a man who knew so much but that he thought he could throw a slur on the legal profession. There was no profession where the tendency was so much toward honesty as in the legal profession, nor any in which there was less jealousy. When the millennium came there would be no need of ministers, nor doctors, but as long as order was heaven's first law there would be hundreds of lawyers needed to practice their profession.

The Hon. JOHN M. SCOTT, Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Illinois, honored the Association by his presence, and being called upon, was received with repeated rounds of applause. After a few preliminary remarks, he said:

It is my duty and my pleasure to hear speeches from members of the Bar, but not to make them, but as I am on the floor now I join most heartily in the expressions that have been made with regard to the very great influence of the Bar upon the interests of society. Indeed, that subject cannot be magnified beyond its true merits. It has its influence in many and varied directions, and, silent though it is, it is none the less powerful and effective now than before. It exists to a much greater extent than the people are aware. The judicial opinions that are delivered by the judges, and become the rules that govern our great commercial transactions and all the relations of life, are often in a measure the direct product of the Bar. The line of thought of those opinions is blocked out in many instances by the lawyers who argue the cases, and who are often entitled to the credit of the opinion rather than the judge in whose name it is delivered. It is in that way that you have influence upon society and all that affects its most important interests. I did not intend even to say this much. I desire now to express the great gratification and pleasure I have experienced in meeting with so many members of the Chicago Bar Association, for whom I entertain the highest respect.

"Our Clients."

The next toast was "OUR CLIENTS.—Bis solvit qui cito solvit." The first response was by D. L. SHOREY, as follows:

An advocate who has good causes and respectable clients, says Quinctilliam, need not fear ingratitude.

Under the Roman law—as it still is under the English law—the honorarium was the reward which the client gave in gratitude for the service rendered, for no English or Roman law has ever given to an advocate a right to enforce his claim for legal service.

It is not certain that, for the honor of the profession, we have a better rule in the United States, where the law affects to measure a lawyer's invaluable legal service as accurately as it measures the value of a bottle of wine.

Nevertheless, the American lawyers, animated by a feeling that has governed their brother lawyers in other countries, rarely seek to enforce such claims in the tribunals before which they practice.

Sir John Fortescue, writing in 1642, says: "There is scant any man found in the realm skillful and cunning in the law, except he be a gentleman borne, and come of noble stock." This accounts, in part, I suppose, for the high sense of honor among English lawyers about the honorarium. I do not know that the lawyers of our time are all gentle born, as Fortescue would understand it; but the culture demanded of the profession in our day has a very mellowing effect upon the raw material; and I think on this occasion we may assume that by all accepted standards a good lawyer is a gentleman.

Now, the habits of a gentleman are a little—not much—expensive; and lawyers are not, and ought not to be, money-grabbers; and when they need a little money the modesty and delicacy with which they suggest their necessities gives great force to the sentiment I am responding to, his solvit, qui solvit cit's,

It does not follow, because a lawyer's service is not to be measured by a money standard, that therefore he is to ignore the duty to see to it that his client is duly grateful. I have no occasion to give these wary old lawyers any advice on that subject. But there are ways of giving impulse to the dullest brain. Even the old English lawyers contrived to convey a suggestion now and then to a client whose sense of gratitude was not well cultivated. In the time of George III. a troublesome case was laid before Sergeant Hill. The fee noted on the back of it was only a guinea. The Sergeant returned the case with a brief note that "he saw more difficulty in the case than under all the circumstances he could well solve." And when the case was returned to the Sergeant with two guineas noted on the back of it, he sent an answer that he saw nothing in the case to induce him to change his mind

In the view, then, I take of the sentiment, I suggest to all the learned lawyers to put it as a motto at the head of the bills they send out for collection. What I mean just now by learned lawyers — circumspice, Mr. President — is those who have forgotten the Latin they used to read. And the vulgar lawyers, if any there be, whose ill-fortune it is never to have read, and therefore never to have forgotten, the language which Tully spoke—let them put as a motto at the head of their bills the words translated into their vernacular—50 per cent. off for cash.

To make a further response Mr. R. BIDDLE ROBERTS was called on, and he replied by a very happy and humerous speech. He proposed to translate the maxim by the injunction, "Pay twice, and that quickly." He closed by an earnest appeal to the profession not to consider the pursuit of wealth as the only object, and suggested that the profession should not make the upper stations so narrow and so little to be sought; that judicial stations would be declined because they would not pay.

COL. U. S. COOPER also responded to the same toast in a brilliant speech.

In reply to a call from Col. Cooper, Gen. STILES made a few remarks on the standing of the legal profession in his usual happy vein, and resigned in favor of another gentleman, who declined to make himself heard.

"Young Lawyers."

The next toast was:

YOUNG LAWYERS—They will reflect in their characters, conduct, and success the treatment they receive from the profession and the courts.

It was responded to by Arthur J. CATON, as follows:

MR. PRESIDENT AND GENTLEMEN:—That the older lawyers are exceedingly considerate of the younger members of the profession, there could be no greater proof than you have given to-night. That we should be represented at a meeting like this, composed of the leading members of this Bar, the Judges of the State and Federal Courts, and embracing among its numbers men with national reputations, is a compliment that we as young lawyers appreciate.

That the older and more prominent members of the profession should take a personal interest in the young lawyer, and extend to him the hand of fellowship and encouragement, is indeed fitting, for he who commences the practice of the law enters upon a course of study, to explore whose many paths must be a continuous labor. There is before him an infinite field for research, and even at the close of an honored life he can only expect to become familiar with a portion of its truths. The lawyer must deem no labor too severe, if he hope for success, for, while the many pages of legal learning present a thousand lights to illuminate his path, they can afford no guidance unless personal application be made to each.

That young lawyers reflect in their characters, conduct and success the treatment they receive from the profession and the courts is evident, for while the character of every man is to some extent formed by circumstances. and success may depend upon those influences which surround him, it is especially true of the lawyer.

The history of the Bench and Bar shows that there is in the practice of the law a silent influence which begets a fraternal feeling, and fills each with a desire to help and sustain the others; as a result of this we have a stronger bond of union cementing us together, and more professional etiquette than is usually observed in other walks of life. When we consider the effect that this must have upon one coming early under its influence, we see to what extent young lawyers must reflect in their lives the treatment they receive from the courts and the profession. In no way can the influence of either the bench or the bar be so strongly and surely felt as it is in the characters of those they are to so great an extent forming.

We appreciate that no forbearance by the courts, nor assistance from the older practitioners at the Bar, can make a successful lawyer. That can only be the result of personal and diligent effort. I need not refer you to the commencement of your professional lives.

True it is, we have helps and aids that many of you knew not of; still the fear that a wrong step might be taken must have been the same with you as with us. Then yon appreciated the kindness of the courts and the encouragement of the profession.

Should I ask those to-night who have gained the greatest eminence upon the bench or at the bar what first gave them that honorable ambition, without which they could not have attained the position they now occupy, the answer of not a few would be that the example of men in the profession first demonstrated to them what measure of success was possible of attainment. Mr. President and Gentlemen, if, in the profession of the law, honor, integrity, and true manhood are found, it is due more than anything else to the influence the profession exerts upon the young lawyer.

And, in conclusion, I feel authorized to say, in behalf of those for whom I am called upon to respond, and who with me have but lately commenced professional life at this bar, that we are indebted to those who here occupy the bench, and to those who have long filled honored positions at this bar, for the excellent examples you have given. You have shown to what splendid success intense application, guided by the highest honor, may lead; we have your examples before us, suggesting the possibilities of the future, and when to this we add the kindly treatment we have always received at your hands, I am sure I but express the purpose of every young lawyer when I say that it shall be our great ambition to bring no reproach upon a profession that you have done so much to honor. And when you shall retire with many rewards to enjoy that repose which a well-spent life so richly deserves, that we may fill the places of trust as faithfully as you have done, shall be our constant effort.

The next speaker, in reply to the same toast, was Mr. J. J. HERRICK, who spoke as follows:

When the young lawyer fresh from his books assumes the duties of his profession, it is, as a rule, with honest and worthy purposes. The tendency of the study of the law as a theory is to strengthen these purposes, to develop the better part of his nature, and to arm him with the best principles of action. When, however, he enters upon the practice of the profession, he finds himself at once surrounded by other and opposing influences, "there are pitfalls at every step." Opportunity, apparent self-interest, the desire for victory, seem to press constantly upon him to swerve him from the line of integrity or duty.

In this position we young lawyers are met by the most delicate and difficult questions, such as these: What is my duty to my client? What should be my advice as a lawyer? Is this professional? Is this a fair use of legal process? Will my duty to my client justify this course? These questions meet us every day. They spring upon us by surprise. We may soon form tolerably clear ideas of duty and professional ethics in the abstract. But the difficulty of determining in practice the precise extent of a principle or the respective force of duties still remains. These questions must be met and answered. By the principles thus derived we will form our professional character and direct our professional conduct. For the solution of such questions we must look to the profession itself. As we have identified ourselves with it we naturally adopt its standard. The conduct of its menbers toward ourselves and the solution which they have given by their acts to similar questions are our precedents and examples, and according to the principles which appear to actuate and control their conduct toward ourselves, will we direct our conduct towards them, towards each other, and towards those that follow us. Consciously or unconsciously they will mold our professional character and conduct, and these in turn will direct and influence our success. In our character, conduct, and success will be reflected their lessons, their examples, their encouragement, their conduct toward us in the varying duties of the profession, their influence upon us as students, as advesaries, or as members of a common profession.

There is an unwritten law of professional honor and professional ethics, which is as much the heritage of the profession as the common law itself. It has made that profession honored and honorable in the past. It has not been preserved in books, but has been transmitted through the lives and characters of the members of the profession. From that source only can we acquire a knowledge of it. And only so far as we find it exemplified can we be guided by it, and preserve it in our character and conduct.

The legal profession has always been characterized by a liberal and generous spirit towards its younger members. It springs from a feeling of a common pursuit, and finds expression in words and acts of advice, of encouragement, and of kindness. The influence of these acts upon the success of the young lawyer cannot be overestimated. They arouse a new ambition, they smooth the rough paths, and create a new and deeper interest in the profession. This Association is, I believe, sir, in a great degree an outgrowth of this same spirit. Its best fruits will be gathered by those who are to-night the young lawyers, and its best results wil be realized when they, however unworthily, shall represent the profession and the courts. and shall illustrate in their character, conduct and success, its healthful influence.

This concluded the regular toasts. Mr. DEXTER, in answer to repeated calls, came forward and kept the party in a roar of laughter for about five minutes Mr. HERVEY was then called for but declined to respond. The association adjourned at one o'clock in the morning. The best of order prevailed during the entire evening.

EX-CHIEF JUSTICE CATON took the greatest interest in the inter-State rifle match which took place upon the range of the Chicago rifle club on Wednesday last. Although the weather was inclement and rainy, the judge remained upon the range the whole day.

The Courts.

UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT.

OCTOBER TERM, 1875.

LONG et al. v. CONVERSE et al.

In error to the Supreme Judicial Court of Mass.

WHEN A WRIT OF ERROR LIES FROM U. S. SUPREME COURT TO STATE COURT.

In this case a contest arose between a receiver of a railroad company, appointed by a State court, and the plaintiffs in error, for the possession of certain bonds and coupons, which said plaintiffs held and claimed as their own. Before the contest, the railroad company had been adjudged a bankrupt in the same State and assignees appointed. The State court decreed that the plaintiffs in error should deliver the bonds and coupons to the receiver. The assignees in bankruptcy consented to this decree. The present writ of error was brought to reverse this decree, and the court held that this is not a case "where any right, title, privilege, or immunity is claimed under any statute of the United States, within the meaning of section 709 of the U. S. Rev. Statutes," and dismissed the case for want of jurisdiction.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

Opinion by WAITE, C. J.

On the 20th of July, 1870, a bill was filed in the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts for the foreclosure of a mortgage executed by the Boston, Hartford and Erie Railroad Company, to secure the payment of certain bonds. The bill prayed a sale of the mortgaged property and the appointment of receivers Henry N. Farwell was named as one of the defendants, he being one of the trustees under the mortgage, and also one of the directors of the company. Process was served upon him July 21, 1870.

On the 2d of August, 1870, an order was made appointing receivers, with authority to take possession of all the property of the railroad company, including all moneys, credits, choses in action, evidences of debt, books, papers, and vouchers.

On the 1st of March, 1871, the railroad company was adjudged a bankrupt by the District Court of the United States for the District of Massachusetts, and on the 18th of the same month an assignment of its property, according to the provisions of the bankrupt act, was made to Charles S. Bradley, Charles L. Chapman, and George M. Barnard, as assignees. This assignment was made to include all the property of which the company was possessed on the 21st of October, 1870.

On the 20th of September, 1871, the receivers of the railroad company filed in the supreme judicial court their petition against George W. Long and John C. Watson, alleging, in substance, that when the order appointing them receivers was made, Farwell had in his possession, as one of the officers of the railroad company, certain coupons of bonds of the Hartford, Providence and Fishkill Railroad Company, and of bonds of the city of Providence, which were the property of the Boston, Hartford and Erie Railroad Company, and which, by the decree, he was ordered to deliver to them; that the railroad company had no right to sell or transfer the coupons or put them in circulation; that he had no right to the coupons or their possession; that notwithstanding this he had, subsequent to their appointment as receivers transferred to Long and Watson five hundred of the coupons of the bonds of the city of Providence; and that Long and Watson, at the time, had full knowledge of the rights of the railroad company, and that Farwell had no power or authority to make the transfer.

The petitioners asked that Long and Watson might be ordered to deliver the coupons to them, and restrained from collecting the money due thereon.

Long and Watson answered the petition, denying that Farwell, at the time of the appointment of the receivers, held the coupons in trust for the railroad company, and averring that he held them as collateral security for a debt owing to him by the Hartford, Providence, and Fishkill Railroad Company. Having no knowledge whether the Boston, Hartford and Erie Railroad Company had authority to sell the coupons or put them in circulation, they left the petitioners to make such proof of that fact as they might deem material. They admitted the transfer to them by Farwell after the appointment of the receivers, but denied any knowledge of the rights of the railroad company, and averred that they purchased them from Farwell in good faith, believing that he had the right to make the transfer.

Subsequently, on the 27th of June, 1872, they filed an amendment to their answer, setting up the bankruptcy of the railroad company, and the assignment to the assignees, and concluding as follows: "Wherefore these respondents submit that the said petitioners had not, at the date of the filing of said petition, if they ever had, any right to the possession of any of the property of the said Boston, Hartford and Erie Railroad Company, and particularly to the possession of the coupons in said petition alleged to be the property of the said company and in the possession of these respondents."

The cause was referred to a special master. Upon the coming in of his report exceptions were filed, and at the April term, 1872, an entry was made on the docket of the court, as follows: "Plaintiff's exceptions sustained. Decree for the receivers upon the evidence reported." The cause was then continued. On the 28th of August, 1872, the assignees in bankruptcy filed in the cause a paper addressed to the court, in which they represented that, "having read * * * the proposed decree of this court against George W. Long and John C. Watson, ordering them to surrender and deliver up to the receivers the coupons of the bonds of the city of Providence described in the petition against them, we do assent to said decree and to the delivery of the coupons to the receivers, as therein ordered."

Afterwards, on the 5th of May, 1873, a decree in form was entered by the court, in which it was "found as a matter of fact, and further ordered, adjudged and decreed, that the respondents, George W. Long and John C. Watson, took the interest coupons sought in this petition to be recovered of them, to-wit, etc., under circumstances which preclude said Long and Watson from claiming the right of holders for value in good faith, and that, as against the petitioners in said petition, said Long and Watson required no better title to said coupons than Henry N. Farwell himself had, and that said Farwell had no right or title to the same, and that the right to the possession of, and the title to said coupons are now in the petitioners, * * * notwithstanding the amended answer of said defendants and the alleged adjudication, in bankruptcy and subsequent assignment made therein." Thereupon, it was further decreed that the receivers recover of Long and Watson the money which it appeared they had collected during the pendency of the suit from the city of Providence, upon the coupons received by them from Farwell.

To reverse this decree the present writ of error has been prosecuted.

Our jurisdiction in this case depends upon the effect to be given to that provision of the judiciary act (Rev. Stat., 709) which authorizes this court to re-examine the decisions of the highest court of a state in certain cases, "where any title, right, privilege or immunity is claimed under" any statute of the United States.

Long and Watson did not claim under the assignees in bankruptcy. They set up the title of the assignees, not to protect their own, but to defeat that of the receivers. They claimed adversely to both the receivers and assignees. They did not even allege that the assignees had ever attempted to assert title. The contest was one originally for the possession of certain papers. The decree for money was given, because, pending the suit, the papers sought for had been exchanged for money, and the receivers were willing to accept the exchange. In the absence of the assignees from the case, the decree could have no effect upon their title to the coupons or money. If, when the demand was made upon Long and Watson by the receivers, they had surrendered the coupons, that surrender would have been a complete defense to a future action by the assignees, inasmuch as they had not before that time asserted their claim, either by demand or notice. The title of the assignees to the property would not have been defeated by the transfer. Whatever rights they had against Long and Watson could be enforced by an appropriate proceeding against the receivers. The whole effect of the surrender, so far as the assignees were concerned, was to transfer the custody of the property from Long and Watson to the receivers. In this case the transfer was not voluntary, but in pursuance of a decree rendered by a court of competent jurisdiction, with the assent of the assignees. Under such circumstances it is not easy to see how the assignees can proceed further against the parties who have only obeyed the commands of the court. Clearly their remedy, if they have any, is against the property in the hands of the receivers.

The second section of the act of 1867 (14 Stat. 485), which was in force when this writ of error was brought, and which has been substantially re-enacted in the revised statutes (Sec. 709), differs only from the 25th section of the judiciary act of 1789, so far as the provision now under consideration is concerned, in the substitution of the word "immunity" for "exemption." In the old act the words were "title, right, privilege, or exemption;" in the last, "title, right, privilege, or immunity." This does not materially affect the rights of the parties in the present case. The words when used in this connection, and applied to the circumstances of this case, have substantially the same meaning.

The construction of this provision in the act of 1789, came before this court for consideration as early as 1809, in the case of Owing's Lessee v. Norwood, 5 Cranch, 344. That was an action of ejectment in a state court. The defendant, being in possession, set up an outstanding title in a third person under a treaty. The writ of error from this court was dismissed for want of jurisdiction. In the progress of the argument Chief Justice Marshall used this language: "Whenever a right grows out of, or is protected by a treaty, it is sanctioned against all the laws and decisions of the states, and whoever may have this right, it is to be protected. But if the person's title is not affected by the treaty, if he claims nothing under a treaty, his title can not be protected by a treaty. If Scarth or his heirs had claimed it would have been a case arising under a treaty. But neither the title of Scarth nor of any person claiming under him can be affected by the decision of this case." In Montgomery v. Hernandez, 12 Wheat, 129, a suit was brought in a state court by parties beneficially interested in a bond given to the United States by a marshall to secure the faithful performance of his official duties. The suit was in the names of the beneficiaries and not in that of the United States for their use. It was insisted that their could be no recovery, because the action should have been prosecuted in the name of the United States, and this was assigned for error in this court. But it was said "the plaintiff in error did not and could not claim any right, title, privilege, or exemption by or under the marshall's bond or any act of Congress giving authority to sue the obligors for a breach of the condition," and that the court had no jurisdiction of the case on that ground. Again, the same question was presented and elaborately argued in Henderson v. Tenessee, 10 How. 311, decided in 1850. That also was an action of ejectment in a state court, in which the defendant set up an outstanding title in a third person, under an Indian treaty, and there too, the writ was dismissed. In delivering the opinion of the court, Chief Justice Taney said: "It is true, the title set up in this case was claimed under a treaty. But to give jurisdiction to this court the party must claim the right for himself, and not for a third person in whose title he has no interest. * * * * The heirs of Miller appear to have no interest in this suit, nor can their rights be affected by the decision. The judgment in this case is no obstacle to their assertion of their title in another suit brought by themselves or any person claiming a legal title under them." To the same effect are Hale v. Gaines, 22 How., 149, 160, and Verden v. Coleman, 1 Black, 472. This must be considered as settling the law in this class of cases. And it seems to be decisive of this case. Long and Watson claim no title, right, privilege or immunity under the bankrupt law. Their obligation to account for the coupons in their hand is not discharged by the law. The title of the assignees can not be affected by the decree except through their consent. It follows, therefore, that this case must be dismissed for want of jurisdiction.

U. S. DIST. COURT, N. D. OF ILL.

JOHNSON et al. v. THE CITY OF CHICAGO et al.

THE CITY'S RIGHT TO TAX VESSEL PROPERTY.

1. TONNAGE—DUTY OF TONNAGE—That the tax in question is not a "duty of tonnage" within the meaning of the third clause of section 10 of the first article of the U. S. Constitution.

2. ASSESSED IN NAME OF VESSEL.—The objection that the tax is assessed in the name of the vessel and not in the name of the owner, under the circumstances in this case overruled.

3. JURISDICTION.—The jurisdiction of a court of admiralty in such cases stated.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

Opinion of the court by BLODGETT, J.

This is a libel against George Von Hollen and the City of Chicago for possession of the schooner North Cape. The admitted facts are that said schooner was, on the 1st day of May, 1874, owned by the libelants, Jacob Johnson, Spier Amundson, and Nels Peterson—Johnson owning one-half, and the others each a quarter interest—Johnson and Amundson residing in the city, and Peterson at Lake View. Said vessel was registered, enrolled, and licensed under the laws of the United States in the office of the Collector of the Port of Chicago in the name of Johnson as owner, and was engaged at and since that time in the business of commerce upon the navigable waters of the United States between the port of Chicago and ports of other States, being a vessel of over 20 tons burthen. Between the 1st of May and the 1st of July, in the year 1874, said vessel was assessed by the assessor of the city of Chicago at the valuation of $7 000; said assessment being entered on the assessment-book in the following form:

"A complete list of all the taxable personal property of the South Division of the city of Chicago, Ill., according to the assessment-roll, as returned or revised by the Board of Assessors for the year 1874."

LIST OF VESSELS REGISTERED IN THIS DISTRICT AND NOT ENTERED.

Name of Vessel.	Name of Owner.	Valuation.	Tax.
North Cape.....	Jacob Johnson.	$7.000	.....

By an ordinance duly passed by the Common Council of the city of Chicago on the 9th day of November, 1874, a tax of 18 mills on the dollar was levied and assessed for the fiscal year 1874, on all real and personal property in said city at the valuation thereof shown by the assessment for that year as made by the city assessor. And on the 9th day of December, 1874, a warrant was issued to George Von Hollen, collector of said city, authorizing and directing him to collect said tax. The warrant was in the same form as the assessment as far as regards the description of the schooner, and name of owner and her valuation, with an additional column in which the tax was carried out and fixed at $126, which is 18 mills on her valuation. The warrant was in the usual form and directed the collector to collect the taxes assessed from the persons and property against whom the same was assessed. This tax remaining unpaid, the collector, on the 13th of September, 1875, levied upon and took possession of said schooner under the assumed authority of his said warrant, and held the same by virtue of said levy at the time of the filing of the libel in this case. It is also admitted that the practice of the city assessor in making assessments upon vessel property has been and is to assess the same to the owner or owners with their other personal property when the owners list or return the same to the assessor, but when the owners fail to return or list their vessel property, the vessel is assessed by name in the name of her owner as appears by the register in the office of the United States collector of customs of the port of Chicago.

It is claimed by the libelants that the levy upon this vessel was void.

First—Because this is a "duty of tonnage," within the meaning of the third clause of sec. 10 of the firs article of the Constitution of the United States.

Second—Because said assessment and warrant for the collection of said tax are void, for the reason that the assessment is against the vessel itself by name, and the warrant runs against the vessel and not against the owner.

On the part of the respondents, Von Hollen and the City of Chicago, it is urged, by way of demurrer to the libel, that a court of admiralty has no jurisdiction in the case made by the libel and facts in this case, and that the only remedy is to be found in the courts of law.

I do not find that this precise question of jurisdiction has ever been raised and passed upon by the courts of this country or England. At least, neither my own examination nor the industry of counsel has discovered any direct authority bearing upon the question. Upon general principles, however, I am of opinion that admiralty has jurisdiction in a case of unlawful seizure of maritime property for taxes or duties. Kent says: "Admiralty possesses authority to decree restitution of a ship unlawfully withheld by a wrong done from the owner. In cases of illegal capture, bottomry, salvage, and marine torts, the admiralty courts in this country inquire into and decide on the rights and titles involved in the controversy." 1 Kent, 371. And the student of this branch of the law well knows that the tendency has been to enlarge the sphere of admiralty jurisdiction rather than to restrict it since Chancellor Kent's time. "Admiralty has jurisdiction of all torts upon and injuries to maritime property committed on navigable waters, when actions of trespass as in the case would be if committed upon land in other classes of property." 23 How., 213; 5 How., 464. So, too, Mr. Justice Story enumerates the following classes of cases as unquestionably falling within the jurisdiction of the admiralty courts, viz.: "Assault or other personal injuries, collision, spoilation and damage (as they are technically called), such as illegal seizures, or depredations on property; illegal dispossession, or withholding from the owner of ships, commonly called possessory suits; cases of seizure under municipal authority for supposed breaches of revenue or other prohibitory laws; and cases of salvage." 3 Story's Com. on Const., 527; Conkling's Ad., 21. In the case of the schooner Tilton, 5 Mason, 465, it was said by the same learned authority: "Suits in admiralty touching property in ships, are either petitory suits, in which the mere title to the property is litigated and sought to be enforced, or they are possessory suits, to restore the owner to the possession." The same point was held by the same learned judge in DeLoris v. Boit, 2d Gallison, 398. And it is a fundamental principle that admiralty has jurisdiction of petitory and possessory actions to recover ships when replevin would lie at common law. Benedict's Admiralty, 165, sec. 275.

Concluding, then, that this is a proper case for admiralty jurisdiction, the question is, Does the case made entitle the libelants to the relief prayed, or to any relief in the premises? The first point made by the libelants is, that the tax in question is a "duty of tonnage" laid specifically upon this vessel by the city of Chicago, and as such void, because not laid with the assent of Congress. What is the "duty of tonnage" meant to be prohibited by the Constitution of the United States? It is a well-known historical fact that nearly all European States and divers free cities and ports were in the habit of levying a tax upon all vessels entering their ports in proportion to their tonnage. And this was what was known to the maritime and commercial world at the time of the adoption of the Constitution as tonnage-tax, or duty of tonnage. The intention of the framers of the Constitution was not only to make commerce free between the States, but to prohibit the States from in any manner, of their own will or caprice, interfering with foreign commerce. A tonnage-tax is defined to be "a duty levied on a vessel according to the tonnage or capacity, without reference to where her owner resides. It is a tax upon the boat as an instrument of navigation, and not a tax upon the property of a citizen of the State." The duty of tonnage which the Constitution of the United States prohibited the States from levying is any duty or tax on a ship, as such, without regard to the residence of her owner, whether it be a fixed sum upon its whole tonnage or a sum to be ascertained by comparing the amount of tonnage with the rate of duty. When a ship, as an instrument of commerce, is required to pay a duty as a condition to her being allowed to enter or depart from a port, or load or unload a cargo, either upon her tonnage, her property, or as a license to her officers or crew. Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat., 1; The Passenger Cases, 7 How., 459; Steamship Company v. Port Wardens, 6 Wall., 34; State Tonnage Cases, F, 12 Wall., 212.

This tax does not purport to be levied upon this vessel according to her tonnage, but according to her valuation as property. It is a tax upon this ship as part of the taxable property of the city of Chicago, she being owned and registered here. This tax is not like a tonnage tax, imposed upon the ship as such, for the privilege of trading or taking shelter in this port, but treats the ship as property subject to a tax in this city.

The question of the liability of property in boats and vessels to be taxed by the State authorities, on valuation, as other property of the State is taxed, has been frequently discussed by the Supreme Court of the United States, and the power uniformly conceded.

In the Passenger cases, 7 How., 402, the court said: "A State cannot regulate foreign commerce, but it may do many things which more or less affect it. It may tax a ship or other vessel used in commerce, the same as other property owned by its citizens." So in the State tonnage cases, 12 Wallace, 212, the court said: "But ships and vessels owned by individuals, and belonging to the commercial marine, are regarded as the private property of their owners, and not as the instruments or means of the Federal government, and as such, when viewed as property, they are plainly within the taxing power of the States, as they are not withdrawn from the operation of that power by any express or implied prohibition contained in the Federal Constitution. Argument, therefore, to show that they may be taxed as other property belonging to the citizens of the State is hardly necessary, as the opposite theory is indefensible in principle, contrary to the generally received opinion, and is wholly unsupported by any judicial determination. Direct adjudication to support that proposition is not to be found in the reported decisions of this court, but there are several cases which concede that such a tax, if levied by a State, would be legal, and no doubt is entertained that the concession is properly made.

"Taxes levied by a State upon ships and vessels owned by the citizens of the State as property, based on a valuation of the same as property, are not within the prohibition of the Constitution, but it is equally clear and undeniable that taxes levied by a State upon ships and vessels as instruments of commerce and navigation are within that clause of the instrument which prohibits the States from levying any duty of tonnage without the consent of Congress; and it makes no difference whether the ships or vessels taxed belong to the citizen of the State which levies the tax or the citizens of another State, as the prohibition is general, withdrawing altogether from the States the power to lay any duty of tonnage under any circumstances, without the consent of Congress.

"Annual taxes upon property in ships and vessels are continually laid, and their validity was never doubted or called in question, but if the States, without the consent of Congress, tax ships or vessels as instruments of commerce, by a tonnage duty, or indirectly, by imposing the tax upon the master or crew, they assume a jurisdiction which they do not possess, as every such act falls directly within the prohibition of the Constitution.

"Prior to the adoption of the Constitution the States attempted to regulate commerce, and they also levied duties on imports and exports, and duties of tonnage, and it was the embarrassment growing out of such regulations and conflicting obligations which mainly led to the abandonment of the Confederation and to the more perfect union under the present Constitution."

In the light of these authorities I therefor conclude that this tax is not a "duty of tonnage."

I come now for a moment to consider the second objection to this seizure on the ground that this assessment and warrant are against the ship and not against the owner, and for that reason void. It was concluded on the hearing that ships and vessels are personal property, and such all the authorities define them to be. The law in this State in force at the time this assessment was made required the owners of all personal property to return each year to the assessor a schedule or list of all their personal property subject to taxation by a certain day to be fixed by the Assessor, and it was the duty of the assesor to fix the fair cash value thereof. (Rev. Stat., Chap 120, Sec. 24; Rev. Stat., Chap. 24, Secs. 249, 251, 252, and 253.) The twenty-fifth section of Chapter 120 prescribed the form of the schedule, and required, among other things, that it should distinctly set forth in the seventeenth item "every steamboat, sailing vessel, wharf boat, barge, or other water craft," etc. And by the thirteenth section of the same chapter it was provided that "All persons, companies, and corporations in this State owning steamboats, sailing vessels, wharf boats, barges, and other sailing craft, shall be required to list the same for assessment and taxation in the county, town, city, village, or district in which the same may belong or be enrolled, registered, or licensed, or kept when not enrolled, registered, or licensed."

Here is a plain and palpable duty imposed by law upon the owner of vessel property. It was admitted on the hearing that, between the 1st of May and 1st of July, 1874, a motion was sent to, or served upon, the owners of all vessels, as shown by the register of the port, requiring them to list their property as required by law. It is not contended that the interest of these libelants, or either of them, was scheduled in any list of taxable property returned by them or either of them to the assessor. In fact, it is admitted that the only tax assessed upon or against this property is the one now in question. Undoubtedly this vessel, being personal property, should be taxed against some owner. The general theory of our law does not allow of the assessment of the tax on personal property as an independent res or thing, as it may be assessed on real estate under certain circumstances,—although there are some features of our later revenue laws which seem to point to the idea that the legislature intended, even in regard to some classes of personal property, like bank shares, capital stock, and vessel property, to tax the thing itself without regard to any personal liability of an owner. But, notwithstanding these incongruities, the general principle running through our law, as it now stands and stood at the time the tax was levied, required the owner of vessel property to list it as personal property for taxation where it was subject to taxation, either by virtue of his residence or the enrollment and registration of the property. It is not necessary that I should decide what would be the duty of the owner of a vessel residing at one place when his vessel is enrolled or registered in another tax-district, as it is not claimed that these owners, or either of them, were taxed elsewhere for this vessel, and it is admitted that two of the owners, representing three-fourths of the property, resided in Chicago, and the vessel was registered or enrolled as owned by libelant, Jacob Johnson. Here it is admitted that the owners of this property made no returns of it to the assessor, and the assessor assessed it in the form and manner I have indicated. The assessment and warrant show the name of the vessel and the name of her registered owner, her valuation, and the tax; nor does it appear that Johnson or either of the other libelants made any return of other personal property. The position is, that this is a tax against the vessel, as such by her name—an assessment and warrant in rem, so to speak—instead of an assessment against her owners.

But I differ with the proctors for libelants as to the construction and effect to be given this assessment and warrant. True the owners might have returned their interest in this vessel in their list of personal property, and if they had done so it should and would have gone into their personal property assessment; but they neglected to do this, and left the assessor to search out this property, fix its ownership, and assess its value as best he could. The assessor has made an assessment in which the name of the owner, the description of the property, and its valuation, all appear. What more is requisite? and what else could the assessor have done under the circumstances? The warrant, like the assessment, shows the name of the owner, the description of the property, its value, and the amount of the tax. I know of no other legal requisites for a tax warrant; nor does it make any difference, in my estimation, that the description of the property is in the first column to the left hand, and the name of the owner in the second. It seems sufficient if these facts appear on the face of the paper.

This may have been, and, for aught that appears in this case, was, the only property for which Jacob Johnson was taxed in the year 1874. If his property was valued too high, or if he was taxed as sole owner of a piece of property when he was only part owner, the law provides a way in which he could by attending to it in apt time have had the assessment corrected; but it does not lie in his mouth, after neglecting his duty in regard to listing his property, and after allowing the time to pass within which the assessment, as made by the assessor, stood open for correction, to object to the assessment in these particulars, when it was his obvious duty to have made it right in the first instance or had it corrected in proper time,

The policy of our law is that all property shall bear its equal share of the burdens of the State and city government. A court of admiralty is essentially a court of equity, and unless the libelant shows that some plain legal or equitable right has been violated, or is in danger of being violated, relief will not be given in this court. This vessel was subject to taxation by the city of Chicago. She was registered in the name of Jacob Johnson, who was a resident of this city. He must, for the purposes of taxation, be presumed to be the sole owner. It is possible that if Johnson had, while the assessment was subject to correction, appeared before the proper tribunal and shown that he was only half owner, and asked to have the assessment corrected in that particular, it might have been done. But he failed to do this, and there is enough, as I think, upon the face of the assessment and warrant and upon the admitted facts, to show that the tax was properly assessed.

It may be said that Peterson, one of the libelants, and owner of a quarter interest in the property, did not reside in the city of Chicago, but resided at Lake View, and, therefore, his interest could only be taxed where he resided. My answer to that is, that Johnson appeared to be the sole owner of record, and officers charged with the assessment and collection of taxes are not required to look into the secret ownership of personal property. They do their duty when they assess the property against the apparent owners, as shown by possession or muniment of title. Take, for instance, a large wholesale or manufacturing firm in this city. There may be silent partners residing elsewhere, who have an interest in the goods, but the property is here, the firm, as a business entity, is here, and this, therefore, should be, and, under the law, is the place of taxation.

I come, then, to the conclusion that the tax complained of in this case is not a "duty of tonnage," and that the warrant under which this vessel is seized and held is so far good as to amount to a justification in this court of the seizure complained of. I do not say that it would be a justification in a court of law, for that question is not before me; but a court of admiralty, like a court of equity, looks into the substantial merits of the controversy, and I find this property subject to assessment in the city. That it was in form so assessed, and a warrant issued to the collector for the collection of the tax, and no reason is shown or made to appear why the tax should not be paid. If the property is taxed in the name of one owner instead of three, it is owing to the negligence of those owners in not returning their schedules, or calling for a correction of the books after the assessment was made.

The libel will, therefore, be dismissed with costs.

U. S. CIR. COURT, S. D. OF OHIO.

OCTOBER TERM, 1875.

JOHN W. ANDREWS, EXR., v. JOHN W. GARRETT, survivor, et al.

REMOVAL OF CAUSE FROM STATE TO FEDERAL COURT.

1. A suit commenced and actually tried in a State court before the passage of the act of Congress of March 3, 1875, but in which a new trial had been granted, and which was pending after the passage of the said act, may be removed from such State court to the Circuit Court of the United States.

2. The condition of the suit, or the time it has been pending, makes no difference in the jurisdiction.

On the 25th day of March, A. D. 1867, suit was brought by the plaintiffs against the defendants in the Court of Common Pleas of Muskinguin county, Ohio, to recover the sum of $10,000 deposited with the defendants by the plaintiffs as indemnity for acceptance by them for the accommodation of the Steubenville & Indiana Railroad Company, and which, by reason of certain facts set forth in the petition, the plaintiffs claim the defendants became liable to pay them. Attachments were issued upon this petition, and certain property was attached. On the 18th day of May, 1867, the defendants filed a motion to remove the cause into the Circuit Court of the United States, on the ground that the defendants were citizens and residents of the State of Maryland, and that the plaintiffs were citizens and residents of Ohio. Upon the hearing of the motion, it appeared that one of the plaintiffs was a citizen and resident of Ohio, one a citizen and resident of Illinois, and one a citizen and resident of Minnesota. The motion was overruled. Thereupon the parties proceeded to make up the issues in said Court of Common Pleas, and at the April term, 1873, a jury was empanneled and the case submitted to the court, and judgment rendered in favor of the defendants.

At the same term the plaintiffs were awarded a second trial, under the statute. Amendments were made to the pleadings, and the cause was continued from term to term until the November term, 1874, when a trial was had before a jury, and a verdict was rendered for the plaintiffs.

At the same term the verdict was set aside, and the cause was continued till the January term, 1875.

On the 25th day of January, the cause was again continued. At the same term, to wit: April 25th, 1875, the order of continuance was set aside; and, on the same day, a petition was filed by the defendants in the State Court, praying for a removal of the cause to the Circuit Court of the United States, under the provisions of the act of Congress of March 3d, A. D. 1875. Bond, with proper security, was filed. The grounds of removal were, that the defendants were citizens and residents of the State of Maryland, and that one of the plaintiffs was a resident of the State of Illinois, one a citizen and resident of Minnesota, and the other a citizen and resident of Ohio. This application was resisted upon the ground that the case did not come within the provisions of the act of March 3d, 1875, because not filed with the court at or before the first term at which the cause could be tried, and before the trial thereof. Upon the hearing of this petition the court, for the reasons that the action was triable and was actually tried in said court before the passage of the act of Congress, overruled said motion.

Afterwards, on the 12th day of May, 1875, the defendants filed in this court transcripts of the record and proceedings in said cause; and, afterwards, on the 6th day of October, a motion was filed in this court to strike the case from the docket on the ground of want of jurisdiction.

Mr. GRANGER, of Muskinguin county, and E. F. HUNTER, Esq., of Lancaster, for plaintiffs.

Senator THURMAN for the defendants.

SWING, J. The disposition of this motion involves the construction of the second and third sections of the act of Congress passed March 3, 1875. The second section of that act provides "that any suit of a civil nature, at law or in equity, now pending or hereafter brought in any State court where the matter in dispute exceeds, exclusive of costs, the sum or value of $500, and arising under the Constitution or law of the United States. * * Or in which there shall be a controversy between citizens of different States, etc., either party may remove said suit into the Circuit Court of the United States for the proper district. And when in any suit mentioned in this section, there shall be a controversy which is wholly between citizens of different States, and which can be fully determined as between them, then either one or more of the plaintiffs as defendants actually interested in such controversy may remove said suit into the Circuit Court of the United States for the proper district."

The third section provides "that whenever either party, or any one or more of the plaintiffs or defendants entitled to remove any suit mentioned in the next preceding section, shall desire to remove such suit from a State court to the Circuit Court of the United States, he or they may make and file a petition in such suit in such State court before or at the term at which said cause could be first tried, and before the trial thereof." * * —LEGAL NEWS, vol. 7, p. 217.

The remaining part of the section refers to the bond and proceedings upon it.

It is not denied that the amount involved in this case, and the citizenship of the parties, were within the requirements of the second section. The amount was over five hundred dollars. The controversy was between citizens of different States, and the suit was pending in a State court at the time of the passage of the act of Congress, possessing every element to authorize its removal to the Circuit Court of the United States.

The third section simply provided the time when and the mode in which the application shall be made for such removal, and the steps necessary to accomplish such removal. The mode is to be by petition to the State court, and the time is before or at the term at which said cause could be first tried, and before the trial thereof.

The facts found by the learned judge of the State court show that the petition was properly filed, and all the necessary steps taken in accordance with the provisions of the 3d section, and that the petition was filed before or at the term at which said cause could be tried, after the passage of said act of Congress. And if the term referred to be the term after the passage of the act, there can be no controversy in the case. The jurisdiction must be admitted. That Congress had the power to authorize the removal of the cause in its then condition can not be doubted. Insurance Company v. Dunn, 19 Wallace, 214. Did they, by the terms and the spirit of this statute, so authorize its removal? The language of the statute is, any suit now pending, in other words, all suits now pending of the requisites may be removed, and the length of time which the suit had been pending, or the condition it was in if no final judgment had been rendered, could make no possible difference in the reason which operated upon Congress to confer the jurisdiction, as is clearly shown in the reasoning of the court in the case of Insurance Company v. Dunn.

The term referred is the term at which said cause—what cause? The cause referred to in second section, to wit: any cause pending at the passage of the act could be first tried after the passage of the act, and not the terms, at which said cause could have been tried long before the passage of the act.

The motion will therefore be overruled to dismiss the petition for removal.

THE UNITED STATES v. HARRY CHASE et al.

SUIT ON COLLECTOR'S BOND—INTERNAL REVENUE—THE FIVE PER CENT. OF THE AMOUNT OF COUPONS TO BE DEDUCTED BY R. R. COMPANIES.

Opinion by WELKER, J. This was an action on an official bond, and the learned judge in substauce said:

The defendant Chase, was collector of Internal Revenue for the Tenth District of Ohio, and as such officer received from the Toledo, Wabash and Western Railroad Company the sum of $24,823,87, being 5 per cent, reserved by said company on the payment of their coupons in the months of August, October and November, 1867, under section 122, of the act of June 30, 1864, and amended by section 9 of the act of July 13, 1866, and which sum he failed to pay over to the government. The company did not make return to the assistant assessor of the district of the said amount of said five per cent tax, but did make out such return and handed it to the collector to be by him delivered to the assistant assessor, which was not certified by the oath of either its treasurer or president. The company on the 1st day of June, 1868, and at the time said return was handed the collector, paid to the collector the amount of said tax, and the collector gave the company a receipt therefor signed by him as such collector. The return so made by the company and handed the collector was never delivered to the assistant assessor. On the trial it was claimed by the defendants, who were sureties of Chase on his collection bond, that they were not liable, because the return of said company was not made to the assistant assessor as required by law, and that therefore there was no proper or legal assessment of said tax so as to make the payment thereof to the collector a receipt of public money by him for which the sureties are liable.

That it was a mere voluntary payment of said company to the collector, and not authorized by law.

Held, 1st. That the requirement of said section 122, that railroad companies shall deduct and withhold five per cent. of the amount of coupons, and pay the same to the government as a tax on such interest so received is a charge of a certain sum on the railroad company, and without assessment makes the company a debtor to the government for the sum prescribed.

2nd. That the collector was authorized to receive such tax without a return thereof having been made by said company to the assistant assessor as directed by said section.

3rd. That when the company made out and handed the collector to be given to the assessor a statement of amount of such reservation of five per cent. of interest received, it was such a fixing and acknowledgment of amount due the government, as made that amount received by the collector public money, and covered by the official bond of the collector, and for which sureties thereon are liable.

4th. That the Supreme Court of the United States in re Savings Bank v. United States, 19 Wallace 227, having decided that five per cent. undistributed earnings of said bank is a charge upon the bank, and without assessment, makes the bank a debtor for which a suit may be brought by the United States for its recovery, the principle of the decision applied to this case determines that the five per cent. due from the railroad company is such a debt due and payable to the United States, and that the collector being the only officer authorized to receive it, he having so received the same, it was public money in his hands.

Judgment for plaintiff for $35,725.65 and costs.

The case was argued by District Attorney WILLEY and Assistant Attorney SHERMAN for the United States; and by E. BISSELL and Geo. R. HAYNES and R. WAITE, for defendants.

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

GEORGE CHANDLER, receiver, etc., v. JOSHUA BROWN.

Appeal from McLean.

INSOLVENT INSURANCE COMPANY—RECEIVER—POWERS OF—STOCKHOLDERS—DISCRETION.

1. That under the 25th section of the act concerning corporations, passed in 1872, it was incumbent on the plaintiff to clearly show a legal right to institute and carry on the suit. To this end he should show his appointment by a decree which is conclusive as against the defendant.

2. POWER OF RECEIVER.—The decree assumed to confer upon the receiver discretionary powers to compromise with the stockholders with regard to the payment of subscriptions. Each stockholder has a vested right in the contract for subscription of every other stockholder, and it is beyond the power of a court of equity to invest any person with a discretionary power to release it.

3. PARTIES—STOCKHOLDER.—That to conclude a stockholder under said 25th section, he must be made a party to the proceeding as it provides.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

The opinion of the court was delivered by SCHOLFIELD, J.

This was an action of assumpsit by appellant, as receiver of the Lamar Insurance Company, against appellee, to recover the balance remaining unpaid on his subscription to the capital stock of that company. The declaration, after amendment, was composed of eight counts, but appellant subsequently entered a nolle prosequi to all but the first and second counts, and to these appellee demurred. The court sustained the demurrer, and the only question raised by his appeal is, was the demurrer properly sustained? So far as it is necessary to notice the allegations in these counts, they are the same.

It is, among other things, alleged that the company did acts authorizing a forfeiture, by permitting execution to be returned, "no property found," and by allowing executions to remain unpaid for more than ten days after demand, and that it did practically dissolve, leaving debts unpaid. That afterwards, the company being unable to meet its liabilities, certain persons, composing a firm, filed a bill, as well in their own behalf as in behalf of all other creditors of the company, against the company and others, in the Superior Court of Cook county, in which proceeding the court acquired jurisdiction of the company. That in said case the company was declared insolvent, its affairs ordered to be adjusted and closed up, and the plaintiff was appointed receiver of the estate of the company, in conformity with law, and was duly invested and clothed with all the property, assets, effects, rights, privileges and powers of said company. That plaintiff gave bond as receiver, and the company conveyed to him the money, property, assets and effects of the company, including the stock, bond or contract executed and delivered by the defendant to the company.

And a subsequent order of the Superior Court of Cook county is then recited, authorizing the plaintiff to collect from all who had not paid twenty per cent. on their subscription, the deficiency, so that all should be equal, and directing plaintiff to levy twenty per cent. more on the stock, and give notice of such assessment by publishing a notice in a newspaper published in Chicago, and mail a notice to each stockholder; that he first make a call of fifteen per cent., and if that be sufficient, on its payment, to surrender the obligation of the stockholder, and if it be not sufficient, that he make further calls until he secure sufficient for that purpose; that if any stockholder prove insolvent, the deficiency be made up by dividing the same among the solvent stockholders, and providing that the assessments of the plaintiff, when made, be valid, and authorizing him to sue for and collect the same, under the statute.

It is further alleged that he published a notice of the assessment in a newspaper published in Chicago, and a further order of the Superior Court of Cook county is recited, wherein it is said that the time for settlement allowed the plaintiff has expired; that a large number of the stockholders are willing to settle on just and equitable terms; that others refuse to pay either under the assessment or in any other way, and that the assessment of twenty per cent. was made for the purpose of equalizing the burdens, etc. And it is then ordered that all settlements made be ratified, and that the plaintiff be empowered to settle with others for such sums as he may deem equitable, and to surrender their obligations, etc. But in case plaintiff has to sue, he shall sue for and collect the entire amount unpaid on the stock, etc.

It seems to be conceded these proceedings were had under the twenty-fifth section of the "act concerning corporations, approved April 18, 1872, and in force July 1st, 1872," by which it is enacted as follows: "If any corporation, or its authorized agents, shall do, or refrain from doing, any act which shall subject it to a forfeiture of its charter or corporate powers, or shall allow any execution or decree of any court of record for a payment of money, after demand made by the officer, to be returned 'no property found,' or to remain unsatisfied for not less than ten days after such demand, or shall dissolve or cease doing business, leaving debts unpaid, suits in equity may be brought against all persons who were stockholders at the time, or liable in any way for the debts of the corporation, by joining the corporation in such suit; and each stockholder may be required to pay his pro rata share of such debts or liabilities, to the extent of the unpaid portion of his stock, after exhausting the assets of such corporation. And if any stockholder shall not have property enough to satisfy his portion of such debts or liabilities, then the amount shall be divided equally among all the remaining solvent stockholders; and courts of equity shall have full power, on good cause shown, to dissolve or close up the business of any corporation, to appoint a receiver therefor, who shall have authority by the name of the receiver of such corporation (giving the name) to sue in all courts, and do all things necessary to closing up its affairs as commanded by the decree of such court." 2d Gross, § 34, p. 106.

It can hardly admit of argument that to conclude a stockholder, by a proceeding under this section, it is indispensable that he shall have been made a party thereto, as it provides. He has a substantial interest therein, and is entitled to his "day in court."

It is incumbent on the plaintiff to show clearly a legal right to institute and carry on the suit. To this end he should show his appointment by a decree which is conclusive as against the defendant.

This he has failed to do. It nowhere appears, either by the recitals in the decree copied in the several counts, or by distinct averment that the defendant was a party to this proceeding.

The decree is, in our opinion, objectionable also, in assuming to confer upon the plaintiff discretionary powers to compromise with the stockholders with regard to the payment of the subscriptions. Each stockholder has a vested right in the contract for subscription of every other stockholder, and we think it beyond the power of a court of equity to invest any person with a discretionary right to release it; at all events, it can not be done by a decree to which the stockholdors were not parties.

We see no error in the ruling of the court below, and its judgment will be affirmed.

Judgment affirmed.

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

OPINION FILED OCT. 14, 1875.

DEWITT C. BARBER v. JAMES BELL.

PROMISSORY NOTE—LIABILITY OF INDORSER—DEMAND—WHAT LAW GOVERNS.

This was a suit by Bell against Barber on an indorsed note given by Dawes & Co., payable to Barber, and by him indorsed before due to Bell. The note was payable at the Merchant's N. Bank, Cincinnati, O., and was indorsed in Illinois. The makers of the note were residents of Ohio, but had some property in Illinois. Extensions were given until 25th Dec., 1874, by consent of the parties to this suit and the makers of the note. This suit was instituted against appellant as indorser at the April term, 1875. Held,

1. That it was not necessary before a recovery could be had against the indorser to present the note at the place where it was payable by its terms.

2. That the note being indorsed in this State, the contract between the indorser and indorsee must be governed by the laws of this State.

3. The makers of the note being non-residents of the State when the note matured, the liability of the indorser became fixed.

4. That appellee was under no obligation to attach the property of the makers of the note in this State.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

Opinion by CRAIG, J.

This was an action of assumpsit brought by James Bell, in the Circuit Court of Perry county, against Dewitt C. Barber, on an indorsed note given by E. C. Dawes & Co., payable to Dewitt C. Barber, and by him indorsed, before maturity, to the plaintiff.

The parties, by agreement, dispensed with a jury, and a trial was had before the court, which resulted in a judgment in favor of the plaintiff. The defendant, Barber, brings the record here by appeal.

The makers of the note resided in the State of Ohio, but the indorsement was made in Perry county, Illinois, where appellant resided. The note was executed Sept. 2d, 1872, due in six months. An agreement was, however, made in January, 1873, between appellant, appellee, and the makers of the note, by which the time of payment was extended twelve months, without prejudice to the rights of appellee, as indorsee. A further extension was given until the 25th of December, 1874, by consent of appellant. The makers of the note were not sued, but this suit was instituted at the April term, 1875, against appellant, as indorser. In two counts of the declaration it is averred that the makers of the note, when it matured, were not residents of the State, and have not been since. The other counts aver the insolvency of the makers, and that suit against them would have been unavailing. The note was payable at the Merchants' National Bank, Cincinnati, Ohio, and it is insisted by appellant that no recovery could be had against him without proof that the note was presented for payment at the place where, by its terms, it was payable.

The note was indorsed in this State, and the contract between the indorser and indorsee must be governed by the laws of this State. In this State the law is well-settled that appellee was not bound to aver or prove a demand of payment of the makers of the note at the place where it was payable, and it is not necessary to enter upon a discussion of the question. New Hope, Delaware, Bridge Co. v. Perry, 11 Ill., 467; Wood & Co. v. Merchants' Savings, 41 Ill., 267; Wilder v. DeWolf, 24 Ill., 190.

It is however urged by appellant, that as appellee used no diligence to collect the note from the makers, he is not liable as indorser. Under the statute of 1845 there are three contingencies under which the indorser may be held liable:

1st. Where the assignee, by the exercise of due diligence, prosecutes the maker to insolvency.

2nd. Where the institution of a suit against the maker would be unavailing.

3rd. Where the maker has absconded or left the State when the note falls due.

In Schuttler v. Piatt, 12 Ill., 418, it was held that if the maker of the note is beyond the limits of the State when the note matures, so that he cannot be subjected to our jurisdiction, the liability of the assignor becomes fixed. In that case as in the one before us, the makers of the note resided in another State, and that fact was known to the assignee of the note when he purchased, but the court held that such fact did not vary the liability of the indorser.

In Mason v. Bruton, 54 Ill., 350, was a case where the maker of the note resided in Wisconsin, the payee of the note indorsed it in Chicago. It was held that the assignee of the note was under no obligation to follow the maker out of the jurisdiction of our own State, but when the note became due, the fact that the maker of the note was in a foreign jurisdiction gave the assignee a right of action against the indorser. Whether the makers of the note resided out of the State when the note was given, or whether they left subsequent to the execution of the note can make no difference; in either event, the liability of the indorser is the same. It is, however, urged by appellant that the makers of the note had property within the State, and appellee was bound to attach the same.

It was in proof that Dawes & Co. had in the county of Perry some eight tons of railroad iron, worth about $60 per ton, which was in the possession of appellant, and a portion of it in use on a raiload.

In addition to this it was shown that Dawes & Co. had deeds of record for certain town lots, but whether they held a legal title to the property it does not appear. It was also shown that Dawes & Co. were largely indebted, that they owed appellant $15,000; that they had suspended payment; under such circumstances, had appellee attached, there is no probability that any portion of his debt could have been made. But we are of opinion that appellee was under no obligation to attach property of the makers of the note. When the note matured the makers were without the jurisdiction of the State; under the statute the liability of appellant, as indorser of the note, became fixed and appellee was not bound to incur the expense and risk of an action of attachment suit. The judgment of the Circuit Court will be affirmed.

SUPREME COURT DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

OPINION DEC., 1875.—THE COURT SITTING IN BANC.

JOHN J. WEED AND WILLIAM PENN CLARK v. LEANDER M. BLACK.

CONTRACTS TO INFLUENCE LEGISLATION VOID.

1. That all contracts for services generally, in procuring legislation, are void from public policy, and it is the duty of the courts so to declare.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

Opinion by A. WYLIE, J.

Previously to the 21st July, 1870, the defendant held certain claims against the government of the United States, generally known as Montana war claims, in regard to which the plaintiffs had rendered him certain services. But the claims had not been paid, or allowed by the government, and it became necessary to procure the passage of an act of Congress for that object. On the 15th July, 1870, Congress passed an act anthorizing the secretary of war to ascertain the expense incurred by the authorities of Montana territory in suppressing Indian hostilities, and the names of persons entitled to relief. The plaintiffs in this action had rendered active services in procuring the passage of that law, and evidence was given to prove that the act itself was drawn up by Mr. Weed, one of the plaintiffs.

The act having passed on the 15th of July, 1870, the following contract was entered into between the parties, on the 21st of the same month:

"Whereas, I have a claim against the United States for horses, equipments and supplies furnished by me to the territorial authorities of Montana Territory, and used in suppressing Indian hostilities in said Territory in the year 1867. And whereas, Weed & Clarke have been engaged in making efforts to secure the payment of said claim, and propose to continue such efforts until said claims are settled and paid:

Now, therefore, in consideration of the premises, and of the services heretofore rendered, and hereafter to be rendered, by said Weed & Clarke, in the prosecution of said claim, I do hereby agree to pay to them, the said Weed & Clarke, twenty per cent. of the amount collected by them on said claim, and I hereby agree that the amount herein specified to be paid to them shall be paid out of the moneys allowed and paid to me on said claim at the time I may receive the same.

And the said Weed & Clarke hereby agree to pay and discharge any claim or charge which may be made by Hon. J. M. Cavanaugh against said L. M. Black for services rendered by him in securing the payment of said claims.

Dated Washington, D.C., July 21, 1870.

(Signed) L. M. Black,
Weed & Clarke."

At the date of this contract, the Hon. J. M. Cavanaugh was a delegate from Montana in the Congress of the United States.

In pursuance of the act of Congress above referred to, Gen. Hardie was appointed by the Secretary of War to investigate these claims, and Weed appeared before him in December, 1870, as agent of the defendant. Part of the claims were allowed, and others suspended by Gen. Hardie.

On the 30th May, 1872, Black, the defendant, gave written notice to Weed & Clarke, that he had revoked their authority, for the reason that they had been negligent as to their duties in the business, and that he had employed other agents in their stead.

On the 3d of March, 1873, an act of Congress was passed directing payment of such of the claims as had been allowed by Gen. Hardie, which amounted to $55,613.25.

The verdict of the Circuit Court in this case was for $11,322.65—at the rate of twenty per cent. on this sum; but the plaintiffs having entered a remittitur for $4,075.69, a judgment was entered in their favor for the balance, $7,245.69.

The main question in the case was as to the validity of the contract; and the decision of that question was left by the court to the jury, as one of actual fraud, to be determined "upon proof."

On its face the contract was for a contingent fee, which was to be divided between the plaintiffs and the delegate named, for services to be rendered, or for services which had already been rendered, by all three, in procuring the allowance and payment of the claims, under authority of acts of Congress. One of these acts had already been passed, and one other at least had yet to be passed before the claims could be paid.

This question has been so often decided by the Supreme Court of the United States, that we must regard it as conclusively settled. All contracts for services, generally, in procuring legislation, are void from public policy, and it is the duty of the courts so to declare. "Agreements for compensation contingent upon success, suggest the use of sinister and corrupt means, for the accomplishment of the end desired. The law meets the suggestion of evil and strikes down the contract from its inception." See Marshall v. B. & O. R. R. Co., 16 How., 325; Tool Co. v. Norris, 2 Wall., 52; Trist v. Childs, 21 Wall., 441.

Honest contracts, however, whose character appears upon their face, are unaffected by the rule. If the terms of the contract be broad enough to cover services of any kind, whether secret or open, honest or dishonest, the law pronounces a ban upon the paper itself. Nor will honest services subsequently performed sanctify an unlawful contract. But contracts which provide for compensation in consideration of particular services to be rendered, such as the collection of evidence, the preparation of papers, or the delivery of arguments, in support of claims, are legitimate everywhere. Even these, however, would not be sustained, if employed as covers for actual frauds against the policy of the law.

These considerations are deemed sufficient to dispose of the present case, finally. The other points are of minor consequence and need not be considered.

The judgment should be set aside and a judgment entered in favor of the defendant, non obstante veredicto.

JOHN D. MCPHERSON & L. G. HINE, for plaintiffs.

WM. F. MATTINGLY for defendant.

LV. NEW HAMPSHIRE.

Through the kindness of JOHN M. SHIRLEY, official reporter, we have received advance sheets of the 55th volume of New Hampshire Reports, from which we take the following head-notes:

McIntire v. Eastern Railroad, p. 558.

REFERENCE LAW—PRACTICE.

A case having been referred by order of the court, and no proceedings having been had under the order until after the act of July 3, 1875, changing the law in regard to references, had been passed. Held, that the order should be rescinded, and the question of reference be determined by the court under the law as amended.

Brooks v. New Durham, p. 559.

ATTORNEY'S AUTHORITY TO REFER PENDING CAUSE.

An attorney of record, in an action which had been sent to a referee by order of court, signed an agreement in writing that the report of the referee should be final, and the agreement was entitled as of the term of the circuit court to which the report was to be made. Held, that his client was bound by such agreement.

Lang v. Stockwell., p. 561.

SECRET TRUST—RESERVATION OF USE OF CHATTEL BY VENDOR.

Upon the sale of a chattel, it was agreed as part of the bargain that the vendor should still have the right to use the thing sold, in and about his business. Held, that such reservation, being inconsistent with an absolute sale, constituted a secret trust, from which fraud as to the creditors of the vendor was an inference of law; and that the actual intention of the parties would not be inquired into.

Chase v. Boody., p. 574.

BAILMENT FOR HIRE—DEGREE OF CARE.

C. bailed to B. a horse, for hire, to convey him from D. to S. B., upon arriving at S., put up the horse in a proper place, and the next morning properly watered, fed, and cared for her, and left her, intending to return, and in fact returning, within a suitable time to care for her, but having reason to apprehend that A., sixteen years of age, would attempt to water the horse during his absence. A. turned the horse loose to water her, and the horse, in consequence thereof, became lamed. Held, that these facts showed no evidence of lack of ordinary care and prudence on the part of B., and that he was not liable to C. for the damages.

Vaughan v. Morrison.

PLEADING—EFFECT OF JUDGMENT DISCHARGING TRUSTEE IN ACTION BY ADMINISTRATOR OF THE DEFENDANT.

In an action of trover, the defendant filed a brief statement, alleging, in effect that before the bringing of this suit he had been summoned as trustee in certain actions commenced by one B. against the plaintiff's intestate, in which he was sought to be charged for the same property; that judgment was duly rendered in those suits, discharging him as such trustee; that the appointment of this plaintiff as administrator was procured by the same creditor, B., for the purpose of bringing the present action against him for the same property. Held, that the judgments in the trustee suits did not constitute a bar to the maintenance of the present action, by way of estoppel, inasmuch as neither the parties nor the issue were the same; and that the brief statement must be rejected.

We call attention to the following opinions, reported at length in this issue:

Writ of Error from U. S. Supreme to State Court.—The opinion of the United States Supreme Court, by Waite, C. J., as to when a writ of error will lie from the Supreme Court of the United States to a State Court, under section 709 of the Revised Statutes.

Tax—Vessel—Tonnage.—The opinion of the United States District Court for the Northern District of Illinois, by Blodgett, J., upon several interesting questions relating to the taxation of vessels by State authorities.

Suit on Official Bond.—The opinion of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Ohio, by Welker, J., in an action brought by the United States on the official bond of a collector of internal revenue.

Removal of Cause from State to Federal Court.—The opinion of the United States Circuit Court for the Southern District of Ohio, by Swing, J., holding that a suit commenced and actually tried in a State Court, before the passage of the act of Congress of March 3, 1875, but in which a new trial had been granted, and which was pending after the passage of said act, may be removed from such State Court to the Circuit Court of the United States.

Insolvent Insurance Company—Receiver—Stockholder.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of Illinois by Scholfield, J., as to the rights and powers of a receiver of an insolvent insurance company, under the 25th section of the act of 1872, concerning corporations. The court is of the opinion that a court of equity cannot confer upon a receiver discretionary powers to compromise with the stockholders with regard to the payment of subscriptions; that each stockholder has a vested right in the contract for subscription of every other stockholder.

Note—Liability of Indorser—Property of Maker in State.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of this State, by Craig, J., where the firm of Dawes & Co., who resided in Ohio, gave their note to the appellant, Barber, who resided in Illinois payable at a bank in Cincinnati. Barber indorsed the note to the appellee, Bell. Dawes & Co. had property in Illinois. On a suit brought by Bell against Barber, as indorser, it was held that Dawes & Co. being absent from the State at the time the note matured, the liability of Barber, the indorser, became fixed; that in order to sustain an action by him it was not necessary that the note should have been presented at the bank where it was made payable; that the appellee was under no obligation to attach the property of the makers of the note in Illinois, and that as the note was indorsed in this State, the contract between the indorser and the indorsee must be governed by the laws of this State. In this connection we would refer our readers to an elaborate opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States in 8 Chicago Legal News, p. 105, stating what law governs the liability of parties to a note or bill when they are residents of different States.

Contract to Infuence Legislation.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, by Wylie, J., holding that all contracts for services generally in procuring legislation are void from public policy, and it is the duty of the courts so to declare.

NOTES TO RECENT CASES.

RIPARIAN RIGHTS—NAVIGABLE STREAM—MISSOURI RIVER.

The Supreme Court of Missouri, in Benson et al v. Morrow et al., 2 Cent. Law Journal, 798, held, that there are in Missouri no navigable streams, within the meaning of the common or civil law definition of this term; but the Missouri river having been declared a navigable stream by act of Congress, the doctrine of riparian property, as established with regard to non-navigable streams, is not applicable to this river.

ATTACHMENT OF SCHOOL-TEACHER'S SALARY.

The Kentucky Court of Appeals, 12 Albany Law Journal, 391, in Clark v. Lee's assignee, held that a school teacher who is to be paid by the city officers out of moneys set apart by law for school purposes, is an "employee of the State," and his salary cannot be attached. The court cites, approvingly, Tracy et al. v. Hernbuckle et al., 8 Bush., 336. We do not remember of any decision in this State upon the precise question, but we have no doubt it would be held that money due a school teacher for teaching could not be attached in the hands of a school officer.

PRESUMPTION OF DEATH FROM SEVEN YEAR'S ABSENCE.

It was held by the Supreme Court of Missouri, in McRee v. Coplin et al., 2 Cent. Law Journal, 813, that where an ancester died at St. Louis, in 1803, leaving several heirs, and among others a son, who then resided at New Orleans, a mere failure to hear of such son in St. Louis, the residence of the ancestor, for seven years after the death of such ancestor, no inquiries having been made in New Orleans, will not raise a presumption of law that the son died unmarried and without issue after the lapse of seven years.

DEFAMATION—PRIVILEGE—WITNESS—MILITARY COURT OF INQUIRY.

The English House of Lords, in Dawkins v. Rokeby, 36 L. T. Rep., N. S., 196, held the ordinary rule of law that a witness is absolutely privileged in what he says or writes in giving evidence before a court of justice, even if he has acted male fide, and with express malice, extends to a witness before a military court of inquiry, called in pursuance of the regulations of the army to inquire into matters of military discipline, though the witness be not examined on oath before such court. Lord Penzance said it is inexpedient on grounds of public policy to remit such questions as the truth and bona fides of a witness to the judgment of a jury.

RIGHT OF BURIAL—MANDAMUS.

The Philadelphia Court of Common Pleas, in Commonwealth ex rel. Boileau et al. v. Mt. Moriah Cem. Ass. of Pa., 33 Leg. Intel., 464, held that a private claim to the right of interment in a cemetery lot will be enforced by mandamus; that a provision of the charter of a cemetery company, which prohibits the transfer of lots without consent of the managers, is binding upon grantees, and a transfer without such approval passes no title; that a lot holder who has executed and delivered a deed of transfer of his lot, unapproved as aforesaid, still has the right to order and compel an interment in such lot. We do not believe that a lot owner, who has by a deed duly executed and delivered, transferred his interest in the lot, can, because the managers of the cemetery did not consent thereto, still continue to direct who shall be buried in such lot. In this case the body refused burial by the officers of the cemetery, was that of a colored person.

SALE OF GOODS—CASH AGAINST BILL OF LADING.

The English Court of Appeal, in Ogg et al. v. Shuter, 33 L. T. Rep., N. S., 492, held that where, by the terms of a contract, the bill of lading is deliverable upon the vendee's fulfilling certain conditions, the shipper is entitled not only to retain possession of the goods under such bill of lading until those conditions are fulfilled, but also, in case of the vendee's default, to dispose of the goods.

Recent Publications.

American Commercial Law, Relating to Every Kind of Business, with Full Instructions and Practical Forms, Adapted to all the States of the Union. By Franklin Chamberlin, of the United States Bar. Hartford: Published by O. D. Case & Company. Chicago: A. H. Andrews & Co. 1875. Price in Law Sheep, $5.00. pp. 1,024.

This work is intended more for the business man than the professional lawyer. It gives the general principles of law regulating the various business transactions among men in this country, with many valuable forms. Among the subjects treated are, What is Law, Commercial Law, Property, Agency, Contracts, Sales, Liens, Negotiable Paper, Guaranty and Suretyship, Bailments, Partnerships, Corporations, Payment, Interest and Usury, Insurance, Bonds, Arbitration, Assignments, Collection of Debts, Mortgages, Landlord and Tenant, Marriage and Divorce, Husband and Wife, Parent and Child, Guardian and Ward, The Bankrupt Act, Copyright, etc., etc. While this book will not make "every man his own lawyer," by carefully reading and studying it, every business man will be able to avoid mistakes which would make him liable to long and expensive law suits..

High on Receivers.—We have had an opportunity this week of examining the advance sheets of the whole of the text of Mr. High's forthcoming work on the Law of Receivers, which is now passing through the press, and it is with much satisfaction we express our belief that it will prove to be the ablest of this distinguished author's works. We confess a feeling of pride in the evident fact that the legal profession in the West is producing a class of judges and authors, who, by their learning and ability bid fair to place their reputation on a level with the highest position attained by their predecessors of the last generation. Few are contributing more to this result than Mr. High.

His work on "Receivers" seems to us an improvement on his "Injunctions," which is now so popular with the profession. The same logical arrangement, the clearness and precision of statement, the patient and conscientious labor in the examination of every decision which could shed light upon his subject, which distinguished his former work, is apparent in this also, while the severe brevity of style has given place to a more graceful and flowing diction; there is less reluctance in the expression of individual opinion, where the authorities disagree; and the entire work gives evidence of a riper judgment and wider learning.

The chapters upon "Actions by and against Receivers," "Receivers of Corporations," and "Receivers over Railways," seem to us especially well-written and satisfactory, and in these days of financial embarrassment and "granger movements" will be welcomed heartily by the profession.

The appearance of the work is opportune, and unless we greatly mistake, it will materially enhance Mr. High's excellent and well-earned reputation.

The Law of Homesteads and Exemptions.—Soule, Thomas & Wentworth, the publishers, of St. Louis, announce as in preparation and soon to appear, a work on the Law of Homesteads and Exemptions, by Seymour D. Thompson, the able editor of the Central Law Journal. The publishers say, as the decisions on the subject of this work involve exclusively the construction of statutes which vary somewhat in the different States, these statutes will be fully set out in the foot-notes. The facts on which the various cases collated rests, will also be fully stated, and extensive quotations will be made from the reasoning of the courts. Mr. Thompson is a careful and laborious writer, and we have no doubt his work will be a valuable aid to the profession. We advise you, friend Thompson, not to let your publishers hurry you, but take your time and produce a book of which you will feel proud. Many a book has been ruined by over anxious publishers.

English Officers not all Honest.—If we may judge by the following, in the London Law Times of December 18th, jurors and officers attending them are no more honest in England than in America. The Times says: "A scandal was exposed at the Manchester Assizes on Monday. It seems to have been the custom of the officer in attendance on special jurors to demand from each of them one shilling out of the fee they received. This was brought to the knowledge of Mr. Justice Mellor, and his lordship, after remarking that the officer had no right to make any such suggestion, said that if it again occurred the man making the proposition should be dismissed forthwith." If this officer had been in some American courts he would have been locked up for contempt of court, and very properly.

Judge Walker.—The Jacksonville Sentinel says: "It seems to be generally understood that the Hon. Pinkney H. Walker, one of the justices of the Supreme Court, will be a candidate for re-election in this, the Fourth judicial district, at the expiration of his present term, in June next, and that there will be no competing candidate. This is as it should be. Judge Walker is an able and an honest judge, and the people could hardly afford to lose the benefit of his long experience on the bench."

It would be a fitting tribute to Judge Walker, after so many years of faithful, honest judicial labor, to re-elect him without opposition. We hope it may be done.

THE LAW OF CHARITABLE TRUSTS.

MR. TAYLOR'S LEGACY.

The law strongly favors gifts to charitable uses, and the courts have resorted to many ingenious devices and very refined constructions, in order to sustain them. A gift to charity will be held valid, which if to an individual, would be void, and where they are declared invalid it is upon the ground of such uncertainty, that the testator's intention cannot be ascertained and carried into effect.

And this policy of the law and of the courts commends itself to our sense of right. The world ever applauds its children, who have sacrificed themselves for the sake of their fellows, and no spectacle is more interesting or more affecting than that which is presented, when one who has accumulated a large fortune, by his own toil, devotes it to the good of mankind.

A recent notable instance in our city has given a public prominence to the subject not ordinarily manifested. Our papers have contained from time to time comments upon Mr. Taylor's legacy and suggestions as to what should be done with it, so that perhaps a few remarks in a legal journal, from a legal standpoint, may not be inopportune.

The first thing is to ascertain the meaning and intention of the testator. It is his will to which effect is to be given, and not the will or desire of others. His intention is to be gathered from his language.

The ninth section of his will is as follows:

"Ninth—All the rest, residue and remainder of my estate, whatsoever, that may remain, after fully providing for the payment of the debts, expenses, legacies, annuities and settlements, or other disbursements hereinbefore indicated or mentioned, according to the spirit of what I have written, I do give, devise, and bequeath to Henry W. King, Henry F. Eames, Albert Keep, Wirt Dexter, O. S. A. Sprague, Thomas M. Avery, Henry Keep, and Hamilton B. Bogue, all of the city of Chicago, and county of Cook, in trust, the same to be by them applied and devoted to the founding or endowing here, in the city of Chicago, upon a lasting basis, of such a charitable or other institution as in their opinion, or in the opinion of a majority of them, is most needed, and will do the most positive and enduring good and the least harm; provided, that if any or either of the nine trustees above named shall die before this will come into effect, or before a permanent organization of such proposed charity is effected, that the survivors shall have full power to select persons to fill vacancies in their number; and provided, further, that if the majority of said trustees shall be unwilling, or deem it expedient to organize a new charity, they may duly certify the same to my administrators and executors, who shall then pay over the same to the lawful managers or trustees of the Home for the Friendless in the said city of Chicago."

Here seems to be a disposition of the residue of his property to charity. He speaks of a "charitable institution," of a "proposed charity," and of a "new charity." Evidently "charity" was in his thoughts when these lines were written.

But in order that a testament may take effect, it is not only necessary that the testator should have wished to do a thing, but also that he should have expressed that wish. And if he has not expressed it, conjecture is not permitted to supply what the testator has failed to indicate. In the absence of disposition, the law provides how the succession shall go, with distinctness and clearness, and it would be unjust to change this, unless the intention of the testator is equally distinct and clear. 1 Jarman on Wills, 315.

No very accurate or precise definition of charity, in its legal sense, can easily be given. On the one hand, it does not mean all the good affections which men ought to bear towards each other; nor, on the other, does it mean simply relief to the poor. Lord Camden defined it, "a gift to a general public use, which extends to the rich as well as to the poor," but this fails in many essentials of a complete definition. The courts usually have recourse to the statute of 43 Elizabeth, c. 4, called the Statute of Charitable Uses, to ascertain what are charitable purposes, though they are not confined to it, but extends the definition to cases within its spirit. Charities, then, such as the law takes cognizance of, are those objects which are enumerated in the statute of Elizabeth, or which properly come within its spirit. If not of this character, however benevolent or praiseworthy they may be, the courts have no jurisdiction to enforce them.

The Supreme Court of Illinois have gone to a greater length than any other American authority in supporting charitable uses. In Hensen v. Harris, 42 Ill., 425, where a devise was made to an executor in trust to sell a farm and apply one-half of the proceeds to the school district in which the farm lay, the fund to be under control of a trustee to be elected by the people of the school district, the interest only to be used in schooling the children, the other half to go to the support of "the poor of Madison county," none to be used but the interest; on a bill filed by the next of kin claiming these provisions to be inoperative and void, it was held, that they were valid and within the letter and spirit of 43 Elizabeth, which statute is in force in Illinois; that whether a trustee be elected or not by the people, the bequest would not be lost, for the court would execute it cy pres by supplying a trustee; and that in the bequest to "the poor of Madison county," the paupers of the county were meant, and the County Court being the legal guardian of that class, could take the fund as trustee. The court say that charitable bequests are favored in law, and will receive a more favorable construction than will be allowed in gifts to individuals, and it matters not how uncertain the persons or the objects may be, or whether the persons who are to take an in esse or not, or whether the legatee is a corporation capable by law of taking, or whether the bequest can be carried into exact execution or not; in all such cases the court will sustain the legacy, and when a literal execution becomes inexpedient, the court will execute it cy pres.

It being clear, then, that the Supreme Court of Illinois will go a great ways to sustain charitable bequests, it remains to inquire what is the bequest in Mr. Taylor's will.

"To the founding or endowing here, in the city of Chicago, upon a lasting basis, of such a charitable, or other institution, as in their opinion, or in the opinion of a majority of them, is most needed, and will do the most positive and enduring good, and the least harm."

There is probably no authority that will sustain this clause as a charitable bequest. And if not charitable, then it is clearly void. Neither private charity nor benevolence is recognized by the courts. That the court may see to the execution of them, the charities must be public in their nature. Hence the courts have held that money devised "to be given in private charity" was void. Ommaney v. Butcher, Turn and Russ, 260. A leading case is Morice v. The Bishop of Durham, 9 Vesey, 399, where a bequest was made to the bishop of Durham to dispose of to such objects of benevolence and liberality as he should approve, and it was held that the bequest was not charitable and must go to the next of kin.

And in Story's Equity Jurisprudence, sec. 1158, the rule is laid down that "since the statute of Elizabeth, the court of chancery will not establish any trusts for indefinite purposes of a benevolent nature not charitable within the purview of that statute, although there is an existing trustee in whom it is vested; but it will declare the trust void, and distribute the property among the next of kin."

So that a mere benevolent intention appearing on the face of the will is not sufficient, but the devise must be absolutely to a charitable use. If the will does not clearly show that the devise is for charity and nothing else, it is void.

When there was a bequest to such charitable or public purpose or purposes, person or persons, as the trustees should, in their discretion, think fit, it was held void, because it was not limited to charitable objects. Sir J. Leach, vice-chancellor, said, that the testator had not fixed upon any part of the property a trust for a charitable use, and the court could not, therefore, devote any part of it to charity; he had given it to the trustees expressly upon trust, and they could not, therefore, hold it for their own benefit; the purposes of the trust being so general and undefined, they must fail altogether, and the next of kin become entitled.

In James v. Allen, 3 Merivale, 17, a gift to trustees to be applied and disposed of for and to such benevolent purposes as they might unanimously agree on, was held void.

A bequest for such charitable or other purposes as the trustees should think fit, was held void for uncertainty. Ellis v. Selby, 7 Sim., 352. Vice Chancellor Shadwell said: "The testator draws a distinction between charitable purposes and other purposes." "It is uncertain whether the trust was to be for charitable purposes, or for purposes not charitable. Then it is nothing more than if he had given an estate to A or B, which would be void." On appeal, 1 My. & Cr., 286, the chancellor, Lord Cottenham, said: In Morice v. The Bishop of Durham, Sir W. Grant lays down the rule in these terms: "The question is not whether the trustee may not apply it upon purposes wholly charitable, but whether he is bound so to apply it." And in James v. Allen, "if the property might, consistently with the will, be applied to other than strictly charitable purposes, the trust is too indefinite for the court to execute;" and he held that the bequest was too indefinite to be carried into effect.

So in the case of Williams v. Kershaw, before the same Lord Chancellor, 11 Cl. & Fin., 111, where there was a direction by a testator to his trustees to apply the residue of his personal estate to and for such benevolent, charitable, and religious purposes as they, in their discretion, should think most advantageous and beneficial, and for no other use, trust, intent, or purpose whatsoever, the bequest was held void.

The question then, is, is there such a discretion in the trustees, under this will, that they can apply this fund to a charitable institution or to some other institution? If so, the court cannot follow them to see that they properly administer their trust, and it is therefore void.

The language of the will is, shortly, "to the founding, etc., upon a lasting basis, of such charitable or other institution as, in the opinion of a majority of them, is most needed, and will do the most good and the least harm." Suppose the trustees should think that a School of Art was most needed, and would do the most good. Who can say them nay? Nevertheless that is not such a charity as the courts can administer. They have the right to found an institution other than charitable, by the very words of the bequest, and having that right or discretion, under the decisions above cited, the bequest to them is void. Almost the very language of Vice Chancellor Shadwell applies to this case: "The testator draws a distinction between charitable institutions and other institutions. It is uncertain whether the trust is to be for a charitable institution or for an institution not charitable. Then it is nothing more than if he had given an estate to" A or to B.

From these authorities it would seem that the trust is void for uncertainty, and the remaining inquiry is, whether the legacy falls into the estate, and goes to the next of kin at once, or whether there is sufficient in the will to indicate the "Home for the Friendless" as the object of the testator's bounty.

The language of the will is very obscure: "And provided further, that if the majority for said trustees shall be unwilling, or deem it inexpedient to organize a new charity, they may duly certify the same to my administrators and executors, who shall then pay over the same to the lawful managers or trustees of the "Home for the Friendless" in the said city of Chicago."

"They may duly certify the same" (the unwillingness to organize a new charity) to my administrators, who shall then pay over the same (what? the unwillingness to organize a new charity?) to the lawful managers," etc.

What is meant seems quite evident. The intention of the testator is that the Home for the Friendless shall receive his bounty, if no charity is organized by the trustees.

But the language of the will does not convey that meaning, nor any other rational one. How, then, would the courts read it?

The construction of a will depends upon the intention of the testator, to be ascertained from a full view of everything contained within "the four corners of the instrument," and where the intention is apparent, the court must give such a construction as will support it, even against strict grammatical construction of the words. Words may be omitted, supplied or transposed, to the extent of not absolutely making the will. Redfield on Wills, Vol. 1, chap. 9. This being so, and the intention of the testator being, that the Home for the Friendless should take, in default of a new charity being organized, it would seem as if the court should so read it. Nor would a failure of the trustees to exercise the naked power to certify the fact of a failure to the executors, affect the result. In the case of a charity the court would exercise this power, in default of its exercise by the trustees. "Charity is the essence and substance, and the mode only a shadow"; and rather than the "substance" should fail, courts will intrust themselves with the execution of the mode." Tiffany & Bullard on Trusts, ¶32.

From this very brief and summary review of the authorities, the conclusion seems to be, that the trust for a "new charity" must fail, because of its indefiniteness and uncertainty.

The testator intended, that if this charity proposed by him should fail, that the trustees for the Home for the Friendless should take the bequest. If the will conveys this intention, and the said trustees or managers are competent to take, then the bequest is determined to them. Otherwise it falls back into the estate and goes to the next of kin.

THE VOTE BY BALLOT.

IS IT A SECRET VOTE?

It would seem that everybody is not satisfied as to the decided meaning of the word "ballot," as it is used in the Constitution and laws of Illinois. The letter of Judge Jameson to State's Attorney Reed, containing an opinion on the subject of ballot numbering, published in the LEGAL NEWS of the 20th of last November, ought to have been allowed to stand unchallenged; for that opinion is, beyond all reasonable doubt or question, correct. Mr. A. M. Pence would undoubtedly have been excused for not essaying to demolish it; and if he had refrained, there would have been no occasion for Mr. Stanley to assist him to the glory of, etc. * * * But the zealous searcher after truth is irrepressible, and a man with an opinion opposed to somebody else's opinion, is very likely to be heard from.

Mr. Pence not only differs from Judge Jameson, himself, but in the first paragraph of his five column essay, published in the LEGAL NEWS of the 4th ult., he asserts that "grave doubts exist in the minds of many as to the soundness of the judge's views." And further, that "absolute conviction obtains on the part of a still greater number, that the opinion is without foundation." Were this really so, it would be a very unsatisfactory state of things, and Mr. Pence could not possibly be too prompt in setting matters right by the publication of his own well considered and sufficiently lengthy opinion on the subject. But it is to be hoped, in charity to the "many," and especially to the "still greater number," that Mr. Pence must be mistaken as to the "gravity" of the "doubts," and the "absoluteness" of the "convictions" which "exist in the minds," and "obtain on the part" of those "doubting" and "convicted" friends of his. And it might be well also, to indulge the hope that those "doubting" and "convicted" people are not very numerous. And it would be somewhat encouraging to be assured that Mr. Pence is again mistaken when he says, "it becomes useless to ascertain the name of the man who cast the [fraudulent] vote, if no method remains whereby it can be ascertained for whom he voted." Because there is a general impression that when the State's Attorney is instructed to draw an indictment for the crime of fraudulent voting, he finds it somewhat convenient to have the name of the alleged fraudulent voter so far "ascertained" that he can put it in the proper place in the indictment. And then, it is believed that a fraud in voting does not consist in voting any particular ticket, "regular" or "irregular,"

"straight" or "scratched"; but in voting at a time and place when and where the party so voting has no legal right to vote at all. A "fraudulent voter," might be defined to be "the wrong man in the right place."

Mr. Pence will no doubt be glad to find that there are a few more mistakes in his essay on what he is pleased to call "The Secret Ballot," a head-line, by the way, embracing the grave literary offence of tautology; for "the word ballot," Mr. Pence to the contrary notwithstanding, does, "by force of its own inherent character, [better say, "established and understood meaning,"] ex necessitate rei [the single, plain English word "always," better expresses the intended meaning] carry with it the idea of secrecy." And here is the feature—to use a mixed figure attributed to Lord Castlereagh — here is the "feature" upon which the error of Mr. Pence and his doubting, etc., friends, "hinges." Warned by the fate of the "western lawyer" who "romed with Romulus, and ripped with 'Ripides, and socked with Socrates, and canted with old Cantharides; yet knew nothing of the statutes of Dakota," Mr. Pence very properly declines going to either Greece or Rome to find the meaning of a common, long-established, unequivocal English word of two syllables, used in the Constitution, and in a recent statute of this State. A good standard English dictionary was the proper "authority" to consult. But Mr. Pence was so unfortunate as to make another mistake. He consulted the dictionary called "Webster's," and none other. He should have known better. "Our great lexicographer," was never supposed to be "quite accurate" by any one whose lexicographical opinion is entitled to respect. Richard Grant White, the highest American authority on "words and their uses," speaking of English dictionaries, says incidentally: "The noteworthy spectacle has lately been shown of the casting over of the whole etymological freight of a well known dictionary and the taking on board of another. For the etymological part of the last edition of Webster's American Dictionary, so called, Dr. Mahn, of Berlin, is responsible. When it was Webster's Dictionary, it was in this respect ridiculous, the laughing-stock of philologists, a just reproach to scholarship in this country, and even to the general intelligence of a people upon whom such a book could be imposed as authoritative. And now that it is relieved of this blemish, it is, in this respect, neither Webster's Dictionary, nor "American," but "Mahn's and German."

There is no such thing as a perfect or "quite accurate" dictionary, English or "American." Dr. Goodrich, assisted by Professor Mahn, and by other learned gentlemen, has succeeded in reconstructing "Webster," and in building up a very large dictionary, which the publishers still call "Webster's." It is said to contain several thousand words more than any other dictionary; and no one seems to question the truth of the advertisement. It is an improved dictionary beyond question; but it is susceptible of yet further improvement. It is very popular, and sells largely. It is, on the whole, a good dictionary; but it is not yet "quite accurate" in all respects, more especially in its definitions. Its defective definition of the word ballot is a notable instance of omission; a defect that in such a very large and unlimitedly pretensious "unabridged" dictionary, ought to be regarded as unpardonable.

Mr. Pence was right in consulting a dictionary, and it would be unreasonable to expect that he would have overlooked or forgotten Webster's, so called; but he was wrong in not consulting other dictionaries; and the quotations of any of his "authorities" other than that dictionary, was utterly idle. Not one of them is in point; while observations anent the questions of "policy," "a pure ballot-box," etc., were out of order, and altogether unprofitable.

The definition given in Webster's is not erroneous. It is correct, as far as it goes; but it is defective. The "great lexicographer," as Mr. Pence says, "does not attach the meaning of secrecy to the word." Neither does "the great lexicographer" negative such meaning,—as Mr. Pence does not observe.

Webster's is, therefore, a worthless witness in the controversy. A few of the other dictionaries testify as follows:

A small edition of the "Household English Dictionary," London, 1872, defines the word thus:

"Ballot, s., a ball or ticket used in giving votes privately."

Nuttall's Standard Dictionary, London, 1865, defines the word thus:

"Ballot, s. A little ball, ticket, or anything used to give a secret vote; the act or practice of voting by balls or tickets."

Zell's Cyclopædia, Philadelphia, 1870, gives the derivation, and defines the word thus:

"BALLOT. n. [Fr. ballotte, from balle, a ball] A little ball used in giving votes; a ticket or written note, used for the same purpose, and put privately into a box or urn set apart for that object."

None of these definitions can be said to be erroneous, yet they are each and all more or less defective. It will be remarked, however, that in some way, more or direct and unequivocal, they severally less recognise the secret—"the idea of secrecy," which Mr. Pence thinks Webster's (unabridged) authorizes him to say, "does not inhere in the word."

Two more "authorities" will be quoted, neither absolutely and unquestionably perfect in every particular; but, the first, the highest and best among "American" dictionaries, and the second, the highest and best among English dictionaries, and, notwithstanding its errors and defects, the best dictionary of the English language yet published in England or America.

Worcester's dictionary, Boston, 1872, gives the derivation and definition (and the "authority" for the definition) of the word thus:

"BALLOT. n. [Sp. ballota; Fr. ballote.] 1. A little ball, a slip of paper, or anything which is used in giving a secret vote. Brande. 2. A secret method of voting at elections. 'America, where the ballot is practiced,' Brande."

JOHNSON'S Dictionary, Todd's edition, five volumes, 4to., London, 1818, gives a definition of the verb at once full, clear and conclusive. And the "authorities" quoted are among the highest and best that even a Chicago philologist (if we have one) could desire to refer to. Thus says Todd's Johnson:

"BALLOT. n. s. [ballote, Fr.] 1. A little ball or ticket used in giving votes, being put privately into a box or urn. 2. The act of voting by ballot."

"To BALLOT. v. n. [balloter, Fr.] To choose by ballot; that is, by putting little balls or tickets with particular marks, privately in a box; by counting which it is known what is the result of the poll, without any discovery by whom each vote was given. 'None of the competitors arriving at a sufficient number of balls, they fell to ballot some others.' Wotten, Rem. p. 262. 'Giving their votes by balloting, they lie under no awe.' Swift."

Some law dictionaries have been looked into, but uselessly; the word is not to be found in any of them. Probably the compilers deemed it a word so well understood that definition or explanation would be a work of supererogation. And indeed this seems to be the idea of the lawyers as well as of the lay-writers who have written with admitted "authority" on the subject. Thus, in McCrary's American Law of Elections, the author commences the section of his treatise devoted to the subject of the ballot, in these words:

"§ 194. The chief reason for the general adoption of the ballot in this country is, that it affords the voter the means of preserving the secrecy of his vote. And this enables him to vote independently and freely, without being subject to be overawed ["they lie under no awe."—Swift.], intimidated, or in any manner controlled by others, or to any ill will or persecution, on account of his vote. The secret ballot is justly regarded as an important and valuable safeguard for the protection of the voter, and particularly the humble citizen against the influence which wealth and station may be supposed to exercise. And it is for this reason that the privacy is held not to be limited to the moment of depositing the ballot, but is sacredly guarded by the law for all time, unless the voter himself shall voluntarily divulge it. (People v. Pease, 27 N. Y., 81)."

In Cooley's Constitutional Limitations, the learned, and now standard author, says: "The mode of voting in this country, at all general elections, is almost universally by ballot. * * * * The distinguishing feature of this mode of voting is, that every voter is thus enabled to secure and preserve the most complete and inviolable secrecy in regard to the persons for whom he votes, and thus escape the influences which, under the system of oral suffrages, may be brought to bear upon him with a view to overbear and intimidate, and thus prevent the real expression of public sentiment. In order to secure as perfectly as possible the benefits anticipated from this system, statutes have been passed in some of the States, which prohibit ballots being received or counted unless the same are written or printed upon white paper, without any marks or figures thereon intended to distinguish one ballot from another. These statutes are simply declaratory of a constitutional principle that inheres in the system of voting by ballot, and which ought to be inviolable whether declared or not. In the absence of such a statute, all devices by which party managers are enabled to distinguish ballots in the hand of the voter, and thus determine whether he is voting for or against them, are opposed to the spirit of the Constitution, inasmuch as they tend to defeat the design for which voting by ballot is established, and though they may not render an election void, they are exceedingly reprehensible, and ought to be discountenanced by all good citizens. The system of ballot voting rests upon the idea that every elector is to be entirely at liberty to vote for whom he pleases and with what party he pleases, and that no one is to have the right, or be in position, to question him for it, either then or at any subsequent time. The courts have held that a voter, even in case of a contested election, cannot be compelled to disclose for whom he votes, and for the same reason we think others who may accidentally, or by trick or artifice, have acquired knowledge on the subject, should not be allowed to testify to such knowledge, or to give any information in the courts upon the subject. Public policy requires that the vail of secrecy should be impenetrable, unless the voter himself voluntarily determined to lift it; his ballot is absolutely privileged; and to allow evidence of its contents, when he has not waived the privilege, is to encourage trickery and fraud, and would, in effect, establish this remarkable anomaly, that, while the law from motives of public policy establishes the secret ballot with a view to conceal the elector's action, it at the same time encourages a system of epionage, by means of which the veil of secrecy may be penetrated and the voter's action disclosed to the public."

The above quotations would seem to be reasonably conclusive. No liberty has been taken with any of them, except that of italicizing the words that seemed to show that "the idea of secresy" does "inhere in the word" ballot; that a vote by ballot is a secret vote.

In conclusion, it is submitted that the word ballot in the constitution means a mode of voting "that secures and preserves to the voter the most complete and inviolable secresy." That the clause in the statute (Chap. 46, Sec. 55), providing that "the judges [of election] shall indorse on the back of the ticket offiered the number corresponding with the number of the voter on the poll-books," violates the "inviolable secresy" of the ballot, and is, therefore, unconstitutional and void. And that one of the highest and most sacred duties of the judiciary is to uphold the constitution, in letter and in spirit, uninfluenced by legislative or any other definitions or opinions, unless satisfied that they are sound and true.

"LAWFUL HOLDERS" OF CHEQUES ETC.

In a letter addressed by the Right Hon. J. G. Hubbard to the Times relative to the decision in Smith v. The Union Bank, a very important point is raised as to presumptions of law. Mr. Hubbard seems to say that if it was assumed that the ultimate holder of the cheque in question was a lawful holder, the assumption was contrary to the evidence furnished by the cheque itself. "Lawful owner," he presumes, "does not mean an innocent ignoramus who has given full value for an article whose very face disproves the title of the seller, but a person intelligent enough to comprehend the nature of a cheque, and combining honesty with his intelligence." This may be a very satisfactory definition of a lawful holder from a high moral standpoint, but it has been found unsuited to the exigencies of commerce as represented by the cases which come before courts of law. A person giving value for a cheque may not be an innocent ignoramus, but he may be negligent. He may not have noticed the crossing particularly. Mr. Hubbard would compel him to lose his money as Smith lost his from allowing a thief to get possession of his cheque. The law, however, distinctly says no more than this, that gross negligence may be evidence of mala fides. In the case of Goodman v. Harvey (4 Ad. & E. 870), Lord Denman said:—"I believe we are all of opinion that gross negligence only would not be a sufficient answer by the defendant where the plaintiff has given consideration for the bill." The principle affecting bills and cheques is precisely the same in this respect. "Gross negligence may be evidence of mala fides, but is not the same thing. We have shaken off the last remnant of the contrary doctrine." Giving consideration is strong evidence of bona fides, and it is clearly a sound doctrine that such evidence should not be rebutted by the simple circumstance that the form of the instrument purchased would even inevitably arouse suspicion in the mind of a man of business.

The law is the same in England and America, and Mr. Story, in his work on Contracts, states it very strongly thus:—"It is therefore no defense to a bona fide holder for value that the person from whom he took the note or bill acquired it by fraud, theft, or robbery, or that the original consideration was illegal (if the paper be not absolutely void by statute)." And as regards negligence, he notices Goodman v. Harvey as overruling Gill v. Cubitt (3 B. & C. 466), and says:—"The rule now is that nothing short of proof of bad faith is sufficient to repel the claim of an indorsee who has paid value for the paper; in other words, nothing short of notice, actual or constructive, of some defense."

Mr. Hubbard quotes the remark of Mr. Justice Blackburn that the holder who had given full value for the cheque must be taken to be the lawful holder unless the crossing prevented him from being so, and goes so far as to say that the crossing alone, ipso facto, made the holding illegal. As an abstract proposition this is somewhat astounding, and we think any legislation which should give effect to it would be unwise, as restricting the negotiability of cheques. Mr Hubbard thinks otherwise, designating a cheque with any other design than that of procuring payment to the payee named in it an illegitimate bill of exchange. If commercial expediency favors this view, and no harm can be done by restraining the transfer of orders for payment of money, legislation to protect payees of cheques will be a simple matter. We are quite clear that courts of law could not have undertaken the functions of Parliament, or decided otherwise than they did in the case of Smith v. The Union Bank.—The London Law Times.

TIME FOR DELIVERY.

(Bergheim v. The Blaenavon Iron and Steel Company, Q.B., 23 W. R. 618, L. R. 10 Q.B. 319.)

If this case does not throw any decisive light on the common stipulation in mercantile contracts providing for delivery within certain limits, it is at least a useful contribution. The contract was for rails, "the delivery of the rails to commence on the 15th of January, 1873, and to be completed by the 15th of April, 1873. The makers to have the option to begin delivery on the 15th of December, 1872. In the event of the makers exceeding the time of delivery above stipulated they shall pay, by way of fine, the sum of 7s. 6d. per ton per week." The question arose on the penalty clause, under which the plaintiff contended that the liability to pay commenced upon the 15th of January, if delivery were not then commenced, and the defendants that it commenced only on the 15th of April. The court held that the defendants' construction was right, and Field, J., observed that the word "time" was in the singular, and added that "if the language had been 'exceeding the times for delivery,' I might have come to a different conclusion." But though, in determining the effect of the penalty clause it did not become necessary to say what was the obligation on the defendants as to any time for delivery before the 15th of April, the point was considered by the court, and much the same difference of opinion appeared as in Coddington v. Paleologo (15 W.R. 961, L. R.2 Ex., 193). Mellor, J., said, "The time for delivery is the period between the two specified times, and on no other day or time can I fix the time of delivery." Field, J., seemed prepared to hold that "the defendants were to commence by delivering a reasonable quantity, probably 500 tons, on the 15th of January, and to deliver the remainder ratably," and Blackburn, J., hesitated, and declined to express an opinion on the point. So in Codington v. Paleologo, where the contract was "deliveries to commence on the 17th of April, and to be completed by the 8th of May." Kelly, C.B., and Pigott, B., held that the seller was not bound to commence on the 17th of April, whilst Martin and Bramwell, BB., held that he was, Martin, B., saying that the seller must "deliver a reasonable quantity, having reference to the entire bulk and to the interval of the time between the 17th of April and the 8th of May, and that of necessity would be a question for the jury."

Thus opinions seem equally divided, and between Martin, B., and Field, J., who both take the view that delivery must commence at the first date, the further difference arises that the one would leave to the jury the question of what is a reasonable delivery, the other seems inclined to determine it for himself. Some light is thrown on the question by the case of Alexander v Vanderzee (20 W. R. 871, L. R. 7 C. P. 530), where the contract was for a "June shipment," and it was held in the Common Pleas and the Exchequer Chamber that it was sufficient if the shipment was completed in June. This decision, in reading the contrart with reference to the time of completion, somewhat favors the view of Kelly, C.B., Pigott, B., and Mellor, J. In that case also the same question arose of whether the construction of the contract was for the judge or the jury; Kelly, C. B., thought it was for the judge, Blackburn, J., balanced, and the rest of the court, thought it was for the jury. Upon the whole, it is probably the better view that, in the absence of something more definite than the mere statement of a time for commencement and completion of delivery, the first date refers only to the right, the second date to the obligation of the seller; and, certainly, if the buyer desires an early delivery he will do wisely to secure that right to himself in plain terms.—The Solicitor's Journal.

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

This court commenced its January term on last Tuesday, all the judges being in attendance. There are many cases before the court of importance to this district. Among them may be mentioned the cases affecting the re-organization of the city and the terms of its officers. In the case of the People ex rel. Charles W. Henderson et al. v. The City Council of Chicago, Mr. ISHAM moved the court for an alternative writ of mandamus; upon which motion Chief Justice SCOTT announced the opinion of the court, as follows:

The motion in this case is for an alternative writ of mandamus against the city council of Chicago, to show cause why they should not order an election for mayor of the city. It is objected that the statute has provided that proceedings in mandamus shall be commenced by summons. That statute obviously has reference only to circuit courts, and was intended to regulate the practice in these courts; but we have endeavored to make the practice in this court conform as near as may be to that which prevails in other courts, and in analogy to that practice we have required proceedings in mandamus in this court to be commenced by summons, instead of awarding the alternative writ, as was the former practice. In all matters of mere private concern it is customary to make the writ returnable at the next term of court, but in cases where public interests are involved, to a day in the same term at which the application is made. Accordingly, in lieu of the alternative writ applied for in this case, summons will be ordered to the defendant named, returnable in 10 days. In making this order we refrain from expressing any opinion on the merits of the case. Questions of the gravest importance, having relation to public interests, are involved, and we are therefore willing to consider the case on full argument, and therefore order a summons to the present term, that the parties may be brought into court.

In reply to the inquiry of Mr. Isham, the court said the argument would be heard when the cause was reached on the call of the docket.

E. S. ISHAM and MELVILLE W. FULLER for the relators.

JAMES P. ROOT for the respondents.

This decision settles an important question of practice in mandamus cases before the Supreme Court. It would now seem as if the Supreme Court would at this term define the duration of the terms of the mayor and aldermen of the city.

EXAMINATION OF STUDENTS.—There were forty-three applicants for admission to the bar, among them Miss Ella Martin, a graduate of the Michigan State University. The court appointed H. S. Green, of Springfield, Judge Gallagher, of Decatur, and Mr. Ewing, of Bloomington, examiners.

On yesterday, on motion of Attorney-General Edsall, the people's cases were set for hearing on the 21st.

Daniel F. Bayliss of Waynesville, DeWitt County, William S. Hall of Chicago, and Robert O'Hara of Lacon, were admitted to practice on foreign licenses.

Chief Justice Scott announced that all members of the class examined yesterday were admitted. The following compose the class: George W. Brewer, Coles; Alfred B. Davidson, McLean; H. Baker, Logan; Walter W. McKaig, Cook; Daniel H. Slayton, Kane; Wesley Martin, Henry; M. F. Hoskinson, Wabash; Alex M. Wilson, Hamilton; John W. Lindsay, Randolph; John W. Karr, Woodford; E. R. E. Kimbrough, Vermillion; Russell M. Crocker, Peoria; N. B. Brant, Cook; Walter Bennett, Woodford; Ella A. Martin, Cook; Jacob F. Murdock, Livingston; William H. Twaddle, McDonough; Thomas L. McGrath, McLean; Charles W. Townsend, Cook; George Morgan, Cook; Jesse B. Barton, Cook; L. W. Paine, Cook; Nicholas Uhlrich, Peoria; James E. Jewett, McLean; S. H. Bethen, Cook; William M. Stokes, Logan; George R. Barton, Douglas; Charles W. Aken, Macon; F. H. Dickey, Cook; Levi N. Brewer, Cumberland; Alfred Ficklin, Coles; John W. Williams, McLean; John C. Maxwell, Crawford; Rufus M. Barlie, Fulton; George W. Crow, Moultrie; W. E. Loomis, Sangamon; W. B. Charsser, Galine; Benjamin F. Portius, Shelby; William B. Leitch, Coles; David W. Dale, LaSalle; James H. Fleming, LaSalle; Oliver P. Chisholm, Kane.

SUPREME COURT OF TENNESSEE.

NASHVILLE, FEB. 20, 1875.

[HEAD-NOTES FROM THE COMMERCIAL AND LEGAL REPORTER.]

A. Hamilton & Co. v. Alex. Kennedy and Others.

WAREHOUSEMAN.

Services not enuring to benefit of true owner of property in storage—Claim for.—Cotton had been seized as captured and abandoned property, and removed by a special agent of the U. S. Treasury, and stored with the complainants, and several parties claiming the property as not abandoned, the special agent filed his bill of interpleader in U. S. Circuit Court, under which the cotton was sold and proceeds held subject to further order of the court; upon bill filed by the warehouseman to impound this fund to pay their claim for charges upon the cotton; held, that the possession of the special agent up to the filing of his bill of interpleader was justifiable, and the charges properly accruing to that date were a lien upon the cotton. But all charges accruing after that date do not constitute a lien, as they have not enured to the benefit of the true owners, who were all the time insisting upon the restoration of their property. The bailee or warehouseman can stand in no higher attitude than the party under whom he holds.

NASHVILLE, DEC. TERM, 1874.

W. W. Wilhoit v. J. P. and S. C. Castell.

TRANSFER OF NOTE AFTER INJUNCTION—CONFLICTING CLAIMS.

Where an injunction and attachment were issued and served upon the maker and the payee of a note under a bill for a divorce and alimony filed by the wife of the payee, and the payee, the husband, with knowledge of the injunction, assigned the note for valuable consideration, and gave notice to the debtor, and the assignee took the assignment with the consent of the wife and not to interfere with her claim to alimony; upon bill filed by a judgment creditor of the husband to subject the proceeds to his debt, Held, That the injunction rendered a transfer of the note by the husband null and void so far as such transfer might affect the claim of the wife to the proceeds of the note for purposes of alimony or support; but subject to this, the transfer of the note or an attachment of it by a creditor of the husband would not be null and void. The assignee or the creditor would hold it subject to the claim fixed by the wife's injunction and attachment.

UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT.

PROCEEDINGS OF.

Monday, January 3, 1876.

The court having adjourned on the 17th of December until the 3rd of January, met, pursuant to adjournment, at 12 o'clock to-day:

On motion of E. L. Goold, William Matthews, of San Francisco, Cal., and Willis Drummond, of Washington, D. C., were admitted.

On motion of C. F. Peck, Edward W. Munford, of McMinnville, Tenn., was admitted.

On motion of P. Phillips, George L. Paddock, of Chicago, Ill., was admitted.

On motion of George F. Edmonds, H. N. Hewitt, of Keeseville, N. Y., was admitted.

On motion of G. H. Williams, John Q. Charles, of Denver, Colorado, was admitted.

On motion of M. H. Carpenter, C. H. Krum, of St. Louis, was admitted.

Case. (Original.) Ex parte A. J. Ambler. Waite, C. J., announced the opinion of the court, denying the motion for a mandamus.

No. 868. The Board of Commissioners of Douglass county et al. v. The Union Pacific Railroad Company. Waite, C J., announced the decision of the court, denying the motion to advance this cause.

No. 887. Levi R. Morrill, administrator, etc. v. The Mutual Benefit Life Insurance Company. In error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the district of Indiana. On motion of E. L. Stanton the case was docketed and dismissed.

No. 880. John Henderson et al v. William H. Wickham, mayor of New York et al. The motion to advance this cause was submitted by H. Nicoll for plaintiffs.

No. 99. Susan B. Allen v. Thomas D. Allen. This cause was argued by George H. Bradley for appellee, and submitted on printed argument by M. Thompson for appellant.

No. 100. T. G. Haines et al., trustees, etc. v. Charles Carpenter, executor, etc. This cause was submitted on printed arguments by Joseph Casey for appellants. No counsel appearing for appellee.

No. 101. The State of North Carolina v. Charles Dewey, assignee, etc., et al. Dismissed with costs under sixteenth rule.

No. 102. Jane F. Hay et al. v. Charles Dewey, assignee.

No. 103. John G. Blount v. R. C. Windley. Passed without prejudice.

No. 104. Myra Clark Gaines v. Joseph Friendas et al. Passed until after assigned cases for 11th instant.

No. 105. Milwaukee and St. Paul Railway Company v. Mary A. F. Arms. Passed.

No. 106. Edwin Reeder et al. v. Walter Crane.

No. 107. Edwin Reeder et al. v. Walter Crane. On motion of D. B. Duffield for plaintiffs, dismissed with costs.

To-day, the case of the United States against Allison, an appeal from the Court of Claims, was submitted, involving the question whether a printer employed in the Government Printing Office at the date of the election of a Congressional printer by the Senate was entitled to the additional twenty per cent. provided for by the act of February 28, 1867. The Court of Claims gave judgment for the claimant and the government here contends that, as two days before the passage of the twenty per cent. act the Government Printing Office passed from the jurisdiction of the Interior department to the control of the Senate, by the election of a Congressional printer, the terms of that act do not sustain the claim, because the twenty per cent. was to be paid only to those at the date of the act within its provisions—that is, in an executive department. It is also submitted, that in fact the Government Printing Office always did belong to the Legislative department, it was always under the control of a Congressional committee, and that fact should seem to establish that it was not intended to be an executive bureau.

The claimant contends that the act of the Senate electing a Congressional printer was unconstitutional, because it was an election of a person to fill an office of the United States established by law, and therefore not within the jurisdiction of the Senate, which may elect only its own officers; and for this reason, it is said, the office of Government printer was not abolished by the action of the Senate in electing a new officer to succeed him. The election was inoperative and void, and has no effect upon the then organization of the bureau as previously existing.

Solr. Gen. Phillips for the government, and J. A. Garfield and J. Daniels for the claimant.

Owing to the absence from the capital of several of the judges during the holidays, which prevented the usual conference of the judges, no opinions were delivered.

The court adjourned until Tuesday at 12 M.

Tuesday, Jan. 4.

On motion of N. H. Sharpless, Charles Swayne of Philadelphia, was admitted.

No. 87. Daniel C. Sawin v. D. G. Kenney and Thomas Foley. M. H. Carpenter suggested the death of Thomas Foley, one of the defendants, and moved that the case abate as to him. Granted.

No. 87. Daniel C. Sawin v. Dennis G. Kenny. Quinton Corwin moved to enter the appearance of the administratrix of Daniel C. Sawin, the plaintiff whose death had already been suggested. Granted.

No. 57. The First Unitarian Society, of Chicago, v. H. F. Faulkner et al. On motion of Mr. Quinton, mandate allowed to issue.

No. 391. The Manhattan Life Insurance Company v. R. S. Buck. This cause was submitted on printed arguments by A. B. Pittman for plaintiff, and by W. P. Harris for defendant, under the twentieth rule.

No. 608. William H. Hoover, assignee, etc.. v. Abraham Wise et al. This cause was submitted on printed arguments by J. H. B. Latrobe for plaintiff, and by W. W. Boyce for defendants, under the twentieth rule.

No. 609. The Board of Liquidation of the State of Louisiana et al. v. H. S. McComb. This cause was submitted on printed arguments by J. A. Campbell and J. Q. A. Fellows for appellants, and by Thomas J. Semmes and Robert Mott for appellees, under the twentieth rule.

No, 634. Desire A. Chaffraix v. Arthur Shiff. This cause was submitted on printed arguments by Mr. Robinson for appellant, and by J. A. Campbell for appellee, under the twentieth rule.

No. 730, Frank A. Otis et al. v. Henry B. Cullum, receiver, etc. This cause was submitted on printed arguments by Alfred Ennis for plaintiff, and by George R. Peck for defendant, under the twentieth rule.

No. 108. Sarah E. Lloyd et al. v. M. C. Fulton, trustee, etc. This cause was argued by P. Phillips for appellants, and by John D. Pope for appellee.

No. 109. Thomas E. Williams et al. v. Thomas B. Florence et al. Passed.

No. 110. Rufus Baker and Isaac F. Baker, assignees, etc. v. Henry S. White. The argument of this cause was commenced by Charles E. Perkins for plaintiffs.

Adjourned until Wednesday at 12 o clock.

Wednesday, Jan. 5.

On motion of P. Phillips, William H. C. Ellis, of Norfolk, Va., W. A. Manderson, of Philadelphia, Pa., and George E. Bird, of Portland, Me., were admitted.

On motion of J. W. Cary, J. C. Gregory, of Madison Wis., was admitted.

No. 110. Rufus Baker and Isaac F. Graham, assignees, etc. v. Henry S. White. The argument of this cause was continued by A. P. Hyde for defendant and concluded by Charles E. Perkins for plaintiff.

No. 111. Lee Dunlop v. The State of North Carolina. Postponed to foot of the docket.

THE LOUISIANA LAW JOURNAL.—We have received the first number of a monthly periodical bearing this name. It is devoted to law and literature, and published by B. BLOOMFIELD & Co., of New Orleans, at five dollars per year, in advance. It is printed upon good paper, and contains thirty-two pages. We are not informed who the editors are. It contains much information that will be useful to the bar, particularly the bar of Louisiana.

THE AMERICAN LAW REVIEW.—The January number of this quarterly, being the second of the volume, is received. Its contents are, 1. How can War be Prevented; 2. UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT.

OCTOBER TERM, 1875.

IRA P. NUDD et al. v. GEORGE B. BURDOWS, assignee of the estate of NORTON EMMONS, a bankrupt.

In error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Illinois.

EVIDENCE—DECLARATIONS OF BANKRUPT—INSTRUCTIONS TO JURY—ACT OF 1872 RELATING TO PRACTICE CONSTRUED—PRACTICE IN STATE AND FEDERAL COURTS.

1. DECLARATIONS OF BANKRUPT.—That the court did not err in admitting in evidence the declarations of the bankrupt.

2. DUTY OF JUDGE AND JURY.—The court states the province of the judge and jury in jury trials.

3. FACTOR'S LIEN.—The court states how a factor's lien is affected by the bankrupt law.

4. HOW FAR PRACTICE IN THE FEDERAL COURT MUST CORRESPOND TO THE PRACTICE IN THE STATE COURTS UNDER ACT OF 1872.—That the purpose of this act was to bring about uniformity in the law of procedure in the Federal and State courts in the same locality. It had its origin in the code enactments of many of the States. While in the Federal tribunals the common law forms, pleading and practice were adhered to, in the State courts of the same district, the simpler forms of the local code prevailed. This involved the necessity of the bar studying two distinct systems of remedial law. It was the aim of this act to remove this evil. The personal administration by the judge of his duties while sitting upon the bench was not complained of; that the personal conduct and administration of the judge in the discharge of his separate functions, in the judgment of the court, is neither pleading, practice, nor a form, nor mode of proceeding within the meaning of those terms as found in the context, and therefore the Federal court is not bound by the provision of the Illinois practice act; that the court in charging the jury shall instruct them only as to the law of the case: that no instructions shall be given unless reduced to writing, etc.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

Mr. Justice SWAYNE delivered the opinion of the Court.

The first of the assignments of error presents the question whether the court erred in admitting in evidence the declarations of the bankrupt.

The suit was brought by the assignee to recover against Nudd and Noe for money and property which they had received from Emmons. They had applied the money and the proceeds of the property in payment of a debt which Emmons owed them. The property was live stock, consisting of cattle, sheep and hogs. The net proceeds were $7,553.27. The money was $1,000. The aggregate amount in controversy was $8,553.27. The assignee claimed that the stock was bought largely upon credit; that Emmons was at the time hopelessly insolvent; that Nudd and Noe knew it, and that the transaction was the fruit of a conspiracy between the parties, having for its object the giving to Nudd and Noe by Emmons a fraudulent preference over his other creditors.

Nudd and Noe received the property and money in January, 1871. The petition in bankruptcy against Emmons was filed in the following month of February. The action is founded on the 35th and 39th sections of the bankrupt act. The transaction was within four months before the filing of the petition. Upon the trial the plaintiffs proposed to prove what Emmons had said touching the purchase of the stock and the payment of the money to the defendants.

To each and all of the questions asked with this view the counsel for the defendants objected, "on the ground that they called for the declarations of Emmons not made in the presence of either of the defendants, or brought to their knowledge."

Was this ground of objection well taken?

The counsel for the defendant in error insists that they were competent as the declarations of a co-conspirator.

In general the rules of evidence are the same in civil and criminal cases. U. S. v. Gooding, 12 Wheaton, 469.

"Where two or more persons are associated for the same illegal purpose, any act or declaration of one of the parties in reference to the common object, and forming a part of the res gestæ, may be given in evidence." Amer. Fur Co. v. U. S., 2 Peters, 365.

The bill of exceptions does not purport to give all the evidence. What proof had been given of the alleged concert and conspiracy on the part of the defendants when the declarations of Emmons were offered to be proved does not appear.

It is to be presumed it was sufficient to lay the proper foundation as to them for the introduction of the evidence. The declarations were competent to prove the whole case as against Emmons. 1 Taylor's Evidence, 486.

Whether the declarations were made in the presence or brought to the knowledge of either of the defendants is immaterial. The objection as taken was confined to this point, and this is the only aspect in which it is necessary to consider it. If it were intended to rest it upon any other ground it should have been so presented and the court advised accordingly.

In the early part of December, 1870, Emmons and James W. and Richard Chandler were partners, under the name of Emmons & Chandler. The plaintiff claimed that the partnership was dissolved on the 13th of that month. The defendants insisted that it continued down to the close of the business in question, and that the transaction was not with Emmons alone but with the firm of Emmons & Chandler.

They offered in evidence the declarations of the Chandlers touching the points in controversy. The court excluded the testimony and the defendants excepted.

This ruling was correct. The declarations of a party may be evidence against him, but, except under circumstances which had no existence in this case, they cannot be received in his favor. The Chandlers might have been called as witnesses. Their declarations were merely hearsay, and as regards this case were res inter alios acta.

It appears by the bill of exceptions that in charging the jury the judge commented upon the evidence.

Questions of law are to be determined by the court—questions of fact by the jury. The authority of the jury as to the latter is as absolute as the authority of the court with respect to the former.

No question of fact must be withdrawn from the determination of those whose function it is to decide such issues.

The line which separates the two provinces must not be overlooked by the court. Care must be taken that the jury is not misled into the belief that they are alike bound by the views expressed upon the evidence and the instructions given as to the law. They must distinctly understand that what is said as to the facts is only advisory and in no wise intended to fetter the exercise finally of their own independent judgment. Within these limitations it is the right and duty of the court to aid them, by recalling the testimony to their recollection, by collating its details, by suggesting grounds of preference where there is contradiction, by directing their attention to the most important facts, by eliminating the true points of inquiry, by resolving the evidence, however complicated, into its simplest elements, and by showing the bearing of its several parts and their combined effect, stripped of every consideration which might otherwise mislead or confuse them. How this duty shall be performed depends in every case upon the discretion of the judge. There is none more important resting upon those who preside at jury trials. Constituted as juries are, it is frequently impossible for them to discharge their function wisely and well without this aid. In such case chance, mistake, or caprice may determine the result.

We do not think the remarks and suggestions of the learned judge in this case exceeded the proper license.

They did not go beyond the verge of what has been often sanctioned by this and other courts. Games et al. v. Stiles, 14 Pet., 337; U. S. v. Fourteen Packages, Gilp., 254; 1 Taylor's Evid., 35.

The modifications of the two instructions asked for by the defendants, were, we think, correct in point of law. Only the second one calls for any remarks.

There was proof tending to show that on the 13th of December, 1870, the defendants adjusted their account with Emmons & Chandler, and by the agreement of all the parties transferred the amount due to themselves to the separate account of Emmons, and gave the Chandlers a release. The balance found due, and so transferred, was the same with the amount in controversy, as before stated. The business of the defendants was the selling of live stock upon commission. The balance accrued in the course of their previous business in this way with the firm of Emmons & Chandler. They claimed a factor's lien upon the money and proceeds of the property in question for the satisfaction of this demand.

The court charged that as the lien could not attach until the money and proceeds were received by the defendants—if the previous transactions created the relation of debtor and creditors between them and Emmons and they could have sued Emmons for the amount—"this would bring the debt under the bankrupt act the same as any other debt."

This must necessarily be so. The lien attempted to be set up was repelled by the circumstances referred to. Such a claim occupies no better ground than would a mortgage, pledge, or power to confess judgment given at the same time and for the same purpose. Otherwise every factor might be thus secured when his debtor was in the article of bankruptcy, and this class of creditors would have a monopoly of the preferences so given. Such preference, to whomsoever given, is forbidden by the bankrupt law and is a fraud upon it. Fraud destroys the validity of everything into which it enters. It affects fatally even the most solemn judgments and decrees. Bankrupt Act, sec. 35; 1 Story's Eq., sec. 252; Freeman on Judgments, sec. 486.

Whenever fraud is perpetrated by one party to the injury of another, the offender is liable. Paisley v. Freeman, 3 T. R., 51; Benton v. Pratt, 2 Wend., 385. Here the jury have found the facts charged by the assignee. This is conclusive against the defendants with respect to any claim upon the fund.

The last assignment relates to alleged errors of the court in matters of practice. Before the judge began his charge to the jury, the counsel for the defendants requested him in giving it to conform in all things to the practice of the courts of record and the law of the State. This he refused to do. He also refused to allow the jury to take with them to their room the written instructions he had given them, and likewise, the account book, bills of lading, and additional papers which had been introduced in evidence, other than the depositions. To each of these refusals the defendants excepted.

The practice act of Illinois provides, that the court in charging the jury shall instruct them only as to the law of the case; that no instructions shall be given unless reduced to writing; that instructions asked shall not be modified by the court except in writing; that the instructions shall be taken by the jury in their retirement and returned with the verdict, and that papers read in evidence, other than depositions, may be carried from the bar by the jury. 1 Gross' Stat., 289.

It is declared by the act of Congress of June 1, 1872, sec. 5, "that the practice, pleadings, and forms and modes of proceeding in civil causes, other than equity and admiralty causes, in the circuit and district courts shall conform as near as may be" to the same things "existing at the time in the courts of record of the State within which such circuit and district courts are held."

The purpose of the provision is apparent upon its face. No analysis is necessary to reach it. It was to bring about uniformity in the law of procedure in the Federal and State courts of the same locality. It had its origin in the code enactments of many of the States. While in the Federal tribunals the common law pleadings, forms, and practice were adhered to, in the State courts of the same district the simpler forms of the local code prevailed. This involved the necessity on the part of the bar of studying two distinct systems of remedial law, and of practicing according to the wholly dissimilar requirements of both. The inconvenience of such a state of things is obvious. The evil was a serious one. It was the aim of the provision in question to remove it. This was done by bringing about the conformity in the courts of the United States which it prescribes. The remedy was complete. The personal administration by the judge of his duties while sitting upon the bench was not complained of. No one objected or sought a remedy in that direction.

We see nothing in the act to warrant the conclusion that it was intended to have such an application.

If the proposition of the counsel for the plaintiff in error be correct, the powers of the judge, as defined by the common law, were largely trenched upon.

A statute claimed to work this effect must be strictly construed. But no severity of construction is necessary to harmonize the language employed with the view we have expressed. The identity required is to be in "the practice, pleadings, and forms and modes of proceeding." The personal conduct and administration of the judge in the discharge of his separate functions is, in our judgment, neither practice, pleading, nor a form nor mode of proceeding within the meaning of those terms as found in the context. The subject of these exceptions is, therefore, not within the act as we understand it.

There are certain powers inherent in the judicial office. How far the legislative department of the government can impair them or dictate the manner of their exercise are interesting questions, but it is unnecessary in this case to consider them. Houston v. Williams, 13 Cal., 24.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT.

OCTOBER TERM, 1875.

JAY COOKE et al. v. THE UNITED STATES.

THE UNITED STATES—COMMERCIAL PAPER—TREASURY NOTES—FORGERY—PAYMENT OF FORGED PAPER.

1. That when the United States become parties to commercial paper, they incur all the responsibilities of private persons under the same circumstances.

2. That genuine treasury notes, like those now in question, were, before their maturity, part of the negotiable commercial paper of the country.

3. That the receipt of the paper, accompanied by payment, was an adoption of it.

4. How far the government is bound by the acts of its officers in receiving and paying forged notes of the government.

5. That Congress seems to have been desirous of meeting its obligations of this class whenever they could be exchanged for, or retired with the proceeds of the sale of certain specified bonds having a longer time to run; the object was to get rid of this species of debt.

6. DISSENTING OPINION.—From the opinion, Clifford, J., Field and Bradley, JJ., dissent, and are of the opinion that the United States are not liable for forged paper under any circumstances.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

Opinion by WAITE, C. J.

The United States sued Jay Cooke & Co., in this action, to recover back money paid them by the assistant treasurer, in New York, for the purchase or redemption before maturity, under the act of August 12, 1866 (14 Stat., 31), of what purported to be eighteen 7.30 treasury notes, issued under the authority of the act of March 3, 1865 (13 Stat., 468), but which it is alleged were counterfeit. Cooke & Co. insist that if they honestly believed the notes in question were genuine, and so believing in good faith passed them to the assistant treasurer, and he, under a like belief and with like good faith received and paid for them, there can be no recovery even though they may have been counterfeit.

As this defense meets us at the threshold of the case, it is proper that it should be first considered.

It was conceded in the argument that when the United States become parties to commercial paper they incur all the responsibilities of private persons under the same circumstances. This is in accordance with the decisions of this court. (Floyd's Acceptances, 7 Wall., 557; U. S. v. Bk. of Metropolis, 15 Pet., 373.) As was well said in the last case: "From the daily and unavoidable use of commercial paper by the United States, they are as much interested as the community at large can be, in maintaining these principles." It was, also, conceded that genuine treasury notes, like those now in question, were before their maturity part of the negotiable commercial paper of the country. We so held, at the last term, in Vermilye & Co. v. Express Co., 21 Wall., 138.

It is, undoubtedly, also true, as a general rule of commercial law, that where one accepts forged paper purporting to be his own, and pays it to a holder for value, he cannot recall the payment. The operative fact in this rule is the acceptance or more properly perhaps, the adoption of the paper as genuine by its apparent maker. Often the bare receipt of the paper accompanied by payment is equivalent to an adoption within the meaning of the rule, because as every man is presumed to know his own signature and ought to detect its forgery by simple inspection, the examination which he can give when the demand upon him is made, is all that the law considers necessary for his protection. He must repudiate as soon as he ought to have discovered the forgery, otherwise he will be regarded as accepting the paper. Unnecessary delay under such circumstances is unreasonable, and unreasonable delay is negligence which throws the burden of the loss upon him who is guilty of it, rather than upon one who is not. The rule is thus well stated in Gloucester Bank v. Salem Bang, 17 Mass., 45. "The party receiving such notes must examine them as soon as he has opportunity, and return them immediately. If he does not, he is negligent, and negligence will defeat his action."

When, therefore, a party is entitled to something more than a mere inspection of the paper before he can be required to pass finally upon its character, as, for example, an examination of accounts or records kept by him for the purposes of verification, negligence sufficient to charge him with a loss cannot be claimed until this examination ought to have been completed. If, in the ordinary course of business, this might have been done before payment, it ought to have been, and payment without will have the effect of an acceptance and adoption. But if the presentation is made at a time when, or at a place where such an examination cannot be had. time must be allowed for that purpose; and, if the money is then paid, the parties, the one in paying, and the other in receiving payment, are to be understood as agreeing that a receipt and payment under such circumstances shall not amount to an adoption, but that further inquiry may be made, and if the paper is found to be counterfeit, it may be returned within a reasonable time. What is reasonable, must in every case depend upon circumstances; but until a reasonable time has in fact elapsed, the law will not impute negligence on account of delay.

So, too, if the paper is received and paid for by an agent, the principal is not charged unless the agent had authority to act for him in passing upon the character of the instrument. It is the negligence of the principal that binds, and that of the agent has no effect, except to the extent that it is chargeable to the principal.

Laches is not imputable to the government, in its character as sovereign, by those subject to its dominion. (U. S. v. Kilpatrick, 9 Wheat., 735; Gibbons v. U. S., 8 Wall., 269). Still a government may suffer loss through the negligence of its officers. If it comes down from its position of sovereignty and enters the domain of commerce, it submits itself to the same laws that govern individuals there. Thus, if it becomes the holder of a bill of exchange, it must use the same diligence to charge the drawers and indorsers that is required of individuals, and if it fails in this, its claim upon the parties is lost. (U. S. v. Barker, 12 Wheat., 559.) And generally, in respect to all the commercial business of the government, if an officer specially charged with the performance of any duty and authorized to represent the government in that behalf, neglects that duty and loss ensues, the government must bear the consequences of his neglect. But this cannot happen until the officer specially charged with the duty, if there be one, has acted or ought to have acted. As the government can only act through its officers, it may select for its work whomsoever it will, but it must have some representative authorized to act in all the emergencies of its commercial transactions. If it fail in this, it fails in the performance of its own duties, and must be charged with the consequences that follow such omissions in the commercial world.

Such being the principles of law applicable to this part of the case, we now proceed to examine the facts.

The department of the treasury is by law located at the seat of government as one of the executive departments, and the Secretary of the Treasury is its official head. (Rev. Stat., sec. 233; 1 Stat., 65.) All claims and demands against the government are to be settled and adjusted in this department, (Rev. Stat., sec 236; 3 Stat., 366,) and the Treasurer of the United States is one of its officer. (Rev. Stat., sec 301; 1 Stat, 65.) His duty is to receive and keep the money of the United States and disburse it upon warrants drawn by the Secretary of the Treasury, countersigned by either comptroller, and recorded by the register, and not otherwise. (Rev. Stat., sec. 305; 1 Stat., 65.) The rooms provided in the Treasury building at the seat of government for the use of the Treasurer are by law the Treasury of the United States. (Rev. Stat., sec. 3591; 9 Stat., 60.) The rooms assigned by law to be occupied by them are appropriated to their use and for the safe keeping of the public money deposited with them. (Rev. Stat., sec. 3598; 9 Stat., 59.) The assistant treasarers are to have the charge and care of the rooms, etc., assigned to them, and to perform the duties required of them relating to the receipt, safe keeping and disbursement of the public money. (Rev. Stat., sec. 3599; 9 Stat., 59.) All collectors and receivers of public money of every description within the city of New York are required, as often as may be directed by the Secretary of the Treasury, to pay over to the assistant treasurer in that city all public money collected by them or in their hands. (Rev. Stat., sec. 3615; 9 Stat., 61.) The treasurer of the United States, and all assistant treasurers, are required to keep all public money placed in their possession till the same is ordered by the proper department or officer of the government to be transferred or paid out, and, when such orders are received, faithfully and promptly to comply with the same, and to perform all other duties as fiscal agents of the government that may be imposed by any law or by any regulation of the Treasury Department made in conformity to law. (Rev. Stat., sec. 3639; 9 Stat., 60.) All money paid into the Treasury of the United States is subject to the draft of the treasurer, and for the purpose of payment on the public account, the treasurer is authorized to draw on any of the depositories as he may think most condusive to the public interest and the convenience of the public creditors. (Rev. Stat, sec. 3644; 9 Stat., 61.)

Thus it is seen that all claims against the United States are to be settled and adjusted "in the Treasury Department," and that is located "at the seat of Government." The assistant treasurer in New York is a custodion of the public money, which he may pay out or transfer upon the order of the proper department or officer, but he has no authority to settle and adjust, that is to say, to determine upon the validity of any claim against the government. He can pay only after the adjustment has been made "in the Treasury Department," and then upon drafts drawn for that purpose by the Treasurer.

By the act of April 12, 1866, the Secretary of the Treasury was authorized, at his discretion, to receive the treasury notes issued under any act of Congress in exchange for certain bonds, or he might sell the bonds, and use the proceeds to retire the notes. (14 Stat., 31.) This exchange or retirement of the notes involved an adjustment of the claims made on their account against the government. That adjustment, as has been seen, could only be had in the Treasury Department, and the Government cannot be bound by any payment made without it, through one of the assistant treasurers, until a sufficient time has elapsed, in the regular course of business, for the transmission of the notes to the department and an examination and verification there.

That such was the expectation of Congress is apparent from the legislation authorizing the issue of such notes. On the 23d December, 1857, an act was passed "to authorize the issue of treasury notes. (11 Stat., 257.) The payment or redemption of these notes was to be made to the lawful holders upon presentment at the treasury. (Sec. 2.) The notes were to be prepared under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, and to be signed in behalf of the United States by the treasurer thereof, and countersigned by the register of the treasury. Each of these officers was to keep, in books provided for that purpose, accurate accounts, showing the number, date, amount, etc., of each note signed or countersigned by himself, and also showing the notes received and canceled. These accounts were to be carefully preserved in the treasury. (Sec. 3.) The notes were made receivable for public dues. (Sec. 6.) The officer receiving the same was required to take from the holder a receipt upon the back of each note, stating distinctly the date of payment and amount allowed. He was also required to make regular and specific entries of all notes received by him, showing the person from whom received, the number, date, and amount of principal and interest allowed on each note. These entries were to be delivered to the treasurer with the notes, and if found correct he was to receive credit for the amount allowed. (Sec. 7.) To promote the public convenience and security, and protect the United States, as well as individuals, from fraud and loss, the Secretary of the Treasury was authorized to make and issue such instructions as he should deem best, to the officers required to receive the notes in behalf of, and as agents in any capacity for, the United States as to the custody, disposal, canceling and return of the notes received, and as to the accounts and returns to be made to the Treasury Department of such receipts. (Sec. 8.) The Secretary of the Treasury was directed to cause such notes to be paid when they fell due, and he was authorized to purchase them at par for the amount of the principal and interest due at the time of the purchase.—(Sec. 9.)

The act of July 17, 1861, "to authorize a national loan, and for other purposes," provided for an issue of 7-30 treasury notes, and, in terms, re-enacted all the provisions of the act of December 23, 1857, so far as the same were applicable and not inconsistent with what was then enacted.—(12 Stat., 259, secs. 1 and 10.)

The acts of June 30, 1864 (13 Stat., 218), and March 3, 1865 (13 Stat., 468), which authorized further issues of the same class of notes, did not in terms re-enact the provisions of the acts of 1857 and 1861, but they did authorize and require the Secretary of the Treasury to make and issue such instructions to the officers who might receive the notes in behalf of the United States, as he should deem best calculated "to promote the public convenience and security, and to protect the United States, as well as inividuals, from fraud and loss."—(13 Stat., 221, sec. 8.)

These are public laws of which all must take notice. In the absence of any evidence showing a regulation permitting an exchange or redemption of notes at any other place than the treasury, and after settlement and adjustment in the department, it will not be presumed that one was made. The notes in question are not made payable at any particular place. Consequently they are in law payable at the treasury, and this is at the seat of government and in the Treasury Department. In this department the Seeretary represent the government. His acts and his omissions, within the line of his official duties, are the acts or omissions of the government itself, and in all commercial transactions his official negligence will be deemed to be the negligence of the government. He is specially charged with the duty of retiring these treasury notes by exchange, payment, or purchase, and he is the only agent authorized to act for the government in that behalf. All who deal with the government in respect to these notes are presumed to know his exclusive authority, for it is public law. Until such time, therefore, as he has acted, or in due course of business ought to have acted, there can have been no such laches as will charge the government. He is presumed to act officially only in his department. His attention can only be demanded after the presentation of the notes at that place. It was there that the accounts and records of the issues and redemptions under the early laws were by statute required to be kept, and that is the appropriate place for keeping such similar records as the Secretary of the Treasury may by regulation prescribe under the later laws, to protect against fraud and loss.

Such seems to have been the understanding of the parties in the transaction which is now under consideration. The notes were "sold" to the assistant treasurer, and were, by stamp upon their back at the appropriate place for their endorsement, made payable "to the order of the Secretary of the Treasury, for redemption." The payment by the assistant treasurer under such circumstances, for the purchase, did not "retire" the notes. That upon the face of the transaction required the further order of the Secretary of the Treasury. Undoubtedly it was expected that in due course of business that order would be given, but, until given, or at least until it ought to have been given, it cannot be said that the government has accepted the notes and adopted them as genuine.

Neither has there been such delay in returning the notes to Cooke & Co., after their receipt by the assistant treasurer, as will throw the burden of the loss upon the government. The return should have been made within a reasonable time and what is a reasonable time is always a question for the courts when the facts are not disputed.—Wiggins v. Burkham, 10 Wall, 133.) Here there is no dispute. The notes were delivered to the assistant treasurer on different days between September 20 and October 8. The first suspicion in Washington in regard to their character was October 5, when a note was found of which, upon inspection of the record, a duplicate was already in. All the notes were found and returned to New York, October 12, and the next day Cooke & Co. were notified.

The amount of 7-30 notes issued by the government was many hundreds of millions of dollars. Necessarily the accounts and records of their issue and redemption were voluminous. Between September 20 and October 8 Cooke & Co. themselves sold to the assistant treasurer for redemption more than $7,500,000. Other parties were at the same time making sales to large amounts. Time must be given for careful examination and scrutiny, and we do not think that, under all the circumstances, any unreasonable delay occurred either in their transmission to or return from the Treasury Department.

We are all clearly of the opinion, therefore, that if the notes were in fact counterfeit, their receipt by the assistant treasurer and his payment therefor did preclude the United States from receiving back the money paid. So far there was no error in the courts below.

It was, however, contended by Cooke & Co. that if the notes were not counterfeit, but genuine notes unlawfully and surreptitiously put in circulation, the government was bound for their payment to a bona fide holder, and consequently that there could be no recovery. We quite agree with the lamented judge of the circuit court who had this case before him upon error to the district court, that the evidence tending to show a fraudulent or surreptitious issue of notes printed from the genuine plates was exceedingly meagre, and by no means sufficient to warrant a verdict to that effect; but the jury was not permitted to pass upon that question, as the district judge charged "that if the notes were printed in the department, and all ready for issue, yet if they were not in fact issued, the United States could recover." The issue to bind the government, said the judge, "must be a physical act of an authorized officer."

It was conceded on behalf of the government, in the argument here, that if the notes had been due when they were received and paid, this part of the charge could not be sustained. We need not, therefore, examine that question. The notes were perfect and complete as soon as printed. They did not require the signature of any officer. As soon as they had received the impression of all the plates and dies necessary to perfect their form, they were ready for circulation and use. In this respect they did not differ from the coins of the mint when fully stamped and prepared for issue. Coin is the money of commerce and circulates from hand to hand as such. These notes represent the promises of the government to pay money, and were intended to circulate and take the place of money, to some extent, for commercial purposes. Although not made legal tender as between individuals, they were, for their then face value, exclusive of interest, as between the government and its creditors.—(13 Stat., 221, sec. 8.) They were issued under the authority of "an act to provide ways and means for the support of the government" (13 Stat., 218, title) in its great peril, and they bore the "imprint of the seal of the Treasury Department as further evidence of lawful issue."—(Ib., 220, sec. 6.) Their aggregate amount was very large, and they were all of convenient denominations, not less than ten dollars. (Ib., 218, sec. 2). The people were appealed to, through their patriotism, to accept and give them circulation. They entered largely, and at once, into the commerce of the country, and passed readily from hand to hand as, or in lieu of, money. After the close of the war they became, in a sense, too valuable for circulation, and were, on that account, to a large extent, withdrawn and held for investment.

But it is insisted, on the part of the government, that as the act of April 12, 1866, only authorized the Secretary of the Treasury to retire, before their maturity, notes "issued" under the authority of some act of Congress, he could only take up such as were actually put out by the "physical act" of some authorized officer of the government in pursuance of law. This, we think, is too narrow a construction of the act. At the time it was passed, the war of the rebellion was over. In the prosecution of this war an immense debt had been contracted. To meet the pressing demands upon the credit of the government, various forms of securities had been put forth, some of which, like these now under consideration, would mature at an early date, and sooner, perhaps, than they could be met without the negotiation of new loans. In view of this possible contingency, Congress seems to have been desirous of meeting its obligations of this class whenever they could be exchanged for or retired with the proceeds of the sale of certain specified bonds having a longer time to run. The object, evidently, was to get rid of this species of debt, and we think the act may be fairly construed to authorize the retirement of all notes of this class outstanding which the government would be required to meet at maturity

This leads to a reversal of the judgment. There have been other errors assigned upon the rulings made in progress of the trial as to the admission of evidence. These need not be specially alluded to. It is sufficient to say that we think there is no error here. The same may be said as to the ruling of the court upon the punching or cancellation of the notes If they were counterfeit, the cancellation could do no harm, for they were worthless before. If they were genuine, they had already been canceled by the payment.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is reversed, and the cause remanded, with instructions to reverse the judgment of the District Court, and to award a venire de novo.

(Mr. Justice Miller did not sit on the argument of this cause, and took no part in the decision).

Mr. Justice CLIFFORD dissenting.

I dissent from the opinion of the court in this case—

1. Because I am of the opinion that the United States are not liable for forged paper under any circumstances.

2. Because I am of the opinion that the United States are not liable for its paper promises fraudulently or surreptitiously put into circulation, nor even if the fraudulent act was perpetrated by treasury officials.

Mr. Justice Field and Mr. Justice Bradley also dissent, and concur in this dissent.

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

OPINION FILED JANY., 1876.

T. LYLE DICKEY et al. v. CHAS. H. REED et al.

Appeal from Cook.

CONTESTED ELECTION—POWERS OF A COURT OF EQUITY IN—WHEN PARTIES CANNOT BE LEGALLY FINED FOR DISOBEYING AN INJUNCTION—CONTEMPT OF COURT.

1. The court below enjoined the aldermen and city clerk from canvassing the returns of a municipal election. The aldermen and their counsel disregarded the injunction and canvassed the vote. The court below fined them for contempt of court in disregarding the injunction. Whereupon they appealed to the Supreme Court, and that court holds that the court below had no power to hear and adjudicate in this class of cases; and having no power under any head of its jurisdiction, the court acted wholly without power to entertain the bill for any purpose, or to award the writ of execution, wanting both power and jurisdiction to entertain the bill, or award the writ; it was a nullity which could legally operate on no one, nor was any one bound to yield obedience to its requirements; having been issued without power, it was as inefficient as if it had been issued without any bill presented, or as though no person had ever asked for it; that the whole proceeding was coram non judice, and the appellants could not be legally punished for contempt in disobeying it.

2. JURISDICTION IN ELECTION CASES.—The court states the jurisdiction of courts of equity in cases of election contests, and draws a distinction between a county-seat contest and a municipal election; that no case can be found where an English court of chancery has ever tried a contested election where the public was concerned, and such cases are of rare occurrence in this country, and then only where the power has been conferred by express enactment or necessary implication therefrom.

3. CONTEMPT OF COURT.—That the general assembly have not only failed to define the offense of resisting the authority of the State as exercised by the courts and declare the penalty or punishment to be inflicted, but in the revision of our statutes omitted the prior provision on the subject. They have thus repealed the law authorizing courts to punish contempts offered in the presence of the same, and for disobedience to their orders and process. Whether it was the design of that body to strip the courts of that power, or to leave them to exercise the undefined power as it existed at common law, or whether the courts being created by the Constitution and the power to punish for contempt being inherent in courts of record, the right is not constitutional and beyond the power of the general assembly, are questions not discussed in the case.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

WALKER, J.—On the 23d of April, 1875, an election was held in the city of Chicago to determine whether that municipality would change their charter, and the people would become incorporated under the general incorporation act for cities and villages, which went into force on the first day of July, 1872. On the 26th of that month, the prosecuting attorney and five others, tax-payers of the city, filed a bill in the Circuit Court of Cook county against forty aldermen, composing the Common Council of the city, and the city clerk.

It alleges the omission by the mayor and Common Council to submit in express terms, or otherwise, to a vote of the people, the question of minority representation, and charges that on account of such omission, the election held on the 23d of the month was void; also, that a large number of illegal and fraudulent votes were cast in favor of organization under the law; that a large number of ballots not actually cast by voters were deposited in the ballot-boxes by the judges, or by their connivance; that in some of the wards there were no poll lists and no clerks, and that if the illegal votes were rejected, the result would be against organization under the act; that the judges had returned, or were about to return their canvass of the votes, including such illegal and fraudulent votes so cast and received, and those cast at the polling places where no poll-lists were kept; and that complainants had good reason to believe and did believe that the Common Council would proceed to declare the act of 1872 adopted.

Affidavits were filed in support of the bill, and in compliance with the prayer thereof, a temporary injunction was ordered restraining that body from canvassing the returns made to them by the judges and clerks of the election. The injunction was to remain in force ten days, with leave to defendants to move to dissolve, and like leave to the complainants to move to continue the same.

The writ was issued and served on the 26th of April. The Common Council, on the same day, were in session, and, after the writ was served, they appointed a committee to procure legal advice and assistance to defend the suit. They employed Wm. C. Goudy, M. F. Tuley, E. A. Storrs, and J. P. Root to assist the regular law officers in such litigation as might grow out of the election.

After being thus employed, the mayor of the city put to them and to the corporation counsel and his assistants the question whether the members of the Common Council would be liable to punishment for contempt of court if they should, notwithstanding the injunction, proceed to canvass the returns and declare and certify the same.

They, after deliberation, answered that the Circuit Court had no jurisdiction in the case, and the writ was void; and that the defendants could not be legally punished for contempt, in case they should disobey the writ.

These opinions were in writing, signed by counsel and delivered to the mayor; and, at a meeting of the Common Council on the 3d of May, 1875, were read to that body, whilst in session, and they canvassed the returns, declared the result, and caused it to be entered on the records of the city.

On the 4th of May the original bill was amended, and a supplemental bill was filed, making the city a party, and setting out what had subsequently transpired after issuing the writ, and praying that the city be restrained from exercising the powers conferred by the act of 1872, thus declared to have been adopted. A motion to strike the supplemental bill from the files was overruled.

On the next day defendants answered the original and supplemental bills, and complainants moved to continue the injunction, but the motion was denied. The injunction expired by the lapse of time. On the 12th of that month complainants dismissed their supplemental bill.

On the 14th complainants, on affidavits filed, moved for a rule on the members of the Common Council who canvassed the returns, and the attorneys who signed the opinions, to show cause "why they should not be punished and committed" for a contempt of court—the members for violating, and the attorneys for advising, the violation of the injunction.

A rule was accordingly entered requiring them to show cause, by the 21st of May, at 10 o'clock, and requiring them to answer interrogatories. They were subsequently exhibited, and answers thereto were filed by all of the defendants. The members of the Common Council admitted the canvassing of the returns, and the attorneys admitted the giving of the opinions referred to herein. The court found the defendants guilty of a contempt, and fined each of a number of aldermen $100, and each attorney $300, and they all appeal to this court.

It is first urged that there is error in the form in which the judgments are entered. This may be true; but we have chosen to consider and determine the case on its merits, passing over technical objections.

The General Assembly have not only failed to define the offense of resisting the authority of the State as exercised by the courts, and declare the penalty or punishment to be inflicted, but in the last revision of our statutes omitted the prior provision on the subject. They have thus repealed the law authorizing courts to punish contempts offered in the presence of the same, and for disobedience to their orders and process. Whether it was the design of that body to strip the courts of that power, or to leave them to exercise the undefined power as it existed at the common law, or whether the courts being created by the Constitution and the power to punish for contempt being inherent in courts of record, the right is not constitutional and beyond the power of the General Assembly, are questions not discussed in this case, and in the view we have taken of it become unimportant in its decision.

It is urged by appellants that the court below had no power to entertain jurisdiction of the case, or to issue the writ, and that all which followed the filing of the bill was utterly void. That the want of power to entertain a bill in such a case, or to make there straining order, rendered the whole proceeding void and of no effect, and being void appellants had the right to disregard its requirements and to proceed to the performance of a plain duty required of them by the statute, although in violation of the restraining order of the court. This we understand to be in substance the position assumed by appellants. On the other hand appellee insists, that if the court had power as contradistinguished from mere jurisdiction, to entertain a bill, to review the canvass of election returns in any case, and to correct frauds, accidents or mistakes, that then the want of jurisdiction in the particular case did not affect the power to issue the writ. That the court had power and had exercised it in contested county seat cases independent of statutory authority, and as an inherent power, or if not inherent a power derived from the Constitution, and hence the court had power in this case to issue the writ and punish those refusing to observe its requirements or for disobedience to its commands, as a contempt of the authority of the court and the State. Thus it is seen that a question of much interest, and it may be of great importance is presented for consideration. It is a question of how far a court of equity may use its powers to relieve against frauds, accidents or mistakes in elections, when its action must determine which of two persons shall fill an office, or as in this case, which of two forms of local government shall control the people of this municipality. If the election may in this case, be thus contested, and the municipal officers and others, be restrained from performing the functions and duties imposed, until by the tedious process of taking depositions and preparing the case for trial can be made, and the case heard in the court below, and an appeal with the incident delays may be heard, years would in all probability elapse before the government chosen by the people could in many instances go into operation. Hence it is the policy of the law to afford a more speedy and less expensive mode of settling these contests.

If the court may exercise this jurisdiction in cases of doubt, or even where there is no doubt of the result, a few contentious and not over scrupulous persons might and probably would be induced from the heat and strife always engendered in such elections, to resort to a bill and an injunction and thus for years thwart the will of the people, which the General Assembly has made absolute in adopting or rejecting this charter for their government. Public policy does not require such a jurisdiction even if it could sanction it. If the power were admitted, where would its jurisdiction end? Suppose a person were to conceive a law to have been unconstitutionally enacted, could he by bill restrain the governor and all other officers from executing it until a hearing could be had and the law declared valid? Suppose a citizen in his hostile opposition to a governor elect, or from other motives, were to conceive that he had obtained his apparent majority by fraud, could he apply to a court for and obtain an injunction, to restrain him from becoming inaugurated, until by delays and appeals the term for which he had been elected should expire and thus defeat the will of the people?

Again, suppose a constitutional convention were called, a Constitution adopted and submitted to the people for ratification or rejection, and the vote were in favor of adoption, could a bill be filed to prevent the Secretary of State from canvassing the returns because fraud was alleged, until the vote of every county could be contested, purged, and new returns were made and a trial were had after long and vexatious delays?

Can it be said that the two houses of the General Assembly may be restrained by injunction from the enactment of laws, because a portion of the members may have procured their seats by fraud, or one or both of the houses have, or are supposed to have been illegally or even unconstitutionally organized? Can the Supreme and other courts be restrained from proceeding with the business before them because it may be supposed that the judges have obtained their seats by frauds in the election, or some statutory requirement has been omitted?

Or may such a course be pursued in a large number of other like cases which would defeat the will of the people constitutionally expressed? To so hold would be revolutionary. Such propositions cannot be maintained, as it would largely give control of the political power of the State to the courts, a department not designed either directly or indirectly to exercise or control that power. But it is believed no one would contend for such power in the courts. But the expansive force of precedent may be said to be almost unlimited. A decision is made as an exception to a rule, and soon it is pressed with vigor as establishing a principle that would embrace cases falling within well defined rules, and if adopted would lead to the perversion of justice. Sanction the power in this case as inherent in the court of chancery, could any ingenuity suggest reasons which should forbid the application of the same rule to every case we have supposed, or any election case where fraud is alleged. In this case alleged fraud is the ground on which the power is urged. So would it be in those cases, and the fraud would be precisely the same in each.

Whilst the writ of injunction is one of the most important in the law, by affording preventive relief—in fact is indispensable to the complete administration of justice, it is one from the facility with which it may be obtained, that is liable to great abuse, when granted to temporarily restrain the action of parties, until a hearing is had. And the whole tendency seems to be towards its improvident use and consequent abuse. Whilst its use is absolutely essential to the administration of equitable relief, it has its limits, and the policy would not be wise, nor would it promote justice to extend its use to cases of doubtful right or to accomplish ends where there are other adequate remedies. The whole tendency of our jurisprudence has been to enlarge its scope, and it is now used in cases where formerly no one supposed it could be rightfully applied, and the present tendency is to a point which, when reached, will compel the General Assembly to intervene to restrain the abuses it will produce. And it is all believed to have grown out of the expansion of precedents not unfrequently of doubtful correctness.

Having stated these general propositions we now come to the consideration of the question, whether the court below had power as contradistinguished from mere equitable jurisdiction, growing out of the facts charged in the bill, to award the temporary injunction. To the complete authority to so act, there are several things which are indispensable to enable the court to hear, to determine and decree. There must be a complainant who must file a bill alleging facts showing that he has an interest in the matter in litigation, or at least to complain and have relief for others; there must be a matter about which rights are claimed, and that matter must be within the power of the court when properly before it, to act upon or control it by its sentence, before it can adjudge and decree that parties shall be restrained from acting in reference to the thing in litigation. If any, or either of these essential requirements is wanting the court cannot decree that a restraining order shall issue.

In this case there was a complainant who had exhibited a bill, and there was a subject-matter for litigation. And the controlling question is, whether the court, under any circumstances could have power to hear, determine and decree in reference to it. If not, then the whole proceeding was coram non judice.

The law under which the election was held neither in terms or by implication confers the power. Nor is it asserted that the court had facts before it which required it to take judicial cognizance and hear, adjudicate and decree. On the contrary the court refused to continue the injunction, thus virtually deciding that the court was powerless to afford the relief sought, and thereby permitting the injunction to come to an end by the terms of the order awarding it. And we are clearly of the opinion that it was not a case for equitable interposition. The act itself provides, Sec. 57, Art. 4, p. 217, R. S. 1874, that "the manner of conducting and voting at elections to be held under this act, and contesting the same, the keeping of poll-lists and canvassing the votes, shall be the same as nearly as may be, as in the case of electing county officers under the general laws of this State." The 98th section of the election law (R. S. 1874, p. 464,) provides for the manner of contesting the election of all county officers except the county judge, in the county court. Other sections of the act provide who may contest, how service shall be made, the trial had and conducted, and for the judgment to be rendered.

Thus it is seen there was complete and in every way an ample remedy expressly provided for contesting this election under the statute, but it was not invoked. Hence there could be no pretense of jurisdiction from necessity. The remedy was obvious, plain, and simple in its application, and being ample and complete there is not the slightest reason why equity should interpose and perform the functions of the county court, where the statute has placed it.

It has been held that a court of equity has no power to try a contested election, even when the statute has not provided a mode for contesting. See Moore v. Hoisengton, 31 Ill., 243. Elections belong to the political branch of the government, and are beyond the control of the judicial power. It was not designed when the fundamental law of the State was framed that either department of government should interfere with or control the other. And it is for the political power of the State within the limits of the constitution, to provide the manner in which elections shall be held and the manner in which officers thus elected shall be qualified, and their elections contested. And the political power of the State may organize municipal bodies and put them into operation by the force of enactment, or by election by the people to be thus governed, and they can provide the mode of reviewing the returns of all elections to ascertain whether they are in accordance with the expressed will of the people. And until the courts are empowered to act by the constitution or legislative enactment they must refrain from interference.

But did the court have a general power to hear and determine as to the fairness of the result of elections in this class of cases on the requisite facts being stated in the bill? If so, then the court had power over the subject matter although the facts were so defectively stated as to fail to confer jurisdiction in the particular case; we think clearly not, because no state of facts, however stated, could confer power to adjudicate in that class of cases. We are aware of no adjudged cases, or text-writer who has ever announced the power as inherent in the courts of equity, to try contested elections between persons claiming an office or in a case of this character.

It is believed that no case can be found where an English court of chancery has ever tried a contested election where the public were concerned. And such cases are believed to be of rare occurrence in this country, and then only where the power has been conferred by express enactment or necessary implication therefrom.

The first section of our act creating and defining the power, jurisdiction, and practice of courts of chancery, provides that the courts shall have power to proceed in the exercise of their jurisdiction in the mode prescribed by the act; and when there is no provision made by the act, then according to the general usage and practice of courts of equity. Now, it is not the general usage or practice of courts of equity to hear and determine contested elections, and, if not, the power is not conferred by the chancery act, and none other has been referred to from which it can be derived.

But it is said that this court has held that chancery has power and could take jurisdiction to try a contested county seat election, and, therefore, such power might be exercised in this class of cases, or, rather, this belongs to the same class of cases, and whether or not the facts charged in the bill conferred jurisdiction to hear and adjudicate, there was still the power in that class of cases, and if the power existed the writ must be obeyed, without regard to what would be the result in the particular case. It is true that in a number of county seat cases we have held that chancery might take jurisdiction, and hear and determine them; but the power was placed expressly upon the grounds that the Constitution had provided that county seats should not be removed except on a vote resulting in a majority in favor of a removal. And the General Assembly, in providing for the mode of holding such an election, wholly failed to provide for any means of contesting it; and to prevent the obstruction and a defeat of the rights of the majority, conferred and intended to be secured to them, it was held that the fundamental law by implication conferred the power on the courts of chancery. But, in making these decisions, it was on that express ground, and those cases thereby became an exception to all other cases. If these decisions recognized them as a class of cases, they only recognize county seat questions as being embraced in the class, and nothing was intended to be, nor do we think anything was said, which can, by fair intendment, be construed to embrace any other character of election cases. They cannot be held to extend the power to other or different cases. The power therein flowed solely and entirely from the Constitution.

But, in this case, there is no pretense that this or like elections were required to be held, by any provision of the Constitution; nor that the statute had not provided a means for contesting it. Hence, this case lacks these essential elements to bring it within the scope of those decisions. Being an exception to all other cases or class of cases, they afford no precedent, nor do they establish any principle that can embrace this case, or in the remotest degree affect or control its decisions.

It then follows, if what we have said is correct, that the court below had no power to hear and adjudicate in this class of cases; and, having no power under any head of his jurisdiction, the chancellor acted wholly without power to entertain the bill for any purpose, or to award the writ of execution. Wanting both power and jurisdiction to entertain the bill or award the writ, it was a nullity which could legally operate on no one, nor was any one bound to yield obedience to its requirements. Having been issued without power, it was as inefficient as if it had been issued without any bill presented, or as though no person had ever asked for it. Not having power, the writ was no more binding than would be a decree in a criminal case, and for the same reason—the want of power. Where power to take judicial cognizance is wholly wanting, all power to judicially bind or affect the rights or interest of parties is wanting; and whilst the powers of the chancellor are great and expanded, still they have their limits, and, when transcended, all acts beyond the limit are absolutely void, and can have no binding effect, and the awarding of this writ falls within and is of that character.

In the case of the People v. The City of Galesburg, 48 Ills., 486, it was held that a court of chancery had no power to enjoin the holding of an election. Again, in the case of Moore v. Hoisington, 31 Ill., 243 it was held that a court of chancery has no power to try a contested election, even where the statute had provided no mode of contesting. And in Walton v. Develing, 61 Ill., 201, it was held where an injunction was issued to restrain the officers from holding an election and it was disobeyed, that they were not amenable to the process or liable to be punished for a contempt in disobeying the writ, and it was upon the grounds that the writ was void for the want of power and the law required the officer to perform this particular duty. The distinction was then taken that where the court has power over the subject-matter, and authority to take such jurisdiction, and the court acts, its process must be obeyed, but when the power is wholly wanting, then the process is void and need not be obeyed. The same rule was recognized and applied in Darst v. The People, 62 Ill., 306. So the doctrine is by no means novel in this court.

It is true that officers and others may be embarrassed as to their course of action in such cases. They must act at their peril under all such circumstances. They can, as the parties did in this case, call to their aid able counsel, learn their duty from all available sources, and then act and abide the consequences. If the advice they procure be wrong, it will be their misfortune and the incorrect advice will not excuse the offense, or mitigate the punishment.

We have confined ourselves to the adjudged cases in our own court, and to general and well recognized legal and equitable principles, not only because we regard them as settled, but because we do not in the least doubt their entire correctness. Hence we have not reviewed the numerous authorities of other courts and text-writers incidentally bearing on the question, presented in the very elaborate and unusually able arguments of counsel. But notwithstanding their industry, research and ability, we have been irresistibly impelled to reach the result here announced.

The entire record, considered in the light of the arguments, we must say that the court below transcended its powers in awarding the writ, and as a consequence thereof, in fining the defendants as for a contempt of the process of the court and the authority of the State, and the several judgments imposing such fines must be reversed.

Judgment reversed.

LXIV. MAINE REPORTS.

State of Maine v. Amos C. Benner, p. 267.

EVIDENCE—PRACTICE.

It is in the discretion of the court to permit the counsel calling a witness to propose to him leading questions, and to cross-examine him, when he is an unwilling witness and adverse to the party by whom he is called.

The occasion for this permission is to be determined by the presiding justice, and the granting of it is not subject to exception.

The limit of cross-examination as to collateral matters, allowable by a judge at nisi prius, is matter of discretion.

When a witness, on whose evidence in part an indictment has been found, but who is called by the prisoner, testifies at nisi prius, differently from what he had done before the grand jury, a member of that panel is a competent witness to prove what he stated before that body for the purpose of contradicting and impeaching his testimony.

A witness cannot be cross-examined on collateral matters for the purpose of subsequently contradicting and impeaching his testimony in relation to such collateral subjects.

If the irresponsive answer of a witness is objectionable, the objection must be taken at the time, and the court should be requested to have it stricken out.

The statements of a witness, not under oath, are hearsay, and receivable only to contradict what he may have said under oath, and to impeach his testimony, and not as evidence of the facts stated.

It is not error to say to the jury that their verdict is not final and irreversible, and that the evidence is to be reported to the governor and council for their consideration and examination, and that after revising the evidence they may order the execution of the sentence, or commute it, or pardon the offender.

When it is perceived that the court has misapprehended testimony, it is the duty of the counsel at the time to call its attention to the subject, that the correction may at once be made.

It is no ground of complaint that the judge states to the jury the positions of fact as respectively assumed, or claimed to exist, by the counsel on the one side or the other, that they may more distinctly perceive the precise issues presented for their decision. Indeed, it may be his duty so to do.

The utterance of falsehoods by the prisoner, by way of exculpation, the falsehoods being established by satisfactory proof, is universally recognized as circumstantial evidence tending to establish his guilt, the inculpatory force of which is to be determined by the jury.

A hypothetical statement, which presupposes as its basis that the issue has already been determined, is not an expression of an opinion "upon issues of fact arising in the case," within the act of 1874, c. 212.

The opinion for the expression of which a new trial is to be granted, must be a distinct and positive one, "upon issues of fact arising in the case."—(Opinion by APPLETON, C. J.)

LIABILITY OF MARRIED WOMEN TO MAINTAIN THEIR HUSBANDS.—At the Caurse Petty Sessions, Welshpool, on Monday, Nov. 1, before J. Robinson Jones, Esq., William Fisher, Esq., Captain Mytton, and E. S. R. Trevor, Esq., Mr. Wilding, on behalf of the Guardians of the Forden Union, applied for an order of maintenance on Arthur Jones (son), Susannah Jones (wife), and the daughter of one Richard Jones, a pauper inmate of the workhouse. He stated that as regarded the wife, the application was grounded upon the provisions of the "Married Woman's Property Act," which rendered the wages of a married woman living apart from her husband her separate property, at the same time that it rendered her liable to contribute towards his maintenance, if a pauper, as was here the case. The wife did not appear, but proof was given of the service of the summons upon her. Witnesses were called who proved that the son was a porter, and the wife cook at Bicton Lunatic Asylum. It was also proved that both were in receipt of wages sufficient to enable them to contribute to the maintenance of the pauper. It was also stated that the cost per week of an indoor pauper was 3s. 8d., and the magistrates, after some deliberation, particularly with reference to the provisions of the Act before mentioned, made an order upon the son to contribute 2s. 6d., and upon the wife for the remaining 1s. 2d., per week. The case as against the daughter was withdrawn, as it appeared that she was out of service. We believe this to be the first instance in this neighborhood of a married woman's being called upon to contribute to the maintenance of her husband.—Oswestry Advertiser.

Federal Court Practice—Act of 1872 Construed.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States, by Swayne, J., holding that the object of this act was to make the practice, pleadings, and forms and modes of proceeding of the Federal courts conform to that of the local State courts; that the personal conduct and administration of the judge in the discharge of his separate functions is, neither practice, pleading, nor a form nor mode of proceeding within the meaning of those terms as found in the act. The statute of the State of Illinois requiring the court to instruct the jury only as to the law of the case and in writing, is not, therefore, within the act, and the Federal courts in that State are not required by the act to regard the statute. We would call attention to the language of the court in stating the province of a judge in instructing a jury. This is the first opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States upon this question under the act of Congress and affirms the judgment of the circuit court.

The United States—Treasury Notes—Forged Notes—Payment of.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States. by Waite, C. J., in a suit brought by the United States against Jay Cooke et al., to recover back money, paid them by the assistant treasurer for the purpose of the redemption of treasury notes, which were alleged to be counterfeits.

Contested Election—Power of a Court of Equity in—when party cannot be Legally Punished for Disobeying an Injunction.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of this State by Walker, J., holding, where the Circuit Court enjoined the aldermen, their counsel and city clerk of Chicago from canvassing the vote of a city election, and they did canvass the vote and disregard the injunction, and the court fined them for contempt; that the Circuit Court had no power to hear and adjudicate in this class of cases; that the whole proceeding was non coram judice; and that the aldermen and their counsel and the city clerk could not be legally punished for contempt in disobeying the injunction; the court comments upon the legislature having repealed, by the revision of the statutes, the prior provision authorizing courts to punish for contempts offered in the presence of the same. The questions involved in this case are of the greatest importance to the people. The court makes a distinction between a municipal election where the statute provides a mode for contesting it and a county seat election, where the statute provides no mode for contesting it. Judge Walker, in delivering the opinion of the court, says, no case can be found where an English court of chancery has ever tried a contested election where the public was concerned, and such cases are of rare occurrence in this country, and then only where the power has been conferred by express enactment, or necessary implication therefrom.

Creditor's Bill—Proceedings in Bankruptcy—Receiver.—The opinion of the United States District Court for the Northern District of Illinois, by Blodgett, J., holding that proceedings in bankruptcy supersede a creditor's bill and that when a receiver has been appointed in such chancery suit, the receiver can be compelled to deliver the property over to the assignee in bankruptcy, subject to all the rights which the creditors whom he specifically represents has obtained and to all the priorities which they have obtained by their diligence. This opinion of the learned judge was an extempore opinion. Owing to our haste in going to press, he had no opportunity of revising it.

The Removal of Causes.—The opinion of the United States Circuit Court for the District of California, by Sawyer, J., as to the removal of causes from State to Federal courts.

Chicago Bar Association.—The Bar Association commences the new year with the following efficient officers and committees:

The Rights, Remedies and Liabilities of Landlord and Tenant, including the Law and Practice on Summary Proceedings, under the statute peculiar to that relation. By David McAdam, one of the justices of the Marine Court of the City of New York, with numerous forms. New York: Diossy & Co. Publishers. 1876.

This is a neat appearing volume of four hundred pages. The references and citations are mostly, but not exclusively, to New York cases. It will be much more valuable to the lawyer of that than any other State. The work treats first of the rights belonging to the respective parties growing out of the relation of landlord and tenant; second, the remedies for the enforcement of those rights; and lastly, the liabilities incidental to those remedies. It contains a number of excellent forms.

Addison on Torts.—We have received, too late for notice in this issue, an American edition of Addison on Torts, published by James Cockcroft & Co. Edited by H. G. Wood, author of the Law of Nuisances. All who have ever had the English edition, know Addison to be a valuable work. This edition must be more valuable, as it contains American notes. For terms, etc., see advertisement on first page.

The New York State Library.—We are indebted to S. B. Griswold, law librarian, for a copy of the fifty-seventh annual report of the trustees of this library. From it we learn that there are one hundred eulogies on President Lincoln in the library.

LIBEL AND SLANDER.

PRACTICAL RULES FROM A NEW LECTURE, BY C. C. BONNEY, OF THE CHICAGO BAR.

1. The truth is stronger than a lie, and will always conquer in a fair fight. He who relies upon the truth need not worry about the result of the conflict. He has only to be true to the truth and to himself, and to go straight forward in his work, turning neither to the right hand nor to the left, to follow any "barking dog," and time will surely bring his vindication. "All things come in time to them that know how to wait."

2. Calumny is an almost certain penalty of marked success. It is the voice of the "revenge that dwells in little minds." It is the outlet of baffled wrong. It is the return of ingratitude for favors received, and which there is not the manliness to acknowledge. It is the base and cowardly refuge of hatred, malice, envy, and ill-will. Hence those who aspire to any eminence should as much expect to meet with calumny, as a sailor on the great sea should be prepared for storms. They try the strength of the ship, but if well built and well managed, they rarely break it. The assault should only quicken the faculties, rouse the courage, and strengthen the hand. It is a proof that the "evil things that hate to look on happiness" find an obstacle in their way, and their enmity is highest praise.

3. No good man will willingly speak evil of another. If circumstances will compel him to accuse, he will show that he does so reluctantly, and for the sake of justice, and that he scorns the thought of self gratification in such an act. If, therefore, any accusation appears to be grounded in a mean, wanton, or malignant spirit; if the occasion to make it appear to be sought; if the accuser speak not to the face of the accused, but behind his back, then it may be set down as certain that at least the truth is distorted, and that, in all probability, it is corruptly falsified. For where a revengeful and malignant spirit is, there the truth cannot dwell. The angel will not abide with the demon. The common perception of this fact is the reason why slanders are so little credited and do so little harm.

4. The best safeguards against libel and slander are a clean character and a circumspect behavior.

That thou mayst injure, no man, dove-like be:
And serpent-like, that none may injure thee.

In the presence of an enemy be on your guard, and while devoutly trusting in God, "keep your powder dry!" The light and power of a just life will shine through the cloud of a slander and dispel it. A habitually careful conduct will naturally secure the present and provide for the dangers of the future. "The truth is always consistent with everything true; while error is inconsistent, alike with the truth and with itself." Hence, he who acts correctly from day to day need never fear what the future may bring forth.

5. Sometimes circumstances seem to be against the innocent, but the innocent need never despair. The truth is somewhere in the circumstances, however deeply hidden, and will surely come to the light, if carefully and patiently pursued. Never take a false step for the purpose of avoiding an apparently unfavorable circumstance. Trust the truth and it will bring you safely out of the wilderness.

6. Never condemn any one without hearing his defense. Never believe an improbable story on the testimony of an interested or prejudiced witness. Always regard a good reputation as stronger than the testimony of any such witness or witnesses. Never believe that a person whom you have known as honest, just, and trustworthy, has been the contrary to another, without "proofs and confirmation as strong as holy writ." Righteousness and iniquity can no more dwell in the same heart, than the lamb and the wolf can live together in the same fold. He who is willfully unfaithful to one is not faithful to others. At heart, he must be essentially "all one thing, or all the other."

7. There may be cases of libel so malignant as to warrant and demand a criminal prosecution, but very rarely indeed does a case arise which can warrant a civil suit for the recovery of a compensation in money. Where the damage done by a libel or slander is in its nature pecuniary, a pecuniary satisfaction may well be sought, but the refined mind naturally revolts from seeking such a cure for wounded honor, or violated peace. For such wrongs, justice demands a swifter and heavier retribution.

8. A statement may at the same time be verbally true, and substantially false. Words may be uttered, or an act done, in such a manner, and under such circumstances, as to be wholly free from any objection. The same act may be described, or words repeated in such a manner, with such change of tone, emphasis, and inflection; with such omissions of qualifying circumstances, as to wholly change the character and effect of the act or words, and inspire them with a malignant spirit Hence, in all cases, the animus of the speaker should be most carefully considered. If hatred, malice, envy, ill-will, or the love of cruelty appear in his tone, manner or purpose the hearer may be sure that those qualities color his statement, whatever literal ground there may be to support it.

9. There are many cases of libel and slander arising from mistake. The eyes and the ears are often deceived. Astonishing cases of mistaking one person for another are within the knowledge of almost every one. A general resemblance suggests the individuality of a particular person. That individuality occupies the mental vision, and, for the time, the dissimilarities are not perceived. In such cases, statements may be made which will be true in all respects, except as to the person involved, and as to him, utterly false. This may be illustrated by abundant examples. Hence, on the ground of probabilities, it is more likely that a single witness, not fully corroborated by all the circumstances, is mistaken, than that a person has acted or spoken contrary to his general character and reputation.

All these rules fitly culminate in the legal maxim that "every one is to be presumed innocent until proved guilty." In favor of innocence, justice, peace, and the general welfare, all reasonable things are to be presumed; while against their opposites every allowable intendment shall be made.

10. In the end, almost every one is estimated according to his own merit. The good sense of the community is rarely at fault. Controversies, legal or otherwise, about alleged libels, slanders, misrepresentations, and the like, rarely result in anything satisfactory. If the correction of an erroneous statement seem to be imperatively required, the force of the correction will be in proportion to its simplicity and clearness, and its freedom from bad temper, countercharges, and epithets.

U. S. DIST. COURT, N. D. OF ILL.

OPINION JAN., 1876.

In Re R. M. WHIPPLE.—In Bankruptcy.

CREDITOR'S BILL—PROCEEDINGS IN BANKRUPTCY—RECEIVER.

That proceedings in bankruptcy supersede a creditor's bill in a State court; and that when a receiver has been appointed by the State court he can be compelled to deliver the property over to the assignee in bankruptcy, subject to all the rights which the creditors whom he specifically represents has obtained, and to all the priorities which they have obtained by their diligence.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

This was a rule to show cause why certain judgment creditors of the bankrupt should not be enjoined from proceeding under creditors bills against the bankrupt in the State Courts, and from enforcing an assignment by the debtor to the receiver appointed in such creditors suits. On the 8th day of August, 1874, Louis Stix and others filed in the Circuit Court of Cook county an ordinary creditors bill to enforce a judgment against Whipple previously recovered in that court. On the fourth day of November, 1875, a receiver of the debtor's effects was appointed in that suit, and the debtor was ordered to make an assignment of his effects to such receiver. On the 10th day of July, 1875, the Chatham National Bank and others filed a similar creditors bill in the Superior Court of Cook county, upon judgments previously recovered therein against Whipple, and upon the 5th day of November, 1875, a receiver was appointed and the debtor was ordered to assign his effects to such receiver. On the 24th day of November, 1875, and before the debtor had executed an assignment to the receiver in either creditors suit, an involuntary petition in bankruptcy was filed against him in this court, on which he was adjudicated a bankrupt on the 6th day of December, and delivered his property to the marshal under the warrant in bankruptcy. The judgment creditors in each of the suits in the State courts above named, having taken proceedings therein against Whipple to enforce an assignment to the receiver appointed in each case, a rule was granted against them in this court to show cause why they should not be enjoined from further proceeding in the State courts.

E. & A. VANBUREN and TENNEYS, FLOWER & ABERCROMBIE, Solicitors for the judgment creditors.

EDWIN BEAN and GEO. W. SMITH, Solicitors for the petitioners.

J. L. HIGH, Solicitor for the bankrupt.

BLODGETT, J.—This question came before me in the case of the National Insurance Company, which was also a case where a creditors bill had been filed in the State court, on which a receiver was appointed and took possession of the assets of the company, and proceedings in bankruptcy were then instituted against the company. I had occasion to investigate the question very thoroughly in that case, and after a very careful examination in the light of the authorities, both in this country and in England, I came to the conclusion that the proceedings in bankruptcy superseded the creditors bill; and that the receiver in the chancery suit would be obliged and could be compelled to deliver the property over to the assignee in bankruptcy, subject, of course, to all the rights which the creditors whom he specifically represented had obtained, and to all the priority which they had obtained by their diligence. I announced my conclusion in that case and the parties acquiesced in it.

This class of cases of course brings up the difficult question of collision between the jurisdiction of the several courts, and I see no way to harmonize it except to assume that when proceedings in bankruptcy are properly instituted and take effect, they must of necessity supersede the proceedings on creditors bills, subject, of course, to all the rights which the parties may have acquired by the steps taken. Now, if Judge Van Buren's client obtained a judgment in 1873, that judgment is ipso facto a lien upon the real estate of the debtor, and if anything is realized out of his real estate this lien would have to be respected. Then if he had acquired possession of any assets through his receiver, undoubtedly to the extent that assets had come into the receiver's hands the authorities require the bankruptcy court to respect the lien thereby obtained.

How far we are to go in enforcing what counsel characterize as an equitable lien, simply by their having instituted proceedings in chancery and obtained the appointment of a receiver, is a question upon which I would prefer to reserve an opinion, until we come to distribute the estate. That is a question that has never been fairly up. It is presented by Mr. Tenney in this case, he claiming that by their diligence in filing the creditors bill, they have acquired a sort of blanket lien on the whole property. It seems to me utterly impossible to carry on the two administrations together; the estate should be administered in one court, and I think the bankrupt court the proper one. The assignee in bankruptcy necessarily, and by operation of law, takes possession of the assets, subject to the existing claims or liens of the creditors in the State courts. And I think that the better authority and the more reasonable doctrine is that the proceedings in bankruptcy supersede all other proceedings for the administration of the assets of the debtor, subject only to the priorities which are obtained by any creditors by the use of diligence, which are to be respected and which should be paid in the order of priority, according to whatever rights have been obtained. Now, in this case, the receiver in the State court has obtained no property. The bankrupt reports to this court that he has turned over all his assets of every nature to the marshal of this court, under the warrant of seizure in bankruptcy. Under these circumstances, the bankruptcy court must go on and administer the estate, leaving these judgment creditors to assert their claims and priorities, if any, in this court. The question is not a new one, but has been frequently up, and until it is overruled by the Supreme Court, I shall insist upon this construction of the law.

Let the rule to show cause be made absolute, and the judgment creditors be enjoined from proceeding in the creditors suits in the State courts, reserving all questions as to the priorities which they have there acquired, to be determined by this court hereafter.

U. S. CIR. COURT, D. OF CAL.

MILO HOADLEY v. THE CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO.

REMOVAL OF SUITS FROM STATE TO NATIONAL COURTS.—A suit was pending in the Supreme Court of California on appeal from the judgment of the District Court at the date of the passage of the act of Congress of March 3, 1875, relating to the jurisdiction of the U. S. Circuit Courts, in which the judgment was reversed and the cause subsequently remanded to the District Court for new trial. At the first term of the District Court at which a trial could be had after the filing of the remittitur and before any other trial, the suit was removed to the United States Circuit Court, on application of the plaintiff.

Held, That the case is within the provisions of sections 2 and 3 of said act of Congress, and that it was properly removed.

SAWYER, Circuit Judge.

This action was originally commenced in the District Court of the State of California for the Twelfth Judicial District, on January 5, 1870. A trial was had and a judgment entered therein July 3, 1871. An appeal having been taken to the Supreme Court of the State, October 25, 1871, the judgment was reversed and a new trial ordered by that tribunal, February 3, 1875, and a petition for re-hearing having been subsequently filed and denied, a remittitur issued in pursuance of the judgment of reversal, July 29, 1875, which was filed in the District Court, September 20, 1875.

On November 15, 1875, which was before the term at which the case could be first tried in the State District Court—the only court in which it could be tried—after it had been remitted to that court by the Supreme Court, the plaintiff presented a petition to the said District Court, in due form, praying a removal of the case to this court, and it was accordingly removed. The defendant now moves to remand the case to the State Court, on the ground that its removal was not authorized for the reason that it had already been tried in the State Court before, and was pending in the Supreme Court on appeal at the time of the passage of the act of Congress of March 3, 1875, under which the removal was had. It is not denied that the subject-matter of the suit is such as in that particular would authorize a removal.

Section 2, as to the point in question, provides that "any suit of a civil nature, at law or in equity, now pending, or hereafter brought, in any State Court," etc., may be removed. And section three, that whenever any party entitled to remove a suit shall desire to do so, he "may make and file a petition in such suit it such State Court before or at the term at which said cause should be first tried, and before the trial thereof for removal," etc. Thus it will be seen the statute in express terms authorizes the removal of a suit pending in any State Court at the time of the passage of the act—"now pending"—as well as those that should be afterwards brought. But section three limits the time within which a removal may be had. It requires the election in either case, to be promptly made. It requires the party to avail himself of the opportunity to remove at, or before, the first term at which a trial could be had, and before any trial after the right to remove attaches. This case was pending in a State Court, on appeal, at the date of the passage of the act. The judgment of the court below had been reversed, and a new trial ordered, but there was pending a petition for re-hearing. It was liable to be tried again, this liability depending upon the decision of the Supreme Court upon the petition for rehearing. All proceedings in the case in the District Court were suspended pending the appeal; and it could not be tried in the District Court till remitted from the Supreme Court. Upon the final reversal of the judgment, with directions to try the case again, it stood in all particulars as though it had never been tried. The case not having been finally disposed of, but being liable to be tried again, at the date of the passage of the act of Congress, it was in my judgment a suit pending in a State Court, within the meaning of section two, to which a right of removal attached; and the clause

"the term at which said cause could be first tried and before the trial thereof," means "first trial," and "before the trial thereof," after the right of removal attached; and that is necessarily after the passage of the act giving the right of removal. In this case there was no trial, and no term when the cause could have been tried, after the passage of the act, and after the right to remove attached, before the application for removal was actually made and granted. Mr. District Judge Swing, of the Southern District of Ohio, held a removal to have been properly made in a cause pending in the State Court at the date of the passage of the act of Congress in which there had, prior to that date, been two trials and verdicts, both of which had been set aside, and where the cause stood awaiting a third trial at the date of the passage of the act. (Andrew's Executors v. Garrett, 2 Cent. Law Jour., 797).

I fully concur in the views expressed by the learned judge. The only difference between that case and this is, that the present case was pending in the Supreme Court, on a petition for re-hearing, after a judgment of reversal, and no trial could be had, or movement for removal made, until the petition for re-hearing should be decided and the case remitted to the District Court, in which alone the new trial could be had. I do not think this circumstance affects the right of removal. It was a cause "now pending," within the meaning of the act, to which a right of removal attached, and the removal was made at the first opportunity. The motion to remand must be denied, and it was so ordered.

SUPREME COURT OF INDIANA.

[From the Indianopolis Sentinel.]

COMMON CARRIER—LIABILITY WHERE GOODS ARE TAKEN UNDER LAWFUL PROCESS.

4388. The Ohio & Mississippi Railroad Company v. Yoke et al. Martin C. C. Downey, J.

Action by appellees against appellant as a common carrier.

The question presented in the case is this: Is a common carrier of goods excused from liability for not carrying and delivering the goods, when they are, without any act, fault or connivance on his part, seized, by virtue of legal process, and taken out of his possession?

The court holds that he is excused from liability where the goods are so taken, provided he exercises proper diligence in giving notice to the consignee of such seizure. (36 N. Y., 407; Redfield on Railways, volume 2, page 158; Drake on Attachments, sections 453, 290 and 350.) Such notice, as the law requires, was not given in this case. Affirmed.

ADMINISTRATOR—REPORT OF, AS EVIDENCE AGAINST—PRACTICE.

4230. The State ex rel. Christian C. Nave v. Wilson et al., Hendricks C. C. Worden, J.

Action by appellant against appellees upon the bond of Wilson as administrator.

The questions presented arise upon the alleged error of overruling the motion for a new trial. The reasons filed for a new trial were: First, that the decision of the court is contrary to law; second, that the decision of the court is not sustained by the evidence in the cause; third, error of law in excluding the evidence offered by the relator, to prove that Wilson had, in violation of law and his duty as administrator, appropriated to his own use large sums of money belonging to the estate, etc.; fourth, error of law in suffering Wilson as a witness in the cause to explain a certain report made by him as administrator, and to contradict the same; fifth, "receiving improper evidence offered by defendants over the objections thereto of the relator;" sixth, "and the rejection of proper evidence offered by the relator, Christian C. Nave, on the trial."

As to the first and second reasons, the court is of the opinion that for these, it can not disturb the finding.

As to the third reason, the record does not show that it is well founded in point of fact.

As to the fourth reason, the accounts of an administrator are not conclusive, either for or against him, until final settlement. (48 Ind. 584.)

The fifth and sixth reasons are too general to bring in review any question. Affirmed.

EVIDENCE—ADMISSIONS—WHEN COMPETENT.

3922. Campbell v. Coon. Montgomery C. C. Worden, J.

Replevin by appellant against appellee for certain saw logs. Verdict for defendant.

Plaintiff claimed title to the logs by purchase from John K. and William P. Yonkey, and gave in evidence a bill of sale of the property, executed by them on the 16th of July, 1873.

The defendant, as it appears from the evidence, claimed that the Yonkeys purchased the logs with his money, for him, advanced to them for that purpose.

A writing, over plaintiffs' objection, was introduced by defendant, which was dated September 30, 1873, and written by W. P. Yonkey to Flanagan, from whom he purchased the logs, admitting that they were bought for the defendant and with his money. The defendant also introduced W. P. Yonkey as a witness, and proved by him, over plaintiffs' objection, that he had admitted at different times to Coon and Flanagan the same facts.

The court is of opinion that the written instrument and the oral testimony were both incompetent and should have been excluded.

Before the instrument was written, the Yonkeys had transferred the property to the plaintiff. Declarations made by a person, under whom a party claims, after the declarant has parted with the right, are inadmissibie to affect any one claiming under him. (17 Ind. 284. do. 446.)

As to the oral evidence, the admission of a vendor, while he is in possession, and before a sale of the property, such as would be evidence against the vendee is admissible against himself. (11 Ind. 347; 18 Ind. 343.) But admissions made after such sale are clearly incompetent. It does not appear in this case when the admissions were made, but the court is of opinion that it should affirmatively appear that the admissions were made at such time and under such circumstances as would render them competent. Reversed.

CONSTRUCTION OF TWELFTH SECTION OF THE LIQUOR LAW OF MARCH, 1873—LIABILITY OF THE SELLER OF INTOXICATING LIQUOR TO ONE INJURED BY THE PARTY INTOXICATED.

4447. English et al. v. Beard, Decatur C. C. Downey, J.

Action by appellee against appellants under the twelfth section of the liquor law of March, 1873. The complaint sets up, substantially, that English sold the intoxicating liquor to one Hickman, who, becoming intoxicated thereon, "struck, beat and wounded the plaintiff, etc."

The errors assigned are: Overruling the demurrer to the complaint, and refusing to grant a new trial.

The first objection to the complaint is that the twelfth section does not give a right of action to the person incapacitated from labor direct, but only to those who occupy a collateral relation to the party injured, and that he who receives the injury direct must look to his ordinary remedy against the person inflicting the injury.

The section says that "every husband, wife, child, parent, guardian, employer, or other person who shall be injured in person or property, or means of support, by any intoxicated person, or in consequence of the intoxication, habitual or otherwise, of any person, shall have a right of action or "the court is of opinion that the language of the act embraces the casesunder consideration."

The other objection to the complaint is, that Hickman should have been united as a defendant with the persons sued.

The section further says that the party injured "shall have a right of action in his or her own name, severally or jointly, against any person or persons who shall, by selling, etc., and any persons owning, renting, etc., any building, etc., shall be liable jointly with the person selling, etc." The court holds that the language of the act is too plain to admit of doubt.

Under the second assignment the sufficiency of the evidence is questioned. The court can not disturb the judgment upon this ground.

Affirmed.

CHALLENGE TO JUROR—THE INTEREST OF A CITIZEN AND TAXPAYER IN A PROCEEDING AGAINST THE CITY A DISQUALIFYING INTEREST.

4264. Hearn et al. v. The City of Greensburgh. Decatur C. C. Reversed.

Biddle, C. J., delivering the opinion of the court: Appellant brought suit against the appellee, a municipal corporation, alleging that said city unskillfully constructed a certain sidewalk, and negligently allowed the same to remain out of repair, whereby the said Mary, the wife of the said Silas, while rightfully traveling along the same, fell and broke her arm, etc.

The only question presented by this case is as to the overruling the challenge of the appellant to three of the jurors, the ground of the challenge being that they were citizens and taxpayers of the city of Greensburgh, and, therefore, interested in the proceedings.

The trial by jury is as old as the common law. Sir William Jones, indeed, asserts that it was known in Athens, but the history of Greece scarcely sustains his views. At all events, it is found in our system of jurisprudence at its very earliest source; and, with the exception of a short time under William, the Norman, who introduced trial by battle, during which trial by jury was somewhat impaired and shaken, has always remained, with English-speaking people, and all who inherit the common law, a favorite mode of trial; and during all this period of its history, there has been no time when interest in the suit did not disqualify a juror. (Section 3, Blackstone, 349-387).

A case in point has been recently decided in the State of New York (51 N.Y., 506). The action was brought to recover damages alleged to have been sustained by plaintiff by reason of his falling through, down, and upon a defective sidewalk in the city of Elmira. Six jurors were challenged for the cause that they were residents and taxpayers of the city. The court said: "The question, therefore, to be considered, is, whether a resident and taxpayer of the city was incompetent as a juror upon the trial of this action. The object of the law is to procure impartial, unbiased persons for jurors. They must be omni exceptione majores. They must have no interest in the subject-matter of the litigation. In this case, a verdict against the city would impose additional burdens upon all the taxpaying residents thereof. Hence, such residents are, at common law, incompetent to serve as jurors in a case to which the city is a party, or in which the city is directly interested."

Our code is with the common law in its spirit. (Sec. 208, 2 G. & H., 154). The decision must be left to the common law, and, according to that judgment, must be reversed.

COMMON CARRIER—FREIGHT—UNREASONABLE DELAY—EXTRAORDINARY CONTINGENCIES.—The London Law Times of Dec. 25, in commenting on a decision of the Supreme Court of Michigan, says:

It is interesting to compare a decision of the Supreme Court of Michigan (reported in a recent number of the CHICAGO LEGAL NEWS), in the Michigan Railway Company v. Burrows with some recent decisions in our own courts at Westminster. The respondent delivered four loads of apples to the appellants at Vandalia for carriage to Minneapolis. At Chicago they were transferred to the other carrier, who delivered them at their destination in four days from the date of the transfer at Chicago. The apples were found upon arrival to be badly injured by the frost. The respondent then brought an action against the railway company to recover damages alleged to have arisen from unreasonable delay on the part of the company. The damage was proved to have been caused after the fruit was delivered at Chicago. The main facts were that the appellants' line and rolling stock were in good order, and that there was sufficient of the latter for all the ordinary purposes of the traffic, but owing to the great Chicago fire on the 8th Oct., 1871, the company's line was damaged and rendered useless for a time. As soon as the line was in working order the ordinary traffic was greatly delayed by reason of the number of relief trains sent to the succor and assistance of the sufferers by the fire. This was the state of the line at the time of the conveyance of the apples of the respondent. It was further given in evidence that whilst previous to the fire the goods trains ran from Vandalia to Chicago in about twenty-four hours, the average time was, owing to the causes already mentioned, lengthened to ten days, whilst the whole time taken by the company in carrying the respondent's apples to Chicago did not exceed seven days. The court below decided that there was unreasonable delay. The view taken by the Supreme Court will be at once plain from the following reference to its reasoning. Proceeding from the recognition of the principle that railway companies must have all reasonable and necessary facilities and appliances for carrying on their business in a prompt, skillful, and careful manner, the learned judge who delivered the judgment of the court continued: "They are not bound, however, to be prepared for unusual and extraordinary contingencies, which no ordinary prudence or foresight could reasonably foresee or anticipate; and where an unusual contingency has arisen, which unexpectedly largely increases the business, or prevents, as in this case, the handling of freight in so prompt and expeditious a manner as the company formerly had been accustomed to do, the company cannot be charged with unreasonable delay for not carrying freight in the same time it had done previous to such contingency." This statement of the law as well as the rules respecting vis major and actus Dei, and so on, is really the statement of a principle easily deducible from the maxim Lex non cogit ad impossibilia, or in the words of Sir W. Scott (2 Dods. 323), the law itself, and the administration of it, must yield to that to which everything must bend—to necessity; the law, in its most positive and peremptory injunctions, disclaims all intention of compelling to impossibilities. The Supreme Court thought the damages too remote. The loss was not necessarily the consequence of the delay. The law cannot inquire into all the concurring circumstances which may have contributed to produce an injury. Upon this point a maxim not seldom quoted in Westminster Hall was adopted by the learned judge. "It were infinite," said Lord Bacon, "for the law to consider the causes of causes, and their impulses, one of another; therefore it contenteth itself with the immediate cause, and judgeth of acts by that without looking to any further degree." The whole judgment, however, is worthy of study as illustrative of such questions as have reference to the important subjects of remoteness of damages, and vis major.

TRUSTEE'S SALE.—WHEREAS, BY THEIR trust deed dated on the first day of May, 1874, Harry Fox and William B. Howard, of the city of Chicago, county of Cook and State of Illinois, conveyed to the undersigned, as trustee, all the following described lands and premises situate in the town of Lake View, county of Cook and State of Illinois, to wit:

Lots number six (6), seven (7), eight (8) and nine (9) in block number seven (7), in Hundley's subdivision of lots three to twenty-one (3 to 21) and thirty-three to thirty-seven (33 to 37), inclusive in Pine Grove being a subdivision of section twenty-one (21), in township forty (40), north range fourteen (14) east, to secure the payment of a certain promissory note, bearing even date therewith, executed by Fox and Howard as part payment of the purchase money of said real estate for the sum of ten thousand dollars, payable one year after the date thereof to the order of Elisha E. Hundley, at the office of Rees, Peirce & Co., Chicago, Illinois, with interest at the rate of ten per cent. per annum, payable semi annually, and ten per cent. per annum after maturity; which said trust deed was on the 4th day of August, A. D. 1874, duly filed for record in the recorder's office of said county of Cook, and was duly recorded in book 443 of records, on page 31.

And whereas, it was provided in and by said trust deed, that in case of default in the payment of the said note or any part thereof, according to the tenor and effect of said note, then on application of the legal holder of said note, it might be lawful for the undersigned to sell and dispose of the said premises, and all the right, title, benefit and equity of redemption of said Harry Fox and William B. Howard, their heirs and assigns therein, at public auction at the door of the court house in the city of Chicago, Cook county, in the State of Illinois, or on said premises, as might be specified in the notice of such sale, for the highest and best price the same would bring in cash, at least thirty days public notice having been previously given of the time and place of such sale by advertisement in one of the newspapers at that time published in said city of Chicago, and to make, execute and deliver to the purchaser or purchasers at such sale, good and sufficient deed or deeds of conveyance for the premises sold.

And whereas, default has been made in the payment of the principal of said promissory note which became due on the 4th day of May, 1875, and also in the payment of six months interest thereon, which became due on the same day, and there is now actually due and unpaid on said note the sum of ten thousand dollars, together with interest thereon since November 1st, 1874, at the rate of ten per cent. per annum.

And whereas, the said Elisha E. Hundley, the legal holder of said note has applied to the undersigned to sell said premises in accordance with the provisions of said trust deed for the purpose of satisfying the said indebtedness.

Now, therefore, public notice is hereby given that I, the undersigned, James H. Rees, trustee as aforesaid, will, on Tuesday the 8th day of February, A. D. 1876, at the hour of ten o'clock in the forenoon of said day, at the door of the court house in the city of Chicago, county of Cook and State of Illinois, to wit: at the west door of the north doors of the court house, situated on the southeast corner of Adams and LaSalle streets, in said city of Chicago, county of Cook and State of Illinois, sell and dispose of said premises hereinbefore described, and all the right, title, benefit and equity of redemption of the said Harry Fox and William B. Howard, their heirs and assigns therein, at public auction, for the highest and best price the same will bring in cash, pursuant to the terms of said trust deed.

Dated Chicago, January 7th, 1876.

SALE OF CERTIFCATE OF SIX SHARES OF stock of the Eagle Tanning Works of Chicago.—Whereas, on the 22nd day of September, 1875, H. C. Mowry executed the undersigned, T. C. Hoag & Co., his promissory note in the sum of six hundred dollars due in ninety days, at ten per centum after maturity; and to secure the payment of the same, he deposited with said Hoag & Co., a certificate of six shares of the capital stock of the Eagle Tanning Works of Chicago, bearing date March 11th, 1875, and numbered 96, of one hundred dollars a share.

And whereas, it is provided in said note, that at the maturity of said note, or at any time thereafter, said T. C. Hoag & Co., their agents or assignee, might sell said certificate, or any part thereof, at public or private sale, and to apply so much of the proceeds thereof to the payment of said note, as may be necessary to pay the same, with all interest due thereon, and all expenses attending the sale of the said certificate, including attorney's fees.

Whereas, default has been made in the payment of said note and interest accrued thereon, leaving now due thereon ($602 50-100) six hundred and two and 50-100 dollars.

Now, therefore, public notice is hereby given that, on Saturday, the 29th day of January, A. D. 1876, at ten o'clock A.M., at the west door of the Bank Building of said T. C. Hoag & Co., on the southeast corner of Davis street and Chicago avenue, in the village of Evanston Cook county, Illinois, the undersigned will sell said certificate and stock, or so much thereof as is necessary to pay said indebtedness, and attorney's fees, and expenses, etc., to the highest and best bidder, for cash.

TRUSTEE'S SALE.—WHEREAS, BRUNO GANSEL and Anna Gansel, his wife, of the town of Hyde Park, in the county of Cook and State of Illinois, by their certain trust deed, duly executed, acknowledged, and delivered, bearing date the ninth (9th) day of December, A. D. 1874, and recorded in the recorder's office of Cook county, in the State of Illinois, in book 490 of records, at page 123, did convey unto John H. Wrenn, as trustee, all the following described premises, situated in the county of Cook and State of Illinois, to wit:

Lots number one (1), two (2), three (3) and four (4), in block number four (4), in McKichan and Mason's subdivision of the west half of the northwest quarter of section number fourteen, township thirty-eight north, range number fourteen, east of the third principal meridian; also, the east one hundred and fifty (150) feet of lots number one (1) and two (2), in Tyler's subdivision of block number two (2), in Walker and Stinson's subdivision of the west half of the southwest quarter of section number two (2), township number thirty-eight (38) north of range number fourteen (14), east of the third principal meridian, to secure the payment of said Bruno Gansel's principal promissory note for the sum of three thousand and six hundred (3,600) dollars, executed by said Bruno Gansel, dated the ninth day of December, A. D. 1874, and payable to the order of himself and by him indorsed, said note having been made payable on the first day of August, 1875, after date, with interest at the rate of ten per cent. per annum, payable at the office of Adolph Loeb and brother, Chicago, Illinois.

And whereas, it is provided in and by said trust deed, that in case of default in the payment of the said promissory note, or any part thereof, according to the tenor and effect of said note, or in case of a breach of any of the covenants or agreements in said trust deed contained, then, on the application of the legal holder of said note, it should and might be lawful for the undersigned, John H. Wrenn, trustee, to sell and dispose of the said premises, and all the right, title, benefit and equity of redemption of said Bruno Gansel and Anna Gansel, his wife, their heirs and assigns therein, at public auction, at the north door of the Board of Trade building, in the city of Chicago, in the county of Cook and State of Illinois, for the highest and best price the same will bring in cash, thirty days previous notice of such sale having been given by publication once in each week, for four successive weeks in any newspaper at that time published in the said city of Chicago, and to make, execute, and deliver to the purchaser or purchasers at such sale, good and sufficient deed or deeds of conveyance for the premises sold, and out of the proceeds of such sale to pay all costs and expenses incurred in advertising and selling said premises, including attorney's fees, also the principal and interest on said note.

And whereas, default has been made in the payment of the said note; and whereas, said note is overdue and unpaid, together with interest thereon since December 9th, 1874, and the legal holder of said note has made application to the undersigned, the trustee in said trust deed named, and requested him, as trustee, to sell and dispose of said premises under the power in said trust deed, and for the purposes therein stated.

Now, therefore, public notice is hereby given, that in pursuance of said trust deed, and by virtue of the power and authority to me granted in and by the same, and by virtue of the statute of the State of Illinois, I, the undersigned, will, on Monday, the seventh (7th) day of February, A. D. 1876, at ten o'clock A. M of said day, at the north door of the Board of Trade building, in the said city of Chicago, sell and dispose of the premises above and in said trust deed described, and all the right, title, benefit and equity of redemption of the said Bruno Gansel and Anna Gansel, his wife, their heirs or assigns therein, at public auction, for the highest and best price the same will bring in cash.

Lot number two (2) and the north twenty-four feet of lot three (3), in block fourteen (14), in Egandale, being a subdivision of the east one hundred and eighteen acres of the southwest quarter of section eleven (11), township thirty-eight (38), north of range fourteen (14), east of the third principal meridian—to secure the payment of one principal promissory note, for the sum of three thousand four hundred and eleven 52-100 dollars, and executed by Jabez Barker and John K. Beatty, and payable to the order of Thomas Tully, one year after date, with interest at the rate of ten per cent. per annum, payable semi-annually.

And whereas, it is provided in and by said trust deed, that in case of default in the payment of the said promissory note or interest as aforesaid, or in case of a breach of any of the covenants or agreements in said trust deed contained, then, on the application of the legal holder of said note, it should and might be lawful for the undersigned, John V. Clarke, to sell and dispose of the said premises, and all the right, title, benefit and equity of redemption of the said Jabez Barker and Margaret Barker, his wife, and John K. Beatty and Kate Beatty, his wife, their heirs and assigns therein, at public auction, at the north door of the court house, corner of La Salle and Adams streets nearest LaSalle street, in the city of Chicago, in the county of Cook and State of Illinois, for the highest and best price the same will bring in cash, twenty days previous notice of such sale having been given by publication in one of the newspapers published in said city of Chicago, and to make, execute and deliver to the purchaser or purchasers at such sale, good and sufficient deed or deeds of conveyance for the premises sold, and out of the proceeds of such sale to pay all costs, commissions, and all other expenses incurred in advertising and selling said premises, also the principal and interest on said note.

And whereas, it is further provided in said trust deed, that in case of default in any of said payments of principal or interest, according to the tenor and effect of said promissory note, as aforesaid, then and in that case the whole of said principal sum thereby secured, and the interest thereon to the time of sale, may at once, at the option of the legal holder thereof, become due and payable, and the said premises be sold, in the manner and with the same effect as if the said indebtedness had matured.

And whereas, default has been made in the payment of the whole of said principal sum and the interest thereon, and the legal holder of said note has made application to the undersigned, the trustee in said trust deed named, and requested him, as such trustee, to sell and dispose of said premises under the power in said trust deed, and for the purposes therein stated.

Now, therefore, public notice is hereby given, that in pursuance of said trust deed, and by virtue of the power and authority to me granted in and by the same, and by virtue of the statute of the State, I, the undersigned, will, on Tuesday, the 15th day of February, A. D. 1876, at 10 o'clock A. M., at the north door of the court house, corner of LaSalle and Adams sts., nearest LaSalle st., in the said city of Chicago, sell and dispose of the premises above and in said trust deed described, subject to a certain other trust deed, dated May 18, 1874, to secure the principal sum of six thousand five hundred dollars, and all the right, title, benefit and equity of redemption of the said Jabez Barker and Margaret Barker, his wife, and John K. Beatty and Kate Beatty, his wife, their heirs or assigns therein, at public auction, for the highest and best price the same will bring in cash.

TRUSTEE'S SALE.—WHEREAS, HARRIET S. Bankson (widow) did, on the first day of February, A. D. 1875, execute and deliver to the undersigned, as trustee, her trust deed dated on the day and year aforesaid, and recorded in the recorder's office of Cook county, Illinois, on the fourth day of February, A.D. 1875, in book 454 of records, on page 217, which said trust deed was given to secure the payment of said Harriet S. Bankson's certain promissory note payable to the order of Horace A. Goodrich, for the sum of four hundred and eighty and 50-100 dollars, with interest at the rate of eight per centum per annum, said note being dated the first day of February, A. D. 1875, and due on the first day of November, 1875.

And whereas, default has been made in the payment of said promissory note, and application has been made by the legal holder of said note to me,

Now, therefore, notice is hereby given, that I, the undersigned, by virtue of the authority in me by said trust deed vested, and at the request of the holder of said note, will on Wednesday, the sixteenth (16th) day of February A. D. 1876, at eleven (11) o'clock in the forenoon, at the west door of the Adams street front of the court house in the city of Chicago, county of Cook and State of Illinois, at public auction, to the highest and best bidder, for cash, sell the premises described and conveyed by said trust deed, to wit:

The two story frame house, together with all the appurtenances thereof, situate upon lots four (4) and five (5), in Hamline's subdivision of the northeast quarter of block fifty-two (52), of the Canal Trustee's subdivision of section seven (7), township thirty-nine (39), north range fourteen (14), east of the third (3d) principal meridian, and also all the right, title and interest of said Harriet S. Bankson, in and to said lots four (4) and five (5) aforesaid, derived through and by a lease thereof before that time made from Melinda Hamline to said Harriet S. Bankson, together with all the right, title, interest and equity of redemption of the said Harriet S. Bankson, her heirs and assigns in and to the above described premises.

TRUSTEE'S SALE.—WHEREAS, OMAR NEWman, of the city of Chicago, of the county of Cook, and State of Illinois, by his two certain deeds of trust, both dated the eleventh day of March, A. D. eighteen hundred and seventy-four, and recorded in the recorder's office of Cook county, State of Illinois, in book 349 of records, on page 243 and 244, did convey to Oliver B. Green, in trust, the real estate hereinafter described; one of said conveyances being made to secure the prompt payment of the bond of the said Omar Newman for the penal sum of $22,000, conditioned upon the payment by the said Omar Newman to one Mary F. Green, of the city of Worcester, in the State of Massachusetts, of the sum of eleven thousand dollars and interest thereon, in manner following, to wit:

One thousand dollars on the first day of June, A. D. 1875, and two thousand (2,000) dollars on the first day of June, A.D. 1876, and eight thousand (8,000) dollars on the first day of June, A.D. 1879, with interest at the rate of ten per cent. per annum, payable semi-annually, on all of said principal moneys unpaid until payment of the same, said semi-annual interest to be paid on the eleventh days of September and March, occurring in each year, from and after said date thereof, except that the interest due on each of said portions of said principal at the date of maturity of each of said portions, shall be paid at the maturity of said portion of said principal sum, according to thirteen several interest coupons of even date herewith, made by said Omar Newman, and payable at the First National Bank of Chicago, with ten per cent. interest after due. Said indebtedness being a part of the purchase money of the premises hereinafter described. And the other of said conveyances being made to secure the payment of two (2) promissory notes both dated the eleventh day of March, A. D. 1874, and signed by the said Omar Newman, and payable to the order of Mary R. Knudson, one of said notes being for the sum of fifteen hundred and thirty-three and 31-100 dollars, and due on the first day of June, A. D. 1874, and the other of said notes being for the sum of one thousand and sixty-three and 87-100 dollars, and due on the first day of November, 1874, both of said notes bearing interest at the rate of ten per cent. per annum after maturity, and being given for a part of the purchase money of the premises hereinafter described.

And whereas, it was provided in said deed of trust first mentioned, that in case of default in the payment of the said bond and interest coupons aforesaid in the said deed of trust mentioned, or of any part thereof according to the tenor and effect thereof, then it should be lawful for the undersigned, on the application of the legal holder of said bond and coupons, or either of them, to sell and dispose of all and singular, the said premises by said deed of trust granted, and all right, title, benefit and equity of redemption of the said Omar Newman, his heirs and assigns therein, at public auction, at the north door of the Chamber of Commerce building, in the city of Chicago, in the State of Illinois, or on said premises, or any part thereof, as may be specified in the notice of such sale, for the highest and best price the same will bring in cash, having previously given at least three weeks' notice of the place and time of such sale by advertisement in the Chicago Legal News or in any newspaper at that time published in the said city of Chicago, and to make, execute and deliver to the purchaser or purchasers at such sale, good and sufficient deed or deeds of conveyance for the premises sold.

And whereas, default has been made in the payment of said sum of one thousand dollars ($1,000) due the first day of June, A. D. 1875, and also in the payment of the coupon note for five hundred and fifty (550) dollars, representing the interest due the eleventh day of September, A. D. 1874, and also in the payment of the coupon note for five hundred and fifty dollars ($550), representing the interest due the eleventh day of March, A. D. 1875, and also in the payment of the coupon note for twenty-two and 22-100 dollars, representing the interest due the first day of June, A. D. 1875, and also in the payment of the coupon note for five hundred dollars ($500), representing the interest due the eleventh day of September, A. D. 1875, and such default have continued for the space of more than 20 days, and the said Mary R. Green has elected to declare and has declared the whole of said principal sums and arrearages of interest thereon immediately due and payable, as by the terms of said bond she was authorized to do, and there is now due thereon the sum of thirteen thousand and eleven and 7-100 dollars ($13,011.07).

And whereas, it was provided in said second mentioned deed of trust, that in case of default in the payment of the said promissory notes in the said deed of trust mentioned, or the interest that might grow due thereon, or of any part thereof, according to the tenor and effect of said notes, then it should be lawful for the undersigned, on the application of the legal holder of said notes, or either of them, to sell and dispose of the said premises by said deed of trust granted, and all right, title, benefit and equity of redemption of the said Omar Newman, his heirs and assigns therein, at public auction, at the north door of the Chamber of Commerce building, in the city of Chicago, in the State of Illinois, or on said premises, or any part thereof, as may be specified in the notice of such sale, for the highest and best price the same will bring in cash, having previously given at least three (3) weeks notice of the place and time of such sale, by advertisement in the Chicago Legal News or any newspaper at that time published in the said city of Chicago, and to make, execute and deliver to the purchaser or purchasers at such sale, good and sufficient deed or deeds of conveyance for the premises sold.

And whereas, default has been made in the payment of both said promissory notes in said second mentioned deed of trust mentioned, and there is now due thereon the sum of twenty-nine hundred and sixty-seven and 69-100 ($2,967.69) dollars.

Now, therefore, public notice is hereby given that on Saturday, the fifth day of February, A. D. 1876, at the hour of ten o'clock A. M., at the north door of the Chamber of Commerce building, I shall sell at public auction the following described premises, to wit:

Lot number twenty-three (23) in Laflin & Smith's subdivision of blocks numbered eighty-six (86) and eighty-nine (89) in the Canal Trustees' subdivision of the west half (½) of section number twenty-seven (27), in township number thirty-nine (39) north, of range number fourteen (14), east of the third (3d) principal meridian, for the highest and best price the same will bring in cash, for the purposes in said deeds of trust mentioned.

CHICAGO LEGAL NEWS.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 22, 1876.

The Courts.

UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT.

OCTOBER TERM, 1875.

CHARLES A. NICHOLS, assignee of A. M. EATON, v. A. M. EATON et al.

CONSTRUCTION OF WILL—RIGHT OF TESTATOR TO MAKE THE INSOLVENCY OF A LEGATEE TERMINATE ALL HIS LEGAL VESTED RIGHT IN THE ESTATE OF SUCH TESTATOR—DISCRETION OF TRUSTEES.

1. ESTATE TERMINATED ON INSOLVENCY OF LEGATEE.—The will provided that if certain sons of the testatrix should respectively alienate or dispose of the income to which they were entitled under the trusts of the will, or if, by reason of bankruptcy or insolvency, or other means whatsoever, said income could no longer be personally enjoyed by them respectively, but the same would become vested in or payable to some other person, then the trust expressed in said will concerning so much thereof as would so vest should immediately cease and determine. The court held this provision in the will valid.

2. DISCRETION OF TRUSTEES.—The court passes upon the validity of a provision placing certain portions of the income in the hands of the trustees, in their discretion, but without its being obligatory upon them, to pay or to apply for the use of the sons of the testatrix so much and such parts of the income to which her said sons would have been entitled under a certain trust named in the will in case a forfeiture in said will provided for had not happened.

3. ALIENEATION—LIFE ESTATE.—The court does not see that the power of alienation is a necessary incident to a life estate in real property, or that the rents and profits of real property and the interests and dividends of personal property may not be enjoyed by an individual without liability for his debts being attached as a necessary incident to such enjoyment. The court is not prepared to follow the English doctrine upon this subject.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

Mr. Justice MILLER delivered the opinion of the court.

The controversy in this case arises on the construction and legal effect of certain clauses in the will of Mrs. Sarah B. Eaton. At the time of her death, and at the date of her will, she had three sons and a daughter, being herself a widow and possessed of large means of her own. By her will she devised her estate real and personal, to three trustees, upon trusts to pay the rents, profits, dividends, interest and income of the trust property to her four children equally, for and during their natural lives, and after their decease, in trust for such of their children as shall attain the age of twenty-one, or shall die under that age having lawful issue living, subject to the condition that if any of her children should die without leaving any child who should survive the testatrix and attain the age of twenty-one years, or die under that age leaving lawful issue living at his or her decease, then, as to the share or respective shares, as well original as accruing, of such child or children respectively, upon the trusts declared in said will concerning the other share or respective shares. The will also contained a provision that if her said sons respectively should alienate or dispose of the income to which they were entitled under the trusts of the will, or if, by reason of bankruptcy or insolvency, or any other means whatsoever, said income could no longer be personally enjoyed by them respectively, but the same would become vested in or payable to some other person then the trust expressed in said will concerning so much thereof as would so vest should immediately cease and determine. In that case, during the residue of the life of such son, that part of the income of the trust fund was to be paid to the wife and children, or wife or child, as the case might be, of such son, and in default of any objects of the last mentioned trust, the income was to accumulate in augmentation of the principal fund.

There is another proviso which, as it is the main ground of the present litigation, is here given verbatim, as follows:

"Provided, also, that in case at any future period circumstances should exist which, in the opinion of my said trustees, shall justify or render expedient the placing at the disposal of my said children, respectively, any portion of my said real and personal estate, then it shall be lawful for my said trustees, in their discretion, but without its being in any manner obligatory upon them, to transfer absolutely to my said children respectively, for his or her own proper use and benefit, any portion not exceeding one-half of the trust fund from whence his or her share of the income, under the preceding trusts, shall arise; and immediately upon such transfer being made, the trusts hereinbefore declared concerning so much of the trust fund as shall be so transferred shall absolutely cease and determine; and in case, after the cessation of said income as to my said sons respectively, otherwise than by death, as hereinbefore provided for, it shall be lawful for my said trustees, in their discretion, but without its being obligatory upon them, to pay to or apply for the use of my said sons respectively, or for the use of such of my said sons and his wife and family, so much and such part of the income to which my said sons respectively would have been entitled under the preceding trusts in case the forfeiture hereinbefore provided for had not happened."

The daughter died soon after the mother, without issue and unmarried. The defendant Amasa M. Eaton, one of the sons of the testatrix, failed in business and made a general assignment of all his property to Charles A. Nichols for the benefit of his creditors, in March, 1867, and in December, 1868, was, on his own petition, declared a bankrupt, and said Nichols was duly appointed his assignee in bankruptcy. The defendant was then, and during the pendency of this suit, unmarried and without children. The executors and trustees of the will were William M. Bailey and George B. Ruggles, a son of testatrix by a former husband, and her son Amasa M. Eaton, the present defendant and bankrupt.

It will be seen at once that, whether we look to the assignment before bankruptcy, or to the effect of the adjudication of bankruptcy and the appointment of Nichols as assignee in that proceeding, one of the conditions had occurred on which the will of Mrs. Eaton had declared that the devise of a part of the income of the trust estates to Amasa M. Eaton should cease and determine, and as he had no wife or children in whom it could vest, it became, by the alternative provision of the will, a fund to accumulate until his death or until he should have a wife or child who could take under the trust.

But Nichols, the assignee, construing the whole of the will together, and especially the proviso, which we have given verbatim, to disclose a purpose, under cover of a discretionary power, to secure to her son the right to receive to his own use the share of the income to which he was entitled before the bankruptcy, in the same manner afterwards as if that event had not occurred, brought this bill to subject that income to administration by him, as assignee in bankruptcy, for the benefit of the creditors. His claim is founded on the proposition, ably presented here by counsel, that a will which expresses to vest in a devisee either personal property, or the income of personal or real property, and secure to him its enjoyment free from liability for his debts, is void, on grounds of public policy, as being in fraud of the rights of creditors, or, as expressed by Lord Eldon in Brander v. Robinson, 18 Vesey, 433, "if property is given to a man for his life the donor cannot take away the incidents of a life estate."

There are two propositions to be considered as arising on the face of this will as applicable to the facts stated: 1. Does the true construction of the will bring it within that class of cases, the provisions of which on this point are void under the principle above stated? and, 2d, if so, is that principle to be the guide of a court of the United States sitting in chancery?

Taking for our guide the cases decided in the English courts the doctrine of the case of Brander v. Robinson seems to be pretty well established. It is equally well settled that a devise of the income of property, to cease on the insolvency or bankruptcy of the devisee, is good, and that the limitation is valid. (Demmill v. Bedford, 3 Vesey, 149; Brander v. Robinson, 18 Vesey, 429; Rockford v. Hackmen, 9 Hare; Lewin on Trusts, 80, chapter vii., sec. 2; Tillinghast v. Bradford, 5 Rhode Island, 205.)

If there had been no further provision in regard to the matter in this will than that on the bankruptcy or insolvency of the devisee, the trust as to him should cease and determine, or if there had been a simple provision that in such event that part of the income of the estate should go to some specified person other than the bankrupt, there would be no difficulty in the case. But the first trust declared after the bankruptcy for this part of the income is in favor of the wife, child, or children of such bankrupt, and in such manner as said trustees in their discretion shall think proper. There does not seem to be any doubt that if the bankrupt devisee had a wife or child living to take under this branch of the will that there would be nothing left which could go to his assignee in bankruptcy. The cases on this point are well considered in Lewin on Trusts, above cited, and the doctrine may be stated that a direction that the trust to the first taker shall cease on his bankruptcy, and shall then go to his wife or children, is valid, and the entire interest passes to them, but that if the devise be to him and his wife or children, or if he is in any way to receive a vested interest, that interest, whatever it may be, may be separated from those of his wife or children and be paid over to his assignee. (Page v. Way, 3 Beavan, 20; Perry v. Roberts, 1 Mylne & Keene, 4; Rippon v. Norton, 2 Beavan, 63; Lord v. Bunn, 2 Younge & Collier Chanc'y R., 98). Where, however, the devise over is for the support of the bankrupt and his family, in such manner as the trustees may think proper, the weight of authority in England seems to be against the proposition that anything is left to which the assignee can assert a valid claim. (Twopenny v. Peyton, 10 Simon, 487; Godden v. Crowhurst, Ib., 642).

In the case before us, the trustees are authorized, in the event of the bankruptcy of one of the sons of testatrix without wife or children, which is the condition of the trust as to Amasa M. Eaton, to loan and reinvest that portion of the income of the estate in augmentation of the principal sum or capital of the estate until his decease, or until he shall have a wife or children capable of receiving the trust of the testatrix forfeited by him.

There does not seem thus far any intention to secure or revest in the bankrupt any interest in the devise which he had forfeited, and there can be no doubt that but for the subsequent clauses of the will there would be nothing in which the assignee could claim an interest. But there are the provisions that the trustees may, at their discretion, transfer, at any time, to either of the devisees, the half or any less proportion of the share of the fund itself which said devisee would be entitled to if the whole fund were to be equally distributed, and the further provision that in case after the cesser of income provided for in case of bankruptcy or other cause, it shall be lawful, but not obligatory, on her said trustees, to pay to said bankrupt or insolvent son, or to apply for the use of his family, such and so much of said income as said son would have been entitled to in case the forfeiture had not happened.

It is strongly argued that these provisions are designed to evade the policy of the law already mentioned, that the discretion vested in the trustees is equivalent to a direction, and that it was well-known it would be exercised in favor of the bankrupt.

The two cases of Twopenny v. Peyton and Godden v. Crowhurst, above cited from 10 Simons, seem to be in conflict with this doctrine; while the cases cited in appellant's brief go no further than to hold that when there is a right to support or maintenance in the bankrupt, or the bankrupt and his family, a right which he could enforce, then such interest, if it can be ascertained, goes to the assignee.

No case is cited, none is known to us, which goes so far as to hold that an absolute discretion in the trustee, a discretion which, by the express language of the will, he is under no obligation to exercise in favor of the bankrupt confers such an interest on the latter, that he or his assignee in bankruptcy can successfully assert it in a court of equity or any other court.

As a proposition, then, unsupported by any adjudged case, it does not commend itself to our judgment on principle. Conceding to its fullest extent the doctrine of the English courts, their decisions are all founded on the proposition that there is somewhere in the instrument which creates the trust a substantial right, a right which the appropriate court would enforce, left in the bankrupt after his insolvency and after the cesser of the original and more absolute interest conferred by the earlier clauses of the will. This constitutes the dividing line in the cases which are apparently in conflict. Applying this test to the will before us it falls short, in our opinion, of conferring any such right on the bankrupt. Neither of the clauses of the provisos contain anything more than a grant to the trustees of the purest discretion to exercise their power in favor of testatrix's sons. It would be a sufficient answer to any attempt on the part of the son in any court to enforce the exercise of that discretion in his favor, that the testatrix has in express terms said that such exercise of this discretion is not "in any manner obligatory upon them," words repeated in both these clauses. To compel them to pay any of this income to a son after bankruptcy, or to his assignee, is to make a will for the testatrix which she never made, and to do it by a decree of a court is to substitute the discretion of the chancellor for the discretion of the trustees, in whom alone she reposed it. When trustees are in existence, and capable of acting, a court of equity will not interfere to control them in the exercise of a discretion vested in them by the instrument under which they act. (Hill on Trustees, 486; Lewin on Trusts, 538; Boss v. Goodsall, 1 Younge & Collier, 617; Madison v. Andrew, 1 Vesey, Sr., 60.) And certainly they would not do so in violation of the wishes of the testator.

But while we have thus attempted to show that Mrs. Eaton's will is valid in all its parts upon the extremest doctrine of the English Chancery court, we do not wish to have it understood that we accept the limitations which that court has placed upon the power of testamentary disposition of property by its owner. We do not see, as implied in the remark of Lord Eldon, that the power of alienation is a necessary incident to a life estate in real property, or that the rents and profits of real property and the interest and dividends of personal property may not be enjoyed by an individual without liability for his debts being attached as a necessary incident to such enjoyment. This doctrine is one which the English Chancery court has engrafted upon the common law for the benefit of creditors, and is comparatively of modern origin. We concede that there are limitations which public policy or general statutes impose upon all dispositions of property, such as those designed to prevent perpetuities and accumulations of real estate in corporations and ecclesiastical bodies. We also admit that there is a just and sound policy peculiarly appropriate to the jurisdiction of courts of equity to protect creditors against frauds upon their rights, whether they be actual frauds or constructive frauds. But the doctrine that the owner of property, in the free exercise of his will in disposing of it, cannot so dispose of it, but that the object of his bounty, who parts with nothing in return, must hold it subject to the debts due his creditors, though that may soon deprive him of all the benefits sought to be conferred by the testator's affection or generosity, is one which we are not prepared to announce as the doctrine of this court.

If the doctrine is to be sustained at all, it must rest exclusively on the rights of creditors. Whatever may be the extent of those rights in England, the policy of the States of this Union, as expressed both by their statutes and the decisions of their courts has not been carried so far in that direction.

It is believed that every State in the Union has passed statutes by which a part of the property of the debtor is exempt from seizure on execution or other process of the courts. In short, is not by law liable to the payment of his debts. The extent and nature of this exemption varies in the different States. In some it extends only to the merest implements of household necessity. In others, it includes the library of the professional man, however extensive, and the tools of the mechanic; and in many, it embraces the homestead in which the family resides. This has come to be considered in this country as a wise as it certainly may be called a settled policy in all the States. To property so exempted the creditor has no right to look, and does not look, as a means of payment when his debt is created. And while this court has steadily held, under the constitutional provision against impairing the obligations of contracts by State laws, that such exemption laws when first enacted are invalid as to debts then in existence, it has always held that as to contracts made thereafter, the exemptions were valid.

This distinction is well founded in the sound and unanswerable reason that since the creditor knows when he parts with the consideration of his debt that the property so exempt can never be made liable to its payment, he is neither defrauded nor injured by the application of the law to his case. Nothing is withdrawn from this liability which was ever subject to it, or to which he had a right to look for its discharge in payment. The analogy of this principle to the devise of the income from real and personal property for life seems perfect. In this country all wills or other instruments creating such trusts are recorded in public offices where they may be inspected by every one, and the law in such cases impntes notice to all persons concerned of all the facts which they might know by the inspection. When, therefore, it appears by the record of a will that the devisee holds this life estate or income, dividends, or rents of real and personal property, payable to him alone, to the exclusion of the alienee or creditor, the latter knows that in creating a debt with such person he has no right to look to that income as a means of discharging it. He is neither misled nor defrauded when the object of the testator is carried out by excluding him from any benefit of such a devise.

Nor do we see any reason in the recognized nature and tenure of property and its transfer by will, why a testator who gives, who gives without any pecuniary return, who gets nothing of property value from the donee, may not attach to that gift the incident of continued use, of uninterrupted benefit of the gift, during the life of the donee. Why a parent, or one who loves another and wishes to use his own property in securing the object of his affection, as far as property can do it, from the ills of life, the vicissitudes of fortune, and even his own improvidence or incapacity for self-protection, should not be permitted to do so, is not readily perceived.

These views are well supported by adjudged cases in the State courts of the highest character.

In the case of Fisher v. Taylor, 2 Rawle, 33, a testator had directed his executors to purchase a tract of land, take the title in their name in trust for his son, who was to have the rents, issues, and profits of it during his life, free from liability for any debts then or thereafter contracted by him. The Supreme Court of Pennsylvania held that this life estate was not liable to execution for the debts of the son. "A man," says the court, "may undoubtedly dispose of his land so as to secure to the object of his bounty, and to him exclusively, the annual profits. The mode in which he accomplishes such a purpose, is by creating a trust estate, explicitly designating the uses and defining the powers of the trustees. * * Nor is such a provision contrary to the policy of the law or to any act of assembly. Creditors cannot complain because they are bound to know the foundation on which they extend their credit."

In the subsequent case of Holdship v. Patterson, 7 Watts, 547, where the friends of a man made contributions by a written agreement to the support of himself and family, the court held that the installments which they had promised to pay could not be diverted by his creditors to the payment of his debts, and Gibson, Chief Justice, remarks, that "the fruit of their bounty could not have been turned from its object by the defendant's creditors had it been applicable by the terms of the trust to his personal maintenance, for a benefactor may certainly provide for the maintenance of a friend without exposing his bounty to the debts or imprudence of the beneficiary."

In the same court, as late as 1864, it was held that a devise to a son of the rents and profits of an estate during his natural life, without being subject to his debts and liabilities, is a valid trust, and the estate being vested in trustees the son could not alienate. (Shankland's Appeal, 47 Penn. State R., 113.)

The same proposition is either expressly or impliedly asserted by that court in the cases of Ashurst v. Given, 5 Watts & Sergeant, 323; Brown v. Williamson, 36 Penn. State, 338; Still v. Spear, 45 Penn. State, 168.

In the case of Leavitt v. Bierne, 21 Connecticut, Waite, Justice, in delivering the opinion of the court, says: "We think it in the power of a parent to place property in the hands of trustees for the benefit of a son and his wife and children, with full power in them to manage and apply it at their discretion, without any power in the son to interfere in that management or in the disposition of it until it has actually been paid over to him by the trustees." And he proceeds to argue in favor of the existence of this power, from the vicious habits or intemperate character of the son, and the right of the father to provide against these misfortunes.

In the case of Nickell et al., v. Handly et al., 10 Grattan, 336, the court thus expresses its view on the general question, though not, perhaps, strictly necessary to the judgment in that case: "There is nothing in the nature or law of property which would prevent the testatrix, when about to die, from appropriating her property to the support of her poor and helpless relatives, according to the different conditions and wants of such relatives, nothing to prevent her from charging her property with the expense of food, raiment, and shelter for such relatives. There is nothing in law or reason which should prevent her from appointing an agent or trustee to administer her bounty."

In the case of Pope's Executors v. Elliott & Co, 8 Ben. Monroe, 56, the testator had directed his executors to pay for the support of Robert Pope the sum of $25 per month. Robert Pope having been in the Rocky Mountains until the sum of $225 of these monthly payments had accumulated in the hands of the executors, his creditors filed a bill in chancery, accompanied by an attachment to subject this fund to the payment of their debt.

The Court of Appeals of Kentucky say that it was the manifest intent of the testator to secure to Robert the means of support during his life to the extent $25 per month or $300 per year, and that this intent cannot be thwarted, either by Robert himself by assignment or alienation, or by his creditors seizing it for his debts, unless the provision is contrary to law or public policy. And after an examination of the statutes of Kentucky and the general principles of equity jurisprudence on this subject, hold that neither of these are invaded by the provision of the will.

The last case we shall refer to specially is that of Campbell v. Foster, 35 New York Court of Appeals, 361.

In that case it is held, after elaborate consideration, that the interest of a beneficiary in a trust fund, created by a person other than the debtor, cannot be reached by a creditor's bill; and while the argument is largely based upon the special provision of the statute regulating the jurisdiction of the court in that class of cases, the result is placed with equal force of argument on the general doctrines of the court of chancery, and the right of the owner of property to give it such direction as he may choose without its being subject to the debts of those upon whom he intends to confer his bounty.

We are not called upon in this connection to say how far we would feel bound, in a case originating in a state where the doctrine of the English Courts had been adopted so as to become a rule of property, if such a propositon could be predicated of a rule like this. Nor has the time which the pressure of business in this court authorizes us to devote to this case permitted of any further examination into the decisions of the state courts. We have indicated our views in this matter rather to forestall the inference that we recognize the doctrine relied on by appellants, and not much controverted by opposing counsel, than because we have felt it necessary to decide it, though the judgment of the court may rest equally well on either of the propositions which we have discussed. We think the decree of the court below may be satisfactorily affirmed on both of them.

Other objections have been urged by counsel, such as that the bankrupt is himself one of the trustees of the will, and will exercise his discretion favorably to himself. But there are two other trustees, and it requires their joint action to confer on him the benefits of this trust. It is said that one of them is mentally incompetent to act, but this is not established by the testimony. It is said, also, that since his bankruptcy, the defendant, Amasa, has actually received $25,000 of this fund, and that should go to the assignee, as it shows conclusively that the objections to the validity of the will were well founded.

But the conclusive answer to all these objections is, that by the will of decedent, a will which, as we have shown, she had a lawful right to make, the insolvency of her son terminated all his legal vested right in her estate and left nothing in him which could go to his creditors or to his assignees in bankruptcy, or to his prior assignee; and that what may have come to him after his bankruptcy through the voluntary action of the trustees under the terms of the discretion reposed in them, is his lawfully, and cannot now be subjected to the control of his assignee.

The decree of the circuit court is, therefore, affirmed.

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

SYLVESTER G. DOWNEY, admr., v. CHARLES D. BEACH.

Appeal from Jersey.

NOTE—30 PER CENT. AFTER DUE—PENALTY —USURY.

1. That it is not usurious to insert in a note that it shall bear interest at the rate of ten per cent. per annum, with 30 per cent. per annum interest after maturity, as liquidated damages for non-payment when due.

2. That in the absence of fraud, etc., a court of equity in all such cases will withhold its aid, and leave the parties to their legal rights whatever they may be.

3. The complainant charged that he was ignorant of the fact that the note contained the provision for the payment of 30 per cent. after maturity until the day he filed his bill. The court held that this was his own negligence against which it is not the province of a court of law or equity to afford him relief.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

SCOTT, C. J.—This bill was to enjoin a suit at law. Complainant borrowed of Talitha and Charlotte Crane, $500, for which he gave them his promissory note with Edwin Colean as surety. The note bears date of July 26th, 1870, payable at one year after date; and bears interest at the rate of ten per cent. per annum, with thirty per cent. per annum interest after maturity as liquidated damages for non-payment when due. Both payees are now dead, and the present defendant as administrator of the estate of the last survivor, had commenced suit on the note to enforce collection. A default had been entered, when this bill was filed to prevent the entering of final judgment. With his bill, complainant tenders the principal of the note, with interest at ten per cent. per annum compounded, together with all costs of the common law case, and seeks to enjoin the further prosecution of the suit.

This court has repeatedly held that contracts like this one are not usurious if made with a single purpose to secure prompt payment of the principal sum. Although the party agrees to pay a rate of interest in excess of that allowed by statute after maturity, it is nevertheless regarded as in the nature of penalty to secure prompt payment. In such cases, the penalty is liquidated damages, fixed by the solemn agreement of the parties. When made for the sole purpose of securing prompt payment, and understandingly entered into, such contracts are valid at law and may be enforced. The cases that hold this doctrine are so numerous in this court, it is not necessary to do more than cite a few of them. Lawrence v. Cowles, 13 Ill., 577; Smith v. Whittaker, 23 Ill., 367; Blair v. Chamblin, 39 Ill., 521.

Connecting the fact insisted upon, that the provision for the payment of thirty per cent. per annum after maturity is in the nature of penalty, still in the light of the decisions of this court, the penalty imposed is liquidated damages, which have been the subject of adjustment by the previous agreement of the parties themselves. A court of equity in all such cases will withhold its aid and leave the parties to their legal rights, whatever they may be. There is nothing in the facts alleged in this case, that calls for the interposition of a court of chancery on equitable grounds. Complainant charges, he was ignorant of the fact, that the note contained the provision for the payment of thirty per cent. after maturity, and had no knowledge of it until the day he filed his bill. This was his own negligence; against which it is not the province of a court of law or equity to afford him relief. It is not claimed, he could not read, and if he failed to read the provisions of the note when he made it, in the absence of any fraudulent practices to procure the execution, he must bear the consequences.

When the note became due it was the duty of the maker to pay it or procure further extension upon such terms as the payees were willing to grant. By paying the note at maturity he could have relieved himself from the payment of the penalty agreed upon for non-payment. Having failed to avail of his privilege in this regard, it must be understood he did so in view of the fact, the damages had been adjusted and fixed by previous positive agreement. He had his election, and a court of equity will not relieve him from the consequences of his own contract.

No deception was practiced by the payees or either of them, to procure the note with the provision for the payment of thirty per cent. after maturity. They were guilty of no wrong or oppression. By no act or word did they mislead or deceive the maker into giving the note with the penalty attached. If he has suffered injury that may now seem grievous, it is attributable alone to his own laches. It is his own contract, which is valid at law, and a court of equity will not interfere to set it aside.

The decree will be reversed and the bill dismissed.

Decree reversed.

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

JANUARY TERM, 1875.

THE AMERICAN INS. CO., garnishee of MARTIN ANDERSON, v. JAMES H. PADFIELD et al.

Appeal from the St. Clair Circuit.

MEANING OF THE WORDS "VACANT AND UNOCCUPIED" IN A POLICY.

1. The words "vacant and unoccupied" mean that the premises should be without an occupant; that is, without any person living in the house.

2. That under the evidence in this case, the house was, within the meaning of the policy, vacant and unoccupied at the time it was burnt.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

Opinion of the court by WALKER, J.

In this case appellees sued out a writ of attachment against Martin Anderson from the Circuit Court of St. Clair county. It was issued on the 28th day of February, 1872, and was served on the same day by levying on lots eleven and twelve in Williams' first addition to the town of Lebanon in that county, and by summoning James R. Padfield as garnishee.

On the first day of the following July, Anderson applied for and obtained a policy of insurance on a dwelling-house on the premises. The policy was for insurance for five years from that date. Early in September following the house was destroyed by fire, and on the 20th of the same month a further affidavit was filed in the attachment suit, that by reason of the destruction of the house by fire, that the property attached had thereby become insufficient to satisfy plaintiff's debt, and thereupon an alias writ of attachment was issued and served on appellants as garnishees.

On the 2d day of April, 1873, a trial was had in the attachment suit, which resulted in a judgment in favor of plaintiffs for $1,196.43, and costs of suit. Interrogatories were filed, which were answered by appellants, denying all indebtedness to Anderson, and all liability on the policy. At the September term, 1874, a trial was had upon the interrogatories and answer, by the court and a jury. A verdict was found for the plaintiff for six hundred dollars. A motion for a new trial having been overruled, judgment was rendered on the verdict, from which this appeal is prosecuted.

The defense relied on consists of the breach of three conditions in the policy: First, that Anderson warranted the premises to be free from incumbrances, when he made his application for insurance, when it was at the time subject to the levy of the writ of attachment. Second, that the house had become vacant, and had so remained for about two months before, and was vacant at the time it was burnt, and Anderson had notice thereof; whilst the validity of the policy was, by a condition therein, made to depend upon its continuous occupancy, and it provided that if the house should become vacant and unoccupied the policy should become void, and the assured should not be entitled to recover for loss. And third, the assured did not make and furnish the proofs of loss, as required by the policy, within the time or in the manner specified.

In the view we take of this case, it becomes unimportant whether or not the levy of the attachment was an incumbrance until followed by a judgment, or whether the property seized was defendant's homestead, and not liable to attachment; other questions control and are decisive of the case.

The evidence incontestably shows that no person was residing in this house, or had been for about two months prior to, or at the time of the fire. The tenant in possession at the time the insurance was effected, testified that he had removed from the house that length of time before, and notified the assured of the fact, who requested him to lease it to some one else, but afterward countermanded the directions, and it had remained unoccupied until it was burnt.

He says that he did not consider that he had anything more to do with the house, that he was not occupying it or paying rent for it; he only had the key to deliver to Anderson when he came back from Missouri. That there was a table, a crib, and a straw tick in it, in the house when it burnt. A number of persons testified that the house was vacant.

We think there cannot be the slightest room to doubt that the house was vacant and unoccupied when the fire occurred, and had been for two months previously. A fair and reasonable construction of the language, "vacant and unoccupied," is that it should be without an occupant, without any person living in it. This is the popular meaning of the language as appears from the evidence. Several witnesses knowing that no one was residing in it, testified that it was vacant, and so would the great majority, if not all persons, say the same thing. The language is not used in the technical, but in a popular sense. If the house had been situated when insured as it was when it was burned, and the assured had answered that it was occupied by a tenant, would any one doubt that such representation was false? Or suppose assured had owned the property in fee, had been, as he was, absent in Missouri, and had received the key from the tenant, and he had answered that he was occupying the house, although it had been situated as it was when it was burned, would any one suppose that the technical rule that the fee draws to it for some purposes the possession, have made the answer true, or that he could have answered his warranty, that the house was occupied by him? We suppose no one would so contend. For some purposes the law might regard the leaving a few such articles in a house as carrying with them possession in their owner. But in such cases there must be an intention to thus take and hold possession, but here there was ho such intention by the tenant; on the contrary he disclaimed all possession. But such possession is not occupancy in its popular sense.

We think it clear, from the evidence in the case, that the house when burnt was vacant and unoccupied. That Anderson was notified of the fact and acquiesced in it, and that the condition that it should remain occupied was broken, and the policy became void, and the company [were not liable] to pay any portion of the loss.

This disposes of the case and renders the discussion of other questions unnecessary. The judgment of the court below must be reversed and the cause remanded.

Judgment reversed.

We are under obligations to C. A. Beecher, of the St. Louis bar, for the following opinion:

SUPREME COURT OF INDIANA.

Opinion January 4, 1876.

The Ohio & Mississippi R. W. Co. v. John A. Yohe et al.

Appeal from Martin Circuit Court.

PROPERTY TAKEN ON PROCESS IN HANDS OF CARRIER.

1. That a common carrier of goods is excused from liability for not carrying and delivering the goods, when they were, without any act, fault or connivance on his part, seized by virtue of legal process and taken out of his possession.

2. That a carrier is not bound when the goods are so taken out of his possession to follow them up and be at the expense of asserting the claim thereto of the party to or for whom he undertook to carry them.

3. That the carrier should have given immediate notice to the consignors that the goods had been seized and taken out of his possession.—[Ed. Legal News.]

Opinion of the court by Downey, J.

This was an action by the appellees against the appellant, as a common carrier. The action was commenced in Knox county and the venue changed to Martin.

It is alleged, in the complaint, that the plaintiffs, consignors, on the 3d day of November, 1873, delivered to the appellant, at Bridgeport, Illinois, a quantity of wheat to be carried to Vincennes, Indiana, and delivered to the appellees.

The appellant signed and delivered a bill of lading evidencing the contract, and this is the foundation of the action. It is alleged that the company failed to deliver the wheat according to the contract, etc.

A demurrer to the complaint was filed and overruled.

The defendant moved the court, on affidavit, to stay the action until the determination of an action of replevin in Illinois, involving the title and ownership of the property, brought by one Johnson. This motion having been overruled, the plaintiff asked that Johnson be made a party to this action, which request was also refused.

Thereupon the defendant pleaded, in substance, that while the wheat was in a car of the company at Bridgeport, awaiting the coming of a train and engine to transport it to Vincennes, in accordance with the bill of lading, without any act, fault, or connivance of the defendant, or of any of her agents, servants, or employees, Johnson sued out of the office of the clerk of the Circuit Court of Lawrence county, Illinois, a writ of replevin, the said Johnson then and there claiming to be the owner, and entitled to the possession of said wheat; and by virtue of said writ the sheriff of said county seized and took the same out of the possession of the defendant, and delivered the same to said Johnson, according to law and the command of said writ, and the said Johnson took possession thereof; that said action is yet pending, by reason whereof the defendant was prevented from transporting said wheat to said city of Vincennes and delivering the same to the plaintiffs. It is averred that said Lawrence Circuit Court had jurisdiction, and certified copies of the papers and process in the action of replevin, etc., are filed with the answer.

A demurrer to the answer—on the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a defense to the action—was filed by the plaintiffs and sustained by the court. The defendant declining to answer further, there was judgment for the plaintiffs.

It is objected to the complaint, that it does not show that the plaintiffs own the wheat, or that they are the consignees mentioned in the bill of lading. There is no foundation for these objections. The complaint alleges that the plaintiffs purchased the wheat of the consignors; that the consignors delivered the same to the defendant, and that the defendant executed the bill of lading to the plaintiffs.

It is further assigned as error that the court improperly sustained the demurrer to the answer.

The question presented is this: Is a common carrier of goods excused from liability for not carrying and delivering the goods, when they are, without any act, fault or connivance on his part, seized by virtue of legal process, and taken out of his possession?

It is impossible for the carrier to deliver the goods to the consignor when they have been seized by legal process and taken out of his possession.

The carrier cannot stop, when goods are offered to him for carriage, to investigate the question as to their ownership. Nor do we think he is bound, when the goods are so taken out of his possession to follow them up and be at the trouble and expense of asserting the claim thereto of the party to or for whom he undertook to carry them.

We do not think it material what the form of the process may be. In any case the carrier must yield to the authority of legal process.

After the seizure of the goods by the officer, by virtue of the process, they are in the custody of the law, and the carrier cannot comply with his contract without a resistance of the process and a violation of law.

The right of the sheriff to hold the goods involved questions which could only be determined by the tribunal which issued the process, or some other competent tribunal, and the carrier had no power to decide them. If the goods were wrongfully seized, the plaintiffs have their remedy against the officer who seized them, or against the party at whose instance it was done.

As between these parties, the process would be no justification if the plaintiffs were the owners and entitled to the possession of the goods.

It makes no difference, we think, that the process was issued by a tribunal of a State different from that in which the plaintiffs reside. The rule must be the same as in a case where the process emanates from a court in the State of the plaintiffs' residence.

It cannot be denied that the carrier must obey the laws of the several States in which it follows its calling. The laws of Illinois which give force and effect to a writ of replevin must be obeyed. It cannot say to the sheriff, who is armed with a writ issued in due form of law, commanding him to take the property, that it has executed a bill of lading and thereby agreed to transport the property to another State and therefore he cannot have it.

The sheriff would have the right, and it would become his duty to call out the power of the county to aid in serving his lawful process. The carrier is deprived of the possession of the property by a superior power—the power of the State—the vis major of the civil law—and in all things as potent and overpowering, as far as the carrier is concerned, as if it were the "act of God" or "the public enemy." In fact, it amounts to the same thing. The carrier is equally powerless in the grasp of either.

In Redfield on Railways, Vol. 2, p. 158, the learned author says, that it is settled that the bailee may defend against the claim of the bailor, by showing that the goods were taken from him by legal process. And in a note he adds: "If this defense were not valid it might compel the party to resist the acts of a public officer in the discharge of his duty, which the law will never do." (Ibid, note 27, p. 158)

In New York, where property was forcibly seized by a constable, on a complaint that the property had been stolen, the court said: "But my associates, not passing upon the question whether the property was delivered to the true owners, desire to put this case upon the doctrine that the common carrier is exonerated from his obligation to his bailor, when the property is taken from him by due legal process, provided the bailor is promptly notified of such taking. The judgment of the Supreme Court should, therefore, be affirmed. All affirm on the ground that when property is taken from the carrier by legal process, and he gives notice thereof, he is discharged." (Bliven et al. v. Hudson River R. R., 36 N. Y., 407.)

In this same case in the Supreme Court it was held that, "The bailee must assure himself and show the court, that the proceedings are regular and valid; but he is not bound to litigate for his bailor, or to show that the judgment or decision of the tribunal issuing the process, or seizing the goods, was correct in law or in fact. This is the rule as to bailees in general, and it includes the case of common carriers." (Ibid, 35 Barbour, 191.)

In a case where goods were seized on attachment, the court held: "If goods are taken from a bailee or carrier by authority of law, in any case coming within these exceptions, there is no doubt that it is a good defense to an action by the bailor or shipper for a non-delivery." (Van Winkle v. United States Mail Steamship Co., 37 Barbour, 124.)

In Vermont, where goods in the hands of a wharfinger were seized under legal process, the court held that if they are taken from the wharfinger or warehouseman by lawful process, the wharfinger or warehouseman can protect himself in a suit brought against him by the owner." (Burton et al. v. Wilkinson et al., 18 Vt., 190.)

In the Supreme Court of the United, States, where goods in the hands of a carrier had been attached by a third party, in a suit brought by the consignees on a bill of lading, Mr. Justice Nelson, in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "After the seizure of the goods by the sheriff, under the attachment, they were in the custody of the law, and the defendant could not comply with the demand of the plaintiffs without a breach of it, even admitting the goods to have been at the time in his actual possession. The case, however, shows that they were in the possession of the sheriff's officer or agent, and continued there until disposed of under the judgment upon the attachment. It is true that these goods had been delivered to the defendant as carriers, by the plaintiffs, to be conveyed by them to the place of destination, and were seized under an attachment by third persons; but this circumstance did not impair the legal effect of the seizure or custody of the goods under it, so as to justify the defendant in taking them out of the hands of the sheriff. The right of the sheriff to hold them was a question of law, to be determined by the proper legal proceedings, and not at the will of the defendant, nor that of the plaintiffs. The law on this subject is well settled, as may be seen on a reference to the cases collected in sections 453, 290 and 350 of Drake on Attachments, 2d edition." (Stiles v. Davis et al., 1 Black, 106.)

The above case is precisely the same as the case at bar, with the single exception that in Stiles v. Davis et al., the goods were seized under an attachment, while in this case they were seized under a writ of replevin.

There is a defect, however, in the answer which justified the Circuit Court in holding it bad, and that is the want of an averment that the defendant gave immediate notice to the plaintiffs that the goods had been seized and taken out of its possession.

That the carrier should do this seems to be a necessary and reasonable qualification of the rule. The rule is laid down with this qualification in Bliven v. The Hudson River R. R. Co., supra.

The only averment as to notice in the answer is this: "And the defendant further avers that said plaintiffs had notice before the commencement of this suit, that said action of replevin was pending," etc. The bill of lading bears date November 3d, 1873. The writ of replevin bears date November 5th, 1873. The wheat was taken and delivered to Johnson on the 6th day of November, 1873. The record does not show when this action was commenced. The first date given is that of the filing of the amended complaint, February 7th, 1874.

There is nothing from which we can find that proper diligence was used by the carrier in giving notice of the seizure of the goods. It may be repeated that the wheat was received by the defendant on the 3d day of November, 1873, and was not seized until the 6th. It is probable that a satisfactory excuse or reason should be alleged why the wheat was not moved before the seizure.

The answer admits the receipt of the wheat and the execution of the bill of lading on the 3d of November, and then alleges: "And thereupon said wheat was loaded into a car of said defendant then standing upon her side track at said town of Bridgeport, and while said wheat was in said car and so upon said track awaiting the arrival of a train and engine to transport the same to the city of Vincennes aforesaid, in accordance with the terms of said bill of lading, and without the act, fault or connivance of the defendant or of any of her agents, servants or employees, one Benjamin F. Johnson sued out," etc.

It is very questionable whether this shows proper diligence on the part of the carrier. We need not, however, decide this question.

Clearly we think the carrier cannot make use of the fact that the property has been seized by legal process to shield himself from liability for his own negligence, or to justify any improper confederation with the party or officer seizing the goods.

The rulings of the court on the motions to stay the proceedings in the action, and to cause Johnson to be made a party to the action were properly overruled for the reasons stated in determining the validity of the answer.

A question is made concerning the publication of a deposition taken by the plaintiff, which, it is contended, was not properly directed on the envelope. But as the deposition was not used on the trial, the defendant could not have been injured by this ruling.

The judgment is affirmed, with costs.

LXIX. ILLINIOS REPORTS.

We have received from Hon. NORMAN L. FREEMAN, official reporter, the entire advance sheets of the 69th volume of Illinois Reports, from which we take the following head-notes:

PROMISSORY NOTE.

1. Assignee after maturity takes subject to all defenses.—The purchaser of a promissory note after maturity takes it subject to any defense that exists against it in the hands of the payee. If the payee, at the date of the assignment, is indebted to the maker in a sum greater than is due on the note, such indebtedness may be set off in an action on the note by the assignee.—(Opinion by SCOTT, J.)—Bissell v. Curran, p. 20.

INSTRUCTION.

2. Repeating.—Where the law, so far as applicable to the facts of a case, is stated in an instruction given as liberally as the party could ask, the refusal of the court to give others not based on the evidence, asked by such party, is not erroneous.

BILL OF EXCEPTIONS.

1. When necessary.—The office of a bill of exceptions is to bring into and make something a part of the record which would otherwise be no part of the same. Where a case is decided on demurrer, there being no motion made or evidence heard, a bill of exceptions is wholly unnecessary.—(Opinion by WALKER, J.)—Chase v. De Wolf, p. 47.

ILLEGAL FEES.

2. Justice of the peace will not be compelled to issue execution for.—Where a constable charges illegal and unreasonable fees for executing a writ of replevin issued by a justice of the peace, the latter named officer will not be compelled by mandamus to issue an execution for their collection.

JUDGMENT FOR COSTS.

3. Embraces only legal costs.—Where a plaintiff, in replevin before a justice of the peace, recovers judgment for costs, it does not embrace all the costs and charges claimed, but only all the plaintiff's legal costs to be taxed, and any charge for services not enumerated in the statute is not embraced in such judgment.

FEES.

4. For executing writ of replevin.—The statute allowing reasonable charges to constables, to be allowed by the justice of the peace, for removing and taking care of property levied on, can not be construed to embrace a charge for taking and delivering property under a writ of replevin; and a charge of $85 for replevying one or two express wagon loads of goods, amounting to almost half the value of the goods, was held to be illegal, unjust, and oppressive.

EXECUTION.

5. For collection of illegal costs claimed, properly recalled.—Where a justice of the peace renders a judgment for costs generally, and afterwards taxes illegal and oppressive fees charged as costs in the case, and issues an execution for their collection, he has the right, and it is his duty, to recall the execution, as, if a levy and sale were made under it, he would be liable to an action of trespass.

REDEMPTION.

1. Right is purely statutory.—The right of a judgment creditor to redeem from a previous judicial sale is purely statutory, and the right must be exercised in the manner required by the statute, or it will be invalid.—(Opinion by CRAIG, J.)—Durby v. Davis, p. 133.

2. Of a less interest than sold, not allowed.—Where judgment is recovered against two defendants, each of whom own an undivided one-fifth of a tract of land, and their interest is sold together, being the undivided two-fifths, a judgment creditor of one of them has no right to redeem as to the interest of his debtor by paying one-half the amount for which the land sold, with interest.

INJUNCTION.

1. To prevent trespass.—Before a court of equity will lend its aid to enjoin a mere trespass, the facts and circumstances must be alleged in the bill from which it may be seen that irreparable mischief will be the result of the act complained of, and that the law can afford the party no adequate remedy.—(Opinion by SCOTT, J.)—Goodel et al v. Losson, p. 146.

2. Where the owner of a leased building sought, by bill in chancery, to enjoin a tenant, who had leased rooms from a prior owner, from attaching to the building a sign of three gilded balls to indicate his business of pawnbroker, there being no stipulation in the lease as to the signs to be used or where they should be placed: Held, that, if the owner would be injured in consequence of the acts sought to be restrained, his remedy at law was complete and adequate, and that it did not appear that any irreparable injury would follow the proposed act.

JUDGMENT.

Form in debt.—It is an irregularity to render a judgment in damages in an action of debt. But it is not such an error as to justify a reversal, and the irregularity is cured by section 56 of the Practice act of 1872.—(Opinion by BREESE, C. J.)—R. R. I. & St. L. R. R. Co. v. Steele, p. 253.

CHATTEL MORTGAGE.

1. Title passes on breach.—A chattel mortgage is but a conditional sale, and when the mortgagor fails to perform the condition, the title to the mortgaged property, so far as it is held by the mortgagor, vests in the mortgagee. Where possession is taken in accordance with the terms of the mortgage, the title passes, even though the debt be not then due. The fact that the mortgagee is required to sell the property, and render the surplus, after payment of the debt, etc., to the mortgagor, will not prevent the title from vesting in the mortgagee, as purchaser.—(Opinion by WALKER, J.)—Duffee v. Grinnell et al., p. 371.

2. Mistake in date to certificate of acknowledgement.—Where a chattel mortgage was in fact executed and acknowledged in 1871, but the justice dated the certificate of acknowledgement in 1872, and the mortgage was recorded on the day of its execution, and it did not appear but that the entry in the justice's docket showed the proper date: Held, that the mistake did not vitiate the mortgage, as no injury could have resulted from it to creditors or purchasers.

3. Acknowledgement taken by justice out of his precinct.—Where a chattel mortgage is acknowledged before a justice of the peace residing in the same precinct with the mortgagor, the acknowledgement will not be bad because it was taken in another township or precinct. It will be good if taken anywhere in the county, provided the justice resided in the same election precinct with the mortgagor.

4. Not affected because the justice keeps his docket in another township.—A chattel mortgage will not be rendered invalid from the fact that the justice of the peace takes his docket out of the township of his residence, and keeps his office, for convenince a few rods in an adjoining township, especially when it is readily accessible for inspection.

PARTIES PLAINTIFF.

5. In replevin.—Where mortgagees of chattels seek to reduce them to possession by replevin, under a clause giving them this right whenever they should feel insecure, etc., they, being joint owners, must sue jointly,

JUSTICE OF THE PEACE.

6. Whether he may act out of his township.—A justice of the peace having jurisdiction throughout his county, may issue any writ where he has jurisdiction, wherever he may be in the county, so that he make it returnable to his office, which must be in his township. So he may take and certify an acknowledgement to a deed, mortgage or other instrument anywhere in his county. But when he has to hear and adjudicate on any question, that must be done in his township and at his office, which must be at a known place.

EXECUTION.

7. What subject to levy and sale.—Where a chattel mortgage authorizes the mortgagor to retain possession of the property until default in payment, with no provision enabling the mortgagee to take possession in any other event than of default in payment, the interest of the mortgagor may be seized and sold under execution, at any time before the mortgage debt falls due, and the purchaser will succeed to the rights of the mortgagor, and nothing more.

8. But where the mortgagee is authorized, by the terms of the mortgage, to take possession if the property is levied upon, or he shall, at any time, feel unsafe or insecure, the levy of an execution on the property can not defeat the mortgagee's right to reduce it to possession. In such a case, it is only with the permission or non-action of the mortgagee that the property can be sold under execution.

U. S. DISTRICT COURT, MASS.

In Re BENJAMIN F. SPILLMAN.

In composition cases the register is entitled to five dollars for incidental expenses; three dollars for the meeting; five dollars when acting under a special order; ten cents for filing each paper; twenty cents for each folio of the examination; twenty five cents for each affidavit; one dollar for ordering an adjournment of a meeting, and ten cents for each folio of the report.

When the resolution has been definitely passed upon, the business of the meeting is over and no adjournment is needed.

The confirmation need not be presented at the meeting of creditors.

If the confirmation is presented to the register, the time spent in examining it may be considered as spent under a special order.

No memoranda are necessary in composition cases.

LOWELL, J.—In examining the question of the fees of the register in the case of composition, I have found that the fee bill, though not specially intended to reach such cases, may be applied to them. Without tracing all the items of charge in this case, I will point out such as seem to be allowable:

First. The general docket fee for office and incidental expenses, five dollars.

Second. For general meeting of creditors, three dollars.

Third. For service under order of court not exceeding, per day, * five dollars.

Fourth. Filing papers, not before filed with clerk, each † ten cents.

Fifth. Examination of bankrupt taken down in writing, for each folio, twenty cents.

Sixth. For affidavits when necessary, each twenty-five cents.

Seventh. Adjournments. A large part of the fees proposed to be charged in the bill sent in by the register are derived from adjournments and adjourned meetings. I understand the ground for making such adjournments was that the confirmation was incomplete. The statute does not contemplate that the confirmation should be made at a meeting, nor that it should be presented to the register. The debtor may procure it within any reasonable time after the meeting. Knowing that they often were presented and filed, I required the register's opinion upon them if filed with him. My orders are perhaps annulled by the action of the Supreme Court. Whether so or not, I shall at once repeal them. I do not understand the Supreme Court to require the register to pass upon the confirmation, and he is at liberty to refuse to do so. If he does examine it he may be considered to do so under a special order, and the time taken may be added to that spent in examining the resolution itself. Whenever the resolution has been definitely passed upon by the creditors assembled in person or by proxy, the business of the meeting is over. I believe it has been ruled in England that such a meeting cannot be lawfully adjourned, except by such a vote as would be requisite to pass the resolution. How that may be by our law I have not had occasion to decide. When an adjourned meeting is necessary (if ever) a fee for ordering it, one dollar; and for holding it, three dollars.

Eighth. Memoranda. The short memoranda are not necessary in composition cases, because the report which the register is required to make of the proceedings includes them. The memoranda are needed in ordinary cases to keep the creditors, who may choose to apply to the court, informed of the state of the proceedings from time to time during the months or years that the case may be pending. In composition cases the register ought to keep a docket and minutes, and can send them up if called for. He may, however, tax the folios of his report itself, for each folio, ten cents.—Pittsburg Legal Journal.

* I suppose in most cases the responsible duty which is put upon the register to examine and report will take time beyond and besides the holding of the meeting.

† A paper signed by any number of persons is but one paper. This was long since decided in taxing fees of the clerk.

THE ENGLISH RAILROAD LAW.—It would seem from the following extract which we take from the London Law Times, that they have as much trouble in England with their railroad legislation as we do in this country:

The railway commissioners appear to have been actively employed of late. Three of the more important cases heard before them (in which written judgments were delivered) are Innes v. Brighton and Southwestern Railway Companies; Greenock Railway Company v. Caledonia Railway Company; Bell v. Midland Railway Company (33 L. T. Rep. N. S. 534-40). Of these, the two last are cheifly interesting to the parties concerned, and only indirectly affect the public. Mr. Innes's case, however, is one of general concern. It was a complaint by a number of inhabitants of Merton and Tooting "of an insufficient number of trains and general lack of station and other accommodation." As to the number of trains the court held that the number of ten daily each way was sufficient, but trusted that the defendants would "endeavor so to fix the Tooting trains as to make their times to and from London harmonize as closely as possible with the hours most convenient for the generality of the passengers by them." As to through booking, the court held that it was not necessary in order to establish a claim to this very "reasonable facility" that "the service should be continuous by the same train, or by a connection between trains." Lastly, with regard to station accommodation, the commissioners decided that a station without a carriage approach, and without any protection from the weather, was not a sufficient one, and the defendent's had a month's grace accorded to them for the purpose of making improvements, the court suggesting only, and not ordering, the manner in which the improvements should be made. The decision is a satisfactory one, and should be widely known, being we believe the first instance in which an application respecting passenger traffic has been fully heard, for the more early and important application of the Dover corporation was unfortunately for the public, compromised at an early stage. We observe, by the way, that a formidable point of law was raised, but not decided in Mr. Innes's case. It was urged for the defendants that as railway companies cannot be compelled to become carriers by the ordinary law (see Hare v London and Northwestern Railway Company, 2 J. & H. 1 per Wood, V. C.), so neither can they be compelled to become so under the Railway and Canal Traffic Act of 1854. It is impossible to exagerate the importance of the point, but we cannot entertain any doubt upon it. The companies are compellable by the commissions to carry, otherwise the act of 1854 is meaningless.

THE FUGITIVE SLAVE CIRCULAR.—The London Law Times says: We are glad to perceive the substituted Fugitive Slave Circular does not depart from the prominent principle of its predecessor. It was our contention, in opposition to Sir Henry James, that the comity of nations forbids the ship of war of any country from setting up within the territorial waters of another country a law of the ship's flag at variance with the law of such other country. "Within the territorial waters of a foreign state," says the circular, "you are bound by the comity of nations, while maintaining the proper exemption of your ship from local jurisdiction, not to allow her to become a shelter for those who would be chargeable with a violation of the law of the place." We maintain this view, notwithstanding the array of so-called authorities brought forward by Sir W. V. Harcourt. The consequence of the clamor against a statement of the law which was certainly a law of expediency, if not strictly recognized by professors of international jurisprudence, is that the position of the fugitive slave is made worse than it was before. Captains are directed not to receive a fugitive slave on board unless by refusing to do so his life would be placed in manifest danger. We are not surprised that the anti-slavery enthusiasts are not satisfied with these amended instructions. Their content, however, cannot be purchased by the sacrifice of legal principles and a violation of the comity of nations.

We call attention to the following opinions, reported at length in this issue:

The Right of a Testator to Make the Insolvency of a Legatee Terminate his Legacy.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States delivered by Miller, J., was to the right of a testatrix to make the insolvency of a legatee terminate all his vested right in the estate of such testatrix. The court decline to follow the English doctrine. In concluding the opinion, Miller, J., says the insolvency of the testatrix's son terminated all his legal vested right in her estate and left nothing in him which could go to his creditors or to his assignee in bankruptcy, or to his prior assignee; and that what may have come to him after his bankruptcy through the voluntary action of the trustees under the terms of the discretion reposed in them by the will, is his lawfully, and cannot now be subjected to the control of his assignee.

Policy — Vacant and Unoccupied.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of this State by Walker, J., as to the construction to be given to the words "vacant and unoccupied" in a policy of insurance.

Note—Thirty Per Cent. after Due.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of this State by Scott, C. J., holding that the provision in a note that it shall bear interest at the rate of ten per cent. per annum, with thirty per cent. per annum interest after maturity as liquidated damages for non-payment when due, is not usurious, and is to be regarded as a penalty for not paying the note at maturity; that in the absence of fraud the collection of such penalty will not be enjoined by a court of equity. This is in accordance with the former decisions of the Supreme Court of this State. It is quite common now to insert in notes a clause that they shall bear a greater rate of interest than ten per cent. after maturity.

Property Taken on Legal Process in Hands of Carrier.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of Indiana, by Downey, J., holding that a common carrier of goods is excused from liability for not carrying and delivering the goods when they were, without any act, fault or connivance on his part, seized by virtue of legal process and taken out of his possession; that a common carrier is not bound, when the goods are so taken out of his possession, to follow them up and be at the expense of asserting the claim thereto of the party to or for whom he undertook to carry them.

Proposed Reforms.—We call attention to the article of C. C. Bonney of the bar of this city, published in another column, proposing reforms in the administration of justice and a re-organization of the Supreme Court of the United States. Mr. Bonney has given this subject much thought and his suggestions are worthy of careful consideration.

BANKRUPTCY—FRAUDULENT PREFERENCE.

The English House of Lords held, in Butcher v. Stead, 33 L. T. Rep., N. S., 541, that when an insolvent debtor pays a particular creditor, with a view of giving him a preference over his other creditors, if the creditor is not aware of the debtor's insolvency, and of his intention to give him such preference, the transaction is protected by the 92d sec. of the Bankrupt act 1869, and is not void as a fraudulent preference.

PRINCIPAL AND AGENT — BROKER—CUSTOM OF MARKET.

The House of Lords, in Robinson v. Mollett, 33 L. T. Rep., N. S., 544, held that a person who employs a broker to transact business for him in a market, with the usage of which the principal is unacquainted, gives him authority to contract upon the footing of such usages, provided they are only such as relate to the mode of performing the contract, and do not change its intrinsic character.

BREACH OF WARRANTY—MEASURE OF DAMAGES.

The English Court of Common Pleas Division, in Smith v. Green, 33 L. T. Rep., N. S., 572, held, in an action for breach of warranty, the plaintiff may recover damages for any injury which is the direct and natural conseqnence of his acting on the faith of the warranty. In the case under consideration, the plaintiff, a farmer, bought a cow from the defendant, warranted free from foot and mouth disease. The cow had the disease, and communicated it to plaintiff's other cows, with which she was placed. In an action for breach of the warranty, the judge below told the jury that if defendant knew, or ought to have known, that plaintiff, in the ordinary course, would put the cow with other cows, they might give damages for the loss of the other cows; and the court, on appeal, held this to be a right direction.

Ohio Digest: Containing all Reported Ohio Cases to the year 1875. By J. Bryant Walker and Clement Bates. Vol. II. Cincinnati: Robert Clarke & Co. 1875. Sold by E. B. Myers, Law Bookseller, Chicago. Price for the two volumes, $12.00.

On page 72 of the present volume, we noticed the appearance of the first volume of the Ohio Digest. We spoke of it as being worthy of the patronage of the profession. Having, upon several occasions since, had to consult it, we are confirmed in our previous good opinion of the work. The second volume is in the same general style as the first, and completes the digest. It will save every person who has to consult the Ohio Reports much labor. We wish we had as complete a digest down to date of the Illinois Reports.

Public Land Laws, passed by Congress from March 4, 1869, to March 3, 1875, with the Important Decisions of the Secretary of the Interior, and Commissioner of the General Land Office, the Opinions of the Assistant Attorney General, and the Instructions Issued from the General Land Office to the Surveyors General and Registers and Receivers during the same period. By Henry N. Copp, General Land Office, Editor of Copp's U. S. Mining Decisions, and proprietor of Copp's Land Owner. Published by the Compiler: Washington, D C. 1875. Sold by E. B. Myers, Law Bookseller, Chicago.

Mr. Copp says the radical changes in the Laws of Congress, the decisions of the Interior Department, and the instructions of the General Land Office, during the past five years, have created an urgent demand for a reliable authority on public land law; that this work resumes the subject where it was left by previous compilations in 1870, and brings it down to April, 1875. We admire the honesty of Mr. Copp in saying that the Digest of Judicial Decisions is taken from Brightly's Digest, and is brought down to 1873. It should have been brought down to the time of going to press. To persons interested in knowing the Land Laws and the rulings of the departments construing the same, this work will be indispensable.

Governor Haines.—The question arises, is the Hon. E. M. Haines, Speaker of the House of Representatives, entitled to be addressed as governor, and has he ever been governor of the State? The 17th Section of Article V. of the Constitution provides that "in case of the death, conviction or impeachment, failure to qualify, resignation, absence from the State, or other disability of the governor, the powers, duties and emoluments of the office for the residue of the term, or until the disability shall be removed, shall devolve upon the lieutenant governor." The 19th Section of said Article provides that if the lieutenant-governor shall for any of the causes mentioned above become incapable of performing the duties of governor, "the same shall devolve upon the speaker of the house of representatives." On last week, Governor Beveridge was absent in Washington, and during that time Lieutenant-Governor Glenn, who is also president of the senate, was absent one whole day in St. Louis. They were both, therefore, for the time being, "incapable of performing the duties of governor," and in the language of the constitution "the same devolved upon the speaker of the house of representatives," who is Mr. Haines. He is not only entitled to be called governor Haines, but he has actually for one day been governor of the State. We are sorry that he did not do more to remind the people that he was once governor of the State. He might have removed the members of the board of railroad and warehouse commissioners, which act would have been applauded by more than two-thirds of the people of the State. He could have called an extra session of the General Assembly, and in the call limited their action to such subjects as he pleased. He could in a single day have removed all the officers appointed by the governor and appointed a new set. A nice question arises as to the proper construction to be given to the words "or other disability" in the clause of the Constitution, "absence from the State or other disability of the governor, etc." When Governor Beveridge and Governor Glenn are both out of the State, there is no doubt about the powers and duties of Governor Haines; but suppose both of these governors are in the State, but in such a condition as not to be able to reach the capital in time to do some official act which ought to be done, and governor Haines is there and ready to do it and perform any other official act, has he the right to do it? Would this come within the meaning of the words, "or other disability?" We are not aware of any authority upon the question, but we have no doubt circumstances might arise which would not only justify, but make it the duty of the speaker of the house to act as governor when both the governor and lieutenant-governor were in the State.

To the Editor of Chicago Legal News:

Will you please inform me whether a justice of the peace, elected in the town of Evanston, can have two offices—one in South Evanston and one in Evanston. An answer through your News will oblige "Curious."

Curious will find his question answered in the head-notes to the opinions of the Supreme Court of this State, published in this issue. A justice's office must be in a known place in the town for which he is elected. — Ed. Legal News.

The Attorney Generalship.—There are quite a number of able members of the bar who are candidates for this position. Attorney General Edsall, who has performed the duties with marked ability is a candidate for re election. Senator Eugene Canfield, who was a leading member of the last senate, is a candidate. Hon. E. Callahan, who represented the southern portion of the State in the last house of representatives with distinguished ability, is also a candidate. These gentlemen are all candidates for the nomination of the republican convention.

The Southern Law Review.—This valuable quarterly is edited by Seymour D. Thompson, of the Central Law Journal, and published by G. I. Jones & Co., of St. Louis, and is furnished to subscribers at $5.00 per annum. The contents of the January number are: I. The Early French Bar, by U. M. Rose; II. The Extra Territorial Force of Statutes, by M. A. Low; III. Notes of Current German Law, by William G. Hammond; IV. The Collateral Impeachment, by Parties and Privies, of Judgments in Personam of Sister States, by Robert O. Street; V. The Bar and the Growth of the Law, by Emory Washburn; VI. The Bench and Bar of the South and Southwest, by Henry S. Foot; VII. Damages for Injuries Resulting in Death, by G. W. Field; VIII. Liability of Railway Companies for Remote Fires, by Francis Wharton; IX. The Federal Courts, by Gustavus Schmidt; X. Book Reviews. This number of the Review commences with an excellent portrait of Judge Dillon, its first editor and present corresponding editor.

Judge Tipton is a candidate for Congress from the Bloomington district. He makes a popular circuit judge. We do not believe he will add to his reputation by going to Congress.

Marine Insurance.—We think that the majority of the Exchequer Division arrived at an erroneous conclusion in Gambles v. The Ocean Marine Insurance Company of Bombay, which we report to-day. The ship was insured from Pomaron to Newcastle-upon-Tyne, and for fifteen days after arrival. She arrived, and was damaged in port by a hurricane within the fifteen days. Here is a clear liability. She had, however, moved from one part of the port to another to take on board a cargo for a fresh voyage. This the majority of the court considered to be a deviation and variation of the risk. Reliance was placed upon Williams v. Shee (3 Camp, 469), and Hammond v. Reid (4 B. & Ald. 72), but neither of those cases really support the finding. The ship in Gamble's case was in the port contemplated by the parties. There was no deviation, nor was the risk in any way varied. The case seems rather within the principle of Raine v. Bell (9 East, 195), that if a ship be in a port for a necessary purpose (a fortiori in regular course), it is no deviation to trade, if the voyage be not delayed nor the risk varied. The appeal which is pending must be successful.—The London Law Times.

PROPOSED REFORMS IN THE ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE.

I.

DEPARTMENTS OF SUPREME COURT.

Increase the number of the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States to twelve, and divide the court into three permanent departments of four judges each.

Divide the business of the court into three permanent classes, and assign one such class to each department of the court.

Provide that each judge of the court shall be assigned to a particular department, and that he shall sit permanently therein. Provide that three judges shall constitute a quorum of each department for the transaction of business, and that the decision of a cause, by the department of the court to which it shall be assigned, shall be final and conclusive, except as below specified.

II.

HEARINGS BEFORE WHOLE COURT.

Provide that in all cases in which a dissenting opinion shall be filed, the cause shall be re-heard before the whole court.

Provide that a majority of the whole court may, at any time, order any cause to be heard or re-heard before the full bench, as the importance of the questions involved or the public welfare may seem to require.

The Supreme Courts of many of the States should be divided into similar departments.

III.

REVIEW FOR PROBABLE CAUSE AND CERTIFICATE OF POINTS IN DISPUTE.

Repeal the provisions of law which limit appeals to cases involving large amounts and provide for a review by the appellate court, in all cases in which a judge of that court shall certify that there is probable cause for such review.

Provide that the party aggrieved may require the presiding judge to certify to the appellate court the particular points of the case on which he desires to assign error, together with the decision of the court thereon; and that the cause shall be heard and determined by the appellate court, without any further or more complete transcript of the proceedings than may be reasonably necessary to a proper understanding of the questions involved.

IV.

DIRECT AND SPEEDY DECISION OF PUBLIC QUESTIONS.

Provide that the President of the United States, the Senate, the House of Representatives and the State governments respectively, may submit to the Supreme Court for decision, any question concerning the existence or the limitations of any power claimed by or against the same under the Constitution of the United States; and that such question shall thereupon be decided by the whole court, under such rules, regulations and directions for the hearing and argument thereof, as the court may prescribe.

V.

SPECIAL JUDGES TO ASSIST THE COURTS.

Provide that in all district and circuit courts, SPECIAL JUDGES from the ranks of the bar may be appointed for the trial of particular causes, as the pressure of business may from time to time require. Such judges to be selected by agreement of counsel, or by the presiding judge of the court, in case no particular objection be made by either party thereto; and to have all the powers of the presiding judge, for the trial of the causes submited to them; Provided that the presiding judge may exercise over them and their proceedings a summary jurisdiction to prevent oppression and abuse of power. The compensation of such special judges to be fixed by agreement of the parties with them; or if not so fixed, to be determined by the presiding judge of the court, in view of the nature and amount of the service involved. The public authorities to allow a reasonable per diem to apply on the compensation of such special judges, on account of the advantage to the public from the dispatch of business; and the residue of the expense to be divided between the parties as the court shall direct or the parties agree, in view of the delay and expense saved to them respectively.

VI.

PREVENTION OF LITIGATION WITHOUT PROBABLE CAUSE.

Provide that in any original case, either party, on filing a written submission to do and receive substantial justice, on equitable terms, without regard to any technical advantage, may thereupon have a summary inquiry to determine whether there be probable cause for litigating the matter according to the usual course of the court; and that if, upon such inquiry, the court shall find that there is not such probable cause, the court shall thereupon proceed to administer substantial justice between the parties, on equitable terms, by adequate orders, writs, and proceedings, from which there shall be no appeal, except upon the certificate of a judge of the appellate court that there is probable cause for a stay of such proceedings till the same can be reviewed, to obtain which certificate a reasonable time shall be allowed, as a matter of right.

VII.

QUALIFICATIONS OF JURORS.

Provide that upon all trials by jury, in civil cases, it shall be a cause of challenge, of any person called as a juror, that he does not appear to have such knowledge and experience as are reasonably required for the proper determination of the questions involved in the case.

VIII.

RELIEF FROM OPPRESSIVE ARRESTS AND SEIZURES.

Provide that in all cases for the seizure of the body or estate of any person or corporation, no process of seizure shall issue, except upon special cause, shown on oath, and the order of a judge or court therefor; and that the fact and cause of such seizure, when made, shall, at the request of the defendant, or of any person acting in his behalf, be forthwith certified to the appellate court, and that said court, or any judge thereof, may thereupon modify or discharge such seizure upon such terms, if any, as may appear to be just.

IX.

PREVENTION OF UNDUE DELAYS IN DECIDING CAUSES.

Provide that no case shall be held under advisement, or the decision thereof be delayed, for more than thirty days next after the submission thereof, in any court other than of last resort; nor more than ninety days in the court of last resort.

Provide that the unfinished business in the hands of any judge at the expiration of his term of office shall be completed by him, with the concurrence of his successor, in the same manner as though his official term had not expired.

X.

JUDICIAL CONDENSATION OF REPORTS AND REFORM OF PRACTICE.

Provide for a judicial commission to arrange in logical order, and in a condensed form, the doctrines of law contained in the reported cases, now too voluminous to be consulted with convenience and accuracy; and let the same commission reform and simplify, as far as practicable, the present forms and rules of practice. What is needed is, not the invention of a new system of pleading and practice, but simply a reform and improvement of the old system in accordance with the established and familiar rules of law.

C. C. BONNEY.

Chicago, Jany., 1876.

THE GRANGER CASES.

The Washington Republican of Wednesday, 12th inst., in speaking of the argument of the Granger cases in the Supreme Court of the United States, says:

The Supreme Court yesterday took up the Granger case, No. 552, The Chicago, Burlington and Quincy Railroad Company against the Attorney General of Iowa and others, which comes up on appeal from the Circuit Court of Iowa, and the argument is in progress, with the prospect of consuming two days in the delivery. The bill was filed to restrain the operation of the act of the State of Iowa establishing maximum rates of charges for the transportation of freight and passengers on State railroads, on the ground that it is in conflict with the provisions of the Federal Constitution, in that it impairs the contract contained in the charter of the road, under which it was established, to fix its own rates of compensation for the transportation of persons and property. It impairs not only the charter contract, but the contract between the company and its stockholders, bondholders and mortgagees; also, between the road and other roads with which it has existing contracts. It is also in conflict with the fourteenth amendment, in that it seeks to deprive the company of its property-rights without due process of law. It is in conflict with the provision of the Constitution which gives to Congress exclusive power to regulate commerce among the several States. Nor is it, in so far as it prescribes rates of compensation for the transportation of persons and property, a police regulation maintainable under the police power of the State. It also violates the constitution of Iowa, in that it is not uniform in its operation, establishing, as it does, one rate for some roads and other rates for other roads, making the burden of interference more onerous in some and more advantageous in others, and in cases where there is no natural diversity or class distinction between them. In reply to this the State contends that the act does not impair the charter contract, because by its charter there is no provision giving it the exclusive power and right to fix its rate of transportation, and where there is no such specific grant to a corporation it cannot be said that the exercise of the right to fix freight tariffs by the State in any manner affects the rights of the corporation. A statute, it is said, will not be held invalid by reason of any repugnancy to the Constitution, unless such repugnance is clear and undoubted. A conflict with some specified clause of the Constitution must be shown to exist beyond all reasonable doubt, or the law will be sustained. The burden is cast upon those who impugn its validity to show precisely where and the manner of its violation of the constitutional restriction. All legislative power is inherent in the people in their sovereign capacity. Another power has been delegated in a complete and unreserved manner to the legislature, except as restricted by the Federal Constitution.

The act complained of is legislative in its character, and within the scope of the legitimate powers of the legislature; but it is said that if the charter of the road contained a provision purporting to confer upon the company the exclusive right to establish its rates of tolls and fares such a provision would be invalid, because it is not competent for a legislature, by contract, to divest itself and future legislatures of the power to legislate for the public good. It holds its power in trust for the people, and can not divest itself of the power, but must exercise it at all times when required by the public good. In subsequently accepting from the State the land granted by the general government to aid in the construction of railroads in Iowa, the company expressly stipulated that it would at all times be subject to such regulations as the State might enact, and thereby surrendered any exclusive right it had previously possessed to fix its own fares and rates. The power to amend or repeal all laws creating corporations is given by the State constitution of 1857, and under this power it was competent for the legislature to make the law in question. The branch roads are subject to the operation of the law because they accepted the aid towards their construction under a statute expressly providing that roads accepting such aid should be subject to legislative control in regard to their charges for transportation.

The objection that the law is not uniform in its operation, it is said, is not sustained by showing that the railroads of the State are divided into classes, according to their gross earnings. As to the objection that it is a regulation of inter-State commerce, it is said that it is unnecessary to discuss the question, as the defendants disavow any attempt to apply the provisions of the act to inter-State transportation. It is, at least, in part constitutional; and that a law may stand and be in part constitutional and in part not, has been frequently held. The road is a foreign corporation, and it was therefore competent for the legislature to prescribe the terms upon which it should be permitted to transact business in Iowa.

In conclusion, it is said that the idea advanced that if this law is sustained all railroad property will become comparatively valueless, because of the insecurity of the investment, and that all efforts to raise money to construct roads will be fruitless, is shown to be a sombre flight of the imagination by the fact that one-half of the 3,500 miles of railway in Iowa have been constructed since the constitution of 1857, authorizing such legislation.

O. H. BROWNING and F. T. FRELINGHUYSEN for appellant, and M. E. CUTTS, attorney general for Iowa, for the State.

THE TESTIMONY OF EXPERTS.

The opinion of the Supreme Court of this State, delivered by Judge BREESE in the Quincy Will case, published in 8 CHICAGO LEGAL NEWS, 94, involving the question as to the weight to be given to the testimony of medical experts, has been commented on very generally by the legal press in this country, and also in England. The London Law Times, in referring to it, says:

The evidence of "experts" is apparently falling into discredit. In a case recently before Sir James Hannen, his lordship dealt severely with the evidence of experts in handwriting, which evidence the jury disregarded and found for the will. In a case recently before the Supreme Court of Illinois, Breese, J., delivering the opinion of the Court, spoke of the medical experts with undisguised contempt. He said: "These experts tell us, as do the books, there is no necessary connection of softening of the brain and apoplexy or paralysis, nor does cerebral softening usually proceed at a slow pace of years before death ensues. On a careful review of the testimony of these experts, we are unable to discover anything in the symptoms and history of the case justifying the conclusions of Dr. Bassett, that the testator was suffering from a cerebral softening. If mental imbecility did exist, it must have arisen from some other cause, and we feel confident we will be more likely to arrive at a just estimate of the mental condition and business capacity of the testator by relying on the accordant testimony of his lifelong aquaintances and neighbors with whom the testator was in frequent intercourse, rather than from the testimony of these medical gentlemen—and so would the jury. If we give heed to such testimony, and suffer it to prevail against the flood of proof in favor of the testator's competency, we should be doing great wrong, and departing from the rules we have laid down in like cases, to which we will hereafter refer. It must be apparent to every one, but few wills could stand the test of the fanciful theories of dogmatic witnesses who bring discredit on science and make the name of 'experts' a by-word and a reproach." An American contemporary, in alluding to the observations of the judge, remarks: "We concur with the judge above referred to; we would not give the testimony of these common-sense witnesses, deposing to what they know and saw almost every day for years, for that of so called experts who always have some favorite theory to support—men often as presumptous as they are ignorant of the principles of medical science."

SUPREME COURT OF INDIANA.

[From the Indianapolis Sentinel.]

CONTEMPT OF COURT—CARRYING OFF WITNESS—AFFIDAVIT PURGING OF THE CONTEMPT.

5024. Daniel Y. Haskitt v. The State of Indiana. Hamilton C. C. Reversed.

Downey, J., delivering the opinion of the court: Attachment proceedings against appellant for contempt of court. The affidavit on which the attachment was awarded shows that an indictment had been found in the court, on which the name of the daughter of appellant was indorsed as a witness, and that a summons had been issued and was in the hands of the sheriff to be served, requiring her attendance as a witness; that appellant knew these facts and carried off the witness, etc. The motion to quash the attachment was properly overruled. (36 Ind., 196; Whart. Cr. Law, Vol. 3, section 3427).

The only other question in the case is as to the sufficiency of the affidavit filed by appellant to purge him of the alleged contempt, the court below holding it insufficient.

It has been held, in several cases in this court, that if the defendant, in such a case, deny, under oath, the facts constituting the alleged contempt, he should be discharged, leaving him, if he has sworn falsely, to be prosecuted for the perjury. (47 Ind., 528, and cases cited).

The court is of opinion that the answer of appellant was sufficient to purge him of the alleged contempt.

ACTION ON A PROMISSORY NOTE—SURETYSHIP—RELEASE BY EXTENSION OF TIME.

3587. Wiley White v. Edwin G. Whitney. Jefferson C. C. Reversed.

Biddle, C. J., delivering the opinion of court: Suit on a promissory note made by John Hugh and appellant. Process was not served on Hugh, nor did he appear in the case. Wiley answered, setting up suretyship on the note, and that Hugh, the principal, had obtained, for the consideration of $1, an extension of the time, from the payee, without his knowledge or consent.

The court is of opinion that the contract for delay was good, and could have been enforced by Hugh against the appellee. (43 Ind., 393; 44 Ind., 298); and that it operated as a release of the surety. (6 Ind., 128; 26 Ind., 338; 45 Ind., 300).

SUFFICIENCY OF DESCRIPTION OF PROPERTY IN A CHATTEL MORTGAGE.

3864. Jacob Ebberle et al. v. John Mayer. Jefferson C. C. Approved.

Biddle, C. J., delivering the opinion of the court: The only question in this case is as to the sufficiency of description of the property in the chattel mortgage.

The goods were described as follows: "All the stock, tools, fixtures and materials now on hand in the shop formerly occupied by said Krober & Co., on Central avenue, in the city of Madison, Indiana, and being the same property this day sold to us by said Krober, as in the invoice to us mentioned."

In 43 Ind., 494, the following description was held sufficient: "A ten-acre field of growing wheat on the northwest quarter, etc."

The court is of opinion that the description is sufficient.

BOARD OF COUNTY COMMISSIONERS — CONTRACTS BY.

4170. Burnett and the board of commissioners of Vigo county v. Abbott. Vermillion C. C. Worden, J.

Appellee has moved to strike out the papers stated by the clerk to have been filed as a substituted complaint. The court does not allow this motion. No objection was made below, this court presumes the filing was correct.

The court is of opinion that the complaint states no facts constituting a cause of action, because the contract out of which the cause of action arose was one which the board of commissioners had no power to make.

There is no law which authorizes them to make a contract for boring wells for oil, or sinking shafts for coal. Reversed.

PRACTICE—PLEADING.

4433. Theodore Humphrey and Harris, executor, etc., v. James H. Merritt and Huldah Merritt, Switzerland C. C. Biddle, C. J.

Merritt and wife filed their complaint against Theodore Humphrey and Jacob R. Harris, executor of Cornelius Humphrey deceased, alleging that Arthur Humphrey devised certain lands to said Huldah Merritt, his daughter, for life, and in fee to her children, and died; that his will was duly probated and recorded; that afterwards Theodore Humphrey and Cornelius Humphrey wrongfully entered upon said lands, plowed and cultivated the same, etc., and committed waste, without right, etc.,; the will is made an exhibit.

Appellants claim that the case should be reversed, because the plaintiffs show in their complaint how the plaintiff, Huldah Merritt, derives title to said lands, what that title is, and that she never took or received possession of said lands devised to her by her father; and until she did manifest her intention to accept said devise, and receive said lands by taking possession, or by offering to take possession, she is not in a condition to bring this personal action against the defendants for use and occupation.

The court is of opinion that this objection is of no force as against an action of test, which is the character of plaintiff's action; nor is the case, since the distinction between the forms of actions has been abolished, at all embarrassed by any technical notions of actual possession, as was necessary in trespass.

FILING CLAIM AGAINST ESTATE OF DECEDENT —NO FORMAL COMPLAINT NECESSARY.

4118. Post, administrator of, etc., Gustavus Schuman, v. Pedrick. Marion C. C. Reversed.

Worden, J., delivering the opinion of the court: Appellee filed a claim against the estate of the deceased, which raises the question in the case.

The court is of the opinion that the allegations in the fourth paragraph of the answer, as to willingness to perform, cannot be reconciled with the allegations in the complaint, that Schuman had sold the interest to third parties. The allegations in the answer may amount to an argumentation denial of the matter alleged in the complaint; but if so, no harm was done in sustaining the demurrer to the paragraph, as the whole complaint was put in issue by the general denial.

The first paragraph of the complaint goes upon the theory that as Schuman had put it out of his power to comply with his contract by selling the interest to other parties, the plaintiff had a right to treat the contract as rescinded and recover back what he had paid upon it. Is the paragraph good? The court thinks it is, (13 Ind., 206), no formal complaint being necessary; only a succinct statement of the claim.

But the court is of the opinion that the judgment must be reversed on account of error in assessing the amount of recovery, it being too large a sum.

PERSONAL LIABILITY OF TRUSTEES OF A SCHOOL CORPORATION UPON A CONTRACT TO A TEACHER.

4411. Morrison et al. v. McFarland, Howard C. C. Reversed.

Downey, J., delivering the opinion of the court: This is an action by appellee against appellant, in which she alleges that she was employed by appellants, the trustees of the school corporation of the town of Noblesville, etc., upon a contract to teach, etc., breaches of which are alleged and damages claimed.

There are numerous errors assigned, but the court does not deem it necessary to consider them all. The main question is as to the personal liability of the trustees.

The court is of opinion that the mere violation of the contract by the trustees in their official capacity, which they had entered into for the corporation, did not render them personally and individually liable.

THE XXV. OHIO REPORTS.

We have received from ROBERT CLARKE & Co., the publishers, the fifth number of the advance sheets of the 25th Ohio, from which we take the following headnotes.

Townsend's executors v. O. Townsend et al, p. 477.

CONSTRUCTION OF WILL—EXTRINSIC EVIDENCE.

1. In the construction of a will, the sole purpose of the court should be to ascertain and carry out the intention of the testator.

2. Such intention must be ascertained from the words contained in the will.

3. The words contained in the will, if technical, must be taken in their technical sense, and if not technical, in their ordinary sense, unless it appear from the context that they were used by the testator in some secondary sense.

4. All the parts of the will must be construed together, and effect, if possible, given to every word contained in it.

5. If a dispute arises as to the identity of any person or thing named in the will, extrinsic facts may be resorted to, in so far as they can be made ancillary to the right interpretation of the testator's words, but for no other purpose.

Reasin W. Shawhan v. Peter Van Nest. p. 490.

CONTRACT—DAMAGES—INTEREST.

Where the plaintiff, in pursuance of an agreement with the defendant, furnished the materials and constructed a carriage for the defendant, in accordance with his order and directions, for which a stipulated price was to be paid, and the defendant refused to receive and pay for it when completed and tendered—Held: That in an action brought for that purpose, the plaintiff is entitled to recover the contract price and interest from the time the money should have been paid.

George W. Stines v. Miles Dorman, p. 580.

AGREEMENT ENFORCED BY INJUNCTION.

A stipulation in a deed of conveyance, whereby the grantee, in part consideration for the conveyance, agrees for himself, his heirs, and assigns that the premises conveyed shall not be used or occupied as a hotel, so long as certain other property owned by the grantor shall be used for that purpose, binds both the grantee and all claiming under him, and may, in equity, be enforced by injunction.

SPECIAL TAX—MAJORITY VOTING.

Where an act of the legislature authorized the trustees of a township to levy a special tax, with the proviso "that said trustees shall not cause said levy to be made until a majority of the electors of said township, at some regular election, shall vote in favor of said levy," it required a majority of all the votes cast at such regular election, and not simply a majority of those voting for or against the levy.

U. S. CIRCUIT COURT D. OREGON.

OPINION BY DEADY, J., DEC. 14, 1875.

In re The Oregon Bulletin Printing and Publishing Co., against which a petition in bankruptcy is filed. In Bankruptcy.

A proceeding to have a debtor adjudged a bankrupt is substantially an action at law, and terminates with the final judgment on the petition or verdict therein; and the subsequent proceedings to ascertain and distribute the estate of the bankrupt are merely consequent upon such action but no part of it.

Such an action is a case at law, and the proceedings therein cannot be reviewed in the circuit court until after final judgment therein; and if the case, by the election of the defendant, becomes triable by jury, it cannot be reviewed otherwise than upon a writ of error.

A stay of proceedings in bankruptcy in the district court is in the discretion of the circuit court, and ought not to be granted where it does not appear that the rights of the defendant will be prejudiced or seriously endangered, if the plaintiff is allowed to proceed to final judgment in the court below.

Semble, that all the appellate jurisdiction of the circuit courts in bankruptcy is conferred upon them by § 4,986 of the R. S., and that § 4,980 of said R. S. to § 4,984, inclusive, do not confer any such power, but only regulate its exercise; that the terms cases and questions are used in said § 4,986 in contradistinction to one another; that a case in bankruptcy, whether at law or equity, is only reviewable in the circuit court according to the mode prescribed in ordinary actions at law or suits in equity; and that the appellate jurisdiction, which the circuit courts may exercise upon bill or petition, is confined to the review of the action of the district courts upon isolated questions arising in the proceedings subsequent to an adjudication in bankruptcy.

Rule to show cause why the proceedings in the district court should not be stayed pending a petition for review in the circuit court.

UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT.

PROCEEDINGS OF.

Thursday, Jan. 13, 1876.

On motion of F. Kernan, Nelson Smith and William Allen Jenner, of New York city, were admitted.

On motion of E. W. Munford, Casey Young, of Memphis, Tenn., was admitted.

No. 693. Daniel Hand v. Thomas C. Dunn, comptroller general of South Carolina. The motion to dismiss this cause was re submitted by T. J. D. Fuller and D. T. Corbin in support of the same, and by P. Phillips in opposition.

No. 892. Williams v. United States.—Appeal from the District Court of California.—This was a claim for a place called "Arroyo de la Laguna," in California, which was successful in the District Court. Subsequently petition was filed asking that a mistake in the decree, occasioned by translating the word "sitio," league, instead of "place," might be corrected so as to give the petitioner whatever land—even if more than a square league in quantity — might be found within the boundaries of the place. The petition was denied, and the question here is whether the mistake can be corrected in the way asked. The government submits that in effect it is asking for a rehearing. The complainant avers that it is simply a petition to be heard correctly. E. S. Gould for claimants; Solicitor General Phillips for government.

No. 552. The Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad Company v. M. E. Cutts attorney general, et al. The argument of this cause was concluded by O. H. Browning for appellants.

No. 478. Chy Lung v. J. H. Freeman et al.

No. 880. John and Thomas Henderson v. William H. Wickham, mayor, etc., of New York et al. The argument of this cause was commenced by Edwards Pierrepont for the plaintiff in No 478, and continued by James Emott for plaintiff in No. 880.

Adjourned until Friday at 12 o'clock.

Friday, Jan. 14.

No. 126. Forsyth v. Kimball.—Appeal from the Circuit Court for the Northern District of Illinois.—This was a bill asking that an amount due to the Mutual Insurance Company of Chicago by the appellant might be set off by an indebtedness by the company to him, on which the assignee of the bankrupt corporation was about to sue. The decision was against the complainant, on the ground that the indebtedness to the company was not wholly his, but, in fact, fell upon three of his brothers, who were mutually bound with him to pay, and that it could not, therefore, be made avoidable by way of set-off; and it is here contended that the court erred in its findings and conclusions. Submitted on printed briefs. W. C. Goudy for appellant; J. L. Thompson for appellee.

No. 478. (Assigned.) Chy Lung v. J. H. Freeman et al.

No. 880. (Assigned.) John and Thomas Henderson v. William H. Wickham, mayor, etc., of New York, et al. The argument of these causes was continued by James Emott for appellant, by John E. Develin and F. Kernan for appellees, and concluded by James Emott for appellants in No. 880.

No. 296. (Assigned.) Ira Munn and George L. Scott v. The People of the State of Illinois. The argument of this cause was commenced by W. C. Goudy, of Chicago, for plaintiffs in error.

Adjourned until Monday at 12 o'clock.

Monday, Jan. 17.

On motion of W. H. Smith, H. H. Greer, of Mt. Vernon, Ohio, was admitted.

No. 81. Joseph Moore v. The United States. Appealed from the Court of Claims. Bradley, J., delivered the opinion, affirming the judgment of the Court of Claims. Davis, J., did not sit during the argument and took no part in this decision.

No. 100. T. J. Haines et al., trustees, etc. v. Charles Carpenter, executor, etc. Appealed from the Circuit Court of the United States for the district of Louisiana. Bradley, J., delivered the opinion, affirming the decree of the Circuit Court with costs.

No. 91. The Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada v. R. M. Richardson et al. In error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the district. Strong, J., delivered the opinion, affirming the judgment of the Circuit Court with costs and interest.

No. 180. M. N. Welton v. The State of Missouri. In error to the Supreme Court of the State of Missouri. Field, J., delivered the opinion, reversing the judgment of the Supreme Court with costs, and remanding the cause, with directions to enter a judgment reversing the judgment of the Circuit Court for Henry county, and directing that court to discharge the defendant from imprisonment and suffer him to depart, without day.

No. 110. Rufus Baker and Isaac F. Graham, assignees, etc. v. Henry S. White. In error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the district of Connecticut. Miller, J., delivered the opinion, dismissing the writ of error for want of jurisdiction.

No. 108 Sarah E. and Minerva E. Loyd v. M. C. Fulton, trustee, etc. Appeal from the Circuit Court of the United States for the northern district of Georgia. Swayne, J., delivered the opinion, affirming the decree of the Circuit Court with costs.

No. 114. Thos. Slater Smith et al. v. Wm. Vodges, assignee, etc. Appeal from the Circuit Court of the United States for the eastern district of Pennsylvania. Swayne, J., delivered the opinion, reversing the decree of the Circuit Court with costs, and remanding the cause with directions to dismiss the bill.

No. 113. J. Young Scammon v. Mark Kimball, assignee, etc. Appeal from the Circuit Court of the United States for the northern district of Illinois. Clifford, J., delivered the opinion, reversing the decree of the Circuit Court, and remanding the cause for further proceedings and decree in conformity with the opinion of this court. Strong, J., did not sit during the argument, and took no part in this decision.

No. 119. Asa Hodges v. Mary A. Speake, administratrix, etc. In error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the eastern district of Arkansas. Waite, C. J., announced the decision, affirming the judgment of said Circuit Court with costs and interest.

No. 116. Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad Company v. Joseph Warren, assignee, etc. Appeal from the Circuit Court of the United States for the northern district of New York. Waite, C. J., announced the decision, reversing the decree of the Circuit Court with costs, and remanding the cause with instructions to reverse the decree of the District Court, and to direct that court to dismiss the bill. On authority of Wilson v. City Bank, 17 Wall., 473.

No. 115. The Delaware, Lackawanna & Western

Railroad Company v. Joseph Warren, assignee. No. 117. The National City Bank of New York v. Joseph Warren, assignee. In error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the northern district of New York. Waite, C. J., announced the decision, reversing the judgment of the Circuit Court with costs, and remanding the causes, with directions to reverse the judgments of the District Court, and to direct that court to enter judgment in favor of the defendants there, on authority of Wilson v. City Bank. 17 Wall., 473.

No. 856. John and J. K. Warren v. Sheridan Shook, late collector. Waite, C. J., announced the decision, granting the motion to advance this cause, and assigning it for argument on the 8th of February next.

No. 709. James L. Huse v. James S. McMillin et al., executors, etc. On motion of W. Bakewell, dismissed with costs per stipulation.

No. 163. James Barclay et al. v. John S. McMillin et al. On motion of W. Bakewell and consent of Harry Cox for plaintiffs, dismissed with costs.

No. 862. The American Emigrant Company v. The County of Adams. The motion to reinstate this cause was submitted by R. P. Lowe in support of the same, and by R. L. B. Clarke in opposition thereto.

No. 211. Frederick Robert et al. v. The Propeller "Galatea," etc. The motion for a commission to take further testimony in this cause was argued by R. D. Benedict in support of the same, and by J. H. Ashton in opposition thereto.

No. 664. Townsend v. Todd et al.—Appeal from the Circuit Court for the District of Connecticut.—This was a proceeding by the appellants, as assignees in bankruptcy of one Newhall, to have set aside a certain deed made to the appellant. The court below declared the deed to be void, because in violation of the spirit and policy of the laws of Connecticut, and because it was a constructive fraud upon creditors; and, the instrument being void as against creditors at the time of filing the bill in bankruptcy, it is void as against the assignee. This ruling is assigned as error here, where the cause is submitted on printed points. John S. Beach for appellant; S. E. Baldwin for appellee.

Adjourned until Tuesday at 12 o'clock.

Tuesday, Jan. 18.

On motion of J. W. Denver, R. McBratney, of Junction City, Kansas, was admitted.

No. 3. (Original.) The State of Florida v. E. C. Anderson, Jr., et al. THE SUPREME COURT-ROOM AT SPRINGFIELD.—When a new county court-house is to be occupied, the clerks and other inferior officers generally succeed in having their offices finished before the court-rooms, and as a consequence are comfortably located in the new court-house long before the judges. The same is also generally true in regard to a new State-house. The executive and legislative officers, having political power, generally manage to occupy the elegant new State-house long before the courts. The Supreme Court of this State, which commenced its term during this month, is still in its old quarters, although they are too small to properly accommodate the court and its officers. The other officers of state have for some time been occupying the new State-house. The Springfield Journal, in describing the Supreme Court-room in the new State-house, says:

The Supreme Court-room, in the southwest wing, however, is the principal point of attraction to visitors, and occasions mixed sentiments of surprise and astonishment. This room is more largely elaborated than is the Governor's parlor, and on it Moretti, the artist, has excelled himself. It is in the style of the Venetian Doge's palace, modified by French taste. On entering the chamber from the rotunda one sees apparently nothing but a profusion of sandy colors and a medley of fresco designs. Once inside, however, and the eye catches something emblematic, and other mysterious and emblematic results of the artist's genius have to be passed upon. The design of the architect in paneling the room serves to enlarge it almost a third, which Mr. Moretti has taken advantage of, and hence nearly all of his creations are in the heroic style. In the center of the room, overhead, is a design which at once strikes the beholder with admiration. It is that of the goddess of justice, heroic size, seated on a forum, a table of the law on the left hand, sword in the right, the forefoot protuding from drapery, is bare, and trampling upon gold pieces spilled from a cornucopia indicates that justice is not bought; a quiver of arrows at her feet. Two little cherubs—one holding a book of the law, the other the national flag—balance the representation of the goddess, and are not the least of the charms of design. In the dim perspective is a reproduction of the new capitol building. Turn which way you will, this glorious vision beams down upon you, and when the chamber is properly curtained and the soft, mellow western light steals in, it will be one of the richest treats to a lover of art that the State of Illinois affords. Around the picture are four motives in bronze and gold, representing the tables of the law, a globe representing the world, a lily representing purity, with festoons and sprays of laurel and oak.

The walls are in imitation of leather, with the word "Justice," in old-fashioned text, on every square foot. The architrave support to the panel sections forming the ceiling is imitation bronze, and on every panel are bronze emblems on an imitation marble background. Above the door entering into the Supreme Court Clerk's room is the National coat-of-arms, surmounted by an eagle. On a background of gold, flags are made to envelope tables of the law, the emblematic sword, etc. On each side of this design are panels frescoed in imitation of marble supported by massive columns, also imitation marble. The wainscoating of the chamber is in black walnut, and the doors and windows are in the same elegant finish. The greatest difficulty in frescoing is to preserve the harmonies of light and shade and the law of perspective. These difficulties have been handsomely surmounted by Miragoli & Moretti, and will speak their fame in eloquent silence for years to come.

Across the corridor is the Department of Public Instruction. These rooms—two in number—like the State Department, are in pure fresco and native woods, elaborately designed and carved, and presenting a pleasing contrast to the rich and gorgeous ornamentation of the Supreme Court Chamber. Both rooms have a southern exposure, and will always remain the most comfortable rooms in the new building.

THE BANKRUPT LAW.—The American Law Record says:

At a meeting of the Board of Trade directors in this city, Mr. Simpkinson took the floor and advocated the immediate repeal of the bankrupt law by Congress, at the same time presenting a form of a petition to be circulated for signatures, urging such a course. Mr. Dickinson, however, opposed the measure. He acknowledged that the law was in many respects faulty. Still he thought that some law of the general government on the subject was absolutely necessary, and he did not believe either in the policy or possibility of securing an unconditional repeal of the law. He therefore moved that a committee of three be appointed to take into consideration the preparation of such amendments to the bankrupt law as may be best adopted to secure its just and equitable operation, and report at some future meeting of the Board. The motion was carried, and Messrs. W. S. Dickinson, Judge Stanley Matthews and R. Dymond were appointed as said committee.

CHICAGO LEGAL NEWS

SATURDAY, JANUARY 29, 1876.

The Courts.

We are under obligation to our old friend, S. W. PACKARD, of the Yankton, Dakota bar, formerly of the law firm of COOPER, GARNETT & PACKARD of this city, for the following opinion:

UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT.

No. 42.—OCTOBER TERM, 1875.

J. SHERMAN HALL et al. v. RALPH A. LANNING et al.

In error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Illinois.

PARTNERSHIP—POWER OF ONE PARTNER TO ENTER APPEARANCE OF OTHERS AFTER DISSOLUTION—EFFECT OF JUDGMENT ON SUCH APPEARANCE—SUIT ON SUCH JUDGMENT IN FOREIGN STATE — JURISDICTION.

1. APPEARANCE AFTER DISSOLUTION.—That after the dissolution of a partnership, one of the partners, in a suit brought against the firm, has no authority to enter the appearance for the other partners who do not reside in the State where the suit is brought and have not been served with process.

2. JUDGMENT ON SUCH APPEARANCE.—That a udgment against all the partners, founded on such an appearance, can be questioned by those not served with process in a suit brought thereon in another State.

3. JURISDICTION.—That the jurisdiction of a foreign court over the person or the subject-matter embraced in the judgment or decree of such court is always open to inquiry, and in this respect the court of another State is to be regarded as a foreign court; that the record of such a judgment does not estop the parties from demanding such an inquiry.

4. FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC JUDGMENTS.—That the authorities refer only to appearances entered whilst the partnership was subsisting, and to the validity and effect of judgments in the State or country in which they were rendered. Domestic judgments stand in this respect on a different footing from foreign judgments. If regular on their face, and if appearance has been duly entered for the defendant by a responsible attorney, then they will not necessarily be set aside, but the defendant will be sometimes left to his remedy against the attorney for damages.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

Mr. Justice BRADLEY delivered the opinion of the Court.

This was an action of debt brought on a judgment rendered in New York against the plaintiffs in error. One of them, Lybrand, pleaded separately nul tiel record, and several special pleas questioning the validity of the judgment as against him for want of jurisdiction over his person. On the trial the plaintiff simply gave in evidence the record of the judgment recovered in New York, which showed that an attorney had appeared and put in an answer for both defendants, who were sued as partners. The answer admitted the partnership, but set up various matters of defense. The cause was referred and judgment given for the plaintiffs. This was the substance of the New York record. The plaintiffs gave no further evidence.

Lybrand then offered to prove that he, Lybrand, never was a resident or citizen of the State of New York; and that he had not been within said State of New York at any time since, nor for a long time before the commencement of the suit in which the judgment was rendered upon which the plaintiff in this case brought suit; and that he never had any summons, process, notice, citation, or notice of any kind, either actual or constructive, ever given or served upon him; and that he never authorized any attorney or any other person to appear for him; and that no one ever had any authority to appear for him in said suit in the State of New York, or to enter his appearance therein, nor did he ever authorize any one to employ an attorney to appear for him in the action in which said judgment was entered; and that he never entered his appearance therein in person; and that he knew nothing of the pendency of said suit in the said State of New York until the commencement of the present suit in this court; that said Lybrand was a partner in business with said J. Sherman Hall at the time the transaction occurred upon which the plaintiffs brought suit in New York, though said partnership had been dissolved and due notice thereof published some six months prior to the commencement of said suit in New York.

This evidence being objected to, was overruled by the court, which instructed the jury as follows: "That the record introduced in evidence by the plaintiffs was conclusive evidence for the plaintiffs to maintain the issues submitted to the jury by the pleadings, and that they should return a verdict for the plaintiffs and against both defendants."

A bill of exceptions being taken to this ruling, the matter is brought here on writ of error.

The question to be decided, therefore, is, whether, after the dissolution of a co-partnership, one of the partners in a suit brought against the firm has authority to enter an appearance for the other partners who do not reside in the state where the suit is brought and have not been served with process; and if not, whether a judgment against all the partners, founded on such an appearance, can be questioned by those not served with process in a suit brought thereon in another state. We recently had occasion, in the case of Thompson v. Whitman, 18 Wall., 457, to restate the rule that the jurisdiction of a foreign court over the person or the subject-matter embraced in the judgment or decree of such court is always open to inquiry, and that in this respect the court of another state is to be regarded as a foreign court. We further held in that case that the record of such a judgment does not estop the parties from demanding such an inquiry. The cases bearing upon the subject having been examined and distinguished on that occasion, it is not necessary to examine them again, except as they may throw light on the special question involved in this cause. In the subsequent case of Knowles v. The Gas-Light Company, 19 Wallace, 58, we further held, in direct line with the decision in Thompson v. Whitman, that the record of a judgment showing service of process on the defendant could be contradicted and disproved.

It is sought to distinguish the present case from those referred to, on the ground that the relation of partnership confers upon each partner authority, even after dissolution, to appear for his co-partners in a suit brought against the firm, though they are not served with process and have no notice of the suit. In support of this proposition, so far as relates to any such authority after dissolution of the partnership, we are not referred to any authority directly in point, but reliance is placed on the powers of partners in general, and on that class of cases which affirm the right of each partner after a dissolution of the firm to settle up its business. But, in our view, appearance to a suit is a very different thing from those ordinary acts which appertain to a general settlement of business, such as receipt and payment of money, giving acquittances, and the like. If a suit be brought against all the partners, and only one of them be served with process, he may, undoubtedly, in his own defense, show, if he can, that the firm is not liable, and to this end defend the suit. But to hold that the other partners, or persons charged as such, who have not been served with process, will be bound by the judgment in such a case, which shall conclude them as well on the question whether they were partners or not when the debt was incurred, as on that of the validity of the debt, would, as it seems to us, be carrying the power of a partner after a dissolution of the partnership to an unnecessary and unreasonable extent.

The law, indeed, does not seem entirely clear that a partner may enter an appearance for his co-partners without special authority even during the continuance of the firm. It is well known that by the English practice, in an action on any joint contract, whether entered into by partners or others, if any defendant cannot be found, the plaintiff must proceed to outlawry against him before he can prosecute the action, and then he declares separately against those served with process, and obtains a separate judgment against them, but no judgment except that of outlawry against the defendant not found. (1 Chitty's Plead., 42; Tidd's Pract., chap. 7, p. 423, 9th ed.) A shorter method by distringas in place of outlawry has been provided by some modern statutes, but founded on the same principle. Now, it seems strange that this cumbrous and dilatory proceeding should be necessary in the case of partners if one partner has a general authority to appear in court for his co-partners. On the basis of such an authority, had it existed, the courts, in the long lapse of time, ought to have found some means of making service on one answer for service on all. But this was never done. In this country, it is true, as will presently be shown, legislation to this end (applicable, however, to all joint debtors) has been adopted, but it is generally conceded that a judgment based on such service has full and complete effect only as against those who are actually served. Further reference to this subject will be made hereafter.

It must be conceded, however, that the general authority of one partner to appear to an action on behalf of his co-partners, during the continuance of the firm, has been asserted by several text writers. (Gow on Partnership, 163; Collyer on Partn., § 441; Parsons on Part., 174, note.) But the assertion is based on somewhat slender authority. We find it first laid down in Gow, who refers to a dictum of Sergeant Dampier, made in the course of argument, (7 T. R., 207,) and to the case of Morley v. Strombong, 3 Bosanquet & Puller, 254, where the court refused to discharge partnership goods taken on a distringas to compel the appearance of an absent partner, unless the partner who was served, would enter an appearance for him. As to this case, it may be said that it is not improbable that the home partner had express authority to appear in suits for his co-partner; for in a subsequent case, (Goldsmith v. Levy, 4 Taunt., 299,) a distringas, issued under the same circumstances, was discharged where the home partner made affidavit that the goods were his own, and that he had no authority to appear for his co-partner. These seem to be the only authorities relied on.

But, as said before, these authorities, and one or two American cases which follow them, refer only to appearances entered whilst the partnership was subsisting; and, it is pertinent also to add that they only refer to the validity and effect of judgments in the state or country in which they are rendered.

Domestic judgments, undoubtedly (as was shown in Thompson v. Whitman), stand, in this respect, on a different footing from foreign judgments. If regular on their face, and if appearance has been duly entered for the defendant by a responsible attorney, though no process has been served and no appearance authorized, they will not necessarily be set aside, but the defendant will, sometimes, be left to his remedy against the attorney in an action for damages; otherwise, as has been argued, the plaintiff might lose his security by the act of an officer of the court. (Denton v. Noyes, 6 Johns., 296; Grazebrook v. McCreedie, 9 Wend., 437). But even in this case, it is the more usual course to suspend proceedings on the judgment and allow the defendants to plead to the merits and prove any just defense to the action. In any other state, however, except that in which the judgment was rendered (as decided by us in the cases before referred to), the facts could be shown, notwithstanding the recitals of the record, and the judgment would be regarded as null and void for want of jurisdiction of the person.

So, it may well be, that where appearance has been entered by authority of one of several co-partners on behalf of all, that the courts of the same jurisdiction will be slow to set aside the judgment unless it clearly appears that injustice has been done; and will rather leave the party who has been injured by an unauthorized appearance to his action for damages.

There are many other cases in which a judgment may be good within the jurisdiction in which it was rendered so far as to bind the debtor's property there found, without personal service of process or appearance of the defendant; as, in foreign attachments, process of outlawry and proceedings in rem.

Another class of cases is that of joint debtors, before alluded to. In most of the States legislative acts have been passed, called joint-debtor acts, which, as a substitute for outlawry, provide that if process be issued against several joint debtors, or partners, and served on one or more of them, and the others cannot be found, the plaintiff may proceed against those served, and, if successful, have judgment against all. Various effects and consequences are attributed to such judgments in the States in which they are rendered. They are generally held to bind the common property of the joint debtors, as well as the separate property of those served with process, when such property is situated in the State, but not the separate property of those not served; and whilst they are binding personally on the former, they are regarded as either not personally binding at all, or only prima facie binding, on the latter. Under the joint-debtor act of New York, it was formerly held by the courts of that State that such a judgment is valid and binding on an absent defendant as prima facie evidence of a debt, reserving to him the right to enter into the merits and show that he ought not to have been charged.

The validity of a judgment rendered under this New York law, when prosecuted in another State, against one of the defendants who resided in the latter State, and was not served with process, though charged as a co-partner of a defendant residing in New York, who was served, was brought in question in this court in December term, 1850, in the case of D'Arcy v. Ketchum, 11 Howard, 165. It was there contended that by the Constitution of the United States, and the act of Congress passed May 26, 1790, in relation to the proof and effect of judgments in other States, the judgment in question ought to have the same force and effect in every other State which it had in New York. But this court decided that the act of Congress was intended to prescribe only the effect of judgments where the court by which they were rendered had jurisdiction; and that, by international law, a judgment rendered in one State, assuming to bind the person of a citizen of another, was void within the foreign State, where the defendant had not been served with process or voluntarily made defense, because neither the legislative jurisdiction nor that of the courts of justice had binding force.

This decision is an authority which we recognized in Thompson v. Whitman, and in Knowles v. Gas-Light Company, before cited, and which we adhere to as founded on the soundest principles of law. And in view of this decision it is manifest that many of the authorities which declare the effect of a domestic judgment, in cases where process has not been served on one or all of the defendants, and where those not served have not authorized any appearance, and do not reside in the State, can have little influence as to the effect to be given to such a judgment in another State.

It appearing to be settled law, therefore, that a member of a partnership firm, residing in one State, cannot be rendered personably liable in a suit brought in another State, against him and his co-partners, although the latter be duly served with process, and although the law of the State where the suit is brought authorizes judgment to be rendered against him, the case stands on the simple and naked question whether his co-partners after a dissolution of the partnership, can without his consent and authority implicate him in suits brought against the firm by voluntarily entering an appearance for him.

We are of opinion that no authority can be found to maintain the affirmative of this question.

In the case of Bell v. Morrison (1 Peters, 351), this court decided, upon elaborate examination, that after a dissolution of the partnership, one partner can not by his admissions, or promises, bind his former co-partners. Appearance to a suit is certainly quite as grave an act as the acknowledgement of a debt.

It is well settled by numberless cases, that, even before dissolution, one partner cannot confess judgment, or submit to arbitration so as to bind his co-partners. (Stead v. Salt, 3 Bing., 101; Adams v. Bankart, 1 Cromp. Mee. & R., 681; Karthaus v. Ferrer, 1 Peters, 222; and cases referred to in Story on Partn., § 114; 1 Amer. Lead. Cas., 5th ed., 556; Freeman on Judgments, sect. 232; Collyer on Part., sect. 469, 470 and notes; Parsons on Partn., 179, note.)

It is equally well settled that, after dissolution one partner cannot bind his co-partners by new contracts or securities, or impose upon them a fresh liability. (Story on Partn., § 322; Adams v. Bankart, qua supra)

Appearance to a suit does impose a fresh liability. If there is no doubt of the validity of the demand, it places that demand in a position to be made a debt of record. If there is doubt of it, it renders the defendant liable to have it adjudicated against him, when, perhaps, he has a good defense to it.

On principle, therefore, it is difficult to see how, after a dissolution, one partner can claim implied authority to appear for his co-partners in a suit brought against the firm. It may, in some instances, be convenient that one partner should have such authority; and when such authority is desirable it can easily be conferred either in the articles of partnership or in the terms of dissolution. But, as a general thing, one can hardly conceive of a more dangerous power to be left in the hands of the several partners after the partnership connection between them is terminated, or one more calculated to inspire a constant dread of impending evil, than that of accepting service of process for their former associates, and of rendering them liable, without their knowledge to the chances of litigation which they have no power of defending.

Few cases can be found in which the precise question has been raised. The attempt to exercise such a power does not appear to have been often made. Had it been, the question would certainly have found its way in the reports; for a number of cases have come up in which the power of a partner to appear for his co partners during the continuance of the partnership had been discussed. The point was raised in Phelps v. Brewer (9 Cushing, 390), but the court being of opinion that the power does not exist even pending the partnership, did not find it necessary to consider the effect of a dissolution upon it.

In Alabama, where a law was passed making service of process on one partner binding upon all, it was expressly decided, after quite an elaborate argument, that such service was not sufficient after a dissolution of the partnership, and that acknowledgment of service by one partner on behalf of all was also inoperative as against the other partners. (Duncan v. Tombeckbee Bank, 4 Porter, 184; Demott v Swaim's Adm., 5 Stewart & Porter, 293.)

In the case of Loomis & Co. v. Pearson & McMichael (Harper's South Carolina Reports, 470), it was decided that after a dissolution of partnership, one partner cannot appear for the other; although it is true, that it had been previously decided by the same court in Haslet v Street et al. (2 McCord, 311), that no such authority exists even during the continuance of the partnership.

But the absence of authorities, as before remarked, is strong evidence that no such power exists.

In our judgment, the defendant Lybrand had a right, for the purpose of invalidating the judgment as to him, to prove the matter set up by him in his offer at the trial. And for the refusal of the court to admit the evidence, the judgment should be reversed with directions to award a venire de novo.

UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT.

OCTOBER TERM, 1875.

J. YOUNG SCAMMON v. MARK KIMBALL, assignee of THE MUTUAL SECURITY INS. CO.

Appeal from the Circuit Court for the Northern District of Illinois.

BANKRUPT INSURANCE COMPANY—RIGHT OF STOCKHOLDER TO SET-OFF—BANKER—TREASURER—HOW THE FUNDS WERE HELD.

1. Complainant was a private banker; he had been elected treasurer of the Insurance company, which was made bankrupt by the great fire of 1871. He owned a large amount of stock in the company. It was owing him on policies for losses to a great amount. The company placed its money in the bank of the complainant under an agreement to receive interest on the same. The company held the notes of the complainant given to secure unpaid portions of his subscriptions to its stock. The bill prays that the company shall be decreed to deliver his notes, and he be allowed to prove the balance of his claim against the bankrupt Ins. Co.

2. SET OFF.—Since this bill was filed this court has decided that the debt due to a stockholder in such a case for losses sustained by the stockholder, of properties insured by the company, cannot be set-off against his indebtedness to the company for unpaid shares in the capital stock of the company.

3. SET-OFF IN LAW AND EQUITY.—The court states how a set-off must be understood, whether the suit be at law or in equity.

4. NOTES GIVEN FOR CAPITAL STOCK—CLAIM FOR LOSSES ON POLICIES—MONEY DEPOSITED.—That the claim for losses due from the company can not be set-off against the notes given for capital stock, but that the amount deposited by the company with the complainant, and which he still owes to the company, or to the respondent as assignee, was and is held by him as a private banker and not as treasurer of the company, and that any losses sustained by the complainant at the time and in the manner alleged, for which the bankrupt corporation were and are liable, may be set off against that claim of the bankrupt corporation as described in the pleadings.

5. DEPOSITS.—The law as to when a deposit becomes a part of the banker's general assets and he merely a debtor for the amount, is fully discussed. —[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

Mr. Justice CLIFFORD delivered the opinion of the Court.

Jurisdiction is vested in the circuit courts under the bankrupt act, concurrent with the district court for the same district, of all suits at law or in equity which may or shall be brought by any person against the assignee of the bankrupt's estate, touching any property or rights of property of the bankrupt transferable to, or vested in, such assignee.

Pursuant to that authority the appellant on the 3d of May, 1872, filed the present bill of complaint in the circuit court against the appellee as assignee of the bankrupt company, described in the title of the case. Prior to that, to wit, on the 27th of January, in the same year, the insurance company was duly adjudged bankrupt, and the record shows that the present appellee was appointed the assignee of the estate of the bankrupt company.

Satisfactory evidence is exhibited in the record to show that the company was duly organized with a nominal capital of $300,000, of which 10 per cent. had been paid, and that the residue was secured by the notes of the subscribers. Provision is made by the charter that the stock and affairs of the corporation shall be managed and conducted by any number of directors, not more than twenty-five nor less than nine, to be chosen by ballot from among, and by, the stockholders. Directors, it is also provided, shall choose out of their number a president, vice president, and the directors have the power to appoint, for the time being "such officers, secretaries, agents, and servants as they shall judge necessary."

Shares in the stock of the company, to a large amount, were owned by the complainant, and he admits that the company held notes against him to the amount of $10,147.50, given to secure unpaid balances of subscriptions, for which he was liable either as principal guarantor or surety. Throughout the lifetime of the company the complainant insured many and valuable properties in the company and paid to the proper officers of the same large sums of money as premiums for such policies of insurance. Antecedent to the event which caused the failure of the company the proper officers of the same transacted a large, and, for the greater portion of the time, a prosperous insurance business.

Much reference to those details will not be made, as they are no longer material in this investigation. Suffice to say, in that connection, that the complainant was, as he alleges, during the whole of that period, a large owner of real and other property and was possessed of sufficient means to render secure any moneyed obligation into which he might enter, and to enable him to perform any promise or contract for the payment of money he might make; and he also alleges that it was necessary that the means of the company should be kept where the same could be promptly commanded, if required to pay losses, and, in order that the company might accomplish that object and still realize interest on the same, he came to an agreement with the proper authorities of the company that the funds thereof, or such portion of the same as they might choose, should thereafter, from time to time, be deposited with him, he being then a private banker, and that the moneys so deposited should be paid out or drawn at the pleasure of the company, without notice or limitation; and he avers that he agreed with the company to account with the proper officers for such moneys when and as often as thereto required, and to pay to the company interest thereon, at the rate of ten per centum annually during the continuance of such deposit, until a further or other agreement should be made.

Funds of the kind contemplated were, in accordance with the agreement, deposited with the complainant at the pleasure of the company, and the complainant avers that he paid interest on the average amount of the same at the agreed rate, for the period and to the amount specified in the exhibit annexed to the bill of complaint.

Ten per centum per annum was paid during the period specified in the annexed exhibit, but it appears that the rate at the close of that period was reduced to 8 per cent. per annum, and the complainant admits that no part of the interest since the rate was reduced has been paid.

Both parties, it seems, were solvent until the 9th of October, 1871, when a large part of the property of the complainant and others, which was insured by the company, was destroyed by fire, the immediate effect of which was to cause the failure of the insurance company. Losses of the complainant by the fire, for which the company is responsible, as claimed by the complainant, amount to the sum of $55,800, as appears by the second exhibit annexed to the bill of complaint, and he admits that he held on deposit at the time the company failed the sum of $39,188.03, received under the agreement already fully described, which is due to the company with 8 per cent. interest from July 1, 1871, to the 18th of December in the same year.

Process was accordingly issued, and the complainant prays that the respondent may be decreed to deliver to him the notes referred to, and that he, the respondent, shall acquit and discharge the complainant from the admitted indebtedness to the company, and that he, the complainant, be allowed to prove the balance of his demand against the estate of the bankrupt company, and that the respondent be enjoined and restrained from selling or assigning the said notes, and from instituting any suit against the complainant to recover the notes or his indebtedness to the company.

Service was made and the respondent appeared and filed an answer. He admits that the complainant was one of the original corporators and subscribers to the capital stock of the company; that only 10 per cent. of the subscriptions for the capital stock was paid in cash, and that 90 per cent. of the same was secured in the promissory notes of the subscribers; that the company at the time of the great fire became insolvent, and that the company on the day named in the bill was adjudged bankrupt; that the company, as alleged, issued several policies of insurance to the complainant, and that he sustained large losses by the great fire; that he is indebted to the company as set forth in the third schedule exhibited in the record, and that he was and is the holder of the funds of the company to the amount specified in the bill of complaint; but the respondent avers that the company never came to any such agreement, in respect to such funds, as that alleged, and that the complainant held the same solely in his official character as treasurer of the company.

Most of the allegations of the answer were also embodied in a cross-bill filed by the respondent at the same time, in which he denied all the equity of the original bill, and prayed for a decree in his own favor, and that the complainant in the original bill be decreed to pay over to him as assignee the whole amount he owed to the company, including the notes given for subscriptions for stock and the amount he held on deposit.

Proofs were taken, and the parties having been fully heard the court dismissed the original bill of complaint and entered a decree for the respondent in the sum of $9,532, being the amount of the promissory notes given for capital stock, and $39,108.03, being the amount of the funds of the company held by the respondent in the cross bill, with 10 per cent. interest on both amounts. Immediate appeal was taken by the complainant in the original bill and respondent in the cross-bill, and he now seeks to reverse that decree.

Complainant's losses by the great fire, it is admitted, amount to $45,015.33, and that the company is liable to him in that amount for such losses under the policies of insurance issued to the complainant prior to the fire.

Since the bill of complaint was filed in this case this court has decided that the debt due to a stockholder in such a case, for losses sustained by the stockholder, of properties insured by the company, cannot be set off against his indebtedness to the company for unpaid shares in the capital stock of the company, for the reason that moneys arising from that source constitute a trust fund for the payment of the debts of the company, which, in the due administration of the bankrupt law, must be equally divided among all the creditors of the bankrupt. (Sawyer v. Hoag, 17 Wall., 610.)

Such an indebtedness constitutes an exception to the rule that where there are mutual debts, "one debt may be set against the other," as originally provided by act of Parliament: or, perhaps, it would be more accurate to say that the rule does not apply where it does not appear that the debts are not in the same right as well as mutual. (U S. v. Eckford, 6 Wall., 488)

Whether the suit be one at law or in equity, set off must be understood as that right which exists between two parties, each of whom, under an independent contract, owes an ascertained amount to the other to set off their respective debts by way of mutual deduction, so that in any action brought for the larger debt the residue only, after such deduction, shall be recovered. (Adams Eq, (6th Am. ed.), 447.)

Courts of equity, following the law, will not allow a set-off of a joint debt against a separate debt, or of a separate debt against a joint debt; nor will such courts allow a set-off of debts accruing in different rights, except under very special circumstances, and where the proofs are clear, and the equity is very strong. (2 Story's Eq., (6th ed,) sec. 1,437.)

Equity regards the capital stock and property of a corporation as held in trust for the payment of the debts of the corporation, and recognizes the right of creditors to pursue properties into whosesoever possession the same may be transferred, unless the stock or property has passed into the hands of a bona fide purchaser; and the rule is well settled that stockholders are not entitled to any share of the capital stock, nor to any dividend of the profit until all the debts of the corporation are paid. (Railroad Co. v. Howard, 7 Wall., 416)

Moneys derived from the sale and transfer of the franchises and capital stock of an incorporated company are the assets of the corporation, and as such constitute a fund for the payment of its debts, and if held by the corporation itself, and so invested as to be subject to legal process, the fund may be seized by a creditor on such process and subjected to the payment of the indebtedness of the company; and where the fund has been improperly distributed among the stockholders, or passed into the hands of third persons, not bona fide creditors or purchasers, the established rule in equity is, if the debts of the company remain unpaid, that such holders take the fund charged with the trust in favor of the creditors, which a court of equity will enforce and compel the application of the same to the satisfaction of the debts of the corporation. (2 Story Eq., 9th ed., sec. 1,252; Mumma v. Potomac, 8 Pet., 286; Wood v. Dummer, 3 Mason, 308; Vose v. Grant, 15 Mass., 522; Spear v. Grant, 16 Id., 14; Curran v. Arkansas, 15 How., 307)

Tested by these considerations it is clear that the prayer of the bill of complaint, that the respondent may be directed to deliver to the complainant the notes referred to, must be denied.

Claim for losses due from the company cannot be set off against the notes given for capital stock. Suppose that is so, still the complainant insists that such claims for losses may be set off against the amount due from him to the company for the moneys of the company deposited with him under the agreement set forth in the bill of complaint.

Matters alleged in the bill of complaint and denied in the answer must be proved before such matters can be assumed as true by the court. Concede that, and it follows that the important question remains to be considered, whether there was such an agreement between the complainant and the company, in respect to the moneys deposited with the complainant, as that set forth in the bill of complaint.

Moneys to a large amount were deposited with the complainant, and it is not denied that he paid interest on the same to the amount of $11,799.96, as shown by the first schedule annexed to the original bill, but the respondent in the original bill and complainant in the cross-bill alleges that the complainant in the original bill received and held all such sums as treasurer of the company, and that the balance in his hands is a trust fund belonging to all creditors, and consequently that his claim for losses under the policies issued to him by the company cannot be set off against his indebtedness to the company for the balance of that fund in his hands. He admits that he was elected to the office of treasurer by the directors in the month of July, 1870, and that he was reappointed thereto during the following year, but he denies that he ever accepted the office, or that he ever qualified as such, or that he held in his custody any money whatever as treasurer of the company. Subsequently he was examined as a witness in the case, and testified that he never qualified as treasurer or gave bond, and never had any other or different relations with the company in respect to its funds than such as existed before he was elected.

What he states in respect to the alleged agreement is substantially as follows: That he agreed, at the first meeting of the directors, to receive all moneys paid to the company, and to allow the company 10 per cent. interest upon it, payable annually, until he should notify the company to the contrary or a different arrangement should be made between the parties, the purpose of the directors being to have the money at all times available, as far as possible, and at the same time to get interest on it, and he says that he made the offer, not because it was of advantage to him, but to encourage the company.

Sufficient appears to show that the complainant was at that time a private banker in good standing and of great reputed wealth, and he testifies that the arrangement was continued as long as the company transacted business, except that the rate of interest which he was to allow was reduced from 10 to 8 per cent. per annum. Blank checks to draw the money in his hands were prepared by the officers of the company and were drawn on him, not as treasurer, but as a private banker, and he testified that it was never understood at any meeting of the company that there were any funds of the company in his hands as treasurer, and that the funds on hand were always reported as funds in bank, and were so described in the published reports of the company.

Decided confirmations of the material parts of these statements comes from several witnesses, and it appears to the entire satisfaction of the court that the arrangement, set forth in the bill of complaint, was known to and approved by the stockholders as well as the directors, and by the executive committee and committee of finance and investment. Deposits undoubtedly may be made with a banker under circumstances where the legal conclusion would be that the title to the fund deposited remained in the depositor, and in that case the banker would become the bailee of the depositor, and the latter might rightfully demand the identical money as his property; but where the deposit is general and there is no special agreement proved inconsistent with such a theory, the title to the money deposited, whatever it may be, passes to the banker and he becomes liable for the amount as a debt which can only be discharged by a legal payment of the amount. (Thompson v. Riggs, 5 Wall., 678. Bank v. Wister, 2 Pet., 325.)

All deposits made with bankers, said Mr. Justice Miller, may be divided into two classes, namely: those in which the bank becomes bailee of the depositor, the title to the thing deposited remaining with the latter; and that other kind of deposit money peculiar to banking business, in which the depositor for his own convenience parts with the title of his money and loans it to the banker, and the latter, in the consideration of the loan of the money and the right to use it for his own profit, agrees to refund the same amount or any part thereof on demand. (Marine Bank v. Fulton Bank, 2 Wall., 256.)

Such an agreement to refund may be express or implied, and if it is express it may be to refund with or without interest, according to the terms of agreement. Where the agreement is to pay interest the agreement is obligatory, but the fact that the depositary agreed to pay interest affords very strong evidence that the title to the money deposited passed out of the depositor by the act of making the deposit.

Money deposited with a banker, says Hill, creates a legal debt between the parties, which under proper circumstances, may be recovered in an action at law. (Hill on Trustees, (4th Am. ed.,) 173.)

Authorities to the same effect are numerous and decisive, as, for example, it was expressly decided by the master of the rolls, that money paid to a banker becomes immediately a part of his general assets, and he is mereby a debtor for the amount. (Devaynes v. Noble, 1 Merivale, 561.)

Sums which are paid, says Lord Denman, to the credit of a customer with a banker, though usually called deposits, are, in truth, loans by the customer to the banker, and the party who seeks to recover the balance of such account must prove that the loan was in reality intended to be his and that it was received as such. (Sims v. Bond, 2 Barn. & Adol., 392.)

Exactly the same rule was laid down in a court of exchequer, where it was held that money deposited with a banker by his customer, in the ordinary way, is money lent to the banker, with a superadded obligation that it is to be paid when demanded by a check. (Pott v. Clegg, 16 Mee. & Wels., 327).

Viewed in the light of these suggestions, it is clear that the amount deposited by the company with the complainant, and which he still owes to the company, or to the respondent, as assignee, was and is held by him as a private banker and not as treasurer of the company, and that any losses sustained by the complainant, at the time and in the manner alleged, for which the bankrupt corporation were and are liable as insurers, may be set off against that claim of the bankrupt corporation, as described in the pleadings in the original suit and cross-bill filed by the respondent.

Nothing remains to be done in this investigation except to recapitulate the elements for a decree, and to direct, in general terms, what the new decree in the case shall be in the court below. Enough is already remarked to show that the complainant is entitled to the relief prayed, so far as respects the claim of the respondent for the balance due to the bankrupt corporation for the moneys deposited with him as a private banker, amounting to the sum of $39,188 03, as appears in the record, and that he should be allowed to prove the balance due to him for the said losses, to the extent that the company is liable therefor, against the estate of the bankrupt corporation; that the complainant is not entitled to the relief prayed, so far as respects the notes referred to, in the bill of complaint, for the reason that the notes were given for shares in the capital stock and constitute a trust fund which belongs to all the creditors of the company, for which the complainant in the cross-bill is entitled to a decree.

Should further investigation become necessary in order to ascertain the exact amount of the respective claims, that investigation will be made by the Circuit Court.

The decree of the Circuit Court is reversed, and the cause remanded for such further proceedings as may be necessary, and for decree in conformity to the opinion of this court.

U. S. CIR. COURT, E. D. OF MICH.

OPINION DELIVERED JAN. 20, 1876.

In Re JAMES T. HURST. In bankruptcy. On petition for review of order of District Court.

CONSTRUCTION OF THE RESOLUTION OF COMPOSITION — WHEN INDORSED NOTES MAY BE PAID FOR DIVIDENDS.

1. A resolution of composition under the bankrupt act which provided that payment should be made by the delivery of indorsed promissory notes was sustained upon the ground that such phraseology would be interpreted to mean a payment in money within the meaning of the statute.
2. There is no principle of law which constrains a court to construe the words, "received in full payment," "received in full satisfaction of," or other similar words, when applied to the reception of a note or other security in payment of an antecedent debt, to mean absolute satisfaction; but it is in all instances a question of fact and intention, to be deduced from the words of the instrument, and the facts in reference to which they have been employed.
3. A resolution of composition under the statute will not be effective to discharge the debtor unless the dividend is actually paid to the creditor.
4. The form of the resolution in question strongly disapproved by the court.

This was a proceeding under the bankrupt act between debtor and creditor to compromise the former's indebtedness. A "resolution of composition" having been adopted, by which the creditors agreed "to accept the sum of twenty cents on the dollar in full satisfaction and discharge, provided the said sum be paid as follows: six month notes of the debtor, indorsed by, etc., as security," the District Court, on motion, made an order to record the same.

E. K. Roberts & Co., a creditor, having refused to sign the resolution, filed a petition in review of the said order, on the ground that it did not provide for payment in money.

EMMONS, J.

The only error urged upon this bill of review is, that the resolution of composition provides for a payment in indorsed promissory notes, whereas the statute requires it shall be in money. Literally interpreted, it is subject to the criticism made. It does provide expressly that the payment shall be made by the delivery of certain indorsed promissory notes. If we cannot construe this to mean a payment in money, the "resolution" must be rejected. We think, without any violation of familiar rules of interpretation, we can read this language as importing such payment, notwithstanding its apparent literal meaning to the contrary. The circumstances in which these words are employed, show that the word "payment" is not to be understood in its literal, absolute signification.

Did not peculiar circumstances constrain us to put in accessible form the reasons for our ruling, we should not, pressed as we are with other duties, feel obliged to do so. We are informed, however, the legality and the effect of these proceedings are questioned in other tribunals; and we assume that the construction which we give them here will be adopted there. In the midst of jury trials, acting also for the district judge, to dispose of a long list of certified admiralty cases, as well as those upon appeal, and the whole business of the bankruptcy court, it is impossible for us to do more than simply link together what is mere memoranda from which our oral judgment was delivered. The few moments we can spare from three sittings a day, will not enable us to condense these suggestions or avoid considerable repetition. What little we have done could by no possibility have been accomplished had we not received some very exceptional and very efficient aid from the learned counsel of the bankrupt.

Had the resolution come before us in different circumstances, and where without great injury we could have caused another to be adopted in its stead, we should have preferred its rejection on account of the impolicy of sanctioning doubtful terms when it is so easy to comply with the provisions of the law. Litigation is naturally created by such ambiguities, and has actually resulted from them in the present instance. It is with great reluctance that we sustain the practice in this case, notwithstanding the many precedents found in the books for construing similar words as we now interpret these. We have much reason to believe that had this point been argued before the District Court, the proceedings would have been remitted to the creditors and a new resolution required. We hesitated indeed, whether, owing to the practice in that court, we would listen to the objection at all.

We deem it unnecessary to discuss the doctrines, much less cite adjudications in reference to the interpretation of statutes and contracts generally, where the decisions are so numerous in reference to the very words employed in this resolution and the subject-matter with which it deals. They are but illustrations of the familiar general rule on which they rest, that every instrument must be construed to effectuate the presumed intention of the parties. It is so in deeds, wills, personal covenants and even judgments and statutes. In reference to them all, the same language in numerous instances has been held to bear wholly different meanings according to the circumstances in which it is employed. The bearing upon this subject is so full and so familiar that its citation and discussion would be quite out of place. We shall do no more than refer to a very small portion of the very great number of English and American judgments which have declared that the words "payment," "in satisfaction of," "in full discharge of," and numerous other similar expressions when contained in receipts and other instruments in reference to antecedent and liquidated obligations, operate to discharge them, or the contrary, just as the circumstances in which they are used indicate intention, and as justice demands. The receipt of a promissory note in payment of an antecedent debt when a suit is brought by the creditor against his debtor, in all of the States of the Union where they profess to follow the common law, is held not to discharge the original obligation. This result is declared in various forms of expression. It is sometimes said to be a conditional payment, at others that the word payment is not to be understood in its technical sense, but is intended only to evidence the amount to be paid. In those States where a different rule is established they concede it to be peculiar. If the same receipt is given in circumstances where it is quite clear that the parties intended to satisfy absolutely an antecedent debt, as where financial adjustments demand that a mortgage should be discharged, a judgment satisfied, a retiring partner who leaves the assetts of a firm in the hands of his previous associates, and numerous other instances where the nature of the transaction shows that actual satisfaction was intended; in all such instances these words "in payment of," or "in satisfaction of," will be ruled to import what they literally mean. In the construction which we give this resolution, holding as we do that it does not mean the delivery of the promissory notes as payment and a discharge of the debtor, we do not approbate the extreme expressions in several of the cases on this subject which hold that there must be in express agreement in terms to accept a note in satisfaction before it will operate as such. It is a mere matter of interpretation in each instance, controlled by the circumstances in which the agreement is made.

1 Smith's Lead. Cas., 7th Am. Ed., p. 613, cites a long list of cases and deduces from them the general principle which the author supposes they sustain. After saying that the transfer by a debtor to his creditor of the note of a third person will discharge his obligation, if such is shown to be the intention, and that such intention must appear by the express agreement of the parties, and will not be implied by the mere act of transfer, adds (p. 613) that "merely receipting the notes as cash, or giving a receipt in full, or receipting the notes as being in payment of the debt, will not alone be sufficient to prove that the notes were taken, not as conditional payment, but as an immediate and absolute discharge." (29 Pa., p. 448, McIntyre v. Kennedy.) The check of a third person was delivered to plaintiff in payment of an antecedent debt. It does not appear that a written receipt was given, but the whole case proceeds on the assumption that in terms it was delivered in payment. Woodward, J., on a very full review of the English and American cases approbating the summary which we have quoted from the American edition of Smith's Leading Cases, lays down the general doctrine that there must be either an express agreement to receive in payment, or facts aliunde from which such an understanding is clearly to be implied. 4 Watts, 308, McLaughlin v. Borard. A draft in this case was received "for the amount then due on the above judgment." Gibson, J., in deciding that it was not satisfaction of the judgment, on p. 315, says "a note or bill taken in satisfaction of a precedent debt imposes no further duty on the creditor than to use reasonable diligence in obtaining payment, or acceptance by presenting it in season, and giving notice of its dishonor to the debtor from whom it was had, if he be a party to it." 5 Johnson, p. 68, Tobey v. Barber. In this case the receipt was very positive in its terms. It read, "Received of Barber $163 on account of within lease, and in full for the second and third quarter's rent." It was held to be sufficient to explain this receipt, and to show that the rent was not paid, by simply proving that it was given for the note of a third person, and that the note was dishonored. 9 Johnson, 309, Johnson v. Weed, illustrates with what fullness the courts have held this question of payment to be one of mere construction, in the light of the circumstances in which the language of receipts and other contracts have been written. It is conceded everywhere that where goods are sold and the note of a third person is cotemporaneously delivered in exchange, the presumption of law prima facie is that it is absolute satisfaction. In this case, however, a jury having found that the delivery of a note in payment of goods bought at the time was not intended by the parties to be absolute payment, the court refused to set aside the verdict; and see 2 Caines, 117, Reget v. Merit. In 10 Maryland, 27, Berry v. Griffin, it was held that a request to charge which implied as matter of law that the reception of a note in payment of a debt was per se an absolute satisfaction, was erroneous. It might or might not be payment in fact, according to the conditions in which the receipt was given. 5 Rawle, 166, Perit v Pittsfield et al., was a case where property was delivered "in payment of a debt." Although the word payment was used, looking to the nature of the transaction, it was held not to be such. Other parts of the case illustrate the liberality of the interpretation which courts will indulge in order to carry out what the parties intended.

There is a class of cases which decides that where upon dissolution of a copartnership the paper of one member is taken for the debt of a firm, the same words which would not import payment, in other circumstances are construed to do so in these. These judgments well illustrate the principle we have assumed that no form of words will secure the same interpretation in all instances. When the motive is to discharge one of several debtors when the other assumes the control of the assets of the business, language indicating discharge and satisfaction will be interpreted so as to effectuate the presumed intention of the parties. Smith's Lead. Cas., vol. 1, 7th ed., pp. 613, 614, refers to a number of these judgments. 6 Barbour, 244, Van Eps v. Dillage, cites and approves 12 Johnson, p. 409, and other cases which hold that when the paper of one member of a firm is given in payment of a partnership debt, where the other member retires and relies upon the discharge of his obligation, it will be deemed absolute payment. It decides, nevertheless, even in such cases, that where there are facts aliunde showing it was not so intended by the parties, such consequences will not follow, and the verdict of a jury, finding there was no payment, was not disturbed; and see 4 Wash. C. C., 271, Harris v. Donaldson; 45 Mo., 150, Doebling v. Loos. In an action to enforce a lien, it was urged that the account was paid by note. The receipt given was as follows: "Received of Loos $1,300 in full of all my demands to date." It being the note of the debtor, the receipt, it was said, was not sufficient evidence to submit it to the jury. Had the circumstances been different, the words might have been differently interpreted. Those before us in reference to this "resolution" are quite as strong as those in 45 Mo.; and see 53 Ill., 309, Archibald v. Argall, which held, on proper testimony, that it was a question of intention for the jury, notwithstanding the form of the papers. The following very recent judgments equally sustain the principle of the cases we have already more particularly noticed: 45 Miss., 559, Lear v. Freedlander; 33 Iowa, 406, Hose v. McDaniel; 43 Ind., 368, Jewett v. Pleak; 33 Wis., 488, Matteson v. Ellsworth.

No State has more fully applied the doctrine than Michigan. It is with much propriety that we adopt one of its rules of interpretation for this resolution—being, as it is, the language of its business men. 1 Doug., Mich., 500, Gardner v. Gorham. A note and mortgage were received "in payment for goods." Upon the trial, evidence tending to show it was not intended to receive them in satisfaction was excluded. In reversing the judgment for this reason the court, by Whipple, J., at page 510, after laying down the general rule in the most stringent form, says: "It is applicable alike to a case where the note of the debtor or of a third person is taken." He cites 9 Johnson, 310, and 7 Term, 64, Owensen v. Morse. The 8th Michigan, 494, Hotchin v. Secor, also goes upon the ground that it is a mere interpretation of the language used by, and the conduct of the parties. 17 Mich., 273, Dudgeon v. Haggart, and 23 Mich., 228, Frazer v. Burchard, announce the same principle.

The English doctrine is quite as stringent as the American. In the 5th Term, 513, Kearslake v. Morgan, a note was received "for and account of the debt." Not being paid and the collateral circumstances failing to show an intention to discharge, it was held that an action could be maintained for the original consideration. This case is cited in 1 Meeson & Welsby 154, Saide v. Rhodes, with approval, and distinguished from the facts before the court, where it appeared by plea that the note was received in absolute satisfaction. The 12th California, 317, Griffith v. Grogan, approves the general principle that a promissory note of a third person is not payment unless so expressly agreed, and says such is the English law, citing the earlier cases on that subject.

The federal cases are equally full to the same point. 1 Wash., C. C., 328, Maze v. Miller. A receipt was given "in full for property sold." Upon proof that payment was made by note of a third person which was unavailable, it was held the receipt was no bar to an action. The language of the instrument was quite as strong as that before us. See also 4 Wash., C. C., 271, Harris v. Donaldson; 10 Peters, 558, 567, Peter v. Beverly. An executor gave his note for a debt due from the estate. In deciding it was no payment, Thompson, J., says "that in no case is the giving of the note of a third person for pre-existing debt, payment, unless it is expressly so agreed, or is clearly to be inferred from the facts of the transaction." He cites, with approbation, 11 Johnson, 513, 14 Ib., 404, 2 Gill & John, 493, Glenn v. Smith, 7 Har. & Johns, 92, in which written receipts declaring the paper was received in payment, were construed to be conditional payment only.

Glenn v. Smith is one of the leading cases, and perhaps is as fully argued as any in the books. The question was, whether certain indorsed notes constituted payment for the property in question. The receipt given was "for two promissory notes signed by herself and indorsed by Glenn & Co. in payment of the above account." After a very full review of the English and American adjudications down to the day of the judgment, it was held that the word "payment" would be interpreted to mean conditional payment only. The peculiar facts of the case are relied upon to sustain this reading of the instrument.

See also 10 Iredell, page 385, Gorgon v. Price; 2 Story, C. C., 467, Barque Chusan, in deciding that the giving of a note was not to be considered as a satisfaction of the cause of action, says, such is the law of New York, that of England, and so far as he (Justice Story) was informed, of any state in the Union, Massachusetts and Maine excepted. See also 2 Cliff., C. C., page 4. The Kimball, same case on error, in 3 Wallace, page 44; 1 Cliff., page 420, Bake v. Draper; and 14 Howard, 240, Downey v. Hicks.

In view of the many precedents for construing the words of this resolution in conformity with the requirements of the statute, and holding that they do import a payment in money, we feel confident it is our duty to do so. It is part of a statutory proceeding in which any other meaning is unlawful. If it does not mean this, it is not within the statute at all. It prohibits any other payment but one in money. Predicaments are presented in which that canon of construction is applicable when the instrument is to be saved, if by any possible interpretation it can be. To use the language of another judgment, "it is our duty to approach the line where interpretation ends, and interpolation commences."

There is no danger to creditors, resulting from such a construction. The composition will not be effective to discharge the debtor unless the amount agreed upon is actually paid. See 13 National Bank, Reg., 129. In re Reiman v. Friedlander. In re Hatton, 7 L. R. Ch., App., 723; Edwards v. Coombe, 7 L R, Com. Pleas, 519; and the numerous American and English adjudications which hold that in all similar cases deeds of composition, and accord and satisfaction, must be completely executed in order to be operative.

The order of the District Court to record the "resolution" is affirmed, without costs to either party as against the other.

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

OPINION FILED JAN. 21, 1876.

THE UNION NATIONAL BANK v. THE OCEANA COUNTY BANK.

Appeal from Cook.

RIGHTS OF DRAWEE AND HOLDER OF BANK CHECK.

Held, that where a depositor draws his check on his banker, who has funds to an equal or greater sum than his check, it operates to transfer the sum named to the payee, who may sue for and recover the amount from the bank, and that a transfer of the check draws with it the title to the amount named in the check to each successive holder. After the check has passed to the hands of a bona fide holder, it is not in the power of the drawer to countermand the order of payment.

SCOTT, C. J.—This action is upon a check drawn by James H. Ledlie on the Union National Bank, of Chicago, in favor of Underhill and Gray, and by them indorsed and delivered to the Oceana County Bank, located at Pentwater, Michigan. The declaration contains a special count upon the check, and also the common money counts. On the trial the plaintiff recovered a judgment for the amount of the check with interest, and the defendant brings the case to this court on appeal.

The evidence shows there was no unreasonable delay in presenting the check to defendant for payment, and notwithstanding it is shown the bank had funds in its possession on deposit subject to check at the time belonging to the drawer in excess of the amount of the check, payment was refused for the reason the drawer had previously ordered the bank not to pay it.

The facts proven in this case bring it clearly within the rule declared in Munn et al. v. Burch et al., 25 Ill., 35. The doctrine of that case has been so frequently affirmed in other cases in this court, it is not necessary now to discuss it as a new question. The principle of all the cases in this court on this subject is, that when a depositor draws his check on his bankers who has funds to an equal or greater sum than his check, it operates to transfer the sum named to the payee, who may sue for and recover the amount from the bank, and that a transfer of the check draws with it the title to the amount named in the check to each successive holder. After the check has passed to the hands of a bona fide holder, it is not in the power of the drawers to countermand the order of payment.

The case at bar is controlled by this principle, and we content ourselves by simply making reference to our former decisions where it is declared. The Chicago Marine and Fire Ins. Co. v. Stanford, 28 Ills., 168; Bickford v. First National Bank, 42 Ills., 238; Brown v. Lecker et al., 43 Ills., 497.

Adhering, as we do, to the doctrine of the cases cited, we are of opinion the evidence offered to prove facts establishing a defense as between the drawees and the drawer of the check, was properly rejected. The judgment must be affirmed.

Judgment affirmed.

LV. NEW HAMPSHIRE REPORTS.

We have received from Hon. JOHN M. SHIRLEY, official reporter, the advance sheets of the LV. Volume of his reports, from which we take the followihg headnotes. The cases are of the August term, 1875:

Citizens' National Bank v. Smith, p. 593.

PROMISSORY NOTE — SIGNATURE OBTAINED BY MEANS OF FRAUDULENT REPRESENTATIONS—NEGLIGENCE.

The defendant was induced to sign his name, as maker, to a negotiable promissory note, by false and fraudulent representations that it was a contract of an entirely different character, whereby he would incur no pecuniary liability; but it appeared, further, that it was a negligent act on his part to sign the note without ascertaining whether it was what the payee represented, or something else: Held, that the defendant was precluded by his negligence from setting up the fraud, against a bona fide holder of the note who had purchased it for value before due.

Bullock v. Wallingford, p. 619.

EVIDENCE—CERTIFICATE OF PUBLIC OFFICER.

A certificate from the United States commissioner of patents that diligent search has been made, and that it does not appear that a certain patent has been issued, is not competent evidence of that fact.

Kittredge v. Holt, p. 620.

REPLEVIN—CONSTRUCTION OF STATUTE.

Replevin cannot be maintained, either at common law or by statute of July 1, 1873, by a third person claiming personal property taken on a valid execution.

Lucy v. Lucy, 9.

ADMINISTRATION — SALE WHEN VOID — ACCOUNTING—NEGLIGENCE.

1. The real estate of a deceased person, not insolvent, vests at once, upon his decease, in the heir-at-law or devisee, subject to be divested by a proper sale under a license for the purpose of paying debts; and the administrator cannot enter to take the rents and profits.

2. In such case, if the administrator has received the rents and profits, he is not to be charged with them in his administration account, but is liable to account to the heirs for the same; nor is he entitled to be credited for taxes assessed subsequent to the decease of his intestate, and paid by him, nor for repairs made by him on the real estate.

3. If, through the administrator's negligence, a sale of real estate under license is void because of some defect in his proceedings, he will not be credited with his charges for services and expenses of such sale upon settlement of his administration account.

4. Commissions are allowed, not as perquisites, but as compensation for services, and the amount to be allowed will vary, according to the labor, risk, responsibility, and trouble of each particular case.

JUDGE EDWARDS ON TAXES.

PERSONAL LIABILITY OF THE COLLECTOR IN CASE OF ATTEMPTED COLLECTION OF AN ILLEGAL LEVY.

To the Editor of the Illinois State Journal:

Having given an opinion that the Town Collector would be liable in an action of trespass if he enforced the collection under his warrant of illegal taxes, I give below the authorities in support of that opinion.

The Supreme Court of the United States, in 11 Wallace, page 112, says:

"If the tax was illegal, the plaintiff protesting against its enforcement might have had his action, after it was paid, against the officer, or the city, to recover back the money, or he might have prosecuted either for his damages."

In 35th Illinois. 466, the Supreme Court held:

"Ordinarily, a party of whom a tax is illegally collected has an ample remedy at law, by an action of trespass against the officer collecting it or by an action of assumpsit to recover back the money."

In 40th Illinois, 389:

"Though a tax was illegally levied, yet the collector to whom a warrant was directed, regular on its face, and which he was to collect or not at his peril, was liable for the costs restraining the collection of the tax; it seems it would be otherwise if he had actually attempted to collect the tax. * * * Until he enforced collection under his warrant he has done no act injurious to the taxpayers of the town."

In 39th Illinois, 124:

"Though from motives of public policy a party is inhibited from raising the question of the validity of a law imposing a tax by a resort to the action of replevin, he yet has a remedy by action of trespass, in which, under a proper state of pleading, the questions can be fully presented, and if an unconstitutional law has been enforced against him, depriving him of his property, the most ample redress may be found in that action"

In Blackwell on tax titles, pages 162-3:

"If a tax is levied for an illegal purpose it cannot be sustained. It cannot be enforced against the citizen unless it is clearly and distinctly authorized by law. 'Whenever money is raised by taxation, the purpose for which it was levied ought to appear upon the face of the proceeding, and if that purpose was illegal, there can be no authority to collect the tax; the officer who attempts to enforce it will be liable in trespass, and the purchaser can acquire no title to the property seized and sold to satisfy it.'"

We call attention to the following opinions, reported at length in this issue:

Power of one Partner to Enter Appearance of Other after Dissolution.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States, by Bradley, J., holding that after the dissolution of a partnership, one of the partners in a suit brought against the firm has no authority to enter the appearance for the other partners who do not reside in the State where the suit is brought and have not been served with process; that a judgment against all the partners, founded on such an appearance, can be questioned by those not served with process in a suit brought thereon in another State; that the jurisdiction of a foreign court over the person or the subject matter embraced in the judgment or decree of such court is always open to inquiry, and in this respect the court of another State is to be regarded as a foreign court; that the record of such a judgment does not estop the parties from demanding such an inquiry. A distinction is made between a foreign and domestic judgment. This is an unusually interesting opinion and will repay a careful study.

Bankrupt Insurance Companies—Set-Off.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States, by Clifford, J., in the case brought by Mr. Scammon against Mr. Kimball, as assignee of the bankrupt Mutual Insurance Company, to compel him to allow certain claims of his against the company, by the way of set-off. The court held that the claim for losses due from the company could not be set off against the notes given for capital stock, but that the amount deposited by the company with Mr. Scammon, and which he still owes to the company, or to Mr. Kimball, as assignee, was and is held by him as a private banker and not as treasurer of the company, and that any losses sustained by Mr. Scammon, at the time and in the manner alleged, for which the bankrupt corporation were and are liable, may be set off against that claim of the bankrupt corporation as described in the pleadings.

Bankruptcy — Composition Resolution—Construction—Payment in Notes.—The opinion of the United States Circuit Court for the Eastern District of Michigan, by Emmons, J., sustaining a resolution of composition under the bankrupt act, which provided that payment should be made by the delivery of indorsed promissory notes, upon the ground that such phraseology would be interpreted to mean a payment in money, within the meaning of the statute, and holding that a resolution of composition, under the statute, will not be effective to discharge the debtor, unless the dividend is actually paid to the creditor. The opinions of the district judges construing that portion of the bankrupt law in relation to compositions, are conflicting. This opinion of the learned circuit judge will be of very general interest to bankruptcy practitioners.

Insurance—Authority of Broker.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of this State, by Breese, J., holding that the insurance broker who took the application of appellee for insurance, was not the agent of the company but of appellee. The court states the duty of the applicant for insurance to tell the truth and the consequence of his making false representations.

Rights of Drawee and Holder of a Bank Check.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of this State, by Scott, C. J., holding that where a depositor draws his check on his banker, who has funds to an equal or greater sum than his check, it operates to transfer the sum named to the payee, who may sue for and recover the amount from the bank, and that a transfer of the check draws with it the title to the amount named in the check to each successive holder, and that after the check has passed to the hands of a bona fide holder, it is not in the power of the drawer to countermand the order of payment.

Constitutional Oath of Office—School Funds.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of this State, by Sheldon, J., holding that Section 25 of Art. 5 of the Constitution, which provides that all civil officers, except members of the General Assembly, and such inferior officers as may be by law exempted, shall, before they enter upon the duties of their respective offices, take and subscribe the oath of office therein prescribed, has not been understood by the legislative department to be self-executing; otherwise all the numerous laws requiring the taking of an official oath would be supererogatory; that in the case of an inferior officer not requiring the oath to be taken is the dispensing with it. The court states who under the school law is the custodian of district school moneys, and the consequences of school directors failing to pay over money borrowed by them when demanded by the township treasurer.

The Board of Health Regulation of Slaughter-Houses—Power of Common Council.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of this State, by Craig, J., holding that the Board of Health of the city of Chicago had no power to make a regulation or ordinance, that from and after the first day of January, 1872, no distillery, slaughter-house, rendering establishment or soap factory should be erected or put into operation in any building not then used for such purpose, within certain named limits in the city of Chicago; that such regulation was void even if the board had power over the subject they could not allow those then in the business to continue and prohibit others from engaging in it; that it is doubtful whether the legislature could confer the law-making power upon a body not elected or chosen by the people such as the Board of Health; that the power over the subject is in the Common Council.

The Citizens' Association Case.—The mandamus in the case of The People ex rel. Henderson et al. v. The City Council of Chicago, came to a sudden and unexpected termination this week at Springfield. Judge Dickey, having been of counsel, took no part in the decision. The six judges stood three for awarding the writ, and three against it. Chief Justice Scott, in announcing the result, said:

The petition in this case is for a mandamus to compel the city council to order an election for mayor of the city of Chicago. We have considered the case with that care and deliberation its importance demands, but we have been unable to agree upon a decision for the reason that the court is equally divided in opinion on the question involved, three members being in favor of awarding the writ of mandamus as prayed for in the petition, and three being opposed to it. Mr. Justice Dickey was not present when the case was argued, and, having been of counsel to respondents before he was elected a member of this court, it is proper to say he has not since his return taken any part in the consideration of the case. It follows that no decision can be made either denying or allowing the writ, as the constitution declares that the concurrence of four members of the court shall be necessary to every decision of the court. (Constitution 1870, art. 6, sec. 2.) The result is the mandamus is not allowed, and the cause will be stricken from the docket. Mandamus not allowed.

Fire Insurance Cases: Being a Collection of All the Reported Cases on Fire Insurance, in England, Ireland, Scotland and America, from the Earliest Period to the Present time, chronologically arranged. Vol. IV. Covering the Period 1855-1864, with Notes and References. By Edmund H. Bennett. New York: Published by Hurd & Houghton. Cambridge: Riverside Press. 1876. Sold by Callaghan & Co., Law-book Publishers, Chicago. pp. 855. Price, $7.50.

The mechanical execution of this volume is excellent. We wish all the Reports of American cases were as good. It is the fourth of the series. These reports are now well known by the profession and have been received with favor. In fact, so much so, that it would be difficult to find a good law library without them. Mr. Bennett, in his preface to the present volume, says the insurance cases decided during the period covered by this volume are so numerous, it was found impossible to insert them all in full; and as many involved only points that had been often previously decided, they were deemed relatively unimportant. In such cases a head-note or syllabus merely of the case has been published here. Mr. Bennett, in these days of pad book-making, is to be applauded for passing an unimportant opinion by with a simple head-note, instead of publishing it, as most authors would, to swell the size of his book.

Wrongs and Rights of a Traveler—by Boat—by Stage—by Rail. By a Barrister-at-law, of Osgoode Hall. Toronto: Published by R. Carswell. 1875.

This is a little volume of about two hundred pages, dedicated by the author to his fellows of the legal fraternity, the traveling public and all others who may care to read therein. The author very modestly says this little work does not aspire to compete with the learned productions of Redfield, Chitty or Story, but merely to supply a want felt by many to exist in this age of perpetual motion, of a plain and brief summary of the rights and liabilities of carriers and passengers by land and by water; that an attempt is made to combine instruction with entertainment, information with amusement, and to impart knowledge while beguiling a few hours in a railway carriage, or on a steamboat. While it is hoped that the general public will peruse with interest the text, containing elegant extracts from ponderous legal tomes, gems from the rich mines of legal lore, and where in many cases the law is laid down in the very words of learned judges of England, Canada and the United States. The notes, a cloud of authorities, the index and the list of cases, are inserted for the special delectation of the profesaional reader. The style of this work is novel and witty; it amuses and at the same time instructs. We do not know who the barrister is that wrote it, but we are much pleased with his work. He says he is very "'umble, coming of an 'umble family," like the celebrated Uriah, not the Hittite, but he of the Heap tribe. This book for its size contains a heap of common sense, sharp wit and good every-day law.

ADMINISTRATOR'S ACCOUNT—STOLEN MONEY.

Stevens v. Gage, 175.

1. In settling an administration account, a court of probate will act upon equitable principles; therefore, where money belonging to an estate was stolen by burglars from the safe of the administrator, the court, upon being satisfied that the administrator had been guilty of no want of due care, held that he should be discharged as to the money so lost, on the settlement of his account.—[*From L V. SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

OPINION FILED JAN. 21, 1876.

THE LYCOMING FIRE INS. CO. v. JOHN O. RUBEN. Appeal from Cook.

INSURANCE — FALSE REPRESENTATIONS — PROOF OF LOSS AS EVIDENCE — INSURANCE BROKER—AGENCY.

1. CONTRACT OF INSURANCE—FALSE REPRESENTATIONS.—That the contract of insurance is one in which the parties to it must act in the utmost good faith. No false representations must be made which go to affect the risk. The insured must tell the whole truth There must be no concealment of any important facts, or false representations as to amount of stock r value. The insurer trusts to the representations of the insured, and proceeds upon the confidence that he has been given all the data necessary to enable him properly to estimate the risk.

2. AMOUNT OF STOCK.—The evidence shows appellee had not at the date of the policy, the amount of stock and of the value reported.

3. INSURANCE BROKER—NOT AGENT OF COMPANY. That the insurance broker who took the application of appellee was not the agent of the company, but of appellee.

4. FALSE REPRESENTATIONS.—That the false representations as to amount and value of property vitiates the policy and makes it void.

5. PROOF OF LOSS.—The court states the effect of refusing to allow the proof of loss to go to the jury.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

BREESE, J.

This was assumpsit in the Circuit Court of Cook county by John O. Ruben, plaintiff, against the Lycoming Fire Insurance Company, defendants, on a policy of insurance executed by the defendant to the plaintiff, August 29, 1872, insuring plaintiff for one year, in the sum of two thousand dollars, on his stock of jewelry, watches, clocks, and materials for the same, silver plate, and plated ware, contained in a two-story framed building, in the town of Evanston.

The general issue was pleaded and submitted to a jury, who found for the plaintiff, assessing his damages at two thousand one hundred and eighty-one dollars, for which the court rendered judgment, having denied defendant's motion for a new trial.

The case is presented to us on the evidence and instructions, and we have given the record a careful and laborious examination.

The theory of the defense was, fraud in procuring the insurance in the amount stated in the policy, the insuree, at the time of its execution, not having articles of that value in the building. Appellants contend that appellee, at the time of taking out the policy, willfully and fraudulently over-valued his stock and deceived appellants, whereby they were induced to take the risk; and, further, that appellee did not have the goods at the time of the fire which he claims were lost, and for which the verdict allows him.

The contract of insurance is one in which the parties to it must act in the utmost good faith. No false representations must be made which go to affect the risk. The insured must tell the whole truth—there must be no concealment of any important fact, or false representations as to amount of stock or value. The insurer trusts to the representations of the insured, and proceeds upon the confidence that he has been given all the data necessary to enable him properly to estimate the risk.

From the best examination we have been able to give to the testimony in this cause, it is very evident appellee had not, at the date of the policy, the amount of stock and of the value reported. It is said, however, in explanation, that his stock was examined and valued by an agent of the company, and, on his report, the risk was taken.

This supposed agent is a Mr. Ludlam, who was not, at that time, nor at any other time, the appointed agent of this company. He was a man in the habit of picking up, as a broker on the street, any risk of which he might get information. It was on his application to appellee to permit him to place some insurance for appellee that the policy was written. He never made any examination of the stock at any time. He merely looked into "the show case," where he saw some watches, some chains, and some plated forks, saw no invoices, but took the value from representations and figures made by appellee, which appellee had ready to show him on the second visit he made to him. After this showing, Ludlam took the application to the agent of the company and obtained the policy in question. In this he was the agent of appellee and not of appellants. The fact that the agent allowed him a commission, does not change the character in which he acted.

The representations made by appellee to Ludlam, and which he communicated to the company's agent, Mr. Hoag, was that the stock on Land was of the value of thirty-three hundred dollars, or thereabouts.

That this was a false representation, appellee's own testimony, taken in connection with that of Oppenheimer, Younggreen, Fossoldt, and Logercrantz.

From this testimony appellee could not have brought to Evanston, from Amboy and Kewanee, an amount of stock to exceed in value six hundred dollars, to which was added by purchases from Happel & Co., from March 27, 1872, to the day of the date of the policy, goods to the amount of ten hundred ninety-eight 92 100 dollars, of which some fifty-three dollars were for tools and materials and not claimed to have been covered by the policy. Subsequent to the date of the policy, August 29, up to October 5, he purchased of the same firm stock to the amount of three hundred and eight 28-100 dollars, which two purchases aggregate fourteen hundred and seventy-nine 20-100 dollars, from which deduct for tools and materials $53.18, leaves fourteen hundred twenty-six 02-100 dollars. Adding this to the stock brought from Amboy and Kewanee, six hundred dollars, there would have been apparently, a stock at the date of the policy of two thousand and twenty six dollars. Appellee came to Evanston from Amboy via Kewanee and Chicago, about the first day of April, 1872. The policy was executed August 29, and the fire burned October 15 of the same year.

By his own testimony his business, after opening at Evanston, up to the date of the policy, a period five months, was fair; his sales amounting to as much as one hundred dollars a month; deducting, then, five hundred dollars from the aggregate of two thousand twenty-six dollars, his stock could by no possibility have exceeded in value fifteen hundred and twenty-six dollars. On this value he obtained by false representations, an insurance on a valuation of three thousand dollars. This of itself vitiates the policy and renders it void absolutely.

Now as to proof of loss:

It is impossible to read the testimony on this branch of the case without a conviction that the goods for which appellee claimed, as for a total loss, were not in the building at the time of the fire, or that the laws of matter have undergone a radical change.

Appellee testified, the fire happened about three o'clock in the morning. McKay, who slept in an adjoining apartment, says about one o'clock. Appellee further testified the tea-set was in the window the night of the fire, also the cake baskets, napkin rings and butter knives—"all my plated ware was in the window."

According to Happel and Co's invoice, there was of plated ware—and he had no other—besides the above as specified, cups, ice pitchers, castors, 3 dozen plated forks, 3 doz. tablespoons, 6 doz teaspoons, one plated child-set (in case), 4 dozen sugar shells; all these articles were in the window for display, placed there to attract attention, and which from their variety, they could not fail to do; yet Mr. Huntoon, a magistrate of the town, living near the premises, going to the fire, having been aroused by the cry, testifies positively, when he got to the building the fire had not reached the window and when he saw it there was none of this ware, none of these articles in the window. This testimony is uncontradicted. It is impossible they should not have been there, if there at the time the fire broke out.

Upon the other proposition, it will be observed, that many of the articles claimed to have been destroyed were of solid silver and solid gold. The most careful and scrutinizing examination of the debris immediately after the fire failed to discover a single particle of gold or silver. Was it true articles of that nature were in the building when fired, some trace of them would certainly have been found, for the closest search was made for that purpose. The remains of nothing of any value were found. Huntoon the elder, spent the most of the day after the fire raking the embers, trying to find valuables. There were two or three others aiding. Esq. Huntoon asked where the show-case had stood and where appellee's work-bench had been, and under the window in which the plated ware was sworn by appellee to have been, he found a tea-caddy about eight inches square in which he put all that he found. There was some forks and spoons, spectacle bows and the dial-plate and inside plate of one watch; these plates were found where the bench had stood, and appellee told him afterwards belonged to a watch he was repairing. These were the only parts of the many watches appellee included in his claim of loss.

Huntoon further testified the spoons found were plated ware, the plating burned off. They found watch-springs and clock-springs under the shelf where the clocks once stood—found clock bells and some clock-hands—they found the fastening of the show-case and the hinges, and a metal spectacle-case. Was there all the day, and the most industriously searching—found no silver forks or spoons—found no gold rings, and not a grain of gold or silver of any kind—appellee put no one there to rake the ruins, and Huntoon had great difficulty to get him there to indicate the place where his property had been placed. Witness went after him and brought him there—he was not there during the fire and only twice there the next morning.

In all these statements except the last, this witness is corroborated by others, and as to the last it is not contradicted nor was any one interrogated on this point.

It may be, as stated by Mr. Happel, that gold mixed with soft solder will fall into a black oxide and when superheated, but not so with solid gold nor with solid silver. Solid gold can only be melted at a white heat and will still be gold—it is indestructible by any known heat. So with solid silver. This witness states that gold jewelry is solder compound of soft solder. If it does not come in contact with soft solder the article will be found as bullion. So with solid silverware. The residue after a fire will be found in the same condition—"it would melt into a lump." Watch-movements, the destruction of which was claimed, the witness says, would not become obliterated by fire.

We understand it to be a fact that the precious metals, gold and silver, no matter into what form they may be worked, if melted by a conflagration such as this, will reappear as bullion.

This fact concerns this claim, as not a trace of either metal was found in the debris of this fire—not a watch movement, nothing to indicate such articles were there to be consumed.

The truth of this case is, that appellee had not at the time he effected the insurance, the property of the kind and value stated, or if he had, these valuables were removed before the fire, which he could have removed as easily as he removed near five hundred dollars worth of watches. And the conclusion is not unreasonable that he caused the fire intentionally after removing the valuable goods.

On this point the evidence is, he left a lamp burning on the show-case, made of glass, with a metal border, sitting upon a wooden counter. When he awoke and discovered the fire, there was nothing burning but a small space about the centre, which could have been quenched, if desired, with a bucket of water. This he did not attempt to apply, but immediately left the building—was not seen at the fire—made no effort to save anything, and could be got to the scene only by the strong persuasion of Mr. Huntoon.

It is not improbable that he had packed off all the valuables to a safe place and then fired the building. And this is not uncommon with those who have been dishonest enough to over-insure their property. It is of frequent occurrence, and courts and juries are bound to expose them, and defeat the wicked intention.

An error in the ruling of the court is complained of, and that is in permitting appellee's proof of loss to go to the jury. That this was error is not denied; but it is insisted it was cured by the instruction of the court to the jury to disregard it.

That this did not cure the error is settled by Lafayette, Bloomington and Miss. R. R. Co. v. Winslow et al., 66 Ill., 219.

This point was distinctly presented in that case, and it was said "it was of the utmost importance in trials by jury that the testimony given to them should be free from all exception that it was not easy to remove from the minds of jurors by instructions, impressions produced by improper testimony which the court has admitted against objections. The inevitable tendency of such evidence is, in doubtful cases, to mislead, and the extent of the mischief produced by it can not well be calculated.

That this proof had great effect upon this jury is evident from the amount of the verdict, they finding for a total loss and against all the well proved facts and presumptions in the case.

There does not appear to us to be a shadow of justice in this claim of appellee. The verdict was wrong, and should have been set aside on motion. It is unnecessary to remark upon the tenth instruction asked by appellants and refused. The case is with them on the merits.

For the reason given, the judgment is reversed and the cause remanded.

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

OPINION FILED JAN. —, 1876.

NO. 272.—CHARLES H. TUGMAN v. THE CITY OF CHICAGO. Appeal from the Criminal Court of Cook Co.

POWER OF BOARD OF HEALTH—SLAUGHTER HOUSES—POWER OF COUNCIL OVER—ORDINANCE MUST BE GENERAL.

1. POWER OF BOARD OF HEALTH—VOID ORDINANCE.—That the Board of Health of the city of Chicago had no power to make a regulation or ordinance; that from and after the 1st day of January, 1872, no distillery, slaughter-house, rendering establishment, or soap factory, should be erected or put into operation in any building not then used for such purpose within the territory in the city of Chicago, bounded within certain named streets, and that such ordinance or regulation was void.

2. ORDINANCE MUST BE GENERAL.—That an ordinance which would make an act done by one penal and impose no penalty for the same act done under like circumstances upon another can not be sustained, because it would be unjust and unreasonable.

3. DISCRIMINATION.—That even if the Board of Health had power over the subject, they could not allow those then in the business to continue and prohibit others from engaging in it.

4. POWER OF THE BOARD.—The court questions whether the legislature can confer the law making power upon a body not chosen or elected by the people such as the Board of Health.

5. POWER OF THE COUNCIL.—The court construes the various statutes relating to the subject, and holds that the power over the subject is in the common council and not in the Board of Health. —[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

CRAIG, J.—This was a prosecution originally instituted before a police magistrate by the city of Chicago, to recover from Charles H. Tugman, a penalty of ten dollars for the violation of a regulation or ordinance adopted on the 12th day of December, 1871, by the Board of Health of the city of Chicago, which reads as follows:

"That from and after the first day of January, A. D. 1872, no distillery, slaughter-house, rendering establishment or soap-factory shall be erected or put into operation in any building not now used for such purpose, within the territory in the city of Chicago, bounded as follows, to wit: Fullerton avenue on the north, thirty fifth street on the south, Lake Michigan on the east, nnd Western avenue on the west."

The cause was taken by appeal from the police court to the criminal court of Cook county, where, upon a trial, judgment was rendered against appellant for the sum of ten dollars.

It is conceded that appellant owned a slaughter-house within the limits designated by the ordinance which was erected and put into operation after the 1st day of January, 1872, and at the time and prior to the commencement of the action he was engaged in slaughtering cattle therein both for packing and city consumption.

It is also conceded by both parties that at and prior to the commencement of the suit several other slaughter-houses were in operation in said city within the limits designated in the regulation, which were erected and in operation prior to the adoption of the ordinance.

There being no dispute as to the facts, the only question presented by the record is, whether the regulation or ordinance adopted by the Board of Health is valid or void.

The first position of appellant is, that the regulation is void because it is unreasonable and oppressive.

Where power is conferred upon the legislative department of a municipal corporation to enact by laws and ordinances for the better government of the inhabitants of the municipality, the body entrusted with that power in its exercise cannot enact ordinances that are unreasonable, oppressive, or such as will create a monopoly.

Each member of a municipal corporation is required to share the burdens incident to such an organization, but at the same time all are entitled to share and participate equally in all benefits to be derived from such a government.

An ordinance, therefore, which would make an act done by one penal, and impose no penalty for the same act done under like circumstances upon another, could not be sanctioned or sustained because it would be unjust and unreasonable. Dillon on Municipal Corporations, Sec. 256.

In the case of the City of Chicago v Rumpff, 45 Ill., 90, where the validity of an ordinance was called in question which provided that all slaughtering for city consumption should be done at the establishment of a particular firm, and prohibited under a penalty slaughtering at any other place, it was said: "All by-laws shoul be general in their operation and should bear equally upon all the inhabitants of the municipality. When privileges are granted by an ordinance they should be open to the enjoyment of all upon the same terms and conditions. That the Common Council had the right under the large powers conferred by the charter to so regulate the business of slaughtering animals as to prohibit its exercise, except in a particular portion of the city, leaving all persons free to erect slaughtering-houses and to exercise the calling at the place designated, cannot be controverted * * * * When that body have made the necessary regulations required for the health or comfort of the inhabitants, all persons inclined to pursue such an occupation should have the opportunity of conforming to such regulations, otherwise the ordinance would be unreasonable and tend to oppression."

The same principle was clearly and forcibly enunciated in the case of Mager v. Thorne, 7 Paige, 261, in the following language: "As all by-laws must be reasonable, the Common Council cannot make a by-law which permits a person to carry on the dangerous business and prohibits another, who has an equal right, from pursuing the same business. Neither have they the right to permit the dangerous manufacture to be carried on in buildings already erected and to prohibit these defendants, whose building was destroyed by an incendiary, from re-building the same for the purpose of carrying on a manufacture which is permitted to others." See also Cooley's Constitutional Limitations, 200.

It will be observed that the regulation to enforce which this suit was instituted, prohibits the use and operating slaughter-houses which should be erected after the first day of January, 1872, while those that were erected prior to that time are left perfectly free to be operated, as the owners thereof may desire.

If the health or comfort of the city require the prohibition of new slaughter-houses within a designated part of the city, the same reason would surely demand that old ones should be discontinued.

If one of the citizens of Chicago is permitted to engage in the business of slaughtering animals in a certain locality, an ordinance which would prevent, under a penalty, another from engaging in the same business, would not only be unreasonable, and, for that reason, void, but its direct tendency would be to create a monopoly, which the law will not tolerate.

The fact that certain persons were engaged in the business within the district designated in the ordinance at the time of its adoption, gave them no right to monopolize the business, nor would such fact authorize the Board of Health to provide that such persons might continue the avocation while others should be deprived a like privilege who should engage in the business at a later period.

If the Board of Health had any power to adopt an ordinance on the subject, the ordinance, to be valid, should not discriminate in favor of any citizen. If it prohibited one from carrying on the business, that prohibition should extend to all, regardless of the time the business may have been commenced.

A regulation of this character, to be binding upon the citizen, must not only be general, but it should be uniform in its operation.

It is also urged that it was incompetent for the legislature to confer upon the Board of Health legislative powers, and, for that reason, the regulation adopted by the Board is void.

The Board of Health derive its power, whatever it may be, from an act of the legislature, approved March 9th, 1867: An act to amend the charter of the city of Chicago. Private Laws of 1867, page 754.

The first section of chapter four of the act provides that the mayor of the city, with six other persons, to be appointed by the judges of the Superior Court, shall constitute the Board of Health of the city.

Section two of the same chapter is as follows:

"Said Board of Health may enact such by-laws, rules and regulations as it may deem advisable, in harmony with the provisions and objects of this act, and all acts the object of which is to promote and preserve the health, safety, and sanitary condition of the city now existing, or that may hereafter be passed, not inconsistent with the Constitution or laws of this State, for the r gulation of the action of said Board, its officers and agents in the discharge of its and their duties, and for the regulation of the citizens or public, and from time to time may alter, amend, or annul the same."

Under this section the ordinance in question was adopted.

The legislative power by the Constitution of the State is vested in the General Assembly. Ordinarily this power can not be delegated. The right, however, of the legislature to empower municipal corporations to make by-laws and ordinances for the welfare and government of the inhabitants of the corporation cannot be questioned or denied.

It may, however, be seriously questioned whether the legislature has the power to confer the law-making power upon a body not chosen or elected by the people, such as the Board of Health.

Where the legislature delegates authority to a municipal corporation to enact ordinances, these ordinances are enacted by a board of aldermen or common council, chosen or elected directly by the people of the municipality; thus the people have a direct voice in making the laws by which they are to be governed, but if the legislature possess the power to provide that some judicial officer of the State may appoint in a city a body of men styled a Board of Health, and that Board can be empowered to make ordinances for the government of the corporation, the people of that corporation may be deprived of self-government.

They will be governed by ordinances adopted by a body they had no voice in electing. This would be repugnant to the theory of our government.

Independent, however, of this question, which it is not necessary to decide in this case, we are of opinion that the act of 1867, did not confer the power upon the Board of Health to adopt the ordinance, but on the other hand the common council elected by the people was entrusted with the power to adopt ordinances in relation to and upon the identical subject-matter over which the Board of Health assumed to act.

Section twenty-four of chapter five of the act of 1867, which provided for the creation of the Board of Health, declares, That the Common Council shall have power and authority to regulate and control the slaughtering of all animals in the city, or within four miles thereof, intended for consumption or exposed for sale in the city, and to enforce by additional ordinances any regulation, contract or law heretofore made on the subject.

If it be true that the Board of Health was empowered by section two of the act to adopt the ordinance in question, then the legislature, by one and the same act, conferred upon two independent bodies, each having the same territorial jurisdiction, authority by ordinance to regulate and control the same thing.

To impute an intention of this character to the legislature is so unreasonable and inconsistent that we cannot sanction it.

We cannot understand how the power could at the same time exist in the two bodies to control by ordinance the same thing. The Common Council might adopt one regulation and the Board of Health another entirely different. Should that occur, which would the citizen be bound to obey? The regulation adopted by the one might be so inconsistent with that enacted by the other that an observance of the one might be a violation of the other.

We cannot, therefore, believe that it was the design of the General Assembly to confer legislative power over this subject, both upon the Common Council and the Board of Health. While perhaps the language used in section two might be regarded broad enough to confer the power upon the Board of Health, had section twenty-four been omitted from the act, yet as the power to legislate upon the subject, is expressly given to the Common Council by the latter section, the general intent expressed in the former must give way to the latter. Sedgwick on Statutory and Constitutional Law, 360.

We are, therefore, of opinion that no power was conferred upon the Board of Health to adopt the ordinance in question.

The judgment will be reversed.

Reversed.

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

OPINION FILED AT OTTAWA, JANUARY 21, 1876.

THE SCHOOL DIRECTORS OF DIST. 13, T. 40, COOK COUNTY v. THE PEOPLE ex rel. CLARK ROBERTS et al.

Appeal from the Superior Court of Cook Co.

CONSTITUTIONAL OATH OF OFFICE—LEGISLATIVE CONSTRUCTION—INFERIOR OFFICERS—TOWNSHIP TREASURER—SCHOOL FUNDS—DEMAND IN MANDAMUS—SCHOOL LAW CONSTRUED—DEMURRER.

1. OATH OF OFFICE—CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISION NOT SELF-ENFORCING.—Sec. 25 of Art. 5 of the Constitution which provides that all civil officers, except members of the General Assembly, and such inferior officers as may be by law exempted, shall, before they enter upon the duties of their respective offices, take and subscribe the oath of office therein prescribed, has not been understood by the legislative department to be self-executing; otherwise all the numerous laws requiring the taking of an official oath would be supererogatory.

2. SILENCE OF LAW AS TO REQUIREMENT IS EXEMPTION FROM, AS TO INFERIOR OFFICERS.—Held, where by the law there appears a manifestation of the intention of the legislature that an inferior officer should not be required to take an oath of office, there is a sufficient exemption "by law" from taking the oath of office within the intent of the constitutional provision. Not requiring the oath to be taken is the dispensing with it in the case of an inferior officer.

3. TOWNSHIP TREASURER.—Held, that the township treasurer falls within the designation of "inferior officers," and as the statute does not in terms provide that he shall be sworn, he is not required to take an oath of office.

4. CUSTODIAN OF DISTRICT MONEYS.—Held, that the place for the moneys of a school district is in the township treasury. The township treasurer is the only lawful depository and custodian of all district school funds, and they are only to be paid out on the order of the directors drawn upon him.

5. MONEY BORROWED BY SCHOOL DIRECTORS.—Held, that where the board of directors had borrowed and received money by the issuing and sale of bonds of the district under § 47 of the general school law, the money thus borrowed and received must be paid over to the township treasurer. And upon refusal by the directors so to do, a demand made by the treasurer upon the directors for the same is a sufficient demand on mandamus brought by the township board to compel the directors to pay over the money to the treasurer. Sec. 62 of the school law authorizes such demand.

6. DEMURRER.—And where the petition for mandamus alleged separate demands by the trustees, and the treasurer, and the answer of the directors denied only the demand by the trustees: Held, that the demurrer to the answer was properly sustained.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

Opinion of the court by SHELDON, J.

This was a petition for a mandamus on the part of the trustees of schools of T. 40, R. 13 E., in Cook county, to compel the appellants the school directors of district 13 in the same township to pay over to William C. Hazleton, the township treasurer of the township, the sum of $13,750 which the board of school directors had borrowed and received, by the issuing and sale of bonds of the district, authorized by a vote of the people, under § 47 of the general school laws.

The answer of the school directors, admits the borrowing and receiving by them of the money, as alleged in the petition, but denies the right of the relators to require the same to be paid to the township treasurer, setting up as a defense to the proceeding:

First: That the township treasurer had failed to qnalify "in this, the said Hazelton did not take and subscribe the oath of office required of him by law to be taken and subscribed before entering upon the duties of the office of treasurer of said township."

Second: A denial that the board of trustees had made the demand for the payment of the money, as alleged in the petition. A demurrer was sustained to the answer, and the defendants refusing to answer further, judgment was entered on the demurrer, and a peremptory writ of mandamus awarded, from which the board of directors took this appeal. It is claimed that the court erred in sustaining the demurrer. The statute does not in terms require of school trustees, treasurers, or directors, the taking of an oath of office. It is urged that the Constitution of 1870 requires such oath to be taken by township treasurers they being nowhere by law exempted therefrom; and reference is made to § 25 of Art. 5 of the Constitution. That section provides that all civil officers except members of the General Assembly and such inferior officers as may be by law exempted, shall, before they enter on the duties of their respective offices, take and subscribe the oath of office therein prescribed, and further provides that no other oath, declaration or test shall be required as a qualification. The oath of members of the General Assembly is prescribed in another section.

It certainly has not been understood by the legislative department, that this constitutional provision is self executing, as express provisions of law have been enacted, prescribing with particularity every essential step to be taken by each person elected or appointed to an office; the mode of election or appointment, the giving of bonds, the manner, time, etc., of taking the oath of office, (where such oath is required) in order to become qualified to perform the duties of the office. If it were supposed that this constitutionul provision was self-enforcing, all the numerous laws, requiring the taking of official oaths would be supererogatory. But the section of the Constitution referred to, expressly leaves it in the discretion of the legislature to exempt "inferior officers" from taking the prescribed oath of office. The township treasurer is appointed by the board of trustees of schools, and falls within the designation of "inferior officers." As the legislature in prescribing the pre-requisites to the right to perform his official duties, has required only that the township treasurer shall be a resident of the township and neither a trustee or a director, and be appointed by the trustees, and give an official bond in a sufficient amount to cover all liabilities, it is not unreasonable to infer the legislative intention, that he should not take an oath of office, as in the very many cases where the legislature have intended an oath of office to be taken, they have so directed, prescribing the particulars in regard thereto, as to manner, time, etc. Not requiring an oath of office to be taken, is the dispensing with it by the legislature in this case. Where by the law there appears a manifestation of the intention of the legislature, that an inferior officer should not be required to take an oath of office, there is in our opinion a sufficient exemption by law from taking the oath of office, within the intent of the constitutional provision. We are of opinion the treasurer was not required to take an oath of office.

As to the demand for the payment of the money, the petition expressly alleges that such demand was made by the township treasurer on the 13th day of March, 1875. We regard this a sufficient demand. Section 62 of the school law declares that "the township treasurer shall demand, receive and safely keep according to law, all moneys, books and papers of every description belonging to his township. It is answered that this provision applies only to moneys belonging to the township; that the money in question belonged exclusively to the school district. But the place for their moneys is in the township treasury. The township treasurer is by statute the only lawful depository and custodian of all district school funds, and they are only to be paid out upon the order of the school directors, drawn upon the township treasurer.

The petition alleges that the board of trustees of schools and the township treasurer respectively, at different times made separate demands for the payment over to the township treasurer of the money. The answer only denies the demand by the board of trustees.

We regard the answer as insufficient, and are of opinion, the demurrer thereto was rightly sustained.

The judgment will be affirmed.

Judgment affirmed.

JUDGE WALKER'S ADVICE TO A CLIENT.

A good story is told of Judge Walker, of the Supreme Court of this State, which well illustrates the exalted sense of honor that has always marked the private and public life of this distinguished judge. On one occasion, in the early days of his practice, a person against whom a judgment had been previously rendered, and who was desirous of fraudulently incumbering or otherwise covering up his property in such a way as to avoid its payment, called at Mr. Walker's office, and, stating his business, asked whether there was any means of preventing a levy or sale of his property to satisfy the judgment. Mr. Walker, discovering the man's real design to be a fraudulent proceeding to defeat a just demand, promptly replied that nothing was more easy: "What will I have to do?" asked the client. "Pay the judgment," replied Mr. Walker, "and no one will dare to touch your property." It is needless to add that the disgusted client went elsewhere for legal assistance in accomplishing his fraudulent purposes.

JUSTICE DE WOLF ON LAWYERS.

Justice DeWolf, of Chicago, who has filled the judicial chair for over twenty years, although he wears a very solemn face, loves a quiet joke now and then. A jury was being empanelled before him once, and a well-known lawyer happened to be summoned upon it. The attorney for one of the parties perceiving him in the jury-box, said: "Your Honor, I object to this man; he is a lawyer." The justice looked gravely over his spectacles, and in a sepulchral tone, remarked: "Your objection is not well taken, for the gentleman don't know enough law to disqualify him."

JUSTICES' FEES IN CRIMINAL CASES.

At the last term of the Criminal Court of Cook county, one of the Chicago justices was indicted and tried for receiving fees from the prosecuting witness in a criminal case, the indictment charging that he had received a fee when no fee was allowed by law.

A jury was waived and the case submitted to the court. Judge Jameson, then presiding, said that while he fully exonerated the defendant from any criminal intent, he was of the opinion that he had violated the statute under which he was indicted. The Constitution of the State provided that "every person ought to obtain by law, right and justice, freely and without being obliged to purchase it," and it would be a violation of that provision if magistrates were allowed to demand pay for issuing criminal process to persons seeking to apprehend offenders against the law. An opinion of Attorney General Edsall on the same subject, which was read in the case, and which was furnished at the request of the State's attorney, fully harmonized with the views of Judge Jameson.

If these opinions are correct, and there can be little reason to doubt it, in all cases where the fees cannot be collected of the party convicted or the prosecution fails, justices are dependant entirely for their compensation upon the County Board, which the statute provides, "may, in its discretion, direct that the cost of the prosecution, or so much thereof as shall seem just and equitable shall be paid out of the county treasury."

If this "discretion" be soundly exercised no injustice will be done, but if it be not, then the justice will have spent his time for naught, for no action will lie against the State for costs.—Legal Adviser.

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

OPINION FILED OCT. 14, 1875.

THE PEOPLE ex rel. THE CAIRO & ST. LOUIS R. R. CO. v. JAMES B. ANDERSON et al., trustees of schools, etc.

TOWNSHIP FOR SCHOOL PURPOSES—SUBSCRIPTION FOR RAILROAD STOCK—CORPORATE POWERS.

1. SUBSCRIPTION FOR STOCK.—That a township organized for school purposes by the general school law in a county not under township organization cannot, under the Constitution of 1848, be empowered to incur a debt for the purpose of subscribing for the stock of a railroad company.

2. CORPORATE PURPOSE.—That the contracting such a debt and the levy and collection of taxes to pay the same with its accruing interest, cannot be held a corporate purpose within the meaning of that instrument.

3. A DISTINCTION.—That a distinction has been made between townships in counties under township organization, and those in counties not under township organization.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

Opinion by WALKER, J.

The question is distinctly presented by these records—whether a township, organized for school purposes, by the general school law, can, under the Constitution of 1848, be empowered to incur a debt for the purpose of subscribing for the stock of a railroad company; whether contracting such a debt, and the levy and collection of taxes to pay the same, with its accruing interest, can be held a corporate purpose, within the meaning of that instrument.

It is urged by appellees that Art. IX., Sec. 5, of that Constitution prohibits the General Assembly from conferring that power on such a body; that the creation of such a debt, and the levy of such a tax, is not for a corporate purpose. That section provides that "the corporate authorities of counties, townships, school districts, cities, towns, and villages, may be invested with power to assess and collect taxes for corporate purposes." This clause was manifestly intended to limit the legislative power in conferring authority on corporate bodies to assess and collect taxes. Without any provision in the Constitution on the subject, the General Assembly have the power to impose taxes as they may choose. They could impose a tax on one species of property and exempt another. They could fix the mode of ascertaining the manner of its imposition as they might choose, if the power was not limited and the mode prescribed in the fundamental law. This was, then, most clearly, a limitation of legislative power.

Had this restriction not been imposed, the General Assembly could have empowered any of these quasi corporations or municipalities to levy and collect taxes for any purpose, whether germane to the object of its organization, or for other purposes. They could have authorized a school district to levy and collect a tax to build a court-house or jail, bridge or other county object, or a school township or district to erect a poor-house and maintain the paupers of the county.

These school townships were created and are continued for school purposes alone, and not for municipal purposes. They are only intended to establish schools, and loan and manage the school fund of the township, and pay the teachers of schools taught in their jurisdiction. This is the purpose of their organization. They were not created to exercise any of the functions of government, and hence are not municipal in their nature or purpose; nor are they provided with the officers or the power to exercise the functions of government. Cities, towns, and villages are endowed with such powers, and are created and maintained for their exercise. Their very object is to aid in the government of the people; and such is true, in a more limited sense, of counties. But none of these functions are conferred upon school townships or districts; but their creation is purely to aid in the great scheme of accomplishing universal education.

The body of men who framed the Constitution must be supposed to have known the meaning of the language employed, and they must have believed that it would be understood in its ordinary sense; and they must have supposed it would receive a reasonable interpretation and a practicable application in the administration of government. When, therefore, they used the language "for corporate purposes," they supposed that if any question arose in the construction of this clause that the legislative, executive, or judicial department of the State, which was required to apply its principles, would look and see what was the object of the creation of the body, and limit it to that purpose. They did not, on the one hand, expect that there would be an effort to push the construction to the extent that it would embrace all purposes which might be brought in the corporate power; nor yet, on the other hand, to so contract and narrow the construction as to exclude purposes that are embraced in their charters, but which may not be strictly germane to corporations of that character, but that it would be held to authorize the exercise of the power when the body is created for specified purposes, although of a mixed character—as if these school townships had been empowered, in addition to the duties imposed upon them, to locate, open, and maintain roads in the limits of their territory; then they could have been empowered to levy a tax for the maintenance of roads, as that would have been a corporate purpose.

But school townships are not invested with such power over roads, and hence they cannot be invested with authority to assess and collect a road tax, nor can it be until one of the purposes of its existence shall be to repair the roads in the township. To give any other construction would be to abrogate and wholly disregard this provision. To say that because the General Assembly confers the power to levy a tax for any purpose, that the law of the organization of such body is thereby changed, and the tax is for a corporate purpose, would be to render the restriction nugatory. We fail to comprehend the force of such reasoning, and we must give some effect to this constitutional provision. Although that constitution has ceased to be a rule for the guidance of the departments of governments, still all laws adopted whilst in force and all rights acquired under it, must be tried by and enforced as though it was in full vigor.

Had the construction contended for by appellant been what was intended, why not have simply said that these bodies might be invested with power to "assess and collect taxes"? Or why insert any provision on the subject, and let the power of the General Assembly remain unrestricted? That strikes us as the more natural and reasonable course that would have been pursued. Tested by these rules the subscription by a school township or school district for the stock in a railroad company, or the levy of a tax to raise the money for the same, cannot be held to be a corporate purpose. Such a tax in no wise aids or promotes education, for which such bodies are created. And this is the construction given to this clause in the cases of Trustees of Schools, etc. v. Toledo, W. & W. R. R. Co., 63 Ill., 299; People ex rel. v. Dupuyh (Jan. T., 1874), when the same question was before the court as is presented by this record.

It is, however, urged that townships in counties under township organization have been held capable of subscribing to the stock of a railroad company and levying a tax for the payment of the same, and that the same should be applied to a school township. All of the congressional townships in the State are created quasi school corporations and are vested with limited powers to establish schools and perform a few functions pertaining to that object. On the other hand townships created under the township organization law are invested with numerous and important governmental functions. They are authorized to locate, open and maintain roads, to construct and repair bridges, to pass by-laws regulating fences, and the conditions under which stock may run at large. Thus it is seen, these bodies are municipal in their character, and school townships have no such power. But the purpose of their creation is entirely different. It is urged that a liberal construction should be given this clause, and by doing so school townships may be embraced in its provisions.

It was only by the most liberal construction that counties, cities and towns were held to be embraced in this provision, and it was mainly in deference to the other departments of government in following the construction they had given this clause, and from the fact that these bodies were entrusted with making and repairing roads and bridges, that it was held to be a corporate purpose. But in doing so, construction was pushed to the utmost verge, and to hold that school townships and school districts were embraced would be to make an immense advance on the construction there given. Nor does it follow that because the courts have given the most liberal construction and sustained doubtful powers, that they will advance farther and embrace and sustain unauthorized powers. It is not a justifiable rule of interpretation, that because a very liberal construction has been given that the courts must give one more liberal. A point must be reached where there must be a limit of power under this clause.

If, because a municipal corporation created for governmental purposes may be invested with such powers, it does not follow that some other body having some of the attributes of a municipal corporation may be. It may be, and probably is true that to be constitutional such a power could not be conferred upon any but municipal corporations.

It is said that municipal townships were not in existence when the constitution of 1848 was adopted, and that school townships were. This is true, but that instrument provided for their organization. And knowing that when organized they would be municipal, they were as fully embraced in this provision of that article as were counties, cities, towns and villages. In fact, it fully embraces all such corporations created for public purposes, that were then in existence or that should be thereafter created. If a new county, city or town were created, it would fall as fully within the provision as one already brought into existence.

Nor does the argument, that simply because the construction of a road would promote the interest and advance the prosperity of the township render it a corporate purpose. It may show, that the people of the township had been unfortunate in the county not having adopted township organization, and the township thus become a corporation capable of aiding in the construction of the road. But it does not follow, that because they were not in a position to avail of the constitutional provision, that it shall be wholly disregarded, and held for naught.

On a careful review of the former decisions of this court, and the reasons which led to them, in the light of the argument of counsel for appellants, we do not see even the slightest grounds for overruling or modifying the principles of those decisions; but, on the contrary, we are fully satisfied with them as announcing the settled law of this court.

The judgment of the court below is affirmed.

Judgment affirmed.

BREESE, J.—I have never doubted the authority of the legislature to confer upon school townships the power to take stock in a railroad projected through the school township. Such a work may greatly enhance the value of the school lands belonging to the township, and the dividends on the stock may relieve the people from the payment of taxes to support schools therein.

W. S. SEARLS for appellants.
SPRAGUE & MICHAN for appellees.

We are under obligations to JOHN N. CRAWFORD, of the law firm of Crawford & Renick, of this city, for the following opinion:

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

OPINION FILED JAN. 21, 1876.

No. 63—JOHN B. LYON et al. v. CHARLES M. CULBERTSON et al.

Appeal from Cook.

CHICAGO BOARD OF TRADE—USAGE—WHAT CONSTITUTES—RULE OF THE BOARD OF TRADE—OPTION CONTRACTS.

4. USAGE.—Evidence of a usage among members of the Board of Trade of Chicago, that where the name of the principal is not demanded from the broker at the time of a transaction, the broker alone is accepted and considered the responsible party, is admissible to explain the intention of the parties, and to ascertain the nature and extent of their contracts.

2. WHAT CONSTITUTES.—To constitute such a usage, there must have been such long and general acquiescence in it that the jury will feel themselves constrained to find that it entered into the minds of the parties and formed a part of the contract.

3. RULE OF THE BOARD OF TRADE.—A rule of the Board of Trade of Chicago, providing that on default of either party to a contract to make additional deposit of security or margin within the next banking hour, when demanded, the other may give notice to consider the contract filled at the market value of the article at the time of notice, is contrary to the law of the land and void.

4. OPTION CONTRACTS.—A party demanding performance of a contract must himself be ready, able and willing to perform the contract on his part, and must, as a general rule, tender performance before he can put the other in default and recover for a breach; and a rule of the Board of Trade dispensing with such readiness or tender, is contrary to the law of the land and void.

Opinion of the Court by WALKER, J.

It appears that appellees, as partners in the firm of Culbertson, Blair & Co., brought suit against appellants, also partners under the firm name of J. B. Lyon & Co., to recover damages for an alleged failure to fulfil certain contracts for the purchase of wheat.

The contracts were similar, except as to amount, etc., and the others were signed by different persons, and this is one of them: "Chicago, Aug. 14, 1872. We have this day bought of Culbertson, Blair & Co., ten thousand bushels of No. 2 spring wheat in store, at one dollar fifty-seven and one-half cents per bushel, to be delivered at seller's option during August, 1872." "This contract is subject in all respects to the rules and regulations of the Board of Trade of the city of Chicago.

J. B. Lyon & Co." "C."

Sections one and two of Rule nine of the Board of Trade are supposed to govern this case, and they are these:

"Section 1. On all time contracts, made between members of the association, deposits for security and margin may be demanded by either or both parties, said margin not to exceed ten (10) per cent., on the value of the property bought or sold on the day it is demanded. All such deposits to be made with the treasurer of the association, unless otherwise agreed upon by the parties. Said deposits and margins may be demanded on and after the day of contract, and from time to time as may be necessary to fully protect the party calling for the same. When margins are demanded, the party called upon shall be entitled to deduct from the margin called any difference there may be in his favor between the market price and the contract price of the property bought or sold. Any deposit made to equalize the contract price with the market price shall be considered as a deposit for security, and not margin.

"Sec. 2. Should the party called upon as herein provided for, fail to respond within the next banking hour, it shall thereafter be optional with the party making such call, by giving notice to the delinquent to consider the contract filled at the market value at the time of giving such notice; and all differences between said market value and the contract price shall be settled the same at though the time of said contract had fully expired.

"Provided, however, that when the call is made during the general meeting of the Board, between 11 A. M., and 1 P.M., the deposit shall be made before 2 o'clock of the same day."

Under these contracts deposits and margins were put up by both parties from time to time. On August the 19th, 1872, the market for No. 2 spring wheat opened at from $1.55 to $1.57 and declined during the day, closing after exchange hours, at from $1.44 to as low as $1.38. On the 20th, the market opened at 9 o'clock A.M., at from $1.27 to $1.34, and fell rapidly until some time between 11 and 1 o'clock it reached $1.10 or $1.11 per bushel. It was claimed that appellees, on the morning of the 20th, became entitled to further deposits, and thereupon by written notices sent to the offices of the buyers, demand was made of Lyon & Co. of further margins, but they failed to respond to these calls within the next banking hour; that on such failure Culbertson, Blair & Co, without tendering any wheat, elected under the rule to consider the contracts filled, and charged up to Lyon & Co. the difference between the price at which they had agreed to purchase, and $1.11½, and notified them of such election.

This suit was brought to recover the differences, and the jury found a verdict for the amount claimed. The case is brought to this court by appeal, and various questions are raised on the record.

The contract signed by Anderson is claimed to have been otherwise settled, and hence is not properly in the case. Bnt the contract signed by Templeton as the purchaser, was admitted in evidence against the objection of appellants.

The court also excluded evidence offered by appellants to show a usage among the members of the Board of Trade, to demand of the broker the name of his principal at the time of the purchase, and a failure to do so was an election by the seller to look alone to the agent for a fulfillment of the contract. The proper foundation for the introduction of this evidence, was laid, and thus the question of the validity of such a usage is fairly presented.

Inasmuch as the great mass of commercial business is transacted by men pressed by their affairs, and who are not in the habit, even if time permitted, of reducing their agreements to writing beyond a mere memorandum, the courts are compelled to look to the usage of each trade or business, to learn the real intention of the parties. If such usages were not resorted to, it is believed that in a large number, if not the greater portion of commercial transactions, the intention of the parties would be frustrated instead of carried into effect. When there is a known usage, which obtains in trade, it must be presumed that all of hose engaged therein, where the usage prevails, contract with a view to it, unless they exclude it by their contract. It has been repeatedly held by this court that a usage or custom is to interpret the otherwise indeterminate intention of the parties, and to ascertain the nature and extent of their contracts arising, not from their express stipulations, but from mere implications and presumptions, and acts of doubtful or equivocal character. To have commercial usage take the place of general law, it must be so uniformly acquiesced in by length of time, that the jury will feel themselves constrained to find that it entered into the minds of the parties and formed a part of the contract. Dixon v. Donahue, 14 Ill., 324; Crawford v. Clark, 15 Ill., 561.

It has also been held that such customs as are universally known to exist, enter into and form part of every contract to which they are applicable, although not mentioned or alluded to in the contract. Munn v. Busch, 25 Ill., 35. But proof of usage can only be allowed to show the intention or understanding of the parties in the absence of special agreement. Fay v. Strawn, 32 Ill., 295; Deshler v. Beers, 32 Ill., 368. The parties, when entering into a contract are supposed to have reference to the known usage and customs which enter into and govern the business or subject-matter to which it relates, unless the parties rebut the presumption by the contract itself. Home Ins. Co. v. Favorite, 46 Ill., 263. But to be binding a custom must be uniform, long established and generally acquiesced in, and so generally known as to induce the belief that the contract was made with reference to it unless rebutted by the agreement. Turner v. Dawson, 50 Ill., 85. Thus it is seen that the doctrine is fully established in our system of jurisprudence. We are of the opinion that the court erred in rejecting this evidence.

The first section of the charter of the Board of Trade provides that the corporation may "make such rules, regulations and by-laws, from time to time, as they may think proper or necessary for the government of the corporation hereby created, not contrary to the laws of the land."

The question, then, arises: Whether the rule or by-law of the company is valid, which, on all time contracts between members of the association, require deposits for security and margin on and after date of the contract, and from time to time, as may be necessary to protect the party calling for the same, and on the failure of the party called on to make such deposit within the next banking hour, giving the other party the option by giving notice, to consider the contract filled at the market value of the goods at the time the notice was given. Is this rule contrary to the law of the land? Have the association, under their charter, the power to change the rule in regard to contracts so as to dispense with a tender, or at least a readiness to perform by the party claiming a forfeiture of the contract?

Where a party has property, and another contracts to purchase it, to be delivered at a future day, and the seller is required to keep it for delivery, he may, as a matter of prudence, or even choice, require that the purchaser shall give security for payment when delivered; and the other party may also, if he choose, require security for the delivery of the property on the day. So with optional contracts, when the seller may choose to deliver, or the buyer may choose to receive the property. But, according to the most elementary rules governing contracts, the party demanding a performance of the contract must himself be ready, able and willing, and, as a general rule, must offer to perform his part of the contract before he can put the other in default and recover for a breach. This has ever been regarded as fundamental in the law of contracts.

Under the general rules of law, where either party has the option to fix the time for the delivery, when he fixes it he must, to put the other party in default, be fully able, and must offer, to perform his part of the agreement.

This is a rule of general application, subject to a few slight modifications or exceptions. Is not this rule of the Board of Trade in violation of it, and, therefore, contrary to the law of the land, and void for that reason? It does not require either party to be prepared and to offer to perform. For aught that appears, the sellers may not have had a bushel of wheat, or, for that matter, have been unable to procure a bushel. May, then, the Board of Trade, by rule, authorize a seller to exercise an option to deliver many thousands of bushels of grain, when he does not have a bushel to deliver, and sue for and recover as though he actually had the amount and had offered or tendered the same? If so, then they may repeal the law of the land and substitute a new rule in violation of its requirements. Independent of this rule, all know that appellees would have been required to have shown that they had the grain on hand, or warehouse receipts therefor, of sufficient quantity and proper quality to have filled their contract, and they would also have been required to at least make an offer to deliver it, or warehouse receipts therefor, before they could have recovered for damages sustained.

It is true the contracts say the wheat was in store when the agreement was entered into, but the record is barren of all evidence to show that appellees had a bushel in store, or otherwise, when they elected to treat the contract filled. Even if it were conceded to be true when the agreement was made, it may be that it was sold the next or some other day, and it or any other wheat was not on hand to be delivered. If, when the notice was given, and within time limited for appellants to put up the margin, they had tendered the money at the contract price, and had demanded the wheat, is it pretended that appellees could have delivered it, or any portion of it, or warehouse receipts therefor? If so, it is most assuredly not proved that they could have complied.

Shall all of the rules be reversed regulating commerce and trade by this organization? It was created to promote the best interests of trade in the great commercial mart of Chicago, within and not outside of the law governing trade and commerce, and not to overturn the long and well-established law of trade. And this being the case, the courts should not, by a strained construction, enable that body to substitute other and different rules, repugnant to the settled law of the land.

If it be said that persons have the undoubted right to purchase grain for future delivery, the proposition is conceded; but, trammelled as these contracts were, can it be said that they have the elements of a bona fide transaction? Or is it not more like a mere wager on the price of grain on a given day? Where no grain is owned at the time of the sale, nor is any expected to be, or to be delivered or received, but simply that the difference in the stipulated price and the actual price at the time for delivery, is to be paid—if above, to the purchaser, and if below, to the seller—such a transaction is only, in fact, a wager, and the whole thing is but a gambling transaction; and such transactions are unlike real business operations, and are injurious to trade and demoralizing in their tendency. Such transactions tend to derange prices, produce great fluctuations, and produce injury, if not ruin, to the fair and legitimate traders, by inflations or depressions in prices, by such wagers being made by men not in business, but simply gambling on the grain exchange. And it is believed that under this rule of the Board of Trade dispensing with a delivery, or offer to deliver, with a present ability to do so, this species of gambling can be carried on without restraint. Hence, the rule, so far as it dispenses with a delivery, or an ability with an offer to deliver, is not only unlawful, but encourages gaming, and is, therefere, pernicious.

Where a transaction is fair and real, it can be shown, by proving an ability to perform by delivering grain or warehouse receipts that have not been sold perhaps a dozen of times to other persons. And such should be one of the tests of its fairness, and that it is a bona fide sale. Such seems to be the reason of the common law rule requiring a tender or an offer with the abiflity to perform, before the other party can be put in default. The law will not permit a party to recover for a breach of contract when he is unable or unwilling to perform on his part, and to do so would be to license wagers on the price of property under the forms of a purchase.

The law has always fostered trade and has never tolerated practices that retard, obstruct or embarrass its free action. Hence, all that tends to its injury or its free course has been held illegal. And to sanction practices which must inevitably damage prices, demoralize its votaries or work injury to the producing and business classes, cannot be sanctioned.

Were men to organize in large numbers and from day to day and constantly bet on the future price of grain, all would say that such a practice would be pernicious, and should be suppressed. In such wagers no one could expect the courts of the country to uphold and enforce them. And in effect what is the distinction between that and making a contract for delivery of grain at a future day, when the one has no grain and expects to have none, and the other neither desires or expects to receive any, at the time of delivery, but simply expects, if fortunate, to receive the amount that it has risen above the purchase price, or if unfortunate, to pay whatever it may have fallen below? Such a transaction is as much a wager in effect as a bet on the cast of a die or a game at cards.

The rule of the Board of Trade, adopting the failure of one of the parties to put up the margin as therein required, as a fulfillment by the other party of his part of the agreement, being unauthorized, nothingt but he ability of the party claiming the forfeiture of the agreement and an offer or tender of the wheat or warehouse receipts could have sufficed. The Board of Trade have no power to substitute something else for this requirement, and it cannot be dispensed with by the courts.

This is a question that involves the interest of large numbers of community besides mere brokers and "gamblers on 'change." The vast number of producers whose grain has to go to the Chicago market for sale, have a deep interest in the question and its solution. If this species of gambling is sanctioned as legal, then the price that shall be paid the producer will at all times depend upon the combination of these gamblers to reduce prices on the one side, and their inflation on the other, leaving the law of demand and supply, with the other considerations of trade, powerless to exert their beneficial and correcting influence in the various channels of business.

It is believed that no means can be invented to produce more or greater uncertainty in the price of commodities to produce greater revulsions in business, to produce ruin and bankruptcy, and great and irretrievable loss upon honest industry and men struggling to create and sustain small but legitimate business, than these pretended purchases and sales which are but wagers in effect. The whole thing is illegal, injurious, and requires to be suppressed.

The judgment of the court below is reversed and the cause remanded.

Judgment reversed.

LEONARD SWETT and JOHN J. HERRICK, for appellants.

DENT & BLACK, for appellees.

NOTE.—This case decides two principal points. The first, on the question of usage, is in accordance with all the authorities. Where a usage of trade has grown so general that all men in that trade act upon it, or take it for granted, even when not expressly mentioned, it has the force of law, and is presumed to enter into all contracts covered by its terms. Whether there is such a usage is always a question of fact to be determined by the jury from the evidence, but its force and effect is a question of law for the court. Such usages may be, and generally are, contrary to well-known rules of law, as in this case, but, nevertheless, are valid between parties acting upon them. Thompson v. Davenport, 2 Smith's Leading Cases, 342; Taintor v. Pendegrast, 3 Hill., 72; Gressell v. Bristowe, 4 L. R., 30.

The second point decided is, that the Board of Trade of Chicago have no pow- to adopt a rule or by-law providing that on time contracts, where one party demands deposit of security or margin, that unless such deposit is made within the next banking hour, he may elect to consider the contract filled at the market value of the article at the time the notice was given; and such a rule adopted by them is void, being contrary to a general rule of law that neither party to a general contract can recover for a breach thereof, or put the other in default, without a tender of performance on his part, or showing a willingness and ability to perform. This seems to be the main ground upon which the decision is based. The court further say that such a rule encourages gaming, and is, therefore, pernicious.

The effort of the court to strike down gambling operations, such as is described in the opinion, will, undoubtedly, meet with approval from all classes. But care must be taken to restrict the somewhat general language of the court to such operations as are mere wagers.

The decision does not hold that option contracts are gambling contracts, but that in the case of gambling contracts, this rule of the Board of Trade will not enable parties to dispense with requirements which the law compels.

Whether or not an option contract is a gambling contract, is a question of fact for a jury. Kirkpatrick v. Bonsall, 72 Penna. St., 155; McIlvaine v. Egerton, 2 Robt., 422. It may be the cloak of a gaming venture, but it may be, also, used in legitimate operations. Hence it must always be a question of fact whether any particular transaction is a gambling operation or not.

"We must not confound gambling. whether it be in corporation stocks or merchandise, with what is commonly called speculation. Merchants speculate upon the future prices of that in which they deal, and buy and sell accordingly. In other words, they think of, and weigh, that is, speculate upon the probabilities of the coming market, and act upon this look-out into the future in their business transactions; and in this they often exhibit high mental grasp and great knowledge of business and of the affairs of the world." Per Agnew, J, in Kirkpatrick v. Bonsall, 72 Penna. St., 155, and it was held in this case that a contract giving one party an option to call for so many barrels of oil, within a certain time, at a certain price, was not on its face a gambling contract, but was to be submitted to the jury with all the circumstances.

Bona fide time contracts for sale of stocks, or other personal property are legitimate. When stocks are bought and sold, although upon speculation, if they are to be delivered, it is not a gambling transaction. Smith v. Bouvier, 70 Penna. St., 325; see, also, Shales v. Seignoret, 1 Ld. Raymond, 440; McIlvaine v. Egerton 2 Robt. (N. Y.), 422.

The general principle, that a corporation has no power to enact a by-law which shall be contrary to the law of the land, is well settled. Angel and Ames on Corporations, 346. The authorities are not a few which hold that a corporation can make no by law contrary to law, good morals or public policy. Taylor v. Griswold, 2 Green. (N. J.), 222; Sayre v. Louisville Union Benevolent Association, 1 Duval, 143; Kennebec & Portland R. R. v. Kendall, 31 Me., 470.

Viewed from this standpoint, the Supreme Court is undoubtedly correct in deciding that the Board of Trade has no power to pass a by-law which will dispense with the necessity of parties fulfilling to each other their legal obligations.

But it is equally well settled in the law, that what may be bad as a by-law may be good as a contract. Angel & Ames on Corporations, 351; Adley v. Whitestable, 17 Vesey, 323. A man may part with a right voluntarily, which it would be unjust to deprive him of by a by-law passed without his knowledge or consent. Hence it will be found that a by-law may be void as against strangers or members who do not assent to it, and yet good as a contract between members of the corporation who do assent to it. Angel & Ames on Corporations, 352. This position seems also deducible from the decision on the question of usage. If a usage of the Board of Trade, although contrary to a rule of law, enters into and becomes part of a contract between parties cognizant of it, how much more would an express rule of the same Board, explicitly incorporated in the contract, become binding between the parties. The rule cannot aid a wagering contract; but where the contract is bona fide, the rule might not unlawfully be made a part of it.

The general rule of law, that neither party to a mutual contract can recover for a breach thereof, or put the other in default, without a tender of performance on his part, or showing a willingness and ability to perform, is, as stated by the court, elementary. But it is not inviolable. It is subject to another general maxim of the law, that any person may dispense with a rule provided for his benefit. Hence we see that this rule of tender is constantly and daily waived by parties to contracts, and a waiver may be by express language, or by a course of conduct. Root v. Wagner, 30 N. Y., 9; Buell v. Trustees, 3 N. Y., 197; Laird v. Pirn, 7 M. & W., 474. Even a constitutional provision affecting simply property or alienable rights may be waived. Phyfe v. Eimer, 45 N. Y., 102. So that if it should appear in any given case that the parties voluntarily entered into a contract which should embody a waiver by one of a rule of law intended for his benefit, or if by a course of conduct on his part, he should lead the other to act upon the supposition that this rule of law was waived by him, undoubtedly he would be estopped from setting it up in a suit arising out of the contract.

The facts of the case are not all fully stated in the opinion, and perhaps in the view taken by the court on the first point it was not essential. The case being reversed upon the question of usage, a decision of other points raised was not necessary, nor a statement of all the facts. Several important questions are argued in the very able briefs of the counsel on both sides, which are not noticed by the court. So too, one or two conceded questions of fact, such as the ability and willingness of the appellees to fill the contract, are also overlooked. The intention of the court was to strike a vigorous blow at gambling contracts and at all rules of the Board that might encourage them. The decision does not reach, nor is it intended to reach legitimate speculative operations.

The following conclusions may be deduced from it:

1. Usages of the Board of Trade enter into and become part of contracts made between members.
2. Option contracts in themselves are not invalid.
3. A rule of the Board of Trade will not render effective a gambling contract, nor enable parties to dispense with their legal obligations to each other.
4. Parties showing ability, willingness, and an offer to perform an option contract on their part, can recover thereon for a breach. They may also show an express or implied waiver of performance.

Chicago, February, 1876.

THROUGH the kindness of ALEX. S. BRADLEY, of the Chicago bar, we have received the following opinion:

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

OPINION FILED JAN. 21, 1876.

FREDERICK N. HAMLIN v. ALBERT S. RACE.

Appeal from Cook.

ACTION BROUGHT ON SPECIAL CONTRACT FOR SERVICES BEFORE THE EXPIRATION OF THE TERM—MEASURE OF DAMAGES—ETC.

1. When an employee under a contract for payment of money by installments for a term of service is discharged without cause, he can sue on the contract at the end of each month for the installment which accrues due at that time, or wait till the end of the term and sue for the whole.
2. If he sues on the contract for damages for the whole term, he can only recover for the amount that would have been due, had he continued in service, at the time the suit was instituted.
3. If, when discharged, he rescinds the contract and then sues for its breach, it may be that he can recover for all the damages he sustained during the term by the breach, if the trial was had after the expiration of the term.

Opinion by WALKER, J.

Appellee was employed on the first of of January, 1873, by Hamlin, Hale & Co., as a salesman in their store for one year, at a salary of $1,020, in monthly installments of $85. They, on the 23d of June following, dismissed him from their service, when they offered to pay him the amount that was due him to that date, which he declined to receive, and on the 6th of the following August brought this suit, to recover the balance for the full year, and on a trial in the court below recovered the full amount.

The declaration was in assumpsit, and contains a special count, with usual common counts. The plea of the general issue was filed, and on the trial the defense relied on was that appellee was discharged for good and sufficient cause.

It is contended that appellee was insolent to his employers, and coarse and vulgar in his conduct to such an extent as fully justified appellants in discharging him. This was a question of fact for the determination of the jury. All will at once concede that an employee must be respectful and obedient to all reasonable commands of his employers, and those having control of the business in which he is employed. And no one will dispute that a person so employed, must, when engaged in the discharge of his business, and in his intercourse with customers, and persons transacting business with the house, and with his employers, and those having charge of the business, be respectful, and must abstain from all vulgarity and obscenity of language and conduct. If wanting in any of these requirements, it would be ground for discharging a salesman in a store from his employment.

But the question raised and pressed on our consideration, is as to the measure for the recovery of damages in the case, appellant contending that appellee was in no event, on the pleadings in the case, entitled to recover more than was due at the time he brought his suit. That under the pleadings he cannot recover for the monthly installments, or any of them, after the suit was brought. On the other hand, it is argued that, as the year for which appellee was engaged had fully expired before the suit was tried, he was entitled to recover the unpaid balance of the $1020, which appellants had agreed to pay him.

Appellant contends that, inasmuch as appellee did not, when he was discharged, terminate the contract, or elect to so treat it, but on the contrary, considered it as still subsisting, and was ready and willing to perform it in full if required, he can only claim as damages in this suit the amount that would have been due him at the time the suit was commenced, had he continued in the employment of appellants. That if he desired to recover damages beyond that sum, he should, when discharged, have notified appellants that as they had chosen to terminate the contract, he would treat it as rescinded, and hold them for all damages he had sustained by their terminating the agreement.

This precise question, in the shape now presented to the court, has never been passed upon by us, although analogous questions may have been.

The law is well settled, that on a contract for the payment of money by installments, assumpsit will usually lie to recover each installment as it falls due, without waiting for the last to mature. 1 Chit. Pl., 116. Here was a sum of money to be paid by monthly installments, and there can be no doubt that appellee, at the end of each month, could have sued for and recovered for the installment which accrued due at that time. But it is equally well settled that a party cannot, when he sues for an installment which is due, recover for installments not due when the suit was brought. And where the declaration showed by its averments, that a recovery of installments not due was claimed, and there was a general verdict, the courts considered it grounds for arresting the judgment, because the plaintiff was not entitled to recover for the portion claimed in the declaration which was not due at the institution of the suit. If it were necessary to quote authorities on so simple and well-settled a proposition, we might refer to note 1 to the case of Hambleton v. Veere, 2 Saund. R. 171, a and b, and the cases therein cited; Gordon v Kennedy, 2 Brim, 287, and the authorities there referred to by the court.

We had supposed no rule was more inflexible or better established than that a plaintiff cannot recover for money not due at the institution of the suit. Gordon v. Kennedy, supra; Chit. Pl., 372; Cunningham v. Morrell, 20 J. R., 203; McLure v. Bush, 9 Dana, 64; Allen v. Sanders, 7 B. Monr., 593; Kittle v. Harvey, 21 Verm., 301; Low v. Belknap, 1 Cush., 279; and Thompkins v. Elliot, 5 Wend, 496. If this rule could be seriously questioned, other cases could be referred to as establishing the rule. But to our minds it requires no authority, as it is based upon principles obviously just.

If, then, a party cannot sue for and recover a debt or claim before it is due, why should he do indirectly the same thing, by sueing for a small part when due, and recovering a greater and more substantial part, accruing after the suit has been brought? The law never permits that to be done indirectly which it prohibits from being done directly. To permit the recovery of the sums falling due after suit brought, would be an evasion of the rule that the cause of action must be complete when suit is brought. It would be without analogy to any rule of law which now occurs to us. In the case of Crabtree v. Hagenbaugh, 25 Ill., 233, it was said that where a party sued for the breach of an independent portion of a contract, he might recover for its breach, though his recovery would be limited to the damages sustained at the time the suit was commenced.

We have no hesitation in holding that appellee was only entitled to recover for the amount that would have been due, had he continued in the service of appellants, at the time the suit was instituted, and the court below erred in admitting evidence of the installments that would have matured afterwards. Suppose that after the suit had been brought appellants had demanded of appellee the fulfillment of his part of the contract and he had refused, then what would have been the measure of damages? Obviously not more than the wages which had accrued up to the time of the demand. Then, why permit a recovery beyond the damages sustained when suit was brought? Or, suppose a trial had been had ten or fifteen days after suit was brought, and the same damages as were recovered in this case, had been allowed, and after the recovery appellants had demanded of appellee to go on and perform his contract and he had refused, would appellants have been compelled to sue and recover the amount back? Yet such a thing might occur, when the plaintiff is still insisting upon being allowed to perform his part of the agreement.

Such a state of things would be an anomaly. If he insists upon going on with his part of the agreement, he should sue when each installment accrues, or wait till the end of the time, and sue for the whole.

At common law it was a ground of arrest to claim such installments in the declaration. So it is a ground requiring the granting a new trial, to permit proof of the same, unless it is apparent that it was not considered by the jury, and was excluded from the verdict. But in this case it is manifest that the installments which were not due when appellee sued, entered into and formed much the greater portion of the finding.

Had appellee, when discharged, terminated the agreement and then sued on the breach of the contract, it may be that a different rule might have prevailed Then the cause of action would have been the breach, and it would have been averred that the contract was at an end, and that plaintiff had been thrown out of employment, whereby he had sustained damage, etc. In such a case, it may be that he could have recovered for all the damage he sustained during the year by the breach of the contract, if the trial was had after its expiration. In such a case, the damage would have continued, had he been unable to procure employment during the time.

But the suit here is not for a breach of the entire contract, and abandoned by appellee; but, on the contrary, he avers that he insisted upon its performance during the remainder of the year.

The judgment of the court below is reversed and the cause remanded.

WE are under obligations to EARL BILL, clerk of the court at Cleveland, for the following opinion:

U. S. CIR. COURT, N. D. OF OHIO.

ELIZABETH CLIPPINGER, administratrix of the estate of JOHN CRESTEAD, deceased,

v.

MISSOURI VALLEY LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY.

REMOVAL OF CAUSES FROM STATE TO FEDERAL COURT—STATUTES CONSTRUED.

Motion by plaintiff to dismiss and remand to State Court.

The plaintiff filed a petition against the defendant, on a policy of insurance, in the Court of Common Pleas of Allen county, on the 28th day of December, A. D. 1872. On the 18th of January, 1873, and before appearance, the defendant, being a non-resident company, filed a petition for removal of the case to the Circuit Court of the United States, and at the February term, 1873, of said court, filed the necessary affidavit, and offered surety as required by the statute, at which term the Common Pleas Court refused to make an order of removal and dismissed the petition, the defendant excepting to the ruling.

On the 19th of April, 1873, the defendant filed its answer in Common Pleas to the original petition, on which issue at the October term, 1873, a trial was had, and verdict and judgment entered for the plaintiff. At the same term a second trial was demanded and allowed and bond given therefor, as authorized by the statute of the State. Afterwards, on the 19th of February, 1874, an amended answer was filed by the defendant to the original petition in said court. On the 23d of February, 1874, in term time, a second petition for removal to this court was filed by the defendant, alleging non-residence of the State, with, proper affidavit alleging local prejudice, and surety offered, and bond given, as required by the statute, for removal. At the May term, 1874, answer to petition for removal was filed by the plaintiff, and on hearing the court dismissed the petition for removal. At the October term, 1874, a second trial on the issue made in the original case, was had in said court, and a verdict and judgment rendered for the plainiff.

On the 13th of March, 1875, the defendant filed a petition in error in the District Court of Allen county to reverse the judgment so lastly rendered in the Common Pleas, alleging for error among other things the dismissal of the petition for removal as aforesaid; and at the April term, 1875, of said District Court, that court reversed the Common Pleas for the assigned error of dismissing said petition for removal. At the May term, 1875, of the Common Pleas, in pursuance of the said judgment of the District Court, that court made an order accepting the sureties, and ordered that no further proceedings be had in said court in the case.

Certified copies of the pleadings, etc., were filed in this court on the 26th day of August, A. D. 1875.

The plaintiff files a motion to dismiss the case from this court and remand the same to the State court.

First—Because the petition, affidavit and bond for the removal of the cause to this court were not filed in the Court of Common Pleas until after the trial of the cause.

Second—Because the certified transcripts of the process, pleadings, etc., were not filed in this court within the time prescribed in the statute after the filing of the petition, affidavit and bond for removal.

Third—Because the removal of the cause to this court is contrary to law, and this court has no jurisdiction to try and determine the same.

In determining this motion it will only be necessary to examine the second ground of the motion in connection with the third. As to the time of the filing of the petition for removal to this court, it is conceded that the first petition was in time under the act of 1789, and the second under the act of A. D. 1873, which combines the preceding statutes on that subject in the Revised Statutes then passed.

It would seem from the fact that the defendant, after having filed the first petition for removal, failed to file copies of the process, etc., in this court, and filed an answer in the State Court, and there went to trial on the issue made, as well as the filing of the subsequent petition, affidavit, etc., for removal in 1874, that it had waived any right to file the papers under that petition. Indeed it is not claimed that it had such right.

The question then is, had the defendant the right to file copies, &c., in this court under the second petition. No question is made as to whether the case itself was a proper one to be removed, or that the defendant had not brought itself within the statue by the filing of a petition and affidavit and offer of surety in the State Court, but it is claimed that it did not file the papers for removal in this court within the time prescribed by the statute.

Each of the statutes upon the subject of removal, in force at the time the last petition was filed, provide "that on filing such petition and affidavit, and offering good and sufficient surety, for entering in such Circuit Court, on the first day of its session next to be held, copies of the process, &c., it shall be the duty of the State Court to accept surety and proceed no further in the case, and that when said copies are entered as aforesaid in the Circuit Court, the cause shall then proceed in the same manner as if it had been brought there by original process."

Thus, this court obtains its jurisdiction in such cases; and thus the jurisdiction of a State court is terminated; that is to say, by a compliance, on the part of the party seeking to remove a cause, with the provisions of the Act of Congress respecting such removals, and as the jurisdiction of this court in such cases is of a purely statutory character, the provision of the Act of Congress should be strictly followed or no jurisdiction is obtained.

But it may be urged that in the case at bar, although the petition for removal was duly filed, supported by the proper affidavits to bring the application within the provisions of the act of Congress, and good and sufficient surety was offered, yet the Court of Common Pleas defeated or obstructed defendent's right of removal by dismissing its petition and refusing to accept the surety, and that this operates to excuse the defendant for its failure to enter copies, &c., in this court on the first day of its then next session and enlarge the time within which this may be done.

The answer is, the Court of Common Pleas had no power to do this. Its "duty" is clearly defined by the act of Congress, viz: "To accept the surety and proceed no farther in the cause." A failure or refusal to perform this plain duty cannot defeat the right of the defendant to remove the cause. On this point the language of an eminent jurist of New York is so clear and comprehensive that it is adopted here. Says Judge Blatchford: "No action of the State court could either confer the right or take it away. The discretion to be exercised by the State court in passing on the question as to whether the proper steps for a removal have been taken, and as to whether the evidence thereof is sufficient, and as to whether the surety is good and sufficient, is a legal discretion," (i. e. a discretion to be exercised in a legal manner and in accordance with its "duty"). "No order of the State court for the removal of the cause is necessary." "The right of the defendant to a removal is not dependant on the question whether the State court does or does not make an order for the removal. If it were so dependent, the refusal of the State court, in a proper case, to make such an order, would make it impossible for the defendant to secure the removal except by carrying the suit through the State tribunals," * * and thence "to the Supreme Court of the United States. (Sec. 6, Blatch C. C. Reports. 117, 118.) This interpretation of the acts of Congress stands uncontradicted so far as my researches have extended, and is believed to be the true one; and in the conclusions of the learned judge from the premises there laid down, I am forced to concur. He says: "If he (the party seeking a removal) does all that is necessary to secure a removal, then, whether the State court makes an order of removal or not, he can perfect the removal by entering in this court, at the proper time, copies of the proper papers, and his appearance and special bail, if necessary." As will have been seen, the proper time for entering in the Circuit Court "copies of the proper papers," etc., was on the first day of the next session after the filling of the petition for removal, affidavit, etc. In this case the last petition for removal was filed in the Court of Common Pleas on the 23d of February, 1874. The first day of the then next session of this court, was the 7th April, 1874, and "copies of the proper papers" were not filed in this court until the 26th of August, 1875, a point of time too late to enable this court to obtain jurisdiction of the cause in the manner provided by the statute. Nor can the action of the Court of Common Pleas of Allen county be held to excuse the delay, nor to enlarge the time within which the defendant might, and should have completed the steps necessary to the removal of his cause to this court.

In the act of 1875, which takes the place of all preceding statutes on this subject, we have a legislative construction that the time of entering copies, etc., in this court is material to the jurisdiction of this court. That act provides that "if the term of the Circuit Court to which the same is removable then next to be holden, shall commence within twenty days after the filing of the petition and bond in the State Court for its removal, then the removing party shall have twenty days from such application to file copy of record, etc."

The motion is sustained, and cause stricken from the docket for want of jurisdiction.

THE RIGHTS OF PERSONS HOLDING FIRE INSURANCE POLICIES ON BUILDINGS.

AN OPINION BY JUDGE WELKER.

The following decision by Judge Welker of the United States Court will be of interest to persons having fire insurance policies, as to a certain extent it shows in what cases insurance companies are liable for damage by fire.

John P. Dorn vs. Germania Insurance Company et al.

In the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Ohio. Motion for new trial.

The action was brought upon a policy of insurance issued by defendant upon a stone building with a stone addition on one side, and a frame addition attached to the stone building on the other side.

After the insurance, and before the fire the plaintiff, without the consent of defendants, cut off eighteen feet of the frame addition next the stone building, and placed the same at the rear end of the frame building addition, thereby detaching the frame addition from the stone building, but leaving the remainder of the frame addition unmoved. In making this alteration it was admitted that the risk of loss by fire was not in any way increased thereby. There was no express provision in the policy against alterations or requiring assent of the insurer to make improvements upon the property insured. In the fire which occured, besides damages to the stone building, the frame addition was entirely consumed, the fire having originated somewhere in the stone building. The case was tried by a jury. On the trial the defendants by their counsel claimed that the alterations above stated disconnected the frame addition from the stone building described in the policy; and that being no longer attached thereto, it was not covered by the policy, and no recovery could be had for its loss; that such alteration separated the addition from the stone building, and became a seperate and distinct building, and no part of the main building; and therefore not any longer covered by the policy; and requested the Court to so charge the jury, which was refused, and the Court did charge in relation thereto

That in the absence of express stipulation in the policy prohibiting repairs and alterations of the premises insured, there was an implied engagement that the assured would not alter the premises or business described in the policy, so as thereby to increase the risk and liability of the insured.

The construction and use of the premises, as described in the policy, constituted the basis of the insurance and determined the amount of the premium. Hence no alteration in either must be made by the insured to enhance the liability of the insurer.

The right to repair and alter buildings is incident to the ownership, and such repairs and alterations as do not change the risk may be made by the assured, without consent of the insurer, if such assent is not expressly required in the policy. That the alteration or enlargement of a building will not avoid the policy of insurance unless the risk is thereby increased.

That if the jury found that the frame addition to the stone building described in the policy, was altered without the consent of the defendant, by taking off eighteen feet of the part next adjoining the stone building, and placing the part so taken off to the rear of the addition, leaving a part of the frame addition in its original place, and they were satisfied that such alteration did not increase the risk to the building insured, such alteration did not in law avoid the policy so far as the frame addition is concerned and the plaintiff would be entitled to recover for its loss.

The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff, including damages for the loss of the frame addition.

The refusal of the court to charge as requested, and the charge as given are assigned as grounds for a new trial.

I have carefully considered this matter, and reviewed the legal questions involved, and am satisfied that in refusing to charge as requested and in the charge as given to the jury, there was no error, and therefore overrule the motion for a new trial.

SUPREME COURT OF INDIANA.

[From the Indianopolis Sentinel.]

INTEREST ON A LEGACY.

4128. Decatur E. Case v. Camilla C. Case, Laporte, C. C. Affirmed.

Worden, J., delivering the opinion of the court: Complaint by appellee to recover interest for one year on a legacy of $8,000 bequeathed to her by her deceased husband. The court allowed the claim.

The general rule is, that where a general legacy is given, no time of payment being specified, it will draw interest only after the expiration of a year from the testator's death. (2 Wm's. on Ex's. 5. American Ed. 1283). But the rule has exceptions, and one is, that "when a legacy is charged upon real property, and no day of payment is mentioned in the will, interest will be given from the testator's death." (2 P. Wm's. 26; 9 Ves., 483.)

The following opinion, construing the statute of the State of Indiana, which is similar to our own relating to a statutory deed, will be of interest to our Illinois readers. The statutory forms of deeds are unquestionably, all things considered, the best for general use.

EASEMENTS—MODIFICATION OF COMMON LAW DOCTRINE.

4295. Mary Ann Keiper et al. v. David A. Klein et al., Tippecanoe C. C. C. Reversed.

Biddle, C. J., delivering the opinion of the court: The statutory form of deed carries the easements of light and air, though the words "appurtenances" and "hereditaments" are wanting.

The main question in the case is: Does the deed of John Taylor convey to Klein with the room the easement of light and air to his west window, over and above the space owned by appellant?

The English doctrine of prescriptive right to ancient windows was never received in America.

The court erred in sustaining the demurrer to the second and third paragraphs of the complaint.

THE JUDICATURE ACT AND THE LAW OF PARTNERSHIP.

Pothier, in his "Treatise on the Law of Partnership," defines this collection of persons, among other qualifications, as a society to obtain honest profits. How far such a definition is applicable to a number of modern partnerships may be a matter of speculation. But be that as it may, there can be no doubt that the law should consider all partnership as created for honest purposes, and should as far as possible shut out every means by which they can be dishonestly conducted. Certain of the provisions of the Judicature Acts will aid honest creditors in the maintenance of their just rights, and will give to the collective name under which persons usually carry on business a legal force which it has hitherto not possessed. The view which English law has up to the present time taken of the name of a firm has been that it was merely a definition for purposes of commercial convenience. No creditor of the firm of Smith & Co., of 100, Lombard street, could obtain any legal remedy by serving Smith & Co. with a writ at their place of business. It was necessary for him to hunt out the names of the several partners, and to discover exactly with whom he had contracted. Not only was this the case, but if he discovered only one or more out of several of the contracting partners, it was possible for him to lose his cause, however just it might be, if all the persons liable were not made defendants. A man of an unsuspicious temperament might without negligence believe that A alone constituted the firm of D and Co., and by this supposition be defrauded of his just rights. To show that this is no piece of legal romance, it is only necessary to turn to the Law Reports. In one leading case, one Richard Smith traded with Walter Smith, under the title of Bush and Co. The plaintiff, believing that Richard Smith was the sole member of the firm, sued him alone. But Richard Smith pleaded, in abatement, as it is technically termed, that Walter Smith was a member of the firm. The verdict was given for the defendant, upon the ground, as succinctly put by Baron Parke, "that unless the plaintiffs could show that the firm of Bush and Co. consisted of the defendant only, or that the defendant held himself out as the only person composing the firm, they were not entitled to succeed." It needs no great subtlety of intellect to see that a door is thus opened to much commercial injustice. It may, indeed, be argued that every man should know with whom he is dealing; but such an argument assumes that every man is desirous of cheating his neighbour, not of making, to quote again from Pothier, honest profits. If persons trade under the name of a certain firm, every just argument points out that they should bear both the responsibilities and the advantages which arise from so doing. Such being the state of the law, the rules framed under the Judicature Act have given new force to the partnership name. In future partners will sue and be sued in the name of their firm, and instead of the plaintiff going forth to discover whom he is suing, it is sufficient to serve the writ upon any one or more of the partners, or at the place of business upon any person having the control or management of the partnership business. This latter provision will, if liberally construed, prevent a partner from shelving his responsibilities and placing it on the shoulders of a managing, but hitherto irresponsible, servant. But this having been done, either party may compel the other to state of whom the firm consists. The value of this rule is apparent when it is borne in mind how easy it was under the old procedure for a man of straw to be put forward as the actual and responsible partner, and thus, after an unprofitable speculation, the bad account was cleared off by the simple means of putting forward, not the real capitalist, but the nominal partner.

Though it may not be impossible, it will be difficult and dangerous to avoid disclosing the whole number of responsible individuals who form the collective whole. This principle is still further carried out by the provision that if after judgment yet another individual is discovered against whom the plaintiff believes that he has a claim, leave to issue an execution against him may be obtained. If this liability is disputed, the point can be decided by an action. In extreme cases this may be no useless remedy. It is not altogether impossible that these provisions, useful though they are, may give rise to some protracted litigation as to who is or is not a partner. But there can be no doubt at all that they will be practically useful, and are remarkable, both in the history of commerce and of law, as giving a force to the collective partnership name which has been so far quite unknown in this country.—Exch.

We call attention to the following opinions, reported at length in this issue:

Township for School Purposes—Subscription to R. R. Stock—Corporate Powers.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of this State, by Walker, J., holding that a township organized for school purposes, by the general school law, in a county not under township organization, cannot, under the Constitution of 1848, be empowered to incur a debt for the purpose of subscribing for the stock of a railroad company.

The Chicago Board of Trade—Option Contracts.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of this State, by Walker J., holding that evidence of a usage among members of the Board of Trade of Chicago, that where the name of the principal is not demanded from the broker at the time of a transaction, the broker is alone accepted and considered the responsible party, is admissible to explain the intention of the parties, and to ascertain the nature and extent of their contracts; that to constitute such a usage, there must have been such long and general acquiescence in it that the jury will feel themselves constrained to find that it entered into the minds of the parties and formed a part of the contract; that a rule of the Board, providing that on default of either party to a contract to make additional deposit of security or margin within the next banking hour, when demanded, the other may give notice to consider the contract filled at the market value of the article at the time of the notice, is contrary to the law of the land and void; that a party demanding performance of a contract must himself be ready, able and willing to perform the contract on his part and must, as a general rule, tender performance before he can put the other in default and recover for a breach; and a rule of the Board of Trade, dispensing with such readiness or tender, is contrary to the law of the land and void. Messrs. Dent & Black, the able counsel of the Board, have applied for a re-hearing in this case.

Contract for Services — Discharge Before Expiration of Term—Damages.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of this State, by Walker, J., holding that when an employee, under a contract for payment of money by installments for a term of service, is discharged without cause, he can sue on the contract, at the end of each month, for the installment which accrues due at that time, or wait till the end of the term and sue for the whole; that if he sues on the contract for damages for the whole term, he can only recover for the amount that would have been due, had he continued in service, at the time the suit was instituted. If, when discharged, he rescinds the contract and then sues for its breach, it may be that he can recover for all the damage he sustained during the term by the breach, if the trial was had after the expiration of the term. This opinion, regarding the right of an employee to recover for his services when discharged before the expiration of his term, we consider important. The precise question, as presented in this case, was never passed upon by the court before. The remarks of Judge Walker, as to the duty of employees, are timely and appropriate.

Injunction—Restraining the Collection of a Tax.—The opinion of the Circuit Court of this county, by Williams, J., as to when a court of equity will restrain the collection of a tax by injunction. This case occupies much more space than we usually allot to an opinion of a court of original jurisdiction, but the great public interest in the questions involved, the care with which it has been prepared and the number of authorities cited, justify its publication in our columns.

Laws and Ordinances of the Town of Jefferson. Published by authority of the President and Board of Trustees. Chicago: Printed by the Chicago Legal News Company. 1876.

This is a volume of about one hundred pages and contains all the laws and ordinances of the village of Jefferson. Each ordinance is preceded by head-notes, something like the style of the revised statutes of the State. The head-notes are the work of S. J. Hanna, village attorney. The ordinances were prepared for the press and arranged by him. Other towns and villages in perfecting and revising their ordinances might profit by an examination of this volume. We take this opportunity of saying to village trustees and others, we have such facilities that we are enabled to stereotype and print laws and ordinances cheaper than any other house in the West.

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The following are notes to opinions filed in the Supreme Court of the United States on Monday last:

THE RULE AS TO EXEMPLARY DAMAGES.

In the case of the Milwaukee and St. Paul Railroad Company against Armes, Mrs. Armes recovered in the court below $4,000 damages for injuries sustained in consequence of a collision of trains, in one of which she was a passenger. The court below instructed the jury that if they found the agents of the company guilty of gross negligence they might by their verdict give primitive or exemplary damages. From the judgment entered the case was brought here, where it was now held that the rule as to exemplary damages limits such recovery to cases in which it is shown that the negligence is willful, or that it is so reckless as to the rights of others as to be equivalent to intentional wrong. Mr. Justice Davis delivered the opinion. The same rule was applied to the case of the Western Union Telegraph Company against Eyser.

THE CONGRESSIONAL PRINTER AN OFFICER OF CONGRESS.

In the case of the United States against Allison, it was held that Allison, who was an employee of the Government printing office from June, 1866, to June, 1867, was not entitled to extra compensation under the twenty per cent. act, because the printing office was not under the Interior Department, as claimed, and therefore in the executive department, but was under the control of the committees of the two Houses of Congress. The opinion was delivered by the Chief Justice.

JURISDICTION OF THE PROPERTY OF INSOLVENTS.

In the case of Mayer and Evans against Hellman was decided, the court holding, substantially, that an assignment by an insolvent debtor of his property to trustees under State laws, for the equal benefit of all his creditors, is not fraudulent, and when executed six months before proceedings in bankruptcy are taken against the debtor is not assailable by the assignee in bankruptcy, and that such assignee is not entitled to the possession of the property from the trustees. Mr. Justice Field delivered the opinion.

HON. LYMAN COCHRANE, OF DETROIT.

To the Editor of the Chicago Legal News:

The Chicago Journal, in a recent issue, stated that Hon. Lyman Cochrane, judge of the Superior Court of Detroit, is one of the members of the starved judiciary of Michigan, whose salary is $1,500 a year. The Journal made wry faces at Judge C., and called him an ungrammatical, stupid blockhead, etc., etc.

In Michigan it is a work of supererogation to speak in laudatory terms of Judge Cochrane. But as the Journal has poured over him a tide of harsh, undeserved criticism, let me say a few words, in Judge C.'s behalf, in the News.

Judge Cochrane's court is the creation of a special statute, and his salary is $4,000 per annum. Judge C. is a gentleman of splendid education and broad culture. He has had legislative experience. The city authorities once employed him to revise the city charter, which he did satisfactorily. He has been upon the bench nearly three years, and during that time, although presiding over a city court, he has gained a State reputation for eminent ability and strict impartiality.

In Detroit, where he has lived so long, such criticisms as the Journal indulges in have no effect whatever against a judge occupying the high place Judge Cochrane does, in the estimation of the members of the legal profession and the gener l public. C.

SUPREME COURT OF MICHIGAN.

January Term, 1876.

NOTES OF DECISIONS, BY HENRY A. CHANEY.

Hourtienne v. Schnoor.

Appeal from Macomb. Affirmed with costs. Opinion by Campbell, J.

ACKNOWLEDGMENT—PROOF.

The regularity of an acknowledgment taken before a reputable acknowledging officer is presumed, and the burden of proof is with the party contesting an acknowledgment to show misconduct on the part of the officer, or forgery or other irregularity which he ought to have discovered.

Bohn v Brown.

Error to Saginaw. Affirmed with costs. Opinion by Graves, J.

CORPORATE DEBT—LIABILITY OF STOCKHOLDER.

Under Comp. L., ch. 76, allowing suits against stockholders to recover a corporate debt where an execution against the corporation has been returned unsatisfied, it is the original debt against the company for which the stockholder is liable. Where judgment is obtained against the company without fraud or collusion, the stockholder is probably bound by the judgment so far as regards the liability and the amount, and cannot litigate these questions. Their liability for debt does not make them liable for corporate torts, notwithstanding the right of the injured party to waive the tort and sue in assumpsit.

A street railway passenger was injured by the conductor's negligence and recovered damages, for which the execution issued against the company was returned unsatisfied. Held, that he could not sue individual stockholders therefor, as for a corporate debt, under Comp. L., ch. 76, which makes the holders of unpaid stock liable on corporate debts that can not be satisfied from the property of the company.

Roethke v. Brewing Company.

Error to Saginaw. Reversed, with costs; new trial granted. Opinion by Campbell, J.

SELLING LIQUOR—FOREIGN FIRM.

Verbal negotiations made in this State with the agent of a foreign liquor-selling company, for the sale of liquor to a resident of the State, are not sufficient, under the Statute of Frauds, to cover subsequent orders sent to the foreign firm, and such orders, therefore, are not within the provisions of the Michigan law avoiding liquor contracts.

Money paid for liquor purchased in violation of the State liquor law, may be properly set off against a valid indebtedness to the liquor-sellers.

Baxter v. Spencer.

Error to Hillsdale. Reversed, with costs; new trial ordered. Opinion by Graves, J.

CHATTEL MORTGAGE—TIME OF PAYMENT.

A mortgagee of chattels who had expressly fixed a certain time and place for the payment of the mortgage, the time being a few days later than the date of the maturity of the debt, made himself a wrong-doer by seizing the chattels on the day before the day he had fixed for payment; payment on that day would have been a satisfaction of the debt.

CIRCUIT COURT OF COOK CO., ILL.

OPINION FEBRUARY 1, 1876.

THE CHICAGO TRIBUNE CO v. CITY OF CHICAGO et al; W. F. STORY v. SAME: THE CHICAGO JOURNAL CO. v. SAME.

THE POWER OF A COURT OF EQUITY TO RESTRAIN THE COLLECTION OF A TAX BY INJUNCTION.

Opinion by WILLIAMS, J.

There are certain general principles, applicable to suits to restrain the collection of taxes, which have been repeatedly laid down by the Supreme Court of this State, and must, therefore, be the law of these cases now under consideration.

Among these are the following:

1st. "It is only in rare cases that the courts will enjoin a tax." * * * "They will not unless the property is exempt from taxation, or where a tax is levied which is not authorized by law, and in the absence of all legal power, or where the persons imposing it have no power conferred upon them by law to levy such a tax. But where the property is liable to the burden under the law, and the law has authorized the tax to be imposed, and it is levied by persons or officers designated by the law to levy such a tax, equity will not interfere, but will leave the parties to their legal remedies." 22 Illinois, 36; 22 Illinois, 595: 35 Illinois, 460; 65 Illinois, 286; 66 Illinois, 383

2d. Courts will not interfere by injunction to prevent the collection of taxes, because there have been irregularities in the assessment. 22 Illinois, 37; 22 Illinois, 312; 22 Illinois, 595; 65 Illinois, 286.

3d. Courts will not interfere by injunction to restrain a tax, because the officer assessing it was only an officer de facto and not de jure. 22 Illinois, 312; 22 Illinois, 602; 35 Illinois, 466; 65 Illinois, 286.

4th. The omission by the officer to assess property liable to tax, will not invalidate the assessment upon other property subject to the burden, though such omissions were made by the officer carelessly or even willfully. 55 Illinois, 361; 22 Illinois, 303; 65 Illinois, 286; 6 Legal News, 215.

5th. The assessment of property at too high a valuation will give to the injured party no redress, unless the assessment was fraudulent. 76 Illinois, 198; 6 Legal News, 215.

6th. Where a party has had an opportunity to redress his alleged grievance in another form, and has neglected to avail himself of such opportunity, a court of equity will not interfere to redress an injury which but for his own laches, might have been prevented. 76 Illinois, 201; 26 Illinois, 357; 6 Legal News, 215.

Whether these rules are reasonable or unreasonable, they have, in suits such as those now before the court, been so often stated and reiterated by the Supreme Court, that their binding force cannot be denied and should not be evaded. I have cited only a part of the cases which enforce them. The complainant's bills contain no charges of actual fraud perpetrated or attempted by the assessor. In the case of the Evening Journal the assessor valued its property at the exact sum he was directed by one of its proprietors to assess it In the case of the Times the valuation of the assessor was in strict accordance with the written and printed return of its business manager. This is not denied, and is proven by the production of documents signed by the parties. It could hardly be said to be a fraud on the part of the assessor committed upon the complainants, to permit them to set a value upon their own property. In the Tribune case the assessor returned the property at $55 000, a difference of only $15,000 from the value set upon the property in complainant's bill, and which in itself is not enough to justify the conclusion that the assessor acted fraudulently. The charges of fraud in the several bills must, therefore, have regard to certain acts done by the defendants, which, not being in the estimation of the several complainants legal, and being injurious to their respective interests, they have chosen to characterize as fraudulent. If these several acts are legal, then they are neither fraudulent, nor in the legal sense injurious to complainants.

The Chicago Tribune Company alleges that the town assessor did not call at its place of business and demand a schedule of its personal property, as by law he was required to do. This is denied by an affidavit of the deputy assessor, who asserts that he called at the office of the company and left with its president a blank schedule, to be filled up by him, and that he was then informed by said president that he might assess the personal property of his company at $100,000. But, admitting that the fact is as is stated in the Tribune's bill, this court, in order to give that complainant the benefit of such objection, would be compelled to overrule a decision of the Supreme Court of this State.

In the case of DuPage county v. Jenks, 65 Illinois, 287, that court said: "As to the objection that the assessors did not call on persons for a list of their taxable property; that was an omission of duty on the part of the assessors, but is only an irregularity, and affords no ground for restraining the collection of the tax."

It is objected that the State Board of Equalization has acted illegally; that by law it was bound to affix a cash value to railroad and other stocks, whereas it has assessed such stocks at only fifty per cent. of their cash value, and therefore its action in adding the fifty-two per cent. cannot be sustained.

The primary duty of the Board of Equalization in assessing such property, as by law they were compelled to assess, was, to so make their assessments "that every person and corporation shall pay a tax in proportion to the value of his, her or its property." This they were compelled to do, both by the Constitution of the State and by the revenue law.

The requisition to assess at its fair cash value, applies not only to stocks to be assessed by the State Board of Equalization, but to all other property of whatever kind and by whom assessed. Real estate is required, by section four of the revenue act, Stat. of 1874, page 858, "to be valued at its fair cash value, estimated at the price it would bring at a fair voluntary sale." All personal property is to be assessed upon the same standard of value. Section 24 of the revenue act, Stat. of 1874, page 860, has enacted that "it shall be the duty of the assessor to determine and fix the fair cash value of all items of personal property." Indeed I do not know of any revenue act that has not fixed such a standard. The language is not always the same. Sometimes it is said the assessor shall assess property at its "actual value," at other times at its "true value," and then again at its "cash value." They are equivalent expressions, all requiring the assessment to be made at its fair cash value. It is true that the law might require that property should be valued at fifty per cent. or 25 per cent. of its fair cash value for the purposes of assessment, and in the absence of any constitutional limitation, such a valuation would be unobjectionable; but in every case the assessment must have a relation to the cash value, and that must be primarily determined. It is difficult to fix the fair cash value of any property, real or personal, accurately, by estimation. Take a piece of real estate in the central portion of a large city and attempt to fix its value by the opinion of witnesses. Every man having experience in such matters, and especially every judge, knows that honest, intelligent and unprejudiced witnesses will differ from 100 to 150 per cent. in their estimates.

How much more difficult it is to fix the value of stocks by estimation, and more difficult still to estimate the value of franchises. For this reason the law, while it fixes actual cash value as the criterion of valuation, because it is the best possible standard, esteems the attainment of such value as of small moment as compared with uniformity of valuation.

The Constitution of this State says nothing about fixing the actual cash value of property for assessment, but it has provided that laws shall be passed for the raising of revenue which shall make all persons pay in proportion to the value of his, her or its property.

The ascertainment of value becomes mainly important in its relation to the primary idea of uniformity. Proportionate taxation is the end; the ascertainment of value the means to such end.

The law has fixed a uniform standard of value for all property, that is, "actual cash value." If property of all descriptions is not assessed at such value, it is through no defect in the law, but owing to the fault of the assessors.

The State Board of Equalization is by law appointed the assessor of the capital stock of corporations. Its duty in assessing is precisely the same as to fixing the valuation of property it may assess as that of other assessors. If any of these assessors make their assessments carelessly, or if they err in judgment, and persons are injured by their action, such conduct does not vitiate the assessment. The Supreme Court has gone even further and declared that the willful misconduct of assessors shall not vitiate the assessment. In the Dunham case, 55 Illinois, 361, that court said: "That a a statute which in terms or by necessary implication, authorizes the omission of real or personal property in the city, so as to destroy the uniformity in respect to persons and property within the jurisdiction of the city required by the 5th section of the ninth Article of the Constitution of 1848, would be void, there can be no doubt.

But the position that it lies with ministerial officers to defeat the collection of taxes by such omissions, whether made willfully or from carelessness, is not tenable. Such officers may make themselves amenable to the law for misconduct in office, but cannot thus stop the wheels of government." Scholfield v. Watkins, 22 Illinois, 66; Merritt v. Farris, 22 Illinois, 303.

If such be the law in reference to careless or willful omissions of property by assessors, a fortiori it applies to valuation by assessors, which may be too high or too low. In Spencer v. The People, 6 Legal News, 215, the court said: "The question presented by the record is, whether, upon an application for judgment against real estate for delinquent taxes, the objection may be made that there was too high a valuation placed upon the land by the assessor in making the assessment," and in passing upon this question the court says:

"The framers of the Constitution could not have contemplated any such consequences as that a tax levy should be void in case an assessor should happen to omit to asses any taxable property, or should make an incorrect valuation of any property, whereby would be produced the result that every person would not actually pay a tax in proportion to the valuation of his property."

The objection we are now considering is not that the Board of Equalization, assessed stocks of corporations out of just proportion to other property, but that they assessed it in contravention of the language of the revenue law.

If the objection is a good one it applies with a like effect to every valuation made under the present law by the town assessors, and if it is a good one there never has been in this county, or perhaps in any county of this State, a valuation in accordance with previous revenue laws The real and personal property of this county has never been valued by any assessor at its real cash value. Uniformity of assessment may sometimes have been approximated, but valuation at actual cash value for county taxation has never been even attempted. The act passed by the General Assembly of this State, in February, 1853, provided that "each separate parcel of property shall be valued at its true value in money * * * and personal property of every description shall be valued at the usual selling price of similar property at the time of listing in the county where the same may then be; and if there be no usual selling price known to the person whose duty it shall be to fix a value thereon, then at such price as it is believed could be obtained therefor in money at such time and place." The valuation of property of individuals in Bureau county, notwithstanding this plain provision of the statutes, as returned by the assessors, ranged from one-fifth to one-third of its cash value, while the C. B. & Q. R. R. had returned their property for assessment at from one-third to one-half its actual value.

The Supreme Court, with these facts before it, in the case of Bureau Co. v. The C., B. & Q. R. R. Co, 44 Illinois, 230, held that the requirements of the law that property should be valued at its true value in money, were exceedingly difficult, if not impossible, and, in regard to the rule of valuation adopted in Bureau Co., said: "The rule adopted by the assessors in this State has grown into a custom, and has been tacitly sanctioned by every department of the government for a long course of years, and it is now too late to challenge it. Even so late as the last special session of the legislature, that body, by clear implication, acknowledged the custom and yielded to its influence by the provisions of the act to tax the shares in national banks. They therein impliedly declare that such shares are to be taxed the same as other property. A share of bank stock, under that bill, is not required to pay more State or local taxes than a piece of land or a house of equal value; and the plain inference is, if such property be assessed on only one third of its actual value, bank stock should be assessed on the same per cent. of its actual value."

In the above case the court entirely disregarded the admitted fact that the property of no owner in Bureau county had been taxed at its real value, and found this no objection to the proceedings; while they considered the action of the Board of Supervisors in raising the tax of the defendant, and therefore taxing it disproportionately as "unfounded in justice and in direct opposition to the Constitution." The same positions were substantially reiterated by the Supreme Court in the case of C. & N.W. R. R. Co. v. Boone County, 44 Illinois, 243, in which case this language is used: "It cannot be that one portion of the taxpayers in a county, owning taxable property, shall be required to pay more taxes, in proportion to its value, no matter how that may be ascertained, than another portion in the same county. If the assessors, regardless of the strict injunction of law, shall place a value upon property far below its real cash value, and such a practice goes on unchallenged, and is recognized by the authorities having special charge of the revenues of the State, that misconduct must also contain within itself the great and cardinal principle of uniformity. No warrant is given, if the law is not strictly observed in the case of individuals, and their property is not assessed at its actual value, that the property of a corporation situate in the same county shall be assessed at greater proportional value than that of individuals, even though the enhanced assessment is not the actual cash value of the property of such corporation. The same rule which is applied to individuals, justice and the Constitution demand shall be applied to corporations. To demand of appellants that they should schedule their property at its cash value, while individuals may schedule their property at one-third or less of such value, would be to demand of the former three times the amount of taxes demanded of the latter. As we said in the Bureau County case, such a proposition is so monstrous as to be indefensible by fair argument. Such discrimination is condemned not only by the Constitution, but by the indignant yet no less just judgment of an honest people."

Referring to the Bureau case above cited the court continues: "In that (Bureau) case the judgment of the Circuit Court was in favor of the railroad company, holding that their schedule was correct and in compliance with the statute, and the practice under it, which had obtained for such a longseries of years unchallenged and unquestioned. And here (says the court), we might say, more explicitly than was said in that (Bureau) case, that a long, uniform and unchallenged practice under a law is strong evidence of the real meaning of the law. To the hoary maxim, contemporanea expositia est optima et fortis-ima in lege, is accorded full force in all courts and we have ever rendered it due respect."

Although the law has, ever since the organization of the State, required all assessments to be made at the actual cash value, I know of no law in relation to valuations more plain and positive than the statute the Supreme Court then had under consideration. And after the decisions upon so clear a statute in both the Bureau and Boone county cases, it cannot be successfully contended that the action of the State Board in fixing the value of railroad stock upon the same basis as other property. Even though that basis be only half its real value, is illegal. This objection has been considered at length, because it was so pressed and relied on in argument. The above reasoning will apply with equal, if not greater force to the objection that the law requires the equalizations as well as the assessments to be made by the State Board upon the cash value. If one requisition may be dispensed with by the Supreme Court, so may the other.

Objection has been made to the action of the State Board in that it has arbitrarily raised the assessed value of personal property in Cook county 52 per cent, and of real estate 62 per cent; and that in defiance of the sworn returns of a multitude of assessors throughout the State, that they had assessed property at its fair cash value, they arbitrarily found that such assessments were upon the average at only 50 per cent. of the cash value. The whole duty of the Board, except in such cases as they were constituted assesors, was to equalize the taxes throughout the several counties of the State, so that each county should bear its just proportion of taxation. In this regard, the Board sustained towards the several counties the same relation, and performed the same duties, which the county Boards of the respective counties sustained and performed for the towns of which said counties were composed.

The right of the county board to equalize taxes between the towns, has never, so far as I know, been questioned. The necessity of such equalization has always been admitted. In no other way could uniformity of taxation for the counties have been secured. The action of the State Board of Equalization is no less important to secure proportionate taxation for the State. The average values in one county, as they are equalized by the county board, is often twice or thrice that of similar property in another county. The possible disproportions in values may be illustrated by the actual disproportions of the valuations of the same property, in the same district and in the same year, made by the city assessor of Chicago, and the assessors for the towns of South, North and West Chicago, as such assessments are set forth in complainant's bills. For the year 1875, the city assessor's valuation of real estate was over $253,000,000, while the aggregate of the three town assessors valuation of such property was less than $129,000,000. It was to remedy such and far greater discrepencies in valuations that the State Board of Equalization was created. It was never designed that they should be bound by the estimates of town assessors. Sections 105, 106, 107, with other sections of the revenue law, have given them extensive powers and large discretions for the purpose of equalizing, while the same law prohibits them from decreasing the aggregate assessed valuation in the State, and from increasing it more than one per cent. By the report of the board for the year 1875, it appears that they found the average valuations of all the counties in the State, as returned by the county board, to be fifty per cent. of the cash value of the property. Taking this as their basis of action, they proceeded to raise the valuations in some counties and lower them in others, in order to secure uniformity of taxation for the entire State. I see nothing to indicate fraud in their action, nor any departure from the law, which has not been justified by the decisions of the Supreme Court. The powers and duties of the board have been so often passed upon and defined by the Supreme Court, that many of them can no longer admit of question.

It was contended in the case of The People v. Salomon, 46 Illinois, 333, as it has been in the cases at bar, that the Board of Equalization had no power to equalize assessments by an arbitrary rule which disregarded the rights of the individual tax payer, but the court decided not only that the board was constitutionally created, but that the act defining the powers and duties of the board was based upon a principle which commended itself to the best judgment of the court. In the case of Porter v The Rockford & R. I. & St. Louis R. R Co., 6 Legal News, 319, the court not only passed upon the constitutionality of the law, appointing the Board of Equalization, but held that the adoption of rules for the ascertainment of values was legal, and that in no other way could the board properly discharge its duties, and that though the board might have erred in its valuation, no power was given to the courts to arrest the collection of the tax on that account. The decisions in the case of the Republic Life Insurance Co. and in the Adsit case, fully sustain the view in the Porter case.

In these cases, and others of a similar character, the Supreme Court have overruled the objections, which have been earnestly and ably presented upon this argument against the action of the State Board of Equalization. There is not one of these objections to the action of said board which can be sustained without contravening either the express language or the necessary and logical deductions to be drawn from the opinions delivered in the cases above cited.

It was objected that the right of the State Board to equalize applies only with reference to State taxes, and that although it might have the right to add 52 per cent. to the valuation for State purposes, that did not justify the addition of 52 per cent. to the valuations for other taxes. The primary object in the creation of the board was to secure uniformity of taxation for State purposes, but it is equally true that one of the clearest purposes of the revenue law was to secure proportionate valuation, not only for State, but for county purposes. To effectuate this design, section 117 of the Revenue Act, provides that "all rates for taxes herein provided for shall be extended by the county clerk on the assessed valuation of property, as equalized and assessed by the State Board of Equalization." Sections 126, 128 and 131, are clear and explicit upon the same subject, and give substantially the same directions. The law is not only exceedingly clear in this regard, but, unless there is a limitation to a rate per cent. and that limitation is exceeded, it is hard to perceive how the citizens of a county can, as to local taxes, be injuriously affected by an increase of the valuations by the State Board. The county of Cook levies a certain specified amount for county purposes, not a certain rate per cent. If that amount is less than 75 cents upon the $100 valuation it matters not whether the county property is valued at one hundred millions or five hundred millions.

The less the valuation the greater the rate per cent. to be paid; the greater the valuation the less the rate.

The Constitutional requirements are two: First, that the assessment shall be proportionate, so that each tax-payer shall bear his due share of the burden; and second, that, except by a vote of the people of the county, the county authorities shall never assess taxes, the aggregate of which shall exceed seventy-five cents upon the one hundred dollars valuation, unless for payment of indebtedness existing at the time of the adoption of the Constitution.

If, then, the State Board of Equalization had raised the valuations of all personal and real property in the county of Cook, or of any other county in the State, one hundred per cent., and such increase had been uniform, it would not have increased the relative burden of the taxpayers.

The only way in which the action of the State Board of Equalization can have occasioned injury to any taxpayers in reference to the State taxes and these all the complainants are willing and offer to pay.

It is said that the city tax is invalid, for the reason that up to Aug. 9, 1875, the city authorities had been proceeding to collect the city taxes under an act commonly known as Bill 300, and that they had no right to abandon said assessment and elect to collect taxes under the general revenue act; that by such election they adopted assessments theretofore made by the assessors of the towns of South Chicago, West Chicago and North Chicago, who had never been up to that time the officers of the city, and who had not, in any respect, acted in its behalf; and by such action the burden of city taxes upon personal property has been doubled.

The bills aver that the valuation of real estate by the city assessor for the year 1875, was over two hundred and fifty-three millions, the valuation of the town assessors in the same territory was about one hundred and twenty-eight millions; the valuation of personal property by the city assessor for the same year was forty-two millions, and of the town assessors about forty-five millions. The city levy for the taxes of the year 1875 was over five millions of dollars. It will be readily seen that a change from the city valuation to the valuation of the town assessors would largely decrease the taxes to be paid upon real property and would largely increase the taxes to be paid by personal property, while it did not change the aggregate taxes, taking the two kinds of property together. It is claimed that this is virtually (in its results) an exemption of about one hundred and twenty-five millions of real estate from the city tax, while it doubles the assessment upon personal property. A change which must result in so great a shifting of the burden of the city taxes as between real and personal property, could only be justified in view of this positive sanction of the law. Did the law sanction such a change?

Bill 300 (statutes of 1874, page 254,) authorized the collection of city taxes under its provisions, but section 270 of the act enacted as follows: "The city council of any city shall have power at any time in lieu of the mode herein provided for the assessment and collection of general city taxes, to, by resolution or ordinance, elect to certify to the county clerk the amount or amounts required to be raised by taxation upon the assessment of property for State and county taxes, and to collect the taxes for said city in the manner provided for in the general revenue laws of this State, and in such case to abolish the office of the city assessor and the city collector, provided, however, that nothing in this section contained shall be so construed as to prevent such corporation at any time thereafter from providing for the assessment and collection of taxes by ordinance and by the manner in this act hereinbefore set forth."

On the 9th. of August last, the City Council by ordinance elected to certify to the County Clerk the aomunts to be raised by taxation, being over the sum of five millions of dollars.

The objections made to such action upon the part of the city authorities are twofold, the first, denying the right of the City Council to make the certificate at any time, and the second denying its power to make it at the time when it was made.

It is argued that, by the Constitution, taxes must be assessed by the Corporate authorities and no one else, and that the town assessors do not answer this description. The last proposition cannot be denied. But if by the assessing of a tax is meant its imposition, then the former proposition might be admitted, and yet the right of the assessors to value the property for the purposes of taxation might exist. For the town assessors had nothing to do with the imposition of the City tax. That was done by the City Council, when by ordinance it determined to raise the $5,000.000 for revenue purposes from the property within its jurisdiction. The duty of the town assessors was in part judicial and in part ministerial, but whether judicial or ministerial and however indespensible to the ultimate collection of the tax, those duties were entirely distinct from that of its imposition. The Constitution has not said that persons performing such duties shall be either officers of or residents in the district for which they act. In the absence of a Constitutional limitation, the power of the legislature as to taxation would be absolute, both as to amount, and as to the method in which the tax should be assessed and collected. Art. 9, Sec. 1, of the Constitution. provides for the valuation of property as follows, "such value to be astertained by some person or persons to be elected or appointed in such manner as the General Assembly shall direct, and not otherwise." The Constitution of 1848 contained a provision precisely similar to the one above quoted, and the Supreme Court held, in the case of DuPage Co. v. Jenks, 65 Illinois, 283, that "there was no constitutional provision which has prescribed the details that shall be observed in making assessments for taxation." There was none in the Constitution of 1848, and there is none in the Constitution of 1870. In the case last cited, it was held that if the assessors were appointed in pursuance of an existing statute, it was all that was required. In that case, the assessors whose appointment were complained of, were appointed by the Board of Supervisors, and were not even residents of the towns for which they were assessors, nor were they sworn into office; but the court held that they were officers de facto, and that the tax was valid. Independent of that decision, the constitutional limitation being such as I have stated, I fail to see why a law which would require a resident of Cairo to assess property in Chicago should not be valid, however unwise and impolitic.

The tax having been imposed by the City Council, the property upon which it was levied might be valued as truly in accordance with the Constitution by the town assessors, if they were by law designated to perform that service, as by the city assessor. Section 270 of the charter did allow the city, at its election, to avail itself of their assessment, instead of subjecting it to the expense of making a new assessment. They had made an assessment for town, county and State purposes, and the legislature had prescribed that in a certain contingency it should also be for city purposes. It was not only a constitutional, but, apparently, a money saving provision. If there could have previously been any doubt of the legality of such appointment, I am at a loss to see why there should be any since the decision of the case of DuPage Co. v. Jenks. Again, it is urged that if the town assessors might have acted for the city, in case the certificate had been made at the commencement of the official year, that the city, having proceeded under bill 300 up to August 9th, had exhausted its election, and could not, at that time, certify as provided by section 270. It is admitted that the city was proceeding with its assessment under bill 300, up to August last; but it is also admitted that the assessment was then, and still is, inchoate. I am not aware of any principal of law which would prevent the city from abandoning an assessment for taxes which had not been perfected, or that would estop the city from perfecting another because it had abandoned one that was still imperfect. The right of taxation by the city is by virtue of a delegation to it of that governmental prerogative by the legislature. The right of eminent domain comes in the same way. If the city had attempted to exercise its delegated right of eminent domain, and the condemnation had been pressed almost to completion, it could at any time before final confirmation, have discontinued its proceedings without prejudice to its rights. 2 Dillon on Munic. Cor., sec. 473.

Why, when it is exercising the delegated right of taxation, should it not be allowed to exercise the same privilege? If it is still said that the city is estopped by its action, of what act or series of acts shall the estoppel be predicated? It ought not to be estopped merely by the lapse of time. It, at least, ought to be permitted to enter upon the fiscal year, and determine what taxes must be raised to meet the current expenses. The statute provides for this The commencement of the official year found the city with an assessor and collector in office. So far as they acted in affecting an assessment, they appear to have done so under existing laws, not because they were under any express orders from the city authorities. The city ought not to be estopped because its officers proceeded with their duties under statutes of the State which they were, as good citizens, bound to obey. Section 270 declares that the Common Council may, "at any time," certify to the county clerk the amount required to be raised by taxation "upon the assessment of property for State and county taxes." and to collect, etc. It is the assessment, not an assessment, the use of the definite article being more appropriate to an existing assessment than to one which was not commenced.

To qualify and limit the meaning of the words "at any time," counsel would have us interpolate into the section some such words as these: At any time before the commencement of the fiscal year. To do this the court must perform a legislative rather than a judicial function. The limit within which the certificate is to be filed is found in sections 111 of the city charter and 122 of the general revenue law. The first provides that the city council shall, on or before the second Tuesday in August, in each year, ascertain the amount necessary to be raised for corporate purposes, and assess the amount upon the property subject to taxation, and certify the ordinance to the county clerk, and the latter fixes the same time for the filing of the certificate by the city of the amount it requires should be assessed with the county clerk. The certificate was made in apt time under these sections. No other time is fixed by the statute, and the courts have no right to limit the city in any other way than the legislature has limited it.

It has been insisted in argument upon behalf of the city that there was, under the present proceeding by virtue of the revenue law, no limitation by statute of the per cent. to be raised by taxation.

As there is a limit in the act under the provisions of which the city is permitted to make its election to certify, it ought not to be permitted to deny the binding force of the limitation contained in the act by which alone it obtains the power to certify. The law permits the city, at its election, again to return to bill 300 for the collection of its revenue, and that act may be used for such purpose one year and the general revenue law the next. If this construction, contended for by the city's counsel, is correct, the city could collect the revenue under bill 300 for a service of years under the limitation, which it is confessed that act contains, and then suddenly and unexpectedly to the citizens, return to the revenue law and assess them at double the previous per cent; or it could assess under limitation one year and without any limitation the next. To be at the mercy of every city council, which could at its will tax the citizens without limit, would be a sad prospect for an already tax-burdened city. A construction of the law which would permit such a result should not be adopted unless compelled by the words of the statute. The fair construction of the law is in favor of the limitation. If there is a limitation of three per cent. the complainants insist that that per cent. must be calculated upon the aggregate valuation of the town assessors, and not upon the valuation as equalized by the State Board. The statute is "three per cent. upon the aggregate assessed valuation of all property assessed." The State Board asses the valuation of a great amount of property. The language of the statute includes that property. If the property they assess is included, what excludes their equalized valuation of that and other property?

The law requires all assessments to be carried out upon the equalized value, and it is that upon which the three per cent. is to be calculated. It is further objected that a portion of the tax was levied for the purpose of paying interest upon illegal indebtedness of the city. But neither of the bills discloses the nature of the illegality, nor sets forth what portion of the tax is assessed to pay illegal interest, and therefore the court cannot know whether any, or if any, how much of the tax should be pronounced illegal. It was also said that the town taxes were not properly certified. They were certified by the town authorities, and a less amount than that required by the town was allowed by the county board. There was, therefore, concert of action to the extent of the tax by both town and county authorities. There would have been more force in the objection had the amount fixed by the county board exceeded the tax imposed by the town. I have noticed the principal objections urged in argument against the validity of the tax. But if there were valid legal objections, what, then, is the duty of a chancellor in these cases? That also has been settled by repeated decisions. In the DuPage county case, 65 Ills., 286, the court said: "It is with reluctance that chancery stays the collection of the public revenue. It is a branch of equity jurisprudence of very modern introduction, and of doubtful expediency. It may well be doubted whether it would not have been better for the public welfare had the parties been left to seek their remedies at law in all cases, as they were until recently, required to do." And the court said it had no inclination to enlarge the rule which limited the relief to cases of fraud, to cases where the tax was unauthorized, or the property exempt from the tax. And even in cases of illegality of the tax, there must also be special reasons alleged in the bill for the interposition of the court, as that the collection of the tax will cause to the complainant irreparable injury, or occasion him a multiplicity of suits, or the court will not interfere to restrain the tax. This doctrine has been clearly announced in the following Illinois cases: 35 Illinois, 466; 6 Legal News, 324; 22 Illinois, 36; 7 Legal News, 321. Dillon on Munic. Corp., Sec. 738, says: "Equity will not restrain even an illegal and void tax assessment where it is sought to be enforced against personal property only, since here the party has an adequate remedy at law;" citing, in support of such proposition, a large number of cases decided in various States of the Union.

The case of Dows v. The City of Chicago, 11 Wallace, 108, was a suit brought to restrain the collection of a tax levied by the city of Chicago upon personal property. The main ground relied on in the bill was that the tax was illegal. Upon demurrer in the court below the bill was dismissed, and also upon like demurrer a cross-bill filed by the Union Nat. Bk., on substantially the same ground, shared the same fate. The case was taken to the Supreme Court of the U. S., and the decree of the court below affirmed. In that case the court said: "Assuming the tax to be illegal and void, we do not think any ground is presented by the bill justifying the interposition of a court of equity to enjoin the collection. The illegality of the tax and the threatened sale of the shares for its payment, constitute of themselves alone no ground for such interposition. There must be some special circumstances attending a threatened injury of this kind, distinguishing it from a common trespass, and bringing the case under some recognized head of equity jurisdiction, before the preventive remedy of injunction can be invoked. It is upon taxation that the several States chiefly rely to obtain the means to carry on their respective governments, and it is of the utmost importance to all of them that the modes adopted to enforce the taxes levied should be interfered with as little as possible. Any delay in the proceedings of the officers, upon whom the duty is devolved of collecting the taxes, may derange the operations of government, and thereby cause serious detriment to the public. No court of equity will, therefore, allow its injunction to issue to restrain their action, except where it may be necessary to protect the rights of the citizen whose property is taxed, and he has no adequate remedy by the ordinary process of the law. It must appear that the enforcement of the tax would lead to multiplicity of suits, or produce irreparable injury, or, where the property is real estate, throw a cloud upon the title of the complainant, before the aid of a court of equity can be invoked. In the cases where equity has interferred, in the absence of these circumstances, it will be found, upon examination, that the question of jurisdiction was not raised, or was waived." Citing in support, 14 New York, 534; 25 New York, 312; 35 Illinois, 465—to which citation might be added several more cases in the Supreme Court of Illinois, and many cases decided in other courts.

There is nothing in the three cases now under consideration which calls for the interposition of the restraining power of a court of equity. There is no actual fraud upon the part of the assessor. In the Journal and Times case, he assessed it at precisely the sum he was requested to assess it, by the parties most interested in giving a lawful value. The Tribune Company was assessed by him at $15,000 more than its present valuation. But such valuation, if too great, could have been redressed by application to the town board of review, and if not there, by application to the Board of County Commissioners, and the Tribune must suffer in this regard for its own laches. Neither of these bills makes out any special case of injury, and under the many decisions above quoted, even if the tax was void, the injunction ought not to issue except upon such a showing. In each case, if the tax is invalid, and should so be declared by the court of last resort, the complainant has a complete remedy at law by bringing suits against the city and county to recover the taxes it has been compelled to pay illegally.

The city and county are both able to respond to any judgments which may be obtained by either or all the complainants in any suits to be brought to recover money paid illegally, and the complainants would not be compelled to resort to a multiplicity of suits in order to obtain such judgments, if they have legal claims.

If upon the objections presented upon the argument of these several suits, this court should restrain the collection of the City tax, and of parts of the County and Park taxes as asked, the City at least would be almost entirely deprived of revenue, and could not carry on the City government for six months.

Its financial credit would be utterly destroyed. If there have been many instances of gross mistake in this assessment, or of fraud, actual or legal, upon the part of the assessors, as is more than possible, they are not within the scope of this opinion as they would present facts entirely dissimilar to those stated in these bills. Such cases must stand upon their respective merits. If relief should be granted by injunction in such cases, no serious harm need ensue to the City. To restrain the tax for merely legal objections which, if sustained, would invalidate the whole assessment and render the City for the time being bankrupt, for the purpose of protecting a few individuals, who even if the tax is void, have several complete and inexpensive remedies for their wrongs by suits at law, would not be justifiable in view of the numerous decisions above quoted. The prayer of the several complainants for injunctions must therefore be denied.

UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT.

PROCEEDINGS OF.

Thursday, Jan. 27, 1876.

On motion of R. T. Merrick, Thomas Young, of Huntington, New York, and James Hoban, of Washington, D. C., were admitted.

No. 104. (Assigned.) Myra Clarke Gaines v. Joseph Fuentes et al. The argument of this cause was concluded by J. S. Black for plaintiff.

No. 43. (Assigned.) The Town of Concord v. The Portsmouth Savings Bank. This cause was reargued by George H. Williams for plaintiff, and by Sandford B. Perry for defendant.

No. 124. The Home Insurance Company v. Benjamin Luce. Dismissed with costs.

No. 125. Henrietta S. Gould, executrix, v. The Evansville and Crawfordsville Railroad Company. The argument of this cause was commenced by Charles Tracy for plaintiff.

Adjourned until Friday at 12 o'clock.

Friday, Jan. 28.

On motion of Matt H. Carpenter, Samuel Gormley, of Philadelphia, Penn., was admitted.

No. 125. Henrietta S. Gould, executrix, etc. v. The Evansville and Crawfordsville Railroad Company. The argument of this cause was continued by Charles Tracy for plaintiffs, and by Asa Iglehart for defendants, and concluded by Charles Tracy for plaintiffs.

No. 127. Marie Romie et al. v. Teresa Casanover. This cause was submitted on printed arguments by S. C. Houghton and John Reynolds for plaintiffs, and by John A. Grow for defendants.

No. 120. Alfred H. Clements v. Joseph P. Machebonef et al. This cause was argued by J. W. Denver for appellant, and by R. T. Merrick for appellees.

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

OPINION FILED JAN. 21, 1876.

NO. 194.—EDWARD ELY v. DAVID J. ELY et al.

Appeal from Superior Court of Cook.

PREMISES DESTROYED BY FIRE—DUTY OF TENANT TO RE-BUILD—COVENANT TO DELIVER IN AS GOOD CONDITION—INSURANCE.

1. This was a bill filed by Edward Ely, the appellant, for the purpose of obtaining the benefit of the insurance upon the premises of which he was the tenant. David Ely, one of the appellees, leased the premises to appellant. The lease contained covenants on the part of the lessee that he had received the premises in good order and condition, that he would keep them in repair at his own expense, and at the end of the term would deliver the same up to his leasor in as good order and condition as when they were entered upon by him. The title to the property was in Mrs. Caroline D. Ely, wife of David J. Ely. She, in her own name, procured policies of insurance on the building upon the premises leased. The building was destroyed by fire October 9, 1871. A new one was erected by the tenant. Held, under the covenants in the lease that the tenant must sustain the whole expense of re-building; that a court of equity cannot impose upon the owner a portion of such cost; that this insurance money is as much the money of Mrs. Ely as that derived from any other source.

2. INSURANCE—RE-BUILDING.—That a tenant has no equity to compel his landlord to expend money received from an insurance office, on the demised premises being burnt down, in rebuilding the premises, or to restrain the landlord from suing for the rent until the premises are rebuilt.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

SHELDON, J.—This was a bill filed in the court below by Edward Ely, the appellant, for the purpose of obtaining the benefit of the insurance upon premises of which he was tenant.

By a lease, bearing date, May 4th, 1867, David Ely, one of the appellees, demised to Edward Ely the premises situate in the city of Chicago, known as No. 3, Washington street, to hold from the 15th day of July, 1867, until the first day of May, 1878, at the rent of $3,000 per year.

The lease contained covenants on the part of the lessee, that he had received the premises in good order and condition, that he would keep them in repair at his own expense, and that at the end of the term he would deliver the same up to his lessor, in as good order and condition as when they were entered upon by the lessee.

At the same time of the execution and date of the lease, the following agreement was executed by the parties:

"Chicago, 4th May, 1867.

"It is mutually understood that Edward Ely, the lessee of the property known as No. 3 Washington street, Chicago, has the right to purchase the same, as follows:

"Any time within three years from the date hereof, at twenty eight thousand dollars ($28,000), and within five years as above, at thirty thousand dollars ($30,000), with interest from date and upon the following terms: One-fourth of the purchase money to be paid in cash at the time of giving notice of purchase or desire to purchase; the remainder to be paid in three equal annual installments, from the date of the notice of the desire to purchase, with interest on the full amount of the deferred payments, annually, in advance, at eight per cent. (8 per cent.), all interest to be paid as stipulated, and the deferred payments to be secured to the entire satisfaction of the grantor, his assigns, heirs, executors or administrators, by assignment of proper policies of insurance upon the buildings thereon.

DAVID J. ELY.
EDWARD ELY."

The title to the property was in Mrs. Caroline D. Ely, wife of David J. Ely, and she, in her own name, procured policies of insurance on the building upon the premises. On October 9, 1871, the building was destroyed by fire, and there were paid to her by certain insurance companies, $5,000.

Edward Ely has, since that fire, erected a new building on the lot, better and more expensive than the old one, and claims this insurance money, for the recovery of which this bill was brought. This claim is based upon an alleged express contract, by which David J. Ely agreed to pay for the insurance upon the building, and also upon the ground that the insurance was, even if there had been no such contract, for the benefit of the party who was bound to rebuild. The express contract relied upon is the following:

"For and in consideration of an agreement to pay three thousand dollars per annum, made this day with Edward Ely, for the rent of No. 3 Washington street, I agree to lease said premises to him from the 15th day of July, 1867, to May 1, 1878, and it is agreed that I am to pay the taxes and insurance on the said buildings and improvements, to leave in the present gas-fixtures, and also the furnace and the range; and I also give the option to the lessee to purchase this property at $30,000, any time within five years from this date. In case said purchase, then the terms are to be $7,500 cash in hand, and the remainder in one, two and three years, at eight per cent. per annum interest. DAVID J. ELY."

"If elected to purchase within three years from this date, price to be twenty-eight thousand dollars; terms as before named. DAVID J. ELY."

This paper writing has no date, and the parties are not agreed in their testimony as to the time when it was given, although Edward Ely admits that it was some time previous to the lease and written purchase option contract of May 4th, 1867.

David J. Ely testifies that the paper was procured by Edward Ely the last of February or first of March, 1867, to be used to influence Peter Page, if possible, to lease to Edward Ely at a lower rent than Page was asking, the building on the corner of Wabash avenue and Washington street, in an adjoining block, of which Edward Ely was trying to negotiate a lease, it being the distinct understanding that it was not to be binding on either of the parties. Edward Ely contradicts this, and they are the only witnesses who speak upon the subject. This paper writing bears the appearance of having been hastily drawn up for a temporary purpose, and not as the final contract upon the subject. It is not signed by Edward Ely, and although it speaks of an agreement as made the same day to pay $3,000 rent, there is no other evidence of any such distinct agreement.

The paper, as it purports, is a contract all on the side of David J. Ely, with nothing binding upon Edward Ely. There are absent the usual particular formal covenants which attend the letting of such valuable property for such a length of time and such a large rent.

The lease of May 4, 1867, has no agreement, on the part of the lessor, as has the paper writing, to pay taxes and insurance, to leave in the present gas fixtures, furnace, and range, and says nothing whatever in regard thereto, the lease containing only terms of simple demise on the part of the lessor.

On the part of the lessee, it contains a large number of particular, lengthy, formally-drawn, and very stringent covenants; as, for the payment of the rent, in sums of $750, at the end of every three months — to pay all water rents — to keep the premises in a clean and healthy condition, in accordance with the city ordinances; that the premises are received in good order and condition; that the premises shall be kept in repair by the lessee at his own expense; that he will not underlet or assign, without the written assent of the lessor; to yield up the premises at the end of the term in as good condition as when the same were entered upon; for a forfeiture and right of re-entry for default in the payment of rent or keeping any covenants; and various minute provisions in regard thereto and in favor of the right of distress; that the lessee shall pay all costs and attorney's fees and expenses of enforcing the covenants; and there is a provision that changes, alterations and additions in and about the buildings, convenient for the lessee's business, may be made at his sole expense. There is a variance, too, in the terms of the option to purchase, of May 4, 1867, from the paper writing, in this: that in the former, the lessee's right of purchase is to be subject to his lease, the interest on the deferred payments is to be paid annually, in advance, and the deferred payments to be secured to the satisfaction of the grantor, by assignment of proper policies of insurance upon the buildings. Even if we should reject D. J. Ely's statement of the purpose of giving the undated paper, comparing these more full and formal instruments of May 4, 1867, with the previous undated paper writing, the design would seem to be that the two former should take the place of and be in the stead of the latter. The very entering into the subsequent instruments of writing, indicates that they were to be constituted and relied upon as the evidence of what was the contract between the parties.

The terms of the undated writing being, "I agree to lease," and not terms of present demise, tend to show it to be executory, looking for its consummation to a lease afterward to be made. The rule of law upon the subject is familiar—that it is a general rule of evidence that a written contract, executed between parties, supersedes all their prior negotiations and agreements upon the same subject.

This rule has not application sometimes when the last contract covers only a part of the subjects embraced in the prior one, and it plainly appears, from the character of the contracts, that the last one was not intended to be in performance, or supersedure of the former one, and that the provisions in the former not embraced in the latter, were intended to remain unaffected. And as neither the lease nor the option contract of May 4, 1867, refer to the subject of insurance, nor to that of gas fixtures, or furnace or range, mentioned in the undated writing, it is urged that this brings that writing within the exception above named—that a subsequent agreement is not to have the effect of superseding an antecedent one, unless the entire ground of the first one is covered by the latter. That would be to nullify the rule in all cases as to any omitted term of a previous negotiation or agreement which should not be contained in a later contract upon the same subject.

This provision as to insurance in the undated writing does not remain in force, because there is no mention made of it in the lease of May 4th. On comparison of these several writings, the one with the other, no such intention is manifest that this stipulation in the undated writing, relative to insurance, should remain afterward in force, unaffected by the execution of the lease; but the contrary one is evinced, that the lease and option contract of May 4th should be expressive of the entire contract of the parties upon the whole subject.

In confirmation of this, if it were necessary, reference might be made to the letters of Edward Ely to David J. Ely, of 23rd July, and 22nd August, 1867, relative to the construction of the words "subject to his lease," in the optional contract of purchase of May 4th, 1867, wherein Edward Ely states his understanding, that the purchase was not to be subject to the lease, and as to showing he refers to what David J. Ely said to him on the evening of May 4th, 1867, but makes no allusion whatever to the undated writing, which does not contain these words; thus manifesting, that he did not regard that writing as then operative and in force, as otherwise he would have referred to that as determining the question.

We can entertain no doubt that the undated paper writing, if ever of any force, is to be regarded as having been merged in and superseded by the subsequent lease and option contract of May 4th, 1867, and that it was thenceforth inoperative and of no force.

As before remarked, the lease contains no agreement on the part of the lessor, to pay insurance. On May 31, 1872, Edward Ely addressed a letter to D. J. Ely, informing him that he proposed to build upon the premises, giving a general description of the character of the building he intended to erect, that to do it, he required the insurance money, and requesting D. J. Ely to send on the money at once. Edward Ely immediately commenced rebuilding upon this and the adjoining lot of one Martin Andrews, and completed the buildings in the winter following. The appellant, while admitting that D. J. Ely always denied any liability to pay him the insurance money, testifies that in August, 1872, D. J. Ely promised to pay over the insurance money as the building progressed, requiring as the only condition to the payment, the execution of appellant's personal bond against mechanic's liens.

D. J. Ely testifies, that while stating to appellant, that he did not admit but denied all claim of appellant to have from him any portion of the insurance money he did consent to furnish a sum of money equal to the insurance money collected, only upon the condition that his architect in Chicago, Wadskier, should be employed to make the plans and specifications, and superintend the erection of the building; that the plans and specifications should meet his approval, the money to be advanced pro rata as the work proceeded, and that the new building should be superior by that sum, to the building he was required to build under the lease. Wadskier was not employed by appellant as the architect, but some other architect was employed. D. J. Ely testifies, that appellant never consulted with him with regard to the character of the building erected; that the architect's plans and specifications were never submitted to him, and that he never approved any plans or specifications. The building erected by appellant was four stories and a basement, the walls of the basement and first floor being sixteen inches, and above that twelve inches. It appears from the evidence that the walls are too slight for a building of that kind. The testimony of the architect, Wadskier, is, that the walls ought to be twenty inches in the basement, and sixteen inches in the first, second and third stories, and twelve inches in the fourth story, and that nothing less would answer for heavy business. It appears, too, that there is no front entrance to the building above the first story, except a centre entrance for both buildings, which would be unadapted to the separate occupancy of the buildings, to remedy which would involve very extensive alterations of the interior of the buildings.

The promise to furnish any money toward rebuilding, without adverting to whether it was supported by a sufficient consideration, was accompanied with material conditions, according to the testimony of D. J. Ely, which were not complied with, and for that reason, there was warrant for the decree, finding there was no liability on the score of such an express promise. It is not sufficient to say that the conditions were substantially complied with, in that the new building is more valuable than the old one, by the amount of the insurance money. The conditions were important in many respects as concerned D. J. Ely, and he is entitled to claim exemption from liability otherwise than according to the terms of his promise.

We do not find then that the claim of the complainant to this insurance money has the support of a promise to pay the insurance, or of any express promise to rest upon.

The further position which is taken, that irrespective of any contract whatever, the insurance was for the benefit of the party, who was bound to rebuild; we know no ground of principle upon which it is to be maintained. The erection of the new building by the lessee, was not done at the instance, or by the procurement of the lessor. It was the voluntary act of the lessee, done in the performance of his own covenants in the lease. He was not entitled to the contribution by the lessor, of any money toward the rebuilding. Had there been no insurance there could be no pretense of a legal claim against the lessor for any portion of the cost of rebuilding. Whence the claim of this insurance money? It belongs to the assured, the owner of the building. The title to it was purchased with her money, not that of the lessee. She had an insurable interest in the premises, and so had the lessee. Either might have insured their own interest, She chose to insure her interest. Appellant did not see fit to insure. The owner might have insured for the benefit of appellant, but did not do so. She insured in her own name, paid the premiums and the insurance was for her benefit. There is nothing looking toward the benefit of appellant in the matter, any more than his having been requested to pay the premiums for insurance, which he absolutely refused to do. He might have done so, and had ground of claim to the insurance money. He did not do so, and is not entitled to the benefit of what he would not pay for.

He was not charged nor chargeable with the premiums. The building to be sure, upon the expiration of the lease, if it then remains will belong to the owner of the premises. But that was an advantage she secured by force of the covenants in the lease. Appellant saw fit to enter into covenants, and keep the building in repair at his own expense, and to deliver it up at the end of his term in as good order and condition as when he received it, without making any exception of loss by fire.

The legal effect of such covenants is well settled, and appellant must abide by them, as he made them. It is the province of courts to enforce the contracts which parties themselves make, not to make contracts for them. Because it may seem a hardship for the appellant, that he should sustain the whole cost of rebuilding, while the owner of the premises will enjoy the ultimate benefit thereof, should the building remain, a court of equity cannot, for such reason, impose upon the owner, payment of part of such cost. This insurance money is as much the money of Mrs. Ely, as that derived from any other source.

The case is analagous to that of mortgagor, and mortagee, who have each an insuarble interest. When the mortgagee insures, the mortgagor having had no connection with the insurance, cannot claim its benefit. The mortgagee may enjoy the insurance money received and still collect the whole mortgage debt from the mortgagor. Honore v. Lamar Fire Ins. Co., 51 Ill., 409; King v. The State Mutual Fire Ins. Co., 7 Cush., 10.

In Leeds v. Cheetham, 1 Sim. Ch., it was held that a tenant has no equity, to compel his landlord to expend money received from an insurance office, on the demised premises being burnt down, in rebuilding the premises, or to restrain the landlord from suing for the rent until the premises are rebuilt.

We do not find that the court below committed any error in dismissing the bill.

Decree affirmed.

WE have received from F. W. YOUNG, of the Chicago bar, the following opinion:

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

OPINION FILED JAN. 21, 1876.

No. 285.—WILLIAM SKELLY v. JAMES BOLAND, imp'd, etc.

Appeal from Cook.

REMARKS OF COURT TO JURY.

That while the court expresses its disapprobation of the court in trying a case, interfering by remarks within the hearing of the jury, unless they are in the form of instructions, still, in this case, as the evidence shows that the defendants could not have been prejudiced, the court refuses to set aside the verdict.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

Opinion by BREESE, J.

This was assumpsit in the Superior Court of Cook county, by James Boland against William Skelly and John Gwynn, sued as partners under the firm name of Skelly, Gwynn & Co., to recover for services as clerk to that firm, at the rate of one thousand dollars per annum, by special agreement. Gwynn defaulted and Skelly went to trial on the general issue. The jury found for the plaintiff and assessed his damages, on which the Court rendered a judgment, having denied defendant's motion for a new trial. Skelly appeals, making the point that the Court made improper remarks on the trial of the cause in the hearing of the jury, by which his case was prejudiced, and that there was error in refusing a new trial, insisting the weight of evidence is against the verdict. No point is made on the instructions. The only contest between the parties was this: Were these services rendered by appellee as a clerk in the concern, or as a partner. The defendant, Skelly, contended the plaintiff was a partner, and in that capacity or character rendered the services.

Much testimony was heard on this point, conflicting, of course, appellant being his own principal witness, whilst appellee testified for himself. There were other witnesses on both sides. On the part of appellee the defaulted defendant and partner was examined, and he testified that he and appellant had tried to induce appellee to become a partner with them, but failing in this, they agreed to hire appellee and give him a salary, on account of his acquaintance and influence with vessel men.

Appellee did make the experiment for a few days of acting as a partner, and gave the partnership the benefit of his name in one or two transactions, but the great preponderance of the evidence is that he never was a partner, but a clerk, merely, and as such entitled to wages.

When the plaintiff rested his case, the defendant moved for a non-suit, which motion the Court denied, remarking in the hearing of the jury, "As it now stands upon the evidence now in, the plaintiff has made out a perfect case, and is entitled to a verdict, unless the defendant makes a defense." The defendant objected to this, and we have considered the point; and whilst expressing our disapprobation of any interference of the Court, by remarks or otherwise, within the hearing of the jury, unless they be in the form of instructions, the remark here excepted to, in the view of the testimony then before the jury, could not have prejudiced the defendant's case, and we would not, therefore, set aside the verdict.

There was no error in refusing a new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence. The evidence was not of a conclusive character; it was cumulative, merely. Perceiving no error in the record, the judgment is affirmed.

MONROE & LEDDY for appellant.
F. W. YOUNG for appellee.

THROUGH the kindness of the law firm of M. A. RORKE & SON, we have received the following opinion:

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

OPINION FILED JAN. 21, 1876.

No. 291.—D. E. K. STEWART v. THE HIBERNIAN BANKING ASSOCIATION.

Appeal from Cook.

CONFESSION OF JUDGMENT — DEPARTURE FROM POWER—PROOF OF EXECUTION.

1. Where a power of attorney authorized an attorney to appear and waive service of process and confess a judgment, etc., and the attorney entered an appearance and allowed the jury to hear the evidence, held not such a departure from the power as to render all acts done under it erroneous.

2. A judgment entered by confession in term time will not be set aside when the power of attorney is more than a year and a day old because the record does not show that evidence was introduced that the defendant was alive.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

Opinion by CRAIG, J.

Appellee recovered a judgment in the Circuit Court of Cook county against D. E. K. Stewart and Joseph Fitzpatrick upon a promissory note. Stewart alone appeals, and seeks to obtain a reversal of the judgment, solely upon the ground that the court had no jurisdiction, by service of process, or otherwise, over his co defendant, Fitzpatrick. The original record filed in this cause does not show service of process upon Fitzpatrick, or that his appearance was entered; but, by an amended record filed since the cause has been pending in this court, it does appear that on the 11th day of February, 1875, and before the judgment was rendered, the appearance of Fitzpatrick was entered by Andrew M. Rorke, his attorney. It is, however, claimed by appellant that Rorke, the attorney of Fitzpatrick, had no authority to enter such an appearance as was entered in the cause.

We do not regard this position well taken. The record shows a power of attorney was filed with the note upon which judgment was rendered, executed by Fitzpatrick, by which he authorized and empowered Geo. F. Bailey, or any attorney of any court of record, to appear in any court of record, in term time or in vacation, in any of the States, at any time after the maturity of the note, to waive the service of process, and confess a judgment in favor of the payee of the note for the full amount of the note and interest.

The power of attorney confers full authority to do three things: First, to appear for Fitzpatrick; second, to waive the service of process; and, third, to confess a judgment upon the note for the amount due thereon.

It cannot be denied that the attorney possessed the power to waive service of process, and confess a judgment upon the note, in a court of record. The argument of appellant, however, is, as the attorney did not confess the judgment, the appearance that was entered, and the waiving of the service of process, did not confer upon the court jurisdiction over the person of Fitzpatrick. We are unable to appreciate the force of the argument. The fact that the attorney did two acts unauthorized by the power of attorney, but, instead of confessing the judgment, which was the third act authorized, allowed the jury to hear the evidence and return a verdict for the amount of the note and interest, cannot be regarded such a departure from the authority conferred by the power of attorney as to render all the acts done under it erroneous.

The position of appellant might be regarded with more favor if it appeared that Fitzpatrick had been injured by the act of his attorney. Such, however, is not the case. On the other hand, he makes no complaint, but seems to be entirely satisfied with the acts of his attorney and the judgment of the court.

It is, however, insisted that as the power of attorney was more than a year and a day old, the law required an affidavit to be filed to prove the execution of the power of attorney, and to establish that Fitzpatrick was then alive. The record furnishes no information in regard to the nature or amount of evidence heard by the court at the time the judgment was rendered; it contains no bill of exceptions, except on the motion to amend record. We will, therefore, presume the evidence offered and considered sufficient to authorize the judgment. Under the authority, however, of Rising v. Brainard, 36 Ill., 80, and Stahl v. Shipp, 44 Ill., 134, proof of the execution of the power of attorney, or that Fitzpatrick was then alive, was then unnecessary.

As we perceive no error in the record, the judgment will be affirmed.

Affirmed.

WILLIAM L. MOSS for appellant.
M. A. RORKE & SON for appellees.

WE have received from ADOLPH MOSES, of the Chicago bar, the following opinion:

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

OPINION FILED FEB. 4, 1876.

THE PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF ILLINOIS ex rel. ADOLPH MOSES, A. M. PENCE AND WILLIAM H. KING v. A. GOODRICH.

Motion for rule to show cause.

THE POWER OF THE COURT TO STRIKE A LAWYER'S NAME FROM THE ROLL FOR IMPROPER ADVERTISING FOR DIVORCE CASES.

1. RIGHT OF AN ATTORNEY TO ADVERTISE.—That an attorney may make any one of the branches of the law a specialty, but he must not in so doing and acting, use undignified means, or low, disgusting artifices, and least of all, should not withhold his name to his advertisement, nor should they be false, or contain libel on the courts.

2. POWER OF COURT.—That the court having power by express law to grant a license to practice law has an inherent right to see that the license is not abused, or perverted to a use not contemplated in the grant.

3. THE RESPONDENT DISBARED.—The court finds the respondent guilty of improper practice and improper advertising in divorce cases, and strikes his name from the roll of attorneys.—ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

Opinion by BREESE, J.

On the eighth day of October of this present term an information duly subscribed and sworn to was filed in this court, and a rule thereupon prayed against Alphonso Goodrich, requiring him to show cause by the twentieth day of that month why his name should not be stricken from the roll of attorneys of this court.

The information was filed by three members of the bar, practicing their profession in the city of Chicago, interested as they allege in upholding the integrity of the courts and of the profession of the law, and in the proper administration of the law.

The defendant is alleged to be a licensed attorney and counselor at law in the same city, practicing his profession in the courts thereof.

The information charges that defendant has been guilty of improper conduct in causing false and fraudulent advertisements to be inserted in divers newspapers published in the United States, inviting "so-called" divorce business, and that he has for years past caused to be inserted in the daily newspapers published in Chicago anonymous advertisements, specimens of which are incorporated in the information, one of which, of August 9, 1870, is of the purport following:

"Divorces legally obtained without publicity and at small expense. Address P. O. Box 1037. This is the P. O. box advertised for the past seven years, and the owner has obtained five hundred and seventy-seven divorces during that time."

Another advertisement in a daily paper of October 21, 1871, of the purport following: "Divorces legally obtained for desertion, cruelty, etc. Fee after decree. Eight years experience. Address P. O. Box 1037." Spised in the daily paper of the 28th by adding, "scandal avoided."

It is further charged that the newspaper press of Chicago having exposed the system of anonymous divorce advertisements and fraudulent divorces, mentioned the name of Goodrich as connected therewith, as "A. Goodrich of post-office box 1037 notoriety," after which the divorce advertisements of defendants, as published in a Chicago daily paper of September 30th, 1875, read in this way: "Divorces legally obtained—not fraudulently. Fee after divorce. Ten years practice in the courts of Chicago. Address P. O. Box 1037."

It is further charged that defendant, in the month of August, 1875, caused to be inserted in the Daily Herald of that date, a newspaper of large circulation published in the city of New York, this advertisement: "Divorces legally obtained for incompatibility, etc. Residence unnecessary. Fee after decree. Address P. O. Box 1037, Chicago, Ill."; and that defendant caused the same to be published in the New York Daily Sun of September 14, 1875, and in newspapers of various other States of this Union.

It is further charged that defendant well knew the fact that no divorces could be obtained in any of the courts of this State without publicity, and that he used the phrases, "without publicity" and "scandal avoided," in his advertisements, to impress the public mind that he could procure divorces in the courts of Chicago without the proceedings being made public, averring that the several newspapers published in that city did then publish and have always published the proceedings of the courts, and that for some time past the practice of referring divorce causes to masters in chancery had been abolished. And it is further charged, that defendant well knew the fact that "incompatibility" was not one of the lawful causes for divorce in this State, and that one year's residence in this State was required prior to filing a bill of complaint for divorce, unless the offense complained of was committed in this State, whilst one or both parties resided therein and could only be had in the county where complainant resided.

It is then charged that these advertisements are false and scandalous, calculated to bring the courts of justice into disrepute and contempt, and were published by the defendant with the intention of deception and fraud.

The advertisements were admitted in defendant's answer to be his act, and a printed letter purporting to have been issued from his office, 124 Dearborn street, Chicago, bearing his printed signature, and dated Aug. 21, 1875, ostensibly in reply to a previous letter from some unknown person but really intended as a "circular," was also his act. In this circular, after enumerating the several causes for divorce, as specified in the statute of this State, he states also on his professional reputation "incompatity" as a cause. The "circular" also informs the party of the total amount of charges, one hundred and twenty-five dollars—twenty-five dollars of which was required in hand and the balance when the decree under the seal of the court was placed in the hands of the applicant. If, however, the party perferred, no present payment was required, but a deposit in bank or with an express agent at the residence of the party, with the understanding that it was to be paid to the attorney when he sent the decree. The "circular" contains this further direction: "If the above is satisfactory and you wish me to proceed, please deposit the money in bank or with express agent and have them sign the enclosed receipt and retur' to me."

To indicate further the nature of defendant's special avocation, we give a copy of the required receipt.

$125.00. Aug. 21, 1875.

Received of —— $125 in escrow, to be paid to A. Goodrich upon his presenting to me a certified copy of a decree of divorce under the seal of a court of record, in the case of —— versus ——. In case decree of divorce is not obtained within three months from this date, said sum of money to be refunded to ——."

And this bears as its emblem the figure of Justice, with one hand resting upon a sword, and with the other bearing aloft the scales!

The wiles and arts and contrivances to which defendant has resorted in his most disgusting cause, are not only not denied but justified, and in explanation of his claim to be able to procure a divorce on the ground of incompatibility, he alleges, by the laws of Utah Territory, that is a ground of divorce. This we regard as the merest subterfuge, for his advertisements are those of a lawyer residing and practising in this State, and the scope of the advertisement is to advise distant parties of the requirements of the laws of this State. Besides, the defendant exhibited no authority to practice law in Utah or any other State than this. It was a false and fraudulent statement, and known to be so when made.

Again, these advertisements, some one or all, convey the idea that by some unexplained means, defendant has such control over the courts of justice in the city of Chicago, as to induce its ministers to conceal from public view and public scrutiny their proceedings in divorce cases, and no matter what the claim of the applicant may be, whether true or false, whether statutory or not, he, by long practice of his arts, can accomplish all that is desired, neither the courts nor the public being the wiser on account thereof. Such shameless effrontery has never before, to our knowledge, been manifested by any member of this or any other bar, and it should stigmatize their author with enduring shame and contumely.

These advertisements are not only a libel upon the courts of justice of this State, but are false in themselves, and put forth to the public by one who would not place his name to them. No high-minded honorable member of our noble profession in this or any other State, so demeans himself, nor does any member of it, jealous of his own honor and duly appreciating his relations to the profession and to the courts, so conduct himself. Look to the distinguished men who have adorned the bar, who have shed lustre upon the profession — the Websters, Wirts, Pinckneys, Emmets, and in our own State, the Kanes, Cooks, Blackwells, Lockwoods, Walkers, and others without number who have passed away, who had their own honor and the honor of their profession in view, with ambition stimulating them to win such trophies as are gladly awarded to well-earned merit. Were they ever concerned in such low, degrading efforts? Never. It is not denied an attorney may make any one of the branches of the law a specialty, but he must not in so doing and acting, use undignified means or low, disgusting artifices, and least of all should not withhold his name to his advertisements, nor should they be false or contain libel on the courts. No honorable, high-minded lawyer, alive to the dignity of his profession and emulous of its honors, could stoop so low as this defendant has. That he should embellish his papers, contrived in a spirit of barratry, with the emblem of Justice, is singularly inappropriate.

We have no patience with one, who, bearing our license to practice law in our courts, has so shocked all sense of propriety of professional decorum, and of respect to the court in which he practices. He is an unworthy member, and must be disbarred. The objections made by the defendant, of want of jurisdiction in this court to entertain the case, the unconstitutionality of the law giving the jurisdiction, the right of a trial by jury on the information, are entitled to no weight.

This court, having power by express law to grant a license to practice law, has an inherent right to see that the license is not abused or perverted to a use not contemplated in the grant. In granting the license, it was on the implied understanding the party receiving it should, at all times, demean himself in a proper manner, and if not reflecting honor upon the court appointing him, by his professional conduct, he would at least abstain from such practices as could not fail to bring discredit upon himself and the courts; and, above all, that he should not publish false and fraudulent advertisements of his capabilities, from the long experience of years, to keep secret judicial proceedings, thereby implying a judicial control, which, of itself, is a libel upon those courts.

The morale of defendant's professional conduct deserves special notice. He makes divorce cases a specialty. How many persons in our broad land, weary of the chain that binds them? And how many are eager to seize upon the slightest twig that may offer to aid them in escaping from a supposed sea of troubles, in which wedded life has immersed them? How many are fretting under imaginary ills, and what better devices than those practiced by this defendant could be contrived to increase their disquietude and stimulate to efforts, by perjury, if need be, to free themselves from their supposed unhappy condition? Is it desirable divorce cases should accumulate in our courts? If so, the defendant is justified in the means he has used and is using, to that end. An honorable, high-minded lawyer, will always aid a deserving party seeking a divorce, as coming strictly within his professional duties. He will render the aid, not solicit the case, and he will in all things regarding it, act the man, and respect, not only his own professional reputation, but the character of the courts, and discharge the unpleasant duty in all respects as an honorable attorney and counselor should do. Such a lawyer will never be found stirring up or soliciting such cases, nor disgrace the profession by the dissemination of such a "circular," and "receipt in escrow," as this defendant manufactures and uses.

In view of our duty, as imposed by the statute, and the defendant's rights as guaranteed him by the Constitution and the laws, we are unable to see why this court has not, and should not have the power, to purge itself of all uncleanness which may be found in its cloisters, and ridding itself of any nuisance which may desecrate them.

We are satisfied the defendant has dishonored the profession of the law, and his position as one of its ministers; and that he ought to be, and he is, from this time forth, disbarred.

His name will be stricken from the roll of attorneys of this court.

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT.

OPINION FILED JAN. 21, 1876.

No. 167.—C. KASSING v. JOHN H. MORTIMER et al.
Appeal from Superior Court of Cook.

MOTION TO SUPPRESS DEPOSITIONS.

That objections to depositions which may be obviated by issuing a new commission and re-examining the witness, cannot be heard after the cause is called for trial. Such objections must be made in time, so as not to unnecessarily delay the business of the court.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

Opinion by SCHOLFIELD, J.

This was an action of assumpsit for merchandise sold and delivered by appellees to appellant.

The only questions discussed in the briefs before us relate to the ruling of the Court below in permitting the reading of the deposition of John G. Schneider in evidence.

The deposition appears to have been taken before one Allen Lee Smidt, of the city of New York, who was appointed a commissioner for that purpose, and it is objected there is nothing in the record showing that he was authorized to administer an oath.

Even if this objection, if made in apt time, would have been tenable, which is not conceded, it is clear it was made too late to be entertained by the court.

The record shows the motion to suppress the deposition, on account of this objection, was not made until the case was called for trial. It has been repeatedly held that objections to depositions which might be obviated by issuing a new commission and re-examining the witness, cannot be heard after the cause is called for trial and submitted to a jury. Kimball v. Took, 1 Gilm., 424; Frink v. McCluny, 4 Id., 569; Thomas v. Dunaway, 30 Ills., 386; Winslow, et al. v. Newlan, et al., 45 Id., 145; Moshier v. Knox College, 32 Id., 162. It is not material, in the present case, that when the motion was made, no jury had been actually empaneled. It is sufficient the case had been reached for trial in the regular call of the docket, and had been called for trial, before the motion to suppress the deposition was made. Had the motion been sustained, it was then too late to retake the deposition, and either the case must have been continued, or appellees been compelled to try without the evidence. The deposition had been on file for several months. The objection could have been disposed of in ample time, so that, if sustained, the deposition might have been retaken in time to have been used on the trial without any postponement. This course of practice is not allowable. Formal and dilatory objections—that is, those that go to matters that may be corrected, must be made in time so as to not unnecessarily delay the business of the Court.

The objections to the interrogatories and answers belong to the same class—they are formal and were urged too late. But even if they were well taken, there is enough in the deposition that is unobjectionable to sustain the verdict.

The judgment is affirmed.

SUPREME COURT OF NORTH CAROLINA.

E. T. BLUM, EX., v. ISAAC W. ELLIS.

THE BANKRUPT LAW LIENS—ALL DEBTS MUST BE PROVED.

The bankrupt law does not divest a lien, but as all the property of a bankrupt, as well that subject to mortgages and liens, as that which is unencumbered, passed to the assignee and is in custodia legis, subject to priorities and liens, it follows that the Bankrupt Court is the proper tribunal in which to administer the remedies for the enforcement of liens.

All claimants against the estate of a bankrupt are required to prove their debts, however evidenced.

Motion for leave to issue execution, heard before CLOUD, J., at Spring Term, 1875, Forsythe Superior Court.

At May Term, 1870, of Forsythe Superior Court, the plaintiff's testatrix, Miss M. N. Transon, obtained a judgment for $761.65, and costs, against the defendants, Isaac W. Ellis and Holden Smith, on their promissory note, executed to the testatrix of the plaintiff, as sureties for one S. E. Smith.

A transcript of this judgment was sent to the clerk of the Superior Court of Davie county, on the 12th day of August, 1871, and made a judgment roll of that court, the defendants residing and holding real estate in that county. Both of the defendants at that time had their homesteads laid off, which covered their real estate.

The testatrix of the defendant died on the 7th day of May, 1872. On the 30th day of May of that year, the plaintiff qualified as her executor, and on the 23d day of April, he was made a party plaintiff to said judgment on the docket in Forsythe county, but not on the judgment roll of the court docket in the county of Davie. Since August, 1870, no execution has issued on said judgment.

At May term, 1874, of Forsythe Superior Court, the plaintiff moved for leave to issue an execution against the defendant, Isaac W. Ellis, upon notice duly served upon him, returnable to that term, the defendant, Holden Smith, having prior thereto obtained his certificate of discharge from his debts in the Bankrupt Court. It also appeared that Isaac W. Ellis, on the 30th of June, 1873, obtained his discharge from the Bankrupt Court, and that the reversionary interest in the real estate owned by him in the county of Davie, at the date of the judgment aforesaid was re-conveyed to him by his assignee in bankruptcy, under the order of said court, no creditors having proved their claims in the Bankrupt Court.

It further appeared that the plaintiff's judgment against the said Ellis, was duly scheduled in the name of M. N. Transon, the testatrix, in his bankrupt petition, which was filed in the bankrupt court, March 24th, 1873, and that notice was mailed by the assignee to M. N. Transon, the testatrix, to Salem, her place of residence, which the executor never received. No notice was ever mailed to said executor, nor served on him in any way whatever.

The usual publication in the newspaper was made, and the executor filed an affidavit in which he stated that he did not have any knowledge of the proceedings in bankruptcy, until the defendant, Ellis, had obtained his certificate of discharge, and said real estate had been re-conveyed to him by his assignee, and it was proved that said judgment had not been paid.

Upon this statement of facts the plaintiff insisted that the judgment roll of the Superior Court of the county of Davie, created from its date, to wit: August, 1870, a lien on all the real estate of Ellis, in said county, which was not divested by the proceedings in bankruptcy, and that the plaintiff had the right to enforce this lien in the State Court, and moved the court for leave to issue execution to keep alive said judgment.

The court refused the motion, and the plaintiff appealed.

SETTLE, J. Congress has power, under the Constitution of the United States, to establish uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States.

In order to make the laws uniform, the bankrupt tribunals must act independently of State tribunals, and must control them in all things pertaining to the bankrupt and his estate, for it would entirely destroy the system, by preventing that uniformity which is enjoined by the Constitution, if suitors should be permitted, at their pleasure, to withdraw from the bankrupt courts into the State tribunals, cases involving any of the questions which grow out of the administration of the assets of a bankrupt.

It is not denied that Congress could have withdrawn from the State courts all cases pending against a bankrupt at the time of the adjudication of his bankruptcy, but for convenience, as it was supposed, this was not done, and the assignee of a bankrupt is permitted to prosecute or defend an action in the State courts, either to recover the estate of the bankrupt or to ascertain the liabilities and liens upon it.

The bankrupt act does not divest a lien, but as all the property of a bankrupt, as well that subject to mortgages and liens, as that which is unencumbered, passes to the assignee, and is in custodia legis, subject, of course, to priorities and liens, it follows that the bankrupt court is the proper tribunal in which to administer the remedies for the enforcement of liens. The State courts, as we have said, may be employed to collect the assets of a bankrupt, and also to ascertain the liens which may exist upon such assets, but it is one thing to ascertain a lien, and quite another to liquidate it; and if a party can liquidate his own liens, through the intervention of a State court, in the absence of the assignee, who represents the general creditors, there is no protection to other creditors against collusion and fraud between the bankrupt and such claimant; further, the settlement of the estate of a bankrupt may be indefinitely postponed by tedious litigation in the State courts.

While all subsisting liens are fully protected by the bankrupt act, we think, by the true interpretation of that act, all claimants against the estate of the bankrupt are required to prove their debts, however evidenced. If not so, why, in addition to the requirement that the bankrupt shall enter upon his schedule all secured debts, etc., does the 22d section of the act require the claimant to prove his demand, and "disclose whether any and what securities are held therefor?" The first section confers jurisdiction upon the bankrupt court to ascertain and liquidate the liens and other specific claims upon the assets of the bankrupt. Here are several courses open, in the bankrupt court, to the secured creditor, but he must adopt some one of them; he will not be permitted to sleep upon his lien until everything is closed in the bankrupt court, and then virtually nullify the whole thing by proceedings in the State courts. If he remains outside of the bankrupt court, he does so at the risk of having his debt barred, and he may also lose the benefit of his securities. We are aware that cases may be found, in great abundance, both supporting and opposing the positions here assumed. We do not feel called upon to cite or comment upon them, but feel ourselves at liberty, in this conflict of authority, to adopt what appears to us to be the most reasonable interpretation of the bankrupt act, and one which will lead to the least confusion in the administration of the assets of a bankrupt. Indeed, when we behold the confusion in which this subject has been involved by the conflicting decisions of different courts, we are inclined to think that it would have been better had Congress withheld entirely from State tribunals all questions touching the bankrupt, his creditors, and his assets.

We give no weight to the suggestion that the plaintiff in this case had no notice of the proceedings in bankruptcy, for this debt was entered upon the defendant's schedule, and notice was sent by mail, addressed to the plaintiff's testatrix, and the usual publication of notice was made in the newspapers.

This court has held, in Knabe & Co. v. Hayes, 71 N. C. Rep., 109, that the discharge of a bankrupt does bar the claim of a creditor who had no knowledge of the filing of the petition in bankruptcy, and whose name was not inserted in the schedule of creditors, and to whom no notice was mailed, unless the creditor alleges and can show that the omission to give notice was the result of fraud on the part of the debtor, and not the result of forgetfulness, accident, or mistake.

PER CURIAM. The judgment of the Superior Court is affirmed.

THROUGH the kindness of EARL BILL, clerk of the court at Cleveland, we have received the following opinion:

U. S. CIR. COURT, N. D. OF OHIO.

THE COMMERCIAL NATIONAL BANK, of Cleveland, Ohio, v. JOHN G. SIMMONS et al.

THE RIGHT OF NATIONAL BANKS TO SUE IN FEDERAL COURTS.

1. That a national bank does not sue in virtue of any right conferred by the Judiciary Act, but in virtue of the right conferred upon it by the act of 1864, authorizing and creating it, and which constitutes its charter. The charter of the old United States bank was but a law, as this general act is a law, of the United States.
2. That the Judiciary Act does not control the right and power of these banks to sue in the federal courts.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

Opinion of the Court by WELKER, J.

This suit is brought on two promissory notes payable to the order of J. G. Simmons & Co. and indorsed to the plaintiff.

The petition states that the plaintiff is a corporation existing under the laws of the United States, and does not state that the payee of the notes is not a citizen of Ohio.

The defendants, Thompson and Mills, demur to the petition, and assign three grounds of demurrer.

1st. That it appears on the face of the petition in each of said causes of action, that the court has no jurisdiction of the defendants, or either of them, or of the subject of the action.

2d. That the plaintiff and its assignor are both residents of the State of Ohio, and of said district, and have no legal right to bring suit against the defendants in this court.

3d. For other good and sufficient reasons appearing on the face of the petition.

This demurrer raises two questions:

1st. Whether the plaintiff can sue in this court, being located in the State of Ohio, and in this district?

2d. Whether, under the Judiciary Act of 1789, and the limitation of the 11th section thereof, the plaintiff can sue in this court upon the promissory notes in petition described the assignor thereof to the plaintiff, being a citizen of the State of Ohio, and of this district.

In order to dispose of the questions made, it will be necessary to examine the provision of the act of Congress "to provide a national currency, etc." approved June 3d, 1864, under which the plaintiff was organized, and also the act on the same subject, approved in 1863.

The 59th section of the act of 25th February, 1863, provides that "all suits, actions and proceedings by or against any association under the act, may be had in any circuit, district or territorial court of the United States held within the district where such association was established."

The 57th section of the Act of 1864 provides: "That suits, actions, and proceedings against any association under this act, may be had in any circuit, district or territorial court of the United States held within the district in which such association may be established, or in any State, county or municipal court in the county or city in which such association is located having jurisdiction in similar cases."

It is claimed by the defendants that under this section as amended, suit can not be brought by national banks in the State in which they were established. That it only applies to suits against such associations. That, it is true, would seem to be the provision of the section.

But the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Kennedy v. Gibson and others, 8 Wallace, 498, has given a construction of these two sections that is binding upon this court. Justice Swayne, delivering the opinion of the court, says:

"The 59th section of the act of February 25th, 1863, provides that all suits by or against such associations, may be brought in the proper courts of the United States, or of the State. The 57th section of the Act of 1864 relates to the same subject, and revises and enlarges the provisions of the 59th section of the preceding act. In the latter, the word by, in respect to such suits, is dropped. The omission was doubtless accidental. It is not to be supposed that Congress intended to exclude the associations from suing in the courts where they can be sued. The difference in language in the two sections is not such as to warrant the conclusion that it was intended to change the rule prescribed by the act of 1863. Such suits may still be brought by the associations in the courts of the United States. If this be not the proper construction, while there is provision for suits against the associations, there is none for suits by them in any court."

Again, in 10 Wallace, 605, The National Bank of Boston sued a State Bank of the same State in the Circuit Court of Massachusetts, and the action was maintained. This case recognizes the construction given to these sections by Justice Swayne by entertaining jurisdiction in that case.

We may then regard the section as reading by or against, and authorizing suit by or against these associations.

It is claimed also by defendants that the 57th sec. only provides for suits under or authorized by the act, that is for liabilities under the act. This is not tenable. The words "under this act" refer to and apply to associations under the act, as descriptive of the parties authorized to sue or be sued, and not liabilities or causes of action.

We now come to the second question made, and a very important one, and about which there well may be difference of opinion. I have examined it with much care, in order to arrive at a correct conclusion, and feel well satisfied at the conclusions to which I have arrived.

Suppose the plaintiff has the right to sue generally in this court as we have determined, has it the right to sue on promissory notes assigned to it by a resident of the district?

I can find no adjudicated case under the banking law, settling this question.

The 11th section of the judiciary act of 1789, after stating that Circuit courts shall have jurisdiction in civil cases, etc., in all cases where the suit is between a citizen of the State where "the suit is brought, and a citizen of another State," provides "nor shall any district or circuit court have cognizance of any suit to recover the contents of any promissory note or other chose in action in favor of an assignee, unless a suit might have been prosecuted in such court to recover the said contents if no assignment had been made except in cases of foreign bills of exchange."

I find two cases in 9th Wheaton, decided by the Supreme Court under a similar question made, which arose under the charter of the old United States Bank.

In the first case, 9 Wheaton, 740, Osborn v. The United States Bank, it is decided that the charter of the bank confers on the bank the right to sue in any circuit court of the United States. In delivering the opinion in this case, Chief Justice Marshall says:

"The charter of incorporation not only creates it, but gives it every faculty which it possesses. The power to acquire rights of any description, to transact business of any description, to make contracts of any description, to sue on those contracts, is given and measured by its charter, and that charter is the law of the United States. This being can acquire no right, make no contract, bring no suit, which is not authorized by a law of the United States."

Another case was decided at the same term of the Supreme Court: 9 Wheaton, 905, The United States Bank v. The Planters' Bank of Georgia. The suit was originally brought by the United States Bank v. defendant in the Circuit Court for the District of Georgia upon notes payable to a citizen of Georgia, and indorsed and transferred to the Bank. The defense set up was that the court had no jurisdiction under the 11th section of the Judiciary Act, or, rather, the limitation to it.

In delivering the opinion of the court, Chief Justice Marshall says:

"We proceed next to inquire whether the jurisdiction of the court is ousted by the circumstance that the notes on which the suit was instituted were made payable to citizens of the State of Georgia. The words of the Judiciary Act, § 11, are:" (He then quotes the part of the act above quoted, being the limitation, and says:) "This is a limitation on the jurisdiction conferred by the Judiciary Act. It was apprehended that bonds and notes given in the usual course of business by citizens of the same State to each other, might be assigned to citizens of another State, and thus render the maker liable to a suit in the Federal courts. To remove this inconvenience, the act which gives jurisdiction to the courts of the Union over suits brought by the citizen of one State against the citizen of another, restrains that jurisdiction where the suit is brought by an assignee to cases where the suit might have been sustained, had no assignment been made. But the Bank does not sue in virtue of any right conferred by the Judiciary Act, but in virtue of the right conferred by its charter. It does not sue because the defendant is a citizen of a different State from any of its members, but because its charter confers upon it the right of suing its debtors in a circuit court of the U. S. * * * There is, consequently, scarcely a debt due to the Bank for which a suit could be maintained in a Federal court, did the jurisdiction of the court depend on citizenship. A general power to sue in anycircuit court of the United States, expressed in terms obviously intended to comprehend every case, would thus be construed to comprehend no case. Such a construction cannot be the correct one. We think, then, that the charter gives to the Bank a right to sue in the circuit courts of the United States, without regard to citizenship."

Now let us examine the banking law itself under which the plaintiff was organized.

Sec. 8, of the act of 1864, provides "That every association formed pursuant to the provisions of this act, shall, from the date of the execution of its organization certificate, be a body corporate. * * By such name it may make contracts, sue and be sued, complain and defend in any court of law and equity as fully as natural persons, * * * and exercise under this act all such incidental powers as shall be necessary to carry on the business of banking, by discounting and negotiating promissory notes, drafts, bills of exchange, and other evidence of debt; by receiving deposits; by buying and selling exchange, coin and bullion; by loaning money on personal security," etc.

Then follows, in the same act, Sec. 57, already quoted, providing "That suits, actions, and proceedings, by or against any association under this act, may be had in any circuit, district, or territorial court of the United States within the district in which such association may be established."

To ascertain the privileges and powers conferred upon these banking associations, these sections are to be taken and construed together. It seems to me that these privileges and powers thus given in this act, are as broad and comprehensive as those given to the United States bank by its charter, and referred to in the case in 9 Wheaton.

It must be borne in mind that in the Judiciary Act the right to sue or be sued mainly depends upon citizenship of the parties. That corporations are only allowed to sue or be sued in the Federal courts, under the act, through the legal fiction of citizenship, arising from the presumption that such corporations are citizens of the States under whose laws they are created.

These banking associations, not being created by State laws, have no State citizenship growing out of the presumed residence of the stockholders.

Under the judiciary act, then, they have no power to sue in Federal courts, and must, therefore, derive it from the act creating them. Having no right to sue under that act, the limitation in the 11th section as to suits upon indorsed notes and choses in action does not apply; the right to sue under that section, and the limitation thereto, go together, the one controlling the other.

If the matter of citizenship, in reference to the national banks, is dispensed with in favor of such banks, then what reason is there for the application of the limitation, as to suits on assigned paper? That limitation is only attached to enforce the privileges of citizenship and to prevent its abuse in bringing suits in Federal courts. And, further, the banks, in purchasing notes, etc., only are doing what the law authorizes them to do.

I may, then, well say, as was said in the case in Wheaton, that the bank does not sue in virtue of any right conferred by the Judiciary Act, but in virtue of the right conferred upon it by the act of 1864, authorizing and creating it, and which constitutes its charter. The charter of the old United States bank was but a law, as this general act is a law, of the United States.

That the Judiciary Act does not control the right and power of these banks to sue in the Federal courts.

The demurrer to the petition is overruled.

SUPREME COURT OF TENNESSEE.

[HEAD-NOTES TO CASES IN THE COMMERCIAL REPORTER.]

Nashville, Jan. 15, 1876.

John C. Spence and others, Plaintiffs in error, v. Crockett and Ransom.

NOTARY PUBLIC.—CERTIFICATE OF PROTEST.—RECITALS IN, ONLY RAISE A PRESUMPTION.—The statements made by a notary raise only a presumption. They are prima facie true, but they are open to rebuttal. Being but prima facie evidence, it may be overturned by any legal testimony that will satisfy the tribunal having cognizance of the question in dispute that the recitals of the instrument of protest are, in fact, untrue.

Where the circuit judge instructed the jury that "it will require the testimony of one credible witness and corroborating circumstances, or two credible witnesses, to rebut the certificate of a notary public." Held, that this was error. The recitals of the certificate are but recitals of matters of fact, and of the judgment the notary has formed as to matters where there may be difference of opinion.

Thomas Robertson, et al., v. Nelson Walker, et al.

VOLUNTARY UNINCORPORATED ASSOCIATION—RIGHTS OF MEMBERS.—Where certain members of a voluntary unincorporated charitable association having been expelled therefrom, filed a bill for a dissolution and winding up of its affairs, and for division of effects among the members. Held, that the funds contributed became the money of the association for the purposes of the society, and no member had any individual claim to it, but was only entitled to the benefits provided by the rules of the society.

The parties having no individual property rights to be asserted, and prima facie, the action of the body in expelling them being correct, courts cannot take cognizance of such a case to restore the parties to their position as members of the society.

WILL—BURTHEN OF PROOF.—The doctrine of this court has always been uniform, that when a will is produced and its formal execution established by proof, and the will is attacked for fraud or incapacity in the testator, the burthen of proof is upon the assailing party to show the fraud, undue influence or want of testamentary capacity.

Nashville, May 15, 1875.

Mary Bilbrey v. J. T. Poston.

HOMESTEAD—CONSTITUTION—WHEN ESTABLISHED.—In pursuance of the ordinance of the convention prescribing the manner and time at which the question of the ratification or rejection by the constitution should be submitted to the vote of the people, etc., the Governor did, on the 5th of May, 1870, "declare and proclaim" the result of the vote, thus attesting that the constitution was established on the 5th of May, 1870.

VOLUNTARY ALIENATION OF BY HUSBAND, BEFORE THE CONSTITUTION.—Where the conveyance of the husband was made on 15th April, 1870, at a time when no constitutional or other legal inhibition existed to restrain the alienation of the homestead by the husband, he being the owner thereof, in the absence of proof of fraud and incapacity, the conveyance is held void.

Landlord and Tenant—Fire—Insurance—Rebuilding.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of this State, by Sheldon, J., holding when a tenant covenants that he has received the premises in good order and condition, and that he will keep them in repair at his own expense, and at the end of the term he will deliver the same up to his lessor in as good condition as when they were entered upon by him, and the premises are destroyed by fire during the term, the tenant must sustain the whole cost of rebuilding the same, and the tenant has no equity to compel the landlord to expend money received from an insurance office on the demised premises in rebuilding.

Remarks to Jury.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of this State, by Breese, J., upon the practice of judges influencing juries by remarks not in the form of instructions.

Confession of Judgment—Practice.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of this State, by Craig, J., upon a question of practice arising in entering up a judgment by confession.

Striking an Attorney's Name from the Roll—Divorce Practice.—The application of the committee of the bar association, composed of William H. King, A. M. Pence and Adolph Moses, in the Supreme Court of this State, to have the name of A. Goodrich stricken from the roll of attorneys for improper practice and advertising in divorce cases, has attracted much attention, This case was brought to a termination on the 4th inst., by an opinion delivered by Judge Breese, holding that the court had full jurisdiction over the respondent, and striking his name from the roll of attorneys.

Suppressing Depositions.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of this State by Scholfield, J., as to when a motion may be made to suppress a deposition.

Bankrupt Law—Liens—All Debts must be Proved.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of North Carolina, by Settle, J., holding that the bankrupt law does not divest a lien; but as all the property of a bankrupt, as well that subject to mortgages and liens, as that which is unencumbered passes to the assignee and is in the custody of the law, subject to priorities and liens, it follows that the bankrupt court is the proper tribunal in which to administer the remedies for the enforcement of liens; that all claimants against the estate of a bankrupt are required to prove their debts, however evidenced.

The right of National Banks to sue in Federal Courts.—The opinion of the United States Circuit Court by Welker, J., holding that a National Bank does not sue in virtue of any right conferred upon it by the act of 1864, authorizing and creating it, and which constitutes its charter; and that the Judiciary Act does not control the rights and powers of these banks to sue in the Federal courts.

Power of a Court of Equity to enjoin the collection of a tax.—The opinion of the Superior Court of Cook County, by Moore. J., as to when a Court of Equity will enjoin the collection of a tax.

NOTES TO RECENT CASES.

DEED—DEFECTIVE ACKNOWLEDGMENT.

The Court of Appeals of Maryland, in Grove v. Todd, 3 Law Times Reports, 59, hold that retroactive legislation, to cure or confirm conveyances or other proceedings defectively acknowledged or executed, is sustainable, upon the ground that it operates not upon the deed or contract by changing it, but upon the mode of proof only; that the deed, being without acknowledgment, was utterly null and void as against the wife, both at law and in equity; that the statute could not impart life to it as against her, without interfering with her vested rights secured by the Declaration of Rights; and that, therefore, the widow was entitled to have dower assigned in the land conveyed.

PROMISSORY NOTE—WHAT CONSTITUTES.

The Supreme Court of Maine, in Collins v. Bradbury, 3 Am. Law Times, 67, held that a note, in the ordinary form, payable to order, at a definite time, for a specified sum in money, is negotiable, notwithstanding the words "said promise made for a colt, this day taken; said colt holden for the payment of said amount."

STATUTES TO INVALIDATE VOID JUDGMENTS.

In Pryor v. Downey, 3 Am. Law Times, 68, the Supreme Court of California hold that an act which has the effect of rendering valid formal judgments entered by a court without jurisdiction, is to be regarded as an exercise of judicial functions by the legislature, and as a contravention of the provisions that no person shall be deprived of property without due process of law, and is, therefore, void.

CONSTRUCTION OF THE STATUTES OF 1874 RELATING TO NOTICES.

The attention of the profession is called to some questions that arise out of § 14, c. 95, p. 713, Statutes of 1874, regulating sales under trust deeds and mortgages made since July 1, 1874.

1. When does the "thirty days previous notice" required by the first sentence of that section begin to run? There would be no difficulty were it not that the third sentence requires "the notice" to be published "once in each week for four successive weeks," thus making the notice an entire thing, consisting of these four publications, and that notice to be given thirty days. Does the "thirty days" run from the end of the four weeks when the notice is complete and has been given, or, from the first one, when the notice commences?

On looking at other statutes on the subject of notices to be given more than once, it will be seen that this question is provided for. In the Chancery act, § 13, p. 199, forty days are required to intervene between the first publication and the term at which default may be taken. So in Attachment, § 23, p. 156, no default can be taken until after the expiration of ten days after the last publication.

2. But a more serious question is what is meant by the words "assigns, if any," in the second sentence. Its connection is, "It shall be sufficient to insert in such notice the date of the instrument, names of the grantor aad grantee, and of the assigns, if any," etc. Now, who are the "assigns?" This term, all know, is of the broadest signification. It includes not only the grantees of the mortgages by deed, but his judgment creditors, and others, having liens on the premises. If their names are left out, and the statute should be held to require them to be put in, it is evident that, as to them, their equity of redemption would not be cut off by the sale. W. T. B.

U. S. DIST. COURT, N. D. OF OHIO.

Opinion Feb. 6, 1876.

John Cunningham v. Alson Cady.

BANKRUPTCY—ORDER TO SHOW CAUSE—DEFECTIVE PROOFS.

Before Welker, J.—The following is the statement of the case and the opinion of the court:

On the 8th of January, 1876, John Cunningham filed in this court his petition against said Cady, debtor, containing the necessary allegations required by the bankrupt act, and duly verified. Depositions were also presented in support of the allegations of the petition, and filed with the same. Thereupon an order to show cause was made against the debtor, and served on him as required by the act.

The debtor by his counsel now moves the court to dismiss the petition and proceedings for the following reasons:

1st. That the deposition in proof of the act of bankrupcy charged is insufficient in law.

2nd. That the deposition in proof of the petitioner's claim against the debtor is also insufficient in law.

The first insufficiency complained of is, that while the deposition sets forth the fact of a conveyance by the debtor of his property to his father-in-law, it fails to show or allege that it was done with an intent of a fraudulent nature under the provisions of the bankrupt law. The second insufficiency alleged is, that the deposition in support of the petitioner's claim, fails to show whether the claim is secured or unsecured; or if secured, to what extent—whether it is not wholly secured—so that the court can judge of the amount provable.

As to the act of bankrupcy, the deposition is defective in failing to allege or show fraudulent intent of the debtor in making the conveyance. But as to the second specification of the motion, the petitioning creditor insists that the proof is sufficient; that he need not prove that his claim was not secured; that if it were so secured the fact should have been pleaded in an answer and not by preliminary motion. There is some authority for holding that unless it appears that the claim is fully secured, it is still a provable claim under a proper interpretation of the bankrupt law. But without undertaking to determine that question, it is sufficient to say that it is the better practice to set out in the deposition all the material facts concerning the claim; in other words, to "give a particular description of the debt" as prescribed in the form given by the Supreme Court.

It follows that, owing to the defects of the proofs, they must be amended before the debtor can be required to answer the petition, and that the order to show cause was improvidently issued. The question now arises whether the debtor's motion to dismiss the petition and the whole proceedings on that account, shall be allowed. At this stage of the matter the petitioning creditor interposes his motion for leave to file further and supplemental depositions in proof of his debt, and of the act of bankruptcy in support of his petition.

I think this motion should be allowed for the following reasons:

The jurisdiction of the court over the subject matter of the proceeding is acquired by the filing of a petition framed and verified in accord nce with the provisions of the act, and the rights and liabilities of all the parties relate and are determined by the time at which the petition is filed. On the filing of the petition it is provided bv the act that "if it shall appear that sufficient grounds exist therefor," an order to show cause shall be entered against the debtor, etc. How the sufficient "grounds" shall be made to appear is not shown in the text of the statute, and in the absence of any other construction of this portion of the section, it would be naturally inferred that it would be by an inspection of the petition itself. But the Supremc Court has seen fit to require proofs of the truth of the principal allegations by separate depositions as a condition precedent to the order to show cause, and in fulfillment of the requirements of the language in question. No defect in the petition is complained of, but the defect is in a subsequent and incidental matter. That defect may be cured without prejudice to the regularity or the sufficiency of the petition, in the mode proposed by the motion of the petitioner, and thus the rights and liabilities created by the filing of the petition are preserved without any hardship upon the debtor. The petition, and the depositions in support thereof, are not so intimately connected with each other that if depositions are defective the petition must necessarily be dismissed. It may be sustained while the proofs may not be held sufficient.

The order to show cause is set aside at the cost of the petitioner, and he has leave to file supplemental proofs in support of his allegations as to his claim, and as to acts of bankruptcy, on the filing of which, if found sufficient, an alias order to show cause be entered.

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

Opinion Filed Jan. 21, 1876.

No. 316.—N. Boardman v. George C. Cook et al.

Appeal from Superior Court of Cook.

MOTION TO SET ASIDE DEFAULT—AFFIDAVIT OF DEFENSE.

Per Curiam.

The pleas of appellant were stricken from the files, on motion of appellees, and the decision of the court on the motion is assigned for error.

The bill of exceptions incorporated in the record does not contain the motion, or the evidence heard by the court in support of the motion, nor was an exception taken to the decision. We can not, therefore, undertake to say, in the absence of proof, that the decision was wrong; but, on the other hand, we must presume the facts presented to the court on the hearing of the motion, were sufficient to justify the decision.

The bill of exceptions shows that appellant entered a motion to set aside the assessment of damages, which was denied, and an exception taken.

It does not appear that any error occurred in the assessment of damages; but the real object of appellant, no doubt, was to set aside the default which had been previously entered. An application, however, to set aside a default is addressed to the sound discretion of the court, and the decision will not be reversed unless it appears that there had been a gross abuse of discretion. Greenleaf v. Roe, 17 Ill., 474.

The affidavit of appellant, filed on the hearing of the motion, does not even state that he has a meritorious defense to the action.

It is true, he states he believes he has a defense; but no facts whatever are incorporated in the affidavit from which the court could determine whether that belief was well founded.

Upon a careful inspection of the facts before the court on the motion, we perceive no sufficient cause appearing to justify a reversal of the judgment of the Superior Court. It will therefore be affirmed.

Affirmed.

J. Charles Haines has been appointed United States Commissioner in this district, in place of J. T. Ely, deceased. Mr. Haines is a son of Hon. E. M. Haines, a member of the Chicago bar, and has for the last five years performed the duties of justice of the peace to the entire satisfaction of the public. The appointment is an excellent one.

Receiving the Death Sentence.—One of our exchanges says:

George Morris, whom Judge Steele, of New Orleans, recently sentenced to be hanged, came to the bar whistling and laughing. The judge said: "George, you have been convicted of the murder of Sarah Jones. You pleaded guilty twice, but I insisted that your case should go before twelve citizens of your county. Have you anything to say why the sentence of the law should not be passed upon you?" Morris smiled and said, in a clear voice, "I agree with you, and am now prepared to receive the full extent of the law, which I know is death." After Judge Steele had sentenced him to be hanged, Morris thanked him for his kindness in so doing.

THROUGH the kindness of FRANCIS ADAMS, of the city law department, we have received a copy of the following opinion:

CIRCUIT COURT OF COOK CO.

OPINION, FEB. 1, 1876.

JAMES COUCH et al. v. MICHAEL EVANS, collector, etc.

THE POWER OF A COURT OF EQUITY TO RESTRAIN THE COLLECTION OF A TAX BY INJUNCTION.

The opinion of the court was delivered by MOORE, J.

The complainant, James Couch, is the owner and proprietor of the well-known hotel called "The Tremont House," in the city of Chicago. He claims that on the 1st day of May, 1875, "he owned and was possessed of personal property to the value of $40,000 or thereabouts, and no money;" that at that time he gave to the assessor a statement of his personal property in South Chicago; that at that time he was 75 years of age, and quite feeble and unable to write, and that he made said statement in good faith, believing that the assessor would return the same as given him; that the assessor pretended to make up and fill out the schedule with the values given by the complainant; that the assessor assented to the valuations of the complainant; that the total value was $40,000; that afterwards the assessor, or some one for him, without the knowledge or consent of the complainant, changed the valuation from $40,000 to $55,000. He also avers that the assessor acted fraudulently by failing in many cases to assess divers persons and corporations;" that in many other instances he failed to assess the personal property of the owners at a fair value; that in 1874 the city of Chicago proceeded to levy and collect its taxes by and under the provisions of the law approved April 15, 1873; that after the adoption of the charter of 1872, the city council by its ordinance of June 7, 1873, fixed the appropriations for the fiscal year commencing April 1, 1875, and ending May 31, 1876, and providing (inter alia) for $55,000 with which to pay tax commissioners and assessors and their assistants; that in so doing the city "proceeded under the statute of April 15, 1875"—called Bill 300—that "to that end" the assessment was made for 1873; that the total valuations of personal and real property made by the assessor for 1875 was $295,586,430; that the total appropriations made June 7, 1875, was "about" $5,120,905.29. He then made averments as to assessments made in the various divisions of the city, conducing to show that valuations in some portions of the city cannot be accurate; that the answer made the assessment roll in disregard of law and of the rights of the citizen and tax-payer; that in August, 1875, the State Board of Equalization added to the assessed value fifty-two per cent. "arbitrarily and without notice to the citizens of Cook county;" that by adding the fifty-two per cent. the Board made the total amount of personal property in the city $44.815,391, and in the same way made the value of real estate $128,791,746 (including $3,297,336 for railway companies), making in the aggregate $174,607,137.

He then avers that August 9, 1875, an ordinance was passed and the city certified to the county clerk the amount of money appropriated, and proceeded to collect the amount required under the general revenue laws of the State. He claims that the city had elected to proceed under the law of April 15, 1875, and could not disregard that election and proceed under the general revenue laws. He complains that he has not been heard, or allowed to be heard, by any Board of Equalization.

There are many other statements in the bill, but they are in the main deductions, inferences and arguments drawn from a base upon the averments hereinbefore recited. He insists from the averments made that both city and county demand a higher rate of "taxation" than is allowed by law.

The affidavit of J. M. Rountree shows that public notice was given through the papers naming the time and place for exceptions to be made to any assessment, and that the complainant did not appear before the committee on equalization, or before the board, and ask to have his assessment corrected. Ryan says he was the deputy assessor who called, and on the 18th of May, 1875, left a blank return at the office of the Tremont House for James Couch to fill up and return; that the blank is the form prescribed by the general revenue law for the return of personal property; that the complainant made no return, and the affiant did not then see him, and he estimated the personal property of the complainant at $125,000; that afterward he saw the complainant, and then erased the valuation, and left it blank, to be filled up by the assessor; that he at no time pretended to make a schedule or list of the personal property of complainant; that he did not write anything; that he did not at any time or place assent to the valuation of $40,000, or to any other valuation; that he told complainant the return must be made to Phillips, the assessor, who would make the valuation.

Edward Phillips, the assessor, in his affidavit, says he had no conversation whatever with the complainant, and that the complainant made no return of personal property for taxation for the year 1875, and that he, the assessor, made the assessment and valuation at $55,000 from the best information he could obtain, and that he regards it as just and equitable, and that Ryan, his deputy, and himself, were the only persons who had any authority in the premises, and that Ryan did not report to him, the assessor, any valuation of the personal property of the complainant.

This is a fair and full statement of the entire case, and making it thus full will very much aid in abbreviating the discussion of the various questions arising on the motion now pending for an injunction.

One question presented for consideration, and perhaps not the least important, is, Has the city the right to collect the taxes under the general revenue law? Has anything been done by the city to preclude it from so proceeding under the general revenue law? To answer these questions in the negative must defeat the city in its present effort to collect revenue, and then every important interest in the city must suffer. But if the rights of the citizen demand it, the courts must even hold that the immensely important interests of the city must suffer, and for the time be held in abeyance.

The constitutional limitations upon the power to levy and collect taxes are few, but well defined. The tax shall be ascertained "by valuation, and in proportion to value," etc. "Taxes shall be uniform in respect to persons and property within the jurisdiction of the body imposing the same." (Constitution, article 9, secs. 1, 9, and 10). It may sometimes be difficult to comply with these just and benign provisions. In fact, imperfect human judgment can at best only approximate perfect "uniformity."

To enable the city of Chicago to provide for the general good of the people, and subject to the limitations of the Constitution, the charter provides that the City Council shall have power to appropriate money for corporate purposes only and provide for the payment of debts and expenses of the corporation. The council shall, within the first quarter of each fiscal year, pass the appropriation ordinance, and in that provide for the payment of all necessary expenses and liabilities of the corporation that may accrue within the fiscal year, and no other appropriation shall be made within the fiscal year—except certain contingent appropriations that need not be considered at this time—vide Gross Statutes, art. 5, sec. 62; sub-sec. 2, page 218; art. 7, sec 89, page 227. It is not denied but that the council complied with these provisions of the charter and that this compliance was in apt time. From this point it is claimed by the complainant that the city proceeded under the statute of April 15, 1873. The defendants claim, however, that the assessors proceeded under that statute simply because the law existed there, and still exists, and required them to make the assessment. There was no ordinance directing them to proceed. After the law is complied with by the assessor why may not the city proceed under the general revenue laws? The council "has power at any time, in lieu of the mode prescribed by the law of April 15, 1873, by ordinance, to elect to certify to the county clerk the anount or amounts required to be raised by taxation upon the assessment of property for State and county taxes, and to collect the taxes for said city in the manner provided for in the general revenue laws of the State. (Gross Stat., section 270, page 259.) By so electing and so proceeding, the statute of April 15, A. D. 1873, is not abrogated. It does not cease to exist. Notwithstanding the fact that the city may proceed under the general law, this law allows the city to again return to the provisions of the law of April 15, 1873, and proceed according to its provisions.

Under this section of the law last named, and under the provisions of section 3, article 8 of the charter, the council did, before the second Tuesday in August, 1875, certify to the county clerk the amount of appropriations for corporate purposes. The rate per centum is then to be ascertained upon the total valuation of all property, subject to taxation within the city, as the same is assessed and equalized for State and county purposes. When this is done it is made the duty of the county clerk to extend such tax in a separate column upon the books of the collector of State and county taxes in the city—vide section 111, article 8, page 231 Gross Statutes. Then by the general revenue law it is provided, in harmony with the provisions of the city charter, that cities collecting taxes under the provisions of said law, shall annually on or before the second Tuesday in August, certify to the county clerk the several amounts required to be raised by taxation. (Chapter 120, section 122, page 878, Gross Statutes.) It is also provided that city and other taxes as well as those for county and State purposes, shall be extended against the assessed and equalized valuation of property, such valuation and equalization having been made by the State Board. (Ch. 120, sec. 128, page 179, Gross Statute.)

This appears to be a concise statement of all the provisions of law in the State, that is necessary to be cited in order that the precise question under discussion may be answered. It is true very many other provisions of law have been referred to, but such provisions do not aid in arriving at correct conclusions on the question now before the court.

The connected statement of all the provisions concerning the subject matter now under consideration, is an argument of itself.

Taxes must be uniform; that is the law imposing a tax must provide that it shall be uniform in respect to persons and property.

The appropriation ordinance must be enacted in apt time—within the first quarter of the fiscal year.

The city may elect to collect its revenue in one of two modes—under one of two laws.

The city in 1874 elected to collect and did collect under the statute of April 15, 1873.

The city in 1875 elected to collect under the provisions of the general revenue law—the other modes allowed by the law.

The appropriation ordinance must be certified to the county clerk, who shall extend the amount, according to the rate to be ascertained from the valuation, as equalized by the State Board.

In this statement is included all the requirements of the law that has anything to do with the question, and all that has been done thereunder. It is true very many other provisions have been cited, but it does not appear that there are any which conflict with, or which change or modify these provisions. No conflict is seen, and none exists. The city having for the year 1875 elected to collect its taxes under the general revenue law, and having made and certified an appropriation ordinance in due form of law, and the clerk having extended the tax according to the provisions of the law, it does not appear that there is any other provision of the law that in any way, or to any extent, changes or limits the provisions recited. The logic of this statement is not destroyed by the limitation of 3 per cent. provided for in the law of April 15, 1873; since it is not pretended or claimed that the appropriation ordinance of June, 1875, appropriates an amount exceeding three per cent of the assessment as equalized by the State Board.

Nor is the force of the argument broken by the claim that the constitutional requirement of uniformity is wanting. The law must conform to the Constitution, and provide for equal and uniform taxes, with respect to persons and property. It is not claimed by any one that the law fails in this respect. It is simply claimed that the officers of the law have failed to observe the rules of uniformity and equality that is enjoined. The Constitution means the law must provide for uniform taxation. It can mean only this. It does not require an impossibility. It can not require that all assessors and that all boards of equalization shall perform their duty so accurately and so perfectly that all valuations shall be according to the same scale and the same measure. The Constitution provides that the General Assembly shall provide that needed revenue may be obtained by levying a tax by valuation, and that the same shall be borne equally and uniformly by every citizen and by every corporation in proportion to the value of the property owned by the respective parties; the value to be ascertained by some person or persons to be elected or appointed, in such manner as the General Assembly shall direct, and not otherwise. The General Assembly having performed its duty, can not undertake to secure perfection in all the practical workings of the law. The assessor is the officer provided by law for fixing valuations. He acts judicially, and from his judgment no appeal lies to this court. If the court undertake to review and correct all the valuations that are not satisfactory to the tax-payer, and that may not have been adjusted by the several boards of equalization, they would perhaps do but little beside, and then might not satisfy the tax-payer as well as the man who is selected on account of his peculiar fitess for that purpose. The law provides for special boards for the revision and equalization of assessments and the valuations of property, but does not authorize the courts to review them. The law must be equal and uniform in all its provisions. That law is not rendered inoperative by the error in assessing values of property, or by the omissions of the assessor to assess some property. Then, in the sense required by the Constitution, these taxes are uniform. Spencer v. The People, 6 Legal News, 215; Sleight v. The People. 7 Legal News, 292.

The conclusion from all this is irresistible. The tax sought to be enjoined is uniform and constitutional, and has been levied and assessed according to existing laws. The city has the right to collect its revenues under the general revenue laws.

The second and only remaining question to be considered is, was the property of the complainant fraudulently assessed at too high a rate.

It has repeatedly been held by the Supreme court of this State, and of all the States, that a court of equity will not entertain a bill to restrain the collection of taxes, except in cases where it is assessed upon property not subject to taxation, or where the tax is unauthorized by law, or where the property has been fraudulently assessed at too high a rate. The C. B. & Q. R. R. Co. v. Cole, 7 Legal News, 333; Porter v. R, R. I. & St. L. Railway Co., 6 Legal News, 324; Chicago v. Burtice, 24 Ill., 489; Elliott v. Chicago, 48 Ill., 294; Dupage County v. Jenks, 65 Ill., 275; Munson v. Miller, 66 Ill., 380.

This general principle has been announced so frequently, and under such varied circumstances, not only by our own Supreme court, but by so many courts in this country, that it may well be regarded as one of the fixed rules of law. The doctrine is conceeded, and hence the complainant admits the tax to be lawful, and that his property is subject to taxation. His bill must mean that he claims that his property was fraudulently assessed at too high a rate, and it can neither mean more nor less than this. The averments relied on by him to show that the property is fraudulently assessed too high are, that his property was worth only "$40,000 or thereabouts, and no more," and that the assessor promised to assess the property at that amount, and that he was thus induced to disregard the matter. He claims he would have asked for a review of the assessment if he had supposed it would have been valued at a greater sum than $40,000. He also claims that the assessor failed to assess much property of others, and that other property was assessed at a rate below the valuation of the complainant's property. It is not averred that the assessor corruptly, and with a view to favor any one, omitted to assess property, and that too at its proper valuation. No person or corporation is named whose property is so omitted. It cannot be claimed that simply omitting, without so intending, to assess the property of any one, or even several persons, would render the correct assessment of the complainant's property fraudulent and void. This cannot be claimed; to do so would be to require of the assessor perfection in the discharge of his duties. It is true very many other averments are made, and the words "fraud" and "fraudulent" and "fraudulently" occur frequently in the bill, but it is not clear that any averments except those about the value of the property, connected with the promise (as claimed) of the assessor to fix the valuation at $40,000, can be construed into a charge of fraudulent conduct on the part of the assessor. But how stands this point? The assessor and his deputy do not remember the facts as stated by the complainant. They both deny that any such promise was made. In addition to this denial by these officers, the complainant does not, in very definite terms, say what his property is worth—"$40,000, or thereabouts, and no more," is not very definite. Taking the averments of the bill, and the statements of the assessor and his deputy, it is not clear that very great injustice has been done to the complainant.

The taxpayer is required to list his property with the assessor, and then the asaessor is required to fix the valuation. The owner of the property may then require the assessor to hand him the copy of the assessment and valuation. The citizen can thus, by a little care and precaution, avoid such mistakes and misunderstandings as those now being considered. If, in this instance, the complainant had demanded this statement, this conflict or difference in recollection would have no existence.

It is also claimed by the complainant that he had no opportunity to have the assessment adjusted. It is not admitted by the defendant that any notice to taxpayers of the time and place of making objections to assessments is required, but in this instance it is shown that such notice was given by publication in the papers of the city, and it is also shown that the complainant did not appear and make any objections. It is the duty of every citizen to be diligent in protecting his own interest. If he is negligent, the courts will not be in haste to supply to him what he has lost by his negligence.

Where the officer makes an assessment of property for taxation, the assessment is presumed to be correct and valid. The officer acts judicially, and his acts and judgments will be upheld, unless the same is shown to be tainted with fraud, which always renders void the most binding and most solemn contracts, even the judgments of courts. The courts do not seek to find objections to assessments. They seek to uphold them. They will rather refuse to regard irregularities of minor importance. The most that can be required is that the officer act fairly and approximate correct valuations, and thus comply with the spirit and intention of the revenue laws, which are intended to be based upon the principles of uniformity and equality. In no event will an injunction lie unless it is clearly made to appear that the party complaining has been wrongfully assessed, and will sustain irreparable injury unless the collection of the tax is enjoined. DuPage County v. Jenks, 65 Ill.. 275; Munson v. Miller, 66 Ill., 380; Porter v. R. R. I. & St. L. R. R. Co., 6 Legal News, 319; Downs v. Chicago, 11 Wallace, 108.

It may be well to add to what has been said that the power of and the constitutionality of the law establishing the State Board of Equalization are no longer open questions. The Supreme Court has held that the legislature was fully authorized to create the board, and to invest it with ample power to equalize the assessments of the different counties in the State, not having made an arrangement with the assessor as to the valuation of the property, and having failed to require of the assessor a copy of the assessment, and having failed to appear before any committee or board in either town or county, the complainant will not be allowed to complain of what the State Board of Equalization has done. It may be that said board fails in its difficult and intricate task to properly adjust and equalize the taxes throughout the State. But that is only such a mistake and such an error as must be endured for the time. These matters have been determined—they are res adjudicata. Adsit v. Lieb, 76 Ill., 198; C. B. & Q. R. R. Co. v. Cole, 7 Legal News, 332; People v. Solomon, 46 Ill., 333.

But it is insisted that the city was at one and the same time proceeding under both laws. It has been found that the two modes of collecting the city revenues exists, and that the law provides for certain offices that may or may not be abolished. Until abolished, as a matter of course, they must perform the duties required by law, and, of course, be paid therefor. Even if this view be not conclusive, it is difficult to see how this error, if error it be, can vitiate the entire tax assessment of the city.

It is, however, in this connection, insisted that the part of the appropriation ordinance of the city appropriating $55,000 for tax commissioners and assessors was unauthorized, and that its enactment, connected with other matters averred in the bill, combined and rendered fraudulent the tax assessment. A sufficient reply to this proposition is that it has ever been held that the tax-payer may at any time have any municipal corporation enjoined from useless and unauthorized appropriations and expenditures. But to prevent such wrongful expenditures direct proceedings must be instituted. It cannot be done by any collateral proceedings. It cannot be thrown in as an additional ground or reason for accomplishing some other end. This is a principle so familiar that the authorities need not be cited to sustain it.

For these and other reasons which need not now be stated, the request of the complainant for an injunction is denied.

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

ABSTRACT OF OPINIONS FILED AT SPRINGFIELD IN 1876.

Filed Feb. 1, 1876.—T., W. & W. R. R. Co. v. Mary O'Connor, admx.—Appeal from Macon.—Opinion by WALKER, Ch. J.

JURY'S PROVINCE IN CONFLICTING EVIDENCE—COMPARATIVE NEGLIGENCE—LIABILITY OF RAILROAD COMPANIES FOR INJURY TO EMPLOYEES—CITY ORDINANCES.

STATEMENT.—The husband of the appellee, being a laborer in the employ of appellant, was, as usual, returning from his place of labor, in company with other laborers, on a hand-car, at noon, to the city of Decatur. Within the limits of the city an engine and tender met the hand-car, in coming suddenly around a curve. One of the laborers on the hand-car gave the alarm, and all leaped from it, except the appellee's husband, who was killed by the collision which occurred. The evidence was conflicting as to whether the engine was running at a higher rate of speed than allowed by the city ordinances, and as to whether any signal was given. Held,

1. That, in cases of conflicting evidence, it is the exclusive province of the jury to decide; and an appellate court will not meddle with their decision thereon, and declare their verdict to be contrary to the evidence.

2. An instruction that deceased must have been free from contributory negligence, in order to a recovery by the administrator, is broader than the law warrants. If a defendant is guilty of gross negligence, and the negligence of the other party is slight, a recovery may be had.

3. It is proper to admit the ordinance of a city, prescribing rate of speed, in evidence as to the question of negligence.

4 The fact of deceased not leaping from the car when the others did, is no proof, in itself, of negligence on his part, because (1) he might not have understood the warning; (2) he might not have been aware of the immediate peril; or, on becoming aware of it, might have been overpowered and incapable of acting; (3) he might have been so situated on the car that he could not so readily escape as the others; (4) he may not have been endowed by nature with the presence of mind and quick perception the others possessed; (5) he might have regarded the peril of leaping from the hand-car as greater than that from which he would escape.

5. The fact that he was an employee of the company does not discharge the liability, since the rule is that where the employment is in diffierent departments, wholly disconnected, and the employees are not associated in the performance of their duties, a company is liable for an injury to one employee resulting from the gross negligence of another.

6. In running through a city with trains or engines, employees are bound to observe the ordinances of the city regulating speed; on failure of which the company are liable for the consequences of their default.

SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE—REQUISITES—DEFENSE OF STATUTE OF FRAUDS—FRAUDULENT REPRESENTATIONS.

STATEMENT.—Appellant applied to the owner of land which had been sold to another by a real estate agent acting under the owner's authority, for a deed to the land—representing to the owner that the agent had sent him. The agent had written before that he had sold the land but without naming the purchaser. Under the representation and information, he, the owner, supposing the applicant to be the same to whom the agent had bargained the land, executed a deed. The contract made by the agent was not in writing. On further information, the owner executed another deed to the purchaser from the agent—the other deed being held in escrow on conditions. The applicant thereon brought suit for specific performance, and cancellation of the latter deed. The grantee of the latter deed filed cross-bill praying relief from the former. Bill dismissed—cross-bill sustained—decree, and appeal. Held,

1. That the contract with the agent, though not in writing, was, nevertheless, morally binding on the owner; and no one but the owner could set up the defense of the statute of frauds.

2. That the former deed being executed by reason of false representations, it had no standing in a court of equity; and the bill for specific performance in the delivery thereof was properly dismissed. One demanding a specific performance must be able to say that his conduct has been clear, honorable and fair.

Thomas B. Trower et al. v. William Elder—Agreed case from Shelby.—Opinion by SCHOLFIELD, J.

INTERPRETATION OF WRITTEN AGREEMENT—PENALTY OR LIQUIDATED DAMAGES.

STATEMENT.—Suit on agreement in writing, providing, "that William Elder, party of the first part, hath this day sold all his business interest, influence and patronage in banking; and also his bank safe, together with all the fixtures pertaining to the business of banking in the town of Sullivan, Moultrie county, Illinois; and he also agrees, and hereby binds himself not to engage in the banking business in said town of Sullivan, Illinois. For which franchises, benefits, and privileges, the said T. B. Trower and son, parties of the second part, pay unto the said William Elder the sum of twelve hundred and fifty dollars." A subsequent clause provided that "the said William Elder, party of the first part, on his non-compliance with the foregoing recited engagements, forfeits three fold the amount paid to him by the said T. B. Trower and son, as damages to them for such non-compliance."

The question was, whether this clause provided for liquidated damages, or only a penalty; and held,

1. The rule is that where there are several covenants or stipulations in an agreement, the damages for the non-performance of some of which are readily ascertainable by inquiry, and the damages for the non-performance of others are not measurable by any exact pecuniary standard, and a sum is named as damages for the breach of any such covenants, or stipulations, such sum is held to be merely a penalty.

2. While recitals or preambles prefixed to an agreement do not, of themselves, have any obligatory force, yet they may be so referred to in the operative part of the instrument as to make them a part of the instrument.

3. In construing the above language, the safe and fixtures are to be regarded as entering into the consideration, as well as the undertaking not to engage in banking; and the court can not judicially know, nor presume, that the safe and fixtures were not an important part of the consideration.

SUBSCRIPTION BY COUNTY TO RAILROAD STOCK UNDER A VOTE—MANDAMUS IN COMPELLING IT—DISCRETION OF COUNTY BOARDS—PERFORMANCE OF CONDITIONS BY COMPANIES.

STATEMENT.—The question herein was, whether the appellees were under a legal obligation to issue bonds in payment of a subscription of $50,000 to a railroad company under a vote of February 15, 1870. Held,

1. That a vote cast at an election under a charter providing that "cities and counties shall be entitled to subscribe for stock in said company, in like manner and with like effect, as is provided in the act to provide for a general system of railroad corporations, approved Nov. 5, 1849, and acts amendatory thereof," only, if favorable, authorizes the authorities of the county to make the subscription in the exercise of their discretion, and is not imperative. And they can not be compelled to make the subscription, as they may be under a peremptory law and vote corresponding.

2. And where the vote has reference to conditions to be performed by the company, which conditions have been complied with by the company, this does not take away the discretion of the county authorities in the matter, in the absence of an actual contract that the subscription shouid be made.

§ 3. A pledge made before the election will not be binding; as before the vote the county authorities have no power to make any pledges, since the vote alone confers that authority under the law.

PRESUMPTION OF REGULARITY—TIME FOR EXECUTING SENTENCE OF DEATH—ACCESSORIES BEFORE AND AFTER THE FACT.

STATEMENT.—Conviction under charge of murder; and sentence of death. On reversing, the court held:

1. That, in the absence of anything in the record to the contrary, the court will presume that the lower court was duly convened, and the term continued, or regular adjournments made as required by law; and also that a regular grand jury was properly discharged, and a special grand jury properly summoned.

2. The sentence was erroneous in violating section 439 of the criminal code, (R. S., 1874, p. 412,) which provides that the day set for inflicting the death penalty, shall not recur before the 10th day of the ensuing term of the Supreme court in that grand division.

3. An instruction that "one who stands by, when a crime is committed in his presence by another, and consents to the perpetration of the crime, is a principal in the offense, and is to be punished as such," is erroneous—the law being that one who stands by, and "aids, abets or assists" in the perpetration, is an accessory, and shall be considered as a principal.

4. An instruction is erroneous, that "if both defendants were alone present at the commission of a murder, and both had used the gun of the deceased thereafter, on an understanding between them to that effect, and kept and concealed the gun, and mutually concealed the fact of the crime, the jury ought to find the defendants guilty;" because, under such circumstances even one or the other might have been merely an accessory after the fact, and not guilty of murder.

5. An instruction is erroneous that "an accessory before the fact is one who, being present at the time a crime is committed, aids in concealing the party or parties who actually committed the same, or aids in concealing the evidence of guilt, as to those actually committing such crime; and the law makes such accomplice a principal to such crime, and alike guilty with those actually committing the same"—since such party, so present, may actually have made heroic efforts to prevent the perpetration of the crime, though afterwards, from unworthy motives, he may have concealed the knowledge and evidence of the crime.

[In remanding, the court ordered separate trials].

REQUISITES OF INDICTMENT AS TO INJURING UNINCORPORATED COMPANIES.

STATEMENT.—The indictment charged that plaintiff in error unlawfully, willfully, feloniously, and maliciously set fire to a building used as and for a store-room and dwelling, which building was insured against loss by fire in the Ætna Insurance Company, of Hartford, Connecticut, with intent to injure that insurance company, contrary to the form of the statute. This was adjudged by the Supreme Court to be insufficient, as to the intent, because, as held,

The law is, that where the charge is the intent to injure a body of persons by a company name, unless such company is incorporated it should be averred that the accused set the building on fire with intent to injure the persons composing the company, stating the names of such persons.

RIGHT OF TENANT IN COMMON TO CROPS RAISED ON LANDS BY A CO-TENANT—TESTIMONY OF WIFE—MINORS CONVICTED—THE PENALTY — ARSON — ABSTRACT INSTRUCTION—PROOF OF ALIBI.

STATEMENT.—Indictment for burning haystacks—personal property of Day and Young. A question of variance arose as to the ownership; it appearing in evidence that a child, not named in the indictment, was part owner as tenant in common of the land on which the hay was grown. But held,

1. That a tenant in common has not in virtue of that relation, a right of property in crops which a co-tenant may raise on the land held in common.

The wife of the defendant was offered as a witness on the trial, but excluded by the court. Held,

2. That the statute allowing parties to testify only removes the disqualification of interest. The prohibition as to husband and wife testifying for or against each other, does not rest alone on the matter of interest, but, in part, on that of public policy, which the statute does not reach, either in civil or criminal cases.

3. The defendant, being under age, could not be sentenced to the penitentiary, as the crime of burning haystacks is not arson, either at common law or under the statute.

4. An instruction to the effect that the defendant was not bound to show who burned the hay, was properly refused as abstract and inapplicable, there being no pretense on the part of the prosecution that the defendant was bound to show that fact.

5. An instruction is correct that, in case of an alibi pleaded, the proof must cover the entire time within which the crime might have been committed.

FRAUD AND CIRCUMVENTION IN EXECUTING NOTE—WHAT IT IS AND EVIDENCE THEREOF.

The only point of general interest in this case is that, under the statute allowing against an assignee the defense of fraud and circumvention in obtaining the making of a promissory note, it is not sufficient to show a failure of consideration, nor even fraud in the consideration, which is quite a different thing from the use of fraud and circumvention in procuring the making or executing of the note.

PARTIES IN SUIT TO APPOINT TRUSTEE UNDER TRUST DEED—VOLUNTARY APPEARANCE.

STATEMENT.—Robert Doyle and wife executed a trust deed in favor of Helen T. Green, to one King, trustee. The trustee having died, a bill was brought to have another one appointed to execute the trust. Doyle and wife had, meanwhile, sold the land and conveyed it to Marsh by warranty deed, Marsh to pay the claim. Marsh only was made defendant. On objection made to this, Doyle and wife entered their appearance as defendants. Held,

That they were not necessary parties, having parted with their interest; and, even if they were parties in interest, they could properly be permitted to come in and have their rights determined. A mere intermeddler could not do this, but a proper party can at any time come in, waive process, enter an appearance and submit to a decree.

DESCRIPTION OF LAND IN TAX ASSESSMENTS—REVENUE ACT OF 1872.

STATEMENT.—Appeal from judgment on a special assessment for park purposes. Held,

1. That in actual conveyances of land, and a fortiori in tax assessments, land is sufficiently described by any description by which the premises may be established and identified: and a grant or devise will only be declared void for uncertainty where, after a resort to oral proof, it still remains a matter of mere conjecture what was intended by the instrument.

2. As to delinquent tax lists and affidavit thereto, the general revenue act of 1872 must govern; which act necessarily worked a repeal of all prior conflicting laws, whether found in the provisions of general laws, or in those of special city charters.

268.—Warne et al impleaded, etc., v. Byron Kendall.—Appeal from Kane.—Opinion by BREESE, J.

JUDGMENT IN GARNISHMENT.

Held, That in a garnishment proceeding under attachment, the issue must be formed between the defendant and the alleged debtor, and not between the plaintiff and the debtor in garnishment; and so judgment, if indebtedness be found, should be rendered against the debtor in favor of the defendant in the original suit, subject, however, to the plaintiff's judgment, operating as a lien thereon.

SUPREME COURT OF INDIANA.

[From the Indianapolis Sentinel.]

RIGHTS OF WIDOW, MARRYING AGAIN, AS TO LANDS ACQUIRED BY PRIOR MARRIAGE—CONSTRUCTION OF SECTION 18, 1 G. & H., 2946.

485. Benjamin F. Small et ux. v. William T. Roberts et al., Warrick, C. C. Reversed.

Downey, J., delivering the opinion of the court: The question in this case is as to the rights of the female appellant in the proceeds of certain real estate, which was sold in a proceeding for partition, because it could not be divided. The first husband of the female appellant died seized of the lands in fee, leaving his widow and appellees, his children, surviving him. She married again, her co-appellant, before commencing this action.

The court, in ordering the sale, directed that one third of the proceeds of the sale of the land be paid to her unconditionally, but later, amended the order so as to require the commissioner to invest the one-third of said proceeds claimed by her, under the order of the court, in such manner as to secure to her the interest thereof during coverture with co-appellant, etc.

The question in the case turns upon the construction of Sec. 18, 1 G. & H., 294: "If a widow shall marry a second or any subsequent time, holding real estate in virtue of any previous marriage, such widow may not, during such marriage, with or without the assent of her husband, alienate such real estate, and if, during such marriage such widow shall die, such real estate shall go to her children by the marrige in virtue of which such real estate came to her."

This court is of opinion that the disability of the wife under this statute is not carried on and applied to the proceeds of the real estate when it has been sold. The ruling in Finch v. Jackson, 30 Ind., 387, was not called for by the issues in the case. The first order of the court was correct, and the court erred in changing it.

THE UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT—A GENUINE COMPLIMENT. — During Mr. Bonney's recent visit to Washington, he had taken his eldest daughter and another young lady to the principal objects of interest at the national capital, including the Senate and House, on the eulogy-day for the late Vice President Wilson, and, when the tour was over, said: "Well, young ladies, everything considered, what is the finest sight you have seen in Washington?" Both replied, simultaneously, and without hesitation, "The Supreme Court!" The calm, majestic dignity of the sanctum sanctorum of American justice, with its nine robed high-priests, had made a deeper and more grateful impression than the gayer pomp and circumstance of all the other scenes they had visited.

The Courts.

WE have received from MACK J. LEAMING, of the Jefferson, Mo., bar, the following opinion:

UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT.

OCTOBER TERM, 1875.

M. M. WALTON v. THE STATE OF MISSOURI.

In error to the Supreme Court of Missouri.

THE LICENSE TAX LAW OF MISSOURI UNCONSTITUTIONAL.

1. A license tax required for sale of goods is in effect a tax upon the goods themselves.
2. A statute of Missouri which requires the payment of a license tax from persons who deal in the sale of goods, wares and merchandise which are not the growth, produce or manufacture of the State, by going from place to place to sell the same in the State, and requires no such license tax from persons selling in a similar way goods which are the growth, produce or manufacture of the State, is in conflict with the power vested in Congress to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States.
3. That power was vested in Congress to insure uniformity of commercial regulation against discriminating State legislation. It covers property which is transported as an article of commerce from foreign countries, or among the States from hostile or interfering State legislation until it has mingled with and become a part of the general property of the country, and protects it even after it has entered a State from any burdens imposed by reason of its foreign origin.
4. The inaction of Congress in prescribing rules to govern inter-State commerce is equivalent to its declaration that such commerce shall be free from any restrictions.

Mr. Justice FIELD delivered the opinion of the court,

This case comes before us on a writ of error to the Supreme Court of Missouri, and involves a consideration of the validity of a statute of that State discriminating in favor of goods, wares, and merchandise which are the growth, product, or manufacture of the State, and against those which are the growth, product, or manufacture of other States or countries, in the conditions upon which their sale can be made by traveling dealers. The plaintiff in error was a dealer in sewing machines which were manufactured without the State of Missouri, and went from place to place in the State selling them without a license for that purpose. For this offense he was indicted and convicted in one of the circuit courts of the State, and was sentenced to pay a fine of fifty dollars, and to be committed until the samewas paid. On appeal to the Supreme Court of the State the judgment was affirmed.

The statute under which the conviction was had declares that whoever deals in the sale of goods, wares, or merchandise, except books, charts, maps, and stationery, which are not the growth, produce, or manufacture of the State, by going from place to p ace to sell the same, shall be deemed a pedlar; and then enacts that no person shall deal as a pedlar without a license, and prescribes the rates of charge for the licenses, these varying according to the manner in which the business is conducted, whether by the party carrying the goods himself on foot, or by the use of beasts of burden, or by carts or other land carriage, or by boats or other river vessels. Penalties are imposed for dealing without the license prescribed. No license is required for selling in a similar way—by going from place to place in the State—goods which are the growth, product, or manufacture of the State.

The license charge exacted is sought to be maintained as a tax upon a calling. It was held to be such a tax by the Supreme Court of the State; a calling, says the court, which is limited to the sale of merchandise not the growth or product of the State.

The general power of the State to impose taxes in the way of licenses upon all pursuits and occupations within its limits is admitted, but like all other powers must be exercised in subordination to the requirements of the Federal Constitution. Where the business or occupation consists in the sale of goods, the license tax required for its pursuit is in effect a tax upon the goods themselves. If such tax be within the power of the State to levy, it matters not whether it be raised directly from the goods, or indirectly from them through the license to the dealer. But if such tax conflict with any power vested in Congress by the Constitution of the United States, it will not be any the less invalid because enforced through the form of a personal license.

In the case of Brown v. Maryland (12 Wheaton, 425, 444), the question arose whether an act of the legislature of Maryland requiring importers of foreign goods to pay the State a license tax before selling them in the form and condition in which they were imported was valid and constitutional. It was contended that the tax was not imposed on the importation of foreign goods, but upon the trade and occupation of selling such goods by wholesale after they were imported. It was a tax, said the counsel, upon the profession or trade of the party when that trade was carried on within the State, and was laid upon the same principle with the usual taxes upon retailers, or inn-keepers, or hawkers, and pedlars, or upon any other trade exercised within the State. But the court in its decision replied that it was impossible to conceal the fact that this mode of taxation was only varying the form without varying the substance, that a tax on the occupation of an importer was a tax on importation, and must add to the price of the article and be paid by the consumer or by the importer himself in like manner as a direct duty on the article itself. Treating the exaction of the license tax from the importer as a tax on the goods imported, the court held that the act of Maryland was in conflict with the Constitution; with the clause prohibiting a State, without the consent of Congress, from laying any imports or exports, and with the clause investing Congress with the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations.

So, in like manner, the license tax exacted by the State of Missouri from dealers in goods which are not the product or manufacture of the State, before they can be sold from place to place within the State, must be regarded as a tax upon such goods themselves. And the question presented is, whether legislation thus discriminating against the products of other States in the conditions of their sale by a certain class of dealers is valid under the Constitution of the United States. It was contended in the State courts, and it is urged here, that this legislation violates the clause of the Constitution which declares that Congress shall have the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States. The power to regulate conferred by that clause upon Congress, is one without limitation; and to regulate commerce is to prescribe rules by which it shall be governed, that is, the conditions upon which it shall be conducted; to determine how far it shall be free and untramelled; how far it shall be burdened by duties and imposts, and how far it shall be prohibited.

Commerce is a term of the largest import; it comprehends intercourse for the purposes of trade in any and all its forms, including the transportation, purchase, sale and exchange of commodities between the citizens of our country and the citizens or subjects of other countries, and between the citizens of different States. The power to regulate it embraces all the instruments by which such commerce may be conducted. So far as some of these instruments are concerned, and some subjects which are local in their operation, it has been held that the States may provide regulations until Congress acts with reference to them. But where the subject to which the power applies is national in its character, or of such a nature as to admit of uniformity of regulation, the power is exclusive of all State authority.

It will not be denied that that portion of commerce with foreign countries, and between the States, which consists in the transportation and exchange of commodities, is of national importance and admits and requires uniformity of regulation. The very object of investing this power in the general government was to insure this uniformity against discriminating State legislation. The depressed condition of commerce and the obstacles to its growth previous to the adoption of the Constitution, from the want of some single controlling authority, has been frequently referred to by this court in commenting upon the power in question. "It was regulated," says Chief Justice Marshall, in delivering the opinion in Brown v. Maryland, "by foreign nations with a single view to their own interests, and our disunited efforts to counteract their restrictions were rendered impotent by want of combination. Congress, indeed, possessed the power of making treaties, but the inability of the Federal Government to enforce them became so apparent as to render that power in a degree useless. Those who felt the injury arising from this state of things and those who were capable of estimating the influence of commerce on the prosperity of nations, perceived the necessity of giving the control over this important subject to a single government. It may be doubted whether any of the evils proceeding from the feebleness of the Federal Government contributed more to that great revolution which introduced the present system, than the deep and general conviction that commerce ought to be regulated by Congress." (12 Wheaton, 446.)

The power which insures uniformity of commercial regulations must cover the property which is transported as an article of commerce from hostile or interfering legislation until it has mingled with and become a part of the general property of the country and subjected like it to similar protection, and to no greater burdens. If at any time before it has thus become incorporated into the mass of property of the State or nation, it can be subjected to any restrictions by State legislation, the object of investing the control in Congress may be entirely defeated. If Missouri can require a license tax for the sale by traveling dealers of goods which are the growth, product or manufacture of other States or countries, it may require such license tax as a condition of their sale from ordinary merchants, and the amount of the tax will be a matter resting exclusively in its discretion.

The power of the State to exact a license tax of any amount being admitted, no authority would remain in the United States or in this court to control its action, however unreasonable or oppressive. Imposts operating as an absolute exclusion of the goods would be possible, and all the evils of discriminating State legislation, favorable to the interests of one State and injurious to the interests of other States and countries, which existed previous to the adoption of the Constitution, might follow, and the experience of the last fifteen years shows would follow from the action of some of the States.

There is a difficulty, it is true, in all cases of this character in drawing the line precisely where the commercial power of Congress and the power of the State begins. A similar difficulty was felt by this court in Brown v Maryland in drawing the distinction between the restriction upon the power of the States to lay a duty on imports and their acknowledged power to tax persons and property, but the court observed that, though the two were quite distinguishable when they did not approach each other, yet, like the intervening colors between white and black, approached so nearly as to perplex the understanding, as colors perplexed the vision in marking the distinction between them, yet that the distinction existed and must be marked as the cases arose. And the court, after observing that it might be premature to state any rule as being universal in its application, held that when the importer had so acted upon the thing imported that it had become incorporated and mixed up with the mass of property in the country, it had lost its distinctive character as an import and become subject to the taxing power of the State, but that while remaining the property of the importer, in his warehouse in the original form and package in which it was imported, the tax upon it was plainly a duty on imports, prohibited by the Constitution.

Following the guarded language of the court in that case we observe here, as was observed there, that it would be premature to state any rule which would be universal in its application to determine when the the commercial power of the Federal Government over a commodity has ceased and the power of the State has commenced. It is sufficient to hold now that the commercial power continues until the commodity has ceased to be the subject of discriminating legislation by reason of its foreign character. That power protects it, even after it has entered the State, from any burdens imposed by reason of its foreign origin. The act of Missouri encroaches upon this power in this respect, and is, therefore, in our judgment, unconstitutional and void.

The fact that Congress has not seen fit to prescribe any specific rules to govern inter State commerce does not affect the question. Its inaction on this subject, when considered with reference to its legislation with respect to foreign commerce, is equivalent to a declaration that inter-State commerce shall be free and untrammeled. As the main object of that commerce is the sale and exchange of commodities, the policy thus established would be defeated by discriminating legislation like that of Missouri.

The views here expressed are not only supported by the case of Brown v. Maryland, already cited, but also by the case of Woodruff v. Parham, reported in the 8th of Wallace, and the case of the State Freight Tax, reported in the 15th of Wallace. In the case of Woodruff v. Parham, Mr. Justice Miller speaking of the court, after observing with respect to the law of Alabama then under consideration, that there was no attempt to discriminate injuriously against the products of other States or the rights of their citizens, and the case was not, therefore, an attempt to fetter commerce among the States, or to deprive the citizens of other States of any privilege or immunity, said: "But a law having such operation would, in our opinion, be an infringement of the provisions of the Constitution which relate to those subjects and, therefore, void."

The judgment of the Supreme court of the State of Missouri must be reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to enter a judgment reversing the judgment of the Circuit Court, and directing that court to discharge the defendant from imprisonment, and suffer him to depart without day.

J. S. BOTSFORD, for plaintiff in error.
ATTY. GEN. HOCKADAY, for State of Missouri.

H. E. MANN, clerk of the court at St. Paul, has our thanks for the following opinion:

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT, MINNESOTA DISTRICT.

JOHN MINNETT v. THE MILWAUKEE & ST. PAUL R. R. CO.

REMOVAL OF CAUSE FROM STATE TO FEDERAL COURT.

1. Where the notice of the motion for removal, which was served upon the plaintiff's attorney, stated that the removal was demanded under the act of 1867, which was repealed: Held, that the right of removal does not depend upon the contents of the notice of the motion for removal, and the State court could not withhold the removal, if the existing law in regard to the petition, etc., was complied with.

2. THE TRIAL OR FINAL HEARING.—The court construes the words, "the trial or final hearing," as used in the act of Congress, and holds that where there has been a trial upon the merits and a new trial granted, the defendant is still entitled to a removal of the action—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

The plaintiff brought his action in the State District Court, and after a trial upon the merits and a verdict in his favor, the court, upon defendant's motion, granted a new trial, for the reason, as stated, that "said verdict is not justified by the evidence and is contrary to law."

The defendant, on February 13, 1875, presented a petition for the removal of the case to the United States Circuit Court, embodying the substance of the language of the third subdivision of section 639, U. S. Rev. Stat., p. 113, except that it states that there has been "no final hearing or trial of the cause."

The proper security was offered, and the affidavits of the president of the company, defendant, and its general manager, were made and filed at the time of filing the petition.

The defendant's attorney, after these steps had been taken, served a notice upon the attorneys for the plaintiff of a motion before the State District Court for the removal of the suit. In this notice he states that the defendant has filed the affidavit provided for by an act of Congress approved March 2, 1867.

The motion came before the court, and after counsel for the plaintiff and defendant had been heard, the removal was ordered February 23, 1875.

The plaintiff now comes before this court for its order remanding the suit, for the reasons—

1. "Because said cause was sought to be removed under the act of 1867, chap. 196, which act was not in force at the date of the presentation of the petition for said removal, and of the order granted thereon.

2. "Because the petition, affidavit and bond presented to the State court were not drawn, executed or approved under or by virtue of any law of the United States in such case provided, in force and effect at said date.

3. "Because no removal can or could be had of said cause after a trial thereof upon the merits."

Other reasons were urged, but they are substantially embodied in those above given.

E. C. PALMER for the motion.

NELSON, J.—If the defendant complied with the law in force at the time it presented the petition, affidavits, and security, it was entitled to have the suit removed, and the judge of the State court had no discretion in the premises. The petition makes no allusion to any particular act of Congress, but states that the petitioner is a citizen of the State of Wisconsin, and the plaintiff a citizen of the State of Minnesota; alleges the amount sought to be recovered sufficiently large to give the Federal court jurisdiction, and in terms embraces all that is set forth and necessary to be done under the 3d subdivision of sec. 639, U. S. R. S.

These statutes embrace all the laws in force Dec. 1, 1873, as revised and consolidated; and section 639 contains all the provisions of the several previous acts relating to the removal of suits from the State to the Federal courts. The only change made is in the act of 1867, by transposition of words in the phrase "at any time before the final hearing or trial," so as to read "at any time before the trial or final hearing."

The notice of the motion which was served upon the plaintiff's attorney, states that the removal is demanded under the act of 1867, which was repealed at the time the defendant presented its petition. The right of removal, however, does not depend upon the contents of the notice of the motion for removal; and the State court, as before stated, could not withhold the removal if the existing law in regard to the petition, affidavits, and security was complied with.

The court is also bound to retain jurisdiction of the suit under like circumstances.

In my opinion, the allegation in the petition that there has been no final hearing or trial of the cause, is a compliance, substantially, with the third subdivision of section 639, which gives the right of removal at any time before "the trial or final hearing;" and, corporations being within its purview, any proper officer—particularly the president, who is the head of the organization—could make the requisite affidavit.

The other question necessary to be determined is, whether, there having been a trial upon the merits, the defendant is entitled to a removal of the action, a new trial having been granted.

The statute requires the petition to be filed before "the trial or final hearing of the cause;" and it is urged that a trial on the merits prevents a removal of the case. "The trial" mentioned in the act, in my opinion, means not one trial or a trial, but a determination of the rights of the parties forever.

When a new trial was granted, the suit was in the same position that it would have been had no trial taken place. The first trial had been erroneous—it had not been in accordance with the law—and there had been no such examination of the rights involved as was contemplated by Congress in using the word "trial."

Again, "the trial" mentioned in the act means a final investigation of the rights involved in the court of original jurisdiction.

The terms "the trial" and "final hearing" are used by Congress as having a relative connection—a reciprocal meaning—the former applicable to actions of law, and the latter to equity cases. The word "suit" embraces actions at law as well as equity cases, and the conjunction "or" connecting the words "the trial" and "final hearing" is used, as is often is, where it is sought to give an explanation or definition of the same thing in different words. Such must be the true construction of the law, for it is hardly probable that a distinction would be made between actions at law and equity causes, which would present a strange anomaly, as suggested by Mr. Justice Swayne, in Ins. Co. v Dunn (19 Wallace, p. 225), that "in equity cases a final hearing only could take away the right of removal, while any trial, however interlocutory in its character, should have the same effect in an action at law." To avoid this, the supreme judicial court of Massachusetts, in Galpin v. Critchlow (Am. Law. Reg., vol. 13, page 137, N. S.), construing the law of 1867, which used the language "before the final hearing or trial," said the "trial appropriately designates a trial by jury of an issue which will determine the facts in an action at law; and final hearing, in contradistinction to hearings upon interlocutory matters, the hearing of the cause upon its merits by a judge sitting in equity."

The supreme judicial court of New Hampshire, in Whittier v. Hartford Insurance Company (Am. Law Reg., N. S., vol. 14, No. 10, page 621), agree to the decision in the Massachusetts case, and consider the reasoning in that applicable to the law as it appears in sec. 639, sub. 3.

With great respect for these courts, I cannot agree to this interpretation of the statute. In equity practice the term hearing has a well-defined meaning, viz: "That stage or proceeding in an equity cause which corresponds to a trial of a cause at law; the hearing of counsel upon the pleadings and proofs" The qualifying adjective final makes this hearing one that absolutely ends the matter in dispute, and is explanatory of the words "the trial." This is certainly within the spirit of the law, and, in my opinion, within its letter.

The motion to remand is denied.

WE have received from the law firm of SHELDON & WATERMAN, of this city, the following opinion:

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

OPINION FILED JAN. 24, 1876.

NO. 246.—THE U. S. LIFE INS. CO. v. THE ADVANCE COMPANY.

Appeal from Cook.

THE POWER OF A GENERAL AGENT OF AN INSURANCE COMPANY TO BIND THE COMPANY FOR ADVERTISING—CUSTOM.

PER CURIAM.

This was an action brought by appellee to recover from the United States Life Insurance Company, appellant, on account for advertising, contracted by one Greene, who was at the time general agent for appellant. A jury having been waived, a trial was had before the court on the following agreed facts: "In November, A.D. 1871, one Samuel Greene was general agent for the State of Illinois for the United States Life Insurance Company, of New York, having his headquarters in Chicago; that upon his order the plaintiffs advertised said insurance company in their paper, incurring a just bill of one hundred and twenty dollars ($120), and charged the same, on their books of original entry, to the United States Life Insurance Company; that subsequently said Greene was removed from his position as general agent, the same being known to the plaintiffs, and said advertising bill being unpaid; that the plaintiffs frequently called upon said Greene for payment of said bill after his removal, and he as often promised the bill of $120 should be paid; that after much dunning, Greene agreed to obtain for said plaintiffs, in payment of the bill, a partially paid up life policy upon the life of a person designated by said plaintiffs in said company, said Greene being in the habit, notwithstanding his removal, of soliciting insurance for said company like any other street broker, and having no other connection with the company; that said Greene made application for such a policy, in the usual course of business, and the same was drafted; but the company officers in Chicago then first finding that said advertising bill was to be turned in to pay the premium, refused to deliver the same; that several months afterwards said Greene became a defaulter to the Evanston school funds and absconded; that it is the general custom with life insurance companies not to allow their general agents any discretion about contracting advertising bills, except as hereinafter stated, but that in each case they must get the consent of the company before contracting any bill.

"And further, that in advertising, the general agents pay bills ordered by them and settle with their companies themselves. For instance, in case of the company allowing a stipulated sum per annum toward the advertising, as is sometimes done, the agent settles the bills, and may turn the receipts in to the home office as vouchers for so much money in their settlements with their company to the stipulated amount.

"Sometimes the home office orders special advertising done, through the agent, and he has it done; and sometimes it is done directly from the home office."

The court, upon the agreed state of facts, rendered a judgment in favor of appellee for the amount of the account, and the question presented by the record, therefore, is, whether the judgment was authorized by the agreed state of facts.

It is conceded that Greene was the general agent of appellant, and the debt was contracted by him and charged to appellant while he was acting in that capacity.

The acts of a general agent, or one whom a man puts in his place to trans act all his business of a particular kind, will bind the principal so long as the agent keeps within the scope of his authority, though he may act contrary to his private instructions. 2 Kent, 620. If this case rested upon the fact alone that Greene was the general agent of appellant, and, as such, contracted the advertising for his principal, appellee's right of recovery could not be questioned or denied.

But under the stipulation appellee concedes that at the time the advertising was contracted, there existed a general custom with life insurance companies not to allow their general agents any discretion in contracting advertising bills.

Where a general custom exists the presumption is that the parties were acquainted with it, and contracted in reference to that custom.

If, then, appellee contracted with Greene with full knowledge of the custom and with reference to it, then the conclusion is irresistible, that it knew Greene had no power to bind appellant and knowing that fact it cannot hold appellant for a debt contracted by Greene without authority, although he was the general agent of appellant. It is said by Story on Agency, sec. 96, the known usages of trade and business often become the true exponents of the nature and extent of an implied authority; for in all cases where such usages exist, and an agency is to be exercised touching such matters, the natural presumption, in the absence of all countervailing proofs, is that the agency is to be conducted in the manner and according to the practices which are allowed and justified by such usages.

It cannot be claimed that appellee was misled by the fact that Greene was a general agent, because it knew while he was acting in the capacity of a general agent that he had no authority to incur the debt on the credit of his principal, and hence the rule that would ordinarily apply to the acts of a general agent, has no application here. It is urged by appellee that the last clause in the stipulation shows that no uniform custom existed; we cannot give the stipulation the construction contended for, when appellee stipulated that there was a general custom that Green was not allowed to contract the indebtedness. The effect of this admission was not destroyed by the last clause of the stipulation.

Under the agreed state of facts, we are of opinion appellee was not entitled to recover; the judgment will be reversed and the cause remanded.

Reversed and remanded.

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

OPINION FILED JAN. 21, 1876.

STEPHEN VAN DUSEN v. THE PEOPLE, etc.

Error to Whiteside.

THE VENUE TO AN AFFIDAVIT—ASSESSOR NO POWER TO SWEAR TAXPAYER OUT OF TOWN.

1. THE VENUE.—The court states the purposes of the venue preceding an affidavit, and that in the absence of other evidence it will be considered the oath was administered at the place therein named.

2. ASSESSOR MUST ADMINISTER OATH IN TOWN.—That an assessor can not swear a person listing property outside of the township for which he was elected.

3. PERJURY.—That where a person was sworn by an assessor outside of the township for which he was elected, and the person so sworn was convicted of perjury, that the assessor having no authority to administer an oath outside of the town for which he was elected, the conviction was improper.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

Opinion by WALKER, J.

This was an indictment for perjury found by the grand jury of Carroll county against plaintiff in error at the September term, 1873, of the Circuit Court thereof. The affidavit alleged to be false was sworn to before Samuel Lichty, assessor of Wysox township. The indictment contains two counts. The first charges that on the first of May, 1873, there was owing to plaintiff in error for money loaned the sum of $10,811. The second charges that there was owing him the sum of $6,811, specifying the persons and amounts each person owed him on the day named, and it charges that he swore that there was owing him on that day but $1,000 for money loaned.

A change of venue was had to Whiteside county, and at the August term, 1874, plaintiff in error was tried and the jury found him guilty and fixed the time he should serve in the penitentiary at three years. He thereupon prosecuted this writ of error and asks a reversal of the judgment.

It is urged that there is no evidence tending to prove that the oath was administered in the county of Carroll. Counsel misconceive the force and effect of the venue in the caption of the affidavit. It is "State of Illinois, Carroll County," which clearly manifests the place where the oath was administered. In all affidavits and other papers requiring such a venue, it is for the very purpose of indicating the place where the act was done. Finding such a venue in the caption of the affidavit in this case, the proof until overcome by competent evidence is ample of the fact that the oath was administered in Carroll county. There is no force in this objection.

It is further objected that there is nothing to show that the assessor acted in the territorial limits of his township, and in the absence of such proof, the conviction was wrong and the judgment should be reversed. The doctrine will be conceded by all, that unless authorized by the statute, an officer can perform no official act outside of and beyond the territorial limits in which he is authorized and required to act. The clerk of a court in one county has no power to issue a writ or perform any other official act in another county. So of a sheriff in serving process unless expressly authorized. Jackson v. Humphrey, 1 L. R., 498. This rule seems to be elementary. It is true that the General Assembly may enlarge the power of courts under the statute, may confer the power by commissioner to take depositions in a foreign government or State, but until thus empowered, the act is extra territorial and is not valid or binding. In this case the assessor was authorized in the discharge of his duty to administer the oath to accused as a tax-payer. He is, by the 26th section of the Revenue law, authorized to administer oaths to persons listing property for taxation whenever he believes the latter has failed to make a fair list of his property.

But that section, or any other, so far as we have been able to find, has not authorized him to administer an oath out of his township. He is elected in it, by the voters thereof, to assess the property therein, and the law contemplates that he will act officially within its territorial limits. The law has imposed no official duty to be performed beyond the territory of his township. It would strike any one that his assessment of property outside of his township and in another, as being ultra vires and void, and for the same reason an oath administered by him extra-territorially is equally void. And it is because he is authorized to perform official acts within his township and is not empowered to do so beyond its limits. It will be denied by none that the officer who administers an oath must have legal and competent authority or the person taking it before him, however false, cannot be convicted of perjury.

In this case there is not the slightest evidence to show the affidavit was sworn to in the township It was indispensable that this fact should have appeared from the venue in the caption or otherwise. There being no such evidence the court below erred in not setting aside the verdict and grrnting the accused a new trial.

The evidence as to the falsity of the oath is loose, uncertain, and to say the least, slight upon which to convict.

We are not prepared to say that we could affirm on the evidence in the record. The loan of money a number of years, or even a shorter period, before the time accused took the oath, is too loose and indefinite upon which to base a conviction. The witnesses testified that they had paid the money which they borrowed of him to one Lane, in Morrison, or that he had sued them in the name of Van Shirley. Lane testified that the notes were delivered to him by Van Shirley for collection, and Van Shirley swears the notes were absolutely his before the 1st of May, 1873. Lane testified that he hardly knew accused by sight and had never spoken to him before he received the notes; that as he made collections he paid the money in person to Van Shirley, or had sent it to him in Iowa by draft. Van Shirley testified, that accused had no interest in the notes nor was he to pay him anything. Nor is this evidence contradicted by any witness. The evidence of Van Shirley may show a transaction out of the usual course of business, by plaintiff in error borrowing money from him and loaning it to others, but we are unwilling to say it was so improbable as to destroy the credibility of his testimony.

All of the evidence considered, we think it fails to sustain the finding, and the judgment of the court below must be reversed and the cause remanded.

Judgment reversed.

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

OPINION FILED JAN. 21, 1876.

JUNIUS MULVEY v. DANIEL H. CARPENTER et al.
Appeal from Superior Court of Cook.

SHERIFF'S SALE — VOID JUDGMENT — REDEMPTION.

Held, that the execution issued on the judgment or decree in Monroe v. Tompkins et al., under which the property was originally sold at sheriff's sale, and from which it was redeemed by appellant on an execution issued on a judgment in his favor against Tompkins, was void, as having been issued under a judgment or decree rendered in a cause in which the court had no jurisdiction of the person of the defendant Tompkins.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

SCOTT, C. J.—Whether titles which it is said parties have acquired to the lands in controversy, from Wiltberger, while the decree of foreclosure in the case of Wiltberger v. Embree, et al., remained in force, and before it was reversed in this court, will prevail over titles previously acquired from Embree, the mortgagor, is a question that has no relation to the merits of the present controversy, and we shall not now discuss that branch of of the case. So far as the mortgage claim was presented by the original bill, it was formally withdrawn on the hearing, it appearing that appellant's wife held that interest, whatever it was, and that he had no direct interest in it. That branch of the case having been dismissed, the remaining controversy is confined within narrow limits and involves the considerations of but few questions, and the discussion of no principles of law, except such as are elementary.

The most important question, and, indeed, the only one which concerns fundamentally the validity of the title appellant claims to the land, is whether the execution issued on the judgment or decree in Monroe v. Tompkins, et al., under which the property was originally sold at sheriff's sale, and from which it was redeemed by appellant on an execution issued on a judgment in his favor against Tompkins, was void, as having been issued under a judgment or decree rendered in a cause in which the court had no jurisdiction of the person of the defendant, Tompkins.

The judgment in favor of appellant against Tompkins was entirely regular, and the execution under which the redemption was effected was valid. But if it shall be determined the execution issued under the decree in Monroe v. Tompkins was void for want of jurisdiction in the court to award it, the sale under it being void, it would follow the redemption based on it would also be void. The judgment creditor is bound to take notice whether the court that pronounced the decree or judgment under which the sale was made from which he is about to redeem, had jurisdiction in the cause. It is a familiar principle if the court had no jurisdiction all proceedings under this decree or judgment would be a nullity, and a party redeeming from a sale in such a case could acquire no title to the land. His redemption can give no validity to the previous sale, which was absolutely void for want of jurisdiction in the court. Johnson v. Baker, 38 Ills., 98.

Whether the sale from which the redemption was made was void is purely a question of law, and is unaffected by the equities arising between the parties. What private contract Tompkins may have had with Monroe or Stewart in regard to the mortgage indebtedness; whether he or Bell should be liable for the amount that should remain after the master's sale of the premises, is wholly immaterial in the decision of the case. It is not shown appellant had any knowledge of the contract, if any existed, and if he had we are not aware it would affect his right in the premises. It may be true, as charged, that the property was, in fact, sold to Bell, but for his accommodation the title was placed in Tompkins. He gave his promissory notes for the purchase money, and executed the mortgage that was subsequently foreclosed by Monroe for the benefit of Stuart and his creditors. No matter what may have been the relations between Bell and Tompkins in regard to the property, the latter was legally bound for the purchase money to the same extent he would have been had he made the purchase on his own account.

In the suit commenced by Monroe to foreclose the mortgage, Tompkins and Bell were both made defendants; the former was alone personally served with process, and the latter was brought into court by publication, under the statute. Bell was defaulted, but Tompkins filed an answer, prepared, perhaps, by Monroe, but, in fact, signed by other counsel, in which he substantially admitted all the allegations of the bill. Accordingly, a decree was entered, finding the amount of the mortgage indebtedness, and directing a sale to be made of the mortgage premises if default should be made in payment of the amount found due by a day fixed. It was recited in the decree that Tompkins was the agent of Bell in purchasing the property, and by a private agreement, made t the time between them, Tompkins was to hold the legal title to the property, for the use and benefit of Bell. The decree provided that if the moneys arising from the sale should be insufficient to pay the amount found to be due, with interest and costs, the master should specify the amount of such deficiency in his report of the sale; and, "on the coming in and confirmation of said report, the defendants, who are personally liable for the payment of the debt secured by the said mortgage, pay to the complainant the amount of such deficiency, with interest thereon from the date of such last mentioned report, and that the complainant have execution therefor."

Having first given the requisite notice, the master, on the 27th day of May, 1865, sold the mortgage premises, under the decree, as directed. On the 7th day of July, 1865, he filed his report of the sale, showing, after the appropriation of the proceeds of the sale according to the direction given in the decree, a deficiency of $1,579.09.

On the 21st day of January, 1869, a further order was entered in the cause, reciting, among other things, the deficiency that remained after applying the proceeds of the sale of the mortgaged premises, as reported by the master; that such deficiency then amounting to $1,893, "and that complainant have execution against the said defendant Tompkins therefor." It was under the latter order the execution was issued on which the sale of Tompkins' property was made, from which appellant redeemed, and under which he acquired the title he now insists upon. On the final hearing of this cause, the court decree the sale and redemption were void, and set aside the sheriff's deed to appellant for the premises, but imposed upon complainants, as conditions upon which the relief would be granted, that they should, within a time fixed, pay to appellant the balance due on the decree on Monroe v. Tompkins and Bell, with interest, and the amount of appellant's judgment at law against Tompkins. Appellees, although dissatisfied with the conditions imposed as to the relief granted, have assigned no cross-errors.

We now recur to the principal question first suggested, viz.: Whether the sale made under the execution issued in the decree in Monroe v. Tompkins was without authority of law, and hence void.

It cannot be maintained on the ground the original decree awarded execution against "the defendant who are personally liable for the payment of the debt secured by the mortgage," because the execution was not issued under that order, but under the order made January 21, 1869. The first order is indefinite and uncertain. Who was "personally liable for the payment of the debt secured by the mortgage" the court does not indicate by anything contained in the decree. Against whom, then, was the execution to issue? It was recited that Tompkins was the agent of Bell for the purchase of the property, and by a private agreement made between them at the time the title was merely placed in Tompkins for the use and benefit of Bell. What this may mean is not very clear, but if it means anything, it is certainly that the court intended to declare that Bell was the party that was personally liable for the payment of the debts. It is not an unreasonable inference from this recital in the decree that no execution was to be awarded against the property of Tompkins for any deficiency that might remain. But, however this may be, that was a joint decree, and the execution was to issue for any deficiency against the "defendants." There were two defendants; Bell had not been personally served with process, and no execution could rightfully be awarded against him. The decree made no provision for issuing any execution separately against the property of Tompkins for any deficiency that might remain unpaid after the sale of the mortgage premises. It was this fact no doubt that gave rise to the making of the order of January 21, 1869, for a separate execution against the property of Tompkins.

By what authority did the court assume to make the supplemental order of January 21, 1869, and awarding execution against Tompkins for the balance remaining due on the original decree? No notice was given to Tompkins that an application would be made to the court to award an execution against him. It may be he would have been able to show cause against it. It was essentially a new proceeding, and what was done was in effect a personal judgment against him as at law for a large amount of money in a cause where he insists he was not liable personally for anything. Nor was it simply directing the issuing of an execution previously ordered "on the coming in and confirmation" of the master's report. The court found the deficiency to be $1,893, and ordered that "complainant have execution therefor." Under the former decree, if any execution could issue at all against Tompkins, it could only be for $1,579.09, with interest thereon from the date of the master's report. It is indispensable to the validity of the last order that the court in some way should have obtained jurisdiction of the person of the defendant Tompkins. It did not have jurisdiction by any notice given to defendant, and hence there was a total want of jurisdiction, unless it can be maintained, the cause had been continuously pending in court since the original decree in 1865, and that defendant was in court by virtue of the service of the original process and his appearance in accordance therewith. This position can hardly be sustained. It will be borne in mind the original decree was rendered in 1865, the sale of the mortgage premises took place in May thereafter; the master's report of the sale, showing a deficiency of $1,579.09, was filed on the 7th of July, 1865, and on the 25th day of September, 1868, the master's report, by an order entered of record on that day, was by the court confirmed. This would seem to have been an end of the case, and in the absence of anything appearing to the contrary, it will be presumed it passed from the docket. If so, the court manifestly lost all jurisdiction of the cause and the persons of the parties, and unless it was placed back upon the docket upon notice to the parties adversely intended all further orders made in the cause would be without authority of law. There is no pretense Tompkins had any notice the cause was to be re docketed that execution might be awarded against him or for any other purpose. It is apparent that neither Monroe, nor Stewart, on whose behalf Monroe was foreclosing the mortgage, ever intended, when the original decree was rendered, to hold Tompkins liable for the payment of any deficiency after the sale of the mortgage premises. Equitably it was the debt of Bell, and all parties seem to have agreed he ought to be made pay it. The arrangement by which Tompkins permitted the title to the property to be vested in him, and assumed the legal liability to pay the purchase money, was entered into partly at the request of Stewart and to oblige him as well as Bell. After the mortgage sale, neither Monroe nor Stewart gave the matter any further attention. The object was to get the title to the property back into the hands of the original owner, and that was accomplished by the mortgage sale and the deed made in pursuance thereof. The matter rested until it was revived 1869, by appellant, who proposed for a share to collect the balance due on the decree from Tompkins, or in some way make it out of his property. After some negotiations his proposition was accepted by Monroe, and thereafter appellant assumed to manage the affair. Neither Monroe nor Stewart gave it any personal attention. It was found appellant could not obtain an execution as at law for the deficiency, without a further order of court. Accordingly, appellant had some papers prepared which Monroe signed, which enabled him to procure the making of the order of January 21, 1869, and subsequently appellant sued out an execution, under it against Tompkins, on which he caused the property in controversy to be sold. At the sheriff's sale the property was bid off by Latimer, who received the usual certificate that would, under the statute, entitle him to a deed in case it was not redeemed. Subsequently, Latimer assigned the certificate of purchase, but to whom he does not recollect, and the evidence does not disclose. Circumstances proven would seem to warrant the inference the purchase by Latimer was in the interest of appellant and that the assignment was afterwards made to him, but whether this is so is not a matter of any great consequence.

Obviously, when the Master's report of sale and showing what deficiency remained was confirmed by the order of court made on the 25th of September, 1868, the cause passed from the docket. This would have been the ordinary course, and nothing to the contrary appears. It was reinstated at the instance of a stranger to the record, and without any notice to any adverse party whose interests were to be affected. Hence, all subsequent orders in the cause were without authority of law and therefore void. It is doubtless true, as counsel contend, that no execution for the deficiency could properly issue until after the "coming in and confirmation" of the master's report.

But no order had previously been made for an execution against Tompkins alone, and none was then made. Months elapsed before the court assumed to award execution against Tompkins. As we have seen the court had then lost all jurisdiction of the cause or the persons of the parties. The sale under the execution awarded against Tompkins being void, there was nothing from which appellant could redeem. Hence it follows as a deduction from the premises, the redemption being unauthorized by statute, appellant acquired no title to the property redeemed and re-sold on his execution.

Upon the whole record we are of opinion the decree of the court below is just and equitable under the evidence, and is warranted by the law.

Decree affirmed.

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

ABSTRACTS OF OPINIONS FILED AT OTTAWA IN 1876.

205.—Seth W. Hardin v. James S. Crote. —Appeal from Cook. — Opinion by SCOTT, C. J.

COLOR OF TITLE AND PAYMENT OF TAXES.

The points in this case are, (1) That a sheriff's deed is color of title under the conveyance act; (2) That a contract of sale is not, in itself, color of title, and does not pass the color of title acquired under a sheriff's deed; (3) That, accordingly, payment of taxes under the contract will avail nothing against the deed.

225—Davidson F. Holmes v. Nicholas N. Shaver.—Appeal from Carroll.—Opinion by BREESE, J.

CAVEAT EMPTOR IN JUDICIAL SALES.

The principle involved in this case is, that the doctrine of caveat emptor applies, in its utmost force, to judicial sales; that there is no warranty of title at such sales; and this must be at the purchaser's risk alone.

183.—Wm. W. Holcomb v. The People.—Appeal from Winnebago.—Opinion by WALKER, J.

QUASI CRIMINAL CASE — APPEAL FROM COUNTY TO CIRCUIT COURT.— EFFECT OF REPEALING PRACTICE STATUTES ON PENDING SUITS.

Held, 1, That a bastardy proceeding, though criminal in form, is civil in effect.

2. That, in such cases, under the act of 1874, an appeal lies to the circuit court from judgments in the county court; although such appeal was not allowed by the act of 1872

3. All suits pending are subject to alterations in the rules of practice enacted by a statute made during such pendency, and repealing the former law. Parties do not acquire a vested right in rules of practice, though prescribed by statute.

No. 198.—The Merchants Transportation Co. v. Jeremiah Bolles.—Appeal from Superior court of Cook.—Opinion by SCOTT, C. J.

LIABILITY OF CARRIERS AND EXEMPTIONS THEREFROM—INFORMATION CONCERNING KIND OF GOODS SHIPPED—TRIAL BY COURT.

STATEMENT.—Household goods, etc. destroyed by fire in the warehouse of defendant; which goods plaintiff had shipped by a railroad to be delivered at another place to defendant. Held,

1. That it is only where a contract is for through transportation, that each connecting carrier will be entitled to the benefits and exemptions of the contract between the shipper and the first carrier. The carrier on whom the loss falls, in such a case, is to be regarded as acting under the contract made with the first carrier, and can claim the benefits of any exemption from liability in favor of the first carrier.

2. Where the contract is not for through transportation, the liability of each successive carrier ends only when the goods are delivered to the next in the order. And if fire destroys the goods en route In the warehouse of a carrier, before deivery to the next, the liability remains that of a common carrier, and is not that of a warehouseman merely.

3. A shipper is under no obligation to disclose the contents of boxes delivered to a carrier, except on inquiry by the carrier. Where there has been no improper concealment, the responsibility rests on the carrier.

4. Where a cause is tried by a court without jury, the findings on matters of fact will be treated by the appellate court as are verdicts of juries.

176.—Junius Mulvey v. Daniel H Carpenter et al.—Appeal from Superior Court of Cook.—Opinion by SCOTT, C J.

REDEMPTION BY JUDGMENT CREDITOR—SEPARATE EXECUTION IN JOINT CASES—SERVICE.

Held, that a judgment creditor, redeeming, under the statute, from a prior execution sale, is bound to take notice whether the court had jurisdiction in the cause where, in the prior execution, sale was made. Otherwise, all proceedings, including the redemption, would be an utter nullity, since the redemption can give no validity to former void proceedings. And this applies where the want of jurisdiction consists of want of service on defendants, as well as other grounds. And where a judgment is entered against joint defendants, and afterwards, an order is entered to issue execution against either of them separately, the order, and all proceedings under it, are void, unless the defendant against whom the execution was to issue was summoned to show cause against the entering of the order, and that after the confirmation of a master's report on sale under mortgage.

80.—Ira Brown, impleaded, etc. v. Rounsevelt.—Error to Cook.—Opinion by SHELDON, J.

PUBLIC POLICY AS TO RESTRAINT OF TRADE—FORM OF VERDICT.

STATEMENT.—Suit on bond given to secure the performance of an agreement with defendant in error, made by plaintiffs in error, to the effect that defendant in error was to sell sewing machines to the plaintiffs in error, who were to engage exclusively in the sale of that kind of sewing machines and purchase their supplies of him at 30 per cent. discount. Judgment for the penalty of the bond and damages. It was claimed that the contract was void on grounds of public policy, because it bound the plaintiffs in error to deal exclusively in that particular kind of machine, and so was in restraint of trade. Held,

1. That such a contract does not contravene public policy as being in restraint of trade.

2. A court may properly assist a jury in preparing a verdict, as to the form thereof.

172—Robert W. Robinson v. John Ferguson et al.—Appeal from Superior Court of Cook.—Opinion by SHELDON, J.

VOID DECREE — SUBSEQUENT VALID PROCEEDINGS—TESTIMONY OF PARTY AGAINST COURT RECORDS.

STATEMENT.—Bill to clear title under the Burnt Record Act. The case turns largely on evidence of the facts, although the property involved was very valuable. However, an important point was decided therein, namely: Held,

1. That where an act is passed, changing the time of the holding of a term of court, and the judge, not noticing the change made, holds the term at the usual time under the prior law, this is fatal to all the proceedings had during such unauthorized term. Yet if, at such term, there be a decree for specific performance, under which the party in whose favor the decree was made fulfills all the conditions imposed thereby, and afterwards, at a lawful term, a further decree is made—as of the delivery of a deed—corresponding with the former decree, the latter decree will cure the error, and be regarded as sufficient. Also,

2. That where a record recites that a defendant appeared and answered in a case, his uncorroborated testimony to the contrary, will not prevail against the record.

117.—Joseph Evans v. Milton Anderson. — Error to Iroquois. — Opinion by BREESE, J.

LEX LOCI.

STATEMENT.—Suit on promissory note executed in Indiana; but the place of the execution did not appear on the face thereof. Held,

1. That the nature, validity and interpretation of a contract must be governed by the law of the place where it was entered into, and this principle extends to promissory notes.

2. That the place needs not appear on the face of the promissory note, but it is sufficient for the application of the rule that the place appear in the pleadings.

3. The existing laws of a State, at the time of executing a promissory note, enters into the note; and the liability is determined thereby.

30.—Edward Roby v. Franklin D. Cossitt et al.—Error to Superior Court of Cook.—Opinion by SCOTT, C. J.

SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE — REQUISITES—DEMURRER.

STATEMENT.—Suit for specific performance of a contract for the sale of lands. The contract was made in February, 1867, and suit brought in July, 1873, the land, having, meanwhile, risen in value from $52,000 to $240,000. All the installments were much past due, nothing having been paid but $400 at the time of making the contract. Held,

1. That where time is not made of the essence of a contract, it must be performed in a reasonable time, or equity will not decree specific performance.

2. It is no excuse for delay that the purchaser desired to postpone the agreement until he could settle with other parties claiming to have contracts for the same property. This can not relieve him of the obligation promptly to offer to perform.

3. Where the facts, in a bill demurred to, are not clear and specific, the demurrer does not admit complainant's right; it being the rule merely that a demurrer admits the facts which are well pleaded. It can not help out vague and indeterminate allegations.

296.—Alfred Patmor v. G. W. Haggard et al.—Appeal from Iroquois.—Opinion by SHELDON, J.

STATUTE OF FRAUDS—PROMISE TO ANSWER FOR DEFAULT—CONTRACT TO CONVEY.

STATEMENT.—Suit on a penal bond executed by Haggard and Kane to Patmor, to secure the executing of a deed by the former to the latter. On the suit, pleas were filed to the effect that Kane's promise was to answer for the default of Haggard, and that no agreement or memorandum thereof existed wherein the consideration was in writing; and again, that the promises of Hazzard and Kane were for the sale and conveyance of land, and that no agreement or memorandum thereof was in writing wherein the consideration is stated, Held,

1. That as to the latter pleas, our statute of 1869, as all statutes containing the word "contract" or "agreement" as to writing, required the consideration to be in writing, since the consideration is an essential part of the contract or agreement—although our statute of frauds of 1874 expressly provides the contrary.

2. But, as to the bond and the undertaking of Kane therein to answer for the default, etc. of another, the law required only that the promise should be in writing in such a case.

[But, under the law of 1874, this distinction does not exist, as above stated.]

300.—C. R. I & P. R. R. v. Sarah A. Clayton.—Appeal from LaSalle.—Opinion by SCOTT, C. J.

LIABILITY OF COMMON CARRIERS AS TO BAGGAGE.

Held, 1. That the delivery of a baggage check to the owner of the baggage is prima facie evidence of a delivery to the carrier; but it may be rebutted.

2. When it is once established that baggage was delivered to a carrier, the liability of the carrier as an insurer immediately attaches, and continues until delivery to the owner again at the termination of the transportation thereof.

3. Where a railroad gives a check to a passenger for baggage not arrived, in exchange for a check of another road, it may be shown as a fact that the baggage never actually came to the hands of the second carrier, giving the last check. But the burden of proof is on the carrier to show that the baggage was not received.

301.—Same v. Patrick McKitrick.—Appeal from Cook.—Opinion by BREESE, J.

EXCESSIVE VERDICT IN CASES OF NEGLIGENCE.—PRESUMPTION IN REGARD TO IT.

Held, That, in an action for negligence against a railroad company, the Supreme Court will take cognizance of an excessive verdict, on appeal from a judgment refusing a new trial, and will presume from the fact of excess, that the verdict was not the result of a proper consideration.

313—L. Schoenfeld v. Thomas H. Brown et al.—Appeal from Cook.—Opinion by WALKER, J.

STATUTE OF FRAUDS AS TO PROMISE TO PAY DEBT, ETC., OF ANOTHER.

STATEMENT. — Appellant agreed with certain contractors to build a large, brick house. The contractors sub let a part of the contract, as to furnishing materials, to appellees. In part, this furnishing was paid for by appellee on certificate of the architect and contractors. The contractors having failed as insolvent, the appellees desisted from furnishing, but on the promise of the appellant to pay for them they continued afterwards to supply materials. On this promise, suit was brought. It was contended that this promise was within the statute of frauds,

Held, That the promise was not within the statute. In such cases, the test is, whether the promise is direct, or collateral. And the most ready means of solving the question is, whether the credit was given to the person making the promise, or to a third person. Where the credit is alone given to the promissor, the statute can have no operation; since it only relates to verbal promises for the payment of the debt, default, or miscarriage of another person. When a person purchases goods, or agrees to purchase, and they are delivered to him, under such a promise that he will pay for them, the statute does not apply, because there is no undertaking to pay the debt of another, but only his own. In such a case as the present, the difficulty usually arises in determining to whom the credit was given.

314.—O. H. Tobey et al. v. R. Foreman. —Appeal from Superior Court of Cook. Opinion by SHELDON, J.

SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE—CROSS-BILLS AND SUPPLEMENTAL BILLS— WAIVER WHERE TIME IS OF THE ESSENCE.

STATEMENT.—Suit, May 9, 1872, for specific performance of a contract for the conveyance of land to Foreman—contract dated March 15, 1872. Booth answered, offering to perform. Tobey answered denying that he made the contract; Booth having signed Tobey's name to the agreement without authority.

November 8, 1873, Foremen filed supplemental bill alleging that, after the contract was made the land advanced in value from $28,000 to $40,000, but during the pendency of the suit, had decreased in value to $25,000, and claiming damages for the delay. This was demurred to, as to the claim for damages, and demurrer sustained. Tobey answered, ratifying the contract and offered to perform, and filed a cross bill to compel Foreman to perform; and stated in the cross-bill that Foreman had filed a claim against Booth's estate (he having died, pending the suit), for damages, in not performing the contract; of which time was of the essence, and prayed that the prosecution of this claim might be enjoined. Foreman dismissed his bills, and the court dismissed the cross-bill on demurrer. Held,

1. That a cross-bill must always show grounds for equitable relief, or it will be properly demurrable.

2. That, while the filing of the original bill offering to perform and asking decree, waived the time which was of the essence, yet the filing of the supplemental bill demanding damages for the delay, was not a renewal of such waiver, unless the defendants would accede to the claim for damages.

3. Refusing to convey when property is valuable and waiting until it depreciated, and then offering to perform, vitiates all claim to equitable relief.

4. There was no equitable reason for enjoining the prosecution of the claim for damages in the county court.

370.—Adam Shugart, impleaded, etc., v. Ann Egan.—Appeal from Lee.—Opinion by SHELDON, J.

LIABILITY UNDER STATE LIQUOR LAW—EVIDENCE—PROXIMATE CAUSE—GROUNDS OF ACTION—LICENSE.

STATEMENT.—Suit brought, under the liquor law, by the widow of one who, naturally peaceable, yet got into a quarrel after excessive drinking at a saloon; which quarrel resulted in his death. The appeal was by the owner of the building. Held,

1. The liability created by the statute does not rest on the ground that the sale of liquor was unlawful, nor does the possession of a license obviate the liability.

2. On the trial of a cause, under the statute, a witness may properly be asked his opinion as to whether the deceased was intoxicated. [BREESE, J., dissenting.] For, although it is the general rule that witnesses are to testify to facts, and not as to their opinions, and that it is only experts on questions of science who are allowed to give their opinions, yet there are cases where the opinions of ordinary witnesses are to be received, as, for example, as to the value of property, as to one's pecuniary responsibility, the identity of a person, or of handwriting, to the questions of sickness and health, or the state of the affections, etc.

3. Proof beyond a reasonable doubt is a measure of proof required only in criminal cases, and not in a civil suit for a penalty.

4. In a case like the present, the doctrine of proximate and remote cause has no application, and it is not proper to instruct a jury that a person can only be responsible for consequences which a reasonable person might foresee as probably resulting.

5. It is not necessary, in order to fix the liability, that the person with whom a quarrel was made, resulting in the death, should also have been intoxicated. It is enough that the deceased was intoxicated, and, in consequence, got into the quarrel, and provoked the injury he received.

[BREESE, J., also dissented on the ground that there was no sufficient evidence connecting appellant with the death of appellee's husband.]

We call attention to the following opinions, reported at length in this issue:

The License Tax Law of Missouri Unconstitutional.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States, by Field, J,, holding that s license tax required for the sale of goods is in effect a tax upon the goods themselves, and that a statute of the State of Missouri, which requires the payment of a license tax from persons who deal in the sale of goods, wares and merchandise which are not the growth, produce, or manufacture of the State by going from place to place to sell the same in the State, and requires no such license tax from persons selling in a similar way goods which are the growth, produce, or manufacture of the State, is in conflict with the power vested in Congress, to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the States; that the inaction of Congress in prescribing rules to govern inter-State commerce is equivalent to its declaration that such commerce shall be free from any restrictions.

Removal of Cause from State to Federal Court.—The opinion of the United States Circuit Court for the district of Minnesota, by Nelson, J., defining the meaning of the words "the trial or final hearing," as used in the act of Congress relating to the removal of causes, and holding that where there has been a trial upon the merits and a new trial granted, the defendant is still entitled to a removal of the cause.

Insurance Agent—Advertising—Custom.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of Illinois, as to the power of a general agent of an insurance company to bind the company for advertising, and how far a party doing advertising would be bound to take notice of a general custom in regard to the authority of such agents.

Assessor no Power to Swear Taxpayer out of his Town.—The opinion of the Supreme court of this State by Walker, J., holding that an assessor cannot swear a person listing property for taxation outside the township for which he was elected, and that a person cannot be legally convicted for perjury in making such an affidavit.

Sheriff's Sale—Void Judgment—Redemption.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of this State, by Scott, C. J., holdiug where a sheriff sold land under a void execution, and appellant redeemed from such sale, that the execution being void there was nothing from which he could legally redeem. The redemption being unauthorized by statute, appellant acquired no title to the property redeemed and resold on his execution.

THE BANKRUPT LAW—SHOULD IT BE REPEALED?

Already a bill has passed the House to repeal the Bankrupt Law, and the question is now being agitated, Should it be repealed? The press throughout the country are pretty generally in favor of its repeal. That it should at least be greatly modified there can be no doubt; that it should be repealed is more of a doubtful question. Upon its repeal, the old practice of making assignments to defraud creditors will be revived, and creditors' bills will be as numerous as they were before the advent of the bankrupt law. Creditors, instead of appearing before the register to prove their claims, will run a race with each other in the State Courts, to see which can secure the most of the debtor's property by attachment. There can be no doubt but what the bar in general would be benefited by the repeal. It would put the collection machinery of the State Courts again in operation, take the collecting business from the great cities where the Federal Courts are held, distribute it through the country and give overy cross-road attorney an opportunity to secure his share. What effect the repeal of the law would have upon the mercantile business of the country it is not easy to foresee. If it is to be continued it should be made less expensive, the practice simplified, the rules adopted by the Supreme Court thoroughly revised and re-written, and the law so changed as to be readily understood by the district judges and the bar. No law was ever passed that has produced so many conflicting opinions as the bankrupt law. We hear of men going through bankruptcy who are reported to succeed in keeping hundreds of thousands of dollars from their creditors, but we seldom hear of their being punished for concealing their property or swearing it away from their creditors. It cannot be denied, in a commercial country like this, but what a proper bankrupt law of uniform operation throughout the United States, must be better than the different insolvent laws of the several States. Can Congress change the present into such a law?

NOTES TO RECENT CASES.

INSURANCE AGENT—AUTHORITY OF.

The Supreme Court of Pa., in Mentz v The Lancaster Fire Ins. Co., 23 Leg. Journal, 99, held that where agents are acting for an insurance company and are held up to the public as such, the reasonable presumption is that they are authorized to act for the company in a general way, unless the company specify what may be their specific duties and powers

DEED—MINING RIGHTS.

The same court held, in Rahm et al. v A. Chadwick, 23 Leg. Journal, 98, that a deed by which mineral rights are conveyed, must clearly express that the grantor also gave the right to take away the surface support, otherwise he will be held to retain the proper support of the surface.

WRITTEN DOCUMENT—PAROL EVIDENCE.

The English Court of Common Pleas Division, in Clever v. Kirkman, 33 L. T. Rep., N. S. 672, held, where a document appears on the face of it to contain the terms of a written agreement, parol evidence is admissible to show that it was not intended to be an agreement, but was written for some other purpose, and the question whether this is so or not is for the jury.

MANSLAUGHTER—INFANT—NEGLECT OF PARENT TO SUPPLY MEDICAL AID FROM CONSCIENTIOUS BELIEF.

The English case of Reg. v. Downes, 33 L. T. Rep., N. S. 675, holds that since the 31 and 32 Vic., c. 122, s. 37, which makes it an offense punishable summarily, for any parent willfully to neglect to provide medical aid for his child being in his custody and under the age of fourteen years whereby the health of such child shall have been, or is likely, to be seriously injured, it is manslaughter if the child die from such neglect, and it is no answer to the charge of manslaughter that the parent so neglected from a conscientious religious belief that it was wrong to call in medical aid, and that medical aid was not required, and not from any intention to disobey the law. This would be regarded as a very severe law in America.

WILL—OBLITERATION OF—REVOCATION.

The English Court of Exchequer, in Swinton v. Bailey, 33 L. T. Rep., 695, where a testator by his will devised real property to his mother, her heirs and assigns forever, and he subsequently obliterated the words "her heirs and assigns" by striking them out, held, that the words obliterated were not a devise or clause within the meaning of the sixth section of the statute of Frauds, and that the obliteration was of no effect, and that his mother took an estate in fee simple.

SALVAGE SERVICE—TERMS OF.

The United States District Court of Delaware, in Boyer et al. v. The Schooner Ellen Holgate, etc., 8 Legal Gazette, 44, held, where the master of a vessel in distress accepts the services of salvors, and permits them to render assistance under the impression that their terms have been assented to by him, he cannot afterwards repudiate those terms, in the absence of evidence that they were compulsory or unconscionable; that in estimating the value of a salved vessel for the purpose of fixing a salvage award, the court will adopt as the standard, the value of the vessel to the owners for the purposes of repair; that a true result is reached by deducting from the value of the vessel, just before the collision, the cost of repair.

COMMON CARRIER—SHIP OWNER—LOSS OUT OF THE REALM—ACT OF GOD.

The English court of common pleas division, in Nugent v. Smith, 24 Weekly Reporter, 237, held that every ship-owner or master who carries goods on board his vessel for hire, whether inland, coastways, or abroad, outward or inward, is, in the absence of express stipulation to the contrary, subject, by implication by the common law of England adopting the law of Rome, by reason of his acceptance of the goods to be carried, to the liability of an insurer, except as against the act of God or the Queen's enemies; that—To amount to an act of God within the meaning of the exception, the damage must have been caused directly and exclusively by such a direct and violent and sudden and irresistible act of nature as the carrier could not by any amount of diligence foresee, or, if he could foresee it, could not by any amount of care and skill resist so as to prevent its effect.

A Commentary on the Law of Agency and Agents. By Francis Wharton, LL D., author of Treatises on "Negligence," "Conflict of Laws," etc. Philadelphia: Kay & Brother, 17 and 19 South Sixth street, Law Booksellers, Publishers and Importers. 1876. Sold by Callaghan & Co., Law Booksellers, Chicago.

This new candidate for the favor of the profession is a neat and substantial volume. In appearance it is equal to the best law books. Mr. Wharton, the author, is well known to the profession by his many works. His present Commentary may be divided into two distinct parts. The first eleven chapters contain a general exposition of the law of agency, the twelfth, thirteenth, fourteenth, fifteenth, sixteenth and seventeenth, Mr. Wharton says, present successively treatises on the Law of Attorneys, of Auctioneers, of Brokers, of Factors, and of Salesmen. The eighteenth chapter discusses the Law of Lien, as related to Agency. Some topics frequently associated with the Law of Agency have been designedly omitted. The Law of Shipping, of Partnership and of Insurance, being considered as independent themes, find no place in this volume. Mr. Wharton thought it advisable to introduce all reported cases, no matter how cumulative, which came to his notice, in connection with the topics discussed. The notes are a complete digest of the authorities upon the questions treated in the text. We are among those who believe that a law-writer of the present day should never give Latin quotations of ancient works if he has the ability to translate them into English. While Mr. Wharton has less Latin quotations than some who have written upon the Law of Agency, still we wish he had fewer than he has. It is safe to say, that of the Bar who have a College education, not one out of every six, to say nothing of those who never entered a College, can read readily a Latin quotation of half a dozen lines.

THE ORDINANCE OF 1787 AND THE BIBLE QUESTION.

In Mr. Bonney's lecture before the Law College on the Ordinance of 1787, he made the point that the reading of the Bible, without note or comment, in the public schools was an exact compliance with the provisions of the ordinance in reference to schools and the means of education, for the purpose of inculcating religion, morality, and knowledge, as necessary to good government and the happiness of mankind. The religion here meant was, according to the fixed rules of legal construction, the Protestant form of Christianity, including the King James version of the Sacred Scriptures, being that broad and tolerant form of christianity, without distinction of sect or creed, which the courts and jurists hold to be a part of the common law. This ordinance, irrevocable without the mutual consent of the original States, and the people and States in the northwestern territory, was thus beyond the power of Congress and the State legislature. This ordinance not only declared that the principles of civil and religious liberty were the basis on which the original States, their laws and constitutions were erected, but also that one of the objects of the ordinance was to fix and establish those principles as the basis of all laws, Constitutions, and governments, which forever thereafter should be established in said territory; and that the ordinance was ratified and reaffirmed as an irrevocable compact, by both the general government and the State of Illinois, at the time of the admission of the latter into the Union.

The act of Congress of April 18, 1818, to enable the peopie of Illinois to form their first Constitution, expressly reaffirmed the ordinance of 1787, and in connection therewith provided for the formation of the several public school funds; and thus those school funds are held in a perpetual and irrevocable trust, to teach the religion, morality, and knowledge intended by the ordinance of 1787.

This broad and tolerant Christianity leads to no prosecution for opinion's sake, but to the largest toleration consistent with the public safety; the ordinance expressly declaring that "no person demeaning himself in a peaceful and orderly manner shall ever be molested on account of his mode of worship or religiou sentiments.

The lecturer contended that the perfect freedom which all other forms of faith had enjoyed under the provisions of the ordinance, was abundant proof of the beneficent sway of legal Christianity, free from sectarian control. In this connection a large number of legal authorities were cited and explained.

SUPREME COURT OF TENNESSEE.

OPINION FILED JAN. 22, 1876.

E. R. PROWELL et al. v. H. P. FOWLKES, administrator, et al.

SUMMARY REMEDY—OFFICIAL BOND OF DECEASED CLERK—LIABILITY OF ADMINISTRATOR WITH SURETIES UPON.

The summary remedies given by statute against public officers, being of purely statutory origin and in derogation of the common law, must be strictly pursued, and nothing can be superadded to them by judicial construction. Such statutes do not in terms extend to the personal representatives of such officers, and cannot be so extended by construction. Held that a motion is not allowable against the administrator of a deceased clerk and the sureties upon the official bond of the clerk.

CASES APPROVED.—Young v. Hare, 11 Humph., 303; State v. Deberry, 9 Humph., 605; Park v. Walker, 2 Sneed, 509.

CASE OVERRULED.—Smith v. Woods, 1 Cold., 539.

SNEED, J., delivered the opinion of the Court.

The counsel for the appellants in this case, insists upon divers grounds of reversal which are worthy of consideration; but in the view we have taken of the case the main question argued must be decisive of it. It is an action instituted by motion in the county court of Williamson county against the administrator of a deceased clerk and the sureties on the clerk's bond for a balance of a fund collected by the clerk, under the orders of the court, belonging to plaintiffs and remaining in the hands of the clerk at the time of his death. The notice of the motion was served upon the administrator alone. A judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiffs and the case was brought before the Circuit Court by certiorari, when on motion of the plaintiffs the petition was dismissed, and an appeal taken to this court by defendants, who have likewise as a measure of precaution, taken a writ of error to the county court.

It is insisted on behalf of the defendants that the summary remedy allowed against the clerk and his sureties in such cases does not lie against the administrator and the sureties of the clerk. And of this opinion is the court. The statute under which the remedy is sought is in the words following: "Judgment may be had summarily by motion against the clerk of any court in this State in the following cases: 1. For failing to pay over to the party entitled on demand money received by him on any judgment or execution, or paid into court upon a plea of tender or any other plea, or under an order or rule of court, judgment for the sum so received with interest and twelve and one-half per cent. damages. 2. For delinquencies in regard to revenue as provided in this code, in Part 1, Titles 4 and 5.

It has been uniformly held in regard to these summary remedies against public officers that they are of purely statutory origin, in derogation of the common law; that they must be strictly pursued and construed, and that nothing can be superadded to them by judicial construction. The very terms of the statute import that the officer himself must be pursued and that the demand must be made upon him. His representative, if he be dead, is the custodian and depository of his personal assets, but the fiduciary trust moneys with which he is charged are supposed to remain in custodia legis, in the hands of his successor in office. The adminstrator is not supposed to know anything about his official affairs, and is not in a condition to protect his sureties in the speedy and summary remedy given to the parties in interest, of which they are not even entitled to notice. Young v. Hare, 11 Humph., 303. It would be a harsh and unreasonable construction of these statutes to give the remedy against innocent sureties with the adminstrator of the officer, when they are not only deprived of their day in court to make their defense, but are in a condition so utterly helpless, from the fact that the death of their principal has cut off the chances of a well-advised defense.

The case of The State v. Deberry was decided in 1848, in which it was held that the act which authorizes a judgment by motion against a sheriff and his sureties, does not authorize such summary proceeding against the executor or administrator of such sheriff. In that case Judge Green said that the act does not in its provisions extend to the executor or administrator of the sheriff, and we do not think it should be so extended by construction. For the default of the sheriff it is much more appropriate to proceed against his executor or administrator upon the bond by a common law action, in which the plea of fully administered might be put in and the issue tried by a jury. We do not think the Legislature intended to extend the remedy by motion te the executor or administrator. 9 Hum., 605.

In the case of Park v. Walker, Judge McKinney said: "No latitude of construction is admissible so as to extend the remedy beyond the express provision of the statute, to cases apparently falling within the reason of the law. The remedy is not given by the statute against the personal representative of the deceased sheriff, or surety; and upon no sound principle can it be so applied. Obvious conditions, growing out of the relations, rights and duties of the personal representative, forbid such a construction." "But it is needless," he says, "to reason on the point. We have held that this remedy did not extend to the executor or administrator of the deceased sheriff himself," citing State v. Deberry, 9 Hum., "and for the same reason we now hold that it does not apply to the executor or administrator of a deceased surety."—Park v. Walker, 2 Sneed, 509. The doctrine of these applies with like force to the summary remedy against clerks, and the statutes have in no manner been extended in their scope and operation since these cases, and many others unreported, have been determined.

But it is said that the doctrine has been modified and departed from in the more modern case of Smith v. Woods, 1 Cold., 539. The point was not directly in judgment in that case. The proceeding in that case was by petition against the administrator of the clerk and the sureties on the clerk's bond, to recover certain moneys in the clerk's hands at the time of his death. The proceeding was in the county court, and the clerk had received the money as special commissioner to sell the property out of which the fund was realized. The suit was treated as in the nature of a bill in equity, and as such was sustained, as it well might be under the rules of practice appropriate to that forum. The learned judge delivering the opinion does undoubtedly in the discussion of the case repudiate the early decisions which hold that the motion does not lie against the representative of a deceased officer, and "inclines to the opinion" that the remedy by motion will lie against the personal representative of a delinquent officer. He seems to base his conclusions upon section 3626 of the Code, ch. 14, Art. 7, by which it is provided that "the remedy by motion given by this article will lie both for and against the personal representative of deceased parties." The provision, he says, might seem at first view, from its juxtaposition and terms, to be restricted to the class of motions enumerated in Article 7. But such, he thought, was not the intention. There would be no sense in such a discrimination. 1 Cold., 539. Upon examination it will be seen that this Article 7 applies exclusively to the reciprocal remedies of sureties as against each other, and that the provision as to them was almost literally carried into the Code from the act of 1801, ch. 15, section 1, which is intended exclusively for the protection of securities. We are satisfied that the learned judge in placing this construction on the section of the Code referred to, did not have this act of 1801, ch, 15, from which it was taken, brought to his attention. But in any event we hold that the sounder doctrine is to be found in the earlier cases upon the subject; and while we do not regard the conclusion of the learned judge as an express adjudication of the question, we must, with great deference and respect for his ability and learning, dissent from the views he has announced in that case. We hold that the summary remedy is not allowable in a case like this.

The judgment will be reversed and the motion dismissed, without prejudice to the plaintiffs, however, in any other appropriate remedy to which they may resort.—The Commercial and Legal Reporter.

TRUSTEE'S SALE.—WHEREAS, CARL O. LUNDberg, of the county of Cook, and State of Illinois, by his certain trust deed, duly executed, acknowledged and delivered, bearing date the 1st day of May, 1872, and recorded in the recorder's office of said Cook county, in book 88 of records, at page 43, did convey unto Henry E. Seelye, as trustee, all the following described premises, situated in said county, to wit: The south thirty-five (35) feet of lots number one (1) and two (2), and the north fifteen (15) feet of lot number eleven (11), all in block number two (2), in Julia Foster Porter's subdivision of block number twenty seven (27), in Canal Trustee's subdivision of the north half and the north half of the southeast quarter, and the east half of the southwest quarter of section thirty-three (33), town forty (40) north, range fourteen (14), east of the third P. M., to secure the payment of his principal promissory note, for the sum of three thousand dollars, executed by him, and payable to the order of William J. Davis, five years after date, with interest at the rate of ten per cent, payable semi-annually, at the office of said Davis, said note bearing date the same day as said trust deed.

And, whereas, said Lundberg covenanted in and by said trust deed, that, among other things, he would, until said indebtedness was paid, or the said premises were sold by virtue of said trust deed, pay all taxes and assessments levied or assessed on said premises, when and as the same became due and payable.

And whereas it was also provided in and by said trust deed, that in case of the breach of any of the covenants or agreements in said trust deed contained, then, on the application of the legal holder of said note, it should and might be lawful for the undersigned, Henry E. Seelye, to sell and dispose of said premises, and all the right, title, benefit and equity of redemption of said Carl O. Lundberg, his heirs and assigns therein, at public auction, in the city of Chicago, county and State aforesaid, ten days previous notice of such sale having been given by publication, in one of the newspapers, at the time of sale, published in said city of Chicago, and to make, execute and deliver to the purchaser or purchasers at such sale, good and sufficient deed or deeds of conveyance for the premises sold, and out of the proceeds of such sale, to pay all costs of advertising and of sale, commissions, and all other expenses of said trust, including all money advanced for taxes or other liens and assessments, with interest thereon, and to pay the principal and interest then due on said note, according to the tenor and effect thereof.

And whereas the covenant in said deed contained, as hereinbefore set forth, has been broken by the said Carl O. Lundberg, and the said Lundberg has not paid, or caused to be paid, the taxes and special assessments, or either of them, that have been levied upon said property during the life of said trust deed, but has allowed said property to go to sale for the taxes, and also assessments levied and assessed against it; and the legal holder of said note has made application to me, the undersigned trustee, as aforesaid, and requested me, as such trustee, to sell and dispose of said premises under the power in said trust deed, and for the purposes therein stated.

Now, therefore, public notice is hereby given, that in pursuance of said trust deed, and by virtue of the power and authority to me granted in and by the same, and by virtue of the statute of the State, I, the undersigned, will, on the 25th day of February, 1876, at the hour of ten o'clock in the forenoon of said day, at the west door of the two north doors of the court house, situated on the corner of LaSalle and Adams streets, in said city, sell and dispose of the premises above and in said trust deed described, and all the right, title, benefit and equity of redemption of the said Carl O. Lundberg, or his assigns, therein, at public auction, for the highest and best price the same will bring in cash, for the purpose of paying the said note and interest, and of the sums advanced by the legal holder of said note for the payment of said taxes and assessments, and for the redemption of said premises from said tax sales, and all other expenses of said trust.

Chicago, February 10, 1876.

TRUSTEES' SALE.—WHEREAS HENRY TITUS, of Chicago, Cook county, Illinois, by his certain deed of trust duly executed, acknowledged and delivered, bearing date the second day of January, A. D. 1873, and recorded in the recorder's office of Cook county, Illinois, in book 161 of records, page 236, did convey unto the undersigned, Samuel Wing, of Chicago aforesaid, as trustee, all the following described premises, situated in the county of Cook and State of Illinois, to wit:

Lot number three (3), and the east twenty-two (22) feet of lot number four (4), all in block number six (6), in Kinzie's addition to Chicago, to secure the payment of one promissory note made by the said Henry Titus for the sum of fourteen thousand and four hundred dollars, bearing date the second day of January, A. D. 1873, payable to the order of Joseph R. Bickerdike, two years from its date, with interest thereon at the rate of eight per cent. per annum, payable annually. Said note being given for purchase money to be paid for the premises in said trust deed and hereinabove described.

And, whereas, in said trust deed it is provided that in case of default in the payment of said promissory note and interest, or either or any part thereof, or in case of a breach in any of the agreements in said trust deed mentioned, then on the application of the legal holder of said note, it should be lawful for the undersigned, Samuel Wing, trustee, to sell and dispose of said premises, or any part thereof, either in mass or in separate parcels, at public auction, at the north door of the court house, in the city of Chicago in the State of Illinois, for the highest and best price the same will bring in cash, twenty days notice of such sale having been first given in one of the newspapers published in the city of Chicago, and to make and deliver to the purchaser or purchasers at such sale, good and sufficient deed or deeds of conveyance for the premises sold, and out of the proceeds of such sale, after first paying all costs of advertising and sale, commissions and all other expenses of this trust, and all moneys advanced for taxes or other liens and assessments, with the interest thereon, to pay the principal and interest due on said note according to the tenor and effect thereof.

And whereas, default has been made in the payment of said principal note and the interest thereon, being all of said principal sum of fourteen thousand and four hundred dollars, and interest thereon at the rate of eight per cent. per annum from the second day of January, A. D. 1874, and the same remains unpaid.

And whereas, the legal holder of said note has made application to the undersigned, the trustee in said trust deed named, to sell and dispose of said premises under the power in said trust deed, and for the purposes therein stated.

Now, therefore, notice is hereby given, that I, the undersigned trustee, as aforesaid, in execution of the powers by said trust deed in me vested, and in pursuance of the terms thereof, and for the purposes therein stated, will, on Monday, the 28th day of February, A. D. 1876, at the hour of two (2) o'clock P. M., at the north door of the court house, situated at the southeast corner of Adams and LaSalle streets, in the city of Chicago and State of Illinois, being the north door on Adams street nearest LaSalle street of said court house, sell and dispose of the premises above and in said trust deed described, and all the right, title, benefit, and equity of redemption of the said Henry Titus, his heirs or assigns therein, at public auction, for the highest and best price the same will bring in cash.

OBADIAH JACKSON,
Attorney.

TRUSTEE'S SALE.—WHEREAS, JAMES L CAMPbell and Sophronia R. Campbell, his wife, of the city of Chicago, in the county of Cook and State of Illinois, by their certain trust deed, duly executed, acknowledged and delivered, bearing date the sixteenth day of October, A.D. 1874, and recorded in the recorder's office of Cook county, in the State of Illinois, in book 454 of records, at page 77, did convey unto William Loeb, as trustee, all the following described premises, situated in the county of Cook and State of Illinois, to wit:

Lots numbered forty-seven (47), forty-eight (48), forty-nine (49), and fifty (50), in F. W. and J. L. Campbell's subdivision of block two (2), of Morris' subdivision of the west half of the southwest quarter of section eighteen (18), township thirty-nine (39), N. range fourteen (14), east of the 3d P.M., to secure the payment of one principal promissory note for the sum of three thousand dollars, executed by James L. Campbell and payable to the order of himself, with interest thereon at the rate of ten per cent. per annum, one year after date and bearing date October the sixteenth, A. D. 1874.

And whereas it is provided in and by said trust deed, that in case of default in the payment of the said promissory notes, or either of them, or any part thereof, according to the tenor and effect of said notes, or in case of a breach of any of the covenants or agreements in said trust deed contained, then, on the application of the legal holder of said notes, or either of them, it should and might be lawful for the undersigned, William Loeb, trustee, to sell and dispose of the said premises, and all the right, title, benefit and equity of redemption of said James L. Campbell and Sophronia R. Campbell, their heirs and assigns therein, at public auction, at the court house door in the city of Chicago, in the county of Cook and State of Illinois, or on said premises, for the highest and best price the same will bring in cash, thirty days previous notice of such sale having been given by publication once in each week, for four successive weeks in any newspaper at that time published in the said city of Chicago, and to make, execute and deliver to the purchaser or purchasers at such sale, good and sufficient deed or deeds of conveyance for the premises sold, and out of the proceeds of such sale to pay all costs and expenses incurred in advertising and selling said premises, including attorney's fees, also the principal and interest on said note.

And whereas, it is further provided in said trust deed, that in case of default in any of said payments of principal or interest, according to the tenor and effect of said promissory notes, or either of them, as aforesaid, then and in that case the whole of said principal sum thereby secured, and the interest thereon to the time of sale, may at once, at the option of the legal holder thereof, become due and payable, and the said premises be sold, in the manner and with the same effect as if the said indebtedness had matured.

And whereas, default has been made in the payment of the principal and interest of said note and the legal holder of said note has made application to the undersigned, the trustee in said trust deed named, and requested him as such trustee to sell and dispose of said premises under the power in said trust deed, and for the purposes therein stated.

Now, therefore, public notice is hereby given, that in pursuance of said trust deed, and by virtue of the power and authority to me granted in and by the same, and by virtue of the statute of the State, I, the undersigned, will on Tuesday, the seventh day of March, A. D. 1876, at ten o'clock, A.M., at the north front door of the court house in the said city of Chicago, sell and dispose of the premises above and in said trust deed described, and all the right, title, benefit and equity of redemption of the said James L. Campbell and Sophronia R. Campbell, their heirs or assigns therein, at public auction, for the highest and best price the same will bring in cash.

Dated this 29th day of January, 1876.

HENRY M. SHEPARD,
Attorney, Room 19, 152 Dearborn St.

TRUSTEE'S SALE.—WHEREAS, JONATHAN C. Mitchell (a widower), made his certain trust deed, dated May 1, A. D. 1875, and recorded in the recorder's office of Cook county, Illinois, in book 491 of records, at page 587, for the purpose of securing the payment, five years after the date thereof, of the sum of twenty-one thousand dollars, money loaned, with interest at the rate of ten per cent. per annum, payable semi annually, according to the tenor of his twenty-one certain bonds for one thousand dollars each, and of his ten interest coupons, for the sum of fifty dollars each, attached to each of said bonds, all bearing even date with said trust deed, and did thereby convey unto the undersigned, Henry M. Shepard all the premises, situate in the county of Cook, and State of Illinois, known and described as follows, to wit: The north seventy-three (73) feet of lots seven (7) and eight (8), and the south twenty seven (27) feet of lots five (5) and six (6), in block eight (8), in Cleaverville, according to the plat of said Cleaverville, recorded in the recorder's office of Cook county aforesaid in book 143 of maps, at page 99, all of said premises being situated in the northwest quarter of fractional section two (2), in township thirty-eight (38) north, range fourteen (14), east of the third (3d) principal meridian, in trust, to wit, upon the trusts created by and specified in said trust deed, to which reference is hereby made.

And, whereas default having been made in the payment of ten hundred and fifty dollars, semi-annual interest due on said bonds, November 1, A. D. 1875, according to the tenor of said coupons, and said default having continued for more than the time limited by said trust deed, and Rufus E. Holmes, the legal holder of said bonds, having exercised the option conferred upon him, as legal holder of said bonds, by the terms of said trust deed, as well, also, as by the terms of said bonds themselves, and declared the principal sums of said bonds, and the interest accrued thereon, due and payable, and more than the time limited by said trust deed for the payment thereof having elapsed, and default herein being made, and still continuing, and there being claimed to be due twenty-one thousand dollars, and interest thereon from May 1, A.D. 1875, at the rate of ten per cent. per annum, besides interest on said coupons, for ten hundred and fifty dollars, from November 1, A. D. 1875, and the said legal holder of said bonds and coupons having applied to the undersigned to sell said premises, in order to execute the trusts created by said trust deed.

Now, therefore, public notice is hereby given, that I, the undersigned, Henry M. Shepard as trustee, named in said trust deed, in pursuance of the power thereby in me vested, and in order to execute the trusts ther by created, will, on Wednesday, the 15th day of March, A.D. 1876, at twelve (12) o'clock, noon, of said day, at the south door of the Cook County Criminal Court-house, on Michigan street, in the city of Chicago, and county of Cook, and State of Illinois, sell at public auction, to the highest and best bidder, for cash, the premises in said trust deed, and hereinbefore described, and all the right, title, benefit and equity of redemption of the said Jonathan C. Mitchell, his heirs or assigns therein, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Chicago, February 11, 1876.

21-24 HENRY M. SHEPARD, Trustee.

ELLIS & FRAKE,

TRUSTEE'S SALE.—WHEREAS, JACOB RINN, Jr. and Lizzie M. Rinn, his wife, of the town of Evanston, in the county of Cook and State of Illinois, by their certain trust deed, duly executed, acknowledged and delivered, bearing date the fourth day of June, A. D. 1874, and recorded in the recorder's office of Cook county, in the State of Illinois, in book 434 of records, at page 49, did convey unto William P. Kimball, as trustee, all the following described premises, situated in the county of Cook and State of Illinois, to wit:

Lots three (3) and four (4), in block five (5) of the Ridge subdivision in South Evanston, of the south half ($s\frac{1}{2}$) of the southeast quarter ($se\frac{1}{4}$), and the south two hundred and seventeen and 90-100 (s. 217 90-100) feet of the north half ($n\frac{1}{2}$) of the southeast quarter ($se\frac{1}{4}$) of the northeast quarter ($ne\frac{1}{4}$) of section twenty-four (s. 24), town forty-one north (41), range thirteen east (r. 13 e.), being a strip of land 53⅓ rods wide off of the entire south end of the east half ($e\frac{1}{2}$) of the northeast quarter ($ne\frac{1}{4}$) of said section twenty-four (24), to secure the payment of one principal promissory note for the sum of two thousand ($2,000) dollars, executed by the said Jacob Rinn, Jr., and payable to the order of Charles Stinson, dated June 4th, 1874, and payable in five (5) years from date, with interest at the rate of ten per cent. per annum payable semi-annually, as evidenced by ten interest notes for one hundred dollars each ($100), due respectively in 6, 12, 18, 24, 30, 36, 42, 48, 54, and 60 months from date.

And whereas, it is provided in and by said trust deed, that in case of default in the payment of the said promissory notes, or either of them, or any part thereof, according to the tenor and effect of said notes, then, on the application of the legal holder of said notes, or either of them, for the undersigned to sell and dispose of the said premises, and all the right, title, benefit and equity of redemption of said party of the first part, his heirs and assigns therein, at public auction, at either door of any building which then may be occupied as a court house in the city of Chicago, and State of Illinois, for the highest and best price the same will bring in cash, three weeks notice having been previously given of the time and place of such sale, by advertisement in any newspaper at that time published in the said city of Chicago, and to make, execute and deliver to the purchaser or purchasers at such sale, good and sufficient deed or deeds of conveyance for the premises sold, and out of the proceeds or avails of such sale, after first paying all costs of advertising, sale and conveyance, including the reasonable fees and commission of said trustee, and all other expenses of said trust, then to pay the principal of said notes whether due and payable by the terms thereof or not, and interest to the time of such sale.

And whereas, it is further provided in said trust deed, that in case of default in any of said payments of principal or interest, according to the tenor and effect of said promissory notes, or either of them, as aforesaid, then and in that case the whole of said principal sum thereby secured, and the interest thereon to the time of sale may at once, at the option of the legal holder thereof, become due and payable, and the said premises be sold in the manner and with the same effect as if the said indebtedness had matured.

And whereas, default has been made in the payment of the interest note secured by said trust deed, due 18 months after date, and the legal holder of said notes has elected to declare the said principal note due and payable, and has made application to the undersigned, the trustee in said trust deed named, and requested him, as such trustee, to sell and dispose of said premises under the power in said trust deed, and for the purposes therein stated.

Now, therefore, public notice is hereby given, that in pursuance of said trust deed, and by virtue of the power and authority to me granted in and by the same, and by virtue of the statute of the State, I, the undersigned, will, on Thursday, the sixteenth day of March, A.D. 1876, at ten o'clock A. M., at the west door of the north doors of the court house, on Adams street, in the said city of Chicago, sell and dispose of the premises above and in said trust deed described, and all the right, title, benefit, and equity of redemption of the said Jacob Rinn, Jr., and Lizzie N. Rinn, their heirs or assigns therein, at public auction, for the highest and best price the same will bring in cash.

Dated February 11th, 1876.

W. J. DURHAM.
Attorney, 133 LaSalle Street.

TRUSTEE'S SALE.—WHEREAS, JEAN B. A. LAfont, and M. Mathilda Lafont, his wife of the county of Cook and State of Illinois, by their certain trust deed, duly executed, acknowledged and delivered, bearing date the 22d day of August, A. D. 1873, and recorded in the recorder's office of Cook county, in the State of Illinois, in book 310 of records, at page 5, did convey unto Francis H. Kales, as trustee, all those certain premises situate in the county of Cook and State of Illinois, and known and described as follows, to wit:

Lot thirty-six in Cossitt's addition to Chicago, being a subdivision of the east ten and 186-1000 acres of the north half of the north half of the southeast quarter of section twelve, township thirty-nine north, of range thirteen east of the third principal meridian, to secure the payment of the promissory note of the said Jean B A. Lafont, bearing even date therewith, for the sum of six hundred dollars payable to the order of himself, and indorsed by him in blank, with interest thereon at the rate of ten per cent. per annum payable semi-annually, on the first days of January and July in each year, (except the last installment which is payable on the 22d day of August, 1878), until said principal sum is paid, which said several installments of interest were further evidenced by ten certain interest notes, or coupons, of even date with said note, numbered from one to ten inclusive, and being for the sum of thirty dollars each, excepting number one, which was for the sum of $21 33-100 and number ten, which is for the sum of $38 67-100, payable to the order of said Jean B. A. Lafont, and indorsed in blank, without grace. Both principal and interest payable at the office of the Illinois Trust and Savings Bank, at Chicago, Illinois.

And whereas, default has been made in payment of fifteen and 50-100 dollars of the one of the said interest notes falling due on the first day of July, A.D. 1875, and all of the one falling due on the first day of January, A.D. 1876, and also in the payment of the taxes on said premises for the years 1873, 1874 and 1875, and the holder of said notes having declared the whole of said principal sum now due and payable under and pursuant to the terms and conditions of said trust deed, and there is now due and unpaid thereon the sum of six hundred and forty-five and 50-100 dollars, and interest on fifteen and 50-100 dollars, at the rate of ten per cent. from July 1st, 1875, and on the sum of six hundred and thirty dollars from January 1st, 1876, besides the taxes aforesaid.

And whereas, the holder and owner of said notes has requested and directed me to proceed to enforce the provisions of said deed of trust as therein contained, to make the amount unpaid on said notes, and other sums provided for in said deed of trust.

Now therefore, public notice is hereby given that under and in pursuance of the powers in me vested by the said deed of trust, and in conformity with the requirements thereof, I shall, on the twenty-first day of March, 1876, at one o'clock in the afternoon, at the north door on Washington street, of the Chamber of Commerce, situated on the southeast corner of LaSalle and Washington streets, in the city of Chicago, in said county, sell and dispose of all the above described lands and premises, with the appurtenances thereunto belonging, and all the right, title, benefit and equity of redemption of the said Jean B. A. Lafont, and M. Mathilda Lafont, their heirs and assigns therein, at public auction, to the highest bidder for cash, and will apply the proceeds thereof in the manner directed in said deed of trust, to the record of which reference may be had for more full information as to my powers and duties in the premises.

Dated February 12th, 1876.

FRANCIS H. KALES, Trustee, etc.

W. J. DURHAM, Attorney. 21-22-25

TRUSTEE'S SALE.—WHEREAS, MICHAEL W. Manning, of the county of Cook, in the State of Illinois, and Harriet B., his wife, by their certain trust deed, duly executed, acknowledged and delivered, bearing date September 1st, A.D. 1874, and recorded in the recorder's office of said Cook county September 7th, 1874, in book 420 of records, on page 280, conveyed to the undersigned the south twenty-one (21) feet of lot five (5) of the subdivison of lots five (5), six (6), seven (7), eight (8), nine (9), ten (10), eleven (11), and part of twelve (12) in Thomas' subdivision of block eighty-seven (87), in the Canal Trustees' subdivision of the west half of section twenty-seven (27), township thirty-nine (39) north, range fourteen (14) east of the 3d P. M., situate in the city of Chicago, in the county and State aforesaid, to secure one certain promissory note given by said Michael W. Manning, for the sum of $1,000, payable one year after date, with interest at the rate of ten per cent. per annum, payable semi-annually.

And whereas, said trust deed provides that in case of default in the payment of said note, or the interest thereon, the undersigned shall sell the premises therein described in manner and form and for the purposes therein provided.

And whereas default has been made in the payment of part of said note and interest, and there is now due thereon the sum of $ 00, with interest from November 10th, 1875, at ten per cent. per annum, said note and trust deed having been assigned to James A. Thompson.

Now, therefore, public notice is hereby given, that the undersigned, in pursuance of the power and authority in him by said trust deed vested, will sell and dispose of the premises therein and hereinbefore described, and also all the right, title, benefit and equity of redemption of said Michael W. Manning and Harriet B., his wife, their heirs and assigns therein, at public auction, at the westernmost north door of the court house situate on the southeast corner of Adams and LaSalle streets, in the city of Chicago aforesaid, on Monday, the twentieth day of March, 1876, at 1 o'clock P. M., to the highest bidder therefor, for cash.

HUGH A. WHITE, Trustee.

Dated Chicago, February 12th, 1876. 21-24

TRUSTEE'S SALE.—WHEREAS, CHARLES B. Tolford, of the city of Chicago, in the county of Cook and State of Illinois, by his certain trust deed, duly executed, acknowledged and delivered, bearing date May 2, 1873 and recorded in the recorder's office of Cook county aforesaid May 23, A. D. 1874, in book 402 of records page 232, conveyed to the undersigned all those certain lots, pieces, or parcels of land or ground situate in the town of Lake in the county of Cook and State of Illinois, and known or described as lots one (1), two (2), three (3), eleven (11), and twelve (12), in the subdivision by William M. Whitney and Isaac Claflin of lot two (2) of the assessor's subdivision of the south quarter ($\frac{1}{4}$) of the southwest quarter ($\frac{1}{4}$) of section four (4), in township thirty-eight (38), north of range fourteen (14), east of the third (3d) principal meridian, to secure payment of his two certain promissory notes, bearing even date herewith for the sum of $400 00, each payable in three and five years after date respectively, with eight (8) per cent. interest payable annually.

And whereas, said trust deed provides, that in case of the default in the payment of said notes, or either of them, or any part of principal or interest according to the tenor and effect of said notes, the undersigned, upon the application of the legal holder thereof, shall sell and dispose of said premises in manner and form and for the purposes in said trust deed provided, as by reference to the records still remaining in the recorder's office aforesaid will fully appear.

And default having been made in the payment of interest due on said notes, May 2, A.D. 1875, the legal holder of said notes has elected and declared the whole of said principal sum of $400.00, and the interest accrued thereon, due and payable,

And whereas, there is now due and payable, according to the terms of said notes and said trust deed, for principal and interest, $409.33,

Now, therefore, public notice is hereby given that the undersigned, in pursuance of said application and of the power and authority in him by said trust deed vested, will sell and dispose of the premises in said trust deed and hereinbefore described, at public auction at the north door of the "Chamber of Commerce Building," situate on the southeast corner of LaSalle and Washington streets in the city of Chicago aforesaid, at 10 o'clock A. M., on Tuesday, the 15th day of February, A.D. 1876.

This sale is made subject to a first encumbrance of $2,000.00 due Jan'y 10th, 1878.

Chicago, Jan'y 18, 1876.

ISAAC CLAFLIN, Trustee.

NOTICE.—Chas. B. Tolford having disposed of said lots he is not responsible for the payment of said notes.

The above sale is adjourned to 10 o'clock A. M. on Tuesday, March 7th, 1876. 21-23

TRUSTEE'S SALE.—WHEREAS, ISAAC PFLAUM, of the city of Chicago, in the county of Cook and State of Illinois, by his certain trust deed, duly executed, acknowledged and delivered, bearing date the tenth day of July, A. D. 1872, and recorded in the recorder's office of Cook county, in the State of Illinois, in book 51 of records, at page 257, did convey unto Francis H. Kales as trustee, all the following described premises, situated in the county of Cook and State of Illinois, to wit:

Sub-lot one (1) of lots thirty-two (32), thirty-three (33) and thirty-four (34), in block three (3), in Wentworth's subdivision of the south sixty (60) acres of the west half (W. ½) of northwest quarter (N. W. ¼) of section thirty-four (34), in township thirty-nine (39), north range fourteen, (14) east of the third (3d) principal meridian (P. M.), to secure the payment of his principal promissory note for the sum of four thousand ($4,000) dollars, executed by the said Isaac Pflaum, and payable to the order of the State Savings Institution, on the first day of July, A. D. 1875, at its office in the city of Chicago, with interest thereon at the rate of ten per cent. per annum after maturity.

And, whereas, it is provided in and by said trust deed, that in case of default in the payment of the said promissory note, according to the tenor and effect thereof, then, on the application of the legal holder of said note, it should and might be lawful for the undersigned, Francis H. Kales, to sell and dispose of the said premises, and all the right, title, benefit, and equity of redemption of said Isaac Pflaum, his heirs and assigns therein, at public auction, at the door of the court house, to wit: the north door nearest LaSalle street of the building now used as a court house, on the southeast corner of LaSalle and Adams streets, in the city of Chicago, in the county of Cook and State of Illinois, for the highest and best price the same will bring in cash, twenty (20) days previous notice of such sale having been given by publication in a newspaper at that time published in the said county of Cook, and to make, execute, and deliver to the purchaser or purchasers at such sale, good and sufficient deed or deeds of conveyance for the premises sold, and out of the proceeds of such sale to pay all costs and expenses incurred in advertising and selling said premises, including attorney's fees, also the principal and interest on said note.

And whereas, default has been made in the payment of the said note, which has matured, for the sum of four thousand ($4,000) dollars, no part of the same having been paid, and the legal holder of said note has made application to the undersigned, the trustee in said trust deed named, and requested him as such trustee to sell and dispose of said premises under the power in said trust deed, and for the purposes therein stated.

Now, therefore, public notice is hereby given, that in pursuance of said trust deed, and by virtue of the power and authority to me granted in and by the same, I, the undersigned, will, on Monday the twentieth (20th) day of March A. D. 1876, at twelve o'clock, noon, at the north door nearest LaSalle street, of the building now used as a court house, on the southeast corner of LaSalle and Adams streets, in the said city of Chicago, sell and dispose of the premises above and in said trust deed described, and all the right, title, benefit and equity of redemption of the said Isaac Pflaum, his heirs or assigns therein, at public auction, for the highest and best price the same will bring in cash.

Dated February 11th, 1876.

JOHN C. BARKER, Atty. 17-22

TRUSTEE'S SALE.—WHEREAS, CHARLES J. F. Kraft, by trust deed dated November 8th, 1874, and recorded in book 485 of records, page 88, conveyed the premises in Chicago, Cook county, Illinois, to wit:

Lot number six (6), in Call & Kraft's subdivision of the west one hundred and seventy-six and 5 10 feet (176 5-10) of the north half of block fifteen, Union Park second addition to Chicago unto the undersigned, in trust, to secure three (3) notes of the said Charles J. F. Kraft, of even date with said trust deed, each for the sum of six hundred and sixteen and sixty-seven hundredths dollars (616 67-100) due and payable respectively, two, three and four years from date, with interest after 1st of January, 1875, at 8 per cent. per annum, payable semi-annually, and 10 per cent. after maturity, and payable to the order of Samuel D. Weakley.

And whereas, said trust deed provides that in case of default in the payment of the interest on said notes as it falls due, the legal holder thereof may, at his option, declare the principal of said notes due and payable, as well as the interest, and default having been made in the payment of interest due on the 1st of July, 1875, and 1st January, 1876, which default still continues, the legal holder of said notes having declared the whole of said notes, together with the interest thereon, amounting to 2,014.41 dollars, due and payable, and has applied to the undersigned to sell and dispose of said premises in said trust deed conveyed, as therein provided.

Now, therefore, public notice is hereby given that the undersigned will, on Saturday the 18th day of March, 1876, between 11 and 12 o'clock, noon, at the northeast corner of the court house square, in Chicago, Cook county, Illinois, under and by virtue of the powers by said trust deed conferred on him, sell and dispose of the above described premises at public auction to the highest and best bidder, for cash, and all the right, title, benefit and equity of redemption of the said Charles J. F. Kraft, his heirs and assigns therein.

The above premises are subject to a prior incumbrance of twenty-five hundred dollars ($2500).

CHARLES M. STURGES,

Attorney, Room 7, Methodist Church Block, Chicago, Ill.

WHEREAS, WILLIAM W. CRAWFORD, PETER Semonin, Fletcher G. Welch and Lyne S. Davison, being indebted unto J. Peter & Co., of Louisville, Kentucky, in the sum of three thousand one hundred and forty-seven dollars and eighty-two cents, to secure the payment thereof, made their promissory note for that sum, bearing date of the twentieth day of October, A.D. 1874, payable to the order of said J. Peter & Co., on the twentieth day of October, A.D. 1875, with interest at the rate of ten per centum per annum until paid, and did, with their respective wives, to wit, Rosanna Crawford, wife of said William W. Crawford, Martha Ann Semonin, wife of said Peter Semonin, Amanda M. Welch, wife of said Fletcher G. Welch, and Nannie S. Davison, wife of said Lyne S. Davison, by their trust deed, of even date with said note, filed for record in the office of the recorder of Cook county, in the State of Illinois, on the ninth day of November, A.D. 1874, and recorded at page 266 of book 447 of records in said office, to secure the prompt payment of said note according to its tenor and effect, convey unto me, the undersigned, Albert R. Cooper, the premises therein and hereinafter described, in trust, among other things, that in case of default in the payment of said note, according to the tenor and effect thereof, the undersigned, Albert R. Cooper, should, on the application of the legal holders of said note, after having advertised such sale twenty days in a newspaper published in the city of Chicago, Cook county, State of Illinois, sell the said premises, or any part thereof, and all the right and equity of redemption of the grantors in said trust deed, their heirs, executors, administrators or assigns therein, at public vendue, to the highest bidder for cash, at the door of the court house of the county wherein said premises are situate, and at the time appointed in said advertisement, and should execute and deliver to the purchaser or purchasers, a deed or deeds for the conveyance in fee of the premises sold, and should apply the proceeds of such sale in the order and manner and for the purposes set forth in said trust deed: to the originals of which note and trust deed, now open to inspection in the custody of Charles M. Sturges, attorney at law, at room No. 7 in Methodist Church Block, in said city of Chicago, as well as to said record of said trust deed, reference is hereby had and made for full particulars of the provisions and contents of said note and trust deed.

And whereas, default has been made in the payment of said note, according to the tenor and effect thereof, so that there remains due and unpaid thereon the sum of three hundred and thirty-six dollars and fifty-four cents, with interest thereon at the rate of ten per cent. per annum from the first day of February, A. D. 1876.

And whereas, the legal holders of said note have made application to me, the undersigned, Albert R. Cooper, to advertise and sell said premises for the purposes and in pursuance of the provisions set forth in said trust deed.

Now, therefore, public notice is hereby given, that, for said purposes, and in pursuance of said provisions, I, the said Albert R. Cooper, on the twenty-first day of March, in the year of our Lord, one thousand eight hundred and seventy-six, at the hour of one o'clock in the afternoon of that day, at the door of the court house of the county of Cook in the State of Illinois, to wit, at the door which fronts on Adams street and is nearest to LaSalle street, of the building occupied as such court house, situate at the southeast corner of Adams street and LaSalle street, in the city of Chicago, in said Cook county, shall sell at public vendue, to the highest bidder for cash, the following described premises situate, lying and being in the county of Cook and State of Illinois, to wit: The southeast quarter of the southwest quarter of section eleven (11), in township thirty-eight (38) north, range thirteen (13) east of the third principal meridian, excepting a strip fifty (50) feet in width off of the east side thereof, granted as right of way to the Chicago, Danville and Vincennes Railroad; together with all and singular the tenements, hereditaments and appurtenances thereto belonging, or in anywise appertaining, and all the right and equity of redemption of the said grantors, their heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns therein.

Dated this twelfth day of February, A.D. 1876.

ALBERT R. COOPER, Trustee,

CHARLES M. STURGES, Atty. 13-18 21-26

TRUSTEE'S SALE.—WHEREAS, STEPHEN PALMER and Alice Palmer, his wife, grantors, made their certain deed of trust, dated the first day of December, A.D. 1874, and recorded in the recorder's office of Cook county, Illinois, in book 41 of records, at page 580, wherein they conveyed to the undersigned, as trustee, the premises hereinafter described, to secure payment of certain promissory notes made by said Stephen Palmer, of even date with said deed, one for the principal sum of $5,000, payable five years after date, and ten others for interest thereon, at ten per cent. per annum, payable at intervals of six months from and after the date thereof, for $250 each.

And default has been made in the payment of the interest note made payable twelve months after date, and application has therefore been made to said trustee to advertise and sell under said deed, in pursuance of its terms, and for the purposes therein expressed.

Now, therefore, notice is hereby given, that I shall sell at auction, for cash, at the north door of the court-house, nearest LaSalle street, situate at the southeast corner of the intersection of LaSalle and Adams streets, in the city of Chicago, at one o'clock in the afternoon, on the twenty-first day of March, A. D. 1876, said premises, to wit:

Lots two and three, in Thomas' subdivision of the west one hundred and fifty-two feet of block fifty-one, in the Canal Trustees' subdivision of section seven, township thirty-nine north, range fourteen, east of the third principal meridian, in the city of Chicago, county of Cook and State of Illinois, together with all the right, title, benefit, equity of redemption, and homestead exemption rights of said grantors, their heirs and assigns therein.

TRUSTEE'S SALE.—WHEREAS, CHARLES J. F. Kraft, by trust deed dated 8th November, 1874, and recorded in book 485 of records, page 86, conveyed the premises in Chicago, Cook county, Illinois, to wit:

Lot number nine (9), in Call & Kraft's subdivision of the West one hundred and seventy-six and 5-10 feet (176 5-10), of the north half of block fifteen, Union Park second addition to Chicago, unto the undersigned, in trust, to secure three notes of said Charles J. F. Kraft, of even date with said trust deed, each for the sum of six hundred and sixteen and 67-100 dollars (616 67-100), due and payable two, three, and four years from date, respectively, with interest after first January, 1875, at 8 per cent. per annum, payable semi-annually, and 10 per cent. after maturity, and payable to the order of Samuel D. Weakley.

And whereas, said trust deed provides, that in case of default in the payment of the interest on said notes as it falls due, the legal holder thereof may, at his option declare the principal as well as the interest, of said notes due and payable, and default having been made in the payment of the interest which was due July 1st, 1875, and on 1st Jan'y, 1876, and which default still continues, the legal holder of said notes having declared the principal and interest thereon, amounting to $2,014.41-100 dollars now due and payable, and has applied to the undersigned to sell said premises in said trust deed conveyed, as therein provided.

Now, therefore, public notice is hereby given that the undersigned will, on Saturday, the 18th day of March, 1876, between the hours of 11 and 12 o'clock noon, at the northeast corner of the court house square, in the city of Chicago, Cook county, Illinois, under and by virtue of the powers by said trust deed conferred on him, sell and dispose of the above described premises at public auction, to the highest and best bidder, for cash, and all the right, title, benefit and equity of redemption of the said Charles J. F. Kraft, his heirs and assigns therein.

The above premises are subject to a prior incumbrance of twenty-five hundred dollars.

CHICAGO LEGAL NEWS.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 26, 1876.

The Courts.

UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT.

No. 546.—OCTOBER TERM, 1875.

In error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of Ohio.

FREDERICK J. MAYER and SETH EVANS, assignees under the assignment laws of the State of Ohio, of GEORGE BOGEN and JACOB BOGEN, as individuals and as late partners as G. & J. BOGEN, and of GEORGE BOGEN, JACOB BOGEN and HENRY MULLER, as individuals and as late partners as GEORGE BOGEN & SON, plaintiffs in error,

v.

MAX HELLMAN, assignee in bankruptcy of GEORGE BOGEN and JACOB BOGEN, as individuals and as late partners as G. & J. BOGEN, bankrupts, and of GEORGE BOGEN, JACOB BOGEN and HENRY MULLER, as individuals and as late partners as GEORGE BOGEN & SON.

An assignment by an insolvent debtor of his property to trustees for the equal and common benefit of all his creditors is not fraudulent; and when executed six months before proceedings in bankruptcy are taken against the debtor, is not assailable by the assignee in bankruptcy, subsequently appointed: and the assignee is not entitled to the possession of the property from the trustees.

Mr. Justice FIELD delivered the opinion of the Court.

The plaintiff in the court below is assignee in bankruptcy of Bogen and others, appointed in proceedings instituted against them in the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of Ohio; the defendants are assignees of the same parties, under the assignment laws of the State of Ohio; and the present suit is brought to obtain possession of property which passed to the latter under the assignment to them. The facts as disclosed by the record, so far as they are material for the disposition of the case, are briefly these: On the 3d of December, 1873, at Cincinnati, Ohio, George Bogen and Jacob Bogen, composing the firm of G. & J. Bogen, and the same parties with Henry Muller, composing the firm of Bogen & Son, by deed executed of that date, individually and as partners, assigned certain property held by them, including that in controversy, to three trustees, in trust for the equal and common benefit of all their creditors. The deed was delivered upon its execution, and the property was taken possession of by the assignees.

By the law of Ohio, in force at the time, when an assignment of property is made to trustees for the benefit of creditors, it is the duty of the trustees, within ten days after the delivery of the assignment to them, and before disposing of any of the property, to appear before the probate judge of the county in which the assignors reside, produce the original assignment, or a copy thereof, and file the same in the probate court and enter into an undertaking payable to the State, in such sum and with such sureties as may be approved by the judge, conditioned for the faithful performance of their duties.

In conformity with this law, the trustees, on the 13th of December, 1873, within the prescribed ten days, appeared before the probate judge of the proper county in Ohio, produced the original assignment and filed the same in the probate court, One of the trustees having declined to act, another one was named in his place by the creditors and appointed by the court. Subsequently the three gave an undertaking with sureties approved by the judge, in the sum of five hundred thousand dollars, for the performance of their duties, and then proceeded with the administration of the trust under the direction of the court.

On the 22d of June of the following year, more than six months after the execution of the assignment, the petition in bankruptcy against the insolvents was filed in the District Court of the United States, initiating the proceedings in which the plaintiff was appointed their assignee in bankruptcy. As such officer, he claims a right to the possession of the property in the hands of the defendants under the assignment to them. The validity of this claim depends, as a matter of course, upon the legality of the assignment. Independently of the bankrupt act, there could be no serious question raised as to its legality. The power which every one possesses over his own property would justify any such disposition as did not interfere with the existing rights of others; and an equal distribution by a debtor of his property among his creditors, when unable to meet the demands of all in full, would be deemed not only a legal proceeding, but one entitled to commendation. Creditors have a right to call for the application of the property of their debtor to the satisfaction of their just demands, but unless there are special circumstances giving priority of right to the demands of one creditor over another, the rule of equity would require the equal and ratable distribution of the debtor's property for the benefit of all of them. And so, whenever such a disposition has been voluntarily made by the debtor, the courts in this country have uniformly expressed their approbation of the proceeding. The hindrance and delay to particular creditors in their efforts to reach before others the property of the debtor, that may follow such a conveyance, are regarded as unavoidable incidents to a just and lawful act, which in no respect impair the validity of the transaction.

The great object of the bankrupt act, so far as creditors are concerned, is to secure equality of distribution among them of the property of the bankrupt. For that purpose it sets aside all transactions had within a prescribed period previous to the petition in bankruptcy, defeating, or tending to defeat, such distribution. It reaches to proceedings of every form and kind undertaken or executed within that period, by which a preference can be secured to one creditor over another, or the purposes of the act evaded. That period is four months for some transactions and six months for others. Those periods constitute the limitation within which the transactions will be examined and annulled, if conflicting with the provisions of the bankrupt act.

Transactions anterior to these periods are presumed to have been acquiesced in by the creditors. There is sound policy in prescribing a limitation of this kind. It would be in the highest degree injurious to the community to have the validity of business transactions with debtors, in which it is interested, subject to the contingency of being assailed by subsequent proceedings in bankruptcy. Unless, therefore, a transaction is void against creditors independently of the provisions of the bankrupt act, its validity is not open to contestation by the assignee, where it took place at the period prescribed by the statute anterior to the proceedings in bankruptcy. The assignment in this case was not a proceeding, as already said, in hostility to the creditors, but for their benefit. It was not, therefore, void as against them, or even voidable. Executed six months before the petition in bankruptcy was filed, it is, to the a signee in bankruptcy, a closed proceeding.

The counsel of the defendants have filed an elaborate argument to show that assignments for the benefit of creditors generally are not opposed to the bankrupt act, though made within six months previous to the filing of the petition. Their argument is that such an assignment is only a voluntary execution of what the bankrupt court would compel; and as it is not a proceeding in itself fraudulent as against creditors, and does not give a preference to one creditor over another, it conflicts with no positive inhibition of the statute. There is much force in the position of counsel, and it has the support of a decision of the late Mr. Justice Nelson, in the Circuit Court of New York, in Sedgwick v. Place (First National Bank. Reg., 204); and of Mr. Justice Swayne, in the Circuit Court of Ohio, in Langley v Perry (Second National Bankrupt Reg., 180). Certain it is that such an assignment is not absolutely void, and if voidable it must be because it may be deemed, perhaps, necessary for the efficiency of the bankrupt act that the administration of an insolvent's estate shall be entrusted to the direction of the district court, and not left under the control of the appointee of the insolvent. It is unnecessary, however, to express any decided opinion upon this head, for the decision of the question is not required for the disposition of the case.

In the argument of the plaintiff's counsel the position is taken that the bankrupt act suspends the operation of the act of Ohio regulating the mode of administering assignments for the benefit of creditors, treating the latter as an insolvent law of the State. The answer is that that statute of Ohio is not an insolvent law in any proper sense of the term. It does not compel, or in terms even authorize, assignments; it assumes that such instruments were conveyances previously known, and only prescribes a mode by which the trust created shall be enforced. It provides for the security of the creditors by exacting a bond from the trustees for the discharge of their duties; it requires them to file statements showing what they have done with the property; and affords in various ways the means of compelling them to carry out the purposes of the conveyance. There is nothing in the act resembling an insolvent law. It does not discharge the insolvent from arrest or imprisonment; it leaves his after-acquired property liable to his creditors precisely as though no assignment had been made. The provisions for enforcing the trust are substantially such as a court of chancery would apply in the absence of any statutory provision. The assignment in this case must, therefore, be regarded as though the statute of Ohio, to which reference is made, had no existence. There is an insolvent law in that State, but the assignment in question was not made in pursuance of any of its provisions. The position, therefore, of counsel, that the bankrupt law of Congress suspends all proceedings under the insolvent law of the State, has no application.

The assignment in this case being in our judgment valid and binding, there was no property in the hands of the defendants which the assignee in bankruptcy could claim. The assignment to them divested the insolvents of all proprietary rights they held in the property described in the conveyance. They could not have maintained any action either for the personalty or realty. There did, indeed, remain to them an equitable right to have paid over to them any remainder after the claims of all the creditors were satisfied. If a contingency should ever arise for the assertion of this right, the assignee in bankruptcy may, perhaps, have a claim for such remainder, to be applied to the payment of creditors not protected by the assignment, and whose demands have been created subsequent to that instrument. Of this possibility we have no occasion to speak now.

Our conclusion is that the court below erred in sustaining the demurrer to the defendant's answer; and the judgment of the court must, therefore, be reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings.

UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT.

No. 134.—OCTOBER TERM, 1875.

CHRISTIAN S. EYSTER v. THOMAS GAFF AND JAMES W. GAFF.

In error to the Supreme Court of the Territory of Colorado.

BANKRUPTCY—EFFECT OF UPON FORECLOSURE PROCEEDINGS.

Held, that the proceedings in the foreclosure suit after the appointment of the assignee in bankruptcy are not void; that it is a mistake to suppose that the bankrupt law avoids of its own force all judicial proceedings in the State or other courts the instant one of the parties is adjudged a bankrupt.

2. DUTY OF COURT.—That it was the duty of the court to proceed to a decree as between the parties before it, until by some proper pleadings in the case, it was informed of the changed relations of any of those parties to the subject-matter of the suit.

3. PRACTICE ENTERING RULE TO SHOW CAUSE.—That this court has steadily set its face against the practice of bringing any person who contested with the assignee any matter growing out of disputed rights of property or of contracts, into the Bankrupt court by the service of a rule to show cause, and to dispose of their rights in a summary way; that the jurisdiction for the benefit of the assignee in a certain class of cases in the Circuit and District courts, is concurrent and does not divest that of the State courts.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

Mr. Justice MILLER delivered the opinion of the court.

This suit was an action of ejectment brought originally by Thomas and James Gaff against plaintiff in error in the District Court of Arrapahoe county, Colorado, in which the plaintiffs below had a recovery, and that judgment was affirmed on appeal by the Supreme Court of that territory.

The title to certain lots in Denver city is the subject of controversy, and there seems to be no difficulty in considering George W. McClure as the source of title, common to plaintiffs and defendant. McClure had made a mortgage on the lots to defendants in error to secure payment of the sum of $18,000.

A suit to foreclose this mortgage was instituted in the District Court in 1868, which proceeded to a decree and sale, and plaintiffs became the purchasers, receiving the master's deed, which was duly confirmed by the court.

This decree was rendered July 1, 1870. On the 9th day of May preceding, the mortgagor, McClure, filed a petition in bankruptcy, and on the 11th day of May he was adjudged a bankrupt, and on the 4th day of June, John Mechling was duly appointed assignee. The bankrupt filed schedules in which these lots and the mortgage of the Gaffs on them were set out. It will thus be seen that pending the foreclosure proceedings which had been instituted against McClure, he had been declared a bankrupt and Mechling had been appointed his assignee, and that the decree of sale and foreclosure under which plaintiffs asserted title in the present suit was rendered about a month after the appointment of the assignee, and nearly two months after the adjudication that McClure was a bankrupt. The defendant in the ejectment suit was a tenant under McClure, and defends his possession on the ground of the invalidity of the foreclosure proceedings after the adjudication of bankruptcy and the appointment of the assignee.

The plaintiffs in this suit seem to have relied at first upon the right to recover under the mortgage, and did not give in evidence the proceedings in foreclosure; but when the defendant had read them, so far as the decree and sale, in order to show that the mortgage was merged, the plaintiffs then produced the master's deed. The Supreme Court of Colorado held that the mortgage alone was sufficient to sustain the action, one of the judges dissenting; and counsel for defendant below insists here that this was error, because the laws of Colorado give to a mortgage only the effect of an equitable lien, and not that of conveying a legal title. He also insists that all the proceedings in the foreclosure suit after the appointment of the assignee in bankruptcy are absolutely void, because he was not made a defendant.

We will consider this latter proposition first, for if the foreclosure proceedings conveyed a valid title to plaintiffs the judgment must be affirmed, whatever may be the true solution of the question of local law.

It may be conceded for the purposes of the present case that the strict legal title to the land did not pass by the mortgage, and that it did pass to the assignee upon his appointment, and consequently, if that title was not divested by the foreclosure proceedings it was in the assignee at the trial of the ejectment suit. On the other hand, if these proceedings did transfer the legal title to plaintiffs, they were entitled to recover as they did in that action.

At the time that suit was commenced the mortgagor, McClure, was vested with the title and was the proper and necessary defendant. Whether any other persons were proper defendants does not appear, nor is it material to inquire. But for the bankruptcy of McClure there can be no doubt that the sale under the foreclosure decree and the deed of the master would have vested the title in the purchaser, and that this would have related back to the date of the mortgage. Nor can there be any question that, the suit having been commenced against McClure when the title or equity of redemption (no difference which it is) was in him, any person who bought of him or took his title or any interest he had pending the suit, would have been bound by the proceedings and their rights foreclosed by the decree and sale. These are elementary principles. Is there anything in the bankrupt law, or in the nature of proceedings in bankruptcy, which takes the interest in the mortgaged property acquired by the assignee out of this rule?

There is certainly no express provision to that effect. It is maintained by counsel that, because the assignee is vested by the assignment under the statute with the legal title, there remains nothing from that time for the decree of foreclosure to operate on, and it cannot thereafter have the effect of transferring the title which is in a party not before the court. But if this be true in this case it must be equally true in other suits in which the title is transferred pendente lite.

We have already said, and no authority is necessary to sustain the proposition, that a sale and conveyance by the mortgagor pending the suit, would not prevent the court from proceeding with the case without the purchaser, nor affect the title of him who bought under the decree. So in a suit against the vendor of real estate for specific performance, his conveyance of the legal title after suit was brought would not suspend the proceeding or defeat the title under the decree of the court. The obvious reason for this is, that if, when the jurisdiction of the court has once attached, it could be ousted by the transfer of the defendant's interest, there would be no end to the litigation, and justice would be defeated by the number of these transfers. Another reason is, that when such a suit is ended by a final decree transferring the title, that title relates back to the date of the instrument on which the suit is based or to the commencement of the suit, and the court will not permit its judgment or decree to be rendered nugatory by intermediate conveyances.

We see no reason why the same principle should not apply to the transfer made by a bankruptcy proceeding. The bankrupt act expressly provides that the assignee may prosecute or defend all suits in which the bankrupt was a party at the time he was adjudged a bankrupt. If there was any reason for interposing, the assignee could have had himself substituted for the bankrupt, or made a defendant on petition. If he chose to let the suit proceed without such defense, he stands as any other person would on whom the title had fallen since the suit was commenced.

It is a mistake to suppose that the bankrupt law avoids of its own force all judicial proceedings in the State or other courts the instant one of the parties is adjudged a bankrupt. There is nothing in the act which sanctions such a proposition.

The court, in the case before us, had acquired jurisdiction of the parties and of the subject-matter of the suit. It was competent to administer full justice, and was proceeding, according to the law which governed such a suit, to do so. It could not take judicial notice of the proceedings in bankruptcy in another court, however seriously they might have affected the rights of parties to the suit already pending.

It was the duty of that court to proceed to a decree as between the parties before it, until by some proper pleadings in the case, it was informed of the changed relations of any of those parties to the subject matter of the suit. Having such jurisdiction and performing its duty as the case stood in that court, we are at a loss to see how its decree can be treated as void. It is almost certain that if at any stage of the proceeding, before sale or final confirmation, the assignee had intervened, he would have been heard to assert any right he had, or set up any defense to the suit. The mere filing in the court of a certificate of his appointment as assignee, with no plea or motion to be made a party or to take part in the case, deserved no attention, and received none. In the absence of any appearance by the assignee, the validity of the decree can only be impeached on the principle that the adjudication of bankruptcy divested the other court of all jurisdiction whatever in the foreclosure suit. The opinion seems to have been quite prevalent in many quarters at one time, that the moment a man is declared bankrupt, the district court which has so adjudged draws to itself by that act, not only all control of the bankrupt's property and credits, but that no one can litigate with the assignee contested rights in any other court, except in so far as the circuit courts have concurrent jurisdiction; and that other courts can proceed no further in suits of which they had at that time full cognizance. And it was a prevalent practice to bring any person who contested with the assignee any matter growing out of disputed rights of property or of contracts, into the bankrupt court by the service of a rule to show cause, and to dispose of their rights in a summary way. This court has steadily set its face against this view.

The debtor of a bankrupt, or the man who contests the right to real or personal property with him, loses none of those rights by the bankruptcy of his adversary.

The same courts remain open to him in such contests, and the statute has not divested those courts of jurisdiction in such actions. If it has for certain classes of actions conferred a jurisdiction for the benefit of the assignee in the circuit and district courts of the United States, it is concurrent with and does not divest that of the State courts.

These propositions are supported by the following cases decided in this court: Smith v. Mason, 14 Wall., 419; Marshall v. Knox, 16 Wall., 501; Mays v. Fritton, 20 Wall., 414; Doe v. Childress, 21 Wall., 642. See, also, Bishop v. Johnson, — Woolworth, 324.

UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT.

No. 73.—OCTOBER TERM, 1875.

JOHN S. WILLS, JAMES G. WILLS, WASHINGTON M. WILLS, and RICHARD GREGG, plaintiffs in error,
v.
HORACE B. CLAFLIN, EDWARD E. EAMES, and EDWARD W. BANCROFT.

In error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Illinois.

PROMISSORY NOTE—LIABILITY OF ASSIGNOR—WHEN SUIT NEED NOT BE BROUGHT AGAINST MAKER—PLEADING—BANKRUPTCY OF MAKER.

Mr. Justice DAVIS delivered the opinion of the court.

Horace B. Claflin & Co., assignees of certain promissory notes, sued Wills, Gregg & Co., assignors of said notes, on their contract of assignment, which was made in the State of Illinois, and the inquiry is whether a case of liability was made out on the trial, under the peculiar provisions of the statute of Illinois on the subject. This statute makes promissory notes assignable by indorsement in writing, so as to vest the legal interest in the assignee; but the liability of the assignor is not absolute, but conditional. He agrees to pay the note if the assignee, by the exercise of due diligence, prosecutes the maker to insolvency; but if the institution of a suit against the maker would be unavailing, or if the maker, when the note falls due, is out of the jurisdiction of the court, and therefore beyond the reach of legal process, the assignor is equally as liable as if due diligence by suit had been used. (Gross' Compilation, 1879, 462.)

There was no attempt to coerce payment of the makers by suit, and this action proceeds on the theory that the assignees were excused, under the circumstances, from instituting it. The declaration avers insolvency, non-residence, and that a suit would have been unavailing. On the trial, the Circuit court, against the objection of the defendants, admitted evidence that a petition in bankruptcy was filed January 20, 1870, in the United States District Court of Missouri, at Milwaukee, against Kimball & Butterfield, the makers of the notes sued on, and a judgment of adjudication, January 29, 1870. The admission of this evidence is assigned for error, on the ground that there was no allegation in either count of the declaration which justified it or the charge of the court that the adjudication in bankruptcy excused the assignees from instituting suit against the makers.

There are two averments in the second count of the declaration, as follows:

1st. "And the plaintiffs aver that at the time when each of said promissory notes became, by its terms, due and payable, the said Simeon Pickard, and the said Kimball, and the said Butterfield, were each and all insolvent and unable to pay the amount of the notes by them respectively subscribed as aforesaid, or any part thereof, and hitherto from thence have continued insolvent and unable to pay the amount of the notes by them respectively subscribed as aforesaid, or any portion thereof."

2d. "And the said plaintiffs aver that the institution of a suit against the said Simeon Pickard, or against the said Kimball or the said Butterfield, at the time the notes so by them as aforesaid respectively subscribed, became due and payable, or at any time since, or now, would have been and would be wholly unavailing."

It is contended that these two averments must be treated as one, and that they mean that the suit would be unavailing by reason of the insolvency of the makers.

If this were so, it would by no means follow that the record from Wisconsin was inadmissible to sustain that issue; but be this as it may, as we construe these averments, they are distinct and independent of each other. The first is complete in itself, because, if the makers were insolvent, it would be idle to bring a suit against them. But there are other things besides insolvency which might render a suit unavailing, as, for instance, want of consideration in the note, or, as in this case, an adjudication in bankruptcy.

The second averment was not limited to any particular cause, but was general in its character, and left the pleader free to show on the trial any reason why a suit would be unavailing.

It is true the pleading was objectionable because it did not contain specifications enough to enable the party to defend himself, (Crouch v. Hall, 15 Illinois, 264,) and if this objection had been taken by demurrer it would have prevailed. But the question here is not whether a demurrer was sustainable, but whether the pleading was good after verdict.

"At common law, after verdict, if the issue joined be such as necessarily to require on the trial proof of the facts defectively or imperfectly stated or omitted, and without which it is not to be presumed that the judge would direct the jury to give, or the jury would have given, the verdict, such defect, imperfection or omission is cured by the verdict." (1 Chitty's Pleadings, 10th American edition, p. 673, and cases cited in note.) And this rule is adopted in Illinois.

In Greathouse v. Robinson (3 Scammon, p. 8), it was held that the defendant, to avail himself of a defective averment in a declaration, must demur to it. "If he elects to plead to the declaration and go to trial, he has no right to insist upon the exclusion of evidence because some necessary averment is omitted or defectively set forth." There was, therefore, no valid reason why the record of the adjudication of bankruptcy should have been excluded. It was not only competent evidence in support of the issue that a suit against the makers would have been unavailing, but conclusive evidence on the point, for the bankrupt act prevents the institution and prosecution of suits against parties in bankruptcy.

The first note was due January 18, 1870, two days before the petition in bankruptcy was filed, and the first term of court held at Chicago after the note became due, was on the first Monday of the following month. At this time, the adjudication in bankruptcy was in force, and a suit against the bankrupts forbidden.

There was parol testimony (received without objection) to show that the debts of the petitioners were settled and the proceedings in bankruptcy dismissed, but there was nothing to fix the time when the order of dismissal was made. The burden of doing this rested on the defendants, and so the jury were told.

As this view of the case is decisive of it, it is unnecessary to notice the other assignments of error.

The judgment is affirmed.

WE have received the following opinion from the law firm of BONNEY, FAY & GRIGGS of this city:

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

OPINION FILED JAN. 21, 1876.

THE FIREMAN'S FUND INSURANCE CO. v. THE CONGREGATION OF RODEPH SHOLEM.

Appeal from Cook.

INSURANCE—WHEN A BUILDING WILL BE CONSIDERED AS FALLEN.

The clause in an insurance policy that "if a building shall fall, except as the result of fire, all insurance by this company shall immediately cease and determine," construed and held that when a building falls from its blocks and is not reduced to a mass of rubbish, but still retains its form and may be repaired, that it will not be regarded as having fallen.

2. HOW A RELIGIOUS SOCIETY MAY SUE.—That since the decision in the Ada Street Methodist Church under a more recent statute, a religious corporation may sue in its own name.

3. PRESUMPTION.—That there were two statutes in force under which a religious corporation could exist, and it will be presumed the corporation could rightfully sue in the name adopted until that fact is put in issue by a proper plea.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

SCOTT, C. J.—The defense in this case is based principally upon that clause of the policy, upon which the action is brought, that declares "if a building shall fall, except as the result of fire, all insurance by this company shall immediately cease and determine." The position assumed is, the building insured had "fallen," in the sense that term is used in the policy, by the action of the winds upon it, before the fire occurred which consumed it, and hence the insurance by the company had ceased and determined under the exemptions of the contract. The question is argued as one of law, rather than of fact, for the reason there is but little controversy as to what did occur; but the effect of the fact, it is insisted, is a matter of law.

But it would seem to us to be purely a question of fact. Whether the building had fallen or was standing, is a fact easily determined, and about which there ought to be no controversy. Indeed, there is scarcely any conflict in the evidence as to the condition of the building at the time the fire occurred. All the witnesses substantially agree in the description they give of the property.

It was a church building, and stood upon posts or blocks. Not long before the fire, by the violence of the storm, it had been blown partly off the posts upon which it rested, by which it was greatly damaged, and so far rendered unfit for occupancy, that most, if not all, the movable furniture was taken out. After the storm it leaned toward the street, was out of plumb, one end being higher than the other, but the building remained united. It had not fallen, although greatly damaged; that was all. The exemption clause of the policy was not that if the building should be damaged by causes other than fire, but "if a building shall fall" the policy should cease to be binding. These words are to be understood in their ordinary meaning. It may be conceded, which is no doubt the fact, it was not the intention of the parties the company would insure the materials, but the building itself. When that should cease to exist, by any cause, except as the result of fire, the insurance upon it and the contents was to terminate at once. This was the contract, and it was one the parties were competent to make, and when understandingly assented to by the assured, there is no reason why he should not be bound by it.

But all the evidence in this case shows the building insured existed until it was destroyed by fire, but in a damaged condition. So long as the building remained standing, there could be no exemption from liability under this clause of the policy, no matter how much depreciation there may have been by the action of the wind, or any other causes. It may be, the condition of the building after the storm rendered the risk more hazardous; if so, it was, perhaps, the privilege of the company to cancel the policy. Opportunity was afforded the company to rescind the insurance contract, on account of the changed condition of the property, had it chose to do so.

Previous to the fire, the company's agent had visited, and, to some extent, inspected the building. He knew its condition, but did not inform the parties interested that the company would insist upon cancelling the policy, but chose to allow the risk to stand. Had defendant cancelled the policy, it might have been the owners could have effected other insurance. At all events, defendant did not undertake to rescind the insurance contract, although in possession of all the facts, and, after the loss occurs, it is too late to insist the changed condition of the building rendered the risk more hazardous.

The case of Nave v. Home Mutual Ins. Co., 37 Mo., 431, to which our attention has been directed, is not analogous with the case at bar. In that case, the insured building was used as a store room and ware house, and by reason of overloading the floors with merchandise, it fell and became a mass of rubbish, and the fire which occasioned the loss arose among the materials. No such condition of the building is shown by the proof in this case.

Workmen, skilled in that department of labor, thought the building could have been repaired and placed back in its original position. When repaired, it would still be the same structure. Had it become a "mass of rubbish," as the building in the case cited, or had it "fallen," in the sense that word is employed in the exemption clause of the policy, no doubt the insurance would have terminated immediately under the contract. The case of Boyd v. Dubois, 3 Campbell, 133, cited by counsel, illustrates no phase of the case in hand. A motion was made in arrest of judgment, on the ground plaintiff was a religious society, incorporated under the laws of this State in 1871, and therefore incapable of suing, except in the names of the trustees. The case of Ada Street Methodist Church v. Garnsey, 66 Ills., is cited in support of the position.

But since that decision was rendered, it would seem under a more recent statute, a religious corporation may sue in its own name. R. S., 1874, p. 292, secs. 35 and 41. Notwithstanding this society may have been organized in 1871, it does not appear but it may have become incorporated under the recent statute, and therefore capable of suing in the corporate name adopted. There were two statutes in force under which a religious corporation could exist, and it will be presumed the corporation could rightfully sue in the name adopted, until that fact is put in issue, by a proper plea for that purpose. The fact objected to, not appearing on the record, it can not be reached by a motion in arrest of judgment. The point is made; the damages found are excessive. That was a question for the jury. It will be observed, the evidence as to the value of the insured property, immediately preceding the fire, was quite conflicting. We are not, however, prepared to say it is not sufficient to sustain the verdict. The policy covered the contents, as well as the building itself. It contained the tabernacle, chancel and pulpit, and all were in as good condition as when new.

A good deal of ornamental work had been done on them at considerable costs Upon the whole record, we think justice has been done, and the judgment must be affirmed.

Judgment affirmed.

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

OPINION FILED FEB. 4, 1876.

SETH W. HARDIN v. U. S. OSBORNE.

Appeal from Will.

TRUST--EXECUTION OF--WHEN LEGAL TITLE REVERTS TO GRANTOR.

1. B. and R., insolvent merchants of N. Y., made an assignment in 1838 to B. and W. in trust for creditors; the creditors not being made parties thereto. Amongst the assigned assetts was a judgment against one Egan, under which, in December, 1840, a sheriff's deed of a large body of lands in Will county, 2480 acres, including the premises in controversy, was issued to B. and R., the assignors, by quit-claim deed dated in 1841, but not acknowledged till September, 1842, and not recorded till 1844, they conveyed these lands to their assignees: the conveyance, which was otherwise in ordinary form, reciting generally the fact of the prior conveyance which was otherwise in ordinary form reciting generally the fact of the prior assignment and purporting to be made to the grantees in their capacity as assignees. Held, semble, that such deed was virtually an ancillary or supplemental assignment, and the title derived under it substantially of the same nature as if the lands had been specifically embraced in the original deed of assignment.

2. Reaffirming the doctrine of Reece v. Gibson et al., 50 Ills., 404; Harris v. Mills, 28 Ills., 44; Pollock v. Maison, 41 Ills., 517: Held, that assignments in trust for creditors although conveying an estate in fee in the ordinary terms, are yet sui generis in their nature, as made merely to secure debts; and, as in case of a mortgage or deed of trust to secure a single creditor, instead of the whole body of creditors, if the debt itself is extinguished by the statute of limitations, the trust itself expires, and the legal title vested in the trustee is executed in the beneficiary entitled thereto.

3. In analogy to the rule under our statute of uses, as expounded in Witham v. Brooner, 63 Ills., 344: Held, where an originally active trust becomes passive, or nominal, by the full execution, or expiration of all its functions, the legal title conveyed to the trustee for the purposes of the trust reverts to the grantor, without the necessity of a formal re-conveyance or judicial decree.

SCHOLFIELD, J.—This was ejectment for certain lands in Will county. The judgment below was in favor of the defendant, and the plaintiff brings the case to this court by appeal.

We deem it necessary to examine but one of the many points which have been discussed, as, in our opinion, the decision of that must be against the plaintiff and conclusive against his right to recover; and it will therefore be immaterial whether other questions were improperly ruled against him upon the trial or not.

The plaintiff derived title by conveyance from Brower and Wynkoop, made on the 13th day of August, 1860. The only title they had to convey was derived by deed from Bailey and Reynolds, dated May 1st, 1841, and acknowledged by them at a subsequent date. In this deed it is recited that the object of the conveyance was to consummate a voluntary assignment made by Bailey and Reynolds to Brower and Wynkoop, as assignees, for the benefit of their creditors, on the 5th day of April, 1838. On the 7th day of March, 1842, Bailey was adjudged a bankrupt by decree of the District Court of the United States for the southern district of New York, and, on the 23d day of July, of the same year, Reynolds was also adjudged a bankrupt by decree of the same court, and one Waddell was appointed assignee of each of them. There is no evidence showing the specific indebtedness which was to be paid by Brower and Wynkoop as assignees under the voluntary assignment; but the schedules of the indebtedness of each of the parties, filed in the District Court of the United States for the southern district of New York, should have shown, and we must presume did show, all their outstanding indebtedness at that time. By them it appears that all of their indebtedness was due and payable as early as February the 3d, 1840, and by decree of that court, rendered in 1842, Bailey and Reynolds were each discharged from any farther liability on account of their prior indebtedness.

Brower and Wynkoop exercised no control or supervision over the land, either by themselves or agent, later than December, 1843. They permitted it to be sold for taxes, effected no redemption therefrom, and paid no taxes on the land after that time.

We can see no difference in principle between the title conveyed to them and that conveyed to a trustee for the payment of a single specific debt, in the event of its non-payment within a prescribed period. In either case the only duty in the trustee is to sell the property and apply the proceeds to the payment of the indebtedness, in conformity with the terms of the power. If the indebtedness is paid or legally extinguished before a sale, the power to sell is presumably revoked, and if the trustee thereafter continues to hold the title, he has no duties to perform, and having no beneficial interest in the property, he necessarily holds as a dry trustee.

In Pollock et al. v. Maison et al., 41 Ill., 516, it was held that a mortgagee can not maintain ejectment against the mortgagor, after the debt secured by the mortgage is barred by the statute of limitation.

And in Gibson et al. v. Rees et al., 50 Ill., 383, it was held, where the creditors for whose benefit an assignment is made delay asserting any claim to the trust fund for such length of time, that the debts designed to be secured are barred by the statute of limitation it is the duty of the trustee after such lapse of time to refuse to pay the debts, and a court of equity will refuse to enforce the trust. In discussing the question, in the opinion of the court, the deed was assimilated to a mortgage, and it was said: "When the debt, the principal thing, is gone, the incident, the mortgage, is gone. And then a foreclosure cannot be had in any of the various modes given by the law. Thus it is seen, that although the statute of limitation does not run to bar the entry where the relation of mortgagor and mortgagee exist, still it does not run to bar the debt; and if it does in such case, why not when property is conveyed to a trustee for the benefit of his creditors?

In principle there would seem to be no difference. In each case the debtor transfers or conveys property as a security for the payment of debt. In either case they are but a security and nothing more. They do not belong to the class of trusts to which the law of trusts usually applies, but partake in some respects of their nature and incidents, but not in all of them. Such assignments do not create a pure trust, but only a quasi trust, being intended to secure debt, and are not designed to endure for long periods of time like most trusts that are created. Hence no reason is perceived why the statute should be suspended merely to keep a debt alive, intended to be paid out of the trust fund, any more than a mortgage debt or other debt secured by a pledge."

Applying the principle here, and waiving the consideration of what effect the discharge of Bailey and Reynolds, by the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York, may have had upon the debt, for the payment of which the assignment to Brower and Wynkoop was made, it is plain that all powers vested in Brower and Wynkoop with regard to the land terminated, by the bar of the debt by limitation, as early as in February, 1856. If they held title to the land after that time, it was but the naked legal title—nothing more. But did they hold such title, after their duties ceased?

It is said in Perry on Trusts, § 351: "Where the cestui que trust becomes absolutely entitled to the whole beneficial interest in the trust estate, and the active duties of the trustee have ceased, the statute of uses generally execute the legal title of the trustee to the cestui que trust, and he obtains the legal as well as the beneficial estate." And again, at the conclusion of § 521, the author says: "It is further to be remarked, that there can be but few of these dry trusts, for where there was no control and no duty to be performed by the trustee, it becomes a simple use, which the statute of uses executes in the cestui que trust, and he thus unites both the legal and beneficial estate in himself."

In Withaum v. Brower, 63 Ill., 344, it was held that, under the operation of section 3, chapter 24, Revised Statutes of 1845, a conveyance in trust, or to the use of any person, which requires no duties, which prescribes the execution of no trust, but leaves the trustee only a passive title, carries to the cestui que trust lawful seizin, estate and possession; that in such case, there is not a mere equitable title, but an actual seizin and possession; not only a right of entry, but an actual estate, and the same principle, we think, is equally applicable where, although a trust was declared by the deed, it has subsequently been satisfied, This is fully sustained by Welch v. Allen, 21 Wend., 147; Nicholl v. Walworth, 4 Denio, 386; Ross v. McJunkin, 14 Sargeant & Rawle, 369; Drysdale's Appeal, 14 Penn. St., 531; Brown v. Doe, 7 Howard (Miss.), 181, as well as by the language we have quoted, supra, from Perry on Trusts.

If this view be correct, Brower and Wynkoop, at the time they conveyed to the plaintiff, having neither the actual possession of nor the legal title to the land, conveyed nothing by their deed to the plaintiff of which he can avail in the present suit.

The judgment is affirmed.

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

OPINION FILED FEB. 4, 1876.

JACOB SOLT et al. v. JACOB WINGART.

Appeal from Stephenson.

SALE UNDER TRUST DEED—RIGHTS OF PURCHASER AT SHERIFF'S SALE IN THE SURPLUS.

1. SALE UNDER TRUST DEED—SURPLUS.—Where there was a sale under a trust deed and a judgment had been obtained against the grantor of such deed soon after it was recorded, and a sale was made under such deed which brought enough to pay off the trust deed and the judgment: Held, that the holder of the sheriff's certificate of sale under such judgment, which had only run fourteen months, was not entitled to the surplus money under such trust deed sale.

2. PURCHASER'S RIGHTS AFTER FIFTEEN MONTHS.—That had the fifteen months expired and appellee had obtained a deed from the sheriff, he would have been entitled to the surplus, but his rights had not advanced to that point, as it lacked about one month of the expiration of fifteen months.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

WALKER, J.

On the 10th day of January, 1871, Jacob Solt executed a deed of trust to John Hart, on seventy acres of land, to secure the payment of a note of $350 he owed to one Cyrus A. Shutz, due in two years from that date. About two months thereafter, Jacob Wingart recovered a judgment against Solt for about $207.17, including costs. In October of that year, he caused an execution to be issued on the judgment, and had the sheriff to levy it on the land conveyed in trust to Hart, and, after advertising it, offered it for sale, and Wingart became the purchaser at $234.12, the amount of his judgment and costs, and received a certificate of purchase therefor. The note to Shutz fell due on the 10th of January, 1873, and after advertising the time and place of sale, Hart, the trustee, offered it, on the 9th of April, 1873, and one Thomas K. Best became the purchaser at $1,000; and, having paid the money, received a deed from the trustee. As soon as the land was struck off at the sale, and before the money was paid to the trustee, Wingart's attorney showed to the trustee the certificate of purchase, and demanded for Wingart the surplus over and above the amount necessary to pay the debt the trust deed was given to secure, and the costs and expenses of the sale.

This the trustee declined to do, but paid the debt to Shutz, and the expenses of the sale. The surplus amounted to $543.60, a part of which the trustee paid, under directions of Solt, to one of his creditors, and the remainder to him.

Wingart thereupon filed a bill against Hart, the trustee, and Solt, to compel the payment of the entire surplus to him. On a hearing in the court below, the relief was granted, and Hart was decreed to pay it to Wingart, and that Solt pay the costs; and from that decree they appeal to this court, and ask a reversal.

The question presented by this record is novel in its character. Appellee had constructive, if not actual, notice of the existence of the prior incumbrance of the trust deed when he recovered his judgment and purchased the trust property at the sheriff's sale. He then occupied the position of a junior incumbrancer with notice. Hence he acquired his lien, entirely subject to the trust deed. His sale was liable to be defeated by a sale of the land under the trust deed. He could, no doubt, have redeemed from the incumbrance of the trust deed, and could have thus virtually tacked the lien of the trust deed to the lien he had acquired on the land subject to the trust, and could have thus compelled any one redeeming from his sale under the execution to pay him both incumbrances, and thus have either obtained the land or the payment of his judgment, with the interest, necessary to authorize a redemption.

All that appellee acquired by his purchase was a lien, which, if no redemption should be made, or if not cut off by a prior lien, would ripen into a conveyance of the title held by the judgment debtor. But in this case it never did ripen into a title, but his purchase and his lien were cut off and wiped out by the sale under the trust deed. When that sale was made, all his claim to the land, or a lien on it, was gone. Then did his purchase, under the circumstances of the case, become a lien on the surplus on the trustee's sale, had it been made within twelve months from the day he purchased? We presume no; and would seriously contend that appellee then had any right to demand the surplus, for the reason that he had but an inchoate right to the land that was cut off and defeated by the trustee's sale. By his purchase he acquired no right to the possession of the land, or the rents, issues, or profits arising therefrom. Had Solt, after appellee purchased, planted and cultivated crops that matured after the expiration of twelve and before the termination of fifteen months, does any one suppose that he could, by virtue of his certificate of purchase, have sued the defendant in execution for removing them, and appropriating them to his own use? The defendant in execution is entitled to the possession of the land thus sold until the purchaser is at least entitled to a deed. Nor does the failure of the debtor to redeem confer any title or greater legal or equitable rights upon the purchaser. The debtor has lost a right, but it is only cut off, but not transferred to any one. In contemplation of law, he is still the owner of the title, but it is but a naked title, without power to sell it, so as to cut off or in any wise prevent the purchaser from obtaining the title through the conveyance from the sheriff if his purchase should not be destroyed by sale under a prior incumbrance, or by a redemption by a judgment creditor.

Had the fifteen months expired, and appellee had obtained a deed from the sheriff conveying Solt's equity of redemption to him, then there would have been no doubt of his right to the surplus; but his rights had not advanced to that point, as it lacked about one month of the expiration of the fifteen months. And the question then occurs, whether he, intermediate the expiration of twelve and fifteen months, may claim, by virtue of his purchase, all or any portion of this surplus. All the rights he acquires are statutory. He could only sell the equity of redemption, or even the land itself, by virtue of the statute. He only acquired, therefore, legal rights governed entirely by the statute. Then does any provision of the statute confer upon him this right, either in terms or by fair and reasonable intendment? We have been referred to none; nor are we aware that any such exists. The statute confers a contingent right, that may or may not become a vested right to the title to the land sold. But it is a mere contingency. It is not such a right as may be subjected to execution or sale, even by a court of chancery. It may by the force of the statute be assigned; but until the expiration of fifteen months from the sale, without redemption, or being otherwise defeated, it is but in the nature of a bid for the land. The sheriff's certificate shows that he has bid the amount, and that his bid will be approved and adopted by the law, if no one else shall bid more, before the expiration of the time limited by the statute. The only right he acquires is this, until he shall be entitled to a deed. Hence, he acquired no right to the surplus, after satisfying the trust debt. He could not, unless he had acquired the equity of redemption; and this he never had.

But if it could be said, that equity would intervene, still it could only be on the grounds that there was a fund growing out of the sale of trust property, which had belonged to the judgment debtor. If that view could be taken of the case, then equity would say, that all debts he owed were equally just and meritorious, and shall be paid from the fund if sufficient for the purpose, but if not, then pro rata. Having acquired no advantage by his sale, not having the remaining interest or title of Solt, by his judgment, or the sale under it, the law will give him no advantage over others, whether contract or judgment creditors. The mere fact that he had reduced his claim, being reduced to a judgment, does not render it more just or more equitable, than any other honest debt owing by the judgment debtor. The judgment, by becoming a lien, is, of course, preferred to debts not being a lien. His judgment was more a lien on the surplus money in the hands of the trustee than was an account or a note owing by the judgment debtor. The statute has not made it so, nor has natural equity or the principles of justice. If it be said that his judgment was a lien on the land sold, which was carried one step farther, by sale and purchase, the obvious answer is, that the lien was subject to the trust previously imposed upon it, and which overrode, and wiped out and extinguished it, before he had a right to the land or the surplus.

Suppose another judgment creditor had, after the trustee's sale, redeemed from appellee's sale, would he, in that case, have obtained the entire surplus? Obviously not: even on appellee's theory of his rights or on any other. If it were conceded that appellee held a lien of any kind, he, in the case supposed, could only have received his purchase money, with interest at the rate of ten per cent. And if this is true, and we think it must be conceded, then by what process did the lien expand, when the land was gone, his lien cut off and extinguished, so as to embrace the entire surplus? He could only obtain a vested right to the equity of redemption, by the land remaining unsold by the trustee, and unredeemed from his sale, and not having acquired the equity of redemption, he did not acquire the right to the surplus. If he acquired by his purchase no right to the rents, issues and profits before the expiration of the fifteen months, although matured after the time allowed for the judgment debtor to redeem, on what principle did he acquire the right to the surplus? Not because the debtor's right to redeem had been cut off and extinguished. If that could be held to transfer all of the debtor's rights to him, then when his rights were cut off and extinguished by the trustee's sale, by the same process all of his rights were transferred to the purchaser at the trustee's sale.

A careful consideration of all the questions involved, satisfies us that appellee failed to make a case which entitles him to recover. But even if the theory upon which appellant has proceeded could be conceded to be correct, the decree was manifestly erroneous in not decreeing that Solt, who received the surplus, or its benefit, should at least be jointly liable to pay the money. But we have seen the trustee was not liable, whether Solt is or not, of which we express no opinion. The decree of the court below must be reversed and the cause remanded.

Decree reversed.

SHELDON, CRAIG and DICKEY, JJ. dissent, except so far as the opinion holds the decree should have been joint against Solt and the trustee.

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

ABSTRACTS OF OPINIONS FILED AT OTTAWA IN 1876.

415.—Elisha Buck v. The People.—Appeal from County Court of Kankakee.—Opinion by WALKER, J.

TECHNICAL OBJECTIONS AGAINST TAXES—DESCRIPTION OF LANDS—OBJECTIONS AVAILABLE—MUST BE SIGNED—LEGAL PRESUMPTIONS.

STATEMENT.—Appeal from judgment for current and past taxes. The objections were: (1) The notice and application, as published, failed to confer jurisdiction on the court, either of the subject matter or of the persons against whose lands the taxes were assessed. (2) The various local taxes were not legally assessed. (3) Insufficient description of the lands. (4) The equalization, by the board of supervisors, raised the aggregate valuation of the property in the county. (5) The county taxes were in excess of the per cent. allowed by law. (6). The local taxes were not levied within the time prescribed by the statute.

Held, 1. That all these are technical objections merely, and so devoid of merit. For it is not claimed that the property was not liable to taxation, nor that it was unfairly or unjustly assessed, nor that a greater rate was imposed than on other citizens, nor that the sum levied was not indispensable to the operations of the county and township governments. Citizens who enjoy the benefits of government and improvements, must expect to share the corresponding burdens, and cannot readily be heard on mere technical objections. Yet all persons have a right to a fair and strict application of the law to tax assessments.

2. In describing lands, common abbreviations may properly be used. And even misdescriptions do not vitiate unless they render it impossible to locate the lands.

3. One person can not use an objection to taxes which applies only to assessments against his neighbor's property, and not to those against his own. Each citizen must leave others to pay, or resist, at their option.

4. Where objections to tax assessments are filed, those objections must be signed by parties or attorneys, on the rule of practice requiring all pleadings, or matters in the nature of pleadings, to be so signed. And, on technical objections, especially technical rules of practice must be enforced.

[The statute as to the substantial justice of the matter is cited here, as in the Chiniquy case, supra.]

5. The statute allows a necessary increase of valuation by the board of equalization.

6. The legal presumption is, that taxes are properly assessed, and are legally and justly due, and the return of the collector of taxes as delinquent rebuts the presumption that they have been paid. So with a treasurer's return to the court.

7. And on these, judgment may properly be entered unless the tax-payer can interpose a legal defense.

CONSTRUCTION OF LIQUOR LAW, R. S. 1874, P. 438.

STATEMENT.—Prosecution under R. S. 1874, p. 438, the defendant being a wholesale brewer. Held,

1. That this being a highly penal statute, must be strictly construed with regard to the intent of the law-making power.

2 It must be therefore construed to apply only to "dram-shops," and not to breweries, and the like, where liquors are not sold under license by small quantities.

430.—Benjamin F. Pixley et al v. Charles L. Boynton et al.—Appeal from Superior Court of Cook.—Opinion by SCOTT, J.

REMITTITUR IN THE SUPREME COURT—LEGITIMATE TRANSACTIONS ON EXCHANGE AND GAMBLING CONTRACTS DEFINED.

1. Held, That the statute now allows a remittitur to be entered in the Supreme Court; but in such case the costs will be taxed to the appellee.

2. The terms used on the Board of Trade "seller, July," and the like, are to be considered, in the custom of exchange as time contracts only, leaving the seller no option but the time at which delivery shall be made. But "puts," and "calls," on the contrary, are held gambling contracts, because they leave the buyer or seller, as the case may be, the option of delivering or not, or calling for delivery or not, and are void on grounds of public policy.

EXTRA-JUDICIAL OATHS NO GROUND FOR INDICTMENT FOR PERJURY.

STATEMENT.—Indictment for perjury in making an affidavit before a tax assessor. It did not appear whether the oath was administered in the township wherein the assessor was elected. Held,

That an oath administered outside the township of the assessor would be extra-judicial, as the statute gives him no official power outside of his territorial limits; and, however false such oath might be, it would not support a charge of perjury. The place of administering the oath must be shown to be within the territorial limits of the official authority of the officer.

[But the court held it doubtful on the evidence whether the oath was actually false.]

John L. McCormick v. William L. Huse.—Appeal from County Court of La Salle.—Opinion by BREESE, J.

CONSTRUCTION OF GOVERNMENT PATENT.

STATEMENT.—Conflict of title in ejectment suit. The opinion largely turns on the state of the evidence. Held,

That in construing a patent from the United States, which describes the land granted by the numbers of the township, section, and range, the court will look to the plat and field notes of the government survey returned to the surveyor-general, in order to locate the land. And although quantity is the least reliable, and the last to be resorted to, as to a grant, in determining boundaries, yet it may sometimes be considered as corroborative evidence.

354.—Harriet Steele v. Susannah Thatcher.—Appeal from Superior Court of Cook.—Opinion by SCOTT, J.

PLEADING—ISSUES WHERE ADMINISTRATOR IS PARTY—DESTRUCTION OF LETTERS, ETC., PENDING SUIT—MOTION TO VACATE THEREON.

Held, That where there is no plea putting in issue the right of a plaintiff to sue as administrator, and, pending the suit, the records of the probate court are destroyed by fire, and a motion is made to vacate all orders made since the destruction by fire, on the ground that the plaintiff had not restored the files, bond, and letters of administration, the motion is properly overruled.

382.—Oliver W. McKenzie v. Joseph M. Remington.—Appeal from Bureau.—Opinion by SHELDON, J.

MARKING OF INSTRUCTIONS.

Held, That a judgment will not be reversed by the Supreme Court, merely because instructions were not marked "given" by the court below, if the record shows what was done with them.

414.—Charles Chiniquy, et al., v. The People.—Appeal from Kankakee.—Opinion by WALKER, J.

TAX NOTICE AND CERTIFICATE—COURT TERM—TECHNICAL OBJECTIONS AND THE STATUTE—COLLECTOR'S AUTHORITY—CLERK'S DUTY—R. R. BONDS—OBJECTIONS NOT RAISED BELOW.

STATEMENT.—This was a tax case; and the court remark that "this record presents several questions which were not discussed in the case of Buck v. The People, of the present term." (See infra.)

Held, 1. That where a delinquent list is headed thus: "The prefix of the letter a, italic, indicates a back tax for the year ——," and the letter a, accordingly, is prefixed to some of the taxes assessed; this is a sufficient notice of back taxes for the year specified.

2. A certificate filed during a term, will be held to have been filed "on the first day of the term," as required by the statute, on the familiar principle that, for most purposes, a term of court is considered as but one day.

3. The statute (R. S. 1874, § 191,) provides that no error or informality in proceedings of any officers connected with the assessment, levying or collecting of the taxes not affecting the substantial justice of the tax itself, shall vitiate, or in any manner affect the tax or the assessment thereof, and any omission can, by leave of court, be supplied during the term.

4. A collector needs only produce his warrant as a complete justification of his acts. The burden of proof is on the owner to show the injustice, if any, of the tax. Nor does the fact that the collector has been compelled to return his warrant unsatisfied, in any wise affect the presumption of correctness in the proceedings.

5. Nor need the people produce the proceedings of the county board showing the levy, since the burden of proof is on the person resisting the judgment against the land.

6. It is the duty of the clerk to extend taxes under the statute without a mandate from the county board.

7. In taxes to pay the interest on railroad bonds, it is not needful that the bonds were actually issued, but a vote before the Constitution of 1870, authorizing the issue, so that a mandamus would lie to compel the executing of the bonds, may establish the debt as binding on the county.

8. And if bonds are actually issued, it must clearly be shown to have been without authority, before a tax levied to pay the interest can be defeated; even if that defense could be interposed against a judgment for delinquent taxes.

9. Objections not raised in the court below will not be considered in an appelate court.

Eli Tuttle et al. v. Wm. Robinson.—Appeal from Peoria.—Opinion by CRAIG, J.

REPLEVIN—DEMAND—WHEN NECESSARY—FRAUDULENT SALE—TRANSFER OF POSSESSION—SUBSEQUENT CREDITORS.

STATEMENT.—Suit in replevin for the recovery of property, levied on by a writ of attachment against one Ames; which property, at the time of the levy, was in the care of Heraldson, one of the appellants, who occupied, as tenant, a farm belonging to appellee. After the levy, the officer left the property with Heraldson for safe keeping.

Previously, the property had been turned over to appellee by Ames, to secure a debt; Ames at that time occupying the farm, which formerly belonged to him, but had been sold to appellee, and, on the transfer, appellee left the property in the hands of Ames, but exercised acts of ownership over it, paying the taxes, selling portions of it, etc. Ames absconding, the farm and the property came into the possession of Heraldson, as tenant. Held,

1. That where property is taken unlawfully, no demand needs be made before bringing a suit in replevin.

2. A tenant having charge of property levied on, which property, after levy, is left with him for safe keeping, becomes thus the agent of the officer, and if the levy is unlawful, he may be joined with the officer in a replevin suit.

3. Even if a sale of personal property, without delivery, actually made, might be impeachable by creditors, yet, where there are no such creditors to impeach it, the transaction is good and binding as between the parties; and subsequent creditors have no right to impeach it.

4. Whether there has been a sufficient transfer of possession where property is sold, is a question for the jury.

5. A purchaser is not necessarily bound, in order to hold property, to take the actual possession himself; but he may properly leave it on land he owns, and employ others to care for it in his behalf.

P. P. & J. R. R. Co. v. Wm. C. H. Barton.—Appeal from Peoria.—Opinion by SCOTT, J.

LIABILITY OF R. R. FOR STOCK KILLED.

Held, That, under the statute, a railroad company is under obligation, where the track runs through a "common field," to place cattle-guards at a public road crossing through the field, and gates or bars across a private-road crossing—failing in which, it is liable for stock killed in consequence of such neglect.

We call attention to the following opinions, reported at length in this issue:

Bankrupt Law—Assignment for Benefit of Creditors.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States, by Field, J., holding that an assignment of an insolvent debtor of his property to trustees for the equal and common benefit of all his creditors, is not fraudulent; and when executed six months before proceedings in bankruptcy are taken against the debtor, is not assailable by the assignee in baukruptcy, subsequently appointed; and the assignee is not entitled to the possession of the property from the trustees.

Bankruptcy — Jurisdiction of State and Federal Courts.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States, by Miller, J., holding that the proceedings in a foreclosure suit, after the appointment of an assignee in bankruptcy for the mortgagor, are not void, and censuring the prevalent practice of bringing any person who contested with the assignee any matter growing out of disputed rights of property into the bankrupt court, by the service of a rule to show cause, and to dispose of their rights in a summary way.

Promissory Note—Liability of Assignor.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States, by Davis, J., deciding several interesting questions relating to the liability of the assignor of a promissory note.

Insurance — Fallen Building. — The opinion of the Supreme Court of this State, by Scott, C. J., stating when a building will be considered as fallen, within the meaning of a clause in a policy providing that if it shall fall, except as the result of fire, all insurance by the company should immediately cease and determine.

Trust—Execution of—When Legal Title Reverts to Grantor.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of Illinois, by Scholfield, J., holding where an original active trust becomes nominal by the full execution, or expiration, of all its functions, the legal title conveyed to the trustee for the purposes of the trust, reverts to the grantor, without the necessity of a formal re-conveyance or judicial decree. We regard this as an important opinion, and one that will well repay a careful reading.

Sale under Trust Deed—Rights of Purchaser at Sheriff's Sale in the Surplus.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of this State, by Walker, J., holding, where a judgment was obtained against the grantor in a trust deed after the trust deed was recorded, that the holder of a certificate of purchase at the sheriff's sale, which had run fourteen months, was not entitled to the surplus money made upon a sale under the trust deed; that had the fifteen months expired and the purchaser had received a deed from the sheriff, he would have been entitled to the surplus money obtained under the trust deed sale. Judge Walker says, the point settled in the opinion is a novel one. Three of the judges dissent from the opinion of the court.

Pleading and Evidence—Action for Causing Death.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of this State, by McAllister, J., deciding several interesting questions of pleading in a suit brought under the statute giving an action for wrongfully causing the death of a human being.

WILL—MARRIAGE, RESTRAINT UPON.

The English Court of Appeals, in Allen v Jackson, 33 Law Times Rep., N. S. 713, held, reversing the decision of Hall, V. C., where there was a bequest to husband and wife for their lives and the life of the survivor, with a gift over in the event of the husband surviving and marrying again, that the gift over took effect on the second marriage of the husband, as it would have done if the limitation in the will had applied to the second marriage of a woman.

PROMISSORY NOTE—FRAUDULENT ALTERATION.

We have received the head-note to the case of Gerrish v. Glines, from the reporter, John M. Shirley. The case will appear in the LVI. New Hampshire. The court held, where a negotiable promissory note was made payable upon a condition, and the condition was written below the note on the same piece of paper, that the note and condition were parts of a single entire contract, and that the fraudulent removal of the condition, by tearing the paper, was such a material alteration as rendered the note void in the hands of a bona fide holder.

FRAUDULENT PREFERENCE.

The United States District Court of Maine, by Fox, J., in Buckman, assignee, v. Goss, 13 N. B. Reg., 337, held that if a mortgage is made in part to prefer the mortgagee as to his claim, and in part to secure a present loan made for the purpose of enabling the debtor to prefer another creditor, it is entirely void.

BANKRUPTCY—PLEA IN BAR.

The Supreme Court of Vermont, in The B. M. Co. v. Frazer et al., 13 N. B. Reg., 363, held that a plea in bar since the commencement of the suit, that the defendant has been adjudged a bankrupt, and the plaintiff has proved his debt in bankruptcy, and that the bankruptcy proceedings are still pending, is insufficient.

REVERDY JOHNSON.

Reverdy Johnson was one of the most eminent of the members of the American bar. The announcement of his death has been received with the deepest sorrow by the bar everywhere, but nowhere with more deep regret than at the capital of the nation, which was the place where his greatest triumphs were achieved.

The members of the United States bar assembled in the court room in the capitol building at Washington, to pay respect to his memory.

Mr. P. Phillips called the meeting to order and nominated Hon. Matt. H. Carpenter as chairman, and Mr. D. W. Middleton as secretary. Mr. Carpenter, on taking the chair, made the following eloquent remarks:

Gentlemen: We have met to express our deep sorrow at the death of Reverdy Johnson, who, long ago, was Attorney General of the United States, and who, amid the cares and responsibilities of many high political stations, at home and abroad, never abandoned the practice of his profession; and for more than fifty years he has been rising higher and higher, and came at length to be regarded by all as one of the leaders and chiefs of this bar.

Beginning his practice here in early life, he became the worthy successor of Harper, Martin, Pinckney and Wirt, men who shed such resplendent lustre upon the old Maryland, and considering the extent and variety of his practice, his natural resources and professional attainments, his thorough self-possession and steadiness of nerve when the skill of an opponent unexpectedly brought on the crisis of a great trial, when feeble men lose first themselves and then their cause; the fidelity he always manifested to the oath which was anciently administered to all the lawyers of England, to present nothing false, but to make war for their clients; the audacity of his valor when the fate of his client was trembling in the balance; when he believed his client was right and everybody else believed he was wrong. Remembering all these traits, we must rank him with the greatest lawyers and advocates this or any other country has ever produced.

He retained full possession of his faculties to the moment of his death, and, not long since, appeared to argue some important causes at this bar, and, although his eye was dimmed, all who heard him felt that his natural force was not abated. As with Milton, from his natural eye the beauties of the earth and the heavens were excluded; to him, as to Milton, there returned not

> "Day, or the sweet approach of ev'n or morn,
> Or sight of vernal bloom, or summer's rose,
> Or flocks, or herds, or human face divine;"

but upon his intellectual comprehension, upon his mind and heart, the light of heaven never ceased to shine.

Nature sets indelible marks upon the products of which she is most proud. His outward form proclaimed the man he was. His compact, firm-knit frame, his heavy shoulders, his bullet head, his striking face, not remarkable for beauty, but bearing the traces of many sharp professional and political conflicts, and lighted up by the intelligence, charity and love that shone through his rugged features, all indicated a man genial in nature, but resolute of purpose; a man easy to court, but dangerous to oppose. We are taught to pray for deliverance from "sudden death."

But the life of our distinguished brother had been long extended, even to nine years beyond "three score and ten," and without pain, without parting from those he loved (more cruel than death itself), possessing all his faculties in full vigor, rich in honors and glorious with praise, he passed in an instant from the known to the unknown, from earth to the hereafter of hope and faith. And if it was ordered that the scene of his mortal life must end that moment, who can say that the manner of its close was not also ordered, in mercy, by that God who doeth all things well. I should do violence to the impulses of my heart if I did not say one thing more—I loved that old man.

When I came first here with trembling and fear, inspired by the glorious memories of this court, over which John Marshall once presided, Mr. Johnson took me by the hand, extended to me a fatherly recognition, became my adviser and ever after remained my friend. For all his kindness, professionally and socially, I would be less than a man did I not cherish the profoundest gratitude.

COMMITTEE ON RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. John F. Edmunds, Chairman; Phillip Phillips, R. T. Merrick, A. G. Thurman, W. D. Davidge, William Pinkney Whyte, George Ticknor Curtis, J. H. B. Latrobe, S. Leackle Wallis, William Pitt Lynde, J. Randolph Tucker, T. O. Howe, John T. Morgan, J. A. Garfield, T. J. Durant, Montgomery Blair.

THE RESOLUTIONS.

Resolved, That the Bar of the Supreme Court of the United States has received with deep sorrow the intelligence of the death of Reverdy Johnson, for more than half a century an eminent and honored practitioner in this Court.

Resolved That the memory of Mr. Johnson deserves to be cherished by the Bar, as most honorable to the profession of which he was a distinguished member, as dear to the Court that has benefited by his great contributions to the science of jurisprudence, and as valuable to the Republic, in whose service, as citizen, Attorney General, Senator and Diplomatist, he was wise and faithful.

Resolved, That the Attorney-General be requested to communicate these resolutions to the Court, and to move that they be entered on record; and,

Resolved, That they be communicated to the family of Mr. Johnson, with the expression of the earnest condolence of the Bar.

After appropriate remarks by Messrs. Edmunds, Phillips, Frelinghuysen, Curtis, Dickerson, Garfield, Tucker and Foote, the meeting adjourned.

Wednesday, February 23.

In presenting the proceedings of the bar in relation to the death of the late Reverdy Johnson, Mr. Attorney-General Pierrepont addressed the Court as follows:

May it please Your Honors:

When an eminent citizen of the Republic, whose eminence has been achieved by an honorable career in the public service, in professional life, or in the less conspicuous but not less useful walks of private benevolence, dies, it is fit that some public notice be taken of the event, and that some permanent record be made to encourage and inspire those who are to come after us.

Reverdy Johnson, who recently departed, full of years and of honors, was, during a long period, one of the most eminent lawyers of this country, and one of the very foremost counsellors of this High Court. He held, with distinguished honor and ability, respectively, the great offices of Minister to England, Senator, and Attorney General of the United States. He has left a fame and an honored memory of which his descendants and his country may be justly proud.

The Bar of the Supreme Court met to do honor to his name, and passed the resolutions of which I now have the honor to read:

[The resolutions appear above.]

I ask your honors to receive this tribute to the memory of a great lawyer and an eminent public man, and to order these resolutions to be entered in the permanent records of this court.

Mr. Chief Justice Waite then replied as follows:

The court gives its ready assent to the sentiments so well expressed in the resolutions of the bar. Mr. Johnson was admitted to practice here on the first day of March, 1824. The first case in which he appeared in counsel was that of Brown v. the State of Maryland, argued and decided at the January term of 1827. Associated with him was the late Chief Justice Taney, and opposed were the then Attorney-Generals, Mr. Wirt and Mr. Meredith, all names familiar in history. The opinion was delivered by Chef Justice Marshall, and it stands to-day as a monument marking the boundary line between the powers of the United States under the Constitution on the one hand, and those of the States on the other. From the commencement of his practice here until his death, Mr. Johnson was extensively employed, with scarcely an interruption, in the most important causes. He was always welcome as an advocate, for he was always instructive. His friendship for the court was open, cordial, and sincere. We mourn his loss both as counselor and friend. The request of the bar is cheerfully acceded to. The resolutions are received in the same spirit they have been presented, and the clerk will cause them to be entered upon the records of the court.

A Curious Bankrupt Case—A Bankrupt's Discharge — A Nice Point. — A curious point under the English bankrupt law, was decided by Vice Chancellor Bacon last month. A man by the name of Pettit was a bankrupt; his bankruptcy was closed three hours before the death of his father, who left him a fortune. The bankrupt had not obtained his order of discharge. The Vice Chancellor held that the bankrupt was entitled to the amount of the legacy. If the father had died three hours before, the legacy would have gone to the creditors. In this case, as in many others, time was money.

RE-ORGANIZATION OF THE JUDICIARY OF THE UNITED STATES.

The following is the substitute reported back by Mr. McCRARY, of the Judiciary Committee, for House-bill 598:

A BILL to re-organize the Judiciary of the United States.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That a circuit court shall be held in every judicial district of the United States at the same time and place at which a district court shall or may be held; and such circuit court is hereby created and established in every district where no such court now exists, and shall belong to the circuit in whose territorial limits it is embraced; and when more than one judge competent to hold such circuit court is present, each judge may hold a separate session thereof, in which case the presiding justice or judge shall, from time to time, designate the causes to be tried or heard before the other judge or judges. And when no separate terms or sessions are prescribed by law for the circuit and district courts of the same district, the panel of jurors selected and summoned for the district court shall also be the panel of the circuit court, unless a special order to the contrary be made by one of the judges of said circuit court at least thirty days before the term.

SEC. 2 That the several circuit courts of the United States shall have and exercise no jurisdiction in cases of appeals or writs of error allowed, taken, or sued out after the first day of September, eighteen hundred and seventy-six, except that writs of error, appeals, and reviews in bankruptcy cases may be had as heretofore provided.

SEC. 3. That there shall be established in each of the circuits of the United States, a court and be called the court of appeals, which shall have appellate jurisdiction, subject to the provisions of this act of all cases arising in the several circuit and district courts within said circuits respectively. The justice of the Supreme Court assigned to the circuit, the circuit judge thereof, and the several district judges of the districts composing the circuits shall be judges of said court of appeals, any three of whom shall be a quorum: Provided, however, That no judge who has heard a cause in the court below shall sit in the court of appeals upon the hearing of the same cause, or be consulted, or give any opinion to the other judges in relation thereto. The justice of the Supreme Court, or, in his absence, the circuit judge, if present, shall preside; if both be absent, the district judge senior in office present shall preside. In the absence of a quorum, any judge may adjourn the court from day to day.

SEC. 4. That such court of appeals shall be a court of record, and shall have a seal, the form and device of which it shall devise. It shall also have a clerk, to be appointed by, and removable at the pleasure of, the presiding justice. Such clerk may, with the approval of the court, to be entered of record, appoint a deputy, who, in case of the death or resignation of the clerk, shall be the clerk until another shall be appointed. Every such clerk shall take the oath and give the bond, with sureties, prescribed by law for clerks of district courts. Process shall run in the name of the United States, and be tested in the name of the Chief Justice of the United States, and shall be under the seal of the court, and signed by the clerk.

SEC. 5. That it shall be the duty of the marshal of the district in which said court of appeals shall be held to attend the sittings of said court, and, under the direction of the Attorney General of the United States, and with his approval, to provide such rooms as may be necessary, and for all incidental expenses of the court, including crier, bailiff and messenger: Provided, That no building or rooms shall be rented or leased for the use of said court in any city where a building of the United States is situated, and which can be used for the purpose: And provided further, That no lease of any building or rooms for this purpose shall be valid until approved by the Attorney General; and any such lease shall be subject to be terminated at any time by the Attorney General or by Congress.

The crier, bailiff, and messenger shall receive the same compensation as is now given by law to such officers of the Supreme Court of the United States.

SEC. 6. That a writ of error in cases proper for such writ, and in all other cases an appeal may, except as herein otherwise provided, be taken to the court of appeals, from any final judgment or decree of any circuit or district court within the circuit, when the amount claimed or the value of the property in controversy exceeds five hundred dollars, and in other cases where an appeal or writ of error now lies from such judgment or decree, or where the circuit or district judge shall certify that the adjudication involves a question of general importance: Provided, That no appeal, writ of error, or review in any case of bankruptcy, shall be taken to the court of appeals, except from the final judgment or decree of a circuit court, when the amount in controversy shall exceed two thousand dollars. Such appeal shall be taken, or such writ of error sued out, within ninety days after the entry of the judgment or decree sought to be reversed. Upon such writ of error or appeal, the court shall review such judgment or decree, and may affirm, modify, or reverse the same, or may order a new trial or such other proceedings to be had in the proper court as shall be just. The judgment or decision of such court of appeals shall be remitted to the court appealed from, to be enforced according to law. The said courts shall have power to issue writs of error, mandamus, scire facias, habeas corpus, and all other writs which may be necessary or proper to the exercise of their jurisdiction, and agreeable to the principles and usages of law.

SEC. 7. That to render an appeal or writ of error under the provisions of the foregoing section effectual for any purpose, a bond shall be executed, on behalf of the appellant or plaintiff in error, by at least one sufficient surety, to the effect that the appellant or plaintiff in error will pay all costs which may be awarded against him on appeal. If the appeal or writ of error be from a judgment or decree directing the payment of money, it shall not stay the execution of the judgment or decree unless a bond, with surety as aforesaid, to be approved by the court or clerk, shall be executed, to the effect that if the judgment or decree appealed from, or any part thereof, be affirmed, or the appeal or writ of error be dismissed, the appellant or plaintiff in error will pay the amount directed to be paid by the judgment or decree, or the part thereof as to which the judgment or decree shall be affirmed. The bonds prescribed by this section may be in one instrument or several, at the option of the appellant or plaintiff in error. Such bonds shall be of no effect unless they shall be accompanied by the affidavit of the surety or sureties, showing that he or they are worth double the amount specified therein over and above all debts, liabilities, and exemptions, and until such bond and affidavits are filed with the clerk with whom the judgment or decree appealed from was entered. In other cases, a stay of execution or proceedings may be granted, upon such terms as any judge of the court may prescribe.

SEC. 8. That cases pending in any circuit court on the said first day of September upon appeal or writ of error shall be heard and determined by such circuit court in the same manner as if this act had not been passed.

SEC. 9. That the said courts of appeals shall, respectively, adopt such rules as they may deem proper to regulate the manner of taking such appeals and suing out such writs of error. They may also establish such other rules as they may deem necessary for the regulation of the practice of their respective courts, and not inconsistent with law, and may, from time to time, alter and revise the same.

SEC. 10. That a writ of error may be sued out from the final judgment of a circuit or district court in any criminal action to the proper court of appeals within ninety days after the entry of such judgment; but such writ of error shall not operate as a stay of proceedings, except in capital cases, unless it is so ordered by a judge of the court of appeals. The judgment or decision upon such writ of error shall be remitted to the circuit or district court appealed from, to be enforced according to law.

SEC. 11. That terms of the said courts of appeals shall be held in the several judicial circuits at the following places: In the first circuit, in the city of Boston; in the second circuit, in the city of Albany; in the third circuit, in the city of Philadelphia; in the fourth circuit, in the city of Richmond; in the fifth circuit, in the city of New Orleans; in the sixth circuit, in the city of Louisville; in the seventh circuit, in the city of Chicago; in the eighth circuit, in the city of Saint Louis; in the ninth circuit, in the city of San Francisco. The first term of said court of appeals shall be held at each of said places on the first Tuesday in November, eighteen hundred and seventy-six, at which time the several courts shall, by an order to be entered of record, fix the times at which said courts shall be thereafter held, which times may be from time to time changed by the court in the same manner. Adjourned terms may also be held from time to time, as, in the judgment of the court, the public interests shall require.

SEC. 12. That the decision of the court of appeals upon questions of fact shall in all cases, except as hereinafter provided, be final and conclusive; but a review upon the law may be had, upon writ of error or appeal, in the manner now provided by law, to the Supreme Court of the United States from every final judgment or decree rendered upon any decision of a court of appeals where the matter in controversy exceeds the sum or value of ten thousand dollars, or where the adjudication involves a question upon the construction of the Constitution of the United States, or any treaty or law of the United States, or where the court shall certify that the adjudication involves a legal question of sufficient importance to require that the final decision thereof should be made by the Supreme Court. Such writ of error or appeal shall be sued out or taken within one year after the entry of the judgment or decree sought to be reviewed: Provided, That if within the year after the entry of the judgment or decree sought to be reversed, any party shall die, the personal representative or heir, as the case may require, may sue out, or be made party to a writ of error without reviving the judgment or decree in the court in which the same was entered. The Supreme Court may affirm or modify or reverse the judgment or decree brought before it for review, or may direct judgment or decree to be rendered, or such further proceedings to be had as the justice of the case may require. The judgment or decision shall be remitted to the proper circuit or district court, to be enforced according to law. Appeals in chancery shall be allowed from the said court of appeals to the Supreme Court of the United States in cases where the matter in controversy exceeds the sum or value of ten thousand dollars, in the manner now provided by law for taking and hearing appeals in like cases from the circuit court.

SEC. 13. That any district judge who shall, in the pursuance of the provisions of this act, attend any court of appeals at any place other than his own residence, shall be allowed his reasonable expenses for travel and attendance, not to exceed ten dollars per day, to be certified by the clerk and paid by the marshal of the district in which such court shall be held, and allowed to him in his accounts with the United States.

SEC. 14. That the clerks of the said courts of appeals and the marshals attending the same, shall be allowed the same compensation for their services, respectively, as is now allowed by law to the clerk of the circuit courts of the United States and the marshal of the United States for similar services in the circuit courts, in the circuits in which said court of appeals shall be held, and shall have the like remedies for collecting the same.

SEC. 15. That section six hundred and ten of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and it is hereby, repealed, and the following is enacted in lieu thereof: "The Chief Justice and each justice of the Supreme Court may attend any term of the circuit or district court within his circuit, and when so attending shall sit in and preside over said court."

SEC. 16. After the said first day of September, all appeals and writs of error taken or sued out from the final judgment or decree of any court of the United States within a Territory, shall be taken as provided by this act, and shall lie to such court of appeals as may be designated by general order of the Supreme Court of the Territory.

If this bill becomes a law, we have no hesitation in saying that the litigation in the Federal courts will double in less than three years. That there should be some change in the organization of the federal judiciary is generally admitted, but we do not believe if this bill is passed without amendment, that it will be an improvement upon the present system. The judges of the supreme court are made also judges of the appellate court. In re-organizing the courts they should be relieved from all judicial labor except that of the supreme court. The time that the district and circuit judges will have to spend in the court of appeals will prevent them from properly attending to the circuit and district courts, and as a consequence, the business will accummulate. Take, for instance, this circuit, with Judges Davis, Drummond, Blodgett and Treat of this State, Hopkins and Dyer of Wisconsin, and Gresham of Indiana, constituted an appellate court, to meet at Chicago to try all the cases that are appealed under this act to such court from the great States of Illinois, Indiana and Wisconsin, and how much time will they have to attend to their home judicial duties after having properly performed their labors in the court of appeals. Under section 9 of the act, each court can establish such rules of practice as it may deem necessary. This would make as many different rules of practice as there are circuits in the United States, and would greatly increase the labor of the supreme court, as the cases that may be taken to that tribunal by appeal from such appellate courts are numerous. Under this act an appeal or writ of error may be taken from a decision of a court of appeals where the matter in controversy exceeds $10,000, or where the adjudication involves a question upon the construction of the Constitution of the United States, or any treaty or law of the United States, or where the court shall certify that the adjudication involves a legal question of sufficient importance to require that the final decision thereof should be made by the supreme court. With such a list of cases that may be taken by appeal from the appellate court to the supreme court, how much would the creation of such a court aid the supreme court in clearing its docket and dispatching its business. If appellate courts are to be created, their rules and practice should be uniform throughout the United States, or else made to conform to the rules and practice of the courts of the States where they are located.

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

[To appear in 71 Illinois Reports.]

THE QUINCY COAL COMPANY v. JAMES HOOD, Admr.

Appeal from the Circuit Court of McDonough county.—The Hon. CHAUNCEY L. HIGBEE, judge, presiding.

1. ARREST OF JUDGMENT—WAIVER OF RIGHT TO.—Where a defendant demurs to a declaration, and, after his demurrer is overruled, pleads over, he will be precluded from insisting upon a motion in arrest of judgment for insufficieney of the declaration.

2. PLEADING AND EVIDENCE—PLAINTIFF LIMITED BY HIS DECLARATION AS TO ELEMENTS OF DAMAGES.—In an action to recover damages for the death of a party, occasioned by negligence, the declaration limited the next of kin of the deceased to his father, and, on the trial, the court admitted proof that the deceased left a father, mother and five brothers and sisters, against the objection of the defendant: Held, that the court erred in allowing the evidence, as it was variant from the declaration.

3. DEATH—NECESSARY INGREDIENTS TO CAUSE OF ACTION FOR WRONGFULLY CAUSING THE DEATH OF A PERSON.—Under the statute giving an action for wrongfully causing the death of a human being, the following ingredients must concur: a wrongful act, neglect, or default of the defendant, causing the death of the intestate under such circumstances as would entitle him to maintain an action if death had not ensued, and he must have left a widow or next of kin. These are indispensible prerequisites to a cause of action, and being shown, they entitle the plaintiff bringing the action as required, to nominal damages at least.

4. FACT OF NEXT OF KIN MUST BE ALLEGED IN THE DECLARATION.—The fact of the survivorship of a widow or next of kin being an essential element in the cause of action, renders it indispensable that it should be alleged in the plaintiff's declaration, and, under the general issue, he is bound to prove it.

5. DAMAGES DEFENDANT UPON, PECUNIARY INJURY.—If the next of kin are collateral kindred of the deceased, and have not been receiving from him pecuniary assistance, and are not in a situation to require it, it is immaterial how near the relationship may be, only nominal damages can be given, because there will be no pecuniary injury; but if they were, dependent upon the deceased for support, in whole or in part, it is immaterial how remote the relationship may be, there will be pecuniary loss, for which compensation, under the statute, must be given.

6. PROOF ADMISSIBLE IN REDUCTION OF DAMAGES.—In the case of collateral kindred, it will be admissible for the defendant to controvert the fact of dependency upon the deceased for support: and in the case of a father, as the next of kin, to show that he was not entitled to the services of his minor child, in reduction of the damages.

7. NEGLIGENCE—NOTICE TO AGENT OF UNSAFE CONDITION OF MINE IS NOTICE TO PRINCIPAL.—Where a servant of a mining company was killed by the falling of a rock from the roof of a common gang way in a coal mine, and it was sought to charge the company with negligence in not keeping the roof in a safe condition, it was held, that notice to the superintendent of the dangerous situation of the roof, was notice to the company; and if this was long enough before the accident to have given time to repair, the same was sufficient to fix negligence upon the company.

8. PLEADING—OBJECT OF.—The primary object of pleading is, to apprise the opposite party of the nature of the plaintiff's claim or the defendant's defense, or, in other words, to apprise the opposite party of what he will be called upon to meet upon the trial.

9. PLEADING AND EVIDENCE.—It is an elementary rule of pleading, that every fact essential to a cause of action is issuable, and must be proved upon the trial, unless admitted by the defendant, substantially as alleged.

C. F. WHEAT and D. G. TUNNICLIFFE, for the appellant.

WM. H. NEECE, for the appellee.

MCALLISTER, J. delivered the opinion of the court.

John Allen Hood, being a minor, of the age of fourteen years, was killed by the falling of a rock from the roof of a common gang-way at the foot of the shaft of appellant's coal mine, and while in the employment of the latter in shoving cars in the mine. Appellee, his father, taking out letters of administration, brought this action under the act of 1853, to recover damages, upon the ground of negligence in the employer in not supplying a safe support for the roof of said gang-way.

The declaration contains two counts, in in each of which the age of deceased was stated, and the only allegation in respect to deceased leaving widow or next of kin, in either count, is, that he left plaintiff, his father, to whom the damages recovered can be distributed.

There was a demurrer to the declaration, which was overruled, and plea of not guilty filed.

On the trial, it appeared that deceased left a mother, as well as father, and five brothers and sisters, and, upon request of plaintiff's counsel, the court instructed the jury that, if they found defendant guilty, then they should assess the plaintiff's damages at the amount of the pecuniary loss sustained, if any, by the next of kin to deceased, "that is to say, his father, mother, and brothers and sisters."

The jury, finding the defendant guilty, assessed the damages at $1,142.

A motion for new trial and in arrest of judgment was made and overruled. Judgment passed upon the verdict, from which the defendant appealed, and numerous points are urged for reversal.

We do not understand appellant's counsel as insisting here that the motion in arrest of judgment should have been allowed for insufficiency of the declaration. They are precluded from assigning error for the denial of that motion, because they demurred to the declaration and pleaded over after decision overruling the demurrer. Am. Express Co. v. Pinckney, 29 Ill., 392. The question which they raise is not affected by the ruling in that case. It is, that the plaintiff, having specified himself in the declaration as the only next of kin left by deceased, and alleged that the latter was a minor, and he his father, it was incompetent, and calculated to take the defendant by surprise, to enlarge the scope of damages on the trial by proving, and the jury taking into consideration, other next of kin, whose right to damage must be based upon another and different ground from that of the father.

The declaration limited the next of kin to the father. The plaintiff introduced proof, against defendant's objections, of others, viz: a mother and five brothers and sisters.

The court expressly instructed the jury that, if they found defendant guilty, they should take into consideration, in assessing damages, the pecuniary loss of the mother, brothers and sisters.

The precise question is, whether, under the rules of pleading and evidence, it was competent, where the plaintiff had specified only one next of kin—the father—to prove that there were others, and superadd their pecuniary loss to that of the father.

The statute declares that the amount recovered shall be for the exclusive benefit of the widow and next of kin of the deceased. Whatever might have been the claims of natural justice, the common law recognizes no pecuniary interest in the life of any member of a family. But the theory of the statute is, that the widow, if there be one, and next of kin, or the latter only, if the deceased had no wife, have a pecuniary interest in the life of the person killed. The right is not extended to creditors, or anybody else not belonging to the class designated. If no one be left of such class, then there is no interest to be affected. The value of that interest is the amount which a jury may ascertain to be the damages sustained by some of that class in consequence of the destruction of that life in which they had such pecuniary interest, and the statute declares what shall be the measure of such damages, which is such sum as the jury shall deem a fair and just compensation with reference to the pecuniary injuries resulting from such death to the wife and next of kin of such deceased person, not exceeding $5 000.

When all the provisions of the act are regarded, it is apparent that, by its force alone, a legal pecuniary interest is created in favor of certain members of a family in the life of another upon whom the former may be dependent for support, or to whose services one of the former may be entitled; and that interest is invested with all the essential attributes of property, subject to the laws for the distribution of personal estate. In this last particular, alone, consists a similarity between this action and an ordinary action by an administrator. While the action itself is purely statutory, there is nothing in the act giving it which expressly or impliedly affects any of the established rules of pleading and evidence.

All of the ingredients which must necessarily concur to give a cause of action, are, wrongful act, neglect or default of the defendant, causing the death of the inte tate under such circumstances as would entitle him to maintain an action if death had not ensued, and he must have left a widow or next of kin. These are indispensable prerequisites to a cause of action, and being shown, they entitle the plaintiff bringing the action as required, to nominal damages, at least. But the fact of the survivorship of a widow or next of kin, being an essential element of the cause of action, renders it indispensable that it should be alleged in the declaration, and it was so decided in Chicago and Rock I. R. R. Co. v. Morris, 26 Ill., 400.

It is an elementary rule of pleading, that every fact essential to a cause of action is issuable. It is equally a fundamental rule of our system of practice, that whatever it is indispensable to allege in order to entitle a party to recover, must be proved upon the trial, unless admitted by the defendant, and it must be proved substantially as alleged.

It will not be denied that the primary object of pleading is, to apprise the opposite party of the nature of the plaintiff's claim, or the defendant's defense, or, in other words, to apprise the opposite party of what he will be called upon to meet upon the trial, and the policy of the general rules of pleading is the promotion of that object.

If the fact of a survivorship of a widow or next of kin be an essential element of the cause of action, necessary to be alleged and proved on the part of the plaintiff, it follows that the allegation and proofs of the plaintiff in this behalf may be controverted by the defendant. If so, why, under the rules of pleading, should not the names of those claiming to be invested with the pecuniary interest in the life of the person killed, by operation of the statute be stated? The suit is brought to recover for the destruction of a life in which they had such interest, and consequent deprivation of the benefits of that interest. The plaintiff is bound to allege there was some such person surviving, and, under the general issue, the burden is upon him of proving it. When he brings the action, therefore, he assumes to know there was some such person, and what hardship can there be in requiring him to state who it is?

There is no instance we can call to mind, where, in an action to recover damages for taking property, or for the deprivation of a legal right or interest, the person to whom such property belonged, or in whom such right or interest is vested, is not required to be named in the declaration; and where one is named, it is exclusive of others not mentioned.

The father being named in this case, the person killed being his son, and a minor, the prima facie damages to the father would be the loss of services to which he was entitled. But suppose the defendant came prepared to show that the father had legally emancipated the deceased, and thus divested himself of the right to his services, would it not be competent to give such matter in evidence, upon the question of damages? But even that might not disentitle the father from all damages beyond nominal, there being no widow or other next of kin, if he was nevertheless dependent upon deceased for support.

In Chicago and Alton R. R. Co. v. Shannon, 43 Ill., 346, this court said: "If, then, the next of kin are collateral kindred of the deceased, and have not been receiving from him pecuniary assistance, and are not in a situation to require it, it is immaterial how near the degree of relationship may be, only nominal damages can be given, because there has been no pecuniary injury. If, on the other hand, the next of kin have been dependent on the deceased for support, in whole or in part, it is immaterial how remote the relationship may be, there has been pecuniary loss, for which compensation, under the statute, must be given. So, also, if the deceased was a minor, and leaves a father entitled to his services."

In the case of collateral kindred here supposed, it would be admissible for defendant to controvert the fact of dependency upon deceased for support; and in the case of the father, to show he was not entitled to the services of his minor child during any of the time of his minority. This must be so, because the measure of damages is what the jury, under all the circumstances, ought to deem to be a fair and just compensation, with reference to the pecuniary injuries resulting from such death, to the wife and next of kin of such deceased person.

Hence it will be perceived, both the basis and amount of damages depend upon circumstances of relationship, dependency for support, which may be various in character and degree.

If there had been a general allegation that deceased left a widow, or that he left next of kin, without naming or specifying the person, or alleging any more specific relationship, the admissibility of evidence upon the trial would depend upon an entirely different principle. No question of either variance or surprise could be raised. But the pleader having named the father, and defined his relationship to the deceased, as showthe pecuniary interest in the deceased, which had been taken away, the defendant would be justified in supposing that to be the only interest affected, and come prepared to meet the case as made by the declaration.

The introduction, upon the trial, of the interests of other next of kin, under such a declaration, would have a clearer tendency to work surprise upon the defendant than the ordinary case of proving special damages without averring them, for in the latter case, the damages, whether general or special, must be the natural consequence of the act complained of. The general rule is that the plaintiff is entitled to recover, as a recompense for his injury, all the damages which are the natural and proximate consequence of the act complained of. Those which necessarily result from the injury are termed general damages, and may be shown under the general allegation at the end of the declaration. But such as are the natural, although not the necessary, result of the injury, are termed special damages, and must be stated in the declaration, to prevent surprise upon the defendant; and being so stated, may be recovered. Vanderslice v. Newton, 4 Comstock, 130.

Here, the distinction is only between consequences which are the necessary result of the act complained of, and those which are not.

In the case at bar, from the frame of the declaration, the defendant would be misled into the belief that the person specified was the only one upon whose interest in the life destroyed damages would be predicated.

The court are of opinion that this exception is well taken. The others, however, will be overruled. The declaration is to be taken as stating a cause of action, and, in respect to the negligence complained of, is broad enough to admit the evidence given.

The omission in plaintiff's instruction to submit the question to the jury, whether plaintiff was administrator, was immaterial. Letters in due form had been given in evidence. There was no ground upon which their validity could be assailed.

The defendant had a superintendent of the mines and work in charge. Evidence was given tending to show notice in him of the dangerous situation of the roof of the gang-way, at the bottom of the shaft. This was notice to the company, and it was long enough anterior to the accident to fix negligence upon the company.

Whether contributory negligence was imputable to deceased, a witness of the name of Slocum gave testimony tending to show the boy knew of the dangerous situation of the roof. We can not say but the jury were justifiable in disbelieving that witness upon the inherent improbabilities of his story, or from his manner of testifying. Besides, upon that question, there was evidence tending to show a promise by the superintendent to have the rock removed, thus taking the risk upon the master during the time following the notice and promise to repair. 2 Whart. on Neg., sec. 220.

The age, and the circumstance of the boy being under the control of his father, were also to be considered.

We express no opinion as to the damages being excessive, but, for the error pointed out, the judgment will be reversed, and the cause remanded, with leave to plaintiff to amend his declaration.

Judgment reversed.

KANSAS REPORTS.

[From W. C. WEBB, reporter, to appear in XV. Kansas Reports.]

Thomas Royal et al v. Annie L. Lindsay.

EXTENSION OF NOTE—CONSIDERATION—INTEREST.

1. When, after the maturing of a note running one year and bearing interest at the rate of twelve per cent. per annum until paid, the payee agrees to extend the note for another year upon the promise of the payor to pay interest at the rate of fifteen per cent. per annum, payable monthly; Held, That such promise was sufficient consideration to sustain the agreement.

2. A payment of a part of an amount due is not sufficient consideration to sustain an agreement to extend the time of payment of the residue.

KINGMAN, C. J., concurring.

BANKRUPTCY—CERTIFICATE OF DISCHARGE—PROPERTY EXEMPT.

1. While section 3 of chapter 12 of the General Statutes is general in its terms, and directs the court on production of a certificate of discharge in bankruptcy to enter a discharge upon the record of any judgment against such bankrupt, it can not and does not apply to any other judgments than such as are legally discharged by the proceedings in bankruptcy.

2. When premises which have been seized under a valid order of attachment become thereafter the homestead of the defendant in the attachment, the homestead right is subject and subordinate to the attachment lien. Bullene v. Hiatt, 12 Kan., 98.

3. Property exempt by the laws of the State from seizure on attachment or execution, does not pass by the assignment to the assignee in bankruptcy, but remain the absolute property of the bankrupt, unaffected by the bankrupt proceedings and subject to any specific liens created by the voluntary act of the bankrupt or through legal proceedings.

4. The State courts have jurisdiction to enforce any specific lien upon such exempt property.

5. The assignment in bankruptcy operates to dissolve only such attachments as were made within four months prior to the commencement of the bankruptcy proceedings, and only such as were levied upon property passing to the assignee, and does not dissolve attachments levied upon property remaining the bankrupts.

H. F. Wooley et al. v. P. Vanbolkenburg et. al.

PROTEST FEES.

1. Protest damages are recoverable in this State only when protest is legally necessary to fix the liability of some party to the note or bill.

2. Protest is not necessary in order to fix the liability of a guarantor; hence, in an action by the payee of a note against the maker and a guarantor, protest damages are not recoverable.

A. Ballenger v. Lizzie Lantier, administratrix of the estate of H. Lantier, deceased.

ATTACHMENT—NON-RESIDENCE.

1. In all cases where an order of attachment is issued, except where the defendant is a non-resident of the State or a foreign corporation, an attachment bond must be given by the plaintiff (Code, section 192, laws of 1870, page 172, section 5.) And where the defendant is not a non-resident of the State or a foreign corporation, and no such bond is given, the attachment should be dissolved on motion of the defendant.

2. A resident of the State of Kansas can become a non-resident, only by leaving the State with the intention of becoming a non-resident, hence, where a person leaves his former home in this State and starts for another State, with the intention of becoming a non resident of this State and a resident of said other State, he is still not a non-resident of this State until he gets out of the State.

3. Where a plaintiff sets forth in his petition a cause of action for goods sold and delivered, and does not mention that any promissory note or notes were given for the price of the goods, and the defendant afterwards sets forth in his answer that the goods were sold on credit, and that three promissory notes were given for the price thereof, and that neither of said notes is yet due; Held, That this answer of the defendant sets forth new matter constituting a defense to the plaintiff's action, and that it requires a reply from the plaintiff to put it in issue. TRUSTEE'S SALE.—WHEREAS, DWIGHT A. NORton, of the city of Chicago, in the county of Cook and State of Illinois, by his certain deed of trust, bearing date the twenty-second day of October, A. D. 1873, and filed of record in the recorder's office of said Cook county on the twenty-first day of November, A. D. 1873, and duly recorded in book 347 of records, at page 242, did convey unto the undersigned as trustee, all the following described premises situated in the town of Lake, county and State aforesaid, to wit:

Lot numbered five (5), in block four (4) of James Goo speeds' subdivision of part of the northwest quarter (¼) of the northeast quarter (¼) of section nine (9), township thirty-eight (38), north range fourteen (14), east of the third principal meridian, (for further description see above named book of records,) to secure the payment of his three promissory notes, executed by the said Norton, bearing even date therewith, payable to the order of Josiah Carpenter, for the sum of one hundred dollars ($100) each, all of which said notes are made payable at the First National Bank, Chicago, and each drawing interest at eight per cent. per annum payable annually, one of which said notes is made payable two years after the date thereof, another three years after the date thereof, and the third four years after the date thereof.

And whereas, it is provided in and by said trust deed that in case of default in the payment of the said promissory notes, either of them or any part thereof, according to the tenor and effect thereof, then, on the application of the legal holder of said notes, it should and might be lawful for the undersigned to sell and dispose of the said premises, and all the right, title, benefit and equity of redemption of said Dwight A. Norton, his heirs and assigns therein at public auction at either door of whatever building then used as court house in the city of Chicago, in the State of Illinois, or on said premises, or any part thereof, as may be specified in the notice of such sale, for the highest and best price the same will bring for cash, three weeks' notice having been previously given of the time and place of such sale by advertisement in the Chicago Legal News, or in any other newspaper at that time published in said city of Chicago, and to make, execute and deliver to the purchaser or purchasers at such sale, good and sufficient deed or deeds of conveyance for the premises sold, and out of the proceeds of such sale, after first paying all costs of advertising sale and conveyance, including the reasonable fees and commissions of said trustee, and other possible expenses therein named, then to pay the principal of said notes, whether due and payable by the terms of said trust deed or not, and interest on said notes up to the time of such sale.

And whereas, it is further provided in said trust deed that in case of default in any of said payments of principal or interest, according to the tenor and effect of said promissory notes, or either of them, or any part thereof, as aforesaid, then in that case the whole of said principal sum thereby secured and the interest thereon to the time of sale may at once, at the option of the legal holder thereof, become due and payable, and the said premises be sold in the manner and with the same effect as if the said indebtedness had fully matured.

And whereas, default has been made in the payment of the promissory note first above named, and the interest for two years on each of said three promissory notes, and the legal holder of said notes has made application to the undersigned and requested him as such trustee to sell and dispose of said premises under the power in said trust deed, and for the purposes therein stated.

Now, therefore, public notice is hereby given, that in pursuance of said trust deed, and by virtue of the power in me vested by the same, and for the uses and purposes therein expressed, I shall, on Monday the thirteenth (13th) day of March, A. D. 1876, at the hour of 10 o'clock A. M., at the west door of the two north doors of the building now used for a court house, in the city of Chicago and State of Illinois, being the building situate at the southeast corner of Adams and LaSalle streets, in said city, sell at public auction, to the highest bidder, for cash, pursuant to the terms of said deed of trust, and all the right, title, benefit and equity of redemption of the said Dwight A. Norton, his heirs or assigns therein.

Chicago, February 18, 1876.

LANDLORD'S SALE OF BUILDING.—WHEREAS, Pollock Barbour did, on the 20th day of July, A.D. 1874, enter into a certain written lease with one J. D. Jensen, in and by which said Barbour leased to the said Jensen lot No. 13 in block 136 in the school section addition to Chicago, for a term ending on the first day of September, A. D. 1879, at a rent of $3,750, payable in monthly installments of $62.50 on the first day of each month, commencing September 1st, 1874, which said rent, together with taxes and water rents, was to be paid by said Jensen.

And whereas, it was and is provided in and by said lease, that the rent therein reserved, and each installment thereof, should be a valid and first lien upon any buildings and improvements upon said premises, or that might at any time be erected, placed or put on said premises by said Jensen, and upon his interest in said lease, and that whenever any rent should become due and remain unpaid one day said Barbour, his agents, attorney or assigns might sell at public auction to the highest bidder for cash, after having first given ten days' notice of the time and place of such sale in some newspaper published in the city of Chicago, all the buildings and improvements on said premises, and all the right, title and interest acquired by said Jensen under said lease to the premises therein described, for the purpose of paying said rent so due, and the expenses of sale.

And whereas, the said Jensen has erected and put upon said lot a certain building and certain improvements, and whereas, one Cyrus H. Meacham and L. A. Brown & Co. claim some interest in said building by virtue of pretended chattel mortgages or otherwise.

And whereas, the sum of 455 dollars of the said rent became and was due on the first day of February, A. D. 1876, and still remains unpaid.

Now, therefore, public notice is hereby given that in pursuance of the power given in and by said lease, I, Lyne S. Davison, attorney in fact for said Pollock Barbour, will, on Tuesday the seventh (7th) day of March, A. D. 1876, at the hour of ten (10) o'clock in the forenoon of that day, on the sidewalk immediately in front of the building known as Number 384 South State street, Chicago, Illinois, sell to the highest bidder, for cash, at public auction, the building and all the improvements situated and being on said lot 13, in block 136, in the School Section addition to Chicago, and known as number 384 South State street, Chicago, and all the right, title and interest acquired by the said J. D. Jensen, under the said lease.

CHICAGO LEGAL NEWS

SATURDAY, MARCH 4, 1876.

The Courts.

Through the courtesy of CLARK W. UPTON, of the law firm of UPTON, BOUTELL & WATERMAN, of this city, we have received the following opinion:

UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT.

OCTOBER TERM, 1875.

DANIEL WEBSTER, plaintiff in error,
v.
CLARK W. UPTON, assignee in bankruptcy of the Great Western Insurance Company.

In error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Illinois.

BANKRUPT INSURANCE COMPANY—ASSESSMENT ON STOCK—LIABILITY OF TRANSFEREE TO PAY ASSESSMENT ON UNPAID STOCK.

Held, that the transferee of stock on the books of an insurance company, on which only twenty per cent. of its nominal value has been paid, is liable for calls for the unpaid portion made during his ownership, without proof of any express promise by him to pay such calls.

2. CAPITAL STOCK.—That the capital stock of an insurance company, like that of any other business, is a trust fund for the protection of its creditors, or those who deal with it. Neither the stockholders nor the directors can lawfully withhold any portion of the stock from the reach of those who have lawful claims against the company; that the stock held in trust is the whole stock, not merely that percentage of it which has been called in and paid.

3. In Upton, etc. v. Tribilcock, it was held that the original holders of the stock are liable for the unpaid balances at the suit of the assignee in bankruptcy, and that without any express promise.

4. LIABILITY OF THE TRANSFEREE OF STOCK.—That the transferee of stock in an incorporated company is liable for calls made after he has been accepted by the company as a stockholder and his name has been registered on the stock books as a corporate; and being thus liable there is an implied promise that he will pay calls made while he continues the owner.

5. RELEASING STOCK.—That the stock cannot be released: that is, that the liabilities of the stockholders cannot be discharged by the company, to the injury of creditors, without payment.

6. NON-ASSESSIBLE.—That the fact the certificate taken by the defendant was marked "non-assessable" is of no importance.

7. A court of equity will compel a transferee of stock to record the transcript, and to pay all calls after the transfer.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

Mr. Justice STRONG delivered the opinion of the court.

The Great Western Insurance Company, of which the plaintiff below is the assignee in bankruptcy, was incorporated under the laws of Illinois in 1857, with general power to insure all kinds of property against both fire and marine losses. Subsequently to its organization its capital was increased to more than one million of dollars, and it was authorized by law further to increase its capital to $5,000,000. It does not appear, however, from the record, that of the stock subscribed more than about $222 000 was ever paid in, a sum equal to nearly twenty per cent. of the par value, leaving over $965,000 of subscribed capital unpaid. In this condition the company went into bankruptcy in 1872, owing a very large sum, equal to, if not greater than its entire subscribed capital, and Clark W. Upton, the plaintiff, became the assignee. The district court then directed a call to be made for the eighty per cent. remaining unpaid of the capital stock. A call was accordingly made, and payments having been neglected, the assignee brought this suit against the defendant, averring that he was the holder of one hundred shares, of the par value of one hundred dollars each, and, as such, responsible for the eighty per cent. unpaid. On the trial, evidence was given tending to show that one —— Hale was the owner of a large amount of the stock of the company, for which he held the company's certificates, and that he had, through his brother, sold one hundred shares to the defendant, on which twenty per cent. had been paid. The books of the company had been destroyed in the great fire in Chicago in 1871, but there was evidence tending to show that the defendant's name was on the stock ledger, and that the defendant transferred, or caused the stock bought from Hale to be transferred to himself on the books of the company. The district judge submitted to the jury to find whether the defendant actually thus became a stockholder, recognized as such on the books of the company, instructing them that if he did he was liable for the eighty per cent. unpaid as if he had been an original subscriber. A verdict and judgment having been recovered by the plaintiff, the case was removed by writ of error to the circuit court, where the judgment was affirmed, and the judgment of affirmance we are now called upon to review.

The leading assignment of error here is that the court below erroneously ruled that an assignee of stock, or of a certificate of stock in an insurance company, is liable for future calls or assessments without an agreement or promise to pay. This, however, is not a fair statement of what the court did rule. The court instructed the jury, in effect, that the transferee of stock on the books of an insurance company, on which only twenty per cent. of its nominal value has been paid, is liable for calls for the unpaid portion made during his ownership, without proof of any express promise by him to pay such calls. This instruction, we think, was entirely correct. The capital stock of an insurance company, like that of any other business corporation, is a trust fund for the protection of its creditors or those who deal with it. Neither the stockholders nor their agents, the directors, can rightfully withhold any portion of the stock from the reach of those who have lawful claims against the company. And the stock thus held in trust is the whole stock, not merely that percentage of it which has been called in and paid. This has been decided so often that it has become a familiar doctrine. But what is it worth if there is no legal liability resting on the stockholders to pay the unpaid portion of their shares unless they have expressly promised to pay it? Stockholders become such in several ways; either by original subscription, or by assignment of prior holders, or by direct purchase from the company. An express promise is almost unknown, except in the case of an original subscription, and oftener than otherwise it is not made in that. The subscriber merely agrees to take stock. He does not expressly promise to pay for it. Practically, then, unless the ownership of such stock carries with it the legal duty of paying all legitimate calls made during the continuance of the ownership, the fund held in trust for creditors is only that portion of each share which was paid prior to the organization of the company, in many cases not more than five per cent.; in the present, only twenty. Then the company commences business and incurs obligations, representing all the while to those who deal with it that its capital is the amount of stock taken, when in truth the fund which is held in trust for creditors is only that part of the stock which has been actually paid in. This cannot be. If it is, very many corporations make fraudulent representations daily to those who give them credit.

The Great Western Insurance Company reported to the auditor of public accounts, as required by law, that the amount of its capital stock outstanding (par value of shares $100 each) was $1,188,000; that the amount of paid up capital stock was $222,831.42, and that the amount of subscribed capital for which the subscribers or holders were liable was $965,168 58. This report was made on the 10th of January, 1871. Thus, those who effected insurances with the company were assured that over one million of dollars were held as a trust fund to secure the company's payment of their policies. But if the subscribers and holders of the shares are not liable for the more than eighty per cent. unpaid, the representation was untrue. Persons assured have less than one-fifth the security that was promised them. This is not what the statutes authorizing the incorporation of the company contemplated. The stock was required to be not less than a given amount, though the company was authorized to commence business when five per cent. of that amount was paid in. Why fix a minimum amount of stock if all of it was not intended to be a security for those who obtained insurance? There is no conceivable reason for such a requirement, unless it be either to provide for the creditors a capital sufficient for their security, or to secure the stockholders themselves against the consequences of an inadequate capital. The plain object of the statute, therefore, would be defeated if there is no liability of the stockholder to pay the full prescribed amount of each share of his stock. With this plain object of the legislature in view it must be assumed, after the verdict of the jury, the defendant voluntarily became a stockholder. Either he must have designed to defeat the legislative intent, or he must have consented to carry it out. The former is not to be presumed. And if the latter was the fact, coming as he did into privity with the company, there is a necessary implication that he undertook to complete the payment of all that was unpaid of the shares he held whenever it should be demanded. To constitute a promise binding in law, no form of words is necessary. An implied promise is proved by circumstantial evidence—by proof of circumstances that show the party intended to assume an obligation. A party may assume an obligation by putting himself into a position which requires the performance of duties.

What we have said thus far is applicable to the case of an original subscriber to the stock, and equally to a transferee of the stock who has become such by transfer on the books of the company. There are, it is true, decisions of highly respectable courts to be found, in which it was held that even a subscriber to the capital stock of an incorporated company is not personally liable for calls, unless he has expressly promised to pay them, or unless the act of incorporation or some statue declares that he shall pay them. Such was the decision of a Supreme Court of New York, reported in 17th Barbour, page 567, the case of The Fort Edward and Fort Miller Plank Road Company v. Payne. A similar ruling was made in The Kennebec and Portland Railroad Company v. Kendall, 31 Maine, 470. A like ruling has also been made in Massachusetts. In most, if not all of these cases, it appeared that the law authorizing the incorporation of the companies had provided a remedy for non-payment of calls or assessments of the unpaid portions of the stock taken. The company was authorized to declare forfeited, or to sell the stock for default of the stockholder, and the law having given such a remedy, it was held to be exclusive of any other. Yet in them all it was conceded that if the statute had declared the calls or assessments should be paid, an action of assumpsit might be maintained against the original stockholder on a promise to pay, implied only from the legislative intent. Surely the legislative intent that the full value of the stock authorized and required to be subscribed, in other words, the entire capital, shall be in fact paid in when required, that it shall be real, and not merely nominal, is plain enough when the authority to exist as a corporation and to do business is given on condition that the capital subscribed shall not be less than a specified sum. A requisition that the subscribed stock shall not be less than one million of dollars, would be idle if the subscribers need pay only a first installment on their subscriptions, for example, five per cent. Manifestly that would not be what the law intended, and if its intent was that the whole capital might be called in, it is difficult to see why a subscriber, knowing that intent and voluntarily becoming a subscriber, does not impliedly engage to pay in full for his shares, when payment is required. It is, however, unnecessary to discuss this question farther, for it is settled by the judgment of this court. In Upton, assignee of The Great Western Insurance Company v. Tribilcock, decided at this term, we ruled that the original holders of the stock are liable for the unpaid balances at the suit of the assignee in bankruptcy, and that without any express promise to pay. The bankrupt corporation in that case was the same as in this.

But if the law implies a promise by the original holders or subscribers to pay the full par value when it may be called, it follows that an assignee of the stock, when he has come into privity with the company, by having stock transferred to him on the company's books, is equally liable. The same reasons exist for implying a promise by him as exist for raising up a promise by his assignor. And such is the law, as laid down by the text writers generally, and by many decisions of the courts.—(Bond v. The Susquehanna Bridge, 6 Har. & Johnson, 128; Hall v. United States Insurance Company, 5 Gill, 484; Railroad Company v. Boorman, 12 Conn., 530; Haddersfield Canal Co. v. Buckley, 7 T. M., 36.) There are a very few cases, it must be admitted, in which it has been held that the purchaser of stock, partially paid, is not liable for calls made after his purchase. Those to which we have been referred are Canal Co. v. Sansom, 1 Binney, 70, where the question seems hardly to have been considered, the claim upon the transferree having been abandoned; and Palmer v. The Ridge Mining Company, 34 Penn. State, 288, which is rested upon Sansom's case, and upon the fact that, by the charter, the company was authorized to forfeit the stock for non-payment of calls. We are also referred to Seymour v. Sturgess, 26 New York, 134, the circumstances of which were very peculiar. In neither of these cases was it brought to the attention of the court that the stock was a trust fund held for the protection of creditors in the first instance, a fund no part of which either the company, or its stockholders, was at liberty to withhold. They do not, we think, assert the doctrine which is generally accepted. In Angell & Ames on Corporations, sec. 534, it is said: "When an original subscriber to the stock of an incorporated company who is so bound to pay the installments on his subscription, from time to time as they are called in by the company, transfers his stock to another person, such other person is substituted not only to the rights, but to the obligations of the original subscriber, and he is bound to pay up the installments called for after the transfer to him. The liability to pay the installments is shifted from the out-going to the in-coming shareholder. A privity is created between the two by the assignment of the one and the acceptance of the other, and also between them and the corporation, for it would be absurd to say, upon general reasoning, that if the original subscribers have the power of assigning their shares, they should, after disposing of them, be liable to the burdens which are thrown upon the owners of the stock." So in Redfield on Railways, 53, sec. 7-4, it is said the cases agree that whenever the name of the vendee of shares is transferred to the register of shareholders, the vendor is exonerated, and the vendee becomes liable for calls. We think, therefore, the transferee of stock in an incorporated company is liable for calls made after he has been accepted by the company as a stockholder, and his name has been registered on the stock books as a corporator; and being thus liable, there is an implied promise that he will pay calls made while he continues the owner.

All the cases agree that creditors of a corporation, may compel payment of the stock subscribed, so far as it is necessary for the satisfaction of the debts due by the company. This results from the fact that the whole subscribed capital is a trust fund for the payment of creditors when the company becomes insolvent. From this it is a legitimate deduction that the stock cannot be released, that is, that the liabilities of the stockholders cannot be discharged by the company, to the injury of creditors, without payment. The fact, therefore, that in this case the certificate of stock taken by the defendant below was marked "non-assessable" is of no importance. The suit is brought by the assignee in bankruptcy, who represents creditors, and, as against him, the company had no right to release the holders of the stock from the payment of the eighty per cent. unpaid.

The second assignment of error and the third are in substance that the court should not have admitted in evidence the order of the district court directing a call by the assignee of the unpaid balance of the stock, and should not have ruled that the call made under the order was effective to make the liability of the defendant complete. That these assignments cannot be sustained was decided in Carver v. Upton, a case before us at this term. Nothing more need be said in reference to them.

The last assignment of any thing that can be assigned for error is that the court charged the jury as follows: "The only question is, was the defendant a stockholder of the company? If the testimony satisfies you that the defendant purchased of —— Hale one hundred shares of this stock, and that it was transferred in the books of the company, either by Webster, the defendant, or by Hale, who sold the stock, or by the direction of either of them, then the defendant is liable the same as if he had subscribed for the stock." The objection urged against this is that a transfer on the books directed by Hale, after the purchase by Webster, could not affect the latter's liability. But if Webster became the purchaser, it was his vendor's duty to make the transfer to him, where only a legal transfer could be made, namely, on the books of the company, and the purchase was in itself authority to the vendor to make the transfer. Still further it was Webster's duty to have the legal transfer made to relieve the vendor from liability to future calls. A court of equity will compel a transferee of stock to record the transfer, and to pay all calls after the transfer.—(3 De Gex & Smale Ch., 310.) If so, it is clear that the vendor may himself request the transfer to be made, and that when it is made at his request, the buyer becomes responsible for subsequent calls. This, however, does not interfere with the right of one who appears to be a stockholder on the books of a company, to show that his name appears on the books without right, and without his authority.

The judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT.

OPINION DELIVERED FEB. 7, 1876.

THOMAS A. OSBORN, JAMES S. EMERY and JAMES L. MCDOWELL, plaintiffs in error,
No. 77 v.
THE UNITED STATES.

In error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Kansas.

1. A pardon by the President restores to its recipient all rights of property lost by the offense pardoned, unless the property has by judicial process become vested in other persons, subject to exceptions prescribed by the pardon itself.
2. A condition annexed to a pardon, that the recipient shall not by virtue of it claim any property, or the proceeds of any property, sold by the order, judgment, or decree of a court under the the confiscation laws of the United States, does not preclude him from applying to the court for the proceeds of money-bonds secured by mortgage, confiscated, the proceeds being collected by the officers of the court in part by voluntary payment by the obligors, and in part by sale of the lands mortgaged. The condition is only intended to protect purchasers at judicial sale, decreed under the confiscation laws, from any claim of the original owner, for the property sold or the purchase-money.
3. The proceeds of property confiscated paid into court, are under the control of the court until an order for their distribution is made, or they are paid into the hands of the informer entitled to them, or into the treasury of the United States.
4. Where moneys belonging to the registry of the court are withdrawn from it without authority of law, the court can by summary proceedings, compel their restitution; and any one entitled to the moneys may apply to the court by petition for a delivery of them to him.

Mr. Justice FIELD delivered the opinion of the Court.

The material questions presented in this case for our determination relate: first, to the effect of the President's pardon upon the rights of the petitioner to the proceeds of his property confiscated by the decree of the district court; and, second, to the power of the court to compel restitution to its registry of moneys illegally received by its former officers.

In May, 1863, the District Court, of Kansas decreed the condemnation and forfeiture to the United States of the several bonds and mortgages described in the information filed by the government. In June following it ordered that the several debtors on these bonds should, within five months thereafter, pay into court the money due by them respectively, and that in default of such payment, the clerk should issue to the marshal orders for the sale of the mortgaged property, upon which he should proceed as on execution under the laws of Kansas. Some of the debtors paid the amounts due by them into the court; but the majority of them failed in this respect, and orders for the sale of the property mortgaged were issued to the marshal. To him the greater number paid without sale, but in some instances sales were made. Over twenty thousand dollars in this way came into the possession of officers of the court.

There were at the time numerous other confiscation cases pending in the court, and the moneys received from them were indiscriminately mixed with the moneys received in the cases against the property of the petitioner. None of the moneys received in any of the cases was paid into the treasury of the United States, and no order was made by the court for any such payment. Some of them were deposited in a banking-house at Leavenworth, designated as the place of deposit of moneys paid into court, and afterwards drawn out. Some were obtained by officers of the court, and to an extent greatly in excess of their legal charges; and some of them were paid to the judge. The moneys from the different confiscation cases being indiscriminately mixed, would seem to have been taken by the officers of the court whenever funds were needed by them, without regard to the sources from which they were derived, or the propriety of their application to the purposes for which they were used.

In April, 1866, the petitioner applied to the court for leave to file a petition for the restoration to him of the proceeds of his property, after deducting the costs of the legal proceedings, alleging that he had ben pardoned by the President of the United States, and setting forth a copy of the pardon. The pardon was issued in September, 1865, and was in terms a full pardon and amnesty for all offenses committed by the petitioner, arising from participation, direct or indirect, in the rebellion, subject to certain conditions. One of these conditions provided that the petitioner should pay all costs which may have accrued in proceedings instituted or pending against his person or property before the acceptance of the pardon. Another condition was that the petitioner should not by virtue of the pardon claim any property, or the proceeds of any property, which had been sold by the order, judgment, or decree of a court under the confiscation laws of the United States.

The district court refused the application, but the circuit court, on appeal, reversed its order and allowed the petition to be filed. The district court held, it would seem, that the conditions attached to the pardon precluded the petitioner from seeking to obtain the proceeds of his property. But the circuit court was of opinion that the effect of a pardon was to restore to its recipient all rights of property lost by the offense pardoned, unless the property had, by judicial process, become vested in other persons, subject to such exceptions as were prescribed by the pardon itself; that until an order of distribution of the proceeds was made in these cases, or the proceeds were actually paid into the hands of the party entitled as informer to receive them, or into the treasury of the United States, they were within the control of the court, and that no vested right to the proceeds had accrued so as to prevent the pardon from restoring them to the petitioner. Woolworth's Rep., 198. This ruling is here assailed by officers of the court, who are called upon to make restitution of a portion of the proceeds they obtained, not by the United States, who are alone interested in the decision. It is not a matter for these officers to complain that proceeds of property adjudged forfeited to the United States are held subject to the further disposition of the court, and possible restitution to the original owner. That is a matter which concerns only the United States, and they have not seen fit to object to the decision. But independently of this consideration we are clear that the decision was correct. The pardon, as is seen, embraces all offenses arising from participation of the petitioner, direct or indirect, in the rebellion. It covers, therefore, the offenses for which the forfeiture of his property was decreed. The confiscation law of 1862, though construed to apply only to public enemies, is limited to such of them as were engaged in and gave aid and comfort to the rebellion. Sec 7, 12 Statutes at Large, p, 590. The pardon of that offense necessarily carried with it the release of the penalty attached to its commission, so far as such release was in the power of the government, unless specially restrained by exceptions embraced in the instrument itself. It is of the very essence of a pardon that it releases the offender from the consequences of his offense. If, in the proceedings to establish his culpability and enforce the penalty, and before the grant of the pardon, the rights of others than the government have vested, those rights can not be impaired by the pardon. The government having parted with its power over such rights, they necessarily remain as they existed previously to the grant of the pardon. The government can only release what it holds. But unless rights of others in the property condemned have accrued, the penalty of forfeiture annexed to the commission of the offense must fall with the pardon of the offense itself, provided the full operation of the pardon be not restrained by the conditions upon which it is granted. The condition annexed to the pardon of the petitioner does not defeat such operation in the present case. The property of the petitioner forfeited consisted of numerous money-bonds, secured by mortgage on lands in Kansas. These bonds were not sold under the confiscation laws; they were collected by the officers of the court, in part by voluntary payments by the obligors, and in part by sale of the lands mortgaged. These lands did not belong to the petitioner, A mortgage in Kansas does not pass the title of the property mortgaged; it is a mere security for the debt, to which the creditor may resort to enforce payment. The property mortgaged was not confiscated nor sold under the confiscation laws. When a bond of one of the debtors was not voluntarily paid, the court proceeded to enforce its payment by the ordinary measure resorted to in the case of mortgages, that is, a sale of the security.

The object of the condition in question annexed to the pardon was to protect the purchaser of property of the petitioner at a judicial sale, decreed under the confiscation laws, from any claim by him, either for the property or the purchase-money. Numerous sales had been made under decrees in confiscation cases, and a similar condition was usually inserted in pardons to secure the purchasers from molestation. Full effect is thus given to the condition; and as a pardon is an act of grace, limitations upon its operation should be strictly construed.

But it is contended that as the bonds were forfeited to the government by the decree of the district court, there can be no restitution except by grant or conveyance of some kind from the government, and that the proprietary interests of the government can only be disposed of by act of Congress. The answer is that the forfeiture results, not from the decree of the court, but from the offense which the decree establishes and declares. The pardon, in releasing the offense, obliterating it in legal contemplation, Carlisle v. United States, 16 Wallace, 151, removes the ground of the forfeiture upon which the decree rests, and the source of title is then gone.

But were this otherwise, the constitutional grant to the President of the power to pardon offenses must be held to carry with it, as an incident, the power to release penalties and forfeitures which accrue from the offenses.

The petitioner being restored by the pardon to his rights in the proceeds of the property forfeited, after deducting from them the costs of the legal proceedings, naturally invoked the aid of the court in which the proceedings were had, or to which they were transferred, for restitution of the proceeds. Proceedings in confiscation cases are required by the statute to conform as nearly as may be to proceedings in admiralty or revenue cases. And in admiralty it is the constant practice for persons having an interest in proceeds in the registry of the court, to intervene by petition and summary proceedings to obtain a delivery of the moneys to which they are entitled. The 43d admiralty rule recognizes this right; and in cases without number the right has been enforced. The power of the court over moneys belonging to its registry continues until they are distributed pursuant to final decrees in the cases in which the moneys are paid. If from any cause they are previously withdrawn from the registry without authority of law, the court can, by summary proceedings, compel their restitution. In the present case it is no answer to the order for restitution that the appellants received the moneys they obtained as officers of the court, and that they have long since ceased to be such officers. If the moneys were illegally taken, they must be restored, and until a decree of distribution is made and enforced, the summary power of the court to compel restitution remains intact. The power could be applied in no case more fittingly than to previous officers of the court.

The careful and labored reports of the commissioners appointed by the court to examine into the proceedings in the confiscation cases, ascertain the expenses incurred, and trace out as far as possible the moneys received, were properly confirmed. There is no objection to their findings which merits consideration.

The decree brought before us for review must be affirmed, except as to the costs of the proceedings subsequent to the presentation of the application of the petitioner. Those costs should be apportioned against the parties ordered to make restitution, according to the respective amounts they are adjudged to restore. The cause will, therefore, be remanded, with directions to modify the decree in this particular; but in all other respects the decree is affirmed.

UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT.

OPINION DELIVERED JAN. 31, 1876.

THE MILWAUKEE AND SAINT PAUL RAILWAY COMPANY, plaintiffs in error,
v.
MARY A. F. ARMS and D. D. ARMS.

In error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Iowa.

ACTION TO RECOVER FOR PERSONAL INJURIES—NEGLIGENCE—MEASURE OF DAMAGES.

1. GROSS NEGLIGENCE.—The court states what is to be regarded as gross negligence. It is the absence of the care that was requisite under the circumstances.
2. PUNATIVE OR EXEMPLARY DAMAGES.—The court states when punative or exemplary damages may be awarded.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

Mr. Justice DAVIS delivered the opinion of the Court.

This action was brought to recover damages for the injury received by Mrs. Arms by reason of a collision of the defendant's train of cars, upon which she was a passenger, with another train upon the same track moving in an opposite direction, which resulted in a verdict and judgment for $4,000. The plaintiffs in error insist that they were severely dealt with in the court below, and that they are entitled to redress in this court.

The bill of exceptions discloses this state of facts: Mrs. Arms, in October, 1870, was a passenger on defendant's train of cars, which, while running at a speed of fourteen or fifteen miles an hour, collided with an engine on the same track. the jar occasioned by the collision was light, and more of a push than a shock. The fronts of the two engines were demolished, and a new engine removed the train. This was all the testimony offered by either party as to the character of the collision and the cause of it, but there was evidence tending to show that Mrs. Arms was thrown from her seat and sustained the injuries of which she complained. After the evidence had been submitted to the jury, the court gave them the following instruction: "If you find that the accident was caused by the gross negligence of the defendant's servants controlling the train, you may give to the plaintiffs punitive or exemplary damages."

The court doubtless assumed that the mere fact that two railroad trains collide is, ipso facto, evidence of gross negligence on the part of the employes of the company, justifying the assessment of exemplary damages, for a collision could not well occur under less aggravated circumstances, or cause slighter injury. Neither train was thrown from the track, and the effect of the collision was only to demolish the fronts of the two locomotives. It did not produce the "shock" even which usually happens in case of a serious collision. The train on which Mrs. Arms was riding was moving at a very moderate rate of speed, and the other train must have peen nearly if not quite stationary. There was nothing, therefore, save the fact that a collision happened, upon which to charge negligence upon the company. This was enough to entitle Mrs. Arms to full compensatory damages, but the inquiry is whether the jury had a right to go further and give exemplary damages.

It is undoubtedly true that the allowance of anything more than an adequate pecuniary indemnity for a wrong sufferred is a great departure from the principle on which damages in civil suits are awarded, but although, as a general rule, the plaintiff recovers a mere compensation for his private injury, yet the doctrine is too well settled now to be shaken, that exemplary damages may in certain cases be recovered. As the question of intention is always material in an action of tort, and as the circumstances which aggravate the transaction are, therefore, proper to be weighed by the jury in fixing that compensation, it may well be considered whether the doctrine of exemplary damages cannot be reconciled with the idea that compensation alone is the measure of redress.

But jurists have chosen to place this doctrine on the ground not that the sufferer is to be recompensed, but that the offender is to be punished, and although the soundness of it has been questioned by some text-writers and courts, it must be accepted as the general rule in England and in most of the States of this country.—(1 Redfield on Railway, p. 576; Sedgwick on Measure of Damages, 4th edition, chapter XVIII, and note, where the cases are collected and reviewed).

And it has received the sanction of this court. It was discussed and recognized in Day v. Woodworth, (13 Howard, 371,) but the rule was more accurately stated in the Philadelphia, Wilmington, and Baltimore Railroad Company v. Quigley, (21 Howard, 213,) which was an action against the company for libel. One of the errors assigned was that the circuit court did not place any limit on the power of the jury to give exemplary damages, if in their opinion they were called for. Mr. Justice Campbell, who delivered the opinion of the court, said: "In Day v. Woodworth this court recognized the power of the jury in certain actions of tort to assess against the tort feasor punitive or exemplary damages. Whenever the injury complained of has been inflicted maliciously or wantonly, and with circumstances of contumely or indignity, the jury are not limited to the ascertainment of a simple compensation for the wrong committed against the aggrieved person. But the malice spoken of in this rule is not merely the doing of an unlawful or injurious act. The word implies that the wrong complained of was conceived in the spirit of mischief or criminal indifference to civil obligations." As nothing of this kind, under the evidence, could be imputed to the defendants, the judgmen was reversed.

Although this rule was announced in an action for libel, it is equally applicable to suits for personal injuries received from the negligence of others. The aggrieved person is entitled to redress commensurate to such injuries, and in order to ascertain its extent the jury may consider all the facts which relate to the wrongful act of the defendant and its consequences to the plaintiff, but they are not at liberty to go further unless it was done wilfully or was the result of that reckless indifference to the rights of others, which is equivalent to an intentional violation of them. In that case, the jury are authorized, for the sake of public example, to give such additional damages as the circumstances of the case require. The tort is aggravated by the evil motive, and on this rests the rule of exemplary damages.

It is insisted, however, that where there is "gross negligence" the jury can properly give exemplary damages. There are many cases to this effect. The difficulty is that thev do not define the term with any accuracy, and if it is made the criterion by which to determine the liability of the carrier beyond the limit of indemnity, it would seem that a definite meaning should be given to it. This the courts have been embarrassed in doing, and this court has expressed its disapprobation of these attempts to fix the degrees of negligence by legal definitions. In The Steamboat New World v. King, (16 Howard, 474,) Mr. Justice Curtis, in speaking of the three degrees of negligence, says: "It may be doubted if these terms can be usefully applied in practice. Their meaning is not fixed or capable of being so. One degree thus described not only may be confounded with another, bnt it is quite impracticable exactly to distinguish them. Their signification necessarily varies according to circumstances, to whose influence the courts have been forced to yield until there are so many real exceptions that the rules themselves can scarcely be said to have a general operation. If the law furnishes no definition of the terms gross negligence or ordinary negligence, which can be applied in practice, but leaves it to the jury to determine in each case what the duty was and what omissions amount to a breach of it, it would seem that imperfect and confessedly unsuccessful attempts to define that duty had better be abandoned." And some of the highest English courts have come to the conclusion that there is no intelligible distinction between ordinary and gross negligence.—(Redfield on Carriers, section 376.)

Lord Cranworth, in Wilson v. Brett, (11 M. & W., 113,) said that gross negligence is ordinary negligence with a vituperative epithet, and the Exchequer Chamber took the same view of the subject.—(Beal v. South Devon Railway Company, 3 H. & C., 327.)

Grill v. General Iron Screw Collier Company (Law Reports, C. P., 1, 1865-6) was heard in the common pleas on appeal. One of the points raised was the supposed misdirection of the Lord Chief Justice who tried the case, because he had made no distinction between gross and ordinary negligence. Justice Willes, in deciding the point, after stating his agreement with the dictum of Lord Cranworth, said: "Confusion had arisen from regarding negligence as a positive instead of a negative word. It is really the absence of such care as it was the duty of the defendant to use. Gross is a word of description and not of definition, and it would have been only introducing a source of confusion to use the expression gross negligence instead of the equivalent—a want of due care and skill in navigating the vessel, which was again and again used by the Lord Chief Justice in his summing up."

Gross negligence is a relative term. It is, doubtless, to be understood as meaning a greater want of care than is implied by the term ordinary negligence, but after all it means the absence of the care that was requisite under the circumstances. In this sense the collision in controversy was the result of gross negligence, because the employes of the company did not use the care that was required to avert the accident. But the absence of this care, whether called gross or ordinary negligence, did not authorize the jury to visit the company with damages beyond the limit of compensation for the injury inflicted. To do this there must have been some willful misconduct or that entire want of care which would raise the presumption of a conscious indifference to consequences. Nothing of this kind can be imputed to the persons in charge of the train, and the court, therefore, misdirected the jury.

For this reason the judgment is reversed and a new trial ordered.

We are indebted to the law firm of Nissen & Barnum, of this city, for the following opinion:

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

Opinion Filed Jan. 21, 1876.

No. 192. Michael Harber et al. v. Deborah Wallner.

Appeal from Superior Court of Cook.

DEED TO HUSBAND AND WIFE, WHEN WIFE IS A MINOR—CONVEYANCE BY HUSBAND AND WIFE, WHILE WIFE IS A MINOR—STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS—NATURE OF ESTATE OF HUSBAND AND WIFE IN SUCH LANDS.

1. Appellee and Wallner intermarried in Feb., 1852, and soon after, her step father, Thomas Jaworski, conveyed to them two twenty-acre tracts of land. The husband deserted the wife within three months after the marriage and did not live with her again. It was claimed that the husband and wife subseqeuntly conveyed the land to Jaworski; that appellee was under fifteen when she was married and when she joined in the deed. And if this is true, then she had the right within three years after coming of age to repudiate the conveyance. But she was then under the disability of marriage, which did not cease until she obtained a divorce on the 6th of January, 1874.

2. Deed of Minor.—Not being of age, the deed was unauthorized and passed no title.

3. Power of Married Women to Convey at Common Law.—The power of a married woman to convey at common law is stated.

4. Void Deed—Repudiation.—This deed was void under the statute, and being void she was not bound to repudiate it three years after arriving at the age of eighteen. Had she been under that age and unmarried, and had made a deed, it would have been only voidable, and she would have been required, within three years after coming of age, to take the necessary steps to avoid it.

5. Statute of Limitations—Act of 1861.—That appellee was married when every act was done, which is claimed to conclude her rights; but in 1861, the act was passed authorizing married women to hold separate property to sue, etc., held, that this did not in this case remove her disability so as to require her to assert her rights, until she became discovert in January, 1874.

6. The Nature of their Estate.—The court states the nature of the estate where land is conveyed to husband and wife, and holds that neither can have partition, nor can either sell the estate so as to effect the rights of the other, and when their rights to the property are invaded a suit for the recovery of the injury or for the property must be joint; hence, the appellee being under the disability of coverture until January, 1874, she had no power to sue until that relation was terminated.

7. Effect of Divorce on Estate.—After the parties were divorced, they were no longer entitled to hold jointly, but from thenceforth they held in severalty.—[Ed. Legal News]

Walker, J.—Appellee and Herman Wallner intermarried sometime in the month of February, 1852; and about that time, and soon after, her stepfather, Thomas Jaworski, conveyed to them two twenty acre tracts of land, on section 26, township 41 N., range 13, E. 3rd pr. M., in Cook county. As the evidence shows, Herman deserted Deborah within about three months after the marriage, and they have not lived together since. There is no question in the case that Jaworski purchased the land from Tuthill King the patentee from the Government, and thereby became invested with the title in fee. But it is claimed that Herman and Deborah subsequently reconveyed the land to Jaworski, but, in so doing, a mistake was made, in describing the grantee as Lawreski—on the 24th of December, 1852. And that afterwards Jaworski conveyed these and other lands about this same time, to Newkirk and Ward, from whom appellants claim by mesne conveyances to have derived title.

It is claimed, and we think the evidence shows, that appellee, at the time of her marriage, was not of age, nor was she when it is claimed she and her husband reconveyed to Jaworski, in December, 1852, although there may be some criticism of the testimony of the witnesses, as to other dates and facts connected with their testimony as to her minority. She and her mother both testify that she was but fourteen years of age when she was married. She fixes the date of her marriage at the 24th of February, 1852. It appears that the deed from Jaworski to appellee and husband bore date on the 25th of March, 1853, and the mother says it was made about a month after the marriage. Thus this date is fixed with reasonable certainty. As to appellee's age, both she and her mother must be likely to have rembembered. Marriage is always considered so important an event that most persons always remember it with certainty, and also the age at which it occurs. These things are seldom forgotten whilst memory lasts, by even the most illiterate, and those who can neither read nor write generally know, and seldom forget their own ages; and mothers of that description are believed to remember the ages of their children quite as well as the educated and more gifted. And although both have mistaken other dates, we are satisfied that they were not likely to be mistaken as to that fact.

If this, then, be true, appellee was not quite fifteen when she is claimed to have joined in the execution of this deed to Jaworski, by her and her husband, and if so, then she had the legal and undoubted right within three years after coming of age to repudiate the conveyance, even if it was made as claimed. Again, she was then under the disability of marriage, which did not cease until she obtained a divorce, on the 6th of January, 1874.

Not being of the age required by the statute to convey, by joining with her husband, the deed was unauthorized, and possessed no title for want of power to make the deed claimed by appellants, as reinstating the title in Jaworski, if it was made as claimed. The seventeenth section of the Conveyance Act of 1845, (R. S, 1845, p. 106,) provides that: "Whenever any husband and wife residing in this State, shall wish to convey the estate of his wife, it shall and may be lawful for said husband and wife, she being above the age of eighteen years, to execute any grant, bargain, sale, lease, release, feoffment, deed, conveyance, or assurance in law whatever, for the conveying of such lands, tenament and hereditaments." The remainder of the section relates to the execution and acknowledgment of the deed when so made, but has no relation to this case.

Has, then, this requirement been answered? The husband and wife were residents of this State, the wife had an interest in the land, but she was not eighteen years of age, and hence was not authorized to join with her husband to make the conveyance, but it was, as declared, negatively unlawful for her to do so, before she was of age. Married women were not then empowered to make a conveyance in any manner, without joining with their husbands, and then only when they were of the age of eighteen years or upwards. This deed, if it was ever made, was without the pretence of power on the part of the wife.

This is better illustrated and made more obvious, by a reference to the common law on this subject. By it a married woman was utterly powerless to convey her real estate by deed, poll, feoffment or other instrument. She could only accomplish that purpose by levying a fine, or suffering a recovery. Hence it is seen that there is no authority in the common law that can be invoked to aid the execution of this deed, or to make the conveyance operative. Not being enabled by the common law to so convey, married women derive all of their power to convey from the statute alone, and a conveyance to be valid or to pass any rights, the party must conform to the substantial requirements of the statute, and that she should be of the age of eighteen years or upwards, is made by the statute absolutely essential to the validity of the deed, or to pass title. This deed under the statute was void; and being void, she was not bound to repudiate it, three years after arriving at the age of eighteen. Had she been under that age, and unmarried, and had made a deed, it would have been only voidable, and she would have been required, within three years after coming of the age of eighteen, to take the necessary steps, as this court has repeatedly held, to avoid it. But the statute having declared that it shall only be lawful for a married woman who is over eighteen years of age to make a deed to her property, by joining with her husband in a conveyance for the purpose. A deed made contrary to its provisions is void, and not merely voidable. This view of the question was not presented by appellee's counsel, but it is so obvious and essential to a current decision of the case, that we have deemed it proper to give it full weight in its decision. There was much evidence on the question, whether or not appellee and her husband made a deed reconveying the lands in controversy to Jaworski. All the evidence considered, the question is left, we think, in great doubt. It is contradictory, uncertain, and perhaps irreconcilable. But from what we have said, it will be seen that it is wholly immaterial whether or not the deed was made, and hence we have not discussed the evidence on that question.

We now come to the question, whether or not appellee has now the right to urge the invalidity of this deed, against the claims of appellants, or is she bound by laches or the statutes of limitations from asserting her rights. Appellant's claim to deny title by a connected chain from King to themselves, through Jaworski, he having subsequently conveyed to Newkirk and Ward, from whom appellants derive title. And it is not questioned that they have claim or color of title made in good faith, with the requisite possession, and payment of taxes to create an absolute bar, under the act of 1839, if appellee is not within the saving clause of the statute, and she is bound under the act of 1835. Appellants having regular connected chain of title in law, deducible of record from the United States government, unless she is within the savings of that law.

The evidence, we think, sufficiently establishes the fact, that appellee became of the age of eighteen in 1856, and the three years expired within which she would have been required to take the requisite steps to assert her title under the act of 1839 had she been sole, but she then was, and had been before this adverse claim arose, a married woman. Had she been sole, and a minor at the time of the adverse possession was taken and the payment of taxes were commenced, then a different question would have been presented. But she was married when she became of age, and when the taxes were paid, in connection with possession under claim and color of title made in good faith. In fact she was married when every act was done which is claimed to conclude her rights.

But in 1861, the act was adopted authorizing married women to hold separate property, as though they were sole and unmarried, free from all control of their husbands. And if it be contended that by that act her disability was removed and she was free then to declare the deed from herself and husband, to Jaworski void; and assert her rights to the law, if such a deed was made, or to assert her claim, before the bar of the Statute had arisen in 1868, after the passage of that law the question is presented, whether she was under such disability as to bring her within the savings of the statutes, until she became discovert in January, 1874.

Under the law prior to the act of 1861, the conveyance Jaworski made to appellee and her husband created joint estate in them by the entirety during their natural lives, and to the survivor, on the death of either. And under the law as it then stood, the parties to a vested and absolute title to such an estate, was not and could not be changed, modified or affected by the act of 1861. We have heretofore held that prior vested estates and rights were in nowise affected by that act, and that it was incompetent for the General Assembly to divest or change such rights. Hence, they took an estate by the entireties, and not an estate as tenants in common, as seem to be supposed by appellee's counsel. In the case of Cooper v. Cooper, (Jan'y term, 1875), the conveyances were made to husband and wife, after the passage of the law of 1861. And the decision was placed on the grounds that the rule was changed by that enactment from an estate by the entireties to an estate in fee, held by the grantees as tenants in common. That decision was placed on that act, and hence it has no bearing on this question, as this estate was created before that statute was adopted.

Now this estate by the entireties is peculiar. The possession of one is the possession of both. The estate is joint for life, and descends or vests in the survivor absolutely and in fee. And by the destruction of the estate of one, it inures to the other. Neither can have partition, nor can either sell the estate so as to effect the rights of the other. And when their rights to the property are invaded, a suit for a recovery for the injury or for the property must be joint, because the property and the right to its enjoyment is joint during coveture. Then appellee could not sue for and recover any interest in the land without joining her husband in the action, until the coveture ceased, and inasmuch as she had no right to sue alone, and could not compel the husband to join her in an action during coveture, it is unlike tenants in common, where either may sue and recover for an injury to the estate, and may use the names of its co tenants. Hence it follows, that appellee being under the disability of coveture until January, 1874, she had no power to sue until that relation was terminated. Had they been tenants in common, it might have been otherwise, but we do not decide that question, as it is not before the court in this case.

From the very nature of the estate and the rights of the parties therein, the act of 1861 could not, as to appellee's rights, remove her disabilily. She had not, nor could she have any more right to sue for the property, or any interest in it after the passage of the law, than she had before that time, until coverture was removed. Hence the statutes of limitation and all that was done under them did not operate to produce a bar.

What effect, then, did the granting of the divorce have on this estate or the rights of the parties therein? The relation of husband and wife were thereby terminated, and with it all martial duties. Their interests and duties from thenceforth, as related to each other, were as though they never existed. This estate, by the enterelies, is essentially a joint estate, although it differs in one or two particulars therefrom. The enterelies are the same, and the jus accriscendi obtains; but they only hold severally per tout et non per my, whilst joint tenants hold by halves and by the whole. But it is believed that when the estate of one is destroyed, it insures to the other, as in case of death or otherwise, so when the unity of the husband and wife is destroyed by death, the survivor takes the whole estate. Blackstone says there are several means of destroying or of severing a joint estate. As by disuniting their possession: "If two joint tenants agree to part their lands, and hold them in severalty, they are no longer joint tenants, for they have no joint interest in the whole, but only a several interest respectively in the several parts." And the jointure may be destroyed by one selling his share and thus converting it into a tenancy in common. It is further said that where by any act or event, different interests are created in the several parts of the estate, or they are held by different titles, or if merely the possession is separated. So the joint tenants have no longer the former indispensable properties of sameness of interest and undivided possession, a title resting at one and the same time, and by one and the same grant, the jointure is instantly divided. In this case the husband conveyed his interest, which would have been a joint tenancy, and destroyed the unity of title, and it would have been a tenancy in common. This of itself, had this been a joiut tenancy, would have changed the entire relation of the parties, and his conveyance had that effect if he had power to sell. But the power to hold jointly arose from the fact that they were married, when the conveyance was made. Had it not existed, the parties would have taken as tenants in common. It was that circumstance, and that alone, which gave to them the joint life estate, and the right to joint possession. The divorce destroyed the relation which gave the joint right, and with it, the right itself. After parties were divorced they were no longer entitled to hold jointly, but from thenceforth they held in severalty, nor were they entitled to joint possession. When the very thing which, by operation of law, gave them a joint estate was destroyed by operation of the same law, the joint estate ceased and they became vested with an estate per my as tenants in common. They, by that act and operation of law flowing from it, are not jointly entitled to possession, but the entirety of title and the unity of estate no longer exising with the incidental right of joint possession, it inevitably follows that they became tenants in common. Our statute has destroyed joint tenancies unless the parties expressly stipulate in the deed of conveyance, that such an estate is thereby created. The estate with the jus accrescendi not being favored by our law and the termination of the marriage relation, having marked a change in the rights of the parties in the estate, the courts should rather hold that the charge is broad enough to convert it into an estate in common than to hold that whatever change was made, that it left the right of survivorship. But, on principle, we are satisfied the decree of divorce had the effect to make them tenants in common, and that appellee thereby became entitled to partition.

There is another question which may deserve a notice. And that is, whether appellee had a right to file a bill for partition until after she was divorced. Situated as this case is, we can see no objection to it. She applied for a divorce in the same bill and had a right to claim alimony in this land, and in the same case to have her rights in this property settled between her and her husband. Thus far, all will concede, that there was no error. And if so, why not make appellants parties, as they were claiming that they had acquired, not only her right, but that of her husband, in the property. They claimed to have an interest in the property, and she had a right to bring them before the court that they might be bound by the decree of the court, settling her rights, and to be freed from again litigating all the facts, and settling all of the legal questions in another suit with them for the recovery of her interest in the land. We perceive no error in the record, and the decree of the court below must be affirmed.

Decree affirmed.

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

OPINION FILED JAN. 21, 1876.

GEORGE WEBSTER ET AL. v. FLAVEL K. GRANGER ET AL.

Appeal from Superior Court of Cook.

SALE—SAMPLE—BILL OF LADING—DELIVERY TICKET—WHEN TITLE PASSES.

The flax seed was shipped by appellees to their commission merchants, Foss & Co., of Chicago, for sale on the track. Foss sold the flax by sample to appellants, delivering them a sample and a delivery ticket therefor. At noon, on the 7th of Oct., 1871, the flax was destroyed by the October fire: Held, that the title vested in appellants by their purchase and the acceptance of the delivery ticket.

2. SALE BY SAMPLE.—That the purchaser did not have twenty-four hours to examine the goods. After taking possession the purchaser buys by sample, and has no occasion to examine the goods. Should they prove, on examination after he has them in his possession, to be not equal to the sample, he may return them or sue for and recover the difference.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

Opinion by BREESE J.

This was assumpsit on the common counts for goods (flax seed) sold and delivered by the plaintiffs to the defendants, brought to the Superior Court of Cook county, resulting, on a trial by the court without a jury, in a finding and judgment for the plaintiffs.

The defendants appeal, and insist the finding is not sustained by the evidence; that at most it establishes a contract of sale, and not an actual sale of the flax seed.

Appellants contend they had a reasonable time in which to examine and remove the goods, and until that time elapsed the title was not in them.

The flax seed was shipped by appellees to their commission merchants, Foss & Co., of Chicago, for sale. There were one hundred and thirty-four sacks "on the track" at the Galena depot, and Foss sold them by sample to appellants, at one dollar and fifty-five cents per bushel, delivering them a sample and a delivery ticket therefor. This was on Saturday, 7th October, 1871, about noon of that day. The goods were destroyed by the October fire.

It was held in Mich. Cen. R. R. Co. v. Phillips, et al., 60 Ills., 190, that the delivery of a bill of lading, unindorsed, did not transfer a barely equitable title, like the delivery of an unindorsed note, it gave as valid and effectual title to the goods as could be obtained by the actual delivery of the goods themselves.

The only difference between the bill of lading and a delivery ticket is that in the former the goods may not have started on their destination, in the latter the purport of the ticket is they have actually arrived ready to be delivered to the holder of the ticket.

It is understood this ticket is in the form of an order from the proper railroad or station agent to deliver the goods described in the ticket to the person named in it, or to the bearer, and is in common use for the delivery of grain.

By this order to deliver the goods to bearer, and appellants being the bearer, they were thereby vested with all the necessary evidence of ownership of the goods, and could have transferred the title to them to a purchaser from them. They had full power to sell the moment they became possessed of the ticket, even if the payment of the money was a condition precedent, the circumstances proved showing a waiver of this condition by the seller. Can it be doubted, if on the receipt of this delivery ticket by appellants, they had soon after found a purchaser for these goods at an advance, that they must not have sold them? The purchaser from them would certainly have acquired the title to the goods.

We have no doubt the title vested in appellants by their purchase and acceptance of the delivery ticket.

It is urged by appellants that the custom governing sales of this character is that the purchaser has twenty-four hours in which to examine the goods after taking possession. This can hardly be when the sale is by sample. The purchaser buys by sample, and has no occasion to examine the goods. Should they prove on examination after he has them in possession to be not equal to the sample, he may return them, or sue for and recover the difference. It would be impossible to do business in any great mart of trade in any other way. Millions are involved in purchases by samples, and they with tickets pass as readily as current bank notes. It is absurd to say that purchasers have twenty-four hours or any other time in which to inspect the goods. Here was a full delivery of the goods by symbol, and appellants could have passed the title to their vendee in the same way. M. C. R. R. Co. v. Phillips, supra.

We repeat, after the delivery ticket was passed to appellants, there was nothing for appellees to do. They had parted with their control over the goods, and the same became vested in appellants, who were to weigh them and pay for them.

This purchase was made at noon of Saturday, and appellants had several business hours of that day in which to remove the goods. They were at their risk and could have maintained a replevin for them.

We cannot appreciate the argument of appellants that the delivery ticket was not a delivery of the goods for any other purpose than for examination. The examination of the sample was an examination of the goods, and there was an implied warranty that the bulk should equal the sample.

It is said by appellants that delivery alone does not pass title. This may be in some cases, they depending on the circumstances, nor is delivery necessary to pass title as between the parties, as this court has often held.

But in this case every element of a sale and delivery exists, the sellers having nothing more to do with the goods but to receive the account of weight from appellants, and the agreed price The price was fixed and the goods placed under the control of appellants, and they should pay for them, as they agreed. See Peters et al. v. Elliott et al. decided at this term.

The judgment is affirmed.

SCOTT, C. J., dissenting.

Howe and Russell for appellants.

Runyan Avery and Comstock for appellees.

JUDICIAL TITLES.

In this country it is getting quite common to call justices of the peace, judges, and to address them as "your honor." In fact, when a person is spoken of as "Judge D.," we cannot tell by his title whether he is a judge of the Supreme Court of the United States, or a U. S. circuit judge, a State Judge, or a justice of the peace. It would seem that in England almost every judge is addressed as "my lord." The London Solicitor's Journal says:

It is interesting to note the rapid growth of the practice of using reverential titles in addressing judges. We pointed out some time ago that a puisne judge, even when presiding over a court, ought not to be spoken of as "my lord"—that title being reserved for the chiefs; but we believe that some learned members of the bench are disposed to dissent from this view, and to establish a usage which the reports show to be unfounded in precedent. The old style of addressing the judges of the common law courts was "sir," and Serjeant Hill, to the end of his life, adhered to this title; but in the course of the last century the custom of speaking to the judges as "your lordship" became gradually established, and now, as we all know, the judges of first instance in the chancery division have cast off "your honor" and assumed "your lordship." The latest example of a like change is related by the Melbourne correspondent of a daily journal, who states that Sir W. Hackett, the new chief justice of the Fiji Islands, has caused himself to be addressed by the bar as "your lordship" instead of "your honor," which is, it appears, the old-established titular form of addressing the presiding judge in all Australian supreme courts. The correspondent adds that a question arose some twenty years ago in the colony of Victoria as to the proper form of addressing county court judges, and a circular was sent to each of them asking whether the practice of calling him "your honor" obtained in his court. To this one of the judges replied "that it certainly was the custom of some barristers and other persons to address him as 'your honor,' but he had been addressed by so many and various titles that he had come to disregard them. He had not only been styled 'his honor' frequently, but had often been called 'his lordship.' Occasionally he had been addressed as 'your grace,' 'your worship,' 'your excellency,' 'your reverence' and 'your eminence,' and on one occasion as 'your holiness.'" The judge or the correspondent may be joking, but flowery as some of these titles are, they are prosaic to those which are employed by the native pleaders in India in petitions addressed to the judges of the various courts. 'Cherisher of the poor," is the most favorite form of address. But "protector of the poor" and "benefactor of the poor" are frequently used, and the court is constantly alluded to as "the Presence."

We call attention to the following opinions, reported at length in this issue:

Bankrupt Insurance Company—Liability of Transferee to pay Assessment on Unpaid Stock.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States, by Strong, J., holding that the transferee of stock on the books of an insurance company on which only twenty per cent. of its nominal value has been paid, is liable for calls for the unpaid portion made during his ownership, without proof of any express promise by him to pay such calls.

Effect of a Pardon by the President.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States, by Field, J., holding that a pardon by the President restores to its recipient all rights of property lost by the offense pardoned, unless the property has by judicial process become vested in other persons, subject to exceptions prescribed by the pardon itself. The court states the effect that will be given to a condition annexed to a pardon.

Personal Injuries — Negligence — Measure of Damages.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States, by Davis, J., as to what is to be regarded as gross negligence, and when punative or exemplary damages may be awarded in an action to recover for personal injuries.

Deed to Husband and Wife Jointly—Effect of Conveyance when Wife a Minor—Limitations.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of Illinois by Walker, J., in a case where the appellee and one Wallner inter-married in February, 1852, and soon after the wife's step-father conveyed to the husband and wife certain land. The husband deserted the wife within three months after the marriage, and did not live with her again. It was claimed that the husband and wife subsequently conveyed the land to the step-father. Appellee was under fifteen years of age when she was married, and when, it is claimed, she joined in the deed. And if this is true, that she had the right within three years after coming of age to repudiate the conveyance. It also appeared that she was under the disibility of marriage until she obtained a divorce on the sixth of January, 1874. The court held that the deed was void under the statute, and being void she was not bound to repudiate it three years after arriving at the age of eighteen. Had she been under that age and unmarried, and had made a deed, it would have been only voidable, and she would have been required within three years after coming of age to take the necessary steps to avoid it. The court states the effect of the statute of limitations and of the act of 1861, giving to married women the right to sue, etc., upon the rights of appellee, and holds that she being under the disibility of coverture until January, 1874, she had no power to sue until that relation was terminated.

Sale by Sample—Delivery Ticket.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of this State by Breese, J., as to when the title vests in the purchaser by sample, of goods on the track, he receiving a delivery ticket therefor at the time of the purchase.

Guaranteed Note—Collateral Security.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of this State, by Breese, J., holding that the taking of collateral security for the payment of a guaranteed note does not release the guarantor.

Removal of Cause.—The opinion of the United States circuit court for the District of Indiana by Gresham, J., construing the law relating to the removal of causes from State to federal courts.

Suit on Land-contract.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of this State, by Scott, C. J., in a suit brought to recover back money paid on a land-contract.

A Treatise on the Law of Receivers, by James L. High, author of "Treatises on the Law of Injunctions," "The Law of Extraordinary Legal Remedies," etc. Chicago: Callaghan & Company. 1876. Price, $7.50.

This volume is the completion of a series of legal text-books by Mr. High, upon the general subject of extraordinary legal and equitable remedies, upon which the author has been engaged, in connection with the practice of his profession, during the past eight years. The first of these was upon the Law of Injunctions, and is now acknowledged to be the leading work upon that branch of equity jurisprudence in America. This was followed by his work upon "Extraordinary Legal Remedies," embracing mandamus, quo warranto and prohibition. The present volume treats of the extraordinary equitable remedy of "Receivers." It is divided into twenty chapters, as follows: 1. Of the General Features of the Jurisdiction. 2. Of the Courts Exercising the Jurisdiction. 3. Of the Selection and Eligibility of the Receiver. 4. Of the Practice. 5. Of the Receiver's Bond and Liability thereon. 6. Of the Receiver's Possession. 7. Of the Receiver's Functions. 8. Of Actions by and against Receivers. 9. Of the Receiver's Liabilities. 10. Of Receivers over Corporations. 11. Of Receivers over Railways. 12. Of Receivers in aid of Judgment Creditors. 13. Of Receivers over Partnerships. 14. Of Receivers over Real Property. 15. Of Receivers in Cases of Mortgages. 16. Of Receivers in Cases of Trusts. 17. Of Receivers in Connection with Injunctions. 18. Of the Receiver's Compensation. 19. Of the Receiver's Accounts. 20. Of the Removal and Discharge of Receivers. The second subdivision of chapter II discusses quite fully the conflict of jurisdiction which so often occurs in the appointment of receivers between the State and Federal Courts. Aside from the general chapter on corporations there is a separate chapter devoted to receivers over railways, which will be of unusual interest at this time, when nearly half the railroads in the country are in the possession of receivers. Mr. High has wisely given a chapter upon receivers in aid of judgment creditors. Should the bankrupt law be repealed or modified, this chapter will be one of the most valuable in the book. Chapter seventeen is one of the most carefully prepared. It treats of the remedy and shows the points of resemblance, and the points of divergence between the remedy by injunction and the appointment of a receiver, and also in what cases the two remedies are granted in connection with each other, and separately. An appendix of valuable forms concludes the work. This volume is not the work of a mere theorist but of an able lawyer, engaged in the active duties of an extensive and varied chancery practice. Mr. High, in his citations, is thorough and accurate: in his arrangement, methodical; in his style, clear and concise. The work shows that years of patient labor have been spent in its preparation. The cases are brought down to the time of going to press, and in his citations, Mr. High has not confined himself to the regular series of reports, but has made free use of the various law periodicals. For many years we have been well acquainted with the usual practice of authors in making law-books, and must say that Mr. High exercises more care in the preparation of his books than any other author that ever came under our observation. Before allowing them to go to press, he always has page proofs and compares them with the citations in the library, to make sure that neither he nor the printer has made any mistakes. The mechanical execution of this volume is excellent. It was stereotyped and printed for the distinguished law publishing house of Callaghan & Co. by the Chicago Legal News Company.

A Treatise on the Law of Estoppel and its Application in Practice. By Melville M. Bigelow. Second Edition. Boston. Little, Brown and Company, 1876.

The first edition of this work has received the approval of the bar and is acknowledged to be a treatise of great value. The present edition is from the press of John Wilson and Son, and in mechanical execution is one of the best productions that ever eminated from that distinguished printing house. Mr. Bigelow has introduced several improvements in the second edition. Many extended quotations from the opinions of the judges have been dropped from the text and incorporated in the notes. Mr. Bigelow says he has encountered about four hundred and fifty new cases in preparing this edition, and made the best use of them he was able to make. That nearly every chapter has received some addition, and the additions to some of the chapters have been extensive and not unimportant; that this is especially true of the chapters on Title by Estoppel, Estoppel by Conduct and Estoppel by Election; that much of the first named subject has been carefully re-written and the whole presented in a clearer light. The bar will find this work well worthy of their patronage.

THE FLAGLOR CASES.

A DESPERATE CHANCERY CONTEST.

These cases, after occupying the courts of this State for the last ten years, appear at length to be concluded. The end has finally been reached only after a great struggle, in which the prestige of victory has sometimes been with one side, and sometimes with the other. Aside from the principles established by the decisions themselves, a brief outline of the origin and progress of this remarkable contest is therefore a matter of interest. These suits, commenced in 1866, originated from a friendly partition suit in equity, brought in the Cook Circuit court in 1851, to divide the Garrett estate, then one of the largest in Chicago. In May of that year a decree, purporting on its face to be by consent, was passed, which in the absence of actual consent was, as the court has held, unjust towards Charles D. Flaglor, one of the defendants, since it declared his estate in the property partitioned to be for life only with remainder in fee to his daughter, when in truth his estate was in fee, with executory devises over to his daughter and others on a contingency which never happened. Flaglor had in fact given no consent to this part of the decree; and he afterwards, in 1853, filed a bill of review to avoid the declaration that his estate was for life only, contained in it. But this bill had no allegations impeaching or explaining the recital of consent appearing in the original decree. To this bill the infant daughter of Flaglor, who was also a party defendant to the original bill, was made a defendant, and the court, in 1854, entered a new decree, repealing the old one, and declaring the estate of Flaglor to be in fee, etc. In 1858, Flaglor, who had sold and conveyed the property in fee, died, leaving his daughter surviving; and she, in February, 1866, sued out a writ of error from the Supreme Court to reverse the decree made on the bill of review, alleging for error, in effect, that there were no allegations, questioning, or impeaching the consent appearing on the face of the original decree; and, for that reason, she claimed that the bill of review was insufficient. For this error the Supreme Court, in Flaglor v. Crow, 40 Ill., 410, reversed the decree of 1854 made on the bill of review, thereby reviving and leaving in force the original decree of partition entered in May, 1851. This gave the Flaglors their first success. But the decree of 1851 omitted to order the necessary deeds, without which, at law, its declarations of an estate in fee in favor of the daughter could not operate. To overcome this difficulty, Elizabeth Flaglor, the daughter, in 1867, commenced these suits against Seth Wadhams and other purchasers in possession from and under her father.

She claimed in her bills that her father never had but a life estate; but if otherwise, still that by force of the decree in partition she had acquired of him the equitable title in fee by an estoppel of record or res judicata; and she accordingly demanded of his grantees a conveyance of the legal title, and an accounting from the time of his death. The first one of these cases, that against Wadhams et al, was tried before Judge Jameson, in the spring of 1871. While he yet held that case under advisement, the great fire of October occurred, destroying the original papers, but copies were saved and at once furnished to the court, and in June, 1872, Judge Jameson delivered an opinion deciding the whole case in favor of the Flaglors, and referring it to the master to take the accounts.

This was a second victory on that side. In December, 1872, another of these cases, that against Miller et al., resting substantially upon the same facts and points as the Wadhams case, was heard by Judge Gary, who within a few weeks after delivered an opinion holding with the defendants and deciding the whole case against the Flaglors, who then sustained their first reverse. At the September term, 1873, of the Supreme court, the Wadham's case, there pending on appeal, was submitted to the court on arguments by F. H. Kales for Wadhams, one of the appellants, and by George Herbert and L. H. Boutell for the others, and by A. W. Windett and W. C. Goudy for Mrs. Flaglor Gay. In June, 1874, the Supreme court entered an order affirming the decree of the court below, by which the Flaglor side gained a third victory. Immediately, the counsel of Wadhams et al. filed their petition under the rules of the court for a rehearing, and obtained a stay of proceedings; and at the September term, 1874, a rehearing was granted them and an oral argument was ordered by the court for the last day of the term. At the time appointed, the case was orally argued by F. H. Kales for Wadhams, and by Messrs. Herbert and Boutell for the Engles and Day, and by Messrs. Goudy and Windett for Mrs. Flaglor Gay. On the 30th of January, 1875, the Supreme court gave judgment, reversing its own former decision and also that of Judge Jameson of June, 1872, and, on the merits, decided the whole controversy in favor of Wadhams et al. The opinion by SHELDON, J., is exhaustive and able, and is given in full in 7 LEG. NEWS, p. 169. The counsel of Mrs. Gay at once moved for a rehearing, and her application was considered at the September term, 1875. At the same term of the court, the appeal of Mrs. Gay in the Miller case came on to be heard, and was then orally argued for her by A. W. Windett, and for Miller et al. by F. H. Kales. At the close of that term the court denied the motion of Mrs. Gay for rehearing in the Wadhams case, thus leaving Wadhams and others completely victorious. On the 4th of February, 1876, the Supreme court gave final judgment in the Miller case, deciding against Mrs. Gay and affirming the decision of Judge Gary, made by him in the same case in 1873. The last opinion of the Supreme court in Gay v. Miller is very brief, and is here given in full, as follows:

"PER CURIAM: This cause rests upon the same state of facts, substantially, as that of Wadhams et al. v. Gay decided at the September term, 1875, of this court, and is governed by the decision in that case; and for the reasons expressed in the opinion filed therein, the decree is affirmed."

Thus, the final decision in Wadhams v. Flaglor Gay, a case argued on both sides by some of the most able counsel at the bar, comes to the profession well authenticated; for, like a common recovery well suffered in the olden time, it hath its double voucher, and on the whole the result is a valuable contribution to jurisprudence.

While arguing a case before the United States Supreme Court in Washington, a few days ago, Albert Pike made a clever reply to an objection of Attorney General Pierrepont. The Attorney General had questioned the evidence of one of Mr. Pike's witnesses on the ground of the extreme age of the man—73 years—and presumptive failure of his faculties. "Well, your honors," said Mr. Pike, "I don't altogether like that myself, for I am now 66 years old, and in a little while I shall be 70, and even 73, and I am somewhat sensitive about old men with no memories. I see on the bench before me one justice hearing this case who is 69 years old, another who is 72, and I would like to ask with what force the Attorney General's argument strikes them that a man has no memory at their ages." Mr. Pierrepont yielded the point. Curiously enough, the client for whom Mr. Pike was arguing was ex-Governor Rector, of Arkansas, with whom he had once fought a duel.

LAURA M. PENNY
No. 218. v.
CRANE BROS. MANUFACTURING CO.

Appeal from Superior Court of Cook.

A GUARANTEED NOTE—COLLATERAL SECURITY.

Held, that taking collateral security for the payment of a guaranteed note does not release the guarantor.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

BREESE, J.—This was assumpsit in the Superior Court of Cook county by Crane Brothers Manufacturing Company against Laura M. Penny, as guarantor of a promissory note, made by the firm of Penny, Weeks & Company to I. J. Spaulding and Company, for eighteen hundred dollars, payable forty days after date, at the First National Bank, with interest thereon at ten per cent., and indorsed to plaintiff. The defendant filed three special pleas, upon which issues were made up and afterward by leave of the court, filed the plea of the general issue. The cause was tried by a jury, and resulted in a verdict for the plaintiff, on which a motion for a new trial having been overruled, judgment was rendered. To reverse this judgment the defendant appeal.

Two points are raised by the pleadings. First, defendant was discharged by reason of the laches of the plaintiff in failing to prosecute the makers of the note. That plaintiff should have proceeded against them, they having property subject to execution, citing Allison v. Waldham, 24 Ill., 132, in support of this position. In the opinions of the court in that case, this language is used: "The evidence shows that the plaintiff should have sued the maker of the note, and tried at least to have collected the debt before resorting to this special guarantor. What was the extent or terms of this special guaranty, the case does not inform us. They may have required the maker of the note should be prosecuted to insolvency before the guarantor should be liable. It could not have been an unconditional guaranty, for this court had held in Heaton v. Hulbert, 3 Scam., 489, that the liability of a guarantor when guaranty was absolute and unconditional, as in this case, does not depend upon the solvency or insolvency of the maker or indorser of the note and the holder is not required to institute any proceedings against the maker. The same doctrine was held in Rich v. Hathaway, 18 Ill., 548, and again in Parkhurst v. Vail, adm., decided at September term, 1874. This we believe, is the accepted doctrine of all courts. The next point is, that taking a new note for fifteen hundred dollars, as collateral security for the balance due on the note in suit, and the transfer of the collateral note, before its maturity, to the First National Bank, the note in suit, all the time remaining in the possession, custody and control of appellees, and no transfer thereof having been made to the bank, without the knowledge or consent of appellant, discharged her from liability on her guaranty.

Appellant claims the rule is, that the holder of the paper must hold himself in readiness to give the guarantors an immediate right of action against the maker of the note, at any time the guarantors chooses to pay up the claim.

This was the ground assumed by appellant in her second special plea, which alleges that appellees agreed with the makers of the note in suit, after it became due and payable, to receive and accept of them a promissory note for the amount then remaining due and unpaid, as and for collateral security for this note, and that the makers of this note in suit made another note, dated July 3, 1873, whereby they promise to pay, two months after its date, to the order of H. I. Robinson, the sum of fifteen hundred dollars, at No. 91 Washington street, for value received; that Robinson endorsed and delivered this note to plaintiff, and that plaintiffs accepted it as and for the note in suit as collateral security, without the consent of the defendant, and that plaintiffs afterwards sold, transferred and delivered this note to the First National Bank of Chicago, and which then and there became the property of that bank, (and without any notice to the bank that the note was executed and delivered merely as collateral security for the note in suit,) and so remained the property of said bank until the maturity thereof.

The facts here stated were traversed by the plaintiffs' replication, and on the trial by the jury; the object and intention of the giving the secured note, and its transfer to the bank, was for the consideration and determination of the jury. The claim of appellant is, this Robinson note was received by the plaintiffs in payment of the balance due on the note in suit, and asked this instruction, which was given: If the jury believe from the evidence, that by the agreement between the plaintiffs and Penny Weeks and Company, the note for $1,500 introduced in evidence, if paid at maturity, was to be payment of the balance due on the 3d day of July, 1873, on the note for $1,800, then the defendant was discharged from her liability by the taking such new notes, and the verdict must be in her favor. The finding of the jury negatives this hypothesis, and is conclusive the Robinson note was received with no understanding or agreement it was to be in discharge of the note in suit. From all that appears in this record, this note was held as collateral merely to the note in suit, and though discounted by the bank, was, at maturity, not being paid by the makers, returned to the plaintiffs, who offer it in court to be surrendered. Admitting the rule to be as claimed by appellant, she always had it in her power to sue makers of this note, she guaranteed. It was never at any time out of the possession and control of appellees, and all she had to do was to call at their house of business and take it up. She was never, for one moment, prevented of a timely action against the makers. Appellant is mistaken in supposing her right of action against the makers of this note was at any time suspended. On its maturity she could have paid it, and then brought her action,—there was no obstacle in her way. The note of Robinson was received only as collateral, and taking it as such, could not by any possibility release this note. The jury, under a proper instruction, have found the note was taken as collateral only, and we know of no rule of law forbidding the holder of a guaranteed note taking collaterals.

It is true, as argued by appellant, if one takes a note for goods sold and delivered, or for a like consideration, and the vendor transfers the note by endorsement, placing the title in another, the vendor cannot recover on the original consideration, and that is the doctrine of the case of Harris v. Johnston, 3 Cranch, 311, cited by appellant. And the reason is obvious, the vendor might be subject to two judgments—the one on the original consideration, the other on the note outstanding in the hands of another party, and double satisfaction might be received.

Admit, as argued by appellant, that when a debt is transferred as collateral security for another debt, the creditor becomes the agent for the collection, and the amount collected, after deducting proper charges, is a proper credit on the debt intended to be secured. Now does this affect appellee's right to recover, in this case, so far as appellant is concerned? It is most clearly, for her interest the debt she has guaranteed should be reduced to the smallest dimensions before a recovery is brought against her.

Whatever amount, then, appellees might have collected, or did collect, on the Robinson note, would go to her credit. She certainly cannot complain of such a transaction. The proof is quite conclusive in this case that the note was taken as collateral, and not as a conditional payment.

The undertaking of appellant, being absolute and unconditional, and the Robinson note being received by appellees as collateral only, appellant cannot escape from her guaranty.

As to the instructions, we are of opinion they were properly disposed of by the court, and finding no error in the record, the judgment must be affirmed.

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

OPINION FILED JAN. 21, 1876.

DANIEL EVANS v. HENRY P. GEORGE et al.

Appeal from Superior Court of Cook.

SUIT TO RECOVER BACK MONEY PAID ON LAND CONTRACT—RECORDING CONTRACT NO DEFENSE—INDIVIDUAL DEBT NO SET-OFF TO JOINT-CLAIM—INSTRUCTIONS.

Defendants, as agents for one H., made a contract with plaintiff to procure for him a warranty deed of certain lands from H., supposed to be the owner thereof, on which plaintiff, at the date of the contract, made a payment to defendants. The contract provided that defendants were to procure for plaintiff such deed within a reasonable time or refund the money thus paid, and that the sale was made subject to owner's ratification. H., on being applied to by defendants for such deed, refused to ratify or carry out the sale, of which they notified plaintiff. He then put the contract on record, and afterwards sued defendants to recover back the money he had paid. Held,

1. The recording by plaintiff of the contract, whether by direction of defendants, or of his own motion, had nothing to do with his right to recover in the action. The court's instructions on behalf of defendants, to the effect that such recording was a bar to plaintiff's right to recover, unless he had "released or offered to release the rights thereby acquired by him," were calculated to mislead the jury.

2. The subsequent contracts between the parties could have no possible connection with the transaction on which this suit was brought, unless it was shown that in making the same the money paid by plaintiff to defendants was in some way adjusted with him.

3. INSTRUCTIONS.—An instruction which directed the attention of the jury only to facts favorable to defendants, and left out of view all that tended to illustrate plaintiff's theory of the case was improper.

4. Instructions based on hypothetical cases, supposed to have been made by irrelevant testimony admitted by the court, had the effect to confuse the jury.

5. An instruction which asserted that the jury have the right to disbelieve such witnesses as in their judgment, under all the circumstances of the case, are unworthy of belief, is not the law.

Opinion by SCOTT, C. J.

This action was brought to recover money paid on a contract made with defendants as agents for one Hynes, supposed to be the owner, for the sale to plaintiff of a certain tract of land. The contract was in writing, was signed by defendants as agents, and contained this clause. "We to procure for him said deed within a reasonable time, or refund the sum now paid." That sum was two hundred and fifty dollars. The agreement contained the further provision, "sale made subject to ratification of owner." Hynes lived in Vermont, and when applied to for that purpose refused to ratify the contract.

Afterwards, defendants made another contract with plaintiff for the sale of a part of the same tract of land, upon which he advanced the further sum of $360. This contract was subject to the same conditions as the former one. On application to Hynes, he refused to ratify the second contract, and thereupon the $360 advanced upon it was returned to plaintiff.

It is not contended that at this or any other previous time defendants had refunded to plaintiff $250 advanced to them under the first contract, but plaintiff insists he was urged by defendant George and under his advice placed the agreement on record in the recorder's office of the county, and that defendants promised to refund him the $250 in a short time.

Shortly after these transactions it was discovered that Hynes was not the owner of the lands about which the parties had been negotiating, but one Morse was the real owner. After the dissolution of the co-partnership between the defendants, such negotiations were had with George by which plaintiff purchased the lands of Morse. The latter sale was effected April 10, 1872. There is no pretence the $250 advanced on the first contract has ever been refunded unless it was done in some way on the Morse contract. But we are unable to find any satisfactory evidence that it was adjusted in that way.

It will not do to say the case presents a conflict of evidence, was properly submitted to the jury on proper instructions, and for that reason the verdict ought to be permitted to stand. Upon looking into the instructions we find every one of the series given on behalf of the defendant in some particular, faulty. We cannot undertake to comment on each of them, but will speak of them in a general way that will indicate our disapproval of the whole series.

The proposition asserted that the jury have the right to disbelieve such witnesses as in their judgment, under all the circumstances of the case, are unworthy of belief, is not the law. The jury, although they are the judges of the credibility of the witnesses, have no right, arbitrarily, to disbelieve the testimony, unless where such witness has wilfully and knowingly sworn falsely to material facts in the case.

Whether plaintiff had placed the first contract on record in the proper office by the direction of George or of his own motion had nothing to do with his right to recover in this action, and the instructions of the court on that subject were highly calculated to mislead the jury. It was shown not only that Hynes had refused to ratify the contract, but that he had no interest whatever in the land. Whether the contract was on record or not could make no difference. It bound no one and it is not claimed that it did.

Much irrelevant testimony was admitted, and some of the instructions are based upon hypothetical cases supposed to have been made by such evidence. The effect was to confuse the jury. The subsequent contracts between the parties can have no possible connection with this transaction unless it is proposed to show that in making such contracts the matter of the $250 was in some way adjusted with plaintiff. The note given by plaintiff to George was an individual transaction, and in no view was it proper evidence in this case.

In the last instruction of the series, the court undertook to give the jury a summary of the principal facts which they were to consider in their deliberations on their verdict. It directed their attention only to facts favorable to defendants, and left out of view all that tended to illustrate plaintiff's theory of the case. It is the duty of the jury to consider all the facts, and when the court assumes to direct their attention to the facts it should refer them to all the facts, so as to present the case fairly for both parties; otherwise the jury might understand the facts stated in the instructions are the only ones necessary to be considered in deliberating on their verdict. C. B. & Q. R. R, v. Griffin, 68 Ill.

The judgment will be reversed and the cause remanded.

Judgment reversed.

EVIDENCE OF FOREIGN LAW.

The law of evidence has been thought to constitute the most praise-worthy portion of our jurisprudence, and, indeed, to have been brought very near perfection by the efforts of Bentham, and the other eminent text-writers who have followed him. But there are some obvious defects even in this department of jurisprudence, and it is well that in a period of legal reform like the present the attention of the Profession and of the general public should be drawn to them with a view to their rectification, when any instance of the inconvenience resulting from them occurs. The recent case of In the goods of Bonelli affords a salient example of such a defect. In that case, in order to prove the Italian law on the subject of the position of a "curator of the dormant inheritance" of one Gaetano Bonelli, a native of Turin, an affidavit of a "certified special pleader," who stated that he was "familiar with Italian law," was produced. Sir J. Hannen, however, rejected an application for administration with the will annexed, based on this affidavit, and held, following Bristow v. Sequeville (5 Ex., 275), that "the law of a foreign country cannot be proved even by a jurisconsult, if his knowledge of it be derived solely from his having studied it in a foreign university."

This statement of the existing law is undoubtedly correct. The laws of a foreign country must be proved as facts, or, in other words, whenever foreign law, whether written or unwritten, is to be proved, that proof cannot be taken from the book of the law, but must be derived from some skilled witness who describes the law: (Taylor on Evidence, 1231, 2; Best on Evidence, 31, 653; Powell on Evidence 302.) Strong doubt indeed appears to be thrown on the correctness of this rule, or at any rate on its application to every species of foreign law, by the dicta of various judges in some of the earlier cases: (R. v. Picton, 30 How. S. T., 491, per Lord Ellenborough; Clegg v. Levy, 3 Ca., 166, per Lord Ellenborough; Miller v. Heinrick, 4 Id., 155, per Gibbs, C. J.; Boehthinck v. Schneider, 3 Esp., 158, per Lord Kenyon, where it was held that the proper mode of proof of foreign written law was by copy properly authenticated), but it has been thoroughly; established by several modern decisions (Dalrymple v. Dalrymple, 2 Hagg. Cons. R., 54; Sussex Peerage Case, 11 Cl. & F., 85, 114–117; Baron de Bode's Case, 8 Q. B., 208, 250–267; Lord Nelson v. Lord Bridport, 8 Bl., 527; Vander Donckt v. Thellusson, 8 C. B., 812; Perth Peerage Case, 2 H. L. Cas., 865, 873; Duchess di Sora v. Phillips, 33 L. J., 129, Ch., quoted in The Stearine, &c. Company v. Heintzmann, 17 C. B., N. S., 60.) At present, therefore, the laws, usages and customs of foreign States must be proved either by a professional man, as a judge, an advocate, a barrister, or an attorney, or by a person holding some official situation in the State in question (Taylor on Evidence, 1233, and the cases there cited), whilst, apparently, no assistance is rendered to litigants by the 7th section of Lord Brougham's Evidence Amendment Act of 1851 (14 & 15 Vict., c. 99), which, though rendering certain foreign and colonial instruments provable by duly certified copies, only applies to proclamations, treaties, and other acts of state, and to judgments, decrees, orders, and other judicial proceedings.

That under such a state of things great inconvenience must frequently arise, will be obvious when it is considered how many points both of written and unwritten foreign law come before our courts, and how difficult, in a great number of cases, it must be to procure the direct evidence of a legal expert as to the existence or nature of the particular foreign enactment, custom or usage in dispute. The occurrence of the hardship to which we have alluded is calculated to become more frequent with the extension of our foreign relations, and it is probable that public opinion would welcome from the Legislature a short enactment to the effect that foreign law might be proved by books purporting to be printed or published under the authority of the government of the country in question, and to contain an exposition of such law. A provision to this effect has been inserted in the last Indian Evidence Act (Act No. 1 of 1872, § 38), and a similar rule obtains in many American States with respect to printed copies of the statutes of any other State of the Union (Story's Conflict of Laws, § 641*n*, and see the important case of Ennis v. Smith, 14 How., 400, there quoted, in which a copy of the civil code of France, purporting to be printed at the Royal Press, Paris, was held admissible in evidence) and apparently also in some cases, with respect to unwritten law (Ib., § 642; Carnegie v. Morrison, 2 Met. (Mass.), 381, 404, per Shaw, C. J.; Young v. Templeton, 4 Louis, Ann, 254).—The London Law Times.

MISS GOODELL'S APPLICATION DENIED.

A WOMAN CANNOT EARN HER LIVING BY THE PRACTICE OF LAW IN WISCONSIN.

The Wisconsin State Journal of the 15th ult. says:

On the 16th of December, we published the petition of Miss Lavinia Goodell, of Janesville, asking to be admitted to practice in the Wisconsin Supreme Court. She was regularly admitted to the bar in the 12th Judicial Circuit over a year ago, and is now engaged in practice there. She had a case which was appealed to the Supreme Court, and she wished to appear for her clients in that tribunal.

The court denied the application on the 15th. The opinion is elaborate, and critically examines the statutes and fortifies and illustrates the opinion advanced. It is held that if the legislature has power to prescribe terms of admission to practice in courts, and that is a legislative and not a judicial power, there is no Wisconsin statute authorizing the admission of females to the bar, from which the common law has always excluded them. The rule of construction, applying words of masculine gender to females, is only permissive to and in construing statutes according to legislative intent, and neither in or out of the statute can any such intent to admit women to the bar be found. If this rule of construction were applied to other statutes, to which it was equally applicable, it would break down all distinctions of sex in the State government, and also admit women to nearly all public offices, legislative, executive and judicial. It would also subject women to prosecution for paternity of bastards and for rape. The court says it is not sorry that no statute can be found admitting women to the bar of State courts, for it does not think it the proper place for the exercise of her peculiar qualities, or for the preservation of her purity.

There will be very decided dissenting opinions expressed by members of the bar and by the people, respecting the policy of excluding from the bar a citizen over twenty-one years of age, of good moral character, learned in the law, and well qualified to practice, solely on the ground that the applicant is a woman. If her purity is in danger, it would be better to reconstruct the court and bar, than to exclude the women.

COUNCIL BLUFFS, WISCONSIN—THE WESTERN TERMINUS OF THE UNION PACIFIC RAILROAD DECLARED TO BE THE IOWA SHORE OF THE MISSOURI RIVER.

No. 584. In the case of the Union Pacific Railroad Company against Hall and Morse, it is held that Hall and Morse, residents of Council Bluffs, have sufficient interest as citizens to maintain the suit, and that it is the duty of the company, under the acts of Congress, to operate the whole road as one connected, continuous line, and that the bridge over the Missouri river, between Omaha and Council Bluffs, is a part of the road, to be used in connection with and as a part of the entire line. It is said that if Congress did not intend to require the construction of the road from the imaginary line in the middle of the river channel (which would be an impossibility), which is the legal boundary of Iowa, the intention must have been that the initial point should be either on the Iowa shore or on the Nebraska shore; and if the Nebraska shore was intended, why was it not designated? It is impossible to give a satisfactory answer to the question, say the court, or to the question why the Iowa boundary was designated, if the eastern or Iowa shore of the river was not intended to be the terminus of the road.

The authority of the company to build the road to the Iowa shore was within itself power to build a bridge over the Missouri river. No express grant to bridge the river was needed, as whatever bridges were needed on the authorized line were as fully authorized as the line itself. All authority given to the company was as a railroad and not as a bridge company. The bridge was to enable the road to connect with other roads, and it was to be built for no other uses. They were not allowed to charge rates of toll over it which they did not charge over other portions of their line. The acts chartering the company manifest no intention to distinguish between the bridge over the Missouri and other bridges on the line of the road. If it is not a part of their road, neither is any bridge between the Missouri and the western boundary of Nevada; for the power to build all bridges was given in the same words. Affirmed.

STRONG, J., delivered the opinion.

BRADLEY, J., dissenting, is of the view that the Missouri river is generally understood to be the western boundary of Iowa, and that the fair construction of the character of the Union Pacific Company is that their road was to extend from that river westwardly.

MILITARY AUTHORITY IN THE STATES SUBSEQUENT TO THE CLOSE OF THE WAR—WHEN THE WAR ENDED IN SOUTH CAROLINA.

No. 146. In the case of Raymond against Strauss, from the Supreme Court of South Carolina, the Supreme Court of the United States that the war of the rebellion ended in South Carolina on the 2d of April, 1866, and that the military officers remaining in command there between that date and the return of the State to the Union had no authority under the acts of March and July, 1867, to annul a decree of a court of equity of the State. Hence, such an order made by Gen. Canby was an arbitrary stretch of authority, and was properly disregarded by the court below. Affirmed. SWAYNE, J., delivered the opinion.

U. S. CIRCUIT COURT D. OF INDIANA.

OPINION, FEB. 28, 1876.

WM. P. BURDICK v. JUDSON HALE et al.

REMOVAL OF CAUSE FROM STATE TO FEDERAL COURT—ACTS CONSTRUED.

Opinion by GRESHAM, J.

On the 15th day of December, 1869, judgment was rendered in the Marion civil Circuit Court in favor of the defendant, Julia Hunt, against her co-defendant, Judson Hale, on her cross-complaint, in which she alleged that she was the owner of the note sued on by the plaintiff. On the 10th day of December, 1873, the Supreme Court of the State reversed this judgment and remanded the cause for a new trial. On the 14th day of October, 1874, the plaintiff, who was a citizen of the State of New York, filed his petition in the State court for the removal of the cause to this court, on the ground that from prejudice and local influence he would not be able to obtain justice in the State court, and with said petition he filed a bond.

On the 29th day of May, 1875, the State court, on the motion of the plaintiff, accepted the bond and ordered that no further steps be taken in the cause in that court.

The defendants now appear and move to remand. It will be observed that the application for removal was under the act of March 2, 1867, and action by the State court was delayed on the same until after the passage of the act of March 3, 1875.

Was there such a compliance with the act of 1875 as divested the State court of jurisdiction?

The bond is penal in form, but the place where the penal sum should have been inserted is left blank. An undertaking to pay an indefinite amount would have satisfied the act, but this instrument is not an agreement to pay anything. No sum being named as a penalty in the contract, it created no liability. But if the bond were not open to this objection, it is insufficient for other reasons. The condition is that the plaintiff shall file in the Circuit Court of the United States "copies of all process" in the action and cross-action.

Section 3 of the act of 1875, declares that the party entitled to remove the suit shall file with his petition for removal a bond, with good and sufficient surety, for entering in the Circuit Court of the United States, on the first day of its next session, a copy of the record in such suit, and for paying all costs that shall be awarded by the said Circuit Court, if said court shall hold that said suit was wrongfully or improperly removed thereto. The act clearly requires that the party on whose petition the suit is removed shall give a bond to do more than file copies of the process in the Federal court. The surety in this bond will be liable for no costs if this suit is sent back to the State court.

If, as was intimated in argument, the act of 1867 was not repealed by the act of 1875, the plaintiff is equally unfortunate, for he failed to comply with the requirements of that act by offering good and sufficient surety for his entering in the court copies of "all process pleadings, depositions, testimony and other proceedings in said suit, and for doing such other appropriate acts."

But it was held in the Danville railroad case, reported in the 7 Chicago Legal News, p. 241, that the act of 1875 repealed the act of 1867, and that ruling must be accepted as law in this district.

It will not do to say that the requirements of the act as to the filing of a petition and bond in the State court are merely directory, and that such defects in the bond as have been pointed out in this case may be cured by amendment in this court.

Congress has prescribed the mode for removing causes from the State to the Federal courts. The Federal courts have no power to dispense with or modify or change any of the provisions of the statutes authorizing the removal of causes from one jurisdiction to the other. Unless the requirements of the act, which are jurisdictional pre-requisites, are substantially complied with, the power of the State court remains undisturbed. If in this case the requirements of the statutes have been substantially complied with, the State court has lost jurisdiction over the suit, and no amendment of the bond is necessary to complete the jurisdiction of this court. If, on the other hand, the requirements of the act have not been complied with, the suit is still in the State court, and there is nothing in this court to amend. The jurisdiction of the State court over a controversy rightfully in its possession, as in this case, cannot be dislodged except by fully complying with the requirements of the act of Congress authorizing the transfer of causes from the State to the Federal tribunals.

It was further urged in support of the motion to remand, that the suit having been once tried in the State court, it was too late to remove it to this court under the act of 1875. But in view of what has been already said as to the insufficiency of the bond, it is not necessary to rule upon that question. The motion to remand is sustained.

Edwin H. Lamme, for plaintiff; Harrison, Hines & Miller, for defendant.

POLITICS AND THE JUDICIARY.

We notice in a recent issue of the Quincy Herald, the announcement that an election for Judge of the Supreme Court for this the Fourth District, occurs on the first Monday in June. The Herald then says: "The present incumbent from this district is Judge Walker, who is a candidate for re-election; but as there will be other candidates in the field, it will be necessary to call a convention to consider their respective merits. With a view to arranging the time and place for holding such convention, the chairman of the Adams county democratic committee has issued a circular to the committees of the other counties inviting a consultation at Mt. Sterling at an early date." The Herald then adds this significant suggestion: "The district is overwhelmingly democratic, and the choice of the proposed convention will undoubtedly be ratified by the people." Now, we cannot yield to the suggestion of the Herald that a partisan convention should be called to determine upon the respective merits of candidates for the Judicial office.

Such a course is vicious in principle and dangerous in its tendency. The Supreme Court is the final arbiter between men of all shades of political opinions, of every variety of religious creed, and of every degree of wealth and poverty. No conditions of the election of a Judge should exist, which, by possibility, suggest that he goes upon the bench as the representative of a political party, or of anybody else, as a class. If we, as democrats may with propriety nominate a candidate for Judge, because he is a democrat, then the Methodists, the Presbyterians, or the Roman Catholics may, with the same propriety, insist that their respective creeds shall be represented upon the bench. A man's religion has as much to do with his fitness for the office of Judge as his politics, and probably a good deal more. We are glad to be able to protest against so dangerous a principle in a district which the Herald says is "overwhelmingly democratic." We want democrats to be consistent with themselves, not advocate one rule of conduct in a district "overwhelmingly democratic," and exactly the opposite in a district which is overwhelmingly Republican. We cannot afford to stultify ourselves after this fashion. If we are to look at this subject as democrats at all, we should bear in mind that four of the seven Judicial Districts in this State are Republican in politics; yet of the seven Judges on the Supreme bench five are democrats.

Since 1860, this State has been "overwhelmingly" Republican, and still so consistently have the people acted on the idea that politics had nothing to do with the Judiciary, that during all these years of Republican domination, a majority of the judges of the Supreme Court have been democrats.

The people seemed to have ignored politics in selecting the men who are to sit in judgment upon their rights. The recent Judicial election in the Chicago district suggests a lesson of peculiar significance to politicians. Judge Dickey, a Democrat, was elected in a Republican district by a large majority over Mr. Hurd, who was the nominee of a Republican convention. Nine years ago, the second or middle grand division was Republican in politics by a majority of nearly three thousand—yet Judge Walker, a Democrat, was elected by a majority of six or seven thousand over his competitor, Judge Emerson, who was the nominee of a Republican convention. We do not now call to mind a single instance where the people have not defeated the nominee of a political convention for the office of Judge, and we hope they will always continue to do so. The Herald suggests that as other candidates besides Judge Walker will be in the field. "it will be necessary to call a convention to consider their respective merits." Why such a necessity? Are not the people competent to determine for themselves who is competent to be a Judge? The masses of the people are not all statesmen, nor lawyers, nor "college-bred," and thank God they are not all politicians, but they have an element in their make-up which stands them well in hand whenever an emergency arises; and that which sometimes overwhelms statesmen and lawyers and college-bred folks, and even politicians themselves. That element in the people is their broad common sense. You may go right out here in the country and find a farmer feeding his stock, and ask him who is the best lawyer in Jacksonville, and, although he may not know a demurrer from a piece of cheese, he will pick out the right man. If you have a land suit, he will select the very one; if you want a patient chancery lawyer, he will unerringly name him; and, if you have a nasty, scandalous suit, he will tell you to a dot who can throw more dirt with a wider shovel than any other lawyer in town. If there are to be other candidates besides Judge Walker, let them announce themselves, and the people will "consider their respective merits" without the advice of a partisan convention. We have heretofore announced our willingness to support Judge Walker for re-election. We did so, not because he is a democrat, but because he is an able and experienced Judge, and of the purest personal character as a man. We could not, however, even support Judge Walker as the democratic candidate of a democratic convention. Politics and the Judiciary should be as separate as the poles.

We copy the above from the Jacksonville Sentinel of this week, and fully endorse all it says about keeping the election of the judges of the Supreme Court out of politics. Judge WALKER is known to the people to be strictly honest. He has spent the best years of his life in their service. His experience on the bench, and his knowledge of the history of the jurisprudence of the State, will greatly add to his efficiency as a judge and the value of his services to the people should he be again elected, which we have no doubt he will be. When a judge has served many years faithfully and with distinguished ability, and is still able to properly perform the duties of his office, it is neither right or prudent to try a new man in his place.

THE COURT KNEW ALREADY.—The Nevada Silver State gives the following amusing account of the examination of a witness:

At a recent trial in the Elko county court our friend Bishoff, of the Humboldt brewery, was called as a witness. Mr. Bishoff is one of the "solid men" of Elko, where he has been in business since the town was started, in the winter of 1858. Upon being sworn, Counsellor Rand, one of the attorneys in the case, who, by the way, is an old resident of Elko, said: "Mr. Bishoff, where do you reside?" "Where I reside? What for you ask me such foolish things? You drink at my place more as a hundred times." "That has nothing to do with the case on trial, Mr. Bishoff. State to the jury where you reside." "De shurry! de shurry! Oh, by jiminy! effery gentleman on dis shurry has a string of marks on mine cellar door just like a rail fence." His honor here interceded in the counsellor's behalf, and, in a calm, dignified manner, requested the witness to state where he resided. "Oh, excuse me, shudge. You drinks at my blace so many times and pays me nothing, I dinks you know old Bishoff, vat keeps the brewery."

OPTION CONTRACTS.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of this State, in pamphlet form, in the Chicago Board of Trade case, involving the validity of option contracts, will be sent to any address, postage paid, upon receipt of thirteen cents.

TRUSTEE'S SALE.—WHEREAS, WILLIAM CUNningham and Ellen Cunningham, his wife, did, on the twenty-fifth day of November, 1874, execute and deliver to the undersigned, as trustee, their trust deed dated on the day and year aforesaid and recorded in the recorder's office of Cook county, Illinois, on the 5th day of December, 1874, in Book 420 of records, on page 534, which said trust deed was given to secure the payment of said William Cunningham's certain promissory notes, of same date as trust deed, and due two years after the date thereof, for the sum of two hundred ($200.00) dollars, with interest at the rate of ten per cent. per annum, payable semi annually, the several semi-annual interest installments being evidenced and secured by his four notes of even date with said trust deed, payable to himself or order in six (6), twelve (12), eighteen (18), and twenty-four (24) months after the date thereof, respectively, for the sum of ten ($10.00) each, with interest, after due, at ten per cent. per annum, all payable at the office of A. Loeb & Brother, Chicago, Ill.

And whereas, default has been made in the payment of two semi-annual interest notes for ten ($10.00) dollars each, due respectively in six (6) and twelve (12) months after the date thereof, and whereas, in accordance with the terms of said trust deed, the legal holder of said principal note for two hundred ($200.00) dollars, and of said interest notes, has elected to consider the whole of said principal sum secured by said trust deed due and payable, and the amount now claimed due, with the interest to date is two hundred and twenty-five 39-100 ($225.39) dollars.

And, whereas, the legal holder of said principal and interest notes has made application to the undersigned, the trustee in said trust deed named, and requested him as such trustee to sell and dispose of said premises under the power in said trust deed, and for the purposes therein stated.

Now, therefore, notice is hereby given, that I, the undersigned, by virtue of the authority in me, by the said trust deed vested, will, on Wednesday the 5th day of April, 1876, at ten o'clock in the forenoon, at the north door of the Board of Trade building, in the city of Chicago, county of Cook and State of Illinois, at public auction, to the highest and best bidder for cash, sell the premises described and conveyed by said trust deed, to wit:

That certain part of lots number eight (8) and nine (9), in C. J. Hull's subdivision of block number six (6), in the Canal Trustees' subdivision of the southeast quarter of section number seventeen (17), township number thirty-nine (39) north, of range number fourteen (14), east of the third (3d) principal meridian, described as follows, to wit: Commencing on the southwest corner of said lot eight (8), running thence north along the west line of said lot eight (8), eighty (80) feet, thence east on a line parallel with the south line of lot number forty-three (43), in same subdivision, thirty-seven and a half (37½) feet, thence south on a line parallel with the west line of lot eight, twenty (20) feet, thence west on a line parallel with the south line of mentioned lot forty-three (43), twelve and a half (12½) feet, thence south along the east line of said lot eight (8) to the south line of said lot eight, thence west along the south line of lot eight (8), to the place of beginning, situate in the county and State aforesaid, with all the right, title, interest and equity of redemption of the said William Cunningham and Ellen Cunningham, his wife, their heirs and assigns in and to the said above described premises.

UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT.

OPINION FILED FEB., 1876.

HOOVER, Assignee of OPPENHEIMER, v. WISE et al.

COLLECTION OF CLAIM AGAINST A PERSON AFTER AN ACT OF BANKRUPTCY—KNOWLEDGE BROUGHT HOME TO ATTORNEY EMPLOYED BY COLLECTING AGENCY.

1. Where a creditor gave his claim against a debtor in a distant State to a collecting agency for collection, and such agency employed an attorney, who procured a confession of judgment thereon from the debtor, well knowing at the time that he was insolvent, and collected the money on such judgment and sent it to the collecting agency, but it was not paid over to the creditor, and proceedings in bankruptcy were commenced against the debtor within four months after the confession of judgment, and were prosecuted to a decree. Held, in an action by the assignee in bankruptcy against the creditor to recover back the amount of the judgment, that the attorney who made the collection was the agent of the collecting agency and not of the creditor, and that the knowledge of the financial condition of the debtor, which the attorney had was not the knowledge of the creditor, and that the action could not be sustained.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

Mr. Justice HUNT delivered the opinion of the Court.

This action is brought by an assignee in bankruptcy to recover back a sum of money collected from the bankrupt after the occurrence of several acts of bankruptcy.

Under the practice of the State of New York the case was referred to a referee upon whose report judgment was entered at the special term in favor of the plaintiff. From this judgment an appeal was taken by the defendants to the general term.

Upon the hearing at the general term this judgment was reversed and a new trial was ordered.

When a judgment is reversed and a new trial ordered, two modes of proceeding are open to the defeated party in the practice of the State of New York. He can accept the terms of the order, and take a new trial in the court below. If he supposes that he can make a better case upon the facts than is contained in the report of the referee, this will be his proceeding. If he can make no improvement in this respect, or if he is satisfied to risk his case upon the facts as found, he may take an appeal to the Court of Appeals from the order granting a new trial. To make this appeal effectual his notice of appeal must contain "a consent on the part of the appellant that if the order appealed from be affirmed, judgment absolute shall be rendered against him.—(Code, §11.) The order for a new trial thus becomes a final judgment in the case.

The latter course was adopted in the present instance. The plaintiff appealed to the Court of Appeals, giving the stipulation required for that purpose. The Court of Appeals affirmed the judgment of the general term, and remitted the record to the Supreme Court, that the judgment might be there entered and enforced. From this judgment, entered upon that remittitur, the present writ of error is brought.

It appears from the record that an account or money demand was delivered by its owners to Archer & Co., a collecting agency in the city of New York, and received by them, with instructions to collect the debt, and with no other instructions; that this agency transmitted the claim to McLennan & Archibold, a firm of practicing lawyers in Nebraska City. Several acts of bankruptcy had been committed by Oppenheimer when Mr. McLennan persuaded him to confess judgment for the debt thus sent to him. Proceedings in bankruptcy were instituted against Oppenheimer within four months after such confession, and were prosecuted to a decree of bankruptcy. At the time of receiving the confession McLennan was well aware of the insolvency of Oppenheimer and that the confession was taken in violation of the provisions of the bankrupt act.

The money collected was remitted to the collection agents in New York, from whom he received the claim, but never paid by them to Wise & Greenbaum, the creditors.

When the debt in question was delivered to the collection agency in New York, it was so delivered, as testified by one of its owners, "for collection." "Archer & Co.," he says, "were collection agents in New York. I gave them no directions except to try their best to collect it. They told me they would send it out (to Nebraska). I gave no other instructions." "The business of Ledyard, Archer & Co. (he says) was to take claims for collection in different parts of the country, and if necessary have them sued."

Mr. Archer, of the collection firm, testifies that he received the claim for collection; that he told the defendants if sent on at once he thought it could be collected; that the account was verified by one of the defendants and sent by the witness to Mr. McLennan, a lawyer, at Nebraska City; that he afterwards told the defendants the account had been put in judgment and that he hoped to make the money, or the greater part of it. When he made this communication he had McLennan's letter in his hand, and communicated it to the defendants. He further testified that the money had been received by him from McLennan. but had never been paid over to Wise & Co.

The referee held that the knowledge of the condition of the bankrupt by the attorneys residing in Nebraska, who took the confession of judgment, was the knowledge of the creditors in New York. The Supreme Court and the Court of Appeals adjudged otherwise, holding them to be the agents of Archer & Co., and not of Wise & Greenbaum, the creditors. It is upon this point of difference that the case is presented for decision.

The general doctrine that the knowledge of an agent is the knowledge of the principal cannot be doubted. (Bk. v. Davis, 2 Hill, 451; Ingalls v. Morgan, 10 N. Y., 178; Fulton Bk. v. N. Y. & S., 4 Paige, 127.)

It must, however, be knowledge acquired in the transaction of the business of his principal, or knowledge acquired in a prior transacrion then present to his mind, and which could properly be communicated to his principal. (The Distilled Spirits, 11 Wall., 356; Weeser v. Morgan, 10 N. Y., 178.)

Neither can it be doubted that where an agent has power to employ a sub-agent, the acts of the sub-agent or notice given to him in the transaction of the business, have the same effect as if done or received by the principal. (Story Ag., §§ 452, 454; Storrs v. City of Utica, 17 N. Y., 104; Boyd v. Vandenberg, 1 Barb. Ch., 273; Rourke v. Story, 4 E. D. Smith, 54; Lincoln v. Battle, 6 Wend., 475.)

It is no answer to this liability to say that the act done by the agent was of a fraudulent character, and that the principal did not authorize the commission of a fraud. For a fraud committed by a partner or an agent the principal is not liable criminally, but he is liable in a civil suit if the fraud be commited in the transaction of the very business in which the agent was appointed to act. (Story Ag., § 452-4; Griswold v. Haven, 25 N. Y., 600, 602; Farmers' & M. v. B. & D. P., 16, 125; 3 Ch. Com. L., 209; N. R. Bk. v. Aymar, 3 Hill, 262; Davis v. Bemis, 40 N. Y., 453, n.; Attorney-Gen. v. Sidden, 1 Cromp. & Jer. 219.)

Upon these general principles we find no difficulty. But the real question still remains. Was McLennan, of Nebraska, the agent and attorney of Wise & Company, the owners of the debt, or were Archer & Co., the collection agents, his principals, and was it to them only and not to Wise & Co., that he stood in the relation of agent and attorney?

The evidence was uncontradicted in every particular. It became, therefore, as stated in the opinion of the Court of Appeals, a question of law whether the evidence sustained the findings of the referee.

The rule of law is undoubted that for the acts of a sub-agent the principal is liable; but that for the acts of the agent of an intermediate independent employer he is not liable. It is difficult to lay down a precise rule which will define the distinctions arising in such cases. The application of the rule is full of embarrassment. For a collection of the cases and illustrations of the doctrine, reference may be had to Story on Agency, § 454, and following.

Without attempting to harmonize or to classify the conflicting authorities, we think the case before us falls within a particular range of decisions, in which the preponderance is undoubted.

Among these are the following:

In Reeves v. The State Bank of Ohio, (8 O. Stat. Rep., 465), the case was this: Reeves & Co. deposited for collection in the Commercial Bank of Toledo, their draft for $500 on Buckingham & Co. of New York. The draft was forwarded to the American Exchange Bank in New York, and on the 31st of November, 1854, it was paid and the amount credited to the Commercial Bank. On the 27th of the same month, the Commercial Bank became insolvent and its assets passed into the possession of the State Bank. Reeves & Co. sued the State Bank as the representative of the Commercial Bank, alleging that the latter bank was their agent and that the money collected in New York for the latter bank on their draft, belonged to them. In an elaborate and exhaustive opinion, in which all the cases, English and American, were reviewed, the Supreme Court of Ohio held, among other things: 1. That the Commercial Bank was responsible to Reeves & Co. for the conduct of the New York bank, and was liable to them for the amount of the draft immediately on its collection in New York. 2. That the New York bank was the agent of the Commercial Bank and not the sub-agent of Reeves & Co. The action was sustained.

In Mackay v. Ramsay, 9 Clark & Fin. 818, "M. employed R. & Co., bankers in Edinburg, to obtain for him payment of a bill drawn on a person resident at Calcutta. R. & Co. accepted the employment, and wrote promising to credit M. with the money when received. R. & Co. transmitted the bill in the usual course of business to C. & Co. of London, and by them it was forwarded to India, where it was duly paid. R. & Co. wrote to M. announcing the fact of its payment, but never actually credited him in their books with the amount. The house in India having failed, it was held that R. & Co. were agents of M. to obtain payment of the bill, that payment having been actually made, they became ipso facto liable to him for the amount received and that he could not be called upon to sustain any loss from the conduct of the sub-agents as between whom and himself no privity existed." "To solve the question, says Ld. Cottenham, it is not necessary to go deeper than to refer to the maxim: qui facit per alium, facit per se. R. & Co. agreed for a consideration to apply for payment of the bill; they necessarily employed agents for this purpose who received the amount; their receipt was in law a receipt by them and subjected them to all the consequences. The appellants, with whom they so agreed, cannot have anything to do with those whom they so employed, or with the state of the account between different parties engaged in this agency." The banker thus receiving the draft from its owner was held liable for the acts of the person employed by him, although free from negligence or fraud.—(Cited 8 Oh., sup., p. 481.)

In 3 Seld., 459, The Montgomery Co. Bk v. The Albany City Bk. and Bk. of The State of New York, the former bank sent to the Albany City Bk., for collection, a draft for $1,800, payable 30 days after date. The Albany bank transmitted the same for collection to its correspondent, the Bank of the State of New York, in the city of New York who neglected to present the same for payment on its maturity, by means of which negligence the amount thereof was lost. The Court of Appeals of the State of New York held that the Albany bank was the agent of the Montgomery bank, that the bank of New York was the agent of the Albany bank and not of the Montgomery bank, and that the Albany bank was liable to the Montgomery bank for the neglect of its New York correspondent. To this many cases are cited. The recovery below against the Albany bank was affirmed, and the judgment against the New York bank was reversed.

To the same effect is The Com. Bk. of Pen. against The Union Bk. of New York, 1 Kern., 203, and Allen v. Merchants' Bk., 22 Wend., 215.

These cases show that where a bank, as a collection agency, receives a note for the purposes of collection, that its position is that of an independent contractor, and that the instruments employed by such bank in the business contemplated are its agents, and not the said agents of the owner of thenote. It is not perceived that it canmake any difference that such collection agency is composed of individuals, instead of being an incorporation. These authorities go far towards establishing the position that Archer & Co., in the case before us, were independent contractors, and that the parties employed by them were their agents only, and not the agents of Wise & Co. in such manner that Wise & Co. are responsible for their negligence or chargeable with their knowledge. There are, doubtless, cases to be found holding to the contrary of these views, but the principle they decide is nevertheless well established.

Cases, no doubt, may also be found where actions have been sustained by the creditor against the last agent, or where he is charged with his acts, in which the point before us was not raised or brought to the notice of the court. Such cases are not authority on the point. Nor do we think any great difficulty arises from the case of Wilson v. Smith, 3 How., 770. That decision is based upon the case of Commonwealth Bk. v. Bank of New England, (1 How., 234,) (which is the only case referred to in the opinion,) and in which case the question was not raised. The question there was not of privity, but of the right to retain under the circumstances stated. Again, in that case, it was held, from the course of dealings between the banks, that it was fairly to be inferred that it was understood between them that the collections should be held subject to a settlement of accounts.

There is, however, another class of cases still more to the point.

In Bradstreet v. Everson, 72 Pa. St. Rep., 124, the case was this: The defendants were a commercial agency in Pittsburg, with agents throughout the United States, for the collection of commercial paper. The plaintiffs delivered to them, for collection, four drafts payable in Memphis, Tennessee. They sent them to Mr. Wood, their agent in Memphis, who obtained the money upon them, and, becoming embarrassed, failed to remit. On being called upon for the money the defendants attempted to excuse themselves on the ground that they followed the instructions of the plaintiffs, and were their agents merely, reporting from time to time, and that Wood. who received the money, was not their agent, that he was a reputable man, and that they had never received the money from him.

Among other points they insisted upon the following, viz: 7. If the plaintiffs placed the acceptances in the defendants' hands for collection, and knew that their personal attention and direct service in such collection would not, in the usual course of business, be given to it at Memphis, and that the employment of an attorney to attend to it at Memphis was necessary, or the proper and usual course of doing such business, then the plaintiffs thereby made either such person or defendants their agent therein, with power to employ an attorney or sub-agent therein at Memphis, and their immediate agent under such authority would not be responsible for any default of such sub-agent, if selected with reasonable care and diligence. And again they insisted —9. If the plaintiffs gave defendants at Pittsburg acceptances to collect at Memphis, they thereby constituted defendants their agents therein, and such agents are not responsible for any loss so long as they have used the usual diligence and conducted themselves according to the usual course of doing such business. The questions now before us were thus directly presented. In a careful opinion delivered by Mr. Justice Agnew, citing many authorities, these propositions are overruled. The court hold that the receipt for collection imported an undertaking by the collecting agent himself to collect, not merely that he receives it for transmission to another for collection, for whose negligence he is not to be responsible. He is, therefore, liable by the very terms of his receipt, for the negligence of the distant attorney who is his agent, and he cannot shift the reponsibility from himself upon his client.

Lewis & Wallace v. Peck & Clark, 10 Ala. R., 142, and Cobb v. Beake, 6 Ad. & Ellis, 930, are to the same purport. The last-named case is especially full and explicit.

We are of the opinion that these authorities fix the rule in the class of cases we are now considering, to wit, that of attorneys employed, not by the creditor, but by a collection agent who undertakes the collection of the debt. They establish that such attorney is the agent of the collecting agent, and not of the creditor who employed that agent. We concur, therefore, in the conclusion reached by the Court of Appeals of the State of New York, that McLennan was not the agent of Wise & Greenbaum, the New York creditors, in such a sense that his knowledge of the bankrupt condition of Oppenheimer is chargeable to them. Whether a different conclusion would have been reached if the money had come to the hands of Wise and Greenbaum, we are not called upon to consider.

The judgment is affirmed.

Mr. Justice MILLER dissenting.

I feel constrained to express my dissent to the opinion of the court just delivered. Wise & Greenbaum were the owners of the notes in this case. The judgment, which was undoubtedly a preference within the meaning of the bankrupt law, was taken in their name and for their use and benefit. The attorney who procured the bankrupt to confess judgment acted for them, and was compelled to use their name. If the notes had been sent by them directly to McLennan, the attorney, it is conceded that they would have been liable in this action. I am at a loss to see how their liability is changed by the fact that the notes were sent to him through a commercial or collecting agency. This agency had no interest in the notes, was not liable to the attorney for his fees, nor to the bankrupt for costs, if an unsuccessful suit had been brought. The notes were not endorsed to this agency, nor could it in any manner have prevented Wise & Co. from controlling all the proceedings of the attorney for collecting the money.

The numerous cases cited from various courts of the relations between banks acting as collectors of money, among themselves and with others, stand on a different basis.

In all such cases the note or bill is either endorsed to a bank or made payable to it. The bank sues, if necessary, in its own name. It passes the amount usually to the deposit account of the person from whom received originally, and the account is so passed as between corresponding banks.

It is from this course of dealing that the series of decisions have been made referred to in the opinion.

So, also, there are numerous cases in which the first agent of a note, or claim owner, may have acquired vested rights, as for fees or advances, or other considerations, which, as between themselves, authorized the first agent to control the debt.

But these cases differ very widely from the case before us, in which there is no evidence that the collection agency had a particle of interest or any right to control the proceedings for collection adversely to the owner of the notes.

The effect of the decision is that a non-resident creditor, by sending his claim to a lawyer through some indirect agency, may secure all the advantages of priority and preference which the attorney can obtain of the debtor, well knowing his insolvency, without any responsibility under the bankrupt law.

Very few creditors, when this becomes well known, will fail to act on the politic suggestion.

Mr. Justice CLIFFORD and Mr. Justice BRADLEY concur in this dissent.

OPINION DELIVERED JAN. 24, 1876.

No. 61—THE WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH COMPANY, Appellants,
v.
THE WESTERN AND ATLANTIC RAILROAD COMPANY.

Appeal from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Georgia.

A CONTRACT AND LEASE RELATING TO THE RUNNING OF A TELEGRAPH LINE BY A RAILROAD CONSTRUED.

Mr Justice MILLER delivered the opinion of the court.

The State of Georgia, which was the sole owner of a railroad called the Western and Atlantic Railroad, desiring the use of the telegraph for the purposes of the road along its lines an instrument of writing was signed on that subject by William Orton, president, on behalf of the Western Union Telegraph Company, and by Foster Blodgett, superintendent of the railroad, which was approved by Rufus B. Bullock, governor, and countersigned by H. C. Carsen, secretary of the executive department. This instrument was dated August 18, 1870.

The substance of this agreement was that the telegraph company should put up and set apart on its line of poles already there, along said railroad, a telegraph line for the exclusive use of the railroad; and equip it with as many instruments, batteries, and other necessary fixtures as might be required for use in the railroad stations; to run the wire into all the offices along the line of the road, and put the same in complete working order. Other provisions of the agreement related to the terms on which the officers of the road might transmit and receive messages through the connecting lines of the telegraph company; to the right of way of the telegraph company along the line of the road, and other matters regulating the use of the wire and compensation for it. The sixth article of the agreement bound the State to pay the cost of constructing the wire and of equipping the same at railroad stations not already supplied with instruments, batteries, and other necessary fixtures, as soon as this cost could be ascertained.

Shortly after the wires were put up and the instrument in working order, the governor of the State leased the road for twenty years, under authority of an act of the legislature, to certain persons, who became a body corporate by the name of the Western and Atlantic Railroad Company.

The instrument witnessing the contract, professed to grant, convey and lease to the Western and Atlantic Railroad Company, "the Western and Atlantic Railroad, which is the property of the State of Georgia, together with all its houses, work shops, depots, rolling-stock, and appurtenances of every character, for the full term of twenty years."

The railroad company took possession of the road and its appurtenances under the lease, including the wire and batteries and instruments put upon the road and in its offices by the telegraph company under the contract with the State. But having this possession, they refused to pay for the transmission of messages over connecting lines, according to the terms of the contract, and claimed that they were not bound by it, and that in fact a true construction of that agreement was that the State had bought and paid for the wire and instruments, and owned them, and as lessees of the State, the company had the right to control and use them without any liability to the telegraph company.

The bill of complaint of the telegraph company, after stating the refusal of the railroad company to recognize its rights in any respect, while they insisted on using the wire and apparatus, refusing also to allow complainants any use of the wires and instruments in their offices and depots, alleges that these considerations induced complainants to treat as revoked and withdrawn all power and privilege on the part of defendants to use said wire and apparatus, or to receive compensation therefor, and that complainants, seeking to recover possession of them, had been hindered and obstructed by the defendants in so doing. The bill prays that defendants be enjoined from using said wire, from hindering or obstructing plaintiffs in the use of it, or in severing it from all the offices of defendants, and for such other and further relief as the nature of the case requires.

Defendants in their answer deny that the contract between the telegraph company and the State is valid, being without authority of law; deny that, if valid, they, as lessees of the railroad, are bound by its terms; and assert that, by the true construction of the contract, the State became the purchaser and owner of the wire and instruments, and that the company succeeded to this ownership without being bound by the other terms of the agreement.

The railroad company also filed a cross-bill, setting up this view of their rights, and praying an injunction against the telegraph company to restrain it from interfering with the use of the wire and apparatus so acquired from the State.

The district court dismissed this cross-bill on demurrer, and, on hearing the original bill of complainants on the answer and evidence, decreed that the wire and instruments in question are the property of the State of Georgia, and are included in the lease to the railroad company, and that this company is not bound by the terms of the contract in other respects, unless adopted by it, and therefore dismissed the bill.

We differ with the district court as to the construction of the instrument. We do not think that the State simply bought a wire and batteries and other instruments, and became absolute owners of them. On the contrary, we think that the contract was for the use of a wire and instruments of the telegraph company.

The language of the first covenant of the telegraph company is that it agrees "to set apart on its line of poles along said railroad a telegraph wire for the exclusive use of said party of the second part." The further covenants are all consistent with this. The contract for the use of this wire in connection with the others, and for the use of one of the wires already there, when this shall be disabled, the fact that it is placed upon the poles of the company already in use for two other wires, the agreements regulating the offices, and, in short, the whole frame of the contract shows that the wire, the poles, the instruments, were the property of the telegraph company, with exclusive use of this wire transferred to the railroad.

This view is perfectly consistent with the idea that the State should pay the cost and expense of the additional wire and instruments rendered necessary by this agreement for its exclusive use, which does not prove that anything more than this right to exclusive use passed to the State.

If this be true, the railroad company, taking possession of this wire and instrument under claim of right from the State, must use it on the terms which bound the State, or not use it at all.

The ownership being in the telegraph company, the road could only have such use of it, lawfully, as it acquired from the State; and the right of the State to the use of it is governed by the terms of the agreement.

It is said the contract between the State and the telegraph company is void because the superintendent and the governor had no power to make it, and because it is oppressive and extortionate.

We do not decide whether this be so or not. Whenever the railroad company or the State shall cease to use the wire, shall abandon the contract and leave the instruments severely alone, and the complainants shall seek to compel compliance with the contract after that, it will be time to decide that question. But so long as this company gets the benefit of the contract by the use of the wire and the apparatus, it must also abide its terms in other respects.

We are embarrassed in this view of the subject by the unskillful character of the bill. The relief it seeks is the very last one would think of, namely, to enjoin the railroad company from the use of a wire and battery and instruments running along their line, and fixtures in their offices and depots, where they may remain until it be the pleasure of the complainants to take them away. The right to compensation for what the complainant has suffered by the failure of defendants, while using the wire, to comply with the covenants of the State, can be understood; and the right of defendants to use the wire when they perform the covenants of the State, can be understood: the right to a rescission of the contract, if either party prayed for it, can be understood; but this right which each claims, that he shall be let alone by the other to do as he pleases in regard to this wire, is very diffiault to understand.

Plaintiff also says he treats as revoked the power and privilege of defendant to use the wire and instruments. Is this an abandoument of the contract by plaintiff?

But there is in the bill a prayer for such other and general relief as the case may require. There is also the following stipulation after the pleadings are all in, which relieves us of much difficulty:

"It is agreed by counsel that if the use of the wire by the defendant is affected by the contract entered into between the complainant and the State (which contract is copied in the exhibit to the bill) in such manner as that the terms of said contract must be observed and complied with by defendant in order to retain the right to such use, the case is one proper for reference to the master to take an account, unless the court should adjudge that there is no right in complainant to relief in equity."

Now, we are of opinion that the use of the wire by defendant is affected by the contract between complainant and the State, in such manner that if they choose to use it they must comply with its terms as we have already said.

We are also of opinion that, to prevent multiplicity of suits, and to have an accounting, instead of bringing a suit on every specific violation of the covenants of the State, complainants have a right to relief in equity.

The decree of the circuit court is, therefore, reversed, with directions to refer the case to a master to state an account on the terms of the contract between the State and the telegraph company, as between the complainant and defendant, for the time defendant has used the wires, batteries and equipments put up under that contract, and to render a decree for that amount.

Mr. Justice FIELD dissents.

DISTRICT COURT OF THE NORTHERN DISTRICT OF OHIO.

OPINION, MARCH 4*th*, 1876.

C. S. Barrett et al. v. Schooner Wacousta.

WHAT ARE "GOING RATES."

WELKER, J. The libellants, on the 15th of November, 1873, entered into a charter party with the defendant, whereby it was agreed that said schooner should carry a cargo of coal for the libellants, from the port of Cleveland to the port of Toronto, Canada, for two dollars and twenty-five cents in gold per ton, or the going rates, at the time the schooner should report for loading. The capacity of the vessel was four hundred tons. The vessel, through the master, reported for load on the 20th of November, 1873, to the libellants, and the master then claimed that $2.50 in gold per ton was the going rate, which was denied by the libellants, they asserting that $2.25 was then the going rate, and refused to agree to pay more. Thereupon the master refused to load the coal, which was then ready to be loaded, or take it upon the vessel, and the vessel did not carry the coal for the libellants; and they, after the refusal, contracted with the schooner Moss to carry the coal to Toronto at the rate of $2.50 in gold per ton, which difference in price they seek to recover in this suit. The contract was proven to be as above stated.

There was a good deal of evidence given on both sides to ascertain and settle what was the going rate at this port for the port of Toronto on the 20th and at the time the defendant reported, the libellant claiming it was $2.25, and the defendant it was $2.50. Several experts were examined and much difference of opinion was manifested as to how "going rates" were established and ascertained, some claiming that the prices fixed in the last charter party made at the port for the port of Toronto determined the rate, and others that whatever might be offered vessel owners by shippers made the "going rate." The testimony showed that in the forenoon of the 20th, and up to the time the defendant reported for load, the last contract of shipment for Toronto made between shipper and carrier was $2.25 in gold per ton. That before the master reported for load, he had been offered by Mr. Crawford $2.50 in gold per ton, and that when he reported to libellants, he informed them of the offer, and proposed to carry for them at the same rate, which they refused, and said they would rely on their contract. Afterwards, on the same day, the master made a contract with Crawford at the rate of $2.50 in gold, which was the first contract for that price made on that date and was followed by the one made by the libellants with the schooner Moss, at $2.50.

The question to settle is: What was the going rate at the time the defendant reported to take load? If $2.25, then the libellants are entitled to recover; if $2.50, then they must fail in their suit. It will be necessary, before determining the question, to understand what is meant by "going rate," and how it is established or ascertained in the port. Rate means price, value. "Going rate" as to freight, like "market price" for produce, means a fixed and established price for the time. To make a market price there must be buying and selling, purchase and sale. The price of gold on 'Change is fixed by sales made. A price cannot be established by a mere offer to sell or an offer to purchase. Sales must be consummated by agreement to make a market price. The minds of the buyer and seller must unite on a price. So of a rate for freight. It cannot be established by the mere offer of a shipper or demand of a carrier. It can only be done by an actual contract having been made in the port, and the last one so made for the same port, would fix the rate. If, however, on a given day the price has varied, being raised, lowered, and raised during the day, the rate for the day would be an average of the rates, which should be regarded as the going rate for that day. If, on a given day, no contracts for shipments had been made, then those of a preceding day would constitute the going rate for that day, and would continue until changed by an actual shipping contract made at a different rate. If mere offers by shippers, or demand of carriers, could establish the rate, then there would be no certainty in the fulfillment of that large class of contracts made for freight at going rates. Shippers would have it in their power to reduce freight at their pleasure, and carriers could increase them as might best subserve their interests.

The only safe, and the true rule is, that rates of freight are fixed and established by actual contracts in the market, and can only be changed by contract in good faith, made in the port for like services. The evidence in this case shows very satisfactorily that no contract had been made in this port before the refusal of the defendant to carry the coal for libellants, for any higher price than $2.25 in gold, and that the defendant in fact made the first contract after such refusal at the new rate of $2.50 per ton. This contract then changed the rate to $2.50, and the libellants had to conform to such increase in their contract with the Moss. The defendant, therefore, in refusing to carry the coal for the libellants at $2.25 in gold, per ton, as the contract bound the defendant to do, violated the contract of shipment, and for which the libellants are entitled to recover.

Another question is made on the hearing, which is not distinctly made in the answer of the defendant, and which it is claimed, prevents the libellants from a recovery in the case. The evidence shows that the libellants had sold the coal, to be carried on the vessel to a firm at Toronto, by the name of Conyer & Co., the freight to be paid by the consignee on its receipt. It also shows that the contract with Conyer & Co. was that they should receive the coal chargeable with a freight of only $2.25 in gold per ton. It is also shown that the consignees paid the $2.50 in gold per ton freight for the coal shipped on the Moss, on its receipt — that afterwards, and after this suit was commenced, the libellants settled with Conyer & Co., and paid them the difference in the freight so paid by the consignees. On this state of facts, it is claimed the libellants had no right in these proceedings against the defendant, having no interest in the contract and sustaining no damages.

The answer to this claim is, that by this contract the coal sold only being chargeable with $2.25 per ton, to be paid by the consignee, any excess paid over that sum was necessarily a loss to that extent on the value of libellants' coal and the price they were to receive for it, and therefore a damage to them in the amount their consignees were then compelled to pay.

Decree for the libellants for $123.91.

MIX, NOBLE & WHITE, for libellants.

U. S. DISTRICT COURT OF MASS.

IN RE WHITNEY ET AL.

BANKRUPTCY—WHEN DISCHARGE OF BANKRUPT WILL BE REFUSED BY REASON OF OPPOSITION OF CREDITOR BEING BOUGHT OFF, ETC.

LOWELL, J.—The third specification of objection to the discharge of the bankrupts is, that they, or some person in their behalf, procured the assent of Reuben G. Morse, a creditor, to their discharge, by the payment of money. The evidence tended to show that the brother of one of the bankrupts bought the claim of Morse a considerable time after it had been proved against the estate; that the name of Morse is signed to the assent after four others, and before the sixth and last. It appeared that the purchase of the debt was negotiated like any other purchase, Morse asking three hundred dollars and obtaining only two hun dred Nothing was said between the parties about discharge, so far as the witnesses recollected, and it was not proved when the assent was given. The brother testified that he bought the debt for the chance of a dividend, that he had no communication with the bankrupts before buying, and that afterwards his brother told him he did not want to hear anything about it, lest fraud should be charged. I am satisfied, from the clear weight of the evidence, that no one of ordinary business capacity could have bought this debt with any expectation of a dividend exceeding two hundred dollars; for this, among other reasons, that he could probably have bought the whole assets for that price instead of a rather small fraction thereof. Upon the whole, I feel justified in believing, though against the positive testimony of the purchaser, that he must have had some other end to attain than the receipt of a dividend; and none can be thought of but that which was attained.

By the English law, when the certificate of discharge required the assent of creditors, it was held to have been obtained by fraud, if any one, even without the knowledge of the bankrupt, paid money to induce a creditor to sign it: Robson v. Calze, Doug., 227; Holland v. Palmer, 1 Bos. and P. 95. Lord Eldon regretted that the law had gone to such a length as to make void a certificate obtained by inducements offered by a friend or enemy without any priorty on the part of the bankrupt, and when, as he said, the bankrupt, perhaps, would have abhorred such means of procuring it: Exp. Butt, 10 Vol., 360; Exp. Hall, 17 Vol., 62. And he is said to have permitted a bankrupt in one case to apply for his discharge anew. Exp. Harrison, 2 Buck, 247 n.

Our statute speaks of a consideration given "in behalf" of the bankrupt, and was perhaps intended to vary the old rule to some extent; I have held that where the evidence was clear and undisputed that the opposition of a creditor had been bought off by one who was a surety of the bankrupt on certain bonds in court which it was for the interest of the surety to have discharged, and the surety acted wholely on his own account and without consultation with or care for the bankrupt, the discharge could not be vacated for that cause; the payment not having been one in behalf of the bankrupt in the sense of the law. That creditor had signed no assent.

But, I observed in that case, that different considerations might arise when a signature of a creditor had been obtained by money and placed upon the paper in such a way that it might have influenced other creditors to sign. This has been always held to be, in itself, a fraud on creditors, independently of any clause in a statute, and without regard to who has made the payment. Jackson v. Lomas, 4 T. R., 166; Leicester v. Rose, 4 East, 372; Dunglish v. Tenant, L. R. 2, Q. B., 49; Phillips v. Dicus, 15 East, 248. There is, besides, this circumstance in the present case: that the payment was made by a friend, with no conceivable motive but to benefit the bankrupt. In such a state of things it would be unsafe not to have the presumption, a very strong one, I will not say conclusive, that such a payment is made in the debtor's "behalf." In many of the decided cases it has appeared that the consideration has moved from a friend or relative of the debtor, and it would be very easy, of course, to conceal the motive. If it were clearly proved, as in the case already referred to, that a distinct and intelligible motive had influenced the action of the third person, and that the debtor was ignorant of the action until after it had been committed, I am still of opinion that the certificate ought not to be refused, unless other creditors may have been misled. I do not find that the debtors have made out such an exceptional case. I am obliged to say debtors, because the paper was a joint one, and though the claim was bought by the brother of only one of them, it operates to the advantage of both, and must be presumed to have been done in behalf of both.

Discharge refused.

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

OPINION FILED JAN. 21, 1876.

THE COUNCIL OF THE VILLAGE OF GLENCOE
v.
THE PEOPLE EX REL., JOHN A. OWEN.

Error to Cook.

MANDAMUS TO COMPEL COUNCIL TO CALL AN ELECTION—WHO ARE PROPER PARTIES—SERVICE OF SUMMONS BY SPECIAL DEPUTY.

1. SERVICE BY SPECIAL DEPUTY.—That the service of summons may be by special deputy, and that in making the return of service it is not necessary for such special deputy to use the name of the sheriff. It is otherwise when the return is made by a deputy sheriff.

2. SERVICE ON A MUNICIPAL COUNCIL.—That service of summons in a mandamus case need not be on each member of a municipal council; that the peremptory writ, however, is governed by different principles, and should be served upon those composing the council at the time of the service.

3. MUST CALL THE ELECTION WITHIN A REASONABLE TIME.—That eight months postponement of a day for holding an election which it was the duty of the council to call, is an unreasonable postponement, though there was a discretion to be exercised by the counsel as to the day. That any postponement not authorized by some apparent public necessity would be unjustifiable.

4. MANDAMUS THE REMEDY.—That mandamus is the proper remedy in this case.

5. WHO MAY PROSECUTE.—That the prosecution was properly carried on by the relator.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

Opinion by SCHOLFIELD, J.

This appeal is prosecuted to reverse a judgment of the court below awarding a peremptory mandamus against "The Council of the Village of Glencoe." Several errors are assigned which we shall proceed to pass on in the order of their presentation by the counsel for the respondents.

There was no appearance by the respondent before judgment was rendered, and it is insisted the respondent was not properly brought before the court.

"The Village of Glencoe" was incorporated by an act of the legislature, approved March 29, 1869, by section one, article two, whereof it is enacted "the municipal government of said village shall be vested in a council, consisting of a president and five councilmen, who shall be elected," etc. The summons runs to "The Council of the Village of Glencoe." It is endorsed as follows: "I hereby depute and appoint J. W. P. Hovey special deputy to serve this writ, this 9th day of October, 1874."

"T. M. BRADLEY, Sheriff."

State of Illinois, } ss.
Cook County, }

J. W. P. Hovey, being duly sworn, saith that he is the special deputy above named, and that he served the within writ on H. B. Wilmarth, President of the Council of the Village of Glencoe, by reading the same to him, and delivering him a copy thereof on October 9, 1874. J. W. P. HOVEY.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 10th day of October, 1874. Signed, John A. Owens, Notary Public, and his notarial seal is also affixed.

The specific objections made are,

1st. The return should have been in the name of the sheriff. 2nd. The writ should have been against "The president and councilmen of the village of Glencoe," and it should have been personally served on each of them.

1st. If the service had been by a general deputy it admits of no controversy; the return should have been in the name of the sheriff. In such case, the act is in presumption of law, the act of the sheriff and the mere return of the service in his name is ordinarily conclusive. This was the English law (1st Sharswood's Blackstone, pp. 344-5 and notes) and it is so provided by our statute. (R. S. 1874. chap. 125, p. 990, § 12.) But the appointment of a special deputy to make service in a single case is authorized by other provisions of the statute, having, as we conceive, no dependence upon or connection with those relating to the appointment and duties of general deputies. It must be conceded that it is competent for the legislature to prescribe how and by whom writs shall be served, and what shall be accepted as evidence that they have been served, for we think there can be found no constitutional provision which prohibits the legislature to authorize personal service of process to be made otherwise than by or in the name of the sheriff.

The tenth section of the statute before referred to, provides, "A sheriff may appoint a special deputy to serve any summons issued out of a court of record by indorsement thereon substantially as follows: 'I hereby appoint —— my special deputy to serve the within writ,' which shall be dated and signed by the sheriff." The next section, the eleventh, provides: "Such special deputy shall make return in the time and manner of serving such writ under his oath, and for making a false return he shall be guilty of perjury, etc." Thus, it will be observed, instead of the requirement being as in the twelfth section, where it is required that the general deputy shall act in the name of the sheriff, that is omitted, and it is only required the special deputy shall make return "under his oath," and this under the pains and penalties of perjury. This difference in phraseology we regard as intended to authorize the return to be made as it was in this instance, the vital requirement being that it shall be under he oath of the special deputy. It sufficiently appears by the appointment endorsed on the writ, and the oath of the special deputy, in what capacity he acted, and the mere form of the return cannot, under these circumstances, be held to release the sheriff from liability for his act.

We think the return, although it might have been more formal to have used the name of the sheriff, is sufficient under the statute.

2nd. The duty sought to be enforced is claimed to be imposed upon the "Council of the Village of Glencoe." No other branch of the municipality has anything to do with it. The writ was, therefore, properly directed, The People ex rel v. The Mayor, etc., of Bloomington, 63 Ill., 208.

The object of the writ is to coerce the performance of a duty which is claimed to be obligatory on the council as a body, without regard to the individuals who compose that body. There might, therefore, be an entire change in the members composing the council, without in any wise affecting the proceeding. The duty sought to be enforced, although to be discharged by one branch of the corporate body, is nevertheless a corporate duty, and the proceeding might, with equal propriety, have been against the corporation—the ultimate result being precisely the same. See Dillon on Municipal Corps., § 701. We are of opinion, therefore, that service upon the president which is authorized by § 7, R. S. 1874, P. 775, in suits against villages, is sufficient. The peremptory writ, however, is governed by different principles and should be served upon those composing the council at the time of the service.

The next question to which our attention is invited, is, does the petition show sufficient grounds, conceding, as we must, its allegations to be true for issuing the peremptory writ?

The allegations material to the questions are, the village of Glencoe is incorporated under a special charter; that on the 16th day of July, 1874, a petition signed by thirty voters of the village, among whom was the relator, was presented to the council of the village (the president and trustees of said village, in whom all legislative authority is vested, being designated in the village charter as the "Council of Glencoe"), which council was then in session, requesting the council to submit the question whether said village will be organized as a village under the act of the legislature of this State, in force July 1st, 1872, "entitled an act to provide for the incorporation of cities and villages," to the decision of the legal voters of said village; that at the same time a motion was made by a member of the council that the question be submitted to the legal voters of the village at an election to be called for that purpose on the 4th day of August, 1874, which vote was laid over by a vote of the council until the next meeting thereof; that at the next meeting of the council no action was had on the petition; that at a meeting of the council held on the 10th day of August, 1874, motion was made that the election prayed by the petition be held on the first Tuesday of October, 1874, another member of the council moved to amend this motion by substituting the first Tuesday of April, 1875, for the first Tuesday of October, 1874, which was adopted; and the council then ordered the election prayed for to be held on the first Tuesday of April, A. D. 1875, but did not designate any place for holding the election or elect any judges therefor, nor did they cause any notice to be given of the time and place of holding such election, and they have taken no other action in regard to such election.

It is alleged that the designation of the first Tuesday in April, 1875, is an unreasonable postponement of the time of holding the election prayed for; that it is the day designated by the present village charter for holding the annual election for village officers; that the designation of such time was made with the purpose and intention of unlawfully postponing and defeating the will of the voters of the village upon the question of reorganization, and it is stated as the opinion of the relator that it is the intention of a majority of the council to defeat said election by a failure to discharge the duties enjoined by the law.

It is argued by the respondent, the fixing of the time at which the election shall be held is a matter of discretion, in which the council cannot be interfered with by the courts.

By section one, article eleven of the statute relating to "Cities, Villages and Towns," R. S., 1874, p. 242, it is enacted: "Any town in this State, incorporated either under any general law for the incorporation of towns and acts amendatory thereof, or under any special act for the incorporation of any town or village, may become organized as a village under this act and in the manner following: Whenever any thirty voters in such town shall petition, the president and trustees thereof to submit the question whether such town will become organized as a village under this act to the decision of the legal voters thereof; it shall be the duty of such president and trustees to submit the same accordingly, and to fix a time and place within such town for holding such election and to appoint the judges to hold such election, and to give notice of the time, place and purpose of such election, by causing at least five notices thereof to be posted in public places in such town, for at least fifteen days prior to holding such election.

It is obvious that council had no discretion when the proper petition was presented, whether the prayer of the petition should be granted or not. The petition being in conformity with the statute, it was the plain duty of the council to act upon it at the earliest convenient moment, fix the time and place of holding the election, select the judges therefor, and give the required notice thereof. But inasmuch as no time is designated by the statute when the election shall be held, there was some discretion necessarily in the council in this regard. The implication of law, however, is that the time fixed should be within a reasonable period, in view of all the circumstances. Precisely what would be a reasonable time might, in many instances, be of extremely difficult solution; instances of what would be an unreasonable period can more readily be imagined which will serve the present purpose. For illustration: Had the election been postponed for ten years, or even five years, it would need no argument to show that it would amount practically to a denial of the right guaranteed to the petitioners. No one would pretend the discretion vested in the council could justify this. So it would seem to be equally clear that any postponement not authorized by some apparent public necessity would be unjustifiable. The discretion vested in the council can not be exercised arbitrarily for the gratification of feelings of malevolence or for the attainment of merely personal and selfish ends. It must be exercised for the public good, and should be controlled by judgment and not by passion or prejudice. When a discretion is abused and made to work injustice, it is admissible that it shall be controlled by mandamus. Tapping on Mandamus (Am. ed.), 66.

The change desired to be effected in the municipal government of the village through an election, was such as materially affected every citizen and tax-payer of the village. The petition was based on what were supposed sufficient reasons, having reference to the then existing state of affairs. If reform, to be brought about through this means, was needed, and desired by a majority of the voters of the village, it was a wrong and an outrage that they should be compelled to submit to the evils they labored under for another year, when the change might reasonably be effected within a month. If there were leeches in the treasury, a vicious revenue system, or imperfect police regulations, in the opinion of a majority of the voters, to be gotten rid of only through change in the organic law, they were entitled to have the change made as soon as it was practicable, and every day they were forced to submit to the continuance of the evils beyond that period, was so much arbitrary oppression by the council.

We can imagine no public necessity justifying the postponement of the election from the 16th day of July, 1874, to the first Tuesday of April, 1875. It has every appearance of an attempt on the part of those filling the council to perpetuate their own power to the utmost possible period, notwithstanding and in defiance of the wishes of the people. It is not admissible that this conduct shall be excused by the respondents assuming that a majority of the electors did not concur with the thirty petitioners, and therefore the election would have involved the village in useless expense.

That was the question to be settled by the election and it could in no other way be settled. The law gave the thirty electors the right to have the election, and to have it within a reasonable time, and its unnecessary postponement was in violation of that right.

The allegation of the petition, moreover, that this postponement was to defeat the will of the electors is by the default to be taken as true. Thus it is conceded the discretion in the council was abused and perverted to the attainment of an unjustifiable end.

If this postponement may be excused, it must follow, the council may, in the exercise of its discretion, indefinitely postpone the calling of an election, between which and an absolute refusal to call the election, the distinction is only in form and not in substance.

We have no hesitancy in saying the case is one in which mandamus properly lies. The only remaining objection is that the prosecution is carried on by a private citizen and not by a public prosecutor. The relator shows that he is a resident voter and tax-payer of the village.

It was said, in the County of Pike v. The State, 11 Ill., 207: "The question, who shall be the relator in an application for a mandamus, depends upon the object to be attained by the writ * * * * Where the object is the enforcement of a public right, the people are regarded as the real party and the relator need not show that he has any legal interest in the result. It is enough that he is interested, as a citizen, in having the laws executed, and the right in question enforced. See, also, City of Ottawa v. The People, 48 Ills., 235; Hall et al v. The People, 57, Id., 310.

These cases hold a different rule from that announced by the cases referred to by the respondent, but are conclusive here. The public prosecutor might undoubtedly have instituted this prosecution, but his failure to do so is no reason why the citizens, tax-payers, and voters of the village shall be denied the right to have the council perform its duty. The remarks in The People ex rel Stine v. Supervisors, 47 Ill., 259, referred to by the counsel for respondent, are not pertinent. They had reference simply to a contract in which the contracting party was asking no aid of the court and had no allusion to the case of a failure to perform a public duty.

We are of opinion there is no error in the record and the judgment must, therefore be affirmed.

Affirmed.

SUPREME COURT OF WISCONSIN.

OPINION FEB. 1876.

IN THE MATTER OF THE APPLICATION OF LAVINIA GOODELL TO BE ADMITTED TO THE BAR.

HELD, THAT A WOMAN CANNOT BE ADMITTED TO THE BAR IN WISCONSIN.

Opinion by RYAN, J.

In courts proceeding according to the course of the common law, a bar is almost as essential as a bench. And a good bar may be said to be a necessity of a good court. This is not always understood, perhaps not fully, by the bar itself. On the bench, the lesson is soon learned that the facility and accuracy of judicial labor are largely dependent on the learning and ability of the bar. And it well becomes every court to be careful of its bar and jealous of the rule of admission to it, with the view of fostering in it the highest order of professional excellence. The constitution makes no express provision for the bar. But it establishes courts amongst which it distributes all the jurisdiction of all the courts of Westminster Hall, in equity and at common law. Putnam v. Sweet, 2 Pew, 301. And it rests in the courts all the judicial power of the State. The constitutional establishment of such courts appears to carry with it the power to establish a bar to practice in them. An admission to the bar appears to be a judicial power. It may therefore become a very grave question for adjudication here, whether the constitution does not intrust the rule of admission to the bar, as well as of expulsion from it, exclusively to the discretion of the courts. The legislature has, from time to time, assumed power to prescribe rules for admission of attorneys to practice. When these have seemed reasonable and just, it has, generally, we think, been the pleasure of the courts to act upon such statutes, in deference to the wishes of a co-ordinate branch of the Government, without considering the question of power. We do not understand that the Circuit Courts, generally, yielded to the unwise and unseemly Act of 1849, which assumed to force upon the courts, as attorneys, any persons of good moral character, however unlearned or even illiterate; however disqualified by nature, education or habit, for the important trusts of the profession. We learn from the clerk of this court that no application for admission under that statute was ever made here. The good sense of the Legislature has long since led to its repeal. And we have too much reliance on the judgment of the Legislature to apprehend another such attempt to degrade the courts. The State suffers essentially by every such assault of one branch of the Government upon another, and it is the duty of all the co-ordinate branches scrupulously to avoid even all seeming of such. If, unfortunately, such an attack upon the dignity of the courts should again be made, it will be time for them to inquire whether the rule of admission be within the legislative or the judicial power. But we will not anticipate such an unwise and unbecoming interference in what so peculiarly concerns the courts, whether the power to make it exists or not. In the meantime, it is a pleasure to defer to all reasonable statutes on the subject. And we will decide this motion on the present statutes, without passing on their binding force.

This is the first application for admission of a female to the bar of this court. And it is just matter for congratulation that it is made in favor of a lady, whose character raises no personal objection—something, perhaps, not always to be looked for in women who forsake the ways of their sex for the ways of ours.

The statute provides for admission of attorneys in a Circuit Court, upon examination to the satisfaction of the judge, and for the right of persons so admitted to practice in all courts here, except this; but, that to entitle any one to practice in this court, he shall be licensed by order of this court. Taylor's Statutes, Chapter 119, Secs. 31, 32, 33. While these sections give a rule to the Circuit Courts, they avoid giving any to this court—leaving admission here, as i ought to be, in the discretion of the court. This is, perhaps, a sufficient answer to the present application, which is not addressed to our discretion, but proceeds on assumed right, founded on admission in a Circuit Court. But the novel positions on which the motion was pressed appear to call for a broader answer.

The language of the statute, of itself, confessedly applies to males only. But, it is insisted, that the rule of construction found in Sub. 2, Sec. 1, Chapter 5, R. S., necessarily extends the terms of the statutes to females. The rule is, that words in the singular number may be construed plural, and in the plural, singular; and that words of the masculine gender may be applied to females; unless, in either case, such construction would be inconsistent with the manifest intention of the legislature.

This was pressed upon us, as if it were a new rule of construction, of peculiar application to our statutes. We do not so understand it. It appears to be but a particular application of the general rule thus stated by TYNDALL, C. J.: "The only rule for the construction of Acts of Parliament, is, that they should be construed according to the intent of the Parliament which passed the Act." And it is not new or peculiar here. Potter's Dwarris, 111. The last clause of the rule, relating to sex, seems to be almost as old as Magna Charta. Coke, 2 Inst, 45. We apprehend that, unless in the construction of penal statutes, it has been little questioned since the much considered case of King v. Wiseman, Fortescue, 91. The rule is permissive only as an aid in giving effect to the true intent of the legislature. Even of a statutory rule, positive in terms, Lord Demnand said: "It is not to be taken as substituting one set of words for another, nor as strictly defining what the meaning of a word must be under all circumstances. We rather think that it merely declares what persons may be included within a term, when the circumstances require that they should." Queen v. Justice, A. & E. 7, 480. So a fortiori of the permissive rule here. And the argument for this motion is simply this, that the application of this permissive rule of construction to a provision applicable in terms to males only, has effect, without other sign of legislative intent, do admit females to the bar from which the common law has excluded them ever since courts have administered the common law. This is sufficiently startling. But the argument cannot stop here. Its logic goes far beyond the bar. The same peremptory rule of construction would reach all or nearly all the functions of the State government, would obliterate almost all distinction of sex in one statutory corpus juris, and make females elligible to almost all offices under our statutes, municipal and State, executive, legislative and judicial, except so far as the Constitution may interpose a verile qualification. Indeed the argument appears to overrule even this exception. For we were referred to a case in Iowa, which unfortunately we do not find in the reports of that State, holding a woman not excluded by the statutory description of "any white male person." If we should follow that authority in ignoring the distinction of sex, we do not perceive why it should not emasculate the Constitution itself, and include females in the constitutional right of male suffrage and male qualification. Such a rule would be one of judicial resolution, and not a judicial construction. There s no sign nor symptom in our statute law of any legislative imagination of such a radical change in the economy of the State government. There are many the other way: an irresistible presumption that the legislature never contemplated such confusion of functions between the sexes. The application of the permissive rule of construction here would not be in aid of the legislative intention, but in open defiance of it. We cannot stultify the court by holding that the legislature intended to bring about, pier ambages, a sweeping revolution of social order, by adopting a very innocent rule of statutory construction.

Some attempt was made to give plausibility to the particular consruction urged upon us, founded on Chapter 117 of 1867, and Chapter 79 of 1870. It was represented that the former admits women to every department of the University, excepting the military only, and so necesarily including the law department; that the latter directs admission to the bar of the graduates of the law department; that the legislature had thus provided for the admission of female graduates of the law schools, nd ought therefore to be understood as intending the admission of women under the general statute. If the legislature had so provided for the admission of female graduates, we do not perceive how that could aid the construction of the general statute of this lady, who does not appear to be a graduate. But, unfortunately for the position, the statutes were not stated with the fair accuracy which becomes counsel, and do not support it. The act of 1867 is an amendment of Sec. 4 of the Act of 1866, reorganizing the University. The section of 1866 provided, without qualification, that "the University in all its departments and colleges shall be open alike to male and female students." The section of 1867 substitutes the provision that "the University shall be open to female as well as male students, under such regulations and restrictions as the

COLLECTION OF A CLAIM AFTER ACT OF BANKRUPTCY — ATTORNEY EMPLOYED BY COLLECTING AGENCY.—The opinion of the United States Supreme Court, by HUNT, J., where a creditor, residing in the east, gave a claim against a person residing in the west, to a collecting agency for the purpose of collection, and the collecting agency employed an attorney to collect it, who procured a confession of judgment on such claim from such debtor, well knowing at the time he was insolvent, and collected the money on such judgment; held, that the attorney who made the collection, was the agent of the collecting agency, and not of the creditor, and that the knowledge of the financial condition of the debtor which the attorney had, was not the knowledge of the creditor.

TELEGRAPH—CONTRACT.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States, by MILLER, J., construing a contract for the running of a telegraph line by a railroad company.

MANDAMUS—TO COMPEL COUNCIL TO CALL AN ELECTION—PARTIES—SERVICE BY SPECIAL DEPUTY.—The opinion of the Supreme court of this State by SCHOLFIELD, J., holding that mandamus is the proper remedy to compel a council to call an election; that eight months' postponement of a day for holding an election, which it was the duty of the council to call, is an unreasonable postponement, though there was a discretion to be exercised by the council as to the day; that the prosecution was properly carried on by the prosecutor, a private individual that a special deputy in making return on a summons need not make use of the sheriff's name. It is evident from the remarks of the learned judge in delivering the opinion, that he is in favor of the people ruling, and against all combinations of officers for the purpose of preventing the people from legally expressing their wishes at the polls. This opinion has the right ring in it.

WE are indebted to John A. Owen the relator for a copy of this opinion.

A WOMAN CANNOT BE ADMITTED TO THE BAR IN WISCONSIN.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of Wisconsin, by RYAN, C.J., refusing the application of Miss LAVINIA GOODELL to be admitted to the bar of that State, and holding that a woman cannot be admitted to the bar in Wisconsin. The learned Chief Justice, in delivering the opinion, uses very strong language in giving his own personal views. We call the especial attention of our readers to this opinion, hoping they will read it with care, believing that it will not only aid in obtaining legislation which will allow women as well as men to practice law, but hasten the day when the right of suffrage shall be extended to women in Wisconsin. In the meantime, Miss Goodell must earn her living as best she can at some other calling, or leave the State of Wisconsin and go to some State like Illinois, where women are allowed to practice law upon equal terms with men.

ASSIGNEE IN BANKRUPTCY — RECEIVER OF STATE COURT—CONTEST FOR POSSESSION OF PROPERTY.—The opinion of the Circuit Court of this county, by WILLIAMS, J., holding, where a Receiver is properly appointed by a State court, and is in the possession of the assets, and subsequently a petition in bankruptcy is filed, and an assignee is appointed who applies to the State Court for the possession of the assets, that the possession of the Receiver will not be disturbed. The main question involved in this case is one of very general interest. Contests between assignees in bankruptcy and receivers appointed by State courts are of constant occurrence all over the Union. The authority of the State courts has not in all instances been respected. It would seem, from the recent opinions of the Supreme Court of the United States, that the jurisdiction of the Bankrupt Court in this class of cases, is not to be regarded as exclusive. In the consideration of cases involving a conflict of jurisdiction between the State and Federal courts, the greatest wisdom and moderation should be exercised by the judges of both tribunals.

WAGES AS THE SUBJECT OF GARNISHEEMENT.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of the State by SCOTT, C. J., construing the 14th section of chapter 62 of the revised Statutes, relating to the liability of a defendant being the head of a family to have his wages garnished, and holding that such a defendant may take his wages as fast as they become due, if the amount that shall become due at any one time shall not exceed twenty-five dollars, and that the statute has no reference whatever to wages subsequent to the service of the writ. The opinions of the bar in the construction of this section of the act have been conflicting. Frequently in practice the return day of the writ has been put off as far as possible, and even after that the hearing of the garnishee proceeding has been continued so as to reach wages acquired after the services of the writ. We have known some courts to construe the law so as to allow this practice. We are glad that the Supreme Court has settled this question in accordance with the humane spirit which prompted the passage of the act, and in favor of the poor laborer and his family.

WHAT IS A GOOD AFFIDAVIT AND JURAT?—The opinion of the Supreme Court of this State, by Walker J., holding that where the return of a special deputy sheriff on a summons, did not in the body contain the name of such deputy, and the jurat of the officer to such return was "subscribed and sworn to," etc., without giving the name of the person swearing to the same, that the return and jurat were insufficient; as not showing who made the affidavit. This opinion must be considered in relation to the facts in the case before the court; that is, that the name of the party making the return did not appear in either the return or jurat.

There is no doubt where the name of the party making the affidavit appears in the body of the affidavit, and the jurat of the officer is "subscribed and sworn to before me," etc., the court would hold this to be good. This is the usual practice in all the States and in the United States Courts, and there is nothing in conflict with it in this opinion. We make these remarks from the fact that some have supposed it went to that extent.

APPOINTMENT OF MR. DANA.—The appointment of Richard H. Dana, Jr., of Boston, to be Minister to England in the place of General Schenck, will meet with the approval of the people. He is one of the ablest and most learned lawyers of the nation, as well as one of its finest writers. He is a gentleman above reproach; a man who will honor the office and not the office the man. We wish the government had more such representatives abroad.

JUDGE TAFT'S APPOINTMENT.—Judge Taft, of Ohio, who has been appointed Secretary of War, is an excellent lawyer, an honest man, and has been for many years an honored and respected Judge, but we are not aware that he has had any military experience. A man who has had no military experience should not be appointed to the position of Secretary of War; and a man who has had no judicial experience should not be appointed a judge because he happens to be a great general. General Sherman is an able man and a great and brave general, one to whom the country owes much it can never repay, but who would think of appointing him Chief Justice of the United States Supreme Court? The American people, however, may rest assured that Judge Taft will not be a party to any corruption, either in or out of office.

The practice of padding reports has become altogether too common. This is not a padded volume. It contains 746 pages, which is much above the average. It seems to have been the object of the publishers to get as many cases in a volume as possible, consistent with good taste. Mr. Conover very properly acknowledges the aid he has received from Mr. Bryant, in the preparation of the present volume, and says that by the liberality of the publishers, and with the full approval of the court, he has been able to make the arrangement which secures the early appearance of the present volume under such favorable auspices, while his own labor has been mainly directed to the preparation of Volume XXXVIII.; that the printing of that volume will be commenced before the appearance of the volume now on our table, and that it is expected to contain all the cases determined by the court during the year 1875. CIRCUIT COURT OF COOK CO., ILL.

OPINION, MARCH 2, 1876.

J. C. MYER ET AL. v. CRYSTAL LAKE PICKLING AND PRESERVING WORKS.

CONFLICT BETWEEN AN ASSIGNEE IN BANKRUPTCY AND A RECEIVER APPOINTED BY THE STATE COURT FOR THE POSSESSION OF THE ESTATE OF BANKRUPT CORPORATION.

A court of equity will appoint a Receiver of a corporation, where the bill alleges gross frauds by its officers, by which the property is greatly endangered.

Where a receiver is properly appointed by a State Court, and is in possession of the assets, and subsequently a petition in bankruptcy is filed, and an assignee appointed who applies to the State Court for the possession of the assets, held, that the possession of the receiver will not be disturbed.

Opinion by WILLIAMS, J.

On the 30th of December last a bill was filed in this court by the complainants, stockholders in the Crystal Lake Pickling and Preserving Works, alleging the commission of certain fraudulent acts upon the part of the corporation and its officers. Among these alleged frauds were the assumption by the corporation of the private debts of its president, to the amount of $160,000, and the conveyance of all the real estate of the corporation to secure said indebtedness; and also, the issue of certain fraudulent judgment notes by the corporation, upon which judgments, it was alleged, were then about being entered. The bill prayed for an injunction and for a receiver. It set forth acts of gross fraud, and presented a case of great exigency. If the alleged frauds were allowed to be consummated, the whole property of the corporation might be put beyond the control of its creditors and stockholders, by the fraudulent act of its officers. The facts stated in the bill present a case for the interference of a court of equity, independent of any existing statutes.

The common law powers of a court of chancery are sufficient to grant to complainants the relief which they seek. Their bill is filed not only in their own behalf, but in behalf of all other stockholders, and of all creditors who may desire to avail themselves of it. The bill is filed to prevent the execution of a great fraud, which, if it was consummated, would injure complainants, but which would injure every other stockholder of the corporation, and every creditor of the same, as well as the complainants. If other stockholders or creditors refused or hesitated to take action to prevent the consummation of these contemplated frauds, it was not only the right but the duty of complainants to ask the interference of a court of equity, even though they personally held but a very small proportion of the stock as compared with the whole issue. Their conduct, instead of subjecting them to animadversion, is deserving of commendation, more especially as their act in filing their bill enures to the benefit of every other innocent and interested party who might be injured by the contemplated fraud.

Upon the filing of the bill a motion was made by complainants for a receiver before my brother Farwell, and the order then entered recites that the "case coming on to be heard upon the bill filed and upon evidence and argument of counsel, both parties, complainant as well as defendant, being represented by counsel, the court doth order and adjudge and decree that one John N. Cannon be, and he hereby is, appointed receiver," etc. It appears also from the statement of counsel, that Judge Farwell sent for Mr. Dow, who had been theretofore the legal adviser of the stockholders, and he appeared in court upon the argument of said motion, and by the consent of all the parties then in court and their respective solicitors, including Mr. Dow, the propriety and necessity of the appointment of a receiver was admitted.

All this occurred upon the 30th of December last. Subsequent orders have been entered in this court in the present case, and the receiver appointed by the court filed his bond in the penalty of $75,000, and entered upon the discharge of his duties, taking possession of and exercising control over the property of the corporation.

On the first of February last, more than a month after the receiver had been appointed, a motion was entered in this court by and upon behalf of some of the creditors, asking this court to vacate all its orders, discharge its receiver, and remit the property to the custody of the assignee in bankruptcy.

At the time when the receiver was appointed, no proceedings in bankruptcy had been commenced. I am not aware that any were then in contemplation. The assignee in bankruptcy has been only recently appointed. When the bankrupt petition was filed, this court, through its receiver, had reduced the assets of the corporation to its possession and was administering them for the benefit of all parties in interest. Its possession was for the benefit of the stockholders who were not named in the bill, and for the benefit of the creditors who were not named therein, as well as of the three complainants who were named. This court can do as complete justice between all the parties interested in the property as can the bankrupt court and the assignee in bankruptcy can be made a party and protect any interest he may have in the property in the receiver's hand. The motion now made is based upon two grounds.

First. That this court had no right to appoint a receiver at the time such appointment was made, and Second. That if the receiver was rightfully appointed, the U. S. District Court, by virtue of the provisions of the bankrupt act, is entitled to the possession of the bankrupt estate, even as against the receiver appointed by this court prior to the institution of any proceedings in bankruptcy.

As to the first ground of the motion, it may be said that this court under the allegations of the bill had a case presented to it, which entitled it to proceed to the appointment of a receiver at common law independent of any provision of the statute, and that it had a right, also, to proceed under section 25 of the statute, relating to corporations. Stat. of 1874, page 290. It is no answer to this position that other defendants should have been made to the bill. The principal party interested in preventing the appointment of a receiver, was a party to the bill, and was present in court consenting to such appointment. The corporation was there and then represented by its attorney, and some, if not all of the stockholders were also represented by other legal counsel.

The case was entirely unlike that of Baker v. Backus, (32 Ill., 79,) in the allegations of the bill and in the circumstances attending the appointment of the receiver. In the case at bar, the court had jurisdiction of the corporation and of the property and the acts and omissions complained of were at most only irregularities, which, upon proper application could be remedied by this court.

As to the position that the bankrupt act takes the property out of the State Court and vests in it the possession of the assignee in bankruptcy; it cannot be sustained by the language of the bankrupt act, nor by any decision of any State Court, nor of the Supreme Court of the United States.

It is true that there have been some decisions of the United States District Courts that have asserted the right of such Courts, upon the appointment of an assignee in bankruptcy, to take property the possession of which had been rightfully acquired by the State Courts prior to the institution of proceedings in bankruptcy, out of the hands of the Receiver of the State Courts and deliver it over to the assignee in bankruptcy. But these decisions have been upon the ground that the Receiver of the State Court had been appointed in a proceeding under a State insolvent law, which law had been superceded by the Bankrupt Act. Such decisions are not supported by any elementary treatise, by the decisions of State Courts, nor of the U. S. Supreme Court. But even if they were, they could not govern this case. The present bill is not filed under any State insolvent law. As I have before said, it could be supported if there was no statutory provision applicable to the case. If the bill was brought under the statute, that statute is very far from being an insolvent law. It has very few, if any, of the elements of such a law.

With the exception of decisions of the United States District Courts, I have upon the argument been cited by counsel to no authority, nor has my research been able to produce one, which supports the position assumed by the counsel who have filed the motion. All the authorities I have examined (with the exceptions above named) support the contrary doctrine.

Bump, on bankrptcy, lays down the rule thus: "So, also, where a receiver, appointed by another court before the commencement of proceedings in bankruptcy, has taken possession of the property which belonged to the bankrupt, and the jurisdiction of such court over the subject-matter of the suit therein, and over the parties thereto when it was instituted and a receiver was appointed, and its jurisdiction to appoint such receiver are in no manner impeached or questioned, the courts of bankruptcy cannot compel the receiver to give up the possession of such property, without its being shown that such possession of the property by such court is void or invalid by reason of the provisions of the bankrupt law.

"When property is lawfully placed in the custody of a receiver by the court which appoints him, it is in the custody and under the protection and control of such court for the time being, and no other court has the right to interfere with such possession, unless it be some court which has a direct supervisory control over the court whose process has first taken possession, or some superior jurisdiction in the premises. Under such circumstances, the courts of bankruptcy have neither such superior jurisdiction nor such supervisory control, as to authorize them to take the property from the possession of such court, or to enjoin the receiver from further interfering with it." Bump on Bankruptcy, p. 203. See also Bump on Bankruptcy, pages 305, 306.

Mr. High, in his late work upon Receivers (which is entitled, by reason of its accuracy of statement and careful quotation of authorities, to confidence) says: "The doctrine under consideration has been frequently applied in cases where proceedings in bankruptcy have been instituted against a defendant debtor in the United States, subsequent to the appointment of a receiver over the debtor's effects in a State tribunal, and in such cases the State Courts have uniformly insisted on maintaining their jurisdiction and disposing of the assets. Thus, where a receiver was appointed upon a judgment creditor's bill, in the State Court, and the appointment was completed and the debtor's property vested in the receiver, but the debtor filed his petition in bankruptcy subsequent to the filing of the creditor's bill, and was adjudicated a bankrupt subsequent to the appointment of the receiver, it was held that the assignee in bankruptcy took only such interest as the debtor had when the assignee was appointed, and, therefore, took the debtors' property, subject to the lien acquired by the creditor's suit, and the receiver was, therefore, directed to pay the funds realized from the property to the plaintiff in the creditor's suit rather than to the assignee in bankruptcy * * * * And without passing upon the right of the judgment creditor in a State Court, to ultimately maintain his lien upon the debtor's property as against the assignee subsequently appointed in bankruptcy, it was held that the defendants should transfer their property to the receiver, notwithstanding the filing of the petition in bankruptcy, and when the State Court has been the first to acquire control over the subject-matter, and has appointed its receiver, who has taken charge of the property in controversy, the receiver subsequently appointed by the U. S. Court, may be punished for contempt if he interfere with the receiver previously appointed by the State Court. The Federal Courts have generally recognized the doctrine under discussion, and have almost uniformly conceded the jurisdiction of the State tribunal, where the latter has first acquired control over the subject-matter and the parties, and where the receiver of the State Court has first acquired possession of the assets, even when the conflict of jurisdiction has been presented to the U. S. Court in the cause of a proceeding in bankruptcy there. And the undoubted weight of authority in the Federal Court supports the proposition, that where the State Courts have properly acquired control over the subject-matter and have appointed receivers, who are in possession of the property or fund at the time of instituting proceedings in bankruptcy, the U. S. Courts will not interfere with the jurisdiction already acquired by the State Court, but will respect the title of their receivers and their right to maintain the control of the property, at least until it is impeached for some cause for which it is impeachable under the bankrupt act.

The jurisdiction of the State Court having properly attached, and its right to appoint receivers not being questioned, the property of defendants is regarded as lawfully in possession of that court, and the federal court has no such superior jurisdiction or supervisory power over the State tribunal as will warrant it in taking the property out of the receiver's possession or enjoining them from its management. The bankrupt court will not, therefore, upon the petition of the assignee in bankruptcy, direct its marshall to take the assets out of the hands of the receiver, and it may enjoin the bankrupt from interfering with the property in the possession of the receiver." * * * And the fact that defendants in such suit, as receivers of the State court, assert a prior jurisdiction acquired by that tribunal, and claim thereupon the power of the State court to administer it, constitute no ground for the interference of the U. S. court by appointing a receiver in limine, especially when it is not shown that the property is in peril of waste or loss in the custody of the State court, or that the receivers are violating their duty, or that they are irresponsible or threaten the removal of the property. And an action cannot be maintained in the U. S. court in behalf of an assignee in bankruptcy, to compel a receiver appointed in the State court, in a creditor's suit, before the proceedings in bankruptcy, to deliver up the property to the assignee. High on Receivers, Secs. 51 and 52. See also Peck et al. v. Inness et al., 7 How. U. S. Rep., 624; 39 How. Prac. Rep., 363; 3 McLean, 494; 1 Bank. Rep., 195; 1 Bank. Rep., 204; 6 Blatchford, 156.

The last case was a suit by the assignee of the bankrupt against the receiver to obtain possession of the assets of the estate, and an injunction had been granted against the receiver to prevent the disposition of the assets. Justice Nelson dissolved the injunction, upon motion, saying, among other things, that "the question involving the right to this property is in the State conrt, where it belongs, and the decision of that court willl be conclusive upon the right." 2 N. Y. Supreme Court Rep., 568.

In the case of Eyster v. Goff, 8 Legal News, 177:

"The Supreme Court of the United States was called upon to decide the question as to the jurisdiction of the State Court, where the exclusive jurisdiction of the Federal court in a bankruptcy proceeding was insisted upon, against the right of the State Court to proceed, and in deciding the question says: 'The opinion seems to have been quite prevalent in many quarters at one time, that the moment a man is declared bankrupt, the district court which has so adjudged draws to itself by that act not only all control of the bankrupt's property and credits, but that no one can litigate with the assignee contested rights in any other court, except in so far as the circuit courts have concurrent jurisdiction; and that other courts can proceed no further, in suits of which they had at that time full cognizance, and it was a prevalent practice to bring any person who contested with the assignee any matter growing out of disputed rights of property or of contracts into the bankrupt court by the service of a rule to show cause, and to dispose of their rights in a summary way. This court has steadily set its face against this view.

The debtor of a bankrupt, or the man who contests the right to real or personal property with him, loses none of those rights by the bankruptcy of his adversary.

The same courts remain open to him in such contests, and the statute has not divested those courts of jurisdiction in such actions. If it has, for a certain class of actions, conferred a jurisdiction for the benefit of the assignee in the circuit and district courts of the United States, it is concurrent with and does not divest that of the State courts.

These propositions are supported by the following cases decided in this court. Smith v. Mason, 14 Wall., 419; Marshall v. Knox, 16 Wall., 501; Mays v. Fritton, 20 Wall., 414; Doe v. Childrers, 21 Wall., 642. See, also, Bishop v. Johnson, — Woolworth, 324."

In view of these decisions, I do not care to comment upon section 5123 of the bankrupt law, which it is claimed, upon the part of complainants, is conclusive against the right of the parties who are pressing the present motion to the relief which they ask.

If these authorities correctly state the law, this court having obtained complete control of the property through its receiver before any proceedings in bankruptcy were instituted, having jurisdiction of the persons of the litigants and the subject-matter of the litigation, and being possessed of as complete facilities for protecting the interests of all parties as the bankrupt court, it ought not, without the consent of all the parties to the record, to abdicate a jurisdiction so universally acknowledged, that it may almost be said to be unquestioned. The right to retain the jurisdiction of the cause and of the property is not so much that of the court as of the parties litigant who have invoked its aid. Another tribunal might have afforded them equal facilities for the redress of their alleged grievances, but it was their right to choose their own forum, and having chosen it, this court ought not now to relegate them to that tribunal which they have and do decline voluntarily to enter.

The right to choose his own forum is as much the legal right of a plaintiff or complainant, as his right of redress after he has entered it, provided, under the pleadings and proofs, he shows himself entitled to such redress. If the complainants are rightfully here, they cannot, except upon their own consent, be sent to any other court, however willing his court might be to relieve itself of the litigation.

The motion to set aside the orders entered in this case, discharge the receiver, dismiss the suit and transfer the property now in the receiver's hands to the assignee in bankruptcy, is denied.

ABSTRACT OF OPINIONS FILED AT OTTAWA IN 1876.

J. H. Stevison et al. v. John Earnest.—Appeal from Knox.—Opinion by SCHOLFIELD, J.

Joseph Kroer v. The People, etc.—Error to Stephenson.—Opinion by SCHOLFIELD, J.

SUNDAY NIGHT DEFINED—FINES ON SEPARATE COUNTS—COMPETENCY OF JUROR—CONSTRUCTION OF LIQUOR LAW.

STATEMENT.—Indictment for selling liquors on the Sabbath day, and night; one count charging as to the day, the other as to the night. Fine of $75 under each count. Held,

1. That the period of darkness between midnight preceding and dawn of the Sabbath falls within the statute as to keeping tippling-house open on Sabbath night.

2. To assess separate fines under different counts in the same indictments, in prosecutions, is a correct practice.

3. It is no disqualification for a juror to have an abhorrence of the liquor traffic, in such prosecutions. The defendant has no right to demand a jury that shall approve his business. It is enough that a juror has formed no opinion as to the guilt of the person arraigned, and entertains no personal prejudice against him.

4. To constitute an offence under the statute, it is not needful that the saloon be kept open to the same extent as on week days, but only that some entrance, open or hidden, be available, and persons are allowed to enter for tippling purposes. Perhaps, however, it would be going too far to say that if one person only has such access, it is in violation of the statute.

DELIVERY OF DEED.

Held, That no particular form or ceremony is necessary to constitute a delivery of a deed. It may be by acts without words, or words without acts; or by both. Anything clearly manifesting the intention of the parties that the deed shall at once become operative—that the grantor shall not control the property, but that the grantee shall have possession, will constitute a sufficient delivery.

Board of Regents may deem proper." In both statutes the section provides that all able-bodied male students shall receive military instruction, and makes no other reference to a military department. And the argument that the admission of females under the statute of 1867 to all departments except the military, necessarily contemplated their admission to the law department, falls to the ground, because the statute neither mentions all departments nor excepts the military—if there be a military department. The inaccuracy is the more striking from the fact that the section of 1866 does expressly include all departments and colleges, and the amendment of 1867 evidently ex industrio omits them. The change of an absolute right of admission to all departments and colleges of the University in 1866, to admission to the University under discretionary regulations and restrictions of the regents in 1867, is very significant; the more so that it is the only amendment made. It seems likely that the legislature came to regard the absolute and indiscriminate right of 1866 as dangerously broad, and to consider it necessary to make the right subordinate to the judgment of the regents. And if the law school had then been established by statute, it would be very doubtful whether the admission of females to it would be sanctioned by the act of 1867. But there was no such statute; and the law school was in fact established, not by statute, but—as we learn—by the authorities of the University sometime in 1868, after the enactment of the section in both forms. The first class of students, all males, graduated in 1869, without color of right to practice. Hence the statute of 1870 to give the right, presumably passed without thought of the admission of females to the bar. And the general argument for this motion takes nothing by these statutes. So we find no statutory authority for the admission of females to the bar of any court of this State. And, with all the respect and sympathy for this lady which all men owe to all good women, we cannot regret that we do not. We cannot but think the common law wise in excluding women from the profession of the law. The profession enters largely into the well-being of society, and to be honorably filled and safely to society exacts the devotion of life. The law of nature destines and qualifies the female sex for the bearing and nurture of the children of our race, and for the custody of the homes of the world, and their maintenance in love and honor. And all life-long calling of women, inconsistent with these radical and social duties of their sex, as is the profession of the law, are departures from the order of nature; and when voluntary, treason against it. The cruel chances of life sometimes baffle both sexes, and may leave women free from the peculiar duties of their sex. These may need employment, and should be welcomed to any not derogatory to their sex and its proprieties, or inconsistent with the good order of society. But it is public policy to provide for the sex, not for its superfluous members; and not to tempt women from the proper duties of their sex by opening to them duties peculiar to ours. There are many employments in life not unfit for female character. The profession of the law is surely not one of these. The peculiar qualities of womanhood, its gentle graces, its quick sensibility, its tender susceptibility, its purity, its delicacy, its emotional impulses, its subordination of hard reason to sympathetic feeling, are surely not qualifications for forensic strife. Nature has tempered woman as little for the judicial conflicts of the court-room as for the physical conflicts of the battle-field. Womanhood is modeled for gentler and better things. And it is not the saints of the world who chiefly give employment to our profession. It has essentially and habitually to do with all that is selfish and extortionate, knavish and criminal, coarse and brutal, repulsive and obscene, in human life. It would be revolting to all female sense of innocence and sanctity of their sex, shocking to man's reverence for womanhood and faith in woman, on which hinge all the better affections and humanities of life, that woman should be permitted to mix professionally in all the nastiness of the world which finds its way into courts of justice; all the unclean issues, all the collateral questions, of sodomy, incest, rape, seduction, fornication, adultery, pregnancy, bastardy, legitimacy, prostitution, lascivious cohabitation, abortion, infanticide, obscene publication, libel and slander of sex, impotence, divorce—all the nameless catalogue of indecencies, la chronique scandaleuse of all the vices and all the infirmities of all society—with which the profession has to deal, and which go towards filling judicial reports which must be read for accurate knowledge of the law. This is bad enough for men. We hold in too high reverence the sex without which, as is truly and beautifully written, le commencement de la vie est sans secours, le milieu sans plaisir, et ve fie sans consolation, voluntarily to commit it to such studies and such occupations. Non lati auxilio, nec defensoribus estis, should judicial contests be upheld. Reverence for all womanhood would suffer in the public spectacle of woman so interested and so engaged. This motion gives appropriate evidence of this truth. No modest woman could read without pain and self-abasement—no woman could so overcome the instincts of sex, as publicly to discuss the case which we had occasion to cite supra, King v. Wiseman. And when counsel was arguing for this lady that the word "person," in section 32, chapter 119, necessarily includes females, her presence made it impossible to suggest to him a reductio ad absurdum of his position, that the same construction of the same word in sec. 1, chap. 37, would subject woman to prosecution for the paternity of a bastard, and in sec. 39–40, chap. 164, to prosecution for rape. Discussions are habitually necessary in courts of justice, which are unfit for female ears. The habitual presence of women at these would tend to relax the public sense of decency and propriety. If, as counsel threatened, these things are to come, we will take no voluntary part in bringing them about.

The motion is denied.

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

OPINION FILED JAN. 21, 1876.

ALBERT BLISS v. JOHN SMITH.

Appeal from Stephenson.

THE RIGHT TO GARNISHEE THE WAGES OF A DEFENDANT, BEING THE HEAD OF A FAMILY, ETC.

Where the wages of a defendant are garnisheed, judgment is only to go for the balance exceeding twenty-five dollars in the hands of the garnishee at the time the writ was served.

2. That the laborer may take up his wages as often as they become due, if the amount that shall become due at any one time shall not exceed twenty-five dollars.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS]

Through the kindnes of JOHN A. OWEN, of the Chicago bar, we have received the following opinion:

SCOTT, C. J.—The decision in this case turns partly on the construction of that section of the statute which provides, "the wages and services of a defendant, being the head of a family and residing with the same, to an amount not exceeding twenty-five dollars, shall be exempt from garnishment. In case the wages or services of such defendant in the hands of the garnishee shall exceed twenty-five dollars judgment shall be given only for the balance above that amount." R. S. 1874, chap. 62, sec. 14.

At the date of the service of the garnishee summons in this case, defendant was indebted to the judgment debtor in the sum of eight dollars for four days' labor previously performed. No question is made that the judgment debtor was at the time the head of a family, residing with them. Hence it follows, under the statute cited, that amount was clearly exempt from garnishment.

The only question in the case is, as to the wages subsequently earned by the judgment debtor in the services of the defendant during the period intervening the service of the garnishee process, and the filing of the interrogatories and answer herein.

The theory of the garnishing creditor is, that the process will hold all the judgment debtor has earned in the service of defendant up to the date of filing his answer, deducting but one time twenty-five dollars, the amount exempt by statute. The construction contended for is as harsh and uncharitable as it is unwarranted. There is no authority in reason or practice, for saying the statute has any reference whatever to wages subsequently earned by the judgment debtor. The language of the statute is, "in case the wages or services of such defendant in the hands of a garnishee shall exceed twenty-five dollars, judgment shall be given only for the balance above that amount." When in the hands of the garnishee? Obviously at the date of the garnishee summons. The judgment is only to go for the balance, exceeding twenty-five dollars, in the hands of the garnishee at that time. The statute has not provided, the judgment shall be for any sum the judgment debtor may subsequently earn in the service of defendant, and we have neither the right nor inclination by judicial construction, to extend its provisions so as to enable the garnisheeing creditor to reach any wages the judgment debtor may thereafter earn. The statute was enacted for a humane purpose, for the benefit of the debtor's family as well as himself, and should receive a fair and liberal construction, that it may effectuate the beneficent object the legislature had in view. Any other construction than the one we have indicated would render the statute nugatory.

But, aside from this view of the law, the case was heard in the court below on the answer of defendant, and as the case comes before us, we do not see how there could be any recovery.

It is set forth in the answer, that on the 18th day of July following the service of the garnishee summons, defendant was indebted to the judgment debtor, including the eight dollars earned before service, in the sum of twelve dollars for one week's labor, which he then paid to him. At the end of the next following week, he was indebted to him in the further sum of twelve dollars, which he in like manner paid. These two amounts being under twenty-five dollars, were, of course, under the statute, exempt from garnishment, and defendant could rightfully pay the same to the judgment debtor.

The last payment was in full of all wages earned up to the 25th of July. On the 27th day of July the judgment debtor commenced working for defendant as a laborer, and continued in his employ up to the date of filing his answer, at and for the wages of two dollars for each working day; that on each Saturday after the 27th of July, defendant had a complete settlement with the judgment debtor, and if anything was found to be due to him, paid in full; that the business of defendant during that period was delivering ice to the inhabitants of Freeport and vicinity, and that he employed the judgment debtor to assist him in delivering ice and in collecting the price. The answer further discloses that frequently between the 27th of July and the date of filing the answer, on the occasions of the Saturday settlement, the judgment debtor was found to be indebted to defendant on account of collections made by him from customers for ice delivered to them. Defendant further says in his answer, he has no means of knowing what amount of money he had paid the judgment debtor for his services from the 27th of July, but avers that at no time from that date to the filing of his answer, was he indebted to the judgment debtor in a sum exceeding twelve dollars; and that ever since the service of the summons the judgment debtor has been the head of a family, residing with them, and has claimed his wages as exempt from garnishment.

The answer is not contested, and must therefore be taken as true. Before any judgment can be rendered in such case, it must appear from the answer that the garnishee is liable. It does not appear from the answer that any sum was ever due from the garnishee defendant to the judgment debtor from the 27th of July to the filing of the answer. The judgment debtor, during all that time was collecting money for the garnishee, and frequently at the weekly settlements he was found to be indebted to the garnishee. The answer does not admit that any certain amount was due the judgment debtor, and it therefore affords no data by which a judgment for any particular sum could have been rendered.

But the decision may be placed on broader and more reasonable grounds. If any thing was found due to the judgment debtor at the Saturday settlements, if the amount was less than twenty-five dollars, the garnishee had the clear right under the statute to pay it over to him for the support of his family, for whose benefit as well as his own the act was passed. Had the judgment debtor quit the service of the garnishee before his wages amounted to twenty-five dollars, it will be conceded the same would be exempt from garnishment. The construction contended for would compel the judgment debtor to quit the service of his employer as soon as his wages should reach twenty-five dollars, and seek employment elsewhere to maintain his family. We are unwilling to give any such narrow and illiberal construction to the statute. The laborer may take up his wages as fast as the same become due, if the amount that shall become due at any one time shall not exceed twenty-five dollars. This construction of the statute is warranted by the enlightened spirit that prompted its enactment, and we have no inclination to so construe it as to defeat the beneficent design.

It is perhaps proper to say, that in giving this construction to the statute, it has no application except to the 14th section cited.

The judgment will be affirmed.

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

ABSTRACT OF OPINIONS FILED AT OTTAWA IN 1876.

O. O. & F. V. R. R. v. Jacob P. Black.—Re-hearing.—Opinion by WALKER, J.

PAYMENT OF R. R. SUBSCRIPTIONS—CONTROL OF EQUITY AS TO TRANSFERS OF ROAD.

STATEMENT.—Suit on subscription to aid in building railroad. Defense, failure of consideration in the sale of the road by the company to another company, so as to destroy the value of the shares. Held,

1. That, where such sale is provided for by the charter, all subscriptions are to be held as having reference to this power under the charter; where there is no power conferred by the charter to sell or lease, this can only be done by a legislative act, empowering the company to do so; and, in the absence of this, the transaction of a sale or lease is merely an unlawful attempt to do what cannot be done, and affords no ground of resistance to the payment of subscriptions

2. In such case, the subscribers paying their subscriptions can invoke the aid of a court of equity, to compel the proper use of the franchises of the company. And the lessees will only be regarded as the servants of the company; which will be held to a strict discharge of the responsibilities existing toward subscribers and the public.

Wm. E. Furness et al. v. Elizabeth McGovern.—Error to Superior Court of Cook.—Opinion by SCOTT, C. J.

STATEMENT.—Suit brought for commissions for negotiating a loan of money, to be secured by a lien on the separate property of appellee, a married woman. She, it was alleged, had declined to take the money when the loan was effected. Bill brought to subject her separate property to the payment of the commissions claimed. Held,

1. That the remedy, if any, was at law, and not in equity. A general engagement, or simple contract, creates no such charge on the separate property of a married woman as can be enforced in equity. To this end, there must be a positive intention to make a debt, or claim, on the separate property manifested by writing, or otherwise, before equity will assume jurisdiction.

John Conley v. The People.—Error to Criminal Court of Cook.—Opinion by SCOTT, C. J.

CONTINUANCE IN CRIMINAL CASE.

Held, That where one is arrested but a short time before court, and speedily brought to trial, without opportunity to consult counsel, and prepare a defense and makes affidavit for continuance, in usual form, he is entitled to continuance, especially on the first application.

F. A. Bragg v. The People.—Appeal from Cook.—Opinion by SCHOLFIELD, J.

EXEMPTION FROM JURY SERVICE—CONSTITUTIONAL LIMITATION.

STATEMENT.—Appellant claimed, by contract with the State on the ground of his services as a member of the fire department in Chicago, a perpetual exemption from serving on juries. Held,

That this is no subject of contract; and that, under the constitution, the matter of exemption from serving on juries must be solely under the control of the legislative power; which can, at any time, withdraw such privilege.

RECORD EVIDENCE—DEFAULT IN REPLEVIN —TITLE—BURDEN OF PROOF.

STATEMENT.—Suit on replevin bond, commenced in Peoria county and changed to Knox. The bond had been given in a replevin suit begun in Peoria, changed to Woodford, and then again to Marshall, where it was dismissed.

The pleas in the suit on the bond, were, (1) non est factum, (2) nul tiel record, as to the record in the replevin suit set out in the declaration, (3) that the merits of the case were not tried in the replevin suit, but that it was dismissed for failure to give security for costs; and (4) that, at the time of the commencement of the suit, the property and right of possession of the goods were in the defendant, Stevison.

On the trial, the plaintiffs read in evidence, against objection, the original affidavit, declaration, writ, endorsement thereon, transcript of Peoria Circuit court on change of venue to Woodford county, transcript of Woodford Circuit court on change of venue to Marshall county, together with the file marks on the several papers in the replevin suit, and a certified transcript of the proceedings and judgment in the cause in Marshall circuit court. Also, parol evidence was given identifying the several papers. It was objected that these loose papers could not be regarded as any part of the record, but only the material from which the record was to be made up; and that, the records being in a different court from that in which the trial was had, evidence of them could only be given by transcript certified as the statute requires. Held,

1. That our practice is different from the common law practice in this particular; so that the papers of a cause, when filed, become a part of the record as fully as if copied in the record book of the court. And transcripts of the records are made by espying the files and the orders of court as entered of record by the clerk. And the clerk is even prohibited by the statute from making a complete record in a case, unless directed so to do by the court, or one of the parties.

2. Although the rule is that a record itself is produced in evidence only when the cause is in the same court, or when it is the subject of proceedings in a superior court, yet this rule has reference to the ability of the court to compel the production of the record, and not to the sufficiency of the record as evidence, when actually produced. And although it is contemplated that the records be permanently kept in the court where they originate, yet, even if illegally obtained, they are not to be rejected for this reason when offered in evidence in another court. The preservation of records is one thing, and what they prove quite a different thing. The facts proved are the same whether originals or copies are used.

3. When an instrument in writing, or a record, is not the foundation of an action, a variance is not material, unless the discrepancy is so great as to amount to a strong probability that it cannot be the instrument or record declared on.

4. Where one suffers a suit in replevin to be dismissed, he loses all right to contest the plaintiff's claim to the property, except that saved to him by the statute, namely, to plead and prove his title to the property in mitigation of damages.

5. And in this the burden is on him. And when he proves title thus, to a prima facie degree, the plaintiff may rebut by showing that the title was obtained for the purpose of hindering, delaying or defrauding creditors.

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

OPINION FILED JAN. 30, 1875.

JOHN HOCK HOCHLANDER v. EVA HOCHLANDER.

Error to Cook.

WHAT IS A GOOD AFFIDAVIT AND JURAT— VOID SUMMONS RETURN DAY.

1. AFFIDAVIT—JURAT.—Where the return of a special deputy sheriff on a summons did not in the body contain the name of such deputy and the jurat of the office to such return was "subscribed and sworn to, etc.," without giving the name of the person swearing to the same, held that the return and jurat were insufficient, as not showing who made the affidavit.

2. RETURN DAY OF SUMMONS.—Held, that a summons returnable at a term beyond that next succeeding its date is void.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

WALKER, CH. J.—This was a proceeding in the court below to obtain a divorce, and the service was made by a special deputy. He made the following return:

"Served by reading to and leaving a copy with the within named John Hochlander, this 8th day of May, 1872."

The return is properly signed, and under it is the following jurat:

"Subscribed and sworn to before me this 11th day of May, 1872. Norman T. Gassette, Clerk."

This is loose, indefinite and uncertain. It nowhere appears to what the person, whoever he may have been, did subscribe and swear. It does not state that the deputy subscribed the return or swore to it. It fails to state who swore to it, or, for that matter, to anything else. It should have appeared to be a compliance with the statute, that the deputy took an oath stating that he made the service as stated in the return by him, or that the return was true, or that he made it at the time and in the manner stated in the return. Again, the return is indefinite and uncertain. He does not state what he read, or of what he served a copy, nor does he state the copy, whatever it may have been, was true and correct. Such incompetency or disregard of duty is inexcusable. For such a want of accuracy and compliance with the substantial requirements of the law seems to imply a want of responsibility on the part of its officers that renders the rights of parties very insecure. And it is strange to us that an attorney would ask a default on such a return. A moment's examination would have shown him the character of the return and the insufficiency of the writ. In a case of this character, of all others, we would expect care and vigilance to see that the court at least had jurisdiction. This is a duty devolving on courts and attorneys that should not be omitted.

It is next urged that the summons was utterly void. It was dated on the 8th day of May, 1872, and was returnable to the third Monday of the next May, more than a year from that date, whilst the May term for that year commenced twelve days after that date, and to that term it should have been and legally could only be returnable. As it was, there were several terms of court after its issue and before the return day named in the writ. The statute expressly requires all writs to be made returnable to the next term of court occurring after the date of the writ, and we are aware of no authority whatever to make a writ returnable to a subsequent term to that next succeeding its date. And this court has repeatedly held that where more than a term comes between the teste and return day of a summons, that such a writ is void and confers no jurisdiction upon the court. See Calhoun v. Webster, 2 Scam., 221; Hildreth v. Hough, 20 Ill., 331 Elie v. Wait, 28 Ill., 70, and Miller v. Handy, 40 Ill., 448. The writ in this case, according to the rule announced in the cases referred to, was void, and being void the court failed to acquire jurisdiction, and having no jurisdiction of the defendant, the decree of the court was equally void with the writ. The court had no power to act, and every step that was taken was without foundation. Had the clerk been reasonably circumspect, or had the attorney taking the default have but spent a moment's time in examining the writ, all of the consequences flowing from a reversal in this case would have been avoided, and the rights of innocent parties would not have been placed in jeopardy.

But for the errors in the record which have been indicated, without noticing others, the decree of the court below is reversed and the cause remanded.

Reversed and remanded.

JUDGE BROWN, of Detroit, is a gentleman of fine legal culture, pleasing in his manners and very popular with the profession. He has recently been holding court in Memphis. The Appeal, of that city, in referring to his judicial labors there, says:

Hon. Henry B. Brown, judge of the United States district court for the eastern district of Michigan, closes the Federal courts of this city to-day, and departs for his home by way of New Orleans. He came here an entire stranger to our citizens, but leaves us with expressions of most sincere regret on the part of all who have had business in his court. The universal testimony of our lawyers is that he is a judge of rare capacity for his place, possessing not only learning as a lawyer, but an administrative ability which enables him to dispatch business with rapidity and satisfaction. He has only recently been elevated to the bench, and although a young man, well deserves the distinguished honor conferred by his appointment. We hope he will be sent to us again on special service. He will always find a welcome among the many friends he has made during his brief sojourn in our city, as will his estimable wife, whose departure is not less regretted than his own.

UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT.

PROCEEDINGS OF.

Wednesday, March 1, 1876.

On motion of O. H. Browning, John J. Robinson, of Canal Dover, Ohio, was admitted.

No. 702. (Assigned.) Isaac Taylor, Collector of Peoria Company et al. v. James F. Secor and William Tracy. The argument of this cause was continued by R. G. Ingersoll for appellees, and concluded by James K. Edsall for appellants.

No. 704. (Assigned.) Herman Lieb and Henry B. Miller, Collector of Cook county, et al. v. Henry P. Kidder and Daniel O. Stone. This cause was argued by Lyman Trumbull, of Chicago, and James K. Edsall, Attorney General of Illinois, for appellants, and by Wirt Dexter, of Chicago, and O. H. Browning for appellees.

No. 297. The steamship Mantanzas, etc., v. Manheim Berwin. On motion of Reginald Fendall in behalf of counsel, dismissed, each party to pay their own costs.

Adjourned until Wednesday, the 15th of March, at 12 o'clock.

THE 77TH ILLINOIS REPORTS.—We have received from Hon. Norman L. Freeman the advance sheets of the 77th volume of Illinois Reports. It contains cases of the January Term, 1875. We should publish head notes from this volume, were it not that we have already printed an abstract of the opinions of that term. The 77th will soon make its appearance.

JUDGMENT NOTES.—We have just printed a short judgment note on paper not larger than an ordinary promissory note. We have them in sheets, and in books of one hundred, which we sell for 75 cents, and in books of fifty, for 50 cents.

PIRIE'S CELEBRATED PAPER.—We have just received a large quantity of Pirie's celebrated linen paper, from Scotland. We will furnish 1,000 letter heads, printed on this paper, for $9.00, or 500 for $5.50. A sample will be furnished upon application.

UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT.

OPINION DELIVERED FEB. 14, 1876.

No. 133.—CHARLES C. SMELTZER, plaintiff in error, v. MILES WHITE.

In Error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Iowa.

GUARANTIES OF THE GENUINENESS AND REGULARITY OF ISSUE OF COUNTY WARRANTS—WANT OF SEAL—BREACH OF WARRANTY—DAMAGES.

This was a suit founded on express guaranties of the genuineness and regularity of the issue of county warrants. The plaintiff had sued the county and been defeated, for the general reasons that the seal of the county had not been attached to the warrants, and that under the laws of Iowa, as held by the court, the warrants were invalid without the impress of the county seal. The present suit is brought against the guarantor. Held:

1. That the guaranties covered the defect of the want of the county seal upon the warrants, and that as they did not bear the impress of the county seal, the guaranty was broken, and the defendant was liable.

2. GENUINENESS OF WARRANTS.—That the genuineness and regularity of issue of county warrants can exist only in cases when the warrants are sealed with the county seal.

3. BREACH OF WARRANTY—RETURN OF PROPERTY.—That in the case of the breach of warranty the person to whom the warranty has been given may sue without a return of the goods. He is not obliged to rescind the sale. The plaintiff was not bound to return the unsealed warrants before he could bring this suit. They were of no value.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

Mr. Justice STRONG delivered the opinon of the court.

All the assignments of error, but one, are founded upon exceptions taken to the charge of the circuit judge. They are numerous, and many of them do not conform to the rules of this court or to the exceptions which were actually taken. Without examining them separately, we shall consider the legal questions they present, so far as they have any bearing upon the case.

The suit was founded upon express guaranties of the genuineness and regularity of issue of county warrants; guaranties which the plaintiff alleged had been broken. He had sued the county to recover the amount of the warrants, and had been defeated, for the general reasons that the seal of the county had not been attached to the warrants, and that under the laws of Iowa, as held by the court, the warrants were invalid unless they bore the impress of the county seal. In the present suit against the guarantor, the circuit judge instructed the jury that the guarantees covered the defect of the want of the county seal upon the warrants, and that inasmuch as they did not bear the seal, (the fact having been decided in the suit against the county,) the guaranty was broken, and the defendant was liable. To this instruction several objections are now urged. It is said, first, that the warrants were genuine and regularly issued, even though they did not bear the impress of the county seal; that the statutes of the State did not require that county warrants should be sealed with the county seal. This, we think, is clearly a mistake. Prior to 1860, the county judge had the management of the business of the county, with the usual powers and jurisdiction of county commissioners, and the county funds could be paid out by the treasurer only upon warrants issued by him. (Rev Stat. of Iowa, 241, 243, 360.) It was made his duty "to audit all claims against the county; to draw and seal with the county seal all warrants on the treasurer for money to be paid out of the county treasury."—(Code, 106.) The treasurer was authorized to pay only warrants thus drawn and sealed. The language of the statute was, and it still is, "the treasurer shall disburse the same (the county money) on warrants drawn and signed by the county judge, and sealed with the county seal, and not otherwise." In 1860 the powers and duties of the county judge in this respect were transferred to a county board of supervisors, (Act of March 22, 1860, Rev., sec. 312, et seq.,) and the clerk of the district court was constituted their clerk, and required to sign all orders issued by the board. Now, as the treasurer can pay no orders or warrants unless they are sealed with the county seal, and as all warrants were required to be sealed by the county judge, until 1860, when the board of supervisors was charged with his duties, (except that their warrants are required to be signed by their clerk,) it is very evident that no warrant is a genuine county warrant which is unsealed with the county seal. The statute expressly requires the board of supervisors, in all cases where the powers conferred by the act upon the board had been before exercised by the county judges, to conduct their proceedings under said powers in the same way and manner as had been provided by law in such cases for the proceedings of the county judge.—(Rev, sec. 325.) It is too clear, therefore, for debate, that the genuineness and regularity of issue of county warrants can exist only in cases when the warrants are sealed with the county seal. And so it has been decided by the Supreme Court of Iowa substantially, both in Prescott v. Gouser, 34 Iowa, 178, and in Springer v. The County of Clay, 35 Iowa, 243. It is next contended that the circuit court mistook the extent of the guaranty. The contention is that a guaranty that the warrants were "genuine and regularly issued," meant only that they were not forgeries, that they were not issued without consideration, and that they were ordered by the proper officers. To this we cannot assent. It is true, even of a technical guaranty, that its words are to be construed as strongly against the guarantor as the sense will admit.—(Drummond v. Prestman, 12 Wheaton, 515.) Such, also, is the English rule.—(Wood v. Prestner, Law Rep., 2 Ex, 67; Mason v. Pritchard, 12 East., 227.) So it has been held that in construing a guaranty, it is proper to look at the surrounding circumstances in order to discover the subject-matter the parties had in view, and thus to ascertain the scope and object of the guaranty.—(Sheffield v. Meadows, L. R., 4 C. P, 595.) Now, if this principle be applied to the present case, it is easy to see what the parties intended. The plaintiff was a citizen of Maryland. He purchased the alleged warrants from the defendant, a citizen of Iowa. He may be presumed to have had no actual knowledge of what constituted genuineness and regularity of Issue of Iowa county warrants. What was necessary for him to be assured of was that the instruments he proposed to purchase were valid and legal claims against the county; claims which might be enforced by law. In view of this, the construction contended for by the defendant is utterly inadmissible. And even without this, the language of the guaranties admits of no other construction than that which the court below gave to it. Under the law of the State, there could be no genuine county warrants regularly issued, imposing a liability upon the county, which were not duly sealed. The treasurer was bound to pay those only that were genuine and issued according to the requirements of the law.

Again, it is urged on behalf of the defendant that the plaintiff was bound to know, or must be presumed to have known, that the law required county warrants to be sealed with the county seal, and that, as the defect was apparent on the face of the instruments sold and guarantied, the guaranties must be construed as not covering a patent defect. It is said it cannot be admitted the defendant intended to guaranty any thing more than the existence of facts of which the guarantee had no knowledge. To this it may be answered that the absence of a proper seal upon the instruments guaranteed was not a patent defect equally within the knowledge of the plaintiff and defendant. Whether the instruments required a seal or not, and what the seal should be in order to constitute them genuine county warrants, regularly issued, depended upon the statute laws of Iowa, of which, it may be presumed, the plaintiff had no actual knowledge, and that for this reason he desired a warranty. Having exacted one, it is a necessary deduction from it that it was taken as a protection against his own ignorance of Iowa law. It was well said on the argument that the only warranty that would protect him against loss, in case it should turn out that the county officers neglected to comply with the law prescribing the mode in which county warrants should be executed and issued, would be a warranty coextensive with the defences to which such instruments were subject in suits against the counties, founded upon non-compliance with the State law on the part of the county officers. We can have no doubt that the true meaning of the guarantees is that the guarantor undertook that the paper was not subject to any defence in suits against the county founded upon any want of legal form, either in the signatures or seals, and we think the absence of the proper seal was a breach of the warranty, rendering the defendant liable for the loss which the plaintiff sustained thereby.

It is next urged by the defendant that the circuit court erred in holding him estopped by the judgments rendered in the plaintiff's suits against the county. This assignment rests upon a mistake of fact. The court did not so rule. And had such ruling been made it would have been harmless. The warrants were in evidence, and they exhibited the fact, not contradicted, that they were not sealed as the law required They were, therefore, not genuine county warrants regularly issued, and it was the duty of the court so to declare them. The defendant's contract was broken as soon as it was made, and the plaintiff was entitled to a verdict, no matter whether the judgments in the suits against the county were conclusive or not. It would, therefore, be idle to discuss the question whether the court below would have fallen into error had the jury been instructed that the former judgments were conclusive. The question is impertinent to this case. We may, however, simply refer to some decisions which tend strongly to show that those judgments were in law conclusive upon the defendant, especially as he had seasonable notice of the defences set up by the county in the plaintiff's suit on the warrants, and was required to assist in the prosecution of the claims.—(Carpenter v. Pier, 30 Vt., 81; Lovejoy v. Murray, 3 Wall., 18; Walker v. Ferrin, 4 Vt., 529; Chicago v. Robbins, 4 Wall., 658; Clarke v. Carrington, 7 Cranch, 322; Drummond v. Preston, 12 Wheat., 515.)

The fifth assignment is that the court erred in overruling the defendant's offer to show that the warrants were regularly issued for legal claims against the county. The offer, we think, was correctly overruled. The evidence proposed had no relevancy to the issue in the case. That the warrants were issued for debts due by the county was of no importance if they were not genuine, and in the form that the law required, to enable the holder to set them up as legitimate claims against the county, What availed it to the plaintiff that the county owed the sums of money mentioned in the warrants if the warrants were nullities? His only means of recovering the money was through the warrants.

The instruction given respecting the measure of damages is not open to any just exception. It was as follows: "The amount which the plaintiff paid the defendant for the warrants is prima facie evidence of their value at the time, and there is also the evidence of the defendant that they were sold by him to the plaintiff for their market value, based on the assumption that they were valid, and there is no other or different evidence on the subject of value. I therefore instruct you the plaintiff is entitled to recover * * * the amount of the consideration which he paid and the defendant received therefor, (for the warrants,) with six per cent. interest per annum on such amount." No other rule for the measure of damages could have been given to the jury.—(See Eaton v. Mellus, 7 Gray, 573.)

It is contended, however, that the court erred in refusing to charge as requested, that there could be no recovery without a return of the warrants, and in charging as follows: "It is not necessary thus to recover that the plaintiff should, before suit was brought, have tendered back the warrants mentioned in said written guaranties. It is enough that they are in court at the trial, and the court can order them to be retained, and on payment of the judgment rendered herein to be delivered to the defendant."

This instruction was in strict accordance with all the well considered decisions. In case of a breach of warranty, the person to whom the warranty has been given may sue without a return of the goods. He is not obliged to rescind the sale. Thus the law is stated by Kent, 4 Com., 486. In Man. Co. v. Gardner, 10 Cush., 83, the Supreme court of Massachusetts ruled that a vendee may sue for a breach of warranty, without returning the goods. And such is the rule in England.—(Fielder v. Starkin, 1 Hen. Blackstone, 17; Pateshall v. Tranter, 3 Ad. & Ellis, 103.) It is true that when a vendee seeks to rescind the contract of sale he must return the property or tender it, but when he relies upon an express warranty and sues upon it, he may recover the damages sustained by its breach without returning or tendering the property. This we understand to be the universal rule. There is, then, no just ground of complaint that the circuit judge charged as he did upon this subject, and much less that he added it was enough that the warrants were in court and could be impounded for delivery to the defendant. If any one could complain of this last declaration, it was the plaintiff and not the defendant.

What we have said sufficiently disposes of all the assignments of error, except the eleventh and twelfth. The eleventh is to the refusal of the court to charge as requested by the defendant's third prayer, which was that "if the jury should find from the evidence that the warrants were regularly issued by order of the several boards of supervisors directing the same, for a valid and subsisting indebtedness by said counties respectively, for the several amounts thereof, and that the plaintiff has not at any time offered to return them, he could only recover the difference between their value without the county seal, and their value with said seal at the time of the several sales, and interest." The fourth instruction asked for, but refused, was "that the several assignments of the warrants carried with them the right to sue and recover the several demands for which they were issued; that if the plaintiff has retained the warrants, without any offer to return them, until the right of action upon the original indebtedness is barred by the statute of limitations, and the right of the holder to affix the county seal to the warrant is also barred by the statute, the jury should find for the defendants."

Of these it may be remarked, in addition to what we have said of the supposed obligation of the plaintiff to return the warrants before bringing his suit on the warranties that there was no evidence whatever that the unsealed warrants had any value. The fair presumption is that they had none, since they were not drawn as the law required, and since the the county treasurer had no authority to pay them. It would, therefore, have been error had the court submitted to the jury to find that they had a value, and to deduct it from what their value would have been, had they been genuine warrants regularly issued.

The plaintiff, as we have seen, was a citizen of Maryland. Buying, as he supposed, Iowa County warrants, and ignorant of their necessary form, he took from the seller an engagement that the subjects of his purchase were such warrants, genuine and regularly issued. He had a right to rest upon that engagement. It was not his duty to inquire farther. Assuming that it was possible when he took the warrants to procure the impress of the county seal upon them, he was under no obligation to procure it. And there is no evidence that he discovered the instruments were not what the defendant warranted them to be until May 14, 1870, when in his suit against the counties they were adjudged void. Then it was too late to obtain, if they ever could have been obtained, regular warrants, or to obtain the impress of the county seal upon those he held. The right to require the affixing of the seal ceased, under the statutes of Iowa, at the expiration of three years from the issue of the warrants. That period had expired before 1870. The right of action on the original claims against the counties was barred at the end of five years from the time it accrued, and all the warrants were dated more than five years before they were adjudged void. The right of action on the original claims against the counties, even if it did pass to the plaintiff by the assignments of the unsealed warrants, was gone, therefore, when he discovered that the defendant's guaranty was broken, and consequently the defendant suffered no loss by not being remitted to the possession of the warrants then, or subsequently. Before that time there can be no pretence that the plaintiff should have returned them. From this it follows very plainly that the third and fourth requests to the circuit court could not have been properly granted.

The judgment is affirmed.

UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT.

OPINION DELIVERED FEB. 14, 1876.

No. 132.—THE ÆTNA LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY OF HARTFORD, plaintiff in error,
v.
DAVID FRANCE and LUCETTA F. FRANCE, his wife, TO USE OF SAMUEL B. SELVAGE.

In error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania.

STATEMENTS IN APPLICATION FOR INSURANCE.

1. That the applicant, when she asked for a policy of insurance, expressly agreed that the answers made by Chew to the questions put to him should be true, and that if any of them were false the policy issued to her should be void. She expressly declared again that the answers made by him were true; that they formed the basis of the contract of insurance, and that any untrue answer should render the policy void.

2. That the question of the materialty of the answer did not arise; that the parties had determined and agreed that it was material; that the agreement was conclusive on that point, and that the only questions for the jury were, first, was the representation made; second, was it false.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

Mr. JUSTICE HUNT delivered the opinion of the Court.

The action was assumpsit, to recover $10,000, the amount of a policy insured upon the life of Andrew J. Chew in July, 1865. The issuing of the policy, the death of Chew, and the service of the necessary proofs of his death are not seriously disputed.

The policy contained the following clause:

"And it is also understood and agreed to be the true intent and meaning hereof, that if the proposals, answers, and declarations made by said Andrew J. Chew, and bearing date the 12th day of July, 1865, and which are hereby made part and parcel of this policy as fully as if herein recited, and upon the faith of which this agreement is made, shall be found in any respect false or fraudulent, then and in such case this policy shall be null and void."

The issuing of the policy was preceded by a proposal for insurance, which contained a number of questions propounded to Chew by the company, with the answers made by him.

In relation to such questions and answers the policy contained this clause:

"It is hereby declared that the above are correct and true answers to the foregoing questions, and it is understood and agreed by the undersigned that the above statements shall form the basis of the contract for insurance, and also that any untrue or fraudulent answers, any suppression of facts in regard to the party's health, or neglect to pay the premium on or before the day it becomes due, shall render the policy null and void, and forfeit all payments made thereon."

Among others were the following questions and answers, viz:

Question 4. Place and date of birth of the party whose life is to be insured?

Answer 4. Born in 1835, interlined (Oct. 28th,) Gloster Co., N. Jersey.

Question 5. Age next birthday?

Answer 5. 30 years.

Question 11. Has the party ever had any of the following diseases? If so, how long, and to what extent? Palsy, dropsy, palpitation, spitting of blood, epilepsy, yellow fever, consumption, rupture, apoplexy, asthma, convulsions, paralysis, bronchitis, disease of the heart, disease of the lungs, insanity, gout, fistula, affection of the brain, fits.

Answer 11. None.

Evidence upon both sides was given as to the age of Chew, tending to show that he was 37 years old, or at least 35 years old when he signed the application, and upon the question of his having suffered from a rupture. Before the case was submitted to the jury a number of requests to charge were made to the judge, which will be referred to presently.

In its main features this case bears a close resemblance to that of Jeffries v. The Economical Ins. Co., decided at the last term of this court.—(22 Wall., 47.) In tthat case, as in this, it was insisted tha the falsity of a statement made in the application did not vitia e the policy issued upon it, unless the statement so made was material to the risk assumed. The opinion then delivered contains the following language in answer to that claim:

"The proposition at the foundation of this point is this: that the statements and declaration made in the policy shall be true.

"This stipulation is not expressed to be made as to important or material statements only, or to those supposed to be material, but as to all statements. The statements need not come up to the degree of warranties. They may not be representations even, if this term conveys an idea of an affirmation having any technical character. Statements and declarations is the expression—what the applicant states and what the applicant declares. Nothing can be more simple. If he makes any statement in the application, it must be true. If he makes any declaration in the application, it must be true. A faithful performance of this agreement is made an express condition to the existence of a liability on the part of the company."

This decision is so recent and so precise in its application that it is not necessary to go back of it. It is only necessary to reiterate that all the statements contained in the proposal must be true; that the materiality of such statements is removed from the consideration of a court or jury by the agreement of the parties that such statements are absolutely true, and that if untrue in any respect the policy shall be void.

The judge was requested to charge—

Fifthly. If the jury believe that the answers to questions Nos. 4 and 5 in the application for insurance, as to the date of birth and age next birthday of said Andrew J. Chew, were false and untrue, the policy issued upon the application is void, and their verdict must be for the defendants.

In response to this request the judge said: "If the jury believe that the answer to the questions numbered four and five were materially untrue, as to the age of the said Andrew J. Chew, the policy is void, and the verdict must be for the defendants." The defendants were entitled to the charge they requested, without the addition made by the judge of the word "materially." The judge, however, proceeded to say: "And if he was 37 or even 35 years old, the difference was not immaterial. I give the fifth instruction as requested."

The process of reasoning by which the learned judge reached his conclusion on this point we have held to be erroneous, viz., that to make the representation important it must be material to the risk assumed; that the representation that he was but 30 years old, when he was 37 or even 35, was material to the risk; and if the jury believed that he was of the greater age mentioned their verdict must be for the defendants, and, therefore, he charged as requested. The charge should have been, that as Chew had represented himself to be but thirty years of age, if the jury found him then to be 35 years old the false statement would avoid the policy, and they must find for the defendants, resting his direction upon the falsity alone of the statement.

Still we do not see that the defendants can ask relief for this reason. The charge was right and could not be misunderstood by the jury. The allegation of the defendants was that Chew had misrepresented his age in the manner stated, and, therefore, the policy should be adjudged void. The judge charged that if he had so misrepresented, the policy was void, and the verdict must be for the defendants. We think no valid exception can be taken to this charge.

Upon the subject of the disease of rupture, or of having been ruptured, the record gives this statement, viz: The defendants requested the court to charge the jury—

6. If the jury believe that the answer to question No. 11 in the application for insurance, whether said Andrew J. Chew ever had any of the diseases therein specified, &c., was false and untrue as to any one of said diseases, the policy issued upon the application is void, and their verdict must be for the defendants.

7. If at the time of the application for insurance was made and the policy issued, Andrew J. Chew was or had been ruptured, he was bound, in answer to question No. 11, to state the fact and also how long, and to what extent; and if the jury believe that at the time mentioned he was or had been ruptured, his answer "None" to said question No. 11 was untrue and false, and their verdict must be for the defendants.

The judge declined thus to charge, but said: "If you believe that Andrew J. Chew was ruptured at the time, or at any such previous period that the rupture may have been material to any question of the soundness of his health when his life was insured; or if, at that time, or within any such prior period, he wore a truss in order that he might repress hernial extrusion, your verdict should, in either case, be for the defendants. But, though he was ruptured in 1846 and 1854, and although the rupture accidentally recurred in a worse form in 1870, from an extraordinary exertion of strength in lifting a heavy weight, yet, if you find that from 1855, or thereabouts, until after the last insurance in 1865, he had no such disease, and was, in all this interval, in the habit of working and using bodily exercise, and occasionally dancing, bathing and traveling, and could walk long distances without being fatigued, and either did not wear a truss, or wore it only from continuance of early habit; that his health was not impaired or affected by the former rupture; that it would not, if mentioned, have increased the risk or the premium, and that there was, in this respect, no falsehood or willful suppression, I cannot give the instruction seventhly requested in the absolute form in which it is expressed."

This charge was erroneous. It left to the decision of the jury, and under circumstances of much embarrassment, a question which the parties had themselves determined. An ordinary jury of twelve men, without the aid of experts, are poorly qualified to determine a question of medical science. To submit to a jury the question, conceding the fact that Chew was ruptured in the year 1846, and again in the year 1854, and again in a worse form in the year 1870, whether during an intermediate period from 1855 to 1865 he had no disease of rupture, and that the jury might decide that, because he walked and worked and danced and bathed without fatigue, and either did not wear a truss or wore it only from continuance of early habit, that his health was not impaired, is to impose a great strain upon the powers of a jury. In the ordinary course of things persons not skilled in medical science could not know what caused a rupture, whether at any particular time the disease was conquered, because its appearance was not then present, or whether it was suspended to reappear sooner or later. Hernia or rupture appears in infants of but a few days old, in youth, maturity, and extreme old age. It manifests itself in the abdomen, the groin, the scrotum, the naval, and the thigh. It is external, or may be internal only.—(Laurence on Rupture, pp. 4, 10.) The author quoted says that this "complaint affects indiscriminately persons of both sexes of every age, condition, and mode of life." "It is true (he says) that a hernia, if properly managed, is not immediately dangerous to the patient, does not effect his health or materially diminish his enjoyments, but it is a source of constant danger, since violent exercise or sudden exertion may bring it from a perfectly innocent state into a condition which frequently proves fatal. * * * The treatment of rupture (he adds) demands from all these circumstances as great a combination of anatomical skill, with experience and judgment, as that of any disorders in surgery."—(p. 2, 3.)

These facts illustrate the gravity of the error committed on the trial of the cause.

The facts and circumstances stated should not have been given to the jury for their judgment. The parties had themselves adjudged and agreed what should be the result if certain facts existed. It was for the jury to determine whether the facts existed, and according as they determined upon that point the one or the other result must necessarily follow. Thus the applicant, when she asked for a policy of insurance, expressly agreed that the answers made by Chew to the questions put to him should be true, and that if any of them were false the policy issued to her should be void. She expressly declared, again, that the answers made by him were true, that they formed the basis of the contract of insurance, and that any untrue answer should render the policy void.

It was alleged by the defendants that when Chew was asked whether he "had ever had any of the following diseases," among which was "rupture," and to which he answered "none," that such answer was untrue.

We decided in the case of Jeffries v. The Economical Ins. Co., (supra,) that the question of the materiality of the answer did not arise, that the parties had determined and agreed that it was material, that their agreement was conclusive on that point, and that the only questions for the jury were—first, was the representation made; second, was it false. This principle was precisely embraced within the requests six and seven made in this case, and the judge erred in not charging as therein requested.

New trial granted.

WE are under obligations to CHARLES H. BILL, Deputy Clerk, for the following opinion:

U. S. CIRCUIT COURT, N. D. OHIO.

ANNA M. BUELL v. THE CONNECTICUT MUTUAL LIFE INS. CO.

Hearing on Demurrer to Second Defense.

STATEMENTS IN APPLICATION FOR INSURANCE—WHAT ARE WARRANTIES—WHAT ARE REPRESENTATIONS.

1. That statements in the application for insurance in the declaration, or answers to the questions are either warranties or representations. If warranties, then materiality, or want of materiality as to the risk, has nothing to do with the contract. The only question is, were they untrue, and if so, the policy is void. But if representations, then to avoid the policy, they must be substantially and materially untrue, or made for the purpose of fraud.

WHAT ARE WARRANTIES—WHAT REPRESENTATIONS.—That where the answers in this class of applications are responsive to direct questions asked by the insurance company, they are to be regarded as warranties, and where they are not so responsive, but volunteered without being called for, they should be construed to be mere representations.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

WELKER, J.—This suit is founded upon a policy of insurance upon the life of Jeptha C. Buell, for the benefit of his wife, the plaintiff.

The defendant, as a second defense to the action, sets up in its answer that in the declaration made at the time of the application for insurance, among other things, the plaintiff says: "And I do hereby agree that the answers given to the following questions and the accompanying statements, and this declaration shall be the basis and form a part of the contract or policy between me and said company; and if the same be not in all respects true and correctly stated, the said policy shall be void." That among the questions in said declaration above referred to, was the following question: "Has father, mother, brother or sister of the party died, or been afflicted with consumption, or any disease of the lungs, or insanity? If so, state full particulars of each case." That the answer to the above question given by the plaintiff was as follows: "No. Father died from exposure in water; age 58. Mother living; age about 50." That the policy issued upon said declaration and questions and answers, and sued upon, contains the following condition, to wit: "And it is also understood and agreed to be the true intent and meaning hereof, that if the proposals, answers and declaration made by said Anna M. Buell, and bearing date the 19th day of March, 1866, and which are hereby made part and parcel of this policy as fully as if herein recited, and upon the faith of which this agreement is made, shall be found in any respect untrue, then, in such case this policy shall be null and void." The defendant avers that the said answer above stated was not in all respects true and correctly stated, but was incorrect and untrue in this, the father of said Jeptha C. did not die at the age of 58, but he died before he was of the age of thirty years: Wherefore the defendant says said policy was and is void and of no effect, and said plaintiff not entitled to recover any amount against the defendant.

To this answer the plaintiff files her demurrer, alleging as reason therefor, that all of said statements and allegations are redundant and irrelevant, and constitute no defense to the plaintiff's action. The demurrer admits that the answer to the question as stated in respect to the age of the father at the time of his death, was untrue and incorrect. That being the fact, does it constitute a defense to this action?

Statements in the application for insurance in the declaration, or answers to the questions are either warranties or representations. If warranties then materialty, or want of materialty as to the risk has nothing to do with the contract. The only question is were they untrue, and if so the policy is void. But if representations, then to avoid the policy, they must be substantially and materially untrue, or made for purpose of fraud.

In 2 O. S. R., 464, the Supreme Court of Ohio says: "The distinction between a warranty and a representation is easily comprehended; the difficulty only arises in its application to particular cases." "An express warranty is a stipulation in writing on the face of the policy, on the literal truth or fulfillment of which the validity of the entire contract depends." "It may be contained in another paper, if distinctly referred to in it and expressly made a part of the contract between the parties." A representation is defined to be "A verbal or written statement made by the assured to the underwriter before the subscription of the policy, as to the existence of some fact or state of fact tending to induce the underwriter more readily to assume the risk by diminishing the estimate he would otherwise have formed of it."

In the case of Campbell v. N. E. Ins. Co., 98 Mass., 381, in defining what is a warranty and what is merely a representation, the court says: "When statements or engagements on the part of the insured are inserted, or referred to in the policy itself, it often becomes difficult to determine to which class they belong. If they appear on the face of the policy, they do not necessarily become warranties. Their character will depend upon the form of the expression used, the apparent purpose of the insertion, and sometimes upon the connection or relation to the other parts of the instrument."

Upon this subject our Supreme Court in 2 O. S. R., says: "But it is by no means * * clear that what is in its nature preliminary, and designed for the information of the underwriter, will so change its character as not to be satisfied by a substantial compliance; from the fact that it is, by appropriate words in the policy made a part of it."

But I am referred to the case of Jeffries, Administrator of Renedy, deceased, v. Economical Mutual Life Ins. Co., 5 Ins. Law, I, 386, recently decided by the Supreme Court of the United States as decisive of the question made upon this demurrer. In that case there were two questions asked the insured: 1st. Whether he was married or single? The answer to which was that he was single. 2d Had any application been made to any other company, and if so, when? The answer to which was "no." The answers to both questions were alleged to be untrue. The Court held that the answers to these questions constituted a part of the contract, and if untrue, whether they were material to the risk or not, would avoid the policy. The court did not seem to put this upon the ground alone that the answers constituted warranties, but that they formed a part of the contract and were expressly made so by the parties, and the court would not inquire as to materiality, because the parties had themselves deemed them material. How did they become material? It will be observed that both of these answers were direct responses to the questions, and that by the direct form of the questions the answers necessarily become a part of the contract. How is it in that respect in the case before us?

The falsity complained of in the answer consists only in reference to the age at which the father died. This certainly was not inquired of in the question, unless we are to find it in that part of it which reads, "If so, state full particulars of each case." This part of the question was evidently intended to reach simply the particulars of the death, or affliction of the near relatives, to ascertain the character and nature of the disease—its extent, whether produced from recent causes or hereditary in the family, in order to determine whether Buell was a proper subject to insure. It is exceedingly doubtful whether the question is really definite enough to require the answer to state whether the father was dead at all, if he did not die of consumption, or disease of the lungs, or insanity. I think the question fairly means, not whether the father, etc., had died of any disease, or from any cause, but whether he had died of, or been afflicted with consumption, or any disease of the lungs, or insanity. This being the fair import of the question, "No" was a complete answer to it, and the remainder of the answer was uncalled for and not responsive to the question. But suppose that be so, defendant claims that it is nevertheless an answer of some sort, and therefore an important part of the contract. The reply to that is, that the declaration which relates to the answers to questions to be made by plaintiff, and which it was agreed should be made part of the contract, must be construed to, and does mean, such answers as are responsive to the questions and such as may be called for by the defendant; and that it does not cover such answers as may be volunteered and irrelevant, and that amount to mere representations.

In the light of the cases in 98 Mass, and 2 O. S. R., I may be allowed to say that not all the statements in the application or writing are to be regarded as warranties, but some may be regarded as mere representations. I do not think the case of Jeffries vs. Economical Insurance Company is at all at variance with this construction. In that case the questions directly called for the answers, and the asking and the answers constituted the mutual agreement of the parties. In this case the age of the father was not called for, and is only voluntarily given by the plaintiff, and the mutual agreement cannot arise as it did in that case so as to say the parties themselves settled the question of materiality.

I believe the true rule in relation to the question of what amounts to a warranty, or what amount only to representation, in the answers to questions in this class of applications, is: Where the answers are responsive to direct questions asked by the insurance company, they are to be regarded as warranties, and where they are not so responsive, but volunteered without being called for, they should be construed to be mere representations. The part of the answer in question in this case in reference to the age of the father at death, being a mere representation, does not constitute a defense unless it appears to have been material as well as false.

The demurrer is therefore sustained.

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

Frame v. Badger.

Appeal from McHenry.

REPLEVIN—INSTRUCTIONS—FRAUD.

1. That the arrangement for working the farm does not appear from the evidence to have been made for the purpose of hindering or delaying creditors.

2. Unfair Instructions.—That it is unfair to select isolated portions of the evidence and give it prominence by calling the attention of the jury especially to it; such a practice is improper; that the judge invades the province of the jury when he undertakes to inform them that one part of the evidence is superior to another, or if they believe one part of the evidence they should discard another.

3. Judge Expressing Opinion.—That the judge should always abstain from in any manner indicating an opinion as to the weight of evidence, unless it is of that character which the law deems conclusive.—[Ed. Legal News.]

Walker, J.—Appellant sued appellee in the Circuit Court of McHenry county in an action of replevin for the recovery of a quantity of wheat, oats and corn. The writ was executed and the property delivered to plaintiff. Before a trial was had it was stipulated and agreed that the trial should be had as though all proper pleas in a replevin suit were filed with replications thereto and issues in fact joined. A trial was had before the court and a jury, resulting in a verdict in favor of defendant. A motion for a new trial was entered, but was overruled by the court and judgment was rendered on the verdict and the plaintiff appeals to this court.

It appeared on the trial that appellant had charge of and controlled a farm in McHenry county which belonged to his brother, who was a non-resident of the State. He had with him an arrangement that he was to cultivate it and pay his brother what he considered a fair consideration for the use of the farm. Appellant had occupied the place on these terms for five or six years, and a final settlement was made by them in the spring of 1874 for the use of the farm for the years 1871 and 1872. Appellant, under the arrangement, was to pay his brother in cash, and not in a portion of the grain raised on the farm.

During the years 1870 and 1871 appellant had leased a portion of the farm to Leonard Frame for a third of the grain and hay he should raise on that portion he finding everything necessary to the cultivation and harvesting the crops. But being unable to support his family, owing to the sickness of his wife in the autumn of 1871, it was agreed that Leonard should work the ensuing year for appellant on another farm, appellant to furnish his family with necessaries and to pay him as much more as he could afford, depending upon the result of the crops, as we infer. But owing to the sickness of his wife, Leonard was unable to remove to the other place, but remained on the farm of appellant's brother and cultivated it as he had previously done. Appellant, in pursuance of the agreement, purchased and furnished goods, groceries, etc., for the use of Leonard's family, to the amount of $311. It also appears that Leonard was a distant relative of appellant.

In the autumn of 1872, Sherwood and Austin having recovered a judgment in the Circuit Court against Leonard for something more than two hundred dollars, sued out an execution, placed it in the hands of the sheriff and had it levied on the property in dispute, and for the recovery of which appellant brought this suit. There is no dispute that the grain was raised by Leonard on the farm of the brother of appellant.

It also appears that in the summer of 1872, E. A. Murphy & Co. caused an execution to be levied on this and other property, on which one Delafield held a chattel mortgage, as the property of Leonard. Appellant and Delafield commenced replevin before a justice of the peace, where, on a trial, the case was decided in favor of the constable, and an appeal was prosecuted to the Circuit Court; but before a trial was had, Leonard turned out property not subject to execution to appellant and Delafield, nearly sufficient to satisfy both debts, and the replevin suit was compromised, and E. A. Murphy & Co. was paid their debt, and the property was released from the levy, and the replevin suit dismissed.

It also appears that in the summer of 1872, appellant had a conversation with E. A. Murphy, in which he says that appellant told him that Leonard Frame's crops were good, and that he thought he would be able to pay a part of his debts the next fall. That on the next day appellant came to him and said he had forgotten to tell him on the day before, that Leonard was working for him that year. On cross-examination, this witness said he would not be positive whether appellant "said Leonard's crops were good, or that Leonard had raised good crops;" that he wonld not be positive as to whether appellant "said he had forgotten to tell me whether Leonard was working for him, or that he felt it his duty to come and tell me the way the thing stood."

Appellant, on being recalled, testified that he told Murphy that Leonard had raised good crops that year, and that when he saw Murphy the next day, he said to him he thought it was his duty to tell him how the matter stood, and that Leonard was working for him, and had been during the year.

The controversy arises on this evidence as to the ownership of the property. Appellant claims that as he hired Leonard to cultivate the grain, that the title is in him. On the other hand, appellee contends that the arrangement was designed and carried out for the purpose of defrauding, hindering and delaying creditors of Leonard in the collection of their debts, and this seems to have been the theory of the defense on the trial below.

It is urged, as a ground of reversal, that the court below erred in giving the first and third of appellee's instructions. This is the first instruction:

"1st. In this case the court instructs the jury as a matter of law, that the burden of proof is upon the plaintiff to show from the evidence in the case, that at the time of suing out this writ of replevin he was the owner of the property in question. And if the evidence in the case, or from the lack of evidence, he has failed to show he was such owner, or if the evidence on that question is equally balanced, then the jury should find for the defendant; and it is not enough that the jury may believe from the evidence, that the property in question, at the time of its replevy, belonged to the brother of the plaintiff, who lives in Virginia."

We, after a careful examination of the entire record, fail to find any evidence on which to base the last clause of this instruction. Appellant testified, and he is uncontradicted, that he had the control of the place, and was to pay his brother what appellant considered a fair share of its products. And he had sold one-third of the grain raised on the place and paid the proceeds to his brother. This was virtually and in effect a leasing of the place, and as lessee, appellant was the owner of the grain he raised, and Leonard Frame was his tenant during the time he occupied the property, prior to 1872. Hence, there was no grounds for leaving the question to the jury whether the grain belonged to Charles Frame. It was calculated to mislead the jury, and should have been stricken out of the instructions before it was given.

The third instruction is this:

"3d. If the jury believe from the evidence that in the summer of 1872 the plaintiff Norman Frame told E. A. Murphy, a creditor of Leonard Frame, that he (Leonard) was doing well on the place, and that he thought in the fall when he came to harvest his crops he would have enough and be able to pay all his debts, this is a circumstance, and to be taken into account by the jury as tending to show that the arrangement between said Norman Frame and Leonard Frame as to the property in question was fraudulent as to the creditors of said Leonard Frame. And if from all the facts and circumstances proven in the case, the jury find that such arrangement about said property was made and entered into by them (Norman and Leonard Frame) with the intent and view on their part to hinder or delay the creditors of said Leonard Frame in the collection of their debts, then they should find for the defendant."

This instruction is unfair to appellant. In the first place, it misrecites the evidence. It states that if the jury believe that Appellant, in the summer of 1872, said to Murphy, a creditor of Leonard Frame, that he was doing well on the place, and that he thought in the Fall, when he came to harvest his crops, he would be able to pay all of his debts, that it would be a circumstance indicating fraud. From this record there is not the slightest pretence for saying that appellant gave it as his opinion that Leonard would be able to pay all of his debts in the Fall. Either the bill of exceptions does not fairly represent the evidence, or the court below has fallen into an error in regard to what the evidence was, when this instrnction was when he gave it. The instruction implied that the judge trying the case understood the evidence as recited in the instruction, and we presume the jury so inferred and acted.

Again, when the evidence is slight or is highly contradictory, it is unfair to select isolated portions of the evidence and give it prominence by calling the attention of the jury especially to it. Such a practice is improper, as this Court has frequently held, and it should not be indulged in by the Circuit Court. All evidence properly admitted on the trial is only received because it is supposed to tend to prove the issue, and it is the duty of the jury to weigh and consider all that is thus admitted on the trial. And the judge invades the province of the jury when he undertakes to inform them that one part of the evidence is superior to another. Or that if they believe one part of the evidence they should discard another. Or generally, if they believe a particular item of evidence they should find for one or the other of the parties to the suit. The court should always instruct that if the facts averred in the issue are proven reciting them, then they should find for the party in whose favor they shall find the facts. Or if either party holding an affirmative fails to prove the affirmative facts, the jury may be told that if they so find, they should find against him. But the judge should always abstain from in any manner indicating an opinion as to the weight of evidence, unless it is of that character which the law deems conclusive.

Again, the theory of the first part of the instruction is wrong. We fail to see how the expression of the opinion by appellant that Leonard Frame would be able to pay all of his debts, or any part of them, to a creditor of Leonard's or to any other person, by a given time, tends, in the slightest degree, to prove that they had entered into a fraudulent arrangement to cheat or wrong Leonard's creditors. At most it was but the expression of an opinion as to the happening of a future event. It did not mislead, or, so far as we can see, did it tend to mislead creditors. And it was not given on the faith of the statement, nor did it imply the crops were admitted to belong to Leonard so as to estop appellant, or tend to prove that appellant was falsely claiming the property. For aught that appears in the evidence, appellant may have had sufficient reason for believing that Leonard would be able to pay something on the debts the next fall. But, be that as it may, we fail to see how the expression of the opinion tended to prove fraud. It must have been this instruction which misled the jury and controlled their verdict, as we are of the opinion that it is not warranted by the evidence. And the judgment of the court below is reversed and the cause remanded.

Judgment reversed.

FRANK CROSBY and B. N. SMITH for appellant.

WE have received from JAMES L. HIGH, of the Chicago bar, the following opinion:

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

OPINION FILED FEB., 1876.

STRAUS ET AL. v. MINZESHEIMER.

PERSONAL PROPERTY—SALE—VENDOR AND VENDEE—DELIVERY—WHEN GOODS TO BE COUNTED—ESTOPPEL.

1. DELIVERY.—Where the vendor of personal property, such as cigars, has done all in his power to complete its delivery to vendee, and thereafter exercises no control over and asserts no possession in the property, everything having been done as between the parties themselves to vest the title, the jury is warranted in finding that there was a delivery of the property and a change of possession, as against attaching creditors of vendor, even though there was no actual removal of the property before its attachment.

2. PROVINCE OF JURY.—Where there is evidence tending to show a delivery, and change of possession of personal property, it is for the jury to determine from the evidence whether a delivery and change of possession actually occurred.

3. CIGARS NEED NOT BE COUNTED, BOXED OR STAMPED.—Where vendee purchases all the cigars at a factory, it is not necessary that they should be counted before the title vests, no separation from stock on hand being required; nor is it necessary that the cigars be boxed or stamped where they have been paid for and the parties have done all in their power to pass the title.

4. CIGARS—STAMPING.—The relative rights of vendors and purchasers of cigars are not affected by the Act of Congress of July 20, 1868, requiring the boxing and stamping of cigars before sale, so as to invalidate, as between themselves, their contract of sale for a supposed violation of the Act.

5. INSTRUCTIONS TO JURY.—A court is justified in refusing an instruction to the jury, when there is not sufficient evidence to make the instruction applicable to the facts, or when it assumes a disputed fact which the jury should be left free to determine.

6. ESTOPPEL.—A purchaser whose property has been attached in his absence for a debt against a third person, is not estopped from maintaining an action of trespass therefor, merely because he did not immediately warn the sheriff, but when he has notified him of his title a few days afterward, and when his conduct has not deceived any one as to the ownership of the property.

Opinion by SHELDON, J.

This was a suit in trespass brought by appellee, Minzesheimer, against appellants, to recover damages for the taking of 10,700 cigars to which Minzesheimer claimed title under a purchase from one Regina Blumenthal, the cigars having been levied upon and sold by appellant Ayars, a deputy sheriff, under a writ of attachment in favor of appellants, Straus and Sawyer, against Regina Blumenthal, and one Schloss, her partner. The record shows the following facts:

In 1872 Minzesheimer was in partnership with J. W. Schloss and Regina Blumenthal in the cigar business in Chicago, under the firm name of F. Minzesheimer & Co. This firm dissolved October 16, 1872, and the business was continued by J. W. Schloss and Regina Blumenthal, under the name of J. W. Schloss & Co. The new firm became indebted to Strauss & Co. in the sum of about $800. Regina Blumenthal lived in New York, and the business was conducted by Schloss in Chicago. Julius Blumenthal, husband of Regina, came to Chicago acting under a power of attorney from his wife, and dissolved the firm, Blumenthal taking the assets and agreeing to pay the firm debts. Blumenthal took charge of the firm assets, including cigars, tobacco, and fixtures at store, No. 39 South Canal Street, and the cigars in controversy, at factory, No. 39 Waller Street. Blumenthal was to take charge of the cigars as soon as they could be packed and ready to be stamped. Before they were packed or stamped, and on the 2d of January, 1873, Minzesheimer claims to have bought the cigars of Blumenthal. The alleged sale was made at 283 West Lake Street, a mile and a half from the cigars at 39 Waller Street. Minzesheimer had never seen the cigars; he paid $428 for them, and received a written memorandum of the sale. Blumenthal was to deliver them Januarv 4, 1873. He was a brother-in-law of Minzesheimer. On the morning of the fourth of January, Minzesheimer, who was to pay for the stamps, purchased them and went with his son and Blumenthal to the factory with two wagons. Blumenthal pointed to the cigars, gave Minzesheimer several boxes, saying: "Here are your cigars." Minzesheimer looked them over, and they began stamping. Schloss' foreman, in charge of the place, then offered to stamp them with the aid of a boy, and to have them completed by 4 o'clock, which was assented to, and Minzesheimer and Blumenthal then left. About 4 o'clock of the afternoon Minzesheimer and Blumenthal came back, but in the meantime the levy had been made under the attachment writ in favor of appellants Straus and Sawyer, against Schloss & Co. Verdict and judgment were for the plaintiff, and defendants appealed.

It is assigned for error that the verdict is unsupported by the evidence, and that the Court erred in giving and refusing instructions. It is claimed that the alleged sale of the cigars to Minzesheimer was invalid, as being fraudulent as against creditors. We are entirely satisfied with the correctness of the finding of the jury in this respect. We do not see how they could, under the evidence, have found otherwise. The sale is further claimed to be invalid, because there was no delivery of the cigars to Minzesheimer, and no change of possession.

This is the chief point of controversy. We think it may be inferred from the evidence, that 39 Waller street was the place where the firm of J. W. Schloss & Co. manufactured its cigars; that every thing there belonged to that firm, although the license was taken in the name of J. W. Schloss; and that there was nothing at Waller street but these cigars, more than half of which were boxed. On January 4, 1873, Blumenthal having previously sold the cigars to Minzesheimer, and received the pay, took Minzesheimer to the factory, at 39 Waller street, showed him the cigars, saying: "Here are your cigars," and handing to him several boxes of them. Blumenthal paid the employees at the factory; Schloss gave him an order for the revenue stamps, which was necessary, because of the license being in the name of Schloss individually. Minzesheimer paid for and obtained the requisite stamps, and commenced the work of stamping the cigars. The foreman suggested that, as it would take some time to complete the stamping, he, with the boy there, would attend to it, and have them ready on Minzesheimer's return in the afternoon. Minzesheimer gave the foreman a dollar to purchase some bay rum, with which to flavor the cigars. During Minzesheimer's absence, the cigars were attached. Both Schloss and Blumenthal had done all they could do to complete the delivery of the property to Minzesheimer. The evidence fails to show, that after the alleged delivery to Minzesheimer, they exercised any control over the cigars, or were in possession thereof. Minzesheimer had commenced to stamp the cigars, and left an agent to complete the same. He would seem to have been the ostensible, as well as real person, in possession.

True, the cigars had not been actually removed, but this could not have been done before stamping, without violating the revenue law. Everything had been done, so far as respected the rights of the parties as between themselves, and their power to do so, to vest the complete title in, and to perfect the delivery to Minzesheimer. The stamping required before removal, concerned alone the United States government, and that Minzesheimer undertook to do.

We think, from such facts, it is not to be asserted that the jury were not warranted in finding that there was a delivery of the cigars to the vendee, and a change of possession.

The objection taken to the instructions given for the plaintiff is, that they assume that the question of delivery is solely a question of fact for the jury, whereas, it is a mixed question of law and fact, and that whereas in this case, the facts show no immediate, continuous, or exclusive change of possession, the court should have instructed the jury that the title had not passed as to creditors. But this is on, what we regard, as a mistaken assumption. We find that there was evidence tending to show a delivery and change of possession. In such case it is for the jury to determine from the evidence, whether they occurred or not.

It is objected that there was error in refusing these three instructions, asked by defendant;

I. The jury are instructed that, under the revenue laws of the United States, Blumenthal could not lawfully sell, nor could the plaintiff lawfully buy the cigars in question, until they were properly boxed and stamped with the United States revenue stamps as provided by law, and that any sale or attempt to sell the cigars until so boxed and stamped rendered the cigars liable to forfeiture to the United States, and the parties liable to a fine of not less than $100, nor more than $1,000, and to imprisonment not less than six months nor more than two years.

II. If the jury find from the evidence that the alleged sale of the cigars by Blumenthal to plaintiff was made with a view to defraud or hinder the creditors of J. W. Schloss & Co., and that the plaintiff knew or had reasonable cause to know of such intention, then the plaintiff, as against such creditors, could acquire no title to the cigars, even had he obtained possession and control thereof, and the defendants were justified in taking the same under the proceedings in attachment.

III. The fact that the cigars in question at the time of the sheriff's levy, were found at the factory of J. W. Schloss, one of the defendants in the attachment, and under his control, affords a strong presumption against their ownership by plaintiff, which presumption must be overcome by satisfactory evidence that the title and possession had passed to plaintiff by a bona fide sale, before the levy of the attachment, in order to entitle plaintiff to a recovery in this action.

The first instruction we regard as inapplicable here. It was drawn in view of the act of Congress of July 20, 1868, which provides for a forfeiture to the United States of all cigars which shall be sold or offered for sale, not properly boxed and stamped, and imposes a penalty therefor. It was not here contemplated that the cigars should be sold without being boxed and stamped, but it was a provision of the contract that they should be stamped. It was the intent that they should be stamped before removal, and Minzesheimer was in the course of stamping them preparatory to their removal, when they were attached. Under such circumstances, we cannot think that the relative rights of the parties are to be affected by this act of congress, so as to invalidate, as between themselves, their contract of sale for a supposed violation of the act.

As regards the second refused instruction, without entering upon any discussion of its correctness, abstractly considered, we find it sufficient to say that, in our opinion, the court was justified in its refusal to give it, on the ground, if no other, of the want of evidence upon which to base the instruction. From an examination of the testimony, we fail to discover enough of evidence that the sale was made with a view to hinder or defraud creditors, and still less that the purchaser knew of any such intention, to fairly raise a question in those respects, and make the instruction applicable to the facts.

It was enough to condemn the third refused instruction, that it assumed the fact that the cigars were found under the control of J. W. Schloss. That was a disputed fact, and the jury should have been left free to find upon it.

It is further urged, that the court erred in its modification of the following instruction, asked by the defendants:

III. It is a well-settled rule of law that in sales of personal property, when anything remains to be done to complete the contract, such as ascertaining quantity or delivering possession, the title does not pass until these things are done, and if the jury are satisfied from the evidence that the cigars in question were in such condition at the time of their alleged purchase by the plaintiff, that something material to the contract, such as counting, boxing, stamping, or delivery of possession remained undone, then, as against creditors, the title could not pass to plaintiff, and defendants are entitled to a verdict.

The words appearing in italics, viz: "counting, boxing, stamping, or," were stricken out by the court and the instruction then given.

Counting was not necessary. Minzesheimer had purchased all the cigars at the factory. The amount paid was based upon the number 10,700. There was no counting to be done. No separation from stock on hand. The boxing and stamping were not with a view to the interest of either of the parties under the contract of sale. They concerned the interest solely of the United States government. The stamps had already been purchased by Minzesheimer to be affixed, and the requirement of government virtually answered. The authorities as to when title to personal property passes on sale, where something remains to be done to the property, are not entirely harmonious. There are numerous most respectable authorities, which hold that a contract for the sale of specific goods, or of goods identified, where something remains to be done to the property, will pass the title to the property before the act be done, if such appears by the contract to have been the intention of the parties. In consonance with this class of authorities, this court held in Graff v. Fitch, 58 Ill. 374, and in Shelton v. Franklin, 68 Ill., 339, that the title to personal property would pass by a contract of sale, where such was the intention of the parties, although measuring or weighing was to be had at a subsequent time in order to ascertain the amount to be paid. The cigars here had been paid for; everything had been done which it was possible under the circumstances to do, to change the possession and make the title complete in the vendee; and there can be no doubt from the evidence that the parties intended an absolute transfer to make the sale complete and absolute, although the stamping of a portion of the cigars remaining to be afterward done for government purposes only. In view of the facts, we perceive no error in the modification of the instruction.

The point is made that Minzesheimer is, by his own conduct, estopped from a recovery. The conduct claimed as having such effect, is, that Minzesheimer on his return to the factory made no assertion of his title or ownership of the property, and did not even speak to the sheriff, whereas, he should have made assertion of his title and warned the sheriff of the consequences of taking his property.

But when Minzesheimer returned to the factory he found the sheriff had already attached the cigars. He did not by any conduct induce the sheriff to make the attachment, nor did he quietly stand by and acquiesce in the making of the levy. It had been made before in his absence. The cigars were attached on Saturday, the 4th; on Monday, the 6th, Minzesheimer tried to find the sheriff and failed in finding him every day for about a week, when he saw him and demanded the cigars. He also, at the same time, demanded them of Straus and Sawyer. We do not perceive that he assisted to deceive any one, or that he influenced any one by his acts to believe any other person owned the property except himself. We see no foundation for the claim of any estoppel.

The judgment will be affirmed.

Judgment affirmed.

WOMEN ATTORNEYS.—We clip the following from the Milwaukee Sentinel in relation to Chief Justice RYAN's opinion in the case of Miss Goodell:

Another young woman has been admitted to the bar in Chicago. Down there they haven't the same desire to preserve "the peculiar qualities of womanhood, its gentle graces, its tender susceptibility, its delicacy, its emotional impulses," as Chief Justice Ryan has. They somehow have an idea that it is just as well for a woman to earn a comfortable living in the profession as in bending over a wash-tub.

TERMS:—TWO DOLLARS per annum, in advance Single Copies, TEN CENTS.

We call attention to the following opinions, reported at length in this issue:

County Warrants—Guaranties of Genuineness—seal.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States by Strong, J., in a case founded upon express guaranties of the genuineness and regularity of the issue of county warrants. The plaintiff has sued the county and been defeated, for the general reason that the seal of the county had not been attached to the warrants, and that under the laws of Iowa, as held by the court, the warrants were invalid without the impress of the county seal. The present suit was brought against the guarantor, and the court held that the guaranties covered the defect of the want of the county seal upon the warrants, and that as they did not bear the impress of the county seal, the guaranty was broken, and the defendant was liable. The court decides several interesting questions relating to suits brought on warranties.

Statements in Application for Insurance.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States, by Hunt, J., holding in the case before the court that the question of the materiality of the answer made by the party whose life was to be insured, did not arise; that the parties had determined and agreed that it was material that the agreement was conclusive on that point, and that the only questions for the jury were: first, was the representation made; second, was it false. In this connection we would call attention to the opinion of Welker, J., upon the same question, published in this issue. We consider it the better opinion of the two.

Insurance—Statements on Application for.—The opinion of the United States Circuit Court for the Northern District of Ohio, by Welker, J., holding that statements in the application for insurance in the declaration or answers to the questions are either warranties or representations. If warranties, then materiality, or want of materiality as to the risk, has nothing to do with the contract, the only question is were they untrue, and if so the policy is void, but if representations, then to avoid the policy, they must be substantially and materially untrue or made for the purpose of fraud. The learned Judge states what are to be regarded as warranties and what as representations.

Fraud—Instructions.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of this State, by Walker, J., as to the province of a judge, in instructing the jury as to the weight of evidence. We have noticed in several recent cases, that the Judges of our Supreme Court have spoken very plainly of the practice of some Circuit Judges, assuming to tell the jury in their instructions what facts have been proven, and the weight they must give to them in making up their verdict. We are glad to see this, for it will have a tendency to break up this evil practice. Instructions should be short, clear, and relate only to the particular case on trial.

Sale—Delivery—When Goods to be Counted.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of this State, by Sheldon, J., as to what constitutes delivery of personal property where the goods sold are to be counted, and holding that the relative rights of vendors and purchasers of cigars are not affected by the act of Congress of July 20, 1868, requiring the boxing and stamping of cigars before sale, so as to invalidate, as between themselves this contract of sale for a supposed violation of the act.

Compromise Agreement.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of Illinois by Craig, J., construing an agreement signed by the creditors of an insolvent to take a certain percentage of their claims in full satisfaction, and stating to what claims it relates.

Agreement — Penalty — Liquidated Damages.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of Illinois, by Scholfield, J., holding where there are several covenants or stipulations in an agreement, the damages for the non-performance of some of them, which are readily ascertainable by a jury, and the damages for the non-performance of the others, are not measurable by any exact pecuniary standard, and a sum is named as damages, for a breach of any of the covenants or stipulations, such sum is held to be merely a penlaty.

The Dram Shop Act.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of this State by Breese, J., construing the act known as the "Dram Shop Act," stating to what cases it applies, and holding that it has no application to the giving away of liquors at a party's own private dwelling as an act of courtesy.

Recent Publications.

The N. Y. Weekly Digest of cases decided in the U. S. Supreme, Circuit, and District Courts, Appellate Courts of the several States, State and City Courts of New York and English Courts. Vol. 1, New York; McDivitt, Campbell & Co., Law Booksellers and publishers, 1876.

We have received from the publishers a neatly bound copy of the first volume, the contents of which is sufficiently expressed in its title page. The volume contains over 600 pages. It is issued regularly in weekly numbers.

A Key to Story's Equity Jurisprudence, containing over eight hundred questions, being an analysis classified by subjects and references, and an index. Designed for the use of universities, colleges and law schools, and for private use. By R. S. Guernsey, of the New York bar, New York: Diossy and Company, publishers, 1876.

The author says these pages are for the express purpose of aiding law students to study and clearly understand equity jurisprudence as a system complete within itself, and as founded upon logical and scientific principles. The arrangement is such that the chapters and questions comprise an outline and skeleton of the system of equity jurisprudence. We are satisfied from the examination we have been able to give this little volume, that if any student follows the method of study here recommended and laid down, that it will be a valuable aid to him in acquiring a knowledge of our equity system.

A Treatise on Questions of Law and Fact — Instructions to Juries, and Bills of Exceptions, By J. C. Wells, Counselor at Law, New York. James Cockcroft and Company. 1876. Price $7.50.

This work is printed from plates made at the Boston Stereotype Foundry, by what is known as the clay process. The paper is excellent. The volume contains seven hundred and fifty-two pages. It is divided into three parts. Part I. treats of Questions of Law and Fact. Part II., of The Law of Instructing and Charging juries. Part III., of Bills of Exception. The plan pursued by Mr. Wells is to give concisely in the text the principles announced by the courts in delivering opinions in cases involving questions within the scope of the work and to give the citations to authorities in the notes. Mr. Wells is a member of the Illinois bar and the author of a treatise upon the Statute of Limitations.

The Institutes of Justinian; with English Introduction, Tranlation and Notes. By Thomas Collett Sandars, M. A., Barrister at Law, late Fellow of Oriel College, Oxford. First American, from the fifth London edition, with an Introduction by Wm. G. Hammond, LL. D. Professor of Law in the Iowa State University. Chicago: Callaghan & Company. 1876.

The publishers have taken the most approved and recent English edition of the Institutes of Justinian and clothed it in an exceedingly elegant new dress, and introduce it to the American bar by an introduction written by Professor Hammond, which shows the author to have been a thorough and critical student of the Roman law. He gives a general account of the classification of Roman law, and of the relation between that classification and the arrangement of our own law, as represented in Blackstone, and says: To appreciate the Institutes, or the other works of the Roman jurists, they must learn to look upon them as the precursors of Blackstone, Kent and Story; as stages in the development of one great science, which, in spite of temporary aberrations and local diversities, has preserved its unity and has grown by continuous forces from the Twelve Tables to the codes and statute books, reports and treatises of the present day; that the recent civilians have fostered a belief in the radical diversity of the civil and common law, in methods, principles and sources. That this work must be undone before the study of Roman law can take firm root among us, or bear its legitimate fruit in a more careful and appreciative study of our own law. Of the merits of the Institutes it is unnecessary for us to speak, They should be read and studied by the law student with the same care as Black-Stone or Kent.

We have received, just as we go to press, too late for notice in this issue, the 68th volume of Illinois Reports.

RULES IN ADMIRALTY.

The following rules in Admiralty were entered by Judge Blodgett in the United States District Court for this district, on Monday, March 13, 1876:

Ordered,—That the following rules of Practice in Admiralty be entered:

1st. Upon the entry of default in admiralty cases, the case shall be referred to a commissioner to take proofs, and such commissioner shall notify the libellant to produce before him the evidence relied upon to support the cause of action set forth in the libel, within ten days, and the commissioner shall thereupon, with all convenient speed report and transmit to the court the proofs taken by or submitted to him, and his conclusion as to whether said proofs are sufficient to maintain said cause of action.

2d. In all admiralty causes where an answer is filed making an issue or issues of fact, either party may move for the reference of the case to a commissioner, to take proofs, and such commissioner shall proceed on reasonable notice to the parties to take the proofs offered in said case. The party having the affirmative of the issue shall take proofs first and within thirty days after such reference, unless, for cause shown, the time shall be extended. The other party shall then take and close proofs within thirty days unless the time shall be extended by the court for cause. And the party having the affirmative shall then have not to exceed twenty days to put in rebutting proofs.

On expiration of the time for taking proofs the commissioner shall, with all convenient dispatch, return said proofs with his report thereon to the court, and if no exception shall be taken to said report within ten days after the filing thereof, the same shall stand confirmed and a decree shall be entered in accordance with the recommendations of the commissioner. But if exceptions shall be taken, then the case shall stand for hearing upon said exceptions or the pleadings and proofs, and be heard before the court in such order as the court shall direct.

3d. That in all cases where property has been sold under a decree in Admiralty or upon the instance side of the court and the proceeds paid into court, notice shall be published by the Clerk in the same manner and time that notices of seizure under mesne process are published, stating, as nearly as may be, the amount of such proceeds and requiring all persons claiming the same, or in any way interested in the distribution thereof to file with or make known to the court within thirty days the nature and amount of such interest or claims, and at the expiration of the time limited by such notice a reference shall be had to a commissioner to examine and report the nature and amount of all claims filed and the respective priorities of said claimants or interveners. And no person shall be entitled to participate in said proceeds unless his claim or petition so to do shall be filed within the time fixed by said notice, unless by leave of court he shall, for cause shown, be allowed to intervene and make such claim after such lapse of time.

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

Abstract of opinions filed at Ottawa in 1876.

C. R. I. & P. R. R. Co. vs. the City of Joliet.—Appeal from Will.—Opinion by Sheldon, J.

UNRESTRICTED DEDICATON TO PUBLIC USE.—USE OF R. R. PUBLIC USE.—DIRECTION OF PUBLIC USES.—EQUITABLE ESTOPPEL.—NUISANCES.—REGULATIONS OF RAILROADS BY MUNICIPALITY.

Statement.—In 1834, the town of Joliet was laid out in Cook county—a block of land on the plat being marked "Public Ground." In 1836 East Joliet was laid out; and also a block marked "Public Ground" was platted, adjoining the former. In 1836, Will county struck off from Cook, with county seat at Joliet; and the act directed the county buildings to be built on these "Public Grounds." In 1837, the town of Joliet was incorporated. In 1841, the incorporating act was repealed. In 1845, the name was changed to Joliet. In 1846 and 1847, the present court house was built. In 1847, the Rock Island and La Salle R. R. Co. was incorporated and authorized to build a railroad from Rock Island to the Illinois river. In 1851, extended to Chicago, via Ottawa and Joliet; and the name of the company changed to the Chicago and Rock Island Railroad Company; and the road was constructed to Chicago. In Joliet, by the public wish, the road was laid across the "Public Ground," within twenty feet of the court house; the right of way being granted by the board of supervisors of Will county, on conditions,—one of which conditions was that the company should enclose a portion of the public square with a fence corresponding with what might afterwards be erected by the county around the other portion. The first train passed July 4th, 1852,—the "public ground" being then altogether unfenced. In June, 1852, the city was again incorporated; and the city government was organized in August. In January, 1853, the council, on request, granted privileges in regard to the erection of a depot—privileges available only by the road passing across the "public ground." In September, 1863, the county board called on the company for the building of their share of the fence, as previously provided for, and the company, accordingly, built the fence, at the cost of over $4,000. In 1866, the Chicago and Rock Island R. R. Co., consolidated with the Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific R. R. Co., of Iowa, and took the name of the latter. From 1854, the city levied taxes on the "public ground" against the county, and the county paid these taxes.

In 1872, the council declared the operation of the railroad on certain streets, and across the square, to be a public nuisance, and imposed penalties for its continuance. Two months afterwards, the city filed a bill for an injunction, and prevailed; whereon the company appealed, Held.

1. That the dedication of the square being only as "public ground," it was an unrestricted dedication to public use. In such case, the use is indefinite, and may vary, according to circumstances, in the discretion of those holding the public trust.

2. While a railroad company is a private corporation, yet the use of a railroad is a public use, and therefore may be provided for by the exercise of eminent domain.

3. There having been no municipal organization at the time the right of way was granted, the county board was the only representative power to direct the public use of the ground dedicated, and this was necessarily subject to the directing authority of the legislature. Even where a fee is in a municipal corporation for public use, the legislature can direct the use to railroad, or other purposes consistent with the design of a dedication of the ground.

4. The acts and acquiescence of the city, after the location, constituted an estoppel in pais; especially when taken in connection with the lapse of time.

5. A city cannot be permitted to allege annoyances in such case, in regard to the holding of courts, since this is exclusively a matter pertaining to the interests of the county.

6. The necessary inconveniences of operating a railroad through a city are not per se a nuisance; although the municipal corporation is at full liberty to provide safeguards against them.

7. A municipal corporation cannot declare anything a nuisance arbitrarily, or, in the absence of general laws of the state or the city, at the mere discretion of the local authority, and not even where it is authorized to declare and punish nuisances.

8. Where a prior ordinance provides, "that said railroad company shall be subject to all laws and ordinances that may hereafter be passed to regulate railroads in the city," this only means that the company shall be subject to all reasonable and legal regulations, and not that the company shall be held liable to abandon, take up, or remove its track, at the bidding of the council.

Henry Muller & wife v. John B. Inderreiden.—Error to Superior Court of Cook.—Opinion by BREESE, J.

VALUATION OF HOMESTEAD.

Held, That where a homestead is levied on, it belongs not to the court, but to the commissioners provided by the statute, to determine whether it is worth more than $1,000, or not.

G. B. Girard v. A. Gateau.—Appeal from Opinion by WALKER, J.

DISSOLUTION OF PARTNERSHIP BY EQUITY.

Held, That, while equity will not, on slight grounds, interfere to dissolve a partnership, on application of one of the partners, yet, where the personal relations of the partners become so hostile that a harmonious carrying on of the business is wholly impracticable, equity will thereon decree a dissolution.

97. Alfred Skinner, et al. v. P. D. Baker et al.—Opinion by CRAIG, J.

DEEDS—DELIVERY—ESCROW.

Held, That a deed takes effect only on delivery to the grantee, or his agent. And where it is delivered to a stranger, or third party, to be delivered to the grantee on performance of conditions, this is an escrow, and passes no title until the fulfilling of the conditions. If the performance fails, the deed may be returned to the grantor, and canceled.

Pratt Roberts et al. v. Levi Pierce.—Opinion by SCOTT, J.

TESTIMONY OF PARTIES—EXCEPTION.

Held, That the exception, in the evidence act of 1857, that where one sues as administrator, the opposite party cannot testify on his own behalf, does not extend to the case where the plaintiff, though administrator, needed not to describe himself as such, but might have maintained the suit in his own individual name.

Isaac P. Coats v. Alexander Cunningham.—Error to Superior Court of Chicago.—Opinion by SCHOLFIELD, J.

APPOINTMENT OF RECEIVERS.

Held, 1. That the appointment of a receiver by a court, is only interlocutory; and no writ of error will lie thereto.

2. The appointment of the receiver determines no rights; and does not, in any manner, affect titles to the property involved. The receiver is merely the officer of the court, and his holding is only the holding of the court for him from whom the possession is taken. He is appointed on behalf of all parties, and his appointment is not to oust any party of his right to the possession, but merely to retain it for the benefit of the party ultimately entitled; and when he is ascertained, the receiver will be considered as his receiver.

C. & P. R. R. Co. v. Frederick Kaehler et al.—Error to Superior Court of Chicago.—Opinion by BREESE, J.

SERVICE ON R. R. CO. AND RETURN.

Held, That, in a suit against a railroad company, a return is sufficient as follows, to wit: "Served the within named railroad company, by reading the same, and leaving a copy thereof to A. B., cashier of the said R. R. company, this 24th day of March, 1875; the president of said company conld not be found in my county, this 5th day of April, 1875;" and will be construed to mean that, on the day service was made on the cashier, the president could not be found in the county, the latter date being merely the date of the return, and not of the service.

Hollis Cummings et al. v. Allen B. Burleson et al.—Appeal from Carroll.—Opinion by CRAIG, J.

MORTGAGED HOMESTEAD.

Held, That where a mortgage on a homestead is foreclosed, the homestead right remaining, it is proper to set out the homestead in the mode prescribed by statute under executions at law. The silence of the statute as to the mode, is to be construed to indicate the will of the legislature that the mode prescribed in similar cases by the specific statute, should govern this proceeding also.

101.—A. G. Comsen v. Joseph F. Hixon et al. Error to Superior Court of Cook.—Opinion by BREESE, J.

SERVICE OF SCIRE FACIAS—MOTION TO SET ASIDE JUDGMENT.

Held, 1. That a scire facias is a summons, and therefore may be served by a special deputy, in the manner prescribed by law.

2. That a motion to set aside a judgment is too late after the term at which the judgment was entered.

1.—Jacob Frye et al v. Daniel A. Jones et al. Error to Superior Court of Cook.—Opinion by Sheldon, J.

WARRANT TO CONFESS JUDGMENT — CONSTRUCTION.

STATEMENT. — Thirteen promisory notes, for equal amounts, and of the same date, payable at monthly intervals, given. On each alternate note a printed warrant of attorney was filled out; and on the rest, this was left blank, and detached. Under this warrant, so attached to the alternate notes, confession of judgment was made on all—the warrant reciting that "we are now justly indebted," etc., and "may, from time to time, become further, or otherwise, indebted, upon bonds, promissory notes, etc., made, or to be made," etc., and authorized such debts made or to be made to be confessed. Held,

1. That the detaching of the warrant from some of the notes indicated the intention of the parties that the notes from which the warrant was detached should not be subject to the power of the warrant.

2. The authority to confess a judgment without process, must be clear and explicit, and must be strictly pursued.

106.—Eliza Nixon v. John Halley. Error to DeKalb. Opinion by CRAIG, J.

ESTOPPEL ON A MARRIED WOMAN AS TO CONTRACT RELATING TO SEPARATE PROPERTY —STATE COMITY.

Held, 1. Where a married woman has possession of property, holds herself out as the owner thereof, and, by such representation, induces one to labor upon it in repairs, she is estopped, in a subsequent suit for the price of the labor, from denying that she was the actual owner.

2. It seems, that if the property is situated in another state, the courts of this State will, by comity, regard the law in that State, and, if that law allows a married woman to contract in regard to her separate property, will enforce such contract, and, more especially, when a subsequent promise to pay is made in this State.

108. Union National Bank v. Oceana County Bank.—Appeal from Cook.—Opinion by SCOTT, J.

EFFECT OF A BANK CHECK AS TO FUNDS IN BANK—TRANSFER—COUNTERMAND.

Held, That where a depositor draws a check on his banker, having funds of his in an equal or greater sum than the amount of the check, it operates to transfer the sum to the payee, who may sue for and recover the amount from the bank; and a transfer of the check gives the right to each successive holder. After the check has passed into the hands of a bona fide holder, it is not in the power of the drawer to countermand the order of payment.

109. Ole Anderson v. H. P. Wood.—Appeal from Knox.—Opinion by BREESE, J.

LAYING OUT AND VACATING ROADS.

This case turns almost wholly on matters of fact. However,

Held, That applications for laying out a new road, and for vacating an old one, may be joined in the same petition, under the present road law.

Isaac Wilsan v. James McDowell.—Appeal from Livingston.—Opinion by WALKER, J.

IMPEACHING DEED—EVIDENCE—STATUTE OF FRAUDS.

Held, 1. That evidence to impeach a deed must be clear and convincing.

2. The statute of frauds will not allow a parol contract concerning lands to be set up for the purpose.

3. The court is not at liberty to make exceptions to the operation of any statute, on the ground of obviating individual hardship. And, as to the statute of frauds, it has already been relaxed to the full limit allowed by public policy.

James H. Clark, et al. v. School Directors, etc.—Appeal from Iroquois, Opinion by SHELDON, J.

DISCRETION OF SCHOOL DIRECTORS IN PURCHASING SCHOOL SUPPLIES.

STATEMENT.—Sale of stereoscopic views etc., to school directors, who gave this order:

"State of Illinois, } ss.
County of Iroquois. }

October 26, 1871.

Treasurer of township 27 north, range No. 14, in said county; on or before the 1st day of April, 1872, pay to Clark, Lake & Co., or bearer, the sum of fifty-three dollars, out of any money belonging to school district No. 1, in said township, for one school set of stereoscopic views, with scope, and Elements of Geography and History, with interest at the rate of six per cent., and ten per cent. on the amount after due."

(Signed)

This was refused by the treasurer, as void on its face. Suit brought; verdict for defendants, and appeal. Held:

1. That the discretion of school directors to purchase school supplies, is extremely limited under the statute.

2. Such purchases can only be made out of surplus money, left after all necessary school expenses are paid, whereas the order above is upon any funds, generally.

3. Directors are not authorized to purchase on time, or pay interest on such claim.

4. The plaintiffs have no remedy but to reclaim their property.

T. L. Miller v. Superior Machine Co.—Error to Superior Court of Cook.—Opinion by CRAIG, J.

SIGNATURE OF COMPANY AND SEAL—APPEAL FROM JUSTICE INSUFFICIENT BOND.

STATEMENT.—Suit by the Machine Company before a J. P. Verdict against it for costs. Appeal to Circuit Court. Default and judgment against defendant (plaintiff in error.)

The appeal bond was signed:

"Superior Machine Company,
by G. S. Stowe, Agt. [Seal.]"

Held, 1. That the court can not know, judicially, that a corporation or company has a seal other than a scrawl. In the absence of proof, the presumption is that the seal used was the proper and only seal of the company.

2. The insufficiency of an appeal bond does not justify an appellee to make default in following the case to a circuit court; since there he could obtain a rule for a sufficient bond.

American Express Co. v. R. Greenhalgh.—Appeal from Knox.—Opinion by WALKER, J.

LIABILITY OF PUBLIC CARRIERS FOR GOODS SHIPPED C. O. D.

STATEMENT.—Goods shipped to Greenhalgh, C. O. D. Consignee refused to receive them, but paid the express charges. Suit was brought by the consignors against the consignee, for the value of the goods. Pending the suit, the attorney for the consignee ordered the express company to return the goods. This was done, and the consignors received them. Afterward, verdict was rendered against the defendant, who then demanded the goods of the express company, and thereon brought suit in trover. It was contended that the judgment gave absolute title to the defendant. Held,

1. That, if so, the action could only lie against the consignors for the goods so returned by order of the defendants.

2. If the agent of the company even knew of the pendency of the suit, yet he would be justified by such order in reshipping to the consignors.

3. It is not the duty of a public carrier to seek the true owner of goods, nor unasked, or unwarned, to seek to protect the contingent future interests of a consignee.

4. Although, should the public carrier deliver goods to a third party, it would devolve upon such carrier to prove that the delivery was to the true owner. But that is not this case.

Isaac M. Kirkpatrick v. R. A. Howk.—Appeal from Warren.—Opinion by SHELDON, J.

A CREDITOR AND SURETY.—RELATION BETWEEN THEM AS TO PLEDGES OR SECURITIES OF THE PRINCIPAL IN THE CREDITOR'S HANDS—DECLARATIONS OF CO-OBLIGOR.

Held, 1. That in equity, a creditor who has the personal contract of his debtor, with a surety, and takes property of the debtor as a pledge, or security, is required to hold the property for the benefit of the surety, as well as himself; and if he parts with it without the knowledge or against the will of the surety, he will thereby lose his claim against the surety to the amount of the property so surrendered. And these rules of equity are enforced in courts of law.

2. A surety who pays the debt is entitled to be put in the place of the creditor, as to all the means and remedies of the creditor.

3. Where two names are embraced in a summons, but service is only on one, the one not served is not a party to the action, and his acts and declarations are incompetent as evidence against the other.

WE have received from JOHN LYLE KING, of the Chicago bar, the following opinion:

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

OPINION FILED JAN. 21, 1876.

ABRAHAM LIPMAN v. ELIAS LOUITZ.

Appeal from Cook.

AN AGREEMENT BY CREDITORS OF AN INSOLVENT TO TAKE A CERTAIN PERCENTAGE IN FULL OF THEIR CLAIMS CONSTRUED—THE RIGHTS OF A CREDITOR, WHO, AFTER SIGNING THE SAME, HAD TO PAY A NOTE WHICH HE HAD ENDORSED FOR THE DEFENDANT.

CRAIG, J.—The principal ground relied upon by appellant to secure a reversal of the judgment, is, that the circuit court erred in giving appellees seventh instruction which was as follows: "The jury are instructed that if they believe, from the evidence, that the agreement of compromise read in evidence was entered into by the plaintiff, and that at the time of such agreement being made and signed by him there was no false or fraudulent representations made by the defendant concerning the amount of his liabilities or assets; and even if the defendant carried out the agreement, cannot prevent the plaintiff, Lowitz, recovering all the money he was obliged to pay as endorser of the defendant's notes, after the said agreement was made, if any such money he did pay. So, if, at the time of the making of the said agreement, the notes of the defendant, Lipman, or any or either of them, were held by third parties, and the plaintiff was obliged to, and did, pay them by reason of his having endorsed them; and this payment was made by him, after said agreement was made, then, in that case, the plaintiff is entitled to recover all that he so paid on the said notes."

In the summer of 1871, the appellant being indebted to appellee in the sum of $6,000, gave him his four promissory notes, two for $1,500 each, one for $1,000, and one for $2,000.

The $1,500 note that matured on the 11th day of October, 1871, was endorsed and transferred, before it became due, to the German National Bank by appellee. In the month of December following, and while the German National Bank held as endorsee, the $1,500 note, appellant made a settlement with his creditors, and a composition agreement was executed, which agreement contains the following: "That we, the said several and respective creditors, shall and will accept, receive, and take, of and from the said Abraham Lipman, for each and every dollar that the said Abraham Lipman does owe and is indebted to us, the sum of twenty-five cents, in full discharge and satisfaction of the several debts and sums of money that the said Abraham Lipman does owe and stand indebted unto us."

This agreement was signed by appellee, and at the foot of his signature he noted down his claim against appellant at the sum of $4,500.

The German National Bank that held the $1,500 note, did not become a party to the agreement.

In the month of January, 1872, after the execution of the composition agreement, appellee paid the German National Bank the amount due upon the $1,500 note held by the Bank upon which he was endorser; the payment was made partly in cash, and in part by appellee's own paper. The position of appellant is that the legal effect of the composition agreement discharged him from any further liability to appellee on the $1,500 note.

It will be observed that the language used in the agreement is that the twenty-five cents on the dollar which appellant agreed to pay, was to be accepted in discharge and satisfaction of the several debts and sums of money that appellant was then owing to the parties who executed the agreement.

It does not in terms or by implication embrace causes of action or liabilities that might arise or be incurred in the future. We are aware of no authority that would sanction a construction of a contract of this character more comprehensive than a reasonable import of the language used would signify. And a composition agreement, like the one under consideration, should be limited in its effect to such matters as were within the contemplation and intention of the parties at the time of its execution. Butcher v. Butcher, 1 Bos. & Pull, 113.

When the contract was made, appellant was not indebted to appellee upon the note; it was held and owned by the bank, and whatever amount of money appellant owed upon it, was due and owing from him to the bank.

It is true, appellee had indorsed the note, and as indorser might have been compelled to pay the endorsee the amount of the note, but that was by no means certain; appellee's liability depended upon the insolvency of the maker, and perhaps the diligence which had been, or should be used by the bank to enforce payment of the maker, at all events when the composition agreement was made, the liability of appellee, as indorser, was not fixed, certain and definite.

This being the case at the time the agreement was executed, apelleee had no claim upon appellant on account of the $1,500 note.

If, in the future, appellee should be required to pay the bank the note, as endorser, then, and not until that event had occurred, would he have any subsisting claim or demand on account of the note, against appellant. The manner in which appellee signed the agreement, is enough, of itself, to establish the fact that it was not within the intent of the contracting parties to include the note in the agreement. If such had been the intention, appellee's claim would have been put down at $6,000. This, however, did not occur, but appellee's debt was stated upon the agreement, to be $4,500, thus leaving out the identical amount of the note which had been indorsed to the bank.

When, therefore, appellee, after the composition agreement had been made, was compelled, as endorser, to pay the note in question, a cause of action arose in his favor, not, perhaps, upon the note itself, but to recover so much money as he was required to pay, and this recovery could be had under the common counts of the declaration.

In Cuyler v. Cuyler, 2 John., 186, was a case where the plaintiff held a note against the defendant, which he indorsed to a third party, and while the note was so held, the plaintiff executed a contract to the defendant, the legal effect of which was to release the defendant from all demands then existing. Subsequently the plaintiff was required to pay the indorsed note, and it was held that the cause of action had arisen subsequently to the execution of the release, and was not affected by it, and that the action for money paid would lie.

See also Crawford v. Swearington, 15 Ohio, 264. Appellant has cited two authorities to sustain his position. The first is Parson on Contract, page 713, where the author says a "release, strictly speaking, can operate only on a present right, because one can only give what he has, and can only promise and give what he may have in future. Where one is now possessed of a distinct right which is to come into effect and operation hereafter, a release in words of the present may discharge the right."

This authority does not in any manner help appellant's position. Appellee had no distinct right, so far as the note held by the bank was concerned, at the time the release was given, and hence it could not operate upon it, as we have heretofore shown.

The case of Pierce v. Parker, 4 Met., 80, also cited, upon examination, will be found not to sustain appellant's position. The agreement upon which the decision in the case last cited was predicated, was much broader than the one in the case at bar. It embraced all "claims and demands, actions and causes of action," and it further appears from the opinion, which is an important element, that the parties, at the time the release was executed, had in view the claim which formed the subject matter of the litigation.

These two important elements clearly distinguish the case cited from the one under consideration.

We are, therefore, satisfied the instruction given is fully sustained by the authorities, and appellant's second instruction, which, in substance, presents an opposite view, was properly refused. It is also urged that the judgment cannot be sustained for the reason that the appellee had not paid in money the entire amount of the note held by the bank.

The proof upon this point is, that appellee had paid a portion of the note in cash, and gave his own paper for the balance and lifted the note.

It is immaterial, so far as this action is concerned, in what manner the note was paid, a payment in merchandise or by appellee's own paper, would be as effectual as a payment in cash.

As the record discloses no substantial error, the judgment will be affirmed.

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

THOMAS B. TROWER ET AL. v. WILLIAM ELDER.

Agreed Case from Shelby.

AGREEMENT—PENALTY—LIQUIDATED DAMAGES.

That where there are several covenants or stipulations in an agreement, the damages for the non-performance of some of which are readily ascertainable by a jury, and the damages for the non-performance of the others are not measurable by any exact pecuniary standard, and a sum is named as damages for a breach of any of the covenants or stipulations, such sum is held to be merely a penalty.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

Opinion by SCHOLFIELD, J.

It is not contested, if the clause in the argument providing for the forfeiture of three fold the amount paid as damages relates as well to the sale of the bank-safe and fixtures, as to the agreement not to engage in the banking business in the town of Sullivan, the sum named must be held to be a penalty to secure the performances of the entire contract, and not liquidated damages to be recovered for the breach of a single stipulation.

This is in accordance with the well established rule that where there are several covenants or stipulations in an agreement, the damages for the non-performance of some of which are readily ascertainable by a jury, and the damages for the non-performance of the others are not measurable by any exact pecuniary standard, and a sum is named as damages for a breach of any of the covenants or stipulations, such sum is held to be merely a penalty.

The language of the clause is: "And the said William Elder, party of the first part, on his non-compliance with the foregoing recited engagements forfeits three-fold the amount paid to him by the said T. B. Trower & Son, as damages to them for such non-compliance."

It is true, as argued by counsel, the recitals or preamble prefixed to an agreement do not of themselves alone have any obligatory force; but they may be referred to in the operative part of the instrument in such way as to show it was designed that they should form a part of it, and this we conclude to be the case in the present instance.

What are "the foregoing recited engagements" upon non-performance of which the forfeiture is to be incurred? The recitals immediately preceding, are: "That William Elder, party of the first part, hath this day sold all his business interest, influence and patronage in the banking business; and also his bank-safe, together with all the fixtures pertaining to the business of banking, in the town of Sullivan, Moultrie county, Illinois; and he also agrees, and hereby binds himself not to engage in the banking business in said town of Sullivan, Illinois; for which franchises, benefits and privileges, the said T. B. Trower & Son, parties of the second part, pay unto the said William Elder the sum of twelve hundred and fifty dollars."

The words "and also his bank safe, together with the fixtures," etc., show as plainly as words can, that these articles were sold in connection with the banking business interest, patronage, etc.; and the words, "he also agrees and binds himself not to engage in banking," etc., as clearly show that this understanding was a part of the same contract.

But it is argued the bank safe and fixtures were too trifling and insignificant to have any value affixed to them, and that they do not constitute any part of the consideration for which the twelve hundred and fifty dollars were paid.

The payment of the twelve hundred and fifty dollars manifestly could not have been solely in consideration of the undertaking to not engage in banking, since the language of the agreement is that it was for certain "franchises, benefits and privileges." What was intended by the use of these terms is apparent from the connection in which they occur.

As will be remembered, they immediately succeed the recital of the things sold and what is to be done by Elder. They are prefixed by the words "for which," thus showing that they were used as synonymous with that which was previously recited.

Although this may be an inapt description of tangible property, yet as the safe and fixtures were a part of that which was sold, by the agreement, it must have been intended they were included in it.

But again, if it be true that the safe and fixtures were of no value, why were they mentioned in the agreement? The language of the agreement itself forbids this supposition. It says they were sold.

If there was a sale, there must necessarily have been a price agreed upon in some form as to their value, and, whether it was much or little, whatever it was, it formed so much of the consideration for which the twelve hundred and fifty dollars were paid.

We can neither indulge in presumptions, nor judicially know that the safe and fixtures were not an important part of that consideration.

Entertaining these views, it follows the judgment must be affirmed.

ALBRECHT v. THE PEOPLE.

Error to Bureau.

CONSTRUCTION OF THE DRAM SHOP ACT—GIVING AWAY LIQUOR AT PRIVATE HOUSE OR AT A BREWERY—COURTESY.

1. THE DRAM SHOP ACT.—The court construes the act known as the Dram Shop Act, and states to what cases it applies.

2. GIVING AWAY LIQUOR—ACT OF COURTESY.—That this act was not designed to punish a person for giving away liquor to his friends or guests at his private residence. This is a mere courtesy which the law was not intended to reach.—[ED LEGAL NEWS.]

BREESE, J.—This was a prosecution by indictment, in the circuit court of Bureau county, against Jacob Albrecht for an alleged violation of chap. 43, title "Dram Shops," R. S., 1874, p. 438.

The title of the act in full, is, "An act to provide for the licensing of, and against the evils, arising from the sale of intoxicating liquors." The sixth section of this act, provides as follows: "Whoever by himself, or his agent or servant, shall sell or give intoxicating liquor to any minor, without the written order of his parent, guardian, or family physician, or to any person intoxicated, or who is in the habit of getting intoxicated, shall for such offense, be fined not less than ten dollars, nor more than one hundred dollars, and imprisonment in the county jail, not less than ten, nor more than thirty days.

The previous sections define: 1. Dram Shops. 2. Provides penalty for selling without license. 3. How license may be granted. 4. The form of the license—the rights under it and how revoked for violation of the provisions of the act, or by keeping a disorderly, or ill-governed house, or place of resort for idle or dissolute persons, or by allowing any illegal gaming in the dram shop, or in any house or place adjacent thereto. 5. Provides for taking bond of the dram seller, and how suit may be brought thereon. This statute is highly penal in its provisions, and is emphatically a penal statute, and according to well recognized canons, must be construed, strictly keeping in view, the great central object the legislature had in view on its enactment, and the evils to be prevented.

The title of the act, in the revision of 1874, is "Dram Shops," and every section is leveled against them, with a view, not to their suppression, for they are licensed to sell intoxicating liquors, and pay large sums of money into the town or county treasury for the privilege. The provisions of the act are aimed at such. What, then, under this view of the statute, should be the construction to be put on the sixth section. Can it be, should it be, other than this: that, whoever keeping a dram shop, shall, &c. The leading facts in this case are, that the defendant was the owner and operator of a brewery, selling the manufacture by the keg or barrel, to any one who wished to purchase, and for the privilege he became liable to pay to the government of the United States, large sums of money demanded by the internal revenue laws, to be appropriated to the payment of our government debt. He kept no dram shop, nor did he sell his beverage by the small, to be drank on his premises.

One day, about the last of July or first of August, 1874, Charles Dewey, the person to whom it is alleged, defendant sold or gave, one or more glasses of beer, came to see appellant, who was then in bad health and nearly blind, lying on a lounge in his house, apart from his brewery, for the purpose of getting a renewal of a lease of some of the lots at Ohio Station, on which he had erected a hay-press. He was accompanied by Mr. Kyle, an attorney-at-law, who was wanted by Dewey to draw the papers. When Dewey and Kyle reached the house and found defendant in this condition, they also found Andrew Ross there, and Samuel Connor, the principal witness for the prosecution. Ross' business there, he being a preacher, was to aid Connor in purchasing some lots of defendant, and to see about the two lots on which Dawey had his hay-press, for the purpose of building a mill upon them. Ross had talked about this with defendant when Kyle and Dewey came in. Dewey wanted to buy the lots, as it would be expensive to move his press, which had cost him eighteen hundred dollars. Ross in his testimony says he supposes Dewey thought he was trying to get these lots, and he got mad, and talked pretty loud, and was "a little boozy."

Connor on his cross examination, says he wanted to buy some lots; Kyle and Dewey came in, and went off together; Dewey was considerably excited; he thought he would lose considerable in moving his press, and was much excited at Ross. In his direct examination, he says: Dewey seemed a little tight, was intoxicated, called for beer twice—some person went into another room and brought it out, and set the beer and glasses on the table, and all were invited to partake. Ross being a preacher, of course declined, never having drank anything intoxicating, and was never drunk. The opposing testimony of Kyle, Dewey and defendant shows quite conclusively Dewey was not intoxicated. The beer was sent for to the brewery, and proffered by defendant to his visitors, as an act of hospitality to neighbors and friends. Surely it was not such an act as this, the statute in question was intended to punish by imprisonment in the county jail. It has nothing of the nature of a dram shop about it, and was but a mere courtesy, which this law was not designed to reach.

If one invites his friends to dine with him, and generous wine which cheers the heart is passed upon the party, one of whom happened to be excited with wine when he came there, is the host to be incarcerated for giving to this most bibulous guest an additional glass.

We do not think the statute should bear such a construction. The culture of the grape is recommended by the moralist and the economist, and the expression of its juices into wine.

Would it be held an offense, punishable by fine and imprisonment, should the vinter from his wine-press fill a flagon and serve it to his guests in his own house, at his table?

Where is the difference in a brewer presenting a tankard under similar circumstances? We can not believe this law was designed to punish such acts. The testimony, we think, is quite sufficient to show that Dewey, though highly excited at what he believed to be the interference of Ross to get these lots, was not intoxicated. He denies positively, he had drank through the day and before dinner, but three or four glasses of beer, and that he was not intoxicated in the slightest degree. There is not the slightest proof, Dewey was in the habit of getting intoxicated.

A jury was waived in this case, and we think the finding of the court was against the clear preponderance of the evidence; and the case made was not as contemplated by the sixth section of chap. 43, title "Dram Shops."

The judgment must be reversed.

ABSTRACT OF OPINIONS FILED AT OTTAWA IN 1876.

13.—Stephen S. Phelps et al. v. John F. Curts et al.—Opinion by SHELDON, J.

FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES — BONA FIDE LIEN THEREUNDER—PERSONAL DECREES IN RELATION THERETO—EFFECT OF BANKRUPTCY THEREON.

STATEMENT.—Creditors bill to subject real estate to the payment of judgments; which real estate had been conveyed under the mere forms of a sale by S. S. Phelps to Wm. Phelps, when Phelps and company were about to fail for $174,000. After the transfers, Wm. Phelps purchased from Myron Phelps certain notes due from Phelps & Co., for many years before the failure; the notes having been given bona fide for loans of money; Wm. representing that he wished the notes to turn in as part payment for real estate which he designed purchasing from Phelps & Co., and giving his own note for the transferred notes. To secure the payment of this note, Wm. transferred, as security though under the form of an absolute conveyance, some of the lands so conveyed by S. S. to him (Wm.), to be released by Myron as he (Wm.) could find purchasers for portions of it; which was done accordingly, at different times. Myron, it appears, knew nothing of the transaction between S. S. and Wm. The decree set aside the conveyance absolutely between Wm. and Myron, as well as the former conveyances. Held,

1. That, even where there is no intentional fraud in voluntary conveyances, and whatever the motives of the parties may be, even if it be designed thus to make a better provision for the payment of creditors, such conveyances will be adjudged fraudulent as against creditors. A debtor in failing circumstances, is only allowed to place his property beyond the reach of his creditors by making a general assignment of it, when he does so for their benefit by devoting it unreservedly to the payment of his debts, and not with a view to his advantage in delaying until a favorable time the appropriation of the property for such purpose.

2. But as to Myron, the decree should have preserved his bona fide lien for the payment of his actual claim in preference. The rule is well settled in equity that when a security or conveyance is set aside as constructively fraudulent, it may be upheld in favor of one not guilty of actual fraud, to the extent of the actual consideration, to be vacated only as to the excess.

3. The decree was erroneous, likewise, in being personal against Myron, for which there was no basis in the transaction between the parties. Any debts of S. S. Phelps, or of S. S. Phelps & Co., which Wm. Phelps may have paid previously to the filing of the creditors' bill, should have been deducted from whatever proceeds he may have received from the fraudulently conveyed property; and in rendering any personal decree against him on account of such proceeds, it should only be for the balance after such deduction.

Pending the creditors' suit, which was in court since Sep., 1862, a cross-bill was filed in 1872, setting up that since the filing of the answers, S. S. Phelps had been adjudged a bankrupt, namely in 1868; and the assignee had fulfilled the duties of his appointment, and been discharged. On demurrer, this cross-bill was dismissed. Held,

4. That the cross-bill contained nothing to bar complainants right to relief, because the fraudulent conveyances were not void, but voidable only, by creditors; so that the property embraced therein did not vest absolutely in the assignee in bankruptcy, as a portion of the bankrupt's estate. All he had was an option, to impeach and avoid the conveyances or not, and he had not done so.

The discharge might debar other creditors from claims with regard to it, by reason of the discharge of their demands, but could not operate to deprive the complainants of the priority of lien acquired by filing their bill. Decree reversed in part.

PRESUMPTION AS TO THE FILING OF PAPERS IN COURT.

STATEMENT. — Judgment by default against plaintiff in error, without a declaration actually filed. Afterwards, on application, the court ordered a declaration filed nunc pro tunc, on the affidavit of the attorney's student that he handed the declaration to the clerk to be filed, and an affidavit of the attorney that he had handed a declaration to the student for that purpose; opposed by an affidavit of defendant's attorney that twice he had examined the files after the time, and at neither time was there a declaration on file. Held,

That the presumption is that the clerk did his duty, and that where no file mark appears, a paper was not filed. And the two affidavits of the plaintiff were overborne by the affidavit of the defendant's attorney, so that the court erred in refusing to set aside the default, and in allowing the declaration to be filed nunc pro tunc.

LIABILITY OF OFFICIAL SURETIES.

Held, That where a supervisor, having in his hands money not paid over, but acknowledged, is afterwards re-elected and gives another bond with new sureties, and afterwards makes default in paying over the money on demand, the sureties on the second bond are liable, since they are to be presumed to know what is matter of public record, and that the supervisor had money in his hands; and further, the non-payment of the money, accruing after the second bond is executed, is to be regarded as the breach of the second bond.

WHEREAS, DAWSON KERR, JR., (THEN OF THE Village of Evanston, county of Cook and State of Illinois,) did, on the seventeenth (17th) day of September, A. D. 1874, by his deed of trust, duly executed and delivered, and recorded in the recorder's office of Cook county, Illinois, in book 420 of records, at page 328, did convey unto Lyman J. Gage, as trustee, the following described premises, to wit:

Lot seventeen (17), in block thirty-eight (38), of the original plat of the village of Evanston, Cook county, in the State of Illinois, to secure one (1) certain promissory note bearing even date therewith and payable to the order of himself five (5) years after date, in the sum of two thousand ($2,000) dollars, with interest at ten (10) per cent. per annum, payable annually, which promissory note was endorsed and delivered to Homer E. Wheeler, of Rockford, Winnebago county, Illinois, as part of the purchase money for the above described premises. Said note was by said Wheeler endorsed without recourse and is now the property of W. H. Tibbals, of Baileyville, Illinois.

And whereas, it is provided in and by said deed of trust that in case of default in the payment of said promissory note or the interest thereon, or any part thereof, according to the tenor and effect of said promissory note, or in case of the breach of any of the covenants or agreements in said deed of trust contained, the whole of said principal sum of said promissory note and the interest thereon to the time of payment may at once, at the option of the legal holder thereof, become due and payable and said premises sold in the same manner and with the same effect as if said indebtedness had matured, then, on the application of the legal holder of said note, it should or might be lawful for the said Lyman J. Gage, trustee (the undersigned), to sell and dispose of said premises, and all right, title, interest, benefit and equity of redemption of said Dawson Kerr, Jr., his heirs and assigns therein, at public auction, at the north door of the court house (corner of Adams and LaSalle streets) in the city of Chicago, in the State of Illinois, or on said premises, for the highest and best price the same will bring in cash, thirty (30) days' notice having been previously given by publication once in each week for four (4) successive weeks, in the Chicago Legal News or any newspaper at that time published in the city of Chicago, and to adjourn said sale from time to time as may be thought expedient, and to make, execute, and deliver to the purchaser or purchasers at such sale good and sufficient deed or deeds of conveyance for the premises sold, and out of the proceeds or avails of such sale to pay all costs of advertising and sale, commissions, attorneys' fees, and all expenses of this trust, then pay the principal and interest of said promissory note rendering the overplus, if any, to said party of the first part, his heirs or assigns. The principal and interest, it is claimed, will, up to the time of sale amount to the sum of twenty-three hundred eighteen 34-100 ($2,318.34) dollars.

And whereas, default has been made in the payment of the interest due on the seventeenth (17th) day of September, A. D. 1875, and the same still remains due and unpaid, and the legal holder of said promissory note has elected to declare and declared the principal sum due and payable, and made application to me, the undersigned trustee in said deed of trust named, to sell and dispose of the aforesaid lot seventeen (17), in block thirty-eight (38), under the provisions of said deed of trust.

Now, therefore, public notice is hereby given, that in pursuance of said deed of trust, and by virtue of the power and authority to me granted in and by the same, I, the undersigned trustee, will on Thursday, the twentieth (20th) day of April, A. D. 1876, at ten (10) o'clock A. M., at the west north door of the court house, (on the corner of Adams and LaSalle streets), in the city of Chicago, Illinois, sell and dispose of the premises described above, and all right, title, benefit and equity of redemption of the said Dawson Kerr, Jr., his heirs and assigns therein, at public auction for the highest and best price the same will bring in cash.

DOW v. HUMBERT et al.

MEASURE OF DAMAGES AGAINST TOWN OFFICERS FOR REFUSING TO PLACE UPON THE TAX LIST THE AMOUNT OF JUDGMENTS, ETC.

The defendants, Supervisors of a town, failed to perform their duty in refusing to place upon the tax list the amount of judgments recovered by plaintiff against the town. Held, that plaintiff was entitled to recover only nominal damages, the taxable property still remaining subject to the judgment, and the right to relief still remaining.

Mr. Justice MILLER delivered the opinion of the court.

The defendants are sued by plaintiff for a failure to perform their duty as supervisors of the town of Waldwick, in the county of Iowa, Wisconsin, in refusing to place upon the tax list the amount of the judgments recovered by him against that town. By the statutes of Wisconsin, no execution can issue against towns on judgments rendered against them, but the amounts of such judgments are to be placed, by order of the supervisors, on the next tax list for the annual assessment and collection of taxes, and the amount so levied and collected is to be paid to the judgment creditor, and to no other purpose.

The declaration avers due notice served on the supervisors of these judgments, and demand that they be so placed on the tax list. The first judgment is described in the declaration as rendered in the circuit Court for the district of Wisconsin, on the 27th of October, 1870, for $708.90; and the notice to the supervisors, set out in the declaration, uses the same language. The other judgment is described as rendered in the circuit court for the western district of Wisconsin, June 10, 1871, for the sum of $1,531.56.

The answer of the defendants denies that there is any such judgment as that first described. And as to the second judgment, they say that after it was rendered the town of Waldwick was divided, and a part of it organized into the new town of Moscow; that thirty-seven per cent. of the judgment was collectable from that town, and that it was not the duty of the defendants to levy the whole judgment on the property of the citizens of Waldwick.

On these issues the parties went to trial before a jury. In support of the issue as to the existence of the first judgment, plaintiffs introduced a copy of a record of a judgment between the same parties, for the same amount, and of the same date, as that described in the declaration, in the circuit court for the eastern district of Wisconsin, to which defendants objected because it varied from the judgment described in the declaration, and in the notice given to defendants to place it on the tax list. The court sustained the objection, and this ruling is the ground of the first assignment of errors. The argument of counsel on this branch of the case rests mainly on the ground of the sufficiency of the notice to the supervisors. But the question before that is whether such a judgment was admissible under the pleadings as they stood. There had been for many years a circuit court for the district of Wisconsin. Shortly before this judgment was rendered, the district was divided into two districts, and the circuit courts were by the express language of the act of Congress called the circuit court for the eastern district, and the circuit court for the western district, respectively. There was no such court in existence at the date of the judgment offered, as the circuit court for the district of Wisconsin, and the defendants were justified in pleading nul tiel record to a declaration founded on a judgment of that date in that court. And on this issue as it stood when the record of a judgment in the circuit court for the eastern district was offered, it did not prove a judgment in the circuit court for the district of Wisconsin.

If plaintiff had asked leave to amend his declaration by inserting the word eastern before district in his first count, in describing his judgment, it would no doubt have been granted, and the question would then have arisen as to the sufficiency of notice to the supervisors, the notice containing the same mistake. But on the plea of nul tiel record of judgment of the circuit court for the district of Wisconsin, it is clear a judgment of the circuit court for the eastern district of Wisconsin is not evidence of such a judgment.

Plaintiff having introduced a record of his judgment for $1,531.56 in the western district of Wisconsin, and notice and demand as to that to the supervisors, the defendants were permitted, as the court said, solely in mitigation of damages, to offer the record of the division of the township and resolutions of the board, adopted after this suit was brought, directing the town clerk to place this latter judgment, with its interest, on the tax list in November, 1872, to which exceptions were taken, and this constitutes the ground of the second and third assignments of error. They will be considered in connection with the fourth and last assignment.

This being all the testimony, plaintiff requested the court to charge the jury that the plaintiff was entitled to recover of the defendants the amount of both these judgments, with intetest from their date; and this being refused, he asked the same instruction as to the second judgment, which was refused. Exceptions were taken to both these refusals, and to the following language in the charge which the court did deliver:

"The jury are instructed upon the whole evidence in the case that the plaintiff is entitled to recover nominal damages from the defendants by reason of their failure to direct the levy of the tax in question. The plaintiff is not entitled to recover any more, because he has not shown that he has suffered any injury from the neglect or omission of the defendants to cause the clerk to put the judgment on the next tax-roll of the town."

The whole case turns upon the soundness of this latter instruction, representing, as it does, the converse of that which the plaintiff asked and which was refused. And the single question presented is, whether these officers, by the mere failure to place on the tax list, when it was their duty to do so, the judgment recovered by plaintiff against the town, became thereby personally liable to the plaintiff for the whole amount of said judgment, without producing any other evidence of loss or damage growing out of such a failure.

It is not easy to see on what principle of justice the plaintiff can recover from defendats more than he has been injured by their misconduct.

If it were an action of trespass, there is much authority for saying that plaintiff would be limited to actual and compensatory damages, unless the act were accompanied with malice or other aggravating circumstances. How much more reasonable that, for a failure to perform an act of official duty, through mistake of what that duty is, plaintiff should be limited in his recovery to his actual loss, injury, or damage?

Indeed, where such is the almost universal rule for measuring damages before a jury, there must be some special reason for a departure from it.

In the case before us it must be presumed that the taxable property of Waldwick township remains to-day as it was when the levy should have been made. That a levy this year would as surely produce the money as if it had been made last year. The debt is not lost. The right to recover remains. The property is liable to its satisfaction, and the means of subjecting it to that use are still open to plaintiff. The only loss, then, is the delay, unless it may be the cost and expense of the unavailing effort to have the debt levied on the tax of the previous year; and this, if proved, could have been recovered under the instructions. For mere delay in paying a monied demand, the law has long recognized interest as the only damages to be recovered, and this interest is by law added to the assessment when placed on the tax list. If A, by the highest class of express contract, say a promissory note or bond, promise to pay B ten thousand dollars on a day fixed, and fail to do it, B can only recover interest for the delay, though he may have depended on that money to save his homestead from sacrifice, and has lost it by reason of that failure. So a man buying real estate may improve, adorn, and have it grow in his hand to a value ten times what he gave for it. But if he loses all this by a failure of his title, he can only recover of the warrantor the sum which he gave for the land. These are apparent hardships. But wisdom and experience have shown that the danger of holding persons liable for these remote consequences of the violation of their contracts is far more serious in its consequences than occasional failure of full compensation by the application of the rule of interest for delay, and of the purchase money in a suit on a warranty of title to lands.

"Damages," says Mr. Greenleaf, "are given as a compensation, recompense or satisfaction to the plaintiff for any injury actually received by him from the defendant. They should be precisely commensurate with the injury, neither more nor less, and this, whether it be to his person or estate." (2 Greenleaf's Evidence, sec. 253) And without entering into the question whether this rule excludes what are called exemplary damages, which are not claimed here, we think this definition of the principle on which damages are awarded in actions of law, a sound one.

The expense and cost of the vain effort to have the judgment placed on the tax-list; the loss of the debt, if it had been lost; any impairment of the efficiency of the tax levy, if such there had been; in short, any conceivable actual damage the court would have allowed if proved. But plaintiff, resting solely on his proposition that defendants by failing to make the levy had become his debtors for the amount of his judgment, asked for that and would accept no less.

Counsel for plaintiff relies mainly on the class of decisions in which sheriffs have been held liable for the entire judgment for failing to perform their duty when an execution has been placed in their hands. The decisions on this subject are not harmonious; for while it has been generally held that on a failure to arrest the defendant on a capias, or levy an execution on his property, or to allow him to escape when held a prisoner, the amount of the debt is the presumptive measure of damages, it has been held in many courts that this may be rebutted or the damages reduced by showing that the prisoner has been rearrested, or that there is sufficient property subject to levy to satisfy the debt, or other matter showing that plaintiff has not sustained damages to the amount of the judgment. This whole subject is fully discussed and the authorities collated in Sedgwick on Damages, pp. 506–525. Richardson v. Spence, 6 Ohio, 13. But without going into this disputed question, we are of opinion that those cases do not furnish the rule for the class to which this belongs.

The sheriff, under the law of England, was an officer of great dignity and power. He was also custodian of the jail in which all prisoners, whether for crimes or for debt, were kept. He had authority in all cases, when it was necessary, to call out the whole power of the county to assist him in the performance of his duty. The principle of the sheriff's liability here asserted originated, undoubtedly, in cases of suit for an escape. Imprisonment of the debtor was then the chief if not the only mode of enforcing satisfaction of a judgment for money. It was a very simple, a very speedy, and a very effectual mode. The debtor being arrested on a capias, which was his first notice of the action, was held a prisoner, unless he could give bail, until the action was tried. If he gave bail, and judgment went against him, his bail must pay the debt, or he could be re-arrested on a capias ad satisfaciendum, and if he had given no bail he was holden under this second writ until the money was paid. To permit him to escape was in effect to lose the debt, for his body had been taken in satisfaction of the judgment. Inasmuch as the object of keeping the defendant in prison was to compel the payment of the debt through his desire to be released, the plaintiff was entitled to have him in custody every hour until the debt was paid.

It is also to be considered that for every day's service in keeping the prisoner the sheriff was entitled to compensation by law at the hands of the creditor. (Williams v. Mostyn, 4 M. and W., 153; Williams v. Griffith, 3 Exch., 584; Wylie v. Bird, 4 Q. B., 566; 6 id., 468.)

With the means in the hands of the sheriff for safe keeping and re-arrest, with the escape of the debtor almost equivalent to a loss of the debt, and with compensation paid him by plaintiff for his service, it is not surprising that when he negligently or intentionally permitted an escape, he should be held liable for the whole debt.

How very different the duties of the class of officers to which defendants belong, and the circumstances under which their duties are performed. There is no profit in the office itself. It is undertaken mainly from a sense of public duty, and if there be any compensation at all, it is altogether disproportionate to the responsibility and trouble assumed. They are in no sense the agents of creditors, and receive no compensation from holders of judgments and other claims against the town, for the collection and payment of their debts. There are no prisons under their control, no prisoners committed to their custody, no posse comitatus to be brought to their aid. But without reward, and without special process of a court to back them, they are expected to levy taxes on the reluctant community at whose hand they hold office. To hold that these humble but necessary public duties can only be undertaken at the hazard of personal liability for every judgment which they fail to levy and collect, whether through mistake, ignorance, inadvertance or accident, as a sheriff is for an escape, without any proof that the judgment creditor has lost his debt, or that its value is in any manner impaired, is a doctrine too harsh to be enforced in any court where imprisonment for debt has been abolished.

The case of The King, at relation Parbury, v. The Bank of England, Dougl., 524, is cited as sustaining the plaintiff in error. It was an application for a mandamus to compel the governor and company of the Bank of England to transfer stock of the bank. The writ was denied on several grounds, among which, as a suggestion, Lord Mansfield said that "where an action will lie for complete satisfaction, (as in that case,) equivalent to a specific relief, and the right of the party applying is not clear, the court will not interpose the extraordinary remedy of a mandamus." He then shows that the right of the party in that case to have the transfer made was not clear. As this was not an action against the officers of the bank for damages, the remark that there was other relief is only incidental, and the point as to the measure of damages was not in issue.

A note to the principal case shows that an action of assumpsit was afterward brought and compromised before final judgment. But on the whole case there is no discussion of the measure of damages; and that question remained undecided. The case of Clark v. Miller, 54 N. Y., 528, decided very recently in the Commission of Appeals, appears to be more in point. It was an action against the supervisor of the town of Southport, Chemung county, for refusing to present to the board of supervisors of the county plaintiff's claim for damages as reassessed for laying out a road through his land.

The court, without much discussion of the principle, holds the defendant liable for the full amount of the re-assessment, on the authority of the Commercial Bank of Buffalo v. Kortright, 22 Wend., 348.

That case was decided in the Court of Errors in 1839. It was an action for refusing to make a transfer of stock of the bank. The chancellor (Walworth) was of opinion that the extent of the damages was the depreciation of the stock, and not its full value; and bf this opinion were four senators.

In the case of The People v. The Supervisors of Rickmond. 28 N. Y., 112, also before the court in 20 N. Y., 252, the relator had sued out a writ of mandamus requiring the supervisors to audit his claim for damages assessed for land taken as a highway. The supervisors made a return to the writ, which, proving false, the supreme court rendered a judgment against them personally for the claim of $200, and for $84 damages for delay. The court of appeals said that, as the return of the supervisors was false, and the relator had been kept out of the money to which he was entitled from the town, the supervisors may be properly made liable in damages to the extent of the interest upon the $200, to wit, $84, and they affirm the judgment as to the $84, and reverse it as to the $200, for which they order a peremptory writ of mandamus.

This answer accords precisely with our views, and we think it of equal authority with Clark v. Miller, above cited in 54 New York.

We are of opinion that, in the absence of any proof of actual damages in this case, the defendants were liable to nominal damages and to costs, and no more.

If we are correct in this, the evidence of the division of the township, and that the supervisors had actually placed the judgment of plaintiff in the tax list of the next year, were properly received in mitigation—at all events did him no harm, as he had proved no actual loss or injury.

The judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

Mr. Justice CLIFFORD dissenting. I dissent from the opinion and judgment of the circuit court in this case, because the instruction given by the circuit court to the jury was erroneous. Plaintiffs were entitled at least to the actual damages sustained by them in view of the whole evidence. Unless the plaintiffs in such a case may recover something more than nominal damages, the debt becomes valueless, as the same conduct by the supervisors may be repeatsd indefinitely, and the rule necessarily leads to practical repudiation.

U. S. CIRCUIT COURT, S. D. ILLINOIS.

OPINION, MARCH, 1876.

THOMAS A. SCOTT et al., Trustees, etc., v. THE CLINTON AND SPRINGFIELD R. R. CO.

REMOVAL OF CAUSE FROM STATE TO FEDERAL COURT—AFTER APPOINTMENT OF RECEIVER IN ONE OF THE SUITS.

REMOVAL—TWO CASES.—That when the court is considering a question of jurisdiction, and whether or not the parties in an independent suit, seeking different relief from that of another suit, can be prevented from exercising an undoubted right under the act of Congress, the court can look to the real status of the two cases to determine whether this is an insuperable obstacle to the removal of the cause. A receiver had been appointed in the other case. That receiver had been removed because the court deemed the trustees the proper custodians, under the circumstances, of the property. It seems to have been conceded that the other case was not one where a receiver should have been appointed. It may be regarded, therefore, only a possession of the trustees, so far as the court was concerned, for the purpose of exercising a certain control over, the property, so as to protect the rights of all parties. In this case the rights of the plaintiffs are paramount. This is a distinct and separate controversy, with which the other case has nothing to do.

2. EFFECT OF ORDER.—That the effect of the order of the State Court, so far as it can have any upon the right of removal, is just as strong, and places just as effectually the property in the possession of the trustees in this case as it does in the other case.

3. PERSONAL PROPERTY—MORTGAGE ON ROLLING STOCK.—That the provision in the Constitution of 1870, which declares that the rolling stock, etc., of railroads shall be personal property, does not change the rule of equity which the U. S. Supreme Court declared in Coe v. Pennock, reported in 23rd Howard, to the effect that whenever a mortgage is made by a railroad company to secure bonds and the mortgage, declares that it shall include all present and after acquired property as soon as the property is acquired, the mortgage operates upon it.

4. WHEN APPLICATION FOR REMOVAL MUST BE MADE.—The court construes the 3rd Sec. of the act which declares that a party seeking a removal from the State to the Federal Court shall make and file a petition in the State Court, before or at the term at which said cause would be first tried, and before the trial thereof.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

This cause, originally instituted in the Circuit Court of McLean county, Illinois, was removed to the Circuit of the United States for the Southern district of Illinois, in December last, under the act of Congress of March 3d, 1875, and a motion having been made by Henry Crawford, on behalf of the respondents, to strike the record from the files, and TREAT, J., having intimated a desire to have the opinion of DRUMMOND, J. upon the question, the motion was argued before DRUMMOND, J., February 14, 1876, by Mr. Crawford for the motion, and R. Biddle Roberts, of Chicago, for the trustees, contra.

DRUMMOND, J., having intimated an opinion, and TREAT, J., concurring, an order was entered at Springfield on the 15th, taking jurisdiction of the case, and requiring the defendants to answer.

Subsequently Mr. Weldon, of Bloomington, made an application to the court, praying them to rescind the order taking jurisdiction of the case, and the court allowed the same to be heard, and on March 8th, 1876, it was argued by Mr. Weldon in support of the motion, and by Mr. Roberts, of Chicago, and Mr. Williams, Bloomington, contra. The following is the opinion of the Court:

DRUMMOND, J.—This was a suit originally brought in the Circuit Court of McLean county, and which has been removed from that court to this court under the act of Congress of March 3d, 1875.

At the time the appplication was made to the State Court for the removal of the cause, there was also pending in the Circuit Court of McLean county a bill filed by Kelly for himself and others as stockholders of the railroad company, against the company and the directors, in which the latter were charged with certain wrongful acts, to the injury of the stockholders, among which was one that the directors were interested in a company known as the Morgan Improvement Company, which had contracted to construct the railroad, upon which contract the directors had realized large profits, and it was claimed that these profits should enure to the benefit of the company. That case had gone to a decree, which was affirmed by the Supreme Court of the State, and all the questions in the case appear to have been settled except the taking of an account.

The plaintiffs in this suit are trustees and bondholders, under a certain deed of trust, given by the railroad company to secure bonds which had been issued for the construction of the railroad, and which it is not controverted were paramount to any claims which might exist on the part of plaintiffs in the Kelly case, upon the property of the road, or upon profits that might be realized upon any contract made by the directors, and which might enure to the company.

The State Court had appointed a receiver in the Kelly case, who, in August last, had been superseded by the appointment of two of the plaintiffs in this case, Scott and Jewett, as trustees, under the deed of trust, the receiver being required to deliver all the property, held by him as such, to them. The trustees were restrained from selling the property until the further order of the court; but were to receive and hold it, and operate the road, under the powers vested in them by the deed of trust, and they were to retain, use and operate the road until the further order of the court, or until discharged from their trust according to law.

At the same time an order precisely similar, was made by the State Court in this case, so that Scott and Jewett had possession of the road, and were operating it as trustees under the deed of trust (which authorized them in a certain contingency so to do), and in conformity with the order of the State Court.

This being the condition of the two cases, and a record of this case being filed in this court, a motion is made, the effect of which is to remand the cause to the State Court, first, for the reason that at the time the application was made for a removal, the order made in August in the Kelly case so operated upon the property that it was still in the custody of the State Court, in the hands of the trustees, as quasi receivers; and second, because the petition filed by the plaintiffs in this case for the removal of the case was not in apt time. No objection is made to the sufficiency of the petition, or of the bond given in the State Court, and there is no controversy but that the plaintiffs in this case and the defendants were citizens of different States, and so that the cause as to citizenship was removable.

As to the first objection:—the suit in the Kelly case was a controversy in relation to the property confessedly subordinate to any rights existing on the part of the trustees and bondholders, under the deed of trust, the plaintiffs in this case. The controversy existing in the Kelly case, was substantially settled when the application was made for removal in this case. That case did not claim to interfere with the rights of any of the bondholders, or of the trustees representing them. This, then, was a controversy at the time the application was made, wholly between citizens of different States. Did the order made in August by the State Court in the Kelly case, turning the property over to the trustees as custodians, to hold and operate the road under the deed of trust, prevent the removal of this cause? It is to be observed that order was in no respect different from that made in this case by the State Court; the property therefore was just as much in the possession and control of the trustees in this case as in the Kelly case, and when the case is removed to this court, if by law that can be done, it necessarily brings with it the order made by the State Court transferring the property to the trustees in this case, and the order certainly is just as binding and conclusive upon the rights of parties in this case, and the question is, whether the court cannot look into the real controversies existing in the two cases, for the purpose of determining whether or not the order made by the state Court in the Kelly case could prevent the removal of this case.

It is manifest that the order in both cases was made because the deed of trust authorized, under certain circumstances, the trustees to take possession of the property.

It is not disputed but that the circumstances authorizing such possession under the deed of trust, had occurred, and that, independent of the order of the court, the trustees had a right, according to the terms of the deed of trust, to take possession of the property.

The effect, then, of the order made in each case, was to put the trustees in possession under the deed of trust, and because there was a litigation pending, affecting the property in the two cases, to hold the trustees subject to some extent at least, under the control of the court. But it seems to me that when we are considering a question of jurisdiction, and whether or not these parties in an independent suit, seeking different relief, can be prevented from exercising an undoubted right under the act of Congress, we can look to the real status of the two cases to determine whether this is an insuperable obstacle to the removal of the cause.

A receiver had been appointed in the Kelly case. That receiver had been removed because, it is to be presumed, the court deemed the trustees the proper custodians, under the circumstances, of the property. In fact, it seems to be conceded that the Kelly case was not one where a receiver should have been appointed. It may be regarded, therefore, only a possession of the trustees, so far as the court was concerned, for the purpose of exercising a certain control over the property, so as to protect the rights of all parties. Now what rights have any of the parties in the Kelly case, as compared with the plaintiffs in this case?

In this case the rights are paramount. This is a distinct and separate controversy, with which the Kelly case has nothing to do. All the serious questions in that litigation have been settled by the opinion of the Supreme court of the state; they do not interfere with the controversy in this case, and as to the possession of the property, that is substantially under the authority of the deed of trust to which these plaintiffs are parties, and under which it is their duty to take possession and control, and operate the road in the interests of the bondholders, whom the trustees represent. And certainly, as already mentioned, the effect of the order of the State court, so far as it can have any upon the right of removal, is just as strong, and places just as effectually the property in the possession of the trustees in this case, as it does in the Kelly case.

A priority of equity and of right must give this court a paramount control over the property, where the case is removed, as we think it can be, from the State to the Federal court. It follows, therefore, that the control of the State court over the property in the Kelly case, as against the trustees in this case, and the parties and interests they represent, is little more than nominal, and if the trustees are called on by the State court, it would be sufficient to answer that they are subject to the terms of the deed of trust, and to the orders of this court in this case, at least to the extent and priorities of the interests the trustees represent.

It is said, however, that there is, or may be, a large amount of property not covered by the mortgage or deeds of trust, and therefore not subject to the claims of the bondholders represented in the mortgage.

There seems to be considerable misapprehension as to the effect of the provision in the constitution of 1870 of this state, which declares that the rolling stock and other movable property of railroads shall be personal property. I do not understand that this changes the rule of equity which the Supreme court of the United States declared in the case of Coe v. Pennock, reported in the 23d of Howard, to the effect that whenever a mortgage is made by a railroad company to secure bonds, and the mortgage declares that it shall include all present and after acquired property, as soon as the property is acquired, the mortgage operates upon it. In other words, it seizes the property or operates on it by way of estoppel as soon as it comes into existence, and is in possession of the mortgagor, and the mortgagees, under such circumstances, have a prior equity to the claims of creditors obtaining judgments and executions after the property is thus acquired, and placed in possession of the mortgagor. That was a case of locomotives and rolling stock which had been purchased by the mortgagor long after the mortgage was executed, and of which the mortgagor had acquired possession prior to the obtaining of judgments by the parties who sought to make them available for the payment of their debts.

That principle has been adhered to in a case in the first of Wallace, Dunham v. R. W. Co., and also in the case of the Galveston Railroad Company v. Cowdrie, in the 71st of Wallace, 459, and must be considered as the settled law of the Federal courts upon that subject, so that all property that was acquired in this case by the railroad company, the deeds of trust having expressly declared that it was given for all the property then in possession of the railroad, or thereafter to be acquired, was covered by the deed of trust, and the mortgagees have a superior equity as against all parties who, at the time that any after acquired property came into possession of the railroad company, had not an inchoate or perfect lien upon the same

The principles declared in the case of Coe v. Pennock and other cases referred to in the Supreme Court of the United States, directly apply in this case. I do not understand that it makes any difference whether the property is real or personal. It is true that we have, as a sort of necessity of the case, and yielding, to some extent, to the statute of this State, where supplies and materials have been furnished to a railroad, and the diligence required by the statute has been used by the creditors to enforce their claims within six months, allowed the payment of those claims, which, perhaps, is stretching the principle referred to as decided by the Supreme court, beyond its legitimate operation.

II. Then, as to the second objection, that the application was not made in time. The third section of the act of 1875 declares that a party seeking a removal from the State to the Federal court, shall make and file a petition in the suit in the State court, before or at the term at which said cause could be first tried, and before the trial thereof.

It is objected, that as more than a term elapsed from the time that this suit was pending in the State court, before the application was made, therefore it was too late; and the question arises as to the true construction of this part of the third section of the act of 1875.

When is the term at which the cause could be first tried, and when is it that it can be said to be before the trial thereof? Could this cause have been tried or heard before this application was made? We are required to say, upon the facts as they appear in the record, that this cause could have been tried at a term before the application was made. In a case which was recently decided by me, at Chicago, I hold that where a cause was pending in the State court, being a bill in chancery, and where an answer had been filed and an issue thereon, and where it appeared that the cause could have been tried, but that by consent of both parties it had been continued over the term, the application for removal came too late, for the cause was at issue and could have been heard, as it satisfactorily appeared, by the court, and therefore the action of the parties in postponing it, was neither an act of the law or of the court, and consequently the application came too late. But in this case, there was not only no issue when the application was made, but there was no answer filed by the parties. It does not appear that there had been any such negligence by those who made the application in this case, as to deprive them of the right which was clearly given by the act of 1875. The object of this provision of the law, was to prevent parties from making an application after the term when the cause could have been tried.

Now, unless the party has been guilty, of some negligence, the cause cannot be heard until there is an issue; and in this case it was not competent, therefore, for the court to try the case, there being no issue before the court to try. And, therefore, I think that within the meaning of the law, a term had not elapsed during which the cause could have been heard. It is to be regretted, perhaps, that the language of the statute upon this subject is not more precise. It will be observed that is more especially applicable literally to the trial of a case at law at "the term at which said cause could be first tried:" and it is often a matter of extreme difficulty to determine what is the first term at which a chancery cause can be tried or heard. Whether the parties seeking a removal could be guilty of such laches as to prevent it, although an issue had not been made up, and the cause might not be ripe for hearing, it is not necessary now to decide. It is sufficient that it does not affirmatively appear in this case, upon inspection of the record, that such laches existed on the part of these plaintiffs. Neither is it necessary to decide whether it is competent for this court to hear evidence outside of the record. It is sufficient for us to decide the case as it exists before us. And we think that this is a controvesry between citizens of different states, and that the application was made for removal at or before the term at which the cause could be first heard, and that, therefore, it is properly removed to this court. The only object of a certiorari, upon which stress is sometimes laid, is to bring the record from the State into the Federal court.

The act of 1875 provides for the issue of that writ by the Federal court, in cases within the terms of the act, and gives the Federal court power to enforce the writ. But here the record itself of the State court is before us, and the issue of a certiorari would therefore be a useless act.

U. S. CIRCUIT COURT, S. D. ILLINOIS.

Before DRUMMOND and TREAT, JJ.

OPINION MARCH 11, 1876.

NEWARK SAVINGS INSTITUTE v. WM. PAUHORST ET AL.

LIABILITY OF OFFICER OF TOWN FOR NOT PLACING JUDGMEMT ON TAX LIST.

The court, citing the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States in Dow v. Humbert et al., reported in this issue, that court has decided, in effect, where the supervisors of a town refuse to enter the amount of a judgment on the tax list of the town, that the measure of damages is not the amount of the claim. At the same time it is stated that if the plaintiff has sustained any special damages they can be recovered. The decision is, that nothing more than quasi nominal damages can be allowed. The court feels restricted by the decision of the U. S. Supreme Court and says, while it allows some damages they will not amount to much more than nominal damages, being five hundred dollars to the plaintiff and eighty-five dollars paid for notices.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

DRUMMOND, J.

This is an action on the case by the plaintiff, against the defendants, to recover damages for the non-performance of a duty by the defendants, as supervisors of the county of Macoupin.

It seems that the plaintiff recovered two judgments in this court, against the county of Macoupin, amounting, altogether, to over one hundred thousand dollars, and writs of mandamus were issued, requiring the supervisors to levy a tax amounting to one per cent. of the assessed value of the property in the county, to pay these judgments. These writs of mandamus were issued respectively on the 24th of May, and the 28th of August, 1873. They were served upon the board of supervisors of the county, and the defendants all had notice of the fact that writs of mandamus had been issued, independent of the general obligation which the law imposed upon them to discharge the duty. The attention of the defendants was, therefore, in these writs, specially called to the duty incumbent upon them, to impose a tax to pay the judgments.

They willfully disregarded and disobeyed these orders of the court; in other words, violated a solemn obligation.

For this disobedience to the order of he court, and for the non-performance of the duty required by the law, this action was brought, and the only question is, what is the amount of damages that can be recovered in the case.

It may perhaps be said, although it might hardly to be considered as proved in the case, but still it has been argued somewhat upon that undisputed fact, that, for this disobedience to the orders of the court, the parties were fined, and the fine was paid. But it was not paid by themselves. They took the money of the county and paid the fine. And these fines were, it is understood, appropriated in part to the payment of costs.

A decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, not yet reported, Dow v. Humbert et al., has restricted us very much as to the quantum of damages which should be allowed in a case like this. That court has decided, in effect, that the measure of damages is not the amount of the claim. At the same time it is stated that if the plaintiff has sustained any special damages, they can be recovered.

Looking at the whole case, without going into the reasons which have influenced the conclusion, and regarding the decision above referred to, as allowing nothing more than quasi nominal damages, we have determined that we will give the plaintiff some compensation for the trouble to which it has been put in consequence of the non-performance of of a duty by the defendants, in the employment of counsel, and for the labor and expense, without defining it in any precise form or language.

In the case of Dow v. Humbert et al. a demand was made on the officers of the town to place upon the tax-list the judgments then in question which was necessary under the law of Wisconsin, before the judgments could be paid. That was not done. The Supreme Court thereupon assumed that it might have been in consequence of ignorance, inadvertance or mistake, on the part of the officers, although it does not exactly appear how, or under what circumstances that inference was drawn.

There certainly can be no such assumption here. In that case there were only allowed nominal damages, and which would not carry costs. Here the case is infinitely more aggravated. In fact, it is as much so as it possibly can be. It is a case where the defendants have set at defiance the orders of the court—orders they were bound to obey—a case in which they were as guilty of the violation of an imperative duty as men well can be. This court is a part of the institutions of their country, just as much as the circuit court of Macoupin county. They are just as much bound to obey its mandates as though it was a court of their own county. They have chosen deliberately, solemnly, to disregard them.

It is said, to be sure, that we have punished them and can punish them again. Part is true, but this is an action brought for the violation of a public duty, which has resulted, it is claimed, in pecuniary loss to the plaintiff. So that it is a case where we think we may go further than the Supreme court said they could go in the Wisconsin case. But at the same time we feel restricted, as I have said, by the rulings of the Supreme court, and, while we give some damages, after all, they will amount to not much more than nominal damages.

We will allow five hundred dollars to the plaintiff and eighty-five dollars for the payment of the money for notices.

The judgment of the court will be therefore for the plaintiff for the amount of $585 and costs.

The parties who were not present at the meeting of the board of supervisors, at which the act of disobedience occurred, as well as those who voted for the imposition of the tax, as directed by the writs, are, of course, not included in this judgment.

I ought, perhaps, to add that our view was, if we were left free by the Supreme court, that the plaintiff would at least be entitled to the interest upon the money which would have been collected, if the defendants had performed their duty.

The presumption is, the plaintiff could have had the use of the money, and, in one sense, might have compounded the interest. But we think we are not at liberty, under the decisions of the Supreme court. to allow it. That court seems to think that as the interest is still due and payable, and may be included with the principal, that is all which can be allowed.

We have also thought that there has not been, within the meaning of the Supreme court, any substantial "impairment" of the responsibility of the county. It is true, that the assessed value of the property of Macoupin county, was much less in 1875 than it was in 1873; but still it appears that the property is sufficient to enable the county to pay,—at any rate, the fund out of which these judgments are to be made, is sufficiently large to enable the plaintiff to avail itself of the laws to recover the amount.

It is true, that under the decisions of the Supreme court, these judgments against municipal corporatiors, where people do not choose to pay them, are not very potential. It has held that where the laws of a State declare that there can be no execution against the property of a municipal corporation, the Federal courts are without power to collect judgments by the imposition of taxes, although that may be the only resource. Rees v. Watertown, 19 Wall., 107.

And now it has been decided, substantially, that the officers of such corporations are not liable for more than nominal damages, if they refuse to perform the duty which the law imposes on them. The result is, judgments can be obtained in the courts against these municipalities, upon the bonds or coupons they have issued, and their obligations construed with the greatest rigor.

But after judgments, and when it is attempted to make their property available to satisfy them, then arises the real difficulty of the case, in the effort to overcome which, the old legal maxim, that there is no wrong without a remedy, seems sometimes to be reversed.

FEB., 1876.

THE UNITED STATES v. H. A. HAMILTON and L. A. LOGAN.

INDICTMENT FOR ATTEMPTING TO DEFRAUD THE GOVERNMENT OF ITS REVENUE, AND FOR COMMITTING AN OFFENSE AGAINST THE UNITED STATES.

Four of the counts in the indictment charged the defendants as conspiring with each other; the other three counts charged them with conspiring with other persons unknown. § 1036 of the Revised U. S. Statutes at Large, of 1874, is as follows: "Sec. 1036. On an indictment against several, if the jury cannot agree upon a verdict as to all, they may render a verdict as to those in regard to whom they do agree, on which a judgment shall be entered accordingly; and the cause as to the other defendants may be tried by another jury."

BATEMAN, RICHARDS & DYER for the United States.

BUTTERWORTH & VOGLER, T. YOUNG, and MOULTON & J. JOHNSON, for defendants.

SWING, J., charged the jury, that, in order to find either of the defendants guilty, under the four counts, charging them jointly, they must find, from the evidence, that they had conspired together; that, on these four counts, an acquittal of one was an acquitttal of both; but that under the other three counts, if they believed that the defendants had conspired with other persons to the government and the jury unknown, they might find the defendants guilty.

After remaining out for two days, the jury came into court and inquired, whether, if they believed from the evidence that one of the defendants was not guilty, and as to the other they were unable to agree, they could so return their verdict, upon which SWING, J., charged them, that under the three counts, charging them with conspiring with other persons, if they found from the evidence that one of the defendants had conspired, not with his co-defendant, but with other persons to the government and jury unknown, they might find a verdict of guilty as to him and not guilty as to his co-defendant; that under these three counts an acquittal of one was not an acquittal of both. If they were satisfied from the evidence that one of the defendants was not guilty, they might return a verdict of not guilty as to him; and if, as to the other defendant, they were unable to determine as to the fact of his conspiring with persons unknown, whether he was guilty, they might return as to him that they could not agree upon a verdict.

The jury found a verdict of not guilty as to Hamilton, and guilty as to Logan, in the three counts charging him with conspiring with other persons unknown.

SUPREME COURT OF TENNESSEE.

JACKSON, NOV. 27, 1875.

J. W. GOSLING v. T. S. GRIFFIN.

NEGOTIABLE PAPER—PAYMENT BY MAKER BEFORE MATURITY, BUT AFTER INDORSEMENT AND TRANSFER, NO DEFENSE TO ACTION BY HOLDER.

Payments of negotiable paper before it is due, and in the absence of such paper, are not made in due course of business, and the party so paying should be held to do so at his own risk. Therefore, the maker of negotiable paper is not discharged if, before the maturity of the paper, and after its transfer, even as collateral security, he makes payment to any person other than the real holder. And this is so although the maker may have no notice of such transfer at the time of making such payment.

The case of Vatterlien v. Howell, 5 Sneed, 441, reviewed at length and overruled.—[ED. COMMERCIAL AND LEGAL REPORTER.]

HOWELL E. JACKSON, Special J., delivered the opinion of the Court.

The material facts of this case necessary to be noticed in determining the legal questions presented by the record, are the following:

On the 9th day of January, 1871, the defendant, T. S. Griffin, executed and delivered to Pollard & Co., his negotiable promissory note for the sum of $598.00 payable thirty days after date, the consideration for said note being the proceeds of a buggy which Pollard & Co. had placed in said Griffin's hands for sale, and which he had sold, and used and appropriated the money. The payees in said note being indebted to the plaintiff Gosling in the sum of $554.25 evidenced by their acceptance, which matured 1st and 3d of January, 1871, and which had been placed in the hands of attorneys at Memphis for collection, on the 10th day of January, 1871, indorsed in blank the defendant's said note for $598 00 and delivered it to the plaintiff's attorney as collateral security for the indorsers' acceptance which said attorneys held for collection. Said attorneys, at the time of receiving defendant's note from said Pollard & Co., gave to the latter a receipt specifying that said note was received by them as collateral security for the payment of said Pollard & Co.'s acceptance for $554.25 due 1st and 3d of January, 1871. It appears that the defendant, after the date of this transfer, and before the maturity of his said note, delivered to Pollard & Co. several lots of flour and meal in payment and satisfaction of his note. This flour and meal to the amount of $613.00, was delivered on the 26th and 29th of January, 1871, without notice or knowledge on the part of defendant that this note had been previously indorsed and transferred by Pollard & Co. to the plaintiff. He accordingly refused to pay the note at its maturity and was sued thereon by the plaintiff in the First Circuit Court of Shelby county.

Amongst other pleas not necessary to be noticed, the defendants plead that said note was not transferred to the plaintiff in due course of trade, but was given to the plaintiff by the firm of Pollard & Co. as collateral security for a debt which the said Pollard & Co. owed the plaintiff, and further that the defendant paid said note to the firm of Pollard & Co. without notice from the plaintiff that he had the note assigned to him, and of this he put himself upon the country. By consent of parties a jury was waived and the case was tried by the court, and resulted in a finding "that though the note was assigned before maturity, it being received as collateral to secure a pre-existing debt, the defendant should have been notified of the assignment and the plaintiff cannot recover on the note, because defendant was not so notified (before paying the note to Pollard & Co.) The court thereupon gave judgment for the defendant, from which the plaintiff has appealed in error to this court.

In rendering judgment for the defendant upon the foregoing facts the court below followed the case of Vatterlien v. Howell et al. 5 Sneed 441, which presented the direct question here presented and is conclusive of the present case if it is to be adhered to as authority. In Vatterlien v. Howell the material facts were, that Howell & Co. on the 10th of March, 1856, executed to T. S. Brown & Co. their promissory note for $208,00 due at six months. On the 15th of May, 1856, Brown & Co., the payees, endorsed and delivered said note to Vatterlien as collateral security for the payment of a pre-existing debt due from them to him.

Vatterlien gave the makers no notice of this assignment of the note to him, and on the 30th of July, 1856, before the note matured, the makers paid the amount thereof to Brown & Co., the payees. When the note was due, Vatterlien sued the makers and it was held, that their payment to the payees, before maturity and after the assignment of the note, having been made without notice of the transfer, was a good defence against the suit of said Vatterlien. This decision seems to proceed upon the idea that an indorsee of negotiable paper, who receives it before maturity as collateral security for or in payment of an antecedent debt is bound to notify the makers of his being the holder, in order to protect himself against payments by the maker to the original holder or payee. That in the absence of such notice an indorsee must show himself to be a holder for value and in due course of trade in order not to be bound by the maker's payment to the original payee, although made before maturity, and after transfer of the note. We cannot assent to the correctness of this principle as applied to negotiable paper. It in effect places such paper upon precisely the same footing as open accounts, and, in our opinion, attaches a condition to the legal and complete transfer of negotiable instruments, which is supported neither upon principle nor authority. It was decided in Clodfelter v. Cox, 1 Sneed, 330, that the assignee of equitable rights and open accounts must give notice to the debtor or holder of the fund of the assignment in order to protect himself against subsequent payments by the debtor to the assignor. But in the subsequent cases of the "Mutual Protection Co. v. Hamilton, 5 Sneed, 277, and Sugg v. Powell, 1 Head, 221, it was held, that this doctrine as to notice had no application to the assignment of negotiable paper, or of instruments, which, though not negotiable by the Law Merchant, are made assignable by law, so as to pass the legal interest or title and permit the assignee to sue in his own name. The rule announced in these cases is irreconcilable with the position assumed in Vatterlein v. Howell. No authority is cited to sustain the proposition or conclusion of law laid down in Vatterlien v. Howell except the case of Van Wyck v. Norwell, 2 Humph., 192, which fails to support the decision. The contest in Van Wyck v. Norvell was between the true owners of the notes and a party holding them as collateral security. The former prevailed, upon principles well settled in our decisions. But Judge Green, who delivered that opinion, recognized the fact that a pre existing debt was a good consideration as between the holder and the individual from whom he received the paper, though it would not be sufficient to entitle him to hold against the true owner. The consideration on which Vatterlien received the transfer of the note from Brown & Co., being a good one as between themselves, and that transfer having vested him with the legal title to the note so as to dispense with the necessity of his giving notice of the assignment, the conclusion seems to be inevitable that a payment by the maker to the original payee, after such transfer and before maturity, should not be held good against the holder.

Again, the decision in Vatterlein v. Howell ignores the distinction that should manifestly be taken between the payment of a negotiable note made after its transfer, and such a payment before assignment. The latter is the proposition discussed by the judge delivering that opinion. He says: "The argument is, that if a party pay a negotiable paper (as this is) before maturity and fails to take it up, he does it at his peril, and if it is afterwards assigned before maturity, the assignee has the right to enfore its repayment." After correctly saying that this doctrine was too broadly stated, the opinion proceeds: "It is true that if a party pay a negotiable paper before due and fail to take it up, and it is afterwards and before maturity negotiated in due course of trade, the assignee being an innocent holder for a valuable consideration, would be entitled to enforce its payment. But it is equally true that if it is taken in payment of, or as security for, a pre-existing debt, it is not negotiated in due course of trade, and the holder would stand in no better situation than the payee, and would be subject to all defences which might be made against it in the hands of the payee." This was undoubtedly a correct statement of the law as applicable to the case of a payment of negotiable paper made before its transfer or assignment. But it did not follow from this principle, as the court concluded therefrom, that a payment made after such transfer or assignment would stand upon the same footing, and be equally available as a defence to an action by the holder.

The endorsement and delivery of negotiable paper as collateral security for pre-existing indebtedness is a transaction of daily occurrence in all commercial communities. It is a legitimate use of such paper, and if the person so receiving it does not become thereby a holder for value, and in due course of trade, according to the Law Merchant, so as to cut off all defences, he is certainly entitled to protection as against payments made or equities arising between the maker and endorser after the date of such transfer. The business of mercantile communities is to a great extent transacted through the medium of bills of exchange and promissory notes, and this free circulation of such paper is a matter of too much importance to be restricted by adhering to an adjudication not founded upon principle nor supported by authority. Our decisions have gone sufficiently far in holding that negotiable paper, transferred in payment of a pre-existing debt, or as collateral security, is subject to all equities or defences existing against the paper at the time of its transfer, and we are unwilling to extend the principles of these decisions so as to let in defences arising after such transfer. Every maker of negotiable paper knows as matter of law that it is transferable by endorsement, so as to pass the legal and complete title to the paper and the debt evidenced thereby, and it is his duty to pay to the holder upon production of the note.

Payments of negotiable paper before it is due, and in the absence of such paper, are not made in the due course of business, and the party so paying should be held to do so at his own risk. For when the title has passed by endorsement and delivery of such paper, the actual or legal holder alone has the right to receive the money due thereon, and the maker, in paying to the original payee after such transfer, in the absence of the paper, either before or after its maturity, must abide the consequence of making payment to a party not entitled to receive it. Our legislation, in providing indemnity for makers of lost negotiable paper when sued thereon, proceeds upon the principle that the actual legal holder thereof could lawfully compel a re-payment to himself.

We therefore hold that in the case of negotiable paper the maker is not discharged if, before the maturity of the paper and after its transfer even as collateral security he makes payment to any person other than the real holder. This conclusion is fortified by the rule applicable to over-due negotiable paper. When such paper is endorsed and transferred after maturity, the maker can avail himself only of such matter of defence as existed between himself and the promisee or endorser at the time of the actual endorsement and transfer of the note to the holder. This is so, both upon the principles of the Law Merchant and under the provisions of our statutes of set-off. It is founded upon the well settled rule that a note does not cease to be negotiable because it is over-due. The payee by his endorsement may still communicate a good title to the endorsee. Nor can the maker, when sued thereon, rely on matters of defence against the endorser which arose after such transfer, although he had no notice of the transfer, at time of acquiring his defense. The maker has no right to presume that such over due paper, which he has made negotiable and on which he agrees to be liable to the actual holder or endorser, remains in the hands of the original payee, and if he pays to the original promisee without regarding the production of the paper, he does it at his own risk.

This is the true distinction between the assignment of open accounts or equitable interest in a fund and the endorsement of a negotiable note. In the former case, notice of the assignment must be given the debtor to protect the assignee against future payments to the assignor; such assignee acquires only an equitable title, and in the absence of such notice the debtor may reasonably presume that the original creditor still holds or controls the claim, and may accordingly make payments to him in the ordinary course of business. But the endorsee of an over-due negotiable note acquires a full legal title with the sole and exclusive right to demand and receive payment thereof—his right being only subject to the equities and defences existing against the paper at the time of its transfer to him. No defences against the original payee acquired after the transfer, are available against him. Now, it is manifest that negotiable paper, taken as collateral security for pre-existing indebtedness, before maturity and before any equities or defences exist against it, must stand upon the same footing as the transfer of such over-due paper. The holder in neither case is considered a holder for value in due course of trade under the Law Merchant. Both are subject to all equities existing at the time of the transfer, but neither is subject to defences arising after such transfer.

The foregoing doctrines are, we think, supported both by principle and authority. See 20 N. Y. Rep., 138; 20 Pick, 545; 6 Metcalf, p. 7; Edwards on Bills and Notes, (marginal) pp. 537, 538.

Our conclusion is that the case of Vatterlien v. Howell, 5 Sneed, 441, was not correctly decided, and should not be adhered to as authority.

It follows from the principles already announced, that the defendant's payment to Pollard & Co., the original payees of the note sued on, made before its maturity but after the date of its endorsement and transfer to the plaintiff as collateral security, constitutes no valid defence to the plaintiff's suit upon said note, although the defendant may have had no notice of such transfer at the time of making such payment. It results, therefore, that the judgment of the Circuit court must be reversed, and that the plaintiff have judgment here upon the note with costs of suit.

SUPREME COURT OF INDIANA.

[From the Indianapolis Sentinel.]

RIGHTS OF MARRIED WOMEN—INTEREST OF WIDOW IN THE PROPERTY OF HER HUSBAND SOLD IN 1840 AT SHERIFF'S SALE, SHE NEVER IN ANY WAY CONSENTING TO THE CONVEYANCE.

4529. Charlotte Taylor v. Henry T. Sample et al., Tippecanoe C. C. Affirmed.

Biddle, C. J., delivering the opinion of the court. Statement of the case: The husband of the appellant was the owner in fee of the lands in controversy, which were sold by the sheriff upon execution in 1840. The wife did not join in the conveyance. The husband died in 1864. The question raised in the record is whether the widow had any right in her husband's lands, held in fee simple, which he had conveyed alone, or which had been sold at sheriff's sale, during coverture?

Held, That this question had been decided adversely to the widow in Strong v. Clem, 12 Ind. 37; which case has been approved by the following cases: 40 Ind. 575; 48 Ind. 347 et al.

HUSBAND AND WIFE—THE WIFE PAYING THE CONSIDERATION FOR PURCHASE OF LAND, AND THE HUSBAND FRAUDULENTLY TAKING A DEED TO HIMSELF.

4462. Tracy v. Kelly, Ripley C. C. Affirmed.

Biddle, C. J, delivering the opinion of the court, holding: 1. That if a husband fraudulently takes a conveyance of lands in his own name, the consideration having been paid by his wife, a trust thereby results in the wife's favor. This equitable rule has not been changed by the statute.

2. That the wife was a competent witness in the case as to all matters touching her own rights in the lands, (29 Ind. 570).

3. That the evidence sustains the general verdict and the special findings.

WHAT CONSTITUTES A VALID GIFT—DELIVERY TO TRUSTEE FOR USE OF THE PARTY TO BE BENEFITED—AMENDED COMPLAINT.

4724. Wyble and Sallie McPheters v. McPheters et al. Reversed.

Worden, J., delivering the opinion of the court.

Statement.—Complaint by the appellants against the appellees. The complaint was in two paragraphs, each seeking to recover an alleged gift to the plaintiffs from their father, of a trustee as it is claimed one of the defendants was. Demurrers to each paragraph of the complaint for want of sufficient facts was sustained, which ruling presents the principal question in the case. Held,

1. That both paragraphs of the complaint show a delivery, absolute and unconditional, to William M. McPheters, and that said party was unconditionally to deliver the subject of the gifts to the plaintiffs upon the death of the donor, an event which must have taken place. That the transaction created the relation of trustee and beneficiary between William M. McPheters and the plaintiffs; and that a delivery to a trustee for the use of a party to be benefited, is as effectual as a delivery to the party himself. (Miller v. Billingsly, 41 Ind., 489; Stone v. Hackett, ex'r, 12 Gray, 227; 1 De G., M. & G., 176; 50 Eng. C. L.; 32 Ind., 78.) Held,

2. That a complaint may be an amended one without appearing on its face to be such, and that the certificate of the clerk is conclusive that the complaint is an amended con-complaint.

PERSONAL LIABILITY OF DEVISEE WHO ACCEPTS LANDS CHARGED WITH A LEGACY.

3744. Burch v. Burch, Franklin, C. P. C. Affirmed.

Downey, J., delivering the opinion of the court.

Held, That a devisee who has accepted real estate devised to him, is personally liable for the payment of the legacies exclusively charged thereon.

PRACTICE—ORDER OF SALE OF LAND ON A JUDGMENT—EVIDENCE—RECORD OF JUDGMENT.

4697. Vandever et al v. Hardy et al., Switzerland C. C. Reversed.

Worden, J., delivering the opinion of the court.

Statement.—Action by appellees to recover possession of a tract of land. The plaintiffs claimed title through Charles Hardy, and the question involved is whether a sheriff's sale was shown to be valid. Held,

1. That where a circuit court gives judgment ordering land to be sold for the payment of a judgment rendered in a Common Pleas court, it is proper for an order of sale to issue from the circuit court for the sale of the land. Held,

2. That where the fact to be ascertained is whether there was a judgment ordering the sale of land, the judgment, order of sale, sheriff's return thereon and the sheriff's deed are sufficient evidence, where no objection is made to the introduction of the judgment without the residue of the record.

A Justice who Wouldn't.—Yesterday forenoon, says the Detroit Free Press, an honest looking man called into the office of a justice of the peace and wanted to know if he could commence suit against a neighbor for assault and battery. He was informed that he could, and he brightened up and continued:

"Well, make out a law suit right away. He kicked me mighty hard, and I want you to plug the law right to him."

As the justice reached for a warrant, his visitor asked:

"How much will you fine him?"

"I can't tell anything about the case until it is tried," was the reply.

"Then he may get off?"

"Yes,"

"And I may have the costs to pay?"

"Yes."

"And you won't agree to fine him?"

His honor began to read a frigid lecture on the practice of law, but the man for whom it was intended started for the door, saying:

"I won't fool around with law. I've got three dogs and two grown-up sons, and I guess the whole pile of us can lick him blind in two minutes."

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

John M. Adams v. Charles Gardner.—Appeal from Superior Court of Cook.—Opinion by Sheldon, J.

DECLARATION AS TO DAMAGES.

Held, That whenever the damages sustained from a cause of action have not necessarily occurred from the act complained of, and are consequently not implied by law, then, in order to prevent surprise on the defendant, the declaration must state the particular damages, or the plaintiff will not be allowed to give evidence thereof.

We call attention to the following opinions, reported at length in this issue:

Liability of Town Officer for Refusing to Place upon the Tax-List Judgments.—The opinion of the Supreme court of the United States by Miller, J., holding where the defendants, supervisors of a town in Wisconsin, refused to place upon the tax-list of the town the amount of judgments recovered by the plaintiff against the town, that the plaintiff was entitled to recover only nominal damages, the taxable property of the town still remaining subject to the judgments. Many lawyers have supposed that the whole amount of the judgments could be recovered of the officer neglecting his duty and refusing to place the same upon the tax-list of the town.

Removal of Cause from State to Federal Court.—The opinion of the United States circuit court for the southern district of Illinois by Drummond, J., construing the third section of the act of Congress, which declares that a party seeking a removal from the State to the Federal court shall make and file a petition in the State court, before or at the term at which said cause could be first tried, and before the trial thereof. There has been a great conflict of opinion as to the meaning of this section. The difficulty has been to determine the meaning to be given to the words "before or at the term at which said cause could be first tried." This opinion of the learned judge will be of very general interest.

Liability of officer for not placing judgment on tax list.—The opinion of the United States circuit court for the southern district of Illinois, by Drummond, J., holding under the ruling of the Supreme Court of the United States that where the supervisors of a town refuse to enter judgments recovered against the town upon the tax-list, that the amount of the judgment cannot be recovered of such officers, but only nominal damages. If the Supreme Court adheres to its ruling that only nominal damages can be recovered, it will be very easy for any Board of Supervisors to defy the authority of the federal courts and prevent honest creditors from collecting their judgments entered in these tribunals against towns.

Indictment for Conspiracy—Verdict—Acquittal of One.—The opinion of the United States District Court for the Southern District of Ohio, by Swing, J., in the case of several persons indicted for entering into a conspiracy to defraud the government. The Court instructed the jury that if they were satisfied from the evidence that one of the defendants had conspired, not with his co-defendant, but with other persons to the government unknown, they might find a verdict of guilty as to him and not guilty as to his co-defendant, and that under the three counts in the indictment an acquittal of one was not an acquittal of both; that if they were satisfied one of the defendants was not guilty, they might return a verdict of not guilty as to him; and if, as to the other defendant, they were unable to determine as to the fact of his conspiring with persons unknown, whether he was guilty, they might return as to him that they could not agree upon a verdict.

Payment of Negotiable Paper before Due, and in the Absence of such Paper.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of Tennessee, by Jackson, Special J., holding that payments of negotiable paper before it is due, and in the absence of such paper, are not made in due course of business, and the party so paying should be held to do so at his own risk; that the maker of negotiable paper is not discharged if before the maturity of the paper, and after its transfer even as collateral security, he makes payment to any person other than the real holder, and that this is so, although the maker may have had no notice of such transfer at the time of making such payment.

NOTES TO RECENT CASES.

BANKRUPTCY—EXEMPTION.

The United States District Court for the Northern District of North Carolina, held, in the case of Martin that a bankrupt is entitled to an exemption of his household furniture and other necessary articles, although they were taken under an execution prior to the commencement of the proceedings in bankruptcy. 13 N. B. Reg., 397.

BANKRUPTCY—FORECLOSURE OF MORTGAGE.

It was held by the Supreme Court of Iowa, in Brown v. Gibbons, 13 N. S. Reg. 407, that a proceeding to foreclose a mortgage instituted in a State Court after the commencement of the proceedings in bankruptcy, without making the assignee of the mortgagor a party thereto, is valid as against all persons who are parties thereto; that if the assignee does not seek to redeem mortgaged property, the mortgagee may proceed in a State Court to foreclose the mortgage, and that such proceeding is not absolutely void.

FOREIGN LAW—EVIDENCE.

Held by the English Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division Court, in the goods of Bonell, 34 L. T. R. Rep., N. S. 32, that the law of a foreign country cannot be proved even by a juris consult of his knowledge if it be derived solely from his having studied it.

BANKRUPTCY—INFANT TRADER—ADJUDICATION AGAINST.

The English Court of Bankruptcy held in ex parte Lynch, 34 L. T. Rep.. N.S. 34, that a trader can be adjudicated bankrupt upon a debt contracted whilst under age, if at that time he by his conduct held himself out to the public as an adult.

INSURANCE—AUTHORITY OF AGENT.

The Court of Appeals of New York, in Bush v. Westchester Fire Ins. Co., 5 Ins. Law Journal, 207, held that the authority of an agent to receive proposals and countersign and deliver policies, is not authority to adjust losses or to waive the stipulated proofs, and bind the company. The fact that an agent assumes to do those acts, does not establish his authority, or entitle the assured to infer his authority.

INSURANCE—AUTHORITY OF AGENT.

The Supreme Court of Wisconsin, in Winans v. Allemania Fire Ins. Co., 5 Ins. Law J., 203, say it is the settled law of this court that the agent of an insurance company, authorized to take risks and issue policies against fire, may waive by parol a condition in a policy issued by him. This opinion is in conflict with the opinion of the New York Court of Appeals above cited.

Miss Goodell's case.—We call the attention of our readers to the review, by Miss Goodell, of chief justice Ryan's opinion refusing her admission to the Wisconsin bar, published in this issue. We judge from it that Miss Goodell has no intention of leaving Wisconsin. We understand she is still practicing in the lower court, where she was originally admitted. It is claimed by her friends that until that admission is revoked she can so practice. Why don't Judge Ryan commit her for contempt, when he has said no woman can practice in Wisconsin, and she keeps on practicing?

A Treatise on the Law of Taxation, Including the Law of Local Assessments, by Thomas M. Cooley, LL. D., one of the justices of the Supreme Court of Michigan, and Jay professor of law in the University of Michigan. Chicago: Callaghan and Company, law book publishers. 1876.

Judge Cooley has for some years been engaged on this work, and the members of the profession have been awaiting its appearance, hoping that it would be as valuable an aid to them on all questions arising under the law of taxation as his former work has been upon constitutional questions. The work will more than satisfy the anticipations of the profession. It is clearly and concisely written, and methodically arranged. The author has not given a mere abstract or digest of the decisions, and left his reader to guess at what the law really is, but gives the general principles underlying the cases, and upon disputed points the learned author does not hesitate to express his opinions, and to support the same by an array of authorities in the notes, which show the thoroughness of the judge's investigations into the adjudications of the courts and the principles underlying the law of taxation. The authorities are brought down to the latest moment before going to press. The volume is divided into twenty-four chapters, as follows: 1. Taxes, Their Nature and Kind. 2. The Nature of the Power to Tax. 3. Limitations upon the Taxing Power. 4. The Purposes for which Taxes may be Laid. 5. The Purpose must Pertain to the District Taxed. 6. Equality and Uniformity in Taxation. 7. Apportionment of Taxes. 8. Official Action in Matters of Taxation. 9. The Construction of Tax Laws. 10. Curing Defects in Tax Proceedings. 11. The Voting of the Tax. 12. The Assessment of Property for Taxation. 13. The Collector's Warrant. 14. The Collection of the Tax. 15. The Sale of Lands for Unpaid Taxes. 16. Redemption of Lands from Tax Sales. 17. Proceedings at Law to Recover Lands Sold for Taxes. 18. Taxation of Business. 19. Taxes Under the Power of Police. 20. Taxation by Special assessment. 21. Local Taxation Under Legislative Compulsion. 22. The Remedies of the State Against Collectors of Taxes. 23. Enforcing Official Duty Under the Tax Laws. 24. The Remedies for Illegal and Unjust Taxation. The mechanical execution of this volume is excellent. It is a large volume and numbers over eight hundred pages. It will be one of the leading American textbooks.

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT.

ABSTRACT OF OPINIONS FILED AT OTTAWA IN 1876.

American Express Co. v. R. Greenhalgh.—Appeal from Knox.—Opinion by Walker, J.

LIABILITY OF PUBLIC CARRIERS FOR GOODS SHIPPED C. O. D.

Statement.—Goods shipped to Greenhalgh, C. O. D. Consignee refused to receive them, but paid the express charges. Suit was brought by the consignors against the consignee, for the value of the goods. Pending the suit, the attorney for the consignee ordered the express company to return the goods. This was done, and the consignors receives them. Afterward, verdict was rendered against the defendant, who then demanded the goods of the express company, and thereon brought suit in trover. It was contended that the judgment gave absolute title to the defendant. Held,

1. That, if so, the action could only lie against the consignors for the goods so returned by order of the defendants.

2. If the agent of the company even knew of the pendency of the suit, yet he would be justified by such order in reshipping to the consignors.

3. It is not the duty of a public carrier to seek the true owner of goods, nor unasked, or unwarned, to seek to protect the contingent future interests of a consignee.

4. Although, should the public carrier deliver goods to a third party, is would devolve upon such carrier to prove that the delivery was to the true owner. But that is not this case.

C. D. & V. R. R. Co. v. Coyer et al. (tax payers).—Appeal from Kankakee.—Opinion by CRAIG, J.

SIGNATURES TO PETITION FOR SPECIAL ELECTION TO VOTE ON RAILROAD SUBSCRIPTION.

STATEMENT.—Bill to enjoin the issuing and delivering to appellant of township bonds, for $30,000, voted June 5, 1869. Bill granted. and appeal.

The objections to the election were, (1) Insufficiency of the petition for submission, in not being signed by twelve freeholders. (2) Insufficiency of notice in not being legally posted.

There were more than the names of twelve freeholders to the petition, but some did not personally sign.

Held, 1. That it was not necessary that the persons required by the statute to sign the petition before the election, should do so in person. Each person could authorize his signature to be attached by another. And this could be done at a prior public meeting, the names being taken down by the secretary, and afterwards attached by a committee appointed by the meeting. And persons so assenting at the public meeting are estopped from afterwards disputing their signatures.

[As to the notices, held, the proof showed they were properly given].

24.—Alfred Berrington v. Michael F. Casey.—Error to Cook.—Opinion by WALKER, J.

LEASE CONSTRUED—IMPLIED COVENANT OF POSSESSION—ELECTION AS TO FORM OF ACTION ON BREACH—WAIVER OF TENDER.

STATEMENT.—Suit in assumpsit for breach of the following lease:

"Chicago, Dec. 7, 1871.

"Received of M. F. Casey ten (10) dollars, on rent of store on corner of Lake and Canal streets, which Mr. Casey is to have for $100 per month until May, 1873.

Alfred Berrington."

While Casey was in New York, Berrington re-leased the store to another. On return, Casey offered to pay the $100 for the first month, but it was refused; and he brought suit. Held,

1. That the instrument was a lease, and not merely an agreement for a lease; and that, therefore, the law implied a covenant for possession; for the breach of which an action would lie.

2. It was optional with the lessee to bring assumpsit or ejectment in such case.

3. That the refusal of the defendant to receive the rent offered, released all obligation to make a formal tender.

258.—1874.—Kamphouse et al. v. Gaffner.—Appeal from Winnebago.—Opinion by SCHOLFIELD, J.

ONSTRUCTION OF LEASE—LICENSE TO WORK MINES — LOCUS IN QUO OF TRESPASS — MEANING OF WORDS—REVOCATION OF LICENSE.

STATEMENT.—Trespass quare clausum in mining lead on certain lands in Jo Daviess county, (whence the cause was removed by change of venue to Winnebago.)

Plea, a grant by lease, and a parol license to mine the lead. Held,

1. That it is error to instruct a jury that in regard to a lease, they should "consider the words used therein having reference to the description or location of said lands, and words denoting merely bearing or direction, must, in all cases, yield to words referring to fixed monuments or objects upon, or in the lands itself, when conflicting therewith," this leaving a construction of a written instrument to the jury which belongs to the court. The court must give to the jury, as matter of law, what the legal construction of the instrument is and the jury are bound absolutely to take the construction.

2. But it is for the jury to say whether a trespass was committed within the boundaries laid down in a lease.

3. It is also for the jury to determine whether in regard to mining, the words "crevice" and "range" are synonymous.

4. A beneficial privilege in lands, as a privilege to work mines, can only be granted by deed; so that every license that authorizes such acts as not only require to be performed upon the land, but which gives some usufruct of the land itself is properly a grant of an incorporeal hereditaments, and must be created and transferred by deed.

5. A license by parol is always revocable, while executory, and it is merely personal and cannot be transferred to another. Nor will any expenditure, or valuable consideration given by the grantee, take away its revocable quality.

6. The rule of law on this matter is, that a mere license, unaccompanied by any vested interest in the real estate created by deed or other writing, and independent of any title acquired by grant, prescription, or adverse possession or claim, for the limitation period, is, in its own nature, countermandable, and essentially revocable at the will of the owner of the fee.

7. Russell v. Hubbard, 59 Ill., 335, is overruled so far as it conflicts with this decision.

[The court decline to decide how far equity might interfere in cases of hardship.]

8. However, when fully executed, and not depending on continuous acts, it is not subject to revocation.

278.—1874.—C. B. & Q. R. R. Co. v. Van Patten, Adm'r.—Opinion by SCHOLFIELD, J.

LEGAL EFFECT OF ERROR—SPECIAL VERDICTS —COMPARATIVE NEGLIGENCE.

STATEMENT.—Suit for death of intestate by negligence of appellant. The case in the appellate court turns largely on the evidence. The following points were decided:

1. When, from all the evidence, it is evident that the same verdict must be rendered on a new trial, the court will not reverse a cause for error in the giving of instructions; but where the right of the successful party is not clear, and there is error in the instructions which might have misled the jury, the cause will be reversed.

2. Where a special verdict is required under the statute, the court exhausts its powers in submitting the interrogatories and it is error to inform the jury that if they are unable to answer the interrogatories because of the uncertainty of the evidence, they might so report; for this intimates that the court probably regards the evidence as uncertain. Also, to inform them that, in such case, they may, nevertheless, return a general verdict—especially if the interrogatories comprise the vital issues of the cause.

3. In actions of negligence, the plaintiff may recover, even if guilty of contributory negligence, if the negligence of the defendant is so gross as to make his negligence comparatively slight. And so as to an intestates in actions like the present.

Sarah Morse et al. v. Ellen Thorsell.—Appeal from Knox.—Opinion by WALKER, J.

DOWER—EVIDENCE—EQUITABLE ESTATE—PARTIES.

Held, 1. That title to real estate, when admissible by verbal evidence, can only be established when it is clear and satisfactory. And if, in a suit for dower, the petitioner can only testify that her husband, in his lifetime, paid the purchase money for the lot, from having heard him and the vendors say so, this is hearsay evidence, and should be rejected.

2. Dower cannot be assigned on an equitable estate, unless the title could have been converted into a legal title, by a bill for specific performance. Hence, a contract not performed cannot confer dower; and, if assigned before performance, a subsequent performance by the assignee cannot avail to give a dower right to the widow of the assignor.

3. Where suit for dower is brought against a married woman, the husband of the defendant is a necessary party, in consequence of his curtesy, or any other interest he may have in the lands.

Norman Frame v. Austin Badger.—Appeal from McHenry.—Opinion by WALKER, J.

ABSTRACT AND INAPPLICABLE INSTRUCTIONS —INSTRUCTIONS AS TO EVIDENCE.

Held, 1. That abstract and inapplicable instructions are erroneous, as tending to mislead the jury into the consideration of irrelevant circumstances, and so to bewilder and confuse them.

2. When evidence is slight, or is highly contradictory, it is unfair and misleading for the court to select isolated portions of the evidence, and give it prominence by calling the attention of the jury thereto especially.

Horace R. Kipp et al. v. Louis Lichtenstein,—Error to Woodford.—Opinion by SHELDON, J.

IMPLIED REPEAL OF CORPORATION ACT—DEFECTIVE DECLARATION.

STATEMENT.—Suit brought against the appellants as trustees of a corporation. The cause of action declared on was (1) indebtedness by the corporation; and (2) failure of defendants, trustees, to make an annual report, as required by the 12th section of the corporation act of Feb'y 10, 1849. Held,

1. That the said act was impliedly repealed by the act of Feb'y 18, 1857, as held in Culver v. Third National Bank, 64 Ills., 530.

2. If a declaration be so defective that it will not sustain a judgment, the defect may be taken advantage of on a motion to arrest of judgment, or on error.

3. Where a true cause of action is not declared on, the supreme court will not consider whether, under the facts, there is a ground for the liability of the defendants.

Jonas Berger v. Jonas Peterson.—Error to KNOX.—Opinion by CRAIG, J.

CONSTRUCTION OF WRITTEN CONTRACT—TENDER—INTEREST ON BREACH OF CONTRACT—RIGHT OF PARTY NOT IN DEFAULT.

STATEMENT.—Suit to foreclose a mortgage given to secure the fulfilment of the following contract:

"Whereas I, Jonas Berger, have, by my deed, bearing date the 6th day of May, 1868, sold and conveyed to Jonas Peterson, one-fourth interest in my patent for improvements in melodeons, and improvements in key coupling musical instruments, and for which the said Joseph Peterson has paid me the sum of $1000, I now hereby agree that, in case the said Jonas Peterson shall fail to realize the said sum of $1000 from the sales of said patent, or instruments made in pursuance of the same, within three years from this date, then, and in that case, I promise and agree to pay to him the said Jonas Peterson, said sum of one thousand dollars, upon his reconveying to me said interest so conveyed to him as aforesaid. Witness my hand this 5th day of August, 1868. Jonas Berger."

In May, 1874, Peterson tendered a reconveyance, but Berger refused to receive the deed, or pay the money. In the suit the $1000 was decreed, with interest from this time, (May, 1874.)

Held, 1. That this contract, not prescribing the degree of effort to be employed in effecting sales, the law will imply merely a reasonable effort, taking into consideration the ability and means at command.

2. If, at the expiration of the time prescribed in the contract, a demand was made by the patentee for a reconveyance, and an offer to refund the money, this was not sufficient to place the other party in fatal default, unless it was also shown that the patentee was ready to pay the money. A mere offer to pay, without present ability, constitutes no tender.

3. The contract provided no forfeiture; and, therefore, the $1000 becoming due on breach, remained due, and Peterson retained the right to enforce payment at any time. Forbearance worked no forfeiture of the right.

4. The allowance of interest from the time of offering the reconveyance, was correct.

Joseph Nowak v. The Excelsior Stone Co.—Error to Superior Court of Cook.—Opinion by SCOTT, J.

BILL OF EXCHANGE—REQUISITES—EFFECT OF ACCEPTANCE—CONSTRUCTION OF STATUTE—AMENDMENT OF COURT RECORDS.

Held, 1. That the essential requisites of a bill of exchange are, that it be drawn in the usual way, according to the custom among merchants; that it be for a specific sum; and that it be payable absolutely, and without conditions.

2. When a bill is accepted in writing, the acceptor will not afterwards be permitted to insist that there was no consideration for his acceptance; nor that he had no funds in his hands at the time of the acceptance, belonging to the drawer; nor that he was not then, and did not thereafter become, indebted to the drawee, in any manner.

3. The 9th section, ch. 98, R. S. 1874, p. 719, has no reference to bills of exchange; and therefore does not change the rules relating thereto.

4. The court may amend its records, as to mere clerical errors, on notice to the opposite party by the party applying for the amendment.

Franklin Hardaway v. Zephaniah Kelley.—Appeal from Whiteside.—Opinion by SCOTT, J.

IMPEACHING AWARD—PRESUMPTION AS TO AWARD.

Held, That, where a matter is submitted to arbitration, the law, in the absence of proof of fraud, will presume that the arbitrators considered all the evidence, and allowed such items to the respective parties as they regarded as proven. Their finding, like that of a court, must be regarded as embracing all matters submitted to them; and, unless impeached in some manner known to the law, must stand as conclusive of the rights of the parties.

Michael Byrne v. City of Chicago.—Appeal from Cook.—Opinion by BREESE, J.

NEGLIGENCE AS TO A CANAL BED.

STATEMENT.—Boat and cargo lost by striking on a rock in the bed of a canal. Averment on suit, that the rock was negligently left by the city when the canal was constructed. Defense that it was subsequently precipitated into the canal by a land-slide. Verdict for defendant. Held,

1. That where a land slide precipitates a rock into a canal, and the rock remains there undiscovered, negligence cannot be imputed, if loss thereby occurs; since the city could not reasonably be required to draw off the water periodically, in order to inspect the bed of the canal.

James Walsh v. The People.—Appeal from County Court of Cook.—Opinion by SCOTT, J.

CORRECTING ERRORS IN TAX ASSESSMENT.

Held, That under R. S. 1874, § 191, p. 889, a county court has plenary powers to correct errors in assessing taxes, and may relieve, therefore, against a mistaken double assessment, under different descriptions of land, and retain the proportion of taxes justly assessed.

Margaret Walker et al. v. Noah L. Deihl.—Appeal from County court of Winnebago.—Opinion by CRAIG, J.

SELLING LANDS OF AN ESTATE TO PAY DEBTS —PAYING CLAIM BEFORE ALLOWANCE.

Held, 1. That an administrator can only on petition and decree, obtain authority to sell lands in order to pay debts existing at the time of the decease of the intestate. He cannot subsequently contract a debt, and then obtain an order to sell lands to pay such subsequent debt, even if it be contracted in the course of settling the estate.

2. Where an administrator pays a claim before it is allowed by the court, he does so at his peril, and must take the risk of proving up the claim and getting it allowed, as any other creditor.

3. And this rule applies to taxes, insurance, and costs in ejectment suits.

SHOULD WOMEN PRACTICE LAW IN WISCONSIN?

JUSTICE RYAN'S OPINION REVIEWED.

The argument of the learned judge, in denying the application of a woman for admission to the bar of the Supreme Court of Wisconsin, resolves itself into four leading heads, as follows:

1st. That the admission of women to the bar, would "lower the standard of professional excellence.

2d. That the right of the courts to establish a bar and regulate the admission to it, is paramount to that of the legislature.

3rd. That the common law has always excluded women from the bar, and that the statute law of Wisconsin does not modify the common law in this respect.

4th. The social argument.

We will consider these in their order:

1st. That the admission of women to the bar, would "lower the standard of professional excellence."

The learned judge implies, rather than asserts this proposition, when he says: "A good bar may be said to be a necessity of a good court. This is not always understood, perhaps not fully by the bar itself. On the bench, the lesson is soon learned, that the facility and accuracy of judicial labor are largely dependent on the learning and ability of the bar. And it well becomes every court to be careful of its bar, and jealous of the rule of admission to it, with the view of fostering in it the highest order of professional excellence." Were it a fact that the mental and moral qualifications of applicants for admission to the bar of the Supreme court, were carefully investigated, and that only those of learning and ability, thorough training and staunch integrity, were admitted, all others being refused, this argument would carry more weight, as showing the intention of the court thus to elevate the standard of professional excellence. But, as a matter of fact, a refusal to admit any applicant to the bar of the Supreme court, on his exhibiting to that court a certificate of admission to the lower courts of the State, is unprecedented. And it is rarely the case that an attorney is disbarred. Be his mental qualifications never so meagre, his scholarship never so poor; though he be besotted and imbruted by the excessive use of liquor and tobacco, and though his reputation for integrity be such that he is neither respected nor trusted by any who know him, he is admitted unchallenged, and with rare exceptions, retained within that same bar which refuses the application of a woman for admission — while admitting that her mental and moral qualifications are such that no personal objection can be raised—lest the standard of professional excellence should be lowered! Most heartily do I concur with the opinion of the honorable court, as to the importance of maintaining a high standard of professional excellence. But I do not understand that the honorable court proposes to maintain such a standard by practically applying either intellectual or moral tests to applicants; but that the only test it does apply—the statute being formally complied with—is that of sex.

With all deference to the wisdom of the honorable court, I would respectfully submit that the only method of attaining the highest intellectual and moral standard within the bar, is by admitting to its ranks all classes of mature citizens possessing suitable mental, educational and moral qualifications. The freest and fullest competition is necessary in any department of industry, to the development of the highest order of talent in that department. If one-half the human race is shut out from competition, just so much mental and moral ability is excluded, and the standard is necessarily lowered.

Let the standard be placed as high as the legislative or judiciary powers shall choose—build up the barriers never so high, against ignorance, incompetence and dishonesty, and if women can not scale those heights, she will gladly stay outside; if she can, she has earned the right, and it will promote the "highest order of professional excellence," for her to be admitted.

2nd. That the right of the courts to establish a bar and regulate admission to it, is paramount to that of the legislature.

This proposition seems to be thrown out rather as a hint that the legislature has no right to provide by enactment for the admission of woman, and that the court would refuse to be bound by such enactment, should it be effected, than as an argument bearing directly on this case; for the court claims that no such legislative provision now exists. The learned judge says: "The Constitution makes no express provision for the bar. But it establishes courts, amongst which it distributes all the jurisdiction of all the courts of Westminster Hall, in equity and at common law. Putnam v. Sweet, 2 Pew., 301. And it rests in the courts all the judicial power of the State. The constitutional establishment of such courts appears to carry with it the power to establish a bar to practice in them. And admission to the bar appears to be a judicial power. It may therefore become a very grave question for adjudication here, whether the constitution does not intrust the rule of admission to the bar, as well as of expulsion from it, exclusively to the discretion of the courts." The italics are ours.

This "seems" to be the enunciation of a new doctrine. Originally at common law, parties conducted their own cases, whether civil or criminal. Attorneys were first constituted by letters patent from the king, "commanding the justices to admit the person to be an attorney to such an one." Bacon Ab. I., p. 474. Cooley's Blackstone, II., p, 24. And during the earlier history of our country, the power of appointing attorneys was exercised exclusively by the colonial governors. (See opinion of Nott, J., in refusing the application of Belva Lockwood for admission to the Court of Claims, Washington; in 6 Chicago LEGAL NEWS, 277.) The admission of attorneys was, therefore, primarily an executive function, to which the judiciary was expected to yield, and to which it did yield, implicitly. Attorneys were not admitted in any other manner than by order of the king until legislation was had upon the subject. The first such legislation was the Stat. Westm. 2, c. 10. This statute has from time to time been followed up by subsequent legislation, authorizing the courts to admit attorneys under certain prescribed rules and regulations. "In both England and this country," says Judge Nott, in the above quoted opinion, "the power of appointment was conferred upon courts by statute." The italics are ours.

Whatever power, then, the courts may have in admitting attorneys is, and ever has been such, and such only, as has been conferred upon them by statute. To this legislation, so conferring the power, and prescribing the restrictions within which they shall be exercised, the courts appear always to have yielded without objection, making rules and regulations only "in aid and furtherance of the dispositions of the legislature." Bacon Ab., p. 481. The legislatures of our several States, following the English precedent, have likewise conferred upon the courts power, under certain rules and regulations, to admit attorneys; nor does it appear that the courts have ever objected to such legislation, or claimed that the admission of attorneys was not a suitable subject of legislative enactment.

The Supreme court of Wisconsin does not appear to have questioned this right till the prospect of a possible legislative enactment admitting women to its bar prompted it to do so; nor does it prescribe any rules whatever concerning the admission of attorneys; evidently considering the legislative provisions sufficient authority for its course in admitting them in accordance with those provisions. At the time the constitution of Wisconsin was adopted, the establishment of a bar was a legislative function, and the judiciary had never possessed any power for the admission of attorneys, excepting such as had been expressly conferred upon it, either by constitutional provision, or by legislative enactment. Previously to the adoption of the State constitution, and at the time of its adoption, the Wisconsin courts admitted attorneys by authority conferred upon them by the territorial legislative assembly, and subject to its restrictions. Had the framers of the constitution intended to take this power from the legislative and confer it upon the judicial branch of the government, an unequivocal expression of that intention would have been necessary; but no such expression was made. On the contrary, the powers of the judiciary are enumerated, and that of establishing a bar is not among them. And the constitution furthermore provided that "all laws now in force in the territory of Wisconsin, which are not repugnant to this constitution, shall remain in force until they expire by their own limitation, or be altered or repealed by the legislature." Art. XIV, section 2, Const. Wis. This, of course, recognized and continued in force the territorial legislative provision for the admission of attorneys. The constitution does not forbid the legislature to establish a bar, under such regulations as it shall deem suitable. That it is competent for the egislature to exercise legislative powers not forbidden by the constitution of the United States or of the State, see 10 Wis., 195. We have already shown that the establishment of a bar was, both in England and in this country, a legislative power. Hence, the constitution authorizes the legislature to establish a bar under such rules and regulations as it shall think fit, and does not give the courts authority to over-ride such rules.

3rd. That the common law has always excluded women from the bar, and that the statute laws of Wisconsin does not modify the common law in this respect.

If the question raised by the learned judge, "whether the Constitution does not intrust the rule of admission to the bar, as well as expulsion from it, exclusively to the discretion of the courts," be answered in the affirmative, as he strongly intimates that it should be, it is quite unnecessary to review the question of common or statutory law, in this connection. And here it may be observed that, while the court does not adopt this principle of the paramount authority of the judiciary in deciding what classes of persons shall be admitted to the bar, for the purpose of surmounting any supposed legal impediment to the admsision of women; and while it bases its refusal mainly on such alleged legal impediments, it nevertheless strongly intimates that should the legislature remove those impediments, the court would then, for the sole purpose of excluding women, decide that the legislature has no right to control the judiciary in this matter. In other words, the court refuses admission to woman on the ground that no statute exists, authorizing her admission, and in the same argument strongly intimates that, should such a statute be passed, it would still refuse her, on the ground that the admission of attorneys is a judicial, and not a legislative function.

"The common law has always excluded women from the bar, ever since courts have administered the common law," says the learned judge. This is the commonly received doctrine, but is it correct? Common law consists in immemorial usage, and is defined in the decisions of the courts, and in some declaratory statutes. Has immemorial usage "always," or ever, "excluded woman from the bar?" Never; because until within a few years, in America, women have never applied for admission; and now, when they have applied, under statutes making no express provision for the admission of woman, the weight of authority is in favor of their admission. That by "immemorial usage," women have not studied law, and applied for admission to practice, makes no common law against their admission. As well might it be claimed that, because formerly, women did not receive a collegiate education, such an education for them is contrary to common law; or that because, formerly, women did not become editors, or authors, or type-setters, that it is now contrary to common law for them to become such. It does not appear that the English courts, in either ancient or modern times, have ever had an opportunity to "exclude" woman from admission to the bar by a judicial decision, for the very good reason that she has never applied; and if there is no precedent in English practice, for her admission, neither is there any precedent against it, and it may as well be claimed that the courts favor her admission, as that they oppose it, so far as the question of precedent is concerned.

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

ABSTRACT OF OPINIONS FILED AT OTTAWA IN 1876.

Peter D. Hawver v. Henrietta Hawver.—Appeal from McHenry.—Opinion by SCOTT, J.

JUSTIFICATION IN SLANDER—HUSBAND AND WIFE TESTIFYING.

STATEMENT.—Suit for slander. The wife of defendant was excluded as an incompetent witness, but the husband of the plaintiff was admitted. There was a plea of justification in the case, Held,

1. That where a defendant, in an action for slander, fails to establish a plea of justification by the proof in preponderance, this failure is not, of itself, a conclusive evidence of malice. It is sufficient if he believed the charge was true, although he may have been unable to prove it.

2. The wife of the defendant is an incompetent witness in such case.

3. But the husband of the plaintiff may testify, because the right of action is property; and being the separate property of the wife, it is the exact case specified in the statute, where the husband and wife may testify for and against each other the same as other parties.

4. Another exception in the statute is, in cases where the wife, if unmarried, would be plaintiff, or defendant. And so, where the wife is entitled to bring suit in her own name as though she were unmarried.

[NOTE.—The present statute provides that a married woman may, in all cases, wherein she has a cause of action, sue without her husband; and otherwise, where a cause of action is against her, she may be sued without her husband. —W.]

Bolivar Blood v. Charlotte A. Barnes.—Appeal from Knox. — Opinion by BREESE, J.

SEPARATE PROPERTY OF MARRIED WOMEN—USE BY HUSBAND.

STATEMENT.—Appellant was a constable, and seized on types and materials in the office of "The Galesburg Free Press," under an execution he held; the articles being taken as the property of appellee's husband. She brought replevin, and recovered the property. To prove property in the husband, the fact was relied on that he used the types, etc., in order to earn a living for his family. Held,

That such use and control of the wife's property, even with her consent, does not render it liable for his debts, unless in case of divorce a mensa et thoro, in which the wife sets up a separate domestic establishment, entirely apart from the husband.

American Merchants' Union Express Co v. Isaac M. Wolf et al.—Appeal from Cook.—Opinion by CRAIG, J.

LIABILITIES OF AN EXPRESS COMPANY AS DISTINGUISHED FROM THOSE OF A RAILROAD COMPANY.

STATEMENT.—A lot of uniforms for a political campaign was shipped, through appeliant. The consignee, not having the money from the political club for whom they had been ordered, refused to take them. They were not taken at all; and the company failed to notify the consignor until the campaign was about over, and the goods were worthless. The package was marked C. O. D. Held,

1. The ordinary rules of railroad liabilities do not strictly apply to express companies. When goods are shipped by railroads, the railroad company may store the goods in a safe warehouse, to be held for the consignee, when he may call for them, and, ordinarily, no notice is required to be given either to consignor or consignee. But the further duty is enjoined upon an express company to deliver the goods at the residence or place of business of the consignee; and also, sometimes, the further duty of making collection of the price of the goods, and returning the money to the consignor.

2. Where goods are sent C. O. D., and are not taken by the consignee on presentation, it is the duty of the express company to notify the consignor at once, or in a reasonable time. And it is liable for damages in failing so to do.

William E. Hale et al. v. John Johnson. —Appeal from Cook. — Opinion by SHELDON, J.

PRIVATE NEGLIGENCE — CONTRACTORS OR SERVANTS—LIABILITY.

STATEMENT.—Appellee was a day-laborer, and, in excavating for the foundation of a building, was injured by the falling of a wall, so that he lost his arm. Judgment below was rendered against the appellants, contractors, and also against the owner, who had employed them to erect the house.

SHOULD A WOMAN LAWYER WEAR HER HAT IN COURT?

Chicago, Illinois, March 21, 1876.

EDITOR OF THE LEGAL NEWS:

Being in favor of complete legal and political equality of the sexes, I have been most deeply gratified to see my adopted State throw open to woman the doors of the legal profession, and have been no less keenly gratified to see the wisdom of that measure confirmed by the promptness with which several young ladies of acknowledged capability and irreproachable character have embraced the opportunity for honorable labor thus afforded them, and by the easy dignity and modest ability with which they discharge their duties. But I beg leave to propound, through the medium of your paper, which cannot be less friendly to the lady lawyer than to the law, a question to the bench and the bar, and especially to the lady members of the latter, concerning court-room etiquette. Would it not be more in keeping with their new office if they, the lady lawyers, would remove their hats, and address the court with head uncovered, as the gentlemen members of the bar are compelled to do? Are there not good reasons for such equality?

Yours very respectfully,

E. QUALITY.

Chicago, February 25th, A. D. 1876.

21-28 MILES ALMY, Executor

TRUSTEE'S SALE.—WHEREAS, DANIEL T. NELson, by his certain deed of trust, duly executed, bearing date the twenty-fourth day of November, A. D. 1874, and filed for record in the recorder's office of Cook county, Illinois, on the second day of January, A. D. 1875, and recorded in book 393 of records, at page 437, conveyed to Oscar F. Avery, of Chicago, Illinois, as trustee, all the premises situate in the city of Chicago, in the county of Cook, and State of Illinois, and known and described as follows, to wit: Lot three (3) in the subdivision of block seventy-eight (78), in the Canal Trustees' subdivision of the west half of section twenty-seven (27), township thirty-nine (39), north, range fourteen, east of the third principal meridian, in trust, to secure the payment of three principal promissory notes, bearing even date with said trust deed, made by the said Daniel T. Nelson, and payable to the order of Mary A. Merriman, at the Merchants National Bank of Chicago, Illinois, with interest as the rate of eight per cent. per annum, from the date thereof, payable half-yearly; one of said principal notes (numbered 1) being for the sum of one thousand dollars, and payable one year after the date thereof, the interest installments thereon for said one year being further evidenced by two interest notes or coupons, of forty dollars each; another of said principal notes (numbered 2), being for the sum of one thousand dollars, and payable two years after the date thereof, the interest installments thereon for said two years, being further evidenced by four interest notes or coupons, each for the sum of forty dollars; and the other of said principal notes being for the sum of twelve hundred dollars, and payable three years after the date thereof, the interest installments thereon for said three years being further evidenced by six interest notes or coupons, each for the sum of forty-eight dollars, all of said principal notes and the said interest notes or coupons, respectively, drawing interest, after maturity, at the rate of ten per cent. per annum, said principal notes amounting in the aggregate, to the sum of three thousand two hundred dollars, the same being the amount of the unpaid purchase money for said premises at the date of said notes, and said trust deed securing the same.

And whereas said deed of trust provides, that in case of default in the payment of the said promissory notes, or either of them, principal or interest, or any part thereof, then, on the application of the legal holders of said principal notes, or either of them, it should be lawful for the said trustee, his heirs, assigns, or successors in trust, to sell the said premises, and all the right, and equity of redemption of the said Daniel T. Nelson, his heirs and assigns therein, at public vendue, at a door of such building as shall then be used as the court house of the county of Cook, in the city of Chicago, Illinois, or upon said premises, to the highest bidder, for cash, having first given notice of such sale, in a newspaper published in the county where the said premises are situate, twenty days before such sale, and to execute and deliver to the purchaser or purchasers at said sale, a deed or deeds of conveyance in fee of the premises sold; and that it should not be obligatory upon the purchaser at said sale, to see to the application of the purchase money.

And whereas it was in and by said deed of trust stipulated and agreed, that in case of default in any of said payments of principal or interest, or of a breach of any of the covenants or agreements therein, then and in that case the whole of said principal sum secured by said deed of trust, and the interest to the time of sale, according to the tenor and effect of said indebtedness, should and might become due and payable, and the said premises be sold in like manner and with the same effect as if the said indebtedness had matured.

And whereas default was made in the payment of said principal note (numbered 1) due and payable one year after the date thereof, and also in the payment of the respective interest installments due and payable on May 24th, 1875, and November 24th, 1875, on all of said principal notes—no part of said principal notes or any installment of interest thereon having been paid—and by reason of such default, the said Mary A. Merriman, the legal holder of all of said notes, has elected and declared the whole of the principal sum secured by said deed of trust to be due and payable, and has applied to the undersigned (the trustee in said trust deed named) to advertise and sell the said premises for the purpose and in the manner provided in said trust deed.

Now, therefore, public notice is hereby given that I, the undersigned Oscar F. Avery, the trustee named in said deed of trust, in pursuance of said application, and under the powers and for the purposes expressed in said trust deed, will, on Wednesday, the nineteenth day of April, A. D. 1876, at the hour of ten o'clock in the forenoon of that day, at the most westerly door of the two north doors of the building standing on the southeast corner of LaSalle and Adams streets, in the said city of Chicago, and at the date of said trust deed, and now, used as the court-house of the said county of Cook, in the State of Illinois, sell at public vendue to the highest bidder for cash, the premises above and in the said trust deed described, and all the right and equity of redemption of the said Daniel T. Nelson, his heirs and assigns therein.

Chicago, March 11, 1876.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT, NORTHERN District of Illinois. Wednesday, March 15, A. D. 1876.—Present, Hon. Henry W. Blodgett, District Judge. Wilder Bush vs. John J. McKinnon, et al.—In Chancery.

It appearing to the court, upon affidavit filed in said cause, that Aaron B. Gifford, Mary W. Gifford, Susan B. Gifford, John D. Gifford, Albert Crosby and —— Crosby, his wife, six of the defendants named in the above entitled cause, are non-residents of the said Northern District of Illinois, and that their respective place of residence is unknown, and that personal service cannot be had on said defendants, or either of them, and that neither of said defendants have voluntarily appeared in said cause, and it further appearing that this suit affects the title to real estate situate within this district, now, on motion of Grinnell and Marsh, it is ordered by the court that said defendants, Aaron B. Gifford, Mary W. Gifford, Susan B. Gifford, John D. Gifford, Albert Crosby and —— Crosby, his wife, appear, plead, answer or demur in above entitled cause on or before the first Monday of May, A. D. 1876, and it is further ordered that a certified copy of this order be served upon each of said absent defendants, if practicable, on or before the tenth day of April, A. D. 1876, and that this order be published in the Chicago Legal News, once a week for six successive weeks, before said first Monday of May A. D. 1876.

Northern District of Illinois, ss.—I, William H. Bradley, Clerk of the Circuit Court of the United States for said Northern District of Illinois, do hereby certify the above and foregoing to be a true and correct copy of the order entered of record in said court on the 15th day of March, A. D. 1876, in the cause wherein Wilder Bush is the complainant, and John J. McKinnon et al., are the defendants, as the same appears from the original thereof now remaining in my custody and control.

In testimony whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the seal of said court, at my office in Chicago, in said District, this 17th day of March A. D. 1876.

The Courts.

UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT.

No. 866.—OPINION FILED FEB. 21, 1876.

EDWIN M. LEWIS, Trustee of Jay COOK & Co., Bankrupts, Appellants, v. THE UNITED STATES.

Appeal from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania.

BANKRUPTCY—EFFECT OF—STATUTE GIVING PRIORITY TO CLAIM OF THE UNITED STATES CONSTRUED.

1. On the 26th of Nov., 1873, all the persons composing the firm of Jay Cooke & Co. were adjudicated bankrupts, and this adjudication remains in full force. This includes the seven American members in the house of Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co. The other three partners of this latter firm are not bankrupt. Under the proceedings in bankruptcy, the defendant Lewis was appointed trustee of the estates of the bankrupts of the firm of Jay Cooke & Co., and as such received and held their several separate individual estates and assets and the estates and assets of the firm as well. The estates of the bankrupts are insufficient to pay all their indebtedness. Held, that the United States, under the statutes, are entitled to priority of payment of their debt mentioned in the opinion, out of the separate estates of such members of the firm of Jay Cooke & Co., as were also members of the debtor firm of Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co., and this proceeding was properly instituted to enforce it.

2. CLAIMS OF THE UNITED STATES. — That all claims of the United States are embraced by the statute, and the form of the indebtedness is immaterial. The debtors may be joint or several, and principals or sureties.

3. UNITED STATES NOT BOUND BY ACT.—That the United States are not bound by the Bankrupt Act; that the claim of the United States was not proved in the bankruptcy proceedings in question is therefore immaterial in this case.

4. DISSOLUTION OF FIRM.—That the bankruptcy of the American partners dissolved the firm of Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co., not only as to themselves, but also, inter sese, as to the solvent partners, and the United States were under no obligations to pursue the partnership effects of Cooke, McCulloch & Co., before filing the bill in this case.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

Mr. Justice SWAYNE delivered the opinion of the court.

This case turns upon legal propositions. There is no controversy about the facts. Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co., bankers, of London, were appointed by the United States disbursing agents for the Navy Department. On the 19th of October, 1873, they were indebted to the department, for the balance of moneys placed in their hands for disbursement, in the sum of £131,610 9*s.* 8*d.* On or about the 20th of September, 1873, when the amount due to the department was considerably larger than that mentioned, the company placed in the hands of the United States or their agents a large amount of collaterals for the security of the debt. The United States claim the right to apply the proceeds of these collaterals to the payment of another and later debt arising in the same way. Irrespective of the collaterals, the amount first mentioned, with interest, is still due and unpaid.

The firm Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co. consisted of Hugh McCulloch, J. H. Puleston, and Frank H. Evans, residents of Great Britain, and of Jay Cooke, Wm. G. Moorehead, H. C. Fahnestock, H. D. Cooke, Pitt Cooke, George C. Thomas, and Jay Cooke, junior, residents of the United States. For a long period previous to the time first mentioned there was a banking-house in Philadelphia under the name of Jay Cooke & Co. The members of that firm were the seven American partners in the house of Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co., and James A. Garland. On the 26th of November, 1873, all the persons composing the firm of Jay Cooke & Co. were adjudicated bankrupts, and this adjudication remains in full force. This included the seven American members in the house of Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co. The other three partners of this latter firm are not bankrupt. Under the proceedings in bankruptcy the defendant, Lewis, has been appointed trustee of the estates of the bankrupts of the firm of Jay Cooke & Co., and as such received and holds their several separate individual estates and assets, and the estates and assets of the firm as well. The estates of these bankrupts are insufficient to pay all their indebtedness. The United States, under the statutes in such case provided, claim priority of payment of their debt before mentioned out of the separate estates of such members of the firm of Jay Cooke & Co. as were also members of the debtor firm of Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co. The trustee denies the validity of this demand. The United States have instituted this proceeding to enforce it.

On the 10th of April, 1875, there was already accumulated in the hands of the trustee of the funds so claimed by the United States the sum $267,844.80.

The bankrupt act of March 2, 1867, declares that, in the order for a dividend, "the following claims shall be entitled to priority or preference, and to be first paid in full in the following order:

"First. Fees, costs, and expenses of suits and of the several proceedings under this act, and for the custody of property, as herein provided.

"Second. All debts due to the United States, and all taxes and assessment under the law thereof."

The fifth section of the act of March 3, 1797, 1 Stat., 515 enacts:

"That where any revenue officer or other person hereafter becoming indebted to the United States, by bond or otherwise, shall become insolvent, or where the estate of any deceased debtor in the hands of executors or administrators shall be insufficient to pay all the debts due from the deceased, the debt due to the United States shall be first satisfied, and the priority hereby established shall be deemed to extend as well to cases in which a debtor, not having sufficient property to pay all his debts, shall make a voluntary assignment thereof, or in which the estate and effects of an absconding, concealed, or absent debtor shall be attached by process of law, as to the cases in which a legal act of bankruptcy shall be committed."

It may be well to pause here, and carefully analyze this section and consider the particulars of the category it defines, so far as its provisions apply to the case in hand.

Those affected are persons "indebted to the United States."

This language is general, and it is without qualification.

The form of the indebtedness is immaterial.

It may be by simple contract, specialty, judgment, decree, or otherwise by record. The debt may be legal or equitable, and have been incurred in this country or abroad. A valid indebtedness is as effectual in one form as another. No discrimination is made by the statute.

The debtors may be joint or several, and principles or sureties

Here again, no distinction is made by the statute. All are included.—Beaston v. The Bank of Delaware, 12 Pet., 134; U. S. v. Fisher, 2 Cr., 358.

There must be a bankruptcy or else insolvency, as the latter is defined by the statute and the authorities upon the subject.

As bankruptcy exists here, we need not look beyond that point in this case. Congress had power to pass the act.—2 Cr., 396.

Where the language of a statute is transparent and its meaning clear, there is no room for the office of construction. There should be no construction where there is nothing to construe.—U. S. v. Wiltberger, 5 Wheat., 95; Cherokee Tobacco, 11 Wall., 621.

That the facts disclosed in the record bring the case within the plain terms and meaning of the section in question, seems to us, viewing the subject from our stand-point, almost too clear to admit of serious controversy. Affirmative discussion, under such circumstances, is not unlike argument in support of a self-evident truth. The logic may mislead or confuse. It cannot strengthen the pre-existing conviction.—11 Wall., 621.

The statute must prevail, unless its effect shall be overcome by the considerations to which our attention has been called by the learned counsel for the appellant. They have argued their contentions with a wealth of learning and ability commensurate with the importance of the case.

We shall respond to their propositions without re-stating them.

The United States are in no wise bound by the bankrupt act. The clause above quoted is in pari materia with the several acts giving priority of payment to the United States, and was doubtless put in to recognize and re-affirm the rights which those statutes give, and to exclude the possibility of a different conclusion. That the claim of the United States was not proved in the bankruptcy proceedings in question, is therefore, quite immaterial in this case.—U. S. v. Herron, 20 Wall., 215; Harrison v. Sterry, 5 Cr., 289.

The case presented is that of a trust fund, a trustee holding, and a cestui que trust, claiming it. This gave the Circuit court original and plenary jurisdiction. That the fund arose and the trustee was appointed under the bankrupt act, did not affect the right of the United States to pursue both by the exercise of the jurisdiction invoked. The same remedies are applicable as if the fund had arisen and the trustee had been appointed in any other way.—12 Pet., supra; Thomson v. Smith, 2 Wheat., 425.

The United States were under no obligation to pursue the partnership effects of Cooke, McCulloch & Co., before filing this bill. The bankruptcy of the American partners dissolved the firm of Cooke, McCullock & Co., not only as to themselves, but, also, inter sese, as to the solvent partners. In analogy, to the proceeding at law, where there are joint debtors, and one is beyond the reach of the process of the court, and equity has jurisdiction, a decree may be taken against the other for the whole amount due.—Darwent v. Walton, 2 Atkyns, 510. In Nelson v. Hill, 5 How., 127, this court held that the creditor of a partnership may proceed at law against the surviving partner, or go in the first instance into equity against the representatives of the deceased partner, and that it was not necessary for him to exhaust his remedy at law against the surviving partner, before proceeding in equity against the estate of the deceased. The solvency of the surviving partner is immaterial. To the same effect are Thorpe v. Jackson, 2 Young & Collier Exch., 553; and Wilkinson v. Henderson, 1st Mylne & K., 582; Exparte Clegg, 2 Cox's Cases, 372; Camp v. Grant, 21 Conn., 41. A court of equity will not entertain the question of marshaling assets unless both funds are within the jurisdiction and control of the court.—Adams Equity, 6 Amer. Ed., 548, note; Denham v. Williams, 39 Georg'a, 312; see, also, Walker v. Covar, 2 South Car., N. S., 16; Dodds v. Snyder, 34 Ill., 53; Herriman v. Skillman, 33 Barb., 378; Shunk's Appeal, 2 Barr., 304; Coates' Appeal, 7 Watts & S., 99; Keyner v. Keyner, 6 Watts, 221. If a judgment at law be recovered against a co-partnership, the separate property of each partner is alike liable to execution with the property of the partnership, and equity will not interfere unless there are cogent special circumstances, such as have no existence here.—Meech v. Allen, 17 N Y., 300. These authorities are conclusive on the point under consideration. If there could otherwise be a doubt upon the subject, it is removed by the two statutes. The bankrupt law declares that the United States shall be first paid; the fifth section of the statute of 1797 enacts that where there is a debt and bankruptcy, they shall have priority of payment. Neither statute contains any qualification, and we can interpolate none. Our duty is to execute the law as we find it, not to make it. It would be a singular equity which would drive the appellees "beyond sea" to carry though a litigation of uncertain duration and results against parties there, before they can be permitted to proceed against the parties and property here.

It is a settled principle of equity that a creditor holding collaterals is not bound to apply them before enforcing his direct remedies against the debtor.—Kellock's Case, 3 Chy. Appeals, 769; Bonser v. Cox, 6 Beav., 84; Tuckley v. Thompson, 1 Johnson & Hemming's Chy. R., 126; Lord v. The Ocean Bank, 20 Penn., 384; Neff's Appeal, 9 Id., 36. This is admitted, but it is insisted there are special considerations here which ought to take the case out of the general rule. We think those considerations are all of the opposite tendency. One of them is found in the character and circumstances of a large portion of the collateral assets. The facts are set forth in the answer of the United States to the cross-bill of the appellant, and need not be more particularly adverted to. Another of these considerations applies to all the collaterals and is conclusive. There are parties entitled to be heard touching the application of the proceeds who were not, and could not be, brought before the Circuit court. According to the best considered adjudications, no burden touching these assets can be made to rest upon the United States, which they are not willing to assume. Doubtless questions will arise involving much delay before the administration of the fund is completed. In the meantime the United States can not be barred from enforcing any remedy to which they are entitled.

The court below committed no error in holding that the preference of the United States as a creditor of Cooke, McCulloch & Co., applied to the separate and individual estates of the bankrupt partners, thus superseding the rule in equity recognized by the bankrupt act—that partnership property is to be first applied in payment of the partnership debts, and individual property in payment of the individual debts. It is sufficient to say upon this subject that the learned and elaborate argument of the appellant's counsel in support of the opposite view overlooks the true meaning and effect of the statutes. The bankrupt parties in question were indebted to the United States, and they had separate estates. This entitled the United States to the preference claimed. One of the obvious purposes of the fifth section of the act of 1797 was to abrogate the rule insisted upon, and it has clearly done so. The provisions of the bankrupt act relied upon do not, as we have shown, affect the United States. The legal relations of those parties to the United States, in this controversy, are just what they would have been if those parties were individual debtors to the United States, and the firm of Cooke, McCulloch & Co. had never existed.

The separate and individual interest of the several partners in the partnership property of Jay Cooke & Co. can be only the share of each one of what may be left after discharging all the liabilities of the copartnership. This will be nothing, the firm being in bankruptcy and conceded to be hopelessly insolvent. The United States can, therefore, have no interest with respect to the administration of its affairs. Any rights as to the collaterals held by the United States, claimed by others must be settled outside of the present proceeding They cannot be adjudicated upon in this case.

The decree of the Circuit court is affirmed.

UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT.

No. 869 —OPINION FILED FEB. 21, 1876.

SAMUEL B. LOWER, the Supervisor, ALLEN S. WALTERS, the Town Clerk, and SAMUEL B. LOWER and PERRY F. REMSBURG, the Justices of the Peace of the Town of Ohio, in the County of Bureau and State of Illinois, Plaintiffs in Error,

v.

Uinted States of America, on the relation of George O. Marcy, Defendant in Error.

In error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Illinois.

MANDAMUS—POWER OF COURT TO COMPEL TOWN AUDITORS TO ALLOW A JUDGMENT —TAX LEVY—THE GRAB LAW.

1. That the answer in this case presents no defense to the collection of the judgment in the manner sought by the petition. The judgment was rendered upon certain coupon notes of the town of Ohio, and the object of the petition is to compel the plaintiffs in error, as town auditors, to audit it, so that it can be placed in process of collection in accordance with the Illinois township law.

2. THE ILLINOIS GRAB LAW.—That there is nothing in the point made by the plaintiffs in error that the judgments like the one in question can only be collected through the mode pointed out out in the funding act of 1869.

3. WHAT THE ACT DID.—That the State only assumed the character of a custodian of the money which reached the treasury. The act did not profess to change the terms of the securities, nor exempt the municipality from the obligation to pay them. They were, it is true, registered in the office of the auditor of public accounts and payable at the treasury of the State, but the holder was not required to resort only there for payment.

4. AUDITORS MAY BE COMPELLED TO ALLOW IT.—That this judgment does not differ from one obtained against the town for ordinary charges. Auditing it so that provision may be made for its payment by taxation is a mere ministerial act not involving the exercise of official discretion, the performance of which can be coerced by mandamus.

5. THE JUDGMENT.—The court below commanded the auditors to meet forthwith and audit the judgment. The order is so modified as to direct the board to assemble at its next regular semi-annual meeting and allow said judgment.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

Mr. Justice DAVIS delivered the opinion of the court.

The answer in this case presents no defense to the collection of the judgment in the manner sought by the petition. The judgment was rendered upon certain coupon notes of the town of Ohio, a municipal corporation of Bureau county, and the object of the petition is to compel the plaintiffs in error, as town auditors, to audit it, so that it can be placed in process of collection in accordance with the Illinois township law. This law provides specifically for the auditing of town charges, among which judgments are included, and for the levy of taxes to pay them, (Revised Statutes of Illinois, 1874, p. 1080,) but the plaintiffs in error say that judgments like the one in question can only be collected through the mode pointed out in the funding act of April 16, 1869.—(Id., p. 791 et seq.)

If this were so, the relator would be placed in an unfortunate predicament, as he could not resort to local taxation to collect his judgment, nor oblige the State to pay it.

The funding act, originating in the necessities of the indebted municipalities of the State, proposed a mode to help them, by the collection and disbursement of a State tax levied within their respective limits, but the State expressly disclaimed all liability on account of their indebtedness, and only assumed the character of a custodian of the money which reached the treasury. The act did not profess to change the terms of the securities, nor exempt the municipality from the obligation to pay them. They were, it is true, registered in the office of the auditor of public accounts, and payable at the treasury of the State, but the holder was not required to resort only there for payment. This means might fail, but, whether it did or not, his right secured in the instrument of holding the municipality liable for the debt was not thereby impaired. This is especially true when the coupons have been merged in a judgment, for there is no provision in the funding act to pay it. Even if it could be paid from the taxes levied by the State auditor, the remedy invoked by the relator is not taken away. It would be singular if it were, when the town owes the debt and the judgment so declares. The statute (Id., p. 691) provides "that the writ of mandamus shall not be denied because the petitioner may have another specific legal remedy, when such writ will afford a proper and sufficient remedy." Under it the inquiry whether there is even a better remedy than the one asked for does not arise. It is enough to know that the writ is an appropriate and efficient remedy to compel town auditors to audit a charge against the town when their action is necessary to determine the amount of money to be raised by taxation. In Illinois an ordinary execution does not issue on such a judgment, but the corporate authorities, on refusal to pay, can be required to levy a tax for the purpose when the board of auditors have certified that the charge against the town is a proper one. The relator took the necessary steps to have this certificate made, but the plaintiffs in error only allowed a small portion of the balance due on the judgment, without any legal excuse for not auditing the residue. They admit in their answer the existence of the judgment and the amount due thereon, and are not at liberty to question the liability of the town to pay it. It does not differ, so far as they are concerned, from one obtained against the town for ordinary charges. Auditing it, so that provision may be made for its payment by taxation, is a mere ministerial act not involving the exercise of official discretion, the performance of which can be coerced by mandamus. It was rendered by a court having jurisdiction of the parties and the subject-matter. and there is no controversy as to the amount due the relator.

The circuit court in this case commanded the auditors to meet forthwith and audit the judgment.

Although we are not prepared to say the court exceeded its power in this particular, yet we are of the opinion that the carrying out this order might lead to embarrassments, and that it were better it should be modified. The statute requires that the board of auditors shall meet semi-annually, to examine and audit town charges. It is made their duty to cause a certificate of their proceedings to be filed with the town clerk, for the purpose of having the same certified to the clerk of the county, in order that the amount certified may be by him levied and collected by taxation in the manner prescribed by the revenue laws of the State.

If the clerk should be advised that he was not authorized to extend a tax for the collection of this judgment, on a certificate of the auditors made at an irregular meeting, the relator would be still further delayed, as the writ in this case operates on the auditors and not on the clerk. In order to avoid the delay, if nothing more, which would occur if such a question were raised, it is advisable that the auditors be required to meet at a time authorized by the statute.

The judgment of the circuit court will, therefore, be modified, so as to direct the board to assemble at their next regular semi-annual meeting and allow said judgment.

We are indebted to the law firm of Pearre & McIlduff, of Dwight, Illinois, for the following opinion:

SUPREME COURT OF MISSOURI.

January Term, 1876.

The Metropolitan Bank v. Lucy G. Taylor et al.

Appeal from St. Louis Circuit.

MARRIED WOMAN'S NOTE—CHARGING HER SEPARATE ESTATE—WHAT QUESTIONS WILL BE CONSIDERED ON SECOND WRIT OF ERROR.

1. What Will be Considered on Second Writ of Error.—That when a case has been decided upon argument in the Supreme Court, and comes again before the same court on appeal or writ of error, only such questions will generally be noticed as were not determined in the previous decision; whatever was passed upon must be regarded as res adjudicata.

2. Married Woman's Note—Charging Separate Estate.—That a married woman is incapable of making a contract except in regard to her separate property, but in reference to that she is treated as a femme sole, and if she gives a note, the law implies, in the absence of proof to the contrary, that she intends to bond her separate estate. It may appear that there was no intention to bind the separate estate, but the intention must be manifested from the contract itself and cannot be shown by parol testimony.—[Ed. Legal News.]

Wagner, J.—This was a suit brought for the purpose of charging the separate estate of the defendant, Lucy G. Taylor, with the payment of a promissory note which she signed in conjunction with her husband. This case has been once before in this court [53 Mo., 444] and it was then held that the property now sought to be charged was the separate estate of the defendant, and as such liable for the debt. After the case was remanded here, it was again tried in the circuit court, and a judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff, subjecting the property specifically to the satisfaction of the demand.

At the trial the defendant admitted that she signed the note, and testified that it was done at the request of her husband; and that she received no part of the consideration and did not know for what purpose the note was made. She was then asked what connection the note had with her separate estate, but the question was objected to by the plaintiff and the objection was sustained. She was also asked if she knew that she had a separate estate, but this question was ruled out. The further inquiry was put whether by signing the note she intended to bind her separate estate; but the court excluded the question.

The point is presented now that was raised when the case was here before, that Mrs. Taylor had no separate estate, but this question was ruled against her in our former decision, and it must be considered as settled.

When the case of Roberts v. Cooper, 20 How., 467, was before the supreme court of the United States the second time, after it had been tried in the circuit court on the principles established by the supreme court in the first trial, it was decided that the court could not be compelled on a second writ of error in the same case to review their decision on the first; that after a case had been brought there and decided, and a mandate issued to the court below, if a second writ of error was sued out it brought up for review nothing but the proceedings subsequent to the mandate; that none of the questions which were before the court on the first writ of error could be re-heard or examined upon the second, and to allow a second writ of error or appeal to a court of last resort on the same questions which were open to dispute in the first, would lead to endless litigation; for there would be no end to a suit if every litigant could by repeated appeals compel a court to listen to criticisms on their opinions, or speculate on chances from changes in its members.

This doctrine has been approved and followed in this court, Chambers v. Smith, 30 Mo., 156; Overall v. Ellis, 38 Mo., 209. When a case has been decided upon solemn argument in this court, and again comes here on appeal or by writ of error, only such questions will generally be noticed as were not determined in the previous decision, whatever was passed upon must be regarded as res adjudicata.

We must, therefore, under the circumstances of this case, decline any further consideration of the character of the estate which was vested in the defendant.

The law in reference to married women binding their separate estates has been so long established in this State that it has become a rule of property and cannot now be shaken. It may be that their estates would be better protected, and that the policy of the law would be more fully carried out, if in all cases where the married woman was surety for another, or she made the contract for mere accommodation, no liability should be enforced against the estate, unless by an express instrument she made the debt a charge upon it.

But too many interests have grown up on the strength of a contrary rule to permit us now to change it. If a change is desirable it should not be made by the courts, but by the legislature, where its operations will be prospective, and cannot interfere with previous transactions which were had on the faith of our former decisions. A married woman is incapable of making a contract except in regard to her separate property. But in reference to that she is treated as a femme sole, and if she gives a note the law implies, In the absence of proof to the contrary, that she intends to bind it. It may appear that there was no intention to bind the separate estate, but the intention must be manifested from the contract itself, and cannot be shown by parol testimony. The intent that the separate property should not be bound, to be of any importance, should be a part of the contract; that is to say, that the writing or contract should show on its face, when properly interpreted, that no charge upon the separate estate was intended to be created. Kinun v. Weippert, 46 Mo., 532.

The court, therefore, did not err in ruling out the testimony which was offered for the purpose of showing that the defendant signed the note with an intention different from that implied by law. As the defendant, when she signed the note, possessed separate property, the law presumes that she intended to render that property liable for the satisfaction of the obligation, and as nothing different appears from the contract itself, the judgment should be affirmed.

All the judges concur, except Judge Vories, who is absent.

We have received from C. C. Bonney, of the Chicago Bar, the following opinion:

SUPREME COURT OF NEW YORK.

First Department, General Term, 1876.

John C. Fuller et al., v. Josiah D. Hunt.

FRAUDULENT CONSPIRACY TO OBTAIN POSSESSION OF PROPERTY WITHOUT PAYING FOR THE SAME.

Motion for a new trial on exceptions ordered by the Court to be heard by the General Term in the first instance.

Cyrus & N. D. Lawton and C. C. Bonney for appellants; Steel & Boyd for respondent Hunt; G. Tillotson for respondent Robinson; J. O. Robinson for respondent Bunster; S. H. Randall for respondent Richardson.

Davis, P. J.—At the close of the evidence on the part of the plaintiffs, the several defendants moved by their respective counsel for a non-suit, stating various grounds for the motion.

The Court granted the motion as to all the defendants, but without stating any grounds upon which it was granted.

The counsel for the plaintiffs duly excepted.

A careful examination of all the evidence contained in the case leaves little, and we may justly say no doubt that the plaintiffs were defrauded of the large amount of property sold and shipped by them to the defendant Richardson, and for which his acceptances were given, but dishonored. A gross deception was practiced upon the plaintiffs either by the defendant Hunt, or, through him as an innocent and deceived party, by one or more of the other defendants, by which the plaintiffs were induced to believe that the purchaser of their goods was one A. Richardson, a brewer, residing in Boston, a man of large wealth and good business reputation, and that he also had an office at 10 Barclay street, in the city of New York, and was there extensively engaged in the business of dealing in cigars.

There was, in fact, a Mr. A Richardson, of Boston, who was a man of large means and good reputation; but he was not, and never had been, engaged in business at 10 Barclay street, New York, in dealing in cigars, nor had he any connection with the concern carrying on business at that place. There was, however, one A. Richardson having an office—or, at least, a sign—at 10 Barclay street, whom the evidence tended to show to be a man of no business standing and of no means but, on the contrary, of bad business character.

Through some instrumentalities the plaintiffs were made to believe that they were dealing with Mr. Richardson of Boston, and that he was identical with the Richardson at 10 Barclay street; and a commercial directory containing the name and business standing of the former at Boston, but which contained no such name as in business at New York, was used as a basis, in part, of the deception.

The goods sold by the plaintiffs were shipped to Richardson, at 10 Barclay street, New York. They were there received by the defendant Bunster, and by him immediately sold to various persons in New York and elsewhere, at prices considerably less than the prices at which they were sold by the plaintiffs to Richardson. Bunster is shown to have had an office at 10 Barclay street, in the same room in which Richardson is claimed to have had his office; and evidence was given tending to show his knowledge of the real purchaser, Richardson, and that Bunster on several occasions, when inquired of respecting him, intimated to parties that he was a brewer doing business at Boston, and at the time when such inquiries were made that he was absent at Boston.

The defendant Robinson was shown to have forwarded the orders of Richardson or orders in his name, upon which the plaintiffs acted in shipping the goods, and in a letter, which accompanied the orders, or a portion of them, he represented in substance that Richardson was a man of responsibility and good business character, using this language: "Mr. R. is A No. 1 and good for all you can sell him."

At the time of making the sale Hunt was in the employ of the plaintiffs as their agent for the purpose of finding customers and making sales of the cigars manufactured by them at Joliet, Illinois.

As already stated the evidence shows that he was either a party to the fraud practiced upon the plaintiffs, or that he himself had been grossly deceived by some of the other parties to this action. There was some evidence tending to show that he occupied the former of these relations.

It consisted in substance in the positive character of the statements he made to the plaintiffs, as though upon his own knowledge, of the responsibility and character of Richardson, the purchaser, and of his identity with the Richardson who resided at Boston; in his haste to dispatch the goods under Richardson's orders, to the neglect of prior orders which plaintiffs had received from other purchasers, leading eventually to the interference of the plaintiffs themselves, for the purpose of fulfilling such former orders; in Hunt's insisting upon the importance to the plaintiffs of filling the orders of so valuable a customer as he represented Richardson to be, and in his leaving the employment of the plaintiffs before the expiration of his time and immediately after one of the plaintiffs had come to New York, where the true character of the transaction would be likely to be developed to him.

If Robinson, the party who forwarded the orders of Richardson, and who appears to have been a broker in this city, is not so clearly shown to have been connected with the fraud, there certainly was evidence of the character above mentioned sufficient to put him upon explanation, and in the absence of explanation, to have justified the jury in finding that he was a particeps criminis in the transaction.

As to the defendant Richardson the case as made seems to leave no doubt that he was a mere buyer in form, without credit or means, whose acceptances were of no value whatever, but were used, and were so intended, as the acceptances of a man of high standing and excellent business reputation, with whom he had neither identity nor any business connection; and the direct and unexplained connection of Bunster with the cigars when received in New York, together with his occupancy of the same office with Richardson, and his efforts to convey on several occasions the impression of Richardson's identity with the brewer in Boston, standing as they do in the case, and taken in connection with the sales made by him, and particularly those to Hill, Kirkpatrick & Co. of Philadelphia, and the letters written by him to that firm tending to show that the cigars shipped by the plaintiffs were under his control before their arrival in New York, in the absence of any explanation, would have required the jury to have found him to have been interested in and a party to the alleged frauds.

The impression upon our minds from an examination of the evidence is that Richardson was a mere willing decoy in the hands of Bunster, whose name the latter was using to get possession of the plaintiff's goods without subjecting any responsible party to liability for their payment.

Upon the whole case, as laid before the jury by the plaintiffs, had it continued—when presented to the jury—wholly unrebutted and unexplained, it would have been surprising to us had the jury failed to find all the elements of a fraudulent conspiracy consummated by successfully obtaining the possession of the property, with no intent on the part of either of the parties that the plaintiff should ever receive a dollar of its value. But it is enough to see that, in the absence of all explanation, the case made was a proper one for the consideration of the jury, whose special province it would be to pass upon the plaintiffs' allegation of fraud and conspiracy, and determine from the facts and circumstances whether they had been established against all the defendants or any of them.

It was error to take these questions from the jury, and it would have been competent for the jury to render a verdict against such of the defendants as they were satisfied were participants in the alleged frauds.

There were several exceptions taken, on the part of the plaintiffs, both to the exclusion of evidence offered by themselves and to the admission of testimony on cross-examination, some of which were, we think, well taken. But it is not important to discuss them, as the case was disposed of by a non-suit, which we find ourselves unable to uphold on the evidence which was received.

The motion for a new trial should be granted, with costs to abide the event.

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT.

ABSTRACT OF OPINIONS FILED AT OTTAWA IN 1876.

Wm. R. Raybourn v. E. J. Ramsdell.—Appeal from Warren. — Opinion by WALKER, J.

LEASE—USE AND OCCUPATION—FORFEITURE.

STATEMENT.—Lease containing conditions that a hedge should be set out on the land, etc. Breach thereof and suit. The declaration containing accounts for use and occupation. Judgment and appeal.

Held, That where a lessee enters and occupies under a lease providing for the payment of rent by making improvements, and makes default therein, the lessor, on such breach, can only exact the damage sustained thereby. A mere breach of the contract does not, of itself, work a forfeiture, and convert the tenant into one liable to pay for use and occupation, until steps are taken to terminate the lease, the lessee is to be held as holding under the lease.

J. W. Morgan et al. v. D. R. Stevens.—Appeal from Warren. — Opinion by BREESE, J.

NUNCUPATIVE WILL—PROOF.

STATEMENT.—Refusal of probate, in the county court, to a nuncupative will. Appeal to circuit court, and reversal of decision of county court. From the decision of the circuit court, contestant's appeal.

Held, 1. That the provisions of a statute as to nuncupative wills, must receive a rigid and strict construction and enforcement from the courts. Such wills are only allowed on the ground that the testator being in extremis, had not time to make a more deliberate will.

2. In the probate thereof, the testamentary capacity and the animis testandi must appear by the clearest and most incontestable proof; as also that the proof must embody the real testatory intentions of the deceased.

3. Under our statute, such a will must be proved by two or more credible witnesses, who were present at the speaking and publishing thereof, and who shall so testify; and that they heard the testator speak the said words; and that they believed him to be of sound mind and memory; and that he did, at the time, desire the persons present, or some of them, to bear witness that this was his will, or words to that effect.

Keithsburg & Eastern R. R. Co. v. H. A Henry.—Appeal from Mercer.—Opinion by WALKER, J.

COMPENSATION FOR RIGHT OF WAY—WHAT MAY BE CONSIDERED.

Held, That in estimating the damages or compensation for taking land for the construction of a railroad track, not only must the value of the land taken be estimated, but there are many other elements of damage which may be properly considered; as, for example, that it puts the land in worse shape for cultivation or pasturage; that it renders some portion of it less convenient or more dangerous for use; that there may be inconvenience or danger in crossing the road with stock to water; that it would require a person to drive the stock to and from watering, in crossing the track. Also, the danger of fire from passing engines, and all other actual inconvenience and damage the property might sustain in its use, and consequently prospective, as well as present, disadvantages.

Wm. P. Henry v. Charles Holloway.—Appeal from LaSalle. — Opinion by CRAIG, J.

BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—PRESUMPTIONS.

Held, That where a bill of exceptions does not profess to contain all the evidence introduced on the trial, the Supreme Court will presume that other testimony was heard in the court below, which was sufficient to authorize the judgment rendered.

Prucilla Richardson v. Benjamin Robinson.—Appeal from Livingston.—Opinion per curiam.

TRIAL BY COURT ALONE—JUDGMENT IN REPLEVIN.

Held, 1. That where a court tries a case without a jury, its finding will be treated as the verdict of a jury.

2. Where a judgment in replevin embraces more property than is claimed in the writ, it is fatally erroneous.

James McMillen v. Joseph Lee.—Appeal from Warren.—Opinion by SHELDON, J.

WIFE AND HUSBAND LIVING APART—NECESSARIES—PROMISE TO PAY IMPLIED.

STATEMENT.—Wife living apart from her husband by mutual consent, with a child, called in a physician to the child, which was sick. The physician sued the father for his services and recovered. The defendant appealed.

Held, 1. That where parents separate, and the father permits the mother to take a child with her, he thereby constitutes her his special agent to provide for the child, and is therefore liable for all necessaries.

2. There is no need for an express contract in such case; but a contract may be implied from the circumstances.

B. F. Sanborn et al. v. J. A. Benedict.—Appeal from Winnebago.—Opinion by BREESE, J,

CONTRACTS FOR GROWING GRAIN NOT FRAUDULENT—OFFER TO PERFORM—FUTURE DELIVERY—PROMISE FOR A PROMISE—OPTION OF BUYER TO DEMAND.

STATEMENT.—Contract to sell corn ot defendants at a definite price, at their warehouse, to be delivered ten days after notice given the seller. The corn was refused, and suit brought, in which the plaintiff recovered damages for the non-performance.

At the time of the contract ten dollars were paid, "to bind the bargain." The amount of grain was 2,000 bushels.

Held, 1. That it is not fraudulent to sell property not in present possession, and agree to deliver it in the future.

2. In a case where a large quantity of grain is contracted for, it is not necessary, in offering to perform, to convey the grain actually to the place of delivery. On account of the inconvenience of so doing, an offer is sufficient to constitute a tender, if, at the time, the grain is in possession.

3. A promise for a promise is a valid consideration.

4. As to notice to be given, the law allows a reasonable time for the buyer to exercise his option therein. And not being exercised within the reasonable time, would be a breach of the contract.

5. Growing grain may be a lawful and proper subject of sale, and a contract concerning it is not a gaming contract.

First National Bank of Chicago v. James W. Beresford.—Appeal from Cook.—Opinion by CRAIG, J.

REQUISITES OF APPEAL BY CERTIORARI—REQUISITES OF PETITION FOR THE WRIT.

STATEMENT.—Case brought by certiorari into the Circuit Court, from a justice's court, after the expiration of the time allowed for an appeal.

Held, 1. That in a case of certiorari, thus bringing up a case, the petition must show, not merely allege as a conclusion of the party, the facts prescribed by the statute.

2. A clerk of a justice of the peace is an officer unknown to the law, and if parties to a suit rely upon information obtained from such a one, they do so at their peril and the fact will avail nothing toward showing due diligence.

Niel McIntyre et al. v. Ephraim Storey.—Appeal from Carroll.—Opinion by SCOTT, J.

PROOF OF DEDICATION OF HIGHWAY.

Held, 1. That a dedication of the right of way for a highway may be variously proven. It may be established by parol or written instruments, or acts and declarations of the owner of the land. It may be inferred from long and uninterrupted use by the public, with the knowledge and consent of the owner.

2. But there must be a clear intent shown to make the dedication, or else such acts and declarations as will equitably estop the owner from denying such intent.

A. Sumner v. J. J. McFarlan.

SALE—WHEN TITLE PASSES.

1. Where property is delivered by the owner to a party seeking to purchase, upon the express agreement that no title shall pass until the price thereof is fully paid, and the price is not paid, the title does not pass, and such party can not, by a sale to one ignorant of the terms of such contract, transfer a good title as against the original owner.

John Patton v. Antoine Furthmier.

GUARDIAN AD LITEM FOR DEFENDANT, WHO IS OF AGE.

1. Where a defendant is of age and is under no legal disqualification, it is error to appoint a guardian ad litem and thus oust him from the control and management of his defense.

2. Where an action is commenced against a minor, and judgment rendered against him and without the appointment of a guardian ad litem, and without his appearance, at the trial, and thereafter, on his becoming of age, upon his petition the judgment is vacated and set aside and the case set down for trial, it is error then to appoint a guardian ad litem and permit such guardian to take charge of and control the defense, and a judgment rendered in such trial against him by his next friend and guardian ad litem will be reversed.

Andrew Pingreer, Ex'r, and Betsey P. N. Perkins v. Sarah D. P. Jones.—Appeal from Boone. — Opinion by BREESE, J.

INFLUENCE AS TO INSURANCE POLICY—COSTS IN A WILL CONTEST IN CHANCERY—DUTY OF EXECUTOR IN WILL CONTEST.

STATEMENT.—Will of the husband of Betsey Perkins (appellant) admitted to probate by the county court. Afterwards, bill brought to set aside the will, on the ground of undue influence, and insanity of the testator; and also to annul the marriage on the same grounds; and to require the widow to pay back to the estate the sum of $3,000, which, after the decease, she had received on a policy of life insurance on the life of the testator, on the ground that it was taken out under undue influence. The bill prayed an issue at law on the will and the marriage, which was granted—the verdict setting aside the will, and sustaining the marriage. New trial as to the first part of the verdict refused, and decree accordingly, also providing for the repayment of the insurance money to the estate. The decree also allowed claimant full costs, including her witness fees, with execution personally against the defendants for such costs; no part of the same to be charged against the estate. Held,

1. As to the insurance policy, that the wife had a perfect right to provide against her widowhood by inducing her husband to take out a policy, and that, as the money paid out in premiums belonged to him, he had a perfect right to take out the policy and pay the money.

2. Although a court of chancery has large discretion in the matter of costs, yet costs cannot be decreed arbitrarily; but, by a fair judicial discretion the matter is to be disposed of.

3. In a contest relating to a will, the person appointed by it is bound, by every principle of honor, justice and right to defend it. He owes it to the memory of the dead, who thus placed confidence in him during life. And, especially, where a will has been admitted to probate without opposition. To make him personally liable for costs is manifest injustice. It is a settled rule that an administrator can never be made liable for costs personally, except on proof of negligence or bad faith.

[No question was made in the Supreme court as to the finding of the jury on the will itself. The marriage, it was incidentally remarked, was evidently true and valid.]

F. F. Cole v. Joliet Opera House.—Appeal from Will.—Opinion by WALKER, J.

FRAUD AND CIRCUMVENTION—PLEADING.

STATEMENT.—Plea that the subscription given to the capital stock of the company, on which suit was brought, was obtained by fraud and circumvention; but no circumstances were set out in the plea.

Held, That, while under the plea of non est factum, a fraud that relates immediately to the giving of the instrument, as that it was misread to the signer, or his signature obtained to an instrument he did not mean to sign may be proved, yet a plea under the statute as to fraud and circumvention, must set out the facts of the fraud and circumvention in detail.

C. R. I. & P. R. R. Co. v. Myron Gore.—Appeal from LaSalle. — Opinion per curiam.

LIABILITY OF COMMON CARRIER.

Held, That to make a common carrier liable for goods lost, it must be shown that the goods actually came into the possession of the carrier, and a shipping receipt is not conclusive, but only prima facie evidence of that fact.

Napoleon Boardman v. George C. Cook, et al.—Appeal from Superior Court of Cook.—Opinion by SHELDON, J.

BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—APPLICATION TO SET ASIDE DEFAULT—AFFIDAVIT.

STATEMENT.—Pleas of appellant were stricken from the files, in the court below, and this decision was assigned for error. Held,

1. That, in such a case, the motion, and the evidence heard by the court thereon, must be set out in the bill of exceptions; or the presumption will prevail that the evidence was sufficient.

2. An application to set aside a default is addressed to the sound discretion of the court, and the exercise of this discretion will not be interfered with unless there is manifestly a gross abuse thereof.

3. On motion to set aside a default, the affidavit must not only state that defendant has a meritorious defense, but must set out the facts for the court to judge from, as to the character of the defense.

Mary Brownfield v. Mary Ann Wilson.—Appeal from Knox. — Opinion by WALKER, J.

INTERPRETATION OF WILLS.

STATEMENT.—Will of Christian Brownfield contained this clause, "I give and bequeath to my beloved wife Mary Brownfield forty acres, viz: the north forty, where the house and orchard now stand on." And this, "I give and bequeath to my heirs, [the names] to share equally and alike in my real estate, and also my personal property; the personal property to be sold after my death, and the real estate after Mary Brownfield's death." The wife was a step-mother to these heirs. A bill was brought praying the court to decree that, under these provisions, she took only a life estate. This prayer was granted, and the widow appealed. Held,

1. That wills are liberally construed, as to the terms thereof, and, as far as possible, all the provisions thereof are made effective. The question, in all cases, is, what did the testator intend?

2. A later clause in a will is held, if repugnant, to be intended to modify or abrogate the former.

3. The first clause of the will above quoted, expressed the intention to give the wife of the testator certain lands in fee; and as it is unreasonable to suppose that he instantly changed his mind, and limited, or modified that devise, in the next clause, it is to be held that the devise of the fee in the first remained unchanged by the second.

4. The requirement of the sale of the real estate, then, is to be taken to mean the real estate over and above the forty acres. Nor is that construction subverted by the fact that the real estate was to be sold after the widow's death, since there might have been good reason for this; and it is not the business of courts to inquire into reasons, but the actual intention of a testator.

5. While outward circumstances may, in cases of doubt, be resorted to, in construction, they are only aids, and cannot control. Nor can the courts even resort to declarations of a testator before or after the execution of the will to control its provisions.

6. In cases of doubt, courts should look at the fact who were the natural objects of the testator's bounty, as explaining the testator's intentions.

7. A testator may dispose of his property to whom he likes, even to the disinheriting of his own children; and the will will be enforced where the intention is manifest.

Harvey Ruth v. City of Abingdon.—Appeal from Knox.—Opinion by SHELDON, J.

EVIDENCE UNDER A CITY LIQUOR ORDINANCE —DEGREE NECESSARY TO CONVICT.

STATEMENT.—Prosecution under an ordinance against selling intoxicating drinks. Appeal to Circuit court, where this instruction was given:

"The jury are further instructed that it is not necessary in this case, to prove the defendant guilty beyond a reasonable doubt. It is sufficient to convict, if a preponderence of evidence is in favor of the plaintiff." Held,

Fatally erroneous.

Henry G. Richards v. Isaac R. Green.—Appeal from Warren.—Opinion by CRAIG, J.

ASSIGNMENT OF ERRORS—SETTING OFF HOMESTEAD—CHANGE OF VENUE.

STATEMENT. — Appellant executed a trust deed to exppellee in which his wife did not join. Appellee brought a bill making appellee and his wife defendants and praying the setting off of a homestead to them or one of them. The homestead was decreed to be in appellant's wife. This decree was reversed by the Supreme court, on the ground that the homestead should have been decreed to appellant himself. Then a decree was rendered below in conformity with this opinion, and he again appeals on the grounds that the court erred in denying the application of the conservator of the wife's estate to come in and defend, and that the rights of the wife were not determined before the final decree. Held,

1. That an appellant cannot urge errors which, if they exist at all, relate exclusively to one who is not complaining, and is not before the court.

2. Where commissioners are appointed to set off a homestead, it does not concern them as to whom the homestead is afterwards decreed.

3. A motion for a change of venue comes too late when a cause is brought to trial, and the court has intimated an opinion as to the merits of the cause.

City of Rock Island v. Sophia C. Van Landschoot.—Appeal from Rock Island.—Opinion by BREESE, J.

CITY LIABILITY FOR ACCIDENTS IN DEFECTIVE STREETS.

Held, That where it appears that a street crossing is made of rocks, etc., and that there are ruts and holes worn; but it appears, also, that the plaintiff was a married woman, riding with her husband, who was intoxicated, in a lumber wagon, with an unfastened seat, and the husband had driven over the crossing carelessly, and thrown his wife out, the city is not liable, if the husband's negligence in the matter was greater than its negligence—even where the wife sues alone for her injuries.

[Scott C. J. & Craig J. dissented; but did not state the grounds. The verdict below was for near $4000.]

Eben L. Clement v. Hannah S. Newton.—Appeal from Superior Court of Cook.—Opinion by SHELDON, J.

MECHANIC'S LIEN ON WIFE'S PROPERTY ON CONTRACT WITH HUSBAND.

Held, That, where a contract is made with a husband, for work to be done on his wife's seperate property, no mechanic's lien can be enforced, unless the husband's agency appears to have been authorized. Otherwiset, the contract will be regarded as a personal contract with him and the work to have been done upon his personal credit.

L. Taylor v. George W. Renn et al.—Appeal from Superior Court of Cook.—Opinion by BREESE, J.

QUANTUM MERUIT AS TO WORK PERFORMED.

Held, That where there is a special contract for work to be performed, and the entire work is performed, but not exactly according to the stipulations of the contract, the workman may recover on a quantum meruit, where there is any acceptance of the work by the owner of the premises on which it was done.

U. S. Life Ins. Co. v. Advance Co.—Appeal from Superior Court of Cook.—Opinion per curiam.

PRINCIPAL AND AGENT—PRESUMPTION.

STATEMENT.—Suit for a bill of advertising, made by the general agent of the appellee. There was an agreed statement of facts, in which it is said, "That it is the general custom with life insurance companies not to allow their general agents any discretion about contracting advertising bills, except as hereinafter stated; but that, in each case, they must get the consent of the company, before contracting any bill. And, further, that, in advertising, the general agents pay bills ordered by them, and settle with their companies themselves; for instance, in case of the company allowing a stipulated sum per annum towards the advertising, as is sometimes done, the agent settles the bills, and may turn the receipts into the home office, as vouchers for so much money, in their settlements with the company, to the stipulated amount. Sometimes the home office orders special advertising done through the agent, and he has it done; and sometimes it is done directly from the home office." Held,

1. That the acts of a general agent, or one whom a man puts in his place to transact all his business of a particular kind, will bind the principal, so long as the agent keeps within the scope of his authority, even when he acts contrary to his private instructions.

2. But, where a general custom exists, the presumption is that the parties were acquainted with it, and contracted with reference to it, which absolves the liability of the principal.

3. Nor is such presumption overcome by the last concession made above, in the statement of facts, in the closing sentence thereof.

Henry Harms v. John Aufield.—Appeal from Superior Court of Cook.—Opinion by SCOTT, J.

CONSIDERATION OF NOTE.

STATEMENT.—Suit on promissory notes. Plea, want of consideration; to which demurrer was sustained. The facts averred by the plea were, that the plaintiff was in possession of a certain tract of land owned by defendant, who had agreed by verbal contract, to sell and convey it to plaintiff; and the notes were given in consideration that the plaintiff should surrender the possession to the defendant, which he had acquired under that verbal contract. Also, it was averred, that the plaintiff held the possession without right; but it was confessed that the defendant, after possession taken, had accepted from plaintiff a partial payment on the purchase money. Held,

That a mere naked possession may be a sufficient consideration for notes given to buy off the possessor rather than lttigate a controversy concerning it.

H. C. Thomas v. S. C. Hinsdale et al.—Appeal from Superior Court of Cook.—Opinion by BREESE, J.

ATTACHMENT—TRESPASS THEREIN—ELECTION OF ACTION FOR WRONGFUL LEVY—WAIVER.

STATEMENT.—Trespass against magistrate, special constable and party for the wrongful issuing and service of an attachment writ. The defendant appeared before the magistrate, moved for and obtained a change of venue; and then made default. The special constable, appointed to save the writ, occupied the magistrate's office, claiming to be a lawyer. Held,

1. That ignorance of the law does not excuse a magistrate, in wrongfully issuing an attachment writ, nor an applicant for wrongfully suing it out.

2. Nor will a writ wrongfully sued out, justify an officer having the means of knowing its illegality, in serving it.

3. In such case a defendant may resist the attachment, sue on the attachment bond, or bring trespass.

4. Appearing before the magistrate to obtain a change of venue, is no waiver of defendant's rights.

250.—Elias Wenger v. Marshall Calder.—Appeal from Kankakee.—Opinion by SHELDON, J.

MALPRACTICE—MEASURE AND GROUND OF DAMAGES.

STATEMENT.—Suit for malpractice in the treatment of a dislocation of the elbow. The following instructions were given for plaintiff:

(1.) "The rule of damages, in this case, if you find for the plaintiff, is the pain and suffering undergone by the plaintiff, and any permanent injury to the arm shown by the evidence, and consequent pecuniary loss, for life, after the time of the plaintiff's coming of age." (2.) "If you believe, from the evidence, that the defendant, as surgeon, treated the arm of the plaintiff, and failed to use the reasonable care and skill in so treating it, and, if you believe, from the evidence, that the defendant was wilfully negligent in failing to use reasonable care and skill in treating the arm, then you may find for the plaintiff any sum you deem proper, under the evidence, not exceeding ten thousand dollars."

The second of these instructions was deemed irrelevant, and so erroneous, because there was no evidence of willful negligence.

As to the first, the court say: "The injury which the plaintiff originally received to his elbow was not produced by any agency or fault of the defendant; and there is no reason why he should be held to pay for the pain and suffering caused thereby. If there were any additional pain and suffering which the plaintiff underwent because of the want of reasonable care and skill in the treatment, that might have been considered by the jury in assessing damages, [this might be done] but nothing more. And there should have been the same limitation in the respect of any permanent injury.

George W. Plummer v. Charles W. Rigden.—Appeal from Superior Court of Cook.—Opinion by CRAIG, J.

NON-PERFORMANCE OF AGREEMENT TO CONVEY LAND—MEASURE OF DAMAGES—MISSTATEMENT OF VALUE OR COST—RESCISSION.

STATEMENT. — Agreement to convey lands, which was found to be impossible through the action of a part owner, not a party to the agreement. Suit for damages in the non-performance. Held,

1. That the measure of damages was the value of the land and not the actual damages suffered, to be estimated at the time it was to be conveyed. The rule is different in cases of eviction; and in England a different rule also prevails in suits for failure to convey; and courts in this country are divided on the question. But the doctrine held, (as above,) in our courts is sustained by the weight of authority. [Authorities cited.]

2. Nor is it clear why the same rule should apply to an action for breach of the covenant of seizin, and an action for the breach of an executory contract, as failure to convey. The latter should be under the general rule which gives a vendee the value of the specific article on the day it is to be delivered.

3. A mere misstatement, by a vendor of property, as to its cost, or value, in the absence of any fiduciary relation between the parties, does not authorize a rescission of the contract.

262. James Cuddy v. Alice Brown et al —Appeal from Will.—Opinion by BREESE, J, HEIRSHIP—BARGAIN AND SALE OF LANDS.

Held, 1. That whether certain parties are heirs at law of a deceased person, is a question of pedigree; and hearsay evidence is admissible. And, for the purpose of identity, family names, circumstances. etc., may be proved.

2. Where one bargains with another that he will convey certain lands to his son, on condition that that son should live with him and be reared by him as his child, such contract will not be regarded as a bargain and sale; but may raise an equity in behalf of the child so taken, which a court of equity will carry out and enforce.

Henry Peterson et al. v. George B. Griffin.—Appeal from Superior Court of Cook.—Opinion by CRAIG, J.

EJECTMENT—WHAT PASSES UNDER A MORTGAGE—HOUSE BUILT AFTER THE MORTGAGE GIVEN—INJUNCTION AGAINST REMOVAL—REAL ESTATE—WHAT IT IS.

STATEMENT.—Pending a suit in ejectment, under a mortgage, a house was removed off the premises—and Held, thereon,

1. That if the house was real property, it could be recovered. But if personal property, it could be rightfully removed.

2. If it were real property, a court of equity would interfere to prevent the removal.

3. A building erected by a tenant, on leased premises, by an agreement with the landlord, may be removed at the end of the term; but no such rule applies to the relation between mortgagor and mortgagee. It is a fundamental rule that real estate embraces lands, tenements and hereditaments; and so, buildings erected on, and fixed to lands, become a part thereof, and belong to the owner of the land; and also all improvements of a permanent character.

4. When, therefore, a building is erected on lands, it is prima facie a part of the lands, and this presumption must be rebutted (in ejectments) by the defendant.

5. [However, a mortgagor and mortgagee might stipulate for the removal of a building subsequently erected, no doubt. W.]

270. Harvey B. Peters et al. v. Alexander Elliott et al.—Appeal from Mercer.—Opinion by SHELDON, J.

ATTACHMENT—PRIORITY OF LIEN—TRANSFER OF PROPERTY IN TRANSITU—CONSIDERATION THEREFOR—RIGHTS OF SHIPPER AND ATTACHING CREDITORS UNDER THE LIEN OF A PLEDGE GIVEN—DELIVERY.

STATEMENT.—Levy of attachment; a question of property arose under the transfer of a shipping receipt for flour. Held,

1. That a sale, mortgage, or pledge, of property in the course of transportation, may be legally made, and the title passed by the delivery of the shipping bill; and that even where the bill is marked "not transferable," by the railroad company, —this being only for the interest of the company, and having no bearing on the rights of the parties.

2. And indebtedness between the shipper and assignee is a sufficient consideration for the transfer.

3. Where there is such a transfer as a pledge for securing indebtedness, the interest of the shipper is only the surplus over and above the indebtedness, and attaching creditors can acquire no greater right than the value of such surplus.

4. In such case, the bill of lading, or shipping receipt, is a symbol of the goods, and the delivery thereof with the intention to transfer the property in the goods is a symbolical delivery of the goods. And the interest acquired dates at the time of delivery, although payment be not made till afterwards; and will take precedence of attachments levied after delivery and before payment. And where interest is that of a lien to secure the return of an advance made on a draft, this lien has priority in the same manner. And also liens may secure even future advances, and have therein like priority.

TERMS:—TWO DOLLARS per annum, in advance Single Copies, TEN CENTS.

We call attention to the following opinions, reported at length in this issue:

Bankruptcy — Priority of Claim of United States.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States by Swayne, J., that the court below committed no error in holding that the preference of the United States, as a creditor of Cooke, McCulloch & Co., applied to the separate and individual estates of the bankrupt partners, thus superseding the rule in equity recognized by the bankrupt act—that partnership property is to be first applied in the payment of the partnership debts, and individual property in payment of the individual debts. The bankrupt parties in question were indebted to the United States, and they had separate estates. This entitled the United States to the preference claimed.

Mandamus—Power of Court to Compel Town Auditors to Allow a Judgment—Tax Levy—The Grab-Law.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States, by Davis. J., construing the law of 1869, known as the Grab-law, and holding that there was nothing in the point made by the plaintiff in error, that judgments, like the one in question, against a town, can only be collected in the mode pointed out in the funding act of 1869; that the State only assumed the character of a custodion of the money which reached the treasury; that the act did not profess to change the terms of the securities, nor exempt the municipality from the obligation to pay them; that they were registered in the office of the Auditor of Public Accounts, and payable at the treasury of the State. But the holder was not required to resort only there for payment. That the judgment in question does not differ from one obtained against the town for ordinary charges; that auditing it so that provision may be made for its payment by taxation, is a mere ministerial act, not involving the exercise of official discretion, the performance of which can be coerced by mandamus. This opinion will be of unusual interest to persons holding bonds issued under the funding act of 1869, commonly called the Grab-law, which has been decided, by our Supreme Court, to be unconstitutional.

Second Writ of Error—Married Woman's Note—Charging Her Estate.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of Missouri, by Wagner, J., as to what questions may be reviewed on a second writ of error, and holding that a married woman is incapable of making a contract except in regard to her separate property, but in reference to that she is treated as a femme sole, and if she give a note, in the absence of proof to the contrary the law implies that she intended to bind her separate estate. This places the decision of the Supreme Court of Missouri upon a principal. The reasons upon which the old English decisions on the questions of charging a married woman's separate estate rest no longer exist. When those decisions were made, a married woman could own no personal property; the moment it was acquired by her it became her husband's in law. Now she can sue and be sued, contract and be contracted with, and own property without the intervention of a trustee; and there is no reason why, when she gives a note, she and her property should not be bound to the same extent that the husband and his property would be bound if he gave a note.

Fraudulent Conspiracy.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of New York for the First Division in General Term, by Davis, J., as to what constitutes a fraudulent conspiracy to obtain possession of personal property.

The London Law Times says: "American law books seem to grow more rapidly than English law books, and it is by no means a promising feature of this growth that the annotation of cases goes on cumulatively, no attempt being made to get rid of decisions no longer of importance." The difficulty seems to be for a law writer to determine just what cases are important and what cases are not. Some writers imagine that every word that proceeds out of a judge's mouth is to be received as law, and commented upon, and cited. The opinions are getting so numerous upon many questions that, if a writer cites them all, he only confuses his reader, and makes him doubt, amid a multitude of conflicting authorities, what the law really is. What should be done to lessen the increasing volume of law, is a question that should receive the careful consideration of the American bar.

NOTES TO RECENT CASES.

BANKRUPTCY—CERTIFICATE OF DISCHARGE —AFTER ACQUIRED PROPERTY.

The Chancery Division of the English court in re Pettit's Trusts, 34 L. T. Rep. N. S., 51, held that after an order closing a bankpuptcy has been made, the bankrupt, although he has not obtained his certificate of discharge, is entitled to the property which he subsequently acquires.

DEVISE—REMAINDER—LIMITATION.

The Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, in Morgan v. Quinleven, 33 Leg. Intel., 109, held where there is a devise to one for life, with remainder to his issue as tenants in common, with a limitation to the heirs general of the issue, they take as purchasers in fee.

RIGHT OF EXECUTOR OR ADMINISTRATOR TO ERECT MONUMENT.

The Orphan's Court, of Philadelphia, in the matter of the estate of Barclay, 33 Leg. Intel., 108, held that an executor will not be surcharged, as respects legatees and next of kin, with the cost of a monument over his testator which is reasonable, accords with the means and position of the testator, and has been approved by the majority of the legatees and next of kin, but the cost and enclosure of a burial lot being on the same footing as the improvement of other real estate, will not be allowed an executor as against objecting parties in interest

RECORDER—NEGLIGENCE IN MAKING SEARCH.

The Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, 33 Leg. Int., 108, in Houseman v. The Girard M. & L. Ass., held that the recorder of deeds is liable in damages for losses suffered by a mortgagee by reason of a false certificate of mortgage search issued from the recorder's office; that it is not prima facie negligence in a mortgagee or his conveyancer to allow the proposed mortgagor to procure the necessary mortgage search. In this county, where the county has its own abstract books, it is a matter of interest to the people to know to what extent the recorder or the county may be liable for the mistakes of the recorder in making searches or giving abstracts from the county books for a consideration. Our Supreme Court has decided when an abstract firm in making an abstract fails to give a tax sale which appears of record, they are liable to pay the damage occasioned thereby. Will the county or the recorder be held to the same liability?

PAROL INSURANCE.

The Supreme Court of Penna., in Patterson v. The B. F. Ins. Co., 23 Pitts. Legal Journal, 126, held that an insurance company may be bound by a parol insurance before the policy is made out and delivered, to protect the insured in the interim between the taking of the risk and payment of the premium, and the issuing of the policy. In such case, the insurance company must not only have the power to make the verbal contract. but the contract must be clearly established.

COLLATERAL SECURITY—ADVANCES.

It was held by the Supreme Court of Penna., in First N. B. of Clarion v. Gregg et al., 23 Pitts. Leg. J., 127, that where a party takes a note as collateral security, and does not make any advances or give any new credit, he has no better title than his assignor.

INSCRIPTION ON TOMBSTONE—THE WORD "REVEREND."

The Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, on appeal from the Arches Court of Canterbury, in Keet v Smith et al., 33 L. T. Rep., N. S. 794, held that "the word reverend" is nothing more than a laudatory epithet. It is not a title of honor, to be exclusively possessed by the clergy of the established church, as having episcopal ordination. The appellant was described on a tombstone as "the Rev. H. K., Wesleyan minister." It was held, reversing the judgment of the court below, that this was not a sufficient reason for refusing a faculty for the erection of such tombstone.

RAILROAD — LIABILITY TO KEEP STREET CLEAR..

The Supreme Court of Pa., in P. & B. P. R. R. Co. v. Pittsburgh, reported 33 Leg. Intel., 92, held that a passenger railway, which is required by its act of incorporation and by a city ordinance to keep the streets upon which its track is in good repair, is liable to clear away debris, etc., carried on to the street by an unprecedented freshet.

CORPORATION CREATED BY LEGISLATURE OF A REBEL STATE.

The Supreme Court of the United States, in United States v. Insurance Companies, 3 Legal Gazette, 77, held that corporations created by the legislature of a rebel State, while the State was in armed rebellion against the government of the United States, have power, since the suppression of the rebellion. to sue in the Federal courts, if the acts of incorporation had no relation to anything else than the domestic concerns of the State; and there were neither in their apparent purpose nor in their operation hostile to the Union or in conflict with the constitution, but were merely ordinary legislation, such as might have been had there been no rebellion,—and that such corporations may in proper cases sue under the captured and abandoned property act.

ADMISSION OF TRAVELERS TO HOTEL.

The United States District Court for the Eastern Dtstrict of Pa., in United States v. Newcomer, 33 Leg. Intel., 94, held that the act of congress of March 1, 1875, is authorized by the 14th amendment of the constitution of the United States, and a clerk in charge of the reception of travelers at a hotel may be liable to conviction for a violation of the provisions of the act.

Recent Publications.

Reports of Cases argued and determined in the Supreme Court of the State of Wisconsin, with tables of the cases and principal matters, and the rules of the several courts in force since 1838. By S. U. Pinney. Vol. III. Containing cases decided from the December term, 1850, until the organization of the separate Supreme Court in 1853. Chicago: Callaghan & Company, Law Publishers, 1876.

This is a neat appearing volume. In addition to the cases reported it contains the rules of practice of the District Courts of Wisconsin Territory, and all rules of practice adopted for the County, Circuit and Supreme Courts, since the organization of the State; with sketches of the judges of the first Supreme Court. Orders for this volume, which is the third of the series, should be addressed to the publishers, Messrs. Callaghan & Company.

Table of Contents.—Our readers will find a table of contents of the matters contained in this issue on the first page.

A Justice Caned.—On the 27th of this month, a large number of the citizens of Jefferson, in this county, determined to express their opinion, in a forcible manner, of Newton Linscott, a justice of the peace of that town. They proceeded to the jewelry establishment of C. D. Peacock, of this city, and purchased one of his best gold-headed canes, and on arriving at the house of Justice Linscott, they presented it to him, as a mark of their esteem for him as a justice and an old and respected citizen of the town.

AGENCY—DOCTRINE OF DELEGATION.

DELEGATION OF AUTHORITY BY AGENTS.

The general principle of our law is consistent with that of the civil law in denying to agents, except in certain cases, the right of delegating the authority with which they have been invested. The maxim "Delegata potestas non potest delegari" is equally appropriate to both systems of law. If no express authority for the power of delegation exists, there is a presumption that the agent has no such power. When the maxim has been applied various reasons have been given for its application. Thus it is said an agent cannot delegate his authority where his personal skill is essential (Burial Board of St. Margaret Rochester v. Thompson (L. Rep. 6 C. P. 457) or where the authority is a judicial authority (Baker v. Cave, 1 H. & N. 678), or where it is a trust and confidence reposed in the agent (Bac. Abr. "Authority," D), or where the authority gives the agent a discretionary power (Alexander v. Alexander, 2 Ves. 640), unless the discretion is to be exercised in respect of a merely ministerial act, in which case a deputy may be appointed (per Willes J., in Burial Board, &c. v. Thompson, sup. p. 458).

Upon the grounds indicated in the above principles, Lord Hardwicke decided that when a father had a power of appointment to his children over a real estate, and he delegated the power to his wife, the power must be considered as a power of attorney which could be executed only by the husband, to whom it was solely confined, and was not in its nature transmissible or delegatory to a third person (Ingram v. Ingram, 2 Atk. 88, and see Hamilton v. Royse, 2 Sch. & Lef. 330). So, where personal estate was given to such charitable use as A. should appoint, and he directed the money to be applied as B. should appoint, the delegation was held void (Attorney-General

v. Berryman, 2 Ves. 643). So, too, where a testator gave his wife a power to appoint personalty among their children, and she delegated the power by will to others: (Alexander v. Alexander, sup.) consent was made requisite to the due execution of a power, he could not empower another to give consent to it as his attorney: Hawkins v. Kemp, 3 East, 410.) Again if A. lends B. a horse to ride to York, B. cannot let his man ride him, for the license is a matter of pleasure annexed to the person of B., and cannot be transferred (Boinglo v. Morris, Mod. 210); but it is otherwise where a certain time is limited for the loan of a horse, for here B. has an interest in the horse, and may let his servant ride him: (Ib. and 2 Ld. Raym, 913, 915, 916). Upon the same ground, where there was a trust to dispose of certain property to such of the relations and kindred of the testator, in such manner as his trustees and executors should think proper, and the trustees and executors died, the survivor devising the trust estates to A. and B., and making them executors as to the personal part of the property, Sir William Grant decided that A. and B. could not execute the power, for the reason that wherever a power was of a kind that indicated a personal confidence, it must prima facie be understood to be confined to the individual to whom it is given, and will not, except by express words, pass to others to whom by legal transmission the same character may and appears to belong: (Cole v. Wade, 16 Ves. 27.)

By an agreement B. was to have a claim upon a coach supplied by him until the debt was paid. B. died, and his administratrix sent the coach to H. for repairs. H. detained it. "If Howes," said Lord Tenterden, in delivering the judgment of the court, "had lived, and the coach, on non-payment of the bill, had been taken out of his possession, and he had brought an action, the defendant might. in bar of that, have relied on the instrument. But as the license was a mere personal license, not transferable, supposing the property had been transferred by the act of the party or by operation of law, we are of opinion that the defendant was not entitled to take and detain the coach:" (Howes v. Bell, 7 B. & C., 481.)

The principles stated by the earlier legal writers upon the subject under examination do not differ in any essential particular from the principles in force at the present day. They are, indeed, identical in substance, and may be traced to the same general principle that an authority to delegate a delegated authority will not be presumed when such delegated authority is enjoyed as a personal trust. Thus, inasmuch as a principal employs a broker from the opinion he entertains of his personal skill and integrity, a broker has no right, without notice, to turn his principal over to another of whom he knows nothing (Per Lord Ellenborough; Cockram v. Irlam, 2 B. & S. 301, n). So if a notice to quit is given by an agent of an agent it is invalid unless authorized by the principal: (Doe v. Robinson, 3 Bing. N. C. 677). So, too, when an act of Parliament for building a bridge, ordered that when any notice was to be given by the trustees appointed and acting under it, such notice should be in writing or in print, signed by three or more of the trustees, or by their clerk or clerks, the Court of Queen's Bench held that a notice signed with the names of the clerks to the trustees, but signed in fact by a clerk employed by them, was insufficient on the ground, inter alia, that the authority of the clerks could not be delegated. Again, if A. delivers goods to B. for sale by him at a particular place, B. has no right to send them elsewhere under the care of another person in search of a market, although he is unable to sell them at the place appointed: (Catlin v. Bell, 4 Camp. 183.) On the same grounds, it was remarked by Lord Eldon, that it is a very dangerous doctrine to maintain that if an auctioneer is authorized to sell, all his clerks, when he goes out of town are in consequence of any usage in that business, agents for the person who authorized him: (Coles v. Trecothick, 9 Ves. 250.)

An important distinction to be borne in mind in oonsidering whether an agent may or may not appoint a deputy to do wholly or in part that which the agent is himself appointed to do, is founded upon the distinction between a ministerial and a judicial officer. The former may, whereas the latter, unless expressly authorized, may not, appoint a deputy (1 Roll. Abr. 591; Tit. "Deputie," affirmed by Parke, B., in Walsh v. Southworth, 6 Ex. 156; Com. Dig. "Officer" D. i).

For a similar reason, where a person's Hence, it was said, a constable, a chamberlain, an alderman, an auditor in the exchequer, an escheator, a sheriff, a dean, a parish clerk, being ministerial officers, could appoint a deputy: (See authorities cited, Com. Dig. "Deputy" D. i). The true distinction would appear to be that which is drawn between acts which are ministerial and acts which are judicial in their character. Thus, at the trial of a cause under the Writ of Trial Act (3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42), before the sheriff, a verdict was by consent taken for the plaintiff, subject to a reference. It was agreed by both parties that the arbitrator should have power to order a verdict to be entered for either party. The award was made and judgment signed accordingly. The plaintiff then obtained a rule calling upon the defendant to show cause why the award, the verdict, and the judgment should not be set aside. The court set aside the two latter, but not the former. Alderson, B., having pointed out that the sheriff did not, under the above Act, enjoy all the powers of a judge at Nisi Prius, went on to say: "The sheriff had no authority to give power to another to alter the verdict of the jury. It would be very inconvenient that a sheriff should have power to order a reference of cases sent to be tried before him": (Wilson v. Thorpe, 6 M. & W. 721). The distinction between acts judicial and acts ministerial is fully recognized in Baker v. Cave (per Pollock, C. B., 1 H. & N. 678). "Judicial acts," says the learned Chief Baron, "must contain in themselves the source of the power, but that rule does not apply to ministerial acts;" (Baker v. Cave, ubi sup.) Many of the cases under this head refer to the doings of arbitrators.

In Little v. Newton (2 Scott N. R. 509) a reference was made to a barrister and two merchants for their award, or the award of any two of them. After all the matters in dispute had been discussed, it was agreed between the barrister and one of the merchants to make an award in favor of the plaintiffs, subject to the decision of a barrister upon a point of law. The latter accordingly, having decided the point in favor of the plaintiff, drew up the award in his favor without any further communication with either of the other arbitrators. The court set the award aside on the ground that the parties were entitled to have the joint judgment of two at least of the arbitrators upon every point submitted to them, and that the judicial authority possessed by each arbitrator could not be delegated by him. "It is true," said Chief Justice Tindal, "that both arbitrators named by the plaintiff and defendant respectively had declined to interfere in the question of law, and had given up their opinion to that of the third. But there is no principle of law that we are aware of which will authorize any such delegation of the judicial authority conferred upon the three; and it is impossible to say that if the determination of the legal arbitrator had been disclosed to either of the other arbitrators before the signature of the award, some argument or observation might not have been made which would have led to a different conclusion." When matters in difference are submitted to arbitrators, it is presumed that the arbitrators will themselves exercise their judgment. Of course, where arbitrators are authorized to call in a competent person to assist them, it is no objection that they have availed themselves of the assistance of such person in deciding the questions submitted to them: (Williams v. Wallace, 3 Cl. & F. 26.) Nor can there be any doubt that a legal arbitrator might properly consult an eminent scientific person upon a question within the scope of his profession, and adopt his opinion: (See per Blackburn, J., in Whitmore v. Smith, 7 H. & N. 513; 31 L. J. 107, Ex.). But, although an arbitrator may consult such persons, his award must be the act of his own mind: (Eads v. Williams, 4 De Gex Mac. & G. 674.) The cases here cited show how necessary it is to avoid confusing a consultation with eminent scientific men, or a giving way by one arbitrator to the opinion of another with a delegation of authority: (See Eardley v. Stoer, 4 Dowl. 423.)—The London Law Times.

SHOULD WOMEN PRACTICE LAW IN WISCONSIN?

At common law, before the enactment of any statute relative to attorneys, parties pleaded their own causes; a privilege which is still accorded them by the constitution of Wisconsin. At common law, therefore, woman has always been admitted to the bar, if she chose to plead there in her own behalf, as a party to the suit. Such being the common law, previous to any statutory enactment, it would seem that it would have required a statutory prohibition to have excluded her from practicing as an attorney. No such statutory prohibition appears ever to have been enacted. Judge Nott, of the Court of Claims, in refusing Mrs. Lockwood admission, while claiming that the spirit of the common law was against the admission of woman, declares his conclusions inferentially, and says: "That there has been no express provision by statute, and that there was no exceptional rule at common law, to prevent any such dangerous and scandalous practice," (i. e. the admission of woman to the bar,) "certainly indicates that the law has never been considered to authorize the admission of women to the bar." Here we have the concession of Judge Nott, while refusing a woman admission to the bar, on the ground that such admission is unauthorized by common law, that "there has been no express provision by statute, and that there was no exceptional rule at common law to prevent" her admission. Instead of inferring that women may be admitted because the common law does not expressly exclude them, Judge Nott infers the reverse—that they should not be admitted because the common law does not expressly provide for their admission! The decision of the Supreme Court of Illinois, in refusing Myra Bradwell's application, contents itself with simply saying that "female attorneys at law were unknown in England;" while the Supreme Court of Wisconsin only remarks, generally, that the common law has "excluded" woman from the bar "ever since courts have administered the common law." None of these learned judges quote a single decision of a court, or a single statute, in support of these assertions. Nor can they. The simple fact is that, until very recently, women have never applied for admission, and consequently the courts have had no opportunity to pass upon the question of her admissibility, and no rulings which could be common law with us have ever been made either for or against her admission. The common law, inasmuch as it has always acknowledged the right of a woman to appear at the bar in her own behalf, and has also recognized her capacity to act as agent for another, must be presumed to favor her admission to the bar to act as agent or attorney for another, unless, either by judicial decision, or legislative enactment, made early enough to be common law in this country, the contrary appears. Judge Nott acknowledges that there has been no such exceptional ruling, and neither the Supreme Courts of Illinois or Wisconsin quote any to sustain their positions. Until this is done, we must take the assertion that the common law has always excluded women from the practice of law, as at least "not proven." Judicial decisions in this country, under statutes not expressly authorizing the admission of women, are as follows: In favor of her admission—Maine, Michigan, Missouri and Iowa; against—Illinois, Wisconsin, and court of claims, Washington, D. C.; so that the weight of authority is to the effect that she may be admitted at common law, unmodified by express statutory enactment.

The learned judge claimed that the pronouns "he" and "his" in the statute providing for the admission of attorneys, are sufficient to exclude woman from its provisions, and that the statute providing that "every word importing the masculine gender only may extend and be applied to females as well as to males," is permissive merely, and leaves to the discretion of the court the question of the intent of the legislature as to its application to any particular statute. Granting the statute to be permissive, merely, the discretion of the court in interpreting the intention of the legislature, is not an arbitrary one, but is subject to certain principles. The rule has been repeatedly laid down, by the Supreme Court of this State, that "general words in a statute must receive a general construction; and if there is no express exception, the court can create none." See Enchling v. Simmons, 28 Wis., 272; Harrington v. Smith, 28 Wis., 43; Chase v. Whiting, 30 Wis., 544. How, then, can it interpret the general word "person" in the statute providing for the admission of attorneys, so as to restrict its provisions to male persons. Again, it has been decided that "it has always been considered competent for the legislature to enact rules for the construction of statutes, present and future, and when it has done so, each succeeding legislature, unless a contrary intention is plainly manifested, is supposed to employ words and frame enactments with reference to such rules." Prentiss v. Danaher, 20 Wis., 311. The statute providing that "words importing the masculine gender only may extend and be applied to females as well as to males," was enacted previously to the existing statute providing for the admission of attorneys; and therefore the legislature framing the latter statute is supposed to have done so with reference to the rule of construction above quoted, and a contrary intention not being plainly manifested, it is evident that the legislature must be supposed to have intended the extension and application of the masculine words therein used to women.

A labored effort has been made by the learned judge to do away with the argument embodied in the petition, to the effect that the legislature has provided for the admission of woman to the bar by enacting, first, that she may be admitted to the State University—and second, that all graduates of the law department of the University shall be entitled to admission to the bar of all the courts of the State. His honor begins by complaining that the statutes were not stated fairly. He says:

"The act of 1867 is an amendment of sec. 4 of the act of 1866, re-organizing the University. The section of 1866 provided, without qualification, that "the University in all its departments and colleges shall be open alike to male and female students." The section of 1867 substitutes the provision that "the University shall be open to female as well as male students, under such regulations and restrictions as the Board of Regents may deem proper." In both statutes the section provides that all able-bodied male students shall receive military instruction, and makes no other reference to a military department. And the argument that the admission of females under the statute of 1867 to all departments except the military, necessarily contemplated their admission to the law department, falls to the ground, because the statute neither mentions all departments nor excepts the military—if there be a military department. The inaccuracy is the more striking from the fact that the section of 1866 does expressly include all departments and colleges, and the amendment of 1867 evidently ex industrio omits them. The change of an absolute right of admission to all departments and colleges of the University in 1866, to admission to the University under discretionary regulations and restrictions of the regents in 1867, is very significant; the more so that it is the only amendment made. It seems likely that the Legislature came to regard the absolute and indiscriminate right of 1866 as dangerously broad, and to consider it necessary to make the right subordinate to the judgment of the regents. And if the law school had then been established by statute, it would be very doubtful whether the admission of females to it would be sanctioned by the act of 1867. But there was no such statute; and the law school was in fact established, not by statute, but—as we learn—by the authorities of the University sometime in 1868, after the enactment of the section in both forms. The first class of students, all males, graduated in 1869, without color of right to practice. Hence the statute of 1870 to give the right, presumably passed without thought of the admission of females to the bar."

This labored effort to invalidate the arguement contained in the petition derogates nothing from its force. That the enactment of 1867 was an amendment of the act of 1866, made to so qualify the former act as to admit women to the University "under such regulations and restrictions as the board of regents may deem proper," instead of admitting them unqualifiedly as before, proves nothing bearing on the point in issue. The legislature itself places no restrictions upon the admission of women to any and all departments of the University, whether then existing or to be created in future, except impliedly to the military by introducing the word "male" in making provision for military instruction. That this enactment does not admit women to all departments of the University, because the statute does not explicitly mention "all departments," when it says, "The University shall be open to female as well as male students, under such regulations and restrictions as the board of regents may deem proper," is a subterfuge too weak to require a moments consideration.

By this statute, as was argued in the petition, the board of regents may, at least, admit women, if they choose to do so, to every department of study in the University except the military, whether then existing or afterwards created, and may allow them to graduate therefrom; and according to the law of 1870, such women, so graduating from the law department, are entitled to admission to the bar of every court in the state. Construing the enactment of 1867 in the strictest manner against women, the board of regents are empowered by the legislature to decide whether women shall be graduated from the law department, and so admitted to the bar of the Supreme court; and the inquiry in the petition—"Can it have been the intention of the legislature to give the board of regents of the State University the power to admit women to the practice of law in the Supreme court of this State, and at the same time to withhold that very power from the Supreme court itself?"—loses none of its force.

The learned judge "presumes" that the law of 1870 was passed "without thought of the admission of females to the bar." What reason has he for so presuming? The law department had been in existence two years; a class had been graduated; women were being admitted to the University in accordance with the statute of 1867; in other states women were already studying law, and applying for admission to the bar. At any time they might apply to pursue the course of law study, provided in the University, and with the approval of the board of regents—if not by right, according to the statute—they might be allowed to graduate from the law department. In the face of all these facts, and all these probabilities, the legislature without qualification or restriction enacted that "all graduates of the law department of the Wisconsin University, shall be entitled to admission to the bar of all the courts of this State, upon presenting to the judge or judges thereof, certificate of such graduation." It is not to be "presumed" that our legislators were unaware of the full scope and effect of the laws they enacted.

4th. The Social Argument.

His honor, with a humility at once touching and naive, assumes that matrimony is so undesirable a state for woman that, were she allowed freely to earn an honorable and lucrative support in any other manner, she would never enter it. The well-being of society requires her to marry, and she should therefore be forced to do so by having no other alternative! Possibly this is so, though I confess I am slow to believe it. Yet, granting it, for argument sake, would it not be better to render the lot of a married woman more attractive by according her fuller rights therein, and by effort on the part of husbands to so refine and ennoble themselves as to become more desirable companions than so to lower the standard as to take wives who marry because no other alternative is open to them? What honorable and self respecting man would wish to marry a woman who would never have consented to become his wife could she have been allowed to follow a successful professional career." No; let every honorable employment be opened as freely to woman as to man, let her be as independent of matrimony as a means of support as he is; and then if he cannot induce her to marry him, let him conclude that the fault is in himself, and proceed to render himself more worthy of her. If we have fewer marriages, for a time, we shall also have fewer devorces, and fewer discordant families and unhappy children.

Again, his honor assumes in strange contradiction to his previous assumption, that admitting woman to the bar is forcing her into a profession against her will for which she is utterly unfitted, and which would be revolting to her better instincts. There is no force used in permitting her to practice when she asks the privelege. The force is in refusing her. No woman would be obliged to follow the legal profession, against her taste or inclination, simply because the Supreme court would admit her, if she applied, and was duly qualified. If the legal profession is not fitted to her, or she to it, practical experiment will convince her of the fact more speedily and effectually than any amount of theorizing can do. No law exists to prevent women from becoming hod-carriers, and yet women do not become hod-carriers. So, if they are unfitted for the practice of law they will soon find it out, and cease to practice; and that will settle the question. But tell them they shall not practice, and there is nothing on earth they want to do so much; and rest assured they will give courts and legislatures no peace till they are accorded the opportunity.

The learned judge declares that the legal profession "has essentially and habitually to do with all that is selfish and extortionate, knavish, and criminal, coarse and brutal, repulsive and obscene in human life;" forgetting that this is but the reverse side of the picture, and that the theory of law has, and its practice should have, if it has not, essentially and habitually to do with all that is unselfish and noble, honest and honorable, high and holy, refined and pure, in human life. The object of law is the administration of justice, and the righting of wrongs, and carries with it a consideration of very many of the most weighty and important questions affecting the welfare of humanity; questions which can be more carefully and thoroughly investigated, and more successfully handled, by one who has had practical experience in dealing with them in the concrete than by any other. In the consideration of these questions, the peculiar qualities of womanhood which the honorable court sets forth so eloquently, are needed no less than the sterner and hardier traits of manhood. "It is not good for man to be alone," even in courts of justice; and this his honor unwittingly proves in endeavoring to prove the reverse. He tells us that the presence of the petitioner in court prevented him from using a certain smutty illustration to demonstrate a point of law which he mentions, and which could have been as well demonstrated by a cleaner one. If this be so the petitioner is glad she was there, and discovers an additional reason why she should be admitted.

His honor gives as a reason why women should not be permitted to practice law, the fact that in their business relations they would meet with so many bad men, whose society would be unpleasant and contaminating. And yet, according to his theory, these very women should marry these men; and should even be forced to marry them, by being shut out from the higher class of employment, lest possibly they might seek a way of escape!

The honorable judge claims that the practice of law is a peculiarly masculine prerogative, and that a woman forsakes the ways of her sex for the ways of his, in adopting that profession. So, once, authorship was considered a masculine employment. As recently as within the last century, Miss Mitford regretted the necessity of being obliged to resort to so peculiarly masculine a vocation for a livelihood, and declared that she would gladly engage in scrubbing, or any "more feminine" occupation, if it would pay her as well!

Education was once considered a peculiarly masculine prerogative. In ancient Greece, an educated woman was considered "unsexed;" she had "forsaken the ways of" her "sex," "for the ways of" man's; and was therefore considered unworthy his respect; as now his honor insinuates a woman learned in the law must needs be. But an advanced civilization demands higher culture for woman, and now she is welcomed in literature and on the rostrum, as she will soon be within the bar; a co-worker with man in the advancement of justice and righteousness.

That a large proportion of women will marry, and will become too largely occupied with home duties to devote themselves to professional labor, is undoubtedly true. It is equally true that a large proportion of men will remain outside the professions, and equally desirable that they should, else who would be our farmers, mechanics, merchants, and laborers? These matters will adjust themselves, only give full scope to labor, and fair competition.

If nature has built up barriers to keep woman out of the legal profession, be assured she will stay out; but if nature has built no such barriers, in vain shall man build them, for they will certainly be overthrown.

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

ABSTRACT OF OPINIONS FILED AT OTTAWA IN 1876.

267. Buradella G. Simpson, v. Wm H. Ham et al.—Appeal from LaSalle.—Opinion by SCOTT, J.

RENTS AND PROFITS ACCRUING WHILE SUIT FOR DOWER IS PENDING—EQUITY JURISDICTION.

STATEMENT.—This suit was for an account of rents and profits, that accrued during the pendency of appellant's suit for dower, in cultivated lands. On demurrer, bill dismissed. Held,

That, under our statute, on the assignment of dower, the court at law may, as a part of the proceeding, assess all damages, on the verdict of a jury. But where this is not done, and the dower case passes from the docket, a petitioner under the statute will not be permitted to thus abandon the statutory proceeding, and then invoke the aid of chancery to take an account of the mesne profits; not even if, afterwards, there was a motion made to reinstate the cause in the court of law, to have the damages assessed, and the motion was denied. The method of correcting this denial is by a direct appeal.

Samuel W. Fleeshman v. Jonas Moore.—Appeal from Cook.—Opinion by SCOTT, J.

SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE.

Held, That a court of equity will always withhold a decree for specific performance, where the contract is indefinite, and is not supported by a clear preponderance of proof.

Amos T. Hall v. John S. Gould et al.—Appeal from Cook.—Opinion by WALKER, J.

LIEN OF LEVY IN ATTACHMENT—STRICT CONSTRUCTION OF LEGAL LIENS ON LAND.

[This is an elaborate case, but turning mainly on facts.]

Held, 1. That a levy on lands by attachment creates no lien until the certificate of levy is filed for record.

2. Execution, attachment, or judgment liens are only to be created by statute, in a strict compliance with the requirements thereof. Mere notice makes no lien.

283. Nelson Monroe v. J. W. Chaldeck.—Appeal from Cook.—Opinion by CRAIG, J.

TENDER; AND COSTS THEREON—EXCESSIVE TENDER.

STATEMENT.—Action of covenant to recover $150 which had been paid in advance, as rent under a lease of premises, which, after such payment was not possessed by plaintiff, and by the fault of a former tenant of the defendant. Tender was made after suit; but the money was not actually paid into court. Tender accepted, and judgment for the amount, with costs, against defendant. Held,

1. That a tender, once made, must be kept good; and is an admission that the amount tendered is due; and if a tender is ever made for a larger sum than is actually due, it is error for the court to order any part of the sum to be refunded.

2. Where a tender is made before suit and afterwards the money is brought into court, judgment for costs goes against the plaintiff; but, otherwise, against the defendant.

284. Edward Iverson v. Michael Mortmer.—Appeal from Cook. Opinion by SCOTT, J.

HARMLESS ERROR IN INSTRUCTIONS.

Held, That mere inaccuracies in instructions will not reverse a cause, where it is evident that, notwithstanding, substantial justice has been done.

LEGALITY OF SLAVE MARRIAGES —'SQUIRE LOCKWOOD WINS THE CASE.

The Washington Republican of a recent date says:

Yesterday the important case was argued before Justice Wylie, in the Equity court, that of Newbern v. Washington. The complainant had asked for the assignment of dower in the estate of her deceased husband, the defendant demurring because of unpaid trusts, and on the overruling by Justice Olin had demanded strict proof of marriage. Upon proof it was shown that the complainant was the second wife, and was married in accordance with the slave laws of North Carolina, and that she removed to this district with her husband after the passage of the act of 1866, regulating the marriage of colored persons in the District of Columbia. Justice Wylie ruled that the marriage of the petitioner was legalized by the statute, and that she was consequently the heir to the whole estate, the first marriage never having been legalized and the second marriage without issue. Belva A. Lockwood, esq., appeared for the complainant, and George F. Appleby, esq., for the defense. This was a novel case of importance, some $10,000 being involved. The complainant's counsel deserves much credit for the ability which she exhibited in the conduct of this case. Some time since the complainant was ejected from the premises in litigation, but since the strong arm of the law has interposed itself she will soon be reinstated in possession thereof.

APPOINTMENT AND JURISDICTION OF MAGISTRATES.—Mr. Hopwood has given notice in the House of Commons that he will, on an early day after Easter, call attention to the law regulating the appointment and jurisdiction of justices of the peace, and the administration by them of the criminal law in summary cases in England, and the necessity for its amendment. He will also move a resolution praying inquiry into the state of the law. Whatever may be the result of the motion, it has been felt (observes the Law Times) that in spite of the many advantages attending the present system of unpaid magistrates, it is a system which is open to improvement. How that improvement is to be brought about is a difficult question to determine. There are numerous reasons for retaining the country gentry on the bench, and much of the work at quarter sessions is of a kind which they are most competent to perform. Perhaps the best solution of the difficulty, one which, at any rate, will tend to remedy the evils apparently indicated by Mr. Hopwood's motion, lies in a more general distribution of stipendiaries. The greater expense attending such a change would be more than balanced by the greater uniformity which would soon be apparent in the decisions.—Public Opinion.

ABSTRACT OF OPINIONS FILED AT OTTAWA IN 1876.

278. The People ex rel. Miller v. P. H. Brislin et al.—Appeal from County Court of Cook.—Opinion by BREESE, J.

ASSESSMENT OF TAXES BY PARK COMMISSIONERS—CONSTITUTIONALITY OF ACT OF 1871 ETC.

STATEMENT.—The matter herein involved is that of a tax assessment by the Park Commissioners. The objections (53 in number) are held, by the supreme court, to be concentrated in No. 48, namely: "Because the act entitled 'an act to enable the corporate authorities of two or more towns, for park purposes, to issue bonds,' etc., approved June 16, 1871, under and by virtue of which said assessment was levied and confirmed, is void and unconstitutional; for the reason that the same has never received the assent or approval of the legal voters of said towns intended to be affected thereby; and for the reason that it authorizes the issue of a new and unlimited amount of bonds, bearing interest at seven per cent., payable annually, for the payment of which, both principal and interest, the lands and lots of the objectors are bound; and for the further reason that it authorizes interested parties to levy assessments upon lots and lands in said towns; and for the reason that it authorizes the Circuit court to confirm and establish the assessment, when made, without personal notice to the parties interested; and for the reason that it imposes heavy burdens upon the property owners and legal voters of said towns, to which they have never, in any manner, assented: and for the reason that said act is repugnant to the terms of the constitution; and all proceedings under the same are null and void." Held,

1. That where an original act provides for a submission to a vote of the people, which vote is given affirmatively establishing the act, it does not follow that subsequent amendments enlarging, curtailing or restricting the chartered rights acquired under the act, must also be submitted to a popular vote, where the essential corporate rights are not invaded.

2. The amendatory act of 1871 did no contravene the provisions of the constitution, nor was the original park act amended by it, interfered with by the constitution of 1870.

3. It is competent for a Circuit court, on confirming the assessment of the park commissioners, to divide the assessment into annual installments.

4. As to the point that the assessment was not made on contiguous property, this question, and all others bringing up the levy and assessment, having been passed on by the Circuit court, are res adjudicata, and cannot be made in the Supreme court. There is ajudgment pronounced by a court of competent jurisdiction, and the question must rest there.

5. That the commissioners were themselves property owners within the district, was not a disqualification to make the assessment.

6. The county of Cook is under township organization; the constitution of 1870 making no change in its status in this respect.

7. All the objections urged are untenable.

286. John L. Doran v. Catharine Mullen.—Appeal from Cook.—Opinion by WALKER, J.

PROBATE OF WILLS—EXAMINATION OF WITNESSES—APPEAL—WHAT MAY BE SHOWN IN IMPEACHMENT OF A WILL—PRESUMPTION.

STATEMENT.—Action to revoke letters of administration, and admit to probate a will which had been refused probate by the County court. Held,

1. That a court has no discretion as to admitting a will to probate, or otherwise; but must judge the matter according to the evidence.

2. A mere discrepancy of dates does not prove a will to be a forgery. And especially such an objection cannot be first raised in the appellate court.

3. The asking of leading questions, in such case, is discretionary with the court. When a witness is unwilling, or very ignorant, the administration of justice requires leading questions to be allowed. And the exercise of this discretion is not subject to review.

4. It is a presumption of law that a testator signed a will with knowledge of its contents, and there is no distinction herein between persons who can, and persons who cannot, write.

5. Where, on an appeal from the County to the Circuit court, a party consents that the Circuit court may review the decision of the County court, instead of trying the matter denovo, he cannot afterwards object to the proceeding. He cannot disclaim his own act.

6. In the matter of a will, it may be shown that the will was not in fact read to the testator, that he was ignorant of its contents, that he was in a situation to be readily imposed on, or was in fact imposed upon.

[Will admitted to probate.]

In error to the Supreme Court of the State of Louisiana.

1. In cases where the judicial power of the United States can be applied only because they involve controversies between citizens of different States, it rests with Congress to determine at what time the power may be invoked and upon what conditions; whether originally in the federal court, or after suit brought in the State court; and in the latter case, at what stage of the proceedings; whether before issue or trial by removal to a federal court, or after judgment upon appeal or writ of error.
2. As the Constitution imposes no limitation upon the class of cases involving controversies between citizens of different States, to which the judicial power of the United States may be extended, Congress may provide for bringing, at the option of either of the parties, all such controversies within the jurisdiction of the federal judiciary.
3. The act of Congress of March 2d, 1867, in authorizing and requiring the removal to the Circuit Court of the United States of a suit pending or afterwards brought in any State court involving a controversy between a citizen of the State where the suit is brought and a citizen of another State, thereby invests the Circuit Court with jurisdiction to pass upon and determine the controversy, when the removal is made, though that court could not have taken original cognizance of the case.
4. A suit to annul a will as a muniment of title and to restrain the enforcement of a decree admitting it to probate, is in essential particulars a suit in equity, and if by the law obtaining in a State, customary or statutory, such a suit can be maintained in one of its courts, whatever designation that court may bear, it may be maintained by original process in the Circuit Court of the United States if the parties are citizens of different States.

Mr. Justice FIELD delivered the opinion of the court.

This is an action in form to annul an alleged will of Daniel Clark, the father of the appellant, dated on the 13th of July, 1813, and to recall the decree of the court by which it was probated. It was brought in the second district court for the parish of Orleans, which, under the laws of Louisiana, is invested with jurisdiction over the estates of deceased persons, and of appointments necessary in the course of their administration.

The petition sets forth that on the 18th of January, 1855, the appellant applied to that court for the probate of the alleged will; and that by decree of the Supreme court of the State, the alleged will was recognized as the last will and testament of the said Daniel Clark, and was ordered to be recorded and executed as such; that this decree of probate was obtained ex parte, and by its terms authorized any person at any time, who might desire to do so, to contest the will and its probate in a direct action, or as a means of defense by way of answer or exception, whenever the will should be set up as a muniment of title; that the appellant subsequently commenced several suits against the petitioners in the Circuit Court of the United States to recover sundry tracts of land and properties of great value, situated in the parish of Orleans and elsewhere, in which they are interested, setting up the alleged will as probated as a muniment of title, and claiming under the same as instituted heir of the testator; and that the petitioners are unable to contest the validity of the alleged will so long as the decree of probate remains unrecalled. The petitioners then proceed to set forth the grounds upon which they ask for a revocation of the will and the recalling of the decree of probate, these being substantially the falsity and insufficiency of the testimony upon which the will was admitted to probate, and the status of the appellant, incapacitating her to inherit or take by last will from the decedent.

A citation having been issued upon the petition and served upon the appellant, she applied in proper form, with a tender of the necessary bond, for removal of the cause to the Circuit Court of the United States for the district of Louisiana, under the twelfth section of the judiciary act of 1789, on the ground that she was a citizen of New York and the petitioners were citizens of Louisiana. The court denied the application, for the alleged reason that, as the appellant had made herself a party to the proceedings in the court relative to the settlement of Clark's succession by appearing for the probate of the will, she could not now avoid the jurisdiction when the attempt was made to set aside and annul the order of probate which she had obtained. The court, however, went on to say in its opinion that the federal court could not take jurisdiction of a controversy having for its object the annulment of a decree probating a will.

The appellant then applied for a removal of the action under the act of March 2d, 1867, on the ground that from prejudice and local influence she would not be able to obtain justice in the State court, accompanying the application with the affidavit and bond required by the statute. This application was also denied, the court resting its decision on the alleged ground that the federal tribunal could not take jurisdiction of the subject matter of the controversy.

Other parties having intervened, the application was renewed and again denied. An answer was then filed by the appellant, denying generally the allegations of the petition, except as to the probate of the will, and interposing a plea of prescription. Subsequently a further plea was filed to the effect that the several matters alleged as to the status of the appellant had been the subject of judicial inquiry in the federal courts, and been there adjudged in her favor. Upon the hearing a decree was entered annulling the will and revoking its probate. The Supreme Court of the State having affirmed this decree, the case was appealed to this court.

In the view we take of the application of the appellant to remove the cause to the federal court, no other question than the one raised upon that application is open for our consideration. If the application should have been granted, the subsequent proceedings were without validity, and no useful purpose would be obtained by an examination of the merits of the defense, upon the supposition that the State court rightfully retained its original jurisdiction.

This action, as already stated, is in form to annul the alleged will of Daniel Clark of 1813, and to recall the decree by which it was probated. But as the petitioners are not heirs of Clark, nor legatees, nor next of kin, and do not ask to be substituted in place of the appellant, the action cannot be treated as properly instituted for the revocation of the probate, but must be treated as brought by strangers to the estate against the devisee to annul the will as a muinment of title, and to restrain the enforcement of the decree by which its validity was established, so far as it affects their property. It is in fact an action between parties; and the question for determination is whether the federal court can take jurisdiction of an action brought for the object mentioned between citizens of different States, upon its removal from a State court. The Constitution declares that the judicial power of the United States shall extend to "controversies between citizens of different States," as well as to cases arising under the Constitution, treaties, and laws of the United States; but the conditions upon which the power shall be exercised, except so far as the original or appellate character of the jurisdiction is designated in the Constitution, are matters of legislative direction. Some cases there are, it is true, in which, from their nature, the judicial power of the United States, when invoked, is exclusive of all State authority. Such are cases in which the United States are parties; cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, and cases for the enforcement of rights of inventors and authors under the laws of Congress. (The Moses Taylor, 4 Wallace, 429; Railway Co. v. Whitton, 13 Ibid, 288.) But in cases where the judicial power of the United States can be applied only because they involve controversies between citizens of different States, it rests entirely with Congress to determine at what time the power may be invoked and upon what conditions; whether originally in the federal court, or after suit brought in the State court; and in the latter case, at what stage of the proceedings; whether before issue or trial by removal to a federal court, or after judgment upon appeal or writ of error. The judiciary act of 1789, in the distribution of jurisdiction to the federal courts, proceeded upon this theory. It declared that the Circuit courts should have original cognizance, concurrent with the courts of the several States, of all suits of a civil nature at common law or in equity, involving a specified sum or value, where the suits were between citizens of the State in which they were brought and citizens of other States; and it provided that suits of that character by citizens of the State in which they were brought might be transferred, upon application of the defendants, made at the time of entering their appearance, if accompanied with sufficient security for subsequent proceedings in the federal court. The validity of this legislation is not open to serious question, and the provisions adopted have been recognized and followed with scarcely an exception by the federal and State courts since the establishment of the government. But the limitation of the original jurisdiction of the federal court, and of the right of removal from a State court, to a class of cases between citizens of different States involving a designated amount, and brought by or against resident citizens of the State, was only a matter of legislative discretion. The Constitution imposes no limitation upon the class of cases involving controversies between citizens of different States, to which the judicial power of the United States may be extended; and Congress may, therefore, lawfully provide for bringing, at the option of either of the parties, all such controversies within the jurisdiction of the federal judiciary.

As we have had occasion to observe in previous cases, the provision of the Constitution, extending the judicial power of the United States to controversies between citizens of different States, had its existence in the impression that State attachments and State prejudices might affect injuriously the regular administration of justice in the State courts. It was originally supposed that adequate protection against such influences was secured by allowing to the plaintiff an election of courts before suit, and when the suit was brought in a State court, a like election to the defendant afterwards. (Railway Co. v. Whitton, 13 Wallace, 289.) But the experience of parties immediately after the late war, which powerfully excited the people of different States, and in many instances engendered bitter enmities, satisfied Congress that further legislation was required fully to protect litigants against influences of that character. It therefore provided, by the act of March 2d, 1867, (14 Statutes, 559), greater facilities for the removal of cases involving controversies between citizens of different States, from a State court to a federal court, when it appeared that such influences existed. That act declared that where a suit was then pending, or should afterwards be brought in any State court, in which there was a controversy between a citizen of the State in which the suit was brought, and a citizen of another State, and the matter in dispute exceeded the sum of five hundred dollars, exclusive of costs, such citizen of another State, whether plaintiff or defendant, upon making and filing in the State court an affidavit that he had reason to believe, and did believe, that from prejudice or local influence he would not be able to obtain justice in the State court, might at any time before final hearing or trial of the suit, obtain a removal of the case into the Circuit court of the United States upon petition for that purpose and the production of sufficient security for subsequent proceedings in the federal court. This act covered every possible case involving controversies between citizens of the State where the suit was brought and citizens of other States, if the matter in dispute, exclusive of costs, exceeded the sum of five hundred dollars. It mattered not whether the suit was brought in a State court of limited or general jurisdiction. The only test was, did it involve a controversy between citizens of the State and citizens of other States, and did the matter in dispute exceed a specified amount. And a controversy was involved in the sense of the statute whenever any property or claim of the parties, capable of pecuniary estimation, was the subject of the litigation, and was presented by the pleadings for judicial determination.

With these provisions in force, we are clearly of opinion that the State court of Louisiana erred in refusing to transfer the case to the Circuit court of the United States upon the application of the appellant. If the federal court had by no previous act, jurisdiction to pass upon and determine the controversy existing between the parties in the parish court of Orleans, it was invested with the necessary jurisdiction by this act itself, so soon as the case was transferred. In authorizing and requiring the transfer of cases involving particular controversies, from a State court to a federal court, the statute thereby clothed the latter court with all the authority essential for the complete adjudication of the controversies, even though it should be admitted that that court could not have taken original cognizance of the cases. The language used in Smith v. Rines, cited from the 2nd of Sumner's Reports, in support of the position that such cases are only liable to removal from the State to the Circuit court as might have been brought before the Circuit court by original process, applied only to the law as it then stood. No case could then be transferred from a State court to a federal court on account of the citizenship of the parties, which could not originally have been brought in the Circuit court.

But the admission supposed is not required in this case. The suit in the parish court is not a proceeding to establish a will, but to annul it as a muniment of title, and to limit the operation of the decree admitting it to probate. It is in all essential particulars a suit for equitable relief—to cancel an instrument alleged to be void, and to restrain the enforcement of a decree alleged to have been obtained upon false and insufficient testimony. There are no separate equity courts in Louisiana, and suits for special relief of the nature here sought are not there designated suits in equity. But they are none the less essentially such suits; and if by the law obtaining in the State, customary or statutory, they can be maintained in a State court, whatever designation that court may bear, we think they may be maintained by original process in a federal court, where the parties are on the one side citizens of Louisiana, and on the other citizens of other States.

Nor is there anything in the decisions of this court in the case of Gaines v. New Orleans, reported in the 6th of Wallace, or in the case of Broderick's will, reported in the 21st of Wallace, which militate against these views. In Gaines v. New Orleans this court only held that the probate could not be collaterally attacked, and that until revoked it was conclusive of the existence of the will and its contents. There is no intimation given that a direct action to annul the will and restrain a decree admitting it to probate might not be maintained in a federal as well as in a State court, if jurisdiction of the parties was once rightfully obtained.

In the case of Broderick's will, the doctrine is approved, which is established both in England and in this country, that by the general jurisdiction of courts of equity, independent of statutes, a bill will not lie to set aside a will or its probate; and whatever the cause of the establishment of this doctrine originally, there is ample reason for its maintenance in this country, from the full jurisdiction over the subject of wills vested in the probate courts and the revisory power over their adjudications in the appellate courts. But that such jurisdiction may be vested in the State courts of equity by statute, is there recognized, and that when so vested the federal courts, sitting in the States where such statutes exist, will also entertai concurrent jurisdiction in a case betweer proper parties.

There are, it is true, in several decisions of this court, expressions of opinion that the federal courts have no probate jurisdiction, referring particularly to the establishment of wills, and such is undoubtedly the case under the existing legislation of congress. The reason lies in the nature of the proceeding to probate a will as one in rem, which does not necessarily involve any controversy between parties; indeed, in the majority of instances no such controversy exists. In its initiation all persons are cited to appear, whether of the State where the will is offered or of other States. From its nature and from the want of parties, or the fact that all the world are parties, the proceeding is not within the designation of cases at law or in equity between parties of different States, of which the federal courts have concurrent jurisdiction with the State courts under the judiciary act. But whenever a controversy in a suit between such parties arises respecting the validity or construction of a will, or the enforcement of a decree admitting it to probate, there is no more reason why the federal courts should not take jurisdiction of the case than there is that they should not take jurisdiction of any other controversy between the parties.

But, as already observed, it is sufficient for the disposition of this case that the statute of 1867, in authorizing a transfer of the cause to the federal court, does, in our judgment, by that fact, invest that court with all needed jurisdiction to adjudicate finally and settle the controversy involved.

It follows from the views thus expressed that the judgment of the Supreme Court of Louisiana must be reversed, with directions to reverse the judgment of the parish court of Orleans, and to direct a transfer of the cause from that court to the Circuit court of the United States, pursuant to the application of the appellant; and it is so ordered.

UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT.

No. 145.—OCTOBER TERM, 1875.

THE UNITED STATES, plaintiffs, v. HIRAM REESE and MATTHEW FOUSHEE.

In error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Kentucky.

THE ENFORCEMENT ACT—THE FIFTEENTH AMENDMENT—POWER TO PUNISH ELECTION INSPECTORS—THE LAW UNCONSTITUTIONAL, BECAUSE IT EMBRACES MORE THAN THE CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISION

1. In this case the indictment contains four counts, under sections 3 and 4 of the Act of May 31, 1870, against two of the inspectors of a municipal election for refusing to receive and count at such election the vote of William Garner, a citizen of the United States, of African descent.

2. ACT NOT EFFECTIVE.—That the act under which the indictment was found cannot be made effective for the punishment of inspectors of elections who refuse to receive and count the votes of citizens of the United States, having all the qualifications of voters, because of their race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

3. AN ACT MUST BE DECLARED TO BE A CRIME.—That if Congress has not declared an act done within a State to be a crime against the United States, the courts have no power to treat it as such.

4. THE FIFTEENTH AMENDMENT.—That the fifteenth amendment does not confer upon Congress authority to impose penalties for every wrongful refusal to receive the vote of a qualified elector at State elections; it is only when the wrongful refusal at such an election is because of race, or previous condition of servitude. That the language of the third and fourth sections of the act does not confine their operation to unlawful discriminations on account of race, etc.

5. THE STATUTE GENERAL NOT SPECIFIC.—That a statute so general as this in its provisions, cannot be made available for the punishment of those who may be guilty of unlawful discrimination against citizens of the United States while exercising the elective franchise, on account of their race, etc. The courts cannot introduce words of limitation into a penal statute and make it specific when, as expressed, it is general only.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

Mr. Chief Justice WAITE delivered the opinion of the court.

This case comes here by reason of a division of opinion between the judges of the circuit court in the district of Kentucky. It presents an indictment containing four counts, under sections 3 and 4 of the act of May 31, 1870, (16 Stat., 140,) against two of the inspectors of a municipal election in the State of Kentucky, for refusing to receive and count at such election the vote of William Garner, a citizen of the United States of African descent. All the questions presented by the certificate of division arose upon general demurrers to the several counts of the indictment.

In this court the United States abandon the first and third counts, and expressly waive the consideration of all claims not arising out of the enforcement of the fifteenth amendment of the Constitution.

After this concession, the principal question left for consideration is, whether the act under which the indictment is found can be made effective for the punishment of inspectors of elections who refuse to receive and count the votes of citizens of the United States, having all the qualifications of voters, because of their race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

If Congress has not declared an act done within a State to be a crime against the United States, the courts have no power to treat it as such.—(U. S. v. Hudson, 7 Cranch, 32.) It is not claimed that there is any statute which can reach this case, unless it be the one in question.

Looking, then, to this statute, we find that its first section provides that all citizens of the United States, who are or shall be otherwise qualified by law to vote at any election, etc., shall be entitled and allowed to vote thereat, without distinction of race, color, or previous condition of servitude, any constitution, etc.. of the State to the contrary notwithstanding. This simply declares a right without providing a punishment for its violation.

The second section provides for the punishment of any officer charged with the duty of furnishing to citizens an opportunity to perform any act which, by the constitution or laws of any State, is made a prerequisite or qualification of voting, who shall omit to give all citizens of the United States the same and equal opportunity to perform such prerequisite and become qualified on account of the race, color, or previous condition of servitude of the applicant. This does not apply to or include the inspectors of an election, whose only duty it is to receive and count the votes of citizens designated by law as voters, who have already become qualified to vote at the election.

The third section is to the effect that whenever, by or under the constitution or laws of any State, etc., any act is or shall be required to be done by any citizen as a prerequisite to qualify or entitle him to vote, the offer of such citizen to perform the act required to be done, "as aforesaid," shall, if it fail to be carried into execution by reason of the wrongful act or omission "aforesaid" of the person or officer charged with the duty of receiving or permitting such performance or offer to perform, or acting thereon, be deemed and held as a performance in law of such act; and the person so offering and failing as aforesaid, and being otherwise qualified, shall be entitled to vote in the same manner and to the same extent as if he had in fact performed such act; and any judge, inspector, or other officer of election, whose duty it is to receive, count, etc., or give effect to the vote of any such citizen, who shall wrongfully refuse or omit to receive, count, etc., the vote of such citizen, upon the presentation by him of his affidavit stating such offer, and the time and place thereof, and the name of the person or officer whose duty it was to act thereon, and that he was wrongfully prevented by such person or officer from performing such act, shall for every such offense forfeit and pay, etc.

The fourth section provides for the punishment of any person who shall by force, bribery, threats, intimidation, or other unlawful means, hinder, delay, etc., or shall combine with others to hinder, delay, prevent or obstruct any citizen from doing any act required to be done to qualify him to vote or from voting at any election.

The second count in the indictment is based upon the fourth section of this act, and the fourth upon the third section.

Rights and immunities created by or dependent upon the Constitution of the United States, can be protected by Congress. The form and the manner of the protection may be such as Congress, in the legitimate exercise of its legislative discretion, shall provide. These may be varied to meet the necessities of the particular right to be protected.

The fifteenth amendment does not confer the right of suffrage upon any one. It prevents the States or the United States, however, from giving preference, in this particular, to one citizen of the United States over another, on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude. Before its adoption this could be done. It was as much within the power of a State to exclude citizens of the United States from voting on account of race, etc., as it was on account of age, property, or education. Now it is not. If citizens of one race having certain qualifications are permitted by law to vote, those of another having the same qualifications must be. Previous to this amendment there was no constitutional guaranty against this discrimination. Now there is. It follows that the amendment has invested the citizens of the United States with a new constitutional right which is within the protecting power of Congress. That right is exemption from discrimination in the exercise of the elective franchise, on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude. This, under the express provisions of the second section of the amendment, Congress may enforce by "appropriate legislation."

This leads us to inquire whether the act under consideration is "appropriate legislation" for that purpose. The power of Congress to legislate at all upon the subject of voting at State elections, rests upon this amendment. The effect of article I., section 4, of the Constitution in respect to elections for senators and representatives is not now under consideration. It has not been contended, nor can it be, that the amendment confers authority to impose penalties for every wrongful refusal to receive the vote of a qualified elector at State elections. It is only when the wrongful refusal at such an election is because of race, color, or previous condition of servitude, that Congress can interfere and provide for its punishment. If, therefore, the third and fourth sections of the act are beyond that limit, they are unauthorized.

The third section does not in express terms limit the offense of an inspector of elections, for which the punishment is provided, to a wrongful discrimination on account of race, etc. This is conceded, but it is urged that when this section is construed with those which precede it, and to which, as is claimed, it refers, it is so limited. The argument is that the only wrongful act on the part of the officer whose duty it is to receive or permit the requisite qualification, which can dispense with actual qualification under the State laws, and substitute the prescribed affidavit therefor, is that mentioned and prohibited in section 2, to wit: discrimination on account of race, etc., and that consequently section 3 is confined in its operation to the same wrongful discrimination.

This is a penal statute, and must be construed strictly; not so strictly, indeed, as to defeat the clear intention of Congress, but the words employed must be understood in the sense they were obviously used.—(U. S. v. Wiltberger, 5 Whet., 85.) If, taking the whole statute together, it is apparent that it was not the intention of Congress thus to limit the operation of the act, we cannot give it that effect.

The statute contemplates a most important change in the election laws. Previous to its adoption, the states, as a general rule, regulated in their own way all the details of all elections. They perscribed the qualifications of voters and the manner in which those offering to vote at an election should make known their qualifications to the officers in charge. This act interferes with this practice and prescribes rules not provided by the laws of the states. It substitutes, under certain circumstances, performance wrongfully prevented for performance itself. If the elector makes and presents his affidavit in the form and to the effect prescribed, the inspectors are to treat this as the equivalent of the specified requirement of the state law. This is a radical change in the practice, and the statute which creates it should be explicit in its terms. Nothing should be left to construction if it can be avoided. The law ought not to be in such a condition that the elector may act upon one idea of its meaning and the inspector upon another.

The elector, under the provisions of the statute, is only required to state in his affidavit that he has been wrongfully prevented by the officer from qualifying. There are no words of limitation in this part of the section. In a case like this, if an affidavit is in the language of the statute, it ought to be sufficient both for the voter and the inspector. Laws which prohibit the doing of things and provide a punishment for their violation should have no double meaning. A citizen should not unnecessarily be placed where, by an honest error in the construction of a penal statute, he may be subjected to a prosecution for a false oath, and an inspector of elections should not be put in jeopardy because he, with equal honesty, entertains an opposite opinion. If this statute limits the wrongful act which will justify the affidavit to discrimination on account of race, etc., then a citizen who makes an affidavit that he has been wrongfully prevented by the officer, which is true in the ordinary sense of that term, subjects himself to indictment and trial, if not to conviction, because it is not true that he has been prevented by such a wrongful act as the statute contemplated; and if there is no such limitation, but any wrongful act of exclusion will justify the affidavit and give the right to vote without the actual performance of the prerequisite, then the inspector who rejects the vote because he reads the law in its limited sense and thinks it is confined to a wrongful discrimination on account of race, etc., subjects himself to prosecution, if not to punishment, because he has mis-construed the law. Penal statutes ought not to be expressed in language so uncertain. If the legislature undertakes to define, by statute, a new offence and provide for its punishment, it should express its will in language that need not deceive the common mind. Every man should be able to know with certainty when he is committing a crime.

But when we go beyond the third section and read the fourth we find there no words of limitation, or reference, even, that can be construed as manifesting any intention to confine its provisions to the terms of the fifteenth amendment. That section has for its object the punishment of all persons who, by force, bribery, etc., hinder, delay, etc., any person from qualifying or voting. In view of all these facts we feel compelled to say that in our opinion the language of the third and fourth sections does not confine their operation to unlawful discriminations on account of race, etc. If congress had the power to provide generally for the punishment of those who unlawfully interfere to prevent the exercise of the elective franchise without regard to such discrimination, the language of these sections would be broad enough for that purpose.

It remains now to consider whether a statute, so general as this in its provisions, can be made available for the punishment of those who may be guilty of unlawful discrimination against citizens of the United States, while exercising the elective franchise, on account of their race, etc.

There is no attempt in the sections now under consideration to provide specifically for such an offence. If the case is provided for at all, it is because it comes under the general prohibition against any wrongful act or unlawful obstruction in this particular. We are, therefore, directly called upon to decide whether a penal statute enacted by congress, with its limited powers, which provides in general language broad enough to cover wrongful acts without as well as within the constitutional jurisdiction, can be limited by judicial construction so as to make it operate only on that which congress may rightfully prohibit and punish. For this purpose we must take these sections of the statute as they are. We are not able to reject a part which is unconstitutional, and retain the remainder, because it is not possible to separate that which is unconstitutional, if there be any such, from that which is not. The proposed effect is not to be attained by striking out or disregarding words that are in the section, but by inserting those that are not now there. Each of the sections must stand as a whole or fall all together. The language is plain. There is no room for construction, unless it be as to the effect of the Constitution. The question, then, to be determined is whether we can introduce words of limitation into a penal statute so as to make it specific, when, as expressed, it is general only.

It would certainly be dangerous if the legislature could set a net large enough to catch all possible offenders and leave it to the courts so step inside and say who could be rightfully detained and who should be set at large. This would, to some extent, substitute the judicial for the legislative department of the government. The courts enforce the legislative will when ascertained, if within the constitutional grant of power. Within its legitimate sphere, congress is supreme and beyond the control of the courts, but if it steps outside of its constitutional limitations and attempts that which is beyond its reach, the courts are authorized to, and when called upon in due course of legal proceedings must, annul its encroachments upon the reserved power of the states and the people.

To limit this statute in the manner now asked for, would be to make a new law, not to enforce an old one. This is no part of our duty.

We must, therefore, decide that congress has not as yet provided by "appropriate legislation" for the punishment of the offence charged in the indictment, and that the circuit court properly sustained the demurrers and gave judgment for the defendants.

This makes it unnecessary to answer any of the other questions certified. Since the law which gives the presiding judge the casting vote in cases of division, and authorizes a judgment in accordance with his opinion, (Rev. Stat., sec. 650,) if we find that the judgment as rendered is correct, we need not do more than affirm. If, however, we reverse, all questions certified, which may be considered in the final determination of the case according to the opinion we express, should be answered.

The judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT.

No. 146.—OCTOBER TERM, 1875.

In Error to the Supreme Court of the State of South Carolina.

HENRY H. RAYMOND, plaintiff in error, v. WILLIAM M. THOMAS.

REBELLION—POWER OF COMMANDER OVER PROCEEDINGS OF COURTS.

Held, that an order of General Canby entered on the 28th of May, 1868, declaring a certain decree of one of the courts of South Carolina annulled, was absolutely void.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

Mr. Justice SWAYNE delivered the opinion of the Court.

The facts in this case, as disclosed in the record, are somewhat involved and complicated. So far as it is necessary to consider them for the purposes of this opinion, they are not voluminous.

On the 25th of August, 1863, Mary Raymond bought from Thomas, the defendant in error, a small house and lot, situated in Greenville, South Carolina, for which she gave him her note for $7,000, payable six months after the ratification of peace between the Confederates and the United States, or before, at her option, with annual interest from the 1st day of September, 1863. The premises were conveyed at the time of the sale, and the grantee gave back a mortgage to secure the payment of the note.

On the 28th of May, 1866, Thomas filed his bill in the Court of Common Pleas of Greenville county to foreclose the mortgage. The vendee answered. The case was heard in July, 1866, before Chancellor Johnson. The chancellor held that the note was intended by the parties to be payable in Confederate money, and that in view of all the circumstances, the amount of principal equitably due upon it was $2,500. The case was referred to a master to compute the aggregate principal and interest due upon this basis. This decree, upon the appeal of Thomas, was affirmed by the court of errors of the State, at its December term, 1867. On the 25th of January, 1868, Chancellor Carrol, sitting in the common pleas, decreed that the amount due in conformity to the master's report was $3,265.62; that unless that sum was paid as directed, the commissioner should sell the premises, and that if the proceeds were insufficient to pay the debt and costs, the complainant might issue execution for the balance.

On the 28th of May following, General Canby issued an order whereby he annulled this decree. The order contains a slight error in the description of the decree, but the meaning of the order is clear. The discrepancy is, therefore, immaterial. On the 24th of December, 1868, the military order, non obstante, the commissioner reported that he had sold the premises for $1,005. On the 2d of January, 1869, Mary Raymond filed her bill in the Court of Common Pleas of Charleston county, setting forth the facts above stated, and further, that the sheriff of that county was about to proceed to collect from her the balance still due upon the decree, amounting to $2,653.26. She prayed that Thomas and all others be perpetually enjoined from further enforcing the decree. The court decreed accordingly. Subsequently, Gaillard, the purchaser, and Thomas answered, and moved to dissolve the injunction. In July, 1869, this motion was overruled, and the injunction again ordered to be made perpetual. An appeal was taken to the Supreme court of the State, but failed for want of prosecution.

In December, 1870, Thomas obtained leave to amend his original bill of foreclosure. He did so, setting forth, among other things, that the original defendant, Mary Raymond, had died, and that Henry H. Raymond had been appointed her executor, and making him a party. In due time he answered, denying that he was either executor or administrator of the deceased, and insisting that he was not bound to answer, and that no decree could be taken against him. He admitted that he was in possession of her estate and averred that he was ready to pay all her just debts. The amended bill and this answer set forth other things not necessary to be repeated.

The case in this new aspect came on to be heard. It was decreed that the sale of the mortgaged premises be confirmed and that the purchaser have a writ of assistance to enable him to obtain possession, and that the complainant have leave to enter up a judgment against the defendant for the balance due him, and interest and costs, as before decreed. Raymond thereupon removed the case by appeal to the Supreme court of the State. That court, at the April term, 1873, affirmed the decree of the lower court. This writ of error was thereupon sued out by Raymond, and the judgment of the Supreme court is thus brought before us for review.

Outside of the record our attention has been called to an act of the Legislature of South Carolina, of the 2d of September, 1868, touching certain military orders therein mentioned. The act does not embrace or affect the order of General Canby in question in this case.

Nothing more need be said in regard to the act.

The only point insisted upon here by the counsel for the plaintiff in error is the order of General Canby, on the 2d of May, 1868, and its disregard by the Supreme court of South Carolina in the judgment before us. The validity of the order is denied by the defendant in error. Our remarks will be confined to that subject.

The war between the United States and the insurgents terminated in South Carolina, according to the judgment of this court, on the 2d of April, 1866.—The Protector, 12 Wall, 701. The national Constitution gives to Congress the powers, among others, to declare war and suppress insurrections. The latter power is not limited to victories in the field and the dispersion of the insurgent forces. It carries with it inherently, rightful authority to guard against an immediate renewal of the conflict, and to remedy the evils growing out of its rise and progress.—Stewart v. Kahn, 11 Wall., 506.

The close of the war was followed by the period of reconstruction and the laws enacted by Congress with a view to that result.

These laws are the acts of March 2, 1867, (14 Stat., 428,) the act of July 19, 1867, (15 Stat., 14,) and the act of July 11, 1868, (15 Stat., 703.) The two acts first mentioned defined the powers and duties of the military officers placed in command in the several States lately in rebellion. The act of July 11, 1868, provided, among other things, that whenever the Legislature of South Carolina should ratify the 14th amendment to the Constitution of the United States she should be again admitted to representation in Congress, and that it should be the duty of the President, within ten days after receiving official information of the ratification, to issue a proclamation announcing the fact. Such a proclamation was issued on the 11th of July, 1868.—(15 Stat., 704.) This replaced the State in her normal relations to the Union. Nothing further was necessary but the elections provided for, which speedily followed, to render her rehabilitation complete.

We have looked carefully through the acts of March 2, 1867, and July 19th, 1867. They give very large governmental powers to the military commanders designated, within the States committed respectively to their jurisdiction, but we have found nothing to warrant the order here in question. It was not an order for mere delay. It did not prescribe that the proceeding should stop until credit and confidence were restored and business should resume its wonted channels. It wholly annulled a decree in equity regularly made, by a competent judicial officer, in a plain case, clearly within his jurisdiction, and where there was no pretence of any unfairness, of any purpose to wrong or oppress, or of any indirection whatsoever.

The meaning of the legislature constitutes the law. A thing may be within the letter of a statute but not within its meaning, and within its meaning though not within its letter.—Stewart v. Kahn, supra.

The clearest language would be necessary to satisfy us that Congress intended that the power given by these acts should be so exercised.

It was an arbitrary stretch of authority needful to no good end that can be imagined. Whether Congress could have conferred the power to do such an act is a question we are not called upon to consider. It is an unbending rule of law that the exercise of military power, where the rights of the citizen are concerned, shall never be pushed beyond what the exigency requires.—Mitchell v. Harmony, 13 How., 115; Warden v. Bailey, 4 Taunt., 67; Fabrigas v. Moysten, 1 Cowp., 161; S. C., 1 Smith's L. C., pt. 2, p., 934. Viewing the subject before us from the standpoint indicated, we hold that the order was void.

This is the only Federal question presented for our consideration. As the Supreme court of the State decided it correctly, our jurisdiction terminates at this point; we can look no further into the case.

The judgment is affirmed.

U. S. CIRCUIT COURT, N. D. ILLINOIS.

LYDIA A. JARVIS v. THE CONNECTICUT MUTUAL LIFE INS. CO.

LIFE POLICY—SUICIDE—INSANITY—CAUSED BY INTEMPERANCE.

1. THE RULE AS TO RECOVERY.—The court states the law as laid down by the Supreme Court in such cases, stating when a recovery may be had, although the party insured takes his own life, and when not.

2. BURDEN OF PROOF.—Self destruction renders the policy void. The burden of proof is on the plaintiff to show such kind and degree of insanity as will relieve the act of that consequence.

3. EFFECT OF INTEMPERANCE.—The court instructed the jury, that if they found that the assured had impaired his health by intemperance, then the policy was void; that this was sufficient of itself to defeat a recovery. He agreed that he should not impair his health by intemperance, and if he broke that provision a recovery cannot be had on the policy.

4. INSANITY AS AN EXCUSE.—If the mental condition, which would otherwise avoid the effect of the self-destruction clause, was produced by intemperance, the plaintiff cannot recover. Insanity induced by violation of one condition of the policy cannot be set up as an excuse for the violation of another condition.

Charge of Judge HOPKINS.

Gentlemen of the jury: This is an action upon a life policy for $2,000 dated May, 1866, on the life of one Jarvis, issued by the defendant, payable to the plaintiff. He died December 4, 1871. The proof of death is admitted to have been made December 23d, 1871. This entitles the plaintiff to a verdict, unless it is shown that the deceased violated some of the conditions of the policy. The provisions claimed to have been broken are first, that the insured became intemperate so as to impair his health, and second, that the party came to his death by his own hand. The plaintiff has admitted that the insured came to his death by his own hand. This entitles the defendant to a verdict, unless the plaintiff has shown that the deceased was insane so as to be incapable of committing the act in the sense these words are used in the policy, that is to such an extent as to relieve the act of the character of self-destruction. The plaintiff on this point has the burden of proof upon him.

I will read and adopt the charge of Judge Dillon, which has been approved by the Supreme Court, with reference to the meaning of these words in the policy, and as to what must be shown to avoid the act of self destruction.

"It is not every kind or degree of insanity which will so far excuse the party taking his own life, as to make the company insuring liable.

"To do this, the act of self-destruction must have been the consequence of the insanity, and the mind of the decedent must have been so far deranged as to have made him incapable of using a rational judgment in regard to the act which he was committing.

"If he was impelled to the act by an insane impulse, which the reason that was left him did not enable him to resist, or if his reasoning powers were so far overthrown by his mental condition that he could not exercise his reasoning faculties on the act he was about to do, the company is liable. On the other hand, there is no presumption of law, prima facie, or otherwise, that self-destruction arises from insanity; and if you believe from the evidence, that the decedent, although excited, or angry, or distressed in mind, formed the determination to take his own life, because in the exercise of his usual reasoning faculties, he preferred death to life, then the company is not liable, because he died by his own hand, within the meaning of the policy."

The Supreme Court summed up the rule in this language:

"We hold the rule on the question before us, to be this: If the assured, being in the possession of his ordinary reasoning faculties, from anger, pride, jealousy, or a desire to escape from the ills of life, intentionally takes his own life, the proviso attaches, and there can be no recovery. If the death is caused by the voluntary act of the assured, he knowing and intending that his death shall be the result of his act; but when his reasoning faculties are so impaired that he is not able to understand the moral character, the general nature, consequences and effect of the act he is about to commit, or when he is impelled thereto by an insane impulse which he has not the power to resist, such death is not within the contemplation of the parties to the contract, and the insurer is liable."

This construction of these words in the policy, and the quantity of evidence to avoid them, is binding upon this court, and the testimony must be considered with reference to that construction.

If you find that the testimony brings the insured's condition of mind within this doctrine thus laid down by the Supreme Court, the defense of self-destruction is answered. Upon this point, you will look at the evidence as to his usual habits, his condition, his circumstances, and all the surroundings and influences tending to such an act, and bearing upon his mental condition, and determine whether, or not, the insured was in the condition mentioned in the foregoing instructions. If he was, then he was not morally responsible for the act, and, in a legal sense, there was no self-destruction. If he was in the enjoyment of his faculties to the extent hereinbefore mentioned, the condition of the policy was broken, and the defendant is not liable.

There is still the question of intemperance. If you should find that the insured had impaired his health by intemperance, then the policy is void. This is sufficient of itself to defeat a recovery. He agreed that he should not impair his health by intemperance, and if he broke that provision, he cannot recover. If the evidence shows you that such is the case, the policy is void; but the burden of proof upon that point, is upon the defendant. The defendant must show, to your satisfaction, that after the policy was issued, the insured did impair his health by habits of intemperance. If the evidence shows that, it avoids the policy. You must find it, however, upon the evidence.

If you should find that his intemperance produced the mental condition relied upon to avoid the effect of the self-destruction clause in the policy, then the plaintiff cannot recover. If the insanity was produced by habits prohibited by the policy, then it cannot be set up in avoidance of a breach of another condition. Intemperance avoids the policy, and if intemperance produced the insanity, this insanity cannot be set up as an excuse for the violation of the self-destruction clause.

The weight of the testimony is for you to settle, and it is for you to draw conclusions from it. Opinions of witnesses are admissible in some cases, and when admissible, it is the duty of the jury to give them such weight as they deem them entitled to. They are not absolutely binding upon you, but you may reject or receive them, as you think them worthy.

If you find for the plaintiff, you will find the sum mentioned in the policy, with interest at six per cent., after ninety days from Dec. 23, 1871—that is, from March 23rd, 1872.

R. L. DIVINE, and HUNTER & PAGE, for plaintiff.

ISHAM & LINCOLN, for defendants.

In this case, the jury failed to agree.

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT.

ABSTRACT OF OPINIONS FILED AT OTTAWA IN 1876.

George W. Myers v. First National Bank of Fairbury.—Appeal from Livingston.—Opinion by SCOTT, J.

SURETY—EXTENSION OF TIME WITHOUT CONSENT—CONSIDERATION RELEASE OF SURETY.

Held, 1. That, where an extension of time is given a principal debtor, for the payment of money, by a valid and binding agreement, without the assent of the sureties, the sureties are thereby released.

2. The consideration for such an extension may be the payment of interest, even at a usurious rate, on the indebtedness.

287. Town of Partridge v. John Snyder. Appeal from Woodford.—Opinion by SHELDON, J.

APPEAL FROM A JUSTICE—WHEN ALLOWED—BOND OF TOWN—DEFECTIVE BOND—AMENDMENT.

STATEMENT.—Prosecution for obstructing highway. Defendant dismissed; and appeal by the people. Held,

That, although, in criminal cases, indictable in the name of the people of Illinois, as also in cases of misdemeanor, no appeal lies to the Circuit court from a justice of the peace, yet, where the action is only a quasi criminal suit, for the recovery of a fine or penalty, it is to be regarded as virtually a civil action, and thus appealable.

2. In such a case as this, the appeal bond should be by the supervisor, in the name of the town.

3. The Circuit court should give opportunity to amend a defective bond; and errs if it dismisses the appeal, on the ground of the deficiency.

288. Alvin S. Widhams v. Francelia M. Hotchkiss.—Appeal from Superior Court of Cook.—Opinion by SCHOLFIELD, J.

AMENDMENT IN ACTIONS BEFORE A J. P.—PRESUMPTION—MISTAKE IN APPEAL—JURISDICTION—TRANSFER—CIRCUIT JUDGES HOLDING COURTS IN CHICAGO—SELECTION OF COURT BY APPELLANT.

STATEMENT.—Appeal from J. P. to the Superior court. Held,

1. That, in amending an error as to the name of a party, it is not requisite that a record be made showing a request and by whom made, nor that the request be made in writing, and preserved with the papers. And the change will be presumed to haveeen made before the trial.

2. Where an appeal is taken to the Superior court, and, by mistake, the papers are filed in the Circuit court, which, on discovering the mistake, orders the cause transferred to the Superior court, the Circuit court does not thereby acquire jurisdiction, and has a right to order the transfer.

Wm. S. Proudfoot v. John Wightman.—Appeal from Superior Court of Cook.—Opinion by CRAIG, J.

SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE—SALE OF LANDS BY AGENT—PROOF OF AGENCY—BURDEN OF PROOF—DEGREE OF PROOF.

STATEMENT.—Bill for the specific performance of a contract for the sale of lands, executed in writing, by a real estate agent, for the owner. Defense that he was not an agent. Bill dismissed. Held,

That, while parol authority is sufficient to authorize an agent to contract for the sale and conveyance of lands, yet, when a purchaser relies upon the parol authority of an agent to sell real estate, the proof to establish the power of the agent should be clear, certain, and specific; and the burden of proof is on the purchaser, when he brings a bill for specific performance. And, more than a preponderance of evidence is requisite, especially where the land was contracted for at a great reduction of value.

E. M. Gleason v. The Village of Jefferson.—Appeal from Superior Court of Cook.—Opinion by WALKER, J.

...TLE IN A SUIT TO ENJOIN MAKING OF ...STREETS—PROOF OF POSSESSION.

...ATEMENT.—Bill to enjoin the village ...s street commissioners from grading and improving as streets certain slips of ground. Held,

1. That, in such an action, there must appear more than a naked right of possession, in behalf of the complainant, as to the land. It must be an ownership in fee simple to justify the restraining power of the court to be exercised. And the evidence must be quite clear. Evidence which would support an action for trespass will not sustain an action of this kind.

2. Even possession is not proven by the existence of a string of fence, any farther than the actual enclosure extends.

James Thompson v. Frederick Bulson.—Appeal from Knox.—Opinion by SCHOFIELD, J.

DIVISION FENCE—COMPELLING REPAIRS—REQUISITES TO PROCEEDING.

STATEMENT.—The question in this case was whether, if one of the parties to a division fence neglects to keep his part in repairs, the other can, under the statute, select the viewers alone, and without notice to the party in default in keeping up the fence; and obtain a binding result by their proceeding. Held,

That, collating the several statutes and sections relating to the action of fence viewers together, it is a logical construction that one party cannot, without notice to the other, select viewers, and bind the other by the proceeding.

Marcus Belden v. S. D. Perkins.—Appeal from Warren.—Opinion by CRAIG, J.

ASSUMPSIT FOR MONEY HAD AND RECEIVED—EQUITY RULES THEREIN—PLEDGES AND TRANSFERS THEREOF.

Held, 1. That, in assumpsit, on a common count for money had and received, the main inquiry is, whether the defendant holds money which ex equo et bono belongs to the plaintiff. It has frequently been called an equitable action, and it approaches nearer to a bill in equity than any other common law action; and indeed has many of the advantages, without the artificial formalities and dilatory proceedings, of a chancery suit. Equitable rules must control in the trial of such a count.

2. But where it appears that property was placed in the hands of a creditor, as security for the payment of rent, even if the debtor had the right of deciding when the property should be sold, it will have the legal status of pledged property.

3. If, in such case, the pledgee sells the property, without notice to the pledgor, and appropriates the money, and the pledgor brings an action in assumpsit for money had and received, the judgment must be only for the surplus, over and above the amount of the debt on which it had been pledged.

4. When property is pledged, the pledgee acquires a special property in the goods, and a mere transfer of the pledged property does not destroy the original lien. The pledgee may deliver the goods to a stranger without consideration, or he may sell and assign all his interest, absolutely or conditionally, by way of pawn, without, in either case, destroying the original lien, or giving the owner a right to reclaim them, on any other or better terms than he could have done before such delivery, or assignment. Whatever doubt may be indulged as te a mere factor, in case of a strict pledge, if the pledgee transfers the same to his own creditor, the latter may hold the pledge until the debt of the original owner is discharged.

William Goldie v. Alexander McDonald.—Appeal from Superior Court of Cook.—Opinion by SCOTT, J.

FILING AFFIDAVIT OF CLAIM—TIME—NOTARIAL CERTIFICATE AND AMENDMENT THEREOF—PRESUMPTION OF DEFENDANT'S RESIDENCE.

Held, 1. An affidavit of merits filed by a plaintiff, according to the statute, will be held as filed with the declaration, within the meaning of the statute, if it is filed more than ten days before the term at which the declaration is filed.

2. A certificate of a notary in another State may be amended; and will then be prima facie evidence that an oath required by law was taken before that officer.

3. It will be presumed that a defendant is a resident of the county where he was served with process.

Daniel Healey v. Charles M. Charnley.—Appeal from Superior Court of Cook.—Opinion by SCOTT, J.

AFFIDAVIT OF CLAIM A PLEADING—AMENDMENT THEREOF.

Held, 1. That an affidavit of claim filed by a plaintiff, is a pleading; and is amendable, like any other pleading.

2. The statute allows an extension of time to file it, and an amended affidavit of claim will be regarded as a new one, and the leave of the court to file it will be regarded in effect as an extension of the time of filing, and so within the statute.

Simpson v. Bradner.—Appeal from Woodford.—Opinion per curiam.

REPEAL OF STATUTE BY IMPLICATION.

STATEMENT.—Action against trustees of a coal company for failing to make report of their doings, as required by § 12, of the act of 1849, title "Corporations." Held,

That the act of 1849 was superseded by the act of 1857; and thereby virtually repealed.

Eleanor Fight v. Thomas Holt.—Appeal from LaSalle.—Opinion by SCOTT, J.

HOMESTEAD RIGHTS AGAINST HEIRS—PARTITION—GRANTEES OF HEIRS—SALE OF LANDS IN PARTITION—DOWER.

Held, 1. That the acts of 1851, and 1857, in relation to homesteads, only created an exemption from forced sales, or alienations by the husband, and did not extend to the widow the right of homestead in premises of which her husband died seized, as against the heirs.

2. A grantee, or purchaser from an heir, occupies exactly the same position as the heir; and is entitled to assert the same rights in the premises.

3. Where there is a petition for partition, if the premises are not susceptible of division, it is proper to decree a sale subject to the widow's dower.

T. S. Dobbins v. H. C. Higgins.—Appeal from Superior Court of Cook.—Opinion by WAKKER, J.

QUANTUM MERUIT, OR PAYMENT PRO TANTO IN ABANDONED CONTRACT—SET-OFF—INTEREST.

Held, 1. That where there is a contract to perform work, and to be paid monthly therefor, and the person for whom the work is done fails in the monthly payment, the other party may abandon the contract, and recover pro tanto at the contract price.

2. The party in default can not set-off money paid to the hands of the contractor, unless the contractor authorizes him to make such payment.

3. Interest at six per cent. may be allowed when judgment is rendered for the amount due, from the time the default occurred.

Artemas Carter v. Lewis D. Webster.—Appeal from Cook.—Opinion by SCOTT, J.

REAL ESTATE AGENT'S COMMISSIONS.

Held, That, where land is left with a real estate agent for sale, he is entitled to his commission, if, through information given by himself, or others for him, a buyer goes to the owner and concludes a bargain, thus without the direct intervention of the agent.

William H. Watchter v. Harriet Albee, Adm.—Appeal from Cook.—Opinion by CRAIG, J.

REQUISITES OF NEW PROMISE UNDER STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS.

Held, That a new promise under the statute of limitations, may arise out of such facts as identify the debt, the subject of the promise, with such certainty as will clearly determine its character, fix the amount due, and show a present unqualified willingness and intention to pay it, at the time acted upon and acceded to by the creditor. It is not sufficient that the debtor admits the correctness of the amount, or that he had received the goods, or the money, or had executed the note sued on; but he must go further, and admit that the debt is still due, and had never been paid—the bare admission of the correctness of the amount being no more a satisfactory answer to the statute, than would be the testimony of a witness to the same fact. It must be an express promise to pay the money, or an unqualified admission that the debt is due, and unpaid; and nothing being said or done at the time, rebutting the presumption of a promise to pay. And the promise must be made to the party interested in the claim, or his agent, and not to a stranger.

Michigan Central R. R. Co. v. E. F. Curtis.—Appeal from Cook.—Opinion by WALKER J.

NEGLIGENCE OF COMMON CARRIER—PROXIMATE AND REMOTE INJURIES—EXCUSE.

STATEMENT.—Trees shipped at Rochester, N. Y., for transportation to various points in this State, (1) by New York Central; and (2) by the road of appellant, to be delivered at Chicago to other roads, were frozen and spoiled in transitu, in the fall of 1871. There was a delay in shipment, both at Detroit and Chicago. The defense was that the great fire had destroyed the freight-house of the defendant, and they had, therefore, to await facilities for shipment. Held,

1. That where a common carrier is charged with loss of goods by negligence, the rule is, that the carrier is liable for direct or immediate consequences of negligence; but where these consequences are remote, and the negligence is but one of a train of causes, there is no liability.

2. Appellants being the last in the chain of transportation agents, and their delay having caused the exposure of the goods to the freezing weather, they are to be held to have caused the injury by proximate negligence, and therefore liable.

3. Nor is the fire a sufficint excuse, especially as it did not evidently render the transportation impossible.

Frank W, Palmer v. The Nassau Bank.—Appeal from Superior Court of Cook.—Opinion by SHELDON, J.

POSSESSION OF NOTE INDORSED IN BANK—TRANSFER BY BANK.

Held, 1. Possession of a note indorsed in bank, is evidence of title.

2. A bank may, through its president, transfer the legal title to a note to that president as an individual.

C. & P. R. R. Co. v. Marion Munger.—Appeal from Superior Court of Cook.—Opinion by SCHOLFIELD, J.

LUNACY — SUIT BY LUNATIC — PLEA IN ABATEMENT.

Held, That when a claim is due to a lunatic, and there has been no conservator appointed, the action must be brought in the name of the lunatic, and a plea in abatement that the plaintiff is a lunatic, is bad, in not giving a better writ.

Aurora Hort. & Agri. Society v. Henry C. Paddock.—Appeal from Kane.—Opinion by CRAIG, J.

POWER OF PRIVATE CORPORATION TO MORTGAGE REAL ESTATE—ULTRA VIRES.

Held, 1. That the power of a corporation to mortgage its real estate, is to be regarded as a necessary incident to the power to acquire and hold real estate. It is the common law rule, that corporations have an incidental right to alien or dispose of their lands and personal property, unless specially restrained by their charter, or by statute; and especially can a mortgage be given for purchase money.

2. Even ultra vires claims may be afterwards enforced, although they might have been enjoined beforehand, on proper application.

William Empson v. The People.—Error To Henry.—Opinion by SHELDON. J.

IMPANELING A GRAND JUROR WHERE PANNEL FAILS—SPECIAL VENIRE.

STATEMENT.—The plaintiff in error claimed that where there is a deficiency in the panel of grand jurors, it should be supplied by ordering the clerk to draw from the jury-box, in the county clerk's office. But, Held,

That, while this was the mode under the statute of 1872, yet, under the statute of 1873. which repealed the former act, the mode is that the county board of the county, at least twenty days before the sitting of the court, shall select twenty-three persons to serve as grand jurors for the ensuing term, who shall be summoned as a grand jury for such term. But where these are discharged (from being irregularly drawn, as in this case,) there is no other mode open, under the statute of 1873, to obtain a needed grand jury, than summoning from the body of the county (as was done in this case), or from the bystanders.

We call attention to the following opinions, reported at length in this issue:

Judicial Power of United States—Removal of Causes from State Courts—Contest of Will.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States by Field, J., holding that where the judicial power of the United States can be applied only because they involve controversies between citizens of different States, it rests with congress to determine at what time the power may be invoked and upon what conditions; whether originally in the Federal Court, or after suit brought in the State Court, and in the latter case, at what stage of the proceedings; whether before issue or trial by removal to a Federal Court, or after judgment on appeal or writ of error; that as the constitution imposes no limitation upon the class of cases involving controversies between citizens of different States, to which the judicial power of the United States may be extended, congress may provide for bringing, at the option of either of the parties, all such controversies within the jurisdiction of the federal judiciary; that the act of congress of March 2d, 1867, in authorizing and requiring the removal to the Circuit Court of the United States of a suit pending or afterwards brought in any State court involving a controversy between a citizen of the State where the suit is brought, and a citizen of another State, thereby invests the Circuit Court with jurisdiction to pass upon and determine the controversy, when the removal is made, though the court could not have taken original cognizance of the case; that a suit to annul a will as a muniment of title and to restrain the enforcement of a decree admitting it to probate, is, in essential particulars, a suit in equity, and if by the law obtaining in a State, customary or statutory, such a suit can be maintained in one of its courts, whatever designation that court may bear, it may be maintained by original process in the Circuit Court of the United States if the parties are citizens of different States. Of the many opinions of the Supreme Court of the United States upon the subject of the removal of causes from State to Federal Courts this would seem to be one of the most important. The question arises, could not a controversy about a claim against a decased person's estate be removed into the Federal Court the same as any other suit, upon the question of the right of Federal Court to interfere in the distribution and settlement of a deceased person's estate when the State laws provided for an equitable distribution of the same, we would refer the reader to the opinion of the Federal Supreme Court by Davis, J., in Yonley v. Lavender et al., reported 7 Chicago Legal News, 154.

The Fifteenth Amendment—The Enforcement Act—Power to punish Election Inspectors—The Third and Fourth Sections Unconstitutional.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States by Waite, C. J., holding that the fifteenth amendment to the constitution of the United States does not confer upon congress authority to impose penalties for every wrongful refusal to receive the vote of a qualified elector at State elections; that it is only when the wrongful refusal at such an election is because of race, or previous condition of servitude; that the third and fourth sections of the Act do not confine their operation to an unlawful discrimination on account of race, etc.; that a statute so general as this in its provisions cannot be made available for the punishment of those who may be guilty of unlawful discrimination against citizens of the United States, while exercising the elective franchise, on account of their race, etc.; that the courts cannot introduce words of limitation into a penal statute and make it specific, when, as expressed, it is general only. This opinion seems to go the length, that where a statute is general and embraces two subjects, one of which is constitutional, and the other is not, the court must, on an indictment for a crime, hold that the whole statute is unconstitional.

Rebellion — Power of Commander over Proceedings of Courts.—The opinion of the Supreme court of the United States by Swayne, J., holding that an order entered by General Canby on the 28th day of May, 1868, annulling a decree entered by one of the courts of South Carolina, was absolutely void.

Life Policy—Self-Destruction — Intemperance.—The charge of Hopkins, J., in the United States Circuit court for the Northern District of Illinois, in a case brought to recover on a policy of insurance, where the deceased had taken his own life. The learned judge instructed the jury that if they found the assured had impaired his health by intemperance, then the policy was void.

Third Class Mail Matter.—The bill which was introduced in the house at the commencement of the session, and passed that body, to repeal that portion of the postal law of last session doubling the postage to be paid on transient newspapers, pamphlets, magazines, proof-sheets, etc., now seems to be sleeping quietly in the senate, and unless it soon finds some more active friends than it has yet had in that body, it will sleep the sleep of death. The members of the popular branch of the national legislature understand that the people are in earnest in desiring to have the old rates restored. The members of the senate are older men—further removed from the people—are less active in discerning the popular will, and less desirous of following it. The bill which passed the house on the 26th of January, has been in the hands of the senate committee on post-offices and post-roads, of which Senator Hamlin is chairman, for more than two months, and no report has been made upon it, but that committee has been foolish enough to propose a bill of its own, the main feature of which is to restore the old and exploded system of a sliding scale of rates, according to distances. The present system is based upon the theory of uniform rates without regard to distance. It is well understood by the people, is convenient, and not calculated to cause mistakes. Just let this proposed bill of the senate committee become a law, and a person, every time he applied a postage stamp to a package of the third class, would have to calculate the distance to the place of destination, and, if he happened to make a mistake in his calculation, the package would be liable to be returned to him—or, if forwarded, the person to whom it was sent would have to be subjected to the payment of the additional postage. This bill should be laid upon the table as soon as possible—the house bill taken up and passed.

The Southern Law Review.—The April number of this very valuable law quarterly, being No. 1 of volume II., is received. Its contents are: 1. Controversies of Modern Continental Jûrists, by U. M. Rose. 2. The Dartmouth College Causes and the Supreme Court of the United States. 3. The Works of Joel Prentiss Bishop, by Hon. Wm. Lawrence. 4. The Cases in which the Master is Liable for Injuries to Servants in His Employ, by Thomas M. Cooley. 5. Concerning the Burden of Proof, by Francis Wharton. 6. The Federal Courts, by Gustavus Schmidt. 7. Notes on Current European Topics, by W. G. Hammond. 8. Book Reviews. 9. Books Received. 10. Notes. This is one of the most interesting numbers of the Review ever issued. The article upon the works of Mr. Bishop is worth more than a year's subscription to any lawyer.

We regard Mr. Bishop as one of the greatest, if not the greatest, of living law writers. He is concise, clear and bold in his style. He fears not to announce a principle and follow it to its legitimate results, even if his conclusions are contrary to the adjudications of a court, no matter how eminent such court may be. The article in question, under the caption of "The Works of Joel Prentiss Bishop," treats of the difficulties of authorship, the requisites of a good treatise on law, the classes of books on unwritten law, and the value of treatises. In stating what Mr. Bishop has accomplished, it says he has stated the law correctly; that he has stated it on legai principle and reason; that he has established legal doctrines, as the result of adjudication, not stated by judges or other text writers; that a large portion of Mr. Bishop's books consists of legal doctrine not found in those of prior authors; that the new matter introduced by Mr. Bishop is the most important of all. Mr. Bishop's First Book of the Law, and his work on the Law of Married Women, are appropriately noticed. This number contains a portrait and sketch of Chancellor Cooper of Tennessee.

This being the first number of the volume, now is a good time to subscribe. Those wishing to do so, should send five dollars to G. I. Jones & Co., St. Louis, Missouri.

Ordinances of the Village of Lemont.—Lemont is a village organized under the General Law of 1872. Its ordinances have been carefully revised by Hon. William H. Skelly, the village attorney. They make a neat volume of about sixty pages, and were issued from the Legal News press on the first of this month. These ordinances are divided into chapters preceded by head lines and head notes. Very similar in form to the Revised Statutes, which make them of easy reference.

Mrs. Lockwood's Hat.—The Washington Law Reporter, of last Saturday, republishes from the Legal News the letter of E. Quality, asking "Should a woman lawyer wear her hat in court?" and says: "Mrs. Lockwood always removes her hat. Precedents are powerful in law and in fashion." If a woman lawyer should follow strictly what is known as etiquette, she would not remove her hat in court; but if she should consider the court room as a place where she has to earn her living upon an equality with her brother members of the bar, she would probably remove her hat, from the same reasons that her brethren do their hats, overcoats and overshoes when trying a case—because they only serve as incumbrances—and it is more respectful to the court to remove them.

Served him right.—At the Manchester assizes on the 12th of March, one Charles Taylor was sentenced by Mr. Justice Blackburne to penal servitude for life for sending a threatening letter to Mr. George Edmund Legge Pearce, surgeon of London, with a view to extort money from him. If some of the black mailers and bribe-takers of America were punished in the same way it would perhaps have a good effect on evil doers.

Fees of Official Referees.—The Public Opinion of the 18th of last month, says:

The Lord Chancellor has, with the concurrence of the Treasury, issued an order that the fees to be taken by any official referee attached to the Supreme court under the provisions of section 83 of the Supreme court of Judicature Act, 1873, shall be as follows:—Upon a reference, for every hour or part of an hour the official referee is occupied, £1. 1s. Where the sittings under a reference are held elsewhere than in London there shall be paid in addition £1. 11s. 6d. for every night the official referee, and 15s. for every night the official referee's clerk, is absent from London, together with reasonable costs of traveling. Where the sittings are held elsewhere than in London the plaintiff shall provide at his expense a place to the satisfaction of the official referee in which the sittings may be held.

We in America would complain most bitterly, if we had to pay over five dollars an hour for the fees of a referee or court commissioner and when the reference is out of the city, the expenses of the referee and his clerks, even the United States District Judges when holding court out of their districts, do not get their expenses paid or any additional compensation.

GOVERNOR JOHN MATTOCKS.

Mrs. Myra Bradwell, Editor of Chicago Legal News.

My Dear Madam:—The inclosed sketch was written by the late Judge Redfield just previous to his last illness,—for publication in a family memorial of Governor Mattocks of Vermont, who died in 1847. As a Vermonter you feel interested in all that relates to your native state, as well as in the profession which now mourns the loss of so eminent a member as the late Judge Redfield. I therefore take pleasure in presenting this sketch to the bar, through the columns of your widely extended paper.

I am very truly yours,

John Mattocks.

Chicago, April, 5th, 1876.

My first recollection of Governor Mattocks, of Peacham, Vermont, dates from the year 1816, when at the age of twelve years I was a pupil at the academy in that town, and in the "town and gown" contests, in ball playing, or other games, General Mattocks, as he was then called, was the champion of the academy boys. I trust it will not be considered scandalous to name here, that the prize in one of these contests, was a gallon of pure whiskey. That was before the days of modern scientific discovery that all stimulus in health is either useless or hurtful, or that the Bible is a myth.

I cannot say that my personal knowledge of Governor Mattocks was of much account from that time until my admission to the bar, in Orleans county, Vermont, in 1827. At that time he stood decidedly at the head of the bar, in that section of the state, and had done so for nearly forty years. He read law, I think, at Middlebury, Vt., with his brother-in-law, Miller, who was a very distinguished member of the bar of that day, when it embraced as much talent to say the least, as it has ever done since. He subsequently removed to Peacham, where he spent the remainder of his life, mainly in the practice of his profession.

Those who think of Peacham as it has been for the last thirty years, isolated from public travel, and equally from that great source of assumed modern enlightment, the conversion by means of rapid revolution and more rapid progress; perched upon hills a thousand feet above tide water, more completely shutting it out from the sunshine of modern progress, than a thousand miles of distance, have no adequate comprehension of what it was in the early years of the present century; when John Mattocks, the young giant, in his profession, and the young leader in the politics of the state, (for that was still in the hands of the old Federalists, the most national, and the most upright and talented party the country has ever produced); the champion of every field and always facile princeps inter pares, might not unjustly be said to wield a wider and more controlling influence than any man of his years had ever done before or has ever done since in the state.

I know this will seem like exaggeration to those in the cities and large towns of the state, and who have not the slightest comprehension how any man, not in contact with the railway and the telegraph can possibly acquire any influence upon anybody or anything. But such men have yet much to learn of the real elements of greatness, whether in individual character or in that of states and empires. When the state was controlled by such men as Isaac Tichenor, Nathaniel and Daniel Chipman, Chauncey Langdon, Charles H. Williams, David Edmonds, Samuel Swift and his brother Benjamin, Samuel Miller, Daniel Farrand, Daniel Buck, Elijah Paine, John Mattocks, Samuel Prentiss and others of like character and calibre Peacham was in fact the headquarters of the council chambers of the party for all the most essential practical ends, and Peacham Academy was then under the leadership of such head masters as Ezra Carter and David Chassell whose equals could not now be found in any similar positions in all New England, and sent forth such pupils as Thaddeus Stevens, the great American commander, and Samuel Merrill, the early political leader in Indiana, and Wilbur Fisk, the almost inspired disciple and preacher of Methodism throughout America, and an army of others of like eminent character and gifts. At such a time we need not wonder that such men as Leonard Worcester, the eloquent preacher and wise and conscientious guide and counselor, and William Chamberlin, and John W. Chandler, (1.) and John Mattocks all residents of Peacham, wielding and surrounded by such influences were able to make an important impression upon public sentiment throughout the state. And such was most unquestionably the fact during all the period of the Federal ascendancy in the state, until the year 1815, with occasional interruptions of more or less extent before that time.

But Gov. Mattocks' great life work was certainly not accomplished mainly in public political positions, although he undoubtedly secured a very large share of the public confidence throughout the whole period of a full and rounded term of earthly existence. He was always the representative of his town in the legislature, whenever he desired it. He was in Congress for two terms before 1827; and again for another term just after 1840. He was a member of the Supreme Court from 1833 to 1835, and governor of the State for two years about 1840, during which period the former vice-president of the United States, Richard M. Johnson, visited the State, and was received by the governor and general assembly in joint session, the governor making one of his always happy speeches of welcome—concluding, in his own inimitable manner, "How are you, Dick Johnson? I am glad to welcome you to this State, and to this chamber." The vice-president afterwards said, he was sorry he had not known his excellency's sobriquet, that he might have replied, "How are you, Jack Mattocks? God bless you!"

But I must hasten to conclude my brief exposition of the public and professional life of one of the most eminent and highly gifted men of my native State—the most gifted, as it always seemed to me, among them all, with the single exception of Senator Phelps, who unquestionably bears the palm in that respect above all others of the State to the present time.

But Gov. Mattocks' great field of excellence and glory was the bar. There is no shamming, and no short-cuts to eminence there. Stern justice applies its measuring-rod with unflinching impartiality to all comers there, whether from the walls of the universities, or from the fields and the flocks, or the highways and byways of common life in any department. There is there no favoritism, and no stinted or grudging recognition of power and strength in that field. The humblest may there expect a patient hearing, and the most highly favored can demand no more. It was my fortune, when I came to the bar in Orleans county, to find all the important advocating in the hands of lawyers from other counties. And of this number, Gov. Mattocks was far the most eminent, although there were many others, such as Fletcher, Cushman, Paddock and Bell, that it would not be easy to match anywhere in the State, at any time since. We naturally felt some humiliation at such a state of things, but we could not break it up, since the clients would control the matter to a large extent, in spite of the advice of the local bar. But we could and did seek redress in another way. Some of the members of that bar attended the terms in the adjoining counties, and returned the favor they did us by arguing their causes. This was always kindly received by Gov. Mattocks, His position was too assured to feel any twinges of envy or jealousy. He said to his old companions of the bar, that it had something of the sound of old Roman times, "delendo est Carthago," more in sport or badinage than in earnest, no doubt.

The most effective and eloquent address I ever heard from Governor Mattocks, was the closing address to the jury on behalf of the Information in the trial of Cleveland(2.)for murder in procuring an abortion. (?) The accused was connected by affinity, with some of the most influential families in the state, who naturally shrunk from being declared kindred with a murderer, which gave great interest to the trial in many important aspects. The court was composed of the chief justice and one other judge of the Supreme Court, with two lay assistants. The law was discussed at the bar from day to day, during the trial, and was supposed to be definitely settled before Mr. Mattocks arose to make his closing argument. The popular sentiment seemed quietly to have settled down into the expectation of a verdict of manslaughter. But Mr. Mattocks had not spoken twenty minutes before we all felt that he was carrying everything before him, with the power of the enchanting wand. The spectators, the bar, and the court, and especially the jury comprehended at a glance that Mattocks would accept nothing less than a verdict of murder in the first degree, and that this he must and would have, in spite of all obstruction from the public opinion, or the charge of the court His manner was cool, almost to solemnity, his diction plain even to the very verge of the common places of the vernacular in ordinary conversation. His person short and dumpy, and his eye almost obscured by fixed introversion, gave no special force to his look, or his manner, which was indeed that of fixedness, rather than of expression. But his words possessed such a power as words never seemed to me to have on any other occasion. He arranged the evidence in such a manner it had never before assumed, and the rule of law which he invoked from the court as the only security of the life of the body politic, and of each of its members, was so simple and natural, as to seem irresistible, and such it proved for the court at once acceded to it, withdrawing all its former announcements.

I have listened to Webster, and to most of the more distinguished American orators, both at the bar and in congress, and to the most distinguished orators of England at the present time, in parliment, as well as at the bar, but for real maddened eloquence, I have never heard anything which seemed to me quite up to this argument of Governor Mattocks. It is scarcely needful to add that Cleveland was convicted of murder and sentenced to death, a most salutary example, but finally his punishment was commuted.

I have listened to a great many of Governor Mattock's arguments at the bar both to court and jury, sometimes when not myself engaged in the cause; sometimes when acting as opposing counsel, and sometimes while sitting as judge, and in all of them there seemed to me great power and ability. I had no reason to suppose myself a particular favorite of the Governor at any time. Our position as opposing counsel in every case where we were both engaged naturally led to no very special intimacy, and in addition to this the effort of a young man to compete as far as possible with one so much his senior, naturally tended to create the feeling of assumption and pretension on my part, unless I was more fortunate than falls to the common lot in such cases. But in our last tournament at the bar, just before his elevation to the bench, where he remained till his own voluntary retirement, when my labors at the bar had been exchanged for others of a graver nature, he acted the part of a noble and generous competitor, saying to some of his friends who urged him to attend to the re-argument of the case, directed by the Supreme Court, that he could never have a better time to retire than when he had made a drawn game with the young lion of the North. It was said with no expectation to have it reach me. He was far too delicate for anything of that character.

But I felt that it was generous and sincere, and as Junius says, "that it would wear well, because it was extorted from him;" and I repeat it here more in justice to him than from any gratification it can give me, when I scarcely expect consolation for the sorrows of advancing years from things of that character.

I am conscious that I have dwelt mainly upon the more serious elements in his character, which were always predominant in all his great efforts at the bar. But in times of relaxation, and when no deep sense of responsibility rested upon him, he was a man of great geniality and playfulness of character. His witticisms in the undertone of the bar, are more remembered than those of almost any other in the state, and many of them are more worth repeating than most of those we meet in collections of the kind. But I have already far transcended the proper limits of such a sketch.

ISAAC F. REDFIELD.

Boston, January 6, 1876.

NOTE.—In our brief enumeration of some of the prominent men in Vermont with whom Governor Mattocks associated and acted, I did not name any of the opposite party although many such existed whose names are held in deserved veneration. Richard Skinner(3.)of Manchester, for many years successively governor and chief justice of the state, was among the ablest and best men which the state has ever had in its public services. The Bradleys, father and son, are remembered with universal respect. Israel Smith, senator in congress, Horatio Seymour, twice senator in Congress, chief justice Aldis, and many others will long be held in the highest esteem as among the most able and faithful of the public servants of the state. There are of course many others to whom reference might be made in a general review of the public men of the state but there is no occasion for it here.

I. F. R.

(1.) John W. Chandler was a near relative of Gen. John L. Thompson, of the law firm of Williams and Thompson of this city, and George W. Chandler of the law firm of Goudy & Chandler also of this city.

(2) Cleveland was sentenced to be hung, and if the sentence was executed, it would be the duty of the sheriff to hang him. The sheriff was the father of the Hon. John A. Jameson, Judge of the Superior court of this county and of Mr. Jameson of the well known printers' Jameson & Morse.

Cleveland was one of the most intimate friends of Sheriff Jameson. After the conviction, the Sheriff realizing his position as the official executioner of one of his dearest friends, suffered untold agonies of mind, from which he was only relieved by the commutation of his sentence. The public feeling ran so high that the Governor feared to commute the sentence himself, and a special act of the legislature had to be obtained. Upon receiving the news of the passage of the act, Sheriff Jameson giving way to the wildest exclamations of joy, every now and then would in a loud voice cry out, "Thank God, he is saved and I havn't got to hang him!"

(3.) Richard Skinner of Manchester, our native town, was the father of Hon. Mark Skinner of this city.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT.

ABSTRACT OF OPINIONS FILED AT OTTAWA IN 1876.

A. R. Wing v. C. L. Dodge.—Appeal from Cook.—Opinion by WALKER, J.

GUARDIAN IN OTHER STATES ACTING IN THIS—PRESUMPTIONS—OBJECTIONS, WHEN TO BE MADE—CAVEAT EMPTOR—DISSOLUTION OF INJUNCTIONS—SUGGESTIONS OF DAMAGES THEREON.

Held, 1. That where a guardian for a lunatic is appointed by a court of another State, competent, under the statute of that State, to make such appointment, and a court afterwards authorizes a sale of the lands of the lunatic, and recites in the decree that the appointment was legally made, the finding cannot be collaterally impeached, or even questioned in the courts of this State. And it does not matter that the finding may have been based on insufficient evidence.

2. Under our statute, our circuit courts can act on the petition of a guardian of a lunatic, appointed in another State, for leave to sell real estate of the lunatic, situated in this State.

3. Even if improper persons, under the foreign statutes, are appointed guardians, our courts will not attempt to remedy the matter, in any way, nor withhold recognition from such guardians de facto.

4. And where it is alleged that, in making a sale, the guardian was not present personally, the Supreme court will not hear the objection, where it was not urged below on the coming in and confirmation of the report; at least, if the sale was not actually fraudulent.

5. The rule of caveat emptor applies to sales of this character, as well as to all other judicial sales.

6. And all objections to the regularity of the sale must be made in season, in the court below.

7. On dissolving an injunction, the court should permit suggestions of damages to be filed, before the suit is finally disposed of. [On cross-errors by appellee, this was decided.]

A. G. Comson v. George Browning.—Error to Superior Court of Chicago.—Opinion by WALKER, J.

APPEAL BOND—ESTOPPEL—PLURALITY OF JUDGES.

Held, 1. That where an appeal bond is sued on, after a case has been decided in the Supreme Court, the appellant is estopped from impeaching the validity of the bond; having derived from it the benefit of having his appeal heard in the Supreme Court, unless the bond actually contravenes some statute, or some rule of public policy.

2. Even if a bond is not a good statutory bond, it may be a good bond at common law, and thus be obligatory.

3. It is error for the judges of the Superior Court or Circuit Court, to set in banc, or as a body. All proceedings should purport to have taken place under a single judge, and not by one judge presiding over others sitting with him.

Archibald Zuel v. Thomas Brown.—Appeal from Grundy.—Opinion by WALKER. J.

EXECUTION OF NOTE IN SUIT BEFORE A J. P. —PROOF THEREOF — PARTNERSHIP LIABILITY — PLEAS IN ABATEMENT AS TO JOINT LIABILITY—PLEA AS TO WRONGFUL USE OF FIRM NAME.

STATEMENT.—Suit on a promissory note for $200, before a J. P. This plea was put in on the trial: "And now comes the said Archibald Zuel, one of the said defendants in the above entitled cause, and says that he neither signed, or authorized, nor consented to the execution of the said note declared on, and of the truth of this he puts himself upon the country." The note was signed "Randall and Zuel." They were summoned by the names of "Archibald Zuel and Gersham Randall, firm of Randall & Zuel." It was objected that the plea, though sworn to, was an insufficient denial of the execution of the note, so that plaintiff was not under obligation to prove such execution. Held,

1. That technicalities are not regarded in proceedings before a justice of the peace.

2. That no plea needed to be entered, but an affidavit would have been sufficient.

3. Though the two defendants were partners, yet one could not sign a note in the partnership name, outside the partnership business, without the express consent of the other.

4. At the common law, a party offering any kind of an instrument in evidence, was required to prove its execution. But, under our statute, this needs not to be done, unless the execution is denied under oath—yet then it is essential to recovery.

5. Where a partnership does not exist, the joint liability must be denied by plea in abatement. But if a partnership exists, and the firm name is wrongfully used for the private purposes of one of the partners, the proper course is to file a plea denying the execution of the instrument, verified by affidavit.

Samuel Getts v. Barrett C. Clark.—Appeal from Will.—Opinion by SCOTT, J.

LIABILITY FOR NECESSARIES OF MINOR AWAY FROM HOME VOLUNTARILY.

STATEMENT.—Goods sold to a minor daughter, which were necessary to make her comfortable; but she was living away from the home of her father, and working for wages, and reserving the benefit of her own labor, although her father was a man of considerable wealth. As no reason was shown for this, the court Held,

That it must be presumed that he would have supplied her wants, had she remained at home. An express promise, or circumstances from which a promise may be implied, must be shown to justify holding a father liable for necessaries supplied to minor children.

Guy Wilson v. Rupert Church.—Appeal from McHenry.—Opinion by CRAIG, J.

ENTIRE CONTRACT FOR SERVICE.

Held, That where a contract for services is absolutely for one year, and the employer discharges the employee, without sufficient cause, the employee can recover for the whole term. But if the employee consented to the discharge, he cannot recover, whether the consent is expressed by word or acts.

W. H. Ovington v. G. W. Smith,—Appeal from Cook.—Opinion by SCHOLFIELD, J.

CONSTRUCTION OF BOND—OBLIGATION OF INJUNCTION BOND CONSTRUED.

Held, 1. That on a bond, the undertaking of the surety is to be strictly construed, and he can not be held liable beyond the precise terms of the instrument.

2. So, where the condition of an injunction bond is, to pay A. and B. the damages they sustain by the issuing of the injunction writ, on the dissolution, and it is dissolved only as to A., and continues as to B., A cannot bring an action on the bond, since there was no undertaking to pay him such damages as he should sustain by the dissolution as to him alone.

C. B. & Q. R. R. v. Clara M. Harwood.—Appeal from Stark.—Opinion by SHELDON, J.

ACCIDENT AT CROSSING OF RAILROAD—COMPARATIVE NEGLIGENCE—LEGAL REQUIREMENT—RULE OF DAMAGES—INCONSISTENT INSTRUCTIONS.

STATEMENT.—Suit for damages on the death of plaintiff's husband, from collision with a passing train, in driving a team across a public crossing of a railroad. Held,

1. That it is the duty of a person, coming to a railroad crossing of a highway, to exercise care and caution to avoid collision with any passing train; and to use precaution, before going thereon, to ascertain whether there is any train approaching. And the failure to ring a bell, or sound a whistle, does not exempt the traveler from this duty.

2. Inconsistent instructions, which leave a jury at discretion to select one or the other as the guide to a verdict, constitute fatal error.

3. There is no requirement of law that in approaching a highway a train must slacken its speed.

4. The rule of damages in a case of this kind is the pecuniary damage suffered.

(CRAIG, J., dissenting as to the legal effect of the instructions, taken together.)

Homer v. Spellman.—Appeal from Superior Court of Cook.—Opinion by BREESE, J.

AUTHENTICATION OF COURT RECORDS FROM OTHER STATES—PLEA OF DISCHARGE BY BANKRUPTCY, WHEN NOT ALLOWED.

STATEMENT.—Action of debt on a judgment rendered in Connecticut. Plea nul tiel record, and a claim that the record was not sufficiently authenticated. Held,

1. That under the acts of Congress, it is a sufficient authentification of such a record, where the clerk of the court certifies under the seal of the court, and the presiding judge certifies that the attestation is in due form.

2. A plea of discharge in bankruptcy cannot be entered where an action is for "the covins, frauds, wrongs and injuries" committed by defendant. No debt originating in fraud is discharged by bankruptcy.

James Mix v. Sarah Baldue.—Appeal from Kankakee.—Opinion by SHELDON, J.

SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE—WAIVER OF DEFAULT—CONSIDERATION—MUTUALITY.

STATEMENT.—Suit for specific performance on this instrument:

"I will sell Sarah Delora the north half of lot number four, in block No. forty-four, in town of Momence, for fifty dollars, dating the transaction from this day; and will execute her papers whenever she is prepared to pay, within three years, as she is a widow.

Momence, Ill., April 15, '63.

JAMES MIX."

Decree granted.

There had been a prior contract with the husband, before his death, for the sale of the lot; under which he, with his family, took possession, and made improvements thereon.

Under the above stipulation, the widow did not offer pay within the time, nor within a reasonable period thereafter. Held,

1. That, though the delay might be excusable, yet, without excuse, it was fatal; unless there was proof of waiver. But a waiver may be inferred from acts, (as in this case.)

2. It being objected that the above instrument was invalid, because of a want of mutuality. as the complainant did not therein promise to pay, it was held that making improvements on the lot would be sufficient to raise a consideration.

City of Chicago v. Caroline McGiven.—Appeal from Superior Court of Chicago.—Opinion by SHELDON, J.

NEGLIGENCE IN SIDEWALKS—EXPERT TESTIMONY AS TO CONDITION OF THE WALK—READING LAW BOOKS TO JURY—MEASURE OF CITY'S OBLIGATION IN CONSTRUCTING SIDEWALKS.

STATEMENT.—Action for injuries received in slipping and falling upon a glass plate, inserted in a sidewalk, in Chicago; which plate had just been covered with a light fall of snow. It was situated nearly three feet from a basement staircase; and fifteen feet from the outer curbstone. On the trial, a mechanic was introduced, as an expert witness, to give his opinion that the glass was dangerous in that position. Also, an attorney was allowed to read law-books to the jury. Held,

1. That a mere slippery condition of sidewalks, arising from ice and snow not accumulated so as to constitute an obstruction, is not such a defect as will make the city liable for accidents.

2. A city is not required to construct its sidewalks so as to secure immunity from injury in using them. nor is it bound to employ the utmost care and exertion to that end. Its duty, under the law, is only to see that its sidewalks are reasonably safe, for persons exercising ordinary care and caution in using them.

3. It is only in matters of science and skill that an expert witness can be allowed to give his opinion. Where a jury are able to draw proper inferences from the facts proved, they must be left to do so without expressed opinions of experts. In this case, therefore, expert testimony was inadmissible; for the jury could decide for themselves whether the sidewalk was reasonably safe.

4. It is a reprehensible practice for attorneys to read law books to a jury, and should not be allowed in a civil case.

[Except on this last point, Chief Justice Scott dissented both from the reasoning and conclusions of the court.]

People ex rel. Montony v. Common Council of Aurora et al.—Mandamus.—Opinion per curiam.

JUDGE'S CLAIM TO COMPENSATION ON FAILURE OF ELECTION.

The above case rules this; but there is this distinct feature here, namely—that the judge sues out a mandamus for compensation since the failure to hold the election. And his petition was granted.

SUPREME COURT OF INDIANA.

WE take the following abstract of an important case from the Indianapolis Sentinel:

ACTION BY MARRIED WOMAN TO RECOVER, AFTER BECOMING OF AGE, HER SEPARATE REAL ESTATE, SOLD AND CONVEYED WHEN SHE WAS AN INFANT UNDER COVERTURE—COMPETENCY OF JURORS—WHEN THE HUSBAND'S ATTORNEY BECOMES THE WIFE'S ATTORNEY—ADMISSIBILITY OF TRANSCRIPT OF JUDGMENT AS EVIDENCE—THE DEED OF AN INFANT MARRIED WOMAN IS NOT VOID, BUT VOIDABLE MERELY, UNDER THE STATUTE—DEED MUST BE DISAFFIRMED WITHIN A REASONABLE TIME AFTER REACHING AGE—ESTOPPEL.

3985. Arabela Scranton v. Stewart and Rickets, Ohio C. C. Reversed. Opinion by BUSKIRK, J.

By this action the appellant sought to recover the possession of certain described real estate, upon the ground that when she and her husband conveyed the same to the appellee, Stewart, she was an infant under the age of twenty-one, and a femme covert. Rickets was the tenant of Stewart.

The court is of opinion that the jurors objected to were competent, and that the court committed no error in overruling the objections to them. The rule laid down in Fahnstock v. the State, 23 Ind., 231, is the most accurate, comprehensive and practical one on this point.

The court is of opinion that Davis should be regarded as the attorney of both Mr. and Mrs. Scranton, and that the communication made by Mrs. Scranton was privileged. The rule laid down by Taylor in his work on evidence, vol. 1, p. 826, is as follows: "So if a wife were induced by her husband to deal with her separate interests under the advice of her husband's attorney, such attorney would be regarded by the client as acting for both husband and wife."

The evidence referred to in the 5th, 7th and 9th reasons for a new trial was admissible as tending to establish a ratification of the conveyance of the land by Mrs. Scranton.

The admissibility of a transcript of a judgment is a question of law to be decided by the court. And the court erred in admitting the transcript of the judgment of the appellant against her husband as it appeared of record that the judgment was obtained by fraud.

The instructions, number 13, 14 and 15, complained of present three questions:

1. Is the deed of an infant married woman void or is it voidable merely?

2. Was the appellant required after she arrived at the age of twenty-one years, and while she remained under coverture, to disaffirm her conveyance to appellee, and if she was, did she, within reasonable time, disaffirm such conveyance?

3. Are the facts recited in the 13th or 15th instructions sufficient to estop the appellant from disaffirming her said conveyance and recovering back the real estate in controversy?

As to the first question, section 6, 1 G. & H. 258, provides that "the joint deed of husband and wife shall be sufficient to convey and pass the lands of the wife, but not to bind her to any covenants therein." The fifth and sixth sections of the act concerning the marriage relations are as follows: "Section 5. No lands of any married woman shall be liable for the debts of her husband, but such lands, and the profits therefrom, shall be her separate property, as fully as if she was unmarried. Provided that such wife shall have no power to incumber or convey such lands except by deed, in which her husband shall join." "Section 6. The separate deed of the husband shall convey no interest in the wife's lands." 1 G. & H. 374.

The capacity of a married woman to convey her real estate is the creature of the statute law; and to make her deed effectual the forms and solemnities prescribed by the statute must be followed. It has been decided that the joint deed of the husband and wife, as between them and the grantee, will be valid, although not acknowledged by the wife. (33 Ind., 393; 25 Ind., 347.)

Section 6 supra declares that the joint deed of husband and wife shall be sufficient to convey and pass the lands of the wife. In section 5 the language is: "No lands of any married woman," etc; nothing is said about infancy, in connection with the power to convey. Any married woman may convey her lands if her husband joins with her. If it be true that the statute does not embrace an infant married woman, then it must result that all conveyances by married women who are infants are absolutely void; but it has been repeatedly held that the deed of an infant married woman, where her husband joins with her, is not void, but is voidable merely. (7 Blackf., 442; 4 Ind., 403, 7 do, 398; 12 do, 76; 13 do, 396; 24 do. 385; 41 do, 586.)

At the time of the execution of the deed appellant was both a femme covert and an infant. The infancy of the plaintiff presents a distinct question from that of her coverture. Each disability must be considered by itself, and neither can derive any additional force from being coupled with the other. Under our statute a femme covert can not convey her lands unless her husband joins with her in the deed, and unless the deed is executed in the mode prescribed by statute, and when a deed is thus executed, the disability of coverture is removed, and that of infancy alone remains. The deed of a married woman is void when the statutory requirements are not complied with. The deed of an infant, whether married or unmarried, is not void but voidable merely. [See 17, Wend., 119; 36 Maine, 336; 3 Robertson N. Y., 429; 52 Barb, 141; 34 Ala., 150; 5 Ohio State, 319; 17 Texas, 341.]

As to the second question: There is a distinction between contracts executory and executed contracts on this point. To render an infant liable on an executory contract, he must expressly ratify it on reaching twenty-one; when the act is executed, as where a deed has been made, the infant must, on arriving at full age, do some act to disaffirm the contract. (40 Ind., 148; 41 Ind., 586.) The deed to the appellee being voidable merely, the title to the land was in the grantee until divested by some act of the maker of the deed. The appellant was required to disaffirm her conveyance within a reasonable time after arriving at age, (41 Ind., 586) and if Wiles v. Singerman (24 Ind., 385) rules, otherwise it is incorrect. Three years after arriving at age was a reasonable time within the meaning of this rule.

But it is insisted that appellant was estopped by her acts from disaffirming her contract. It is well settled that a married woman may be estopped by matters in pais. (6 Ind., 289; 21 do, 344.)

The most material act relied upon as an estoppel is that when the appellant came of age there was due her husband, upon the notes given for purchase money of the land in dispute, the sum of $1,250, and that she remained silent and permitted the appellee to pay such sum. To constitute this an estoppel it must appear that appellant knew that the purchase money was unpaid, and that the appellee was ignorant of the fact that the appellant was an infant when the deed was made.

The evidence is such as to preclude the estoppel under this rule. The 13th and 15th instructions were defective in the light of this rule.

ILLINOIS CASES.

Maria L. Wolcott v. George B. Heath.—Appeal from Iroquois.—Opinion by SCOTT, Ch. J.

TIME CONTRACTS—WITNESS REFERRING TO BOOK ENTRIES—INSTRUCTIONS ON SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

Held, 1. That time contracts, made in good faith, for the future delivery of grain, or any other commodity, are not prohibited by common law, nor any statute of this State. But the delivery must be imperative, and nothing contingent but the time. The law forbids contracts where the delivery is contingent also.

2. Where a business consists of a long series of transactions, as that of a commission merchant, between parties, it is error for a court to refuse to allow a party testifying to refer to his books, in order to refresh his recollection. A witness who would pretend to carry in his memory all the details of a complicated business, would be unworthy of credit; and to exclude testimony based on book entries would be to close up, in many cases, all channels of correct information.

3. An instruction must leave it to the jury to decide whether, on a certain kind of evidence failing in a cause, there is any other evidence to sustain the issues. A judge should not express his opinion on the sufficiency or weight of evidence.

People ex rel. Smith v. Common Council of Aurora, et al.—Mandamus.—Opinion by SCHOLFIELD, J.

CONSTRUCTION OF REPEALING STATUTE AS TO CITY COURTS.

STATEMENT.—By the act of 1859, the cities of Elgin and Aurora elected a judge of common pleas court jointly. And the act provided that if, for any cause, an election was not held at the time appointed, the clerks of the courts in the two cities should issue a call for a special election, within four weeks. An election thus failed, and the clerks refused to issue a call. A writ of mandamus was sued out and awarded. Held,

1. That the act of 1874, repealing the act of 1859, did not abolish the said courts. And the fact that the later act employs only the word "city," and not "cities," has no significance; since the statute expressly lays down the general rule of construction, that "Words importing the singular number may extend and be applied to several persons or things, and words importing the plural number may include the singular." (R. S. of 1874, p. 1011.) And herein, the word "city," in the singular, is used merely as a designation of the election district; which, as to courts thereafter to be organized, was to be a single city.

LAW BOOKS—CRITICISM.

GALESBURG, ILL.,

ED. CHICAGO LEGAL NEWS: The criticism of the London Law Times, upon the general character of recent American text-books (so called), seems unfortunately just; and your comments thereon, well worthy attention.

It seems scarcely desirable, much less practicable, for the general practitioner thoroughly to familiarize himself with the mass of decided cases.

Cases, as such, are of special value as authority, in so far only as they correctly announce and apply legal principles to the determination of points in difference; but apparently this fact is not considered of importance by most recent authors of legal treatises; hence, instead of judiciously discriminating analysis of the legal principles pertaining to the matter in hand, supported or amplified by citations of such adjudged cases only, as upon principle, clearly tends to exemplify and sustain, or successfully controvert the propositions contained in the text; the writer too often contents himself with loosely stating the propositions gleaned from some decided case, and backing them with, or rather burying them under, a conglomorate mass of cited cases, nine-tenths of which tend to confuse, rather than enlighten. The profession owe it to themselves to decline purchasing such works, since, to a good lawyer they are of but trifling advantage at best, while to purchase them is to pay a premium for charlatanism. W.

LORD ST. LEONARDS' WILL.—We sometime since gave an account of the admission to probate in the court below, of the will of Lord St. Leonard, under very peculiar circumstances. The Hour of March 14, in refering to the opinion of the Appellate court in affirming that judgment says:

The court of Appeal, composed of a very strong bench, yesterday affirmed the decision of Mr. Justice Hannen in the case of the late Lord St. Leonards' will. The judgment of Chief Justice Cockburn fully recognizes the soundness of the doctrine that a missing will must be taken in the absence of evidence to the contrary to have been destroyed by the testator for the purpose of revoking it. He, however, is of opinion that the surrounding circumstances of the case show that the will was not destroyed by Lord St. Leonard's. Reliance is mainly placed on the known character of the deceased lawyer, his abhorrence of intestacies in general, and the pride he took in this very missing document, and also on the fact that the testamentary casket was well known to the servants, and that it was capable of being opened by several keys in the house. . . .

The strangeness of the mystery which surrounds the disappearance of the late ex-Chancellor's will is only equalled by the remarkable feat of memory performed by his daughter, which form the two features of the case. Luckily, the one has been set off against the other, and the great lawyer who made so many wills for others has not been allowed to die without one of his own. If he could see what has been the result of his keeping his will in his own hands, he would probably change the opinion he expressed against the practice of persons depositing their wills in the Registry as soon as made. It is not every one who has a living testamentary depositary like Miss Sugden at hand, and, therefore, the best way to keep his heirs out of a lawsuit is to send his will at once to Somerset House instead of trusting it to the frail security of a desk or a drawer.

The court has in this case taken a step in advance of what it has done in any other case, there can be no doubt but the Chief Justice stated the rule correctly when he said that a missing will must be taken in the absence of evidence to the contrary, to have been destroyed by the testator for the purpose of revoking it, but we do not believe that it was in accordance with the law to hold that this presumption of destruction was overcome by "the known character of the deceased lawyer, his abhorrence of intestacies in general, and the pride he took in this very missing document, etc." It is a fact well known to the profession that attorneys who spend most of their lives in drawing the wills of others or in administering probate law, seldom make their own wills and if they do make a will for themselves often make some mistake in it. Judge Rucker who was judge of the Probate court of this county for eight years made a will, but probate of it was refused in the very court over which he had presided for so many years with marked ability. We could name many instances of this kind. We presume the reluctance of probate lawyers to make wills for themselves may be accounted for from the fact that they see so much litigation over the construction of wills, and so many wills that work great hardship, that they conclude that the law which is the experience of the ages if they die intestate will distribute their peoperty better for them than any will that could be drawn, we have no doubt in nine cases out of ten this conclusion is correct.

THE LEGAL PRESS ON THE SUPREME COURT OF NEW HAMPSHIRE.—The London Solicitor's Journal says:

An American contemporary, in noticing a recent volume of transatlantic law reports, complains bitterly of the prolixity of the judges. "In Eastman v. Clark it was adjudged that participation in profits is not a decisive test of partnership. It takes two judges and seventy-eight pages to say this. Judge Smith starts off modestly and succinctly in fourteen pages, but Judge Doe brings up the rear with sixty-three! The point in Fay v. Parker is that exemplary damages are not recoverable in a civil action for a tort which may also be criminally punished. Judge Foster occupies sixty-nine pages in saying this, and in querying whether they are recoverable in any civil action. It is evident that Judge Foster was determined not to be outdone by his brethren in length or learning. He quotes from Milton's 'Paradise Lost,' also from Dante. Judge Foster is also sarcastic; he gives many other judges very severe 'wipes.' Finally comes Aldrich v. Wright. A statute provided that mink should not be destroyed between certain dates, under a prescribed penalty. The defendant shot mink on his own land, while they were chasing his geese. Held, that under the constitution, which gave him a right to "protect property," he had a 'natural, essential and inherent right' to kill those mink. Judge Doe rises to the consideration of this grave topic in an opinion of thirty pages, and cites, among other authorities, Sidney Smith's 'Essay on Spring Guns.'"

THE ADVANTAGE OF STEREOTYPING LEGAL NOTICES.—It is known to all printers that legal notices, when kept in type from week to week, and lifted from form to form, are liable to be changed by having letters or figures drop out. To avoid this, when requested we stereotype legal notices without additional cost, in one solid block of metal, type high, which makes it impossible for a letter or figure to drop out. This process prevents any change being made by accident after it is once cast into plate. We shall be glad to show the advantages of stereotyping legal notices to attorneys or real estate dealers calling at our office.

THE COST OF AN ARBITRATION.—A parliamentary return shows that the sums paid for services in the Albert Arbitration were—to the arbitrator, £2,000; the assessor, 5,700 guineas; and the liquidators, £12,275 18s. The gross amount paid to solicitors and parliamentary agents for costs was £19,264 10s. 11d. The expenses in the Court of Chancery were £71,668 1s. 7d.

LEGAL BLANKS.—We call attention to the advertisement of our Legal Blanks, on page 573, of this issue.

BLANKS TO ORDER.—We have the stereotype plates of all our trust deeds, deeds and leases, and will print one hundred of either of these forms, without change, with red lines, on Weston's linen paper, with the card of the person ordering on the back, for four dollars—or two hundred for seven dollars.

OUR LEGAL AND CONVEYANCING BLANKS.—We are now printing all our blanks on Byron Weston's linen paper, which will bear folding and re-folding without cracking or breaking, and is pleasant to write upon. These blanks will be furnished at the office for seventy-five cents a quire.

The Courts.

UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT.

No. 339.—OCTOBER TERM, 1875.

THE UNITED STATES, Plaintiffs in Error, v. WILLIAM J. CRUIKSHANK, WILLIAM D. IRWIN, and JOHN P. HADNOT.

In error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Louisiana.

THE ENFORCEMENT ACT—THE 14TH AND 15TH AMENDMENTS TO THE CONSTITUTION CONSTRUED—THE RIGHTS OF CITIZENS OF THE UNITED STATES.

1. WHAT IS A CRIME UNDER THE ACT.—This was an indictment under the sixth section of the Enforcement Act. The court held, that the offences provided for by the statute in question do not consist in mere "banding" or "conspiring" of two or more persons together, but in their banding or conspiring with the intent or for any of the purposes specified; that to bring the case under the operation of the statute, it must appear that the right the enjoyment of which the conspirators intended to hinder or prevent, was one granted or secured by the Constitution or laws of the United States; that it does not appear that the criminal matter charged has been made indictable by any act of Congress.

2. RIGHTS OF CITIZENS—NATURE OF GOVERNMENT.—That in our political system we have a government of the United States and of each of the several States. Each one of these governments is distinct from the other, and each has citizens of its own, who owe it allegiance, and whose rights, within its jurisdiction, it must protect. The same person may be at the same time a citizen of the United States and a citizen of a State, but his rights of citizenship under one of these governments will be different from those he had under the other.

3. THE GOVERNMENT OF THE U. S.—That the Government of the United States was erected for special purposes, and endowed with all the powers necessary for its preservation and the accomplishment of the ends its people had in view. It can neither grant nor secure to its citizens any right or privilege not expressly, or by implication, placed under its jurisdiction.

4. ATTRIBUTES OF NATIONAL CITIZENSHIP.—The court states what are attributes of national citizenship that will be protected by the Government of the United States.

5. THE 14TH AMENDMENT.—The 14th amendment prohibits a State from depriving any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law, but it adds nothing to the rights of one citizen as against another; it simply furnishes an additional guaranty as against any encroachment by the States upon the fundamental rights which belong to every citizen as a member of society.

6. RACE OR COLOR.—That in as much as it does not appear in these counts that the intent of defendants was to prevent these parties from exercising their right to vote on account of their race, etc., it does not appear that it was their intent to interfere with any right granted or secured by the Constitution or laws of the United States.

7. CHARGING OFFENSE.—That where the definition of an offence includes generic terms, it is not sufficient that the indictment shall charge the offense in the same generic terms as in the definition but it must state the species—it must descend to particulars.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

Mr. Chief Justice WAITE delivered the opinion of the Court.

This case comes here with a certificate by the judges of the Circuit Court for the District of Louisiana, that they were divided in opinion upon a question which occurred at the hearing. It presents for our consideration an indictment containing sixteen counts, divided into two series of eight counts each, based upon section 6 of the enforcement act of May 31, 1870. That section is as follows:

"That if two or more persons shall band or conspire together, or go in disguise upon the public highway, or upon the premises of another, with intent to violate any provision of this act, or to injure, oppress, threaten, or intimidate any citizen, with intent to prevent or hinder his free exercise and enjoyment of any right or privilege granted or secured to him by the Constitution or laws of the United States, or because of his having exercised the same, such persons shall be held guilty of felony, and, on conviction thereof, shall be fined or imprisoned, or both, at the discretion of the court—the fine not to exceed five thousand dollars, and the imprisonment not to exceed ten years—and shall, moreover, be thereafter ineligible to, and disabled from holding, any office or place of honor, profit, or trust created by the Constitution or laws of the United States.—(16 Stat., 141.)

The question certified arose upon a motion in arrest of judgment after a verdict of guilty generally upon the whole sixteen counts and is stated to be whether "the said sixteen counts of said indictment are severally good and sufficient in law, and contain charges of criminal matter indictable under the laws of the United States."

The general charge in the first eight counts is that of "banding," and in the second eight that of "conspiring" together to injure, oppress, threaten, and intimidate Levi Nelson and Alexander Tillman, citizens of the United States, of African descent and persons of color, with the intent thereby to hinder and prevent them in their free exercise and enjoyment of rights and privileges "granted and secured" to them "in common with all other good citizens of the United States by the Constitution and laws of the United States."

The offences provided for by the statute in question do not consist in the mere "banding" or "conspiring of two or more persons together, but in their banding or conspiring with the intent or for any of the purposes specified. To bring this case under the operation of the statute, therefore, it must appear that the right, the enjoyment of which the conspirators intended to hinder or prevent, was one granted or secured by the Constitution or laws of the United States. If it does not so appear the criminal matter charged has not been made indictable by any act of Congres.

We have in our political system a government of the United States and a government of each of the several States. Each one of these governments is distinct from the others, and each has citizens of its own who owe it allegiance, and whose rights, within its jurisdiction, it must protect. The same person may be at the same time a citizen of the United States and a citizen of a State, but his rights of citizenship under one of these governments will be different from those he has under the other. (Slaughter-House Cases, 16 Wall., 74.)

Citizens are the members of the political community to which they belong. They are the people who compose the community, and who, in their associated capacity, have established or submitted themselves to the dominion of a government for the promotion of their general welfare and the protection of their individual as well as their collective rights. In the formation of a government the people may confer upon it such powers as they choose. The government when so formed may, and when called upon should, exercise all the powers it has for the protection of the rights of its citizens and the people within its jurisdiction, but it can exercise no other. The duty of a government to afford protection is limited always by the power it possesses for that purpose.

Experience made the fact known to the people of the United States that they required a national government for national purposes. The separate governments of the separate States, bound together by the articles of confederation alone, were not sufficient for the promotion of the general welfare of the people in respect to foreign nations, or for their complete protection, as citizens of the Confederate States. For this reason the people of the United States, "in order to form a more perfect Union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquility, provide for the common defence, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty," to themselves and their posterity, (Const. Preamble,) ordained and established the government of the United States, and defined its powers by a constitution, which they adopted as its fundamental law and made its rule of action.

The government thus established and defined is to some extent a government of the states in their political capacity. It is, also, for certain purposes, a government of the people. Its powers are limited in number, but not in degree. Within the scope of its powers, as enumerated and defined, it is supreme and above the states, but beyond it has no existence. It was erected for special purposes and endowed with all the powers necessary for its own preservation and the accomplishment of the ends its people had in view. It can neither grant nor secure to its citizens any right or privilege not expressly, or by implication, placed under its jurisdiction.

The people of the United States resident within any state are subject to two governments, one state and the other national, but there need be no conflict between the two. The powers which one possesses the other does not. They are established for different purposes and have separate jurisdictions. Together they make one whole and furnish the people of the United States with a complete government, ample for the protection of all their rights at home and abroad. True, it may sometimes happen that a person is amenable to both jurisdictions for one and the same act. Thus, if a marshal of the United States is unlawfully resisted while executing the process of the courts within a state, and the resistance is accompanied by an assault on the officer, the sovereignty of the United States is violated by the resistance, and that of the state by the breach of peace in the assault. So, too, if one passes the counterfeited coin of the United States within a state, it may be an offence against the United States and the state; the United States, because it discredits the coin, and the state, because of the fraud upon him to whom it is passed. This does not, however, necessarily imply that the two governments possess powers in common or bring them into conflict with each other. It is the natural consequence of a citizenship which owes allegiance to two sovereignties and claims protection from both. The citizen cannot complain because he has voluntarily submitted himself to such a form of government. He owes allegiance to the two departments, so to speak, and within their respective spheres must pay the penalties which each exacts for disobedience to its laws. In return he can demand protection from each within its own jurisdiction.

The government of the United States is one of delegated powers alone. Its authority is defined and limited by the Constitution. All powers not granted to it by that instrument are reserved to the States or the people. No rights can be acquired under the Constitution or laws of the United States except such as the government of the United States has the authority to grant or secure. All that cannot be so granted or secured are left under the protection of the States.

We now proceed to an examination of the indictment, to ascertain whether the several rights, which it is alleged the defendants intended to interfere with, are such as had been in law and in fact granted or secured by the Constitution or laws of the United States.

The first and ninth counts state the intent of the defendants to have been to hinder and prevent the citizens named in the free exercise and enjoyment of their "lawful right and privilege to peaceably assemble together with each other and with other citizens of the United States for a peaceful and lawful purpose." The right of the people peaceably to assemble for lawful purposes existed long before the adoption of the Constitution of the United States. In fact, it is, and always has been, one of the attributes of citizenship under a free government. It "derives its source," to use the language of Chief Justice Marshall, in Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat., 211, "from those laws whose authority is acknowledged by civilized man throughout the world." It is found wherever civilization exists. It was not, therefore, a right granted to the people by the Constitution. The government of the United States when established found it in existence, with the obligation on the part of the States to afford it protection. As no direct power over it was granted to Congress, it remains, according to the ruling in Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat., 203, subject to State jurisdiction. Only such existing rights were committed by the people to the protection of Congress as came within the general scope of the authority granted to the national government.

The first amendment of the Constitution prohibits Congress from abridging "the right of the people to assemble and to petition the government for a redress of grievances." This, like the other amendments proposed and adopted at the same time, was not intended to limit the powers of the State governments in respect to their own citizens, but to operate upon the national government alone. (Barron v. The City of Baltimore, 7 Pet., 250; Lessee of Livingstone v. Moore, 7 Pet., 551; Fox v. Ohio, 5 How., 434; Smith v. Maryland, 18 How., 76; Withers v. Buckley, 20 How., 90; Pervear v. The Commonwealth, 5 Wall., 479; Twitchell v. The Commonwealth, 7 Wall., 321; Edwards v. Elliott, 21 Wall., 557.) It is now too late to question the correctness of this construction. As was said by the late Chief Justice, in Twitchell v. The Commonwealth, (p. 325,) "the scope and application of these amendments are no longer subjects of discussion here." They left the authority of the States just where they found it, and added nothing to the already existing powers of the United States.

The particular amendment now under consideration, assumes the existence of the right of the people to assemble for lawful purposes, and protects it against encroachment by Congress. The right was not created by the amendment; neither was its continuance guaranteed, except as against congressional interference. For their protection in its enjoyment, therefore, the people must look to the States. There is where the power for that purpose was originally placed, and it has never been surrendered to the United States.

The right of the people peaceably to assemble for the purpose of petitioning Congress for a redress of grievances, or for anything else connected with the powers or the duties of the national government, is an attribute of national citizenship, and as such, under the protection of, and guaranteed by, the United States. The very idea of a government, republican in form, implies a right on the part of its citizens to meet peaceably for consultation in respect to public affairs and to petition for a redress of grievances. If it had been alleged in these counts that the object of the defendants was to prevent a meeting for such a purpose, the case would have been within the statute and within the scope of the sovereignty of the United States. Such, however, is not the case. The offense, as stated in the indictment, will be made out if it be shown that the object of the conspiracy was to prevent a meeting for any lawful purpose whatever.

The second and tenth counts are equally defective. The right there specified is that of "bearing arms for a lawful purpose." This is not a right granted by the Constitution. Neither is it in any manner dependent upon that instrument for its existence. The second amendment declares that it shall not be infringed; but this, as has been seen, means no more than that it shall not be infringed by Congress. This is one of the amendments that has no other effect than to restrict the powers of the national government, leaving the people to look for their protection against any violation by their fellow-citizens of the rights it recognizes, to what is called in The City of New York v. Miln, 11 Pet., 139, the "powers which relate to merely municipal legislation, or what was, perhaps, more properly called internal police," "not surrendered or restrained" by the Constitution of the United States.

The third and eleventh counts are even more objectionable. They charge the intent to have been to deprive the citizens named, they being in Louisiana, "of their respective several lives and liberty of person without due process of law." This is nothing else than alleging a conspiracy to falsely imprison or murder citizens of the United States, being within the territorial jurisdiction of the State of Louisiana. The rights of life and personal liberty are natural rights of man. "To secure these rights," says the Declaration of Independence, "governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed." The very highest duty of the States, when they entered into the Union under the Constitution, was to protect all persons within their boundaries in the enjoyment of these "unalienable rights with which they were endowed by their Creator." Sovereignty, for this purpose, rests alone with the States. It is no more the duty or within the power of the United States to punish for a conspiracy to falsely imprison or murder within a State, than it would be to punish for false imprisonment or murder itself.

The fourteenth amendment prohibits a state from depriving any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law, but this adds nothing to the rights of one citizen as against another. It simply furnishes an additional guaranty against any encroachment by the states upon the fundamental rights which belong to every citizen as a member of society. As was said by Mr. Justice Johnson, in Bank of Columbia vs. Okely, 4 Wheat., 244, it secures "the individual from the arbitrary exercise of the powers of government, unrestrained by the established principles of private rights and distributive justice." These counts in the indictment do not call for the exercise of any of the powers conferred by this provision in the amendment.

The fourth and twelfth counts charge the intent to have been to prevent and hinder the citizens named, who were of African descent and persons of color, in "the free exercise and enjoyment of their several right and privilege to the full and equal benefit of all laws and proceedings, then and there, before that time enacted or ordained by the said State of Louisiana and by the United States; and then and there, at that time, being in force by the said State and District of Louisiana, aforesaid, for the security of their respective persons and property, then and there, at that time enjoyed at and within said State and District of Louisiana by white persons, being citizens of said State of Louisiana and the United States, for the protection of the persons and property of said white citizens." There is no allegation that this was done because of the race or color of the persons conspired against. When stripped of its verbiage the case as presented amounts to nothing more than that the defendants conspired to prevent certain citizens of the United States, being within the State of Louisiana, from enjoying the equal protection of the laws of the state and of the United States.

The fourteenth amendment prohibits a state from denying to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws; but this provision does not, any more than the one which precedes it, and which we have just considered, add anything to the rights which one citizen has under the Constitution against another. The equality of the rights of citizens is a principle of republicanism. Every republican government is in duty bound to protect all its citizens in the enjoyment of this principle, if within its power. That duty was originally assumed by the states, and it still remains there. The only obligation resting upon the United States is to see that the states do not deny the right. This the amendment guarantees, but no more. The power of the national government is limited to the enforcement of this guaranty.

No question arises under the civil rights act of April 9, 1866, (14 Stat., 27,) which is intended for the protection of citizens of the United States in the enjoyment of certain rights, without discrimination on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude, because, as has already been stated, it is no where alleged in these counts that the wrong contemplated against the rights of these citizens was on account of their race or color.

Another objection is made to these counts that they are too vague and uncertain. This will be considered hereafter in connection with the same objection to other counts.

The sixth and fourteenth counts state the intent of the defendants to have been to hinder and prevent the citizens named, being of African descent and colored, "in the free exercise and enjoyment of their several and respective right and privilege to vote at any election to be thereafter by law had and held by the people in and of the said state of Louisiana, or by the people of and in the parish of Grant aforesaid." In Minor vs. Happersett, 21 Wall., 178, we decided that the Constitution of the United States has not conferred the right of suffrage upon any one, and that the United States have no voters of their own creation in the states. In U. S. vs. Reese, just decided, we hold that the fifteenth amendment has invested the citizens of the United States with a new constitutional right, which is, exemption from discrimination in the exercise of the elective franchise on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude. From this it appears that the right of suffrage is not a necessary attribute of national citizenship, but that exemption from discrimination in the exercise of that right on account of race, etc., is. The right to vote in the states comes from the states, but the right of exemption from the prohibited discrimination comes from the United States. The first has not been granted or secured by the Constitution of the United States, but the last has been.

Inasmuch, therefore, as it does not appear in these counts that the intent of the defendants was to prevent these parties from exercising their right to vote on account of their race, etc., it does not appear that it was their intent to interfere with any right granted or secured by the Constitution or laws of the United States. We may suspect that race was the cause of the hostility, but it is not so averred. This is material to a description of the substance of the offence, and cannot be supplied by implication. Everything essential must be charged positively, and not inferentially. The defect here is not in form but in substance.

The seventh and fifteenth counts are no better than the sixth and fourteenth. The intent here charged is to put the parties named in great fear of bodily harm and to injure and oppress them, because, being and having been in all things qualified, they had voted "at an election before that time, had and held according to law by the people of the said State of Louisiana, in said State, to wit: on the 4th day of November, A. D. 1872, and at divers other elections by the people of the State, also before that time had and held according to law." There is nothing to show that the elections voted at were any other than State elections, or that the conspiracy was formed on account of the race of the parties against whom the conspirators were to act. The charge as made is really of nothing more than a conspiracy to commit a breach of the peace within a State. Certainly it will not be claimed that the United States have the power or are required to do mere police duty in the States. If a State cannot protect itself against domestic violence, the United States may, upon the call of the executive, when the legislature cannot be convened, lend their assistance for that purpose. This is a guaranty of the Constitution (Art. IV., section 4), but it applies to no case like this.

We are, therefore, of the opinion that the first, second, third, fourth, sixth, seventh, ninth, tenth, eleventh, twelfth, fourteenth, and fifteenth counts do not contain charges of a criminal nature made indictable under the laws of the United States, and that consequently they are not good and sufficient in law. They do not show that it was the intent of the defendants, by their conspiracy, to hinder or prevent the enjoyment of any right granted or secured by the Constitution.

We come now to consider the fifth and thirteenth and the eighth and sixteenth counts; which may be brought together for that purpose. The intent charged in the fifth and thirteenth is "to hinder and prevent the parties in their respective free exercise and enjoyment of the rights, privileges, immunities, and protection granted and secured to them respectively as citizens of the United States and as citizens of said State of Louisiana," "for the reason that they, * * being then and there citizens of said State and of the United States, were persons of African descent and race, and persons of color, and not white citizens thereof," and in the eighth and sixteenth, to hinder and prevent them "in their several and respective free exercise and enjoyment of every, each, all, and singular the several rights and privileges granted and secured to them by the Constitution and laws of the United States." The same general statement of the rights to be interfered with is found in the fifth and thirteenth counts.

According to the view we take of these counts the question is not whether it is enough, in general, to describe a statutory offence in the language of the statute, but whether the offence has here been described at all. The statute provides for the punishment of those who conspire "to injure, oppress, threaten, or intimidate any citizen, with intent to prevent or hinder his free exercise and enjoyment of any right or privilege granted or secured to him by the Constitution or laws of the United States." These counts in the indictment charge, in substance, that the intent in this case was to hinder and prevent these citizens in the free exercise and enjoyment of "every, each, all, and singular," the rights granted them by the Constitution, etc. There is no specification of any particular right. The language is broad enough to cover all.

In criminal cases, prosecuted under the laws of the United States, the accused has the constitutional right "to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation."—(Amendment VI.) In U. S. v. Mills, 7 Pet., 142, this was construed to mean that the indictment must set forth the offence "with clearness and all necessary certainty, to apprise the accused of the crime with which he stands charged;" and in U. S. v. Cook, 17 Wall., 174, that "every ingredient of which the offence is composed must be accurately and clearly alleged." It is an elementary principle of criminal pleading that where the definition of an offence, whether it be at common law or by statute, "includes generic terms, it is not sufficient that the indictment shall charge the offence in the same generic terms as in the definition, but it must state the species—it must descend to particulars." (1 Arch. Cr. Pr. and Pl., 291.) The object of the indictment is, first, to furnish the accused with such a description of the charge against him as will enable him to make his defence, and avail himself of his conviction or acquital for protection against a further prosecution for the same cause; and second, to inform the court of the facts alleged, so that it may decide whether they are sufficient in law to support a conviction, if one should be had. For this, facts are to be stated, not conclusions of law alone. A crime is made up of acts and intent, and these must be set forth in the indictment, with reasonable particularity of time, place, and circumstances.

It is a crime to steal goods and chattels, but an indictment would be bad that did not specify with some degree of certainty the articles stolen. This because the accused must be advised of the essential particulars of the charge against him, and the court must be able to decide whether the property taken was such as was the subject of larceny. So, too, it is in some States a crime for two or more persons to conspire to cheat and defraud another out of his property, but it has been held that an indictment for such an offence must contain allegations setting forth the means proposed to be used to accomplish the purpose. This, because, to make such a purpose criminal, the conspiracy must be to cheat and defraud in a mode made criminal by statute, and as all cheating and defrauding has not been made criminal, it is necessary for the indictment to state the means proposed in order that the court may see that they are in fact illegal.—(State v. Parker, 43 N. H., 83; State v. Keach, 40 Vt., 118; Alderman v. The People, 4 Mich., 414; State v. Roberts, 34 Maine, 32.) In Maine it is an offence for two or more to conspire with the intent unlawfully and wickedly to commit any crime punishable by imprisonment in the State prison, (State v. Roberts,) but we think it will hardly be claimed that an indictment would be good under this statute, which charges the object of the conspiracy to have been "unlawfully and wickedly to commit each, every, all and singular the crimes punishable by imprisonment in the State prison." All crimes are not so punishable. Whether a particular crime be such an one or not is a question of law. The accused has, therefore, the right to have a specification of the charge against him in this respect, in order that he may decide whether he should present his defence by motion to quash, demurrer, or plea; and the court, that it may determine whether the facts will sustain the indictment. So here, the crime is made to consist in the unlawful combination with an intent to prevent the enjoyment of any right granted or secured by the Constitution, etc. All rights are not so granted or secured. Whether one is so or not is a question of law to be decided by the court, not the prosecutor. Therefore, the indictment should state the particulars, to inform the court as well as the accused. It must be made to appear, that is to say, appear from the indictment without going further, that the acts charged will, if proven, support a conviction for the offence alleged.

But it is needless to pursue the argument further. The conclusion is irresistible that these counts are too vague and general. They lack the certainty and precision required by the established rules of criminal pleading. It follows that they are not good and sufficient in law. They are so defective that no judgment of conviction should be pronounced upon them.

The order of the Circuit court arresting the judgment upon the verdict is, therefore, affirmed, and the cause remanded with instructions to discharge the defendants.

UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT.

No. 135.—OCTOBER TERM, 1875.

WILLIAM W. LATHROP, Assignee in Bankruptcy of JAMES W. ADAMS, Appellant,
v.
SAMUEL DRAKE and JOHN DRAKE, Jr., Executors of JOHN DRAKE, deceased, WINFIELD S. HULICK, Administrator, DERRICK HULICK, deceased, and SAMUEL DRAKE, now or late doing business as DRAKE, HULICK & CO.

Appeal from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania.

BANKRUPTCY — WHERE ASSIGNEE MAY BRING SUIT.

Held, that under the Bankrupt Act as passed in 1867, an assignee in bankruptcy, without regard to the citizenship of the parties could maintain a suit for the recovery of assets in the Circuit Court of the United States in any district other than that in which the decree of Bankruptcy was made.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

Mr. Justice BRADLEY delivered the opinion of the court.
