U. S. DIST. COURT, E. D. OF WIS.

OPINION FILED MARCH 18, 1875.

UNITED STATES v. LD SOUTHMAYD.

1. LIST OF WITNESSES FOR ACCUSED.—In all criminal cases in which there has been no preliminary examination, it is within the discretion of the court to order a list of the witnesses sworn before the grand jury, to be furnished to the accused.

2. MINUTES OF GRAND JURY.—He is not, however, entitled to the minutes of the proceedings before the grand jury, nor, in the absence of strong reasons to the contrary, should they be furnished him.

The defendant stands indicted for the alleged forgery of a postal money order, and for passing such order. There was no preliminary examination previous to the finding of the indictment. The defendant's counsel moves for an order requiring the district attorney to furnish him with a list of the witnesses sworn before the Grand Jury and with the minutes of their testimony, basing his application upon the fact that there was no preliminary examination, and claiming that he is entitled to know who the witnesses were who appeared before the Grand Jury and what their testimony was, in order to prepare for trial. The application, so far as it relates to the production of a list of the witnesses, is not resisted, but opposition is made to disclosure of their testimony.

DYER, J. There are cases reported in the books in which the courts, in the exercise of a proper discretion, have ordered a list of the witnesses to be furnished to the accused where he has had no preliminary examination before a magistrate. The statutes of the United States provide that when any person is indicted of treason, or of any other capital offense, he shall be furnished with a copy of the indictment and a list of the witnesses to be produced at the trial. Rev. Stat. of U. S., 1874., Title 13, Ch. 18, § 1033. I find no similar provision in relation to other offenses. I have no doubt, however, that in all cases in which there has been no preliminary examination, it is within the discretion of the court to order a list of the witnesses sworn before the Grand Jury to be furnished to the accused. The People v. Naughton, 7 Abbott's Practice, R. N. S. § 421, is relied upon by counsel for defendant as an authority in support of his motion, not only as to furnishing a list of witnesses, but as bearing upon his right to the minutes of their testimony. In that case the defendants were indicted for alleged frauds in the conduct of certain elections. The motion papers set forth that the accused were indicted without preliminary examination; that they nad no means of knowing the particular time, place or circumstances relied on by the people; that, at different times during the day on which the charges were laid, a large number of persons were present at the voting place, and, unless the accused could ascertain the precise time at which they were charged to have committed the offenses, it was impossible for them to determine what witnesses to summon, or in any manner to prepare for trial; and that important irregularities occurred in the proceedings of the Grand Jury, fatal to the validity of the indictment, which the minutes of testimony would disclose. Most of the discussion, in the opinion of the court in that case, is addressed to the question of the right of the accused to a list of the witnesses. The case discloses that it had been customary in many of the counties of the State of New York, before the passage of any statute on the subject, for the Distaict Attorney to indorse the names of witnesses on an indictment, and then send the same to the Grand Jury to be investigated. The names of the witnesses came, therefore, to be regarded as much an indorsement as the words, "True bill," and, consequently, the statute subsequently passed provided that the accused shall be entitled "to a copy of the indictment and of all indorsements thereon." We have the same provision in the statutes of this State. Upon the practice as it had grown up in New York, and upon the statutes, there can be no doubt of the correctness of the decision of the court in The People v. Naughton, supra, requiring a list of witnesses to be furnished.

The case of Commonwealth v. Knapp, 9 Pickering, 496, so far as it is applicable here, presented only the question of the right of the accused in a capital case to a list of the witnesses for the State. Although it was urged that this was not a matter of right, except under the statute of treason, Wilde, J., says, "a list of the witnesses has never been refused, in a case of this kind."

If the determination of the question, now presented, depended upon authority, I do not regard the case of The People v. Naughton, supra, as settling the point. It is not asserted here, that any irregularities occurred in the proceedings before the grand jury, involving the validity of the indictment. In that case, the application for the minutes of testimony was based principally upon such alleged irregularities, claimed to be fatal to the indictment, and which the minutes would disclose, and this branch of the motion was denied, for the reasons that the motion papers did not state wherein the proceedings of the grand jury were irregular, or wherein an inspection was essential to protect the right of the defendant, or that he could not more properly derive the information sought from other sources. The strictness of the rule on the subject was rigidly enforced, and the court say, that "it is only within certain restrictions that any inspection of the minutes can be allowed."

In Earl of Shaftesbury's case, 3 Howell's State Trials, the court, on application, ordered the witnesses before the grand jury examined in open court. But that was a case where an attempt was made to procure an indictment for high treason against the Earl.

It is the general rule that proceedings before a grand jury are privileged from disclosure. The cases are exceptional in which the rule is not adhered to. In an action for maliciously indicting the plaintiff, Lord Kenyon allowed a grand juryman to be asked, whether the defendant was the prosecutor of the indictment; and thought the disclosure did not infringe upon the juryman's oath. (Sykes v. Dunbar, 2 Selwyn Nisi Prius, 1091. Roscoe's Criminal Evidence, 150.) In that case the alleged cause of action, itself, sprung from the act of the party in procuring the indictment.

Following the general rule, it is held that the clerk of the grand jury cannot be compelled to disclose the proceedings before them, (Viner's Abridgement, Evidence (B. a.), pl. 5), nor can the county attorney (McClellan v. Richardson, 13 Maine R., 82). In Massachusetts it has been held, that the attorney for the commonwealth cannot be called to disclose what passed in the grand jury room. (Commonwealth v. Tilden 2 Starkie on Evidence, 324, note).

In the absence of strong reasons to the contrary, the rule ought not to be departed from. I think it should be adhered to in this case, to the extent of denying the application for the minutes of testimony. A list of the witnesses sworn before the grand jury should be furnished to the defendant.

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

OPINION FILED JUNE 16, 1875.

THE PEORIA, PEKIN & JACKSONVILLE R. R. CO. v. JOHN R. CAMP.

Appeal from Peoria.

This was an action brought by appellee to recover of appellants for killing his horse by a train of cars. At the time appellee's horse was killed, it was unlawful for domestic animals to run at large in Peoria county, and notwithstanding this fact, he turned his horse out upon the commons adjoining his premises, and from thence the horse escaped over uninclosed lands to the track where it was killed. The court discuss the principles that should control the liability of the appellants in such cases, and make a distinction between a case where the owner turns his horse out voluntarily, and where he escapes from the enclosure of the owner against his will—[ED. LEGAL NEWS]

Opinion by SCOTT, J.

At the date plaintiff's horse was killed it was unlawful for domestic animals to run at large in Peoria county, when the accident occurred. Session Laws 1872, p. 116. Notwithstanding this fact, he turned his horse out upon the commons adjoining his premises, and from thence it escaped over uninclosed lands of other persons to the track of the railroad, where it was struck by a train and killed. No fence had been erected on either side of the track, although it was the statutory duty of the company to have erected suitable fences, unless it had been relieved by the agreement of the adjoining proprietors, of which there is no evidence in the record. On this state of facts the question arises whether the company is responsible for the value of the animal killed if it is shown its servants observed every reasonable precaution to avoid the accident.

It was contrary to the provision of the statute for plaintiff to turn his horse upon the commons, and therefore unlawful. There was nothing to prevent it from getting from thence upon the railroad. Of this fact he was well aware, for it occurred near plaintiff's residence, and he was, of course, familiar with the locality. By the voluntary unlawful act of the plaintiff, his horse was trespassing on the right of way of the company, and this fact must be imputed to him as negligent care for the safety of his property. Had the horse escaped from his enclosure against his will, and he had used all reasonable diligence to recapture it, the case would have been within the rule in C. and N. W. R. R. Co. v. Hains, 54 Ill., 528.

In that case it was unlawful by a local ordinance for plaintiff to permit his horse to run at large, but the decision is placed on the distinct ground, the escape from his private enclosure was involuntary on his part, and that he made reasonable efforts to reclaim them soon after their escape, but was unsuccessful. Although plaintiff in this case was guilty of contributory negligence by his unlawful act in turning his horse upon the commons, where he knew it could escape over lands not his own, upon the railroad, this fact does not relieve the company from the duty to exercise proper care, and observe all reasonable precautions to avoid the accident. Assuming the burden of proof was upon the railroad company, we think it is proven its employees did everything in their power after the danger was discovered, to prevent injury to plaintiff's property? The train was within a few hundred yards of the station and was moving at a low rate of speed. All the witnesses agree, the horse was grazing quietly near the railroad until the train was nearly opposite, when it suddenly came upon the track in front of the engine. As soon as it was discovered the horse was coming upon the track, the engine-driver did everything he could to stop the train in time to avoid a collision, but was unsuccessful. The horse was partially blind, and, as the witnesses describe it, seemed to become bewildered and ran directly towards the train. The whole thing occurred in an instant. The engine driver may have seen the horse grazing near the railroad, not many yards distant, but it was not his duty to stop his train by reason of that fact. He could not anticipate the horse would suddenly come upon the track. Under such circumstances it would be an unreasonable regulation to require him to stop his train, and the law has imposed no such obligation. It is proven the company's employees did everything in their power, after it was discovered the horse was in danger, to avoid the injury. The finding of the court was therefore contrary to the law and the evidence. The judgment will be reversed and the cause remanded.

REED v. WOODWARD.

SLATE WILL.—A writing on a slate, intended by the decedent to be her last will and testament, is not admissible as such under the Pennsylvania statute of wills.

This was an action of ejectment. The plaintiff claimed under a will written upon a slate, by which the premises in suit were devised to her by one Phebe Ann Woodward, late of the borough of Kennet Square, deceased; the defendant claimed as the heir of said decedent under the Intestate Laws of the Commonwealth. The case was submitted to the jury, subject to the opinion of the court on the point reserved, which will be found in the opinion of the court below, the verdict was for plaintiff. The legal question here determined was attempted to be brought before the Supreme Court in last January, for their decision, on an appeal from the decree of the Register's Court refusing to admit the writing on a slate for probate. The Supreme Court then affirmed the decree of the court below, delivering the following opinion:—Per Curiam.—The principal question in this case, whether a slate will can be proved as a written will under the Act of Assembly, is one of difficulty. However, we find it unnecessary to decide it, as the evidence of the creation of the alleged will as a final testamentary act, and by the requisite number of witnesses, according to the Act of 1833, is too meagre and too doubtful to requ.re a reversal of the decree of the Register's Court, which is presumptively right until the contrary is shown. Decree affirmed and appeal discharged at the costs of the appellant.

Opinion by BUTLER, P. J. April 26th, 1875.

On the trial the defendant requested instruction that "the writing on the slate is not admissible as a will, and the jury, therefore, must find for the defendant." The cause was submitted on the facts, and the point reserved. A verdict having been found for the plaintiff the point must now be disposed of. When the parties were before the Register's Court the case went off upon the facts, which alone were considered.

The question is new, and presents a fair field for discussion. We will content ourselves, however, with the statement of our conclusions without entering elaborately into the agreement.

The writing is within the terms of the statute—for they are general, requiring simply that "every will shall be in writing." But is it within the spirit? For this inquiry also, is involved in the interpretation; and when considered, we see plainly that all writing is not embraced. The purpose of the statute is obvious. It was to avoid the uncertainty and danger attending proof of nuncupative wills. Ordinary writing—as with the material in common use—serves to accomplish this purpose. Such other writing as does not, was not contemplated, and is not embraced. One may write in the dust, or the sand, or with charcoal or chalk, leaving the impression so evanescent that a breath will efface them. Such writing, though embraced by the terms of the statute, is excluded by its spirit. Then again, one may write on a rock or a wall, or a tree; and this also is excluded, for it is incapable of the use and treatment prescribed. We think it may be said with safety, that no writing effected with material not designed for or suited to the purpose, is within the statute. It could not have been contemplated that men would so write;—but does the statute embrace all writing effected with material designed for the purpose? This proposition includes lead pencil and slate, for they are designed and prepared for writing. Here the inquiry is narrower and the question more difficult. Still, the true test—the adaptability of the writing to the end in view—is the same. If all such writing answers this end, then all is included. If a part does not, it is excluded. But the results of the test here, are not so marked as in the instances before stated. It may be said that the difference consists merely in the degree of appropriateness. The common judgment of men, however, as shown by almost universal experience, is against the fitness of lead pencil and slate for writing of a permanent character. Deeds, leases, and all similar instruments are uniformly written in ink; and the judicial records of this country show no will in other material; while those of England show but two. Granting therefore, that a will in lead pencil may, in some degree, answer the purposes of the statute, it may well be doubted whether the use of this material was contemplated. Under a statute similar to ours, the English Ecclesiastical Court have, however, admitted wills in pencil to probate: Dyer's Estate, 3 Ecc. Rep. 92; Dickson v. Dickson, 1 Ecc. Rep. 222. Whether we will follow this lead is yet to be shown. In Patterson v. English et al., 21 P. F. S. 454, it is said that "no will should be written or signed with lead pencil, on account of the facility with which the writing may be altered or effaced." It may be remarked that the danger here from admitting such wills would be greater than in England, where the statute requires subscribing witnesses, and thus avoids the uncertainty attending proof of handwriting in pencil.

But we think writing on slate presents even more serious objections. While it is true that this material is prepared and used for writing, it is true only in a limited sense. It is especially designed for figures, and is neither intended for, nor adapted to, writing of a permanent character. It would hardly be thought of in this connection; and the reports here and elsewhere, show not a single instance in which it has been so used. Impressions upon it are easily removed, and replaced, without leaving any trace of the change. Writing upon such material does not in our judgment even reasonably accomplish the purpose had in view by the Legislature, was not contemplated, and is not embraced in the statute.

Judgment must, therefore, be entered for the defendant on the point reserved, notwithstanding the verdict.

For the opinion of Butler, J., in this cause, when in the Register's Court, see 30 Legal Intelligencer, 250.

Judge Hanna, in In re Will of William H. Fuguet, 32 Legal Intilligencer, 179, allowed a will as corrected in lead pencil to be admitted to probate.

SUPREME COURT OF TENNESSEE.

OPINION FILED JUNE, 1875.

SIDNA A. P. HODGES v. W. B. WILLIAMS et al.

POWERS OF MARRIED WOMEN.

A married woman, having a separate estate, where the power of disposition is not expressly withheld in the deed or will creating the estate, may convey the same as a feme sole, without the concurrence or consent of her husband, provided her privy examination be taken by a chancellor, circuit judge, or clerk of the county court. And if she could convey without the consent of her husband, she could do so with his consent, provided her privy examination be had. The husband's joining could not vitiate the deed.

MCFARLAND, J., delivered the opinion of the court.

The complainant, in her bill, alleges that on the 11th of May, 1860, E. A. Clay conveyed to her, to her sole and separate use, 4½ acres of land in or near Chattanooga; that afterwards she joined her husband, John P. Hodges, in a conveyance of this land to W. P. Williams, the proceeds going to pay debts due from the firm of Womicut & Hodges, of which her husband was a member; that her husband, to reimburse her, conveyed to her, to her sole and separate use, a certain lot in Chattanooga, called in the record the Walnut street property. Afterwards she joined her husband in the conveyance of this latter property to Cohen and wife for $2,000, part of which was paid in cash on debts of her husband. Three notes were executed payable to herself and husband, one for $710, was turned over to her, and she has disposed of it as a matter of necessity to raise money for herself and family. The two $500 notes were placed in the hands of S. A. Key, as collateral security to secure D. B. Ragsdale and P. A. McKinney as securities of said John P. Hodges, for money due for the purchase of certain mountain land described. John P. Hodges afterwards died.

The bill prays, first, to recover the 4½ acre tract of land conveyed to Williams, and to have her deed declared void; or, if this relief cannot be granted, that she recover the Walnut street property from Cohen and wife, or the consideration agreed to be paid therefor with interest, and, lastly, if not entitled to relief upon either of the foregoing grounds, that the mountain land be decreed to her, and the difference in value between it and the 4½ acres be paid to her out of the estate of John P. Hodges, or out of the assets of the firm of Womicut & Hodges. The cause was heard upon the demurrer of Cohen and wife, Ragsdale, McKinney and Key. The demurrer was overruled and the defendants allowed to appeal. Williams answered the bill, but no appearance was made by the administrator or minor heirs of John P. Hodges, nor were any steps taken to bring the cause to a hearing as to them.

The case, therefore, as to Williams and the heirs and administrator of Hodges, is not before us. We will consider only the questions raised by the demurrer of the other defendants. The objection upon the ground of mulitifariousness was withdrawn.

First, as to the right of the complainant to recover the Walnut street property from Cohen and wife. The complainant held this property under a deed from her husband, conveying it to her sole and separate use. The deed contains no provision in regard to her power of sale or disposition. No such power is in terms conferred, nor is there any restriction upon the power.

In Gray v. Robb, 4 Heiskell, 74, this court held, that if the deed creating the separate estate of a married woman contains no power of disposition, no such power can be exercised, and the deed of the husband and wife in such case was a nullity. This was in regard to a deed executed in 1862. The Act of 1869-70, ch. 99, however, is to be considered. The 3d section is as follows: "Femes covert or married women owning a separate estate settled upon them and for their separate use, shall have and possess the same power of disposition by deed, will or otherwise, as are given by the first and second sections of this act—provided the power of disposition is not expressly withheld in the deed or will under which they hold the property."

The first section enacts: "Married women over the age of twenty-one years, owning the fee or other legal or equitable interest or estate in real estate, shall have the same power of disposition by will, deed or otherwise as femes sole." The second enacts that the powers of married women to sell, convey, devise, charge or mortgage their real estate shall not depend upon the concurrence of the husband, provided her privy examination shall take place before a Chancellor, Circuit Judge or Clerk of a County Court. A subsequent section limits the provisions of the act, except the third section, to femes covert whose husbands have abandoned or refused to live with them, or are non compos mentis, with a proviso that married women may devise their real estate as femes sole, but not to defeat tenancy by the courtesy.

The third section is to be taken with the first and second sections, except that the third section is not limited, as is the first and second sections, to that class of married women above mentioned. From this it would seem to result that a married woman having a "separate estate" where the power of disposition is not expressly withheld in the deed or will, may convey the same as a femes sole, without the concurrence or consent of her husband, provided her privy examination be taken by a Chancellor, Circuit Judge or Clerk of the County Court. We take it that if she could convey without the concurrence or consent of her husband, she could certainly do so with his consent provided the privy examination be had as required. The joining of the husband could not vitiate the deed.

The bill does not deny that there was a privy examination in this case, and the power of disposition was not expressly withheld in the deed of Mrs. Hodges. So we hold that, under this statute, the deed to Cohen and wife was not void for want of power to make it. We think there is no sufficient allegation of fraud or undue advantage to avoid the deed. The result is, that the decree of the Chancellor overruling the demurrer as to Cohen and wife, is erroneous—it should have been sustained, but the decree was correct in overruling the demurrer as to Key, Ragsdale and McKinney. Whether the complainant's equities are superior to those of McKinney and Ragsdale, it is not proper now to determine. The question as to complainant's rights against Williams, or the heirs and administrator of her husband, are not before us.

The decree will be reversed and the demurrer sustained as to Cohen and wife, and affirmed and remanded as to the other defendants. The costs of this court will be paid one-half by complainant, and one-half by Ragsdale and McKinney.—The Commercial and Legal Reporter.

SUPREME COURT OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

APRIL, 1875.—IN EQUITY.—No. 3721.

WM. E. CHANDLER v. WM. A. COOK, Trustee.

Where the advertisement of sale of trust property states the day of the month correctly, but names a wrong day of the week, and the mistake is corrected in the published notice, the day before the sale, a bill in equity to set aside such sale for that irregularity will be dismissed, when it is evident that there was no intention to mislead either the parties or the public, and when neither in fact were misled.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE.

The complainant filed his bill to have a sale of certain real estate which had been sold under a power of sale, in a trust deed, set aside and declared null and void.

The deed of trust was executed by one Sidney McFarland to the defendant, Wm. A. Cook, as trustee, to secure the payment of fifty-six promissory notes, each for the sum of twenty-five dollars, with interest, which notes, at the time of the sale of the trust property, belonged to the estate of one Plowman, deceased. The said deed and notes were all dated on or about the 12th day of October, 1869; said deed empowered the trustee, upon default made in the payment of any one of said notes, etc., to sell the premises "at public auction, upon such terms and conditions, and at such time and place, and after such public advertisement," as the trustee in the execution of the trust should "deem advantageous and proper."

The premises were advertised November 27, 1873, to be sold on the 8th of December following. For reasons not shown no sale was made on the 8th of December, but on the 9th of December the original advertisement, with the following notice attached, appeared in the Republican, a daily newspaper:

The above sale is hereby postponed until Thursday, December 19, 1873, same hour and place. LATIMER & CLEARY, de9-TuThS&ds. Auctioneers.

The sale actually took place on Friday, December 19, 1873. On Thursday, the 18th of December, the above error in the day of the week was corrected. On that day, as well as on the morning of the sale, the notice of postponement was printed correctly, viz: "Friday, December 19th, 1873."

Evidence as to attendance, and number of bidders and adequacy of price is conflicting. The defendant, Cook, trustee, in his deed to the purchaser, recites that he advertised the premises "for more than ten days, and on the day of the sale."

The special term in equity made a decree dismissing the bill, and the plaintiff prayed an appeal.

FRANK W. HACKETT, for plaintiff, argued in his brief as follows:

The authority of the trustee in this suit to sell, after such public advertisement as he should deem advantageous and proper, extended only to publication of such an advertisement as in itself contained the essential characteristics of a valid and legal notice.

The medium of publication was left to his sound discretion; whether by posters or newspaper advertisement, daily, weekly, morning or evening, and for such a length of time, as his judgment should approve. But he could not neglect the salutary requirements of the law as to what the notice itself should contain. No particular form of advertisement is necessary when not prescribed by the deed. Newman v. Johnson, 12 Wheat., 570; but it should reasonably inform the public as to the time, place and description of the property. Besides, the notice must be truthful in all material particulars. Burnet v. Dennison, 5 Johns. Ch., 35. In Fitzpatrick v. Fitzpatrick ut., sup., the court observed in setting aside a sale where the notice gave the day, but omitted the time of day, that "such a defect defeats the whole purpose of the notice."

The adjournment should have been made on the day and at the place of sale. 11 Am. Law Reg., 721, Sect. 29. The question of the best time to which postponement should be made was for the trustee himself. Its decision could not be delegated to an agent. Bates v. Perry, 51 Mo., 449.

But it appears that the sale was postponed by the advertisement of December 9th, which reads:

"The above sale is hereby postponed," etc.

There is no evidence that the trustee was in attendance December 8th. In fact, if he had been, he would have said so in his answer. Besides, the postponement does not purport to be the act of the trustee at all but of the auctioneers. If the postponement was in fact made by the trustee, before the publication of the advertisement, then the advertisement was incorrect in stating that the sale "is hereby postponed." Such a statement might have induced a would-be purchaser to stay away from the sale, for the reason that he would not venture to risk a title upon a trustee's sale fixed by the auctioneer, and not by the trustee himself. On the other hand, if the postponement was actually made by the advertisement, it was either void, as not being the act of the trustee himself, or the advertisement was fatally defective in not setting forth a postponement, determined upon by the trustee, or by his authority.

If there was a postponement by the trustee on the ground, it must have been till Friday, Dec. 19th; otherwise the day of actual sale and the day of postponement would have differed.

But a published notice of postponement must conform to the actual postponement made on the ground. Richards v. Holmes, 10 How., 143; Miller v. Hull, 4 Denio, 104. The onus of proving that the advertisement, and the day of sale itself conformed to the day established by actual postponement, rests upon defendants. Gibson v. Jones, 5 Leigh, 370.

WILLIAM A. COOK, for defendant.

Mr. Justice OLIN announced the decision of the court to the effect following:

The only question raised by the bill in this case is as to the regularity of the notice of sale. No fault is found with the original advertisement, but the notice postponing the sale to the 19th of December, 1873, stated the day of the week to be Thursday instead of Friday.

The day of the month was correct, and that was the day of the sale. There is no doubt but the wrong day of the week was inserted by mistake, and without any intention of misleading, and it was discovered and corrected the day before the sale, which actually transpired at the place and on the day of the month advertised.

The correction of the notice gave a time certain, so that the public could not be misled.

We are aware of the rule which requires a trustee for sale to act in good faith and with diligent attention in conducting the sale of the property. But the postponement in this case was proper and necessary to bring the property to sale under the most favorable circumstances for realizing its full value. And in point of fact there is nothing in the case to show that the sale was not conducted so as to secure this result.

We think the decree of the special term should be affirmed and the bill dismissed with costs.

MACARTHUR, J., dissented, and expressed his opinion to be that there was no proof as to the sale having been postponed by the trustee or by his direction. The notice is in the name of the auctioneers alone, and not by the trustee.

Whether the sale shall take place, or be advertised again, is a matter confided to the discretion of the trustee, and he cannot delegate that power to auctioneers or agents under the special trust and confidence with which he alone is invested. The fact may be that the postponement was authorized and the new advertisement directed by the trustee; but there is nothing in the pleadings or proofs to explain the advertisement of the auctioneers. For this reason, I think, there was no valid execution of the power to sell, and that the sale was null and void.—Wash. Law Rep.

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

ABSTRACTS OF OPINIONS FILED AT SPRINGFIELD, IN JUNE, 1875.

PROPERTY TO PROMISSORY NOTE EXECUTED TO A WIFE UNDER AN AGREEMENT THAT SHE SHALL HAVE THE INTEREST THEREOF FOR LIFE.

STATEMENT.

The appellant sold his land; to which his wife agreed, until the writings were prepared, when she refused to sign, alleging her fear that her husband would abandon her when he got rid of all his lands, and demanding one thousand dollars as a security, which he refused. Finally, it was compromised, by executing one of the notes to her for $1,000, on the distinct understanding that she should have the interest during life, and the whole if appellant should abandon her. Afterwards, the purchaser paid this note to her; she took the money and loaned it out, taking a note and mortgage. This note she devised to appellee, her daughter, on her death. Appellant filed a bill for injunction, and to obtain a decree of the property of this note and mortgage in him.

Held, That the property of the note and mortgage was in him.

David Blalock v. Stephen A. Randall.—Appeal from Sangamon.—Opinion by SHELDON, J.

TRESPASS AND CASE UNDER THE LATE STATUTE ABOLISHING THE DISTINCTION—WHEN ACTION FOR MALICIOUS PROSECUTION BROUGHT—EVIDENCE.

STATEMENT.—Action of trespass for false imprisonment, and action for malicious prosecution together. Held,

1. That trespass will not lie for imprisonment on regular process, but only case; and that only on the grounds of malice and want of probable cause. The statute abolishing the distinction between the actions of trespass and case does not change the rule. The statute only does away with the technical distinction between the two forms of action; but does not affect the substantial rights and liabilities of parties so as to give any other remedy for acts done under regular legal process than before existed; an action on the ground of malice and want of probable cause.

2. An action for malicious prosecution can only be brought after the final determination of the prosecution, and not where the cause has merely been stricken from the docket with leave to reinstate.

3. Where it is charged that a note was given through circumvention and fraud, by means of a devise, proof of the same device being used on others in the same course of employment, is admissible, to show a fraudulent intention.

ISSUE OF SCIRE FACIAS ON RECOGNIZANCE-FORFEITED—STATUTE RETROACTIVE—VARIANCE BETWEEN THE WRIT AND THE RECORD—OBJECTION MUST BE MADE BELOW—FINDING AGAINST EVIDENCE.

STATEMENT.—In this case. it was objected that, after the forfeiture of the recognizance, there was no order of court for the scire facias issued by the clerk. Held,

1. That, under the statute, the judgment of forfeiture is a sufficient order to the clerk to issue the writ. Nor does it make any difference that the forfeiture was declared before the passage of this statute, inasmuch as the statute was intended to regulate the practice, and apply to all cases in which writs were to be issued after its passage. Nor, indeed, was such an order necessary, in the absence of the statute, under the common law.

2. The question of a variance between the writ and the record cannot be made for the first time in the Supreme court.

3 It is only where the verdict is clearly against the weight of evidence that the Supreme court will interfere with it.

155.—William L. Kenner v. Charles N. Harding.—Appeal from McDonough—Opinion by BREESE, J. WALKER, C. J., dissenting.

WARRANTY—WHAT IT INCLUDES—FALSE REPRESENTATIONS IN THE SALE OF LANDS—MOTION IN ARREST OF JUDGMENT.

STATEMENT.—False representation of soundness as to a mule which was visibly unsound; and false representations alleged as to the value of land, and the excellence of its timber, the land being in the neighborhood where the parties lived, and the vendee choosing to rely upon the representations of the vendor without going to view the land. Held,

1. That a warranty does not extend to the visible defects of an animal sold, but only to those which are latent.

2. Where there are no relations of trust or confidence between the parties, it is merely the folly of a vendee to rely upon the representations of the vendor, and he cannot be relieved against false representations as to the value or quality of the land.

3. A motion in arrest of judgment has the same effect in law as a general demurrer to the declaration, and the office of such pleading is to admit all facts well pleaded.

[This case is distinguished from White v. Sutherland, 64 Ill., 181, in which the party complaining was bed-ridden—a cripple, incapable of motion—the land was 30 miles away, and the seller was a minister of the gospel, and had been an officer in the army; and the vendee told him he should rely upon his statements, and invoked him as a gentleman, a soldier, and a minister, to tell him the exact truth. On these circumstances, it was held there was such a relation of trust as entitled the vendee to relief in equity.]

158.—J. W. Jefferson, v. George W. Kennard.—Appeal from Champaign.—Opinion by SHELDON, J.

STATEMENT.—Amendment in prayer of a bill for specific performance, changing it to a prayer for a rescission of the contract for fraudulent representations in the sale of a large quantity of wool.

Held, That where, in a contract for the sale of personal property, the buyer files a bill for specific performance, and while it is pending the complainant discoveres that there was fraud in the sale, he may have leave, by application to the court, to amend the prayer of his bill, so as to pray for a rescission of the contract on the ground of the fraud, and thus obtain relief; and the right of rescission would not be concluded by the original bill.

159.—City of Champaign v. Robert M. McLaurie.—Appeal from Champaign.—Opinion by SCHOLFIELD, J.

CASE FOR INJURY TO POSSESSION OF LAND—CHARACTER OF THE POSSESSION NECESSARY—WHAT PUT IN ISSUE BY THE PLEA OF "NOT GUILTY"—PROOF.

STATEMENT.—Action on the case for injury to real estate in the possession of appellee.

Held, 1. That where possession of land alone is relied upon for any legal purpose in the absence of legal title, it must be an actual, and not a constructive possession.

2. The rule of common law is that, under the plea not guilty, in an action on the case, the defendant may not only put the plaintiff on proof of the whole charge contained in the declaration, but may also give in evidence any justification, or excuse. The English rule that, in actions on the case, the plea of not guilty shall operate as a denial only of the breach of duty, or wrongful act alleged to have been committed by the defendant, and not of the fact stated in the inducement, etc., was adopted by the judges at Hilary, Term., 4 William 4, pursuant to the statute 3 and 4, William 4, and has never been adopted by statute in this State.

3. It was incumbent on the plaintiff to make proof, under his declaration, either of the legal title to, or the actual possession of, the property claimed to have been injured.

162.—Oliver P Canterbury v. Charles Miller.—Appeal from Sangamon.—Opinion by CRAIG, J.

WRITTEN AGREEMENTS VOID FOR UNCERTAINTY—CONSTRUCTION OF CONTRACTS IN WRITING.

STATEMENT.—Suit for not receiving and paying for a lot of hogs sold by appellant to appellee. On the trial, two instruments were offered in evidence, but rejected by the court and judgment for defendant.

The instruments were: "I have this day bought of O. P. Canterbury, 100 head of hogs, to average 225 pounds and over; to be delivered at Sherman between the 1st and 20th of July, at my option. The hogs to be weighed on his scales, and delivered at his expense, for which I agree to pay $4.50 per hundred lbs. on delivery, this 30th day of April, 1873.

O. P. Canterbury."

And, "I have this day sold to Charles Miller, 100 head of hogs, to average 225 lbs. and over. The hogs to be weighed at my scales and delivered at Sherman at my expense, between the 1st and 20th of July, at his option, for which he agrees to pay $4.50 per hundred lbs. on delivery, this 30th day of April, 1873.

Charles Miller."

Held, 1. That these two instruments, simultaneously executed, are to be regarded as one and the same instrument.

2. They constitute no contract. The one signed by Canterbury recites that he has bought of himself one hundred head of hogs, for which he agrees to pay himself $4.50 per hundred. The other that Miller has sold to himself, etc.

3. It is no part of the duty of courts to make contracts for parties. In the construction of a contract, where the language employed is ambiguous, courts uniformly endeavor to ascertain the intention of parties; and give effect to that intention. But where the language is unequivocal, although the parties may have failed to express their real intention, there is no room for construction; and the legal effect of the agreement must be enforced.

165.—Toledo, Wabash and Western R. R. Co. v. John Jones—Appeal from Macon.—Opinion by BREESE, J.

CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE, ETC.—INADMISSIBLE EVIDENCE—TRAIN BEHIND TIME—SIGNALS—INSTRUCTIONS.

STATEMENT.—Action for damages in a train running upon the wagon of appellee in trying to cross the track before it; which collision severely injured him and killed a little boy riding in the wagon with him. Held,

1. That where a declaration does not aver that the condition of a culvert at a railroad crossing contributed to produce an injury, evidence is not admissible to show the condition of the culvert, and such evidence tends to draw the attention of the jury from the true issue.

2. That in regard to ringing the bell or sounding the whistle, a railroad company are not liable under the statute for non-performance, but only for the injury resulting from the non-performance; and it must appear that the non-performance contributed to the injury.

3. It is erroneous to instruct a jury that a train not running on its schedule time requires more vigilance on the part of those managing it, and makes less vigilance necessary on the part of others in crossing the track. Due care and diligence are alike requisite at all times, on both the part of the company and of all persons exposed to danger at a railroad crossing.

4. It is proper to instruct the jury that it was not the duty of the engineer in charge of the locomotive on nearing the road crossing to stop the train for the purpose of avoiding a collision with a wagon and team approaching the crossing, although by applying the brakes he could do so in time to avoid the collision, but it was the duty of the person in charge of the team, in obedience to the known custom of the country, to stop his team, and not attempt to cross in front of the train.

166.—Toledo, Wabash and Western R. R. Co. v. Andrew J. Miller, Admr., etc.—Appeal from Macon.—Opinion by SCOTT, J.

DEATH OF CHILD UNDER CHARGE OF ONE WHOSE NEGLIGENCE CAUSED THE ACCIDENT BY COLLISION WITH A TRAIN.

STATEMENT.—This action was for the death of the son of appellee, as set forth in the above case, being in connection with the same occurrence. The boy was nine years of age. Held,

That although the same degree of care could not be required of a child of tender years as of an adult, yet as the parents entrusted him to the care of the owner of the team, by whose negligence he was brought into the fatal danger, the railroad cannot be held liable.

168.—John W. White v. Charles W. Smith.—Error to Piatt.—Opinion by SHELDON, J.

WHAT IS A VALID PROMISSORY NOTE—CONTINGENCY.

STATEMENT.—Suit was brought by the assignee of this instrument in writing:

"MONTICELLO, ILLS., }
"$50.00. April 17th, 1866. }

"For value received, I promise to pay to the Monticello Railroad Company, or order, the sum of fifty dollars, to be paid in such installments, and at such times, as the directors of said company may, from time to time, assess, or require. J. W. WHITE."

On this some assessments were paid, and the whole of the remainder assessed but not paid; and afterwards it was indorsed to the plaintiff. The question arose whether it was a negotiable promissory note. Held,

1. That, although a valid promissory note must be for the payment of money which will certainly become due and payable one time or other, though it may be uncertain when that time will come; and when the payment depends on a contingency, it will make no difference that the contingency does in fact happen afterwards, on which the payment is to become absolute, since its character as a promissory note cannot depend upon future events, but solely upon its character when executed; and although this instrument seems to depend upon a contingency, yet, there is a class of cases which, at first view, seem to import that payment is to be made only upon the occurrence of events which may never happen, and yet which are uniformly held to be absolutely payable at all events; as, for example, a note payable after sight, or after notice, or on demand, which note will be held valid and payable at all events, although, in point of fact, the payee may die without ever having presented the note for sight, or without giving notice, or making demand. The law, in all cases of this sort, deems the note to admit a present debt to be due the payee, and payable absolutely and at all events, whenever, or by whomsoever, the note is presented for payment, according to its import.

2. That the instrument sued on in this case is to be construed as a note payable on demand.

No. 169.—Toledo, Wabash and Western R. R. Co. v. Lydia F. Moore.—Appeal from Piatt.—Opinion by CRAIG, J.

STATEMENT.—Action for the death of the appellee's husband by the explosion of a boiler, he being engine-driver on the train. Held,

1. That where there is evidence from which a jury could find a verdict, it will not be disturbed, although the evidence might, in the opinion of the appellate court, justify a different result. The verdict must be manifestly against the weight of the evidence, in order that the court should interfere with it.

2. But where there is a balance of evidence, the instructions below must accurately state the law, or the cause will be reversed therefor.

3. While it is the settled rule that a servant cannot recover of the company for an injury resulting from the negligence of another servant in the same line of employment, provided the company has taken due care to select skillful and careful servants, yet an engine-driver will not be held to be in the same line of employment with the master mechanic whose business it is to keep the engines in repair, any more than a brakeman would be held to be in the same line of employment with construction hands.

4. A company is liable for any negligence resulting in injury to its employees in not providing safe machinery or track for them to operate with in the performance of their duty.

170.—Thomas O. Smith v. Job A. Race et al.—Appeal from Moultrie.—Opinion by CRAIG, J.

CONSTRUCTION OF THE WORDS "OWN" AND "POSSESS" IN THE TEXAS CATTLE STATUTE.

STATEMENT.—Action of damages to cattle of appellee by Texas cattle of appellant. Verdict for plaintiff of $4.900. Held,

1. That the word "own" in the prohibitory statute relating to Texas cattle, is to be understood in its natural and ordinary sense, and not as relating to a conditional ownership; and the term "possess," also, to be the usual and well-known possession which men generally name of personal property, and not as relating to a mere lien, without the control of the property. [The case mainly turns on evidence of ownership.]

171.—City of Decatur v. William Vermillion.—Appeal from Macon.—Opinion by WALKER, Ch. J.

EXTRA COMPENSATION NOT ALLOWED TO PUBLIC OFFICERS—EVEN PROMISE THEREON NOT BINDING.

STATEMENT. — Appellee being pound-master, was appointed special policeman in order to enable him to more efficiently discharge his duties in that office on the express understanding that he was not to be paid as policeman, yet he brought suit and recovered for extra services as such special policeman. In reversing, the court held,

1. That a person accepting a public office, with a fixed salary, is bound to perform the duties of the office for the salary. He cannot legally charge additional compensation for the discharge of those duties, even though the salary may be a very inadequate remuneration for his services, and even though, by subsequent statutes or ordinances, his duties are increased, and not his salary. Even a promise to pay him an extra fee is not binding, though he may render service and exercise a degree of diligence greater than could legally have been required of him.

2. The office of special policeman, in this case, was but auxiliary to that of pound-master, and even a promise for extra pay would not have been binding.

172.—Wesley Best v. Nokomis National Bank. — Appeal from Sangamon. — Opinion by BREESE, J.

RULES GOVERNING DRAFTS OR BILLS OF EXCHANGE—ACTION THEREON BY PAYEE—INDORSEMENTS MERELY FOR COLLECTION—CONSIDERATION.

STATEMENT.—Bill of exchange drawn by defendant (appellant) for the accommodation of Cooley & Co. in favor of B. F. Culp, Cashier of appellee, on Whitaker & Gray, of St. Louis.

Suit thereon— pleas non assumpsit, and want of consideration, the drawer being insolvent.

Held, 1. That it was a bank transaction, and the draft belonged to the bank, although made payable to the cashier.

2. A payee of a note, although he may have written an assignment thereon, can maintain an action in his own name. The indorsement is in the power and control of the payee; and he may strike it out or not, as he thinks proper, and the possession of the note by the payee is, unless the contrary appears, evidence that he is the bona fide holder of it.

3. Where indorsements are made for the purpose of collection merely, they do not transfer the title. The indorsee in such case, is a mere agent, and, at any time, his ageney may be annulled, and he deprived of all authority to receive the money.

5. An objection that bills drawn for the accommodation of another are without consideration, is not tenable any more than would be the objection of a surety that he had received no consideration. It is sufficient if the principal has received a consideration.

174.—Mary Ann Sontag etc. v. Rosina Schmisseur.—Error to St. Clair.—Opinion by WALKER, C. J.

HOMESTEAD RIGHT OF A WIDOW AS TO THE HEIRS—CONSTRUCTION.

STATEMENT.—The question in this case was, whether the widow of a person dying seized of real estate, having children as heirs, but no debts, can claim in addition to her dower in the premises a homestead worth one thousand dollars, as against the heirs of her husband, in a proceeding for partition and assignment of dower.

Held, That the acts of 1851 and 1857 only create an exemption from forced sales, or alienations by the husband, and do not extend the right to the widow as against the heirs.

175.—Henry Cease v. Washington Cockle. —Appeal from Mason.—Opinion by SHELDON, J.

STATEMENT.—Action to recover excess of a payment, with interest, made on a written agreement to deliver 20,000 bushels of corn, of which only a part was delivered. The agreement was signed by Tambly & Co. and Cease, as sellers, parties of the first part, jointly and severally to deliver. It was contended that Cease was only surety as to one-half (10,000 bushels).

Held, That while, where two or more have signed an instrument for the payment of money, jointly and severally, it may be shown that one was only a surety; yet this cannot be done on a contract for sale and delivery of property, by the parties respectively, as this would vary the contract; nor can it be shown that one was to deliver one-half the corn, (or other property), and the other the remainder, as this likewise would vary the instrument by parol; nor as to part one was surety. The express terms of such a contract must govern.

176.—Dennis Cullinam v. John H. Nash. —Appeal from Macon.— Opinion by SCHOLFIELD, J.

BILLS OF EXCEPTION—CANNOT BE CERTIFIED BY A REPORTER, BUT ONLY BY THE JUDGE —ALL THE EVIDENCE.

Held, 1. That where a bill of exceptions does not state that it contains all the evidence, the appellate court will not look to see whether the evidence not in the record, will sustain the verdict.

2. A reporter cannot sign, or certify, a bill of exceptions as to the evidence, for this is a judicial act, and so must be done by the judge.

177.—William H. Coggeshall v. John M. Beesley, guardian, etc.—Appeal from Mason.—Opinion by SCHOLFIELD, J.

AMENDMENT UNDER PRACTICE ACT OF 1874 —WHEN MAY BE MADE.

[The same points as above, in regard to bills of exceptions, were reiterated in this case.]

Held, That under the practice act of 1874, it is proper where there has been a verdict for plaintiff, and there is a motion for a new trial, to allow the plaintiff to amend his declaration, and dismiss as to one of the parties.

180.—George McDaniel v. Benjamin F. Fox.—Appeal from Sangamon.—Opinion by WALKER, C. J.

BALANCE OF EVIDENCE—ILLEGAL LEVY, AND REPLEVIN—BINDING EFFECT OF ERRONEOUS JUDGMENT OF A CIRCUIT COURT THEREIN.

STATEMENT.—Bill filed to set aside a judgment alleged to have been obtained before a justice of the peace, by fraud of the plaintiff. The case chiefly turns on the evidence, there being, as to most particulars, the oath of the plaintiff against the oath of the defendant, merely. Held,

1. That, in such a condition of the evidence, the appellate court will not undertake to determine the weight or preponderance thereof.

2. The illegal levy of an execution [as where it was without authority of law] is no ground for setting aside a judgment of replevin, but only for an action of trespass against the officer, and against the plaintiff in execution, if he directed or advised the illegal levy, not even if the execution had lost its life or vigor before the levy was made.

3. If a circuit court holds, in a replevin suit, that a levy could be made under a dead execution, that judgment is binding in all collateral proceedings until reversed, vacated or satisfied.

182.—George Milmine et al. v. Albert C. Burnham et al.—Appeal from Champaign.—Opinion by SCOTT, J.

EQUITIES AS BETWEEN MORTGAGEE AND JUDGMENT CREDITOR—NOTICE.

STATEMENT.—This is a contest between judgment and mortgage creditors. Surplis bought of Conkey a tract of land, and took a deed, which, by mistake, misdescribed the land. Under this he took possession of the land, and afterwards gave a mortgage containing the same description, to the appellants. This mortgage was foreclosed. Soon after this decree of foreclosure, the mistake was discovered, and Conkey re-conveyed to correct the error, December 19, 1869. At the October term of the circuit court, closing Nov. 17, 1869, appellees obtained a judgment against Surplis, not having at that time any notice of the mistake in the deed and mortgage; although they had such notice prior to the date of the second deed. January 5, 1870, levy was made on the land under the judgment of appellees, who bought it in at the sale, and afterwards obtained the sheriff's deed. They contended that as they had no notice of the interest of the mortgagees, Nov. 17, 1869, when their lien attached, their lien having once attached must prevail over the rights of the mortgagees (appellants) acquired under the instrument containing an erroneous description. But, Held,

1. That, at that date, the legal title was not in Surplis, he having only an equitable title, which he had conveyed by the mortgage, retaining, however, an equity of redemption, and being in possession. The judgment in the case could be only a lien on the equity of redemption. Whatever interest he had might have been learned, by inquiry of him on the premises. And before the legal title became vested, the judgment creditors had full notice and caused the levy and sale to be made after this notice. And the judgment creditors, under such circumstances, cannot obtain superior equities to prior mortgagees.

2. A judgment creditor has no equities superior to a bona fide purchaser; and whatever notice would affect the latter would affect the former.

CEREMONY IN THE ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE.—At the recent assizes of Northampton, England, Mr. Justice Mellor is reported to have said, addressing the gentry of the county, who had assembled to serve as grand-jurymen: "It was also important in this respect—he regretted to see in many counties—and he was not sure he might not say the same of this—the decay of those matters of importance which ought to attend the reception of the representatives of her Majesty's commissioners, those circumstances of state, which in his judgment entered very largely into the spirit of that which was known as allegiance to law, and of which they were but imperfect judges. This was a matter not to be lost sight of; and he doubted whether allegiance to the law would remain in tact as it was at present, if the circumstance of solemnity and state should unfortunately throughout the country disappear. It was of the utmost importance that those who had a stake in the country, as it was called, or who possessed the property of the country in great measure, should do nothing calculated to diminish the allegiance to the law. This was not his opinion only; he had heard it stated by others who took a more philosophical view of the matter than a judge could do; it was their opinion that it was of essential importance to keep up those circumstances of solemnity and state attending the administration of criminal law. He was convinced that they owed the greatest advantage to the solemn administration of justice, particularly by the judges, who were commissioned by her Majesty to represent her, and, therefore, it was that he regretted when he saw anything that was calculated to lessen that respect. He did not say this in any narrow spirit. There were a number of counties in which the same thing was manifested."

LAW SCHOOLS.—The Albany Law Journal of last Saturday has the following in favor of law schools:

One of the most hopeful indications of the times in regard to legal education is the increasing prosperity of the principal law schools of the country, and the tendency exhibited by some of them to a more thorough system of education. Although many excellent lawyers are unfriendly to the law schools, the general professional sentiment is that it is a very valuable, if not essential, aid in legal training. One source of objecton has been that some of the schools have professed to make lawyers and have indirectly, if not directly, inculcated the belief among young men that all that was necessary to be fully prepared for the demands of an active practice was to spend the requisite time at the school and to receive the diploma. The law-school cannot make a lawyer, but it can do a great deal toward it. There is much that cannot be learned in the schools, but there is vastly more that the office does not teach. In the technicalities of practice, in the rules of pleading and evidence, and the application of law to the affairs of men, the office furnishes the only instruction. But here its benefit ends. Under ordinary circumstances it makes an attorney, not a lawyer. The larger culture which fits one for the higher walks of the profession, that comprehensive knowledge of the principles of legal science, which lifts one above a mere dependence on cases, can be nowhere so well acquired as in the school of law. The young man who shall pursue with diligence a course at a law school and shall supplement it with an apprenticeship in an office will, nine times in ten, outstrip the mere office student in the professional race. While there may be, and doubtless are, defects in the organization and methods of many of the schools, they are such as time and experience will mend.

The old Vanderbilt homestead at Stapleton, Staten Island, built probably over 100 years ago, is still in a good state of preservation, but the barn is in a tumble-down condition, though the commodore says it is good enough for him, and won't have it repaired.

CHICAGO LEGAL NEWS.

MYRA BRADWELL, Editor.

CHICAGO: SEPTEMBER 25, 1875.

Published EVERY SATURDAY by the

CHICAGO LEGAL NEWS COMPANY,

At Nos. 151 and 153 Fifth Avenue.

TERMS:—TWO DOLLARS per annum, in advance Single Copies, TEN CENTS.

With this number we commence the eighth year of the Legal News. In looking over the work of the past seven years, we have much to feel thankful for and very little to regret. It shall be our aim in the future, as it has been in the past, whenever possible, to publish the recent opinions of the Federal and State courts upon questions of interest to the profession, in advance of our cotemporaries. We have published more of the opinions of the Supreme Court of the United States and of the Federal District and Circuit Courts than any other legal periodical. Although our advertising patronage has increased during the past year, we have devoted more space to reading matter than in any previous volume, and the volume just closed contains more cases and more reading matter than any other. Upon a calculation, we find that it contains as mnch reading matter, exclusive of advertisements, as five volumes of Illinois Reports. The Chicago Legal News is furnished for less than any other regular weekly or monthly legal publication We are truly grateful to the members of the profession and others for the liberal patronage we have received for the past seven years, and would solicit its continuance in the way of legal notices, advertisements, job printing and stereotyping.

We would ask all our subscribers, who have not already done so, to at once forward us the required two dollars and twenty cents, to renew their subscriptions and pay the postage.

We hope and believe that all our subscribers will respond readily and willingly to our call for their subscriptions. We will furnish volume IV., V., VI. and VII. of the Legal News, neatly bound, for $3.00 each, at the office. When ordered from a distance, forty-four cents for postage should be added to the price of each volume. The cash should accompany all orders for binding.

We call attention to the following opinions, reported at length in this issue:

List of Witnesses for Accused—Minutes of Grand Jury.—The opinion of the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Wisconsin, by Dyer, J., holding that in all criminal cases in which there has been no preliminary examination, it is within the discretion of the court to order a list of the witnesses sworn before the grand jury to be furnished to the accused; that he is not, however entitled to the minutes of the proceedings before the grand jury, nor, in the absence of strong reasons to the contrary, should they be furnished him.

Slate Will.—The opinion of the Court of Common Pleas of Chester County, Pa., holding that a writing on a slate, intended by the decedent to be her last will and testament, is not admissible to probate as such. We cannot endorse this opinion. While no prudent lawyer would advise a will to be drawn on a slate if paper could be obtained; still we can name cases where the best of lawyers would draw a will on a slate and the wisest of judges would admit it to probate. Suppose three men were traveling miles away from any house, and where no paper could be obtained, and one of them was taken suddenly sick, unto death, and desiring to make his will, one of his companions should take from his carpet bag a slate, and the will of the sick man should be drawn upon it signed and witnessed, with all the formalities of law, would any one seriously contend, upon the death of the testator, that the will on the slate, upon proper proof, should not be admitted to probate?

Negligence--Killing Stock.--The opinion of the Supreme Court of Illinois, by Scott, J., in a case brought against a railroad company to recover damages for killing a horse by its cars.

Powers of Married Women.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of Tennessee, by McFarland, J., holding that a married women having a separate estate, where the power of disposition is not expressly withheld in the deed or will creating the estate, may convey the same as a feme sole, without the consent or concurrence of her husband, provided her privy examination be taken by the proper officer, and that if she could convey without the consent of her husband, she could do so with his consent, provided her privy examination be had.

Trustee's Sale—Mistake in Advertisement of Sale.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, by Olin, J., where, in the advertisement of a sale under a trust deed, the day of the month was correctly stated, but, by mistake, a wrong day of the week was named.

INJUNCTION—GOOD WILL—CONTRACT IN RESTRAINT OF TRADE.

In the case of Harkinson's appeal, where the appellant had sold her confectionery and its good will, and covenanted not to engage directly or indirectly in the same business within the 22nd ward, for ten years, but to endeavor to promote the business interests of her vendee, and she within the time erected another confectionery within the ward, placed the name Harkinson over the door, and put her son in possession to prosecute the business in his own behalf. The Supreme Court of Pa. held that the breach of the covenant being doubtful, and no substantial injury being shown by the covenantee, an injunction would not lie against Mrs. Harkinson to restrain her from letting her house for the purpose specified.

ESTIMATING DAMAGES FOR LAND TAKEN.

The Supreme Court of Pa. held in the E. B. & W. R. R. Co. v. Ruck (reported 32 Leg. Intelligencer, 336), that in estimating damages for property taken by a railroad, the declarations of value and offers of sale by the claimant just before or after the opening of the road, offered in evidence by the company, are competent to go to the jury.

MISFEASANCE BY PUBLIC OFFICER—NO PROOF OF MALICE.

The judicial committee of the privy council, on appeal from the Supreme Court of New South Wales (reported 33 L. T. Rep., N. S. 1). Held, that if a public officer is guilty of a misfeasance in the exercise of the powers intrusted to him by law, and in the discharge of his duty, he is liable to an action for any damage resulting from that act, without proof or malice or want of probable cause.

FRAUDULENT PREFERENCE—SECURED CREDITOR.

The English Court of Appeal in Chancery (33 L. T. Rep., N. S. 3), say the doctrine of fraudulent preference, is enforced solely with the view to the equal distribution of the bankrupt's assets among all his creditors; that a trustee in bankruptcy ought not to make, or allow to be made in his name, an application to set aside a transaction on the ground of fraudulent preference, except for the purpose of benefiting the estate, and having the property equally distributed among all the creditors; that where the setting aside of such a transaction would not benefit the estate but only a creditor, who claimed a charge on goods alleged to have been parted with by way of fraudulent preference exceeding the value of the goods, and hold that leave should not be given to the creditor to use the trustee's name in proceedings, to set aside the transaction. The rule laid down in this case is evidently correct, as the trustee acts for all the creditors and should not be allowed to act for the purpose of benefiting one creditor only.

FREIGHTS—UNDUE PREFERENCE—CONSIDERATION FOR REDUCED RATES.

The English court of the railway commission in the B. O. Co. et al. v. The B. R. W. Co. (33 L. T. Rep., N. S. 29). Held, that it is not a valid consideration for a reduced rate on coal, nor a circumstance that can substantially affect the rate at which it can profitably be carried; that the party favored is the customer of the same railway company, in goods of quite a different kind.

FREIGHTS—UNDUE PREFERENCE.

The same court, in Thompson et al. v. The L. & M. R. W. Co. (33 I. B., 32), say that it cannot be laid down as a general proposition of law, that an advantage given by a railway company to obtain traffic for which it competes with another company is not undue; but that the court will decide the legality or illegality of any alleged preference in each particular case. The legislation for regulating railroads in England seems to have been carried nearer perfection than in America, and much more equitable to all parties concerned. To show the spirit in which these enactments are construed, we give the following brief extract from the opinion in the above case:

"What degree of favor can lawfully be shown to some persons to the prejudice of others, under the pressure of competition, can only be decided in any case that arises, by a reference to its special circumstances. In the case before us some of the traffic would, independently of the bounty, be sent to the Northwestern; the rest would naturally fall to the Midland, for the simple reason that the breweries and the station are contiguous, and joined by lines of rails, the local relation of the Midland to the traffic is such that it must have the preference, and if another company, under such circumstances, aims at diverting that traffic into its own channels, we think, looking at the matter in its bearing on the rights under the statute of third parties, that their interests ought not to be sacrificed or placed at a disadvantage in the pursuit, however otherwise legitimate, of their object."

TAXATION—EXEMPTION OF CHURCH PROPERTY.

The Supreme Court of Ohio in Gerke v. Purcell, (23 Ohio, 230.) In construing the provision of the constitution relating to the exemption of houses used for public worship, hold that the express authority given in the Constitution to exempt from taxation "houses used exclusively for public worship," carries with it, impliedly, authority to exempt such grounds as may be reasonably necessary for their use; but such grounds must subserve the same exclusive use to which the buildings are required to be devoted; that a parsonage, although built on ground which might otherwise be exempt as attached to the church edifice, does not come within the exemption. The ground, in such a case, instead of being used exclusively for public worship becomes a place for a private residence. This opinion occupies twenty pages. In it many authorities are cited.

Recent Publications.

The Medical Jurisprudence of Insanity. By J. H. Balfour Browne, Esq., of the Middle Temple and Midland Circuit, etc., etc. Second edition, with References to the Scotch and American Decisions. San Francisco. Sumner, Whitney & Co.: 1875.

The first edition of this work appeared in June, 1871, and upon its title page it was stated to have been published in London by J. & A. Churchill, and in San Francisco by S. Whitney & Co. The second edition, which is the one before us, bears only the imprint of the California house, although it has the preface of the author dated London, April, 1875. The first edition has been well received by the profession both in England and America. Much new matter has been added to the second edition, and it has been greatly improved. The chapters have been subdivided into sections, to which the index and table of contents refer, and English, American and Scotch cases have been added. With the text of Mr. Browne we have no fault to find. It is a well-arranged and ably written treatise. We must say, however, for a reprint by an American house, it does not in the notes refer to the American cases as much as the American lawyer has a right to expect it would. The cases should have been brought down to the time of going to press.

A Treatise on the Law of Trespass, in the Twofold Aspect of the Wrong and the Remedy. By Thomas W. Waterman, Counsellor at Law. In two volumes. Volume II. New York: Baker, Voorhis & Co., Publishers, 66 Nassau street. 1875,

In March last the first volume, devoted to trespass to the person and personal property, appeared, and was well received by the bar. The present, which is the second volume, is devoted exclusively to trespass on real estate, and is divided into nine chapters, as follows: 1. Right to the enjoyment of land. 2. Justifiable on another's land. 3. Invasion of another's premises. 4. Trespass concerning animals. 5. Parties entitled to redress. 6. Remedy for trespass to real estate. 7. Action of trespass to try title. 8. Action of trespass for mesne profits. 9. Proceedings in forcible entry and detainer. The plan adopted by Mr. Waterman was to eschew, with few exceptions, all books of reference but law reports; to aim at the careful reading of every reported decision bearing upon the questions treated in the work; and finally, to adopt his conclusions only after a systematic and patient study and comparison of the cases, commencing with the earliest adjudications and following the stream of judicial exposition down to the latest time before going to press. In the preparation of this work Mr. Waterman has bestowed much honest labor, and he will be appreciated as well as rewarded by the liberal patronage of the profession.

LIV. NEW HAMPSHIRE.

We are indebted to Hon. JOHN M. SHIRLEY for advance sheets of the 54th & 55th Vols. of New Hampshire Reports from which we take the following head notes:

RE-FORMATION OF DEED.

A deed cannot be reformed in equity, where it appears to have been made according to the intention and understanding of the parties at the time of its execution.—(Opinion by LADD., J.)—Bradford v. Bradford, p. 463.

As to a parol, contemporaneous contract for a reconveyance of the premises in certain contingencies, the parties must stand upon their rights as they exist at law.

COMPELLING ATTENDANCE OF WITNESSES—IMPEACHING EXPERTS

It is only in a capital case that the respondent is allowed the process of the State to compel the attendance of his witnesses, and not in such a case, unless the respondent is poor and unable to furnish them himself.—(Opinion by SARGENT, C. J.)—State v. Archer, p. 465.

Any person, who heard the respondent testify on a former hearing, may testify what he then stated for the purpose of contradicting his present story. Such impeaching testimony is not confined to such witnesses as took minutes of his former testimony.

A respondent is not obliged to testify so as to criminate himself in relation to any collateral matters, even though he volunteers as a witness in chief; but if the witness chooses to testify, on cross-examination, that he has been guilty of a felony, it would be competent as affecting the credit of the witness.

Witnesses, not experts, cannot, as a general rule, give their opinions as to the mental soundness or unsoundness of the respondent.

Proof of the actual commission of a rape by the respondent, would warrant a conviction for an assault with intent to commit rape.

SALE OF LIQUOR.

Sales of intoxicating liquors, if made in this State, since the act of 1855, will be presumed to be illegal and void until the vendor's authority to sell is shown.—(Opinion by SARGENT, C. J.)—Corning & Co. v. Abbott & Co., p. 469.

But if such sale is made in another State, the presumption will be that the sale is legal until it is shown to be otherwise. A sale of spirituous liquors without license from the United States government is not void.

Information and belief on the part of a vendor of spirituous liquors, that the purchaser was intending to sell the same contrary to the law, does not invalidate the sale.

The plaintiffs will not be affected by any secret understanding or agreement between partners, not known to the plaintiffs, limiting the general powers of either partner.

PLEADING GOODS BARGAINED FOR.

When goods are bargained for and delivered, with the agreement that they shall remain the property of the vendor until they are paid for, if the same are not paid for within the time specified, the vendor may retake the goods, or bring assumpsit for the price.—(Opinion by SARGENT, C. J.)—Clay v. Bohonon, p. 474.

But neither a count for goods sold and delivered, nor for goods bargained and sold, can be maintained for the price of the goods; but a special count should be inserted, founded upon the special contract.

A declaration for goods sold and delivered, and for goods bargained and sold, may be amended by adding such special count.

In trespass quare clausum fregit, and for cutting down and carrying away trees, the measure of damages is the amount of injury which the plaintiff suffered from the whole trespass taken as a continuous act: the increased value of the trees, occasioned by the labor of the defendant in converting them into timber, is not to be included.—(Opinion by HIBBARD, J.)—Foote v. Merrill, p. 490.

PRIVATE RAILROAD — HIGHWAY — OBSTRUCTION—NEGLIGENCE.

The defendants, being owners of a private railroad, with the consent of the W. M. Railroad Corporation, were used to run their cars and engines over a part of the track of said corporation, including a highway crossing. Held, that, while thus in occupation of the track, they were to be considered proprietors of the railroad, so far as regards their rights and liabilities in obstructing the crossing, under Gen. Stats., ch. 148, sec. 7.—(Opinion by LADD, J.)—Hall v. Brown, p. 495.

That statute is directed to the object of protecting travelers against delay from the obstruction of cars, etc., at railroad crossings; its violation, therefore, does not create an absolute liability for damage which is not caused directly by such delay.

The defendants left their cars standing across the highway for more than two minutes. While the highway was thus obstructed, the plaintiff's horse was driven up to the crossing, and, after being delayed more than two minutes, took fright when an engine was attached and the cars started, ran and was killed. Held, that the plaintiff must show actual negligence or fault on the part of the defendants before he could recover.

A discharge under the United States bankrupt act of 1867 is no bar to a suit against a surety on a bond executed before the bankruptcy to secure the plaintiff for such damages as might be occasioned him by an injunction staying the collection of an execution, when the equity proceeding in which the injunction was issued was not determined till after the discharge.—Eastman v. Hibbard, p. 504.

LV. NEW HAMPSHIRE.

If a party employ a person, who has not been admitted to practice as an attorney, to prosecute or defend a suit in his behalf, such person, if his authority is questioned, must produce and file it with the clerk; and if not questioned, the court will ordinarily compel him to file his authority before he will be permitted to appear.—(Opinion by SMITH, J.)—Stevens v. Fuller, p. 443.

An action will not be dismissed on motion, because it appears that the writ was made by a person who is not an attorney of the court.

P. brought an action on the case against H. and others, to recover damages for flowage to his land by means of the defendants' dam. The defendants claimed they had a right to flow to the top of their dam. The plaintiff called a witness, who testified that M., one of the defendants, had stated that they did not claim the right to flow to that height. The defendants then called M. to contradict said witness, and was permitted to state that the defendants claimed the right to flow to the top of their dam. Held, that this, being only a statement of their defence, in itself proved nothing; and as it did not appear that the jury were misled by the statement, it was no cause for setting aside the verdict.—(Opinion by SMITH, J.)—Perley v. Hilton, p. 444.

H. and others erected a dam in the highway, and continued in the occupation thereof for more than twenty years, flowing, during the same time, land of P. above on the stream, with his knowledge, and without objection on his part, or interruption on the part of the State.

Held, that P. could maintain no action for the injury occasioned thereby to his land.

The plaintiff owned and occupied a barn and nine mows of hay therein. He sold the eighth mow to one M., and the ninth to the defendants, who occupied a portion of the barn by their horses with the plaintiff's permission. The plaintiff claimed that the defendants fed their horses from the other seven mows. The defendants' evidence tended to show that much of the hay purchased by them was of such poor quality that their horses would not eat it. Held it was competent for the defendants to show that the hay in the eighth mow, purchased by M., being also of poor quality, the plaintiff told M. that the hay purchased by him was good hay; but if it was not, he might take hay from the other seven mows to make up for the defective hay in the eighth mow, and that M. did so, as tending to account for the missing hay in a manner consistent with the defendants' assertion of their innorence.—(Opinion by FOSTER, C. J.)—Brown v. Marr, p. 448.

CHANCERY COURT, NASHVILLE, TENNESSEE.

Dinah Carter vs. W. J. Montgomery and others. Decided at special term, September, 1875.

ANSWER—SIGNATURE.—An answer in chancery should be signed by the defendant even if the oath be waived.

RESULTING TRUST.—A resulting trust can only arise at the time the conveyance is made, and if there is no money consideration for the conveyance at the time, or if he who pays the consideration manifests an intention that the title shall abide beneficially in the grantee, the resulting trust never arises.

EVIDENCE—OMISSION AND ADMISSION IN PLEADING.—The omission of a part from a bill, even when sworn to, of itself amounts to nothing, but the admission of a fact in a sworn statement is evidence against the party making it.

EVIDENCE—EXCEPTION.—Exception to documentary evidence "as incompetent" is too vague.

GIFT—CONSIDERATION—WRONG DONE.—If a gift be in consideration of a wrong done, such as seduction, or of past illicit cohabitation, equity will not interfere to deprive the donee of the legal title.

MARRIAGE PROHIBITED BY STATUTE VOID.—A marriage between a white person and a person of mixed blood to the third generation inclusive, being prohibited by statute, is void ab initio.

EVIDENCE — PEDIGREE — HEARSAY.—In this State, hearsay from others than members of the family, and public repute are admissible in questions of pedigree, especially in the case of illegitimates, hearsay in the family, other things being equal, entitled to greater consideration.

SAME.—Such evidence is admissible to prove the body of the tradition touching pedigree, but not to establish any specific fact, such as place of birth or death, or shade of color.

Opinion by Hon. W. F. COOPER, Chancellor.—The Commercial & Legal Reporter.

OLD FRIENDS WITH A NEW FACE.

Some years ago a new book was published in London under the title of "The Heavenly Pilgrimage described under the similitude of a Voyage," or a title as near as possible to this, with a preface by an eminent Congregationalist divine. Some curious inquirer discovered that the book was a re-print of one which had appeared in America under the title of "A Reel in a Bottle; by an Old Salt." The American publishers, if we are to believe our American legal cotemporaries, are just as clever in furbishing up old literary wares. The Central Law Journal, published at St. Louis, states that a New York firm have recently published Mr. Forsyth, the member for Marylebone's well-known work "Hortensius; or the Duty and Office of an Advocate," under the new title of "History of Lawyers, Ancient and Modern," without any explanation, and that the Journal has been threatened with an action of damages for commenting on the fact. The Albany Law Journal mentions that the same publishers have published Stephen's "Adventures of an Attorney in Search of Practice," accrediting it to a better known writer, Samuel Warren.

Now there can be no doubt that an author, or any other person to whom the right of publishing a book belongs, may change the title of the book. The original title may not be a suitable one, may not properly indicate the nature of the work—may not be such as to attract the attention of the class of persons for whom the work is intended. The title of Bishop Berkeley's "Essay on Tar Water," did not indicate to an ordinary person, the metaphysical moonshine to be found in the book; and we are far from thinking that "A Reel in a Bottle; by an Old Salt," was a suitable title for a work of a religious character. A man is quite entitled to change his own name or the name of his book, but, when the change is made, he should give notice of the fact, so that the public may not be deceived. When, a few years ago, Mr. Josiah Bug changed his name to Norfolk Howard, he exercised very probably a wise discretion; but he was honest enough to advertise the change of appellation, so that everybody was aware that it was the same popular old insect after all. And when some gentlemen of the name of Gammon changed their name to Grenville (they always do get into the peerage when they change their names) they advertised the fact; so that the public knew it was all Gammon after all. In the same way the American publishers, when advertising the book in question, ought to have informed the public that the History of Lawyers was the same old Hortensius after all; just as Bug and Gammon did; so that no person by mistake should provide himself with a second specimen of the same article, and feel sorry afterwards.

Of course we are not expressing any opinion on the merits of the controversy between the American publishers and the American journal. We have only seen the statement of one side; and we are far from approving of the notion (and we are sure that our legal contemporaries in America are far from approving of it either), that a journalist is as privileged as if he were the wretched little representative of a wretched little half-caste State, and that he is entitled to say things about a publisher which are not correct in point of fact, and to threaten him, if he will not submit to that sort of nonsense, he will hurt the sale of his books.

We take the above from the Edinburgh Law Magazine for September. We fully agree with our cotemporary, that a journalist is not privileged to say things about a publisher which are not correct, but, at the same time, he should speak the truth boldly about publisher's books, and should not allow a worthless book to be put upon the market without sounding the alarm. Many publishers and authors are not exercising the care they ought to in the preparation of books, and, as a consequence, we have law books that are not worth what it costs to bind them. When one of this class makes its appearance, every honest legal journal should caution the profession against the imposition.

The London Law Times says: "On Tuesday last an application was made to the vacation Chancery Judge, Vice-Chancellor Bacon, to discharge a solicitor out of custody under the following circumstances: The solicitor in question has been imprisoned under an order of attachment from the Court of Chancery, issued in the ordinary course, but it was contended on behalf of the prisoner that the arrest was illegal, he having been captured by the officer of the court (the sergeant-at-mace) while actually within the precincts of the Mansion House Court. The Vice-Chancellor, after hearing counsel for the applicant, held that a solicitor is privileged from arrest eundo et redeundo, and accordingly ordered the solicitor to be discharged upon his undertaking to take no further proceedings in the matter."

CONSTRUCTION OF DRAM-SHOP LAW.

The following letter from Mr. CHAFEE suggests some questions of interest relating to the construction of the dram-shop law. We have no doubt Mr. HURD, the revisor, will be able to respond to the concluding portions of the letter:

SHELBYVILLE, Sept. 21, 1875.

Editor LEGAL NEWS, Chicago:

At our present term of County Court I raised the question of the power to imprison for selling liquor to minors, or without license, under our dram-shop law. Have you any knowledge of the law being construed by any court of the State? What is the construction?

§ 182, State Ed. County Court Act, confers jurisdiction and fixes mode of procedure in county court—practice being same as in circuit court. The last clause, however, provides that jurisdiction of justices of the peace shall not be affected. §§ 2 and 6 of the dram-shop act provide, that parties convicted of selling liquor, etc., shall, for each offense, be fined not less than $20 * * and imprisoned in the county jail * * *. § 12 is peculiar: "Any fine or imprisonment mentioned in this act, may be enforced by indictment in any court of record having criminal jurisdiction, or the fine above may be sued for and recovered before any justice of the peace * * * and in case of conviction, the offender shall stand committed to the county jail until judgment and costs are fully paid.

(2.) In other words an offender under this law may be proceeded against for two sales before a justice of the peace, and upon conviction pays the fine, anything less than $200 and costs, and that ends it. But if the State's attorney proceeds in the county or circuit court against an offender for like offense, the offender must go to jail at least 20 days, possibly 60, and pay a fine as large as it would be in a justice court, and costs.

These two laws do not harmonize, and applying the general rule of construing penal statutes strictly, and giving him the benefit against whom the penalty is inflicted (Dwarris, page 245, and note) only the fine could be imposed. "It's an invariable rule that the law favors liberty, so in the interpretation of a penal statute, if it is dubious, that sense must be pursued which is more beneficial to the party suffering." Dwarris, page 279.

Was it a mistake in the framer of the law regulating dram-shops, in using the conjunction in fixing the penalty, or was it a shrewd act of some anti-sumptuary to tack sec. 12 on the otherwise dangerous law?

Can you throw any light on the subject? GEO. D. CHAFEE.

BETS AND BETTING HOUSES.

In the case of Oldham v. Ramsden (32 L. T. Rep., N. S., 825), there are two points worthy of notice. In the first place it shows the uncertainty that exists in the mind of the public, and to a certain extent apparently in judicial minds, as to what should be deemed a "house, office, room, or other place," within the meaning of Sir Alexander Cockburn's Betting House Act (16 and 17 Vict., C. 119), ss. 1, 3. The court of common pleas in Oldham v. Ramsden, decided that "an ordinary club at which bets were made" was not within the purview of the act. This seems reasonable, and indeed, as was observed incidentally in the course of the argument, to hold the contrary would be to declare that the act applied to such "places" as the Athenæum, the Carlton, and other clubs of a similar nature. As a matter of fact it may well be doubted whether, looking at previous decisions, the term "place" has not received a judicial interpretation wide enough to cover such places of resort. The court of common pleas in Doggett v. Catterns, (11 L. T. Rep., N. S., 422), held that a "spot under a tree in Hyde Park," was a place within the meaning of the act, though this decision was subsequently reversed by the Exchequer Chamber (12 Ib., 355) on the ground (per Bramwell, B.), that "the act was intended to put down ascertained places of resort." But why should not a spot of ground under a tree be considered an "ascertained place of resort," as well as a "stool covered by a large umbrella." (Bows v. Fenwick, 43 L.J., N.S., 107, M.C.)? A "strip of ground six feet wide outside a race-course" is a "place" (Shaw v. Morley, L. Rep., 3 Ex., 137). So is a "pigeon shooting ground" (Eastwood v. Millar, 43 L. J., N. S., 139, M. C.) So is a "cricket ground" (Haigh v. Town Council of Sheffield, L. Rep., 10 Q. B., 102, approving Eastwood v. Millar). It is somewhat difficult to see clearly the ratio decidendi upon which the above cases proceeded—the four last mentioned at any rate appear to be at variance with Doggett v. Catterns. Oldham v. Ramsden certainly does not make the matter any plainer. It was there decided that the bare fact of bets being made at any place is not sufficient to bring such place within the meaning of the act. But if, as the judges seem to have thought, the "place" must be one expressly and solely designed and kept open for the purpose of betting, then we must be permitted to entertain some doubt as to the correctness of the decisions in Eastwood v. Millar and Haigh v. The Town Council of Sheffield (sup.), for it can hardly be said that pigeon-shooting grounds and cricket-grounds are expressly and solely kept open for the purpose of betting. As of late years questions under the first and third sections of Sir Alexander Cockburn's act have been continually cropping up, we think if our legislature were to pass a short bill, clearly defining what is a "place" under that act, a great boon would be conferred on the general public, the unpaid magistracy, and the judicial bench.

Secondly, Oldham v. Ramsden furnishes further refutation of the erroneous idea entertained by some that there is anything intrinsically illegal in a pure and simple bet. Bubb v. Yelverton (Lord Charles Ker's claim, 24 L. T. Rep., N. S., 822), was quoted in the course of the argument, and no dissent from that case was expressed. There a testator—the late Marquis of Hastings—had requested a friend to bet on his account at Newmarket, and the friend having done so, and paid the amount lost, it was held by Lord Romilly, M. R., that the request to bet implied an authority to pay the debts if lost, and that the friend was entitled to prove against the testator's estate for the amount paid by him in respect of the bets, which he clearly could not have done if the betting transaction had been illegal: (Compare Clayton v. Dilly, 4 Taunt., 165, a case arising under the old betting statutes of 16 Car. 2, c. 7, s. 2. and 9 Ann. c. 14, s. 6, and see the cases there cited). Bubb v. Yelverton followed the well-known case of Rosewarne v. Billing (9 L. T. Rep., N. S. 441, inaccurately reported 33 L. J., N. S., 55, C. P.), where Chief Justice Erle said, "The law is that the contracts made by way of gaming or wagering, shall be null and void, but not that they shall be illegal." The case of Bubb v. Yelverton above alluded to must not be confounded with the case of the same name reported L. Rep., 9 Eq., 471, which, however, is also important with respect to the subject we are considering. In it Sir R. Palmer (Lord Selbourne), arguendo (473), quoted a host of cases to show that "a wagering contract is not illegal, and a security given for it is only voluntary:" (Fitch v. Jones, 5 E. & B., 238; Hill v. Fox, 4 H. & N., 359; Johnson v. Lausley, 12 C. B., 468).—The London Law Times.

DIGEST OF INSURANCE DECISIONS.

[From the Insurance Law Reporter.]

COURT OF APPEALS OF NEW YORK.

PAROL CONTRACT—LOSS.

Henry F. Smith v. Glenn's Falls Insurance Co.

In an action upon a parol contract, after the loss, between the company and the insured, to pay a specified sum in liquidation of the claim, the agreement operates as a waiver of any limitation of time or breach of warranty in the policy unless the contract was procured by fraud.

Where there has been no request to find as to the fact of a breach of warranty, and no exception to a refusal so to find, a court of review will not look into the evidence to reverse a judgment.

SUPREME COURT OF NEW YORK.

WARRANTIES—UNTRUE ANSWERS.

Sarah L. Fitch v. American Popular Life Ins. Co.

The policy provided that the statements and answers in the application are warranties, and in all respects true.

Held, that if the answers were shown to be false or untrue, from whatever cause, whether material or not, the policy was void.

HEALTH.

§ 132. Life—Condition at Time of Renewal.—The premium was not paid when due. Subsequently the policy was reinstated upon application of the insured, who furnished his own certificate, together with that of the company's examining physician, that he was in good health. The renewal receipt was delivered two week's later. Held, that the insured was not obliged to furnish any further statements as to the variation of his health between the time of applying for renewal and the delivery of the renewal receipt.—Day v. Mut. Ben. Life Ins. Co.

PAROL CONTRACT.

§ 135. Fire.—Definite Time and Rate Essential to Validity of.—A verbal arrangement with an agent for insurance, in which the time the insurance was to run and the premium rate were left subject to future adjustment, does not constitute a valid parol contract. To constitute a valid contract of insurance the minds of the parties must meet as to the premises insured, the risk, the amount insured, the time the risk should continue, and the premiums. Baptist Church v. Brooklyn Fire Ins. Co., 28 N. Y., 153; Audubon v. Excelsior Ins. Co., 27 N. Y., 216; Kennebec Co. v. Augusta Ins. Co., 6 Gray, 204; Monsur v. N. E. Mut. Mar. Ins. Co., 12 Gray, 520; Walker v. Metrop. Ins. Co., 59 Me., 391, distinguished.

The principle of a promissory note or check, silent as to time, cannot be applied to a contract of insurance. Proof of usage of a company, in its dealings with other parties, is immaterial when no complete contract has been made. Strohn et al. v. Hartford Fire Ins. Co.

TAXATION.

§ 139. Life.—Of Premiums of Mutual Companies in Michigan.—The Acts of 1869 and 1871.—The Michigan act of 1869 prescribed a tax on "all premiums received in cash or otherwise." The act of 1871 required the tax to be "upon the premiums received," and also upon such sums as within the year "shall have been agreed to be paid for any insurance effected or agreed to be effected or procured" The full premiums called for by the contracts of a mutual life company in that State, were $287,019.25. In conformity with an understanding, as claimed by the company, with its policyholders to restrict its exactions to the cost of insurance, the actual collections of that year were reduced to $163,275.58, the amount being determined by crediting on the premiums due the amount of over-payments in 1872. Held, that the excessive payment of 1872 was resolved into a part payment of the premiums of 1873, and as such liable to taxation, and that under either statute the whole sum collectable, $287,019 25, was liable to taxation, and not merely the amount actually collected. Shargo's Case, L. R., 8 Ch'y App., 407; 5 Eng., 626; Owen v. Dunton, 5 Tyrw., 360; Pratt v. Foote, 5 Seld., 463 6, ib. 599; Domat's Civil Law, Pt. 1, B. 4, Tit. 2, Cush. Ed.

Held, that the act of 1871 was meant to enlarge the scope of the act of 1869, not merely to more accurately define it. People ex rel. Conn. Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Collier, State Treasurer.

ADMISSIONS TO THE BAR.—A large class was examined for admission to the bar last week, at Ottawa, and several of the applicants rejected. It is a fact worthy of mention, that in the class there was one woman and a colored man. The colored man failed to pass. Miss Mary Perry was more successful. One of the examiners, who is not noted for being a woman's rights man, informed us that she took the court, the examiners and the bar by surprise, and passed by far the best examination of any member of the class. Miss Perry is polite and lady-like in her manners, and so conducts herself as to gain the respect of all who make her acquaintance. She has been a thorough student, and enters upon the practice of law with a good knowleage of the principles upon which it is founded. Miss Perry will honor the profession, and, being a lawyer, will be none the less a lady. We know nothing of her intentions for the future, but we should like to see her connected with some one of the leading law firms in the city.

HON. SAMUEL F. MILLER.—One of the justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, on taking his seat in the United States Circuit Court, at St. Louis, on Monday last announced that he could remain there only two weeks unless some cases of more than usual importance should detain him, as the Supreme Court of the United States would meet on the eleventh of October, and he always made it a practice to be present at the opening of the court. He would not hear any appeal cases from the District Court in bankruptcy or admiralty, or any minor cases. Judge MILLER is one of the ablest of the Federal judiciary.

COCKROFT & Co's PUBLICATIONS.—The firm of James Cockcroft and Co. of New York, formerly of this city, have opened a branch office in this city at No. 7 Honore Block, for the sale of their publications, which will be under the charge of Frank Shepard, who is well known to the bar as having been in the law book house of E. B. Myers of this city for the last four years, and formerly with Mr. Cockcroft. Frank is an efficient and obliging young man, and we hope he may succeed in his undertaking.

THE Hon. W. J. HYNES, who was last year Congressman-at-Large from Arkansas, is again in this city, and has decided to make Chicago his home. He has been admitted to practice law here, and has united with a Chicago law firm, under the name of Scates, Hynes & Bennett.

CHARGES of unprofessional conduct have been preferred in the Supreme Court at Ottawa against D. James Leary and Edward J. Hill, by the Bar Association of this city.

A LEGAL MONSTROSITY.—A hard word for a caption, no doubt; but the subject referred to is a "hard case," also. I would be pleased if any one would rise and explain why matters are thus, in a supposable event; namely, by hard joint labor and co-operative economy, a husband and his wife gain a little home, which stands, as to title, in his name, of course. He dies intestate, without children. Thereupon, she must submit to a "partition" with collateral heirs, as to the real estate; and the half of the real estate—of the forty acres, or an extra house and lot, which may not be a homestead—must go off among those who did nothing to establish it, and will rather escheat than return to her ownership. Ought she not, in all reason and justice, have all the real estate as well as the half of it?

She might marry again, might she? Well, granted. Then, what? I admire the generosity of the man who provided by will that, should his widow marry again, she should have $600 more out of his estate for incidental expenses.

Now, somebody, in the proper place, (that is, in the legislature) ought to suggest the substitution of the little word "all," instead of the little word "half," in our statute of descent; which provision could be accounted for, as I think the present one cannot be. W.

U. S. DIST. COURT, W. D. OF WIS.

UNITED STATES v. SAMUEL RINDSKOPF et al.

INDICTMENT FOR CONSPIRACY WITH INTENT OF DEFRAUDING THE UNITED STATES OUT OF TAX ON SPIRITS.

1. WHAT IS A CONSPIRACY.—It is an agreement or combination between two or more persons to effect the purpose declared by the act to be illegal. It consists in an agreement expressed or implied, to do one of the things prohibited in the act. The indictment here charges the conspiracy to be to defraud the United States out of the tax upon certain spirits to be distilled at the distillery of Alexander Rogers in Middleton. The first count charges an agreement to manufacture illicit spirits at that place. In other parts it is alleged also that the agreement was to do so by breaking seals and stamps placed upon certain tubs, and to use them unlawfully for the purpose of manufacturing illicit spirits. Held, that the gist of the offense was the illegal conspiracy to manufacture, and that the particular manner in which it was done or to be done, was not the material question in the case: that the question to be determined under this count was whether there was a conspiracy between the parties to manufacture and remove spirits so manufactured without the payment of the lawful tax to defraud the United States. If the parties, or any two of them, entered into a scheme to illegally manufacture spirits, with intent to defraud the government out of the tax by law imposed thereon, it is a conspiracy within the meaning of the act, whether a seal or stamp was broken or not.

2. OVERT ACTS—SEVERALLY CRIMINAL.—That the fact each of the overt acts constitutes an offense is no answer to the indictment for conspiracy. Upon a charge of conspiracy, an overt act, which is itself criminal, may be proven to show the existence of the conspiracy charged.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

The defendants were indicted for conspiracy under section 30, act March 2, 1867. It was found and alleged in the indictment that Alexander L. Rogers was the owner of a distillery at Middleton, and, for the purpose and with intent to defraud the United States out of the tax upon the spirits manufactured thereat, conspired with Samuel Rindskopf, liquor dealer, of Milwaukee, Albert Mueller, his distiller, and James W. Bull, storekeeper at said distillery, to aid and assist him in carrying out such purpose; and that they did, in pursuance thereof, manufacture, dispose of, and defraud the government out of the tax upon, large quantities of spirits manufactured thereat and setting forth the various and illegal means and devices used for that purpose. Before the trial commenced, a nolle prosequi was entered as against the defendant, Alexander L. Rogers. On the trial against the other defendants, he was called as a witness, and testified that he established and went into the business for the purpose and with the intent to manufacture illicit spirits, and says that after he had commenced, he went to Milwaukee and saw Mr. Rindskopf, and there told him, in substance, that he was engaged in manufacturing illicit spirits, and that he could get them from the still or government warehouse to his rectifying house without paying taxes, but he did not know how to get them from there upon the market, and asked Mr. Rindskopf to assist him, and that Mr. Rindskopf then told him he would go in with him and take the wines, and pay him Chicago prices less twenty-two cents, which he was to retain as his share of the speculation or risk, and that he told them how to proceed to get to him or his house, to wit, that he (Rogers) should put them in new barrels at the rectifying establishment, and get the guager here to guage them as whisky, and put on whisky stamps and ship them to his firm as such; and that they would receive them at the depot, and pay for them at the prices named. And he further stated that, under that agreement, he sent high wines under such false labels, to them from time to time, and that they were received and paid for upon the terms of that agreement; stating the mode and amount of two of the payments. He stated that, after that, he continued to manufacture illicit spirits and that Mueller was the distiller and did the work, or superintended it, and that Mr. Bull, the store-keeper, had full knowledge of it, and received from him $100 per month for neglecting his official duty, and permitting him to use what material he wished, and to take the spirits from the warehouse without payment of the tax. He further stated that, after some trouble with the revenue officers in February, he was ordered to send them two-stamp goods, and, if not detected, he would not enter them on the books.

Mr. Henry Lacher, another witness, testified that he had charge of the rectifying house under Mr. Rogers first, and afterwards under Rogers & Bunker, and that spirits were often received at the rectifyer and dumped, upon which the government tax had not been paid, and described the means adopted to accomplish that purpose, particularly, and that such spirits or highwines were afterwards placed in other barrels and marked whiskies, kimmel or bitters, and stamped by the gauger either as whisky at 66 or 68 proof, or as bitters, no proof, and that they were shipped by rail to Rindskopf Bros., Milwaukee; that they were entered on their book at the rectifier according to the gauger's mark, and Rindskopf Bros. were charged with them at the market rates for such goods. This, he said, continued up to about the 11th of February, when he changed and shipped them as highwines with two stamps, but that they were, with a few exceptions, got out of the warehouse and placed in stamped barrels and no tax paid thereon. He further said that he received statement of sale and amount and that they were paid for as highwines at the rate stated by Mr. Rogers, to-wit: Chicago prices and 22 off; that those statements and letters accompanying were returned to Mr. Rindskopf at his request after seizure.

Other testimony was given sustaining and corroborating these general facts. Whereupon, Judge Hopkins, who presided at the trial, among other things, charged the jury as follows:

The defendants are indicted under section 30 of the act of March 2, 1867, U. S. Revenue Laws, for a conspiracy, which reads as follows:

"If two or more persons conspire, either to commit any offense against the laws of the United States, or to defraud the United States in any manner whatever, and one or more of said parties to said conspiracy shall do any act to effect the object thereof, the parties to said conspiracy shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be liable to a penalty of not less than one thousand dollars, and not more than ten thousand dollars, and to imprisonment not exceeding two years."

The act declares what illegal purposes constitute a conspiracy. But in construing it, it becomes necessary to ascertain what is meant by conspiracy, in this act. I think it may be defined as an agreement or combination between two or more persons to effect the purpose declared by the act to be illegal. It consists in an agreement, express or implied, to do one of the things prohibited in the act. The indictment here in substance charges the conspiracy to be to defraud the United States out of the tax upon certain spirits to be distilled at the distillery of Alexander Rogers, in Middleton.

In the first count the charge of an agreement to manufacture illicit spirits at that place is expressly alleged. In other parts it is also alleged that the agreement was to do so by breaking seals and stamps placed upon certain tubs, and to use them unlawfully for the purpose of manufacturing illicit spirits. I have ruled during the trial that the gist of the offense was the illegal conspiracy to manufacture, and that the particular manner in which it was done, or to be done, was not the material question in the case. That the question to be determined under this count, was whether there was a conspiracy between the parties to manufacture, and remove spirits so manufactured without the payment of the lawful tax, to defraud the United States. Now the question here is, did the parties, or any two of them, enter into a scheme to illegally manufacture spirits, with intent to defraud the government out of the tax by law imposed thereon. If they did, I think it constituted a conspiracy within the meaning of the act above mentioned, and that on that question it is immaterial whether a seal or stamp was broken or not.

In order to charge the parties as conspirators, I do not think it necessary to prove an express agreement between all the parties to do the illegal act. It would be enough if you should find that all of them had the same illegal purpose in view and each acted a certain part to accomplish or tending to accomplish it. But you must be satisfied that each had the same common design and acted to carry such design into effect. In other words, if you should find that Mr. Rogers' purpose was to unlawfully manufacture spirits and remove the same from his distillery, and to place them upon the market without paying the tax thereon, and as a part of such corrupt purpose, induced the storekeeper, Mr. Bull, to abstain from doing his official duties, so that he could obtain the material contrary to law, to use for such purpose, and employed Mr. Mueller, his distiller, to secretly manufacture the same into spirits, and further obtain the consent of Bull to run them from the cistern of warehouse without the payment of the lawful tax thereon, and further employed to assist him in his unlawful purpose aforesaid, Mr. Lacher to faudulently receive and conceal such spirits into the rectifying establishment of said Rogers, and that by an agreement with the defendant Rindskopf, and at his suggestion, Mr. Lacher and the government gauger were employed to place said spirits into other barrels and gauge them as whiskey and other articles of less proof, and then ship them under such false and fraudulent stamps to the defendant, or to the house of which the defendant was a partner, and that said defendant personally knew of their receipt, under such false labels and stamps, and concealed or aided in concealing such facts to defraud the government, and for the purpose of enabling the said Rogers to defraud the government out of the legal tax thereon and share the proceeds with him, you might be at liberty to infer from these facts that the parties acting for the common purpose to defraud the government, were all guilty of conspiracy. It would not, in such a case, be necessary to show that the parties had any previous acquaintance, or, with the exception of Rogers, knew of the exact part the other was to perform. In such case, each might be considered a co-conspirator with Rogers, and being so, would be responsible for his acts in carrying out the illegal purposes. And if you should find such acts to have been done in the carrying out of such illegal purpose, and that the illegal purpose was common to all—that is, to defraud the government out of the tax—I think you would be authorized to find that the conspiracy was established as to all. If they knew the intention of Rogers, in procuring them to do such acts, to be to defraud the government, and that their acts respectively aided and assisted him to carry into effect such illegal purpose, and that they did the several acts to them assigned, on purpose to enable Rogers to successfully carry out his illegal designs, I think it would be a conspiracy as to all of such parties, if their overt acts are satisfactorily proven.

In determining the question of conspiracy, Mr. Rogers may be reckoned as one, so that if either of the others conspired with him to do the acts alleged in the indictment, although you might find that the other defendants did not conspire with them, you might find that one guilty under this indictment, provided the overt act to effect it is satisfactorily proven.

The defendants were all found guilty by the jury.

Whereupon a motion for a new trial was made by the defendants, upon which Judge HOPKINS announced the following opinion:

The defendants having been convicted by the jury of the conspiracy charged against them, now move the court for a new trial and in arrest of judgment, and have, in the argument in support of the motion, mainly relied upon the following points:

1st. That the court erred in its charge as to what constituted a conspiracy.

2d. That as the overt acts set out and proven were severally criminal, and the parties committing them were liable to a specific punishment, that after such acts had been performed the parties could not be held liable for a conspiracy to do them; and

3d. That the verdict is against evidence.

The first two are those mainly relied upon. As to the first, after listening to the able and ingenious argument of the learned counsel, and after a careful and critical re examination of my charge on the question, I am thoroughly satisfied that I correctly instructed the jury on that point. The instruction and charge on that question is supported and warranted by the following authorities:

Rex v. Cope, 1 Strange, 144; The People v. Mather, 4 Wen., 260, et seq; Rex v. Parsons, 1 Wm. Black Rep., 392; 2 Deys (Conn.) R., 205; 34 Eng. Com. Law Rep., 314-404; 5 M. Lean, U. S. v. Cole, 513; 6 Mass. R., Commonwealth v. Warren, 74; 8 Car & P. Regina v. Murphey, 297; 3 Greenl'f Ev., section 93; 1 Bishop on Cr. Pro., section 77, and 2 id., section 187; 5 Cox Cr. Cases, Reg. v. Rowland, p. 485 & 497.

The law upon the second point I find too well settled and uniform against the defendants to be at this time questioned.

The fact that each of the overt acts constitute an offense is no answer to this indictment for conspiracy. Upon a charge of conspiracy, an overt act, which is itself criminal, may be proven, to show the existence of the conspiracy charged. Conspiracies, from their very nature, are usually entered into in secret, and are consequently difficult to be established by direct evidence. It has been therefore universally held that they may be inferred from circumstances. The common design is the essence of the charge, and may be shown by circumstances and the acts psrformed by the different alleged conspirators, and the fact that the several acts constitute separate criminal offenses, does not exonerate the parties from the crime of conspiracy, or bar a prosecution therefor. This is sustained by an almost unbroken chain of authorities, both in this country and England.

In Regina v. Boulton and others, 12 Cox. Cr. Cases, part 3, page 87, in Court of Queen's Bench, before Ch. J. Cockburn, in 1871, although, the course of receiving proof of the commission of the substantial crime is not regarded as satisfactory, yet it is decided that such a course is legal, and in that case, it being a charge of conspiracy to commit a felonious crime, proof of the commission of the crime itself was allowed. The chief jnstice cited and relied upon the authority of the late Lord Cranworth, in Reg. v. Rowland, 5 Cox Cr. C., 497, note. In that case the parties had been indicted, not for the offense they had committed, but for a conspiracy to commit it, and the judge, after stating that it would have been more satisfactory if the parties had been indicted for what they had done and not for conspiracy to do it, stated "that the course pursued was no doubt legal and being legal," he said, "I shall not now step out of the path of my duty by speculating upon the policy that has been adopted in this case. It would be much more satisfactory to my mind if parties were indicted for that which they have directly done, and not for having previously conspired to do something, the having done which is proof of the conspiracy. It never is satisfactory, although undoubtedly it is legal." I have quoted this language as expressive of my first view of the question when raised during the trial, and I can say now, as I said then, that the better way, in my judgment, would have been to have indicted all parties here for the particular offense committed by each, but under the law it seems I have not the right to say they must be so prosecuted. The course pursued in this matter by the government attorney, in the language of those cases, is "undoubtly legal," and I can therefore only consider the case as it is presented on this indictment.

These cases dispose of the second question so strenuously pressed by defendants' counsel. The case of Commonwealth v. Kingsley, 5 Mass., 106, laying down a contrary doctrine, does not seem to have been followed in that State, for the same Judge, Parsons, in Commonwealth v. Warren, 6 Mass., 74, refused to arrest a judgment on a charge of conspiracy, where the overt act was a felony, and was completed and the avails of the crime divided; and in Commonwealth v. Davis, 9 Mass., 415, it is held that acts in execution of the conspiracy may be shown, in aggravation. In the case in 1st Lowell, 266, U. S. v. Boyden et al., being an indictment under the same act and section as this, this question was raised and examined upon principle and authority, and Judge Lowel, before whom it was tried, arrived at the conclusion that though the act concerning which the conspiracy was formed, was completed, and there was a specific penalty for doing that act, still the Government could elect under which to proceed. This doctrine is also supported by People v. Mather, 4 Wen., 259; Collins v. Commonwealth, 3 S. & R., 220. The dictum in the opinion of Senator Spencer, in Lambert v. The People, 7 Cowen, 578, I do not think, entitled to much weight. The case there did not turn on any such question. Indeed, it is impossible to tell what principle was settled in that case in the Court of Errors. The Senators seemed to have embarked on an uncertain sea of generalities, and to have spent their energies in magniloquent declamation, better suited to the forum than the bench.

The plain, simple sentences in the opinion of Chief Justice Savage in same case on page 166, of same volume, are far more satisfactory, reasonable and convincing. The law on this question is too well established to be now overturned.

On the other point, that the verdict is not supported by the evidence, I need only say that if the jury believed the testimony of Rogers and Lacher the charge was most clearly made out. Assuming their testimony to be true, the fact of an unlawful conspiracy to defraud the Government out of the tax upon spirits to be manufactured at Rogers' distillery, as charged, is established beyond all controversy. The section of the act declaring the conspiracy expressly provides that the parties may be tried in any district where the conspiracy is committed, or an overt act is done in furtherance of the illegal purpose. The overt acts were performed in this district, and the case is properly triable here.

During the trial several questions were raised of a technical character as to the particular means by which illicit manufacture was effected. I then overruled them as not tenable and as too critical, and since that time my attention has been called to section 8 of the amended Practice Act of 1872, 17 Stat. at La., 198; and if I had any doubts upon the questions before, that section has removed them. The objections have not, however, been renewed in this motion, and I presume the counsel are satisfied that that they are made unavailing by the section of the act above referred to, even if they were good before its passage.

The motion for a new trial and in arrest of judgment is overrruled.

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

OPINION FILED SEPT. 27, 1875.

MARK SHERIDAN et al., Police Commissioners v. H. D. COLVIN, Mayor of the city of Chicago, et al.

Appeal from Cook.

POWER OF COMMON COUNCIL TO RE-ORGANIZE THE POLICE FORCE.

THE GENERAL ACT OF 1872.—The court, after stating that the validity of the new organization of the city under the general act of 1872 could not in any respect be drawn in question in this case; that such a question can be determined only by a direct proceeding in the nature of a quo warranto, and assuming then that the city of Chicago became incorporated under the act by virtue of the election of 1875, the provisions of the act of 1872 thereby became its charter, to which the court must look for the extent of its corporate authority with such limitations as may be found to arise from the provisions of section 6 of the act, hold as follows:

1. POWER TO PASS THE ORDINANCE.—That the city council had the power, under the provisions of the act of 1872 to pass the ordinance re-organizing the police force.
2. POWER LEGISLATIVE.—That the power to pass the ordinance is legislative and discretionary.
3. CHANCERY—JURISDICTION.—That the court of chancery had no jurisdiction to interfere with the exercise of that power.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

Opinion by M'ALLISTER, J.

Elaborate printed arguments have been filed by the counsel for the respective parties in this case, and able and exhaustive oral arguments delivered at bar, all of which having been considered, we are prepared to give our conclusions.

It is not claimed by counsel for appellants that the validity of the new organization of the city under the general act of 1872 can be in any respect drawn in question in this suit. Such a question can be determined only by a direct proceeding in the nature of a quo warranto. Assuming, then, that the city of Chicago became incorporated under that act, by virtue of the election held April 23, 1875, the provisions of the act of 1872 thereby became its charter, to which we must look for the extent of its corporate authority with such limitations as may be found to arise from the provisions of section 6 of the act.

With these preliminary observations we will proceed to state, as briefly as possible, our views and conclusions. The case involves itself into three principal questions, viz.:

1. Had the city council the power under the provisions of the act of 1872 to pass the ordinance in question?
2. What is the nature of the power thereby sought to be exercised?
3. Had the court of chancery jurisdiction to interfere with its exercise?

These questions will be considered in the order stated. First, then, as to the power. That question can properly be determined only by a consideration of the legal status of the police commissioners at the time of the new incorporation of the city, and reference to the several provisions of the act of 1872 pertinent to the subject. We have, however, no concern with the legal status of the police commissioners any further than relates to their functions as city officers. Now, the act creating the board of police declares that "the said board shall assume and exercise the entire control of the police force of said city, and shall possess full power and authority over the police organization, government appointments, and discipline within said city." By the same law that board also had the custody of all property belonging to the police department. Such was the authority vested in the board of police, composed of appellants, at the time of the new incorporation of the city under the act of 1872, and it amounted to an exclusive control over the police force of the city. But it has not been and cannot be denied that these functions and their continuance with these municipal officers were entirely subject to legislative control. The legislature could in its discretion provide for the creation of another officer, and for taking these functions from the board of police and bestow them upon that officer. Appellants' counsel concede this, but insist that the legislature has not done so. Let us see whether this be so or not.

Upon this point we would say that in our opinion, from a consideration of the whole scope and purpose of the act, as well as the provisions of section 3, the new incorporation did not ipso facto repeal the act creating and defining the powers and duties of the police commissioners, or abolish their office in toto. That section says: "If a majority of the votes cast at such election shall be for city organization under general law, such city shall thenceforth be deemed to be organized under this act; and the city officers then in office shall thereupon exercise the powers conferred upon like officers in this act until their successors shall be elected and qualified."

This clause, taken in connection with one in section 6, evinces the legislative intent in respect to the manner in which reincorporation should be effected. The latter is as follows: "And from the time of such organization, or change of organization, the provisions of this act shall be applicable to said cities and villages, and all laws in conflict therewith shall no longer be applicable. But all laws or parts of laws not inconsistent with the provision of this act shall continue in force and be applicable to any such city or village, the same as if such change of organization had not been made."

There is a plain difference between a legislative declaration, that an inconsistent prior law shall not be applicable to certain municipal corporations, and one that is repealed. The legal effect of that provision is that if the law creating the board of police, or any prior statute relating to a corporation reorganized under the act of 1872, shall be found in conflict or inconsistent with any of the provisions of that act, such inconsistent law shall no longer have any applicability within the territorial limits of such new organization. If such inconsistent law originally applied beyond such territorial limits, it may continue to do so, but not within them.

The act of 1872, like much of our legislation, is wanting in that complete mechanism requisite to the exact fitting on one part with every other part, so as to make one harmonious whole. But the intention of the legislature to provide a general system of local municipal government required by the policy of the constitution prohibiting, the passage or alteration of city charters by special law, and to enable existing corporations to effect changes in their organic law with as little disturbance as possible, is very apparent from the whole act. The powers confided to the local legislative department of such new corporations are broad and plenary, especially as respects the police department, the only matter now before us. And one object of the clauses from the sixth section, above quoted, clearly was to remove all obstacles arising from prior laws to the exercise of such powers.

The first subdivision section 62, article 5, of the act of 1872, gives the city council the control of all the finances and property of the corporation. This, of course, would include the property belonging to the police department the entire custody of which by prior laws was given to the board of police. Subdivision 66, of same section, gives the power to regulate the police of the city, and pass and enforce all necessary police ordinances; section 68, to prescribe the duties and powers of a superintendent of police, policemen, and watchmen. By section 73, it is provided that "the city council may in its discretion, from time to time, provide by ordinance for the election by the legal voters, or appointment by the mayor with the approval of the city council, of a city collector, a city marshal, a superintendent of streets, a corporation council, a city comptroller, or any or either of them, and such other officers as may by said council be deemed necessary or expedient. This section further provides: "The city marshal shall perform such duties as shall be prescribed by the city council for the preservation of the public peace and the observance and enforcement of the ordinances and laws."

Section 74 provides that "all officers of any city, except where herein otherwise provided, shall be appointed by the mayor (and vacancies in all office be filled by like appointment) by and with the advice and consent of the city council. The city council may, by ordinance not inconsistent with the provisions of this act, prescribe the duties and define the powers of all such officers, together with the term of any such office, provided the term shall not exceed two years."

It seems to us clear beyond doubt that by their several provisions ample authority is conferred upon the city council to not only provide for the appointment of a city marshal and vest him with the entire control of the police force, but to organize that department as purports to be done by the ordinance in question. If the council had the power to pass the ordinance, it must have the power to carry it into effect; and if it had the power to pass and enforce it, then the effect must be to take the functions given the board of police by the act of their creation away from that board, and confer them upon the officers named in the ordinance. The continued possession, therefore, by the board of police of exclusive authority over the police force is utterly inconsistent with the exercise of the plenary power over the subject matter conferred upon the city council by the act of 1872, and by force of the sixth section of that act, the prior law can no longer be applicable. The last section of the ordinance, it is conceded by appellee's counsel, is too broad. But that cannot affect the other provisions of the ordinance, because they are in no respect dependent upon it. It may be regarded as applying to appellants only as city officers, in which view it might be sustained. For authority in the city council to take away their functions as city officers, which we think the council has, is virtually to deprive them of their offices, so far as they were such city officers.

The second question is: What is the nature of the power sought to be exercised in passing the ordinance under consideration? To that question there can be but one answer, and we shall not stay to discuss it. The power is legislative and discretionary.

The third and last question is: Had the court of chancery jurisdiction to interfere with the exercise of that power?

We are clearly of the opinion that it had not. The subject is purely political. The only title to relief shown by the bill is that arising from the mere fact of complainants being police commissioners, vested, as it is alleged, with the entire control of the police force, etc. The bill does not go upon the theory of any property right, but is an application to a court of equity to restrain the city council and other officers of the city from carrying said ordinance into effect, on the ground that it will deprive them of the functions of their office. It is elementary law that the subject matter of the jurisdiction of the court of chancery is civil property. The court is conversant only with the questions of property, and the maintenance of civil rights. Injury to property, whether actual or prospective, is the foundation on which the jurisdiction rests. The court has no jurisdiction in matters merely criminal or merely immoral, which do not effect any right to property. Nor do matters of a political character come within the jurisdiction of the court of chancery. Nor has the court of chancery jurisdiction to interfere with the public duties of any department of government, except under special circumstances, and where necessary for the protection of rights of property.—Kerr on Injunctions, pp. 1 and 2.

In the case of Shirlock v. The Village of Winnetka, 59 Ill., 398, this court said: "There are some acts which a municipal corporation, while acting within the limits of its charter, may do, without being subject to the supervision of any court. Such acts are those done under its legislative and discretionary powers." Willard's Eq. Jur., 405. Again, in High on Injunctions, the author says: "A court of equity is not a proper tribunal for determining disputed questions concerning the appointment of public officers, or their right to hold office, such questions being purely of a legal nature, and cognizable only by courts of law. Thus, equity will not interfere by injunction to restrain persons from exercising the functions of public officers on the ground of the illegality of the law under which their appointments were made, but will leave that question to be determined by a legal forum, and a temporary injunction granted pendente lite, and until the question of validity of the law under which defendants claim their office can be determined, will be dissolved." Delehanty v. Warner et al., September term, 1874. (Unreported.)

We are of opinion that the demurrer to appellant's bill was properly sustained and that the decree of the court below should be affirmed.

Decree affirmed.

CIRCUIT COURT OF ALEXANDER COUNTY.

SEPTEMBER TERM, 1875.

MARY N. MAYO v. S. STAATS TAYLOR et al.

REMOVAL OF CAUSES TO FEDERAL COURTS —THE NEW ACT OF CONGRESS CONSTRUED.

1. THE CORRECT PRACTICE.—That it is the correct practice for the State court, in applications for the removal of suits under the act of 1875, to act upon the petitions and bonds; that such a practice is consonant with the practice prior to the act of 1875.
2. DUTY OF STATE COURT.—That the mandate that the State court shall "accept said petition and bond," implies that the State court should take some action, make some order in the case.
3. THE PROPER PRACTICE.—That if a petition and bond are filed in term time for the removal of a cause, the court should ascertain that the applicants are "entitled to the removal," before it ceases to exercise jurisdiction. If the petition and bond are filed in vacation and a copy of the record filed in the Federal court, it would, upon motion, if fully satisfied that the party filing the petition was not "entitled to the removal," order the cause to be placed on the docket, and proceed to trial there, as in other cases.
4. THE PARTIES.—Held, that where the plaintiff was a citizen of New York, one of the defendants a citizen of Missouri, the other of New York, and the Missouri defendant appeared and moved for a continuance for want of service on his co-defendant, and the plaintiff took a rule on the Missouri defendant to plead, etc., etc.; that under the Illinois statute and the act of Congress, it was a controversy wholly between citizens of different States, and that the Missouri defendant was entitled to have the suit removed on his petition into the Federal court.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

Opinion by BAKER, J.

This is an action of assumpsit commenced in the Alexander county Circuit court by Mary N. Mayo against S. Staats Taylor and Edwin Parsons, trustees of the Cairo city property. The declaration is based upon certain written contracts alleged to have been executed, jointly, by the defendants. The damages claimed in the declaration are $20,000. A summons was issued returnable to this, the September term of court, which was duly served upon S. Staats Taylor, one of the defendants, and returned "not found" as to the defendant Parsons.

A motion was made early in the term by the defendant Taylor, for a continuance "for want of service on the co-defendant Parsons." This motion was overruled by the court, and on motion of the plaintiff, a rule was entered upon the defendant Taylor to plead to the declaration.

Thereupon the defendant Taylor filed in the suit a petition for the removal of the suit into the Circuit court of the United States for the Southern District of Illinois, and filed therewith a bond, with good and sufficient surety, conditioned as required by law. It is now claimed by the attorneys for Taylor that the suit is no longer pending in this court; that, from the moment the clerk placed his file marks upon the petition and bond, co instanti, this court was ousted of its jurisdiction; that it can make no further order in the case, and has no right under the law to examine the petition and bond filed in the suit and pass upon the question as to whether they are in compliance with the act of Congress. This question, it is claimed, can be passed upon only by the Federal court. It is also claimed by the attorneys for defendant Taylor, that, even admitting the right of this court to judge as to the sufficiency of the petition and bond, the petition and bond filed in this suit are such as give the defendant Taylor the right to have the desired transfer.

The question now before the court is as to the present status of this suit as to the defendant Taylor.

The determination of this question necessarily requires a consideration of the provisions of the act of Congress of March 3, 1875, and a discussion as to what is the correct practice in the removal of suits thereunder, from the State Court to the circuit court of the United States.

The judicial power of the United States is conferred and limited by Article III of the Federal constitution, it extends, so far as it has application or claim of application to this case, "to controversies between citizens of different States."

The act of March 3, 1875, is not only a consolidation of all the several previous acts of Congress upon the subject of the removal of cases from the State to the Federal courts, but is an extension of the jurisdiction of the circuit courts of the United States. This act is of so recent a date, that it has not, as yet, received a fixed and settled judicial construction. So far as I am advised, the case, reported in 7 CHICAGO LEGAL NEWS, 241, of Osgood v. The C. D. & V. R. R. Co. et al., in which two opinions were delivered by the learned and distinguished Judge Drummond, is the only case in which this act has been judicially considered.

In that case the plaintiff filed a bill in the Will county circuit court against the railroad company, and certain other defendants to foreclose a mortgage. The court ordered an injunction and appointed receivers at the time the bill was filed. After various other proceedings in the case, the court adjourned for the term. On the 22d day of March, 1875, in vacation, petitions were filed in the suit, with the clerk of the court, by the railroad company and several other defendants, asking for the removal of the case from the State court to the circuit court of the United States for the Northern District of Illinois, under the act of Congress of the 3d of March, 1875. Bonds were filed, conditioned as required by the act of Congress. A transcript of the record of the suit in the State court, duly certified by the clerk of the State court, was filed in the circuit court of the United States, on the 24th of March. A motion was then made in the Federal court to dismiss and remand the suit on the ground that the Federal court had no jurisdiction.

In the first opinion delivered in this case, reported in 7 CHICAGO LEGAL NEWS, 241, Judge Drummond says, "the language of that section (section 5 of the act of 1875) is peculiarly significant as affecting the motion now before the court. The copy of the record has been filed in this court, and the law seems to indicate under what circumstances only, in such an event, the case would be remanded back to the State court. It is when it shall appear to the satisfaction of the Federal court, that the suit does not really and substantially involve a dispute or controversy properly within the jurisdiction of the court, or that the parties have been improperly or collusively made, or joined, for the purpose of creating a case cognizable under the act. It is true that the act prescribes the manner in which the removal shall be made, and the directions of the law should be complied with. But the fifth section does not authorize the court to remand or dismiss the cause, for the reason that it may appear that there was any irregularity in the means taken to procure the removal. The purpose obviously was, if the record was filed in the Federal court under the law, and the court could see that it had jurisdiction of the case, it should retain it, notwithstanding there might be defects in the manner of removal."

Afterwards, upon a re-argument before Drummond and Blodgett, J. J., a second opinion was delivered by Judge Drummond, also reported in 7 CHICAGO LEGAL NEWS, 241 and 242, in which he says: "The fifth section contains provisions which are new. It is true that in practice under previous laws, when a case came into the Federal court by removal from the State court, motions could be made to dismiss and remand the cause, but their decision depended upon general principles. Now, the fifth section controls the action of the Federal court both as to the dismissal and remanding of cases. It did not intend the suit should be dismissed or remanded on account of irregularities, provided it satisfactorily appeared that the court had jurisdiction of the cause. Here the only thing to which objection is now made is as to the character of the suit and the want of opportunity of the State court, as a court, to act or refuse to act. There is no complaint made against the sufficiency of the bond. It may be admitted there are difficulties in any view we may take of this part of the case." * * * * * *

Here, then, in this case, there were "defects in the manner of removal," and "irregularities," but as the records and petitions filed showed a case where "it was entirely competent for the defendants to remove it to the Federal courts," and as the bonds filed were conditioned as required by the act of congress, and as the record from the State court was "certified by the clerk under the seal of the court," and was on file in the Federal court; therefore, notwithstanding the "irregularities" and "defects in the manner of removal," and notwithstanding that the State court had not acted or had opportunity to act upon the application for removal, the Federal court, being governed by the provisions of the fifth section of the act of 1875, overruled the motion to dismiss the suit. In other words, the United States Circuit court, while admitting the "defects" and "irregularities," refused to dismiss on that account, holding that under the fifth section it was only competent to dismiss for the causes specified in said section.

The Federal court having thus decided and having decided that the petition and bond were such as were required by the act of congress, had disposed of the whole matter before it.

Is it the correct practice for the State court, in applications for the removal of suits under the act of 1875, to act upon the petitions and bonds? It strikes me forcibly that it is.

Such a practice is consonant with the practice prior to the act of March 3d, 1875 This act of Congress should be construed in the light of former legislative and judicial determinations.

The act itself provides in the third section that any person "entitled to remove any suit. * * * who shall desire to remove such suit * * * may make and file a petition in such suit in such State court * * * for the removal of such suit * * * and shall make and file therewith a bond, with good and sufficient surety. * * * It shall then be the duty of the State court to accept said petition and bond, and proceed no further in such suit." Why does the act require that the petition and bond should be filed in the State court? Why does it not require them to be filed in the Federal court and provide for a writ of certiorari to be issued, forthwith, to the State court?

Does not the mandate that the State court shall "accept said petition and bond" imply that the State court should take some action — make some order? How otherwise can the court "accept the petition and bond?" When is it that the court shall "proceed no further in such suit?" If we follow the natural order of the several mandates we would say, "When it has accepted the petition and bond."

Again, this act of Congress applies only to those who are "entitled to remove a suit," and even they are required to file such a petition as brings them within the purview of the act, and to "file a bond with good and sufficient surety." Suppose that some plaintiff or defendant who is not "entitled to remove a suit" should make an application for a removal? Is not the State court to be allowed to say that he is not entitled to the removal? Suppose a petition is filed which is clearly no petition whatever under this act? Is not the State court allowed to ascertain that fact? Suppose that in each one of the several hundred civil cases now pending in this court, one party or the other should place upon the files a petition—not sworn to—for the act does not require the petition to be sworn to—and should offer of evidence of the truth of the petition, and should file with his or her petition a bond for a merely nominal sum, and with mere straw surety for such nominal sum? In such state of the case what is the State court to do? Must it adjourn until "court in course," and wait until after the next January term of the Circuit court of the United States for the Southern District of Illinois, in order that the Federal court may come to its assistance by remanding the several causes and punishing the refractory litigants by compelling them to pay costs?

If the doctrine contended for is correct, what is there to prevent such a result? If a reasonable construction can be given to the act of Congress, and such construction does not lead to such absurdities, ought not such "reasonable construction" be the accepted construction?

The Circuit courts of this State have almost unlimited common law and chancery jurisdiction. Are the rights and interests of the litigants in these courts wholly worthless? A citizen of this State sues another citizen of this State, in the State court, on a simple contract for a money demand. What power has Congress to interfere with his suit? What authority has the Circuit court of the United States to interfere with his suit? Where is the constitutional provision giving the power to Congress? Where is the act of Congress giving jurisdiction to the Federal court? In such cases, is not the State court allowed to protect its own litigants? Is it not allowed to protect its own lawful jurisdiction, and exercise the powers given to it, and perform the duties required of it by the law of the land?

I would take the correct practice to be this: that the State court should approve of the bond, and allow the removal of the cause. Any other practice would degenerate into a farce, and hazard the rights and interests of the citizen in the hands of the unscrupulous and reckless, without any adequate remedy.

If the party applying for the transfer of the cause is entitled to it under the law, the State court will be bound to give it to him. If the State court decides erroneously, the evidence may be preserved by a bill of exceptions, and the party aggrieved may have the question passed upon by the Supreme court of the State, and finally by the Supreme court of the United States, or he may proceed more expeditiously under the seventh section of the act of 1875, by sueing out a writ of certiorari from Circuit court of the United States to the State court, commanding the State court to make return of the record, * * * * * and may enforce said writ according to law. If the applicant is entitled to the removal, and makes the proper application, any subsequent proceedings by the State court would be coram non judice.

Ample power is given to the Federal court in this act to protect the legal rights of all who are entitled to call for its assistance. And that, too, without delaying and endangering the rights of litigants whose suits are properly cognizable in the State court.

Even if we admit that the Federal court should not, under section five of the late act, remand a cause for mere "irregularities" or "defects in the manner of removal," it does not follow that this "irregular" and "defective" practice is the correct practice.

If petitions and bonds for the removal of causes are filed in term time in this court, the court will insist upon ascertaining that the applicants are "entitled to the removal" before it ceases to exercise jurisdiction. If the petition and bond are filed in vacation, and a copy of the record filed in the Federal court, it would, upon motion, if fully satisfied that the party filing the petition was not "entitled to the removal," order the case to be placed upon the docket, and proceed to trial therein as in other causes. For if it was a suit in which the applicant was not "entitled to a removal" of the cause, then the act of 1875 would have no application to the case, and the jurisdiction of the cause, under the law of the land, would have remained all the while in this court.

The second point of inquiry is this: Is this suit, as it now stands, "a controversy between citizens of different States?" Is it cognizable in the Circuit court of the United States?

As we have already stated, the plaintiff sued S. Staats Taylor and Edwin Parson, Trustees, etc., jointly on a joint contract.

It appears that the plaintiff is a citizen of the State of New York; that the defendant Taylor is a citizen of the State of Missouri, and that the defendant Parsons is a citizen of the State of New York—the plaintiff and Parsons being citizens of the same State.

The second section of the act of 1875 states when a case can be removed from the State to the Federal court. Omitting some causes for removal which can have no possible application to this case, it appears that it must be a suit of a civil nature, at law or in equity, * * * * where the matter in dispute exceeds, exclusive of costs, the sum or value of $500.00, * * * in which there shall be a controversy between citizens of different States. * * * This clause refers to a removal by either party; that is by the whole of what constitutes the one side or the other. The section then proceeds as follows: "And when in any suit mentioned in this section there shall be a controversy which is wholly between citizens of different States, and which can be fully determined as between them, then either one or more of the plaintiffs or defendants actually interested in such controversy may remove said suit in the Circuit Court of the United States for the proper district." This clause refers to the case in which the cause can be removed by one or more of the plaintiffs or defendants—less than the whole "party."

Is there in this writ a controversy wholly between citizens of different States?

The tenth section of chapter 110 of the Revised Statutes of Illinois provides, that if a summons or capias is served on one or more, but not on all of the defendants, the plaintiff may proceed to trial and judgment against the defendant or defendants on whom the process is served."

The same section further provides that "at any time afterwards" the plaintiff may have a new suit by "summons in the nature of scire facias" against the defendant not served.

And the twelfth section of the same chapter also gives to the plaintiff a separate and original action against the defendant not served in the first suit.

Thus we see that the common law rule is changed, and that under the Statute of Illinois the plaintiff may, at his or her election, only one of the defendants being before the court, proceed under the statute against that one alone.

In this case, the plaintiff, by resisting the motion for a continuance "for want of service on the co-defendant Parsons," and by taking a rule on the defendant Taylor to plead to the declaration, and by her election announced in open court, has, as is averred in the petition, elected to proceed to trial and final judgment against Taylor alone.

Thus, by virtue of the statute, and at the election of the plaintiff, there is now in this suit, in substance, effect and fact a controversy which is wholly between citizens of different States—between the plaintiff, a citizen of New York, and Taylor, a citizen of Missouri—a controversy which may, under the statute, proceed to trial and final judgment and be fully determined as between them without any service upon or appearance by the defendant Parsons.

The petition and bond filed in this suit will be accepted, the bond will be approved and the proper orders made for the removal of the suit to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of Illinois.

U. S. DIST. COURT, W. D. OF MO.

THE UNITED STATES v. SIMON ADLER et al.

INDICTMENT FOR FAILING TO DEFACE AND OBLITERATE FROM CASKS OR PACKAGES OF DISTILLED SPIRITS, AT THE TIME OF EMPTYING, MARKS, BRANDS, OR STAMPS REQUIRED BY LAW TO BE THEREON.

Judge KREKEL, after addressing the jury at some length as to the facts of the case concluded by giving them the following written charge as to the law:

Under a statute of the United States regarding internal revenue, Adler & Furst, the defendants, have been indicted for failing to deface and obliterate from casks or packages of distilled spirits, at the time of emptying, marks, brands or stamps required by law to be thereon. The indictment, in fifty eight counts, charges this offense, varying in manner and the packages regarding which the omission occurred, so as to meet the testimony in the case. The U. S. statutes, in section 3, 324, under which the indictment has been found, provide that "every person who empties or draws off, or causes to be emptied or drawn off, any distilled spirits from a cask or package bearing any mark, brand or stamp required by law, shall at the time of emptying such cask or package, efface or obliterate said mark, stamp or brand. * * * * * Every person who fails to efface and obliterate said mark, stamp or brand at the time of emptying such cask or package, shall be deemed guilty of felony, and shall be fined, etc."

I have cited such parts of the section only as bear directly upon the issues. You will observe, in the first place, that the section begins with declaring it to be the duty of every person who empties or draws off, or causes to be emptied or drawn off, any spirits, shall, at the time of emptying such cask or package, efface and obliterate said mark, stamp or brand. The object of the provision obviously was to secure the destroying of the mark, stamp or brand at the time of emptying; and the words "shall efface and obliterate" are apt words to express that intention. The language, "at the time of emptying such cask or package," leaves no room for construction as to the time when the act of effacing and obliterating is to be done. It must be done at the time of emptying and at no other time. The object is so providing was no doubt to prevent the opportunity of defrauding the government by an improper use of the package or stamps, or both. The law, however, will not require an impossibility, and if a case was presented in which the person whose duty the law makes it to efface and obliterate, without any fault of his own, was prevented from the discharge of the duty imposed on him, the law might excuse him. Such a case, however, is not before you, for there is no evidence tending to show even, that the party upon whom the obligation to "obliterate and efface" rested was in any way interfered with or prevented from doing so. But the important inquiry is, upon whom, under the testimony before you, did the law impose the duty of cancelling and effacing? Was it upon Adler & Furst, the defendants? And if so, are they responsible for the acts of their employes? In reading the clause of the section pronouncing the penalty as a separate and distinct part of the section, countenance may be found for the construction that the penalty was denounced against the person only who did the act of emptying. A close examination of the language of the part of the section denouncing the penalty shows beyond a doubt that it refers to the duty which the section in its beginning imposes, for it provides that every person who fails to efface and obliterate SAID mark, stamp or brand at the time of emptying, etc.

As we have already seen, the provisions of the section imposing the duty to efface and obliterate is of such mark, brand or stamp only, as are required by law to be upon casks or packages, and hence the language in the penalty clause —SAID mark, stamp or brand. To read the penalty clause without reference to to the preceding one would leave us without any designation as to what mark, brand or stamp the law is applicable to. To read the provision providing the penalty in connection with the clause imposing the duty of effacing and obliterating such mark, brand or stamp required by law to be upon casks and packages, gives us an intelligent reading of the statute.

But it does more. The construing of the duty and penalty clause together enables us to ascertain to whom the statute applies, namely: To "every person who empties or draws off, or causes to be emptied or drawn off, any distilled spirits." Such a construction, in entire harmony with the provisions of the statute, accomplishes its evident object to hold those responsible, among others, who cause the drawing off. This leads us to the urgency under the evidence whether a person or partnership engaged in rectifying and employing persons who empty distilled spirits from casks and packages bearing marks, brands and stamps required thereon by law, can be said to cause the emptying or drawing off of such spirits. The owners, possessors and operators of a rectifying establishment engaging hands, furnishing the materials and receiving its products, may be said to cause the emptying of spirits used in their business by those in their employ. And any failure on their part to efface and obliterate marks, stamps or brands at the time of emptying casks or packages of distilled spirits on which cask or package marks, stamps or brands were required by law, or cause the same to be done, such person or persons so causing the emptying without effacing or obliterating such mark, brand or stamp is amenable to the law. The jury is instructed that if they find from the evidence that Adler & Furst were rectifiers and carrying on a rectifying establishment in the Western district of Missouri; that they emptied or caused to be emptied by their employes as explained any distilled spirits from casks or packages bearing any mark, brand or stamp required by law and failed to efface and obliterate said mark, stamp or brand at the time of emptying such cask or package, as charged in the indictment, they should find the defendants guilty, otherwise acquit. It was the duty of Adler & Furst, the defendants, to efface or obliterate the marks, brands and stamps on emptying, or cause it to be done, and the failure of their employes to do what the law imposes as a duty on them does not excuse them.

The jury then retired, and after an absence of an hour returned with a verdict of "guilty on all counts of the indictment except the first."

W. B. Miller v. John H. Speed et al.

RIGHTS OF SURETIES—BILL, QUIA TIMET.—Upon bill filed by the surety upon the forthcoming bond of a decedent, who was the husband of the life-tenant of a fund, to be indemnified against probable ultimate loss of the fund, upon the ground that, by the changed condition of the property of his principal since his death, and since the complainant became his surety, he fears he will finally have to pay the amount if permitted to remain unprovided for until the termination of the life estate; Held, that complainant was entitled to relief against the personal representatives.

Where property is covenanted to be secured for certain purposes and in certain events, and there is danger of its being alienated or squandered, courts of equity will interpose to secure the property for original purposes; and to this end will require security to be given, or will place the property under the control of the court.

DEADERICK, J., delivered the opinion of the court.

S. D. Williams v. W. A. Lenoir—From Loudon—Knoxville June Term, 1875.

PLEADING—SET-OFF—STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS.—Upon a proper plea of set-off, the statute would not operate to bar the defendant's claim, nor run after the commencement of the plaintiff's suit, in cases of mutual accounts arising between the parties about the same time.

In the case of a set-off pleaded, which is in the nature of a cross-action, the plaintiff as to that plea is a defendant, and his replications in substance pleas; and he may, without leave of the court, file as many as are necessary to his proper defense.

ACCOUNT FROM ANOTHER COUNTY—COMPETENCY OF PARTIES AS WITNESSES.—The Act of Feb. 24, 1870, was not intended to affect the mode of proceeding under Sec. 3780 of the Code, as to making up an issue upon an account coming from another county, but leaves the affidavit of plaintiff as conclusive evidence unless denied by the affidavit of the defendant, and excluding all evidence in his behalf without such denial. Upon the point that the plaintiff and defendant are both incompetent witnesses, the case of Wilkhorn v. Gillespie, 6 Heisk., 329, is overruled, and it is held that both are competent.

2. GARNISHMENT—LIEN.—A garnishment bill held to give to the complainant the benefit of the lien, to secure the indebtedness of the debtor to the garnishee for unpaid purchase money for land. As to other indebtedness not so secured by lien, a judgment only should have been given against the garnishee.

2. SALE.—Frror to sell land on time and free from equity of redemption, when not asked for in the bill.

3. INTEREST.—Error to compute interest from the date of Masters' Report to the rendition of the decree, thus compounding interest upon the garnishee.

NICHOLSON, C. J., delivered the opinion of the court.

Mary J. Perkins, by her next friend, v. P. G Stiver Perkins and others.—Error to Chancery Court of Giles.—Decided at Nashville.

PRACTICE—FEES OF COUNSEL FOR PERSONS UNDER DISABILITY.

1. Where the client is sui juris, the court should, in the cause in which the services were rendered, do no more than declare the lien upon the recovery for reasonable counsel fees; leaving the attorney to enforce his claim by an appropriate proceeding against his client, unless the amount be settled by contract. But if the client is under disability, a reference may be allowed, in which case the attorney and client assume an antagonistic position; the attorney cannot in this matter represent his client, and the client should have actual notice.

LIEN—HOW SATISFIED.

2. If fees are due the solicitors, then their liens for these several fees would be upon the fund recovered by their several clients, and out of the sum realized from the sale of the debtor's land their fees should be paid. But land, until sold and the sale confirmed, still belongs to the debtor, and as such the solicitors has no lien upon it.

LIV. NEW HAMPSHIRE.

WE are indebted to Hon. JOHN M. SHIRLEY, Official Reporter, for advance sheets of the 54th New Hampshire Reports, from which we take the following head-notes:

The plaintiffs and the defendant associated themselves together under the name of the Danbury cornet band, but not as a corporation. They adopted and subscribed certain by-laws, one of which was as follows: "If any member shall leave the band, he leaves all his interest with the band." Musical instruments for the use of the members were bought by the association, one of which was intrusted to the defendant for use. The defendant voluntarily withdrew from the association, taking with him said instrument, which he refused to surrender upon demand made for the same. Held, that trover for the same might be maintained by the remaining members of the association against him.—(Opinion by SMITH, J.)—Band v. Bean, p. 524.

BURDEN OF PROOF—PREPONDERANCE OF EVIDENCE—DISTINCTION BETWEEN THEM.

A sale of a chattel by the mortgagor, with the consent of the mortgagee, will convey a good title to the purchaser, even though such consent be not in writing, or, if it be so, though it be not entered or indorsed upon the mortgage or the record of the same.—(Opinion by SARGENT, C. J.)—Roberts v. Crawford, p. 532.

LIABILITY OF RAILROADS AS COMMON CARRIERS. AS WAREHOUSEMEN, AND AS DEPOSITARIES.

After the responsibility of a railroad as a common carrier has ceased, they may charge for storage of goods as warehousemen, in which case they will be liable for ordinary care in relation to the goods.—Brown v. Railway, p. 535.

But where they are acting in good faith as mere depositaries, without pay, they are only responsible for slight care, and would not be liable for an act of ordinary negligence on the part of their servant in taking care of the goods.

SUPREME COURT OF INDIANA.

[From the Indianapolis Sentinel.]

VENDOR AND PURCHASER—RIGHT OF ACTION.

3984.—Cole and wife v. Wright et al. Elkhart, C. C. DOWNEY, J.

Wright sued Cole and wife and William J. Church, alleging that in 1863 Cole purchased of one Benedict certain real estate, and was put in possession thereof. In 1865 Benedict demanded payment of Cole, who agreed with Wright to pay the amount for him, and that Wright should take and hold the title to the land as his security. Accordingly Wright paid Benedict and he conveyed the land to Wright. Now Wright brings this action and asks judgment for $4,000, and asks that the same be declared a lien on said real estate, and that the court will foreclose the mortgage lien against Cole and wife, and order sale, etc. Judgment for plaintiff. Without considering all the errors assigned, the court is of opinion that before Wright can sue for specific performance, and to enforce his lien, it is necessary that he shall have tendered performance on his part by offering to Cole a deed for the land, to be delivered upon payment of the purchase money, as he stands in the place of Benedict for all practical purposes. CONSTITUTIONALITY OF THE ACT OF MARCH 9, 1875, ESTABLISHING A SUPERIOR COURT IN TIPPECANOE COUNTY.

5134.—Vickery v. Chase et. al., Tippecanoe C. C. BUSKIRK, J.

The record prcsents the question whether the act of March 9, 1875, establishing a superior court in Tippecanoe county, is constitutional.

It is claimed that the act is local and special, and hence in conflict with sections 22 and 23 of article 4 of our constitution. The act is not embraced by section 22. The act is both local and special. But in 33 Ind. 201, the validity of a special act creating the Jefferson Criminal Circuit Court was held valid, upon the ground that the constitution did not prohibit special acts creating courts of inferior jurisdiction. Besides, the legislature is the exclusive judge whether a law on any subject not enumerated in section 22 of article 4 of the constitution can be made general and applicable to the whole State. The doctrine laid down in 5 Ind. 4 was overruled in 29 Ind. 409. (See 46 Ind. 355, 33 Ind. 418.) Affirmed.

NEW TRIAL ON GROUND OF ABSENCE OF MATERIAL WITNESS—ALLEGATION OF DILIGENCE.

4228.—Nordman v. Stough, Greene C. C. DOWNEY, J.

This was a complaint for a new trial, to which a demurrer was sustained, which is the error assigned. The ground on which the new trial was asked was the absence of a material witness.

The following is the allegation of diligence in the complaint: "That he used due diligence to ascertain, before trial, the whereabouts of said Rudisill."

There is no case, when the allegation of due diligence is required, in which such an allegation would be sufficient. The party should state what acts of diligence he used Affirmed.

The lawyers and doctors are generally on excellent terms and very charitable as to each others mistakes, as well they may be; but there are exceptions to this as to all rules, as the following may serve to illustrate: A practicing lawyer named Stone and a Doctor Mason were rival candidates for the Senate in Tennessee, and were stumping the district together. Dr. Mason was an advocate of law reform, and, as an argument in its favor, he referred to a certain case in which his competitor had been recently non-suited on some technical point—"Now," said the Doctor, "we need law reform, or else Mr. Stone is incompetent to bring a suit correctly." Mr. Stone, in reply, said: "The Doctor has the advantage of me; for, when I make a mistake in my practice, he has only to go to the records of the court to find it and to publish it to the world; but when he makes a mistake in his practice, he buries it six feet under ground." If his "fellow-citizens" had a due appreciation of ready wit, Mr. Stone became a senator.—Irish Law Times.

We call attention to the following opinions, reported at length in this issue:

Chicago—Re-organization of Police Force.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of this State, by McAllister, J., upon the re-organization of the police force of this city. The court holds, assuming the validity of the new organization of the city under the general act of 1872, could not in any respect be drawn in question in this suit; that the common council had the power under the act of 1872 to pass the ordinance re-organizing the police force of the city of Chicago; that such power is legislative and discretionary, and that the Court of Chancery has no jurisdiction to interfere with the exercise of such power.

Removal of Cases to Federal Court.—The opinion of the Circuit Court of Alexander county, by Baker, J., construing the recent act of Congress, relating to the removal of causes from the State to the Federal courts and holding that it is the duty of the State court, in applications for the removal of causes under the act of 1875, to act upon the petition and bond, and if the State court can satisfy itself that the applicant is not entitled to the removal, it should proceed with the case that where the plaintiff was a citizen of New York, one of the defendants a citizen of Missouri, and the other of New York, and the Missouri defendant only appeared; that on his petition he was entitled to have the case removed to the Federal court. Although the opinion in this case is not of a court of last resort, on account of the importance of the questions involved, and the absence of any direct authority, we give it entire.

Indictment for not Defacing Marks, etc., from Casks.—The charge of the United States District Court for the Western District of Missouri, by Krekel, J., upon an indictment for failing to deface and obliterate from casks or packages of distilled spirits, at the time of emptying, marks, brands, or stamps, required by law to be thereon.

Cook County Judges.—We see it stated in some of the daily press of the city, that the friends of Judge McAllister are urging him as a candidate for Judge Gary's place. This is a mistake. The judge's friends are urging his claims to be elected Circuit Judge in place of Judge Tree, resigned. We understand Judge McAllister would be willing to accept this position should it be tendered him by the people. As judge of the Recorder's Court he distinguished himself, and was the terror of evil doers. The criminal portion of the community feared his judicial power so much that they threatened to take his life. Judge McAllister at the bar or on the bench has always been recognized by his professional brethren as a man of great ability and power. His opinions on the Supreme bench have been able and always vigorous. While the profession at large would suffer a loss in his retirement from the Supreme Court, the bar of this city would be greatly benefited in securing the services of such an able and experienced judicial officer upon the bench of the Circuit Court.

NOTES TO RECENT CASES.

TROVER—CONVERSION—BROKER.

The first eleven pages of the London Law Times' reports for September 18, are occupied by the opinions delivered in the House of Lords. In Hollins v. Fowler it was held that any person who, however innocently, obtains possession of the goods of a person who has been fraudlently deprived of them, and disposes of those goods for his own benefit, or for that of another person, is guilty of a conversion. In this case the appellants purchased some cotton from B; in so purchasing they intended to act as brokers, and to resell the cotton to any of their clients whom it might suit, charging only a commission; but they had no immediate principal at the time of the purchase. They afterwards sold it to M. B had obtained the cotton by a fraud from the respondents, but the appellants were not aware of this. In an action of trover brought by the respondets against the appellants, to recover the value of the cotton, the jury found that it was bought by the defendants in the course of their business, and that they dealt with it only as agents to their principals. The House of Lords held, affirming the judgment below, that the defendants were guilty of a conversion.

LANDLORD AND TENANT — DISTRESS FOR RENT—DISTRESS WITHOUT SALE.

The English Court of Exchequer, in Lehaine v. Philpot, 33 L. T. Reps., N. S., 98, held, where a landlord who elects to enforce his remedy by distress against his tenant in arrear with his rent, cannot, so long as he detains the distress without sale, maintain an action against the tenant for the same rent, even although the goods distrained are not of sufficient value to satisfy the amount of rent distrained for.

ADMIRALTY — COLLISION—FAILURE TO RENDER ASSISTANCE.

The English Court of Admiralty held, in the Adriatic, 33 L. T. Reps., N. S., 102, that a ship failing to render assistance to another with which she had been in collision, and showing no reasonable cause for such failure, will be held to blame for the collision, unless proof be given to the contrary on her behalf.

ACTION FOR DEATH OF INFANT—CARLISLE TABLES.

The Supreme Court of Iowa in Walter's administrator v. the C. I. & P. Railway Co., (9 W. Jurist, 535.) Held, That in an action by an administrator to recover damages for the death of an infant, it is proper to prove his expectancy of life by the Carlisle tables.

BANKRUPTCY—BOOKS OF ACCOUNT.

The United States District Court for the District of Massachusetts, in re Reed, 12 N. B. R., 390, held that a retail dealer in groceries, who keeps no invoice books but keeps all his invoice bills carefully together, so that a comple account of all the goods received by him can be made out from them; the other customary books being also kept, keeps proper books of account, that the qustion of book-keeping is a question of fact in each case.

BANKRUPTCY—JURISDICTION OF STATE COURT.

The Court of Appeals of Maryland, in Jourdan, assignee, v. Downey, 12, N.B. R., 427, held that a State court may entertain an action by an assignee to recover money received by a creditor as a preference; that if money is brought into a State court under a fi fa., the assignee may intervene and claim the fund on the ground that the levy is void under the bankrupt law.

SUNDAY CONTRACTS.

The Supreme Court of Arkansas, in Tucker, admr., v. West et al., reported in a recent issue of the Central Law Journal, hold that contracts founded on an act prohibited by statute, under a penalty, are void. That contracts made on Sunday are not, by the common law, void. That a note executed on Sunday for property previously sold is illegal and invalid under the Sabbath Act; but such a note may be ratified by a subsequent promise to pay it made on a working-day.

Lectures on Law.—Among the books purchased by Mr. Rosenthal for the Law Institute, during his recent visit east, are three volumes of law lectures, entitled Wilson's Works. They consist of lectures on law delivered by James Wilson, one of the associate justices of the Supreme Court of the United States and professor of law in the college of Philadelphia. The style is pleasing, and they could be read with profit by attorneys as well as by law students. It is a fact worthy of note that although these lectures on law were delivered nearly ninety years ago, they are addressed: "Ladies and gentlemen." We were pleased and entertained by their hasty perusual.

Law Books in Preparation.—Baker, Voorhis & Co. announce as in preparation by Thomas W. Waterman, author of Waterman on Trespass, etc., a Treatise on Corporations, to cover the entire law on that subject; also Waterman's United States Criminal Digest, which we are told, is to be a complete compendium of the American criminal law. We are among those who believe that Mr. Waterman is one of the honest legal authors, but at the same time we feel it to be our duty to caution him against multiplying his works too fast. One man can do only about so much work in a given time. We hope Mr. Waterman will not, by hastenin the appearance of these works, injure hi present good reputation.

Briefs and Abstracts.—We would call the attention of aitorneys to the fact that we have the largest fonts of small pica type, and are working the greatest number of compositors on briefs and abstracts of any office in the city, and are therefore able to complete such work without the least possible delay. We employ none but the best of compositors, and have the most experienced proof readers, which ensures accurate and tasty briefs.

Bankruptcy Blanks.—We call attention to our list of red line bankruptcy blanks, revised in accordance with the provisions of the Revised Statutes of the United States and the amendments thereto. These blanks are good for any State in the Union. Send for a sample blank.

Obituary.

HON WILLIAM H. UNDERWOOD.

The Honorable William H. Underwood, one of the most experienced and able lawyers of the Illinois bar, died at his residence in Belleville, on Thursday, the 23d ultimo. The fatal disease was paralysis, brought on, no doubt, by overwork. The first attack came on the 3d of May last, and though at times he seemed much improved, it rendered him almost helpless from that day until his death.

No member of the bar in Southern Illinois could have been taken away whose death we should have mourned more than Judge Underwood's. He was one of the best friends The Legal News ever had. When our enterprise was an experiment he came forward with his powerful influence and aided and supported us. He has been, from the commencement of The Legal News up to the time of his last illness, a frequent contributor to its columns. His suggestions have often been valuable to us. In his death the State has lost one of its best and most gifted citizens, the bar one of its wisest and purest counselors, his family one of the kindest of husbands and fathers. He was a firm advocate of the eqality of man and woman before the law. The distinguished services rendered to the State in his published works, in his various public offices, as well as at the bar, make it not only proper, but a pleasing duty, for us to surrender so much of our space to the proceedings of the St. Clair County bar, in respect to his memory, whose members knew him best and appreciated him most.

PROCEEDINGS OF THE ST. CLAIR COUNTY BAR.

The members of the St. Clair County bar met, pursuant to call at the courthouse in Belleville, on Friday, September the 24th, at 12 M., Hon, G. Koerner in the chair, Hon. John Hinchcliffe was appointed secretary. The president, Gov. Koerner, stated the objects of the meeting, with much feeling, as follows:

REMARKS BY GOVERNOR KOERNER.

Gentlemen of the Bar: We have met here for the purpose of signifying in a suitable way the great regret that we all feel at the loss of one of the most distinguished members of our Bar, and to present our sentiments in the form of resolutions to be presented to the Court.

I will say, having been called to preside over this meeting, that I certainly had no expectations that it would ever fall to my lot to preside over a meeting commemorating the merits of our deceased friend. In the course of nature he ought to have survived me. Until a very short time ago, he gave promise of a long life. His constitution was an excellent one, his habits were temperate and there was nothing at all to prepare us for such a loss as we have now suffered.

I have known Judge Underwood for the last thirty-five years. I believe I heard the first speech he ever made in the Court House, and it so happened that I heard his last. I have been, as a member of the bar, connected with him intimately for all that time with the exception of a comparatively short period when I was absent from the country. It may be interesting, perhaps, to some of you if I embrace this opportunity of giving you a very brief statement of his career, since I believe I am perhaps the only one amongst you who is able to do so with some degree of accuracy.

If I mistake not Judge Underwood came here as early as the early part of 1840. As far as I knew then, and as far as I know now, he had no relatives or friends in this country or in the State of Illinois. How his attention was directed to the particular place where he finally settled I have never learned; it may have been merely accidental. At the time he came here there were only a few lawyers here—in fact there were only four who were actively engaged in business, snd they constituted but two firms. Governor Reynolds had formed a partnership with Lyman Trumbull, and Mr. Shields, afterwards General Shields, had formed a partnership with me. Shields, Trumbull and myself were comparatively young lawyers, Mr. Trumbull being of about the same age as Judge Underwood. There was then an opening, and Judge Underwood concluded to stay here although there was otherwise no particular inducement for him as far as I could discover. He, about that time, Judge Trumbull having been appointed Secretary of State, early in 1841, then formed a partnership with Governor Reynolds, and commenced the practice of law. I had noticed him only in one or two cases before justices of the peace, but I found that he was always in his office—that he was constantly reading law, that when appearing even before a justice, he had studied his case admirably well and was prepared even at that time to bear out his statements by a reference to authorities, and upon the whole I concluded that Judge Underwood would make after a while a safe and good lawyer. While holding this opinion, I received a letter from the Hon. Adam W. Snyder, who had been a member of Congress, and was then a senator representing the counties of Madison, St. Clair and Monroe in the legislature—the leader, I might say, of the then democratic party in the State—in which he informed me that an election would take place for State's attorney in our circuit, then comprising about twelve or thirteen counties, that the candidates that had already applied were not men that were really very fit for the office, and that inasmuch as St. Clair county had not had the office of State's attorney for a number of years, it was desirable that some one from St. Clair county should be appointed. The mode of appointment then was by the legislature, but the members from each circuit met together and made the nomination which was merely indorsed afterwards by the legislature in open session. He suggested that some one from St. Clair county should become a candidate. He desired me to do so, but I declined. But at the same time I suggested to him William H. Underwood, of whom Mr. Snyder at that time knew but very little. Mr. Snyder acted upon my suggestion, and I believe Judge Underwood, without having known a word about it, received the appointment very much to his surprise. He entered his office with a great deal of zeal, and it was one which required at that time a considerable sacrifice of comfort, because it was expected that the State's attorney would go to all those counties, a great many of which were very small, hardly accessible, and the fact was that some of his predecessors had only attended some of the larger counties and let the business go as it might in the other counties, relying upon the special appointment of State's attorneys by the court. But Judge Underwood had a different view of his office. He attended to it at all places and at all times. I am not aware that he was absent at any one time, and as long as he was in the office—being re-elected in the session of 1842-3—he performed its duties with the greatest industry and application, and I may say also, with a good deal of success. This made him known all over the circuit, and his business on tne circuit, being always in attendance and there being a great many counties where there were but few, and some where there were no lawyers at all, after a while increased. Of course he improved the opportunity, and from that time on he became a leading lawyer on the circuit. He then was made a Judge of our circuit court, which office he filled also to the great satisfaction of the bar, and in which he showed the same application and talent which he had done before while he was practicing at the bar. I am not aware that at any one time he was absent from the bench.

After that time his career is known to nearly all of you; and I may say here that certainly in many respects he may be placed before the members of the bar as a model. I do not think that I have ever known any lawyer who was his superior in application, industry and fidelity to his causes. With him it was immaterial whether the case involved a large or a small amount, whether it involved a legal question of great or small interest, he treated all his cases and all his clients alike; that is to say he always did his very best in every case. I am sure that you will agree with me that I am not exaggerating his merits in that respect.

And not only did he practice law extensively and unceasingly, I might say, but he devoted some of his time, and I suppose a great deal of it in later years, to the instruction of the profession. The annotations which he made to our revised statutes have proved and will prove hereafter of immense benefit to the profession. And no one, let me tell you, gentlemen, who has not himself tried his hand at this kind of work is able to appreciate the immense industry, application and ability which is required for it. I have no doubt that the sickness which finally carried him off was induced to a very great extent by this additional labor which he took upon himself, not, as I understand, for the purpose of making it lucrative, but rather that the profession should have the benefit of his long years of industry and application in collecting all the authorities with which he has, I might say, illustrated our statutes, and noting their relations to one another, and to former laws. In this respect, the bar is under very great obligations to him. It is not a work that is very attractive, it requires a strong resolution to go through with it. There is, as a general thing, no very great reputation connected with it, for the very reason that but very few people know how difficult the task is. Those who do know it will appreciate it very highly.

There is one other thing remarkable in Judge Underwood's career: While he was devoting apparently all his time to the law, he took a great interest in politics. It is usually said, it has almost become a maxim, that it is destructive to a lawyer's professional success to connect himself with politics. Like a great many other maxims which we make use of almost every day, or which we see made use of by others, it is not quite true; it is a one-sided view. We all know that some of our greatest statesmen were excellent lawyers; need I mention more names than those of Webster, of Clay, of Chase or Trumbull? Judge Underwood was well versed in the political affairs of the country, always kept his eyes open to what was going on, and as we all know, he himself was a member of the legislature, I think probably twice, and he was ten years a member of the senate of our own State, and lastly a member of the Constitutional Convention of 1870, and when you saw him at Springfield you would not imagine he was thinking of law, because he was always in his place, the first man there and the last man to leave. I do not think that he was ever absent except, perhaps, in cases of illness, and I am not aware that he was much afflicted with sickness; always there, always attending his committees—in fact it was almost incomprehensible how he could unite the pursuits of legislator and of a lawyer in such a remarkable way as he did, and yet none of his clients had ever any reason to complain. Now, it is very true that there are a great many lawyers who spoil their prospects by being politicians, but those are politicians of a lower grade. A man who thinks only about offices and how to arrange for the success of himself and his friends; who knows how to organize primary meetings and to lead conventions, and who is, in one word, one of those successful managers who sometimes get to be called statesmen—such a man will always be a poor lawyer as a matter of course. No one can be a good and distinguished lawyer without being a man of high aspirations, a man of large views, who despises those tricks which to be sure frequently produce success for a short time. Now it may be true that politicians of the kind just mentioned, will not succeed in the profession, but men that are real statesmen, men who care little about the political success of themselves or their friends, but only for the good of their country, may at the same time be shining lights in the higher walks of the profession and secure themselves great reputation at the bar of the country.

I think, then, that as respects industry, application, zeal, legal talent, concentration of mind to the profession which he had embraced, and, above all, as regards fidelity to the cause of his clients, our deceased brother may well be pointed out as a model, and it may be said that the loss which we as members of the bar have sustained in his death, is very great, while at the same time the community at large is bereft of a highly useful citizen. It is therefore eminently fit that we should assemble in order to bear public testimony to the great merits of the departed.

On motion of S. M. Kase, a committee of five was appointed by the chair to draft suitable resolutions expressive of the sentiments of the bar; and to present them to the Circuit Court upon its convening on the following morning, The chairman announced S. M. Kase, John B. Hay, Jehu Baker, T. J. Krafft and M. W. Weir. Upon motion of T. J. Krafft the chairman of the meeting was added to the committee. The meeting then adjourned sine die.

At the opening of the circuit court, on Saturday morning, Hon. W. H. SNYDER presiding, the Hon. JEHU BAKER, of the committee of the bar, arose and addressed the court as follows:

REMARKS OF HON. JEHU BAKER.

May it please the court: The committee which was appointed yesterday has taken into consideration the subject-matter submitted to its charge, and has agreed upon and directed me to report to the court the following series of resolutions:

Resolutions adopted by the members of the St. Clair County Bar, on the occasion of the death of HON. WILLIAM H. UNDERWOOD.

1st. Be it resolved: That it is with pain and sorrow that we learn that Hon. Wm. H. Underwood has departed this life.

2d. That we feel that a sad breach has been made in our number by the loss of one who not only filled so large a place at the Belleville Bar, but whose professional standing was eminent throughout the State of Illinois.

3d. That in his editorial labors, in connection with the jurisprudence of our State, the deceased has left a monument of industry and talent which will entitle him to the lasting gratitude of the profession.

4th. That in view of his long residence in our community, his prominent connection with our bar, and the various stations he has filled, we recognize in the deceased an honest man, a very able, devoted, and learned lawyer, an upright judge, and a patriotic statesman.

5th. That we heartily tender our sympathy and condolence to his afflicted family; and that the secretary of this meeting be directed to transmit a copy of these resolutions to his bereaved widow.

6th. That the court be requested to direct the clerk to place these resolutions upon the records of this court, as a permanent testimonial; and that the court be further requested to adjourn, in honor of the deceased, until Monday morning the 27th inst.

7th. That as a further token of regard for the deceased, the members of the bar will, in a body, attend his funeral obsequies.

I am further requested by members of the committee to add some remarks in connection with the presentation of these resolutions. This is a duty from which I cannot shrink, but I confess that I find it one of much difficulty. There is probably no subject upon which it is more difficult to speak with real propriety than upon one of an obituary character. The reason is that on the one hand, the common, stereotyped routine of remark is comparatively tame and meaningless; whilst on the other, to grasp the individual subject aright is a task of extreme difficulty and delicacy.

There are three main topics of thought to which the mind is naturally drawn upon such an occasion; the first relating particularly to the deceased, his character, his career; the second relating to the general consideration of death, its mystery, its significance; the third relating to the influence which such bereavements may rationally have upon the living. I will make a few remarks upon each of these topics.

About 1839 or '40, I think—which would be thirty-five or thirty-six years ago, Mr. Underwood was a young man of about twenty-one or twenty-two years of age. He then came from the State of New York to Illinois, which was at that time for the most part a wild and unsettled country. The prospects of life was open before him in the vast west. He settled in our town, where he has since resided. The change that has taken place within these thirty-five years is one of the most marked which has taken place in any population upon the face of the earth within a like time. Belleville at that time probably contained not more than five hundred or one thousand people—I cannot be accurate as to numbers; our forests were comparatively unbroken; our prairies wide and thinly settled, and there was a charm, which Mr. Underwood, in common with many other immigrants to the west, felt in penetrating into this comparatively new country, with a view of pursuing his profession, building up his fortune, and achieving a success in life. He acheived that success. Probably there is no lawyer in the State of Illinois, all things considered, who practiced his profession more successfully than Judge Underwood. Certainly, no lawyer was more devoted to his profession. And here I will remark, that so very great was the industry of Judge Underwood, that it had the illusive effect of putting into comparative obscurity his really powerful talent. I regard Judge Underwood's native talent as having been decidedly superior. It is clear to me that industry can never achieve such a success in the law, such a knowledge of the Anglo-American judiciary system, such an eminent professional career, unaided by superior native ability. In view of the resolutions reported, which are a high testimonial of the talent, the moral worth, and the prominent professional standing of our deceased brother, I need say no more in the way of personal characterization.

Time passes and man changes. A few years remove a generation of men from the stage of life. When they enter upon it, they experience that feeling which has been so often noticed by the poets, and which has such a deep significance in connection with the problem of life. The young man sees promise in every venture, and success along every line of effort. His imagination explores the future, and busies itself in constructing forms of realization which are destined, for the most part, never to be realized in fact. A great poet has very beautifully described this morning phase of life:

"There was a time when meadow, grove and stream,
The earth, and every common sight,
To me did seem
Apparel'd in celestial light,
The glory and the freshness of a dream."

This is the time when the earth appears greener, the air purer—when the clouds appear to float in a higher heaven—and when the heart is wont to leap, like the startled hare, in anticipation of its objects of desire. As men pass from youth to age, this enchantment gradually disappears, and the whole external world seems to change. They realize that there is much illusion mixed up in their lives, and that nature has two tales to tell—one to the young and another to the old—the one inspiring the heart with confidence in every object of desire in life, the other chilling it with the prospect of "the valley of the shadow of death." As life still proceeds—as its battle and its struggle still continue, men more and more become sensible that their knoweldge is ignorance, that their wisdom is folly, that their strength is weakness, that their days "are few and full of evil," and that there is no boast in that little and obscure kingdom of the grave with whose honors they hasten to be crowned.

Meantime nature moves on in perennial strength. The flowing river mocks the shortness of human life—ever murmuring as it seeks the sea, "man comes and goes, but I go on forever." The seasons return and the stars rise and set as they did before man had a place upon earth. The brightness of yesterday morning reminded me of what I have often observed—the joyous freshness with which the new day rises upon the corpses of dead men. Even art, the creation of man, is far stronger than he to resist the tooth of time. I have, suspended over my office table, the identical eagle with the national motto, under which in the old court house Judge Breese presided, and A. P. Field, Lyman Trumbull, Gustavus Koerner, Wm. H. Underwood, Joseph Gillespie, Adam W. Snyder, John Reynolds, Wm. C. Kinney, J. L. D. Morrison, Nathaniel Niles, James Shields, and others, practiced law in years far agone. Its colors are well nigh as fresh as when it received the finishing touch from the hand of the pioneer artist; but what inroads time has made upon that group of talented and strong men!

But nature is so full of illusions and surprises, and she works by such secret means to such secret ends, that, viewed as a purely rational question, it may be, after all, that man's apparent weakness and transitoriness is itself only an illusion. However great a mystery death may be, it is perhaps not quite entirely a mystery. Some tracing of light may be discerned upon the rim of the cloud. There is something in human nature which prompts men to feel—as another great poet has finely expressed the thought, that "The awful shadow of some unseen Power floats, though unseen, among us." There is something which prompts the sorrowing heart to bind wreaths of the immortelle around the crumbling column—in dim metaphorical expression of a hope that reaches across the night of death. There is something which has placed stony fingers pointing upward in the cemeteries of the world; something which has encircled the earth with altars of worship, and temple spires piercing the heavens. Looked at philosophically, these, reinforced by very many kindred phenomena, may be taken as evidence of some vague sense of the soul, connecting it veraciously with a fundamental fact of its being—somewhat, though not entirely—as the murmur of the shell is a reminiscence of the deep and vast ocean by whose forces it was formed.

Finally, death is a wonderful teacher of charity; from which we see that nature knows how to extract the divinest use from her ugliest fact. In the presence of death, the rudest heart feels the influence of a chastening spell. When we walk among the graves of the dead, we perceive that the inscribed slab, the etched head-stone, the carved column, are cold and white and still; but they are not more silent than the mouldering forms that sleep beneath. We contrast this utter silence with the loud rush of life, its angry collisions, its sharp and bitter rivalries; and, touched by this mute teaching, we feel that our lives are foreshortened and unworthy. The lesson of charity so taught by death—if appropriated as it should be—would not only add to the dignity, the beauty, the grace and the happiness of life, but it would also contribute greatly to increase its efficient force. And thus it is that death—to which all are doomed—continually aspires to purify and elevate the life of the living.

REMARKS BY JUDGE W. H. SNYDER.

There is no task, in the whole course of life, more delicate, than the attempt to offer a proper tribute on occasions like this, to the memory of the lamented dead. An attempt, I may justly and emphatically term it, for who can presume, I care not how gifted he may be, to perform it? And I have many times painfully felt the utter inadequacy of language to express one's feelings upon such an occasion, and to give utterance to our appreciation of the many excellent and noble qualities which have been made manifest by an intimate acquaintance of many years.

Having passed my fiftieth year, and reached the period when those with whom I have been long and most intimately associated, are rapidly passing from life to death, I have come to think more and more upon life, its mysteries, its surroundings—the conditions and the laws that hem it on every side.

These occasions teach us grave lessons. One is the transitoriness—the utter nothingness in results, I may say, of this fearful struggle for existence, we call life. One great trouble with us all is our egotism, our high opinion of ourselves and our species. We arrogate to ourselves that all the earth. almost the whole universe, has been created for our exclusive use. Instead of seeing man as he really is, the crowning work of animated nature, we look upon him as constituting a superior, almost separate order in nature. It is calculated to dissipate our pride very considerable to guage man by the laws of nature. When we measure him by the inexorable conditions that constantly stare us in the face, we find that he, though so superior and possessed of such marvelous powers, as to startle the candid student of nature, upon a little observation and reflection, he is found to be only the highest of a long gradation of animate and inanimate organisms—I say it greatly dissipates man's arrogance when he learns that the same rigid, unbending, remorseless law governs him which rules the lowest and the most contemptible of animated beings, and even vegetable existences. To arrest a certain amount of force, to organize it into a material existence, to continue that existence for a brief time to have that force suddenly pass away from the particles of matter it animates and holds together, and the elements composing the organism quickly remanded back to their respective places in nature, is his course. No amount of exertion on his part will prevent this inexorable destiny. And the smallest worm, the crudest bactria, the lowest of animated creation, goes through precisely the same process, and there is as little of man when he is dead, and his body has been remanded to its original elements, as there is of the least important of animated nature or the coarsest and the most valueless blade of grass when life has passed from them. For the "laws of nature," as is well said by a great intellect, "are without morals and without heart." They crush alike the high and the low, the good and the bad. No amount of agony and supplication can turn them from their course; they ruthlessly snap the heart-strings and cruelly rend the dearest ties.

When we thus reflect, we come to understand that in view of the task before us, our lives should be so ordered as so elicit the best results from what surrounds us, instead of being allured by anticipations of bliss or alarmed and driven by fear of punishment; instead of being treated like children and scared into what is good, it is our duty to go back to the noble doctrine of the Stoics—the noblest ever announced—that virtue should be loved for its own sake, and practiced for no other consideration or expectation than its own unaided reward. Let us commend to ourselves the lesson of the woman who marched at the head of the last crusade of St. Louis, carrying a pitcher of water in one hand, and a pot of fire in the other, saying: "With this I will burn all sin, and with that I will extinguish hell, so that there may be no inducement and no fear to drive me to doing good."

Another lesson is taught us by the departure from this earth of our honored and esteemed brother, and that is, that we hasten too much through this world. We are brought by such events—calamities, I might call them—to look more closely at our people and see what a feverish life they lead, to see the mass of the American people hurrying and jostling one another as though all were in a race, and each were striving to reach the goal first in order to clutch some great prize. We work and fret our lives away. We draw inordinately upon our mental and physical resources, in a manner that should prevent us from reproaching the dissipated man, who, with his eyes wide open to the consequences, destroys himself. Ours is another, but not much better kind of intemperance. Let us remember that in proportion as we inordinately draw upon our resources, as we hurry, as we tax our powers beyond what they are capable of bearing, in so much do we shorten our days, and render what are left to us miserable until we reach the condition that doing our duty in this world is impossible, or becomes exceedingly imperfect and irksome.

The great German intellect, which stands to-day, deservedly, at the head of all, in profundity, in grasp and in range of thought, owes the marvelous progress it has made to the deliberation with which its people have prosecuted their studies and investigations, though it has been jeeringly termed, and is in fact, habitually spoken of as phlegmatic.

It is to be regretted that the American people have not a little more phlegm, and consequently, more deliberation in their composition. The progress of the German nation, intellectually, has been with all their phlegm and patient deliberation, wonderfully rapid. It is less than two centuries since the German intellect began to claim a place with other nations of Europe, and it now stands in its confessedly commanding and illustrious position. This position a great people has reached by observing the precept of their grandest genius, the immortal Goethe:

> "Oh, let your course be like the star,
> Though unhasting, yet unresting."

It is not necessary that man should stand still. He may, by husbanding his power, labor almost constantly, if he will but labor with discretion and proper deliberation, and simply up to a fair adequacy of his resources.

In saying thus much, I cast no reproach upon our departed friend. He has, by his immense and constant labor drawn upon his life, in such manner as to have passed away perhaps fifteen or twenty years before his time. We have no right to cast blame upon him, for many of us are given to the same manner of disposing of our time. He has engaged in the feverish race, which we all are running, and in which, impelled by our surrounding, it is perhaps impossible to avoid taking part. The time may come when this shall not be.

Perhaps we are passing through a phase to which this feverishness belongs. The vast resources of our country, the splendid opportunities of acquiring fortune and distinction are too great an inducement to permit us to bear ourselves in our professional and business pursuits with moderation. The allurements are too great. We are called upon too irresistibly by our struggling fellows to refuse to follow. It may be, I say, that we are passing through a phase of our existence as a people. I sincerely hope we are, otherwise this feverish, hurrying life will wear us out, not only individually but nationally, and in a few years this great and brilliant nation will have burned out and passed away like a meteor.

The profession of which our friend was an illustrious member, has, as its history has shown, tended to produce the highest state of practical morals. Its members have been notable for their probity, their integrity, their high sense of honor, and their jealous guarding of human rights. The science of jurisprudence is the only system that practically applies moral dealings and right, just and honorable conduct to the every-day affairs of life. Its history shows, notwithstanding the vulgar opinion entertained by ignorant minds, that to belong to the legal profession is naturally to be tricky and dishonest, that as a body the legal profession has ever manifested a high state of morals, a pure integrity and the highest sense of justice and of right of any body of men in all time. From the foundation of the Republic down to the dissolution of the Empire, through a period of a thousand years, we but rarely hear even the least reproach cast upon the Roman Praetor, and we need but mention, to commend them in the highest terms, the Mutius Scævolas, the Papinians and the Ulpians, her great and splendid lawyers. Turning to England, from whom we have drawn our law and our legal inspiration, we find that from the Heptarchy to the present time, throughout her whole history, with the exception of a Scroggs and a Jeffries and a very few other excerable names, her judiciary has been one of illustrious integrity, and her judges have been drawn from her lawyers, of whom they were, and who by them were but fairly represented.

We shall soon finish the hundredth year of our national existence. From a small and insignificant beginning we have grown to be a mighty Republic, the greatest marvel as a nation that this world has seen since the time of the Romans. As we have grown great we have become rich, and, not escaping the fate of the nations which have gone before us, corruption stalks in our midst. But, though its taint is manifest almost everywhere, and though it has possessed itself of many high places, we can proudly say that our Judiciary, National and State, and our Bar, have remained wonderfully pure and honest; and, while immorality and crime have been rife in the land, and even though another great profession has incurred just reproach, and some of its members have humiliated us in the eyes of the nations, it is our boast that fewer of the legal fraternity have been charged with crime than those of any other occupation, in proportion to numbers.

I will conclude by saying that our departed brother was as bright, as honorable, as upright, as any member of our profession throughout the land. He honored his profession. It would be compliment enough to him, or to any man, to say that he had not dishonored it.

I will with melancholy pleasure—it being the last mark of respect that can here in the place illustrated by his labors and success, be paid to the dead—order the resolutions just presented to be spread upon the records, and this court will now adjourn until Monday morning, at nine o'clock.

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

ABSTRACTS OF OPINIONS FILED AT SPRINGFIELD, IN JUNE, 1875.

DEGREE OF EVIDENCE REQUIRED UNDER THE LIQUOR LAW IN A PROSECUTION BY A WIFE FOR FURNISHING LIQUOR TO HER HUSBAND—CIRCUMSTANTIAL PROOF.

Held, That in a prosecution under the liquor law, it is not required that the evidence shall be clear, positive and specific, as to the time place, manner and each item of loss, to authorize the jury to find injury to the means of support of the family, but that fact may be proved, like any other, by circumstances.

184.—Toledo, Wabash and Western Railroad Company v. Patrick Donahue.—Appeal from Morgan.—Opinion per CURIAM.

KILLING STOCK ON TRACK—ERRONEOUS INSTRUCTION.

STATEMENT.—This instruction was given in the case: "The court further instructs the jury for the plaintiff, that, if they believe from the evidence in this case, that the public road spoken of by the witnesses is 33 feet wide, the law makes it incumbent upon the defendant to fence said railroad up to the line of said county road, as near as reasonably may be. And if the jury believe from the evidence in this case that the striking and injury of said mare of plaintiff's was at any other place on said railroad than upon the public highway as laid out and established, and not in a town, city, or village, and within five miles of a settlement, and that said railroad had been open for more than six months, the defendant would be liable to the plaintiff, if the jury should believe that the defendants' locomotive or servants, caused the injury complained of, in such a sum as the evidence shows plaintiff sustained, if any has been proven"—the ground of complaint being the insufficiency of the cattle-guard and fence adjoining.

Held, that the instruction was erroneous in declaring the liability of the defendant for the mere killing of the animal, under the circumstances therein mentioned, without reference to the sufficiency of the cattle-guard and fence, or other default of defendant.

186.—Francis G. Lombard v. Francis Johnson et al.—Appeal from Morgan.—Opinion by CRAIG, J.

MECHANIC'S LIEN—PROPER PARTIES—RULES GOVERNING—COPY OF CONTRACT IN EVIDENCE—PROPER AUTHENTICATION THEREOF.

STATEMENT.—There was a written contract between Lombard and Johnson for building a house for Lombard. Johnson at the time had a partner who joined in enforcing the lien. It was contended that the written contract was not admissible in evidence, because signed by only one of the parties sueing as complainants. Held,

1. That the contract, being made for the benefit of both the partners, though signed by one alone, was admissible in evidence. A proceeding to enforce a mechanic's lien is similar to a suit in chancery, and is governed by the same rules. And as to parties, therefore, all persons interested should be brought in as plaintiffs or defendants.

2. There is no rule of law requiring one who transcribes a copy of a written instrument to be produced as a witness, before the copy can be read as evidence, where the party himself can testify that it is a true copy.

187.—Ezekiel N. Palmer v. Thomas Gardner et al.—Appeal from DeWitt.—Opinion by WALKER, Ch. J.

SUIT BY PAYEE OF AN INDORSED PROMISSORY NOTE—PRESUMPTION FROM POSSESSION—RULES GOVERNING APPEALS IN SUPREME COURT—IMPEACHMENT OF A WILL.

STATEMENT.—Bill to enjoin the collection of two judgments, one in the DeWitt Circuit Court, the other in the Supreme Court, for damages on dismissal of an appeal. As to the first judgment, the grounds for injunction were: That suit was brought by the payee, although he had indorsed the note in blank, and that suit was brought on the note, one day after due, without allowing days of grace. Held,

1. That the possession of a note by a payee is prima facie evidence of ownership. And where the note has been indorsed in blank, the pre umption is that it has been negotiated but again taken up by the payee—the ownership legal and equitable, returning to him thereon, so that he could maintain an action in his own name.

2. Where a note is entitled to days of grace, which are not allowed before suit, the objection must be pleaded in abatement and not in bar.

As to the judgment in the Supreme Court, held,

1. That it is the duty of an appellant to file a transcript of the record in the case, by the close of the second day of term, or procure an order of the court extending the time. Failing in this, an appellant loses all right to further prosecute his appeal, nor can the court give him that right.

2. If the record is lost, his course is to apply for leave to supply the loss, which would be granted, and, if necessary, a continuance to enable him to supply. But failing in this, he is in default.

3. It is not the duty of a defendant in error to enter his appearance. And, in case of his death, [as in this case with appellee], the law does not require his executors or administrators to enter their appearance, but it is the duty of the plaintiff in error to get them into court, by service of writ or notice. He may suggest the death, and revive the suit in the name of the representative, and then bring him into court. An appellant, in all respects, occupies the position of a plaintiff in error, and is required to take the same steps to revive a suit, and prevent its abating by the death of appellee. The representative of appellee, or plaintiff in error, may, if he chooses, suggest the death, and revive the suit in his own name, or he may have the appeal or writ of error abated, if appellant, or plaintiff in error, fail to so revive.

4. As to the judgment dismissing the appeal, the dismissal being treated as an abatement of the appeal, the judgment for costs of appellant was regular, but not for costs of appellee. But, although a judgment for costs may be unwarranted, through an error in fact, as to the death of appellee, the error cannot be corrected by an injunction, but only by a proper application to the appellate court to set aside the dismissal, and correct the judgment for damages.

A will of the deceased appellee being called in question as to the disposition of the testator's estate, in Ohio, to one of the parties, in its bearing on the note in controversy.

Held, That a will cannot be contested in this collateral proceeding, out of the State where it has been probated, and beyond the jurisdiction of the estate devised.

190.—George Pinkard v. George Milmine et al.—Error to Piatt.—Opinion by SCOTT, J.

ESTOPPEL BY THE RECITALS IN A MORTGAGE—PROPER NAMES OF PARTIES MISNAMED IN A DEED TO BE USED IN SUIT.

STATEMENT.—Ejectment brought by George Milmine and Edwin C. Bodman, against appellant, to recover premises which plaintiffs claimed "in fee simple, as mortgagees of Charles Fisher, for condition broken." Plea in abatement filed on the ground that "the said Edwin C. Bodman was named Edward C. Bodman, and not Edwin C. Bodman." Replication, that the mortgage was executed by Charles Fisher, who afterwards sold to Robert Fisher the land embraced therein; the appellee being in possession as tenant of Robert Fisher; and that, therefore, appellant was estopped to deny the name of plaintiff Demurrer to the replication overruled, and defendant elected to abide by the demurrer. Held,

1. That the demurrer should have been sustained. Although the court recognizes the doctrine of estoppel by the recitals of a deed; and that a party claiming under the deed, cannot be permitted to deny any fact admitted to exist by such recital—the principle being that whatever rights legitimately arise on such admitted facts, may, at all times, be asserted, whether it be to obtain or defend the possession of such rights, yet the recital in this mortgage could not invest the plaintiffs with the right to sue in a fictitious name; for there is nothing in the mortgage admitting such right.

2. When a contract or deed is executed in a wrong name, plaintiffs must sue in the proper names, and may aver in the declaration that defendants made the deed or contract, by the name mentioned.

191.—Louis Famer v. The People.—Error to Macon.—Opinion by WALKER, C. J.

CONSTRUCTION OF STATUTES—BEARING OF A REPEAL OF A CRIMINAL STATUTE ON PROSECUTIONS PENDING—KNOWLEDGE OF MINORITY OF ONE TO WHOM DRINK IS SOLD, ON THE PART OF THE SELLER.

STATEMENT.—Prosecution for selling liquors to a minor. Application for a change of venue overruled, August, 1874, under the idea that the statute of 1874, enacted after prosecution commenced, did not apply, but the former statutes governed (viz: acts of 1845 and 1861).

Held, 1. That the repeal of a law under which a penalty has been incurred, defeats the right, where it has not been prosecuted to judgment, unless there is a saving clause in the new law.

2. Where there is such a sav.ng clause, it operates only on the right, and not on the modes of procedure. And, although a suit, or prosecution, may have been commenced under the repealed law, it shall, after the repealing law takes effect, proceed in conformity with the repealing law then in force.

3. A man selling liquors must see that he sells only to such as he is permitted by his license to sell to, and where it is prohibited to sell to a minor, he is bound to know that the person to whom he sells is not a minor, at his peril. It is not as though it were lawful to sell generally. He sells under a special permit, or license, and, therefore, undertakes to perform the conditions thereby imposed.

LIQUOR PROSECUTION—INADMISSIBLE EVIDENCE—NOT CURED BY INSTRUCTIONS—DAMAGES—EVIDENCE OF CONSENT—WIFE ABLE TO MAINTAIN HERSELF NO EXCUSE—STATUTE WHERE DEATH ENSUES—OWNER OF BUILDING AND SELLER—EXEMPLARY DAMAGES—MITIGATION.

STATEMENT.—Prosecution against appellants (seven in number), saloon keepers, for causing the intoxication, and consequent death of the appellee's husband. The declaration only counted on the destruction of the means of support, and not on injuries to the person, from the intoxication of the husband.

Held, 1. That, under the declaration, the evidence should be confined to injury to the means of support, and it was error to admit evidence of personal injury even to show the fact of intoxication; which fact could be directly testified to.

2. That such evidence admitted cannot be remedied by an instruction to the jury to exclude it from their consideration.

3. It is proper to instruct the jury in such a prosecution (where the evidence calls for it), that, if they believe from the evidence, that the intoxicated person drank at other places than the saloon of the defendant, within the time specified in the declaration, such fact should not be considered in reduction or mitigation of damages. The statute gives an action to the person injured, severally or jointly, against those who caused the intoxication.

4. If evidence is introduced tending to show that plaintiff consented to her husband drinking, and sometimes drank wine and beer with him at beer gardens, and at home, it is proper to introduce evidence explaining this conduct—as that she went under compulsion of her husband.

5. It is improper to instruct the jury that if the plaintiff can maintain herself as comfortably as her husband did, from her own property, or by her own exertions, they should find the defendant not guilty. It is the duty of the husband to provide for his wife, and wherever he is disabled to do so by the sale to him of intoxicating liquors, she is injured in her means of support, within the meaning of the statute. The right of support is not limited to the bare necessaries of life, but embraces comforts suitable to the condition in life.

6. It is in the discretion of the jury to award vindictive or exemplary damages, in addition to the actual damages proved

7. The action extends to cases where death has occurred, notwithstanding the statute which, in general terms, gives an action to a survivor, etc; where death is caused by a wrongful act; for this statute only gives an action where, if the deceased had lived, he would have been entitled to an action; which does not apply to this case. Nor does it signify anything that the liquor law gives an action in terms to a "wife," and does not employ the term "widow." To exclude the widow thus, would be a construction too strict and unjustifiable.

8. Nor does the statute intend to draw a distinction between the seller and the owner of a building in which the liquor is sold, so as to subject them to a different measure of liability—the one for actual damages only, and the other for exemplary damages. In a joint action, there are not to be separate judgments rendered against the one for actual damages sustained, and against the other for both actual and exemplary damages. In a joint, or in a separate suit, actual and exemplary damages may be recovered against both, or against either, as the case may be.

9. It is not proper to instruct the jury that the liability to exemplary damages depends upon the defendants, after being notified not to sell the liquor, continuing to sell it; or tempting and seducing the buyer, trying to reform back into the habit of drunkenness again.

10. It may be proper for the jury to take into consideration the drunkard's drinking at his own house, in considering the question as to whether the drunkenness was caused by the defendants.

195.—Charles Drohn v. William Brewer.—Error to Macon.—Opinion by CRAIG, J.

REBUTTING EVIDENCE IN ASSAULT FROM HABITS OF LIFE—EXEMPLARY DAMAGES—DISCRETION OF A JURY AS TO DAMAGES.

STATEMENT.—Assault with a padlock inflicting severe injuries on the head from which erysipelas followed.

Held, 1. That where a proper foundation is laid, evidence in such case may be introduced to show that the aggravated injury resulted, in whole, or in part, from habits of intoxication.

2. Exemplary, or vindictive damages may be given when the act committed was accompanied by malice, violence, oppression, or wanton recklessness; and even if the assault was made under considerable provocation.

3. In an action of this kind, the amount of damages rests so much in the discretion of a jury, that the verdict will not be disturbed on the ground of excess, unless it is manifest the jury have been governed by passion, partiality, or corruption.

196 — John W. Skidmore v. Annabel Bucker.—Error to Piatt.—Opinion by WALKER, C. J.

CHARACTER IN MALICIOUS PROSECUTION—MALICE—RECORD OF ACQUITTAL NOT ADMISSIBLE—MOTIVES OF.

STATEMENT.—Appellant had, after consultation with the State's attorney, prosecuted appellee for a riot. She was acquitted, and brought an action for malicious prosecution. The complaint in the prosecution for riot, was not an information or belief, but on appellant's own knowledge.

Held, 1. That where the complaint is on personal knowledge, then, in a subsequent action for malicious prosecution, it is not proper to introduce evidence to show the general character of the accused. Had the charge been made on information and belief, such evidence of character, on the part of the plaintiff, might be proper to show that the accuser was actuated by malice, and had no proper grounds for a belief of guilt.

2. Where one, in bringing an accusation, acts under the advice of a prosecuting attorney, it requires stronger evidence to show malice on his part, in instituting the prosecution.

3. In no case can the record of acquittal in the prosecution be read in evidence in an action of malicious prosecution thereon.

4. Nor can the motives of plaintiff in the conduct which led to the prosecution, be adduced in evidence, since the question is not one of the guilt of the plaintiff, but whether defendant, as a prudent man, had reasonable cause, from the circumstances, to believe in the guilt of the accused—unless, indeed, the motives or intentions can be brought home to the notice or knowledge of complainant at the time.

199.—William Newton et al. v. Frank Locklin.—Error to Piatt.—Opinion by BREESE, J.

ARBITRARY ARREST BY POLICEMEN—LIABILITY OF A MAGISTRATE IN IMPRISONING FOR CONTEMPT—EXCESSIVE DAMAGES.

STATEMENT.—Appellee had been arrested, without warrant or authority, while quietly passing along in the evening on his own business, having, however, been intoxicated in the morning, but having slept it off. Brought before the magistrate, he became disorderly, as his demands for an immediate trial were not complied with, and was sent to the calaboose for contempt. Action against the magistrate and policeman for trespass. Verdict for $325.

Held, 1. That a policeman has no right to make an arrest on the mere order of a town marshall without a warrant of a citizen not engaged in the violation of law.

2. A magistrate has no authority to commit for contempt but only to levy a fine, and then commit if the fine is not paid at once. But the usual process of collecting fines needs not first to be resorted to. The imprisonment is merely the mode of collecting the fine.

3. That the damages though greater than ought to have been allowed will not justify the interference of the Supreme Court, since the jury do not seem to have been led by passion or prejudice.

201.—City of Bloomington v. Abraham Brockaw et al.—Appeal from McLean.—Opinion by WALKER, J.

CONTRACT OF CITY TO PAY DAMAGES—LIABILITY—NO EXECUTION AGAINST MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—MANDAMUS.

STATEMENT.—In changing the grade of a street, water was thrown on appellee's lot, Temporary injunction allowed and then the city agreed to appoint commissioners to assess damages. This was done but the city afterwards refused to pay it, and the court ordered an execution on judgment thereon. The refusal was on the ground that the assessment of compensation was not under the eminent domain law.

Held, 1. That the city had a right to make a private arrangement, or contract without any proceedings under the eminent domain law; and having done so, is bound by its contract.

2. A city is liable for damages done to lots by changing the grade of streets in throwing water thereon, if, by the construction of culverts or drains, etc., the injury can be avoided.

3. An execution cannot issue against a municipal corporation on a judgment against it. The proper mode of enforcing a judgment is by mandamus.

204.—Andes Insurance Co. v. Elias Shipman.—Error to McLean.—Opinion by CRAIG, J.

STATEMENT.—Action on insurance policy for loss by fire. Verdict, $10,825. Defense, misrepresentations as to the risk in procuring the policy, and also in breach of the contract in that when the fire occurred there was no watchman on the premises, the company maintaining that this meant the premises actually insured, whereas the watchman was in an office within the inclosure, but not within the terms of the policy. Held,

That this construction was not tenable.

Again it was claimed that the watchman was to keep a record. But held,

1. That as the clause requiring this was inserted by the agent in the application, and signed by the insured without knowing its contents, on the representation of the agent that it was all right; and,

2. As there was no watch-clock provided by the company, without which no record could be kept:

The excuse or defense was unavailing, and the company was liable.

CHICAGO LEGAL NEWS.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 9, 1875.

The Courts.

U. S. DIST. COURT, N. D. OF ILL.

In re JOHN H. DANIELS, a bankrupt.

BANKRUPTCY—CLAIM OF PERSON HOLDING STOCKS ON A MARGIN—SALE DEFICIENCY—EXPUNGING CLAIM.

The bankrupt was a banker in Illinois. The claimants, who were stock brokers in New York, purchased stocks upon the order of Daniels, the bankrupt, paying the money therefor and receiving and holding the stocks, together with a margin of ten per cent., or less, as security for the money advanced by them. At the time Daniels was declared a bankrupt, the stocks could have been sold by the claimant so as to have left a small balance in favor of Daniels, but the claimant held the stocks until they depreciated, sold them, and then filed his claim against the bankrupt's estate for the balance. The court held, that it was the duty of the claimants to take notice of the adjudication of bankruptcy of Daniels, and that they were bound to know that their correspondent had lost his ability to pay, and that the management of his affairs was thereafter in the hands of the court, and if they had notified the court it would have ordered the stocks sold before they depreciated in value, but not having done so, and sold them without the order of court, the debt having accrued after the adjudication in bankruptcy, the claim is not allowed, but expunged.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

Opinion by BLODGETT, J.

This is an application on the part of the assignee of said bankrupt to expunge a claim filed for between fourteen and fifteen thousand dollars, by the firm of F. B. Wallace & Company, of New York city.

It appears from the evidence in the case that Daniels was for some years, prior to his being declared bankrupt, a banker at Wilmington, in Will county, in this district; that F. B. Wallace & Company, the claimants, were engaged in the business of stock brokers in the city of New York; that Daniels filed his voluntary petition in bankruptcy on the third day of July, 1873, upon which he was immediately adjudged bankrupt; that for two or three years prior to his bankruptcy, Daniels had been operating to a greater or less extent in stocks upon the New York market, through the firm of F. B. Wallace & Company, who purchased stocks upon the orders of Daniels, paying the money therefor and receiving and holding the stocks together with a margin of ten per cent, or less, as security for the money advanced by them.

At the time Daniels was declared bankrupt, Wallace & Company held seven hundred and fifty shares of the stock of the Chicago & Alton Railroad Company, which had been purchased pursuant to the arrangement I have mentioned, upon which, however, the margin was nearly exhausted, but the stock at that time could have been sold so as to have left some balance to the credit of Daniels in the hands of the brokers. After Daniels' adjudication, and until about the 18th of September, 1873, said stock remained at about the same price. After the 18th of September—being about the date that Jay Cooke & Company failed—said stock declined rapidly in value, and on the 24th of October, Wallace & Company sold the same, and passed the proceeds to the credit of Daniels, leaving Daniels, by their account rendered, in debt to said brokers in the sum of thirteen thousand four hundred dollars ($13,400). This amount, together with the interest accrued thereon, said Wallace & Company have brought as a claim against the estate of Daniels, and the assignee seeks to have the same expunged on the ground that it is not a valid claim to be paid out of the assets of said estate.

It will be noticed from the recital of facts, that at the time Daniels became bankrupt the adventure in these stocks could have been closed so as to have left something to the credit of the bankrupt; in other words the bankrupt did not owe his brokers anything at that time. True it is claimed on the part of the brokers that this transaction was in all respects that of a loan from Wallace to Daniels of the amount of money necessary to buy the stocks in question, and that they simply held the stocks as security for their loan, but it is equally apparent from the evidence and from the nature of the transaction as developed by the proof that Daniels was engaged merely in speculating upon the fluctuations in the value of this stock. He never intended to become the owner of this stock upon the books of the corporation by whom it was issued, but simply bought the stocks upon a margin which he had put up with his brokers for the purpose of making a profit if any should accrue in an advance on the price of said stocks. The real owners of said stocks were the brokers who had advanced the money to buy the same and held the stocks in their own name for their own security, together with whatever margin Daniels might have from time to time remaining in their hands.

It does not appear that any application was made by Wallace & Company to this court for leave to sell these stocks, nor did the assignee of the bankrupt, who was elected on the 18th of August, receive any notice from Wallace & Company of any such intention, but the brokers held such stock probably as long as under the circumstances they thought it profitable or safe to themselves to hold them, and then, without notice, sold them upon the market for whatever price they would bring.

The bankrupt in his schedule refers to these stocks as held on a margin, and in which he had no interest except for a disputed difference between himself and his brokers in regard to the interest which had been charged him. As I said before, there was no indebtedness between the broker and the bankrupt at the time Daniels became bankrupt.

It was undoubtedly the duty of Wallace & Company under the circumstances, to take notice of Daniels' adjudication in bankruptcy. They were bound to know that their correspondent had lost the ability to control this venture from the time of his adjudication, and that the management of the affair was thereafter in the hands of this court; and as it is no part of the duty of an assignee in bankruptcy to speculate in stocks, there can be no doubt but what this court would have at once, on information being imparted to it of the condition of the bankrupt's estate with reference to these dealings with Wallace & Company, ordered said stocks sold and the adventure terminated; but without disclosing the relations which they bore to the court, Wallace & Company continue to hold these stocks upon a declining market, through a critical financial period, and finally sell them out without leave of court, and seek now to make the bankrupt's estate responsible for this large difference.

I do not think the claim, as it is presented under the evidence, should be allowed. It has all accrued since Daniels was adjudged bankrupt, and under such circumstances that I cannot conceive that the creditors or assignee of Daniels are morally or legally bound to sustain this loss.

The claim is therefore expunged.

THROUGH the kindness of the law firm of TENNEYS, FLOWER & ABERCROMBIE, of this city, we have received the following opinion:

U. S. CIRCUIT COURT, E. D. OF PA.

MICHENER, plaintiff in error, v. PAYSON, assignee of the REPUBLIC INS. CO., of Chicago.

Error to the District Court.

BANKRUPTCY—RECORD OF AS EVIDENCE—CORPORATION—ASSESSMENT BY AUTHORITY OF COURT.

1. Held, That the record as certified by the clerk was properly admitted, not only to prove the assignment, but also to show that an assessment by authority of the bankrupt court upon the stock of the bankrupt insurance company to pay losses had been made; that the certificate being of all "matters of record" touching the assessment, it was properly admitted to show that fact, although it did not purport to be a complete record of the whole proceedings.

2. ASSESSMENT—JURISDICTION.—That the court appointing the assignee has exclusive jurisdiction of the administration of the bankrupt's assets, and of their distribution among creditors; that any adjudication which it may make in the exercise of this jurisdiction is unquestionable in a collateral proceeding in another form; that the assessment in question was directed and sanctioned by the court, which has authority so to adjudge, and for and excess in it redress must be sought in that tribunal.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

MCKENNAN, Cir. J.—The first assignment of error relates to the admission in evidence of a record of proceedings in bankruptcy in the District Court for the Northern District of Illinois, against the Republic Insurance Company of Chicago, as assignee of which the defendant in error brought this suit. It was objected to on the ground that it does not purport to be a copy of the whole record, but it was admitted to show (1), an assignment to the plaintiff below, and (2), an assessment by the authority of the bankrupt court upon the stock of the bankrupt company to pay losses.

There can be no doubt of the admissibility of this record to show the assignment, because the 14th section of Bankrupt Act expressly provides, that a copy thereof, duly certified by the clerk of the court, under the seal thereof, shall be conclusive evidence of the assignee's title to sue for the bankrupt's property.

But was it properly admitted for the additional purpose for which it was offered?

The Bankrupt Act, while it enacts that the proceedings in all cases in bankruptcy shall be deemed matter of record, does not treat these proceedings as constituting an integral record, for it declares that they shall not be recorded at large, but shall be filed, kept and numbered, in the office of the clerk of the court, and copies of such record duly certified by that office, under the seal of the court, are made presumptive evidence of all the facts therein stated. It would, therefore, seem to be the intent of the act that in so far as any of these proceedings might be used as evidence, copies of them are to be authenticated as separate records, and so are competent presumptive evidence of the facts stated in them. The certificate of the clerk of the court authenticates the copies of the papers and proceedings contained in the record "as true copies of all the papers filed, proceedings had, and record and docket entries made in said case, and of the whole thereof, in any way relating to an assessment upon the stockholders of said company," etc. It is an exemplification of all "matters of record" touching the assessment and, as such, was properly admitted to show that fact.

The second assignment is founded upon the rejection of the offer to prove by the plaintiff in error, certain representations made by the agent of the Insurance Co. to him, when he made his subscription of stock, touching the establishment of a branch in Philadelphia, of which the subscriptions made there were to be the capital which was to be under the control of a local board of directors, and was to be set apart for losses in Philadelphia risks, accompanied by further proof that this local office had been withdrawn and the assurances given had not been fulfilled.

While it did not appear that any loss or injury whatever could result to the plaintiff in error from the partial nonfulfillment of these representations, it is at least questionable whether such evidence could have the effect of relieving the plaintiff in error from the payment of any part of his subscription. But in this suit it is altogether unavailable to him. Like a creditor's bill in equity, this suit is a proceeding by the constituted representative of a bankrupt corporation to collect its assets that they may be applied to the payment of its debts. The plaintiff in error is a subscriber to its stock, of which subscription he has paid only twenty per cent. The remaining eighty per cent. is part of the assets of the corporation, indispensably required for the payment of its debts, and its creditors may lawfully insist that it shall be so appropriated. Now, it is plain that the plaintiff in error cannot gainsay this right of the creditors, unless he can show such an equity as would entitle him to a preference over them, if he had paid up his stock subscription in full. But he took and held a certificate for the full amount of the stock subscribed for by him, and received dividends upon it, and upon the basis of his subscription and that of others, the company was enabled to create its indebtedness. Surely, as against those who became creditors of the corporation upon the faith and security of its stock subscriptions, his equity is subordinate and unavailing, and was rightly so treated by the court below.

The only remaining question which requires notice, relates to the legal sufficiency of the assessment upon the stockholders, which this suit was brought to recover.

By virtue of the adjudication of bankruptcy and the appointment of an assignee, not only was the control of the bankrupt corporation over its assets, of every kind, superseded, but complete domain over them was conferred upon the assignee. He alone can sue for and recover them, and whatever rights the bankrupt had in reference to their collection he can claim and enforce. He is also the representative of the creditors, for they can make the assets of their debtor available only through his agency. As Mr. Justice Dillon has well said: "However it might have been before, creditors can not, since the supervention of bankruptcy bring bills in equity, or other actions in their own names directly against the stockholders to enforce their liability with respect to their unpaid stock."

It was one of the unquestionable faculties of the bankrupt corporation to assess ratably upon its unpaid stock a sum sufficient to pay its debts, and the exercise of this power the creditors might have compelled. But by the proceedings in bankruptcy, the power of the directors and the direct remedies of the creditors, in reference to the assets of the corporation, were superseded and the assignee was constituted the representative of both these interests. In the exercise of all his functions in this twofold character, he is subject to the control and direction of the court in which the bankruptcy proceedings were instituted. It has exclusive jurisdiction of the administration of the bankrupt's assets, and of their distribution among creditors. Any adjudication which it may make in the exercise of this jurisdiction is unquestionable in a collateral proceeding in another forum. The assessment in question was directed and sanctioned by the court, which has authority so to adjudge, and for any excess in it redress must be sought in that tribunal.

The record then shows a valid assessment upon the stockholders of the bankrupt, and the instruction given to the jury, in reference to it and to the right of the plaintiff below to recover, was correct.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

U. S. CIR. COURT, E. D. OF WIS.

OPINION SEPT. 1875.

WILLIAM S. WARNER v. AARON H. CRONKHITE.

BANKRUPTCY—DEBT CREATED BY FRAUD—JUDGMENT—MERGER—AGREEMENT NOT TO ARREST.

1. DEBT CREATED BY FRAUD is not discharged in bankruptcy even though reduced to a simple judgment for money in which there is no mention of fraud; if the original action was based upon fraud, the fraud is not merged in the judgment.

2. EFFECT OF AGREEMENT NOT TO ARREST.—A stipulation between the parties, after the judgment, by which the plaintiff waived his right to execution against the body of defendant, does not affect this question of discharge.

3. MASSACHUSETTS INSOLVENT LAW, and many cases, commented on and distinguished.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.

This action comes into this court by removal from the Circuit Court of Ontagamie county.

The complaint sets forth the following state of facts: That on the 11th June, 1859, the plaintiff brought an action against the defendant in the Circuit Court of Ontagamie county to recover damages claimed to have been sustained by the plaintiff, by reason of alleged frauds practiced by defendant upon plaintiff in the sale of certain lands; that the action and the right of the plaintiff to recover therein were founded solely upon the said frauds; that issue was joined in that action by the parties thereto, trial by jury had, and verdict and judgment were rendered in favor of plaintiff against defendant, for $1258 87, damages and costs; that this judgment has never been appealed from, reversed or set aside, and has not been paid.

The complaint then alleges, that after the rendition of this judgment, the defendant procured from the U. S. District court for the Eastern District of Missouri, his discharge in bankruptcy, and that the defendant claims that by this discharge his liability to the plaintiff, upon the debt represented by the judgment, is discharged. The complaint next alleges, that the debt represented by the judgment was created solely by the fraud of the judgment debtor, and that the debt is not cancelled by the discharge in bankruptcy; and closes with the allegation that this action was commenced upon such judgment by leave of the Circuit Court of Ontagamie county, and judgment is demanded for the amount alleged to be due upon said former judgment, with interest.

The defendant answers this complaint and says, that after the rendition of the judgment mentioned in the complaint, the parties to that judgment entered into a written stipulation, by which the plaintiff waived his right to an execution against the body of defendant upon the judgment, and expressly agreed that no execution should ever be issued against the body of the defendant in that action; and by which stipulation the defendant, on his part, waived all errors in entering said judgment and in all orders prior to the entry thereof, and further agreed that he would not take any appeal from the judgment or any of said orders. It was further stipulated between the parties, that said judgment should be and remain in all respects binding upon the real and personal property of the defendant, and that no other or further right of the plaintiff than that of execution against defendant's body, was relinquished by the stipulation.

To this answer the plaintiff interposed a demurrer, and the question is, does the stipulation set forth in the answer, constitute a defense to this action?

Annexed to the complaint, is a certified copy of the judgment record in the original action, from which it appears that that action was founded upon certain alleged false and fraudulent representations made by defendant to plaintiff in an exchange of property between the parties. The gravamen of the complaint in that action, and the gist of the action was fraud. The judgment rendered was in terms and form a simple money judgment, no reference to the ground of action being mentioned therein.

DYER, J.—Sec. 33 of the Bankrupt Act provides, "that no debt created by the fraud or embezzlement of the bankrupt, or by his defalcation as a public officer, or while acting in any fiduciary character, shall be discharged under this act; but the debt may be proved, and the dividend thereon shall be a payment on account of said debt." It is claimed by the plaintiff that the ground of the action in which the judgment now sued on was rendered being fraud, the debt was not discharged by the bankruptcy proceedings, and that the stipulation in question did not extract from the judgment which at the time of the bankrupt's discharge represented the debt, the element of fraud upon which it was originally founded. It is claimed by defendant's counsel that the original debt or claim was merged in the judgment; that to show the alleged fraud, within the meaning of Sec. 33 of the Bankrupt Act, so as to make the debt in this case one from which the defendant was not discharged by the bankruptcy proceedings, it must be disclosed by the judgment itself; that it was necessarily based upon the fraud, and that in any event, the stipulation made by the parties gave to the judgment the character of a mere contract debt, which was discharged by the debtor's discharge in bankruptcy.

When the original action between these parties was commenced, and when the judgment here sued upon was rendered, there was no statute in force in this State authorizing an arrest of a defendant or an execution against his body in a case where fraud in contracting a debt or incurring an obligation was the sole ground of action. It was not until 1868 that a statute was enacted, authorizing an arrest in such a case. So that, although the parties seem by their stipulation to have supposed that the right to an execution against the body in that action then existed, in fact it did not exist. This being so, that stipulation becomes insufficient as a defense to this action, if the action itself can be maintained. For it is apparent, that the plaintiff's demurrer to the defendant's answer reaches back to the question whether the original demand, debt or judgment was discharged by the defendant's discharge in bankruptcy, and consequently, whether this action will lie. There is some conflict of authority upon the question, as to whether the recovery of a judgment upon a debt fraudulently contracted merges the original cause of action, so as to relieve from liability to arrest, even where there is a statute authorizing arrests in civil actions founded upon fraud. In the case of McButt v. Hirsch, 4 Abbott, 441, it was held, that in an action upon a judgment recovered upon a debt fraudulently contracted, the defendant was not liable to arrest on the ground of fraud in the original debt, and that the original cause of action was merged in the judgment recovered upon it. It will be observed here, that the point was not, whether an execution could be issued upon the judgment, against the body of the defendant, but the question was, whether, in a new action upon the judgment, the defendant could be arrested because of the fraud in the original debt; and in this state of the case the principle above stated was applied.

In the case of Mallory v. Leach, reported in note, 14 Abb., 449, there was a similar decision of the question. A judgment was recovered in an action for fraud. Another action was brought upon that judgment, and it was held that this second action was upon contract, and not for fraud, and the defendant could not, therefore, be arrested.

I have referred particularly to these two cases, because they as strongly affirm the principle of merger as any I find. The case at bar must be distinguished from those cases. We do not have here an action upon the judgment with an accompanying proceeding to procure an arrest, on the ground that the original cause of action upon which the judgment sued on was recovered, sprung from the defendant's fraud. The question here is, whether the original cause of action was so merged in the judgment, and the original fraud so extinguished by the judgment, that it must now be held a debt which was discharged by the defendant's discharge in bankruptcy.

Judge Blatchford, in the case of Patterson 1, N. B. R., 308, after stating that the point involved was, whether the debt in that case was one excepted by sec. 33 of the Bankrupt act from the operation of a discharge, says: "It is claimed by the bankrupt that the debt being in the shape of a judgment, this court cannot, in applying the 33d section, go behind the judgment to see whether the claim on which the judgment was recovered, was created by fraud; that the judgment which is now the only debt, was created by the claim, and not by the fraud, and that though the judgment was created by the claim, and the claim by the fraud, yet the judgment was not created by the fraud. This view is unsound. Wherever the debt, no matter whether it be in the shape of a judgment or in any other form, was created by fraud, had its root and origin in fraud, then it is not to be discharged. To hold that the recovery of a judgment, in an action where the gravamen of the complaint is fraud, condones that very fraud by so merging the original claim that the judgment cannot be said to be a debt created by the fraud set out in the complaint as the ground for recovering the judgment, would fritter away entirely the good sense and plain intention of the 33d section."

The same principle is recognized and applied by Judge Lowell, in re Whitehouse, 4 N. B. R., 63, and I think that the conclusions arrived at in these cases are sound, when applied to a case in which it appears by the record that the original demand or cause of action sprung from fraud. Now, in the case at bar, what does the record show? The complaint in the action in which the judgment sued on was rendered, shows a cause of action springing exclusively from alleged fraudulent representations in an exchange of property. It was not an action upon contract with immaterial allegations of fraud, but it was an action grounded solely upon the fraud. The summons in the action was not upon a liquidated money demand, but in terms demanded relief as it should in an action to recover unliquidated damages. The issue joined between the parties was upon the question of fraud as appears by the complaint and answer. There was a trial by jury and an assessment of damages, and a judgment upon the issue of fact involved was entered on the verdict. Was it necessary that the judgment on its face should show that the ground of the action, or that the origin of the plaintiff's demand was fraud, in order to make it a case of a debt or demand created by fraud not dischargeable under the bankrupt law? I cannot think so. As the record of the action shows a material and traversable allegation of fraud as its sole foundation, the debt or demand may fairly be said to be one founded in fraud, and the action to be one founded upon a debt or claim from which the bankrupt's discharge would not release him." In re Whitehouse, 4 N. B. R., 64. The distinction must not be ignored between the question as it presents itself in the case at bar, and as it would be presented in a case where the allegations of fraud in the original action were incidental and immaterial, or in a case of an attempted remedy against the person of the defendant in an action on the judgment. Upon the record, it would seem that had there been no fraud there could have been no claim, and had there been no fraud, and consequently no claim, there would have been no judgment. Accepting the record as evidence of the character of the original cause of action, the debt in this instance, though now represented by a judgment, was created by fraud, and so excepted by the bankrupt act from the operation of a discharge.

Shuman v. Strauss, 52 N. Y., 404, is cited by defendant's counsel. But that was an action for the recovery of money only, and the summons was in the form prescribed by subdivision one of the section of the Code relating to the form of the summons, which subdivision has reference to actions upon liquidated demands. It was held in such a case that upon the non-appearance of the defendant, judgment being perfected upon an assessment of damages by the clerk, the defendant is not concluded by the allegations of fraud in the complaint; but that the plaintiff's right of action for, or remedy under the statutes by reason of the fraud, is merged in the judgment. The court, after speaking approvingly as I understand their decision, of the doctrine laid down in the case of Patterson, 1 N. B. R., 308, and some other similar cases, say that they come far short of the claim of the plaintiff in the case then decided, and a mere statement of the character of that case, as already given, makes the correctness of that observation of the court, obvious.

Wood v. Henry, 40 N. Y., 124, is also cited.

In that case the defendants, as commission merchants, received certain property for sale from the plaintiff. They sold the property but did not account for the proceeds. These facts were alleged in the complaint, and so it appeared that the defendants acted in a fiduciary character. Judgment was taken by default. No order of arrest had been obtained during the pendency of the action, and the question was whether an execution upon the judgment could be issued against the persons of the defendants. A majority of the court held that the allegations of the fiduciary character of the defendants were not traversable, and that no execution could issue against the person upon the judgment, because the cause of action did not necessarily import liability to arrest, the cause of action and cause of arrest not being identical. In other words, upon trial, proof of the fiduciary relation was not indispensable to recovery. Here is a plain distinction between that case and this at bar; for here there could have been no recovery without proof of the alleged fraud, for the fraud was the entire basis of the action. It was, in short, the sole cause of action. Prouty v. Smith, 51 N. Y., 594, is in character and principle like Wood v. Henry, while Roberts v. Prosser, 53 N. Y. 260, enforces the principle applied in the case at bar as distinguished from the other cases cited. I do not think Bangs v. Watson, 9 Gray, 211, is applicable to the question we have here. The original cause of action in that case arose upon contract. Judgment was recovered, and it was held that there was a merger of the original indebtedness in the judgment, and that the judgment did not, within the provisions of the insolvent law of Massachusetts, constitute a claim for necessaries not dischargeable under the act, although the original demand was for necessaries. The language of that act was: "No discharge of a debtor shall bar any claim for necessaries furnished to such debtor." The language of the 33rd section of the bankrupt law is: "No debt created by fraud shall be discharged under this act." The Massachusetts statute specifies the claim in the form in which it exists at the time of insolvency proceedings. It must, then, to be excepted from the operation of a discharge, be in the form of a claim for necessaries, and it is not in such form when in judgment. The language of the bankrupt act requires an inquiry into the origin, the creation of the debt, and if created by fraud, it is not to be held discharged. In the case of Palmer v. Preston, 45 Verm., 156, cited by defendant's counsel, the action was upon contract. Fraudulent representations had been made to procure a certain indorsement, but the fraud was not the foundation of the judgment recovered. The judgment was held to be discharged by the bankruptcy proceedings, and not to be within the exception of the 33rd section of the bankrupt act, because the debt in question was created by contract, and as the debt had been treated as a demand so created, it was held that the fraud was waived. The case is, therefore, inapplicable to that under consideration.

The demurrer to defendant's answer must be sustained.

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

OPINION FILED OCT. 6, 1875.

THE CHARTER OF THE CITY OF CHICAGO—ACT OF 1872.

1. MINORITY REPRESENTATION.—That under the act of 1872 no formal submission of the question of minority representation was necessary.
2. NOTICE OF ELECTION.—That it was not a fatal objection that the notice of the election did not mention the polling places.
3. CHANGING THE POLLING PLACES.—That the common council had the lawful authority to change the polling places.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

STATEMENT OF THE CASE.

On the 10th day of April, 1872, the General Assembly of this State passed an act entitled, "An act to provide for the incorporation of cities and villages." (Revised Statutes 1874, p. 211.)

By the first section of this act it was provided that whenever one-eighth of the legal voters of any city, voting at the last preceding municipal election, should petition the mayor and council to submit to a vote of the electors of the city, the question of becoming incorporated under said act, it should be the duty of the mayor and council to submit such question.

The 53d section of the same act provided that whenever said act should be submitted to a vote of the electors there should be submitted at the same time for adoption or rejection, the question of minority representation in the city council.

On the 4th of January, 1875, the common council of the city of Chicago, having received a petition signed by the requisite number of voters, passed a resolution appointing the 23d of April, 1875, as the day for holding such election, and by said resolution submitted the question of becoming incorporated under said act, without providing for the submission of the question of minority representation. It was further provided in said resolution that the polling places should be the same as at the election of State and county officers, held in said city on the 3d day of November, 1874.

On the 20th of March, 1875, a notice was given, by publication in a Chicago newspaper, that an election would be held on the 23d day of April, 1875, as to whether the city should become incorporated under said act.

The notice gave no information as to the places where the election was to be held, and contained nothing in regard to the question of minority representation.

On the 16th of April, 1875, the common council passed another resolution fixing other places for holding said election, than those specified in the resolution of the 4th of January above named.

Under the resolution of Jan. 4, there would have been ninety-two polling places, while under the resolution of April 16th there were but twenty; one in each ward in the city; there being twenty wards.

An election was held on the 23d of April, 1875, the result of which, as declared by the common council upon a canvass of the votes, was the adoption of the act of 1872 as the city charter.

This result was announced on the 3d of May, 1875, and from that date the city claimed to be incorporated under said act.

On the 14th of May, 1875, there was filed an information in the nature of a quo warranto against the city of Chicago, asking that the city be required to answer by what warrant it claimed to use and enjoy the franchises conferred by said act of 1872.

The court below sustained demurrers to several pleas of the defendant, and gave a judgment of "ouster." From that judgment the city brings this appeal.

Opinion of the Court, by SHELDON, J.

In view of the statement made by the counsel for the appellee, that the fifth plea sets up all the facts presented in the other pleas, and on which depends the validity of this election, and that for the purpose of deciding the substantial questions presented by this record, it will only be necessary for the court to direct its attention to this plea, and as the opposing counsel state that if the fifth plea be a good one, it disposes of the case, we shall confine ourselves to the question raised and discussed under the fifth plea, to which a general demurrer was sustained. This plea sets forth in detail all the steps which were taken about the submission of the question of incorporation here involved, and, owing to its great length, we will omit to give the plea in full, deeming it unnecessary to do so for the purpose in hand.

It is insisted, on the part of the relators, that the election as set forth in this fifth plea was invalid on three different grounds, all of which appear in the plea.

First—The act of 1872 required the question of "minority representation" to be submitted to the popular vote at the same time with the question of the adoption of the new charter, and that this was not done.

Second—The notice of the election as set forth in the plea was fatally defective, in not stating the places where the election was to be held, and the two questions upon which the vote was to be taken.

Third—The resolution of the common council of the 4th of January, 1875, directing that the polling places should be the same as at the election of State and county officers, held on the 3rd day of November, 1874, in said city of Chicago, was, as to this provision, rescinded by a resolution of the council passed April 16, 1875, by which other and different polling places were fixed, and this was done only seven days prior to the day of election. which was held at the polling places fixed by the resolution of April 16. The first two sections of the act under consideration are as follows:

"Be it enacted, etc. First. That any city now existing in this State may become incorporated under this act in manner following: Whenever one-eighth of the legal voters of such city voting at the last preceding municipal election shall petition the mayor and council thereof to submit the question as to whether such city shall become incorporated under this act, to a vote of the electors in such city, it shall be the duty of such mayor and council to submit such question accordingly, and to appoint a time and place or places, at which such vote may be taken, and to designate the persons who shall act as judges at such election; but such question shall not be submitted oftener than once in four years.

Second—The mayor of such city shall give at least thirty days' notice of such election, by publishing a notice thereof in one or more newspapers within such city; but if no newspaper is published therein, then by posting at least five copies of such notice in each ward."

Article 4 of the act headed "Elections" in section 53 provides:

"Whenever this act shall be submitted to the qualified electors of any city for adoption, there shall be submitted at the same time for adoption or rejection, the question of minority representation in the city council or legislative authority of such city. At the said election the ballots shall be in the following form: 'For minority representation in the city council,' or 'against minority representation in the city council.'"

Then follow in the same section provisions for subsequent submissions, in case the first vote is against the propositions, and provisions as to the canvass of the votes and the effect of adopting minority representation.

As respects the first of the foregoing reasons for holding the election invalid, that there was a failure to submit the question of minority representation, it is contended that that particular question should have been submitted by the passage of an ordinance by the city council, directing its submission, and by a notice given by the mayor, stating the fact of such submission. Certainly, the statute does not expressly require this. It is silent as to by whom, or how, the question of minority representation shall be submitted. The language, "There shall be submitted at the same time for adoption or rejection the question of minority representation," etc. What the need of an ordinance directing that there shall be submitted such question when the statute itself says there shall be a submission of it? It would be superfluous for the mayor and council to appoint a time and place at which a vote should be taken on the question of minority representation distinctly, because, when they had appointed a time and place for the vote upon the question of incorporation under the act, there was then already fixed a time and place for voting upon the question of minority representation, namely, the same time and place with the vote upon incorporation so expressly fixed by the act itself. There was, moreover, the action of the city council upon the question of minority representation recognizing and virtually declaring its submission. The plea avers that on the 19th day of April, 1875, the common council adopted and spread upon its records a resolution directing the city clerk to cause to be printed one hundred thousand ballots with the words, "For minority representation in the city council," and one hundred thousand ballots with the words "Against minority representation in the city council," printed on the ballots, and to see that the same were properly distributed among the wards and delivered to the judges of election on the 23d of April, 1875, and that in pursuance of the resolution the ballots were so printed and distributed, and were, in fact, distributed among the voters before and at the election, and that said proceedings of the common council, embracing a copy of the resolution, were published in the corporation newspaper of the city on the 21st day of April, 1875; that the voters at such election did vote upon the question of minority representation; that returns of such votes were made, and the result as declared by the common council upon a canvass of such votes, was that a majority of the votes cast at such election on that subject were against minority representation in the city council. We must think that the electors rightfully voted upon this question; that their vote upon it was a valid one, although there had been no formal submission of the question by the common council—that the act authorized such vote.

We are of opinion then, that the question of minority representation should be regarded as having been submitted to the popular vote at the same time with the question of the adoption of the new charter. We arrive at this conclusion with the less reluctance from the fact that the submission is not a finality; the statute providing that at any subsequent time, not more than once in two years, the question of minority representation shall be submitted to the popular vote on the requisite petition.

As to the second ground, that of defective notice of the election, the notice was as follows:

"ELECTION NOTICE.

"MAYOR'S OFFICE, CITY OF CHICAGO, March 20, 1875.—Notice is hereby given that on the (23) twenty-third day of April, 1875, an election will be held in the city of Chicago, at which said election the question will be submitted to be voted upon by the legal voters of said city, as to whether said city shall become incorporated under an act of the general assembly, entitled 'An act to provide for the incorporation of cities and villages,' approved April 10, 1872.

"H. D. COLVIN, Mayor."

The alleged defect in the notice is in not stating the place where the election was to be held, and the two questions upon which the vote was to be taken.

The first section of the act provides that the mayor and common council shall submit the question of becoming incorporated under the act, and appoint a time and place or places at which the vote may be taken. The second section as to notice, provides that the mayor shall give at least thirty days' notice of such election by publishing a notice thereof in one or more newspapers within the city. There is no express requirement that the notice should state the places where the election is to be held, or that the question of minority representation was to be voted upon, but only that thirty days' notice shall be given "of such election by publishing a notice thereof," that is, of an election, as to whether the city shall become incorporated under the act.

According to the averment of the plea, the common council, in pursuance of the first section of the act, did, in the same resolution by which they submitted the question of incorporation, appoint the time and places of the election, and such resolution was, on the 6th day of January, 1875, published in a daily newspaper in Chicago, the corporation newspaper, in which it was required by law that the proceedings of the common council should be published.

Had any electors wished to ascertain the places of election, beyond what the notice informed him, the means of knowledge were at hand by recurring to the records of the common council, the body whose duty it was to appoint the places, as the law informed him.

An analogous case with the present is that of The Chicago and Iowa Railroad Company v. Pinkerton, decided at the September term, 1873, of this court, which was the case of an election by a town, as to whether it would make a donation to the railroad company of $75,000 in bonds. The statute required that the petition for the election should state the amount of the bonds, the rate of interest they were to bear, and the time when the bonds should be payable, and that notice should be given of the election, "stating fully in the notice the object of the election." The notice said nothing about the length of time the bonds should run or the rate of interest they should bear. The petition filed with the town clerk complied with the requirement of the statute. The notice stated that a petition had been filed in the town clerk's office for an election as to whether the town would make a donation to the company of $75,000 in bonds. An objection to the validity of the election because the notice was insufficient in the particulars above named, it was held that the petition on file in the clerk's office afforded information how long the bonds were to run and their rate of interest, and that the notice in connection with the petition was sufficient.

So here, the notice given in connection with the resolution of the common council fixing the polling places, we are of opinion sufficiently fulfilled the requirement of giving "notice of such election," although the notice itself did not state the places where the election was to be held. Any elector wishing information upon that subject was referred by the law to a source of information—the record of the proceedings of the common council. Electors must be supposed to have knowledge of such a public law, and one notified as about to be submitted to their action for approval or rejection. Viely v. Thompson, 44 Ill., 9, and Harding v. R. R. Co., 65 id., 90, are referred to as cases where this court has held special elections to be void when held without the required notice. We regard these cases as quite distinguishable from the one under consideration. The one was an election as to levying a county tax, the other an election as to a subscription by a county to the capital stock for a railroad company. In both cases the statute required notice for a specified number of days to be given of the election. The notices given were not for the required length of time, and the elections were held invalid on that account. There was there a violation of an express statutory requirement. Here, as has been stated, there was no violation of any express requirement of the statute.

The places only, and not the time of holding the election are here involved. The place of holding an election would seem to be one of the least important of the things pertaining to the notice, especially when the place is not to be fixed by the notice, but is fixed by public authority, as in this case by the legislative body of the city.

Previous notice of the time may be important to enable the voter to arrange beforehand with a view thereto. Notice for the full prescribed length of time may be essential, to afford opportunity for information and consideration, in order to enable the voter to vote intelligently.

But it would not seem to subserve any important end that the voter should have previous notice for any length of time of the place for holding the election. There was here a polling place appointed in each elector's ward. Had an elector, on the morning of election day, been desirous of voting, but did not know the place of the election, he obviously might have ascertained it at once, without difficulty, upon inquiring; and it is not perceived wherein he was subject to be prejudicially affected by the want of a previous knowledge of the place where the election was to be held. As to the notice not stating that minority representation would be submitted to be voted upon, there is, as before remarked, no express requirement of the statute that the notice should so state. The act, as we hold, by its own force, authorizing a vote upon the question of minority representation, without the formal submission of it hy the common council, and the act also fixing the time and place of the vote upon the question, viz: the time and place of voting upon the question of becoming incorporated under the act, the election upon the question of minority representation might be legally holden, we think, without notice having been given of it. The electors may be well presumed to know when an election, fixed by law at a certain time and place, is to be held. The case in this respect of the question of minority representation, we are of opinion, falls within the general rule laid down in Dillon on Corporations, Sec. Ed., 316. Elections fixed by law at a certain time and place, may be legally holden although notice has not been published or given, but if the time be not defined by statute and is to be fixed by notice, the notice required is imperative, and see Cooley, Const. Lim., 603; The People v. Cowles, 13 New York, 350; The People v. Hartwell, 12 Michigan, 508; Foster v. Scarff, 15 Ohio St., 532; State v. Goetz, 22 Wisconsin, 363.

So soon as the time and place were appointed of the election on the question of becoming incorporated, then the time and place for the voting upon the question of minority representation was fixed by law as at the same time and place with the former. Notice of such former election taken with the law would serve as notice of the election upon the question of minority representation.

The third ground of objection to the validity of the election is the change made by the common council April 16, 1875, in the places of holding the election. The plea avers that on that day the common council had definitely ascertained that several of the places at which the vote was taken at the November election, 1874, could not be procured for such purpose for the election to be held on the 23d day of April, 1875, and that thereupon the common council passed a preamble and resolution declaring the ascertainment of such fact, and did thereby fix as the places where the election should be held, one place in each ward of the city, nine or more of which places were the same ones fixed by the first named resolution of Jan. 4, 1875, and the remainder were in the vicinity of the polling places of such wards as fixed by said resolution of Jan. 4, 1875, and that such preamble and resolution were published in the corporation newspaper on the 18th of April, 1875, and that the places at which the elections was to be held were before the 23rd day of April, 1875, generally known to the voters of the city.

This change in the polling places was made by the lawful authority, the common council, and the election was held at the places last fixed. To be sure, there was not thirty days' notice given that the election would be held at these places, but there was thirty days' notice of the time of the election. It must be admitted that there may be cases where a notified place of holding an election may be properly changed without notice thereof; as, for instance, where a building designated for such purpose should be destroyed by fire.

There is reason to believe, from the circumstances, that the places at which the election was held were generally known to the voters of the city before the day of election.

It is not seen wherein the change made was calculated to produce any injurious effects, and we are of opinion that it should not, under the circumstances, be held a sufficient ground to invalidate the election.

Appellee has assigned cross-errors on the ruling of the court below in sustaining demurrers to certain replications to the third amended plea. But as application was made to the court below, by the defendant, after the filing of the fifth plea, for leave to withdraw the third plea, which was refused, and as appellant's counsel state in their brief that they do not desire to rely upon this plea, and are content that it shall be treated as abandoned, we shall regard it as not in the record, and not consider the cross errors. The defendant had the right to withdraw the plea, and the court should have granted leave to do so.

Being of the opinion the demurrer was improperly sustained to the fifth plea, the judgment will be reversed and the cause remanded.

Judgment reversed.

THROUGH the kindness of JOSIAH H. BISSELL, of the Chicago bar, we have received the following opinion:

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

OPINION FILED JUNE 16, 1875.

FREDK. SCHWEIZER, impl'd, etc. v. JAMES M. TRACY.

Appeal from Champaign county.

SALE—FRAUDULENT REPRESENTATIONS—RIGHTS OF ATTACHING CREDITORS.

1. SALE—FRAUDULENT REPRESENTATIONS—Under the evidence in this case the court finds that the representations as to the value of the Urbana stock, and the amount of the indebtedness thereon were false and fraudulent, and that the goods were sold upon the faith of these representations, and that no valid title passed to the purchaser, but that the purchase was voidable at the option of the vendors, on the ground of fraud in the making of it, whilst the property remained in the hands of the vendee.

2. RIGHTS OF ATTACHING CREDITOR.—Held, that the vendors discovering the fraud, might, while the goods remained in the hands of the fraudulent vendee, replevy them, but had the vendee, before the reclaiming of the goods by the vendors, sold them to an innocent purchaser for value under the decisions of the Supreme Court, the purchaser would have acquired a valid title to the goods: that an attaching creditor could attach nothing but the interest of the debtor and fraudulent vendee in the property seized, he had not an absolute title, but only a voidable one, subject to be avoided by the defrauded vendors, the same right of avoidance of the fraudulent purchase which they had against the fraudulent vendee himself existed against his attaching creditors.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

SHELDON, J.

This was a suit upon a replevin bond which had been given by appellant as surety, and Mack, Stadler & Co. as principals, in an action of replevin commenced by the latter in the Circuit Court of Champaigne county on the 22nd day of October, 1872, to rocover a lot of merchandise previously sold by them and then in the possession of the sheriff of said county, taken under a writ of attachment against the vendee of the goods from Mack, Stadler & Co., sued out Oct. 18th, 1872.

Mack, Stadler & Co. having been nonsuited in their action, a return of the property replevied awarded and failure therein, this suit was brought against the principals and surety in the replevin bond. No service, however, was had upon Mack, Stadler & Co., nor did they enter their appearance.

Appellant pleaded, in substance, to the declaration under the statute in that behalf, that the merits of the suit in replevin were not determined in that suit, and that at the time of the commencement thereof, and now, Mack, Stadler & Co. were, and are the absolute owners of the goods replevied and entitled to the possession of the same.

Upon replication filed traversing the fact of such ownership and right of possession issue was joined, and upon trial by the court, without a jury, it was found in favor of the plaintiff below, and judgment rendered for $1198.58 damages, from which defendants appealed.

It is first objected that the court below erred in admitting in evidence, against the objection of the defendant, the deposition of Isaac H. Mack of the firm of Mack, Stadler & Co., which had been taken in the replevin suit. Upon perusal of the deposition we do not discover in it anything of such injurious effect to the appellant as should cause a reversal of the judgment, even were the deposition improperly admitted in evidence. We will not, therefore, stop to discuss the question of its admissibility.

It is further assigned for error, that the finding of the court below is contrary to the law and evidence.

The record discloses that Mack, Stadler & Co, were wholesale dealers in clothing in the city of Cincinnati; that one C. K. Weil, doing business in the town of Urbana, in this State, in the name of his father-in-law, Moses Black, purchased at the store of Mack, Stadler & Co., on the 6th of September, 1872, the goods which were afterwards replevied, in value about $1900, on credit, stating to them that the stock which he then had on hand at Urbana amounted in value to about $4800; that he had a considerable amount of outstanding debts due him; that he did not owe to exceed $500, and this in Louisville, and that he owed nothing anywhere else. The fact was that Weil was, at the time, indebted in about the sum of $5,000 to a merchant in Chicago, for merchandise sold to him prior to the purchase from Mack, Stadler & Co., some of which indebtedness had become due, and the inability to obtain further credit there had induced him to resort to the Cincinnati market for the purpose of getting goods on credit.

We have no doubt, from the evidence, that the representations as to the value of the Urbana stock and the amount of the indebtedness thereon, were false and fraudulent, and that the goods were sold upon the faith of these representations, and that no valid title passed to the purchaser, but that the purchase was voidable at the option of the vendors, on the ground of fraud in the making of it, whilst the property remained in the hands of the vendee. The point is made by appellee that Weil was doing business in the name of Black, and so known by Mack, Stadler & Co., and that they shipped the goods in the name of Black, and that these circumstances should, in some way, disentitle Mack, Stadler & Co. to question the validity of the purchase from them.

Whether Weil was acting either for himself or as agent for Black is immaterial. In either case the effect upon the sale, of the fraud and false representations would be the same, it being manifest that the goods were not parted with because of the credit given to either Weil or Black, but because of the representations of the value of the Urbana stock and the amount of the indebtedness thereon. But it is supposed that there was fraud here on the part of Mack, Stadler & Co. in assisting Weil to perpetrate a fraud upon the community, which should debar their rights to avoid the sale

The matter of the use of Black's name by Weil in the manner it was, was understood by the Chicago creditors as well as by Mack, Stadler & Co. It was not shown how any one was defrauded or likely to be so by the conduct of Mack, Stadler & Co. They simply knew that Weil was carrying on business in the name of Black, and bought and requested the goods to be shipped in the name of the latter, that Weil was owing some $500, and perhaps that Black was insolvent. We discover nothing in this which should deprive Mack, Stadler & Co. of redress for a fraud practiced upon them in the purchase of the goods.

Coming, then, to the conclusion that we do, that Mack, Stadler & Co. discovered the fraud practiced upon them whilst the goods remained in the hands of the fraudulent vendee, and replevied them, they could have successfully maintained their action. The question is presented whether the attaching creditor here, or the sheriff, by virtue of his writ of attachment, acquired any other or greater title than the fraudulent vendee possessed. Had the vendee, before the reclaiming of the goods by Mack, Stadler & Co., sold them to an innocent purchaser for value, no doubt, under the decision of this court, the purchaser would have acquired a valid title to the goods. Jennings v. Guy et al., 13 Ill., 610; M. C. R. R. Co. v. Phillips et al., 60 Ill., 190; Young et al. v. Bradley et al., decided at the September term, 1873.

The case of Burnell v. Robertson, 5 Gilm., 282, is cited as sustaining the doctrine that an attaching creditor stands in the light of a purchaser, and is to be protected as such. That was a case where the debtor had title to the property, and the controversy was between a prior purchaser from the debtor who had not obtained possession of the property, and a subsequent attaching creditor; and in reference to such a state of facts the court say: "In case of two sales of personal property, both equally valid, his is the better right who first gets possession of the property, and the attaching creditor stands in the light of a purchaser, and is to be protected as such." That is, the attaching creditor stands in the light of a purchaser, not necessarily as against the world, but as against another purchaser, the creditor having, by virtue of his attachment, first obtained possession of the property; thus acknowledging the common doctrine respecting the sale of personal property that a sale without possession is void as against subsequent purchasers and creditors. This is the full import of that decision. But in the case at bar the only title of the debtor is one acquired by fraud and false representations and voidable at the option of the vendors. The general expression used in the case cited is to be understood with reference to the facts of that case, and is not authority in support of the view that an attaching creditor under the circumstances of such a case as the present stands in the same position as an innocent purchaser for value. In Martin v. Dryden et al., 1 Gilm., 188, where there had been a sale and conveyance of real estate, but the deed not recorded, this court held that an attaching creditor without notice of the prior deed would hold the land as against the prior purchaser. But that was under our recording act containing the provision that all deeds and title papers shall take effect and be in force from and after the time of filing the same for record and not before, as to all creditors and subsequent purchasers without notice; and as to them all such deeds and title papers shall be adjudged void, until the same shall be filed for record in the county where the land may lie. Gale's Statute, 664, § 5.

In the cases above cited the attachments were sustained against prior purchaser in obedience to plain rules of law. In the first case the rule of the common law made the prior sale of the goods without the delivery of possession void as against creditors. In the second case a statutory enactment declared the prior deed void as to creditors until it was recorded. But in the case before us the attaching creditor has no such plain rule of law to invoke in his behalf. He can cite the doctrine that where personal property has been obtained by means of a fraudulent purchase, a bona fide purchaser thereof from the fraudulent vendee for a valuable consideration, without notice, will acquire a good title. But that does not embrace the case of a mere attaching creditor. He cannot be regarded as such a purchaser, or be viewed like a mortgagee, who is considered a quasi purchaser. The claim of an attaching creditor to protection is not of equal strength with that of a bona fide purchaser for a valuable consideration. He parts with nothing in exchange for the property, nor does he take it in satisfaction of any precedent debt. The property is merely seized for the purpose of having it afterward so appropriated. The attaching creditor by means of his attachment obtains but a lien. It is a well settled rule, certainly of equity, that the general assignees of a bankrupt take his estate subject to every equitable claim which exists against it by third persons; and so it is with judgment creditors, as respects the lien of their judgment. Ex parte Howe, 1 Paige, 125. As to such assignees the Supreme Court of the United States say: "In cases like this the assignee stands in place of the bankrupt; his rights are their rights, and theirs, like the lien of judgment at law, are subordinate to all prior liens legal and equitable, upon the property in question. Gibson v. Wharden, 14 Wallace, 249. In Tousley v. Tousley, 5 Ohio St., 78, it is held that a judgment creditor is not a purchaser nor entitled to the privileges of that position. It is there said: "So far as the statute goes in giving him (a judgment creditor) a preference over mortgages not perfected by delivery to the recorder, his rights are absolute, but for everything else, he is remitted to general principles; and upon general principles it is very clear that he acquires a lien only on the interest of his debtor, and is bound to yield to every claim that could be successfully asserted against him. See also Drake on Attachment, § 220; Nathan v. Giles, 5 Taunt., 558. The only difference as effects the present question between the lien of a judgment and one acquired by attachment is, that one is general and the other is specific. We are unable to see that this distinction should change the rule in its application to a case like the present. Nothing was here attached but the interest of the debtor, and fraudulent vendee in the property seized. He had not an absolute title, but only a voidable one, subject to be avoided by the defrauded vendors. The same right of avoidance of the fraudulent purchase which they had against the fraudulent vendee himself, we are of opinion existed against his attaching creditors. Had he made an assignment of the property for the benefit of these attaching creditors, the assignee would have taken only such interest as the assignor had in the property — his voidable interest. We can not see upon what principle the creditors could require any greater interest by the levy of an attachment to secure the payment of their claims than they would have done by a voluntary conveyance made by the debtor himself for the same purpose.

It is the general rule that a better title is not obtainable from anyone than he possesses.

But the levying of an attachment comes within none of the recognized exceptional instances, where one can acquire from another a greater interest in property than such other himself possesses. We perceive no laches on the part of the vendors in the exercise of their right of avoiding the sale. It follows then that the right of possession and property in the goods was in Mack, Stadler & Co; that their suit of replevin was rightly brought, and that there is no liability upon the replevin bond for the non-return of the property replevied. The finding and the judgment of the court below being manifestly against the evidence the judgment is reversed.

Judgment reversed.

LIV. NEW HAMPSHIRE.

WE are indebted to Hon. JOHN M. SHIRLEY, Official Reporter, for advance sheets of the 54th New Hampshire Reports, from which we take the following head-notes:

A person who would justify his acts as a public officer, must show that he is such an officer de jure.—(Opinion by FOSTER, J.)—Roberts v. Holmes, p. 560.

A collector of taxes, deriving his authority from the appointment of selectmen de facto, is an officer de jure.

This court has power to allow the amendment of town records conformably to the fact.

CONTRACT — DISCLOSED AND UNDISCLOSED PRINCIPALS—AGENT.

Where a principal carries on business in the name of his agent as a business name, the principal is liable upon a contract made by his agent for him in the agent's name, whether it is verbal or written; and if written, whether it is negotiable or not, and whether the agent disclosed his agency or not.—(Opinion by HIBBARD, J.)—Chandler v. Coe, p. 561.

An undisclosed principal is liable to be sued and entitled to sue upon an express verbal contract, and also upon a simple written contract not under seal, but not upon a negotiable instrument, made by his agent for him in the agent's name.

A disclosed principal is not liable to be sued nor entitled to sue upon a written contract made by his agent for him in the agent's name.

A principal is not liable to be sued nor entitled to sue upon an implied contract arising from the passage of the consideration between his agent and the other contracting party where there was an express contract in the agent's name, whether verbal or written, unless an action might be sustained by or against him upon the express contract.

Where an agent is sued upon a written instrument executed in his own name, whether it is negotiable or not, and whether he disclosed his agency or not, parol evidence that he contracted only as agent is not admissible for the purpose of discharging him from liability.

ADMISSION OF ATTORNEYS IN NEW YORK.—On the 22nd of last month the Judges of the court of appeals so amended the rules relating to the admission of attorneys as to provide that "an allowance of one year shall be made to applicants who are graduates of any college or university, who in their course of study shall have been instructed in the theory and general principles of jurisprudence, and in the historical development of the constitutional law of the United States and Great Britain. The proof of which shall be the certificate of the president of the college where such applicant graduated to the satisfaction of the supreme court, that he has been taught and has sustained a satisfactory examination in said studies, specifying the same, and no other allowance shall be made to such applicants, for study prior to the time of the graduation, which time shall be made to appear."

We call attention to the following opinions, reported at length in this issue:

Bankruptcy—Claim of Person Holding Stocks on a Margin.—The opinion of the United States District Court for the Northern District of Illinois, by Blodgett, J., in a case where a stock-broker purchased stocks for a bankrupt before his bankruptcy, held them until after, sold them without notice, and then filed his claim against the bankrupt's estate for the difference between what the stock brought and his advances.

Bankruptcy—Record as Evidence—Assessment.—The opinion of the United States Circuit Court, by McKennan, J., as to the effect to be given to a certified copy of the record of the assignment of a bankrupt, or of the assessment upon the stockholders of the bankrupt insurance company, under authority of the court when introduced in evidence in another district from the one where the assignee was appointed. The court also considers the power to make an assessment upon the stockholders of a bankrupt corporation for the purpose of paying its debts.

Charter of Chicago—Act of 1872.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of this State by Sheldon, J., in the Quo Warranto cases brought originally in the Criminal Court of this county for the purpose of testing the question whether the act of 1872 had been legally adopted by the city of Chicago. The opinion reverses the judgment of "ouster" entered in the court below, and remands the cause.

Rights of Attaching Creditors.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of this State, by Sheldon, J., as to the rights of an attaching creditor as against a vendor of a fraudulent vendee. The court reviews its former decisions upon the question involved, and makes a distinction between the facts in this and former cases. We regard this as an unusually interesting opinion.

INDIVIDUAL NAMES AS TRADE MARKS.

The New York court of appeals, in Meneely v. Meneely, reported 12 Albany Law Journal, 220, Held that every man has the absolute right to use his own name in his own business, even though he may thereby interfere with or injure the business of another person bearing the same name, provided he does not resort to any artifice or contrivance for the purpose of producing the impression that the establishments are identical, or do any act calculated to mislead.

CONNECTING LINES—LIMITING LIABILITY.

The Supreme Court of the United States in Evansville and Crowfordsville R. R. Co. v. the Androscoggin Mills, 32 Leg. Intel., 355, held where the provision "this company will not be liable for loss or damage by fire from any cause whatever" was printed upon defendants bill of lading, who were a Railroad Company, and who advertised and took freight through from the south to Boston passing over their line and other lines, that this limited their liability on any part of the route.

FIRE COMMUNICATED FROM PASSING ENGINE.

The Supreme Court of Missouri, in Lester v. The K. C., St. J. & C. B. R. R. Co., 2 Central Law Journal, 641, held when the plaintiff's evidence tends to show that fire escaped from one of defendant's engines, and was communicated to plaintiff's premises, and the defendant offers evidence tending to prove that such engine was provided with the best-known appliances for preventing the escape of fire, that the fire in question could not have escaped therefrom, and that its employees were, at the time, in the exercise of due care, it is error to permit the plaintiff in rebuttal to show that other fires had been occasioned in that neighborhood about that time by sparks emitted from passing engines belonging to the defendant.

PATENT—NEW ARTICLES OF MANUFACTURE.

The Supreme Court of the United States in the Rubber-Tip Pencil Co. v. Howard, 2 Am. L. T. Rep., 150, held that an article of manufacture, to be patentable as such, must be an invention, in the usual sense of the word; that a rubber-head, to be used upon lead-pencils, although a new article of commerce, is not the proper subject of a patent.

Recent Publications.

A Treatise on the American Law of Elections. By Geo. W. McCrary, of the Iowa Bar, Member of the House of Representatives of the United States, and late Chairman of the Committee of Elections of that body. Keokuk, Iowa: R. B. Ogden, Publisher. Chicago: E. B. Myers, Law Bookseller. 1875.

Law books upon special subjects are growing more common every year, and the lawyer sometimes feels that a great service would be done the profession, if all text-books were destroyed, except his Blackstone, Kent and Story. But since it has become a habit from which the lawyer cannot escape, to accept and use books upon special studies, we do not know of a good reason why a book upon Elections should not be published. When a writer devotes himself to a single subject, it is expected that he will omit no case nor leave any branch of his subject untouched.

We suppose the work before us was suggested to Mr. McCrary by his experience as chairman of the Election Committee of U. S. House of Representatives. It is a work that will be of great practical utility, without doubt, to all members of election committees in all legislative bodies in this country. It seems to be a full collection of authorities upon elections contested before such bodies, and we should think our friends Farwell and LeMoyne, of the 1st Congressional District of Illinois, would at once purchase a good sized edition of the work for themselves and their lawyers and the committte before which they will soon carry their case.

But contested election cases before political bodies, are of little value, as authority, before the courts. There is too much of partisanship in them to stand as precedents for our courts.

We do not mean to say that Mr. McCrary has not made a valuable work for lawyers generally. His text is well written and lucid, and we have not observed that he has misstated a proposition of law; but we think that he has omitted several subjects and many cases which he might have introduced, and he has thus rendered his book of much less value to the courts and the profession. The courts do not, nor do the lawyers care, for the opinion of plain Mr. McCrary, unless supported by the adjudications of the courts. It is very rarely that a text book is referred to by the English Courts, and they should be omitted much more frequently by ours. We think Mr. McCrary grew especially weary when he came to the topic of special elections. Upon a brief examination of the authorities in two or three States, we find the following important cases omitted from his work upon this topic, viz: Viely v. Thompson, 44 Ill.. 9; People v. Salomon, 46 Ill., 420; People v. Gochenover, 54 Ill., 123; Harding v. R. R. Co., 65 Ill., 90; Knox county v. Davis, 63 Ill.; McMillan v. Lee county, 3 Iowa, 313; State v. Young, 4 Iowa, 563; Fort Dodge City, etc. v. District, etc., 17 Iowa, 85; 22 Wis.; 363 State v. Lutfring.

The validity of railroad bonds, special taxes, location of county seats and city charters depend upon this branch of election law, and its knowledge is of more value to the public than the ability to determine who is entitled to a particular office. We must say that the work is well nigh worthless upon this special topic. Its merits in other respects we cheerfully concede, though we must say that the author's "better opinion" so frequently referred to, is not always supported by citation of authorities, which the lawyer so greatly desires in a work of this kind. We think the courts would not much care for Mr. McCrary's "better opinion," without the book and page where he obtains it.

Reports of Cases Argued and Determined in the Superior Court of Indianapolis, With Collection of Authorities cited to cases. Vol. I. By Oliver M. Wilson, Official Reporter, Indianapolis Journal Company, Printers. 1875.

This is the first volume of a new series of reports. We examined it very closely to see if good judgment has been exercised in the selection of the cases, and if the reporter had performed his portion of the labor in a creditable manner. The cases reported will not only be useful to the Indiana lawyer, but many of them will be of interest to the members of the bar in other States. We have no hesitation in saying that Mr. Wilson shows evidence of being a skillful reporter. His head-notes are short, clear and accurate. They are preceded by headings, the principal words of which are given in small caps and followed by others in italics. We do not remember to have seen this style in any other book. We think it a good one. The concise notes at the end of the opinions will be found very useful in practice. This series of Reports should readily find a place in every Indiana lawyer's library. This volume contains a table of cases reported and one of cases cited. In two or three of the late volume of reports of our own State, Mr. Freeman has omitted the table of cases cited; it may have been from the fact that he thought the space it would occupy would be better filled by opinions. Orders for this volume should be addressed to Mr. Wilson, at Indianapolis.

Leading Cases on the Law of Torts Determined by the Courts of America and England. With Notes. By Melville M. Bigelow, Boston: Little, Brown and Company. 1875. Sold by E. B. Myers, Law Bookseller, Chicago.

The mechanical execution of the volume is not liable to criticism. Mr. Bigelow, as a law writer, is well and very favorably known to the profession in America. It is a sufficient compliment to the book to say it is just such an one as might be expected from Mr. Bigelow. He says the work is the result of an attempt to furnish for ready service a collection of recognized authorities on the existing law of torts, with a consideration of the rise and growth of the law as thus represented, followed by a statement in greater detail of its present aspect; that he has confined himself to a consideration of the typical branches of the subject, omitting bailments, marine torts, statutory torts and the torts of persons under legal disability. In short, the object of the work is to present a full and complete view of the essential doctrines of the law of torts. We do not remember to have seen a volume of leading cases prepared with as much skill, or one upon which there was as much labor bestowed as this one. It took more time and labor to prepare the notes than it would to write an ordinary treatise; they contain the very essence of the law reduced to the smallest possible compass. The following is the order of subjects in this volume: 1. Deceit, Slander and Libel, Malicious Prosecution, Conspiracy. 2. Assault and Battery, False Imprisonment, Seduction and Enticing Away, Trespasses Upon Property, Conversion, Nuisance, Dangerous Animals and Works, Obstructing and Diverting Water, Support of Ground and Buildings. 3. Negligence. The cases have generally been selected with judgment. But we would suggest to Mr. Bigelow, in case he should add another volume, that we have some leading cases in Illinois and other Western States, which we should like to see inserted in the body of the volume, as well as to be cited in the notes. Massachusetts, although a great State, has more than her share of cases in the body of the work.

THE CORPORATION TAXES.

CIRCULAR LETTER BY THE ATTORNEY GENERAL DEFINING THE STATUS OF THE SUITS PENDING IN THE FEDERAL COURTS TO ENJOIN THE COLLECTION OF TAXES UPON RAILROADS AND OTHER CORPORATIONS.

STATE OF ILLINOIS,
ATTORNEY-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
SPRINGFIELD, Sept. 27, 1875.

To the several County Boards and County Collectors of Illinois:

To avoid the necessity of answering numerous letters of inquiry, and to convey the desired information to those interested, I have prepared this circular respecting the condition of the suits pending in the Federal courts to enjoin the collection of State, county and other taxes assessed against railroads and other corporations. You are aware that the Supreme Court of the State, in a series of decisions, have sustained the constitutionality of the revenue law of the State respecting the assessment of the property and franchises of such corporations. These decisions of the Supreme Court are as yet unreported, but I have a pamphlet copy of them, which can be furnished to those who may wish to use the same. After the Supreme Court had thus decided the disputed legal questions adversely to those who had resisted the payment of such taxes, one or more of the non-resident stockholders in the several railroad or other corporations, organized under the laws of the State (with but few exceptions), filed bills in the United States Circuit Courts in the northern and southern districts of the State, praying for injunctions against the collection of such taxes, on substantially the same grounds as was so decided by the Supreme Court of the State to be insufficient to warrant such injunctions.

The questions involved were argued at length, on both sides, in the United States Circuit Court, at Chicago, in March, 1874, and subsequently before Judges Drummond and Treat, at Springfield, in June of the same year, and the question was then taken under advisement by Judge Drummond to determine whether he would follow the decision of the Supreme Court of the state and dissolve the injunctions. No formal decison of the questions submitted was annonced by the Federal Circuit Court until the following year, when Judge Drummond delivered the opinion published in the number of the Chicago Legal News, dated April 10, 1875, (Vol. 7, p. 229.) In the meantime the Federal courts continue to grant injunctions against the collection of the taxes assessed under the designation "capital stock," in all cases where the parties asked therefor. By reference to the opinion of Judge Drummond, published in the Legal News, it will be observed that he not only held the tax assessed under the designation "capital stock," invalid, but also held that the action of the state board of equalization, and the law itself, which provided for the assessment and distribution of the value of the tangible property of railroad corporations among the various counties for the purposes of taxation, to be unconstitutional and void. After the rendition of this opinion, it naturally followed that Judge Drummond would not only grant injunctions restraining the collection of the tax upon "capital stock" of corporations generally, but also taxes assessed upon the tangible property of railraod corporations, when bills were filed praying therefor. The district judges, Blodgett and Treat, for a time refused to restrain the collection of taxes assessed upon the tangible property, but at length yielded to the opinion of the circuit judge, and modified their injunctions so as to include the taxes assessed upon the tangible property of railroad corporations, whenever applied to for that purpose.

One ground upon which the federal court held the assessment of the tangible property of railroad corporations to be illegal was, that the State Board raised the valuation placed upon such property by the companies, in their returns to the auditor, without first giving notice to the corporations concerned, of their intentions so to do. We then insisted that, conceding this to be correct, it showed no ground why the corporation should not, at least, pay the tax upon the valuation which they themselves had placed on their own property, and that the court ought to require them to do so, as conditional to the granting of the injunctions for the residue of the tax. Judge Blodgett sustained this view, and, accordingly, in one or two cases, granted injunctions upon this condition. Subsequently, the question was argued before both the judges at Chicago, and the result was, the court relapsed into its former habit of granting injunctions restraining the collection of all such taxes, including that upon the valuation which the corporations themselves had placed on their property. This being the case, no alternative was left but to press one or more of the cases to a final decree in the Circuit Court, from which appeals could be prosecuted to the Supreme Court of the United States. We accordingly filed answers in three of the cases, viz: that of the C., B. & Q R. R. Co., the Chicago and Alton, and the T. P. & W. R. W. Co., and have succeeded in getting final decrees and perfecting appeals to the Supreme Court of the United States in time to submit the same to that court at its term comm ncing on the second Monday of October next. I have the transcript of the records made up and am now engaged in the preparation of the cases for hearing in that court, and hope to have them decided within a few months. In the ordinary course of business the cases would not be likely to be reached for argument in the Supreme Court in less than two years, but the court has power to advance upon the docket and assign an early day for the hearing of appeals from decrees restraining the enforcement of State revenue laws. [U. S. Rev. Stat., p. 189, sec. 949.]

I have no doubt the court will regard the state of Illinois as entitled to this privilege, in respect to these cases, and I intend, in behalf of the State, to apply to the court for such an order soon after it convenes in October next. If this motion is allowed, the cases will probably be argued and decided during the coming winter. When the United States Supreme Court has decided the questions involved in the cases which have been appealed, the federal court will, as a matter of course, apply the same principles thus settled, to the various other cases pending before them. In the meantime, it is thought not to be advisable to press the other cases where temporary injunctions have been granted, to final decrees, but to permit them to remain in statu quo, until we get the decision of the United States Supreme Court. There is a general understanding to this effect, between counsel upon the opposite side of the cases and myself, which meets with the approval of the judges of the United States Circuit Courts. Should we prepare the other cases for hearing, and insist on final decrees at the present time, the United States Circuit Court would undoubtedly simply make perpetual the temporary injunctions now pending, and thus place it beyond our power to procure their dissolution, in case the Supreme Court should decide the appealed cases in our favor.

I am, very respectfully,
JAMES K EDSAL,
Attorney General.

JACKSON, APRIL, 1872.

SCHONFIELD & HANOVER v. R. A. MOON.

From Shelby.

1.—COMMERCIAL LAW—BANK CHECK—HOLDER—DRAWER—DRAWEE—PAYEE.

It is a settled rule of commercial law that where the holder of a check sues the drawer—if the drawer, drawee, and the payee live in the same place—the drawer is liable if the check be presented within the business hours of the next day after it is drawn. Citing 2 Parsons on Bills and Notes, 72; Chitty on Bills and Notes, 385.

2 SAME.—As between the drawer and the holder, the check is an appropriation to the latter of so much money in the banker's hands: and unless injured thereby the drawer cannot complain if the money is allowed to remain in bank, though after the second day the risk is with the holder.

OBITER.—1st. As between the holder and endorser, or the drawer and transferrer, the check must be presented immediately or within a reasonable time, according to the relative localities of the parties, otherwise the endorser is released. Citing 2 Parsons, on Bills and Notes, 73.

2nd. If the holder sue the endorser or transferrer, it is competent to show that the check was received as cash or in payment of the debt.

NICHOLSON, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court.

J. N. Hall bought a bill of goods of plaintiffs amountig to $141.27, and proposed to go to the Gayoso Savings Bank for the money with which to pay for them. They said they would save him the trouble of going to the bank, as the check of R. A. Moon on the bank was as good to them as money, and they would take it as cash. Hall thereupon passed to them the check of R. A. Moon for $141.27 by delivery, the same being payable to him or bearer. This occurred on the 4th of February, 1868, at 10 o'clock, the bank having paid all the checks presented up to that time. The check of R. A. Moon was not presented until after the bank closed and suspended on the 5th of February, when it was duly protested for non-payment, and notice given to R. A. Moon, the drawer. Moon had a deposit of $400 in the bank when it closed. Schonfield & Hanover have sued R. A. Moon for the amount of the check.

On the trial of the cause the Circuit judge charged the jury:

"As a general rule the holder of a check has the day on which the check is drawn and the business hours of the following day to present the same for payment, but this is not absolute. The holder of a check must use due diligence in the presentation of the check for payment; and if the bank failed after the holder could have got his money on the check, the loss is his."

Under this charge the jury found for defendant, and the plaintiffs have appealed.

The proof makes it certain that if the check had been presented on the 4th of February, or on the 5th before the time when it closed up and failed, it would have been paid. It was manifestly in view of this proof that the judge charged the jury that "if the bank failed after the holder could have got his money, the loss is his." The question arises, is the general rule laid down by the judge, that the holder of a bank check has the day on which it is drawn and the business hours of the succeeding day within which to present it, subject to the qualification stated? It is important to keep in mind the distinction between the liability of the drawer and of the endorser or transferrer of a check. When the holder of a check sues the drawer, if the drawer, the drawee and the payee live in the same place, the drawer is liable if the check be presented for payment within the business hours of the next day after it is drawn. This is a settled rule of commercial law, applicable to the liability of the drawer, to the holder of bank checks.—2 Parsons on Bills and Notes, 72; Chitty on Bills, 385. The check is an appropriation, as between the drawer and the holder, to the latter of so much money in the banker's hands. The holder of the check may allow the money to remain in the banker's hands, and the drawer cannot complain unless he is injured thereby. But the risk of allowing the money to remain in the banker's hands, after the expiration of the banking hours of the day after the check is drawn, rests upon the holder of the check.

But as between the holder of a check and an endorser of it, and the transferrer and the drawer, it must be presented for payment within a reasonable time; and it seems by the best authority that this is the same as required in the case of a bill or note.—2 Parsons on Bills and Notes, 73. As it is one of the peculiar characteristics of a bank check that it has no days of grace, it is necessarily due as soon as it is drawn and delivered to the payee or holder. As between the holder and indorser, therefore, the holder is bound to present it for payment immediately, or at least within a reasonable time acording to the relative localities of the parties, otherwise the indorser ceases to be liable. It is obvious that if this rule should be applied as between the holder and the drawer, the bank check would cease to be anything but a bill of exchange, and could no longer fill the special channel in commercial transactions for which it is designed. The proof in the case shows clearly the commercial usage in respect o bank checks, and the reason of the rule which gives the holder the day in which they are drawn and the next day for presentation. During that period the check is at the risk of the drawer, afterwards it is at the risk of the holder. This is the fixed law which governs the bank check and controls the rights and obligations of the holder and drawer. The drawer issues it with the implied understanding that it need not be presented for payment, except within the business hours of the next day after its issuance, and the holder takes it with the same understanding. During this time, therefore, no laches can be imputed to the holder, unless he received it with a different contract. The fact proven, in this case, that the plaintiffs received the check as cash from Hall in payment of a bill of goods, has no effect as between the plaintiffs and the defendant. If the plaintiffs had sued Hall as indorser or transferrer of the check, this proof would have been pertinent.

We are therefore of opinion that the Circuit Judge erred in his charge to the jury. The judgment is reversed and a new trial awarded.—Commercial and Legal Reporter.

SUPREME COURT OF PENN.

MAY '75, 52. MAY 18.

ALEXANDER v. MCCULLOUGH et al.

Error to Common Pleas of Blair county.

EVIDENCE—RECORD—BANKRUPT ACT.

In ejectment plaintiff gave in evidence a certified copy of a petition in bankruptcy, a certificate of the bankrupt's discharge, and a deed from the bankrupt's alleged assignee.

Held, (affirming the judgment of the court below), that there was no evidence of the appointment of the assignee, and without this the plaintiff could not recover.

This was an action of ejectment by Alexander against McCullough and another. The plaintiff derived his title from Barr, the alleged assignee in bankruptcy of Lockard, the former owner of the premises. To prove his title he read in evidence (a) a certified copy of the petition of Lockard to be declared a bankrupt, with a schedule thereto annexed, containing a description of the property in dispute; (b) the certificate of discharge of the bankrupt, dated Nov. 21, 1871; (c) deed of Barr, as assignee in bankruptcy of Lockard, to the plaintiff, dated November 8, 1871.

The court below, DEAN, (P. J.) directed a verdict for the plaintiff, reserving the point whether the plaintiff had sufficiently shown Barr's title, as assignee, to the property in question. Judgment was afterwards entered for the defendant on the point reserved, the court saying: "There was no copy of the decree or order of the court upon the petition, or evidence that any was made. The plaintiff's title depended on an injunction in bankruptcy, as against Lockard, and regular appointment of Barr as assignee, under the act of Congress and rules of the District Court. No exemplification of the record, containing the full and entire proceedings of that court, was produced; detached portions of the record alone were offered. We think the plaintiff failed to show authority in Barr to make the sale and conveyance of the lot, or Lockard's estate in it; that authority could only have been shown by an exemplification of the record, setting forth the preliminary steps necessary to the appointment of an assignee. This could not be shown by detached portions of the record; it must be made up and certified as a whole."

To this judgment Alexander took a writ of error, assigning as error the entry of judgment for the defendant on the point reserved.

D. J. NEFF, for plaintiff in error.

[In the paper book of the plaintiff in error were printed the docket entries in the District Court of the United States in The Estate of Lockard, a Bankrupt, together with the assignment by the register in bankruptcy to Barr as assignee of that estate, neither of which had been offered in evidence.]

The plaintiff's testimony showed a good title in the assignee. The assignment to the assignee set out that he was duly appointed assignee. This assignment is part of the record of the District Court of the United States, and it is not necessary to put in evidence the record of the entire proceedings to prove this one. A copy of the deed of assignment, duly certified, is conclusive evidence of the title of the assignee to sue. He will be admitted as a party to a suit, upon the production of such duly certified copy. Hendon v. Howard, 9 Wall., 664.

S. S. BLAIR, contra.

The Bankrupt Act, § 38, provides that a copy of the record must be duly certified to be prima facie evidence. A record must be made up and certified as a whole. Susquehanna Railroad Co. v. Quick, 18 P. F. Smith, 25, 189.

May 24. THE COURT. The plaintiff in error was the plaintiff below, and, therefore, could recover only on the strength of his own title. His title depended on a sale by an assignee in bankruptcy, but of this he had no legal evidence. An uncertified (certified—Ed.) copy of the petition to be declared a bankrupt, and a certificate of discharge, were no evidence of the appointment of Simon B. Barr as assignee, or of his authority to sell. The plaintiff, therefore, had nothing to support his alleged deed by an assignee in bankruptcy. This puts an end to his ejectment, as the verdict would necessarily be against him, without regard to the other questions in the case.

Judgment affirmed.

PER CURIAM. Opinion in full.

ENGLISH COURT OF APPEALS IN CHANCERY.

FRIDAY, MAY 28.

[Before the Lord Chancellor (CAIRNS), and Lord Justice JAMES.]

BATSTONE v. SALTER.

ADVANCEMENT—TRANSFER OF STOCK INTO JOINT NAMES OF TRANSFEROR, DAUGHTER, AND SON-IN-LAW—SURVIVORSHIP.

A widow transferred stock which had previously stood in the joint names of her husband and herself, and to which she had become entitled by survivorship on the death of her husband, into the joint names of herself, her daughter, and her daughter's husband; and the dividends of the stock were enjoyed by the transferor during her life. The daughter died before her mother, and the son-in law survived the mother.

Held, (affirming the decision of Hall, V. C.), that there was no resulting trust and that the son-in-law was entitled to the fund by survivorship.

This was an appeal from a decision of Hall, V. C.

The facts of the case, which are more fully stated in the report of the hearing before the Vice-Chancellor (31 L. T. Rep. N. S. 600), were shortly as follows:

On the 15th Sept. 1864, Mary Anne Wakeford sold out 100*l.* consols part of a sum of 1000*l.* consols standing in her name, and applied the proceeds to her own use, and transferred the remaining 900*l.* consols into the joint names of herself, Margaret Salter her daughter, and Henry Salter, who had married her daughter about a year before the date of the transfer.

The 1000*l.* had formerly belonged to Mrs. Wakeford's husband, who had transferred it into the joint names of himself and his wife, and on her husband's death Mrs. Wakeford had become entitled to the fund by survivorship.

At the date of the transfer, Mrs. Wakeford was sixty-nine years of age, and very infirm, but she herself received the dividends of the 900*l.* consols for three or four years afterwards, and subsequently Henry Salter received them and paid to her.

Margaret Salter died on the 4th July, 1869, without issue.

Mrs. Wakeford died on the 9th Nov., 1871, having by her will, which was made in 1868, appointed the plaintiff her executor.

The plaintiff, by the direction of Wickens, V. C., instituted the present suit against Henry Salter, praying that he might be declared a trustee of the 900*l.* consols for the residuary legatees named in the will.

The suit was heard before Hall, V. C., who held that the defendant was entitled to the fund, and dismissed the bill with costs.

From this decision the plaintiff appealed.

DICKINSON, Q. C. and SIMMONDS for the appellant.

There is no evidence that Mrs. Wakeford intended to benefit her son-in-law by this transfer, and it would appear that her intention was only to benefit her daughter. She did not stand in loco parentis to her son-in-law, and therefore, in the absence of clear evidence of an intention to benefit him, it must be held that there is a resulting trust: Stock v. McAvoy, 27 L. T. Rep. N. S. 441; L. Rep. 15 Eq. 55; George v. Howood, 7 Price, 646; Lloyd v. Read, 1 P. Wms., 608; Kingdon v. Bridges, 2 Vern., 67; Dumper v. Dumper, 6 L. T. Rep. N. S. 315; 3 Giff., 583.

Without calling upon

INCE, who appeared for the respondent,

The LORD CHANCELLOR (CAIRNS) said: I am not able to arrive at a different conclusion from that of the Vice-Chancellor. The transfer of this fund was made by Mrs. Wakeford in Sept., 1864. It appears that about a year before that date the defendant, Henry Salter, had married a daughter of Mrs. Wakeford. The fund came to Mrs. Wakeford herself in a somewhat singular way. The stock, of which this fund formed a part, had during the life of her husband been transferred by him into the joint names of himself and his wife, and she had become absolutely entitled to it by survivorship. Thus her attention had been called to the operation of a transfer of this kind, as she became mistress of the fund by a similar transfer, a circumstance which probably has not occurred in any previous case. With this knowledge, she transferred 900*l.* of the stock into the joint names of herself, her daughter, and her daughter's husband. Now, supposing that she acted with the intention of endowing her daughter, who was a married woman, how else could she have done it than by transferring the fund in this way? Assuming that to have been her intention, she could not have transferred the fund into her daughter's name alone, at least without deceiving the Bank of England as to the fact of her daughter being a married woman, for the bank would not allow a transfer of stock into the name of a married woman, without her husband, before the passing of the Married Women's Property Act 1870. She was, therefore, obliged to make the endowment in this way, namely, by transferring the fund into the joint names of her daughter and her daughter's husband, and in order to secure her own control over it during her life she put in her own name as transferee jointly with their names. Now if that be so, and if it be true that the doctrine of resulting trust is only adopted where there is no other probable explanation of the transaction, here there is a reasonable explanation of the transaction in the fact that there was a daughter to be endowed, and that she could only be endowed by this form of transfer. In my opinion every inference which would have been drawn in the case of a transfer into the joint names of a mother and an unmarried daughter, ought to be drawn here too. Then, if the intention of the transferor at the time when the transfer is made is ascertained, it cannot make the least difference whether the daughter and her husband both survive the transferor, or, as in the present case, the husband only survives. I am of opinion, therefore, that the decision of the Vice-Chancellor is correct, and the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

Lord Justice JAMES.—I entirely agree.

Appeal accordingly dismissed with costs.

THE American Law Review, in its book notices, says of Waterman on Trespass, that it has certain merits which it cheerfully commends; that the style is concise; that cases, on the whole, are fairly stated; and the selection of topics is, as far as it goes, practical; and it has no doubt the book will prove of considerable service for some time. But concludes than it can but feel, that the volume exhibits too many marks of compilation for sale, and too few of thoughtful labor and patient digesting, to entitle it to more than a limited term of usefulness. We cannot say that we agree with all that is said by the Review of this book. The same care and labor that produced the present edition, bestowed on subsequent editions, will give it an extended term of usefulness.

HON. E. M. HAINES has announced a new edition of his Justices' Treatise as in press.

WHEREAS, ON THE 3D DAY OF JULY, A. D. 1871, Strange A. Holman executed his trust deed to the undersigned, Chalkley J. Hambleton, as trustee, thereby conveying the property hereinafter described, to secure his four notes, of even date therewith, payable to the order of Charles W. Ayers, one for $733.34, in one year; one for $738.33, in two years, one for $366.67, in three years, and one for $366.66, in three years, all with interest at the rate of ten per cent. per annum, payable semi-annually, which trust deed was recorded in the recorder's office of Cook county, Illinois, in book 435 of records, on page 21.

And whereas, it was provided in said trust deed, that on default in the payment of said notes, or any part thereof, and on the application of the legal holder of either thereof, the said trustee might sell said premises, and all the right and equity of redemption of the said Holman, his heirs and assigns therein, at public auction, at the northeast corner of the court house square, in the city of Chicago, Illinois, for the highest and best price the same would bring in cash, two weeks' notice having been previously given of the time and place of such sale by advertisement in any newspaper at that time published in said city of Chicago, and on such sale to execute and deliver to the purchaser good and sufficient deed or deeds of the premises sold, and that it should not be obligatory on the purchaser to see to the application of the purchase money.

And whereas, default has been made in the payment of the note for $733.34, falling due in one year from its date, and in the semi-annual installments of interest falling due January 3d and July 3d, 1875, the amount of said note and said interest being now claimed to be due.

Now, application having been made to me by the legal holders of said last named note to sell said premises for the payment thereof, pursuant to the provisions of said trust deed, notice is hereby given, that on Saturday, the sixth day of November, A. D. 1875, at the hour of ten o'clock A. M., at the northeast corner of the court house square, at the corner of Randolph and Clark streets, in the city of Chicago, and State of Illinois, I, the undersigned, Chalkley J. Hambleton, will sell at public auction, for the highest and best price the same will bring in cash, the premises in said trust deed mentioned situate in Chicago, Cook county Illinois, and described, as follows, to wit:

Sub-lot two (2) in the subdivision by Chas. W. Damier, Robert L. Elder, and Chas. W. Ayers of sub-lot six (6), in the subdivision of lots eighty-one (81) and eighty-two (82) in Ellis' east addition to Chicago, more particularly described as follows: Beginning at a point in the westerly line of said sub-lot six (6) eighteen feet and ¼ of an inch southeasterly from the northwesterly corner of said sub-lot six (6), and running thence northeasterly to a point in the easterly line of said sub-lot six (6) twenty-two feet 9¼ inches southeasterly from the northeasterly corner of said sub-lot six (6), thence southeasterly along the easterly line of said sub-lot, eighteen feet and five inches, thence southwesterly to a point in the westerly line of said sub-lot six (6) thirty-six feet five ¾ inches southeasterly from the northwesterly corner of said sub-lot six (6), thence northwesterly along said westerly line of said sub-lot six (6), said westerly line being also the easterly line of Ellis' avenue, eighteen feet and five inches, to the place of beginning, it being the intention to convey a lot the northerly and southerly boundary lines of which shall coincide with the middle of the partition wall separating the houses erected on the lot herein described from the houses erected on the lots south and north of and adjoining the same, respectively, together with all the right and equity of redemption of the said Holman, his heirs and assigns therein.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 16, 1875.

The Courts.

U. S. CIR. COURT, D. OF OREGON.

OPINION FILED OCT. 4, 1875.

W. W. MORELAND v. MARION COUNTY.

ACTION TO RECOVER POSSESSION OF REAL PROPERTY.

In an action of ejectment the defense may consist of either a denial of the plaintiff's right to recover by controverting any or all of the material allegations of the complaint, or of an averment or plea of such an estate in the premises, or license, or right to the possession thereof, in the defendant, as is inconsistent with a present right of possession in the plaintiff, or both. (Or. Civ. Code, § 316.)

The statement of new matter in the answer must be "concise," and it must constitute a "defense" to the action, and like the statement in the complaint of "the facts constituting the cause of action," it must be limited to the ultimate facts of such defense, and should not contain the evidence of them.

A defense which states in detail the circumstances by which it is claimed that a dedication of the premises was made to the defendant to certain public uses, is irrelevant as a pleading; it should have alleged a right of possession in the defendant, in pursuance of a dedication, for the purposes and time claimed as prescribed by statute. (Or. Civ. Code, § 316.)

Facts stated in a defense do not amount to an estoppel, unless pleaded as such.

A plea of estoppel must allege that the plaintiff ought to be precluded from showing some fact or matter stated in the complaint, to which the estoppel is interposed, because of some other fact or matter alleged in the plea, which constitutes the estoppel.

A district attorney, by virtue of his office, is the attorney for the several counties in his district, and as such must prosecute or defend all actions to which any of such counties may be a party, without reference to the locality of the court in which they may be pending.

The County Court may employ council to assist the district attorney in the prosecution or defense of a particular action, but the district attorney is entitled to control the proceedings in court, and the county cannot appear by any other attorney.

If the pleading of a county is not subscribed by the proper district attorney, it is not duly subscribed, and may be stricken out of the case. (Or. Civ. Code, §§ 79, 103.)

Opinion by DEADY, J.

This action is brought by a citizen of the State of California, against the defendant, a county of the State of Oregon, to recover the possession of block 6 in the town of Salem in said county, alleged to be worth $130,000, together with the sum of $500 damages, for withholding the possession of the same.

The answer of the defendant first denies the material allegations of the complaint except those concerning the citizenship of the parties and the value of the property. It also contains a second defence styled "a further and separate answer," which the plaintiff moves to strike out as irrelevant and frivolous, as well as the whole answer, because "the same is not subscribed by the defendant or its attorney."

The second defense is divided into 12 articles or paragraphs, and states substantially, that about the year 1844 William H. Willson and Chloe A., his wife, settled upon a tract of public land including the premises, since designated in the United States surveys as Donation claim No. 44; that in July, 1853, the said Willson and wife having resided upon and cultivated said claim for four successive years, and otherwise complied with the provisions of the Donation act of September 27, 1850, the surveyor general of Oregon, issued to them Donation certificate No. 20, for said claim, designating therein the north half thereof, which includes the premises in controversy, as enuring to the wife, and the south half to the husband; that on February 4, 1862, a patent issued from the United States for said claim, to said Willson and wife; that between the years 1844 and 1850 said Willson, with the knowledge and consent of his wife, laid off the town of Salem upon said claim, and on March 22, 1850, recorded the plat thereof, and that upon said plat said block 6 was designated as a public square and dedicated to the use of the people of said county and town for the purpose of building a court house thereon; that said people, in 1852, with the knowledge and consent of said Willson and wife, took possession of said block and built a court house thereon, and by virtue of said dedication, have used the same for public purposes ever since, and that said Willson contributed largely to the building of the court house; that said Willson and wife, after they acquired title to said claim, sold lots with reference to said plat, and continued to recognize said dedication of the premises until the death of said Willson, in 1856, after which the said Chloe A. sold lots in said town with reference to said plat, and continued to recognize the dedication aforesaid up to the time of her death in 1874, and assented to the said dedication of said block; that, in 1872, the defendant erected a court house upon said block, with the knowledge and consent of said Chloe A., at a cost of $100,000; and that whatever interest the plaintiff has in the premises is derived from said Chloe and was acquired since the erection of said last mentioned court house and with a knowledge of these facts.

In an action of this kind the defense may consist of either a denial of the plaintiff's right to recover, by controverting any or all of the material allegations of the complaint, or of an averment or plea of such an estate in the premises, or license or right to the possession thereof in the defendant, as is inconsistent with a present right of possession in the plaintiff, or both. (Or. Civ. Code, § 316).

The answer of the defendant substantially admits that the plaintiff is the owner in fee of the premises, but undertakes to set up in bar of the action to recover the possession, a dedication of the same to the use of the defendant, by Chloe Willson, under whom it is alleged the plaintiff claims.

This attempt to plead a license or right to the possession in the defendant, consists of a detailed narrative of the settlement and occupation of Donation claim No. 44, by William H. Willson and Chloe A. Willson, from 1844 to 1874, including their acts and doings with reference to the defendant and said block 6.

The motion to strike out the second defense as irrelevant must be allowed. Much of it is immaterial—even as evidence of a dedication by Chloe A.—while none of it is relavent as an allegation or pleading to the complaint. (The President, etc. v. Kitching, 7 Bosworth, 668).

The statement of new matter in the answer is required to be "concise," and to constitute a "defense" to the action. Like the statement in the complaint of "the facts constituting the cause of action," it must be limited to the ultimate facts of such defense, and should not contain the evidence of them. (Wooden v. Strew, 10 How., p. 50).

§ 316 supra provides that in an action to recover the possession of real property: "The defendant shall not be allowed to give in evidence any estate in himself or another in the property, or any license or right to the possession thereof, unless the same be pleaded in his answer. If so pleaded, the nature and duration of such estate or license or right to the possession, shall be set forth with the certainty and particularity required in a complaint.

For instance, if the defendant relies upon a right to the possession of this property, arising from a dedication thereof by Chloe A. Willson to itself, for the purpose of building and maintaining thereon, forever, a court house, it should plead that fact as directed by this statute, and not what council may consider the evidence of it. This could be done in a few words, without burdening the record with a story of a dozen folios concerning the circumstances out of which the defendant claims such a right arose, or imposing upon the plaintiff the unnecessary hardship and disadvantage of replying in detail to this statement of these circumstances before any proof is offered in support of them, and thereby in effect convert the answer into a bill of discovery.

On the argument, counsel for the defendant claimed that the facts stated in this defence was also relied upon as a bar to the action by way of estoppel. But they are not pleaded as such. There is no fact stated in the complaint, which the defendant alleges the plaintiff ought not to be permitted to show. A plea of estoppel must allege that the plaintiff ought to be precluded from showing some fact or matter stated in the complaint, to which the estoppel is interposed, because of some other fact or matter alleged in the plea, which constitutes the estoppel. For instance, in an action of ejectment by the vendor of the premises claiming under an after acquired and superior title, the vendee and defendant might plead that the plaintiff ought to be precluded from showing that he was seized of the premises and entitled to the possession thereof, because on some day prior to the commencement of the action he had conveyed the same to the defendant with full covenants of warranty.

§ 79 of the Or. Civ. Code provides that "every pleading shall be subscribed by the party or his attorney;" while § 103 declares that any pleading not "duly subscribed" may be stricken out of the case. In support of the motion to strike out the whole answer, upon the ground that it is not duly subscribed, counsel for plaintiff contends that the district attorney for the judicial district, including Marion county, is the attorney for the defendant. That he is appointed such attorney by means of a public election in the district held in pursuance of law, and that the defendant cannot disregard such appointment and appear in this action by another, and, therefore, this answer is not duly subscribed and is liable to be stricken out of the case.

§ 945 of the Or. Civ. Code prescribes the duties of the district attorney, as follows:

"He shall prosecute for all penalties and forfeitures to the State, which may be incurred in any county in his district, and for which no other mode of prosecution and collection is expressly provided by statute, and in like case, prosecute or defend as the case may be, all actions, suits or proceedings in any county in his district to which the State or such county may be a party."

The answer is subscribed by certain attorneys of this court as "attorneys for defendant." The motion is not made upon affidavit or other proof as to who is the district attorney for the third district, which includes the defendant. I do not think the court can take judicial knowledge of the fact that any particular person is district attorney for that district, or that neither of the attorneys who have subscribed the answer is not such officer. On the other hand, the subscription to the answer does not profess to be made by a district attorney, as it should, if made by one. The motion asserts that the answer is not subscribed by defendant's attorney, and upon the argument it was substantially admitted that neither of the attorneys subscribing the answer is the district attorney for the district including the defendant.

Assuming, then, that the answer is not subscribed by the attorney for the third district, is it subscribed by the attorney of the defendant as required by statute?

Until the contrary appears, the court will presume that when one of its attorneys subscribes a pleading as the attorney of a party, to a proceeding before it, that he is authorized to do so. But in the case of a public corporation, like the defendant, which has a regular official attorney, appointed by law, there is no room for the presumption that any other attorney has authority to represent it. The voters of the various counties in the third district have, by the election of the district attorney, constituted him the attorney of such counties, with authority "to prosecute or defend, as the case may be, all actions, suits or proceedings" to which any of them may be a party, during his continuance in office. Admitting even, what is very doubtful, that a county may authorize an attorney, other than the proper district attorney, to represent it in court, there is certainly no presumption that it has done so—the fact must be made to appear.

Regularly this should be done by an order of the county court, and a copy of the same, under its seal, filed with the appearance of the attorney. The presumption is, that the defendant has an official attorney in the person of the attorney for the third judicial district upon whom the law casts the authority and duty of defending this action. The court is therefore not at liberty to presume that the gentlemen whose names appear signed to the answer of the defendant were authorized to do so.

It is not doubted but that the county court may, with the assent of the district attorney, and it may be without his assent, employ counsel to assist him in the prosecution or defense of a proceeding to which it is a party; but even then the district attorney would be the attorney of the county and entitled to control the proceedings and required to authenticate the pleadings by his subscription. It may, also, as representing the county, control and direct the conduct of a cause to which the latter is a party the same as a natural person might do (Or. Civ. Code, § 871); but unless there is a vacancy in the office of district attorney, it must appear in court by him. He may be assisted, but he cannot be ignored.

It has been suggested that this action is not within the purview of § 945 supra, because it is not prosecuted or defended "in any county" in the third district. But it is quite certain from the language of the whole section that it was the intention of the legislature to make the district attorney the law officer of the county, and require him to appear for the county in any action to which it might be a party, without reference to the locality of the court in which it may be pending. It is true, this action is not prosecuted in the county of Marion, because this court does not happen to sit there, but the cause of action arose therein, and the county is a party to it, and this brings it within the statute which requires it to be defended by the district attorney of the third district.

The motion to strike out is allowed on both grounds.

U. S. CIRCUIT COURT, E. D. OF PA.

Error to the District Court.

GUILLOU, assignee in bankruptcy of Charles Vezin (trading as Charles Vezin & Co.), a bankrupt, v. WILLIAM FONTAIN.

1. Under the provisions of the act of June 5th, 1872, Revised Statutes, § 915, the Federal courts may issue process of foreign attachment against the property of non residents, where the same would lie under the laws of the State in which such court is held.

2. An action of debt, by the assignee of a bankrupt firm, against a special partner, upon his statutory liability under the laws of Pennsylvania, to restore the amount of his original capital, where the same has been reduced by the payment of interest or profits to him, may be commenced by process of foreign attachment.

This was an action of debt, commenced by the plaintiff in error, in June, 1873, by process of foreign attachment, in the District Court of the United States, for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania.

The attachment was served on July 1st, 1873, upon property of the defendant in error, in the hands of the garnishees, as endorsed upon the writ; and on the 23d day of July, following, the plaintiff filed his declaration, setting forth, that on the 18th day of October, A. D. 1869, a limited partnership was formed under the provisions of the acts of Assembly of the commonwealth of Pennsylvania in such case made and provided, between the said defendant, as special partner, and Charles Vezin, as general partner, for the transaction of the business of the importation and sale of gloves, under the firm name of Charles Vezin & Co., for a term to commence on the 18th day of October, A. D. 1869, and to terminate on the 18th day of October, A. D. 1872, the amount of the capital contributed by the said special partner being fifty thousand dollars in cash. That afterwards, at various specified times, and while the said limited partnership continued and was in existence, portions of said capital so contributed by said special partner to the common stock of said firm were withdrawn by and paid to the said defendant as and in the name of interest on the said capital, amounting together to the sum of five thousand seven hundred and eighty-two seventy-seven one-hundredth dollars. That by such payment of interest to the said special partner, the defendant in this action, the original capital has been reduced by an amount of five thousand seven hundred and eighty two seventy-seven one-hundreth dollars. That afterwards, to wit, on the 29th day of November, A. D. 1871, the said Charles Vezin, trading as Charles Vezin & Co., was, on creditors' petitions filed in said court, duly adjudicated a bankrupt; and this plaintiff was afterwards, to wit, on the 22nd day of January, A. D. 1872, duly appointed assignee, and an assignment by instrument of writing under the hand of Edwin T. Chase, Esq., one of the registers in bankruptcy of said court, bearing date January 22nd, A. D. 1872 (here shown to the court), assigning and conveying to this plaintiff all the estate real and personal of the said Charles Vezin, bankrupt, with all his deeds, books, and papers relating thereto, was duly made and delivered to this plaintiff. By means and reason whereof an action has accrued to this plaintiff to demand, and have of and from the said defendant the sum of five thousand seven hundred and eighty-two seventy-seven one-hundredth dollars above demanded.

The defendant failing to appear, a motion was made, at the third term of the court ensuing the execution of the writ, for judgment for such default, which was refused; the court, Cadwalader, J., saying, "that if the jurisdiction which the first section of the act of Congress of the 2d of March, A. D. 1867, to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States, confers upon this court, of suits for collection of assets of the bankrupt, enables the assignee in bankruptcy to proceed as plaintiff in such a suit by way of foreign attachment, in any case the demand of the present plaintiff, as appears from his declaration, is not such as to sustain a proceeding by foreign attachment."

The case was then removed to the Circuit Court upon a writ of error; the assignment of error being the refusal of the court below to grant judgment against the defendant for default of an appearance.

J. C. LONGSTRETH, Esq., for plaintiff.

The opinion was delivered by McKENNAN, Circuit Judge, on October 4th, 1875.

As far back as 1809, at least, it was the practice in the Federal courts, in this district, to issue writs of foreign attachment according to the laws of the State of Pennsylvania. Fisher v. Consequa, 2 Wash. C. C. R. 382, and Toland v. Sprague, 12 Pet. 300, are proofs of the existence of this practice. In some, only, of the United States Circuits did this practice prevail, while in others its legality was denied. But in Toland v. Sprague a majority of the Supreme Court held, that, in the courts of the United States, the right to attach property to compel the appearance of persons can be properly used only in cases in which such persons are amenable to the process of the court, in personam. The question was certainly presented in the case, and although it was not necessary to the judgment to decide it, as was held by the four dissenting judges, yet the case must be considered as deciding that the Federal courts, under the law as it then stood, had no authority to proceed by foreign attachment, as it was regulated by the laws of Pennsylvania.

But, doubtless, in view of this decision, the act of Congress of June 6th, 1872, greatly enlarges the authority of the Federal courts in the employment of remedies. By the sixth section of that act, Rev. Stat. sec. 915, it is enacted that "in common law causes in the Circuit and District Courts the plaintiff shall be entitled to similar remedies, by attachment or other process against the property of the defendant, which are now provided by the laws of the State in which such court is held for the courts thereof."

The Federal courts in this State are thus invested with undoubted authority to proceed against non-resident persons by attachment of their property, as may be done by the laws of the State.

Was the plaintiff, then, entitled to an allowance of his motion for judgment against the tdefendant for default of appearance? It was denied by the court below, for the reason that the cause of action, as appears from the declaration, would not support a proceeding by foreign attachment.

The action is debt, and the declaration avers that a limited partnership was formed between Charles Vezin and the defendant, to the capital of which the defendant contributed $50,000 as a special partner; that during the continuance of the term, at certain times stated, the defendant withdrew from the capital contributed by him specific sums of money, as and in the name of interest on the said capital, whereby the original capital was reduced by the amount so received by him; and the demand is to recover from the defendant these several sums as received by him in violation of law.

The suit is brought to enforce a statutory liability claimed to be imposed upon the special partner, under the circumstances stated in the declaration. By the statute (Brightly's Purdon, 937,) it is enacted "that if it shall appear that by the payment of interest or profits to any special partner the original capital has been reduced, the partner receiving the same shall be bound to restore the amount necesssry to make good his share of capital with interest." The liability to restore is complete, if the payments to a special partner reduces the capital, and he may be compelled to repay the deficiency in his share of the capital thus caused by an appropriate action.

Is a foreign attachment then an allowable method in Pennsylvania of commencing such action?

Any demand arising ex contractu which is susceptible of ascertainment by a definite standard may be the foundation of a foreign attachment. In Strock v. Little, 9 Wr. 418. Mr. Justice Woodward, says "under our statutes, which being remedial, are to be liberally construed, foreign attachments may issue in all actions sounding in contract, where the plaintiff can swear to the amount claimed, or the court, upon a rule to show cause of action, can get at the sum in controversy with sufficient accuracy to fix the amount of bail which the defendant is to give to dissolve the attachment." This is the settled construction of the Pennsylvania statutes, and the demand in this case is fully within it. It is a determinate and certain sum, received under circumstances, stated in the declaration, which imposed upon the defendant a statutory obligation to repay it, and for the recovery of which an action ex contractu is the appropriate remedy.

The motion of the plaintiff in error for judgment for default of appearance by the defendant ought, therefore, to have been granted, and the cause is remanded to the District Court, with directions to allow said motion and to enter judgment accordingly.—Legal Gazette.

U. S. CIR. COURT, W. D. OF PA.

THE SCHUYKILL NAVIGATION CO. v. ELLIOTT.

1. The act of Congress of July 14, 1870, re-enacts the sections of the act of 1864, in reference to the tax of five per cent. on the amount of interest upon a corporation's bonded indebtedness.

2. Congress has the right to impose a tax by a new statute, although the measure of the tax is governed by the income of the past year.

Opinion by McKENNAN, CIR. J. October 4th, 1875.

On the 10th and 16th of September, 1870, the plaintiff returned to the internal revenue assessor the amount of interest upon its bonded indebtedness, payable on and between the 1st days of January and July, 1870, upon which a tax of 5 per cent. was assessed by the assessor and paid by the plaintiff under protest to the defendant, as collector; and the question to be determined is, whether this interest was subject to taxation.

If the 120th, 121st, 122nd, and 123d sections of the Internal Revenue Act of June 30th, 1864, and its Amendments in 1866 and 1867, did not expire by limitation with the year 1869, except as to the income tax properly so considered, as was held by the Circuit Court for the first Circuit, in the Concord R. R. Co. v. Topliff, Int. Rev. Record, vol. 21, No. 10, there can be no doubt of the liability of the plaintiff for the tax imposed. And, indeed, it is very difficult to gainsay the conclusion of the court in that case, supported, as it is, by very cogent reasons.

But whether this be so or not, the Act of July 14th, 1870, Stat. at Large, vol. 16, p. 261, is decisive of the plaintiffs liability. Nothwithstanding the peculiarity of its phraseology, the Supreme Court holds in the case of Stockdale. Collector, v. The Atlantic Insurance Co. of New Orleans, 20 Wall. 323, that the 17th section of that act re-enacts sections 122 and 123 of the Act of 1864, as modified by subsequent statutes, and subjects to the tax imposed by them the earnings of corporations which accrued before its passage. Mr. Justice Miller, delivering the opinion of the court, says: "The right of Congress to have imposed this tax by a new staute, although the measure of it was governed by the income of the past year, cannot be doubted; much less can it be doubted, that it could impose such a tax on the income of the current year, though part of that year had elapsed when the statute was passed. * * * The paragraph we have been considering was not, in its essence, an attempt to construe a statute differently from what the courts had construed it, for no construction on this subject had been given by any court. Nor was it an attempt, by construing a statute, to interfere with or invade personal rights, which were beyond the Constitutional power of Congress. But it was a legitimate exercise of the taxing power, by which a tax, which might be supposed to have expired, was levied and continued in existence for two years longer. It was, therefore, valid for that purpose, and the tax must be upheld."

Although the contested assessment in that case was upon corporate earnings, the principle of the decision is equally applicable to a tax levied upon the interest payable on corporate bonds, because the tax upon both is imposed by the same sections of the Act of 1864, 1866 and 1867, which the court declare are continued in force by the Act of 1870. As the tax in question was assessed after the passage of that act, it must be held to have been legally demandable; and judgment will, therefore, be entered on the special verdict for the defendant.

U. S. DIST. COURT, W. D. OF MO.

DELIVERED OCT. 11, 1874.

We are under obligations to Mack J. Leaming, of the Jefferson City bar, for the following charge of KREKEL, J., to the jury in the case of the United States v. James Blackburn et al., charged with conspiring and going in disguise on the highway for the purpose of depriving Frank Lucas and others as a class of persons, and because of their being colored citizens of the United States of African decent, of the equal protection of the laws and of the equal privileges and immunities under the laws. The court charged the jury as follows:

JUDGE KREKEL'S CHARGE.

U. S. v. Blackburn et al. } Indictment for conspiracy to deprive colored citizens of the equal protection of the laws and equal privileges and immunities.

The defendants are indicted for conspiring together and going in disguise on the highway, and on the premises of Lucas and others for the purpose of depriving them, as a class of persons, and because of their being colored citizens of the United States of African descent, of the equal protection of the laws, and of equal privileges and immunities under the laws. The offenses charged consist in the conspiring together, for the purpose of depriving colored citizens as a class, of the equal protection of the laws and of equal privileges and immunities to which they are entitled.

At the present stage of the proceedings the indictment must be treated not only as charging an offense against the laws of the United States, but as doing so in due form of law. No inquiry or suggestion as to the constitutionality of the law will therefore be proper or indulged in. In the first place the indictment charges a conspiracy, which is defined to be a combination of two or more persons, to commit the crime charged in the indictment, namely: the depriving colored citizens as a class, and because of their being colored, of the equal protection of the law and of equal privileges and immunities to which they are entitled. It is not necessary that there should be direct proof of a conspiracy but such as may be inferred from acts of the parties, such as going together in disguise in the night-time, the doing of illegal acts, in which two or more unite, using language in the hearing of each other indicating a common purpose, in fine, anything satisfying your mind that they acted in harmony with a common design and for a common illegal purpose. The indictment further charges, and you must be satisfied from the evidence in the case, that the object in the conspiracy was against the persons named in the indictment or some one or more of them as a class, and because of their being colored citizens. You cannot find these defendants guilty of any offense under this indictment, if you shall come to the conclusion that their acts, however criminal, were crimes committed without any design and purpose to deprive the colored citizens named in the indictment, or some of them, because they were colored, of the equal protection of the law or equal privileges and immunities, which the law guarantees to them.

Acts such as entering the houses of colored persons only, while on their nightly, illegal and criminal errants; talk such as, we will give you a touch of the Civil Rights Bill; notices such as indicate hostility to colored schools, more or less tend to lead you to proper conclusion in reference to their object, design and intention. Crimes, however, such as these defendants are charged with when committed without any design to effect particular persons or a particular class, are punishable under State laws only.

The law guarantees equal protection to all. It is no defense, or even a mitigation in the legal sense, that the colored persons named in the indictment were charged by the perpetrators of the outrages, or other parties, with illegal acts or crimes, for if they had been guilty of any such, they were entitled to trials in the courts ordained for that purpose.

The failing to resort to them strongly tends to show that the wrongs pretended to have been committed were private, rather than public wrongs, and that the charges against them were invented to palliate, if not justify their illegal acts. Further, if you shall find, from the evidence, that the colored people of the township in which the colored persons named in the indictment resided, were, under the law, by virtue of the number of children of suitable school age, entitled to have a public school, and that the defendants, or any two or more of them, conspired by illegal means to deprive them, as a class, and on account of their color, of such school, either by driving them off or intimidating them, in order to prevent them from availing themselves of the benefit of the law, such acts tend to show, in the language of the indictment, that their object was the depriving them, as a class of persons and because of their being colored, of their legal rights.

By the equal protection of the laws, spoken of in the indictment, is meant that the ordinary means and appliances which the law has provided shall be used and put in operation alike in all cases of violation of law; hence, if the outrages and crimes shown to have been committed in the case before you, were well known to the community at large, and that community and the officers of the law wilfully failed to employ the means provided by law to ferret out and bring to trial the offenders, because of the victims being colored, it is a depriving them of the equal protection of the law.

Aside from the depriving of colored persons, as a class, of the equal protection of the laws, charged in the indictment, it also charges that they were deprived of equal privileges and immunities under the laws.

The privileges and immunities here spoken of are defined in an early decision by Justice Washington to be such as "belong of right to citizens of all free governments, and which have at all times been enjoyed by the citizens of the several States, and comprehend the enjoyment of life and liberty with the right to acquire and possess property of every kind, and to pursue and obtain happiness and safety." The enjoyment of life and liberty implies safety to person and property. The illegal and criminal interference with either by the defendants, or two or more of them, is to deprive the person or persons so interfered with, of equal privileges and immunities, and if such interference was with the intent to solely affect the colored persons named in the indictment as a class, and on account of their color, this charge of the indictment is made out.

The government, through a grand jury, has accused the defendants of the crime charged. For the purpose of the trial, the defendants are considered innocent. The government must prove the charges, and satisfy your minds as to the guilt of the defendants, or two or more of them, beyond a reasonable doubt. By a reasonable doubt is meant the waivering of the mind in coming to a conclusion, from the evidence, as to the guilt or innocence of the party charged.

If, on a careful examination of the whole testimony in the case, your mind shall be in hesitation or doubt as to the guilt or innocence of all, or any of the parties, you shall acquit all, or such regarding whom you have such doubt. If you are satisfied beyond such doubt of the guilt of two or more of the defendants, you should find a verdict of guilty as to such, about whom you have no doubt.

You are the sole judges of the weight, under the law as laid down by the court, you will give to the facts testified to, and of the credibility of the witnesses. Of the credibility of the witnesses, you must judge as men who are familiar with the affairs of life. Before you, on the one side, is a class of witnesses, who but a short time since were denied the right to testify against their former masters, the whites. As witnesses, we have had but little experience with them. Whether flaws in their moral character will similarly affect their character as to truth and veracity when upon the witness stand, as we suppose of whites, you must judge. Their conduct on the witness stand, the promptness and directness, the intelligence with which they answered or failed to answer inquiries made of them in your presence, are proper to be considered in estimating their credibility. On the other hand, you have their former masters, whites, testifying against them. How far they may, unknown to themselves, possibly be influenced by prevailing prejudices, you are to judge. I can but ask you to give these matters the most careful consideration.

In reference to the alibi undertaken to be shown by the defendants, I call your attention to the fact that it is a defense which is set up by the defendants and must be made out by them to your satisfaction. The law regarding the strength or weakness of the alibi made out by the facts and circumstances testified to, has been so fairly presented on both sides in the arguments of counsel, that I need not further allude to it. You are authorized to find all, or as many of the defendants guilty, or not guilty, as you in your judgment, in the application of the law as given you by the court, applied to the facts and circumstances testified to, may determine.

We are indebted to the law firm of ROSENTHAL & PENCE, of this city, for the following opinion:

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

THE CHARTER QUO WARRENTO CASE.

We published, in 8 CHICAGO LEGAL NEWS, 18, the opinion of the Supreme Court of this State, by SHELDON, J., passing upon the validity of the reorganization of this city under the act of 1872. In that opinion the court failed to pass upon the cross-errors assigned by Judge LAWRENCE and A. M. PENCE, counsel for the Citizen's Association. Last week they moved the court to take up and dispose of the cross-errors. The court granted the motion, and on Monday last the following opinions were filed in the case:

SHELDON, J.

Appellee has assigned cross-errors on the ruling of the Court below in sustaining demurrers to the fourth, fifth, and sixth replications to the third amended plea.

The sixth replication was as follows:

And by way of further replication to said third plea as amended, leave of the Court for that purpose being first had and obtained, said Charles H. Reed, State's Attorney, etc. says, precludi non, because he says that at the pretended election so held on the 23d day of April, 1875, no poll books were kept of the votes at the polling places in the First, Second, Seventh, Eight, Ninth, Eleventh, Eighteenth, and Twentieth, Wards in said city. That no clerks were appointed for said polling-places, nor were any clerks present at such places, nor were any poll-books or other record kept upon which were entered the names of the voters so voting at such places, nor were any numbers placed upon the ballots so cast at such polling-places.

And he further avers that all the ballots, so cast at such polling places, were counted by said judges of said polling places.

And he further avers that the judges of said polling-places made returns of the ballots so cast at said places to the Common Council of the City of Chicago.

And he further avers that no clerks attested the returns of said judges of said polling-places.

And he further avers that no poll-lists or tally-sheets were returned by said judges with the said returns so made by them to the said Common Council.

And he further avers that said Common Council did canvass said pretended returns of the judges of the polling-places in said First, Second, Seventh, Eight, Ninth, Eleventh, Eighteenth, and Twentieth Wards, and did count and allow the returns so made by the said judges of election in said wards last mentioned as having been cast at said pretended election in said wards.

And he further avers that the returns of said judges of election in said wards last mentioned, so canvassed by said Common Council, showed a majority in favor of incorporating said city under said law of 1872, in said plea referred to, which majority exceeded the entire majority in favor of incorporating under said act, as found and declared by said Common Council to be the result of the election in all the wards of said city, to wit, more than 5,000 votes.

And he further avers that some ballots were cast at said pretended election for and some against minority representation in the Common Council of said city.

And he further avers that at all the polling-places in said city, to wit: at the polling-places of the First, Second, Seventh, Eight, Ninth, Eleventh, Eighteenth, and Twentieth Wards in said city, only one ballot-box was used by the judges of election at said polling-places respectively, and that each voter was permitted to cast two ballots at his proper place of voting, and that many voters, to-wit: 5,000, actually cast two ballots at their respective polling-places.

And he further avers that the said judges of election, at their respective polling-places aforesaid, received two ballots from each of the voters so offering to cast two ballots, and that said judges, in said cases, deposited both ballots so cast in a single ballot-box, so kept by said judges respectively as aforesaid.

And he further avers that, during the progress of said election, and subsequent thereto, large numbers of ballots were fraudulently inserted into the said ballot-boxes at the voting of the First, Second, Seventh, Eighth, Ninth, Eleventh, Eighteenth and Twentieth wards in said city, which were not cast by any voter, and that, after the closing of the polls at the respective polling places in said wards, the said judges of election in said wards respectively, to wit: The judges of election in said First, Second, Seventh, Eighth, Ninth, Eleventh, Eighteenth and Twentieth wards, in making up their returns respectively, added to the actual count of votes in favor of said act of A. D. 1872, a large number, to wit: 2,000 votes, which were never cast, and which were never counted out of said ballot-boxes.

And he further avers that all the returns so made by said judges of election were canvassed by said Common Council, and the result was declared to be in favor of adopting said act of A. D. 1872.

Without this, that a valid election was held in said city, in pursuance of said petition, resolution and notice, in manner and form as in said plea is alleged.

And of this, he puts himself upon the country, etc.

The other two replications were like the sixth, except in the omisson of one or more of the particulars of irregularity therein alleged.

The demurrers to the replications were special, assigning various causes of special, demurrer.

The averments as to the casting of two ballots do not necessarily impute anything wrongful to the voters. There were two questions voted upon, of incorporation and minority representation, and we do not understand the averment of the voters casting two ballots to import anything more than that they cast a ballot upon each one of the two questions.

According to the averments of the sixth replication, there was gross irregularity in conducting the election in these specified wards, and fraud on the part of the judges of the election in those wards. But an election is not necessarily to be made void on such grounds, especially in the other wards of the city. The rules prescribed by the law for conducting an election are directory merely, not imperative. Piatt v. People, 29 Ill., 54.

There may be reason shown here for rejecting the returns made from the wards specified as evidence of the votes cast in them, as in Knox County v. Davis, 63 Ill., 405, where it was held that the poll-book and certificate of an election in one of the towns of the county were rightfully rejected as evidence of the vote of town because of fraudulent practices in the conducting of the election.

In support of the ruling of the court in sustaining the demurrers to these replications, we think it sufficient to say that the replications do not aver that the matters alleged affected the actual result of the election.

The averment in that respect is, that the returns in these wards showed a majority for incorporation which exceeded the entire majority in favor of incorporation, as found and declared by said common council to be the result of the election in all the wards of said city, to wit: more than 5,000 votes. It was not enough that the result of the election as found and declared by the common council should have been affected, but it must have been the actual result; the question being whether a majority of the legal votes actually cast were in favor of adopting the law. The result as found and declared by the common council was but evidence of what was the actual result.

In one or more other wards of the city there might have been equal irregularity affecting the returns of a like number of votes against incorporation, counterbalancing the effect of the irregularities charged, as respects the actual result. The issue tendered in this respect should not have been upon the result as found and declared by the common council, but upon the actual result, or as to the majority of legal votes polled.

We are of opinion that the demurrers were properly sustained to the replications.

It has not been necessary to consider whether this proceeding will be against a municipal corporation as a body.

MCALLISTER, J.—I concur, but go further than the above opinion. If the information was bad in substance, the demurrer of relators to defendant's special pleas should have been carried back and sustained to the information. I think the information was bad in substance, on the ground that neither at common law or under our statute will an information in the nature of a quo warranto upon the relation of private individuals lie against a municipal corporotion as a body. As I understand the English cases at common law, such an information against municipal corporation on the relation of private individuals will not lie. Rex v. The Corporation of Carmanthen, 2 Barrows, 869 S. C., 1 W., Blackstone, 187; The People v. Richardson, 4 Cond., 109, and cases there cited. This case is not within our statute. That includes private corporations only.

The recognition of such a doctrine would be fraught with danger to the rights and liberties of the people under local governments. If private individuals may institute and prosecute such cases against the City of Chicago as a body, they may, by parity of reasoning, against the County of Cook as a body, to test the validity of its organization, and if the proceeding will lie, then, by the default or mispleading of an attorney, judgment of ouster may go, and three-quarters of a million of people be divested of all corporate rights and privileges under such local governments.

It would lead to confusion and disorganization of society, if not revolution. If it will lie as to cities and counties, why may it not as to States? Why may not individuals institute suits in the Federal Courts against the State of Illinois, to determine whether the Constitution of 1870 was regularly adopted, and in the same way, by default or the verdict of a jury, obtain a judgment of ouster?

Such cannot be the law. The usual and legal course is to proceed against the individual officers, who, it is claimed, have usurped the franchise as complained of. The court has not passed upon this question by the above opinion; I think it is raised, and therefore express my views upon it. For the reasons given, the demurrer of relators to the defendant's pleas should have been carried back to the information, and sustained to that, as bad in substance.

BREESE, J.—I am disposed to think that an information in the nature of quo warranto, by private individuals, will not lie against a municipal corporation as such, and that the demurrer to the special pleas should be sustained to the information.

WALKER, J.—I incline to the opinion that this information cannot be maintained against a city, town, village, county, township, or other municipality as a body, but it should be against the officers, of the body. That an election for the adoption of the charter cannot be contested in such a proceeding.

SUPREME COURT OF IOWA.

JUNE TERM, 1875.

DANIELS, appellant, v. CHICAGO, IOWA AND NEBRASKA R. CO., et al.

Appeal from Linn District Court.

RAILROAD—LANDS TAKEN FOR—MEASURE OF DAMAGES.

When a railroad company entered upon land necessary for its convenient use without condemnation thereof under the statute, or grant from the owner, and subsequently instituted proceedings under the statute to assess the damage sustained by the owner on account of the appropriation of the land, the measure of his recovery will be the value of the land at the time the railroad entered upon it, with six per centum per annum interest, and not its value at the time of the assessment of damages.

This is a proceeding under the statute instituted by the defendants, railroad corporations, to assess the damages sustained by plaintiff on account of the appropriation and taking by defendants of a lot in Cedar Rapids, owned by plaintiff, for the use of the railroad. Upon an appeal from the assessment made by the sheriff's jury, judgment was rendered in the District Court in favor of plaintiff for the sum of $178; he now appeals to the court. Other facts in the case appear in the opinion.

E. LATHAM for appellant.

N. M. HUBBARD and E. S. BAILEY for appellees.

BECK, J.—The defendants entered upon the lot involved in the action in 1860, and have occupied it since for the use of the railway operated and owned by them. No proceedings were, prior to the present action, instituted by either party to assess plaintiff's damages resulting from such appropriation of his property. In 1871, plaintiff commenced a suit for the possession of the lot which resulted in a judgment in his favor and an affirmance thereof in this court. See 35 Iowa, 129. The defendants therefore instituted this suit, being still in the occupancy of the lot for purposes connected with the operation of their railroad. Upon the trial the court held, and so instructed the jury, that plaintiff was entitled to recover the value of the lot appropriated which it bore in 1860, the date of the appropriation; plaintiff insists that he is entitled to recover the value of the lot at the time of the assessment of damages made by the sheriff's jury. The ruling upon this point presents the only question in the case. We will proceed to its consideration.

Railway corporations are authorized "to take and hold * * * * * so much real estate as may be necessary for the location, construction and convenient use of their railways." Code, § 1241. The right of defendants to appropriate the lot of plaintiff in the manner prescribed by law is not disputed.

It is provided that if the owner of real estate required for the necessary purposes of a railway, refuse to grant the same to the railroad company, or if the owner and the corporation cannot agree upon the compensation to be paid therefor, either party may institute proceedings for the assessment of the land owner's damages. Code, §1244. There is no provision in this statute prohibiting the corporation from entering upon the land prior to the assessment, or requiring the assessment to be had before the land is occupied. The rights of the parties in case the land should be occupied before the assessment are not prescribed by the statute. But this court has held that the railroad company acquires no right to the land until payment of damages. Henry v. D. P. R. Co., 10 Iowa, 540, Code § 1244. If damages have not been assessed, the land owner may recover the possession from the company. Daniels v. C. & N. W. R'y. Co., 35 Iowa, 129. The possession of the company before assessment of damages is that of a trespasser. But the statute evidently contemplates cases where the land may be so held and gives to the owner the remedy of compensation to be recovered by the proceedings instituted by defendant in this case. Code § 1244. Proceedings of this character are not uncommon in such courts, and the right of the land owner to relief in that way cannot be questioned under the language of the section first cited. The railroad company, at any time, after occupancy of the land, if it has not before done so, may institute the proceedings in order to acquire right to hold the land and settle the amount of compensation to be paid to the land owner.

In the case before us the land has been occupied by the defendants since 1860. Since that date both parties have had the right to institute proceedings to assess plaintiff's damages. Defendants have held the land at the sufferance of plaintiff, enjoying its benefits to the same extent as though plaintiffs damages had been assessed. Plaintiff has suffered no greater damage than would have accrued to him had defendant pursued the course pointed out by statute which they are, now by these proceedings pursuing. By these proceedings plaintiff is not deprived of the title to the land; the defendants acquire nothing more than the right to occupy it for railroad purposes. Had they been instituted prior to or upon defendants taking possession of the land no different right would have been acquired by them than they obtain in the present action. In each case the measure of plaintiff's damages is the same, namely, the value of the land without regard to benefits resulting from the improvement. Plaintiff, had the damage been assessed upon the occupancy of the land, would have received no compensation for its prospective uses other than as then would enter into the estimate of its value. The same matters now will determine the value that would have then. It will be seen, in view of these considerations, that the value of the land at the time of the appropriation, with interest upon the sum assessed from that date until judgment in the case is the just measure of the plaintiff's damages.

This conclusion is supported by the further considerations that the remedy by the same proceedings defendants have instituted, has been within plaintiff's reach all the time since the occupation of the land by defendants, and that a different rule of damages claimed by plaintiff, namely, the present value of the land, would in case of the depreciation of the property after the appropriation, work manifest injustice to the land owner.

The following authorities lend support in some degree, to the conclusion above expressed: The Delaware &c. R. R. Co. v. Burron, 61 Pa. St., 369; Railroad v. Gisner, 20 Pa. St., 240; Whiteman v. Boston & M. R. R. Co., 7 Allen, 313; Dickerson v. Inhabitants of Fetchburg, 13 Gray, 546; Parks v. City of Boston, 13 Peck, 198; Vanblaricum v. State, 7 Blackf. 209.

WE are indebted to Hon. JOHN M. SHIRLEY, Official Reporter, for advance sheets of the 54th New Hampshine Reports, from which we take the following head-notes:

BOUNDARY LINE.

A deed contained the following description of one of the lines of the land conveyed: " * * westerly to the river road, so called; thence northerly on the easterly side of said road to," etc.; and it appeared that the grantor was the owner of the soil of the highway. Held, that this description located the line at the centre, and not at the easterly margin of the highway.—(Opinion by LADD, J.)—Woodman v. Spencer, p. 507.

CONTRACT IN RESTRAINT OF TRADE.

A contract in restraint of trade, but limited as to time, place, or persons, is not void upon grounds of public policy, but may be enforced.—Perkins v. Clay, p. 518.

C. sold to H. his cart and business as a butcher for the sum of $90, and agreed not to carry on the same business over the same route which he had formerly run so long as H. should want to carry on the business. Subsequently H. sold to P. the cart and business as butcher for the sum of $90; and C, in consideration that H. had released him from his former agreement, entered into a parol agreement with P. that he would not carry on the same business over the same route for a period of two years. Held, that there was a sufficient consideration for the promise from C. to P., and that the agreement was not within the statute of frauds.

U. S. COAST SURVEY—EMINENT DOMAIN—PAYMENT—TENDER — PUBLIC USE—STATUTE—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW.

It was not the intention of the legislature which enacted the General Statutes, that the assessment of damages, and the tender provided for in ch. 132, should precede the entry upon and injury to lands therein authorized.—(Opinion by HIBBARD, J.)—Orr v. Quimby, p. 590.

A State has constitutional authority to condemn private property for a public use by the United States.

Property taken for the use of the United States coast survey is taken for a public use.

Chapter 132 of the General Statutes is not unconstitutional, because it does not require an assessment of damages, and payment or tender of the sum assessed, before the entry upon and injury to lands therein authorized, nor provide for a definite and certain fund to secure the payment of compensation. DOE, J., dissenting.

A party injured, under the authority of ch. 132 of the General Statutes, is not entitled to commence an action of tort and maintain it, uhtil an assessment of his damages shall have been made under the statute, and the sum assessed paid or tendered.

An agent of the United States, entering upon and doing injury to land, in the service of the coast survey, under the authority of ch. 132 of the General Statutes, will be liable to an action of tort, unless such entry and injury were reasonably necessary for the purposes of the coast survey.

DIGEST OF INSURANCE DECISIONS.

DESCRIPTION.

Fire.—Not a Warranty of Title.—The policy insured plaintiff "on his two buildings." Held, that the phrase was merely descriptive, not a warranty of ownership. Niblo v. Ins. Co., S. C. Fire—Of the Insured by Terms of Policy.—The application was incorrectly filled by the agent from correct representations by the insured. But the policy made the agent of the insured, and not under any circumstances. The truthfulness of the application was a warranty. Held, that the terms of the contract must be enforced, and the breach of warranty was not avoided by the knowledge or acts of agent.

INSURABLE INTEREST.

Fire—Of General Creditor.—A general creditor of the estate of one deceased whose personal property left is insufficient for the payment of his debts, has an insurable interest in the sole real estate of the deceased debtor, when it is plain that if it is damaged by fire a pecuniary loss must ensue to the creditor thereby. 1 Arnold on Mar. TITLE.

Fire.—Agreement to Sell.—A verbal agreement to sell, payment to be made by crediting on an existing debt, without any visible outward act in furtherance of the transaction, is not a change of title which avoids the policy. WARRANTY.

FIRE.—Breach of.—Where plaintiff made no representation as to his interest further than to show the agent the instrument by virtue of which he claimed an interest, Held, that the policy phrase, "on his two buildings," even if more than a mere description, was not a phrase for which the insured was in any way responsible. Plaintiff, in his notice of loss, stated his ownership as that of "legal heir of his deceased wife;" he was in reality a general creditor of her estate by virtue of an instrument executed by her before her decease. Held, that this was no intentional deception, or anything calculated to mislead. Rohrbach v. Ætna Ins. Co.

PRACTICE.

FIRE.—Request to Find.—Where there has been no request to find as to the fact of a breach of warranty, and no exception to a refusal so to find, a court of review will not look into the evidence to reverse a judgment. Smith v. Glen's Falls Ins. Co.

OTHER INSURANCE.

FIRE.—Separate Interest.—P. owned an undivided interest in wool, which he insured without any reference to joint ownership. He afterward insured in another company, with the policy clause attached, "loss, if any, one half payable to George N. Pitney, as his interest may appear,"—George N. Pitney being the joint tenant. Held, that the policies attached to the same subject matter of insurance, and the second policy was other insurance with reference to the first. Mussey v. Atlas Ins. Co., 14 N. Y., 84; Ogden v. East River Ins. Co., 50 N. Y., 389; Case of Howard Ins. Co. v. Scribner, excepted.

A renewal is not other insurance, and where the act of the agent amounted to a waiver of the required indorsement when the policy was issued, the indorsement is not required by the renewal. Pitney v. Glen's Falls Ins. Co.

THE REJECTED LAWYER.

RUFUS F. ANDREWS SUPERSEDED AS THE ATTORNEY OF THE WIDOW TAYLOR—THE REASONS WHY.

The New York Herald says concerning a case recently reported in the Indianapolis Sentinel: In one form and another the Taylor will case appears to be an unending legacy to the courts. On behalf of Mrs. Sarah B. Taylor, widow of James B. Taylor, the decedent, a motion was made recently before Judge Donohue, in Supreme Court chambers, to substitute Messrs. Wingate & Cullen as her counsel in place of Rufus F. Andrews. Judge Donohue rendered his decision yesterday granting the application. His decision is as follows:

"Mrs. Taylor asks leave to substitute an attorney in place of Rufus F. Andrews, her present attorney. It is objected, on behalf of Mr. Andrews, that, first, he can not be substituted without cause shown; second that he then can only be substituted on such terms as are just; that such terms should be the payment of all the amounts due him for costs and counsel fees, and some advances he has made outside of the suits; third, that Mrs. Taylor is not a person to be trusted with the direction of her affairs, because she consults and has consulted the spirits for some time past, and supposes she acts under their direction. Before disposing of the questions raised, I desire to notice a statement, in the opposing papers, that Mr. Taylor, in a charge to be made, expects and hopes there would be political influence obtained.

Such statements on this motion are entirely out of place, and, in my judgment, unworthy of counsel. If the evidence of such influence in lawsuits exists there is a place and a way in which redress for it may be had, and to that tribunal the facts should be submitted; but the mere assertion of counsel can not, on the motion, deprive Mrs. Taylor of her right. Those rights are: First, where a party has differed, as here, with the attorney, the court will not permit one of its officers to insist on the right of retaining the management of the case against her wish; second, as to any advances outside of the lawsuits, there is no lien either on the attorney's possession of her papers or her claim in her own suits; third, it is evident from the reiterated statements in the opposing affidavits, that the attorney knew that Mrs. Taylor had nothing but what the will gave her or she may get out of the estate. It would, therefore, be unjust and against good conscience for the attorney to claim immediate payment for services which his own statement shows he knew must be paid out of future assets. The substitution must therefore be made, on the party filing a stipulation that her interest in the estate, when realized, shall be subject to any judgment her attorney may have against her for the services for which he claims compensation. The allegation that Mrs. Taylor had acted under the advice of or in consultation with spirits comes with poor grace from the counsel, who has, as he claims, acted for years on her information, so obtained, and allowed her to do it. If he has deemed such communications of use heretofore he shows no reason but her desire to change why he does not think so now."

THE London Law Times says: The truth of the adage "penny wise and pound foolish" is well illustrated in the course adopted by a large class of persons in regard to the making of their last will and testament. It is a common practice with many people to purchase a printed form of will, which, when filled up and attested in supposed compliance with the Wills Act, satisfies the would-be will maker that he or she has disposed of his or her worldly belongings in conformity with his or her intentions. The following case of this kind has just come under our notice: A man of small property purchased at a stationer's shop a printed form of will, the printed form of attestation to which was in these terms: "Signed by the testator and acknowledged by him to be his last will and testament in the presence of us present at the same time and described by us as witnesses in the presence of the said testator and of each other." In this condition the form was used by the testator, and, as a necessary consequence, the clerk of the seat in the principal registry (on the will, oath to lead the grant, and affidavit for the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, being carried in, to obtain a grant of Probate) required an affidavit of due execution, which in the particular case has involved an expenditure of some pounds, and has occasioned considerable delay. It is readily admitted by most of the clerks of the seat at Somerset House that it is frequently necessary, in cases where printed forms are used, to require additional affidavits by which small estates of deceased persons are put to extra expense.

Novel incidents appear, now and then, to enliven the practice of law in Southern India, and give occasion to judicial remonstrances, such as the following from the judge of the Salem sessions: "Circular No. 10 of 1875. The sessions judge brings to the notice of the district magistrate that a sub-magistrate, in a case committed by him to the court, sent up the head of a sheep which had been severed from its body some three months previous to the special sessions, evidently with a view to its being identified as the head of the animal forming the subject of the theft. The sub-magistrate in question evinced an utter want of discretion in sending up this sheep's head, as he must have known, as remarked by the judge, that it would be so decomposed before the commencement of the trial of the accused as to be beyond the possibility of identification. The district magistrate hereby directs all sub magistrates to use discretion in sending up to the court such things as decomposed sheep's heads, decomposed human bones, decomposed vegetables, and other similar property, in cases committed by them for trial; all the above having, at some time or other, been sent up to the sessions court—June 29, 1875." A short time ago the chief magistrate of another part of the presidency had to remonstrate still more seriously with the head official of a remote village for exercising "undue discretion." It appeared that a stranger, an East Indian, died with suspicious suddenness while he was passing through the village. After due consideration and consultation the official determined to have the body decapitated and the head exposed on a pole in the highway "for the purpose of identification." This not proving very successful, the head was, after the lapse of three or four days, duly dispatched to the chief station in the district as the "massam" of a probable crime." "Massam" means the chief piece of criminating circumstantial evidence; and it is, according to the notion of the majority of South Indian Hindus, so necessary for conviction that they will prefer a decomposed and unrecognizable "massam" to none at all.—Pall Mall Gazette.

EJECTMENT—ESTOPPEL—COUNTY ATTORNEY.—The opinion of the United States Circuit Court for the District of Oregon, by DEADY, J., in an ejectment suit, involving several questions of pleading, estoppel, and the right of an attorney to appear for a county who is not the county attorney.

FEDERAL COURTS—FOREIGN ATTACHMENT.—The opinion of the United States Circuit Court for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania, by MCKINNAN, J., holding that under the provisions of the act of June 5th, 1872, Revised Statutes, section 915, the Federal courts may issue process of foreign attachment against the property of non-residents, where the same would lie under the laws of the State in which such court is held. The question arises, What effect, if any, section 18 of the act of March 3d, 1875, Statutes at Large, 470, has upon the act of 1872.

POWER OF CONGRESS TO IMPOSE TAX.—The opinion of the United States Circuit Court for the E. D. of Pa., by MCKINNAN, J., in the Schuykill N. Co. v. Elliott, 32 Leg. Intel., 362, held that Congress has a right to impose a tax by a new statute, although the measure of the tax is governed by the income of the last year.

THE CIVIL RIGHTS BILL—RIGHTS OF COLORED CHILDREN.—The charge of KREKEL, J., of the District Court of the United States for the Western District of Missouri, to the jury in a case where several persons were tried upon a charge of whipping certain colored persons because they were colored, and that they went on the highway in disguise to frighten and maltreat certain negroes because they were negroes. This charge will attract attention. It is evident that the judge does not mean that the civil rignts bill shall remain a dead, when he is asked to apply it to a case in his court where the evidence warrants.

THE CITY QUO WARRANTO CASE.—The opinion of the Supreme Court delivered in the quo warranto case, brought to test the validity of the re-organization of the city under the act of 1872, upon the cross errors assigned by Judge Lawrence and Mr. Pence, counsel for the citizens association, it will be remembered by our readers, that the court failed to pass upon the cross errors in the opinion disposing of the case which was published in 8 CHICAGO LEGAL NEWS, 18.

RAILROAD—LAND TAKEN FOR—MEASURE OF DAMAGES.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of Iowa, by BECK, J., holding that when a railroad company entered upon land necessary for its convenient use without condemnation thereof under the statute, or grant from the owner, and subsequently instituted proceedings under the statute to assess the damages sustained by the owner on account of the appropriation of the land, the measure of his recovery will be the value of the land at the time the railroad entered upon it, with six per cent. per annum interest, and not its value at the time of the assessment of damages.

ENLISTMENT OF ALIENS IN MILITIA.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of New York, by LAWRENCE, J., holding that an alien who voluntary enlists in a New York militia regiment, cannot be discharged on the ground that he is an alien.

POWER OF ADMINISTRATOR TO COMPROMISE CLAIM.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of Tennessee, by NICHOLSON, C. J., as to the power of an administrator to compromise a doubtful claim.

NOTES TO RECENT CASES.

BILL OF EXCHANGE—INSOLVENCY OF DRAWER AND ACCEPTOR.

The English Court of Appeal in Chancery, in ex parte The General S. A. Co., 33 L. T. R. N. S., 112, held that the doctrine of ex parte Warring, 19 Ves., 345, does not apply to a case where, although both the parties to a bill of exchange are actually insolvent, yet only one of them has his affairs under judicial administration, while the other is not subject to any jurisdiction and retains the ordinary rights of property.

ARREST OF DEBTOR—DISCHARGE FROM CUSTODY—ATTORNEY—ATTACHMENT.

The English Court of Appeal in Chancery, in ex parte Deere 33, L. T. R. N. S. 114, where an attorney was ordered by a court of law to pay a sum of money, and did not comply with the order. And he was afterward adjudged a bankrupt, and a rule for an attachment against him for non-compliance with the order having been made absolute by the Court of Exchequer, and the bankrupt was arrested and sent to jail. It was held, on an application to the bankrupt court to discharge him from custody, that as the attachment had been issued by a court of competent jurisdiction againt its own officer, the court of bankruptcy, in the exercise of the discretion given it by the 13th section of the bankruptcy act of 1869, would not interfere with the process of the court of common law.

BANKRUPTCY—COMPOSITION—EXECUTION CREDITOR.

The English Court of Appeal in Chancery in ex parte Jones, held, under the English Act of Bankruptcy, that where an execution creditor delivered the writ to the sheriff, after the debtor had filed a liquidation petition and the creditors afterwards duly resolved to accept a composition, that the execution creditor was entitled to have his debt satisfied in full by sale of the goods seized by the sheriff under the writ.

DAMAGES FOR OPENING STREET.

The Supreme Court of Pa., in Tenbrooke v. Jahke, 32 Leg. Intel., 363, held that damages for the opening of roads and streets are a personal claim; that they are assessed in favor of the owner at the time of the injury, and do not run with the land.

The Court of Appeals of Maryland, in Weckler v. The 1st N. Bank of Hagerstown, 14 Am. Law Reg., N. S., 609, held in an action of deceit against a national bank, seeking to recover damages for the alleged fraudulent representations of its teller made in the sale to the plaintiff of certain railroad bonds; that the business of selling bonds on commission, is not within the scope of the powers of national banking association, and the bank cannot, under any circumstances, carry it on; and being thus beyond its corporate power, the defense of ultra vires is open to it, and the bank is not responsible for any false representations, by which the plaintiff may have been damnified, made by its teller, in any such dealing.

REPORTS OF CASES IN LAW AND EQUITY DETERMINED IN THE SUPREME COURT OF THE STATE OF IOWA. By John S. Runnells, Reporter. Vol. I. Being Volume XXXVIII, of the series. Des Moines: Mills & Company, Law Publishers. 1875.

The only fault we have to find with this volume is that it has been tardy in reaching the LEGAL NEWS office. This is Mr. Runnells' first volume of reports, and we must say we are agreeably disappointed to find it a model volume. There is but one long syllabus in it; all the rest are exceedingly short and accurate. The volume is so arranged that a person can soon find what is in it. The index is very short, yet so constructed that it reveals the contents of the volume at a glance. There is a general feeling of the bar that long indexes in reports should be avoided. The reporter says that the names of cases have been given in the shortest possible form. All descriptive titles and official designations have been discarded, as the object is facility of reference to the principle only, and that any thing in the name of the case more than is absolutely necessary to identify it is unnecessay and cumbersome. The law limits the number of reports to two volumes each year, and as a consequence the reporter has to contract and not expand. At the end of the volume is an appendix containing cases not otherwise reported. We notice that Mr. Runnells gives the date when each opinion is delivered. This should be done in all reports, as it enables a person to tell which is the latest utterance of the court, which is often important in case of conflicting opinions.

A TREATISE ON PLEADING AND PRACTICE IN ACTIONS AND SPECIAL PROCEEDINGS AT LAW AND EQUITY, IN THE COURTS OF IOWA, UNDER THE CODE OF 1873. Revised Edition. By William E. Miller, Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Iowa. Des Moines: Mills & Company, Law Publishers. 1875.

Every Iowa lawyer should feel proud that so finely an executed volume is the work of a publishing house in his own State. Judge Miller very appropriately dedicates his work to the gentlemen of the Iowa bar. The country is flooded with works upon pleading and practice, written by men who are ignorant of the first principles of pleading, and never had any practice of their own. It is really a pleasure to examine a book like Judge Miller's, where the propositions in the text are clearly and concisely stated, and the forms given are founded upon legal principles and divested of all surplusage. The former edition of this work was received with great favor by the profession in Iowa. The many changes made in the statutes of that State by the adoption of the Code of 1873, rendered a revision of the work necessary. The text of the work has been largely re-written; it embodies all the decisions of the Supreme Court of Iowa published and unpublished applicable to the law of pleading and practice in that State rendered before the work went to press. The volume has a very complete general index, as well as an index to the forms, which number over two hundred and fifty. The work is not only indispensable to Iowa lawyers, but valuable to all attorneys in other States having Codes like that of Iowa. It will be forwarded to any address by the publishers upon the receipt of $7.50.

APPOINTMENT OF NOTARY PUBLIC.

CHICAGO, ILL., Oct. 11, 1875.

ED. LEGAL NEWS:

DEAR MADAM: You will confer a favor on us by giving your opinion on the Statute cap. 99, p. 721, sect. 1, reading thus: That the governor may appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the senate, and commission as notaries public, as many persons having the qualification of electors, and resident in the county in this State for which they are appointed, as he may deem necessary.

The Constitution, Art. VII, Sect. I, reads thus: Every person having resided in this State one year, in the county 90 days, and in the election district 30 days, etc., etc. And sect. 6, ib., says: No person shall be elected or appointed to any office in this State, civil or military, who is not a citizen of the United States, and who shall not have resided in this State one year next preceding the election or appointment.

Now, what I want to know is, has a person, to have the qualification (for the appointment of a notary public) of sect. 1, or of sect. 6 of art. VII, of the Constitution, or, in other words, what is meant by the words, "having the qualification of electors," in Statute ch. 99, p. 721, sect. 1, above set forth?

Respectfully yours, W. M. S.

ANSWER.—Construing the statute in the light of the Constitution, we are of the opinion that a person to be appointed a notary public, must be a citizen of the United States.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

THE ILL. RAILROAD TAX INJUNCTION CASES.—Attorney General Edsall has prepared petitions and affidavits in what are known as the railroad tax injunction cases, and gone to Washington to get them advanced on the docket so as to secure an early hearing of the questions involved. Mr. Edsall is sanguine in the opinion that he will be able to secure a reversal of the judgments below. He is faithful and earnest in looking after the interests of the State, and makes an able and efficient Attorney General. He is in no way connected with the rings that invest the State house.

SUPREME COURT OF INDIANA—NEW RULE.—The Supreme Court of Indiana on last Wednesday entered the following new rule, which is numbered 36: "When it shall be discovered, or when objection shall be made, after a cause has been submitted, that the transcript is not legally certified, or that the clerk has not affixed his seal thereto, the appeal will not be dismissed for such reason, unless the appellant shall fail to remedy the defect within such reasonable time, as the court may fix, according to 2 G. & H., 278, section 581, of which time he shall have notice from the clerk of the court."

CHARGES of unprofessional conduct have been preferred by the Chicago Bar Association against A. Goodrich, of the Chicago bar, the rule to show cause being returnable on Oct. 20, 1875.

ONE-THIRD of the legal publications of the United States are printed and published in the State of Pennsylvania.

Dr. SAMUEL T. SPEAR, editor of the New York Independent, has a very able article in that publication of the 7th inst., upon the limitation of legislative power, from which we take the following extract:

Law, for the purpose of enforcing contracts, claims the right to decide as to the class of persons legally competent to make contracts and as to the subject-matter of the contracts to which it will give its support. A lawful contract is, hence, one in which the parties have the "contractual capacity" and in which the contents of their agreement lie within the scope of legal recognition. To such contracts legal rights attach, and out of them legal duties arise, and this is what is meant by the obligation of contracts. The contracting parties are left free to make their own bargain, and what the law does is not to make a new bargain, for them or alter the one they have made; but to bind them to good faith with each other according to the terms of their contract. This it does by ascertaining what the contract is and providing a suitable remedy against its non-fulfillment.

Monetary contracts, or those in which money is stipulated to be paid by one party to the other, are embraced in these general principles of law. Money in some form is one of the most universal terms of contracts. The connection between contracts and money is, hence, so intimate, so constant, and so important that law justly assumes and exercises the right of determining what shall be money. It must do so in order to supply a general rule for courts in the enforcement of contracts. That which is the standard for computing and expressing all other values and is, therefore, the medium of exchange transactions and to which courts must refer in enforcing money contracts ought to have a definite and fixed character, known to the law and established by law. What law can do on this subject is contained in two statements: 1. It can, as its own exclusive right, provide the process of furnishing the money of use within the limits of its own jurisdiction. 2. It can make this money a legal tender in payment of debts. Such money is "lawful money." It has the sanction of law, and, hence, the general rule is that whatever has this sanction is money.

It would, however, be a very serious mistake to assume that law is omnipotent as the creator and establisher of money, and can, therefore, make one thing serve as money just as well as another. There are some things on this subject which law cannot do and there are others which it ought not to do; and both classes are limitations upon its power.

Underlying the exchange transactions of society, we find the two generic elements of quantity as determined by a standard of weight or extension, and of value as ascertained and fixed by a standard of value. Each must have a standard, and it is the province of law to select and define a suitable standard for each. The Constitution assigns this duty to Congress in the grant of power "to coin money, regulate the value thereof and of foreign coin, and fix the standard of weights and measures." In the exercise of this power, Congress is subject to certain limitations which grow out of the nature of things. Take, for example, a standard of weight. What Congress can can here do is to establish such a standard by fixing upon something that has weight, and by declaring that as the unit of weight it shall be the means of computing and expressing all other quantities by weight. To this unit and to its multiples or its divisions it can give names that shall be both definite and intelligible, as forming a part of the language of contracts. It can do the same thing in respect to the measures of extension; but in regard to neither can it create the weight or the extension, or make that a standard of weight which has no weight or that a standard of extension which has no extension. The standard of quantity must have quantity, either by extension or weight; and this necessarily limits the law-making power in fixing "the standard of weights and measures."

Precisely the same necessity applies to money, considered as the standard or measure of values. It is only by its own value that it can compute other values. When a specific commodity is selected from all the rest, whether by usage or by law, as the commodity which shall perform the functions of money in computing the value of other things, and on this account be exchangeable for them, the very first condition of the selection is that the commodity should have value independently of the selection, founded on the twofold fact that men desire it and use it for other purposes and that it takes labor to produce it. This fact is not created by the selection. Those who talk about money as having no value in the material of which it is composed are talking about that which has no exchange power, to which no legal enactment can impart such a power, and which, hence, cannot compute the value of other things. Their kind of money fails in the most elementary function of money. They might as well talk about a standard of weight that has no weight or a standard of extension that has no extension. Credit money, so called, is not money at all, in the real sense, but simply a promise to pay money. Take from the United States notes the dollars which stand behind them as the thing promised, and thus let the question be settled that the promise is never to be fulfilled, and the value of these notes at once sinks to the level of the paper composing them; and nobody pretends that the paper itself has anything to do with their monetary character.

If, for example, Congress should repeal all its coinage and legal tender laws, and substitute iron coins of the same weight as that of gold and silver coins, and then declare them to be dollars and multiples of dollars, having the same legal value as the present coins; or, if it should abandon coinage altogether, and adopt pieces of stamped paper, giving to them the names and legal tender power of these coins, does any one suppose that such substitutes, though having all the sanction that law can give to money, would or could take the place of gold coins and circulate at the same value? Can Congress, by mere law, legislate into an ounce of iron or an ounce of paper the value that naturally belongs to an ounce of gold? He who thinks that this can be done by law is beyond the reach of discussion. The laws of value are older and stronger than human statutes, were never made by them, and can never be unmade by them. The very nature of things imposes limitations upon legislative power when exercised in establishing a standard of quantity or one of value. The exercise is rather declarative than creative.

THE MEMPHIS LAW LIBRARY.

We understand the Memphis Bar Association is not only in a prosperous condition, but its rooms are so arranged that they are a general resort for the members of the Bar. The Memphis Appeal of October 5th, says:

A day or two ago we had occasion to step into the rooms of the Memphis Bar and Law Library Association, and were surprised and pleased to learn the very prosperous condition of that company. The law library has already reached the number of thirty-five hundred and fifty-eight volumes, embracing sets of the reports complete of twenty-two States, and broken sets of the residue of the States, and a large number of rare and of modern micellaneous text-books. Upon the tables also are to be found all the leading quarterly, monthly and weekly law periodicals as they are published. It is gratifying to know, too, that the association is entirely free from debt, and is conducted upon the principle of paying cash for all purchases and incurring no pecuniary liability for any purpose. Nearly or quite all the important lawyers of the city are members. The library is the largest in the State, excepting, perhaps, the State library at Nashville. A noticeable feature is the liberality of the management of the library. All lawyers residing in other States, or in other counties in Tennessee, have the privilege when in Memphis, without charge or ceremony, of the full and free use of the rooms and the books, and all of all the appurtenances of the library, to the entire extent allowed to resident members. And it is the desire of the managers, we are informed, that all lawyers from abroad, when in the city, shall avail themselves of the privilege, and frequent and make use of the rooms and the facilities of the library. It is the place where to find and meet the home lawyers, some of whom are there searching the books at all hours of the day, and large numbers generally in the forepart of the day. A pleasant circumstance, it seems to us, is that the rooms and library are becoming a sort of headquarters for the legal profession. Some of the rooms are set apart exclusively for study and silence, and one large and handsomely furnished room is assigned for conversation and general and free intercourse. The whole concern is highly creditable to the bar of Memphis, and indeed an honor to the city, and deserves a large degree of public favor. A kindly and genial and social set are our lawyers. They study hard and work hard, and that is the rule, without which no one can keep up to the front of the profession here; but when off duty and out of harness, and in their intercourse with each other, they are a cheerful and, indeed, as harmonious and jolly a lot of gentlemen as one can find in a twelve months travel from one end of the continent to the other. Industry and temperance, and fair dealings and honorable conduct, is the rule; and the predominant sentiment among them exacts conformity with the rule. Any one who falls below it soon finds himself out of line and beneath the standard and respect of the better class of his fellow lawyers. Our opinion is, that for hard work, thorough learning and high intelligence, as well as for fair dealing and honorable conduct, the bar of Memphis is quite up to the level of the best professional standard found in any city in America.

WOMEN AS OFFICEHOLDERS.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S REASONS FOR RULING THEM OUT IN NEW JERSEY.

Attorney General Vannatta, of New Jersey, bases his decision as to the legality of the appointment of Mrs. Jones, as jailoress of the Hudson county jail, on reasons which might apply equally to any other woman officeholder in the State. Mrs. Jones has held the place for two years, and probably secured the appointment because in the lifetime of her husband she performed all the duties of the position. No complaint was made of the kind of service rendered. The Attorney General's opinion is only upon the legal points of the case, and he interprets the law of 1874 to say expressly that no woman shall be appointed to any office, and such an appointment he believes to be contrary to the spirit of the laws of the State. Moreover, no person can be legally appointed to an office who cannot fulfill all its duties, and there are jail duties which a woman cannot perform. A married woman could not be able to perform, at all times, all the duties of any office, even if otherwise capable; and the same opinion must apply to a single woman, because she might marry and give rise to two questions: First, as to whether she still held the office, or whether it had lapsed, or whether the husband had any authority; and second, whether, in case of dereliction of duty, the responsibility would lay with the husband or wife.

Mrs. Jones, however, continues to hold the office, and though the subject has been repeatedly discussed by the freeholders, that body has persistently refused to oust her.

DELIVERY—PAROL EXTENSION OF TIME.—The London Law Times of Sept. 18 says:

An important decision in regard to the effect of a parol extension of the time stipulated for the delivery of goods is given in Hickman v. Haynes (32 L. T. Rep., N. S. 873). The case is important not because it has introduced any new principle, but because it shows that our courts of law are not disposed to shake the authority of such cases as Ogle v. Earl Vane (L. Rep, 3 Q. B. 272). The facts are of the usual character in this class of cases. A contract in writing is entered into containing on the one part a promise to deliver, and on the other a promise to accept, certain things by periodical instalments. Before the completion of the contract, one or other of the parties finds it convenient to defer one or more of the instalments, and it is accordingly agreed by word of mouth that the time for delivery shall be extended. Time passes, and one of the parties treats the extension of the time as being almost equivalent to a waiver of right existing under the contract. Such, broadly stated, is the generic character of these cases. In Hickman v. Haynes, the action was for the non-acceptance of twenty-five tons of iron. According to the terms of the original contract, the iron should have been delivered in June, but, by verbal agreement, the delivery was to stand over. In August, the seller grew tired of further waiting, and asked the defendant to accept the installment. The defendant would not. The present action was then brought, and it was held that the plaintiff was entitled to recover. The important point to be determined was whether the parol extension of time so altered the original contract as to admit of the application of the principle of Noble v. Ward (4 H. & C., 149). That case, as is well known, is conclusive to the effect that such a parol agreement as we are discussing, namely, one to extend the time for performing a written contract, and required to be in writing by the Statute of Frauds, does not rescind, or in any way affect such written contract. The decision clearly applicable here is that of Ogle v. Earl Vane, where Mr. Justice Blackburn says: "The plaintiff was willing to wait at the request of the defendant, for the defendant's convenience, and he did wait for a long time, till February; but if he had lost patience sooner and refused to wait longer, he would have had a right to bring his action at once for the breach in July. It is clearly a case of volfntary waiting, and not of alteration of the contract, and the length of time can make no difference." It was properly acknowledged that there was no defense upon the merits. We are always glad when defenses founded upon anything else prove no better than broken reeds.

THE WHISKY CASES—MERGER OF OFFENSES.—The St. Louis Republican of the 28th ult. says: "In the United States circuit court yesterday Justice Miller delivered the opinion of the court on the reserved point in the demurrer to indictment No. 654, the question being that of "merger." The opinion of the court on the other points of the demurrer was given in full in Saturday's REPUBLICAN. In rendering the opinion of the court, Justice Miller said that if in case of a trial in court for misdemeanor and during its progress the testimony showed that a felony had been committed, it would be a question for the court whether the proceedings for the misdemeanor should be discontinued and proceedings for the felony instituted. But in this case the court was not in that category. The first count in the indictment charged a misdemeanor, and the second a felony, and the latter having been charged by the government, it must be considered that the government was in a position to prove that offense. Whilst there was a great difference of opinion among learned authorities in relation to many points in the doctrine of merger, there was a very general agreement, that in case of an indictment charging two grades of offense, the lesser was merged in the greater. The indictment must therefore be considered bad, and the demurrer sustained."

DISQUALIFICATION OF JUDGES.—The New York Weekly Digest publishes the following abstract of a short per curiam opinion of the New York Court of Appeals, in Smith v. Nelson: "This was a motion for a re-argument on the ground that one of the judges who sat on the former argument was disqualified. The affidavit of the moving party showed that the firm of which the judge was a member had appeared as attorneys in the defense of another action, involving some of the questions presented by this appeal. That action was never tried, but was discontinued many years ago. The judge never had any personal knowledge of the pendency of that action, or of the legal questions involved therein. Held, that there was no disqualification; that the statute disqualifies only where a judge has been counsel in the same action. That the judge was compelled by law to sit and act, and even if he had had personal knowledge of the facts set forth in the motion-papers, he would have had no legal excuse for not taking part in the judgment."

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

ABSTRACT OF OPINION FILED AT SPRINGFIELD, IN OCTOBER, 1, 1875.

John Roach and Patrick Roach v. The People, etc.—Error to McLean.—Opinion by McALLISTER, J.

INSTRUCTION IN CRIMINAL CASE ASSUMING FACTS—WHEN HOMICIDE IS JUSTIFIABLE IN SELF-DEFENSE—AND IN DEFENDING POSSESSION OF PROPERTY—CREDIBILITY OF WITNESSES FOR THE JURY TO DECIDE—IMPEACHMENT OF WITNESSES, AND THE EFFECT THEREOF.

STATEMENT.—Indictment for manslaughter—the defendants having killed one Dunlap in a dispute concerning the right to use water from a well which afforded an insufficient supply of water for the wants of both parties. Plea of justification, that the killing was in self-defence. Conviction, and sentence of John for twenty-one years, and of Patrick for one year, in the penitentiary.

The following instruction was given, in the court below, in behalf of the people; that, "In case of a mutual conflict, he who would excuse himself on the ground of self-defense must show that, before a mortal blow was struck, he had declined any farther conflict, and retreated as far as he could with safety. And therefore, if the jury believe, from the evidence, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the defendants, and John Byron Dunlap, and the witness, Wilcox, were engaged in a mutual conflict, all being equally willing to engage in said conflict, and on equal terms as to being armed, and the defendants mortally wounded John Byron Dunlap while so engaged in mutual conflict, and without having, in any way, attempted to decline any further conflict at the time said mortal stroke was given, in manner and form as charged in the indictment, and the jury will find the defendants guilty. Held,

1. That this instruction assumes that the parties were equally willing to engage in the conflict, and that they were equally armed, and that the wound was given as charged in the indictment; that is, unlawfully, feloniously, and wilfully; and, moreover, the instruction artfully directs the jury to convict the defendants.

2. That if the defendants were assaulted by the deceased in such a way as to induce in them a reasonable and well-grounded belief that they were in danger of losing life, or suffering great bodily harm, when acting under such reasonable apprehension they were justified in defending themselves, whether the danger was real or only apparent. Actual and positive danger is not indispensable to justify self-defense.

3. It was not necessary that the defendants should have the exclusive right to the possession of the well, as against the whole world; but only as against the deceased and his party, to justify their repelling force with force.

4. The credibility of witnesses is exclusively within the province of the jury, and must not be invaded by instructions; although the jury may properly be instructed that if an attempt is made to impeach a witness, they may, notwithstanding the impeaching evidence, give his testimony such weight as they judge it entitled to under all the circumstances in evidence; where they find his statements reasonable, and consistent, and corroborated by other evidence.

203.—Daniel O. Crist et al. v. Mary W. Wray.—Appeal from McLean.—Opinion by SHELDON, J.

AMENDMENT—CONTINUANCE.

Held, That where a plaintiff introduces his evidence, and then by leave amends his declaration by abandoning a part of the claim, and thereupon the defendant moves for a continuance, the affidavit giving no reason why the amendment should render him unprepared for trial, the court may properly refuse the continuance, since the amendment would apparently only have the effect of narrowing the issues to be met

SUPREME COURT OF TENNESSEE.

W. M. ALEXANDER et al. v. J. C. KELSO et al.

POWER OF ADMINISTRATOR TO COMPROMISE DOUBTFUL CLAIM.

Where an administrator was satisfied it was prudent in him to make a compromise, pending a suit, as he had no means of the estate to carry on an expensive suit, and he believed there was real doubt as to his ability to make the party liable; Held, that he has a right to compromise such a case, and in that way promote the interest of his estate.

Opinion by NICHOLSON, C. J.

Complainants are creditors of Henry Kelso, who died in September, 1868, and on whose estate J. D. Tilman administered in January, 1867. Some time before his death Henry Kelso loaned to J. C. Kelso, his nephew, three or four thousand dollars in gold to be used for an indefinite time, and if not returned before Henry Kelso's death, then to be paid over to his widow. At the time this loan was made Henry Kelso was heavily indebted, probably to insolvency. After the death of Henry Kelso, and before any administration on his estate, J. C. Kelso paid over to the widow of Henry Kelso about $4,100 in pursuance of his agreement; he paid also $300 to Jefferson Kelso, on a note of Henry Kelso, on which J. C. Kelso was surety.

In 1871 W. M. Alexander brought suit in the circuit court of Lincoln county against J. C. Kelso to make him responsible as executor de son tort of Henry Kelso, by reason of his having paid over the $4,100 to the widow and the $300 to Jefferson Kelso. Upon the trial of the cause, under the charge of the circuit judge, the jury found that J. C. Kelso was not executor de son tort. Alexander appealed to the Supreme Court, and while the cause was pending in that court Tilman, as administrator of Henry Kelso, and J. C. Kelso entered into a compromise, by which J. C. Kelso agreed to pay to Tilman $1,500 in the event he gained the case in the Supreme Court, and Tilman agreed for that consideration to release him from further liability to Henry Kelso's estate.

The Supreme Court affirmed the judgment of the Circuit Court, whereupon Alexander and other creditors of Henry Kelso filed this bill against J. C. Kelso, and T. D. Tilman filed this bill against J. D. Kelso and J. D. Tilman to set aside the compromise made between them, alleging that it was fraudulent in law if not in fact, and seeking a decree against J. C. Kelso for the amount of money borrowed of Henry Kelso, but asking no decree against Tilman. Chancellor Marks held that complainants were without equity and dismissed their bill.

Tilman was required to answer on oath as to the compromise made with J. C. Kelso; he did so, stating that he had no knowledge or information of the transaction between J. C. and Henry Kelso, or of the payment of the $4,100 to the widow of Henry Kelso until the facts were disclosed in the suit of Alexander, in 1874. After the case had been decided against Alexander, and was pending in the Supreme Court, he was satisfied it was prudent in him to make the compromise, as he had no means of the estate to carry on an expensive suit, and he believed there was real doubt as to his ability to make J. C. Kelso liable. He fully acquits himself of any imputation of fraud or improper conduct in making the compromise. No doubt can be entertained as to his right to compromise a doubtful case, and in that way to promote the interest of his estate. If Tilman had the power to make the compromise, it would operate as a release of J. C. Kelso from further liability to the estate, unless it should appear that it was procured by fraudulent means. We concur with the Chancellor in the conclusion that the complainants have failed to make out such a case of fraud as entitles them to relief. The decree is therefore affirmed with costs.—The Commercial and Legal Reporter.

SUPREME COURT OF NEW YO

[At Chambers. October 12. Before LAWRENCE, J.]

In re FITZ SCHULE.

HABEAS CORPUS—ENLISTMENT OF ALIENS IN MILITIA REGIMENTS OF NEW YORK.

LAWRENCE, J. It was conceded in the argument that the petitioner was not at the time he enlisted, and is not now, a citizen of this State, and that he had not declared his intention to become a citizen. It is quite clear, therefore, that under the provisions of the Military Code of this State the petitioner was not, at the time he enlisted, subject to military duty. (Code, sec. 1, chap. 80, Laws 1870.) It is claimed, however, that the thirteenth section of the Military Code, which provides that "volunteers may be received and enlisted in any troop, battery or company district, or not" indicates an intention on the part of the legislature to allow those not subject to military duty to waive their exemption and voluntarily submit themselves to the obligations, duties and penalties prescribed by said code. A perusal of the act convinces me that this view is correct. There would seem to be no necessity for providing for voluntary enlistments if the volunteers could only be drawn from the class of persons subject by law to the performance of military duty. If I am right in this construction of the law, then it follows that it was perfectly competent for Schule to volunteer and enlist as a member of Company D in the Fifth regiment, and that by so doing he became liable to be fined if he did not comply with the rules and regulations of the company. The return, therefore, of the keeper of the county jail seems to me to show that Schule is in his custody under a warrant issued by a court martial which had jurisdiction of his person, and which was authorized to commit him to the custody of such keeper in default of the collection of such fine imposed upon him by a levy upon his goods and chattels. The objection made to the warrant of commitment, that it does not specify the time for which the delinquent is to be imprisoned, does not seem to me material. It is stated in the warrant that the total fine imposed upon the petitioner is the sum of $84, and the jailer is required to keep said delinquent closely confined in the manner and during the time required by law, and until discharged according to law. The warrant is drawn in the exact language of the 214th section of the Military Code, which provides that in default of sufficient goods and chattles of the delinquent to satisfy the fine the Marshal is "then to take the body of such delinquent and convey him to the common jail of such city or county, whose jailer shall keep the said delinquent closely confined, without bail or mainprise, for two days, for any fine or penalty not exceeding $2, and two additional days for every dollar above that sum, unless the fine and penalty, together with the costs and the jailer's fees, be sooner paid; but no such imprisonment shall extend beyond the period of twenty days." The duty of the jailer is thus expressly defined by the law, and as the warrant states the amount of the fine, he is informed by the warrant that the case is one in which prisoner must suffer the maximum imprisonment provided by the law, unless he is sooner discharged by the payment of the fine and jailer's fees, or unless under, the subsequent provision of the statute he is liberated by order of the commandant of the division or brigade to which he belongs. The petitioner also urges, as a ground for his discharge, that he signed the enlistment paper, but, being a German by birth, he does not understand the English language perfectly; that he did not read the paper, and did not and does not know what it contained, and that he did not swear to it before the person before whom the oath purports to have been taken. This allegation amounts to a charge of fraud in the matter of the enlistment. If the enlistment was fraudulently obtained, it was no enlistment, and the petitioner is entitled to be relieved from it. I will hear the allegations and proofs of the parties. Subsequent to the rendition of the above decision, by consent of the counsel for the regiment, the prisoner was discharged on his parole. It was further arranged that evidence be taken upon the allegation of fraud in the enlistment.

A GRAVE QUESTION.—The Indianapolis Sentinel say

"The following letter to the Supreme Court is one involving such grave questions that after unsuccessfully wrestling with its question, the judges turned it over to the attorney general. He being unable to come to a decision, has referred it to the governor. It is to be hoped that some conclusion may be reached, as the writer has already been "procrastinated" sufficiently. His being kept out of any office for one year is a serious thing to him. The names of the writer and the city from which he sends forth his grievances are here omitted:

To the Most Respectable Supreme Court of the State of Indiana.

GENTLEMEN:—The undersigned was a professor in Germany and in this country for many years. These two years he was teaching languages in the seminary of the city of———. The board of education, according to decision of the Supreme Court, illegally elected here, dismissed of on account of personal vengeance of one of the members, Professor———, in spite of a large petition of 212 citizens, three-fourths of the inhabitants, signed by the mayor and five councilmen out of six in favor of re-election of said professor. There is a great loss and damage to the petitioner, because he is for one year without any office, having been procrastinated by said board from days to weeks till last of July. The supplication, therefore, very modestly made to the most respectable Supreme Court, is what may be done legally for a citizen of the United States to come to his rights and justice after all inquisitions with lawyers?

CENTRAL GRAND DIVISION.

SPRINGFIELD, Ill., Oct. 13.—Opinions in the following cases of 1875 have this day been filed in my office:

ANECDOTES OF LORD BROUGHAM'S EARLY HISTORY.

[From the Edinburgh Law Magazine.]

You may not like Lord Brougham; you may have no respect for his personal character or his political character (assuming that the latter had any existence independent of the former); you may fancy that he was not only a consummate orator, but also a consummate inventor of facts; that his faculty of imagination grew with his growth and strengthened with his strength, until, in his closing years, in obedience to the law of the strongest, it killed off all his other powers, and his mind became of imagination all compact. You may have an opinion of this kind in greater or lesser strength; but you cannot possibly help reading everything about the marvelous man. The very best things in Mr. Greville's Memoirs, in which he faithfully recorded the hatreds of every day, were the stories about Brougham, the stories which displayed his dash and brilliancy, his energy, his humbug, his mendacity, his vanity, his ludicrous pretensions to omniscience. The reason why we care to read everything about Brougham is not far to seek. We do so simply because of the wonder and admiration we have for the Titanic force of the man.

For the following ana of Lord Brougham's early career, a matter naturally enough of special interest to Scottish lawyers, we are indebted to a veteran lawyer, whose legal note-book contains the gatherings of more than half a century:

I.

In the end of last century a distinguished citizen of Edinburgh was induced to write a comedy. The night of performance came, and the friends of the author crowded the theatre to applaud the efforts of the young Shakespeare of the North. The first act was most patiently endured on the score of friendship, but its sad dullness prevented one token of approbation. The curtain arose on the second act, and the friendly audience was fondly hopeful of some improvement with the advance of the plot, but matters were becoming worse. Impatience now sat visibly on every countenance, and a general feeling existed that the piece might be politely, "damned with faint praise," and gently consigned "to the tomb of all the Capulets." At length a supper party was exhibited, and one of the dramatis personæ, in dull prosaic strains, put the questions to his companions around the scenic board, "What toast shall we next give?" No sooner was the question put than an answer was loudly heard from the center of the pit, "Drink good afternoon, if you please." A peal of laughter followed the appropriate reply, in which the actors themselves were compelled heartily to join. It was impossible longer to persist in the dull display. The curtain fell alike on the actors and the act, which was thus gently laughed into oblivion. The voice proceeded from a young man then a student in Edinburgh; his name was Harry Brougham. How many times since then has his power of sarcasm driven bad men and worse measures from the political stage, and bidden "good afternoon" to many a flagrant abuse long played at the nation's cost.

THE CHICAGO RIFLE CLUB.

On last Saturday there were seven prizes won at the range of this club at South Park. The shooting commenced at one o'clock, and continued until it was so dark that the target could not be seen. The distance was five hundred yards. It rained all afternoon and was very cold. The Chicago Bar was well represented. Several of its ablest members were present and participated in the contest. Judges, lawyers and doctors pulled up fence posts, carried boards and brush and made a fire. It was amusing to see them stand around the fire in the rain, watching the shooting, or waiting for their turn to come. Had they been compelled to thus expose themselves, there is no doubt they would have had the chills and fever, or some other more dangerous sickness. But as it was, we are informed, it improved the health of the members. The prizes were awarded as follows:

S. W. Burnham, the Hamilton & Rowe badge, $75.

George Willard, Life Membership, $25.

S. E. Bliss, third prize, $12.

J. Muir, fourth, $10.

C. R. Prouty, fifth, $5.

C. Fuller, sixth, $3.

W. C. Dyer, seventh, valuable pocket-knife,

Members of the bar won the first and second prizes. Mr. Burnham, who was official reporter of the courts for so many years, in a score of 29 out of a possible 35, carried off the Hamilton, Rowe & Co's badge in the first contest. George Willard, the well known railroad attorney, and one of the masters in chancery of the Circuit Court, made a score of 28 in a possible 35, which gave him the second prize, and made him the first life member of the club.

The enterprising law book-publishing house of Callaghan & Co., of this city have given to the Rifle Club seventy-six dollars worth of their most valuable legal publications to be shot for as prizes. We have no doubt these legal prizes will be warmly contested for by the members of the bar. Upon the receipt of the books the club passed a vote of thanks to the firm of Callaghan & Co., and by a unanimous vote made its senior member, Mr. B. Callaghan, an honorary member. The following is the letter of the firm to the president of the club:

HON. JAS. B. BRADWELL, President Chicago Rifle Club:

DEAR SIR:—Having noticed in a recent number of the LEGAL NEWS, that the Chicago Rifle Club contained quite a number of the legal profession, and desiring to encourage their effort to improve their aim, we beg to offer them, as prizes, to be shot for at your next meeting, the following books: High on Injunctions, 1 vol.; High on Extraordinary Remedies, 1 vol.; Moore's Civil Practice, 1 vol.; North's Probate Practice, 1 vol.; Bissell's U. S. Circuit Court Reports, 4 vols.; Curran's Speeches, 1 vol.; Adams & Durham's Real Estate Statutes and Decisions of Illinois, 2 vols.; which you may divide into such classes as seems proper to you, or not divided at all.

We beg to say here, that we rejoice to see that the combative profession is preparing to meet all comers, whether in the forum or the field, but we trust that their liability to engage in "shoots" at law may not result in anything more sanguinary than the occasional destruction of a "bull's eye," some poor fellow's reputation for truth and veracity, or a bottle of——milk.

Very sincerely yours,

CALLAGHAN & Co.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.—Two of the leading dailies of this city have, within the past week, spoken of the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States, delivered by WAITE, C. J., in the case of Mrs. Minor of St. Louis v. Hoppersett et al., holding that women are not guaranteed the right of suffrage under the Constitution, or the amendments thereto, as having been just delivered, and contain leading editorials commenting on the opinion as the death blow to woman suffrage. This opinion was delivered months ago, and published in 7 Chicago LEGAL NEWS, on page 221.

THE Central Law Journal views the recent edition of Parsons on Notes and Bills, in almost as unfavorable a light as the LEGAL NEWS, judging from its notice of that work in last week's issue.

POLYGAMAY IN UTAH.—On the 13th instant Judge BOREMAN, of the United States District Court, in Utah, delivered a strong charge to the grand jury in opposition to polygamy or bigamy, and in regard to enforcing the law of Congress of 1862, punishing the offense. He stated that it had never been respected, and every possible means has been used to prevent its enforcement; that leaders of the people while teaching this crime, repudiated it themselves when brought into the court-room; that as there is no statute in that territory in regard to marriage, no ceremony is required and none need be proved, and called upon the jurymen to indict all persons known to be living in polygamy; that it depends upon the grand juries whether the laws shall be enforced or not, or whether Congress shall be called upon to give us better laws.

STATUTE OF DESCENT.—Regarding the change in the Statute of Descent, prepared by "W" in the NEWS of Sept. 25th, page 28, allow me so suggest that a copy of the Colorado Statute on the subject would probably meet his views. It reads as follows: "If such intestate leave a husband or wife, and no child nor descendants of any child, then the whole of the estate of such intestate, real and personal, shall descend to and rest in such surviving husband or wife as his or her absolute estate, subject to the payment of debts as aforesaid." A LAWYER SHUT UP.—"Sir," asked an attorney yesterday, of a witness who was testifying in a case of assault and battery, "have you ever been in this court before?"

"Yes, sir," replied the witness, "I have been here often."

"Ah, been here often, have you?" said the attorney in a triumphant tone. "Now tell the court what for."

"Well," replied the witness, slowly, "I have been here at least a dozen times to see you to try and collect that tailor's bill you owe."—San Francisco Chronicle.

JUDGES FOR COOK COUNTY.—The convention of the Opposition Party, which met in this city on yesterday, showed its good sense by nominating Judge McAllister of the Supreme Court for Circuit Judge, and Judge Gary for re-election as Judge of the Superior Court. John F. Finerty of the Tribune was nominated for Clerk of the Superior Court; Mr. Hesing for County Treasurer. He is an old citizen and, should he be elected, will perform his official duties faithfully.

BANKRUPTCY — PRACTICE UNDER THE AMENDMENT TO THE 43D SECTION OF THE BANKRUPT ACT PROVIDING FOR THE DISPOSITION OF PENDING CASES BY MEANS OF A COMPOSITION BETWEEN THE BANKRUPT AND HIS CREDITORS.

Opinion by GRESHAM, J.

By the amendment to the 43d section the bankrupt act, provision is made for the disposition of pending cases by means of a composition between the bankrupt and his creditors.

In certain cases when composition proceedings are pending, application is made to the court to settle questions of practice, and for the better regulation of this method of settlement the following statement is made for the direction of registers.

Upon an application to the court by by a bankrupt whose case is pending, setting forth that he proposes to compound with his creditors, an order will be made and certified to the proper register directing him to call a meeting, and to give notice of not less than ten days to each known creditor of the time, place and purpose of such meeting. These notices will be sent by mail, properly addressed and postpaid, and a memorandum will be entered by the register to the effect that he has received the order of the court and given the notices required.

The record of the register should show that at the time appointed the bankrupt appeared in person, or if from some lawful cause prevented from so appearing, then by another person on his behalf, with a statement of the whole of his debts and assets, showing also the names and addresses of the several creditors.

The proposition of the debtor being submitted, must then be adopted by a majority in numbers and three-fourths in value of the creditors of the debtor assembled at such meeting, voting either in person or by proxy.

This alone does not authorize the submission of the composition to the court, for an additional step must then be taken, that is, the resolution must be confirmed by the signature of the debtor and of two-thirds in number and one-half in value of all the creditors of the debtor. If the vote of those assembled at the meeting does not amount to a majority in number and three-fourths in value, the matter is at an end. But should that vote be given in that number and value, of those so assembled, a further step must be taken to confirm it by securing the signature of the debtor to the resolution and also the signatures of a larger proportion of the creditors, to wit: two-thirds in number and one-half in value of all the creditors of the debtor, This provision of the law is designed to protect the creditors from the effect of a resolution adopted by a small number assembled at such a meeting. The smaller number may adopt the resolution, but the larger number must confirm it, and it is plain from the language of the act that after the adoption of the resolution a reasonable time may be given to secure such additional signatures as may be required to confirm it.

A question arises upon the further provisions of the section as to how this voting and confirming is to be counted. The language of the amendment is: "And in calculating a majority for the purposes of a composition under this section, creditors whose debts amount to a sum not exceeding fifty dollars shall be reckoned in the majority in value, but not in the majority in number."

This language, which directs what shall be counted in the majority, is not free from obscurity. The majority, however, can only be ascertained by making the count, and as the method of making it is to be first determined before the vote is settled, it seems that the reasonable interpretation of this provision is that in settling the composition, whether for or against creditors whose debts do not exceed fifty dollars shall not count in determining the number, but shall count in determining the value.

As to secured creditors they are not counted at all unless they satisfy the register that there is an excess due them over the value of the security. That excess being determined by the register, they are admitted to the vote as are the creditors whose demands are unsecured.

If, however, a secured creditor abandons his security, he is admitted to vote as one unsecured.

It is proper here to observe that the secured creditors to whom this exception applies are those who are secured by the pledge, in some form, of property that, apart from their lien upon it, would go into the fund for general distribution. The language is general, to be sure, and construed strictly and without reference to other provisions of the statute, might be made to embrace those creditors who have personal security. But the law makes provision elsewhere for the protection for such sureties, allowing them to prove in full when they have paid the debt, and provides for their subrogation to the right of the creditor, if he shall have proved, and they afterward pay the debt. The provision for the abandonment of the security can only apply to such security as may be surrendered to the general fund, and can have no application to that form of security which could be abandoned only for the benefit of the surety, and not for the increase of the fund. It allows, of course, that a creditor having personal security votes upon composition proceedings as an unsecured creditor. The question of the effect of partnership relations in making a composition presents more difficulty. The law is silent as to partnerships. It proceeds apparently upon the theory that the debts and assets are all of a single class. It does not provide for a classification of debt and assets as being individual and partnership, and for a several vote and counting among the different classes of creditors. Are the creditors of A. and those of B. and those of the firm of A. & B. to be all counted together in determining the required numbers and values in these several stages for settling a composition? Or, are they to be separated into classes and to vote and be counted in such classification before the question of composition can be determined?

The act provides carefully in section 36 for the marshaling of the debts and assets and the distribution of the several individual and partnership funds, according to the well-known equity rules. The creditors being so entitled, it is easily seen that very gross inequality might in some cases result by a vote for composition without requiring a classification. If the personal assets of partners are small and the personal debts large, the personal creditors could expect only a proportionate dividend, and therefore could readily vote for a composition that would be unjust to the partnership creditors, unless a similar ratio existed between their debts and the partnership fund. If their debts were in the aggregate comparatively small and the partnership fund large, they could, by the preponderating vote of the personal creditors, be driven to accept a composition which would be greatly below the amount of their dividends were the cause to proceed to settlement by the assignee.

Congress could not have contemplated and intended any such inequality. The cases, however, to which the attention of the court has been called, are cases where the meetings have been held upon general notice to all creditors, both individual and partnership, and where the vote has been made by the creditors who assembled and those who signed the confirmation of the resolution, without any classification and without any objection on that ground from any creditor. The state of the respective debts and funds may be such as to justify this course; and where they are so it simplifies the proceedings very materially. Whether this condition of practical equality of the debts and assets, both individual and personal, exists, is shown to the creditors at the composition meeting, and it is their province to act upon it as they see proper. They may make the composition by general vote and general confirmation, if they are content with it. Or, if one of any class of the creditors perceives that the other class is about to force upon him an unjust composition, he can demand a separate vote, and so protect himself by calling to his assistance those who compose the class to which he belongs.

It would seem that by this application of the law no injustice can be done. There remains a second meeting to be called by the court, after notice to every known creditor, for the final allowance of the composition by the court, if it shall be found to be fair and to have been conducted according to law. Should it appear at this meeting that the common voting of all creditors, individual and partnership, together worked injustice, the court can then consider if any and what redress should be given.

We are under obligations to the law firm of STEVENSON & EWING, of Bloomington for the following opinion:

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

OPINION FILED OCT. 1, 1875.

JOHN ROACH et al. v. THE PEOPLE, etc.

Error to McLean.

INSTRUCTIONS IN CRIMINAL CASES—WHEN HOMICIDE IS JUSTIFIABLE IN SELF-DEFENSE—DEFENDING PROPERTY—CREDIBILITY OF WITNESSES—IMPEACHMENT OF.

1. Indictment for manslaughter for killing one Dunlap in a dispute concerning the right to use water from a well which afforded an insufficient supply for the wants of both parties. Held, that the instruction given in relation to a mutual conflict assumes that the parties were equally willing to engage in the conflict and that they were equally armed, and that the wound was given as charged in the indictment; that is, unlawfully, feloniously and willfully; that the instruction artfully instructs the jury to convict the defendant.

2. WHEN KILLING JUSTIFIABLE.—That if the defendants were assaulted by the deceased in such a way as to induce in them a reasonable and well-grounded belief that they were in danger of losing life, or suffering great bodily harm, when acting under such reasonable apprehension, they were justified in defending themselves whether the danger was real or apparent, actual and positive danger is not indespensable to justify self-defense; that it was not necessary that the defendants should have the exclusive right to the possession of the well as against the whole world, but only as against deceased and his party to justify their repelling force with force.

3. CREDIBILITY OF WITNESS.—The court states the rule for determining the credit to be given to a witness' testimony.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

Opinion by MCALLISTER, J.

John Roach and Patrick Roach, the plaintiffs in error, were indicted at the November term, 1874, of the McLean Circuit court for manslaughter in taking the life of John Byron Dunlap. The indictment contains three counts. The first count charges, in substance, that on October 10th, 1874, in McLean county, the defendants unlawfully, feloniously and willfully made an assault upon said Dunlap with a knife, held in the hand of John Roach; and upon the side of the left breast of said Dunlap then and there unlawfully, feloniously and willfully did strike, cut, stab and thrust, giving to said Dunlap, then and there, with said knife, in and upon the left side of the breast, one mortal wound of which he instantly died; then averring that said defendants the said Dunlap then and there in manner and form as aforesaid unlawfully, feloniously and willfully did kill.

The second count is the same, only that it charges the same acts to have been done by John Roach, Patrick being present aiding, abetting and assisting.

The third count is the same only that it avers the killing to have been done with a club.

It appears, by the evidence upon both sides, that there was a controversy between the deceased and one Wilcox acting in concert with him, upon the one side, and the defendants upon the other, about the right of the former to take water out of a certain well or spring for the purpose of watering stock, the defendants claiming to have a paramount right, the supply not being adequate for the stock of all parties.

Evidence was given, and not controverted, that Patrick Roach and one Malay had previously dug out the well or spring, so as to increase the supply, had put a fence around it, and the Roaches had been in the prior possession and use of it. Niccolls, the owner of the land where the spring was, testified that on the Friday before the homicide, one of the Roach boys called on him and asked him if he had any objection to his (Roach) watering there. Witness said he did not care how many watered there. Roach then asked witness if he had any objection to his digging the well deeper, and some one present asked who would have the right to the water. Nothing was said as to the exclusive right, but some one said he thought the one that fixed it up ought to have the first right. Witness replied that he thought so too, and this was all that was said on the subject. Before this, as the evidence shows, Patrick Roach, with the assistance of Malay, dug the well deeper and put a fence around it.

The evidence tends to show that after the well was thus fixed up by Roach and Malay, the deceased and Wilcox, on the occasion of the homicide, came early in the morning with stock for the purpose of watering them, before the Roaches had watered theirs, and from this attempt, a conflict ensued in which clubs were used upon both sides.

The theory of the defense was, that after the fight had been continued until Patrick was knocked down and disabled, John was assailed by the deceased and Wilcox, one of them having a rock in his hand, which was thrown at him (John) with great violence, and that acting under a reasonable and well grounded belief that he was in danger of losing his life, or suffering great bodily harm, he used his knife in self defense. Upon some questions of fact, there was a sharp conflict of evidence, but there was testimony tending to support the alleged justification, that the killing was in self defense.

The jury found both the defendants guilty, and fixed the term of imprisonment in the penitentiary twenty years for John and one year for Patrick, and they sue out a writ of error from this court.

The court on behalf of the People gave to the jury the following instruction: "The court instructs the jury that in case of a mutual conflict, he who would excuse himself upon the ground of self defense, must show that before a mortal blow was struck he had declined any further conflict, and retreated as far as he could with safety. And, therefore, if the jury believe from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt, that the defendants and John Byron Dunlap and the witness, Wilcox, were engaged in a mutual conflict, all being equally willing to engage in said conflict, and upon equal terms as to being armed, and that the defendants mortally wounded the said John Byron Dunlap while so engaged in mutual conflict, and, without in any way having attempted to decline any further conflict, at the time said mortal stroke was given in manner and form as charged in the indictment. And the jury will find the defendants guilty. By this instruction the court assumes the fact, that all parties were equally willing to engage in the conflict, that they were upon equal terms, as to being armed. The same assumption is repeated in the eighth instruction. This was calculated to prejudice the defendants. So far as the parties were armed with clubs, they were probably upon equal terms, as to being armed. But the testimony tended to show, that the Dunlap party seized a rock for the purpose of using it upon John Roach, and this fact was material upon the question of self defense. The last clause but one, of the instruction, assumes that the mortal wound was given in manner and form as charged in the indictment—that is, unlawfully, feloniously and wilfully. This is contrary to the rule announced in various decisions in this court, and was erroneous. This instruction is unusually artful in its structure and highly calculated to mislead the jury. The direction of the court to convict at the end of the instruction, should be made expressly dependent upon their finding such and such facts established beyond reasonable doubt by the evidence. This is not so framed; but is made to appear so independent of any hypothesis in the former part of it, so that it might mislead the jury into the error of regarding it as a positive direction from the court to convict. Beginning with a capital letter, it reads thus: "And the jury will find the defendants guilty." Such a mode of instructing the jury either in civil or criminal cases, cannot receive the sanction of this court.

The court, on behalf of the people, gave the following instruction to the jury: "9. The court instructs the jury that before the defendants, or either of them, can justify the killing of John Byron Dunlap, if the jury believe from the evidence, and beyond a reasonable doubt, that the defendants did kill John Byron Dunlap, it must appear that the danger was so urgent and pressing that in order to save their own lives, or the lives of one of them, or to prevent them, or one of them, from receiving great bodily harm, the killing was absolutely necessary; and it must further appear that John Byron Dunlap was the assailant, or that the defendants had really and in good faith endeavored to decline any further struggle before the mortal blow was given."

This instruction would convey to the minds of the jury the idea that the defendants could not sustain their alleged justification unless their danger was not only apparently imminent, but was actual and positive. In Campbell v. The People, 16 Ill., 17, a similar instruction was given, and it was condemned, this court holding that if the defendant was assaulted by the deceased in such a way as to induce in him a reasonable and well-grounded belief that he was actually in danger of losing his life, or suffering great bodily harm, when acting under such reasonable apprehension, he was justified in defending himself, whether the danger was real or only apparent. "Actual and positive danger," said the court, "is not indispensable to justify self-defence." This doctrine was reaffirmed in the case of Schnier v. The People, 23 Ill., and an instruction like the above was held to be erroneous. So, also, in Maher v. The People, 24 Ill., 241, to the same effect.

On behalf of The People the court gave the following instructions: "12. The court instructs the jury, that if they believe from the evidence, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the defendants did not have the exclusive right to the use of the well on Niccoll's land, then they had no such right or property to the water in said well as would justify the defendants, or either of them, in opposing by force any person desiring or attempting to get water at said well."

This instruction had a tendency to mislead the jury.

It was not indispensable to defendants' right to defend their possession of the well, or repel force with force, that they should have the exclusive right to the use of the well as against all the world. It would be enough if they had it as against the deceased and Wilcox.

The court also gave for the People the following: "The jury are instructed that even though numerous witnesses may have testified against the credibility and truthfulness of the witness Wilcox, and even though the jury may believe from the evidence, that the general reputation of the said Wilcox for truth and veracity is bad, yet the jury should not, upon that account, discredit the testimony of the said Wilcox; provided they believe the same to be reasonable and consistent, and that the same is corroborated by other credible evidence, and by the facts and circumstances otherwise proved in this case."

This instruction invades the province of the jury. The jury might properly have been instructed that they were at liberty, notwithstanding the impeaching evidence, if they found his statements reasonable and consistent, and corroborated by other credible testimony in the cause, to give to his testimony such weight as they thought it was entitled to, under all the circumstances in evidence. The credibility of witnesses is a matter exclusively for the jury. We had occasion to discuss this proposition and express our views in the case of Oliver v. The People, January Term, 1875, when a similar instruction was held erroneous.

The judgment of the court below will be reversed and the cause remanded.

Reversed and remanded.

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

OPINION FILED OCT. 18, 1875.

O. S. HOUGH v. THE COOK COUNTY LAND COMPANY.

Appeal from Superior Court of Cook.

POWER OF CORPORATION TO HOLD AND CONVEY LANDS—FORFEITURE OF CHARTER—CHANGE OF NAME.

1. CHANGING NAME.—The effect of a corporation changing its name considered.

2. FORMER CASES—A DISTINCTION.—The court makes a distinction between this case and the case of Starkweather v. The American Bible Society, reported 7 Chicago LEGAL NEWS, 59.

3. POWER OF CORPORATION—REMEDY OF APPELLANT.—The court, assuming appellant's construction of the several statutes affecting appellee's corporate powers to be correct, upon which the court expresses no opinion, holds that appellant, as a stockholder, on a bill filed for that purpose, may restrain appellee from acting in excess or in violation of its corporate powers; and that he may also, as a citizen of the State, cause steps to be taken in its name, for the same causes, to have judgment of forfeiture of its franchise; but that he cannot, as a grantor of lands, urge such acts as a cause for decreeing his deed void and a rescission of his contract.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

SCHOLFIELD, J.

This was a bill in equity filed by the appellant against the appellee in the court below to set aside a conveyance of certain lands, to cancel the stock of appellee, issued to him in payment for the same, and to restrain appellee, in the meantime, from selling such stock which had been pledged to it as collateral security for a loan made to appellant.

A demurrer was interposed to the bill which the court below sustained, and dismissed the bill.

So far as the allegations of the bill are material to the questions requiring our consideration, they are as follows: Appellee claimed to be a corporation under the laws of this State, with power to borrow and lend money; to take lands and mortgages as security; to purchase lands and make improvements thereon by erecting buildings for the purpose of renting the same; to hold buildings and lots for the purpose of improving and renting the same, and to do a general loan business, and take lands, mortgages and notes to secure the loans.

Appellant believing that appellee was possessed of the powers it claimed, and that it was authorized by its charter to buy land and issue its stock in payment therefor, and to loan money, etc., on the 24th day of May, 1873, contracted with it to sell and convey to it certain lands in Cook county, which are particularly described in the bill, in consideration that appellee would issue to him three hundred and sixty-five shares of its stock, and would also loan him eighty per cent in money of the stock and hold the stock as collateral security on the loan; the loan to be for one year from that date, with interest at ten per cent. per annum till due, and twelve per cent. per month after maturity, with power, on failure to pay, to sell, etc.

The land was conveyed, the money loaned, and the stock issued and pledged as collateral security in conformity with the terms of the agreement.

Since the transaction occurred, appellant has been advised by counsel that appellee had no authority to take the land and issue the stock; that it professes to act under authority of "an act to incorporate the Land Improvement and Irrigation Company;" approved March 1st, 1867, and the change of name to The Cook County Land Company, by vote of its stockholders on the 20th of July, 1872, at which time its capital stock was increased, in accordance with an act of the legislature in regard to changing names and increasing stock of corporations, approved March 26th, 1872; that the change of name and increase of stock was unauthorized and void, and all the authority appellee had by its charter was to purchase lands for the purpose of irrigation and improvement for the raising of crops thereon, and the sale and disposal thereof when so improved.

It is alleged that the power vested in appellee by its charter, which is made part of the bill as an exhibit, was to examine survey and purchase lands and interests therein, water courses or interests therein, for the purpose of irrigating the lands that might be so purchased, and facilitating crops in dry seasons, and to improve and cultivate such crops chiefly as require irrigation to produce the largest returns, and that appellee had no power to purchase and hold lands for any other purpose; that appellee has not purchased any lands for the purpose of irrigation or for any object contemplated by its charter, but that appellee has purchased a large quantity of land worth above $600,000, holds improved and unimproved city real estate, announces its intention to erect buildings on part of its vacant city property, and that it has been since its organization, and now is, engaged in purchasing lands, city lots, the improvement of said lots for the purpose of sale and rental, and in the purchase of tax certificates, and in loaning money on bonds and mortgages, etc.

Appellant insists that the purchase of the land, and the loaning of the money and taking notes therefor, were contrary to positive statutes, and therefore void.

The act of March 1st, 1867, under which appellee first became incorporated by its first section, empowers "The Land Improvement and Irrigation company to have, hold, possess and enjoy by themselves, successors and assigns forever, lands, tenements, hereditaments, goods, chattels, choses in action and effects of every kind, and the same to grant, sell, alien, invest, loan and dispose of, and the fourth section of that act is as follows:

"The chief objects of this association shall be to examine, survey and purchase lands or interests in lands, water-courses, or interests therein, which are as near as may be adapted by nature to the use of water to irrigate the same, to facilitate the growth of crops in dry seasons, and to improve and cultivate the same for such crops chiefly as require irrigation, to produce the largest returns." Private Laws of 1867, vol. 2, p. 241.

Section twenty-one of the general incorporation law, approved March 26th, 1872, under which appellee changed its name and increased its capital, contains this proviso: "And provided further, that any corporation, other than corporations for manufacturing purposes, availing itself of or accepting the benefits of, or formed under this act (except the mere change of name), shall be subject to the general laws of this State now in force, or which may hereafter be passed, regulating corporations of like character. 2d Gross., 59. One of the general laws then and still in force regulating corporations, provides that "no foreign or domestic corporation established or maintained in any way for the pecuniary benefit of its stockholders, shall purchase or hold real estate in this State, except as provided for in that act. 2 Gross., 106, § 36. Section ten of that act authorizes corporations to "own, possess and enjoy so much real and personal estate as shall be necessary for the transaction of their business," and "to sell and dispose of the same when" not required for the uses of the corporation; and it contains a proviso that "all" real estate so acquired in satisfaction of any liability or indebtedness, unless the same may be necessary and suitable for the business of such corporation, shall be offered at public auction, at least once every year, etc.

In case any corporation "shall fail to sell such lands, it is made the duty of the State's attorney of the proper county to proceed against the corporation, by information, to the end that such lands shall be decreed to be sold, 2 Gross, 103. And the first section authorized corporations to be formed in the manner by the act provided for any lawful purpose, except banking, insurance real estate brokerage, the operation of railroads, and the business of loaning money."

Conceding that, in determining appellee's power, these several provisions must be construed together, and that appellant's construction that appellee has authority only to examine, survey and purchase lands, or interests in lands, water-courses, or interests therein which are as near as may be adapted by nature to the use of water to irrigate the same, etc, is correct, does it follow that the title to lands conveyed to and held by it for other and different purposes, is absolutely void, and may be so declared at the instance of the grantor, seeking for that cause alone, to repossess himself of the property?

The authorities cited in the brief for appellant, Bank, U. S. v. Owens, 2 Peters, 538-9; Munsell v. Temple, 3 Gilm. 93; Cin. Mut., etc., v. Rosenthal, 55 Ill., 91; Green v. Seymour, 3 Sandford, Ch. 292; Smith v. Bromley, Douglas, 696, and Browning v. Morris, Cowp., 790, recognize the general doctrine, that a contract prohibited by statute, or against the manifest policy of the law, is void. And in Carroll v. East St. Louis, 67 Ill., 568, also cited by appellant, the question before us, was whether a corporation, created in another State for the sole purpose of buying and selling lands, has power to purchase and hold title to lands in this State, and we held that it has not, because it would tend to create perpetuities and is against the general policy of our legislation.

In a more recent case Starkweather v. The American Bible Society, term, the same doctrine was reasserted.

There seems to us, however, to be this important distinction between the principle recognized in these authorities, and that applicable here. These, by reason of the express or implied prohibition of the law, the party is absolutely denied the power to acquire any rights through the particular contract.

Here there is power to purchase, receive conveyances, and hold title to lands, but it is prohibited that they shall be purchased and held for other than a prescribed purpose. In the one case the principle affects the power of acquisition, in the other it affects simply the use to which the acquisition shall be applied.

There can be no question of the right of a stockholder to the aid of a court of equity against a corporation, to prevent it from misapplying its capital, or from doing acts which would amount to a violation of its charter; but the frame and prayer of the bill in the present case do not contemplate such relief, and we do not conceive it could be granted without material amendment, to make which, leave should have been asked in the court below.

But appellee being authorized to purchase and hold lands, and appellant having sufficient capacity to convey, the title was obviously vested in appellee by the delivery of the deed, and the question whether appellee has, by its purchase and use of lands, exceeded the powers conferred by its charter, is one between the State and appellee, with which appellant as a grantor simply has no concern. Banks v. Porteaux, 3 Randolph, 141; Borrow v. Naud. C. T. Co., 9 Humphreys, 304; Chambers v. St. Louis, 29 Mo., 576. Att'y Gen'l v. Tudor Ice Co., 104 Mass., 239; Whitman Mining Co. v. Baker, 3 Nevada, 391; Hayward v. Davidson, 41 Ind., 212; Angell & Ames on Corps., §§ 152-3; Dillon on Munic. Corps., § 444; Natorna W. & M. Co. v. Clarkin, 14 Cal., 544. It is well observed by Field, J., in the case last above referred to, at p. 552, "It would lead to infinite embarrassments if, in suits by corporations to recover the possession of their property, inquiries were permitted as to the necessity of such property for the purpose of their incorporation, and the title made to rest upon the existence of that necessity."

And this cannot be better illustrated than by reference to the fourth section of appellee's charter before quoted: Precisely where would the line be drawn between those lands which are, in the language there employed, "as near as may be adapted by nature to the use of water to irrigate the same, and those which are not." If it were competent to inquire whether the land conveyed is such as is contemplated by the charter, this would have to be determined, and in every conveyance it would be material in determining whether title vested, or the deed was a nullity.

Our conclusion is, assuming appellant's construction of the several statutes, affecting appellee's corporate powers to be correct (upon which we express no opinion), appellant may, as a stockholder, on a bill filed for that purpose, have relief in equity to restrain appellee from acting in excess or in violation of its corporate powers; and he may also, as a citizen of the State, cause steps to be taken in its name, for the same causes, to have judgment of forfeiture of its franchise; but he cannot, as a grantor of lands, urge such acts as a cause for decreeing his deed void, and a rescission of his contract. Treated as a bill, to rescind the contract on the ground of fraud, independently of the questions we have considered, the allegations are insufficient.

The decree is affirmed.

WALKER, C. J.—I am in favor of affirming unless complainant should be required to refund the money he received from the company.

I hold that the company exceeded their power in purchasing these lands, and that the company should be held to have taken no title by the purchase.

LYMAN TRUMBULL for appellant.

GEO. W. SMITH, for appellee.

SUPREME COURT OF TENNESSEE.

1. CARRYING PISTOL—PLEADING—A plea in abatement cannot be received after a general continuance, but must be pleaded at the proper time.

2. Plea of former conviction before justice of the peace held defective because it did not show a real conviction upon the plea of guilty under the small offense statute, and because the justice had no jurisdiction to try the offense, but could only bind the party over to the Circuit Court.

CHARGE.—A charge that if defendant carried a pistol not openly in his hands, in a public place, within twelve months, etc., he would be guilty, held to declare the law correctly; as applicable to the facts of the case.—[ED. Commercial and Legal Reporter.]

NICHOLSON, C. J. delivered the opinion of the court.

Kirk Hallum was convicted for unlawfully carrying a pistol, in the circuit court of Shelby county at Bartlett, and has appealed to this court.

The presentment contains two counts: First, for unlawfully carrying a pocket pistol, a belt pistol and a revolver pistol, not used in the U. S. army. Second, for unlawfully carrying a revolver pistol not openly in his hands. The presentment was made at the August term, 1872, and at the April term, 1873, there was a general continuance of the case. At the August term, 1873, the defendant filed his plea in abatement for misnomer, which was stricken out on motion, because filed after a general continuance at a former term. Defendant then filed a plea of former conviction before a justice of the peace, which was demurred to and the demurrer sustained.

Defendant was then tried on the plea of not guilty, and a verdict of guilty was rendered under the proof and charge of the court. The proof was, defendant was at public place, not on his premises, wearing a pistol in his belt, which was a navy six or army pistol. The charge of the court was as follows: "If you find that the defendant carried a pistol not openly in his hands, off his premises in a public place and within the jurisdiction of this court, within twelve months prior to the finding of the indictment, you will find him guilty." Several errors are assigned for reversal. First, because the court struck out the plea in abatement. It was not filed at the first term, but after a general continuance. Pleas in abatement in criminal as well as in civil cases must be pleaded at the proper time. 3 Smedes & Marsh., 587; Green v. Campbell, 9 Yerg., 7. A plea in abatement cannot be received after a general continuance. Shaw v. Bowen, 1 Tenn., 297. The error was, therefore, not well assigned.

2nd. Because the court sustained the demurrer to defendant's plea of former conviction. The conviction pleaded was had before a justice of the peace and was clearly defective, because it did not show a real conviction upon the plea of guilty, under the small offense statute, and because the justice had no jurisdiction to try the offense, but could only bind the party over to the circuit court.

3rd. Because the court refused to quash the indictment. Under repeated adjudications of this court the indictment was sufficient.

4th. Because the charge of the court is erroneous. The charge is remarkable for its brevity, but we are unable to see that it does not contain every necessary constituent of a good charge. The proof made out clearly a case of wearing an army pistol in a belt at a public place. The charge was that if defendant carried a pistol, not openly in his hands, in a public place, etc., he would be guilty. As brief as is the charge, we think it declared the law correctly as applicable to the facts of the case.

The judgment is affirmed.

SUPREME COURT OF TENNESSEE.

GEORGE NELSON, in error, v. THE STATE.

INVOLUNTARY MANSLAUGHTER—KILLING WITH A WAD.—Where the proof failed to show any purpose to take the life of the deceased, or to inflict any injury upon her, but showed that if the defendant fired the pistol purposely it was for the purpose of frightening the deceased, or practicing what he intended as a joke, not knowing that a dangerous wound might be inflicted without a leaded ball or shot. Held, that under the circumstances, a conviction for voluntary manslaughter was erroneous.—[ED. Commercial and Legal Reporter.]

MCFARLAND, J.—The prisoner was tried upon an indictment for the murder of Milly Ford, and convicted of voluntary manslaughter and sentenced to five years imprisonment in the penitentary, and his motion for a new trial being overruled, he has appealed in error.

The proof of the witnesses set out in the bill of exceptions shows that the prisoner, on the 25th of December last, had been shooting a small pistol about the yard at the house where the deceased resided in Memphis—shooting Christmas guns. Harriet Fane, who reside in the same house with the deceased, says: "He," meaning the prisoner, "came into my room just after he had shot once and loaded his pistol, and while in my room loading his pistol said that he intended to go into Milly's room and shoot and kill her unless she would kiss and hug him. When he loaded his pistol he went into Milly's room, and I heard him say, 'kiss me, Milly,' or 'I want you to kiss me.' She answered 'I won't do it; go away from me, George.' She then heard the pistol fire."

Henry Thomas, who was in the room with the deceased, says: "George Nelson came into the room with a pistol in his hand; he went up to Milly and said, 'Milly, I want you to hug me, or I want you to kiss me.' She answered, 'I won't do it.' He then said, 'If you don't do it I will shoot you.' He then put both arms around her, and as he did so the pistol fired, and as the pistol fired she fell over into George's arms and sank to the floor. George said, 'For God's sake forgive me, Milly; I did not think it would hurt you' He then said to me, 'Go, Henry, and bring the doctor; please go, Henry—quick!'"

The statement of this witness is corroborated by other witnesses. The proof makes it most probable that the pistol was not loaded with a bullet but with a paper or other "wad." The wound was in the back below the spine, the orifice ranging back to the spine. The parties had been entirely friendly previous to that time. Without setting out the evidence in detail, we think it fails to show any purpose to take the life of the deceased, or to inflict any injury upon her. We understand the threat to shoot or kill the deceased to have been a jest or at least the shooting he did not intend to be of a dangerous character. This was the understanding by the witnesses, for they evidently did not think at the time that anything dangerous was intended.

The evidence may support the conclusion that he fired the pistol purposely, but upon this record we think that if he did so it was for the purpose of frightening the deceased, or practicing what he intended as a joke, probably not knowing that a dangerous wound might be inflicted without a leaden ball or shot.

His entire conduct we think, with the attending circumstances, establishes this conclusion. Taking this view of the facts, is it a case of voluntary manslaughter? Our statute, which, in this respect, is the substance of the common law defines manslaughter thus: "Manslaughter is the unlawful killing of another without malice either expressed or implied, which may be either voluntary upon a sudden heat or involuntary, but in the commission of some unlawful act." The most common case of manslaughter is where two persons upon a sudden quarrel, fight and one kill the other. Marly v. The State, 1 Sneed, 407. Our statute makes two separate grades of manslaughter and affixes different punishments. See Lee v. The State, 1 Cold., 92–67. Involuntary manslaughter is defined to be "where it plainly appears that neither death or bodily harm was intended, but death is accidentally caused by some unlawful act or any act not strictly unlawful in itself, but done in an unlawful manner and without due caution. We are of opinion that neither death nor bodily harm was intended, and the proof does not sustain a conviction for voluntary manslaughter.

The question whether he is guilty of involuntary manslaughter is not before us.

Let the judgment be reversed and a new trial awarded.

NOTES OF DECISIONS OF THE SUPREME COURT OF MICHIGAN.

OCTOBER TERM, 1875.

Wallace v. Harris.

Appeal from Wayne. Opinion by Graves, C. J. Case disposed of as stated at close of opinion.

The objection that a case is one of legal, instead of equitable cognizance, may be considered waived, if not taken in the court of original jurisdiction.

Where there is apparently as good ground for assigning a case to the jurisdiction of a court of equity as to that of a court of law, it is held not to be a matter of great consequence in which branch it falls, especially in Michigan, where the same judge sits in both law and equity.

In determining undue influence, allowance must be made for the right of every true owner, when not hindered by personal incapacity or particular regulations, to dispose of his own property according to his own free choice, whether it be guided by friendship, benevolence, gratitude or relationship.

An entire conveyance is not necessarily void because part of it is.

Dye v. Mann, 10 Mich., 291, explained.

A husband's sole deed of land including his homestead is not necessarily invalid except as to so much as lies in the homestead.

Ells v. Rector.

Error to Berrien. Opinion by Graves, C. J. Reversed and remanded for new trial with no costs to either party as against the other.

Costs are withheld from both parties as against each other where error is brought on a void finding.

Gallaway v. Burr.

Error to Superior Court of Detroit. Opinion by Marston, J. Affirmed with costs.

To sustain an action for obtaining goods under false pretenses, the plaintiff need not have actual, personal knowledge of the facts, but if he honestly believes them to be true, he may rely on such statements received through the usual channels, as business men of ordinary prudence would act upon.

The institution of a criminal prosecution for the recovery of a private claim is strong, if not conclusive evidence of malice; if this is the motive, the advice of counsel is no protection.

A refusal to charge a correct abstract proposition is cured by the refusal of the jury to find any fact which it could relate.

Youngblood v. Sexton..

Appeal from the Superior Court of Detroit. Opinion by Cooley, J. Decree below dismissing the bill affirmed with costs.

Equity has no jurisdiction to restrain the collection of a personal tax, even though illegal.

The acquiescence of parties cannot give a court of chancery jurisdiction to issue a writ of injunction.

The enforcement of a money demand does not fall within the category of "irreparable injuries," so as to require equity cognizance.

A common interest in a question at law, where the legal interests of the parties are wholly distinct, is no ground for equitable jurisdiction when the several controversies affected by the legal question are themselves purely legal; it does not, therefore, call for the action of a court of equity for the purpose of avoiding a multiplicity of suits.

Taxation is not license.

Act 228 of 1875, for the taxation of the liquor traffic, is held valid.

The tax authorized by the liquor tax law (Act 228 of 1875), is in no proper sense anything more than a local tax.

Sanford v. Huxford.

Error to Calhoun. Opinion by Campbell, J. Judgment reversed, demurrer overruled with costs, and cause remanded that defendants may plead over.

The withdrawal of opposition to bankruptcy proceedings already begun, is a valid consideration for an agreement between petitioning creditors and the defendants in bankruptcy.

Clark v. Locomotive Works.

Error to Superior Court of Detroit. Opinion by Campbell, J. Reversed with costs; new trial granted.

One who contracts to furnish machinery must, if necessary, provide suitable contrivances for making it effective. But whether a contractor should have used a certain specific device as better known and more effective than others, is for the jury to determine from evidence as to such knowledge and usage, and does not call for an expert's opinion.

A contractor furnished a steamer with defective machinery; held, that if during the boating season, ordinary prudence had required a timely stoppage of the boat for examination and repairs, and this precaution would have prevented continuous damage, but was neglected, enhanced damages could not be recovered.

In an action based upon a refusal to pay for defective machinery placed in a steamer, expert evidence was held admissible to show the condition of the boat as fitted to receive the machinery, as e. g. whether the stern, in which it was placed, settled more than it ought to.

Bottsford v. Simmons.

Error to Wayne, Opinion by Graves, C. J. Affirmed with costs.

A defendant in garnishment can not be held on the ground that he has property belonging to the principal defendant, when the process simply charges him with being indebted to the principal defendant, and vice versa. The grounds are distinct and the interlocutory proceedings and the nature of the judgment differ according to the form of the allegation against the garnishee.

Murphy v. Granger.

Error to Superior Court of Detroit. Opinion by Marston, J. Affirmed with costs.

Pendency of a suit in admiralty does not bar the institution of a suit at common law on the same subject, nor authorize a stay of proceedings therein. The principle of Granger v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 27 Mich., 406, is re-asserted.

National Bank v. Burkham.

Error to Superior Court of Detroit. Opinion by Cooley, J. Reversed with costs, and new trial ordered.

After accepting and paying a bill, the drawee cannot recover back the amount of it from the payee on the ground that he had paid it under a mistake as to the reliability of the drawer's security, which had proved to be fictitious.

Andre v. Harden.

Error to Saginaw. Opinion by Cooley, J. Reversed with costs and new trial ordered.

Considerable latitude should be allowed in the cross examination of experts as to their competency; held proper, however, to exclude evidence of a mechanic's having compromised his bill on complaint made of his work.

Where the waiver of a contract bears on the question of damages, the terms of the contract should be put in evidence.

Where a question, that might have been admissible to furnish a basis for estimating damages, was ruled out because the imperfect explanations of counsel asking it led the court to suppose it immaterial, the ruling was not treated as error.

Bissell v. Starr.

Error to Superior Court of Detroit. Opinion by Marston, J. Affirmed with costs.

Cross examination of plaintiff witnesses as to their character, without reference to the issue, should be regulated at the discretion of the judge.

It does not concern a bailee, sued for conversion, whether the plaintiff bought the property with his own money or not. He cannot question the bailor's right to recover its value.

In an action for conversion, it is immaterial, whether or not the plaintiff would have sold the goods for a certain price at auction; it would not fix the measure of damages.

It is competent, in a suit for conversion, to give evidence tending to show that the defendants had received the goods and delivered them to a third person not authorized by the plaintiff to receive them; also that they had the goods about the time they were demanded by the plaintiff, and did not deliver them to her, but denied having ever received them.

In trover for conversion it was proper that the answer "Yes, sir," to the question "Did you then demand the box?" should go to the jury, if not objected to at the time, as evidence of a demand, without detailing the conversation.

Robinson v. Grand Trunk Railway.

Error to Macomb. Opinion by Graves, Ch. J., Affirmed with costs.

A railroad company, though required to maintain side-fencing, is not liable for the destruction of cattle suddenly let loose upon the track through a breach in the fencing caused by a storm, and existing through no fault or neglect of the company.

McBride v. Grand Rapids.

Error to Kent. Opinion by Cooley, J. Proceedings dismissed with costs. Graves, C. J., dissents.

The provision in Art. VI., Sec. 8, of the Constitution, relating to the jurisdiction of the Circuit Courts with regard to certain writs, criticised as blind.

Writs of injunction, certiorari and habeas corpus, and informations in the nature of quo warranto are necessary to the ordinary jurisdiction of Circuit Courts.

The history and nature of the writ of Mandamus described.

The jurisdiction given to Circuit Courts by Art. VI., Sec. 8, of the State Constitution, does not authorize them to issue writs of habeas corpus, injunction and certiorari, information in the nature of a quo warranto, and especially writs of mandamus, except for the purposes of the jurisdiction that is conferred in general terms upon these courts.

SUPREME COURT OF INDIANA.

Abstract made from recent cases published in the Indianapolis Sentinel.

PRACTICE — CROSS-COMPLAINT — ANSWER — ABATEMENT OF THE ACTION — LEASING RAILROAD—RULES OF LAW AS TO CORPORATIONS.

4442. The Board of Commissioners of Tippecanoe county et al. vs. the L. M. & B. Railroad Company.

The L M. & B. Railroad Company vs. the L. B. & M. Railroad Company et al. Petitions for rehearing, Biddle J.

1. It is insisted that the court did not decide the point of practice made by the appellees in their original brief relative to the cross-complaint. It is insisted that the code does not prescribe the form of cross-complaint, and continues in force the laws and usages of this State relative to pleadings and practice in civil actions not inconsistent therewith, and in aid thereof, and to supply any omitted case. That the cross-complaint should state the original complaint, and the proceedings had thereon, etc., according to the old chancery practice. Such a practice once prevailed in England, where a cross-bill was filed in the Court of Chancery to an original bill pending in the Court of Exchequer; but the court is not aware that it was ever the practice in this State, or in America, or even in England, where both the original and cross-bill were pending in the same court, and in the same suit, as in this case. It is true our code does not prescribe the forms of a cross-complaint, nor even mention it in terms, yet when it abolishes the distinctions between the forms of actions, prescribes the form of complaint, and gives the right to bring a cross action on the same terms with the original complaint, it is not necessary to resort to an old practice which never did prevail in this State, to ascertain the form of a cross-complaint. Besides, the practice is expressly settled in 35 Ind., 326, where it is held that the only difference between a complaint and cross-complaint is, that the first is filed by the plaintiff, and the second by the defendant. Both contain a statement of the facts and demand affirmative relief upon the facts stated. In making up the issues and in the trial of questions of facts, the court is governed by the same principles of law of practice in one case as in the other.

2. The petitioners insist that their answer to the original complaint is sufficient to abate that branch of the action, according to the judgment of the court below. This was a dilatory plea, and as such must be construed strictly. No intendment can be taken in their favor. What is not properly averred within them must be held as against them. This answer sets up the pendency of the cross-complaint in abatement of the original complaint, yet it nowhere avers on what ground the cross-complaint rests, nor what relief it prays. True, it says that in the cross-complaint substantially the same relief is prayed for that the plaintiff seeks in the original complaint. This is not a good averment. If traversed it would only present the issue, whether the relief prayed for in the cross-complaint is the same as that prayed for in the original complaint. The court cannot look to the cross complaint in aid of the answer to the original complaint. It is not made a part of the answer. The answer must stand by itself.

3. Again, the answer is pleaded in abatement of the action, and the judgment of the court below puts an end to the suit, which the answer, if good at all, is good only as a plea in suspension of the action. [See Stephen on Pleading, 47; Gould's Pleading, 223, 224; I. Chitty's Pleadings, 447.] It is not in the power of the defendant to abate a suit properly brought against him in the commencement, by afterwards creating a state of facts against the ability of the plaintiff to sue; and there can be no doubt of the right of the plaintiff in this case to sue at the time they filed their original complaint.

4. The appellees seem to think that the court ought to have decided the general question whether railroad companies can lease their roads under the laws of this State. When such a question is properly presented it will be the duty of the court to decide it.

5. It is argued that the decision in this case is in conflict with former decisions of this court—particularly 11 Ind. 104, and 47 Ind. 407. The court thinks otherwise: In these two cases the want of power to contract was pleaded in favor of the corporation to defeat the payment of the consideration for benefits it had received and enjoyed. In this class of cases the courts will go as far as is consistent with the fixed rules of law to reach the justice, equity and good conscience of the case. In the case under consideration the want of power was pleaded against the corporation to prevent the perpetration of an alleged wrong. In such cases the courts will hold corporations to the strictest rules of law.

The petition is overruled, Worden, J., dissenting, holding that a re-hearing should be granted.

THE BAXTER BILL OF 1873—LIABILITY OF OFFICER FOR MINISTERIAL ACT DONE UNDER UNCONSTITUTIONAL LAW.

4,227.—Sumner et al. v. Beeler, by next friend.—Marion C. C. C.—PETTIT, C. J.

Suit by appellee against appellant to recover damages for an illegal arrest, imprisonment, prosecution, and causing him to be fined, on the charge of being found drunk, under the ninth section of the Baxter bill of 1873. Defendants answered jointly and separately by the general denial, and by a third paragraph in justification under the ninth section of said law. Demurrer for want of sufficient facts was sustained to this paragraph, and this is the error assigned.

This section has been held to be unconstitutional. (47 Indiana, 150.) It is well settled that ministerial officers and other persons are liable for acts done under an act of the legislature which is unconstitutional and void. All persons are presumed to know the law, and if they act under an unconstitutional enactment of the legislature, they do it at their peril. There was no error in sustaining the demurrer to the third paragraph of the answer. The complaint is sufficient. Affirmed.

SALE OF LOTTERY TICKET.

3910. Rothrock v. Perkinson, Shelby, C. C. Pettit, C. J.

Rothrock ond others purchased a lottery ticket in the Louisville Library Lottery. The third paragraph of the complaint alleges that the holders of the ticket drew $75,000 and the money was deposited in a bank for them. That Rothrock transferred the plaintiff one-tenth part of his interest therein. Rothrock notified the bank not to pay over the amount to plaintiff, etc.

Demurrer to this paragraph overruled, which is the error assigned.

Article 15, section eight of the constitution of this State prohibits lotteries and the sale of lottery tickets, and section 32, 2 G. and H. 468, renders the contract set out in the complaint void. Reversed.

A POINT IN THE LAW OF HABEAS CORPUS.

BROWN V. UNITED STATES (23 Am. L. Reg. 566).

In this case Bridges was indicted for perjury by the Grand Jury of Georgia, at a term of the State court, for swearing falsely as a witness before a commissioner of the United States Court, in a case of the United States against Kinney, arrested on a warrant issued by the commissioner, charging him with a crime against the laws of the United States, committed within the district of Georgia. He pleaded the general issue, and was convicted and sentenced by the court of Georgia to the penitentiary. A writ of habeas corpus was sued out from a judge of the United States District Court in behalf of Bridges, who was a freedman, and alleged to be a citizen of the United States and of Georgia. A question of jurisdiction of the United States Court to inquire into the cause of imprisonment of Bridges was made, based, in the argument, upon United States v. Booth, 21 How. 506, in which, it will be recollected, the United States Court held, that, if a prisoner is held under process and by authority of the United States, no State court has jurisdiction by habeas corpus, or otherwise, to pass upon the question of the legality of his detention. In the words of the court, "neither the writ of habeas corpus nor any other process issued by State authority can pass over the line of division between the two sovereignties." "We do not question the authority of a State court or judge, who is authorized by the laws of the State to issue the writ of habeas corpus, to issue it in any case where the party is imprisoned within its territorial limits, provided it does not appear, when the application is made, that the person imprisoned is in custody under the authority of the United States." In other words, and this is important in its bearing upon the questions presented in this case of Bridges, there is no concurrence of jurisdiction in the State and United States courts, and the action of the latter is limited to "its sphere of action prescribed by the Constitution of the United States." This objection to the jurisdiction of the court was overruled, and the marshall was directed to take Bridges into his custody, he being then in custody of the keeper of the penitentiary, and held under the sentence above mentioned.

In giving his opinion, Erskine, the district judge, examines quite a number of cases, including Tarble's Case, 13 Wall. 397, confirming the doctrine of the Booth case above referred to, and concludes that the State court of Georgia had no jurisdiction over the offense charged against Bridges, and adds that, "if the State court had not jurisdiction of the case, its judgment is utterly void, and the petitioner is restrained of his liberty in violation of the constitution, and the act of 1867 affords a proper and legal remedy to administer relief." "If he committed the crime as charged by the State in the indictment, the act was done within the authority and exclusive jurisdiction of the national courts, and, as they are the sole tribunals that could try him, so they alone could punish him." And he adds that "the Federal courts for that district are the only tribunals that have cognizance of the offense, and jurisdiction of the party offending." The case was then appealed to the Circuit Court, and we have the opinion of Bradley, J., by which he arrives at the same conclusion as the district judge.

Without presuming to doubt the soundness of this judgment, there is enough of seeming paradox to be encountered before reaching it to warrant us in occupying a moment in examining the steps by which it has to be reached. Stripped of its surroundings, we have this simple case: The persons called judges of the Superior Court of Georgia, without the least pretense of right or power, order a certain man called a sheriff, alike destitute of power or authority to act, to take a citizen of Georgia, against whom nothing has been legally alleged or proved, and shut him up in the penitentiary, and the keeper who, as to him, has no more right of detention than any man in the street, has him in his custody, all the proceedings having been utterly void. In order to be relieved from this detention, this citizen desires a writ of habeas corpus. To whom shall he apply? He and his wrong doers are all citizens and residents of Georgia. In the language of the court in Tarble's case, "there are within the territorial limits of each State two governments, restricted in their spheres of action, but independent of each other, and supreme within their respective spheres." "The two governments in each State stand, in their respective spheres of action, in the same independent relation to each other, except in one particular, that they would if their authority embraced distinct territories." And "that particular consists in the supremacy of the authority of the United States when any conflict arises between the two governments." Now, if we suppose this order of arrest and detention had been issued by a man calling himself Judge of the Supreme Court of Alabama, and an Alabama man calling himself a sheriff were to arrest a citizen of Georgia for larceny committed in Alabama, and to hold him under such arrest while he was a resident of Georgia, to which of these courts or magistrates should he apply for a process of habeas corpus, for it is to be borne in mind that there is no concurrent jurisdiction in the two. If one has jurisdiction, the other has not. And in the case last supposed, there is no conceivable reason why the injured party should not seek and find ample redress in the courts of the State in which he is arrested. Under the United States law, the judges of the United States court may grant writs of habeas corpus, but they "shall in no case extend to a prisoner in jail, unless where he is in custody under or by color of the authority of the United States, ar is committed for trial before some court thereof." Such was the provision of the statute of 1789, and it would clearly exclude such cases as the last we have supposed, and, of course, the party imprisoned must resort to a State court only. In other words, it was only where a citizen was unlawfully detained under process or authority of the United States that he might resort to the United States court for relief by habeas corpus.

In the case we have under consideration there was no authority from any source. The whole action is void from the beginning. The proceeding was in the name of the State of Georgia, when neither Georgia nor her officers had any cognizance whatever of the matter. What authority, then, had the United States court to interpose in any way in the matter? Theoretically, each State, in its sovereign capacity, is able to take care of her citizens, and extend over them the protection of the law in every thing, except what has been expressly delegated to the United States by the Constitution. And if that is to be measured and ascertained by the judiciary act of 1789, the present case would be clearly excluded; for the first and only action of the United States in the matter was the issuing of this very writ of habeas corpus now under consideration. Judge Erskine himself says that the question is to him "one of original impression," and intimates that it might have been saved altogether, if Bridges, the prisoner, had properly objected to the jurisdiction of the court which tried him when he was arraigned. And it would seem that the same court would have been as ready to discharge him upon his application for a habeas corpus, if the want of jurisdiction were shown, as they would have done upon demurrer in the first instance. And that, at first sight, seems not only the proper tribunal to apply to, but the only one to which a citizen of that State could apply to correct the error of one or more of its judges in a process in her own courts.

But when we come to examine the opinion of Judge Bradley somewhat carefully, we find he rests his jurisdiction upon a statute made in 1833, in the days of nullification, which forms a clause in the revised statues in these words, after the words already quoted, "or is in custody for an act done or omitted in pursuance of a law of the United States, or of an order, process or decree of a court or judge thereof." "And, in more recent times," says Judge B., "it has been extended to all persons in custody in violation of the Constitution, or a law or treaty of the United States." And he adds, "the case is relieved from the impediment to the use of a habeas corpus which formerly existed, where the prisoner was committed under State authority."

The upshot of the matter, therefore, seems to be this: If one is charged in a State court for what is a statute offense under the Statute of the United States, and of which the court has no jurisdiction whatever, and he sees fit to make no objection to its taking cognizance of the cause, and he is, upon a trial thereof, convicted and sentenced to be imprisoned, the State court could not discharge him upon habeas corpus if they would; but he may apply for such a process to a judge of the United States court; and, if the process against him is for an act done in pursuance of a law of the United States, such judge has full authority to discharge him from his imprisonment. It struck us as it did Judge Erskine, as being a point "of original impression," and one of sufficient importance to merit something more than a passing notice.—Albany Law Journal.

Bankruptcy — Practice—Composition. — The opinion of the United States District Court, for the District of Indiana, by Gresham, J., defining the practice under the amendment to the 43d section of the Bankrupt Act, providing for the disposition of pending cases by means of a composition between the bankrupt and his creditors.

Criminal Law — When Homicide is Justifiable.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of this State by McAllister, J., as to when homicide is justifiable in defense of person or property.

Power of Corporation to Hold and Convey Land.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of this State by Scholfield, J., as to the power of a corporation to hold and convey land. The court makes a distinction between this case and that of Starkweather v. The American Bible Society reported in 7 Chicago Legal News, 59. Carrying a Pistol.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of Tennessee, by Nicholson, C. J., where the defendant was charged with carrying a pistol not openly in his hands in a public place, etc.: It would be well if the laws of the States against carrying concealed firearms were enforced. It is getting quite common in some localities when parties get into a difficulty, for one to draw a pistol from his pocket and shoot at the other.

Criminal Law Reports: Being Reports of Cases Determined in the Federal and State Courts of the United States, and in the Courts of England, Ireland, Canada, etc. With Notes by N. St. John Green, Lecturer on Criminal Law at the School of Law of Boston University. Vol. II. New York: Published by Hurd & Houghton. Cambridge: The Riverside Press. 1875.

Great care has been exercised by Mr. Green in the selection of the opinions for this volume. There is no surplusage in it. The head-notes are re-written, and are remarkably short. It is a volume of leading cases upon interesting questions of criminal law, each opinion being followed by condensed notes to the authorities relating to the questions passed upon in the opinions. It is a work no lawyer devoting his attention to criminal law can afford to be without. Illinois is well represented in this volume. It contains seven opinions by our Supreme Court. Mr. Green failed to obtain permission from the publishers of the opinions of the Court of Appeals of New York to take cases from those Reports for this compilation. Now, Mr. Green, why did you not take the opinions of the court which you wanted, write your own notes and head-notes to them, and put them in the volume? The opinion of a court cannot be copyrighted; notes and head-notes may be. This series of reports is to be continued. The omission of the New York cases is to be supplied in the next volume.

The first edition of this work was received with favor by the profession and others interested in the law relating to horses. In this edition more than five hundred cases are cited which are not referred to in the first. Chapters have been added on "Carriers of Horses and Other Live Stock," "Negligence in the Management of Horses," and "the Rule of the Road." Injuries by horses and other live stock are considered in these new chapters. Horse law suits are not as common in this part of the country as they were twenty-five years ago, but any person engaged in them should procure a copy of this volume.

COURT OF APPEALS OF NEW YORK

John Rohrbach, respondent, v. The Ætna Ins. Co., appellant.

Where plaintiff made no representation as to his interest further than to show agent the instrument by virtue of which he claimed an interest.

Held, that the policy phrase "on his two buildings," even if more than a mere description, was not a phrase for which the insured was in any way responsible.

The policy provided that the claimant for a loss should give notice and render an account stating the ownership of the property insured. Plaintiff stated that the property belonged to him as legal heir of his deceased wife. His claim was that of general creditor of her estate.

Held, that this was no intentional deception, or anything calculated to mislead.

Folger, J.

This appeal was argued at the same time with that of the same plaintiff against the Germania Fire Ins. Co., and as one case; but they are quite different in some important facts.

The questions raised by the appellant, whether the plaintiff had an insurable interest, and whether the description of the property in the policy as "his two buildings," would avoid the policy, are fully discussed in the other case, and our conclusions in this are the same as there expressed.

The error for which the other case has been sent back for a new trial is not presented in this. It does not here appear that prior to the issuing of the policy the plaintiff made any representation as to his interest in the property further than to show to the agent of the defendant the instrument, in writing, by virtue of which he claimed an interest. Even if the phrase "on his two buildings" was more than a description of the property, it does not appear that it originated with him. It was the creation of the defendants or their agent, from the truthful information furnished them by the plaintiff. It was not a warranty, nor was it the basis of the insurance. It does not appear, therefore, that the plaintiff has made any breach of the conditions of the policy which were precedent to the issuing of it.

It is claimed by the defendants that there has been a breach of a condition subsequent. It is provided by the policy, that all persons having a claim thereunder shall give immediate notice and render a particular account thereof, stating the ownership of the property insured. The plaintiff did render an account, in which he stated that the property belonged to him as the legal heir of his wife, Margaretta Hartman, deceased, and by purchase at auction on a certain day. The policy also provides that any fraud, or attempt at fraud, on the part of the assured shall forfeit all claim under the policy. If "fraud" here means a designed deception, there was none. The defendant's agent knew all that the plaintiff knew. The disclosure, by the latter, of all the facts known to him was full and frank. Nor was there anything untrue in the statement, save that he was the legal heir of his deceased wife. This was not the statement of a fact so much as of a legal conclusion. I do not perceive that it did mislead or could mislead; rather I think that it would excite inquiry as to how a surviving husband could be the legal heir of his deceased wife, for there must be other facts existing than her marriage to him and her death to make him her heir. I do not appreciate how there could have been any imposition upon the defendants by this statement, nor any throwing of them off their guard. It does not appear, as a fact, that there was any. And I think that the statement was made use of upon the trial, not so much to show a fraud subsequent to the issuing of the policy, as to show that when the policy was issued the plaintiff was not the owner of the buildings having any title thereto, and that there was a misrepresentation, and a warranty which was broken thereby. But that we have spoken of and disposed of.

There seems no error in this case calling for a reversal of the judgment. It should be affirmed with costs.

CAN A NOTARY PUBLIC ACT BY DEPUTY?

Ed. Legal News: Under our statute can a notary public act by deputy? And will the acts of one representing the notary public, under such authorization, be valid and legal? An answer to the question through the columns of the Legal News will be a favor. D. C.

Answer. A notary has no authority to appoint a deputy.—Ed. Legal News.

Judicial Power of Consuls General. —On Friday of last week the case of Francis Dainese against Charles Hale was argued in the Supreme Court of the United States by W. P. Clarke, for the defendant in error, and S. S. Henkle for the plaintiff. Dainese was consul at Alexandria, Egypt, and Hale Consul General, and plaintiff sued defendant for attaching his goods in a case of Allen against him, claiming that the Consul General had no such power as he claimed. A demurrer raised the question as to the right of the Consul General to exercise judicial authority, and the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia in general term, in June, 1873, sustained the demurrer. The case then went up on writ of error.

Punishment for Cruelty.—John McGuire, of Ford county, took Charles O'Connell from the Christian Brother's Home, in this city, to bring up. He abused the orphan boy, compelled him to ride on horseback until his hands were frozen, whipped and otherwise maltreated him. He brought suit by his guardian, James E. Morrison, in the Ford county Circuit Court, to recover damages for such ill-treatment. The case was taken by change of venue to McLain county. It came up last week before Judge Tipton and a jury. The jury found the defendant guilty, and assessed the damages at seven thousand six hundred dollars. The verdict in this case should not only serve as a warning to all tyrannical and ill-tempered persons who are in the habit of being cruel to poor orphans, but should convince institutions that commit the care and custody of children to strangers, of the necessity of some system of visitation.

The R. R. Tax Injunction Cases.—Attorney General Edsall, on Tuesday last, moved the Supreme Court of the United States to advance what were known as the Railroad Tax Injunction Cases, on the docket.

JUDGE McALLISTER—WHO WILL SUCCEED HIM?

The Springfield Journal, of a recent date, says:

It was announced in the Chicago papers of Saturday that the Hon. William K. McAllister, one of the Justices of the Supreme Court of this State, had been nominated for the office of Judge of the Circuit Court of Cook county.

We presume this action would not have been taken without the sanction of Judge McAllister, and it therefore indicates the truth of the rumors we have heard of the intention of that gentleman to retire from the supreme bench.

Only a few months since, Judge Thornton resigned his place upon the bench, to resume his practice at the bar, being driven to that course by the excessive labor of the position and the inadequate compensation provided by a pusillanimous policy called economy. Now we have the prospect of losing another able and honest judge, probably from the same cause. Judge McAllister is recognized by men of all parties as a man of ability and learning, and of the purest character. It cannot but be a matter of deep regret that any circumstances should conspire to induce him to leave a position so important to the people, and which he was so well calculated to honor and adorn.

The fact is, our Supreme Court are sadly overworked. The dockets in the three grand divisions aggregate one thousand to twelve hundred cases per annum. Of these, not less than eight hundred require written opinions. Nearly one-half of the year is necessarily occupied in holding court and in consultation. The balance of the time must be devoted to writing opinions. This simply involves perpetual toil, day and night, the year round. But few men have the physical strength to endure such incessant labor. We believe the court make a great mistake in their endeavor to do too much. The public have no right to require their servants to work themselves to death. Men in the ordinary avocations of private life are enabled to get along prosperously with reasonable labor. Public servants should be expected to do no more. Let the Supreme Court Judges assert their right to protect their health and lives, and do only so much as can be done well, and consistently with safety to themselves. This might result in the docket getting behind. All the better for that. If decisions were less prompt, there would be less encouragement to the small and unnecessary litigation which now encumbers our court dockets.

If Judge McAllister should be elected to the Circuit Judgeship in Cook county—and that seems to be a foregone conclusion—he will receive a larger salary, with the prospect of a month's vacation in each year, while as Supreme Judge he could have no vacation at all.

If we did not so much regret his leaving a higher sphere of usefulness, we would congratulate him upon the prospect of so fortunate a change.

WHO shall succeed Judge McAlister on the Supreme Bench becomes an important question. His election to the position of Circuit Judge being a certainty, having been nominated by both parties. The names of Hon. Harvey B. Hurd, the reviser of the Statutes of the State, the Hon. C. W. Upton, of Waukegon, Chairman of the Committee that revised the Statutes of 1874, M.F.Tuley, late corporation counsel, Melville W. Fuller, one of the ablest and most industrious attorneys at the bar, and Hon. T. L. Dickey, the corporation counsel, who is an old resident of the State and was at one time Judge of the LaSalle Circuit Court, have been mentioned in this connection. The Chicago Evening Journal of Thursday, says:

"The resignation of Judge McAlister as a member of the State Supreme Court being now a certainty, the question of his successor in that important tribunal is now in order. Hon. H. B. Hurd, of this county, whose recent laborious and successful work of revising the statutes of Illinois was appreciated and applauded not only by the General Assembly, but by the entire legal profession of the State, is favorably mentioned in connection with that vacancy.

It would, we think, be a very difficult matter to find a better man in this district for that peculiar position than Mr. Hurd. With his familiarity with the statutes, and with his acknowledged judicial turn of mind, he would fill a seat on the Supreme Bench with ability.

The term to which Judge McAlister was elected, and which his successor will serve out, will expire in June, 1879. The Supreme Court District which Judge McAlister represents, and in which a special election for his successor will be called, is numerically the Seventh, and embraces the counties of Cook, Lake, DuPage, Will and Kankakee."

The successor of Judge McAlister should be able, honest and industrious. The bar of the district has ample material for the people to select from.

SUPREME COURT OF INDIANA.

Abstract made from recent cases published in the Indianapolis Sentinel.

GENERAL VERDICT — SPECIAL FINDINGS—PRACTICE.

4217. The Jefferson, M. & I. Railroad Company v. Worland, executrix.

Action by appellee against the railroad company; the complaint alleges a special contract by which the railroad company agreed with plaintiff's testator to transport certain hogs from Shelbyville to Jeffersonville at an agreed price; that the hogs were shipped on the morning of February 3, 1872, and by agreement were to be delivered in Jeffersonville on the following day at 9 o'clock A. M.; that by negligence of defendant the cars were delayed thirty-six hours; and alleges the damages resulting therefrom. Trial by jury with general verdict for plaintiff, and answers to interrogatories propounded at the instance of defendant.

In the answers to these interrogatories the jury found that there was no special contract between the parties, nor any agreement to deliver the hogs at a specified time in Jeffersonville. The defendant moved for judgment on the special findings on the ground that they were inconsistent with the general verdict. This motion was overruled, followed by a motion for a new trial, which was overruled. The overruling these two motions presents the questions to be considered. The court is of opinion that there is a fatal variance between the contract alleged and that which the jury found to have been proved; there was a failure of proof within the meaning of section 96, 2 G. & H., 116.

Reversed.

INDICTMENT FOR KEEPING GAMING HOUSE—MEANING OF WORD "HIRE."

4576. Carr v. the State of Indiana, Benton C. C. Worden, J.

Indictment for keeping a gaming house. Motion to quash overruled: verdict of guilty; motion for new trial overruled.

It is urged that the indictment is double, charging the keeping of a gaming house within section 19 of the act defining misdemeanors, etc., and the keeping of a billiard table, within the meaning of sec. 74 of the same act.

The court is of opinion that no offense is charged in the indictment within the meaning of section 74, as it is not alleged, as required by that section, that the table was kept "for the purpose of wagering any article of value thereon."

Upon the trial it was proved that the rule was, that when persons played billiards on the table the loser of the game paid for the use of the table 20 or 25 cents. There was no evidence that any one had played for "beer," "whisky" or "other articles of value."

The court is of opinion that, on the evidence, the appellant was entitled to a new trial. The only charge sustained by the evidence is, that persons were permitted to play and bet and wager upon the result of the game, "the hire of said billiard table." To constitute gambling, some "article of value" must be lost or won, and the penalty prescribed is a fine of not less than the value, nor more than twice the value of the article lost or won, (2 G. & H., 465, section 28,) and in a prosecution for gambling the value of the article lost or won must be stated, (13 Ind., 566.) Betting and wagering "the hire of said billiard table," is too indefinite and uncertain to constitute a valid charge. "Hire" means a reward, recompense for the use of a thing. But the indictment does not show that the reward had any value.

PROSECUTED FOR BASTARDY—CONFESSIONS OF RELATRIX NOT ADMISSIBLE EXCEPT FOR IMPEACHMENT—NEW TRIAL NOT GRANTED FOR IMPEACHMENT—CHANGE OF VENUE—WAIVING OBJECTIONS TO.

4240. Thalke v. The State of Indiana, ex rel., etc., Ohio. C. C. Worden, J.

Prosecution of appellant for bastardy. Trial by jury, verdict, guilty, and judgment over motions by defendant for a new trial and in arrest.

Overruling these motions are the errors assigned. The motion in arrest is based upon the alleged reason that the court had no jurisdiction of the subject matter. There was a change of venue, upon motion of defendant, from the Ohio Circuit Court to the Dearborn Circuit Court, and changed back again to the Ohio Circuit Court, for what reason the record does not show. To this last change the defendant must be deemed to have acquiesced, for he not only did not object thereto, but he appeared to the action in the latter court, again applied for a change of venue, procured a continuance and finally went to trial without objection. The case stands upon the same footing as if there had been an express agreement between the parties to the change. The court had jurisdiction of bastardy cases, and the consent of the parties gave it jurisdiction of this particular case.

Two grounds are presented upon which it is claimed a new trial should have been granted, viz: Surprise and newly discovered evidence.

The alleged surprise was the evidence given by a certain witness. The court is of opinion that no such case of surprise is made out as the law will relieve against.

Appellant filed his affidavit stating that he expected to be able to prove by A. B. that he was five miles away from Milton, the place where the alleged act was committed, on the evening of March 20th, 1871, the time when the act is alleged to have been committed. This is cumulative of the appellant's own testimony on the same subject. In the same affidavit appellant stated that he had discovered since the trial that he could prove by D. J. that the relatrix had stated to him, in a certain conversation, that the appellant was not the father of the child, but the reason she charged appellant was that he was worth something, and the real father was poor. In the conflicting state of the evidence on the trial, had this evidence been introduced, it is probable a different result would have been the consequence.

If this evidence could be introduced as the admission of the relatrix, like the admission of any other party, then it would seem that a new trial should have been granted. The writer of this opinion, and Pettit, C. J., are of opinion that the relatrix, in a bastardy prosecution, is so far a party to the action that her admissions as such may be given in evidence against her, like admissions of other parties. But a majority of the court are of a different opinion.

Her statements could only be given in, in this view, to impeach her; but a new trial will seldom, if ever, be granted for the purpose of impeachment. 16 Ind., 97; 40 Ind., 351.

INDICTMENT FOR DESECRATING THE SABBATH—ALLEGATIONS IN INDICTMENT OF EXCEPTIONS IN STATUTE.

5152. Russell v. the State of Indiana, Marion C. C. C. Buskirk, J.

Appellant was indicted and convicted in the court below for desecration of the Sabbath, by superintending, contracting and carrying on a barber-shop on Sunday. A motion to quash the indictment was overruled. This is the error assigned. The objection urged to the indictment is that it does not negative all the exceptions contained in the body of the act. The statute, among other things, excepts "works of charity and necessity." The indictment omits the words "and necessity." This is a fatal omission. When the exception is contained in a subsequent clause or statute it is a matter of defense, and need not be negatived in the indictment. But if it be in the enacting clause, or clearly connected with it, it must be shown by negative averment that the defendant is not within the exception. 7 Blackf., 590, 9 Ind., 408.

U. S. SUPREME COURT CASES.

STATE LAWS AGAINST USURY AS AFFECTING NATIONAL BANKS.

The case of the Farmers' and Mechanics' National Bank of Buffalo against Dearing from the Court of Appeals of New York, now argued by the Supreme Court of the United States, presents the question whether national banks, under the thirtieth section of the act of June, 1864, have privileges of immunity from the usury laws of a State, so that they may make loans at a greater rate of interest than prescribed by State law. The State court held that they have no such right, and held a contract reserving ten per cent. interest usurious and void. It is here urged that the forfeiture under the charter of the bank could be only of the entire interest, and not the principal sum as well, as provided by State law in New York, where the interest is 7 per cent.

REDEMPTION OF SPURIOUS BONDS BY THE GOVERNMENT.

The case of Jay Cooke & Co., against the United States, also just argued before the United States Supreme Court, presents the question whether the redemption of its bonds by the government, operates as an estoppel, afterwards preventing the plea that the bonds were spurious, and a recovery of the money paid for them; also, the further question, upon whom the onus of proof rests as to the identity of the bonds.

A CIVIL RIGHTS CASE.

The case of Lanvient against Walker, from the Supreme Court of Louisiana, now pending before the Supreme Court of the United States, was brought to recover damages for refusal to sell refreshments, although full price was offered, because Lanvient was a colored person. The case was tried by a jury which failed to agree, and the court thereupon, under a statute of the State, gave judgment for the plaintiff for $1,000 as exemplary damages. This judgment was affirmed by the Supreme Court of the State, and the case is brought here, the argument being that under the fourteenth amendment, the citizen of the United States is entitled to sell his commodities or not, as he shall see fit, and the compulsion sought by the State law is an abridgment of that right. It is also said that, under the thirteenth, fourteenth and fifteenth amendments, the question of the rights of the colored man in such cases is referred to Congress, which has sole power in the premises, and that the judgment of the court of the State court was therefore void for want of jurisdiction.

SUPREME COURT OF KANSAS.

[TO APPEAR IN 18 KANSAS.]

TITLE OF OCCUPANT—ADVERSE TITLE.

A party in the quiet, peaceable and rightful possession of real estate, claiming title thereto, has such an interest therein, although his title may be ever so defective, that he may maintain an action to quiet his title and possession as against any adverse claimant whose title is weaker than his, or who has no title at all.—Giltenan v. Lemert.

LIEN FOR CARRIAGE.

The lien of a carrier of goods for charges for carriage is prior to the claims of creditors of the vendee, or the rights of the vendor. The carrier's possession can not be disturbed until such charges are paid. An officer holding an execution against the vendee of such goods, by paying the carrier's charges, becomes entitled to the carrier's lien, and is entitled to the possession even as against the vendor of such goods, claiming the right of stoppage in transitu, until he is reimbursed the money by him thus advanced. —Rucker v. Donovan & Feiferlich.

ACTS OF CORPORATION.

An act within the powers of a corporation, when regularly done, binds both the corporation and stockholders.—Whetstone v. Ottawa University.

ARTICLES OF INCORPORATION—CONSTRUCTION OF WORDS USED.

Where, in preparing a certificate of incorporation, the corporators employ only the words used in the statute to describe the general purposes of such incorporation it will be presumed that they intended to create a corporation of the same general nature, and with the same general powers granted by the statute, rather than that by such words they sought to apply special limitations on the powers of the corporation.

TOWN COMPANY—DONATION OF LOTS.

A donation of lots by a town-site corporation, with no special limitation on its powers, is not necessarily ultra vires. Where the direct and proximate tendency of certain improvements sought to be obtained by the donation is the building up of a town and the enhanced value of the remaining property of the corporation, the donation is within the powers of the corporation, and this though the improvements are to be made outside the town site.

A donation by the Ottawa Town Company to the Ottawa University of one hundred lots to aid in the erection of a school building outside of the town site, and distant therefrom less than half a mile, was not ultra vires.

CONSTITUTIONAL TERM OF OFFICE.

The provisions of sec. 3, art. 9 of the Constitution that "All county officers shall hold their offices for the term of two years, and until their successors shall be qualified," applies only to the regular term of the office, and not to vacancies, or exceptional cases.—Hagerty v. Arnold.

MORTGAGED PROPERTY.

The mere fact that one person mortgages goods to another does not authorize any person except the mortgagee or some person claiming under him to take the property from the mortgagor; and if any such person other than the mortgagee, or some person claiming under him does so take said property, he is liable for more than merely nominal damages.—Tallman v. Jones.

PARENT AND CHILD.

Where a minor son who lives with a father and is under his father's control commits certain wrongful acts, but where the said acts have not been authorized by the father, are not done in his presence, have no connection with the father's business, are not ratified by the father, and from which the father receives no benefit, the father is not liable in a civil action for damages for such wrongful acts.—Edwrdvs v. Crume.

ANECDOTES OF LORD BROUGHAM'S EARLY HISTORY.

II

A town in Scotland delights in certain traditionary facts connected with the early history of a great man. It is one of the towns of the Northern Justiciary Circuit. There dwelt an official, a man of wealth, highly respected, and given to much hospitality. His widow recently died at the ripe age of ninety years. She was just such a lady as would have been canonized by Dean Ramsay. She was full of anecdote, spoke the pure Doric, and eloquently upheld the past age over the degeneracy of its successors. Her husband was in use to invite all young advocates who went Circuit to his house and table. Sixty years ago, a young counsel made his first Circuit, and, it is said, earned his first fee in an appeal case—a source of revenue now extinct. He received the usual invitation to dinner. The day was exceedingly cold; and so soon as the newly-fledged barrister entered the drawing-room, he observed that the grate was monopolized and deformed by a large mass of coal, from which was emitted no particle of heat. At once, and without leave asked or obtained, the young jurist seized the poker, and with one strong, impulsive, and fell blow, he inflicted a compound fracture on the black diamond, and made the flames to leap upright and shed their light and heat around the apartment. The matron of the house stood astonished at this daring act of a stranger, and remarked, "Young man, d'ye no ken that nane shud meddle wi' a fire till seven years acquant wi' the house?" The smart reply was, "I know no such rule; but know that the use of coals is to burn and give forth heat." The lady, thereon, sarcastically observed to her spouse, "Tak' ye notice, that birkie is sure either to mak' a spune or spoil a horn." The good old lady's prediction was sybilistically soothfast. Many a spoon, both horn, silver, and gold, has the same person made; and it may be some few useless, brutish horns have been unavoidable spoiled in the process of manufacture. It was not from any doubts of Dr. Black's theory of latent heat that he committed the daring deed of violating the privacy of the fire-place, and interfering with the lares et penates of the domestic circle; but he early had intuitive notions of utilitarian policy—"The greatest good to the greatest number." He was an experimental philosopher after the school of James Watt, and delighted in the expansive power and diffusion of heat set at liberty and imparting force. Many a severe stroke has he since inflicted on dark and black masses of corruption, and has invoked heat and light where before nothing had existed save cold and deadness. It is needless to add, that the young Scotch advocate was Henry Brougham, and the Lady Prophetess lived to see the object of her censure and vaticination the honored occupant of the Woolsack, as Lord Chancellor of England.

III.

In the beginning of this century, William Hall, overseer of a farm in Selkirkshire, Scotland, was leaning against the dyke of the farmyard, patriarchial-like meditating at evening-tide, while a young gentleman came up to him, wished him a good evening, and observed that the country around looked beautiful. The two getting into conversation, Hall, after a few observations, asked him "Whaur he was gaun?" The stranger answered that he intended going to Jedburgh. "And what business can ye ha'e at Jedart?" says Wull. "Oh," says the gentleman, "I am going to attend the Circuit Court, but my feet have failed me on the road;" and, observing a pony in the farm-yard, he said, "There's a nice bit pony of yours—is it to sell?—would you like to part with it?" "I wadna care," says Wull, "but ma brither Geordie, he's the farmer, he's at Selkirk the day; but if we could get a good price for't, I daresay we micht part wi't." "What do you ask for it?" says the other. "Ma brither," quoth Wull, "says it's a thing we ha'e nae use for, and if we could get aught of a wiselike price for't it would be as weel to let it gang." There were only two words to the bargain; the gentleman and Wull agreed, and the sale was completed without missive or sale note. "But," says the gentleman, "by the way, I cannot pay you to-night; but if you have any hesitation about me, my name is Henry Brougham, and I refer you to the Earl of Buchan, or Mr. George Currie, of Greenhead, who will satisfy you." The residences of this nobleman, and Henry's brother advocate, Mr. Currie, were in the neighborhood. On this reference, without making any inquiry, Wull immediately gave the gentleman the pony, with the necessary trappings. Wull, being a man of extreme orderly habits, went early to bed, and soundly slept, without either nightmare or pony, and the next morning, when the business of the farm called him and Geordie together, says Wull to Geordie, "Ye was unco late in comin' hame last nicht; I selt the powny." "And wha did ye sell it to?" says Geordie. "Oh, to a young gentleman." "And what did ye get for't?" Wull having mentioned the price—"My faith," says Geordie, "ye hae selt it weel." "But," says Wull, "I didna get the siller." "Ye big idiot! ye didna gi'e awa' the powny without getting the siller for't? Wha was he?" "Oh, he ca'd himsel' Henry Brougham; and he said, if I had ony jalousin' aboot him, that the Earl o' Buchan, or George Currie, the advocate, the laird o' Greenhead, would say he was guid enough for the money. Oh, he was a very honest-looking lad; I could hae trusted onything in his hand." Geordie's temper became quite ungovernable at Wull's simplicity, and he was nearly subjecting him to Jeddart justice. After the whole Southern Circuit was finished, there was no word of payment, and Wull's life became quite miserable at Geordie's incessant grumbling and taunting—the latter ever and anon repeating, "What a confounded idiot, Wull, was ye to gi'e the beast awa' without the money to a man ye kenned naething aboot, and who very likely is jist ane o' the genteel vagabonds frae Lunnan;" and the other as pertinaciously insisting "that he (the gentleman) was an honest-looking man: there's nae fear o' him." In the course of six weeks, an order came for the price of the beast. "Weel," says Wull, "didna I tell ye he was an honest man? I kenned by the very look o' him." From that moment Wull stood eminently high in Geordie's eyes; and while the one chuckled at the penetration of character, the other was no less humbled at having called his superior judgment in question. Wull lived to discover that his estimate of character, ex facie, was not unfounded, when, after a brilliant career, the buyer of the shelty became the occupant of the Woolsack.

NUISANCE FROM SMOKE.—The Lord Justice James, in the case of Salvin v. North Brancepeth Coal Company, L. R. 9 Ch., 705, gives the following illustrations of the character of the damage necessary to sustain a bill for an injunction against a nuisance caused by smoke. He says:

"The bill in substance sought by a mandatory injunction to prevent the defendants, who are a great colliery company, from erecting or working any coke ovens or other ovens to the nuisance of the plaintiff; the nuisance alleged being from smoke and deleterious vapors. . .

When the Master of the Rolls said that the damage must be visible, it appears to me that he was quite right; and, as I understand the proposition, it amounts to this, that although, when you once establish the fact of actual substantial damage, it is quite right and legitimate to have recourse to scientific evidence as to the causes of that damage, still, if you are obliged to start with scientific evidence, such as the microscope of the naturalist, or the tests of the chemist, for the purpose of establishing the damage itself, that evidence will not suffice. The damage must be such as can be shown by a plain witness to a plain, common juryman.

"The damage must also be substantial, and it must be, in my view, actual; that is to say, the court has, in dealing with questions of this kind, no right to take into account contingent, prospective, or remote damage. I would illustrate this by analogy. The law does not take notice of the imperceptible accretions to a river bank or to the sea-shore, although, after the lapse of years, they become perfectly measurable and ascertainable; and if in the course of nature, the thing itself is so imperceptible, so slow, and so gradual as to require a great lapse of time before the results are made palpable to the ordinary senses of mankind, the law disregards that kind of imperceptible operation. So if it were made out that every minute a millionth of a grain of poison were absorbed by a tree, or a millionth of a grain of dust deposited upon a tree, that would not afford a ground for interfering, although, after the lapse of a million minutes, the grains of poison or the grains of dust could be easily detected.

"It would have been wrong, as it seems to me, for this court in the reign of Henry VI. to have interfered with the further use of sea coal in London, because it had been ascertained to their satisfaction, or predicted to their satisfaction, that by the reign of Queen Victoria both white and red roses would have ceased to bloom in the Temple Gardens. If some pictnresque haven opens its arms to invite the commerce of the world, it is not for this court to forbid the embrace, although the fruit of it should be the sights, and sounds, and smells of a common seaport and shipbuilding town, which would drive the Dryads and their masters from their ancient solitudes."—The American Law Review.

SUPREME COURT OF MAINE.

SYLVAN SHURTLEFF v. BENJAMIN F. THOMPSON.

If the bankrupt's counsel fails to appear for him in an action, because by mistake he supposed that the counsel for a co defendant also appeared for the bankrupt, a review of a judgment by default entered against the bankrupt may be granted, so that he may plead a discharge.

Petition for review of an action of assumpsit, brought by Mr. Thompson against Alvah and Sylvan Shurtleff. The presiding justice found and reported the following facts, upon which judgment is to be entered according to the rights of the parties, viz.: That William L. Putnam, Esq., was retained as the attorney of Sylvan Shurtleff in his application to the District Court of the United States for the benefit of the bankrupt act, as well as in the action now sought to be reviewed. The petition in bankruptcy was filed August 24, 1870, and the writ in the suit of Thompson against the Shurtleffs was entered at the February term, 1871, of the superior court. The petitioner handed the summons in that case served upon him, to his said counsel, who did not appear therein, however, because he saw that Howard & Cleaves had entered a general appearance, these gentlemen having been employed by Alvah Shurtleff, and not by this petitioner. At the March term, 1871, the plaintiff discontinued as to Alvah Shurtleff, and Sylvan was defaulted. He had no knowledge of this, or that Mr. Putnam did not appear for him in that suit, till August 10, 1872, when he was arrested upon an alias execution issued upon the judgment rendered therein. To obtain his release from his arrest, he gave the statute six months' bond, but performed none of its conditions, and an action is pending upon it. Sylvan Shurtleff obtained his discharge in bankruptcy, July 15, 1871. He expected and intended that Mr. Putnam would suggest his bankruptcy and plead the discharge in Mr. Thompson's suit, which was upon a claim provable in bankruptcy, being for goods delivered by the plaintiff in that case upon orders drawn by S. Shurtleff, in the name of the firm of A. & S. Shurtleff. While that cause was pending, this petitioner consulted Judge Howard about it, who procured these orders of Mr. Thompson's counsel, in order to show them to Sylvan Shurtleff.

HOWARD & CLEAVES, for the petitioner.

Bankruptcy and his discharge were a perfect defense, which Mr. Shurtleff was entitled to and intended to make; but was deprived of it by accident and mistake, without consent, knowledge, or fault on his part. This entitles him to a review of that action.

J. O'DONNELL, for the respondent.

The burden is on the petitioner to show due diligence, which he fails to do. This respondent only pursued his claim regularly, and tried to enforce it. He sued the firm of A. & S. Shurtleff. Howard & Cleaves appeared generally, and filed joint pleadings, not as attorneys for either individually. The action was tried in due course, and resulted in a discontinuance as to Alvah Shurtleff, and judgment against Sylvan, on the ground that their firm was dissolved long before the goods were sold by the plaintiff, the use by Sylvan of the firm's name in the orders for them being unauthorized and fraudulent. Should such a creditor suffer, then, becuuse Mr. Putnam did not see fit to appear, but (as well as his client) acquiesced in and ratified the general appearance of Howard & Cleaves? (Crooker v. Randall, 53 Maine, 355). By consenting to a default, and allowing us to take judgment, Sylvan Shurtleff prevented our proving our claim in bankruptcy, since it was merged in the judgment of a date subsequent to the 24th day of August, 1870. (Sampson v. Clark, 56 Mass., 173; Bradford v. Rice, 102 Mass., 472; Woodbury v. Perkins, 59 Mass., 86). The review would only create an annoyance in the action upon the bond, which virtually satisfied the judgment. (Sturdivant v. Greeley, 4 Me., 535; Brown v. Brigham, 87 Mass., 582.

Rescript.

At the March term, 1871, of the superior court, the petitioner, one of the defendants in the original action, was defaulted without appearance. He intended to appear by counsel which he had previously retained for that purpose.

He had a full, legal defense; but his counsel failed to appear and make it, for the reason that the latter mistakenly supposed that the petitioner's co-defendant's counsel also appeared for the petitioner.

Held that a review be granted.

JUST JUDGMENT.

The Indianapolis Sentinel says:

The difference between justice in Canada and in the United States is exemplified in the case of Dr. Davis and his wife, who have just been condemned to death at Toronto on the charge of fatal criminal malpractice. They had been guilty of the same grave crime at Rochester and other cities on this side of the great lakes, and invariably escaped the penalties of the law. When their case was called for trial at Rochester, the prosecuting witnesses could not be found, and they were discharged. Then they removed to Toronto, where they practiced their "profession" upon Miss Gilmour with fatal results. They were put upon trial and convicted upon circumstantial evidence, and were promptly sentenced to death, the court consoling them with the judicial assurance that they had better prepare to die, as there were no grounds upon which they could hope for even a stay of proceedings. The spectacle of a husband and wife being hanged on the same gallows and at the same time is a sad one, but the appalling character of their crime calls for the extreme penalty. It were better that they thus terminate their terrestrial career, than that women shall be mutilated and murdered, and society demoralized by the practice of their profession.

U. S. DIST. COURT, D. OF INDIANA.

OPINION OCT. 1875.

BENNETT F. WITT, assignee of WILLIAM M. AUGHINBAUGH, bankrupt, v. HENRY HERETH et al.

BANKRUPTCY—JUDGMENT BEFORE JUSTICE—LIEN—FILING PETITION IN BANKRUPTCY SAME DAY ON WHICH EXECUTION ISSUES.

1. On the 3d of August a summons was returnable before a justice of the peace against the bankrupt, and on that day an execution was sworn out on the judgment which was entered by default and levied on the property of the defendant. Later in the same day on which the execution was levied, the defendant Aughinbaugh filed his voluntary petition in bankruptcy and was adjudged a bankrupt. Held, that the lien of the execution and levy was not displaced by the subsequent proceedings in bankruptcy.

2. JURISDICTION OF JUSTICE.—The court considers the power of a plaintiff to reduce his demand so as to bring it within the limit of a justice's jurisdiction.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

GRESHAM, J.

On the 31st day of July, 1875. Henry Hereth filed his complaint before William H. Schmitts, a justice of the peace in and for Center township, Marion county, Indiana, demanding judgment against William M. Anghinbaugh for two hundred dollars upon a note, the principal of which was two hundred dollars and eighty-three cents, and on the same day a summons was duly issued to a constable of said township, and served on said Aughinbaugh. On the 3d day of August, at 9 o'clock A. M., that being the time at which said cause was set for trial, the said Aughinbaugh was duly called and defaulted, and judgment was entered for the plaintiff for two hundred dollars and costs of suit.

Subsequently, on said 3d day of August, the plaintiff filed his affidavit with said justice, averring that the collection of his judgment would be endangered by further delay in the issuing of execution. Thereupon an execution was issued on said judgment, which was immediately levied upon the goods and chattels of the said Aughinbaugh sufficient to satisfy the debt and costs. And later, on said day, the said Aughinbaugh filed his voluntary petition and was adjudged a bankrupt.

On this agreed statement of facts the court is asked to decide whether the lien of the execution and levy was displaced by the subsequent proceedings in bankruptcy.

Justices of the peace in Indiana have jurisdiction to try and determine suits founded on contract, when the debt does not exceed two hundred dollars. 2 G. & H., 579.

Unless otherwise directed justices shall issue execution on all judgments, when the defendant has appeared, after the expiration of four days from the rendition thereof; and in cases of default after the expiration of ten days; but when it shall be made to appear by affidavit that delay will endanger the collection of the judgment, execution shall issue immediately. 2 G. & H., 600.

It is insisted that the justice had no jurisdiction to render the judgment, because the note sued on exceeded the sum of two hundred dollars, and that the statute did not allow the plaintiff to remit part of his claim so as to reduce it to two hundred dollars for the purpose of giving justice jurisdiction.

Even if it had appeared that the plaintiff had thus reduced his claim by remitting the interest and part of the principal, I would have no doubt on the question of jurisdiction

The amount demanded determined the jurisdiction of the justice, and not the principal of the note or the amount actually due on it. If the plaintiff saw proper to reduce his claim to a sum within the jurisdiction of the justice by remitting part of it, no one had a right to complain for no one lost anything but himself.

Wetherill v. The Inhabitants, etc., 5 Blackford, 357, 6 ib., 63. Clearly the plaintiff was barred from maintaining another action on the same note, even if his judgment was for less than was due him. The facts agreed upon fail to show that the plaintiff remitted any part of his claim, and the presumption is that he demanded all that was due him.

It is further insisted that the filing of the affidavit, the issuing and levy of the execution upon the same day upon which the judgment was rendered and the subsequent commencement of voluntary proceedings in bankruptcy on the same day, show collusion between the plaintiff and the bankrupt, and something more than passive non-resistance on the part of the latter. I do not think so. All these suits might have existed without collusion. It must be admitted that the circumstances excite a suspicion that the bankrupt was trying to aid the plaintiff in obtaining a lien, but they go no further. It may be that the plaintiff knew of the insolvent condition of the bankrupt before he commenced his action, and that he hoped, by diligence, to get an advantage over the other creditors. He pursued a remedy that the law gave him. The other creditors were not equally diligent, and none of them saw proper to institute proceedings in bankruptcy and invoke the aid thereby of this court to prevent the plaintiff from obtaining his judgment, execution and levy, and the law imposed no duty on the bankrupt to go into voluntary bankruptcy to defeat the plaintiff in his efforts to procure a lien, Wilson v. City Bank, etc., 17 Wal., 473.

It was as much a part of the plaintiff's remedy to file his affidavit and cause his execution to be issued and levied before the expiration of ten days, as it was to obtain his judgment.

An order will be entered requiring the assignee to pay said judgment and costs out of any funds in his hands not otherwise appropriated.

U. S. CIR. COURT, D. OF IOWA.

OCTOBER TERM, 1875.

PITTSBURGH LOCOMOTIVE AND CAR WORKS v. STATE NATIONAL BANK OF KEOKUK.

CONDITIONAL SALE—PLEDGE—POWER OF NATIONAL BANKS TO TAKE PLEDGES OF CHATTELS.

1. UNRECORDED LEASE OF CHATTEL—RIGHTS OF A PLEDGEE AS AGAINST THE OWNER.—A locomotive was leased by the manufactures to a railroad corporasion in Iowa, by an instrument in writing not recorded, for a sum equal to its value, to be paid in nine months; otherwise the manufacturers were to have the right to re-possess the same. The lessee pledged the locomotive to a bank to secure a loan of money. Held, under § 1922 of the Iowa Code, 1873, which requires contracts for the conditional sale of chattels to be recorded in order to be valid against creditors and subsequent purchasers without notice, that the pledgee's right was superior to that of the manufacturers.

2. POWER OF NATIONAL BANKS TO TAKE PLEDGES OF CHATTELS AS SECURITY FOR LOANS.—A national bank may take a pledge of chattels as security for money lent.

JOHN F. DILLION, C. J.

Replevin for a locomotive engine. In July, 1873, the plaintiffs and the Miss. Valley & West. R. R. Co. (an Iowa and Missouri corporation) entered into a written contract, by the terms of which it "let" or leased to the railroad company the locomotive engine for nine months, for a sum equal to the value of the locomotive, one-fourth of which was paid at or near the date of the instrument, and the balance was to have been paid within the nine months. If paid, the plaintiff was to execute to the railroad company a bill of sale; if not paid, the plaintiff "was to re-possess and enjoy the engine as though the instrument had never been made."

The instrument contained a stipulation on the part of the railroad company, that the said locomotive engine should be taken to Keokuk, Iowa, by the railroad company, and there kept and used and not removed from the control of the railroad company without the consent of the plaintiff.

The engine was sent to the railroad company, and was received by it at a town on its line in Missouri. While there, to wit, in September, 1873, said railroad company borrowed of the State National Bank of Keokuk $1,250, and pledged the engine to the bank as security, placing the same in the actual custody of a third person for the security of the bank. The bank had no notice of the plaintiff's lease or claim on the locomotive, and the plaintiff's lease was never recorded. The question in the case is whether the pledge to the bank gives it a right to hold the locomotive as security for its loan to the railroad company as against the plaintiff.

At the date of these transactions there was in force in the State of Iowa the following statute:

"No sale or contract or lease wherein the transfer of title or ownership of personal property is made to depend upon any condition, shall be valid against any creditor or purchaser of the vendee or lessee in actual possession obtained in pursuance thereof without notice, unless the same be in writing, executed by the vendor or lessor, acknowledged and recorded the same as chattel mortgages." Code 1873, section 1922.

Howell & Anderson for the plaintiff; Gilmore & Anderson for the bank.

DILLON, C. J., orally said:

1. Conceding that the instrument of lease was executed in Pennsylvania, and that as between the parties it does not show a sale of the engine, and that, as de from the Iowa statute (Code 1873, sec. 1922), the plaintiffs would have the superior right, I am of the opinion, in view of the express stipulation of the contract, that the locomotive was to be taken to Iowa and there used by the railroad company, that the Iowa statute controls the case and has the effect to subordinate the rights of the plaintiffs to the lien of the bank as pledge. 2. I am furthermore of the opinion, that under the National Banking Act the bank had the right, on making the loan to the railroad company, to take a pledge of the locomotive as security. National banks are not, in my judgment, confined, in the taking of security for discounts and loans, to the security afforded by the names of indorsers or personal sureties, but may take a pledge of bonds, choses in action, bills of lading, or other personal chattels. The words "loans on personal security," in the banking act, are used in contra-distinction to real estate security. Such has been the usage of the banks, and any other construction would throw a bombshell into the community, and injure both the banks and their customers.

Judgment for defendant.

NOTE.—In Shoemaker v. Mechanics' National Bank, 2 Abbott (U. S.), 416, decided in the Maryland Circuit, it was held by Mr. District Judge Giles that a national bank has power to lend money on a note or other personal obligation secured by a pledge of stock of a corporation as collateral security.—The Central Law Journal.

U. S. CIR. COURT, OF VA., W. D.

FOWLKES v. FOWLKES.

REMOVAL OF CAUSES FOR PREJUDICE ON ACCOUNT OF COLOR—PREVIOUS CONDITION, ETC.

That there is no law enabling a colored citizen when impeached by another citizen of the same State to remove his cause because of local influence or prejudice. This right is only given him when sued by a citizen of another State.

RIVES, J.—Ex parte Peter Fowlkes and others, on a motion to remove from the Circuit Court of Pittsylvania, and docket in this court for trial, a cause pending in the former against the petitioners at the suit of the heirs of George Fowlkes, deceased.

On the first day of this term the petitioners filed their application for removal, accompanied by a full copy of the record. It is admitted that their petition was also duly filed in the State court. The motion now made to docket this cause brings before the court the question whether this removal is warranted by the act of Congress, and whether this court can entertain jurisdiction in the cause.

The petitioners allege that they are colored citizens of the United States, and of this State, to whom a certain George Fowlkes, deceased, late of Pittsylvania county, devised valuable lands and other property, by will duly recorded in the County Court of Pittsylvania, at its December term, 1873; that afterwards the heirs at law of said George Fowlkes brought their bill in chancery against those petitioners and others to impeach the validity of said will in the Circuit Court of Pittsylvania; that an issue of derisavit vel non was directed and tried in said cause; a verdict found against the will; that verdict was set aside by the judges; a new trial awarded, and upon the trial the jury were hung and discharged from rendering a verdict; upon these facts the petitioners predicate their averment that "they are unable to enforce their rights in the judicial tribunals of the State on account of the prejudice that exists against them in the minds of the white population on account of their color, race and previous condition of servitude." They further declare "their belief that if no difference existed between them and those claiming to be the heirs at law of the said Fowlkes, as to race, color and previous condition, that the juries in the State courts would have no difficulty in finding, under the facts and circumstances of the case, that the said paper writing was the true last will and testament of the late George Fowlkes."

Is this application, then, in conformity with the 641 sec. of the Revised Statutes?

It is observable that the late comprehensive act for the removal of causes from the State courts, approved March 3, 1874, embraces cases only originally cognizable by the Federal courts. The same is the case of removal on the ground of "prejudice and local influence."

The exception to this applies to cases of public officers, civil and military, sued on account of acts in the discharge of their official duties; and to persons denied or prevented from enforcing in the courts of the State their equal civil rights of citizens of the United States, and to officers, civil and military, or other persons for their acts or refusals under authority of the Civil Rights act. This departure from the fundamental principle of limiting removals to cases cognizable in the Federal courts, results from the duty of the government to its officers; and the obligation of Congress to enforce by appropriate legislation the provisions of the XIV amendment to the Constitution. These exceptional statutes, therefore, are to be strictly construed, interpreted if practicable, in subordination to and conformity with the theory of our judicial systems, State and Federal, and the provisions of the Constitution.

There is no law enabling a colored citizen, when impeached by another citizen of the same State, to remove his cause because of prejudice or local influence. This right is only given him when sued by a citizen of another State. And then the affidavit is prescribed to him, namely: "That he has reason to believe, and does believe, that from prejudice or local influence he will not be able to obtain justice in such State court." The interposition of the Federal judiciary is wholly based upon this belief or apprehension; and why? Because the cause was originally cognizable in that judiciary, and its removal thereto would involve an enlargement of the jurisdiction.

Had Congress supposed that it had the power under the Fourteenth amendment in a case between residents of the same State to give the colored citizen a right to remove his case on the ground of his belief that he could not obtain justice in the State court, why did it not use the language of the 639 section? Doubtless, the omission to use this language is due to the restricted and well-guarded inhibitions of the XIV amendment: "No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty or property without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws." Now, when section 641 speaks of "the denial of or inability to enforce in the judicial tribunals of the State, or in the part of the State, etc.," equal civil rights of citizenship, is such language to be satisfied by the declaration of a belief or apprehension that such may be the result of the prejudice of race? The latter is a state of the mind; matter of conjecture and not traversable; it may be mere suspicion. At any rate, it is vague, uncertain, and can produce no practicable issue. Not so with the former: there it appears as a fact, certain and absolute and, if need be, issuable and capable of contradiction. The petition must state "the facts; of what?" manifestly of "the denial or inability to enforce;" not merely of a belief or suspicion of these facts. When we construe this language in subordination to the constitutional amendment, it seems to me it clearly points to the action of the State in one of its three capacities—legislative, executive or judicial. Ought not the petitioner in such case to designate some law, some judicial ruling, some executive act, as the denial of his equal and civil rights, or as constituting the obstacle to his obtaining them? Surely it would be a mockery to assume his "suspicions" or "belief" in place of "the facts" for which this enactment calls. So far as the record of this case shows, the petitioners are enjoying their rights under the will of Geo. Fowlkes; it is true, they are sued in respect to them; and when they were about to lose them by the verdict of a jury, the judge interposed to shield them from the effects of prejudice, they deprecate, and now their complaint is that on a second trial the jury were hung, and the plaintiffs could not obtain the verdict they wished. They are still secure in their rights, but apprehend they may not remain so.

This enactment of Congress was never designed to appease the fears or lull the suspicions of a suitor in a case wholly cognizable in the State courts; it is designed to secure him the equal protection of the laws, and his equal civil rights, when invaded by the State in any part of its administration—legislative, executive or judicial. Nevertheless, the petition does not disclose any such case; it complains of no law of the State, general or local; no judicial ruling; no executive interference; it was a fear and belief of the existence of a prejudice of race, that is obstructing or delaying a decision in favor of the petitioners. They do not allege the absence of a law for change of venue in such case. They do not complain that juries are selected contrary to the State law, to which this court is required to conform as far as practicable. The fact is, my rule is based on the State law; it uses its phraseology as to qualification, and ordains a selection by lot as nearly conformable as practicable to the State practice; the only difference is that I require a representation of the colored race in the jury-box, while the State merely allows their eligibility. I can scarcely doubt that in a case like this where there is a fear of race prejudice, the State court would guard against it by an impartial composition of the jury, as is often practiced; and may, it seems to me, be rightfully demanded in this cause. If this court were to try this case they would have to do so under the laws and judicial decisions of the State, when not in conflict with the laws of the United States and judicial decisions of its courts; hence there is eminent propriety in limiting removals to cases of such conflicts pertaining to the guaranteed, equal rights of citizens.

For these reasons, I conclude that the case of the petitioners is not embraced by the terms nor the proper construction of the section of the law, under which they prefer their application; that they allege "no denial of their civil rights nor inability to enforce them in the State court" arising from any act of the State government, either legislative, executive or judicial; and hence that this court cannot assume jurisdiction of their case by removing and entertaining it here.

The court, therefore, refuses to docket the case, and directs it to be remitted to the circuit court of Pittsylvania.

The case was elaborately argued by distinguished members of the Virginia bar. Thos. S. Flournoy and Chas. E. Dabney for the removal, and Jas. M. Whittle and E. E. Bouldin contra.

OUR thanks are due GEORGE HERBERT, of the Chicago bar, for the following opinion:

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

OPINION FILED OCT. 13, 1875.

SAMUEL WING et al. v. EDWARD SHERRER.

Appeal from Superior Court of Cook.

EQUITY JURISDICTION—REMOVAL OF CLOUD UPON TITLE—LOST DEED—SECONDARY EVIDENCE—DESTROYED RECORDS—IDENTITY OF COMPLAINANT.

1. JURISDICTION TO REMOVE CLOUD.—That prior to the passage of the act of 1869, a court of equity would not assume jurisdiction to remove a cloud from the title to real estate unless it appeared the owner was in possession. That act extended the jurisdiction of the court so that a bill might be filed to quiet title and remove clouds from the title to real estate when the lands were unimproved, or unoccupied, and this is now the settled law, the exercise of this branch of equity jurisprudence is within the sound discretion of the court.

2. CONCURRENT JURISDICTION.—That in all cases arising out of fraud, equity has concurrent jurisdiction with courts of law, but parties will be referred to that forum where justice can be most effectually administered.

3. INTEREST OF COMPLAINANT.—That preliminary to any relief it must be proved complainant is the owner of the real estate in controversy.

4. IDENTITY OF COMPLAINANT.—The identity of complainant should have been shown.

5. EVIDENCE WHEN DEED LOST AND RECORD DESTROYED.—The record of the deed was destroyed by the fire of 1871. The original was placed in the hands of George Schoffer, in Brooklyn. Sherrer applied to him for it, but was told it was lost. Schoffer's evidence was not taken: the destruction of the deed was not shown, but it could have been found, had search been made for it. Held, there was no foundation laid for the introduction of evidence of its contents, either by parol or by proof of the contents of the original abstract of title, if the latter evidence was in any event admissible. Excluding this evidence, as it ought to have been, there remained nothing to connect complainant with the title to the lots.

6. REMITTED TO A COURT OF LAW.—The evidence being uncertain and unsatisfactory the complainant should be remitted to a court of law.

7. RIGHTS OF DEFENDANTS.—That the defendants bought in good faith for an adequate consideration, and they ought not to be deprived of their property, except upon satisfactory proof. Something more than the complainant's own testimony ought to be required in this case.

8. RECORD DESTROYED—CLOUD UPON TITLE.—That when complainant shall have established his identity as the grantee of Shimp, it will be appropriate, if the contract, once of record, but long since destroyed, shall be construed to be a cloud upon his title to this property, to file a bill to have it removed, and this he ought to do before coming into a court of equity to have it removed.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

SCOTT, J.

Prior to the passage of the act of 1869, a court of equity would not assume jurisdiction to remove a cloud from the title to real estate, unless it appeared the owner was in possession. That act extended the jurisdiction of the court so that it might hear and determine bills to quiet title and to remove clouds from the title to real estate when the lands in controversy were unimproved or unoccupied. The reason for the previous rule that obtained was, the party had a remedy at law. He could assert whatever title he had in an action of ejectment.

That equity will entertain a bill to quiet title or remove a cloud from the title to real estate, is now the settled law, and since the recent statute it is immaterial whether the party claiming to be the owner is in possession, or whether the lands are unimproved or unoccupied. The exercise of this branch of equity, jurisprudence has always been held to be within the sound discretion of the court.

The rescission of contracts, the cancellation or delivering up of agreements, securities, or deeds, or the specific performance of contract, are not matters of absolute right upon which a court is bound to pass a final decree, but it will exercise a sound legal discretion in granting or refusing relief according to what is reasonable and proper under all the circumstances of each particular case. It may be stated as a general proposition that in all cases, arising out of fraud, equity has concurrent jurisdiction with courts of law. But parties will be referred to that forum where justice can be most effectually administered, and the right most satisfactorily established.

As a general rule it is better in all cases of doubtful character, presenting a conflict of evidence, the parties should be remitted to whatever remedy they have at law, although equity might entertain jurisdiction.

Complainant claiming to be the owner in fee of four lots described, filed a bill to remove a cloud from the title, said to have been cast upon it by reason of a contract of sale to Samuel Wing, purporting to have been executed in his name by Warren and Goodrich, and a deed made in pursuance of that agreement by a person representing himself to be Edward Sherrer, which deed purported to convey the property in fee to Wing. The authority of Warren and Goodrich to execute any agreement in the name of complainant for the sale of the property is distinctly denied, and the deed made in pursuance of the contract is charged to be a forgery. Both the contract and the deed were placed on file in the proper office in Cook county, where the property is situated.

Preliminary to any relief in any view of the case, it must be proven complainant is the owner of the real estate in controversy. By the pleadings his title is put directly in issue, and the burden of proof rests upon him to maintain it.

The admission that the Edward Sherrer from whom defendants claim title to the lots is the owner, is not an admission that Edward Sherrer, complainant, is the owner. It is not necessary, perhaps, that complainant should deraign title from the government, but it is necessary he should show title in himself to the property, otherwise he can have no standing in any court. This he has attempted to do by proving a conveyance of the lots to himself from Peter Shimp, who was and now is a resident of Chicago where the property is situated, and in whom both parties concede the title was.

No original deed was offered in evidence from Shimp to complainant for the lots; nor do we think any foundation has been laid for the introduction of secondary evidence of its contents. Whatever record of it that existed was destroyed by fire when the court house was burned in 1871. The original deed had been placed in the hands of George Schoffer, in Brooklyn, N. Y., some years ago. Sherrer applied to him for it, but was told it was lost. Schoffer's testimony was not taken, and there is not a particle of evidence that he ever made any search for it. Its destruction is not proven. Non constat, but it could have been found had search been made. There was then no foundation laid for the introduction of evidence of its contents either by parol or by proof of the contents of the original abstract of title, if the latter evidence was in any event admissible. Excluding this evidence, as it ought to have been, there remained nothing to connect complainant with the title to these lots. This was a vital point in the case. Failing to show by any competent evidence, title in himself to the property, the relief sought ought to have been denied.

So far as this record shows, he was a stranger to the title and may not intermeddle. This view of the law is warranted by the decisions in this court and is fatal to the present decree. Hopkins v. Granger, 52 Ill., 504: West v. Schnebly, 54 Ill., 523.

The record presents a curious and most singular state of facts. Edward Sherrer, complainant, is a native of Switzerland, but now a resident of the city of New York. His business is plating ware, but how extensively he is engaged in that business does not appear. In 1861 he was called upon in the city of New York by Peter Shimp, whom he had never seen before. Shimp represented he called upon him through the recommendation of Conrad Schoertzer, of Canton, Ohio.

After some negotiation it is insisted Sherrer purchased the lots involved in this litigation, of Shimp for the sum of $900, paying for the same partly in plated ware or jewelry, some money, his note and mortgage on the premises, and by assuming the payment of a previous mortgage.

In 1868 a stranger, representing himself to be Edward Sherrer, called at the office of Warren & Goodrich, in Chicago, and authorized them to sell these lots for him, claiming that he was the owner. On the next day Warren & Goodrich offered a sale of the lots to Samuel Wing, and gave him the contract set forth in the bill. Soon after, the preliminaries having been adjusted, this Edward Sherrer made a deed to Wing of the property, which was acknowledged before Bradly, a notary public. Upon making the deed, Wing paid over all the purchase money, which was received by Sherrer, except an amount kept back until it should be made to appear a previous mortgage had been paid. Satisfactory evidence having been produced, the residue of the purchase money was subsequently paid to Bradly in pursuance with an arrangement made with Sherrer.

This Edward Sherrer seems to have been an entire stranger to all the parties engaged in the transaction. Bradly, who took the acknowledgement of his deed, had no personal acquaintance with him and had never seen him before he called to secure his services in this matter. He was equally a stranger to Warren and Goodrich, but when he called on Bradly he gave them as reference. All agree he seemed to know all about the property and the incumbrances upon it. As soon as he received the first payment, which was nearly all the purchase money, and amounted to a very considerable sum, he left, saying he was going to send the money away by express, and has never been heard of since. The residue of the last payment, after deducting some charges, still remains in the hands of Bradly.

The proof seems to be very clear complainant is not the Edward Sherrer who made the deed to Wing and acknowledged the same before Bradly, but whether complainant is the Edward Sherrer of the city of New York, to whom Shimp conveyed these lots is left in very grave doubt by the evidence. Proof of his identity rests alone upon his own testimony and that of Shimp. But Shimp's testimony is so much discredited by proof of his notorious bad reputation for truth and veracity, that full confidence can not be placed in it. In the details of what occurred between them in New York, their testimony is contradictory in the extreme. Complainant's own account of the transaction is unreasonable and highly improbable. Schwertzer, whom complainant says he knew in his native country, is said to be still living in Ohio, but his testimony was not taken to establish his identity.

In this uncertain and unsatisfactory state of the evidence complainant should be remitted to a court of law to establish his title to the property, whatever it may be. The defendants allege in their answer, they are in possession of the property and nothing appears in the record to disprove it. Complainant can bring ejectment and may prove the deed under which defendants claimed the property is a forgery. That question can better be tried in a court of law than in chancery. It involves the identity of two persons comparatively unknown, each claiming to be Edward Sherrer, the grantee of Shimp.

Defendants bought in good faith for an adequate consideration, and they ought not to be deprived of their property except upon satisfactory proof. They are in possession, as they allege, under a deed prima facie good, from the apparent owner, having been acknowledged under all the solemnities and forms of the law. It is this title that complainant assails. Something in addition to his own testimony ought to be required. Whether the testimony of Shimp will be regarded as sustaining complainant and make that clear and positive proof the law requires, that the deed under which defendants claim is a forgery, is a question of fact that ought to be submitted to a jury.

This he ought to do before coming into a court of equity.

When complainant shall have established his identity as the grantee of Shimp it will be appropriate if the contract once of record, but long since destroyed, shall be construed to be a cloud upon his title to this property, to file a bill to have it removed.

The decree will be reversed and the bill dismissed without prejudice.

Decree reversed.

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

OPINION FILED OCT. 11, 1875.

WILLIAM M. ZEARING v. JOHN RABER.

Appeal from Superior Court of Cook.

WHEN DEED DESCRIBES LAND AS FRONTING ON STREET—OWNER ESTOPPED—JURISDICTION OF COURT OF EQUITY.

1. The court cites approvingly the doctrine laid down in 2 Smith's Leading Cases, 154, that "if one owning land, exhibit a map of it, on which a street is defined, though not as yet opened, and building lots be sold by him with reference to a front or rear on that street, or lot be conveyed being described as by street, that this is an immediate dedication of that street, and the purchasers of lots have a right to have that street thrown open forever," and hold in this case that appellee is entitled to have the street kept open for use, and that appellant is estopped from denying the existence of the street.

2. JURISDICTION.—The evidence shows a threatened nuisance tending to deprive appellee and others of the full and free use of the street as he is entitled to have it used, and this is a well recognized ground for equitable jurisdiction.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

SCHOLFIELD, J.

James, Springer, and Green, being owners, as tenants in common of a certain out lot, south and in the immediate vicinity of the city of Chicago (except a strip extending through its center from north to south, used as railroad right of way), laid out a street, across such lot from east to west, extending from State street to what was then called Thompson street, but is now known as Wentworth avenue.

They caused ditches to be dug and a roadway thrown up along the street, so far as it extended on their ground, and erected a fence on its north side from State street to the railroad right of way. They also prepared a map of the lot showing the location of this street, designated thereon "Green street." The map, however, was neither acknowledged nor recorded, for the purpose of making a statutory dedication of the street. Walenta subsequently became the purchaser of a portion of the lot which was conveyed to him by deed from James, Springer and Green, by the following description: "Commencing at the southeast corner of said lot five, and running thence due north 152 feet to a street 66 feet wide, extending from State street to Thompson street; thence due west 672 feet, more or less, to land owned and occupied by the Michigan Southern and Chicago and Rock Island Railroads; thence south 152 feet, thence east 672 feet, more or less, to the place of beginning."

This property was subsequently conveyed to appelle by deed by the same description.

After the sale and conveyance to Walenta, we may assume for the purposes of the questions to be determined, without critically noticing the several deeds relating to his title, appellant became the owner of the residue of the lot, except that part occupied as railroad right of way.

In the deeds under which he derived title, this language occurs in describing the property conveyed to him: "* * * lot number 5, in section 16, township 38 north, range 14 east, excepting and reserving so much of lot 5 as was sold to Rudolph Walenta, October 4th, 1859, and described as follows (as in said deed to Walenta): the premisis hereby conveyed, containing 3 65-100 acres, more or less, subject to any and all railroads, public streets, lanes, alleys or highways running upon, along or through said premises, or any part thereof."

Aside from the language in the deeds, the evidence is clear that Walanta, in purchasing from James, Springer and Green, and appellee in purchasing from him, did so with express reference to the supposed existence of the street; and that when appellant purchased, he was fully informed of what had been done to establish the street, and what rights had been acquired on the faith thereof.

The question is, can appellant now be heard to deny the existence of the street?

It is unimportant whether the public have so far accepted the dedication as to be bound to keep the street in repair, since the question involved is simply one of private right. Nor do we conceive it necessary to determine where the fee in the soil of the supposed street is, whether it is in the adjacent property holders to the center of the street, or remains in the original owners until there shall be sufficient evidence of acceptance by the public. If appellee is entitled to have the street kept open for use, it will be sufficient. That appellant is, under the facts given, estopped from denying the existence of the street can hardly admit of controversy.

The principle applicable is well stated by the editors of Smith's Leading cases (7 Am. ed., vol. 2, 154), in a review of the authorities relating to the point.

And inasmuch as what is there said covers the entire ground in controversy, and meets with our approval, we shall content ourselves with transcribing it.

"If one owning land exhibit a map of it on which a street is defined, though not as yet opened, and building lot be sold by him with reference to a front or rear on that street, or lot be conveyed being described as by street, (Schenley v. Commonwealth, 26 Runa. St., 62 and Ed. 29), this is an immediate dedication of that street, and the purchasers of lots have a right to have that street thrown open forever (Wyman v. Mayor, etc., 11 Wendell, 487; Surugston v. Mayor, etc., 8th Id., 85; and see the matter of 29th and 39th streets, 1 Hill's N. Y., 189, 192), and this principle is not limited in its application to the single street on which such lots may be situated.

"If the owner of land lays out and establishes a town, and makes and exhibits a plan of the town, with various plats of spare ground, such as streets, alleys, quays, etc., and sells the lots with clear reference to that plan, the purchasers of the lots acquire, as appurtinant to their lots, every easement, privilege, and advantage which the plan represents as belonging to them as a part of the town, or to their owners as citizens of the town. And the right thus passing to the purchasers is not the mere right that such purchaser may use these streets or other public places, according to their appropriate purpose, but a right vesting in the purchasers, that all persons whatever, as their occasion may require or invite, may so use them; in other words, the sale and conveyance of lots in the town, and according to its plan, imply a grant or covenant to the purchasers, that the streets and other public places indicated as such upon the plan, shall be forever open to the use of the public, free from all claim or interference of the proprietors inconsistent with such use. Rowans ex. rel. v. Tow of Reatland, 8 B. Monroe, 232, 237; see also Bowlinggreen v. Hobson 3d Id., 478, 481; Huben et al. v. Gazley et al., 18th Ohio, 18; Dummen v. Den ex dem. Selectmen of Jersey City, Spencer, 86, 106; Wickliffe v. City of Lexington, 11 B. Monroe, 163."

Other authorities, cited in appellee's briefs, will, on examination, be found fully sustaining this quotation. Thus in Parker v. Smith, 17 Mass., 412, and in Thompson v. Roole, 7 Gray, 83, it is held that the general principle often recognized in that State is, "If land be conveyed, as bounded upon a way or street, this is not merely a description, but an implied covenant that there is such a way, and the grantor and his heirs are estopped to deny such a way as existing. So also a boundary on a passage way two rods wide, which is to be laid out between the premises and land of A., estops the grantor and those claiming under him to deny the existing of the passage way." Tufts v. Chovestown, 2nd Gray, 271.

To the same effect is Hawley v. The Mayor, 33 Md., 280. See also Smith v. Lock, 18 Mich., 56; Trustees et al. v. Walsh., 57 Ills., 368.

The principle is equally applicable to the portion of the street lying west as to that lying east of the railroad right of way. The description in the deed to Walenta expressly stating that the line of the property conveyed ran north to a street 66 feet wide extending from State street to Thompson street, and the conveyances to appellan tin clear and direct terms, excepting public streets running upon or through said premises.

What difficulties may be encountered in crossing the railroad right of way, or in opening up the street there, in no wise concerns appellant.

He has no right in the street laid out over the lot by his grantor, and appellee is entitled to have them as they were represented when his property was conveyed to Walenta.

The only remaining question relates to the jurisdiction of a court of equity, and upon this we entertain no doubt. The evidence shows a threatened nuisance tending to deprive appellee and others of the full and free use of this street, as he is entitled to have it used, and this is a well recognized ground for equitable interposition. 2 Story's Equity Jurisprudence, § 927; Horning v. Lourie, 6 Johnson, ch. 439; Rowen's Exrs. v. Town of Portland, 8 B. Monroe, 232; Mills v. Miller, 3 Paige, 254.

We see no cause to disturb the decree below, and it is therefore affirmed.

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

OPINION FILED OCT. 14, 1875.

ABRAM MITCHELL v. LEVI R. LYMAN et al.

RATE OF INTEREST—USURY—NOTE INCLUDING USURY—GIVING SECOND NOTE AND CANCELLING FIRST EFFECT OF.

1. RATE OF INTEREST.—That the statute limits the rate of interest to ten per cent. per annum, but is silent as to the time of payment of the interest whether at the end of the year or otherwise.

2. TAKING INTEREST IN ADVANCE.—That the taking the rate of interest, allowed by the statute, in advance, out of the principal, is not usurious.

3. WHEN USURY INCLUDED IN FIRST NOTE.—That although the usury in the first note should not effect the second one to the disallowing of the interest which it bears, yet the court is of the opinion that it should have effect to the extent that there should be a deduction from the second note of all payments of interest made before it was entered into upon the first note. The first note being usurious, no interest whatever was recoverable upon it.

4. USURIOUS INTEREST.—That usurious interest voluntarily paid cannot be recovered back, yet so long as any part of the debt remains unpaid, the debtor may insist upon a reduction of all usurious interest paid therefrom.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

Opinion by SHELDON, J.

This was an action of assumpsit brought by appellant against appellees to recover upon a promissory note, of which the following is a copy:

"Centralia, Ill., December 20th, 1869.

$3,000.00.

On or before December 20th, 1870, we, or either of us, promise to pay to the order of A. Mitchell, the sum of three thousand dollars ($3,000.00) for value received, negotiable and payable without defalcation or discount, with interest at ten per cent. from date; payable annually.

{ $1.50 stamp. }

Alex. McClelland.
Jno. W. Reed.
Isaac McClelland.
John McClelland.
John Woods."

Upon the back whereof were the following credits:

"Received the sum of ($300) three hundred dollars on the within note this 24th day of December, 1870.

A. Mitchell.

Received on the within note the sum of thirteen hundred dollars ($1,300) this February 15, 1872. A. Mitchell.

March 19th, 1872, received as interest on the within note, the sum of $200."

The only defense set up was one of usury. The cause was tried and a verdict found on the 15th day of February, 1875, for the plaintiff for $658.40 from the judgment on which he brings this appeal.

The evidence as to the usury was conflicting, but taking that on the part of the defendants to the full extent of all that it tends to prove, it presents this state of facts. That on September 1, 1868, three of the defendants, L. P. Lyman, Alex. McClelland, and John Reed, being in the mill business at Sandoval, Ill., under the firm name of Lyman, McClelland & Co., borrowed from the plaintiff, A. Mitchell, the sum of $3,000 for one year, at fifteen per cent. interest, giving therefor their note as follows:

"$3,000.

Centralia, Ill., Sept. 1st., 1868.

One year after date, we jointly and severally promise to pay to the order of A. Mitchell three thousand dollars, with interest at ten per cent. per annum, value received.

Alex. McClelland,
Levi P. Lyman,
John W. Reed."

The extra five per cent. interest was retained out of the sum lent, Lyman, McClelland & Co. actually receiving at the time only $2850.

This note was secured by a mortgage on their mill. After the note became due, another agreement was entered into between the parties that Lyman, McClelland & Co. should pay up all the interest on the notes and have the money for another year at ten per cent. interest; that the note of Sept. 1, 1868, and the mortgage on the mill to secure it, should be given up and cancelled, and that a new note should be given for the principal money at ten per cent. interest only, with personal security. That arrangment was carried out, and in fulfillment of it, the note in suit was given and accepted with Isaac McClelland, John McClelland and John Woods as the personal security upon it.

In the court below, there was no interest whatever allowed upon the note sued on, and there was further deducted from it all the interest which had been paid upon the previous note of September 1, 1868.

We are of opinion that there was error in the disallowance of any interest upon the note in suit. The penalty under our statutes for contracting to receive a greater rate of interest than ten per cent. per annum, is a forfeiture of the whole of the interest so contracted to be received and only the principal sum is recoverable. The contract sued upon is unobjectionable, as being one to pay a greater rate of interest than ten per cent. per annum and no greater rate was paid under it. Nor do we perceive that it had mingled in it any usurious element. The contract was another and different one from that of Sept. 1, 1868. That was a contract on the part of three persons to pay three thousand dollars, with fifteen per cent. interest, with mortgage security on the mill property. The contract of December 20, 1869, was one on the part of six persons (three of them being additional) to pay the three thousand dollars with only ten per cent. interest, and that the first note and the mortgage security should be given up and cancelled, which was accordingly done.

The latter contract was made by different persons in part for the payment of a different and a legal rate of interest, and on the additional and further consideration of the cancellation of the mortgage on the mill property.

We cannot see that the last note is infected with usury, on the account that it was given for the sum of three thousand dollars, while the amount actually received by the borrowers in the first instance, on Sept 1, 1868, was only $2,850, and not $3,000. The extra five per cent. interest was paid in advance on Sept. 1, 1868, and so retained out of the sum of $3,000 borrowed and the note given for $3,000 with ten per cent. interest. Notwithstanding $2,850 only was actually received, $3,000 was the principal sum borrowed and was the principal sum due at the end of the year, and giving a new note for the principal sum of $3000 did not necessarily have embraced in it any element of usury. Had the loan of the money on Sept 1, 1868, been only at the legal rate of ten per cent. interest, and the interest paid in advance and retained out of the sum lent, and had the borrowers received but $2,700 and given their note for $3,000 payable in one year, with ten per cent. interest after maturity, the transaction would have been unexceptionable, as regards usury.

The statute limits the rate of interest to ten per cent. per annum, but is silent in regard to any time of the payment of the interest, whether at the end of the year or otherwise.

It was said by Blackstone, Justice, in Lloyd v. Williams, 2 W. Bl., 792, "that interest may as lawfully be received beforehand for forbearing, as after the term is expired for having forborne; and it shall not be reckoned as merely a loan of the balance."

The reservation of the statutory rate of interest and the taking of the same in advance out of the sum loaned is not usurious, as held by this court. This was expressly adjudged by this court in McGill et al. v. Ware, 4 Scam., 21. The legal rate of interest at that time was twelve per cent. per annum, and McGill, on the first day of June, 1833, borrowed of Ware $2,500 for five years at twelve per cent. interest per annum, payable in advance, for which he executed his note.

After deducting $300, the interest on $2500 for one year, at twelve per cent., Ware paid McGill $2200. McGill, on the same day, executed his four several promissory notes for $300 each, the yearly interest on $2500 at twelve per cent., payable severally one year in advance, to wit: on the 1st of June, 1834; 1st of June, 1835; 1st of June, 1836; and 1st of June, 1837. The defense of usury was there set up, but the transaction was sustained as free from the objection of usury.

There are many authorities to the point that although a contract be in its inception usurious, a subsequent agreement to free it from the illegal incident shall make it good. Barnes v. Healey, 2 Taunt., 184; Kilbourne v. Bradley, 3 Day, 356: DeWolf v. Johnson, 10 Wheat., 367; Postlethwait v. Garrett, 3 Monroe, 345; Fowler v. Garrett, 3 J. J. Marsh., 681; Chadbourne v. Watts, 10 Mass., 124, Clark v. Phelps, 6 Metc., 296; Blydenburg on Usury, 91.

But although the usury in the first note should not affect the second one to the disallowing of the interest which it bears, yet we are of opinion that it should have effect to the extent that there should be a deduction from the second note of all payments of interest made before it was entered into, upon the first note. The first note being usurious no interest whatever was recoverable upon it.

This court, while deciding that usurious interest voluntarily paid cannot be recovered back, holds still, that so long as any part of the debt remains unpaid, the debtor may insist upon a deduction of all usurious interest paid, therefrom. Hadden v. Quins, 24 Ill., 381; Farwell v. Meyer et al., 35 id., 42; Taylor v. Daniels, 37 id., 331.

We think that under these decisions, for the purpose of the allowance of a deduction of all payments of interest made upon the first note, the original loan of the three thousand dollars is not to be considered as so far settled and paid up as to exclude such deductions.

The views expressed sufficiently dispose of the instructions, which were not in harmony therewith.

The judgment will be reversed and the cause remanded.

Judgment reversed.

WALKER, J.—I am unable to concur in the reasoning or conclusion announced in this opinion.

We are under obligations to the law firm of JOHNSON & OSBORN, of Goshen, Indiana, for the following opinion:

SUPREME COURT OF INDIANA.

CALE et al. v. ALFRED P. WRIGHT et al.

Appeal from the Elkhart Circuit.

SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE—TENDER.

That a vendor cannot bring an action for the purchase money without having executed the conveyance, or offered to do so, unless the purchaser has discharged him from so doing, and on the other hand, a purchaser cannot maintain an action for a breach of contract without having tendered a conveyance for execution and the purchase money.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

Opinion of the Court by DOWNEY, J.

The appellee, Wright, sued Samuel Cale and wife and William J. Church, alleging in his complaint the following facts: that Samuel Cale, in 1863, purchased by parol of one Benedict certain real estate in Elkhart county, Indiana and was put into possession thereof. The purchase money agreed upon was two thousand dollars, to be paid with interest from and after the purchase. Cale continued in possession and made lasting and valuable improvements. When the principal of the purchase money was to be paid is not alleged. In 1265 Benedict demanded payment of Cale, who agreed with Wright to pay the amount for him, with expenses and taxes, and that Wright should take and hold the title to the land as his security. Accordingly Wright paid Benedict, and he conveyed the land to Wright. It is alleged that this amount was to be paid in a reasonable time from July 1, 1863. It is averred that a reasonable time has elapsed, and that the amount has not been paid; that Cale failed to pay the taxes on the lands, which were paid by Wright, and the dates and amounts of the several payments are stated; that in May, 1868, Wright sold his interest in the land to Church, and in August, 1869, Church re-conveyed to Wright. Prayer for judgment against Cale for four thousand dollars; that the same be declared a lien on said real estate; that the court will foreclose the mortgage lien as against Cale and wife, and order the same sold, etc.

While Church claimed to own the land he sued Cale for the possession, and failed to recover, on the ground that the transaction between Cale and Wright was in the nature of a mortgage or security for money only, and did not therefore entitle him, as the purchaser from Wright, to the possession. See the case reported in 36 Ind., 34.

Following the suggestion of that opinion, the present action has been brought to enforce the lien of Wright.

The first question presented by the assignment of error, is as to the sufficiency of the complaint. A question is discussed under another assignment of error which is also applicable here, and that is whether any action can be maintained by the plaintiff to subject the land to sale until after a tender of a deed and demand of the money. The claim of Benedict, had he sued and sought to subject the land, would have been for specific performance of the contract of purchase made and partly performed by Cale, and for an enforcement of his vendor's lien. As he conveyed the fee in the land to Wright, and as he took the place of Benedict for all practical purposes, it seems to us that before Wright could sue for specific performance and to enforce his lien, it was necessary that he should have tendered performance on his part by offering to Cale a deed for the land, to be delivered upon payment of the purchase money, etc. There was no definite time fixed for the payment of the purchase money either in the contract between Benedict and Cale, or that between Wright and Cale. The acts were cleaaly intended to be concurrent and dependent acts, and neither party ought to sue without having tendered performance on his part. Sugden, in his work on Vendors, 162, 163, says: "A vendor cannot bring an action for the purchase money without having executed the conveyance, or offered to do so, unless the purchaser has discharged him from so doing. And on the other hand, a purchaser can not maintain an action for a breach of contract without having tendered a conveyance (for execution) and the purchase money." And see Mather v. Scales, 35 Ind., 1, and cases cited.

We need not examine the other questions made in the case.

The judgment is reversed, with costs, and the cause remanded, with instructions to sustain the demurrer to the complaint.

J. H. BAKER, J. A. S. MITCHELL, attorneys for appellee.

SUPREME COURT OF TENNESSEE.

JOHN B. NORVELL v. JOHN BAKER AND WIFE.—Knoxville, June 19. 1875.

TITLE BOND—HUSBAND AND WIFE.—Upon bill filed against husband and wife by the purchaser of their real estate under a title bond executed by them, to enforce a specific execution of the contract, or for a rescission and a judgment against them for purchase money paid on the land; Held, that the title bond given by the husband and wife was a nullity, and specific performance of the contract was rightfully refused by the chancellor. But it was erroneous to render a decree against the wife for the purchase money and subject her interest in the land to its satisfaction.—[ED. Commercial and Legal Reporter.]

NICHOLSON, C. J.

Baker and wife sold to Norvell the undivided interest of Baker's wife in a tract of land of about 120 acres for $800, and executed to him a bond for title. The land had descended to the wives of Norvell and Baker as tenants in common. Norvell afterwards paid the purchase money, but got no deed. The parties agreed to cancel the trade, when Baker and wife paid to Norvell $200 and executed their three notes for $200 each, together with a written agreement whereby Norvell was to release his claim for a title under his bond upon the payment of the three notes.

Baker and wife failed to pay the three notes, when Norvell filed his bill for a specific execution of the original contract, and if that could not be done, he prayed for a judgment against Baker and wife for the purchase money paid by him, with a lien on the land for its satisfaction. Upon the hearing, the chancellor held the bond for title null and void, because of the coverture of Baker's wife, and therefore refused a specific performance of the contract, but he held that Norvell was entitled to a decree for the purchase money and interest against Baker and wife, and ordered the land to be sold for the satisfaction of the amount.

The land was accordingly sold, and bought by Norvell at $300, and title was vested in his wife at his request.

Baker and wife bring the case here by writ of error.

The decree is manifestly correct so far as it treats the bond for title as a nullity, and refuses to decree a specific performance. But we find no evidence of fraud on the part of Baker's wife in the transaction, nor is there any evidence that she received the purchase money paid by Norvell for the land.

We are therefore of opinion that it was erroneous to render a decree against her for the purchase money, and subject her interest in the land to its satisfaction. The case of Rhea v. Isley and others, decided at the September Term, 1871, at Knoxville, is conclusive of the present case. It follows that the decree is reversed, so far as it gives judgment against Baker and wife for the purchase money, and orders a sale of land. The decree setting aside the title bond as null and void is affirmed, and a decree will be rendered against Baker for the amount of the purchase money and interest.

The costs will be paid by Norvell with judgment over therefor against Baker.

ENGLISH HOUSE OF LORDS.

DAWKINS v. ROKEBY.

Error from the Court of Exchequer Chamber in England.

DEFAMATION—PRIVILEGE—WITNESS—MILITARY COURT OF INQUIRY.

The ordinary rule of law that a witness is absolutely privileged in what he says or writes in giving evidence before a court of justice, even if he has acted mala fide, and with express malice, extends to a witness before a military court of inquiry, called in pursuance of the regulations of the army to inquire into matters of military discipline, though the witness be not examined on oath before such court.

Judgment of the court below affirmed.

PER LORD PENZANCE.—It is inexpedient, on grounds of public policy, to remit such questions as the truth and bona fides of a witness to the judgment of a jury.

This was a proceeding in error from a judgment of the Exchequer Chamber (Kelly, C. B., Martin, Bramwell, Channell, Pigott, and Cleasby, BB.; and Byles, Keating, Brett, and Grove, JJ.), delivered Feb. 1st, 1873, upon a bill of exceptions to the ruling of Blackburn, J., in a case tried before him at Westminster, in Feb., 1871.

The case is reported below in L. Rep. 8 Q. B. 255, and 28 L. T. Rep. N. S. 134, where the facts are fully set out.

The plaintiff and defendant were both officers in the army, and the action was brought for an alleged libel and slander of the plaintiff by the defendant in certain evidence given by him before a military court of inquiry, assembled to investigate the conduct of the plaintiff as such officer. The learned judge ruled that as a matter of law the action would not lie even though the plaintiff should be able to prove that the defendant, in giving such evidence, had acted mala fide, and with actual malice, and without any reasonable and probable cause, and with a knowledge that the statements made by him were false; and directed a verdict for the defendant.

This ruling was upheld by the Exchequer Chamber, and hence the present appeal was brought to the House of Lords.

The judges were summoned, and Kelly, C. B., Blackburn, Mellor, Brett, and Grove, JJ., and Pollock, B., attended.

H. MATTHEWS, Q. C., and HOLL, for the appellant, relied on the same authorities, and urged the same arguments as in the court below (ubi sup).

BULWER, Q. C., BOWEN, and FITZMAURICE, who appeared for the respondent, were not called upon to argue.

At the conclusion of the arguments the following question was left by their lordships to the learned judges: "Whether the opinion and ruling of the learned judge, as stated in the bill of exceptions, were right in point of law?"

The opinion of the learned judges was delivered by—

KELLY, C. B.—We answer your lordships' question in the affirmative. A long series of decisions has settled that no action will lie against a witness for what he says or writes in giving evidence before a court of justice. This does not proceed on the ground that the occasion rebuts the prima facie presumption that words disparaging to another are maliciously spoken or written. If this were all, evidence of express malice would remove this ground; but the principle, we apprehend, is that public policy requires that witnesses should give their testimony free from any fear of being harassed by an action on an allegation, whether true or false, that they acted from malice. The authorities, as regards witnesses in the ordinary courts of justice, are numerous and uniform. In the present case, it appears in the Bill of Exceptions that the words and writings complained of were published by the defendant, a military man, bound to appear and give testimony before a court of inquiry. All he said and wrote had reference to that inquiry, and we can see no reason why public policy should not equally prevent an action being brought against such a witness as against one giving evidence in an ordinary court of justice.

The LORD CHANCELLOR (Cairns).—I am sure your Lordships all feel greatly indebted to the learned judges for the attention which they have paid to this case, and for the very clear and satisfactory opinion which they have given in answer to your Lordships' question. It is of importance that the House should bear in mind the precise expressions of the learned judge who tried the case, because I am sure that your lordships would not desire your decision to go further than the circumstances of this particular case would warrant. The leading facts which are put in prominence by the learned judge are these, that the statements were made by the defendant, who was a military man, and that the inquiry was a military inquiry; that the statements were made in relation to the conduct of the plaintiff as a military man, and were made with reference to the subject of that inquiry. I say this the more particularly, because an argument was addressed to your lordships to show that the inquiry in question was not to be considered in the light of a judicial inquiry, and that the evidence was not given by a witness on oath. That is quite true, but it is at the same time stated in the bill of exceptions that it was an inquiry connected with the discipline of the army, that it was an inquiry warranted by the Queen's orders and regulations for the army, that it was called by the Field-Marshal Commanding-in-Chief in pursuance of those regulations, and that the defendant in the action was called before the court of inquiry as a witness, as a person who was required to give evidence relevant to the inquiry which was then being conducted, and that it was in the course of that inquiry that the statements were made. Adopting the expressions of the learned judges with regard to what I take to be the settled law as to witnesses, and as to the protection of witnesses in judicial proceedings, I certainly am of opinion that upon all principles, and certainly upon all considerations of conscience and public policy, the same protection which is extended to a witness in a judicial proceeding, who has been examined on oath, should be extended, and must be extended to a military man who is called before a court of inquiry of this kind, for the purpose of testifying there upon a matter of military discipline connected with the army. It is not denied that the statements which he made, both those which were made viva voce, and those which were made in writing, were relevant to that inquiry. Under these circumstances I submit that the conclusion of the learned judges is in all respects one which we ought to adopt, and that your lordships will hold that statements made under these particular circumstances are statements which cannot become the foundation of an action at law. I therefore beg leave to move that the appeal be dismissed with costs.

Lords CHELMSFORD, HATHERLEY, O'HAGAN, and SELBORNE concurred in the judgment of the Lord Chancellor.

Lord PENZANCE.—My lords, I also agree in the view which has been stated, but I wish to say one word on the supposed hardship of the law which is brought into question by this appeal. It is said that a statement of fact of a libellous nature, which is palpably untrue, known to be untrue by him who made it, and dictated by malice, ought to be the subject of a civil remedy, though made in the course of a purely military inquiry. This mode of stating the question assumes the untruth, and assumes the malice. If by any process of demonstration free from the defects of human judgment the untruth and malice could be set above and beyond all question and doubt, there might be ground for contending that the law should give damages to the injured man. But this is not the state of things under which this question has to be determined. Whether the statements were in fact untrue, and whether they were dictated by malice are, and always will be, open questions upon which opinions may differ, and which can only be resolved by the exercise of human judgment. And the real question is whether it is proper on grounds of public policy to remit such questions to the judgment of a jury. The reasons against doing so are simple and obvious. A witness may be utterly free from malice, and yet in the eyes of a jury may be open to that imputation; or again, the witness may be cleared by the jury of the imputation, and yet may have had to encounter the expenses and distress of a harassing litigation. With such possibilities hanging over his head, a witness cannot be expected to speak with that free and open mind which the administration of justice demands. These considerations have long since led to the legal doctrine that a witness in the courts of law is free from any action; and I fail to perceive any reason why the same considerations should not be applied to an inquiry such as the present, and with the same result.

Judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber affirmed, and appeal dismissed with costs.

We call attention to the following opinions, reported at length in this issue:

Bankruptcy—Judgment Before Justice—Lien.—The opinion of the United States District Court for the District of Indiana, by Gresham, J., where an execution was issued by a justice of the peace and levied on the property of the defendant on the 3d day of August, and afterwards, on the said day, the defendant filed his voluntary petition in bankruptcy and was adjudged a bankrupt, held that the lien of the execution was not displaced by the subsequent proceedings in bankruptcy.

Power of National Banks to Take Pledges.—The opinion of the United States Circuit Court for the District of Iowa, by Dillon, J., upon the power of National Banks to take pledges of chattels as security for money lent.

Removal of Cause for Prejudice on Account of Color.—The opinion of the United States Circuit Court, by Rives, J., holding that there is no law enabling a colored citizen when impeached by another citizen of the same State, to remove his cause because of local influence or prejudice; that this right is only given when sued by a citizen of another State.

Equity Jurisdiction — Removal of Cloud upon Title — Lost Deed — Secondary Evidence—Destroyed Records.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of this State, by Scott, J., as to the jurisdiction of a court of equity to remove clouds upon the title to real estate under the act of 1869, when the land is unimproved or unoccupied, and holding when the proof is uncertain and unsatisfactory that a court of equity will remit the complainant to a court of law. In this case, the record of the original deed and contract was destroyed by the great fire of 1871. The destruction of the original deed was not shown. If proper search had been made for it, it might perhaps have been found, and that, therefore, there was no foundation laid for the introduction of evidence of its contents. The court concludes by saying when complainant shall have established his identity as the grantee of Shimp, it will be appropriate, if the contract once of record but long since destroyed shall be construed to be a cloud upon his title to this property, to file a bill to have it removed. This he ought to do before coming into a court of equity.

When Deed describes land as fronting on street, grantor estopped from denying existence of street. — The opinion of the Supreme Court of this State, by Scholfield, J., holding that when the owner of land conveys lots and describes them in the deed as fronting on a street, he is estopped from afterwards denying the existence of such street, and that a court of equity has jurisdiction to prevent the purchaser or his grantees from being deprived of the use of such street.

Rate of Interest—Usury.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of this State by Sheldon, J., holding that the taking of the rate of interest, allowed by the statute, in advance, out of the principal, is not usurious; that usurious interest voluntarily paid cannot be recovered back. Yet so long as any part of the debt remains unpaid, the debtor may insist upon a reduction of all usurious interest paid therefrom, even when a former note in which the usurious interest was embraced had been cancelled by the giving of a second note.

Parol Evidence to Prove Lost Record.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of this State, by Walker, C. J., upon the competency of proving the contents of lost records by parol evidence. We have had this opinion in stereotype plate since June, but withheld its publication as there was a petition for a re-hearing filed. The application for a re-hearing has been refused, and the opinion now stands as the law of the State. The court also considers the effect of failing to appolnt a guardian ad litem in a proceeding to sell the real estate of a minor.

Specific Performance—Tender.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of Indiana, by Downey, J., holding that a vendor cannot bring an action for the purchase money without having executed the conveyance, or offered to do so, unless the purchaser has discharged him from so doing; and on the other hand, a purchaser can not maintain an action for a breach of contract without having tendered a conveyance for execution and the purchase money.

Defamation — Privilege—Witness.—The opinion of the English House of Lords holding that the ordinary rule of law that a witness is absolutely privileged in what he says or writes, in giving evidence before a court of justice, even if he has acted mala fide, and with express malice, extends to a witness before a military court of inquiry, called in pursuance of the regulations of the army to inquire into matters of military discipline, though the witness be not examined on oath before such court.

THE COLLEGE OF LAW.

The Union College of Law is entering on its third year with many flattering signs of the success we had predicted for it, from the time it was organized under the charge of the two Universities and with its present numerous and eminent faculty. One hundred and seventeen students have entered for the present year, and entries for the present college year will still be in order during the first half of the first term, or until Nov. 5th. After that, until the first Monday of January (the first day of the second term) students may enter the Junior class for the present school year, on passing a satisfactory examination in the studies pursued during the first term. After the fifth day of November in the Senior class, and the first Monday of January in the Junior class, students entering will be credited with a years's study only at the expiration of a full calendar year from the day they enter. The college is very liberally aided by the services of members of the Bar of Chicago, who are delivering lectures almost daily before the students, instead of on Saturday merely, as during last year.

The R. R. Tax Injunction Cases.—Attorney General Edsall has succeeded in getting the Railroad Tax Injunction Cases advanced in the Supreme Court of the United States. The Chief Justice announced the order to advance these cases on Monday.

United States Digest; a Digest of Decisions of the Various Courts within the United States. By Benjamin Vaughan Abbott. New series, Vol. V. Annual Digest for 1874. Boston: Little, Brown, and Company. 1875. Sold by Callaghan & Company, Law Book Publishers, Chicago.

Mr. Abbott has received an enviable reputation as a digester. His first New York Digest is a model. We can but think, however, that some of his later digests are not as concise and clear as his earlier volumes. This may be accounted for from the fact that it is impossible for any one man to do all the labor himself required to produce so many volumes. We would suggest a little more trimming down. This series is of great value to the profession, and no law office is complete without a full set of the United States Digest. We have often heard lawyers remark that they could find cases easier in the United States Digest than in the Digest of their own State. The ink used in printing this volume was of an inferior quality. The press work is carelessly done, and as a consequence, the pages present a dirty appearance, and are not as clear as they otherwise would be. A digest of all other law books should be printed in a skillful manner.

Hubbell's Legal Directory for Lawyers and Business Men, containing the Names of one or more of the Leading and Most Reliable Attorneys in nearly Three Thousand Cities and Towns in the United States and Canada; a Synopsis of the Collection Laws of each State, and Canada, with Instructions for Taking Depositions, the Execution and Acknowledgement of Deeds, Wills, etc., and a Concise Synopsis of the Bankrupt Law, with Registers in Bankruptcy; also, Times for Holding Courts throughout the United States and Territories, for the Year commencing July 1,1875,to which is added a List of Prominent Banks and Bankers throughout the U. Mr. Hubbell states accurately in the title page, which we give above, the contents of his Directory. Lawyers will find this volume useful in their practice and more carefully prepared than works of this character usually are. That portion of it relating to Illinois was prepared by the law firm of Carter, Becker & Dale, of this city. The publisher asks those discovering errors to inform him of them so that they may be corrected in future editions.

Cooley on Taxation.—We have been shown by the enterprising publishers, Messrs. Callaghan & Co., of this city, some of the advance sheets of Judge Cooley's work upon Taxation, now going through the press. We are satisfied from the examination we have been able to give them, that this work will occupy the same position with the American bar that the learned author's work on Constitutional Limitations now does—that is, second to none. We congratulate the author upon the selection of his publisher.

Has a widow right of dower in her husband's equity of redemption?—The Washington Daily Critic says:

This question, of vital interest to nearly every woman in the District of Columbia, recently came up in the Equity Court, Judge Olin presiding, in the case of Newbern vs. Washington et al. In this case Mary Newbern, widow of Matthias Newbern, filed her petition for the assignment of her dower in certain real estate, of which her said husband died seized, but upon which he had executed certain deeds of trust; and one to the amount of $125 had been signed by the plaintiff. The defense claimed that the signing of this deed conveyed away the legal title to the estate; and that dower would not therefore attach, although plaintiff offered to redeem by tendering in open court the amount of the deed of trust signed by her, with interest and costs. A case was cited from 12th Peters as bearing upon the subject. Counsel for plaintiff claimed that a deed of trust is not a de facto conveyance, but a collateral security for a debt, which may be redeemed at any time before foreclosure or sale, by the payment of the obligation by any party in interest, after which there can arise no question about the attaching of dower. It was further pleaded that under the English law, the law of Maryland, Massachusetts, Ohio, New York, and, in fact, that of nearly every State in the Union, dower attaches to the husband's equity of redemption, although the obligation be not discharged by his widow or heirs. The case was argued at some length. Belva A. Lockwood appearing for the petitioner, and George F. Appleby for the defense. Judge Olin, on the 15th, overruled the demurrer, with leave to answer in ten days, if advised. The ruling was certainly in accordance with what the law ought to be, and if the law thereon is not sufficiently clear, it is high time that there was some more explicit legislation on this subject, especially as three-fourths of the realty in this District is more or less encumbered.

SUPREME COURT OF INDIANA.

Abstract made from recent cases published in the Indianapolis Sentinel.

Recovery of possession of land—Pleading—Evidence.

3781. Lotz v. Briggs, Sullivan C. C. Worden, J.

Action by appellant against appellee to recover a strip of land, a part of a town lot described. General denial, and trial by jury, with verdict and judgment for defendant.

The bill of exceptions is properly in the record, being filed within the extended time fixed by the written agreement of the attorneys. The attorney has a right to bind his client under the statute 2 G. & H. 328 section 772.

The plaintiff moved for judgment in his favor on the answers to interrogatories, notwithstanding the general verdict, but the motion was overruled, which ruling is assigned as error. The answer to the interrogatories show that the plaintiff was the owner of the land sued for, but they do not show that the defendant unlawfully kept him out of possession, which is a necessary fact to be alleged in the complaint.

On the trial of the cause, the defendant gave in evidence the record of a former action between the same parties in the same court. As the jury were retiring, they requested permission to take the papers constituting the record to their room to determine the issues involved in that case. This was allowed by the court, though objected to by the plaintiff. This action of the court was erroneous, as was held in 39 Ind., 19; 35 Ind., 492. Reversed.

Subscription to articles of association—Construction of act.

4134.—Reed v. Richmond Street R. R. Co.—Wayne C. C.—Downey, J.

Action by appellee against appellant to recover the amount of a subscription to the capital stock of the company. The subscription was made to what purported to be articles of association, and containing also an agreement to pay for the shares subscribed.

The case presents the question as to the proper construction of the first section of 3 Ind. statutes, 422, on the subject of the organization of street railway companies. There was no corporation to whom the benefit of the subscription could inure until the steps prescribed in this section had been complied with, 46 Ind., 142; 47 Ind., 38.

This section, among other things, requires that articles of association shall be subscribed severally, in which, amongst other things, shall be set forth the number of directors and their names. If any one of the requirements of the section be held as merely directory, this court hardly knows where to stop. In this case the requirement just set out was not complied with, the number and the names of the directors not being in the instrument signed by appellant. Reversed.

OPINION FILED JUNE 16, 1875.

ALONZO GAGE et al. v. JOHN SCHRODER.

Appeal from Lake.

PAROL EVIDENCE TO PROVE LOST RECORD —EFFECT OF FAILING TO APPOINT GUARDIAN AD LITEM.

1. PROVING LOST RECORD BY PAROL EVIDENCE.—That the court did not err in receiving parol evidence of the contents of the petition, printer's certificate and decree of court ordering a sale of the premises in controversy, which were proved to have been lost. This case is distinguished from that of Bennett v. Wolf, where it was held that parol evidence was not admissible to aid or explain a record. In this case the proof was not designed to aid or explain a record, but to prove what the record, as it existed, contained

2. EFFECT OF NOT APPOINTING A GUARDIAN AD LITEM.—That the decree in question in this case was not void, because the County Court failed to appoint a guardian ad litem for appellants, who were then minor defendants; that the filing of the petition, and the notice or service confers full jurisdiction to proceed to adjudicate; therefore, the failure of the court to appoint a guardian ad litem, or when appointed, his failure to file an answer, while it may be error, cannot be held to be jurisdictional.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

Opinion of the court by WALKER, Ch. J.

It is first objected that the court below erred in receiving parol evidence of the contents of the petition, printer's certificate and decree of court ordering a sale of the premises in controversy, which were proved to have been lost. The case of Bennett v. Wolf (unreported,) is referred to in support of the proposition. There is scarcely any analogy between that and this case. In that the record remained full and unimpaired, whilst in this case the record has been lost or destroyed. In that case, the effort was to prove that the notice was sufficient, although, as it appeared on file, it was insufficient. There was, in that case, no question as to the proof of the contents of a lost or destroyed record. The questions are different and involve different rules. In the one case there was a notice on file, but insufficient, and the effort was made outside and independent of the record, to prove a sufficient service by publication. An effort to aid the record by parol, which was held to be inadmissible.

In this case, however, the proof was not designed to aid or explain a record, but to prove what the record, as it existed, contained. A record, when lost or destroyed, may be proved like any other writing, by secondary evidence; and its loss having been shown, no reason is perceived why witnesses, who know its contents, may not be called to prove them. If this was not permitted in cases of this character, where a complete record is not made by the clerk, the title acquired by the purchaser would be liable to be defeated by loss or destruction of the certificate of publication or the petition. It may be that there is some hazard in permitting titles to depend on the frail memory of witnesses, as to the contents of records, but the same objection applies to all verbal evidence of the contents of written instruments. If deemed to be uncertain, or liable to abuse, the General Assembly can readily remedy the evil by restoring the statute requiring the clerk, in such cases, to make a full record of all the proceedings in the case, which could be done with slight cost, and would give stability to such titles.

The evidence that there was a proper notice published and filed in this case, was ample, being proved by the county clerk and Cook, who had both seen the notice and certificate on file. They also testified, in a satisfactory manner, to having seen a petition on file for the sale of this land, by the executor of Gage. We would hardly expect more satisfactory evidence of the contents of a lost record. We regard it amply sufficient to warrant the finding that there had been a proper record of service by publication and a proper petition filed. This was followed by a decree approving of the sale appearing of record, and the executor's deed.

But it is assumed that the decree in this case is void, because the county court failed to appoint a guardian ad litem for appellants, who were then defendants. In the case of Peak v. Shasted, 21 Ill., 137, it was said that a minor could only appear and defend by guardian. It was also held to be error, in fact, for a minor to defend otherwise than by his guardian, as guardian ad litem. The rule was recognized in the case of Hall v. Davis, 44 Ill., 494, and in Quigly v. Roberts, ib., 503. It was held in Gibson v. Rall, 30 Ill., 179, that in cases of this character, the jurisdiction of the subject matter is acquired by filing the petition, and jurisdiction of the person by publication of the notice, and, it should have been said, or by service of the notice as provided by the statute; and the same doctrine was announced in the case of Goudy v. Hall, 36 Ill., 313, and other cases might be referred to in our reports announcing the same rule. And it has been said in numerous cases that whether the guardian ad litem answer or not, the evidence must be preserved in the record to support the decree. And in Goudy v. Hall, supra, it was held that the failure of the guardian to answer for one of the minors, defendants, did not take away the jurisdiction of the court.

If, as we have seen, the filing of the petition and the notice or service, confers full jurisdiction to proceed to adjudicate, then the failure of the court to appoint a guardian ad litem, or, when appointed, his failure to file an answer, whilst it may be error, cannot be held to be jurisdictional. Such a failure could not operate to deprive the court of jurisdiction previously acquired. When the infant is brought into court, it is necessary for the guardian to appear for the defendant, as an adult appears by an attorney. And that the infant may be properly defended, it is the duty of the court to appoint a guardian ad litem. This is required by the statute.

It then follows that the decree of the county court was valid and binding, the sale regular, and the title which Gage died seized of to this land, passed to the purchaser at the sale by the executor, and plaintiffs below were thus deprived of their title to the same. And having no title for the premises for which this suit was brought, they have shown no right to recover. From what has been said, it is apparent that it is unnecessary to discuss the other question raised and urged for a reversal. None of the instructions refused for appellants could have changed the result, even if they were legally correct. Nor did the court below err in giving appellee's instructions. We perceive no error in this record, and the judgment must be affirmed.

Judgment affirmed.

MCDAID, WILSON & PICHER for appellants.

RUNYAN, AVERY & COMSTOCK for appellee.

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

ABSTRACT OF OPINIONS FILED AT SPRINGFIELD, OCTOBER 13TH, 1875.

8.—Henry P. Heazle v. I. B. & W. R. R. Co.—Appeal from Champaign.—Opinion by SCOTT, J.

RULE OF NEGLIGENCE AS TO R. R. COMPANIES.

STATEMENT.—Accident to appellant by broken rail throwing passenger cars from the track. Plaintiff was found insensible at the bottom of a culvert. An instruction was given on the trial, at the instance of plaintiff, that the throwing off of the train was prima facie evidence of negligence, and threw the burden of proof on the defendant to disprove negligence.

Held, That this was a stricter rule of liability than is warranted by the law.

[However, the defendant did disprove negligence; and the jury returned a special verdict that "plaintiff was guilty of greater negligence than the defendant." The greater part of the opinion is a review of the evidence.]

No. 18.—W. W. Chapman v. F G. Burt.—Appeal from Morgan.—Opinion by CRAIG, J.—6 pp.

NEWLY DISCOVERED EVIDENCE NOT MERELY CUMULATIVE—WHAT IS PAYMENT TO AN ATTORNEY—INTEREST ON MONEY COLLECTED BY AN ATTORNEY—DEMAND ON ATTORNEY FOR MONEY, WHEN NOT NECESSARY—WEIGHT OF EVIDENCE—EXPLANATION OF RECEIPT FOR MONEY.

STATEMENT.—Appellant, an attorney, received from appellee, for collection, a note executed by five makers—two named Gibson, and three named Bruces. After judgment thereon, the two Gibsons sold their interest in a mill to their partners, the Bruces, the purchasers agreeing to pay the indebtedness of the firm, including the judgment. Up to April, 1867, the Bruces had large dealings with the appellant after the said sale; and at that date (April 1) had a settlement with him, they giving their note for $550 balance. On the 21st one-fifth of the judgment was paid, and the Bruces testified that in this note of $550 was included a proportion of the judgment, amounting to three-fifths thereof; on which point there was a close conflict of evidence on the trial of the present case—the appellant denying such payment in the note, and this suit having been brought to recover the amount of the judgment, which had been collected by the appellant, as attorney for appellee. The verdict in this case was for four-fifths of the judgment and interest for the greater part of the time after April, 1867. In the conflict of testimony, or evidence, two receipts were introduced, one, reciting the payment by D. H. Gibson of his share of the judgment, and containing a clause indemnifying him from any farther payment thereon, and the other releasing two of the Bruces in like manner, except that no plaintiff was named herein, and the judgment was said to be in "The circuit court of Illinois," and bearing date April 1, 1867, the day of the above mentioned settlement. Motion for new trial overruled, the case having been submitted to two juries—the first disagreeing. It was also contended that, in any event, appellee ought not to recover because, even on his own showing, the appellant did not receive money, but only a credit on settlement in payment of the judgment. In support of the motion for a new trial, the fact of newly-discovered evidence was alleged, which, however, seems to have been only a clearer statement on the books than was given in the testimony on the trial. Held,

1. That such evidence was merely cumulative, and no ground for a new trial.

2. The appellant could not object that he had received something other than money on the judgment. The appellee could repudiate his act therein, or, otherwise, ratify it, and sue for money had to his use.

3. When money collected by an attorney has been held and not paid over within a reasonable time, the attorney may be held liable for interest thereon, as well as for the payment of the amount.

4. In such a case no demand is necessary, the holding an unreasonable time being virtually an appropriation of the money to the individual use of the attorney.

5. It belongs to the jury to weigh evidence, and the Supreme Court will not interfere unless it is clearly manifest that the jury mistook the evidence, or were governed by passion or prejudice. And the fact that two juries have passed upon a case—the one disagreeing, the other deciding—furnishes, of itself, a strong presumption that, at least, the verdict is not clearly wrong.

6. A receipt uncertain in its terms may be explained, and its meaning determined by testimony.

41.—Lewis W. Ross v. C. B. & Q. R. R. Co.—Appeal from Peoria.—Opinion by SCHOLFIELD, J. 16 pp.

AMENDMENT CHANGING ORIGINAL PURPOSE OF A STATUTE—EXTENSION OF ROUTE AND OF BRANCHES OF RAILROADS—TWO SUBJECTS IN TITLE OF ACT—CHANGE OF CHARTER AND ITS EFFECT ON SUBSCRIPTION—ESTOPPEL—TIME OF THE ESSENCE OF A CONTRACT OF SUBSCRIPTION.

STATEMENT.—Appellant sued appellee in ejectment, to recover a strip of ground in its possession; whereon the suit was enjoined by bill in chancery, and a decree rendered that appellant convey the land to appellee, which had derived title from the Peoria and Hannibal Railroad Company.

The first objection to the decree was that the P. & H. R. R. Co. had no valid charter, and consequently no existence, the charter being passed at a special session of the legislature convened by the governor, February 9th, 1854, and the passage of the charter not being specified in the proclamation as one of the purposes of calling the special session. This proclamation specified as one of the purposes, "to amend charters of towns, cities, railroads, etc., and to extend the same." The regular session of the legislature of 1853 chartered the original company, under the name of the "Macomb, Vermont and Bath R. R Co." and prescribed its route. The special session changed the name to P. & H. R. R. Co., and vacated a part of the proposed route, and repealed expressly several sections of the original charter.

Held, That, while the court will not undertake to say how far the original purpose of a statute may be changed by an enactment professing only to amend it, the legislative will cannot be disregarded unless it is clearly wrong.

The second objection was that the charter was unconstitutional in that it expressed more than one subject in its title, namely, the location and construction of more than one line of road—although only one company was created thereby.

But held that the additional extent of road authorized thereby was only an extension, and would form but one continuous line; and therefore, the charter is not objectionable on this ground. A railroad company may properly be authorized even to extend branches, and these will not be construed to be distinct and independent roads.

It was again objected that the written agreement of Ross to convey was not binding, because the road was not completed within eight years, as required by the amendatory act; and also because by a subsequent amendment, the company were allowed to divide the line of road into sections, and complete it in that way.

But held, 1. That Ross was estopped by the fact that the was a director of the road, and accepted the amendments to the charter; and actively participated in the doings of the company thereunder.

2. That, allowing the company to divide the road into sections for the purposes of construction, did not break the unity of the design; and therefore did not release subscribers from their obligations; the original corporation remained the same, and the design of the amendment was simply auxiliary to the main design of the corporation.

3. That Ross cannot be regarded as accepting an amendment as a stockholder and director, and then objecting as an individual. There is no basis for such distinction.

4. The charter did not irrevocably fix the time of completion, and it was competent for the legislature to extend it, or change it, by the consent of the company. The State alone could take advantage of a failure, on behalf of the company, in this respect. And while Ross might have made time of the essence of his contract by an express stipulation, yet, as he did not do so, it will not be so regarded, unless there had been an abandonment of the enterprise, which is not the case herein.

5. He was also estopped by allowing the company to take possession of the land without any notice that he intended to revoke the agreement. And so, in regard to route, if any limitations were to have been insisted upon, except the range of the charter itself, these should have been inserted in the written offer to convey.

Held, also, That, by a subsequent agreement, by which Ross was to dismiss two suits against appellee—one ejectment for the strip of land, the other trespass—in consideration of the construction of a cattle pass, which was mutually carried out, he was estopped to deny the right of the company to the possession of the land.

REVENUE CASES—APPEALS UNDER ACT OF 1873—ACT OF 1874 NOT RETRO-ACTIVE AS TO APPEALS AND WRITS OF ERROR.

STATEMENT.—In December, 1873, an appeal was prayed by the plaintiff in error from a judgment in the County Court for taxes. This was allowed, but the appeal was never perfected. After the act of 1874 had gone into effect, a writ of error was sued out, which was dismissed by the Supreme Court. Held,

1. That no writ of error would lie in revenue cases under the act of 1873, but only an appeal.

2. That, although the act of 1874 expressly provides for a writ of error, as well as an appeal, yet it cannot be construed as having a retro-active effect in the absence of any declaration therein, that it was so intended by the legislature.

R. R. LIABILITIES TO EMPLOYEES—THIS CASE DISTINGUISHED FROM T. W. & W. R. R. CO.

V. FREDERICK, IN WHICH THE COMPANY WERE HELD LIABLE.

STATEMENT.—Appellee was a freight-conductor on the road of appellant and was injured in attempting to uncouple some freight-cars belonging to another company, so that an amputation of the arm became necessary. These cars—as is common with through-freight cars, but not with way-freight cars—had double "buffers" or "dead-wood." In setting off the cars he found it necessary to couple them with a car of the White Line company, previously standing on the track, and thus the accident occurred. It was contended that the company were liable on two grounds: 1st. That the draw-bar on the still car was not properly constructed, or was out of repair. 2d. That the cars were equipped with the double buffers. Held,

1. That even were the draw-bar out of repair, if it had suddenly become so, the company would not be liable therefor, unless attention had been called to the fact, or the company could have discovered it in the exercise of a high degree of care, and there had been opportunity of making repairs. The ground of liability is only negligence.

2. It being the case that, by general usage, the double-buffers are employed on through-freight cars, and these cars being mutually accepted to be drawn on the various roads as necessity requires, the company cannot be held liable for accidents resulting from their use, especially as in through freights. They are approved as beneficial throughout the country, and can, with due care, be safely operated.

3. An employee contracts with reference to all ordinary hazards, and his not having had previous experience in regard to particular appliances does not make the company liable for his injuries, and particularly as he can leave the service at any time when he discovers unexpected hazards connected with the employment.

4. The case of T. W. & W. R. R. Co. v. Fredericks (Jany. Term, 1874), is distinguished from this in that the defect, or vicious construction, in that case, was not peculiar to a class, but to a particular car, wherein the draw-bar was too short, and it appeared that otherwise the injury would not have occurred. One just entering the service could not be expected to discover the defect in that particular instance, and the company were besides held to have known of it.

5. There is no such rule of liability as that of a greater degree of negligence on the part of defendant.

MARRIED WOMAN'S EARNINGS PRIOR TO ACT OF 1869.

STATEMENT.—Suit brought by appellee for services as housekeeper, rendered prior to 1864, while appellee's husband was in the army—the husband still living at this time. Held,

That the right of action was alone in him; as the act of 1869, giving a married woman the right to recover for her personal service, had no retro-active operation.

90.—James D. Kilgore v. A. B. Ferguson et al.—Appeal from Ford.—Opinion by SCHOLFIELD, J.—7 pp.

NON-ACCEPTANCE OF OFFICIAL BOND—WHAT MUST BE ALLEGED AND PROVED IN ACTION ON THE CASE THEREFOR.

STATEMENT.—Action on the case against the members of the Board of Supervisors for refusing to approve an official bond of plaintiff, as treasurer of the county, the bond being alleged by him sufficient. The sureties on a former bond had been released, and this was a second bond. Judgment for defendants or demurrer. Held,

That it was not sufficient for the declaration to aver that the bond was good and sufficient, but it must set out the facts specifically which made it good, and thus make it appear that the members of the board acted corruptly and wilfully in refusing it.

96.—Teutonia Life Insurance Co. v. John F. Anderson.—Appeal from St. Clair.—Opinion by SCOTT, J.—5 pp.

LIABILITY OF INSURANCE COMPANY WHERE PREMIUM NOT PAID AT DEATH, BUT NO FORFEITURE HAD PREVIOUSLY BEEN DECLARED ON THE DEFAULT.

STATEMENT.—The policy of insurance declared on in this case was taken on the life of Franklin Anderson, by the "Bismark Bund," and payable to appellee. The Bund was to pay the premiums, in consideration that the assured should pay his weekly dues to the Bund.

The defense to the action was that the Bund had refused to pay the last premium due, because the assured was in default with his weekly dues.

Held, That, in such case, the Bund could have had the policy cancelled for non-payment of the weekly dues. Or the company, on non-payment by the Bund, could have declared a forfeiture under the terms of the policy, in the lifetime of the assured. But as neither of these steps was taken, the company was liable; its neglect to declare the forfeiture being construed as an election to continue the risk notwithstanding the non-payment.

100.—I. B. & W. R. R. Co. v. Walker McLaughlin et al.—Appeal from Tazewell.—Opinion by SCHOLFIELD, J. 6 pp.

TRESPASS TO LANDS IN THE HANDS OF A TENANT—WHO MUST SUE.

STATEMENT.—Trespass quare, etc. Judgment $400, and appeal.

The lot belonged to the wife, who is joined with the husband in this suit. The trespass complained of was excavating a roadway for a few feet, and operating the road therein by the railroad company. After the road was completed, a dwelling house was erected on the lot, costing about $900, and used by plaintiffs as a residence for a time, and then let to tenants.

The question for decision is thus stated by the court, "Can the plaintiffs recover jointly, as well for a permanent injury to the realty, and injury to the possession, when the property was in the possession of tenants, as for injury to the possession when they actually occupied the property?" Held,

1. That where there is no evidence of a husband's right of reversion to real property, in that no birth of living issue is shown, he may join with his wife in suing for damages done to the actual possession of himself and wife jointly, but no farther.

2. The owner of land cannot sue for damages to possession where the land is in the possession of a tenant merely; but only for injuries affecting the reversion.

AGENCY; RATIFICATION: EXPRESS AND IMPLIED.

A ratification may be expressly made or it may be implied from circumstances. When one individual deliberately, whether with full knowledge, or without inquiry, ratifies the act or conduct of another, no question arises respecting the fact of ratification. When, on the other hand, there is no express ratification, it becomes important to consider what circumstances have been held sufficient in our courts of law to warrant the inference that a ratification may be implied from them. With respect to the general nature of the evidence that will be thought sufficient to establish a ratification, the remarks of the learned judges in Fitzgerald v. Dressler (7 C. B., N. S., 374) may be studied with advantage. To establish a case of authority by ratification there must be some substantive proof; it must not rest upon probability or conjecture (per Crowder, J. ib. at p. 397); certainly it would be very unsafe to say that because there is a strong probability of the existence of a state of things from which a prior authority or a subsequent ratification might be inferred, a jury would be warranted in acting upon it as if there were strict legal proof: (see per Williams, J., ib. 396). In the same case Willes, J. (at p. 398) points out that it is not competent to a jury, when dealing with the acts of a third party, to act upon probabilities, "there being no original authority in H." Said the same learned judge, "to make the promise, it was a thing done by him out of the ordinary scope of his duty; and though there was a moral duty cast upon him to communicate to his employer the fact of his having made the promise, it was nothing more than a moral duty, and the rule Omnia præsumuntur rite esse acta donec probetur in contrarium is never applied to such a duty as that."

The rule requiring substantial proof of a ratification is, with good reason, applied to cases of trespass. By the common law, if a principle agree to a trespass after it is done, he is no trespasser "unless the trespass was done to his use or for his benefit: (C. Inst. 4, 317.) Besides, it should not be forgotten in action for false imprisonment, that courts of law will take care that people are not put in peril for making complaint when a crime has been committed (per Pollock, C. B., in Grinham v. Willey, 4 H. & N. 496), and see the observations of Lord Cranworth and Alderson, B. in Gosdon v. Elphick (4 Ex. 445, 447). A plaintiff having been apprehended at the instance of the defendant's son, on a charge of obtaining money by false pretences, of which charge, after a remand, he was acquitted, brought an action for trespass and false imprisonment against the father. There was no proof that the son was authorized to make the charge; but there was evidence that after the remand the defendant, when told by his son that he had caused the plaintiff to be apprehended, said he would have nothing to do with it. The court held that there was no evidence of a ratification: (Moon v. Towers, 8 C. B., N. S., 611.) "No man," said Willes, J., "ought, as a general rule, to be responsible for acts not his own."

In questions of ratifications by railway companies of the unauthorized acts of their servants, it is manifestly material to consider whether the act complained of could be said to have been for the use or benefit of the company. For instance, it has been held that the assault and imprisonment of a passenger liable for the non-payment of his fare, is an act which might have been for the benefit of the company and hence might be ratified: (Eastern Counties Railway Company v. Broom, 6 Ex. 326, 327; Rowe v. Birkenhead, Lancashire, and Cheshire Railway Company, 7 Ex. 36.)

It is generally laid down in text books that a small matter will be evidence of such assent as will support a plea of ratification: (Paley on Agency, 171; Chitty Com. Law iii., 199; Story Agency, 252.) The cases cited in support of the statement contain nothing inconsistent with the above principle, for in all these there was evidence which did not rest merely upon probability or conjecture: (See Ward v. Evans, 6 Mod. 37; Thorald v. Smith, 11 Mod. 88; 2 Lord Raym. 93.) There are two rules respecting ratification which may be noticed here. The first is that if a principal ratifies and adopts the agent's acts, even for a moment, he is bound by them: (Smith v. Cadogan, 2 T. Rep. 189.) In other words, after ratification there is no locus pœnitentiæ. The second rule is that there can be no ratification of a part only of a transaction. In other words, the law does not allow one part of a transaction to be affirmed and the rest to be disavowed. No one shall "blow hot and cold." Hence, to treat a party as one's agent in respect to one part of a transaction, is equivalent to a ratification of the whole transaction: (Wilson v. Poulter, 2 Str. 859; Hovil v. Pack, 7 East, 164; Small v. Attwood, 6 Cl. & F. 232.) For instance, if a principal ratify a contract made by his agent, he incurs the same liabilities as if he had originally authorized it: (Wilson v. Tummon, 6 M. & Gr. 236; Smethurst v. Taylor, 12 M. & W. 554; Doe v. Goldwin, 2 Q. B. 143.) Again, an adoption of a contract by an undisclosed principal is an adoption in omnibus; hence, if the contract embodies an agreement that the defendant should set off a debt due him from the agent, the principal must take the contract subject to this agreement: (Ramozetti v. Bowring, 7 C. B., N. S., 851, per Erle, C. J.)

The following cases are selected as illustrative of the nature of the evidence necessary to prove a ratification:

In Granby v. Allen, (Ld. Raym, 224) trover was brought to recover money paid by the pfaintiff's wife for land conveyed to her by the defendant, and it was held by Holt, C. J., that the husband could recover money so laid out, unless he was either privy to the purchase or consented to it afterwards.

In Howard v. Baillie, (2 H. Bl. 618), it was held that if the agent of an executor accept a bill, and the executor admit that the bill accepted with his knowledge is for a just debt and ought to be paid, there is sufficient evidence of a ratification of the agent's act in accepting the bill.

In Haseler v. Lemoyne (5 C. B., N. S., 530). A. was the general agent to manage B's property. He signed a warrant to distrain the goods of C., a tenant, for arrears of rent. After the goods had been distrained B. said she should leave the matter in A.'s hands, and it was held that this amounted to a ratification of A.'s acts.

Benham v. Batty (12 L. T. Rep. N. S. 266) was an action to recover a deposit. The defendant employed an agent to sell the lease of a certain house. The latter exceeded his authority, and took a deposit for the conveyance of a longer term than he was authorized to dispose of. The defendant refusing to complete this agreement, the plaintiff applied to the agent for a return of his deposit. Before he would do so he required an order from the defendant, and it was held that the order so given was evidence of a ratification of a previous general authority, so as to make the defendant liable for the deposit.

Fitzmaurice v. Bayley (6 El. & Bl. 868), is an instance of a ratification without inquiry. An agent exceeded his authority in agreeing for the purchase of certain buildings. A dispute having arisen the plaintiff wrote respecting the agent's authority, "I left everything to him" (the agent) "desiring him to do the best he could. What he has done for me I know not; but of course I must support him in all he has done for me, except incivility." This was held to be a full ratification of the agent's agreement.

In Hawley v. Sentance (7 L. T. Rep. N. S. 745), an agent for the purchase of goods on credit paid for certain goods out of his own money. This fact was known to the principal, who directed the agent to clear the goods at the Custom House. In the usual course of business this would be done after payment of the price by the agent for the principal. This direction was held to be a ratification of the previous payment by the agent, so as to enable him to sue the principal for the price as money paid to his use at his request.

Under the following circumstances it was held that there was no ratification: A. sold, through D. and Co., brokers, a quantity of linseed to B., who afterwards sold it to C. at a higher rate through the same brokers. C. being in want of the linseed sent a clerk to D. and Co. for the delivery order, with instructions to follow up the matter. D. and Co. took the clerk to A., who gave the delivery order upon the clerk promising that B. would pay A. On the following day C. sent a cheque to D. and Co. for £900 on account of the linseed, the precise quantity not being known. Afterwards, when it was measured, A. was found on the contract with B. to be entitled to receive £971 15s. 6d. It was held that there was no evidence to warrant a jury in finding a ratification by C. of the contract which the clerk had so made, since it was not proved that the clerk had communicated to C. what had passed between him and the plaintiff when he obtained the order.

A ratification might also be implied from the form of action adopted for the enforcing of one's rights. In Smith v. Hodson (4 T. R. 211, and see Ferguson v. Carrington, 9 B. & C. 59) it was held that if a bankrupt on the eve of his bankruptcy deliver goods to one of his creditors, the assignees may disaffirm the contract and recover the value of the goods in trover, but if they bring assumpsit they affirm the contract. Hence the creditor might set off his debt in the latter case.

In conclusion, it may be laid down as a rule that a ratification may be inferred from acquiescence. But this acquiescence may itself be either express or it may be implied. It may be implied from an act, as in some of the above instances, or, in short, from any circumstances which clearly indicate an intention to adopt the unauthorized act or conduct of the agent. In all cases when the acquiesence has been implied from an act, it will be found that the principal has done something which assumes the authorization and validity of the act that awaited ratification, such, for instance, as bringing an action which postulates as a condition for its main tenance the adoption of a previously unauthorised act of the agent. (See the cases cited above.)—The London Law Times.

A NICE POINT IN NEWSPAPER COPYRIGHT.—An important question as to the law of copyright in newspaper telegrams has lately been debated in the Supreme Court, Melbourne. The proprietors of the Argus pay a large sum for the purpose of obtaining the latest telegrams from Europe. Any newspaper proprietors who may wish to publish the telegrams so obtained can do so by paying a contribution towards the expenses incurred. The proprietor (Mr. Luke) of the Gipps' Land Mercury, a newspaper published at Sale, in Gipps' Land, had made an agreement to pay for the right of republishing the telegrams. This agreement was carried out for several months, when Mr. Luke cancelled it. The European telegrams received by the Argus were, however, republished in another form, as from a Melbourne correspondent of the Mercury, with the preliminary words, "It is reported," or "The news about town is—." This was considered a breach of the copyright which the proprietors of the Argus possessed in the telegrams, and, as there was another newspaper at Sale that did contribute towards the expenses of the receipt of the telegrams, a suit was instituted in the Equity Court to restrain Mr. Luke from republishing the telegrams. It was argued for the defendant that as the telegrams were matters of news, anyone could republish them without breach of the Copyright Act. Molesworth, J., held, however, that the plaintiffs had a property in the telegrams, and that no one could republish them without the permission of the persons to whom they had been sent in the first instance. An injunction was therefore granted to restrain the defendant from publishing the telegrams.—The London Law Times.

SUPREME COURT OF MICHIGAN.

NOTES OF DECISIONS OF THE OCTOBER TERM, 1875.

BY HENRY A. CHANEY, ATTORNEY AT LAW.

Home Insurance Company v. Curtis.—Error to Saginaw. Opinion by Marston, J. Affirmed with costs.

Where, in a suit on an insurance policy, the company, while pleading the general issue, relies on a failure to make good a representation, etc., not contained in the policy, but sets forth in some other instrument in the insurers' hands the notice attached to the plea must declare the instrument and indicate the breach. The defense is one that can be waived, and omission to give the notice implies a waiver of it. And this must be done whether evidence showing such breach is incidentally given by the opposite side or not.—[Circuit Court rule 10.]

If insurance agents advance to the company the money for a premium and take the note of the insured for the amount, and negotiate it, the condition of the policy that the premium shall be actually paid before the company becomes liable, is sufficiently complied with, and the company cannot cancel the policy without notifying the assured and refunding or offering to refund the unearned premium.

It is sufficient delivery of an insurance policy to leave it in the hands of the agents of the company, if they are willing to retain it, subject to the order of a third person, even though he does not call for it.

One cannot go to trial on the merits, voluntarily take his chances of the result, and then question the jurisdiction. The previous filing of a bond and petition for the removal of the case, without taking any further step, will not avail against such a manifest abandonment of the right to a removal.

Keator v. People.—Error to Ingham. Conviction affirmed. Opinion by CAMPBELL, J.

Where a witness had had no settled place of residence for any length of time, an impeaching witness was allowed to show what his reputation had been at a place where he had been living four years before the trial.

It is proper, on direct examination, to ask an impeaching witness if he would believe the impeached witness under oath.

As a court must have judicial knowledge of the position and action of those who act as its officers, no better evidence of their official character is needed than proof that they openly act in court in such capacity; this is so in a trial for perjury where it appears that the oath has been administered by a man acting as deputy clerk.

An information cannot be made better or worse for inserting or omitting a matter judicially noticed.

An information for perjury need not show the date at which the oath was taken; it is enough to identify the trial.

Where a full and correct charge was given, certain introductory phrases and cautionary comments on the mode employed in impeaching testimony, were held not prejudicial.

Ochsenkel v. Jeffers.—Error to Saginaw. Reversed with costs and new trial granted. Opinion by MARSTON, J.

The rule that parol evidence is inadmissible to vary a written contract does not apply to instruments fraudulently drawn with intent to deceive; otherwise it would shield the wrong-doer.

ENGLISH CUSTOM TO DEFER THE BURIAL OF A PERSON DYING IN DEBT.—No such disgraceful custom as deferring the burial of a person dying in debt ever prevailed in any of the American States, and even in England it would be denied that this custom ever had an existence there if it were not supported by as good an authority as LYNDWOOD. The London Law Times of October ninth says:

An application made by an undertaker named TITFORD, at the Clerkenwell Police Court a few days ago, serves to demonstrate to what a very great extent ancient customs remain, and are handed down by verbal tradition among the lower classes. It appears that some person had died owing £9 to his landlord, and that, although the relations wished to remove and to bury the body as soon as possible, yet that the landlord refused them permission to remove the corpse, because the debt had not been discharged. Mr. HANNAY, the sitting magistrate, very properly explained to the applicant that the landlord had no power to detain the corpse, hinting at the same time that if not given up at once, the sanitary authorities would interfere. How far the sanitary authorities might interfere with effect is very doubtful, the only statute, to our knowledge, conferring such power directly being restricted to the City of London (The City of London Sewers Act 1848), but there is no doubt whatever that, if not the sanitary authorities, certainly the relations, might remove the corpse without any payment whatsoever of the landlord's claim, and, moreover, that the landlord would be liable to an indictment should he attempt to oppose them. A case in the Common Bench, where a woman, who feared that the dead body of her son would be arrested for debt, was holden liable upon a promise to pay in consideration of forbearance, though she was neither executrix nor administratix, having been cited to Lord ELLENBOROUGH in Jones v. Ashburnham (4 East. 460), that learned Judge remarked that it is impossible to contend that this last forbearance could be a good consideration for an assumpsit, for to seize a dead body upon any such pretence would be contra bonos mores and an extortion upon the relatives. And the same was held in the case of Reg. v. Fox (2 Q. B. 246), where Lord DENMAN, being Chief Justice, a peremptory mandamus was awarded to deliver up a corpse detained for debt to the executors, and in the same matter an indictment was subsequently preferred against a person named SCOTT, who pleaded guilty to it. Yet, according to LYNDWOOD, who compiled the Provinciale, or constitutions of fourteen archbishops of Canterbury, there seems to have been once a custom in England to defer the burial of a person dying in debt. That such, however, is no longer the case the above quoted cases abundantly show; added to which, it was held in Reg. v. Stewart (12 A. & E. 779) that the individual under whose roof a poor person dies, is bound to carry the body decently covered to the place of burial. This is still the common law of England. The landlord, in the case before Mr. HANNAY, besides losing his £9, had, it seems, a supercumbent duty cast upon him.

MASTERS' SALES.

BENJAMIN D. MAGRUDER,
Master, 154 LaSalle Street.

STATE OF ILLINOIS, COUNTY OF COOK, SS.—Superior court of Cook county. In chancery. Henry T. Curtiss, complainant, vs. Isaac N. Hardin, Gertrude H. Hardin, John Esaias Warren, Charlotte R. Warren, Thomas Lord, Peter K. Dederick, Henry S. Monroe, trustee, and Susan B. Ward, defendants.

[Foreclosure of Mortgages.]

Public notice is hereby given, that in pursuance of a decree entered in the above cause on the 20th day of October, A. D. 1875, I, Benjamin D. Magruder, master in chancery of said court, will, on Tuesday, the 23d day of November, A. U. S. CIR. COURT, N. D. OF ILLINOS.

CITY OF CHICAGO v. DAVID A. GAGE et al.

In Chancery.

REMOVAL OF CAUSE FROM STATE TO FEDERAL COURT—ACT OF 1875 CONSTRUED.

1. PARTIES TO THE CONTROVERSY.—The court states who are to be regarded as parties to the controversy, within the meaning of the act, so as to entitle the case to be removed from the State to the Federal court.

2. WHOLE CASE MUST BE REMOVED.—That a complicated chancery suit may almost necessarily involve, in some of its collateral issues, the rights and interests of citizens of different States, but unless the original controversy which the suit is brought to determine be between citizens of different States, or between such parties as give the Federal courts jurisdiction, it would not seem that Congress intended to provide for the removal thereof, inasmuch as the whole case must be removed instead of that collateral branch or part involving a controversy between citizens of different States.

3. THIS CASE.—That this is not such a case as was intended to be removed from the State to the Federal court.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

BLODGETT, J.

This case was originally commenced in the Superior Court of Cook county, and removed to this court on the application of the defendant, Ayers. A motion is now made on behalf of the complainant to remand the case to the Superior Court, because of facts appearing upon the face of the record.

The record shows that, on the 27th day of December, 1873, David A. Gage, and his wife, of the city of Chicago, executed and delivered to George Taylor, also of said city, a deed conveying to said Taylor, in trust, certain property for the purpose of securing the city against loss of any indebtedness which might exist from Gage to the city, as late treasurer thereof, and for other purposes therein expressed. Said deed did not state what the amount of said indebtedness was, but declared that said conveyance was not to be, in any sense, a satisfaction of any part of said indebtedness. It included and conveyed to Taylor a large amount of real property, situated in Chicago and its suburbs, some portions of which were improved and yielding income. It empowered the trustee, during the period of eight months from the date of the deed, to enter, immediately, into the possession of said property, control and manage the same, receive and collect the rents, income and profits thereof, and out of the same pay the taxes, assessments and insurance; to sell and convey, under the direction and with the concurrance of the comptroller of the city, all or any part of said property, and out of the net proceeds of the said sales, rents, income and profits, to pay over to the city, from time to time, to apply on the indebtedness of Gage to the city, such sums as might be available for that purpose. At the expiration of eight months the comptroller was authorized to require the preemptory sale of so much of said property as should then remain unsold, for cash, and the said Taylor, as trustee, was required to comply with said request and apply the net proceeds of the sales so made to the satisfaction of the unpaid remainder of said indebtedness.

Taylor accepted the trust, entered upon the possession, control and management of the property, and made some sales thereof, and partial payments to the city within the eight months allowed for that purpose.

After the expiration of said eight months, a large portion of the indebtedness, claimed by the city, against Gage, as its late treasurer, still remaining unpaid, the comptroller ordered the trustee to sell the rest of the property on hand, for cash. Said trustee refused to comply with the order of the comptroller, alleging as the ground of said refusal, that said deed did not state the amount of said indebtedness; that he did not know the amount of it, himself, and that he was unwilling to sell and pay over the proceeds of such sale to the city, until a competent court had first found and decreed the balance due from Gage to the city. Thereupon the city filed the bill in this case, in the Superior Court of Cook county, setting out the said trust deed, and alleging that, at the time of the making thereof Gage was indebted to the city, as treasurer, for a balance of five hundred and seven thousand, seven hundred and three dollars and fifty-eight cents, for the security of which it was claimed that Taylor held the property, so conveyed to him by said trust deed; and prayed that the court would take an account and ascertain the amount due, and give a decree in favor of the city for the same, and order the said trustee to proceed and sell the trust property remaining unsold, and apply the proceeds of such sale to the satisfaction of the amount so found due. Gage and wife, and Taylor, were the only defendants to this bill.

Gage answered the bill, denying that he owed the city anything. Taylor also answered, stating his belief that the amount due by Gage to the city, was that stated in the bill, but alleging that he did not know what was the real amount of said indebtedness, and prayed that the court would find and decree the amount of said indebtedness, and order the sale, and declare the amount to be paid by him out of the proceeds.

In February last, William T. Ayres, a citizen of Alabama, acting as executor for Charles P. Gage, deceased, late of said State of Alabama, recovered a judgment in this court against said David A. Gage for three thousand and six dollars and ninety-two cents. Execution was issued on said judgment, and returned "no property."

Thereupon Ayres applied to the Superior Court to be made a party defendant to the bill in this case, which application having been granted, he answered the bill, and also, by leave of court, filed a cross-bill, in both of which he alleged in substance the recovery in this court of said judgment against Gage, the issue of his execution and return, and charged that said judgment was an equitable and prior lien upon the property so held in trust by said Taylor; alleging that no indebtedness, in fact, existed from Gage to the city; that by the action of the common council of the city, Gage had been permitted to loan the funds of the city, and to pay certain interest arising therefrom to the city; that by reason of certain advances which had been made from certain of the general funds to certain specific funds by Gage while acting as city treasurer, certain equitable considerations had arisen which ought to defeat, and did defeat any claim at law, or in equity, in favor of the city against Gage, praying it might be found and decreed that no indebtedness existed from Gage to the city, and that the property conveyed by Gage to Taylor, the trustee, was legally and equitably subjected to the lien of his judgment, as against the city, and asking the court to decree a satisfaction thereof out of the same.

After having filed his said answer and cross-bill, Ayres filed his petition in the Superior Court setting up that he was a citizen of the State of Alabama; that there was a coutroversy in said suit between himself and said Gage, who were citizens of the State of Illinois and of this district, and asking that said cause be removed from said Superior Court to this court for trial.

The Superior Court entertained said petition and ordered the removal of said cause to this court; and the question is: Does there enough appear on the face of the record to justify this court in holding jurisdiction of the case?

The fifth section of the act of March 3d, 1875 (Eighteenth Statutes At Large 472) provides—"That if, in any suit commenced in a State Court, or removed from the State Court to the Circuit Court of the United States, it shall appear to the satisfaction of said Circuit Court, at any time after such suit has been brought or removed thereto, that such suit does not really and substantially involve a dispute or controversy properly within the jurisdiction of said Circuit Court, or that the parties to said suit have been improperly or collusively made or joined, either as plaintiffs or defendants for the purpose of creating a case, cognizable or removable under this act, the said circuit court shall proceed no farther therein, but shall dismiss the suit, or remand it to the court from which it was removed, as justice may require."

The first question which suggests itself to my mind in discussing this motion, is—between whom is the controversy in this case?

The original suit was brought by the city of Chicago to determine the amount of indebtedness due to it from Gage, and to require the payment of that indebtedness out of the property held in trust by Taylor, for that purpose. In his answer, in that case, Gage denied any indebtedness between himself and the city. I think it unnecessary for the purposes of this inquiry to investigate the grounds upon which Gage based that denial; it is sufficient, for this motion, to say that by the bill, answer and replication in the case, as it stood at the time Ayers made himself a voluntary party thereto, the controversy in the case was between the city and Gage as to whether there was, in fact, an indebtedness, and the amount thereof, if any, from Gage to the city. The defendant, Ayres, does not raise any new controversy by his answer and cross-bill, but simply makes himself a party to that which already existed, alleging, perhaps, more in detail the grounds for denying any indebtedness from Gage to the city, but at the same time not changing in any degree, the issue in the case, or the character of the controversy. The main question still is, as the pleadings now stand, and as they stood before Ayres came into the case. -Does Gage owe the city anything which ought to be satisfied out of the proceeds of the property held in trust by Taylor, under the trust deed described in the complainant's bill? This being so, the controversy inaugurated in the suit is simply one between citizens of this State. True, Ayres, as a creditor of Gage, may be interested in the result of that controversy, because, if it terminates in favor of Gage it leaves the property now held by Taylor subject, equitably if not legally, to Ayres' debt, but that does not in any degree, in my estimation, involve a controversy between the city and Ayres, in the original suit.

As was intimated by the learned circuit judge of this circuit in the case of Osgood against the Chicago, Danville and Vincennes Railroad Company, (7 CHICAGO LEGAL NEWS, 241,) the statute of March 3d, 1875, clearly contemplates the removal of the whole suit from the State to the federal court, and not of such fragment or part thereof as may involve a controversy or question between two or more of the defendants. And we must look into the nature of the original controversy, which was the subject matter of the suit, to settle this question of right of removal.

A complicated chancery suit may, almost necessarily, involve in some of its collateral issues, the rights and interests of citizens of different States; but, unless the original controversy which the suit is brought to determine be between citizens of different States, or between such parties as give the Federal courts jurisdiction, it would hardly seem that Congress intended to provide for the removal thereof, inasmuch as the whole case must be removed instead of that collateral branch or part involving a controversy between citizens of different States.

Applying these suggestions to the case under consideration, it would seem that the controversy, as presented by the issues and pleadings is, as to whether or not Gage owes the city anything which should be paid out of this trust fund. That being determined, if determined against the city, the defendant, Ayres, may have a standing in court to claim his pay out of the trust property, but not until then. Notwithstanding Ayres' interpolation into the suit, the real questions still stand at issue between the city and Gage, and Ayres only has rights as he may be subrogated to those of Gage. It is nowhere intimated in this case that there is any collusion between Gage and the city or that the city suit is not prosecuted in entire good faith. If it had been made to appear that Gage had given the trust deed to Taylor for the purpose of defrauding Ayres, or that the conveyance was not bona fide, the parties to the controversy might be changed, and Ayres, or any creditor of Gage, might be the real party to the controversy with the city and trustee; but there is nothing of the kind in this case. It therefore seems clear to me that, upon the facts shown in the record, this suit is not such an one as was intended to be removed from the State to the Federal court.

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

OPINION FILED OCT. 14, 1875.

F. C. COX v. C. CUNNINGHAM.

FORCIBLE ENTRY AND DETAINER—POWER OF TENANT TO EFFECT LANDLORD'S POSSESSION.

Having leased from Gallagher and entered under him, appellant had no power to so contract with appellee as to affect Gallagher's possession without first having surrendered the possession to his landlord.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

WALKER, J.

This was an action of forcible entry and detainer brought in the St. Clair Circuit Court for the recovery of two lots, being a part of the subdivision of a lot in Cahokia Common, in St. Clair county in this State. The plaint charged that appellant unlawfully withheld the possession of the same from appellee. The defendant filed a plea of not guilty. A trial was had before the court and a jury resulting in a verdict in favor of plaintiff, and after overruling a motion for a new trial, the court rendered judgment on the verdict and awarded a writ of restitution, and from that judgment defendant appeals to this court.

We think that the evidence clearly shows that Gallagher leased the premises to appellant by a verbal lease. This, we think, cannot be successfully controverted, and it is equally clear that he entered into possession under that lease. It does not appear, nor is it claimed, that the lease was ever canceled or abandoned by the parties. Nor is it proved or claimed that appellant ever abandoned the premises, or that he disclaimed holding under the lease from Gallagher. But, it is claimed, that he attorned to or recognized appellee as his landlord, and hence became her tenant, and liable to her precisely as though he had not leased from Gallagher, but had from appellee before entering into possession in the first place.

Having leased from Gallagher and entered under him, had appellant the power to so contract with appellee as to affect Gallagher's possession without first having surrendered the possession to his landlord. All know that had appellant underlet, or put another in possession, that Gallagher could have maintained an action against such under-tenant and occupant, and recovered possession. Appellant could have conferred on no one any higher or better rights than he held. Any one entering under him could have held precisely as he did, and would be liable to be dispossessed by the landlord by forcible entry and detainer as would the tenant had he remained in possession until the expiration of the term. Ballance v. Fostier, 3 Gilm., 291.

Even if appellant did attorn to or receive a verbal lease from appellee, that would in no wise affect Gallagher's rights. His tenant could not give away or barter off his rights, or affect his interest by under-letting or receiving a lease from another until he fully restored possession to his landlord. But a tenant may, no doubt, complicate his own rights by taking leases for the same property for the same time from different persons. He may thereby estop himself from denying the title of either landlord. If, however, he were to take the lease for the shorter term from his second landlord, and was to be turned out by forcible detainer, according to the case of Ballance v. Fostier, supra, the first lessor could maintain such an action against his second landlord, who could not occupy a better position than the tenant of the person making the longer lease.

Did appellant after leasing from Gallagher receive a lease from appellee? The evidence is somewhat conflicting, but when fully considered we think it does not sustain the finding. The witness, Short, testified that appellant called on him to rent the premises, but he referred him to appellee. She says he did not see her, but she found him in possession and turned his horses out of the enclosure, and appellant swore that he rented the property of and entered under Gallagher. This then renders it manifest that appellant did not lease the premises, before he entered, from appellee, nor did he enter into possession under her; on this question there would seem to be no doubt.

Did then appellant, after he leased from Gallagher and had entered into possession, lease the premises of appellee, or did he attorn to her or do any act that created the relation of landlord and tenant between them, or to render his possession hers? Short testified that afterwards, at his house, appellant offered to pay the rent to appellee, but she declined to receive it until it was settled who owned the title. Appellee says, when she ordered appellant to leave, when she first found him in possession, he refused to give her possession and refused to agree to pay her the rent, but said he would pay it to the person entitled to receive it. She further testified that afterwards, at Short's, appellant said to her, "I have found out that you are the right owner; the rent is ready for you at any time," but she declined to receive it until the title was settled. This appellant denies most positively.

But even conceding this to be true, it falls far short of constituting a lease or attornment that he should hold until the title was settled by the ejectment suit then pending. Nor does it appear that there was any agreement that he should hold under her or pay to her any future accruing rent. He says she told him not to pay the rent to Gallagher, and he had not paid it. He says it was agreed between him, her and Gallagher, that he was to pay the rent to the owner, and they were to wait until the suit was decided. This seems to be the most probable version of the matter.

But were all appellee's claims conceded, still it only amounts to an opinion on the part of appellant. When a tenant of one person is in possession, to create the relation of landlord and tenant between him and another person, the evidence should be at least reasonably satisfactory, not inferred from slight circumstances. It is wholly unlike a person in possession as an intruder or wrongdoer who admits another to be the owner and agrees to pay rent for the time occupied as the presumption in such a case is that the occupant is willing to act justly and pay rent. But not so with a person having a lease and bound to pay rent. There can be no presumption that he is willing to pay full rent to two different persons; on the contrary the presumption is the other way.

It is, however, urged that appellee had a prior possession. It appears that about two years before appellant went into possession, appellee put locks on the gate and barn door and locked them, and had the lot plowed and planted in corn, but Gallagher entered and had it with the weeds cut down. The brother of Gallagher testified that he rented the premises for his brother to a man from Clinton county, who occupied it for six months next preceding the time when appellant went into possession. This is not contradicted by any evidence in the record, and it appears that Gallagher had been in possession for about twenty years before this suit was brought. That this possession was uninterrupted, unless the locking the barn door and gate and the plowing up the lot and planting corn on it amounted to possession. They were acts of trespass, unless justified by title, but cannot be held under the circumstances to have been such possession as authorizes a recovery in forcible detainer against a person having such long, open, visible, notorious and uninterrupted possession as Gallagher has shown.

Even if this action can be maintained by a person who has previously sued in ejectment to recover the same land whilst that suit is pending, appellee has failed to make out a case, and the judgment of the court below is reversed.

Judgment reversed.

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

OPINION FILED OCT. 11, 1875.

CYRUS F. MILLER et al. v. RICHARD D. KIRBY.

Appeal from Superior Court of Cook.

TRESPASS—TITLE—POSSESSION—RULE AS TO VINDICTIVE DAMAGES.

1. TRESPASS — TITLE — POSSESSION. — That the plaintiff, in such cases, must show that at the time when the injury was committed he had an actual or constructive possession of the property, and also a general or qualified title therein; that actual possession without the consent or even adverse to the real owner, is sufficient as against a wrong-doer, or one who can show no better title.

2. EQUITABLE INTEREST. — The court considers the right of a person having an equitable interest in the property to bring the action.

3. SALE — FRAUD. — The question of impeaching a sale for fraud is discussed.

4. RULE AS TO VINDICTIVE DAMAGES.—The rule is that vindictive or exemplary damages should not be awarded unless the injury complained of was done wantonly or wilfully. — [ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

Opinion by SCHOLFIELD, J.

About the first of June, 1873, Charles G. French being engaged in the sale of jewelry, etc., in Chicago, sold his stock in trade to appellee for $7,500, for which appellee paid in cash, at the time, $1,500, and gave his twelve promissory notes for $500, each payable the first one month thereafter, and the others, one for each consecutive month following, until the last note should become due, for the residue. To secure the payment of the notes he also executed, at the same time, a deed of trust to one Nichols. Appellee took possession of the stock, in conjunction with Nichols, the trustee, immediately after his purchase, and proceeded to sell the same as customers enabled him to do so, and also made some additional purchases to replenish and enlarge the stock.

On the 5th of July, 1873, the appellants, Henry Seans, Edmund B. Seans and Edward W. Beattie, recovered a judgment before a justice of the peace of Cook county, against Charles G. French, for $76.00, and costs of suit taxed at $5.95. Execution was issued on this judgment on the 11th of July, 1873, and placed in the hands of appellant, Swick, a constable, to execute. He, in company with appellant, Miller, an attorney at law, acting for the plaintiffs in the execution, thereupon went to the place of business of appellee, and levied the execution upon certain watches and "watch movements," which were included in the sale by French to appellee, and also upon one watch which had been left with appellee for repairs, and one watch which belonged to Nichols, for both of which, however, appellee seems to have been under obligation to, and did account to their respective owners. The action is trespass de bonis asportatis, and the appellant justify under the judgment and execution.

The jury, by their verdict, found appellants guilty, and assessed appellee's damages at $514.44. The court thereupon gave notice that he would grant a new trial unless appellee would remit all but $200 of the amount found by the verdict, which being done, judgment was then given for that amount.

Several errors have been assigned, which we will notice, in the order of their precedence, on the record.

It is objected that appellee does not show sufficient possession or right to possession, to enable him to maintain the action; that the possession is shown to have been in Nichols, under the deed of trust; and he alone, if any one, can bring trespass, under the proof.

The general doctrine is well settled, as claimed by counsel for appellant, that the plaintiff, in such cases, must show that, at the time when the injury was committed, he had an actual or constructive possession of the property and also a general or qualified title therein; but it is equally well settled, that actual possession, though without the consent, or even adverse to the real owner, will be sufficient as against a wrong-doer, or one who can show no better title.

Assuming the sale by French to appellee to have been valid, the question raised, upon which we shall pass for the present, appellee after executing the deed of trust still retained an equitable interest in the property which it was important to him should be protected. That he might do so it is expressly provided in the deed: "It is understood and agreed by and between said parties, that said Kirby (appellee) is to have, during the time said Nichols shall be trustee as aforesaid, full right, power and authority to carry on the business of said store in his own name; to have his signs out as such owner; to sell the goods therein contained, and in said schedule mentioned, to receive the proceeds of sales of said goods, and to have the management of said business in the same manner as a retail jewelry business is generally carried on. It surely cannot be insisted that this provision is inconsistent with the actual possession of the property by appellee. It is plainly impossible that it could be practically carried out without an actual possession. Whatever possession, then, it was designed Nichols should have, must have been simply constructive, the sole purpose of his appointment, and the extent of the authority vested in him being to see that appellee faithfully carried on his business and applied the proceeds of his sales to the payment of the notes

The evidence moreover shows that, in fact, Nichols never had the actual possession of the goods; but it was always held by appellee. We think the evidence ample, in this respect, to sustain the plaintiff's right of action.

The next question to which our attention is directed is, was the sale by French to appellee made in fraud of the rights of the creditors of French, and, therefore, as to them void, under the statute for the prevention of frauds and perjuries?

Appellant's counsel argue upon the assumed hypothesis that this was an assignment by French for the benefit of his creditors, and they cite authorities holding that where, in such an assignment, the trustee is authorized to sell upon a credit, the assignment, will, in equity, be set aside at the instance of a dissatisfied creditor. But as we understand the evidence, that is not this case, and these authorities therefore have no application.

French absolutely and unconditionally sold the property to appellee; and, although in providing for the payment of the balance over the $1500 paid down, he provided that it should be appropriated to the payment of his debts, this did not, in any degree, affect the validity or the regularity of the sale. The fact that French was indebted at the time of the sale; that it was on a credit, and that the notes were to be used in the payment of his debts, do not establish fraud. Nelson v. Smith, 28 Ills., 500. A party, though in debt, may sell his property to whom he pleases, if no heir exists to prevent it, and if the transaction be an honest one, made in good faith and for an adequate consideration, it matters not how many creditors may be thereby prevented from reaching the property, Hessing v. McCloskey, 37 Ill., 352.

In the light of these well settled principles, we are unable to discover, from the evidence, anything whereby the sale is successfully impeached. It is not even shown that French, at the time of the sale, was unable to pay his debts, nor is it shown that there was anything, designedly done by appellee, for the purpose of enabling him to defraud any creditor.

It is objected that in one of the instructions given at the instance of appellee, the jury were told, although they should find the conveyance by French was had, made, or contrived with the intent or purpose to delay his creditors, yet before they could find for the defendants, they must also believe "that the plaintiff also contrived the conveyance with malice, fraud covin, collusion or guile. We see no objection to this. It is in accordance with the principles laid down in Ewing v. Runkle, 20 Ills., 448, Herkelratte et al. v. Stoakey, 63 Id., 486, and Hessing v. McCloskey supra.

Objection is also taken to the action of the court in giving the 7th and 8th instructions asked by appellee, and in refusing the second instruction asked by appellant.

The objection to the 7th and 8th instructions of appellee, we conceive to be unimportant. The facts, the existence of which they assume, were not contested on the trial, and it is not possible that assuming their existence could, under the circumstances, have prejudiced appellants.

The same principal intended to be asserted in the appellant's second instruction, and which was refused, is declared in the fourth of their instructions, which was given, and it was entirely unnecessary to repeat it. The refusal to do so, is at least, no cause for reversal.

So far, we perceive no important error in the record. There remains, however, to be considered the question of damages. Notwithstanding the remittitur made at the instance of the court, the judgment still exceeds any actual damages proved. It is true, the question is for the jury to determine from the evidence whether there are such circumstances of aggravation as to justify vindictive damages; and when the evidence reasonably tends to sustain their finding in that respect, we will not reverse for the mere difference of opinion we may entertain as to the weight of the evidence; but the jury are no more at liberty on this question than on any other to act without evidence, and when it is clear to our minds they have done so, we have no alternative but to set their finding aside.

The rule recognized by our previous decisions is, that vindictive or exemplary damages should not be awarded unless the injury complained of was done wantonly, or willfully. Foot v. Nichols, 28 Ill., 486; Hawk at al. v. Ridgway, 33 Id., 475.

There is no evidence, not even that of appellee, that shows anything to have been done by appellants which can be reasonably construed as wanton or wilful. There was no violence, no unusual noise, or unnecessary demonstration. The fact that more property was taken than was actually necessary to satisfy the execution, was, under the circumstances, of no great significance. Appellee was requested to point out the property he had obtained from French, and to give the constable values. This he refused to do, as did also Nichols. Neither the constable nor the attorney with him were jewellers, and the value of the property levied upon was, at the highest selling estimate fixed by any witness, not more than double the amount called for by the execution. By the estimate of same witnesses it was much less than that. The fact that the constable proceeded with the levy after appellee notified him the property was his, is not a conclusive circumstance as to his knowledge that the property belonged to appellee. Appellant contested, and we cannot say in bad faith, the validity of appellee's title; and this was one mode by which it could be tested.

For the reasons last stated the judgment is reversed and the cause remanded.

Reversed and remanded.

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

OPINION FILED OCT. 13, 1875.

LEWIS W. ROSS v. THE CHICAGO, BURLINGTON AND QUINCY R. R. CO.

Appeal from Peoria.

R. R. CHARTER—AMENDMENTS WHEN WITHIN SCOPE OF ORIGINAL ACT—CHANGING NAME OF CO.—LOCATION AND CONSTRUCTION OF MORE THAN ONE LINE—ACTS AS STOCKHOLDER AND DIRECTOR.

1. The appellant having commenced an action of ejectment against the appellees to recover possession of a strip of land occupied by it for its right of way across a certain tract of land owned by him in Lewiston. The present bill was filed to enjoin further proceedings in that suit, and to enforce the conveyance of the strip of ground in question by Ross to the company. The decree below was in accordance with the prayer of the bill.

2. CHANGING NAME.—The court considers the effect of the act of the legislature changing the name of the railroad company.

3. AMENDMENT WHEN WITHIN THE SCOPE OF ACT. —The court is not authorized to hold as a matter of law that the entire purpose and scope of the act of Feb. 24, 1854, is so foreign to the objects embraced by the act of Feb. 11, 1853, that it cannot be held to be an amendment of that act. The leading objects might all still be obtained under the charter as amended. Precisely how far the original purpose of the statute may or may not be changed by an enactment professing only to be an amendment the court will not undertake to say. The legislative determination in this respect cannot in any view be disregarded unless it is clearly wrong.

4. ACT EMBRACING MORE THAN ONE SUBJECT.— The court overruled the objection that the act and its amendments embraces more than one subject; that is the location and construction of more than one line of road.

5. BOUND BY ACT.—That the appellant was not only bound by implication as a stockholder to the acts of acceptance of the company, but also expressly by his own acts as a director in exercising the powers and privileges conferred by the act.

6. TIME FOR COMPLETION.—That the time for completion of the road specified in the fifth section of the act is not irrevocable. It was competent for the legislature and the company to change it at any time by mutual consent.

7. THE CONSTRUCTION OF THE LINE WITHIN LIMITS OF CHARTER.—That it is not important what line of road was in contemplation when the instrument was executed, the line as constructed is within the limits of the charter of the company, and as in regard to time, so in this respect. If other limitations were intended, they should have been distinctly specified in the instrument.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

Opinion of the Court by SCHOLFIELD, J.

Lewis W. Ross having commenced an action of ejectment against the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy Railroad Company to recover possession of a strip of ground occupied by it for its right of way across a certain tract of land owned by him at Lewiston, in Fulton county. The present bill was filed to enjoin further proceedings in that suit and to enforce the conveyance of the strip of ground in question by Ross to the company. The decree of the court below was in conformity with the prayer of the bill.

The Chicago, Burlington and Quincy Railroad Company derives whatever rights it may have, in the right of way referred to by conveyance from the Peoria and Hannibal Railroad Company to Jay and from Jay to itself; and the first objection taken to the decree below is, that the Peoria and Hannibal Railroad Company never had any legal existence.

The objection is not as to the mere regularity of the corporation, but it is that what assume to be the charter of that company, was and is no law, because enacted at a special session of the General Assembly convened by the Governor, and not embraced in the purposes enumerated in his proclamation for which the special session was convened.

The act under which the "Peoria and Hannibal Railroad Company" claimed to be incorporated was enacted at the special session of the General Assembly, which convened Feb'y 9, 1854, and was approved on the 24th day of that month (Laws of 1854, p. 237). It was entitled "An Act to amend an act entitled 'An Act to incorporate the Macomb, Vermont and Bath Railroad Company,'" approved Feb'y 11, 1853. Among the purposes enumerated in the proclamation of the Governor for convening the General Assembly at the time, were the following: "To amend charters of towns, cities, railroads, ferries, dykes and plank roads and to extend the same." (Legislative Journal, 2d Session, 18 General Assembly, p. 18.)

The question is, therefore, was the act of Feb'y 24th, 1854, what, by its title, it professed to be?

By the first section of the act of Feb'y 11, 1853, the persons therein named were incorporated by the name and style of the "Macomb, Vermont and Bath Railroad Company" and empowered to locate, construct and maintain a railroad, etc., commencing at the town of Macomb in the county of McDonough, running from thence on the most eligible route to the town of Vermont in the county of Fulton, and from thence on the most eligible route to the town of Bath in the county of Mason. The seventeenth section of the same act also authorized the company to extend their railroad from Macomb to a point opposite or at the city of Burlington in the State of Iowa, on the most eligible route, and to also extend their railroad from Bath, in Mason county, to some point that might be agreed upon on the Petersburg and Springfield Railroad. (See Private Laws of 1853, p. 20, et seq.)

It was enacted by the first section of the Act of February 24, 1854, that the name of the "Macomb, Vermont & Bath Railroad Company be changed, and that hereafter said company be known and called by the name and style of the Peoria & Hannibal Railroad Company, and that said company be authorized and empowered to survey, locate, construct, and fully complete and operate an extension of their said railroad from the town of Vermont, in the county of Fulton, by way of Lewiston and Canton, in said county, to the terminus of the Peoria & Bureau Valley Railroad, at or in the city of Peoria, and from the town of Vermont aforesaid, by the way of Rushville, in Schuyler county, and Mount Sterling, in Brown county, to a point on the Mississippi river, as nearly as practicable, opposite the city of Hannibal, in the State of Missouri. By the fifth section it was provided that the company should not be required to construct the line of their road from the town of Macomb to the town of Bath; and that the work on said extended railroad should be commenced within five years and completed within eight years after the passage of the act.

The act of February 11, 1853, contained seventeen sections, and by the act of February 24, 1854, five of these—the 2d, 3d, 4th, 5th and 6th—were expressly repealed, but the remaining sections, except in so far as they were inconsistent with the provisions of that act, were left in full force.

We do not feel authorized to hold as a matter of law that the entire purpose and scope of the act of February 24, 1854, is so foreign to the objects embraced by the act of Feb. 11, 1853, that it cannot be held to be an amendment of that act. Its leading objects might all still be attained under the charter as amended—not necessarily, it is true, but possibly—and some of them were entirely unaffected by the amendment. Precisely how far the original purpose of a statute may or may not be changed by an enactment professing only to be an amendment, we will not undertake to say. The legislative determination in this respect cannot in any view be disregarded, unless it is clearly wrong, and that is not established to our satisfaction in the present instance.

A further objection to the constitutionality of the charter of the Peoria & Hannibal Railroad Company as constituted by the various amendatory statutes, insisted upon is, that it embraces more than one subject that is the location and construction, etc., of more than one line of road.

The same objection was argued in The Belleville, etc., R. R. Co. v. Gregory, 14 Ill., 28, and overruled, and what was there said on this point is equally applicable here. The court said: "The first inquiry here is, does this law embrace more than one subject? The subject of this law is the incorporation of a railroad company. No other subject is introduced into the law, and but one company was created by it. But it was urged that two roads were authorized to be constructed by the law, if this extension is sustained. Even admitting that this would make the law obnoxious to the constitutional objection, the fact does not sustain the objection. With the extension to Alton, there will be but one continuous road, and that on a much straighter line than many other roads in the State. If we are to look at the line of road authorized to be constructed, for the purpose of determining whether the bill embraces more than one subject, we shall find the law as free from objection as most others of a similar character, and much more than some others. Take, for instance, the Illinois Central Railroad Company providing for the construction of a main trunk and Chicago and Dubuque branches, the former of which projects from the main road over two hundred miles from its terminus at Chicago, presenting the same objection in a much higher degree. * * Should we hold this law to be unconstitutional for the reason urged, but few railroad charters in the State could survive the test." We can not now reconsider the rule of construction then announced. It has ever since been accepted and acted upon as the correct exposition of the clause of the constitution involved. See also City of Ottawa v. The People, ex. rel., 48 Ill., 233. It can not be claimed that, by the charter of the Peoria and Hannibal Railroad Company, the construction of two or more distinct and independent lines of road were contemplated; the authority was merely to construct, etc., one or more extensions of the principal line in different directions, as in the illustration given in the opinion from which we have just quoted.

The proof of acceptance of the various amendatory acts by user, etc., under them, is ample. Indeed, no question is raised in argument on this ground.

An instrument, of which the following is a copy, was executed and delivered to the railroad company by Ross:

"Know all men by these presents that I, Lewis W. Ross, of Lewiston, Fulton county, Illinois, in consideration of one dollar to me in hand paid by the Peoria and Hannibal Railroad Company, the receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, do hereby agree to release and convey unto said company, the right of way for said railroad over any land or town lots owned by me in Fulton county, Illinois, except those having buildings on the line, and to execute and deliver to said company a proper release and conveyance of the same as soon as the said road is located. In testimony whereof I have hereunto subscribed my name and affixed my seal this 26th day of June, A. D. 1854."

[SEAL.] LEWIS W. ROSS."

It is contended, because the road was not completed within eight years after the passage of the act of Feb. 24, 1854, as required by the 5th section of that act, and because, also, by a subsequent amendment to its charter, the company were allowed to divide the line of road into sections, and to complete it in that way, the promise contained in this instrument ceased to be obligatory.

An amendatory act entitled, "An act to amend an act entitled an act to incorporate the Macomb, Vermont and Bath Railroad Company," was enacted by the legislature and approved Feb. 14, 1857. By the fourth section of this act, it was provided that the Peoria and Hannibal Railroad Company should have the right by its directors, to divide the route of its road, running from Peoria to Hannibal, in divisions; to let, construct and operate any of such divisions, and also to call in installments on stock from stockholders interested, in or near the line of such divisions so to be constructed, and apply the same on such part so to be built and operated; and it was also thereby empowered to unite its road with any other road, now or hereafter constructed at its termini, or any point thereof where the same or any part thereof may come in contact with any such road; to issue bonds bearing any rate of interest, not exceeding ten per cent. per annum and to mortgage, sell or lease their said railroad and its equipments, rolling stock, station houses, or any portion or part thereof.

The sixth section is as follows: "This act shall not, in any respect, affect the subscriptions of stock voted or subscribed by any county, city, corporation or persons. The said company may commence the work on said road within three years; and if any division thereof be completed within eight years after the passage of this act, then this act to remain in full force and effect, together with the several acts to which this is an amendment. (Private Laws of 1857, 619.)

At, and long prior to, the date of this enactment, Ross was a stockholder in the Peoria & Hannibal Railroad Company. He was one of the commissioners named in the act of February 24, 1854 to solicit subscriptions to its capital stock, and he was active and zealous in this capacity in promoting the success of the company's undertaking.

It appears that the act of February 14, 1857, received his express approval, and from 1862, in April, he was, for the period of two years, one of the directors of the company, during which time he authorized and approved of acts done by, and on behalf of, the company, having their only legal sanction in the provisions of that act. He is, therefore, not only bound by implication as a stockholder, to the act of acceptance of the company, but also expressly by his own acts as a director, in exercising the powers and privileges conferred by the act.

Nor do we think the adoption of this admendment worked such a fundamental change in the charter of the company as could be held to release individuals from their obligations to it, upon the ground that it thereby became a new and essentially different corporation. The cases of Sprague v. Ill. R. R. Co. et al., 19 Ill., 177; Ill. R. R. Co. v. Zimmer, 20 Id., 657, are in point and sustain this view.

The case of Fulton county v. Marsh, 10th Wallace, 676, cited as holding differently is not analogous. There the subscription was made to a corporation which was subsequently divided and made into three corporations, one of which claimed the benefit of the subscription. Here the unity of the original corporation is not disturbed. It is merely allowed to construct its road by sections, and appropriate the proceeds arising from subscriptions to the payment of expenses incurred, according to the locality in which the subscriptions were made. This was doubtless designed to stimulate local aid. It was clearly auxiliary to the main design of the original organization, and therefore, whether it was the wisest policy that could have been adopted under the circumstances, it is unnecessary for us to inquire.

We do not comprehend the force of the distiction attempted to be drawn between the duties and liabilities of Ross as a stockholder and as an individual, when applied to the enquiry before us. We cannot understand how Ross, as a stockholder and director in the Peoria and Hannibal Railroad Company, can be regarded as accepting an amendment to its charter, and at the same time protesting against it as an individual. Having by his own personal acts accepted and assisted in fastening this amendment upon the company, to what principle of equity can he appeal for the purpose of his being relieved from his private obligations to the company on account of the change thus wrought in its charter? His mouth is closed. He can not be heard to say upon well-settled principles of equitable estoppel that the corporation has ceased to be that to which he became obligated.

The time specified for the completion of the road in the fifth section of the act of Feb. 24, 1854, was not irrevocable. It was competent for the legislature and the company to change it at any time by mutual consent. The State alone could take advantage of a failure in this respect on behalf of the company, and, if it should chose to waive its rights on that account, no one else could complain. While it may be said that the time within which the road was to be completed may be presumed to have been within the contemptation of the parties when this instrument was executed, it may, on the other hand, be said it may also be presumed to have been within their contemplation that this provision might be, subsequently, changed. So the only way to have made time certainly of the essence of the contract, was to have inserted a stipulation to that effect.

The case cited relating to common highways was governed by an express statutory provision, and on that account has no application here.

The cases holding parties relieved from like obligations with that of Ross, where the evidence shows there was a subsequent abandonment of the enterprise, would be in point if the evidence here supported that theory, but in our opinion it does not.

Work was done at different places along the line of the road, according to the evidence, commencing in 1854, in small quantities, every year until in 1862, when it was completed from Canton to Lewiston. Ross remained a director in the company until in 1864, and the organization was kept up until after 1869, when the road was completed from Lewiston to Rushville. After the completion of the road to Lewiston in 1862, work was for some time suspended, but there is not a particle of evidence showing an abandonment of the enterprise. On the contrary efforts were being made and renewed at different intervals, to secure additional means and enlist the aid of those whose influence would insure success. Work also seems to have been done occasionally. The line was run across the property of Ross substantially where the road is now built; estimates, profiles, etc., were made, and it seems to have been regarded by the president and engineer of the company that the road was located there, as we infer from the evidence, as early as in 1861 or 2. Ross himself may not have actually known of this location, but he does not pretend to have been ignorant of the fact that the organization of the company was kept up; that efforts were being made from time to time to complete the road to Rushville; that the hopes of its completion was not abandoned, and the probability that the road, if constructed, would run not far from where it was built, yet he made no effort to cancel the instrument he had executed obligating himself to convey the right of way, gave no notice that he did not intend to be bound by its terms, but permitted the company to retain this instrument and complete the construction of the road over his property before he made known a single one of the many objections now alleged against their rights under the instrument. Even if such time had elapsed as to authorize him to revoke the offers contained in the instrument, it was for him to determine whether he would do so or not, and it would seem, under the circumstances proved, that good faith would have required that he should have given notice to that effect, before the company had taken possession of his property, so that it might have adopted another location, or taken proceedings to condemn this property before rendering itself otherwise liable.

We do not consider the question important, what line of road was in contemplation when this instrument was executed. The line as constructed is within the limits of the charter of the company, and as in regard to time, so in this respect, if other limitations were intended, they should have been distinctly specified in the instrument. It was perfectly competent for him in that way to impose what restrictions or limitations he pleased.

There is one other circumstance to be noticed tending strongly in our opinion to show that Ross is not equitably entitled to recover the possession of the right of way, even if we could regard the question of his right to damages against the company, open.

Some short time subsequent to the completion of the road over his property, he commenced two suits against the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy Railroad Company which was then and still is in possession of the road. One in ejectment for the possession of this right of way, and the other trespass q. c. l. for damages to his real estate, sustained in the construction of the road. These suits were dismissed by him, pursuant to an understanding then had with those representing that company. Some witnesses swear that the agreement was the company was to make a cattle pass for Ross on this ground, under the railroad and Ross was to dismiss the suits and make a deed of the right of way to the company.

Ross and other of the witnesses disagree with so much of this as relates to the making of the deed. That the suits were to be dismissed and the cattle pass to be made to the satisfaction of Ross, there is no controversy. Ross says his understanding was, the making of the cattle pass was to go in reduction of his claim of damages. Upon this hypothesis, was not this a distinct abandonment of any right which he might have had to the possession of the property, and an election to take his damages instead? The pass cost $800, was made for the sole accommodation and convenience of Ross, and, of course, upon the hypothesis that the right to the possession of the property, where it was made, was in the company. He induced the company to expend this money with the understanding it should have the benefit of it in his claim for damages. Shall he now be allowed to defeat this by taking the whole property? We think in equity this can not be allowed.

In every view we have been able to take of the case, we think the equities are in favor of the company.

We have not discussed the right of the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad Company as distinct from those of the Peoria & Hannibal Railroad Company, and no question is made in that respect. We have assumed that by the effect of the several conveyances the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad Company occupies the same position the Peoria & Hannibal Railroad would if no conveyance had been made.

The decree is affirmed.

UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT.

No. 502—OCTOBER TERM, 1875.

THE FARMERS AND MECHANICS NATIONAL BANK, of Buffalo, plaintiff in error, v. PETER C. DEARING.

In error to the Court of Appeals of the State of New York.

RATE OF INTEREST CHARGEABLE BY NATIONAL BANKS.

1. The rate of interest chargeable by each bank is to be that allowed by the law of the State or territory where the bank is situated.

2. When by the laws of the State or territory a different rate is limited for banks of issue organized under the local laws, the rate so limited is allowed for the national banks.

3. Where no rate of interest is fixed by the laws of the State or territory, the national banks may charge at a rate not exceeding seven per cent. per annum.

4. Such interest may be reserved or taken in advance.

5 Knowingly reserving, receiving, or charging "a rate of interest greater than aforesaid shall be held and be adjudged a forfeiture of the interest which the note, bill, or other evidence of debt carries with it, or which has been agreed to be paid thereon."

6. If a greater rate has been paid, twice the amount so paid may be recovered back, provided suit be brought within two years from the time the usurious transaction occurred.

7. The purchase, discount, or sale of a bill of exchange, payable at another place, at not more than the current rate of exchange on sight drafts, in addition to the interest, shall not be considered as taking or reserving a greater rate of interest than that permitted.

8. ACT CONSTITUTIONAL. — That the national bank act is constitutional

9. TAKING MORE INTEREST THAN ALLOWED BY LAW.—The court construes the provisions of the act relating to the penalty for taking more than lawful interest, and holds that the plaintiff below was entitled to recover the principal of the note sued upon less the amount of the interest unlawfully reserved.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

Mr. Justice SWAYNE delivered the opinion of the Court.

The question presented for our determination involves the construction of the provisions of the national bank act of Congress of the 3d of June, 1864, 13 Stat., 99, upon the subject of the interest to be taken by the institutions organized under that act.

The plaintiff in error is one of those institutions. The 30th section of the act declares "that every association may take, receive, reserve, and charge on any loan or discount made, or upon any note, bill of exchange, or other evidences of debt, interest at the rate allowed by the laws of the state or territory where the bank is located, and no more, except that where by the laws of any state a different rate is limited for banks of issue organized under state laws, the rates so limited shall be allowed for associations organized in any such state under this act. And when no rate is fixed by the laws of the state or territory the bank may take, receive, reserve, or charge a rate not exceeding seven per centum, and such interest may be taken in advance, reckoning the days for which the note, bill, or other evidence of debt has to run. And the knowingly taking, receiving, reserving, or charging a rate of interest greater than aforesaid, shall be held and adjudged a forfeiture of the entire interest which the note, bill, or other evidence of debt carries with it, or which has been agreed to be paid thereon. And in case a greater rate of interest has been paid the person or persons paying the same, or their legal representatives, may recover back, in any action of debt, twice the amount of interest thus paid from the association taking or receiving the same; Provided, That such action is commenced within two years from the time the usurious transaction occurred. But the purchase, discount, or sale of a bona fide bill of exchange, payable at another place than the place of such purchase, discount, or sale, at not more than the current rate of exchange for sight drafts, in addition to the interest, shall not be considered as taking or receiving a greater rate of interest."

The facts of the case are few and simple. On the 2d of September, 1874, it was agreed between the parties that Dearing should make his promissory note to one Deitman for $2,000, payable one month from date, and that the bank should discount the note for Dearing at the rate of interest of ten per cent. per annum. This agreement was carried out. The bank received the note and paid to Dearing the sum of $1,981.67, The discount reserved and taken was $18.33. The rate of interest which the bank was legally authorized to take was 7 per cent. per annum. The excess reserved over that rate was $5.50. Dearing failed to pay the note at maturity. The bank thereupon sued him in the Superior Court of Buffalo. He answered that the agreement touching the discount was usurious, corrupt and illegal; that it avoided the note, and that he was in no wise liable to the plaintiff. The court sustained this defense, and gave judgment for the defendant.

At a general term of that court, the judgment was affirmed and the judgment of affirmance was subsequently affirmed by the court of appeals.

No searching analysis is necessary to eliminate the several provisions of the section to be considered, to develop the true meaning of each, and to draw the proper conclusions from all of them taken together.

(1) The rate of interest chargeable by each bank is to be that allowed by the law of the State or territory where the bank is situated.

(2) When by the laws of the State or territory a different rate is limited for banks of issue organized under the local laws, the rate so limited is allowed for the national banks.

(3) Where no rate of interest is fixed by the laws of the State or territory, the national banks may charge at a rate not exceeding seven per cent. per annum.

(4) Such interest may be reserved or taken in advance.

(5) Knowingly reserving, receiving, or charging "a rate of interest greater than aforesaid shall be held and be adjudged a forfeiture of the interest which the note, bill, or other evidence of debt carries with it, or which has been agreed to be paid thereon."

(6) If a greater rate has been paid, twice the amount so paid may be recovered back, provided suit be brought within two years from the time the usurious transaction occurred.

(7) The purchase, discount, or sale of a bill of exchange, payable at another place, at not more than the current rate of exchange on sight drafts, in addition to the interest, shall not be considered as taking or reserving a greater rate of interest than that permitted.

These clauses, examined by their own light, seem to us too clear to admit of doubt as to anything to which they relate. They form a system of regulations. All the parts are in harmony with each other, and cover the entire subject.

But it is contended that the phrase, "a rate of interest grea er than aforesaid," as it stands in the context, has reference only to the preceding sentence, which relates to banks where no rate of interest is fixed by law, and that hence it leaves the consequences of usury, where such rate is fixed, to be governed wholly by the local law upon the subject. This, in the State of New York, would, in all such cases, render the contract a nullity, and forfeit the debt. Such the court of appeals held to be the law of this case, and adjudged accordingly.

Neither of these views can be maintained. The collocation of the terms in question does not gramatically require such a construction. Viewed in this light, the phrase is as much applicable to both the foregoing clauses as to the next preceding one. The point to be sought is the intent of the law-making power. The offense of usury under this section is as great, where the local law does not, as where it does define the rate of interest. The same considerations apply in both cases. Why should Congress punish in one class of cases, and, so far as its action is concerned, exempt in the other? Why such discrimination? The result would be that in Pennsylvania, where the contract would be void, only as to the unlawful excess, the bank would lose nothing but such excess, while in New York, under a contract precisely the same, except as to the identity of the lender, the entire debt would be lost to the bank. This would be contrary to the plainest principles of reason and justice.

A purpose to produce or permit such a state of things ought not to be imputed to Congress, unless the circumstances are so cogent as to render that result inevitable.

We find nothing within the scope of the subject of that character.

The second proposition—that the State law, including its penalties, would apply if the first proposition be sound—is equally untenable. If the construction contended for were correct the State law would have no bearing whatever upon the case.

The constitutionality of the act of 1864 is not questioned. It rests on the same principle as the act creating the second bank of the United states. The reasoning of Secretary Hamilton and of this court in McCulloch v. Maryland, (4 Wheat., 316,) and in Osborne v. The Bank of the United States, (9 Wheat., 708,) therefore applies. The national banks organized under the act are instruments designed to be used to aid the government in the administration of an important branch of the public service. They are means appropriate to that end. Of the degree of the necessity which existed for creating them Congress is the sole judge.

Being such means, brought into existence for this purpose, and intended to be so employed, the States can exercise no control over them, nor in any wise affect their operation, except in so far as Congress may see proper to permit. Anything beyond this is "an abuse, because it is the usurpation of power which a single State cannot give." Against the national will "The States have no power, by taxation or otherwise, to retard, impede, burthen or in any manner control the operation of the constitutional laws enacted by Congress to carry into execution the powers vested in the general government."—Bank of the U. S. v. McCullough, Supra; Weston and others v. Charleston, 2 Peters, 466; Brown v. Maryland, 12 Wheat., 419; Dobbins v. Erie county, 12 Wheat., 419.

The power to create carries with it the power to preserve. The latter is a corollary from the former.

The principle announced in the authorities cited is indispensable to the efficiency, the independence, and indeed to the beneficial existence of the general government. Otherwise it would be liable, in the discharge of its most important trusts, to be annoyed and thwarted by the will or caprice of every state in the Union. Infinite confusion would follow. The government would be reduced to a pitiable condition of weakness. The form might remain, but the vital essence would have departed. In the complex system of polity which obtains in this country, the powers of government may be divided into four classes:

Those which belong exclusively to the States.

Those which belong exclusively to the national government.

Those which may be exercised concurrently and independently by both.

And those which may be exercised by the States, but only with the consent, express or implied, of Congress.

Whenever the will of the nation intervenes exclusively in this class of cases, the authority of the state retires and lies in abeyance until a proper occasion for its exercise shall recur. Gilman v. Philadelphia, 3 Wall., 713; Ex-parte McNeil, 13 Wall., 240.

The power of the States to tax the existing national bank lies within the category last mentioned.

It must always be borne in mind that the Constitution of the United States, "and the laws which shall be made in pursuance thereof," are "the supreme law of the land," (Const., art. 6), and that this law is as much a part of the law of each State, and as binding upon its authorities and people, as its own local constitution and laws.

In any view that can be taken of the 30th section, the power to supplement it by State legislation is conferred neither expressly nor by implication. There is nothing which gives support to such a suggestion.

There was reason why the rate of interest should be governed by the law of the State where the bank is situated, but there is none why usury should be visited with the forfeiture of the entire debt in one State and with no penal consequence whatever in another. This, we think, would be unreason and contrary to the manifest intent of congress.

Where a statute prescribes a rate of interest, and simply forbids the taking of more and more is contracted for, the contract is good for what might be lawfully taken and void only as to the excess.—Burnhisel v. Wright, Assignee, 22 Wall., (now in press); German v. Calvert, 12 Sarg. & R., 46. Forfeitures are not favored in the law. Courts always incline against them.—Marshall v. Vicksburg, 15 Wall., 156. When either of two constructions can be given to a statute, and one of them involves a forfeiture, the other is to be preferred.—Vattel, 29th Rule of Construction.

Where a statute creates a new offense, and denounces the penalty, or gives a new right and declares the remedy, the punishment or the remedy can be only that which the statute prescribes.—Stafford v. Ingersoll, 3 Hill, 38; First Nat. Bk. of Whitehall v. Lamb, 57 Barb., 429.

The 30th section is remedial as well as penal, and is to be liberally construed to effect the object which Congress had in view in enacting it.—Gray v. Bennet, 3 Met., 539.

The 46th section of the banking act of February 25, 1863, 12 Stat., 679, declared that reserving or taking more than the interest allowed should "be held and adjudged a forfeiture of the debt or demand." In the act of 1864 the forfeiture of the debt is omitted, and there is substituted for it the forfeiture of the interest stipulated for, if it had only been reserved, and the recovery of twice the amount where the interest had been actually paid.

In the Revised Statutes of the United States of the 22d of June, 1874, 1011, the provisions of the 30th section of the act of 1864 are divided into two sections, and the language is so changed as to render impossible in that case the same construction as that of the 30th section contended for by the counsel of the defendant in error in this case.

In the "act to amend the usury laws of the District of Columbia," of the 22d of April, 1870, (16 Stat., 91,) it is provided that six per cent. per annum shall be the lawful rate of interest, but that parties may contract for ten per cent.. and that if more than ten per cent. be contracted for, the entire interest shall be forfeited, and that only the principal debt shall be recoverable. It is further declared that if the unlawful interest has been paid it may be recovered back, provided it be sued for within a year.

It is declared in the last section that this act shall not affect the banking act of 1864.

This later legislation shows the spirit by which Congress was animated in passing the 30th section of the act here under consideration, and is not without value as affording light whereby to ascertain the true meaning of that section, if there could otherwise be any doubt upon the subject.

This section has been elaborately considered by the highest court of Massachusetts, of Pennsylvania, of Ohio, and of Indiana. Davis, Receiver, v. Randall, 115 Mass., 547; Central Nat. Bk. v. Pratt, Id., 539; Second Nat. Bank of Erie v. Brown, 72 Penn. Rep., 209; First Nat.

CHICAGO LEGAL NEWS COMPANY,
AT NOS. 151 AND 153 FIFTH AVENUE.

TERMS:—TWO DOLLARS per annum, in advance
Single Copies, TEN CENTS.

WE call attention to the following opinions, reported at length in this issue:

REMOVAL OF CAUSE FROM STATE TO FEDERAL COURT.—The opinion of the United States Circuit Court for the Northern District of Illinois, by BLODGETT, J., construing the act of 1875, providing for the removal of cases from State to Federal courts. The learned judge held, in the case before the court, that it was improperly removed from the State to the Federal court, and remanded the case to the Superior Court of Cook county, from whence it came. This opinion will commend itself to the profession.

LANDLORD—TENANT—POSSESSION.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of this State, by WALKER, J., as to the power of a tenant to contract to effect the possession of his landlord without having first surrendered the possession to him.

TRESPASS — POSSESSION — DAMAGES. — The opinion of the Supreme Court of this State, by SCHOLFIELD, J., as to what right a plaintiff must have in personal property in order to maintain an action of trespass to recover damages for its injury, and stating when vindictive or exemplary damages should not be allowed.

R. R. CHARTER—AMENDMENTS—CHANGING NAME—CONSTRUCTION OF MORE THAN ONE LINE.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of this State, by SCHOLFIELD, J., settling several interesting questions relating to special acts, amending the charters of railroad companies, defining the powers of such companies and their authority to locate and construct more than one line.

WHAT INTEREST A NATIONAL BANK MAY TAKE.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States by Swayne J., construing the sections of the act of Congress relating to interest and stating what interest a national bank may take. This opinion is of more than usual interest and arriving too late to appear in the place allotted for the opinions of the Supreme Court of the United States we insert it elsewhere.

GOODRICH, THE DIVORCE LAWYER.—The Supreme Court adjourned without having passed upon the application of the committee of the bar association to strike the name of A. Goodrich, the divorce lawyer, from the roll of attorneys for unprofessional conduct. We suppose an opinion may be filed in the case at any time during vacation.

THE RULE ON MR. WILBANKS.—Our readers will be pleased to learn that the Supreme Court not only discharged the rule against Mr. Wilbanks for alleged unprofessional conduct, but found that his conduct was strictly professional and honorable.

ILLINOIS REPORTS.—Mr. Freeman is pushing the publication of his reports with all possible dispatch. We have received from Mr. Freeman advance sheets of the 68 and 76 volumes of Illinois Reports, which are now being run through the press and will soon make their appearance.

HOMESTEAD AND DOWER.—The homestead laws of 1851 and 1857 exempted the homestead in favor of the widow and family from sale, for the payment of debts of the deceased owner, but did not exempt it to the widow as against the heirs. She took as against those only her dower in the land. By R. S., 1874, § 1, title "Exemptions," the homestead is further exempted "from the laws of descent and devise." In proceedings by the personal representative to sell lands for the payment of debts of the deceased, and in proceedings for partition, where both dower and homestead rights exist in one of the parties, serious questions present themselves. For example:

1. Is the widow entitled to dower and homestead rights, or is her right to both conditional? (See § 36, title "Dower.")

2. If the former, should the dower be first allotted to the widow, and then the homestead set off out of the remainder, giving her as dower the use of one-third of all the real estate for dower and the use of one thousand dollars' worth of the remainder. Or, should the homestead be set off first, and dower equal in a part equal to one-third of the remainder be allotted.

I would like to have the opinion of the NEWS upon these questions. And the joint committee on revision appointed in 1873 might also arise and explain the meaning of § 36 above referred to.

Will some member of the joint committee give our correspondent the desired information through the columns of the LEGAL NEWS?

THE CHICAGO LAW INSTITUTE.

The annual meeting was held on Monday last, at the rooms of the Institute, in the City Hall building. In the absence of the President and Vice-Presidents, Secretary J. J. KNICKERBOCKER called the meeting to order, and nominated JOSEPH E. SMITH as chairman pro tem.

Reports were made by J. P. WILSON, treasurer, JULIUS ROSENTHAL, librarian, and J. J. KNICKERBOCKER, secretary, as follows:

JOHN P. WILSON, Treasurer.

LIBRARIAN ROSENTHAL'S REPORT.

To the President and members of the Chicago Law Institute:

Since my last yearly report there were added to our library 1,250 volumes, consisting principally of American text-books, 101 vols.; English text-books, 97 vols.; American Reports, 197 vols.; English Reports, 139 vols.; Irish Reports, 81 vols. In all 417 volumes of reports.

English Statutes, 7 vols.; American Statutes, 31 vols.; Session Laws, 42 vols.; American Digests, 30 vols.; English Periodicals, 164 vols.; American Periodicals, 61 vols.; American Constitutional Law, 11 vols.; Leading Cases and Trials, 22 vols.; Civil Law, 13 vols.; Legal Biography (Eng. and Am.), 23 vols.

All the current volumes of English and American Reports and the latest text books, English and American, were added as soon as found in the market. Our very full department of legal periodicals was regularly kept up.

The total number of volumes now in our library is nearly 7,300. All purchases have been made for cash, at the best discounts we could obtain, of our city booksellers as well as of outside firms. A duplicate set of Illinois reports was added and a full set of the Law Journal reports, the English Jurist, and the Weekly Reporter, will be found on our shelves.

The board considered it in the interest of the members of the Institute that a copy of Peltzer's Atlas be acquired, and the same was purchased. Books have been presented by the Hon. J. D. Ward, the Hon. B. G. Caulfield and George S. Williams, and Messrs. Goudy and Chandler and M. D. Ewell, a copy of the council proceedings of 1873-4, by J. K. C. Forrest, city clerk; the Illinois Laws by the Hon. Judge Moore; the Public Laws of Rhode Island by the Secretary of State of that State, and several volumes by the undersigned.

The thanks of the Institute are due to all these donors. I must especially acknowledge the kindness of N. L. Freeman, Esq., in presenting us regularly with the volumes of his reports and transmitting to us unpublished volumes in advance sheets. The 76 volume of Illinois Reports is now found complete on our table, in advance. We obtained from George S. Williams, Esq., librarian of the Supreme Court Library at Ottawa, a box of briefs and arguments selected from those which had accumulated in the Supreme Court building during the years 1872-3-4, and some briefs and arguments have been contributed by our members, but not as many as it is desirable to have. Our members are herewith respectfully requested to transmit to us copies of their briefs and arguments, which are now the more valuable, as our current volumes of Illinois Reports do not give (except in exceptional cases) the points and references, and arguments of counsel.

The following volumes of American Reports are still wanting to complete our set:

The 16th and 17th of Howard, the 1st of Wallace, Jr., 1 to 5 inclusive, Gill and Johnson Maryland, 1 to 5 inclusive, 7 and 13 and 2 vols. of Aiken's Vermont, and the 4th volume of Rhode Island, in all 18 vols.

These volumes have become very scarce, and I take this occasion to call upon the members of the Institute to notify the librarian whenever they may know of a chance to buy any of these volumes.

We have lost a few books during the year. I would particularly mention Sharswood's Blackstone, 2 vols.; Blackwell on Tax Titles, 1 vol.; Dillon on Munic. Corp., 2 vols., 2d ed.; Burrel's Practice, 2 vol.; L. R. 14 Eq. Cases, 1 vol.

For the purpose of a catalogue, we use an interleaved copy of the very valuable New York law library catalogue, entering the new books whenever they come in under the proper heads.

Our department of English Reports is still very defective. Some of them have become so scarce that it has become exceedingly difficult to obtain them, and then only at exorbitant prices. Others we have in abridged, mutilated and condensed American publications, and ought to be replaced by full, original editions. Still more defective is our department of American Statutes, and Session Laws. An assessment of $15 on each share of stock for the ensuing year, to defray the current expenses and fill up the gaps of our library, is probably all that is needed, and I would recommend the same.

Respectfully, JULIUS ROSENTHAL, Librarian.

SECRETARY KNICKERBOCKER'S REPORT.

To the President and members of the Institute:

GENTLEMEN: Your secretary would respectfully beg leave to submit herewith his annual report for the past year.

During the year just closed there have been twenty-eight additions to the memberships of the Institute, by new subscriptions, and thirty-four certificates of stock have been issued.

There have been no forfeitures of stock during the year, and the actual membership of the Institute, at this date is three hundred and fifty (350). During the past fiscal year your secretary has drawn upon the treasurer eighty-two (82) orders numbered from 160 to 241 inclusive, for the payment of obligations incurred by the Institute. The corresponding vouchers for which are herewith submitted. These orders amount in the aggregate to $8,204.57, of which amount $6,036.13 has been expended for books, the remainder $2,168.44 being for miscellaneous expenses, such as salary of assistant librarian, insurance, binding of books, shelving, etc., etc. Schedule A, annexed to this report, presents a detailed statement of these disbursments, with the names of the different persons in whose favor orders have been drawn, together with dates and amounts.

Respectfully submitted.

JOHN J. KNICKERBOCKER, Secretary.

OFFICERS.

J. H. Bissell, J. S. Cooper, J. L. High, D. J. Schuyler, and D. L. Shorey were appointed a Committee to nominate officers for the ensuing year.

The persons reported by the Committee were elected as follows:

President—Thomas Dent.
First Vice-President—Ed. A. Small.
Second Vice-President—W. I. Culver.
Secretary—E. B. Sherman.
Treasurer—William H. Holden.
Librarian—Julius Rosenthal.
Managers—D. L. Shorey, George Gardner, H. K. Whiton, Joseph E. Smith, William A. Barnum, Franklin Denison, E. A. Otis, William R. Page, and Thomas S. McClellan.

On motion of J. J. Knickerbocker, it was voted that an assessment of $15 be levied on each share of stock to defray the expenses of the ensuing year.

On motion of Josiah H. Bissell, the following resolution was passed:

Resolved, That the Librarian and Executive Committee be instructed to procure, as far as practicable, copies of the briefs in the reported cases in our Supreme Court, and arrange them for convenient reference, and also to make arrangements to procure copies of all briefs on file in the Supreme Court hereafter.

On motion of W. B. Blanke, it was ordered that the incoming Board of Managers be instructed to appoint a committee of five to confer with the Board of County Commissioners with a view to securing proper quarters for the Institute in the county buildings about to be erected.

WHAT IS A GAMBLING HOUSE.—We take the following abstract of an opinion of the Supreme Court of Iowa, from the Times, of Dubuque, Iowa:

"The Supreme Court, yesterday morning, rendered a decision in regard to gambling houses that will be of interest to a large number of readers in all parts of the State, and will create something of a commotion among the proprietors of billiard halls, pool-tables and the like.

In the case of the State v. Peter Book, from Shelby District, the court affirmed the decision of the court below. Several indictments were filed against Book, but one of which was sustained, and that was that he kept a pool and billiard table; on this count he was found guilty and sentenced. He took an appeal to the Supreme Court, believing that court would reverse the decision, which makes billiard playing, where the losing party pays for the game, and also pool playing, gambling. This may now be fully understood to be the meaning of the law, and those interested must govern themselves accordingly."

REFERENCE INDEX TO THE REVISED STATUTES OF THE UNITED STATES—FROM STATUTES TO SECTIONS. By Darius Lyman, of the office of the Secretary of the Treasury. Boston: Little, Brown & Co. 1875.

This reference index will be a great aid to any one using the Revised Statutes of the United States, as it will enable him to find from what part of the statutes at large any section, or part of a section of the revision, was taken.

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

ABSTRACT OF OPINIONS FILED AT SPRINGFIELD, OCTOBER 13TH, 1875.

Teutonio Life Insurance Co. v. Mary Mueller et al.—Appeal from Tazewell.—Opinion by SCOTT, J. 4 pp.

SUBSTITUTION OF PARTIES UNDER PRACTICE ACT—OBJECTIONS TO AMENDMENTS MUST BE URGED BELOW—ESTOPPEL BY RECITALS IN A POLICY.

STATEMENT.—Policy of insurance by the "Bismark Bund," on the life of appellee's husband. On the death of the insured, suit was brought by the administrator. During the progress thereof, the administrator was dismissed from the suit, and the widow and heirs substituted as plaintiffs. Held,

1. That this substitution was allowable under the practice act.

2. An objection that an amendment was made to a declaration by interlineation cannot be urged, for the first time, in the Supreme Court; but must be made in the court below.

3, Where a policy recites the payment of the first premium, a company cannot be allowed to disprove the recital.

[The other points are the same as in 96, supra.]

108.—Samuel D. Porter v. James McNabney et al.—Appeal from St. Clair.—Opinion by SCOTT, J. 11 pp.

INNOCENT PURCHASERS WITHOUT NOTICE—SUPERIOR EQUITY MUST PREVAIL.

STATEMENT—Bills brought by the parties, mutually, to clear title to land, originally belonging to James McNabney, patentee, who conveyed it to Wilson; and Wilson to Carter. Carter gave a deed of trust on it, immediately, to his brother, to secure the payment of $4,000 due to Wilson—all these conveyances being duly recorded. It is claimed that Wilson and the trustee canceled the deed of trust by writing across its face "canceled in full." It was then returned to the grantor, Carter, who conveyed the land to Wilson, who afterward obtained a deed of release from the trustee, Carter, and then conveyed to appellees; all these instruments being duly recorded. It is charged that afterwards Porter (appellant) surreptitiously obtained the deed of trust so canceled, and had the land sold under it; he bidding it in at the sale, and afterwards obtaining a deed from the sheriff of St. Louis, who sold it as trustee—this deed being also recorded.

The defense was that the trustee, Carter, gave into the hands of Porter the deed of trust and the notes secured thereby, indorsed by Wilson, the payee, as security for a loan of money, which he sold the land to obtain payment of—the sheriff acting in the absence of Carter, trustee, in selling the land under the trust deed so deposited in Porter's hands.

In the suit, Porter filed his cross-bill to clear title, in which cross-bill it is charged that the conveyance by Carter (grantor) to Wilson, and the release by Carter (trustee) was in fraud of Porter's rights. The evidence was very contradictory and obscure. Held,

1. That the appellees were innocent purchasers, and therefore entitled to protection. The record showed the power in the deed of trust had been revoked by the deed of release to Wilson from Carter (trustee); and they were not under obligation to look further, and see whether there had been a subsequent sale or not, under the canceled trust deed.

2. That the sheriff had no power, at any rate, to sell after the trustee had released his claim. While the release remained in force, no authority could exist in a successor to sell the land; and so the sheriff's deed was no more effectual to pass the title than that of a mere stranger. Porter should have asserted his rights in the courts of this State, before proceeding to sell the land. He having notice in apt time of all the principal facts, and lying by until superior equities had intervened, these equities must prevail.

111.—Wm. H. Broadwell v. Wm. P. Howard et al.—Appeal from Morgan.—Opinion by SCHOLFIELD, J. 5 pp.

WAREHOUSE RECEIPTS AS EVIDENCE OF DELIVERY OF PERSONAL PROPERTY.

STATEMENT.—Appellant levied an execution on grain stored in the warehouse of one Fox; who, with money of the appellees, had bought the grain, and sent them warehouse receipts therefor.

Held, That while, in general, there must be an actual delivery of personal property to constitute ownership, yet there are exceptions to this rule, and a warehouse receipt, in accordance with the usage of trade, as to public warehouses, is a sufficient delivery and proof of ownership, and carries the title to the property.

115.—Richard Clark et al. v. Samuel Marfield.—Error to Champaign.—Opinion by SCOTT, J. 5 pp.

DISCRETION OF THE COURT AS TO THE ORDER OF HEARING CAUSES—IMPLIED WAIVER OF RIGHTS BY COUNSEL—SERVICE BY PUBLICATION—CO-PARTIES IN WRIT OF ERROR CANNOT ASSIGN ERRORS FOR ONE WHO HAS NOT JOINED.

STATEMENT.—Suit to clear title from a cloud arising from a forged deed purporting to have been executed by the complainant. No defense was made on the trial; and it was objected that the trial was had in advance of the day for which the hearing had been set by the clerk, according to the statute. Held,

1. That the statute places it within the discretion of the court to change the order assigned by the clerk for "good and sufficient cause"; and this discretion is not reviewable by the Supreme Court, unless there is manifest abuse in its exercise. Nor was there any necessity to reduce the change of order to writing as a rule of court.

2. If counsel are really surprised by having the hearing brought on sooner than the day set, they should be permitted to show cause against it; as that they had used due diligence, but were unprepared. But counsel cannot be allowed capriciously to refuse to show cause, and then assign the proceeding as error.

3. Where service is by publication as to one of the parties in a cause, who does not join in a writ of error, co-parties cannot assign errors on his behalf that only affect him. And unimportant errors will not vitiate a published notice.

138. — George Chandler etc. v. Joshua Brown.—Appeal from McLean.—Opinion by SCHOLFIELD, J. 4 pp.

PARTIES TO DECREE APPOINTING RECEIVER FOR FAILING CORPORATIONS—POWERS OF RECEIVER HOW LIMITED.

STATEMENT.—Suit by appellant as receiver of the Lamar Insurance Company against appellee, to recover balance unpaid on his subscription, appellant acting by virtue of a decree of the Superior Court of Chicago.

The points decided were,

1. That this action could not be maintained, because the appellee was not made a party to the said decree.

2. The decree was, besides, objectionable in conferring upon the receiver discretionary powers to compromise with the stockholders with regard to the payment of each subscription, since each stockholder has a vested right in all the subscriptions, and a court of equity can not give any one a discretionary right to release it; and particularly, this cannot be done unless all the stockholders are made parties to the decree.

145.—Louis Reinback v. John C. Crabtree et al.—Appeal from Morgan.—Opinion by SCHOLFIELD, J. 9 pp.

INSTRUCTIONS—APPLICABILITY—STANDARDS OF MONEY VALUE—USURY RULE THEREIN—TIME—USURIOUS CONTRACT A QUESTION OF FACT.

STATEMENT.—Action of assumpsit on promissory note; in which the defense was that the principal in the note had paid usurious interest enough to pay the balance due on the note. Judgment on verdict for defendants.

Held, 1. That all instructions must be applicable to the evidence; and if an instruction is a correct expression of the law upon a state of facts, which the evidence tends to prove, it is sufficient; and it is not proper to state exceptions to the rule when there is no evidence to make such statement applicable to the case at bar.

2. Neither the Supreme Court of the United States, nor of Illinois, recognizes two legal standards of value. A dollar is a dollar, whether payable in gold or in national currency; and ten per cent. interest, payable in gold, may be lawfully paid, dollar for dollar, in any currency which the general government has declared to be a legal tender, in the payment of debts. And any excess in the payment of interest beyond the rate allowed by law, would not be relieved of the objection of usury, because of the contract under which it was paid having provided for payment in gold, and the payment having been made in currency.

3. Although usurious interest once voluntarily paid cannot be recovered back, yet this rule does not apply where the transaction has not been settled, and suit is brought for an alleged balance. In such case the debtor may defend by claiming a credit for whatever usurious interest he has paid in the same transaction.

4. In pleading, the statement of the precise time is not necessary, even in criminal cases, unless it constitutes a material part of the contract.

5. The taking of usurious interest is prima facie evidence of a usurious contract; and whether a contract is usurious or not is a question of fact for the jury.

146.—Alfred Andras et al. v. I. J. Ketchum.—Appeal from Morgan.—Opinion by CRAIG, J. 5 pp.

JUDGE'S OPINION ON CONTROVERTED FACT—LIMITATION OF PROOFS.

STATEMENT.—Suit to recover $89 for a map of Morgan county, with views of appellee's residence. Motion for new trial overruled, and judgment for defendant. In reversing, it was Held, 1. That there is no rule of law or practice which allows a presiding judge to give the jury his opinion on a controverted question of fact. And so, after the evidence was submitted, in this case, it was fatal error to ask the court, "Would your honor know the view to be the residence of defendant, were defendant's name taken from the view?" and the court to reply in the negative, [or affirmative]; since this was likely to bias the jury as to a fact to be established alone by the evidence; and it is always impossible to know whether such opinion actually influenced the verdict or not.

2. It would have been proper to show that the map was incorrect, but not to show that a business card was incorrect, which was inserted, but not authorized by the prior agreement of the parties.

149.—Edwin S. Fowler v. Edward R. Perkins.—Appeal from Sangamon.—Opinion by SCOTT, J. 4 pp.

EFFECT OF REPEALING PRACTICE ACT—INTERPRETATION OF "MAY" AND "SHALL" IN STATUTES.

STATEMENT.—A revenue case was pending in the Circuit Court on appeal from the County Court, when the act of 1874, giving to the county courts direct appeals, etc., to the Supreme Court, took effect; whereupon the Circuit Court dismissed the appeal.

Held, 1. That jurisdiction having already attached, the Circuit Court should have proceeded to judgment.

2. The words "may" or "shall," in a statute may be used interchangeably, as will best express the legislative intention. The word "may" means "must" or "shall" only in cases where public interests and rights are concerned, and the public, or third persons, have a claim de jure, that the power shall be exercised. And, on the other hand, the word "shall" is presumed to have been used in reference to any right or benefit which may have accrued to any one; but where no such right or benefit depends on its imperative sense, it may be held directory merely.

152.—William Yokem et al. v. Jesse Yokem et al.—Appeal from Sangamon.—Opinion by SCHOLFIELD, J. 9 pp.

PRESUMPTION OF INTENTION IN A VOLUNTARY CONVEYANCE OF LAND TO CHILDREN.

STATEMENT.—Appellant being old, conveyed his lands to his children, with the intention that he should reserve to himself, either in the deed or by a separate lease, the possession for his lifetime, which, by a misunderstanding of the attorney drawing the conveyance, was not done. Evidence of intention is a large part of the case and opinion.

Held, That the facts that complainants were old, infirm and ignorant, and therefore easily persuaded, do not, in themselves, show that undue influence was employed to obtain the execution of the deed. Yet, it is so manifestly against the interest of an old, helpless man to surrender the present means of a comfortable support, and accept, in lieu thereof, mere individual obligations to maintain him, even if the obligors are his own children, that a court of equity should never act on the assumption that it has been done, unless the proof to that effect is clear and convincing, which is not the case here.

[Case remanded, with instructions to the court to require immediate possession to be given to the complainant, of the lands, for his life. WALKER, J., dissenting]

153.—Peter Larisson et al. v. P. A. & D. R. R. Co.—Appeal from Logan.—Opinion by WALKER, Ch. J. 16 pp.

PLEADING BY CORPORATIONS BROUGHT IN AS NOMINAL PARTIES—BY MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—IMPEACHMENT OF A STATUTE.

STATEMENT.—Bill in chancery by appellants to restrain the collection of a tax against appellees, the tax having been levied to aid in the construction of appellees' road. Payment was resisted on the grounds that the special act of incorporation of the company was unconstitutional, and that the company conducted fraudulently and never intended to finish their road, but held out false inducements therein; that the officers still hold the bonds for their own use, although they have sold the franchises of the company, and abandoned the construction of the road. Bill dismissed on hearing. Held,

1. That where, as in this case, there are several defendants, one (or more) a corporation or corporations, a cause will not be reversed because the answer of the corporation was not under seal, if it was but a nominal party, and the injunction would have been dissolved even if it had been defaulted.

2. A municipal corporation may answer in its own name, without the signature of its officers besides.

[3. The constitutional objection was a mere formal one, maintaining that the charter was not passed in the way, and by the steps in legislation, prescribed by the constitution. The court decides that, as a matter of fact, the proper steps were observed.]

4. Evidence to impeach a law must be clear, and not merely sufficient to raise a doubt.

[The charge of fraud was not specifically passed upon; but the judgment below against appellant was affirmed.]

156.—Samuel A. Murphy v. Victor Larson.—Appeal from Ford.—Opinion by SCOTT, J. 8 pp.

MALICIOUS PROSECUTION — ACTING UNDER ADVICE—EXEMPLARY DAMAGES.

STATEMENT.—Suit for malicious prosecution. Verdict for plaintiff.

1. It was held that, while the advice of an attorney duly licensed will justify one in instituting a criminal prosecution in good faith, yet, where, (as in this case,) advice is taken of one who is not licensed although he holds himself out as a lawyer, this will constitute no excuse; since the adviser is not an officer of court.

2. Nevertheless, such unauthorized advice may be admitted in evidence, in mitigation of exemplary damages, since it tends to show want of actual malice.

173.—Board of Supervisors of Jackson Co. v. Samuel T. Bush et al.—Appeal from Jackson.—Opinion by SCOTT, J. 8 pp.

RAILROAD SUBSCRIPTIONS—ISSUING OF STOCK BY COUNTIES—AUTHORITY THEREFOR BY VOTE OF THE PEOPLE—BURDEN OF PROOF UNDER THE PROHIBITORY PROVISION AND SAVING CLAUSE OF THE NEW CONSTITUTION—COUNTY "TRUSTEES"—VALIDITY OF BONDS.

STATEMENT.—Bill for injunction, and decree that 200 undated bonds, each for $1,000, prepared under an order of the County Court of Jackson county, and delivered to John M. Hanson, Hugh Crawford and John Ford, in trust for the Cairo and St. Louis R. R. Co., be surrendered up to the corporate authorities of the county, and that the orders of said County Court, made in 1871, authorizing and directing that two subscriptions, each for $100,000, be made to the capital stock of the said company, be declared null and void, as having been made without authority of law. One hundred of these bonds, it was claimed, were issued under a subscription voted at an election held June 9, 1868, and the others under election of July 24, 1869. Injunction dissolved as to the first series of bonds, and made perpetual as to the others. Appeal by both parties.

The first series of bonds were ordered by the County Court to be issued on the conditions submitted to vote at the first election, viz: to run 20 years at the option of the county; to bear interest at 8 per cent.; no part to be delivered to the R. R. Co. until the road was finished to Murphysboro, and then one half of them to be executed and delivered—the other half to be, in like manner, delivered on the completion of the entire road, and cars being run thereon. None bearing interest until so delivered. The clerk of the court was required to prepare the bonds, omitting the date, and deliver them undated into the custody of the trustees named above, who had power by the order of the court to date and deliver them to the company as prescribed, signed by the members of the court, upon compliance with the conditions contained in the propositions voted upon as follows: $50,000 when the road should be finished to Murphysboro, and $50,000 when it should be finally completed. They were also authorized, on such compliance and delivery, to take in return certificates of stock equal to the amount of the bonds issued.

A similar order was made with regard to the second series.

In November, 1871, the county adopted township organization, so that the board of supervisors have succeeded the old County Court; which board are complainants herein. Held,

1. That those undated bonds should be surrendered to the corporate authorities of the county. There is no authority for placing them in the hands of such trustees, to judge of the compliance with conditions, and then issue the bonds, even if the subscriptions had been duly authorized by the vote of the people. The regularly constituted authorities of the county cannot delegate their official trust; and more especially without the express consent of the people.

[2. Without expressly deciding the point whether, when a vote on subscription was taken without anything said in the submission as to the gauge of the road to be built, the company can construct a "narrow gauge" instead of the usual and customary gauge, the court say, it is a very important question in determining whether this is the enterprise authorized by the vote.]

3. The folly of the County Court in the matter is apparent in that one of these trustees having died, some of the undated bonds came into the possession of his personal administrator, who could have no authority to control them in any wise. Nor, in such case, have the surviving trustees any rights of survivorship as such, since the board has no existence in law.

4. Such trustees could commit irreparable injury by improperly dating and delivering such bonds, they being in no sense county officers, and owing no obligation to the county for their proper performance of the trust.

5. Where, on a vote prior to the adoption of the Constitution of 1870, a subscription is afterwards made, subsequently to such adoption, the burden of proof is on the railroad company to show affirmatively that the subscription is within the saving clause of that provision of the Constitution which prohibits subscriptions to the capital stock of corporations by municipalities.

[6. The court do not decide the point whether the elections were in conformity with the enabling act or not, but intimate that the burden of proof rests on the company as to this question.]

7. The questions raised as to the validity of the bonds can be better determined should the corporation sue out a writ of mandamus to compel the county to date and deliver the bonds.

Whole decree reversed.

LV. NEW HAMPSHIRE REPORTS.

Through the courtesy of Hon. JOHN M. SHIRLEY, we have received the advance sheets of the LV. Volume of his Reports, from which we take the following head-notes:

Cummings v. The Cheshire County M. F. Ins. Co. p. 457.

INSURANCE—ASSIGNMENT OF POLICY.

Insurance is a contract of indemnity appertaining to the person or party to the contract, rather than to the property subjected to the risk against which its owner is protected.

The assent of the insurer to an assignment of a policy of insurance, upon a sale of the property named therein, constitutes a new and original promise to the assignee to indemnify him in like manner as the original insured was indemnified; and the exemption of the insurer from further liability to the vendor, and the premium already paid for insurance for a term not yet expired, are a good consideration for such promise, and constitute a new and valid contract between the insurer and the assignee.

A mutual fire insurance company insured A, "his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns," on his dwelling-house a certain sum, and "on furniture and clothing therein," a certain other sum. During the life of the policy, A sold the real estate to B, and assigned the policy to him, with the consent of the insurers. A did not sell his furniture and clothing to B, but removed it. B took possession of the house, and placed therein his own furniture and clothing, of equal character and value, and it was burned with the house.

Held, B may recover of the insurers the amount of the original insurance upon the furniture and clothing of A.

Harriman v. Park, p. 471.

DEED-POLL—RESERVATION—ACCEPTANCE.

Where land is conveyed by deed-poll, with a reservation that the grantee shall maintain suitable fences upon the lines of the premises, and the grantee accepts the deed, he is bound to perform the service.

H conveyed by deed-poll a tract of land to P and D. The deed contained the following clause: "And the said grantees agree to build and keep in repair a suitable fence, on the westerly and southerly sides of said last described premises, at their own expense." P and D subsequently conveyed the land to third parties, after which H died. His executrix brought assumpsit against P and D to recover damages which accrued by reason of the fence being out of repair, as well after as before the death of the grantor.

Held, that the executrix could maintain assumpsit to recover the damages that accrued prior to the death of her testatator.

Held, also, that P and D could not defeat her right to recover by conveying the premises to a third party.

SUPREME COURT OF MICHIGAN.

NOTES OF DECISIONS OF THE OCTOBER TERM, 1875.

BY HENRY A. CHANEY, ATTORNEY AT LAW.

Harvey v. McAdams.—Error to Saginaw. Affirmed with costs. Opinion by COOLEY, J.

Declarations in trover need not set forth the the precise nature or evidences of the plaintiff's title.

What either partner does in the collection of a firm debt is presumptively done with the other's sanction.

Whoever selects a person not qualified as a regular officer, to serve a process, should be held responsible for his behavior in the discharge of the duty.

Where mortgaged goods are levied on under an execution against the mortgagor, it is not illegal, when necessary, to take possession of distinct articles separately, but this would not justify selling them separately.

Any parol understanding between the mortgagors and mortgagees of property regarding its possession is ended when the property is converted by a third person.

In a case resulting in an execution and a levy upon goods the time of entering judgment is within the court's discretion; the judgment is only provisional, and does not deprive a party of the right to move for a new trial.

Wells v. Martin.—Error to Ottawa. Reversed with costs and new trial granted. Opinion by CAMPBELL, J.

A railroad sub-contractor, whose relation to the contractor is declared by an express provision in the contract between them to be that only of a disbursing agent, has no authority to obtain supplies on the contractor's credit.

Iron Company v. Auditor General.—Appeal from Marquette. Reversed; cause remanded with directions to overrule the demurrer. Opinion by COOLEY, J.

A specific tax obliging mining companies to pay more upon mineral obtained in the State, and exported before it is smelted, than on that which is smelted within the State, is a tax on inter-State and foreign commerce, and is an application of the doctrine of protection.

Doty v. Martin.—Appeal from Clinton. Affirmed with costs. Opinion by MARSTON, J.

Instruments of conveyance embodying the terms of a contract may sometimes be executed and delivered in full performance of an oral agreement, and may even vary it, and then the oral agreement is considered as merged in the written.

Where papers are executed and delivered in performance of part only of an oral agreement, leaving some distinct portion untouched and unperformed, so much of the oral agreement as is left unperformed is not merged in the written agreement, and parol evidence to show what the actual agreement was is not then excluded.

An executed oral agreement for the sale of the good will of one's professional practice is not void under the Statute of Frauds as one not to be performed within a year. When the practice is transferred, paid for, and entered upon, the parties have done what they could to make the transaction complete, even if the purchaser does not, within the year, reap all the benefits he expects from it.

Churchill v. Burt.—Error to Calhoun. Writ dismissed. PER CURIAM.

A decision of the Circuit Court affirming an order of the Probate Court to extend the time of a commission and pass upon a claim, is not a common-law final order or judgment, and not reversible on writ of error.

G. R. & I. R. R. Co. v. Wright.—Error to Kent. Reversed, PER CURIAM.

One who appeals from a justice's judgment is entitled to the whole of the day on which the return is filed to pay the entry fee, and his right of appeal does not depend on the payment of a fee to the opposing attorney in addition to the entry fee.

Scott v. Bingham Township Board.—Mandamus. Writ refused with costs against relator. PER CURIAM.

The costs and expenses of one who proceeds by information on his own account, and not by direction of the township, to establish his right to the office of supervisor, are a personal debt, and the township is under no legal liability to defray them or reimburse him with the amount.

Ligare v. Semple et al.—Appeal from Delta. Reversed, and new decree entered in the Supreme Court with costs of both courts to complainant; case remanded for farther proceedings. Opinion by GRAVES, C. J.

Where a wife is non-resident when her husband makes an absolute conveyance, divesting himself entirely of his seizin and estate, she has no right of dower left.

In a foreclosure suit, the right of dower of a third person cannot be litigated, nor the woman made a party.

Thayer v. Arnold.

Appeal from Washtenaw. Opinion by GRAVES, C. J. Affirmed with costs.

The omission of claimants of land to put into a case an instrument which tended to qualify the estate they claimed, and which the other side ought properly to have produced and had construed, was not held as helping to estop them from urging their claim to the lands.

Where one conveyed land in trust, and the trustees, with his knowledge, and by virtue of the stipulations of the trust to which certain events had given effect, deeded to a third person, and the first owner thereon relinquished possession upon being required to, and never reclaimed it, but disposed of his property as if he did not consider this land as belonging to him, his title was regarded as extinguished.

Kidder v. Merryhew.—Case made from Kent. Reversed and judgment entered for defendants with costs of all courts. Opinion per curiam.

Where a replevin suit is abated in consequence of the removal of the magistrate before whom it was begun, the plaintiff ought not to be held responsible on the replevin bonds.

LIABILITY OF A STOCKHOLDER ON A CONDITIONAL SUBSCRIPTION—DISPOSITION OF A BILL OF LADING AFTER ACCEPTANCE OF A DRAFT.

No. 482. Upton v. Trebilcock. Error to the Circuit Court of Iowa. This was an action by the assignee in bankruptcy to recover an unpaid subscription by the plaintiff in error to the stock of the insolvent Great Western Insurance Company, to which the defense was that the subscription had been obtained by the fraudulent representations of the agent of the company to the effect that eighty per cent. of the amount not paid in was non-assessable and would be paid by the profits, etc. It was also alleged as a defense that the agent represented that the note given for the twenty per cent. paid would not be parted with by the company, but would be leniently held, to suit the convenience of the subscriber, and that afterward the note was transferred to a bank for collection, and that thereupon the subscriber had repudiated the subscription, and asked to have the contract rescinded.

The court holds that the defense will not avail to relieve the subscriber from his contract; that he became a stockholder under a certificate entitling him to the shares of stock named therein, and that the words "not assessable," stamped across the face of the certificate did not import more at most than that he would not be liable to assessment after he had paid the full amount of the subscription, and could not in any event destroy the contract. It was said in this connection that the idea that the capital of a corporation is to be treated like a football, to be thrown into the market for purposes of speculation, that its value may be elevated or depressed to advance the interest of its managers, is a modern and wicked invention which will not be tolerated by the courts. Upon the question of the alleged recession of the contract in consequence of the violation of the agreement as to the note, it is held that it was not before the jury; that the only question of fraud submitted was that in reference to the eighty per cent. of unpaid subscription, and that could not avail by reason of the want of diligence in the subscriber in not ascertaining his liability respecting it under the regulations of the company, until it was demanded. Reversed. HUNT. J., delivered the opinion; dessenting, MILLER, J., with whom concurred the Chief Justice and BRADLEY, J.

BILL OF LADING—TIME DRAFT—AGENT—INSTRUCTIONS.

No. 15. National Bank of Commerce of Boston v. The Merchants Bank of Memphis.—Error to the Circuit Court for Massachusetts. This case presents the question whether a bill of lading of merchandise, made deliverable to order, when attached to a time draft and forwarded with the draft to an agent for collection, without any special instructions, may be surrendered to the drawee upon his acceptance of the draft, or whether the agent's duty is to hold the bill of lading after the acceptance, for the payment of the draft, and the court hold that the agent can be held liable to the owners of the draft for a breach of duty in surrendering the bills of lading on acceptance of the draft only, after special instructions to retain the bills until payment of the acceptances. Justice STRONG delivered the opinion.

JUSTIN BUTTERFIELD'S DEFENSE OF JOE SMITH.—Hon. E. M. HAINES is publishing a series of original anecdotes of the members of the bar of the early day in this State in his LEGAL ADVISER. We take the following from the November number:

In 1842, Gov. Carlin, of Illinois, caused a warrant to be issued for the arrest of the Mormon prophet, Joseph Smith, as a fugitive from justice from Missouri, where he had been indicted for a capital offense; but the arrest was delayed until the following winter of 1843, when the Mormons insisted on having the question involved legally tested in the Federal court, upon which Joe Smith surrendered himself, as a prisoner, to the sheriff of Sangamon county, who held the warrant for his arrest. A writ of habeas corpus was obtained from Judge Pope, of the United States court at Springfield. Smith had made great preparation for his defense, and had employed Justin Butterfield, of Chicago, then conceded one of the ablest lawyers in the northwest. The court-room was crowded with spectators, which included a large number of ladies, who were accorded seats upon the platform upon either side of Judge Pope. The career of Smith had excited great attention among the people, especially in Illinois and Missouri; consequently the present occasion, which was to decide the fate of the Mormon prophet, was looked to with intense interest. Mr. Butterfield, fully appreciating the importance of the case, and the necessity of maintaining his reputation as a lawyer, which had been rapidly established, had made a thorough preparation of the case. He was a man of powerful logic, and seldom indulged in illustrations or allusions not of the most serious and weighty import. His manner was of the Websterian style. When he arose to address the court, all eyes were upon him, and as he involuntarily, for a moment, surveyed the assemblage, he was forcibly struck with the peculiarity of the circumstances, which instantly flashed over his vision, and, without the least thought in advance of such an illustration, he proceeded: "May it please your honor: I appear in the presence of the Pope, surrounded by angels, to defend the prophet of the Lord." There was something in the suggestion so ludicrous, and yet so apt, that it secured for Mr. Butterfield a most attentive listening to his powerful argument which followed. Joseph Smith was discharged, and all seemed pleased with the result.

INDORSEMENT AND PAYMENT OF DRAFTS.

Secretary New has issued the following instructions: Treasury or Post Office drafts must not be paid until the indorsements conform to the following regulations:

1. The name of the payee, as indorsed, must correspond in spelling with that on the face of the draft; no gaurantee of an indorsement, imperfect in itself, can be accepted. If the name of a payee as written on the face of a draft is spelled incorrectly, the draft should be returned to the Treasurer of the United States for correction.

2. Indorsements by mark (✕) must be certified by two witnesses.

3. Indorsements by executors or administrators must be accompanied by certified copies, under seal, of letters testamentary or letters of administration, as the case may be.

4. Payees and indorsees must indorse by their own hands: officials, officially with full title; firms, the usual signature by a member of the firm, not by a clerk or other person for the firm.

5. Every indorsement must be by the proper written (not printed) signature of the person whose indorsement is required.

6. Powers of attorney for the indorsement of drafts in payment of claims must be dated subsequently to the drafts, must be witnessed by two persons, and must be acknowledged by the constituent before the Treasurer of the United States or an Assistant Treasurer; a judge or clerk of a District Court of the United States; a collector of customs; a notary public, under his seal, or a justice of the peace or commissioner of deeds, if before either of the two latter, the certificate and seal of the county clerk as to the official character and signature of the justice or commissioner is required. If executed in a foreign country, the acknowledgment must be made before a notary public, with his seal attached, or a United States consul or Minister. The official taking the acknowledgment must certify that the said letter of attorney was read and fully explained to the said constituent at the time of acknowledgment.—(See section 3477, Revised Statutes.)

7. Evidence of authority to indorse for incorporated or unincorporated companies must accompany drawn drafts or indorsed to the order of such companies or associations. Such evidence should be in the form of an extract from the by-laws or records of the company or association, showing the authority of the officer to indorse, receive moneys, etc., for the company, and giving his name and the date of his election or appointment, which extract should be certified to by the secretary or president of the company, and its seal be affixed. If the company has no seal, the extract should be certified as correct by a notary public, or other competent officer, under his seal.

Bk. of Columbus v. Gurlinghouse, 22 Ohio St. Rep., 492; Wiley v. Starbuck, 44 Black's Rep., 198. In all these cases views were expressed in conflict with those maintained in the First Nat. Bk. of Whitehall v. Lamb et al., 50 New York Rep., 100. This adjudication controlled the result of the litigation between these parties.

Upon reason and authority we have no hesitation in coming to the conclusion that there is error in the case before us.

The plaintiff below was entitled to recover the principal of the note sued upon, less the amount of the interest unlawfully reserved. Whether he was entitled to recover interest upon the amount of the principal so reduced, after the maturity of the note is a point which has not been argued, and upon which we express no opinion.

The judgment of the court of appeals is reversed, and the case will be remanded with directions to proceed in conformity with this opinion.

SUPREME COURT OF INDIANA.

MARION, C. C. C.

KEPPE v. KLINGENSMITH et al.

ATTORNEY—ILLEGALLY RETAINING MONEY—DISBURSING.

DOWNEY, J.

This is a continuance of the case between the same parties in 41 Ind., 341. On return of the case to the Circuit Court an amended complaint was filed, to which Klingensmith filed a demurrer, which was sustained, and this ruling is the alleged error.

The object of this action is not to recover a judgment against Klingensmith, or Burns & Klingensmith, for the money collected by them as attorneys. That judgment was rendered before the first appeal in this case. From so much of the judgment in the first case (41 Ind., 341.) as suspended Klingensmith from practicing law, was appealed, and that portion was reversed on the ground that he should not be suspended for the illegal appropriation of the money by his partner. The object of this complaint is to compel Klingensmith to account for the sums collected due him and his partner as attorneys, and which, by agreement, he was to appropriate to payment of plaintiff's claim, and to disbar Klingensmith, etc.

The court is of opinion that the facts in the amended complaint, now before it, does not warrant the suspension of Klingensmith from practice. The money collected by him on the claims due to the firm is not the money of their client. (See 2, G. & H., 329, section 778 req.) If there is any remedy against Klingensmith on account of the claims alleged to have been left in his hands for collection, it must be sought in another form. Affirmed.—Indianapolis Sentinel.

The Canada Law Journal for August says: "This is the season humorously called the 'long vacation.' A few officials of the courts, a few counsel whose life is untroubled by solicitors' labors, a fortunate judge or two, may enjoy a 'long vacation'; but to the majority of the profession the term is a cruel mockery. With appeal courts, election courts, and the incessant treadmill of solicitors' practice, the long vacation, in which we should be laying in stores of health and vigor for the struggle of the rest of the year, is sadly shorn of its proportion. Those on whose shoulders the editing of a legal journal falls are touching objects of sympathy. To think of a 'subject,' to examine it when discovered, to ponder over it, to write about it with the thermometer at its present altitude, is 'utter weariness and sore distress.' If it were justifiable to introduce into these columns dissertations on matters which at this season have some sort of interest for readers, we should feel more hopeful. No doubt picnics, boating parties, and tours by land and water, are the origin of petitions which are often summarily dismissed, of appeals, of rehearings, of reversals of judgment, of contracts leading sometimes to partnership and sometimes to breach of trust; but these matters are of too delicate a nature to admit of treatment in a purely legal tone. On the whole, we must satisfy ourselves with the reflection that people are as unwiling to read in this weather as we are to write."

UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT.

No. 28.—OCTOBER TERM, 1875.

JOHN D. MCLEMORE, plaintiff in error, v. THE LOUISIANA STATE BANK.

In error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Louisiana.

WAR OF THE REBELLION—BANK—LIABILITY OF FOR PLEDGE WHEN BANK PUT IN MILITARY LIQUIDATION—BANK NOT LIABLE FOR LOSS OCCASIONED IN CONSEQUENCE OF MILITARY ORDER.

Mr. Justice DAVIS delivered the opinion of the Court.

It is unnecessary to consider whether in all respects the charge of the Circuit Court to the jury was correct, because the record shows the case of the plaintiff to be so fatally defective, that the judgment below would not be reversed for instructions, however erroneous. (Brobst v. Brock, 10 Wallace, 519; Decatur Bank v. St. Louis Bank. 21 Wallace, 301.) The case is this: The plaintiff was the owner of certain promissory notes and acceptances, in possession of the commercial firm in New Orleans of which he was a member, which were pledged by the firm, in 1861 and 1862, to the bank, as security for money loaned to them. This paper was not met at maturity, and with the collaterals pledged for its repayment remained in possession of the bank until the 11th June, 1863, when the bank was put in liquidation by order of Major General Banks, and its effects transferred to military commissioners, appointed to close it up. The officers of the bank, while submitting to this order, because they had no power to resist it, deemed it unjust and oppressive, and entered a protest against it, on their minutes. During the administration of the affairs of the bank by these commissioners, the pledged paper was sold for less than its face. In January, 1866, the military liquidation ceased, by order of Major General Canby, and the effects of the bank which were unadministered were restored to the corporators. The plaintiff, on the theory that the securities were parted with illegally, seeks to make the bank responsible for the proceedings of the commissioners, but this he cannot do. Certainly no act was done, or omitted to be done by the bank, inconsistent with its duty, for it was only bound to take that care of the pledge which a careful man bestows on his own property.

It is true it was the duty of bank to return the pledge, or show a good reason why it could not be returned. This it has done by proof, that without any fault on its part, and against its protest, the pledge was taken from it by superior force, and where this is the case, the common law as well as the civil law holds that the duty of the pledgee is discharged. (2 Kent, 579; Story on Bailments, section 339; Commercial Bank v. Martin, 1 Annual, 344.) That the proceedings of General Banks and the liquidators appointed by him constituted "superior force," which no prudent administrator of the affairs of a corporation could either resist or prevent, is too plain for controversy. It was in the midst of war that the order was made, and with an army at hand to enforce it, there was nothing left but submission under protest. Any other course of action, under the circumstances, instead of benefiting, would have injured every one who had dealings with the bank. It has turned out that the plaintiff has suffered injury, but not through the fault of the officers of the bank, for they retained the notes and bills long after the paper for which they were given as security had matured, and until they were dispossessed of them by military force. Under such circumstances they have discharged every duty which they owed to the plaintiff, and if loss has been occasioned in consequence of the military order in question the bank is not responsible for it.

The judgment is affirmed.

U. S. DIST. COURT, D. OF INDIANA.

OPINION NOV. 4, 1875.

UNITED STATES v. DISTILLERY NO. 28, AND OTHER PROPERTY.

DISTILLERIES MAY BE COMPELLED TO BRING THEIR BOOKS INTO COURT.

1. ACT OF JUNE, 1874.—That the act of June 24, 1874, does not apply exclusively to cases arising under the custom revenue laws, but applies as well to cases arising under the internal revenue laws.

2. DESCRIPTION OF BOOKS.—That the books and papers ordered to be produced are described with sufficient particularity.

3. CONSTITUTIONALITY OF ACT.—That the fifth section of the act of June 22, 1874, is constitutional, and does not violate articles 4, 5 and 7 of the amendments to the Constitution.

4. PROCEEDING AGAINST DISTILLERY.—That this is a proceeding against the distillery and not against the claimants; that any statements made by them as witnesses in the proceeding against the distillery could not be used against them in any subsequent criminal prosecution.

5. PRODUCTION OF BOOKS.—That the court had the power to make the order requiring the production of the books and papers, and to enforce it.

6. JURY TRIAL.—That when the issues are made up, the claimants will have the constitutional right to demand a jury trial.

7. THE PENALTY.—That the penalty for not complying with the order is that the allegations in the motion shall be taken as confessed.

8. EX POST FACTO LAW.—The court considers the objection that the act of 1874 is an ex post facto law.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

Opinion by GRESHAM, J.

Informations were filed in two cases under the internal revenue laws against Distillery No. 28, and certain rectifying houses and other property.

Gordon B. and John W. Bingham intervened as claimants, and the causes were consolidated.

Subsequently, upon the written motion of the district attorney, under the 5th section of the act of June 22d, 1874, an order was entered against the claimants to produce in court certain business books and papers relating to their business as distillers, rectifiers and wholesale liquor dealers, on a day and hour certain, subject to the examination of the district attorney, under the direction of the court. On the day named claimants appear by counsel, and moved that this order be vacated for the following reasons:

First. That the act of June 22d, 1874, applies exclusively to cases arising under the custom revenue laws, and not at all to proceedings under the internal revenue laws.

Second. That the books and papers ordered to be produced are not described with sufficient particularity.

Third. That the fifth section of the act of June 22, 1874, is unconstitutional in this, that it violates articles 4, 5 and 7 of the amendments to the Constitution.

The section under which the order was entered against the claimants reads as follows: "That in all suits and proceedings other than criminal, arising under any of the revenue laws of the United States, the attorney representing the government, whenever in his belief any business book, invoice or paper belonging to or under the control of the defendant or claimant will tend to prove any allegation made by the United States, may make a written motion particularly describing such book, invoice, or paper, and setting forth the allegation which he expects to prove; and thereupon the court in which suit or proceeding is pending may, at its discretion, issue a notice to the defendant or claimant to produce such book, invoice or paper in court, at a day and hour to be specified in said notice, which, together with a copy of said motion, shall be served formally on the defendant or claimant by the United States Marshal by delivering to him a certified copy thereof, or otherwise serving the same as original notices of suit in the same court are served; and if the defendant or claimant shall fail or refuse to produce such book, invoice, or paper in obedience to such notice, the allegations stated in said motion shall be taken as confessed unless his failure or refusal to produce the same shall be explained to the satisfaction of the court. And if produced, the said attorney shall be permitted, under the direction of the court, to make examination (at which examination the defendant or claimant, or his agent, may be present) of such entries in said book, invoice or papers as relate to or tend to prove the allegation aforesaid, and may offer the same in evidence on behalf of the United States. But the owner of said books and papers, his agent or attorney, shall have, subject to the order of the court, the custody of them, except pending their examination in court as aforesaid."

Language more general could hardly have been employed. It provides for the production of books, papers, etc., "in all suits and proceedings other than criminal, arising under any of the revenue laws of the United States."

It is true the act entitled "An act to amend the customs-revenue laws and to repeal moieties," and that, with the exception of the fifth section, its provisions relate solely to the customs-revenue. But it also appears that the provisions of former acts repealed by the act of 1874 also related exclusively to customs-revenue. Why, then, did not Congress expressly limit the operation of this act providing for the production of business books and papers to cases arising under the customs-revenue laws, as it did the provisions of the several acts referred to in this act and repealed by it? Clearly for the reason that in all suits, other than criminal, arising under any of the revenue laws of the United States, Congress designed that the court might require the production of any business book and paper belonging to or under the control of the defendant or claimaint.

Besides, it is seldom that the title of an act of Congress is resorted to as an aid in its construction. The title neither extends nor restrains any positive provisions contained in the body of the act. It is well known that Congress often embodies in a single act incongruous provisions, having no reference to the matters specified in the title. Haddon v. Collector, etc., 5 Wall., 107.

The second objection made to producing the business books, papers, etc., is that the same were not described with sufficient particularity.

The act must receive a reasonable construction. Such a degree of particularity as was insisted upon by counsel for claimants would render the fifth section practically nugatory. The district attorney cannot be required in his motion to describe the business books as journal A or B, or ledger A or B, for he may not know what particular books the claimants have.

The description of the books and papers in the written motion and the order of the court is, substantially: certain day-books, journals, cash-books, ledgers, blotter-books, blotters, invoices, dray-tickets, etc., kept, received, and taken by the claimants in their business as distillers, rectifiers, and wholesale liquor dealers, between certain dates named and since the 22d day of June, 1874, showing the amount of spirits produced, received, removed, and sold by them during the time named. The claimants were sufficiently advised by this description what books and papers were meant. No greater certainty of description was required to satisfy the statute. U. S. v. 3 Tons of Coal, 21 Int. R. R., 215. Myer v. Becker, 21 Int. R. R, 244.

In considering the constitutionality of the fifth section of the act of June 22, 1874, it is necessary to determine the real character of the case at bar.

The charges made in the libel are against the property, and not against the claimants. It is the distillery and other property proceeded against that are treated as the offenders. The claimants, strictly speaking, are not parties to the proceeding. They are here of their own motion, and not on the process of the court. The judgment must be for or against the property libeled, not for or against the claimants. A forfeiture of the property does not convict the claimants. This proceeding is entirely independent of any criminal prosecutions which have been commenced, or which may hereafter be commenced, against them. The books and papers, which may or may not, when produced, inculpate the property, can only be used in evidence in this action. After being thus used they go back into the possession of the claimants.

The question, therefore, of compelling a person to accuse himself or to testify against himself, in a criminal case is not before the court. Even if the act of 1874 were not in existence, the claimants might be compelled by a subpœna duces tecum to bring in the books and papers called for in the order of the court: and I can see no reason why they might not also be compelled to testify concerning all the allegations of the libel. Any statements thus made by them as witnesses in the proceeding against the distillery and other property could not be used against them in any subsequent criminal prosecution.

The act of February 25, 1868, (sec. 868, R. S.) provides that "no discovery or evidence obtained from the party, or witness, by reason of a judicial proceeding * * * shall be given in evidence, or in any manner used against him, or his property or estate, in any court of the United States, in any criminal proceeding, or for the enforcement of any penalty or forfeiture."

It was said in argument that under this statute the books and papers, even if produced, could not be used in evidence on the trial of this cause.

The act of 1874 expressly provides that the books and papers may be thus used in evidence. This is the last expression of the legislative will. So far as the two acts are inconsistent or repugnant, the act of 1868 is repealed. The claimants are not justified by Article V. of the amendments to the constitution in refusing to produce their books and papers to be used in evidence. U. S. v. Parker Mason, 21 Int. R. R., 215; U. S. v. 3 Tons of Coal, supra.

The claimants next attempted to shelter themselves under that provision in Article IV. of the amendments to the Constitution which secures the people in their persons, papers and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures.

Congress is empowered by the Constitution "to levy and collect taxes, imports and excises," provided the laws are uniform to their operation. The mode and manner of exercising this power is left to the discretion of Congress. Under the exercise of that power Congress has provided the internal revenue system. By that system the government raises the principal portion of its revenue. The tax on the production and sale of spirits exceeds all other sources of revenue. The government has, therefore, practically assumed control of the manufacture and sale of spirits. It has adopted regulations for the government of distillers, rectifiers, and wholesale dealers, with fines, penalties, and forfeitures for their violation. They are required to keep books in which they are to enter daily all their business transactions with the utmost particularity. These books are at all times open to the inspection of the proper revenue officers, and are popularly known as government books. If properly kept, they will show the exact amount of spirits produced, received, and removed on any given day. If so kept, they will correspond with their business books, and this correspondence ought to exist. No one can engage in the manufacture and sale of spirits without the consent of the government. That consent is obtained on certain terms and conditions. No one can be allowed to say, that as a distiller, rectifier, or wholesale liquor dealer, he has kept a private record of his transactions. His books and entries are quasi public books and entries. The government has a right to see any record kept by him of his business. This right has been exercised by the government since its organization. The first and subsequent Congresses have enacted such laws. It is too late to question the validity of such statutes. Experience has shown that without severe and even inquisitorial regulations the government can not successfully collect the tax levied upon the production and sale of spirits, and the necessities of the government justify the existence and rigid enforcement of such regulations.

The order of the court complained of by the claimants authorizes neither search nor seizure. It calls on the claimants to produce certain books and papers relating to their business as distillers, rectifiers and wholesale liquor dealers. If their business books and papers are not produced, the allegations of the libel are taken as confessed.

The claimants were equally unsuccessful in invoking the protection of article 7 of the amendments to the Constitution. That article provides that "in suits at common law, when the value in controversy shall exceed twenty dollars, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved." And it has been settled that a proceeding in rem under the internal revenue laws is a suit at common law within the meaning of that article. The Sarah, 8 Wheat., 391.

It is clear, then, that when the issues in this proceeding are made, and the case is ready for trial, the claimants will have a constitutional right to demand a jury.

But they must first submit to, and comply with, all reasonable and proper rules and orders of the court entered against them in making up the issues and preparing the case for final trial.

As already stated, the books and records kept by the claimants are quasi public records. If their government books were kept as the law required them to be kept, their business books will make the same showing as the government books. And if this correspondence exists, the production of their business books and papers will not harm the claimants. If their government books were not so kept, and their business books and papers contain evidence which will tend to prove the allegations in the libel, there is justice in the demand of the government for their production.

The act of 1874 authorized the court to make the order in controversy. That act, and others of the same nature, have not only been held constitutional, but reasonable and proper, in view of the object sought to be accomplished. The statute authorizing the order for the production of the books and papers also fixes the penalty for disobedience of that order—the allegations in the motion shall be taken as confessed.

If Congress had not seen proper to prescribe the penalty or punishment for disobedience of the order, it can hardly be doubted that the courts, in the exercise of a sound discretion, would have been authorized to enforce compliance either by fine or imprisonment, or both. In this case the statute has fixed the penalty, and the court can inflict no other. If the claimants refuse to comply with the order of the court, they are in contempt of its authority. That question is not triable by a jury. The contempt can be purged only by a compliance with the court's order. The constitutional right of the claimants to a trial by jury will not shield them from punishment for disobedience of the order of the court.

Whenever in the progress of a proceeding a party acts contumaciously by disobeying a lawful order entered against him, that proceeding, so far as he can claim any advantage under it, is at once arrested, and goes no further until the contempt is purged.

Where the United States courts are not limited by statute, their power to enforce obedience to their orders by punishing for contempt is discretionary.

The object to be accomplished by the exercise of this power may be punitive in its character, or it may be at once punitive and remedial, according to the given case.

In the case of Texas v. White, in the Supreme Court of the United States, not yet reported, Justice Miller used this language:

"The exercise of this power has a two-fold aspect, namely: First, the proper punishment of the guilty party for his disrespect of the authority of the court, or its order; and second, to compel his performance of some act or duty required of him by the court, which he refuses to perform. Stimpson v. Putnam, 41 Vt., 238. In the former case the court must judge for itself the nature and extent of the punishment with reference to the gravity of the offense. In the latter case the party refusing to obey should be fined and imprisoned until he performs the act required of him or shows that it is not in his power to do it."

Also see Bishop's Cr. Law, sections 232 to 259 inclusive, 3d ed.

The first ten articles of the amendments to the Constitution were proposed by the first Congress of the United States at its first session on the 25th day of September, 1789. At the same session, and about the same time, the act commonly called the Judiciary Act was passed. Section 15 of that act (sec. 724, R. S., 137) is as follows:

"That all the said courts of the United States shall have power, in the trial of actions at law, on motion and due notice thereof being given, to require the parties to produce books or writings in their possession or power, which contain evidence pertinent to the issue, in cases and under circumstances where they might be compelled to produce the same by the ordinary rules of proceeding in chancery; and if a plaintiff shall fail to comply with such order, to produce books or writings, it shall be lawful for the courts respectively, on motion, to give the like judgment for the defendant as in cases of non suit; and if a defendant shall fail to comply with such order to produce books or writings, it shall be lawful for the courts respectively, on motion as aforesaid, to give judgment against him or her by default."

In the case of the U. S. v. 28 Packages Pins, Gilp. R., 306, it was held that this statute did not apply to proceedings in rem. The contrary, however, was held by Judge Treat of the Eastern District of Missouri, in the case of the U. S. v. 469 Barrels of Spirits, 10 Int. R. R., 205, in which ruling he says he is supported by the circuit judge in a well-considered opinion. This section of the judiciary act is important as a legislative construction of the seventh article of the amendments to the Constitution. The very act organizing the Federal courts is contemporaneous with the articles of the amendments to the Constitution, whose protection was relied on by the counsel for the claimants with such seeming confidence. The act is still in force. It authorizes the courts to order the production of the books and writings of a party, and to enforce such order by summary judgment against the party failing or refusing it. The motion in the case at bar was made under the act of 1874, and not under that of 1789; but the argument by which the former statute is sustained necessarily establishes the validity of the latter. The further point was made by counsel for the claimaints that the fifth section of the act of June 22, 1874, was ex post facto, and, therefore, null and void. In support of that position the case of the U. S. v. Hughes, 2 N. S. Am. L. T. R., 300, was cited.

That was a case pending before the passage of the act of 1874. It was a suit to recover penalties for an alleged violation of the revenue laws, committed prior to the enactment of the law of 1874. The motion in the case involved the production of books and papers of the defendants used and kept by him prior to the act of 1874. Judge Blatchford held that, as applied to that case the act of 1874 was ex post facto, in that it altered the legal rules of evidence which applied prior thereto and at the time of the alleged violation. This case is expressly limited to the books, papers, etc., of the claimants relating to their business since the act of June 22, 1874. Whether or not a statute is ex post facto depends upon the facts of the particular case.

The court has been aided in the consideration of these questions by the labors of the counsel upon both sides, and especially by those of Mr. Holstein, the assistant district attorney.

The motion of counsel for claimants is overruled, and the order of the court requiring the production of the business books, papers, etc., will stand.

THROUGH the kindness of R. W. TOWNSHEND, of the Shawneetown bar, we have received the following opinion:

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

OPINION FILED OCT. 14, 1875.

H. G. MASON et al. v. CITY OF SHAWNEETOWN.

POWER OF CITY TO ISSUE BONDS—CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISION—VOTE OF PEOPLE.

1. POWER TO ISSUE BONDS—CONSTITUTION OF 1870.—Held, That the ordinance of the city of Shawneetown submitting the question whether $50,000 of bonds of the city should be issued for the purpose of constructing a levee was a law within the meaning of the Constitution, and that the bonds which were subsequently issued and sold were issued in compliance with a vote of the people of the municipality in pursuance of law providing therefor.

2. MEANING OF "IN PURSUANCE OF ANY LAW."—The court construes the provision of the Constitution authorizing bonds to be issued in compliance with a vote, etc., "in pursuance of any law," and holds that when an incorporated town or city has been invested with power to pass an ordinance by the legislature for the government of the municipality, an ordinance enacted by the legislative branch of the corporation in pursuance of the act creating the corporation, has the same force and effect of a law passed by the legislature, and can not be regarded otherwise than a law of and within the incorporation.

3. EXERCISE OF POWER.—The court states the proper manner of exercising the power.

4. INJUNCTION—DAMAGES.—The court committed no error in assessing the damages on the dissolution of the injunction.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

Opinion by CRAIG, J.

This was a bill in equity brought by Hezekiah G. Mason and Willard Mason in the Circuit Court of Gallatin county against the City of Shawneetown and others, to enjoin the city and its officers from levying and collecting any taxes for the payment of either interest on or principal of certain levee bonds issued by the city of Shawneetown.

The venue of the cause was changed to Saline county, where a hearing was had upon bill, answer, replications and proofs, and a decree was entered dissolving the injunction and dismissing the bill, to reverse which the complainants bring the record here by appeal.

In the act incorporating the city of Shawneetown, Private Laws of 1861, page 272, sec. 2 of Article 9, declares:

§ 2. It shall be the duty of the city council as soon as practicable after the passage and adoption of this act to proceed and make arrangements for the construction of a levee that will so far surround the city, of a sufficient height and breadth, as to entirely prevent the future inundation or overflow of said city, or any part of it, from the waters of the Ohio or Wabash rivers; and they are hereby authorized and empowered to borrow money, at not exceeding one per cent. a month interest, and to pledge the revenue of the city, together with the revenue and taxes mentioned in the first section of this article, for the payment of said money and interest thereon, and they shall issue bonds to secure the payment of said money, with full specifications, signed by the mayor and attested by the city clerk under the seal of the said city.

Section 3 authorizes the city council to make contracts for the construction of the levee, to appoint a surveyor to lay off the grounds upon which the levee shall be constructed, and authorizes such repairs and alterations to be made as shall be deemed proper.

Section 2 of Article 6 gives the city power to borrow money and pledge the revenue of the city for the payment thereof, provided that no sum or sums of money shall be borrowed at a greater interest than ten per cent. per annum for ordinary purposes.

Sec. 19, Article 10, provides that no money shall ever be borrowed by the city council unless the ordinance therefor shall first be submitted and voted for by a majority of the voters voting at an election for that purpose, except for constructing or repairing a levee.

Section 22 of Article 6 declares: The city council shall have power to make all ordinances which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the powers specified in the act, so that such ordinances be not repugnant to nor inconsistent with the Constitution of the United States or of this State.

In pursuance of a petition presented, of the property holders of the city of Shawneetown at the regular May meeting, 1870, of the city council, an ordinance was enacted as follows:

Be it ordered by the city council of Shawneetown, That at the city election to be held on the 6th day of June, 1870, there shall be submitted to the legal voters of the city, the following proposition: Shall the city of Shawneetown issue bonds to an amount not exceeding fifty thousand dollars to be due and payable in twenty years, reserving the right to the city to pay the same at any time after five years, with interest payable semi-annually at the rate of not more than ten per cent, to be applied solely to the construction of a levee that will surround the city, of a sufficient height and breadth to entirely protect the city from further inundation and overflow at all times; the work on said levee to be given to the lowest responsible bidder for the same, after ample publication of the time and place of letting the contract. All legal voters of the city voting on this proposition shall deposit a ballot on which shall be written or printed "for levee," or "against levee."

Under this law of the city an election was held, which resulted in favor of the proposition by a large majority of the legal voters of the city.

In pursuance of the vote of the people of the city, and under the authority of the charter, the city, in March and April, 1872, issued and sold fifty of its bonds, known as levee bonds, of the denomination of $1,000 each.

It was also shown on the trial of the cause, that on the 1st day of January, 1872, the city delivered its bonds to the Saint Louis and Southeastern Railroad Co. to the amount of $25,000.

The assessed value of property in the city for State and county taxes for the year 1871 was $808,060.

It is insisted by appellants that in 1872 the city could not, under Article 19, Section 12 of the Constitution, become indebted for any purpose in any amount exceeding five per cent. of its taxable property as assessed for State and county taxes, and that all bonds issued in excess of $40,403 were void.

The section of the Constitution upon which appellants rely, declares: No county, city, township, school district or other municipal corporation, shall be allowed to become indebted in any manner or for any purpose, to an amount, including existing indebtedness, in the aggregate exceeding five per centum on the value of the taxable property therein, to be ascertained by the last assessment for State and county taxes, previous to the incurring of such indebtedness.

The section, however, contains a proviso which is as follows:

This section shall not be construed to prevent any county, city, township, school district, or other municipal corporation from issuing their bonds in compliance with any vote of the people which may have been had prior to the adoption of this Constitution, in pursuance of any law providing therefor.

The question to be determined is, whether the levee bonds were issued in compliance with a vote of the people of the municipal corporation in pursuance of a law providing therefor.

It will be observed that the provision of the Constitution which authorizes bonds to be issued in compliance with a vote, does not require that the vote shall be had solely under an act of the legislature of the State; the language used in the organic act is "in pursuance of any law."

When an incorporated town or city has been invested with power to pass an ordinance, by the legislature, for the government or welfare of the municipality, an ordinance enacted by the legislative branch of the corporation in pursuance of the act creating the corporation, has the same force and effect of a law passed by the legislature, and cannot be regarded otherwise than a law of and within the incorporation.

An ordinance is the law of the inhabitants of the municipality.

By Section 2 of Article 9 of the charter of the city, the city council was empowered to borrow money and issue bonds to secure the payment for the construction of the levee, but the charter is silent in regard to the manner in which the power given to the city to act in this particular shall be exercised; but by Sec. 22 of Article 6 to the city council is given power to make all ordinances necessary to carry out the various provisions of the charter.

While the charter nowhere directly requires a vote of the people to authorize an issue of bonds, yet, where the manner in which the power is to be exercised is left in the discretion of the city council with general power to act by and through ordinances, we are aware of no better or more judicious manner in which the city council could proceed to exercise the powers given them by the charter than to enact an ordinance submitting the question to a vote of the people of the incorporation for their adoption or rejection, neither the ordinance or the vote under it was in conflict with the charter of the city.

The city council did not assume to act under the authority given in the charter, without a vote of the people of the incorporation. The bonds issued show upon their face that they were issued in pursuance of a majority of the votes cast at an election legally held in the city pursuant to law on the 6th day of June, 1870.

We are therefore of opinion, that the ordinance adopted submitting the question, whether $50,000 of bonds of the city should be issued for the purpose of constructing a levee, was a law within the meaning of the Constitution, and that the bonds which were subsequently issued and sold were issued in compliance with a vote of the people of the municipality in pursuance of law providing therefor.

The court, in dissolving the injunction, assessed the damages sustained by the city at $200. In this we perceive no error. It appears from the testimony that the city employed Mr. Townshend, an attorney, to assist the city attorney in defending the suit. The evidence further shows that his services were worth from $200 to $500. The amount assessed by the court was reasonable.

If it be true, as insisted by appellants, that the attorney was personally interested in some of the bonds, that fact could not deprive the city of the right to be compensated in damages under the statute for the wrongful issue of the injunction by appellants.

The decree of the Circuit Court will be affirmed.

Affirmed.

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

OPINION FILED NOV. 4, 1875.

THE C. B. & Q. RAILROAD CO. v. THE PEOPLE.

EXTORTION AND UNJUST DISCRIMINATION IN THE RATES CHARGED FOR THE TRANSPORTATION OF PASSENGERS AND FREIGHT —THE CONSTITUTIONALITY OF THE R. R. LAW.

1. CHARGE OF THE OFFENSE.—The court discusses how the offense should be charged in the declaration.
2. REASONABLE RATES.—The court states how reasonable rates are to be ascertained under the law.
3. DISREGARD OF SCHEDULE RATES.—That a disregard of the schedule of rates to be prepared by the railroad and warehouse commissioners a necessary element of the offense against which the statute is directed, is the charging more than the maximum rates fixed by the said commissioners, which makes the company guilty of extortion under the statute within its true intent and meaning.
4. WHEN RATES NOT FIXED—OFFENSE.—The court cannot think that until this schedule of rates was made by the board of commissioners there would, under the statute, be incurred a liability for unreasonable and extortionate charges nor that when made that for taking the rate fixed by the schedules, or less rates than the statutory penalties would be incurred even though proof might be made that the rates so taken were just and reasonable rates.
5. THE DECLARATION DEFECTIVE.—That the declaration was defective in not averring that a schedule of rates had been established by the board of commissioners, and that the defendant had received compensation in excess of those rates.—[ED LEGAL NEWS.]

Opinion of the Court by SHELDON, J.

This was an action of debt brought to recover penalties under the act to prevent extortion and unjust discrimination in the rates charged for the transportation of passengers and freight on railroads in this State, etc., approved May 2, 1873. The suit was commenced May 21, 1874. The declaration contained twenty counts, the first nineteen of which are for extortion, and the twentieth one for unjust discrimination. The defendant pleaded three special pleas, to which a demurrer was sustained, and the defendant electing to abide by the pleas, the court, a jury being waived, heard the evidence and fixed the penalty for a violation of the statute at $1,000, and gave judgment therefor, from which defendant brings this appeal. It is urged that the court below erred in not carrying back the demurrer and sustaining it to the declaration. Appellant insists that the declaration is defective in not averring that a schedule of reasonable rates of charges for the transportation of passengers and freight had been established as provided for by the eighth section of the act, and that the defendant had demanded and received compensation in excess thereof. The statute provides in Sec. 1, that if any railroad corporation in this State shall charge, collect, demand, or receive more than a fair and reasonable rate of toll or compensation for the transportation of passengers or freight, etc., the same shall be deemed guilty of extortion, and upon conviction thereof shall be dealt with as thereinafter provided; and in Sec. 2, that if any such railroad corporation shall make any unjust discrimination in its rates or charges of toll or compensation for the transportation of passengers or freight, etc., the same shall be deemed guilty of having violated the provisions of the act, and, upon conviction, shall be treated as thereinafter provided.

Section 4 provides that any such railroad corporation guilty of extortion, or of making any unjust discrimination as to passenger or freight rates, etc., shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined in any sum not less than $1,000 nor more than $5,000 for the first offense, and for the second offense not less than $5,000 nor more than $10,000, and for the third offense not less than $10,000 nor more than $20,000, and for every subsequent offense and conviction thereof shall be liable to a fine of $25,000.

Sec. 8 directs the railroad and warehouse commissioners "to make for each of the railroad corporations doing business in this State, as soon as practicable, a schedule of reasonable maximum rates of charges for the transportation of passengers, and freights and cars, on each of said railroads; said schedules shall in all suits brought against any such railroad corporations, wherein is involved in any way the charges of any such corporation for the transportation of any passenger, or freight, or cars, or unjust discrimination in relation thereto, be deemed and taken in all courts of this State as prima facie evidence that the rates therein fixed are reasonable maximum rates of charges for the transportation of passengers, and freight, and cars, upon the railroads for which said schedules may have been respectively prepared. Said Commissioners shall from time to time, as often as circumstances may require, change and revise said schedules. When any schedule shall have been made or revised as aforesaid, it shall be the duty of said Commissioners to cause publication thereof to be made for three successive weeks in some public newspaper published in the city of Springfield, in this State; provided, that the schedules thus prepared shall not be taken as prima facie evidence as herein provided until schedules shall have been prepared and published as aforesaid, for all the railroad companies now organized under the laws of this State, and until the 15th day of January, A. D. 1874, or until ten days after the meeting of the next session of this General Assembly, provided a session of the General Assembly shall be held previous to the 15th day of January aforesaid," etc.

The charge of the offenses in the declaration is in general form the language in one of the counts, which in this respect is a fair specimen of all, being that the sum charged "exceeded a fair and reasonable rate of toll and compensation for the carriage of the goods in the sum of $1.91, and was then and there unjust, unfair, unreasonable, and extortionate, contrary to the form of the statute," etc. Looking merely at the first section of the statute, the declaration would seem to describe the statutory offense. That section by itself makes the offense to consist in taking more than a fair and reasonable rate of toll and compensation, without reference to any standard of what is fair and reasonable. In such case, it may be seen, different persons would have different opinions as to what is a fair and ressonable rate. Courts and juries, too, would differ, and at one time or place a defendant might be convicted and fined in a large amount for the same act, which in another place or at another time would be held to be no breach of the law, and what might be thought a fair and reasonable rate on one road might be considered otherwise upon another road. There would be no certainty of being able to comply with the law. A railroad corporation, with purpose of conforming to the law, might fix its rates at what it believed to be reasonable, and yet be subjected to the heavy penalties here prescribed. The statute furnishes evidence that it did not intend to leave the railroad companies in this state of uncertainty and danger, and exposed to such seeming injustice. We must look to the entire statute, and to every part and provision of it, to learn in what the offense is really made to consist. The eighth section provides how reasonable rates shall be ascertained, what they shall be; that the railroad and warehouse commissioners should make, for each of the railroad corporations in the State, a schedule of reasonable maximum rates, thus providing a uniform rule for the guidance of the railroad companies. When that is done there will be a standard of what is fair and reasonable, and the statute can be conformed to and obeyed. The careful provision made by statute for the publication in a public newspaper for a length of time of the schedules when made, and that until so published they should not be such prima facie evidence, indicates, as we may suppose, the legislative intention that the railroad companies should have fair notice of the schedule of rates, and so have the opportunity afforded to them of being able to conform thereto. The provision, too, that the schedule of rates is to be made for each of the railroad corporations in the State, is another indication in the same direction.

We are of opinion, from an examination of all the provisions of the statute taken together, that a disregard of the schedule of rates to be prepared by the railroad and warehouse commissioners, is a necessary element of the offense against which the statute is directed, that it is the charging more than the maximum rates fixed by said board of commissioners which makes the company guilty of extortion under the statute within its true intent and meaning. We cannot think that until this schedule of rates was made by the board of commissioners there would, under the statute, be incurred a liability for unreasonable and extortionate charges, nor that when made, that for taking the rates fixed by the schedule or less rates, that the statutory penaly would be incurred, even though proof might be made that the rates so taken were more than fair and reasonable rates; yet in such last case, according to the terms of the first section of the statute, and the interpretation put upon the act by appellee, there would have been a commission of the statutory offense, as there would have been the taking of more than fair and reasonable rates. The evident purpose was to regulate and fix, so far as the legislature might, the rates of railroad charges, and to punish the taking in excess of the fixed rates; and the form of the provision making the schedule of fixed rates prima facie evidence of what were reasonable maximum rates was doubtless to avoid the objection indicated in the opinion in the Chicago & Alton Railroad Company v. The People (67 Illinois, 13) to the legislature making any fixed rates conclusive of what was reasonable, and to follow what was inferable from that opinion that they should be made but prima facie evidence. It is true that the taking of higher rates than those fixed by the commissioners' schedule of rates is not the exact form of the statutory offense, and the taking of such higher rates might not subject to the penalties of the statute upon the making of proof that they were fair and reasonable. Still, as we view it, to constitute the offense really designed and intended by the statute, regarding it in its whole scope and purpose, the rates taken must have been in excess of the schedule rates. It was not enough then, we think, to bring the case fully within the provisions of the statute, that the rates charged were simply unreasonable and extortionate, but they should have been so according to the rule of reasonableness to be prescribed under the statute, and we are of opinion that the declaration in this respect was defective in not averring that a schedule of rates had been established by the board of commissioners, and that the defendant had received compensation in excess of those rates.

We think what has already been said sufficiently meets the position taken by appellee, that the statutory offense consists simply in receiving more than a fair and reasonable rate of compensation, and that the schedule of rates is but prima facie evidence of what is reasonable, and that it is not necessary for a party to plead evidence. In the view taken, the schedule of rates is something more than evidence, it is a fact upon which the action rests.

Under the constitutional provision the statute would go into effect July 1, 1873, and so from that date the first and fourth sections, prohibiting and imposing penalties for extortion, be in force; but the eighth section provided that the schedules of rates could not be used as prima facie evidence until the 15th day of January, 1874, and appellee's counsel make a point upon this as evidencing that the existence of the schedules of rates was not essential to the commission of the offense of extortion under the act. But we can view this as but an accidental incongruity in the respect named, not entitled to such serious regard as to be of controlling force in determining the true construction of the statute.

But it is insisted on the part of the appellee that there is at least one good count—the twentieth—that which declares unjust discrimination.

The charge in the count is that defendant made an unjust discrimination in its rates and charges of toll and compensation of freight from Quincy to Macomb in this, that defendant on the 11th (day) of April, 1874, transported for James T. Applegate and Samuel Dodd, from Quincy to Macomb, one car load of horses, commonly called ponies, a distance of 59 miles, charging therefor the sum of $28.34, being at the rate of 48 cents per mile; and that said defendant on the 30th of March, 1874, transported from Macomb to Chicago, a distance of 204 miles, for Robert Smithers and James Robinson, one car load of horses, charging therefor only the sum of $55.20, being at the rate of 27 cents per mile for the carriage of said car-load of horses, contrary to the form of the statute, etc.

The statute defines in section 3, in respect to unjust discrimination, as it provides in section 8, in respect to reasonable rates, what shall be deemed and taken as prima facie evidence of the unjust discrimination prohibited by the act. The language of the section in respect to freight is charging a greater amount of compensation for any distance than is at the same time charged for the transportation in the same direction of any passenger or like quantity of freight of the same class over a greater distance of the same railroad."

This count, we think, does not present a state of facts which shows a violation of the statute in that there is no averment as to the respective freight being of "like quantity of the same class," or that in respect of such freight that was a higher charge for a less than for a greater distance.

There is no averment whatever upon this head either in respect of numbers of the respective animals, or their weight or the size or class of the cars containing them, or otherwise.

The section itself recognized the fact of there being railroad cars of different classes and numbers, for in defining unjust discrimination in respect to cars, it provides that they be of the "same class or number."

The description of the respective freights merely as one car-load of ponies and one car-load of horses, does not in our view sufficiently show them to be like "quantities of freight of the same class."

The rules applicable to the enforcement of the penal statutes requires that it should be made clearly to appear, that the precise statutory offense has been committed.

Being of opinion that the demurrer should have been carried back and sustained to the declaration instead of to the pleas, the judgment will be reversed.

Judgment reversed.

WALKER, C. J., and SCHOLFIELD, J., dissenting.

We hold that the first, second and third sections of the act create complete offenses, independent of the eighth section. That the fourth section imposes penalties for their violation. That the eighth section only prescribes a rule of evidence on the trial for the recovery of the penalty.

Whether that section is valid and has changed the rule, does not, as we think, arise on the pleadings, and can only be presented for decision when the schedules provided for by it shall be offered in evidence,

We hold that the averments contained in the twentieth count show a violation of the second and third sections of the act, and that it is good. These sections define the offense of unjust discrimination, aad the averments show that the offense was committed.

The pleas fail to present a defense to the charge of unjust discrimination for the use of the cars; and the statute has declared that the facts stated in this count, prima facie, constitute an unjust discrimination, and the statute is warranted under the decision in the case of the Chicago and Alton Railroad Co. v. the People, 67 Ill., 11; where it was held that the General Assembly have the power to declare that the facts averred in this count should be held prima facie evidence of unjust discrimination, leaving the company to overcome the presumption.

In this case there was no evidence to rebut the presumption, but, on the contrary, the demurrer admits the facts and we think the judgment should be affirmed under the twentieth count in the declaration. But we refrain from the expression of any opinion as to what, if any, change of the rules of evidence has been made by the eighth section of the act, as that question does not arise on this record.

The want of time prevents us from presenting our views in a more extended form.

SCOTT and MCALLISTER, J.J., dissenting.

We concur in reversing the judgment in this cause, but dissent from the reasoning of the opinion of the majority of the court, especially so far as it may be said to assume the constitutionality of the act under discussion.

As the majority of the court have avoided any discussion of the real merits of the case, we do not deem it necessary to express our views at length.

We are indebted to D. S. PRIDE, of the Chicago bar, for the following opinion:

CIRCUIT COURT OF COOK CO., ILL.

OPINION Nov. 10, 1875.

ENOCH WOODS v. OBADIAH SANDS.

USE OF NAME AS TRADE-MARK MAY BE ASSIGNED.

1. A man who uses a name under which he does business has an exclusive right to the use of such name, and having obtained such exclusive right, other persons are not at liberty to interfere by "sailing under his flag" and thus deceive the people.

2. Having acquired such exclusive right to use such name, called in a general way a "trade-mark," he has the right to assign such word or trade-mark to another, and the law will protect the assignee in an exclusive right to use the same in carrying on the same business in the same building.

3. There may be some doubt, however, about such assignee having an exclusive right to carry on such business in a different place from that where the assignor conducted the same.

4 W. had obtained the exclusive right to the use of the name of "Wood's Hotel," assigned his lease of the hotel, together with furniture, good-will and name to C., and agreed not to engage in hotel business until 1879; shortly after said hotel was destroyed by fire. A few months after the fire, S. opened a hotel under the name of "Wood's Hotel," W. and C. not assenting, but objecting thereto. Afterwards C. becomes proprietor of the "Gault House," and W. purchased from C. a release of his agreement not to open a hotel, and immediately opens a hotel under the old name of "Wood's Hotel." On bill filed by W. to enjoin S. from using the name of "Wood's Hotel": Held, that there had been no abandonment by W. and C. of their right to said name or trade-mark, and the injunction was granted as prayed.

Opinion of the Court by FARWELL, C.J.

This was a case to enjoin Mr. Sands from keeping a hotel under the name of "Wood's Hotel," and there was a cross-bill by Sands to enjoin Wood from keeping a hotel by the name of "Wood's Hotel," which was kept by him some time ago.

After a careful examination of the law touching this question, and in view of the evidence given in this case, showing what the facts are, I am on the whole—not without some hesitation—but on the whole I am inclined, and so decide, that the complainant in the original bill is entitled to the relief which he prays for; that he is entitled to have Mr. Sands enjoined from keeping his hotel with this name.

In brief, the reasons for my conclusion are these: Wood, several years since, leased a building on the corner of State street and Hubbard Court, I think, which he first opened as a boarding house, but finally converted into a hotel, and which he kept for a number of years by that name, and for several years was known by that name, and became well known, and had a reasonable amount of custom-patronage. He renewed the lease he first had of five years, afterwards for five years more, which, if I recollect right, was to expire in 1879, and not a great while after this renewal, he transferred his lease,—his hotel, with a large part or all of his furniture and things pertaining to it, unto a man by the name of Cummings—the good will of the business, the use of his name; and agreed that he would not himself, during the remainder of the term of five years, the time for which this lease was to run, keep a hotel here, and the assignee took possession and kept a hotel under the same name and in the same way. A month or two afterwards, that is, in July, 1874, a fire came and burned off the entire concern—hotel, furniture and everything seems to have been all destroyed by the fire. The keeper of the hotel, the assignee of the lease, Mr. Cummings, seems pretty soon to have gone into a house called the "Gault House," on the west side, in some capacity, and that same season, early in the fall, I think, the testimony shows, or the same season, Sands, the defendant, opened a house on Washington street, belonging to a man by the name of Wood, and which they concluded, after some consultation, under the circumstances, to call "Wood's Hotel," the same name precisely that the other house was known by. They did call it so, and have continued to keep that house ever since by that name. The evidence shows that Cummings never assented to this, that Wood never assented to this use of his name by Sands. On the contrary, it appears that objections were made by one, or both of them, to this house being opened and kept by this name, they claiming still to have some interest in what that name belonged to, and manifested some intention to continue to carry on a hotel by that name, and some negotiations seem to have been made or talked between them with reference to consenting to have Sands carry on his house under that name, which consent, however, never was obtained. No new hotel seems to have been erected on the ground where the old hotel was burned down, or if so, these parties don't seem to have any interest in it, or at least never attempted to carry on a hotel again on that ground. In July of this year, Wood takes from Cummings a release of his claim under this agreement which had been made, leaving him no longer bound by any agreement not to keep a hotel, etc., and leaving him at liberty to keep a hotel himself with such name as he might choose, as far as he and Cummings were concerned. After obtaining that release or an agreement from Cummings, Wood then opens on Fifth Avenue a house having the same name which he formerly had used—that is, "Wood's Hotel," and he then files this bill asking that Sands may be enjoined from longer carrying on this business under this old name, "Wood's Hotel," which the complainant alleges belongs really to him.

Now, the law, as I understand it, is this, as applicable to a question of this kind: A man who uses a name under which he does business, which does not infringe upon the rights of anybody else, and which within the rules governing such subjects, it is well enough for him to use to designate his hotel, or other business which he carries on; has a right to the use of that name to the exclusion of others for the purpose of carrying on such business. He pre-occupies the ground; he gets a sort of exclusive right to the value of this name—if there is any value to it—by which custom is obtained and men are induced to do business with him; and where he has obtained such exclusive right, others are not at liberty to interfere by sailing under his flag or wearing his clothes in deceiving people, for that is the effect of the action. They are not at liberty to step in and by what amounts to false pretenses, although it may not be so intended by the party, obtain that which belongs to the man who has acquired this sort of proprietary right in the use of the name. Now, when Wood sold out to Cummings, Wood, as the evidence shows, had acquired this right. He had run a hotel that he named by his own name, called it by his own name, and he had a right to the exclusive use of that name as against any body that might attempt to use it afterwards here for this purpose. The law allows a party having any business of this kind, and having a name which is a sort of protection—which is called in a general way a trade-mark—he has a right to assign over, to transfer to others any rights which he may thus have, so that the other parties step in his shoes, provided there is nothing objectionable about it in the eye of the law. I think that, in this case, Mr. Wood had a right to transfer to Mr. Cummings the right to carry on that hotel for the remainder of the term, under the name which it had borne, "Wood's Hotel," and that Mr. Cummings, before the destruction of this hotel by fire, had a right to say that no one shall carry on the hotel as long as he is carrying this one on. No one else should carry on another one under the same name because it is liable to take away what belonged to him—custom. Whether Wood could transfer to Cummings the right to carry on any other hotel than this old hotel under the name of "Wood's Hotel," there may be some doubt because there comes in the question whether he had a right to do it so that the courts would protect him in the right, because there comes in a question whether the parties are at liberty to adopt a name which shall be a fraud on the public. If a man adopt the name of Irving House, Revere House, Sherman House, Pacific Hotel, or anything of that kind, that does not necessarily imply that Irving keeps it, or Sherman keeps, or anybody in particular keeps it; that it is any particular man's hotel; it is a mere name to a hotel. But when a man calls a hotel by his own name, I think he has a right to transfer to another man the right to keep that hotel under the same name, because it is not only known as the hotel of the man, but as a hotel having that name. It is not only a hotel kept by Wood, but it is Wood's Hotel; so that there would seem to be no impropriety in it so far; but whether a man who calls his hotel by his own name, calls it "Wood's Hotel," not The Wood's Hotel but "Wood's Hotel," has a right to transfer his interest so that his assignee could go off from that ground, go into another building and call his hotel "Wood's Hotel" or not, is another question. I have serious doubts about it. I have great doubts, whether a court would protect the party so that he should have the exclusive right to any such name, because my impression is, that that is a sort of fraud; that it is an attempt to have the public understand that this hotel is kept by a man that does not keep it, and no court will help that, or assist it rather. But in this case that was not attempted. No hotel was put up, at least, by Cummings to be kept by this name. The question then arises, What are Mr. Wood's rights, the original owner?

Now, if after the fire the defendant, Sands, had been told by these people that they should do nothing more, that he could do what he pleased, that would have been an abandonment. If they took a course which gave him a right to say, without doubt, they had abandoned it—if they had taken a course so distinctly and plainly that they would ever be estopped from saying that they had not abandoned it, then they would not have the right to talk about it afterwards, if Sands did appropriate this name. But I think it was not for Mr. Sands to jump in too quick in this matter. Men who are burned out must have time. Mr. Cummings was burned out, and the hotel and furniture and everything were destroyed, and he was left houseless, homeless, and without business, and he and Mr. Wood must have a reasonable time in which to decide what they can do, what they wish to do, what they will do. They are not to be hurried to conclusions at the peril of losing everything they have of value of this kind. They must have a reasonable time. It might be that the owner of the property would rebuild it and give them the lease again; it might be that some arrangements would be made by which Mr. Wood would be enabled to rebuild there or elsewhere, and carry on the business in his own name. They must have time for these things.

Now, it appears that there was no abandonment. There was nothing said by these people to Mr. Sands, that they did not intend to do anything, so that he could go ahead and use any name he chose. On the contrary, they claim they did intend to hold on to this name, to the use of it, and insist that it was theirs, and therefore there is no claim of that kind. The question is whether there was such an abandonment as gave Sands the right to go on. Now, I don't think there was—I think Cummings and Wood did as much as they probably could be expected to do. Mr. Wood did not feel at liberty to open a hotel, himself, until he was released from this claim to Cummings—not to go somewhere else and keep a hotel of this name. I suppose from the evidence he felt it his duty, and that it was necessary for him to make some arrangement about this exclusive right before it was proper for him to venture to open one on his own account in his own name; and after a while he effected that, in July following—got a release, a paper which enabled him to go on. Now, Mr. Wood does not want to lose this trade-mark—this valuable name which he has acquired—this custom and patronage of the public. He deems that of value, and he wants to retain that for himself. I think he has a right to do it. I don't think there has been such delay, such negligence or such acts or language, on the part of these people, as should prevent Mr. Wood from enjoying the benefit of this good name—if such is the fact—which he has acquired, an ability to draw custom to his house from the experience of the past. I think he is entitled to that.

Now in this case perhaps it is not very important, but yet it is not to be disregarded, (in order to show where the parties stand) what they intended. It is evident from the advertisements that were put in the paper by Mr. Sands about "Wood's Hotel" being opened, that it was his expectation—it may be presumed, no matter what he says about it—that there is nothing here that shows that Mr. Sands intended to perpetrate any fraud in his own mind, he didn't suppose that he was doing anything but what he had a right to do, but he puts an advertisement in the paper soon after the fire, when he got his house ready in the fall, which would give the public to understand that this was the same Wood's Hotel. The public not knowing anything particularly about it, would draw that inference, would come to that conclusion that this was the same establishment, in the same form, or in the hands of the same person that they had been acquainted with.

"Wood's Hotel" is supposed from the pleadings here to have acquired a good name. Now he puts in an advertisement that this is re-opened—Wood's Hotel is reopened and ready to receive boarders, etc. He in that way expects to get the benefit of the old reputation. The old reputation did not belong to Mr. Sands at all. It is nothing that he made; it is nothing that he built up; he has given no value to it. There was value given to it by Mr. Wood, and Mr. Wood is entitled to that unless he in some way abandoned it. I have had considerable doubt about this because it is rather a close case, but on the whole I think that justice, equity and fair-dealing is best secured under the circumstances in giving to Mr. Wood the right to carry on his business under the name under which he carried it on before. I therefore shall allow a decree in favor of the complainant, enjoining the defendant from using the name.

XXV. OHIO REPORTS.

We take the following head-notes from numbers of the 25th volume of Ohio State Reports, furnished us by Robert Clarke & Co., the publishers:

Emery's Sons v. Irving National Bank, p. 360.

DELIVERY—BILL OF LADING.

1. By the rules of commercial law, a bill of lading is regarded as the symbol of the property therein described; and in case the shipper reserves to himself the jus disponendi, he can transfer the title, at any time before the property is delivered by the carrier to the consignee, as effectually by the delivery of the bill of lading as by the delivery of the property itself.

CONSIGNMENT—VENDOR—VENDEE.

2. If the consignment be made by a vendor to a vendee, the question whether the consignor reserved the jus disponendi is one of intention, to be gathered from all the facts and circumstances of the transaction.

3. If the right to control the property be reserved by the shipper, the carrier must be regarded as his agent; if not, then as the agent of the consignee.

4. On such question of intention, the terms of the bill of lading are to be taken as admissions of the consignor, and are entitled to great weight, but are not conclusive.

SPECIAL RATES—DELIVERY.

5. Nor is the fact, that the consignee had contracted with the carrier for special rates of freight, conclusive that the goods were delivered by the consignor to such carrier as the agent of the consignee

6. Where the vendor of goods consigns them to the purchaser, taking a bill of lading from the carrier, and intending to reserve the right of control over them, at the same time draws upon the purchaser for the price, and delivers the bill of exchange, with the bill of lading attached, to an indorsee, for a valuable consideration, the consignee, upon receipt of the goods, takes them subject to the right of the holder of the bill of lading to demand payment of the bill of exchange, and can not retain the price of the goods on account of a debt due to him from the consignor.

JUDGMENT ON REVERSAL.

7. Where a judgment is reversed for error in overruling a motion for a new trial, on the ground that the judgment was contrary to the evidence, it is error for the reviewing court to remand the case, with instructions to render judgment in favor of the plaintiff in error, he not being entitled to judgment on the pleadings, and there being no agreed statement or finding of facts, and the case being one in which either party had a right to a jury trial.

We call attention to the following opinions, reported at length in this issue:

Bank—Loss—Military Liquidation—The opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States by Davis, J., holding that a bank was not liable to the owner for a pledge lost by the bank, occasioned by the bank being put into military liquidation.

Production of the Books of a Distillery.—The opinion of the United States District Court for the district of Indiana, by Gresham, J., holding upon an information filed under the Internal Revenue laws against a distillery, that the court has the power to compel the claimants to produce their books and papers, relating to the management of the distillery, in court.

Power of City to Issue Bonds—Constitution of 1870—Vote of People.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of this State by Craig, J., holding where the city of Shawneetown was incorporated before the adoption of the present Constitution, and power given the city council to provide for the issue of bonds, that the ordinance of the city passed after the adoption of the Constitution, submitting the question whether $50,000 of bonds of the city should be issued for the purpose of constructing a levee, was a law within the meaning of the Constitution, and that the bonds which were subsequently issued and sold were issued in compliance with a vote of the people of the municipality in pursuance of law providing therefor, within the meaning of the Constitution. The construction of this provision of the Constitution will be of unusual interest to those interested in city bonds.

Railroad Rates—Unjust Discrimination and Extortion.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of this State, by Sheldon, J., in a case brought under what is known as the Granger's Railroad Law, to recover penalties for extortion and unjust discrimination in rates charged for transportation. The majority of the court after passing upon several questions raised under the law, hold that the declaration was defective in not averring that a schedule of rates had been established by the board of commissioners, and that the defendant had received compensation in excess of those rates. The judges do not agree in the construction to be given the law or the constitutionality of portions of it, as will be seen by the different opinions filed in the case.

Use of Name as Trade-mark may be Assigned.—The opinion of the Circuit Court of Cook county by Farwell, C J., holding that a man who uses a name under which he does business has an exclusive right to the use of such name, and having such exclusive right he has the right to assign such word or trade-mark to another, and the law will protect the assignee in the exclusive right to use the name in carrying on the same business at the same building.

Expense of the Burial of the Dead Occurring on Railroads.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of this State by Breese, J., holding that the law requiring every railroad company running cars within this State shall be liable for all the expenses of the coroner and his inquest and the burial of all persons who may die on the cars, or who may be killed by collision or other accident occurring on such cars, may be considered in the light of a special tax for which there is no sanction in the Constitution. The only wonder is that such a law should not have been declared unconstitutional long ago.

Our Judicial Election.—Judge McAllister has been taken from the bench of the Supreme Court, and unanimously elected Judge of the Circuit Court in place of Judge Tree, resigned. When a judge of distinguished ability, like Judge McAllister, resigns a position upon the bench of the highest Court in the State, to accept one in the Circuit Court, the people, and especially the law-makers should study the circumstances that could bring about such a result. The judges of the Supreme Court receive about two thousand dollars per annum less than the judges of the Circuit Court of Cook county, and in addition to this drawback they have to pay their travelling expenses and hotel bills for more than six months in the year, and endure the inconvenience of being away from their families. Judge Thornton, one of the ablest jurists that ever adorned the bench in Illinois, was driven back to practice by the small salary that was paid the judges of the Supreme Court, the great amount of labor required, and his dislike of being away from home so much. The question arises, who is to take Judge McAllister's place? It should be a man of unquestioned integrity, legal ability and experience, with enough common sense to keep him from riding hobbies, punishing enemies or rewarding friends. We fear this great commercial city of the West may not soon have as able a representative from this district as Judge McAllister was.

The Bar of this county are to be congratulated on the unanimous re-election of Judge Gary. An able and faithful judicial officer has been retained in the service of the people.

Recent Publications.

Cases Argued and Determined in the Circuit Courts of the United States for the Fifth Judicial Circuit. Reported by William B. Woods, the Circuit Judge. Vol. I. Chicago: Callaghan & Co. 1875.

This is the first volume of a new series of reports. In mechanical execution it is equal to any volume of American reports ever published. Few circuits present as many important legal questions of general interest as the fifth. Its judges, Bradley and Woods, are among the ablest of the federal judiciary. The present volume contains 119 cases, embracing questions in Admiralty, Bankruptcy, Revenue, Criminal Law, Patent Law, Carriers, the Powers and Duties of Receivers and Masters, as well as cases arising out of the late war involving the validity of the recent Amendments to the Federal Constitution, the Enforcement and Confiscation Acts. Of these cases, 38 are decided by Bradley, J., of the Supreme Court of the United States, a few by the District Judges of the Circuit, and the remainder by Woods, J. the whole presenting a variety of legal adjudications seldom found in a single volume of law reports. Among the most notable are what are known as the Slaughter-House Cases; the Myra Clark Gaines Cases; the Confiscation Cases; in which the opinions were delivered by Bradley, J., involving some of the most important constitutional questions ever passed upon by any court. This volume is a valuable addition to the reports of the decisions of the Federal courts, and should find a ready place among those reports in every lawyer's library. It may be had of the publishers, Callaghan & Co., of this city, upon receipt of the price, $7.50.

Reports of Selected Civil and Criminal Cases Decided in the Court of Appeals of Kentucky. By W. P. D. Bush, Reporter. Volume X. Containing cases decided at Winter Term, 1873, and Summer and Winter Terms, 1874. Louisville, Ky.: Published by John P. Morton and Company. 1875.

The style of this volume in some respects, is peculiar. After the head-notes the names of the attorneys for the appellants are given, followed, first by reference to the text-books cited, and then to the reports arranged in columns. Then, after the names of the attorneys for the appellees, references to the text-books and reports cited by them are given in the same order. This plan has its advantages. It enables any one to have at his command all the authorities cited by the counsel on both sides in any given case. It also shows what authorities the court had before it in preparing the opinion. In Burkett v. McCarty, 758, it is held that whether a citizen has been guilty of an offense involving the forfeiture of his right to vote, is a judicial question which can be constitutionally decided by the judiciary on a full and fair trial on an indictment, but cannot be rightfully adjudged collaterally or incidentally by the officers of the election; nor can a test oath be constitutionally required in such a case; nor can the refusal to take such an oath be deemed a judicial trial and conviction of the imputed offense; that a legislative act cannot make voluntary rebellion expatriation.

The Law of Homestead and Exemptions. By John H. Smith. San Francisco: Sumner, Whitney & Co. 1875.

This is a volume of 467 pages, and was issued from the press last month. The author in his preface says he has attempted to collect all the cases, giving a general rule of law, where it was possible to do so, and to state the rule in each State where variation of statutes, or conflict of decisions, made it necessary. This volume contains a greater number of references to authorities upon the subjects treated than can be found in any other work. The authorities might, however, have been brought down to a later date. We notice that several recent important cases upon the question of homestead exemption are not referred to.

Removal of Causes—Costs.—It would seem that the Federal judges in Indiana are of the opinion that parties who remove their causes from the State court into the Federal court should pay the costs. The following rule was entered in the United States Circuit Court last week:

The clerk shall require a bond for costs from the party, whether plaintiff or defendant, who files a record on the removal of a cause from a State court. And the opposite party, on appearing to such cause, shall file a cost bond on his part.

This week we received from Stevens & Sons, of London, a cable dispatch to send The Legal News from April last. We sent the required numbers by Tuesday's mail.

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

OPINION FILED OCT. 14, 1875.

OHIO & MISS. R. W. CO. v. LACKEY.

EXPENSE OF THE BURIAL OF THE DEAD OCCURRING ON RAILROADS — UNCONSTITUTIONAL LAW.

The law requiring that every railroad company running cars within this State shall be liable for all the expenses of the coroner and his inquest, and the burial of all persons who may die on the cars, or who may be killed by collision, or other accident occurring to such cars, or otherwise, may be considered in the light of a special tax for which there is no sanction in the Constitution.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS,]

Opinion by BREESE, J.

This was an appeal from the judgment of the Marion Circuit Court, rendered at the October term, 1870, upon the following agreed state of facts.

It was agreed in this case that during the year 1869, three persons were run over and killed by trains on the railroad of appellants in Marion county, and the appellee being coroner of said county at the time held an inquest in each case, the expenses of which, together with the cost of burial, amount in the aggregate to $91.15, that if appellant was in law liable to appellee, upon the facts stated, for the above amount, then judgment should be rendered in favor of appellee therefor, and if not so liable, then judgment should be for appellant, with right to either party to appeal.

In 1855 the general assembly of this State passed an act entitled "an act to provide for the burial of the dead occurring on railroads, and in and by vehicles carrying passengers," in the second section of which it is provided "that every railroad company running cars within this State shall be liable for all the expense of the coroner and his inquest, and the burial of all persons who may die on the cars, or who may be killed by collision, or other accident occurring to such cars, or otherwise.

And any coroner, city, town or person who shall take charge of and decently inter any such body or corpse, or cause an inquest to be held over such corpse, shall have cause of action against such company before any court having competent jurisdiction." Sess. Laws, 1855, p. 170; Scates' Comp., 423.

It is insisted by appellants that this statute is not within the constitutional competency of the general assembly to enact, as it places the burden of these expenses upon the railroad companies, which, in other cases of like nature, is placed upon the estate of the deceased, or upon the county in which the accident may occur.

This is the general law. R. S. 1845, ch. 99, title "Sheriffs and Coroners," § 23; R. S. 1874, § 21, title "Coroners."

It may, very pertinently, be asked, why this distinction? On what principle is it that railroad corporations, without any fault on their part, shall be compelled to pay charges which in other cases are borne by the property of the deceased, or, in default thereof, by the county in which the accident occurred?

An examination of the section will show, that no default or negligence of any kind need be established against the railroad company, but they are mulcted in heavy charges, if, notwithstanding all their care and caution, a death should occur on one of their cars, no matter how caused, even if by the party's own hand. Running of trains by these corporations is lawful and of great public benefit. It is not claimed that the liability attaches for a violation of any law, the omission of any duty, or the want of proper care and skill in running their trains; the penalty is not aimed at anything of this kind. We say penalty, for it is in the nature of a penalty, and there is a Constitutional prohibition against imposing penalties when no law has been violated or duty neglected. Neither is pretended in this case, nor are they in the contemplation of the statute. A passenger on the train dies from sickness—he is a man of wealth. Why should his burial expenses be charged to the railroad company? There is neither reason nor justice in it. And if he be poor, having not the means for a decent burial, the general law makes ample provision for such cases. As argued by counsel for appellant, the law attempts to place what is properly a public burden upon these corporations, which should be borne by all alike, and discharged out of public funds raised by equal and uniform taxation.

This may be considered in the light of a special tax, for which there is no sanction in the Constitution. We have not been furnished with any brief, points or argument for the appellee. The views presented by appellant satisfy us the law in question cannot be sustained as a constitutional enactment.

In 1874 the general assembly repealed this statute by chap. 31, title "Statutes," R. S. 1022, but at the same session re-enacted it substantially, giving the power to sue, not to the coroner as here, but to the county. Ib., title "Coroner," 283, § 22.

For the reasons given the judgment is reversed.

H. P. BUXTON for Appellant.

THE LIMITS TO THE JURISDICTION OF COURTS.

LECTURE BY A. M. PENCE, ESQ., BEFORE THE UNION COLLEGE OF LAW.

Gentlemen of the Union College of Law, of the City of Chicago:

* * * * * * *

I wish to speak, to-day, of but a single branch of the manifold acquirements of the true lawyer, viz: the proper use and understanding of the machinery of the courts, or rather the limits and powers of the courts.

I can only throw out a few hints, and leave you to fill in the great detail. I will not attempt to exhaust the subject, nor to express myself in abstract propositions, but rather to fix in your minds, by illustrations, a few valuable principles. Law in the abstract you may find in the books.

The judicial department of every constitutional government is the true bulwark and protection of the citizen, sometimes interposing to prevent the encroachment of the executive upon the rights of the individual; and as often interposing to prevent the encroachment of the legislative department.

The popular power, that which comes from the people, can be as tyrannical as the prerogative of the king.

It has been the glory of the English government that its judges, with a few exceptions, have maintained the rights and privileges of the subject against both the king and the commons.

In doing this, the courts have often been called upon to define their jurisdiction, and to force the executive and legislative departments to recognize and obey their mandates.

The judges did much, during the great formative period of the English constitution to thwart the prerogative of the king, and to define the jurisdiction of the executive.

And Sir Edward Coke, when removed by the king from the office of chief justice, on account of his opposition to the king, who attempted, by virtue of his prerogative, to pass laws by proclamation, was not prevented, however, from carrying on his war against the king's assumed jurisdiction; for being returned to parliament he became the leader of the House of Commons, and carried the celebrated petition of right in which the king's jurisdiction was definitely defined, although not at first submitted to.

Lord Chief Justice Holt, at one time came in conflict with the House of Lords, and at another time with the House of Commons; and in both instances maintained the jurisdiction of his court against those powerful bodies.

The most interesting case was that wherein the House of Commons attempted to intimidate the chief justice.

In a certain borough the whigs had a majority of legal voters; but through the corruption of the judges of election, they were prevented from voting, and a tory member was returned.

The men whose votes were refused brought actions in the Court of Queen's Bench for damages.

The first case brought on for trial was that of Ashley, which was carried before the House of Lords on writ of error, and the right of action was maintained.

The House of Commons claimed that their privilege was infringed of determining who were legally elected, and so furious did they become toward Chief Justice Holt and the House of Lords that the queen was compelled to dissolve the parliament.

Upon a new election the tories were still in the majority in the House of Commons, and forthwith they arrested the other parties whose cases had not yet been decided for prosecuting their actions in contempt of the house. They were imprisoned at Newgate.

The house even threatened to arrest and imprison Chief Justice Holt for entertaining jurisdiction. It is reported that the speaker of the house in his robes and full bottom wig, attended by many of the high privilege members appeared before the chief justice and said: "Sir John Holt, Knight Chief Justice of her Majesty's Court of Queen's Bench, in the name of the Commons of England, and by their authority I summon you forthwith to appear at the bar of the house to answer the charge there brought against you for divers contempts by you committed in derogation of their ancient and undoubted privileges."

His lordship calmly replied, "Go back to your chair, Mr. Speaker, within these five minutes, or you may depend upon it I will lay you by the heels in Newgate. You speak of your authority, but I tell you that I sit here as an interpreter of the laws and a distributor of justice, and if the whole House of Commons were in your belly, I would not stir one foot."

So high did the matter run that the queen again dissolved parliament, and at the next election the whigs had a majority in the house.

Strange as it may seem, a similar question again arose within the reign of Queen Victoria, 140 years afterward, when Lord Denman was chief justice, in the case of Stockdale v. Hansard. See 9 Ad. & Ellis, page 1, and 11 Ad. & Ellis, page 273.

During the progress of the case the House of Commons imprisoned for contempt the plaintiff, the attorney, the attorney's son, his clerk, and the two sheriffs of London.

Lord Denman, who was a whig, maintained his ground, and the house was compelled to recede.

Stockdale, the plaintiff, sued the Hansards, printers of the parliamentary reports, on account of a report made to the House of Commons, and by them printed, which was libelous upon the plaintiff.

The house claimed it was a breach of their privilege to sue their printer, and without there being any law to protect their printer, they claimed the privilege to publish the libelous document without a law to that effect. Upon a passage of a law afterwards, the Duke of Wellington, in the House of Lords, remarked that such a law "would make the House of Commons the only authorized libellers in the country."

I will refer to this case again hereafter.

But it is not my intention to dwell upon the conflict of jurisdiction between the courts and the legislative or executive departments; nor the concurrent, and sometimes apparent conflicting jurisdiction of the State and Federal courts.

You will experience no difficulty in your practice in determining whether you should apply to the State or the Federal Courts. This is a very easy matter.

The Federal courts have indeed a very limited jurisdiction, and for all practical purposes it is sufficient to know and understand the powers of the State courts.

This is, indeed, a wide and interesting field of inquiry. You will meet at the very threshold of your practice the question of jurisdiction.

You cannot proceed a single step without a knowledge of this subject. It enters into every department of your practice. You cannot bring a suit, you cannot defend a suit, you cannot examine a title to real estate without a full knowledge of the jurisdiction of the courts, general and special. You will not have much difficulty in determining the distinction between the juristiction in chancery and at law, nor as to what kind of an action at law you must bring, whether assumpsit or trespass, and the like.

I do not appreciate the complaint which we often hear made, especially by laymen, that under our common law system of pleading and practice no one can feel sure whether he has brought his action or suit in the right way or in the proper forum. A very little scientific study of the matter will be sufficient to prevent mistakes in this regard. It is not here that difficulties arise or mistakes occur. If you study well the principles of the law, you will not mistake the remedy or the forum. To understand the rights of the parties is difficult. This requires constant study. To know the remedy after you understand the rights of your client, is easy indeed. Of course, if you do not know your client's rights, you cannot choose the proper remedy.

But inasmuch as all lawyers are not intelligent, are not industrious, you will find the same defects in their works that you will find in the works of other persons professing skill.

You will find much work done by pretended lawyers ("men whom God Almighty never intended to be lawyers") that is absolutely vicious.

Many of our profession have really a genius for mistakes.

In any other business, if a man has no talent for it, he is compelled to abandon it. He cannot continue to be a cabinet maker, or a machinist, or a newspaper editor if he possesses no talent for the vocation.

But you will find men continuing in the law though they be not fit for a country schoolmaster. They can conceal their defects from ordinary laymen, and thus go on year after year and be known only to the profession—as ignorant workmen, unskilled laborers. Hence, when you are called upon to defend a case, the first thing you ought to do is to examine the principles involved, and determine whether the cause is properly brought—whether the court has jurisdiction.

And this question of jurisdiction involves two inquiries:

1st. Whether the court has jurisdiction of the person.

2d. Whether the court has jurisdiction of the subject-matter in controversy.

If the defendant resides in the State, you look first to the return of the sheriff indorsed upon the writ. Upon that return the court acts.

If it be returned according to the provisions of the statute, the court has authority to act, and you must put in the defense.

And then the question arises, Has the court jurisdiction of the subject-matter?

As to the Superior Courts, that is, the Circuit Courts of the State, and the Superior Court of Cook county, in this State—they have common law and chancery jurisdiction as it existed in the Superior Courts of England, prior to 4th year of King James I., and such other jurisdiction as has been given them by the statutes of this State.

You inquire, then, if the court in which the suit is brought has a general jurisdiction of that class of subjects. For instance, if it be a bill for a specific performance of a contract, on the chancery side, or a declaration to recover for a sum of money due, on the law side, you at once determine that the court has jurisdiction of that class of cases in that form of action.

But suppose it were a bill, not for specific performance, but a bill or petition by an administrator asking the court to sell the real estate belonging to the heirs of a deceased person, for the purpose of paying the debts of decedent's estate, you would say at once that the Superior Courts did not have power, by bill, to sell the real estate of heirs for such purpose, because it is not in accordance with the course of common law. The courts at Westminster Hall could not do it. And then you must turn to the statutes of your State, and you will there see that such a right exists, but the remedy given is in the County Court; that the right is entirely statutory, and therefore the remedy can only be sought in that court where the statute directs.

And should the proceeding continue in the Circuit or Superior courts, not a particle of title would be obtained by the purchaser if a decree should be entered in such court.

What would you do if the heirs of such deceased party should call upon you to defend such a proceeding in the Circuit Court? You would do one of two things. You would demur to the bill and the court would dismiss it for want of jurisdiction; or, if you thought the suit was without merit, but that you would be unable to make a sufficient defense upon the merits, what would you do? Suppose, for instance, that the foundation of the suit was upon a promissory note given by your client's ancestor, which you were morally convinced had been paid in his lifetime; but, for some reason, by accident or otherwise, not taken up by him, yet you could not prove that it had been paid. What would you do?

I would advise you, in such a case to do nothing, because, if the administrator or executor should proceed and obtain a decree and sell your client's land, the purchaser would obtain no title thereby, because the court would have no jurisdiction in the case.

The proceeding would be a nullity, but his debt would be extinguished by the sale pro tanto, or perhaps by the time the mistake was discovered, the note would be outlawed as against the heirs.

Let me tell you, gentlemen, when you have a case to defend, when you have doubt as to the goodness of your defense, be in no hurry about the matter. If the plaintiff does not move in the matter, you keep silent. Time will come to your rescue by and by.

I know of a suit which has been on hand for five years. There is no defense to the cause. Whenever it shall be brought on to a hearing the complainant will obtain such a decree as he asks. The defendant bought the property and paid full price, yet obtained no title, for certain reasons. That case will not be ended for two or three years yet. And after complainant has obtained his decree, it will do him no good, for he has misconceived the effect of his action. And by that time the defendant will have a complete bar to the right of action by lapse of time.

In the case last mentioned the court has jurisdiction of the subject-matter, but the relief prayed for is inadequate, and the defendant could in the first instance have demurred to the bill, and it would have been dismissed, not for the reason that the court did not have jurisdiction, but for the reason that the court should not have exercised jurisdiction on that particular case in opposition to defendant's objection.

Good cases to illustrate the difference between the want of jurisdiction and the improper and erroneous exercise of jurisdiction, are the first two that I mentioned—one where a bill is brought in the Circuit Court to sell real estate of heirs to pay debts of decedent, and the case of a bill in the Circuit Court to enforce a specific performance of a contract for the sale of real estate.

In the latter case, the court has jurisdiction of that class of subjects, viz.: specific performance, but the bill in that case does not show that complainant ever offered to perform, or that he is ready and willing to perform, on his part. And it also shows that the contract was made fifteen years ago, and complainant does not set up any reason why he did not bring his bill sooner. Of course, if a demurrer were interposed, in that case the court would dismiss the bill for want of equity—not for the reason that the court did not have jurisdiction, but for the reason that it would not be equitable for the court to assist any one who has lain by for so long a period while the property was increasing in value. It would refuse to exercise its jurisdiction.

But, instead of interposing a demurrer, suppose the defendant made no defense. Then, if the court entered a decree and caused its master to make a deed of conveyance of the premises to the complainant, the title would be good, and the defendant could never recover the land, so long as the decree remained unreversed.

But the decree in the latter case is erroneous, and if taken to the Supreme Court, within proper time, it would be reversed. The decree in that case is simply voidable and not void.

And I desire that you should clearly understand the distinction between a decree that is voidable and one that is absolutely void. You will find the courts using language that misleads, and many lawyers are unable to discriminate—and hence claim that a certain decision supports their views, when it does nothing of the kind.

The courts will call a void decree erroneous. They will also call a voidable decree erroneous. And so they both are. But you will see at once that all erroneous decrees are not void, because the word is used as applicable to both voidable and void decrees.

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

ABSTRACT OF OPINIONS FILED AT SPRINGFIELD, OCTOBER 13TH, 1875.

179.—Gilman, Clinton & Springfield R. R. Co. v. Joseph J. Kelley et al.—Appeal from McLean.—Opinion by SCOTT, J. 17 pp.

PUBLIC AND PRIVATE TRUSTEES—THEIR OBLIGATIONS AND RESPONSIBILITIES—RATIFICATION BY STOCKHOLDERS—APPOINTMENT OF RECEIVERS.

STATEMENT.—Bill by appellee in behalf of himself and other stockholders of appellants. Afterwards certain townships were also made party complainants. Appellant was organized by act of Assembly in 1867, and this act was amended in 1869. A large amount of local municipal subscriptions ($600,000) was obtained along the line of the proposed road for capital stock, but the bonds were really and necessarily to construct the road. With this municipal aid, a contract was effected with the "Morgan Improvement Company," a company organized in the interest of the Pennsylvania Central R. R. Co., to which railroad company appellant had proposed terms for aid in constructing and equipping its road; which proposal was the basis of the arrangement with the Morgan Improvement Company. To the Pennsylvania Central the road was to be leased, when completed, for 99 years, at one dollar per year, provided the lease could be made without prejudice to the rights of parties holding the company's bonds.

The appellant was also bound to issue certificates of stock for the remainder of the capital stock, not taken; to be delivered to the P. C. R. R. Co. as an escrow; and to be delivered to the Morgan Improvement Company; and also the company were to execute mortgage bonds. The contract was not to be binding on the Morgan Improvement Company, if the directors should make any change without its consent or approval. The contract was adopted by the directors, June 7, 1870; and afterwards approved by a meeting of the stockholders.

In September, 1870, Mr. Melvin, a director, and the president of the G. S. & L. R. R. Co., Mr. Black, another director, and Mr. Williams, afterwards appointed director by the governor, all became members of the Morgan Improvement Company. This, it is charged, invalidated the construction contract, and caused a misappropriation of the funds of the R. R. Co. for the personal benefit of these individuals, and also a wrongful issue of the majority of the stock so as to place the control of the affairs of the company in the hands of the Improvement Company. The bill further alleged that the directors were about to lease the road to the P. C. R. R. Co. for 999 years, on condition that the lessee would secure certain bonds, and pay a large debt owing to the Morgan Improvement Co., by the G. C. & S. R. R. Co.

The prayer of the bill was that it should be decreed that the construction contract was fraudulent; that the directors should refund profits under the contract to the railroad company; that the bonds issued to the Improvement Company should be canceled; that certain income bonds about to be issued by the railroad company should be declared void; and that the lease prepared by the directors and submitted to the P. C. R. R. Co. be declared void; and that the latter company be enjoined from claiming any rights thereunder.

Prayer substantially granted, and appeal. However, previously, the directors had been advised that they could not, under the charter, make the contemplated lease, and had thereon abandoned the intention. Held,

1. That as the contract sought to be avoided had been performed before the filing of the bill, and the securities probably passed into the hands of innocent holders for value, these holders could not be affected by this litigation.

2. Complainants were entitled to an account from the participating directors, of any profits received by them. [The court, however, remark that the evidence shows positive loss instead of profits.]

3. No director of the railroad company could lawfully become a member of the Improvement Company, with whom the contract of construction was made, with a view to share in the profits. If any gains were realized by the act, they would belong to the railroad company, upon the equitable principle which forbids a trustee, or any person acting in a fiduciary capacity, from speculating out of the subject of the trust. In this case, the interests of the two companies in the contract must be opposite, and the same person could not properly represent both sides, or be a stockholder in both corporations.

4. The directors of a railroad company are trustees for the stockholders, and it would be a breach of duty to transfer that trust to assume obligations inconsistent with that relation—to place themselves in opposition to the interests of the stockholders, or in such positions as that their own individual interests would prevent them from acting for the best interests of those they represent. The rule is, that all persons holding a fiduciary relation must observe the utmost fidelity to the interests of the cestui que trust, and this rule embraces every relation in which there may, by any possibility, arise a conflict between the duty to the person with whom the trustee is dealing, or on whose account he is acting, and his own individual interest. The rule acts, not on the possibility that in some cases the sense of that duty may prevail over the motives of self-interest, but it provides against the probability in many cases, and the danger in all cases, that the dictates of self-interest will exercise a predominant influence and supersede that of duty. So strictly is this rule adhered to, that no question is allowed to be raised as to the fairness of any contract made contrariwise. The law absolutely inhibits the agent, or trustee, from placing himself in a position where his private interests would naturally tend to make him neglectful of his obligations to his principal, or where his position would afford him an opportunity to speculate in the trust property. So that it is not indispensable there should be actual injury resulting before the act of the trustee will be declared void as interdicted by the law. The cestui que trust has his election to ratify the act of the trustee, and insist on all its advantages, or disaffirm it in toto, as shall be most to his interest. And this whether it be a public or private trust.

5. Issuing the majority of the stock to the Improvement Company, in order to give it the control of the road, was illegal. If a railroad company gratuitously give away its stock, or if the stock is given for the fraudulent purpose of depriving the stockholders of dividends, or of destroying the value of their shares, or to prevent them from exercising their legal power of control over the road in the election of directors, or otherwise equity will afford relief. Nor does it matter that the stock is really of no value. The principle is not affected by any such consideration. The untaken stock is trust property in the hands of the directors, and they have no authority to bestow it gratuitously upon themselves or others, with the design of depriving bona fide stockholders of their just influence in the management of the affairs of the company.

6. Nor does the original ratification of the contract, by the meeting of stockholders, change the application of the principles above stated, to the case at bar—the acts complained of not being included in the ratification. No ratification will estop a principal unless he has been made aware of all the facts having a material bearing in the matter.

[The court say they see no necessity for the appointment of a receiver in this case, and then held,]

7. Courts should hesitate to take the management of railways out of the hands of the directors elected by the stockholders, and proceed with great caution in such matters.

[The court below is directed to discharge the receiver.]

Henry Wickenkamp v. Willian Wickenkamp.—Appeal from Adams.—Opinion by CRAIG, J. 6 pp.

DISCRETION OF COURT IN ADMITTING EVIDENCE IN REBUTTAL—OBJECTIONS TO EVIDENCE — WAIVER — INSTRUCTIONS TO EXCLUDE EVIDENCE.

STATEMENT.—Assumpsit for labor for 8½ years. Verdict for $753.35. The plaintiff is a son of defendant. Three years of the time was on account merely, the prior time on note, to which an offset was pleaded, which was allowed. Held,

1. That the admission of evidence in rebuttal is discretionary; and the exercise of that discretion cannot be assigned for error.

2. When specific objections are made to the admission of evidence, which objections are not tenable, other objections which might properly have been made, must be regarded as waived, and the mere fact that improper testimony was allowed to go to the jury without objection, cannot be assigned as error. But a party may ask an instruction to the jury to disregard improper testimony given in, and a refusal of such instruction may be error.

185.—T. W. & W. R. R. Co. v. Edward Williams.—Appeal from Morgan.—Opinion by SCHOLFIELD, J. 6 pp.

STATEMENT.—Appellee, while awaiting the departure of a train after purchasing a ticket, was forcibly assaulted by an employee and ordered out of the ladies' room in Quincy station-house. Held,

1. That a suit could be maintained, under the law in force, as well in Morgan county for the injury complained of, as in Adams county where it occurred, if the company did not object in the court below to the venue.

2. Where a declaration names the servant of the company alleged to have committed a trespass, the name may be considered as surplusage, and needs not be proved; the gist of the action being the injury by a servant of the company merely.

3. A railroad company has a right to set apart a room for ladies, and exclude therefrom all gentlemen unaccompanied by ladies, and that, too, even if there are not proper accommodations for the gentlemen so excluded—whose remedy in such case would be against the company directly for neglect to provide such accommodations.

FILING PLEADINGS—PRACTICE THEREIN.

1. Held, That an additional plea filed after issue joined, and without leave of the court, may properly be stricken from the files. Parties are not allowed to adopt a course of practice in pleading which may tend to injure the opposite party, by presenting, at the last moment and when he may be unprepared to meet it, a new and unexpected issue, or to trifle with the time of the court by making up portions of their issues at different times, when it can be reasonably avoided.

207.—Henry Bell, admr. v. Parker Gardner et al.—Appeal from DeWitt.—Opinion by SCOTT, J. 3 pp.

SURPRISE BY EVIDENCE ON TRIAL OF A CAUSE — EQUITY RELIEF — NEWLY DISCOVERED EVIDENCE.

STATEMENT.—Bill to obtain a new trial, in a common law case, on the ground of being surprised by evidence on the trial. Held,

1. That the complainant, having been plaintiff in the case, could have avoided jeopardizing the interests involved by taking a non-suit, if surprised by unexpected evidence and unable to rebut it. The law will not permit a party to experiment with the chances of a favorable verdict, and then, if unsuccessful, seek relief in equity.

2. Newly discovered evidence must not be merely cumulative.

209.—Leander Smith v. George A. Crawford.—Appeal from Cook.—Opinion by SCHOLFIELD, J. 6 pp.

DESCRIPTION OF LANDS VOID FOR UNCERTAINTY.

STATEMENT.—Bill to establish title to land under the burnt record act of 1872. Held,

1. That the description "an undivided ten acres of land in the east half of section two," etc., is void for uncertainty; although, in some States, the rule is different. Such a tract cannot be found or located so as to give possession thereof. [Confirmed by a series of Illinois cases.]

220.—Edward Wilson v. Wm. S. Kellogg.—Appeal from McLean.—Opinion by CRAIG, J. 7 pp.

FRAUDULENT SALES—EQUITY JURISDICTION.

STATEMENT.—Bill to set aside administrator's sale of lands for debts of the estate on the ground that there was a fraudulent collusion to prevent bidding. Decree for complainant, and appeal by defendant. Held,

1. That a contract among bidders to prevent bidding, or stifle competition, will vitiate the sale; and a court of equity will not allow a party to retain the results of such fraudulent bidding. But a court of equity will not allow a judicial sale to be set aside without clear and satisfactory proof. If sales are set aside on slight causes, purchasers will be deterred from bidding, and thus lands be sacrificed at forced sales.

LV. NEW HAMPSHIRE REPORTS.

We have received from JOHN M. SHIRLEY, reporter, advance sheets of the LV. New Hampshire Reports, from which we take the following head-notes:

Heywood v. Hartshorn, p. 484.

INDEMNITY AGAINST NOTE LOST—INTEREST.

The payee of a negotiable promissory note, secured by a mortgage to him of land situate in this State, moved beyond the State, taking with him the note and mortgage, and afterwards died a citizen of another State. Held, that his administrator, upon furnishing suitable indemnity to the mortgagor against any claim on account of said note and mortgage by any bona fide holder thereof, might maintain a bill in equity to foreclose said mortgage, although the note and mortgage had been lost and could not be found.

An offer by the maker of a promissory note to pay the sum due thereon, upon a reasonable condition which the holder refuses or is not in a situation to fulfill, is sufficient to stop the running of interest.

Flanders v. George, p. 487.

WILL—LICENSE TO SELL LAND FOR PAYMENT OF DEBTS—NOTICE.

Provisions of a will held to impose upon the executor, who was also residuary legatee and accepted the will, the burden of paying the debts of the deceased, without calling in specific devices of land for that purpose.

A decree of the Probate court, granting license to sell land for the payment of debts, will be reversed on appeal by this court, when it appears that parties interested in the land by the provisions of the will were not notified of the petition according to the order of the probate court.

Moore v. Kidder, p. 488.

ATTACHMENT IN EQUITY PROCEEDINGS—UNRECORDED DEED.

A writ of attachment, ordered by a single justice in the Supreme Judicial Court, in an equity suit, under the General Statutes, ch. 190, sec. 7, and Laws of 1869, ch. 15, was made returnable at a general term of the whole court at Concord. Held, no error.

A return by an officer, that he has attached all the real estate owned by the defendant in the town of K., constitutes a valid attachment of all lands which come within that description, and it makes no difference that at the time of the attachment the defendant had conveyed away all his lands in the town of K. by a deed which had not then been recorded.

A bill in equity, in aid of the remedy at law, may be sustained against one summoned as trustee, when it appears that he is fraudulently putting his property beyond the reach of legal process in order to prevent the collection of the judgment which he anticipates may be rendered against him as such trustee.

State v. Roberts, p. 483.

SPIRITUOUS LIQUORS—SALE—AGENCY—EVIDENCE.

Upon the trial of an indictment for unlawfully selling spirituous liquors, evidence having been introduced by the State of a sale by the respondent's wife —Held, that it was competent for the State to prove sales by the respondent himself other than those specified in the indictment, at the same place and about the same time, because such sales by him tended to show that the illegal traffic was his business, and that the sale of liquor by his wife was an act done by her as his agent and by his authority.

One of the selectmen of the town in which the respondent resided, testified, subject to the respondent's exception, that he never joined in any appointment of the respondent as an agent for the sale of spirituous liquor. The respondent himself, on cross-examination, but without interposing any objection to the inquiry on that subject, testified that he had never received any appointment as such agent.

The court instructed the jury that they might consider the evidence given by the selectman as withdrawn, and that they might also consider the respondent's statement aforesaid as evidence that he was not such agent. Held, the instructions were correct, and the respondent was not prejudiced by the withdrawal of the testimony of the selectman from the consideration of the jury.

Case 34. Carver v. Upton. Error to the Circuit Court for the northern district of Illinois. This is another action by Upton as assignee in bankruptcy of the Great Western Insurance Company to recover of Carver money claimed to be due from him as a stockholder, and as an unpaid balance on capital stock. The defense was that there had never been any call made by the company for the unpaid balance, and that the certificate itself provided that this balance was subject to the call of the directors as they may be instructed by the majority of the stockholders represented at any regular meeting. Upon this it was urged that the certificate was not admissible to show any grounds for recovery, as it showed only a special contract in full force without proof of a call of the directors, as specified therein. There was a recovery below, and it is here urged that the company could not have recovered in any other way than specified in the certificate, and that the assignee in bankruptcy took the property and rights of the bankrupt in the same condition as the bankrupt possessed them, with the single qualification that he can impeach a fraudulent conveyance or transaction of the bankrupt as a creditor might. The money was payable upon a contingency which had not happened, and it cannot be recovered in an action of law.

No. 35. Sanger v. Upton, assignee, etc. Error to the Circuit Court for the northern district of Illinois. This is also an action against Sanger as a stockholder of the Great Western Insurance Company for an unpaid balance on stock. The same defense is set up as in No. 34, preceding, that the unpaid balance was to be paid upon call of the directors, and that body has not called it in, hence there is no authority for the call. The court below, however, held that upon the insolvency of the company its corporate powers, so far as was necessary for the winding up of its affairs, were transferred to the Bankruptcy court; that the functions of its directors were at an end, and its unpaid capital stock became a trust fund for the benefit of its creditors, which it was the duty of the Bankruptcy court to collect and administer. This ruling is assigned as error here, the plaintiff in error insisting that the stockholders are not bound by the order of the Bankruptcy court, because they were not parties nor privies in the proceeding. These causes were argued by J. H. Thompson, of Chicago, of counsel for plaintiff in error in No. 34, by George H. Williams for plaintiff in error in No. 35, and L. H. Boutell, of Chicago, for the defendants.

Chicago cases and attorneys were well represented in court to-day.

The Courts.

UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT.

No. 482.—OCTOBER TERM, 1875.

C. W. UPTON, assignee of the GREAT WESTERN INS. CO., a bankrupt, v. J. D. TRIBILCOCK.

In error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Iowa.

LIABILITY OF A STOCKHOLDER ON A CONDITIONAL SUBSCRIPTION.

This was an action by the assignee in bankruptcy to recover an unpaid subscription by the plaintiff in error to the stock of the insolvent Great Western Insurance Company, to which the defense was that the subscription had been obtained by the fraudulent representations of the agent of the company to the effect that eighty per cent of the amount not paid in was non-assessable and would be paid by the profits, etc. It was also alleged as a defense that the agent represented that the note given for the twenty per cent. paid would not be parted with by the company, but would be leniently held, to suit the convenience of the subscriber, and that afterward the note was transferred to a bank for collection, and that thereupon the subscriber had repudiated the subscription, and asked to have the contract rescinded.

Held, that the defense will not avail to relieve the subscriber from his contract: that he became a stockholder under a certificate entitling him to the shares of stock named therein, and that the words "not assessable," stamped across the face of the certificate did not import more at most than that he would not be liable to assessment after he had paid the full amount of the subscription, and could not in any event destroy the contract. It was said in this connection that the idea that the capital of a corporation is to be treated like a football, to be thrown into the market for purposes of speculation, that its value may be elevated or depressed to advance the interests of its managers, is a modern and wicked invention which will not be tolerated by the courts. Upon the question of the alleged rescission of the contract in consequence of the violation of the agreement as to the note, it is held that it was not before the jury; that the only question of fraud submitted was that in reference to the eighty per cent. of unpaid subscription, and that could not avail by reason of the want of diligence in the subscriber in not ascertaining his liability respecting it under the regulations of the company, until it was demanded.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

Mr. Justice HUNT delivered the opinion of the court.

Two points are presented in this case. Upon the first point, the facts are as follows:

The plaintiff, as assignee of the Great Western Insurance Company, a bankrupt corporation, organized under the statute of the State of Illinois, brought his action against the defendant, alleging that he was a stockholder of said corporation to the amount of ten thousand dollars; that twenty per cent. only had been paid upon his stock; alleging, also, the bankruptcy of the company. the appointment of the plaintiff as assignee, and the demand of the amount claimed; and seeking to recover the eight thousand dollars remaining unpaid. The complaint averred that the defendant did verbally agree to become such stockholder, and, with intent to become such, did accept a certificate for the same, whereby he became bound to pay the full amount thereof, as follows: five per cent. upon delivery of the certificates; five per cent. in three months; five per cent. in six months; five per cent. in nine months, and the residue whenever called for by the company, according to the charter of the company and the laws of the State of Illinois.

The defense is, that the subscription was obtained by the fraudulent representations of the agent of the company, to the effect that the defendant would only be responsible for twenty per cent. of the subscription made by him; that afterwards he executed his promissory note for the 20 per cent., and secured the same by a mortgage of real estate, "and that thereupon (in the language of the answer), and pursuant to agreement, said subscription contract was surrendered and delivered up to defendant;" and also, in the language of the answer, "that said note was a full payment and discharge of all obligations and personal liabilities of all kinds whatsoever, by reason of his contract so made, and the relations created by the delivery to him of said certificate, and said note was received in full payment."

In his third amended answer the defendant avers that he did subscribe for stock, on the conditions mentioned; that after that contract was made, and before a certificate was delivered to him, and before executing his note, an agreement was made with Overton, on behalf of the company, to the effect before stated, and thereupon he made and delivered the note and mortgage, which was received by Overton in full discharge and payment of the amount due on his said subscription.

The evidence contained in the bill of exceptions leaves the case substantially as is averred in the pleadings. The defendant offered evidence tending to prove representations that 20 per cent. only was required to be paid; that 80 per cent. was unassessable and created no personal liability; that the agent, Overton, exhibited a blank form of certificate with the words "nonassessable" printed across the face, "being a copy similar to that subsequently filled up and delivered to defendant by Overton." It appears that before the defendant made his subscription, a copy of the charter and by-laws had been furnished to him by Overton, and that in returns made by the company to the auditor of the State of Illinois of the amount of "unpaid subscribed capital for which the subscribers were liable," the amount of the defendant's note was included.

The case standing in this position upon the pleadings and the evidence, the plaintiff requested the court to charge the jury as follows:

2d. That any contract between the company or its agents and the stockholders, limiting their liability as to unpaid installments of stock, is void as to creditors of the company and as to the rights of the assignee, who represents the creditors in this action.

3rd. That if the jury find from the evidence that defendant, J. D. Tribilcock, became a stockholder of the Great Western Insurance Company in the month of August, 1870, and that he continued to own and hold said stock until after the insolvency of the company in February, 1873, that any representation by any agent of the company, at the time defendant became such stockholder, as to the matter of his liability for 80 per cent. of the stock, or any indorsement on the stock of the words "non-assessable," are wholly immaterial and constitute no defense to this action.

This request was refused.

It is hardly necessary to argue the proposition that if the defendant became a holder of shares of the capital of this Insurance Company, to the amount of $10,000, and had paid but twenty per cent. thereof, its creditors were entitled to require of him the payment of the eighty per cent. remaining unpaid. The acceptance and holding of a certificate of shares in an incorporation, makes the holder liable to the responsibilities of a shareholder. (Brigham v. Mead, 10 Allen R., 245; Buff City R. R. Co., v. Douglass, 14 N. Y. R., 336; Seymour v. Sturgess, 26 N. Y. R., 134). The capital stock of a moneyed corporation is a fund for the payment of its debts. It is a trust fund of which the directors are the trustees. It is a trust to be managed for the benefit of its shareholders during its life, and for the benefit of its creditors in the event of its dissolution. This duty is a sacred one, and cannot be disregarded. Its violation will not be undertaken by any just-minded man, and will not be permitted by the courts. The idea that the capital of a corporation is a foot-ball to be thrown into the market for the purposes of speculation, that its value may be elevated or depressed to advance the interest of its managers, is a modern and wicked invention. Equally unsound is the opinion that the obligation of the subscriber to pay his subscription may be released or surrendered to him by the trustees of the company. This has been often attempted, but never successfully. The capital paid in and promised to be paid in is a fund which the trustees cannot squander or give away. They are bound to call in what is unpaid and carefully to husband it when received. (Sawyer v. Hoag, 17 Wall., 610; Tuckerman v. Brown, 33 N. Y. 297; Ogilvie v. Knox Ins. Co., 22 How. R., 380; Osgood v. Taylin, 3 Keys, 521; 37 How. Pr. R., 63 affg, 48 Barb., 463; Gross Ill. Stat., P. 356, sec. 16). We are of the opinion that the alleged representation of the non-assessability of the stock held by him was quite immaterial. It was so held in Ogilvie v. Knox Ins. Co., 22 How., 380.

Again, if full effect is given to the evidence of the defendant, and to his claim in this respect, it shows this and nothing more: He became a stockholder under a certificate signed by the president and secretary, that he was entitled to one hundred shares of the stock of $100 each, payable five per cent. on receipt of the certificate; five per cent. in three months; five per cent. in six months; five per cent. in nine months from date; the time or manner of the payment of the residue not being specified. Upon the face of this certificate was stamped, in red ink, the figures $100, and in another place were stamped the words "non-assessable." This certificate he held until the insolvency of the company, in 1873, was known to him.

The legal effect of this instrument was to make the remaining eighty per cent. payable upon the demand of the company. We see no qualification of this result in the words "non-assessable." Assuming them to be incorporated into and to form a part of the contract, it is quite extravagant to allege that these words operate as a waiver of the obligation created by the acceptance and holding of a certificate to pay the amount due upon his shares. A promise to take shares of stock imports a promise to pay for them. (Palmer v. Lawrence, 3 Sand. S. C. R., 761; Bigham v. Mead, 10 Allen, 245). An acceptance and holding of a certificate has the same effect. (Auth. supra). At the most, the legal effect of the words in question is a stipulation against liability to further taxation or assessment after the holder shall have fulfilled his contract to pay the one hundred per cent. in the manner and at the times indicated. We cannot give to them the consequence of destroying the legal effect of the certificate.

Still again, the representations relied upon as a defense, it will be noticed, were as to the legal effect of the defendant's subscription and certificate. It is alleged that the agent represented that by the laws of the State of Illinois and by the charter of this company, the defendant might become a subscriber to the amount of $10,000, and by means of a certificate to be given to him like that exhibited, he would really be liable only to the extent of one-fifth of his said subscription, and that good lawyers had given their advice to that effect.

There was here no error, mistake or misrepresentation of any fact. The defendant made the subscription he intended to make, and received the certificate he had stipulated for, and as there is no evidence to the contrary, it is to be presumed the good lawyers advised as was stated; but in law the defendant incurred a larger liability than he anticipated. (Leavitt v. Palmer, 3 N. Y., 19.)

He had received, several days before this time, a copy of the charter and by-laws of the company, and then had them in his possession. The 25th section of the by-laws was as follows; "Every person who shall subscribe for $10,000 of stock and pay 20 per cent. thereof shall be constituted a director of this company, and shall continue such director so long as he shall retain of such stock an amount equal to $10,000; but such $10,000 shall not be reckoned in the election of other directors." It was under this section and the succeeding one, authorizing the establishment of a branch in any place where such subscription was made, and by which the defendant became a director, and might be president thereof, that the transaction took place.

The defendant did not read the charter and by-laws, if such were the fact, was his own fault. It will not do for a man to enter into a contract, and when called upon to respond to its obligations, to say that he did not read it when he signed it, or did not know what it contained. If this were permitted, contracts would not be worth the paper on which they are written. But such is not the law. A contractor must stand by the words of his contract, and if he will not read what he signs, he alone is responsible for his omission. (Jackson v. Croy, 12 John R., 427; Leis v. Stubbs, 6 Watt, 48; Farly v. Bryant, 32 Me., 474; Cuffing v. Taylor, 16 Ill., 457; Slafyton v. Scott, 13 Ves., 427; Alvanly v. Kinnaid, 2 MacG., 7; 29 Beavan, 490.) That a misrepresentation or misunderstanding of the law will not vitiate a contract, where there is no misunderstanding of the facts, is well settled.

In Fish v. Clelland (33 Ill., 243,) the principle is expressed in these words: "A representation of what the law will or will not permit to be done, is one on which the party to whom it is made has no right to rely, and if he does so it is his folly, and he cannot ask the law to relieve him from the consequences. The truth or falsehood of such a representation can be tested by ordinary vigilance and attention. It is an opinion in regard to the law, and is always understood as such." (See Starr v. Bennett, 5 Hill, 303; Lewis v. Jones, 4 B. & C., 506; Rashall v. Ford, Law Rep., 2 Eq., 750.) The law is presumed to be equally within the knowledge of all parties. That a stockholder may relieve himself from his liability by proof that he was misinformed as to the effect of his contract when he made it, would be a disastrous doctrine.

That a defendant who would not by contract lawfully relieve himself from liability as a stockholder, can accomplish that result by proof that it was fraudulently represented to him that he could so relieve himself, would be strange indeed. (Ogilvie v. Knox Ins. Co., 22 How., 380.) The rule that a mistake of law does not avail prevails in equity as well as at common law. (Bank of U. S: v. Daniel, 12 Pet. R., 32; Hunt v. Rensman, 1 Pet., 1; 8 Wheat., 174; Mellock v. Robertson, 25 Vt. R., 603; Lant v. Palmer, 3 Com., 19.)

"If ignorance of law was admitted as a ground of exemption, the court would be involved in questions which it were scarcely possible to solve, and which would render the administration of justice next to impossible, for in almost every case ignorance of law would be alleged, and the court would, for the purpose of determining this point, be often compelled to enter upon questions of fact insolvable and interminable." (Austin's Jour., Vol. 2, p. 172; Kerr, 397.)

A statement that the insurance company had consulted with good lawyers, and that their opinion was as stated, should have been clear proof to the defendant that a representation of law was a matter of opinion only. We think the judge erred in not charging as was requested.

The facts upon which the second point arise are these: Assuming that fraudulent representations had been made to the defendant respecting his non-liability for the 80 per cent., and that they were of a character that might relieve him from his contract, it was objected that he had not used proper diligence in discovering the fraud and in repudiating his contract. The transaction took place in August, 1870, and the defendant himself gave evidence "that he never suspected any liability, as to said 80 per cent., or that the said representation as to the laws of Illinois were false, until the agent of the assignee made a demand upon him for the 80 per cent., in the year 1873; and that as no claim had been made upon him, he never made any investigation as to the truth of such representations until after said demand in 1873." In February, 1871, the defendant did ask for a rescission of his contract, on the untenable ground that it had been fraudulently represented to him; that his note should be retained, and held in Bloomfield, Iowa, which representation had been violated by a sale of the same, and a removal thereof to the city of Chicago. The defendant is explicit and emphatic in his evidence that this attempted repudiation "was based wholly on what was represented" as to the intended disposition of the notes and mortgage.

The plaintiff thereupon requested the court to charge the jury as follows:

"7. That if the defendant offered to surrender his stock to the officers of the company, but not upon the ground that he had been induced to subscribe for the stock upon a fraudulent representation as to his liability for the 80 per cent., but upon another ground, to wit: that the company had sold and assigned his note and mortgages, then the evidence of such offer is immaterial, and the evidence of fraud as to such misrepresentation as to his liability for the 80 per cent. cannot be made available in this suit, and constitute no defense to this action.

"12. That if defendant was induced, in August, 1870, to become a stockholder of the Great Western Insurance Company by a representation of the agent of the company that 80 per cent. of the stock was non-assessable, and that the laws of the State of Illinois allowed the company to make such a contract with those who took stock, then it was the duty of the defendant to use reasonable diligence to ascertain the truth of such representations, and to ascertain what the law of Illinois was on that subject; that if he did not do so within a reasonable time, and did not ascertain the truth of said matter until after the insolvency of the company in 1873, then he cannot, as to the creditors of the company, maintain any defense by reason of such representations. The court instructs you, as matter of law, that the defendant could have ascertained the truth of such representations within a few months from the time they were made, and that not doing so is negligence on the part of the defendant that bars such defense as to the assignee."

The defense arising from the alleged promissory representations that the note and mortgage of the defendant should not be removed from Bloomfield, but should be retained in charge of the branch of the company at that place, was frivolous, and was practically abandoned on the trial. The case was submitted to the jury solely on the question arising upon the representation of the non-assessability of the 80 per cent. The attempted rescission on account of the representation as to non-removal and its violation was, however, unfortunately introduced into the charge, in a manner that prejudiced the right of plaintiff.

The requests, as above stated, were declined, but the judge charged the jury as follows: "That as respects creditors, the law requires of one who has been drawn by fraud into the purchase of stock, that he shall be guilty of no negligence or want of reasonable care in discovering the fraud, and in discovering it, promptly repudiating the purchase. If you find, from the evidence, that within a few months after receiving the stock certificate the defendant, discovering that he had been deceived in some respects, procured the agent who had obtained his certificate to go to Chicago, delivering to such agent his stock certificate, aud instructed the agent to surrender up the stock and demand back the note for 20 per cent; and if the agent accordingly went to Chicago and offered to the company to surrender up the stock and rescind the contract, which the company refused, and if you find that the defendant never afterwards acquiesced in being a member of the company; that in September, 1871, he brought an action in replevin for the note, based on the ground of fraud; and if all this took place before bankruptcy or insolvency of the company, I instruct that in point of law this is a sufficient repudiation of the contract to become a stockholder, to enable defendant living in another State, to resist an action for the payment of the 80 per cent., provided that you find defendant was induced to become a stockholder by fraud, as before explained; and also further find, in view of all the circumstances, that defendant was not unreasonably negligent in discovering the fraud, and was guilty of no want of reasonable diligence in taking steps to repudiate the transaction." To this charge the plaintiff excepted. The general principles set forth in this charge are no doubt sound.

If the alleged promissory representation as to the non-removal of the note had been available, and had been the question submitted to the jury, the charge would have been well enough. But that question was not before them. The questions submitted to them related exclusively to the representations that the 80 per cent. should not be required to be paid. That was the fraud before the jury, and the question involved in the 7th and 12th requests was this: Assuming that representation to be a fraud which would avoid the contract, had the defendant discharged his duty in discovering that fraud and in repudiating the contract on account of that fraud, and not on account of another fraud not now in question, we think the defendant was entitled to the opinion of the juryon that precise question. The charge refused him this right. The jury were charged that if within a few months after receiving the certificate, the defendant, discovering that he had been deceived, in some respects, sent an agent to Chicago, to surrender his certificate and demand his note, if he never afterwards acquiesced in being a member of the company; if he brought an action of replevin for the note, and if he refused to receive a dividend, this was sufficient evidence of repudiation. This was well enough as to the abandoned fraud, which was not before the jury, but was entirely inapplicable to the fraud that was before them. As to that fraud, the defendant testified that he had no knowldge or suspicion of its existence until after the demand made upon him in 1873, by the assignee, and that he never made any investigation as to the truth of the representation as to the 80 per cent. liability until after said demand, in 1873. On this point this was no contradictory evidence. It should have been ruled as a question of law. (Pettibone v. Stevens, 15 Cm.R., 19; Beers v. Bottsford, 13 St., 146.) The submission should have been made, if not held as a question of law, on these facts only, as requested, and the failure to do so and the introduction of the facts tending to show a repudiation on the ground of another fraud, could not fail to confuse the jury, and was error on the part of the judge. Wright's case (Law Rep. Eq. 12, 1871, p. 331-351,) is an authority on this point. It was there held, 1st. That under the English act a surrender and cancellation of shares did not relieve the holder from his liability to creditors of the bank; and 2nd, that a surrender by Wright of his shares in November, on the ground of an apprehended difficulty in the affairs of the bank, did not enable him to claim a rescission of his subscription on account of a fraudulent representation in the prospectus of the company, which fraud was then unknown to him. (Henderson v. Royal British Bank, 7 E & B., 356; Parris v. Harding, 1 C. B. N. S., 533; Oates v. Turquand, L.R. 2 Ap. Cases, 325.)

The principle laid down in the charge of the judge, that one who claims to have been drawn into a fraudulent purchase must exercise care and vigilance to discover the fraud, and must be prompt in repudiating his contract on the ground of such fraud, is a sound one. (Thomas v. Baxton, 48 N. Y. R., 193.)

The defendant sought to become a member of a corporation of the State of Illinois, and to obtain the benefits and advantages of its special privileges. If he is not held to be bound to know and accept all the consequences of this connection, he certainly is bound to use care and attention to ascertain his position and promptly to make his choice of retaining it with its advantages and responsibilities, or of abandoning it. To subscribe for stock in a corporation in August, 1870, to rest quietly until the year 1873, never making any investigation as to the position in which he stood until that time, and until after the assignee in bankruptcy had made a demand upon him, falls very short of what the law requires. Especially is this the case when it is shown that he lived in an adjoining State, that he had sent an agent to Chicago, and himself went to that city in 1871 to obtain his note and mortgage from that very company for an alleged misconduct in another respect. It was his plain duty to have inquired and to have ascertained his position long before he did. "A party must use reasonable diligence to ascertain the facts." (Buford v. Brown, 6 B. Monroe, 553.)

Mere lapse of time, where a party has not asserted his claim with reasonable diligence, is a bar to relief. Relief is not given to those who sleep on their rights. (Beckford v. Wall, 19 Ves., 87-97; Jones v. Taberville, 2 Ves. Jr., 11.)

Equity will not assist a man whose condition is attributable only to that want of diligence which he fairly expected from a reasonable person. (Duke of Beaufort v. Wall, 2 C. & Y., 248-286.)

Parties who are shareholders, and claim to be relieved on the ground of fraud, must act with the utmost diligence and promptitude. (Smith's case, L. R., 2 Ch. Ap., 613; Denton v. MacNeil L. R., 2 Eq., 532; Peels' case, L. R., 2 Ch. Ap., 684.)

The judgment must be reversed, and a new trial had.

Mr. Justice MILLER.

I am of the opinion that where an agent of an existing corporation procures a subscription of additional stock in it by fraudulent representations, the fraud can be relied on as a defense to a suit for the unpaid installments, when suit is brought by the corporation: and that if the stockholder has, in reasonable time, repudiated the contract and offered to rescind before the insolvency or bankruptcy of the corporation, the defense is valid against the assignee of the corporation.

I also think there was evidence of such fraud in this case, and that the question of reasonable diligence in the offer to rescind was fairly put to the jury by the Circuit Court.

I am authorized to say that the CHIEF JUSTICE and Mr. Justice BRADLEY concur in what I have here said.

UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT

No. 15.—OCTOBER TERM, 1875.

THE NATIONAL BANK OF COMMERCE, of Boston, State of Massachusetts, plaintiff in error,
v.
THE MERCHANTS' NATIONAL BANK, of Memphis, State of Tennessee.

In error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Massachusetts.

BILL OF LADING ATTACHED TO TIME DRAFT FORWARDED TO AGENT—ACCEPTANCE OF —DELIVERY OF BILL OF LADING.

That a bill of lading of merchandise deliverable to order, when attached to a time draft, and forwarded with the draft to an agent for collection, without any special instructions, may be surrendered to the drawee on his acceptance of the draft, and the agent's duty is not to hold the bill of lading, after the acceptance, for the payment.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

Mr. Justice STRONG delivered the opinion of the Court.

The fundamental question in this case is whether a bill of lading of merchandise deliverable to order, when attached to a time draft, and forwarded with the draft to an agent for collection, without any special instructions, may be surrendered to the drawee on his acceptance of the draft, or whether the agent's duty is to hold the bill of lading after the acceptance, for the payment. It is true there are other questions growing out of portions of the evidence, as well as one of the findings of the jury, but they are questions of secondary importance. The bills of exchange were drawn by cotton brokers residing in Memphis, Tennessee, on Green & Travis, merchants residing in Boston. They were drawn on account of cotton shipped by the brokers to Boston, invoices of which were sent to Green & Travis, and bills of lading were taken by the shippers, marked, in case of two of the shipments, "to order," and in case of the third shipment marked "for Green & Travis, Boston, Mass." There was an agreement between the shippers and the drawees that the bill of lading should be surrendered on acceptance of the bills of exchange, but the existence of this agreement was not known by the bank of Memphis when that bank discounted the drafts and took with them the bills of lading indorsed by the shippers. We do not propose to inquire now whether the agreement, under these circumstances, ought to have any effect upon the decision of the case. Conceding that bills of lading are negotiable, and that their indorsement and delivery pass the title of the shippers to the property specified in them, and, therefore, that the plaintiffs when they discounted the drafts and took the indorsed railroad receipts or bills of lading, became the owners of the cotton; it is still true they sent the bills with the drafts to their correspondents in New York, the Metropolitan Bank, with no instructions to hold them after acceptance. And the Metropolitan Bank transmitted them to the defendants in Boston, with no other instruction than that the bills were sent "for collection." What, then, was the duty of the defendants? Obviously it was first to obtain the acceptance of the bills of exchange. But Green & Travis were not bound to accept, even though they had ordered the cotton, unless the bills of lading were delivered to them contemporaneously with their acceptance. Their agreement with their vendors, the shippers, secured them against such an obligation. Moreover, independent of this agreement, the drafts upon their face showed that they had been drawn upon the cotton covered by the bills of lading. Both the plaintiffs and their agents, the defendants, were thus informed that the bills were not drawn upon any funds of the drawers in the hands of Green & Travis, and that they were expected to be paid out of the proceeds of the cotton. But how could they be paid out of the proceeds of the cotton if the bills of lading were withheld? Withholding them therefore, would defeat alike the expectation and the intent of the drawers of the bills. Hence, were there nothing more, it would seem that a drawer's agent to collect a time bill, without further instructions, would not be justified in refusing to surrender the property against which the bill was drawn, after its acceptance, and thus disable the acceptor from making payment out of the property designated for that purpose.

But it seems to be a natural inference, indeed a necessary implication, from a time draft accompanied by a bill of lading indorsed in blank, that the merchandise (which in this case was cotton) specified in the bill, was sold on credit, to be paid for by the accepted draft, or that the draft is a demand for an advance on the shipment, or that the transaction is a consignment to be sold by the drawee on account of the shipper. It is difficult to conceive of any other meaning the instruments can have. If so, in the absence of any express arrangement to the contrary, the acceptor, if a purchaser, is clearly entitled to the possession of the goods on his accepting the bill and thus giving the vendor a completed contract for payment. This would not be doubted if, instead of an acceptance, he had given a promissory note for the goods, payable at the expiration of the stipulated credit. In such a case it is clear the vendor could not retain possession of the subject of the sale after receiving the note for the price. The idea of a sale on credit is that the vendee is to have the thing sold, on his assumption to pay, and before actual payment. The consideration of the sale is the note. But an acceptor of a bill of exchange stands in the same position as the maker of a promissory note. If he has purchased on credit and is denied possesson until he shall make payment, the transaction ceases to be what it was intended, and is converted into a cash sale. Everybody understands that a sale on credit entitles the purchaser to immediate possession of the property sold, unless there be a special agreement that it may be retained by the vendor, and such is the well-recognized doctrine of the law. The reason for this is that very often, and with merchants generally, the thing purchased is needed to provide means for the deferred payment of the price. Hence, it is justly inferred that the thing is intended to pass at once within the control of the purchaser. It is admitted that a different arrangement may be stipulated for. Even in a credit sale it may be agreed by the parties that the vendor shall retain the subject until the expiration of the credit, as a security for the payment of the sum stipulated. But if so, the agreement is special, something superadded to an ordinary contract of sale on credit, the existence of which is not to be presumed. Therefore, in a case where the drawing of a time draft against a consignment raises the implication that the goods consigned have been sold on credit, the agent to whom the draft to be accepted and the bill of lading to be delivered have been entrusted cannot reasonably be required to know, without instruction, that the transaction is not what it purports to be. He has no right to assume and act on the assumption that the vendee's term of credit must expire before he can have the goods, and that he is bound to accept the draft, thus making himself absolutely responsible for the sum named therein, and relying upon the vendor's engagement to deliver at a future time. This would be treating a sale on credit as a mere executory contract to sell at a subsequent date.

And, if the inference to be drawn from a time draft accompanied by a bill of lading is not that it evidences a credit sale, but a request for advances on the credit of the consignment, the consequence is the same. Perhaps it is even more apparent. It plainly is that the acceptance is not asked on the credit of the drawer of the draft, but on the faith of the consignment. The drawee is not asked to accept on the mere assurance that the drawer will at a future day deliver the goods to reimburse the advances. He is asked to accept in reliance on a security in hand. To refuse to him that security is to deny him the basis of his requested acceptance. It is remitting him to the personal credit of the drawer alone. An agent for collection having the draft and attached bill of lading, cannot be permitted, by declining to surrender the bill of lading on the acceptance of the bill, to disappoint the obvious intentions of the parties, and deny to the acceptor a substantial right which by his contract is assured to him. The same remarks are applicable to the case of an implication that the merchandise was shipped to be sold on account of the shipper.

Nor can it make any difference that the draft with the bill of lading has been sent to an agent (as in this case) "for collection." That instruction means simply to rebut the inference from the indorsement that the agent is the owner of the draft. It indicates an agency. (Sweeney v. Easter, 1 Wallace, 166). It does not conflict with the plain inference from the draft and accompanying bill of lading that the former was a request for a promise to pay at a future time for goods sold on credit, or a request to make advances on the faith of the described consignment, or a request to sell on account of the shipper. By such a transmission to the agent he is instructed to collect the money mentioned in the drafts, not to collect the bill of lading. And the first step in the collection is procuring acceptance of the draft. The agent is, therefore, authorized to do all which is necessary to obtaining such acceptance. If the drawee is not bound to accept without the surrender to him of the consigned property or of the bill of lading, it is the duty of the agent to make that surrender, and if he fails to perform this duty, and in consequence thereof acceptance be refused, the drawer and indorsers of the draft are discharged. (Mason v. Hunt, 1 Douglas, 297).

The opinions we have suggested are supported by other very rational considerations. In the absence of special agreement, what is the consideration for acceptance of a time draft drawn against merchandise consigned? Is it the merchandise, or is it the promise of the consignor to deliver? If the latter, the consignor may be wholly irresponsible. If the bill of lading be to his order, he may, after acceptance of the draft, indorse it to a stranger, and thus wholly withdraw the goods from any possibility of their ever coming to the hands of the acceptor. Is, then, the acceptance a mere purchase of the promise of the drawer? If so, why are the goods forwarded before the time designated for payment? They are as much after shipment under the control of the drawer as they were before. Why incur the expense of storage and of insurance? And if the draft with the goods or with the bill of lading be sent to a bank for collection, as in the case before us, can it be incumbent upon the bank to take and maintain custody of the property sent during the interval between the acceptance and the time fixed for payment? (The shipments in this case were hundreds of bales of cotton). Meanwhile, though it be a twelve-month, and no matter what the fluctuations in the market value of the goods may be, are the goods to be withheld from sale or use? Is the drawee to run the risk of falling prices, with no ability to sell till the draft is due? If the consignment be of perishable articles, such as peaches, fish, butter, eggs, et cet., are they to remain in a warehouse until the term of credit shall expire? And who is to pay the warehouse charges? Certainly not the drawees. If they are to be paid by the vendor, or one who has succeeded to the place of the vendor by indorsement of the draft and bill of lading, he fails to obtain the price for which the goods were sold.

That the holder of a bill of lading, who has become such by indorsement, and by discounting the draft drawn against the consigned property, succeeds to the situation of the shipper, is not to be doubted. He has the same right to demand acceptance of the accompanying bill, and no more. If the shipper cannot require acceptance of the draft without surrendering the bill of lading, neither can the holder. Bills of lading, though transferable by indorsement, are only quasi negotiable. (1 Parsons on Shipping, 192; Blanchard v. Page, 8 Gray, 297, a). The indorser does not acquire a right to change the agreement between the shipper and his vendee. He cannot impose obligations or deny advantages to the drawee of the bill of exchange drawn against the shipment which were not in the power of the drawer and consignor. But were this not so, in the case we have now in hand, the agents for collection of the drafts were not informed, either by the drafts themselves or by any instructions they received, or in any other way, that the ownership of the drafts and bills of lading was not still in the consignors of the cotton. On the contrary, as the drafts were sent "for collection," they might well conclude that the collection was to be made for the drawers of the bills. We do not, therefore, perceive any force in the argument pressed upon us that the bank of Memphis was the purchaser of the drafts drawn upon Green and Travis, and the holder of the bills of lading by indorsement of the shippers.

It is urged that the bills of lading were contracts collateral to the bills of exchange which the bank discounted, and that when transferred they became a security for the principal obligation, namely, the contract evidenced by the bills of exchange; for the whole contract, and not a part of it, and that the whole contract required not only the acceptance, but the payment of the bills. The argument assumes the very thing to be proved, to wit: that the transfer of the bills of lading were made to secure the payment of the drafts. The opposite of this, as we have seen, is to be inferred from the bills of lading and the time drafts drawn against the consignments, unexplained by express stipulations. The bank, when discounting the drafts, was bound to know that the drawers on their acceptance were entitled to the cotton, and, of course, to the evidences of title to it. If so, they knew that the bills of lading could not be a security for the ultimate payment of the drafts. Payment of the drafts by the drawees was no part of the contract when the discounts were made. The bills of exchange were then incomplete. They needed acceptance. They were discounted in the expectation that they would be accepted, and that thus the bank would obtain additional promissors. The whole purpose of the transfers of the bills of lading to the bank may, therefore, well have been satisfied when the additional names were secured by acceptance, and when the drafts thereby became completed bills of exchange. We have already seen that whether the drafts and accompanying bills of lading evidenced sales on credit, or requests for advancements on the cotton consigned, or bailments to be sold on the consignor's account, the drawees were entitled to the possession of the cotton before they could be required to accept, and that if they had declined to accept because possession was denied to them concurrently with their acceptance, the effect would have been to discharge the drawers and indorsers of the drafts. The demand of acceptance, coupled with a claim to retain the bills of lading, would have been an insufficient demand. Surely, the purpose of putting the bills of lading into the hands of the bank was to secure the completion of the drafts by obtaining additional names upon them, and not to discharge the drawers and indorsers, leaving the bank only a resort to the cotton pledged.

It is said that if the plaintiffs were not entitled to retain the bills of lading as a security for the payment of the drafts after their acceptance, their only security for payment was the undertaking of the drawees, who were without means, and the promise of the acceptors, of whose standing and credit they knew nothing. This may be true, though they did know that the acceptors had previously promptly met their acceptances, which were numerous and large in amount. But if they did not choose to rely solely on the responsibility of the acceptors and drawers, they had it in their power to instruct their agents not to deliver the cotton until the drafts were paid. Such instructions are not infrequently given in case of time drafts against consignments, and the fact that they are given tends to show that in the commercial community it is understood, without them, agents for collection would be obliged to give over the bills of lading on acceptance of the draft. Such instructions would be wholly unnecessary, if it is the duty of such agents to hold the bills of lading as securities for the ultimate payment.

Thus far we have considered the question without reference to any other authority than that of reason. In addition to this, we think, the decisions of the courts and the language of many eminent judges accord with the opinions we avow. In the case of Lanfear v. Blossom, 1 Louis. An. Reps., 148, the very point was decided, after an elaborate argument both by the counsel and by the court. It was held that "where a bill of exchange drawn on a shipment, and payable a certain number of days after sight, is sold, with the bill of lading appended to it, the holder of the bill of exchange cannot, in the absence of proof of any local usage to the contrary, or of the imminent insolvency of the drawee, require the latter to accept the bill of exchange, except on the delivery of the bill of lading; and when, in consequence of the refusal of the holder to deliver the bill of lading, acceptance is refused and the bill protested, the protest will be considered as made without cause, the drawee not having been in default, and the drawer will be discharged." This decision is not to be distinguished in its essential features from the opinions we have expressed. A judgment in the same case to the same effect was given in the Commercial Court of New Orleans, by Judge Watts, who supported it by a very convincing opinion. (14 Hunt's Merchants' Magazine, 264). These decisions were made in 1845 and 1846. In other courts, also, the question has arisen, what is the duty of a collecting bank to which time drafts, with bills of lading attached, have been sent for collection? and the decisions have been that the agent is bound to deliver the bills of lading to the acceptor on his acceptance. In the case The Wisconsin Marine and Fire Insurance Company v. The Bank of British North America, 21 Upper Canada Queen's Bench Reps., 284, decided in 1861, where it appeared that the plaintiff, a bank at Milwaukee, Wisconsin, had sent to the defendants, a bank at Toronto, for collection, a bill drawn by A., at Milwaukee, on B., at Toronto, payable forty-five days after date, together with a bill of lading, indorsed by A., for certain wheat sent from Milwaukee to Toronto, it was held that, in the absence of any instructions to the contrary, the defendants were not bound to retain the bill of lading until payment of the draft by B., but were right in giving it up to him on obtaining his acceptance. This case was reviewed, in 1863, in the court of error and appeals, and the judgment affirmed. (2 Upper Canada Error and Appeals Reps., 282. See, also, Goodenough v. The City Bank, 10 Up. Canada Com. Pleas, 51; Clark v. The Bank of Montreal, 13 Grant's Cha., 211.)

There are also many expressions of opinion by the most respectable courts, which though not judgments, and, therefore, not authorities, are of weight in determining what are the implications of such a state of facts as this case exhibits. In Shepherd v. Harrison, Law Rep., Q. B., vol. 4, p. 493, Lord Cockburn said: "The authorities are equally good to show, when the consignor sends the bill of lading to an agent in this country, to be by him handed over to the consignee, and accompanies that with bills of exchange to be accepted by the consignee," that that "indicates an intention that the handing over of the bill of lading and the acceptance of the bill or bills of exchange, should be concurrent parts of one and the same transaction." The case subsequently went to the House of Lords, 5 H. L., 133, when Lord Cairns said: "If they (the drawees) accept the cargo and bill of lading, and accept the bill of exchange drawn against the cargo, the object of those who shipped the goods is obtained. They have got the bill of exchange in return for the cargo; they discount, or use it as they think proper, and they are virtually paid for the goods." In Coventry v. Gladstone, 4 Law Rep, Eq., 493, it was declared by the vice-chancellor that "the parties shipping the goods from Calcutta, in the absence of any stipulation to the contrary, did give their agents in England full authority, if they thought fit, to pass over the bill of lading to the person who had accepted the bill of exchange" drawn against the goods and attached to the bill of lading, and it was ruled that an alleged custom of trade to retain the bill of lading until payment of the accompanying draft on account of the consignment was exceptional, and was not established as being the usual course of business. In Schuhart et al. v. Hall et al., 39 Maryland, 590, which was a case of a time draft, accompanied by a bill of lading, hypothecated by the drawer, both for the acceptance and payment of the draft, and when the drawers had been authorized to draw against the cargo shipped, it was said by the court, "under their contract with the defendants the latter were authorized to draw only against the cargo of wheat to be shipped by the Ocean Belle, and they (the drawees) were, therefore, not bound to accept without the delivery to them of the bill of lading." See, also, the language of the judges in Gurney v. Behrend, 3 E. and Bl., 622; Marine Bank v. Wright, 48 N. Y., —; Cayuga Bank v. Daniels, 47 N. Y., 631.

We have been unable to discover a single decision of any court holding the opposite doctrines. Those to which we have been referred as directly in point, determine nothing of the kind. Gilbert v. Guignon, Law Reps., 8 Cha., 16, was a contest between two holders of several bills of lading of the same shipment. The question was which had priority. It was not at all whether the drawee of a time draft against a consignment has not a right to the bill of lading when he accepts. The drawer had accepted without requiring the surrender of the first indorsed bill of lading, and the lord chancellor, while suggesting a query whether he might not have declined to accept unless the bills of lading were at the same time delivered up to him, remarked, "if he was content they should remain in the hands of the holder, it was exactly the same thing as if he had previously and originally authorized that course of proceeding, and that (according to the chancellor's view) was actually what had happened in the case." Nothing, therefore, was decided respecting the rights of the holder of a time draft, to which a bill of lading is attached, as against the drawee. The contest was wholly inter alios partes.

Seymour v. Newton, 105 Mass., 272, was the case of an acceptance of the draft, without the presentation of the bill of lading. In that respect it was like Gilbert v. Guignon. No question, however, was made in regard to this. The acceptor became insolvent before the arrival of the goods, and all that was decided was that, under the circumstances, the jury would be authorized to find that the lien of the shippers had not been discharged. It was a case of stoppage in transitu. It is true that in delivering the opinion of the court Chief Justice Chapman said "the obvious purpose was that there should be no delivery to the vendee till the draft should be paid." But the remark was purely obiter, uncalled for by anything in the case. Newcomb v. The Boston and Lowell Railroad Corporation, 115 Mass., 230, was also the case of acceptance of sight drafts without requiring the delivery of the attached bills of lading, and the contest was not between the holder of the drafts and the acceptor. It was between the holder of the drafts with the bills of lading, and the carrier. We do not perceive that the case has any applicability to the question we have now under consideration. True, there as in the case of Seymour v. Newton, it was remarked by the judge who delivered the opinion, "the railroad receipts were manifestly intended to be held by the collecting bank as security for the acceptance and payment of the drafts." Intended by whom? Evidently the court meant by the drawees and the bank, for it is immediately added: "They continued to be held by the bank after the drafts had been accepted by Chandler & Co. (the drawees), and until, at Chandler & Co.'s request, they were paid by the plaintiff, and the receipts with the drafts still attached were indorsed and delivered by Chandler & Co. to the plaintiff." In Stollenwork et al v. Thatcher et al., 115 Mass., 224, (the only other case cited by the defendants in error as in point on this question), there were instructions to the agent to deliver the bill of lading only on payment of the draft, and it was held that the special agent thus instructed, could not bind his principal by a delivery of the bill without such payment. Nothing was decided that is pertinent to the present case. In Bank v. Bayley, reported in the same volume, 228, where the instructions given to the collecting agent were, so far as it appears, only that the drafts and bills of lading were remitted for collection, and where acceptance was refused, Chief Justice Grey said "the drawees of the draft attached to each of the bills of lading were not entitled to the bill of lading or the property described therein, except upon acceptance of the draft." It is but just to say, however, that this remark as well as those made by the same judge in the other Massachusetts cases cited, was aside from the decision of the court.

After this review of the authorities cited, as in point, in the very elaborate argument for the defendants in error, we feel justified in saying that, in our opinion, no respectable case can be found in which it has been decided that when a time draft has been drawn against a consignment to order, and has been forwarded to an agent for collection with the bill of lading attached, without any further instructions, the agent is not justified in delivering over the bill of lading on the acceptance of the draft.

If this, however, were doubtful, the doubt ought to be resolved favorably to the agent. In the case in hand, the Bank of Commerce having accepted the agency to collect, was bound only to reasonable care and diligence in the discharge of its assumed duties. (Warren v. The Suffolk Bank, 10 Cushing, 582.) In a case of doubt, its best judgment was all the principal had a right to require. If the absence of specific instructions left it uncertain what was to be done further than to procure acceptances of the drafts, and to receive payment when they fell due, it was the fault of the principal. If the consequence was a loss, it would be most unjust to cast the loss on the agent.

Applying what we have said to the instruction given by the learned judge of the circuit court to the jury, it is evident that he was in error. Without discussing in detail the several assignments of error, it is sufficient for the necessities of this case, to say it was a mistake to charge the jury as they were charged, that "in the absence of any consent of the owner of a bill of exchange, other than such as may be implied from the mere fact of sending 'for collection' a bill of exchange with a bill of lading pasted or attached to a bill of exchange, the bank so receiving the two papers for collection would not be authorized to separate the bill of lading from the bill of exchange and surrender it before the bill of exchange was paid." And again, there was error in the following portion of the charge: "But if the Metropolitan Bank merely sent to the defendant bank the bills of exchange with the bills of lading attached for collection, with no other instructions, either expressed or implied from the past relations of the parties, they would not be so justified in surrendering (the bills of lading) on acceptance only." The Bank of Commerce can be held liable to the owners of the drafts for a breach of duty in surrendering the bills of lading on acceptance of the drafts only after special instructions to retain the bills until payment of the acceptances. The drafts were all time drafts. One, it is true, was drawn at sight, but in Massachusetts, such drafts are entitled to grace.

What we have said renders it unnecessary to notice the other assignments of error.

The judgment of the circuit court is reversed and the record is remitted with directions to award a new trial.

KNOXVILLE, JUNE 19, 1875.

CHRISTOPHER GRAVES v. SUSAN FITZGERALD.

SOLDIER—LIABILITY OF, FOR TAKING FORAGE.—If the soldiers were foraging for supplies, the defendant, being a soldier, would be strictly in the line of his duty as such, in causing or advising the soldiers to procure corn from the plaintiff's farm, if corn was a necessary article of supply, and for so doing he would not be liable.—[ED. Commercial and Legal Reporter.]

NICHOLSON, C. J.

This cause was before the court at its last term, when the judgment was reversed because the proof failed to sustain the verdict as to the mules and horse alleged to have been taken by Graves. As to the corn alleged to have been taken, the court expressly waived the expression of any opinion as to whether there was proof enough to sustain the verdict. The cause has again been tried in the court below, as to the liability of Graves for the corn, and it appears that the same evidence was submitted to the jury as on the former trial, and the jury have found against Graves. He appealed.

It appears from the proof that if Graves is liable it is not for having taken the corn, but for having induced Confederate soldiers engaged in foraging to take it. The evidence is weak as to his having procured Confederate soldiers to take it. But under the settled rule on this subject, we could not disturb the verdict, unless we find in the charge of the court some error which may have misled the jury. It appears that Graves was a Confederate soldier, and lived a close neighbor to the plaintiff. The Confederate forces were encamped in the neighborhood, and obtained their supplies from most of the farmers, including those of plaintiff and defendant. The defence was relied on, that as the corn was taken by the Confederate soldiers for supplies, even if defendant was cognizant of the taking and concerned in it, that he would not be liable. On this branch of the case the judge charged the jury that "if the defendant was a soldier and in the line of his duty as such, and the corn was taken by him or his command when foraging upon the country, or under orders, he may avail himself of this defence under the plea of not guilty, and he would not be liable; but if he was not in the line of his duty, the fact that he was a soldier would not protect him in taking the corn or causing it to be taken."

It appears that after having retired, the jury returned and asked for further instructions, when, among other things, the court told them that "if soldiers were in the neighborhood, defendant would not make himself liable by giving them information that plaintiff had corn, unless he caused them to take it, or advised them to do so." After this additional charge was given, the jury found for plaintiff. The inference is that they so found under the charge that if the defendant caused the soldiers to take the corn or advised them to do so, he would be liable. This was virtually telling the jury that defendant would not be in the line of his duty, if he caused the soldiers or advised them to take the corn. If the soldiers were foraging for supplies, the defendant being a soldier, would be strictly in the line of his duty as such soldier in causing or advising the soldiers to procure corn from plaintiff's farm, if corn was a necessary article of supply, and for so doing he would not be liable.

We are, therefore, of opinion that the last instruction given to the jury was erroneous, and may have misled them. We are also of opinion that the court erred in refusing to instruct the jury when so requested, that "if the corn was taken by the Confederate soldiers for supplies for the Confederate army, that Graves, the defendant, would not be civilly liable, if he recommended said soldiers to take the corn for necessary supplies for their army as forage."

For the errors indicated, the judgment is reversed.

SUPREME COURT OF TENNESSEE.

ISAAC S. DAVIDSON et al. v. MATTHEW SHEARON Administrator de bonis non of the estate of JAMES A. GAUT, deceased.

LIEN OF JUDGMENT—NOT EXTENDED BY REVIVOR.—The levy of an execution being made more than twelve months from the date of the judgment, and the execution being issued in the name of the administrator of the creditor, it is held that a revivor in the name of the administrator was not for this purpose a new judgment, and the lien did not extend from the date of the revivor. The lien is only given by statute, and cannot be extended by construction.

MCFARLAND, J.—On the 8th day of December, 1859, James A. Gaut recovered a judgment against Benj. Mosely in the Circuit court of Bedford county. During the year 1860, the complainants severally purchased tracts of land from Mosely and took deeds, and had them duly presented and noted for registration, and, as we suppose, registered.

This bill was filed by the complainants to enjoin a sale of their several tracts of land under an execution issued upon said judgment, and levied in January, 1861, more than twelve months from the date of the judgment, and after the execution and registration of their deeds.

The question is, whether the lien of the judgment was lost before the levy; the levy being more than twelve months from the date of the judgment. It was certainly lost unless there be something else in the case.

The record shows that James A. Gaut died in March, 1860, and that the execution that issued in January, 1861, was in the name of Robert Cannon, administrator of his estate. It is argued that this had the effect to extend the lien, or that a revivor in the name of the administrator was a new judgment, and that the lien extended from that time; but we think this position cannot be maintained. The lien is only given by statute, and cannot be extended by construction, and there is no such exception as to the limit of its duration. If it were a statute of limitation, which it is not, the death of the plaintiff would not effect it. The revivor is not for this purpose a new judgment.

It is said, as to one of the tracts of land, Mosely only acquired title after the judgment and within the twelve months, and as to this the lien was still in force, but the record does not establish this fact.

The decree of the Chancellor must be affirmed with costs.—The Commercial and Legal Reporter.

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

ABSTRACT OF OPINIONS FILED AT SPRINGFIELD, OCTOBER 13TH, 1875.

231.—Village of Princeville v. Peter Austen et al.—Error to Peoria.—Opinion by SCOTT, J. 7 pp.

PRESUMPTION IN REGARD TO DEDICATION OF LAND TO A VILLAGE—PAROL EVIDENCE.

STATEMENT.—Bill to enjoin the removal, by the village trustees, of the town hall to a vacant square in the village plat, which had not been divided into lots, and which was not explained on the plat, or accompanying certificates, as to what purpose was intended in its dedication to the public. The question is, what should the design of the square be presumed to be—whether for a park or a place for municipal buildings, or other purpose? Held,

1. That there is no usage by which this question can be determined conclusively; but the village not being a county town, the more reasonable presumption is that the vacant square was designed by the dedicator as a public park, and especially as the town hall and calaboose had been erected elsewhere, and an attempt formerly to locate the school house on the square had been defeated by the citizens.

2. The privilege of building houses of any kind on the square could only exist by a grant, or an act of the donor equivlent to a grant; and any citizen interested can object successfully to such appropriation otherwise.

3. Parol evidence is available, in such case, to show the object of the dedication.

244.—Samuel Wing et al. v. Edward Sherrer.—Appeal from Superior Court of Cook county.—Opinion by SCOTT, J. 7 pp.

BILL TO QUIET TITLE TO LANDS—EQUITY JURISDICTION—TITLE OF COMPLAINANT.

Held, 1. That, under the act of 1869, a court of equity will entertain a bill to quiet title where lands in controversy are unimproved, or unoccupied. This branch of equity jurisprudence is in the sound discretion of the court, as is the rescission of contracts, specific performance, etc.

2. In all cases arising out of fraud, equity has concurrent jurisdiction with courts of law; but parties will be referred to that forum where justice can be more effectually administered, and the right most satisfactorily established. In all cases of a doubtful character, it is better the parties should be remitted to their remedy at law, although equity might entertain jurisdiction.

3. In all cases for clearing title, the complainant must prove his title clearly.

264.—Alexander R. Chesnut v. Emily Chesnut. — Appeal from Morgan. — Opinion by SCOTT, J. 6 pp.

STATEMENT.—Proceedings by scire facias on a record; husband and wife; dismissal of bill for divorce; effect thereof.

Held, 1. That, strictly speaking, no evidence can be heard on such scire facias other than the record declared on, unless as to the question of amount.

[The record herein was an order for temporary alimony in a divorce case brought by the husband and afterwards dismissed.]

2 The dismissal of a bill for divorce discharges an order for temporary alimony.

3. Where scire facias is brought on a record to enforce the payment of money, the money must be certain, or capable of being made certain, by mere computation.

4. Scire facias will not lie upon an order for temporary alimony, in any event.

5. A married woman cannot sue her husband in an action at law, unless in regard to her separate property.

200.—Otis L. Wheelock v. Elias Kast et al.—Appeal from Macon.—Opinion by SCOTT, J., WALKER, C. J., dissenting.

OSTENSIBLE STOCKHOLDERS IN A BANK—LIABILITY—ESTOPPEL.

STATEMENT.—Bill against stockholders of a bank to compel them to pay a judgment against it, the bank being insolvent. Appellant, for mere accommodation and the credit of the bank, as is said, stood as a stockholder on its books; but he held the stock as collateral security for loans to the bank and indemnity against his accommodation note given the bank. This he set up in defense; and also the illegal organization of the bank.

Held, 1. That where shares in a bank are hypothecated, and placed in the name of a transferee, he will be subjected to all the liabilities of ordinary owners, because the legal ownership appears to be in him.

2. Whether a bank has been regularly organized is not a defense that can be used by a stockholder, as against a bona fide creditor, if it appears there was an organization de facto, and that such stockholder participated in its transactions.

THE CHICAGO RIFLE CLUB.

There will be a spirited contest on the range of the Chicago Rifle Club to-day for the Root prize, consisting of some rare old books. The following racy letter of Mr. Root, accompanying the prize, explains the nature of the contest:

CHICAGO, Nov. 19.—HON. JAMES B. BRADWELL, President Chicago Rifle Club—Dear Sir: I take great pleasure in sending you the books which constitute the prize to be contested for by the club tomorrow. They are valuable because of their antiquity, and because they contain a true and ably written account of poetry, customs, art, religion, history, geography, manners, as understood at that time. In those days writers and travelers had not learned to lie, and the word "sensational" was unused. I have examined these volumes in vain to find any account of a rifle club. There were then no Remingtons, Maynard, or Sharps. A thousand-yard target was rather too much for "Queen Ann's arms."

Shooting has contributed very much to the literature of the world. Without the illustrations afforded by shooting, our poets, divines, authors, and lawyers, would fall far short of the mark of expressing their ideas clearly and with force.

How often a story is told, or a character described by a single quotation from some remarks made by a sagacious coon in Kentucky: "If that's you, Capt. Scott, don't shoot, I'll come down."

The poets seem to have traveled around with the score of the Chicago Rifle Club in their pockets, for have they not exclaimed, written, and promulgated their high appreciation of the worthy art?

Aimest thou at princes?—Pope.
Each at the head leveled his deadly aim.—Milton.
Beware the secret snake that shoots a sting.—Dryden.
She shoots the Stygian sound.—Dryden.
To teach the young idea how to shoot.—Thompson.

(This Thompson is the one that shot in Michigan.)

These preachers make
His head to shoot and ache.—Herbert.

Probably because he was bullet headed.

All boys are advised to "aim high," clearly showing that the author of this was a marksman, and was conversant with the effect of gravitation on the bullet. The advice, however, does not go far enough, merely "aiming high" is not sufficient. It should read, "aim high and watch the wind."

Napoleon, on one occasion, sent a dispatch to the English, informing them they were thrashed, whereupon some gentleman, having a true appreciation of the noble art, responded:

We thank you for your bullet in,
Great emperor, king and elf;
But we would be better pleased
With a bullet in yourself.

"Hit him in the eye," "Let drive," "Draw a bead," "Centre shot," "Bang away," "Knocked the spots off," are all well turned and elegant expressions in daily use to express all sorts of ideas, but all borrowed from the nomenclature of the rifle club.

Science has, indeed, attained a wonderful attainment, when, by a slight movement of a finger a leaden messenger speeds away a third of a mile to its work of destruction. Let science be utilized in the defense of our flag, the destruction of many squirrels, and the winning of many prizes. Yours truly,

JAMES P. ROOT.

WE call attention to the following opinions, reported at length in this issue:

LIABILITY OF A STOCKHOLDER ON A CONDITIONAL SUBSCRIPTION.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States, by HUNT, J.. as to the liability of a stockholder on a conditional subscription to an insurance company on an action brought by the assignee in bankruptcy of the insurance company, as to what constitutes fraudulent representations in obtaining subscriptions to stock, and whether such representations can be relied on as a defense to a suit for the unpaid installments. MILLER, J., files a dissenting opinion, in which WAITE, C. J., and BRADLEY, J., concur. This case has attracted much attention throughout the country. Senator UPTON of this city, the assignee of the Great Western Insurance Company, is entitled to the thanks of the creditors interested in the fund for the able manner in which he has prosecuted the stockholders, who sought to throw off their legal liability.

BILL OF LADING ATTACHED TO TIME DRAFT FORWARDED TO AGENT—ACCEPTANCE OF—DELIVERY OF BILL OF LADING ON ACCEPTANCE.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States, by STRONG, J., holding that a bill of lading of merchandise, deliverable to order when attached to a time draft and forwarded, with the draft, to an agent for collection, without any special instructions, may be surrendered to the drawee on his acceptance of the draft, and the agent's duty does not require him to hold the bill of lading, after the acceptance, for the payment. This is an exceedingly important opinion to commercial men and bankers.

LIEN OF JUDGMENT NOT EXTENDED BY REVIVOR.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of Tennessee, by MCFARLAND, J., held, where the levy of an execution was made more than twelve months from the date of the judgment, and the execution was issued in the name of the administrator of the creditor, that a revivor of the judgment in the name of the administrator was not for this purpose a new judgment, and the lien did not extend from the date of revivor.

SOLDIER.—LIABILITY FOR TAKING FORAGE.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of Tennessee, by Nicholson C. J. Holding, that a person who had his corn taken by a party of Confederate soldiers for forage could not, in a civil action against a party advising the soldiers to take it, recover its value.

ENROLLMENT AND LICENSE OF CANAL BOATS.

United States Attorney General PIERREPONT has given an opinion that under the act of April 18, 1874, Revised Statutes, 4371, canal boats employed on navigable waters of the United States, not provided with sails or propelling machinery of their own, adapted to lake or coastwise navigation, and not employed in trade with the Canadas, are exempt from the law requiring them to be enrolled as vessels of the United States, as well where, in the trade in which they are engaged, they may never enter a canal of any State, as where their voyages are partly on such navigable waters and partly on a State canal; that there is no restriction as to the locality of the navigable waters on which they may be employed; that the rule as to exemption from enrollment and license is not limited in its operation to waters within the interior of each State, but extends generally to any waters coming under the denomination of navigable waters of the United States, irrespective of their geographical location.

JUDGE McALLISTER.

RESIGNATION OF HIS SEAT ON THE SUPREME BENCH.

On the 16th instant, Judge MCALLISTER tendered his resignation as Associate Justice of the Supreme Court, in the following letter:

CHICAGO, Nov. 16, 1875.

The Hon. John L. Beveridge, Governor of the State of Illinois.

SIR: I hereby tender my resignation of the office of Judge of the Supreme Court of this State, to take effect at the time your commission to me as Circuit Judge of Cook County.

As the above indicates the nature of the step I am about to take, its seeming singularity demands a word of explanation, not so much on account of my own personal interest, but because the circumstances which have compelled me to take it arise chiefly from defects in the constitutional scheme respecting the Supreme Court itself, resulting in inequality of labors, duties, and responsibilities among its members. The State is divided into seven districts, from each of which a judge is elected. The Constitution requires each judge to reside in the district in which he is elected. The purpose of this, as construed by the Court, was the convenience of suitors and attorneys in respect to all business to be done by a single judge in vacation. Hence, there has come into force an unwritten rule that it belongs to each judge to attend to all such business as may arise in his district.

The division of the State into districts was evidently made upon the basis of population — numbers — without reference to the probable extent of judicial business.

This, as the practical working of the system clearly demonstrates, was a serious mistake. The business of the Court has steadily increased until it has reached upwards of 700 cases a year, requiring opinions to be written. That is, over 100 opinions for each judge, when the terms themselves take five months of the year, at which but few opinions can be written.

The bulk of the work has to be done in vacation. Now, it is an indisputable fact that upwards of one half of all this work comes from the city of Chicago alone. This great mass of business from Chicago has its multifarious incidents of which no man without actual experience can scarcely conceive. Applications for supersedeas in cases both civil and criminal; to continue injunctions after appeals; for stay-orders, on petition for rehearing. The city of Chicago being in my district, no sooner do I return home from a term than I am beset with these applications. I have had from thirty to forty of them every vacation, while my brethren will none of them have half-a-dozen in a year, and some of them not over two or three. It has been the determination of a majority of the Court to keep up with the business, excessive as it has become. Cases are divided among the judges by lot, all taking an equal share, to write opinions in; so each one knows just what he has got to do. Notwithstanding the great inequality of situation, I have taken my equal share with the others. But it has been utterly impossible, on account of the numerous interruptions to which I have referred, to do my work satisfactorily, or to keep up with it. In spite of all effort, it would accumulate and oppress me like a nightmare. In February, 1874, I was taken sick, and was disabled from work for two months. By this the ground was irrevocably lost, though a vigorous effort was made to recover it during the summer and fall vacation of that year. In February, 1875, being in good health I resolved to clear off the remnants of three terms, comprising some sixty cases, before the June term. I fought off the lawyers with their applications for orders, and by the 5th of May had fifty-three cases done; but there came a worse visitor, paralysis of the optic nerve of one eye, with indications that the other would soon go in the same way. That calamity made it necessary for me to stop all continuous writing. But I could not cease writing and stay in the Court, neither was I in a condition to resume the practice of law. From this serious dilemma, the Bar of Chicago, with more than brotherly kindness, and the electors of Cook county, with unexampled magnanimity, have relieved me by transferring me to another field of labor, where, though the duties will be arduous, they will not require that kind of application which outraged Nature has so sternly inhibited.

In point of theoretical dignity, the transition is a step downwards; in life's higher hopes it is a blight, and disappointed ambition might excusably cause a tear. But then the hand which helps me down, though so powerful, has been so gently given, that when I think of the slavery from which I have escaped, the descent is made with but few pangs of mortification. Aside from my duty to my family, I have now two prominent objects of life; one to fulfill my obligations of gratitude to the city of Chicago and cook County: the other to pity my successor in the Supreme Court. If the Court continue in its determination to keep up with the business, and the law remains as it is now, he must struggle alone with burdens which ought to be shared by three at least. If more than half of the business of the State arises from Chicago, which is an indisputable fact, then it follows that at least three of the judges should have been located here, and not have all the incidents of that business thrown upon one as it has been upon me. Yours, etc.,

W. K. MCALLISTER.

NUMBERING BALLOTS.

Last year D. HARRY HAMMER, a member of the bar of this city, handed his ballot to the judges of election with the request that they should not number it. The judges disregarded his request and numbered his ticket. He brought suit against the judges in the Circuit Court of this county, and the case was tried before Judge ROGERS, without a jury. He found the defendants guilty, and assessed the damages at ten dollars. The defendants appealed to the Supreme Court. The case is now pending in that tribunal, having been submitted at the last June term. We published the opinion of Judge ROGERS in 7 CHICAGO LEGAL NEWS, 167, holding the law requiring the ballots to be numbered to be unconstitutional.

At the last election in this city some of the judges refused to number the ballots. Last week an attempt was made to get them indicted by the grand jury of the Criminal Court of this county. State's Attorney REED addressed a letter of inquiry to Judge JAMESON, who is holding the Criminal Court this month, as to the constitutionality of the law. Judge JAMESON, who is the author of a work upon constitutional conventions, and has spent a large portion of his life in the examination of constitutional questions, after a very careful examination, in response to the letter of Mr. REED, holds that so much of the law as requires the ballots to be numbered, is unconstitutional. The letter of Mr. REED and the opinion of Judge JAMESON are given below.

THE STATE'S ATTORNEY'S INQUIRY.

The Hon. John A. Jameson, Judge of the Criminal Court of Cook County:

OFFICE OF STATE'S ATTORNEY, CHICAGO, Nov. 10, 1875.—I desire, for use of the Grand Jury now in session, your opinion whether or not Sec. 55, page 459, of the Revised Statutes, is constitutional. That section requires judges of election to number each ballot, by indorsing on the ballot the number corresponding with the number of the voter on the poll-books. His Honor Judge Rogers, in an opinion in the case of Hammer v. Swift et al., published in the LEGAL NEWS, Feb. 15, 1875, held that section unconstitutional. He referred to the case of Williams v. Stein, 33 Indiana, p. 89, where a similar law was declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Court of Indiana.

If your honor agrees with Judge Rogers, then it will be useless for the Grand Jury to present indictments against the judges of election for a violation of said Sec. 55. Yours, etc.,

CHARLES H. REED,
State's Attorney.

JUDGE JAMESON'S OPINION.

The Hon. C. H. Reed, State's Attorney, Cook County, Illinois:

CHICAGO, Nov. 15.—You ask my opinion "whether or not Sec. 55, page 459, of the Revised Statutes, is constitutional." That section requires the judges of election to number each ballot, by indorsing on the same the number corresponding with the number of the voter on the poll-books. The facts are, that the judges of election, at the election in November, in one or more of the wards, neglected or refused to number certain ballots as required by the statute referred to, and for this supposed offense they have been complained of to the Grand Jury.

The Constitution of the State (1870) provides, Art. VII., Sec. 2, that "all votes shall be by ballot."

The Revised Statutes of 1874, page 458 and following, contain a construction of the word "ballot" as understood by the Legislature. Thus, Sec. 52 of Art. 46, on elections, after repeating the constitutional provision given above, continues as follows: "The ballot shall be folded by the voter and delivered to one of the judges of election, and if the judges be satisfied that the person offering the vote is a legal voter, the clerks of election shall enter the name of the voter and his number under the proper heading in the poll-books, and the judges shall indorse on the back of the ticket offered the number corresponding with the number of the voter on the poll-books, and shall immediately put the ticket into the ballot-box." Sec. 59 provides further, that the ballots shall be sealed up and sent to the proper officer—the county clerk—"who shall carefully preserve said ballots for six months, and at the expiration of that time shall destroy them by burning, without the package being opened; provided, in case of contested election, the same shall not be destroyed till such ontest is finally determined; but the parties contesting the same shall have the right to have the said package of ballots opened, and said ballots referred to by witnesses for the purpose of such contest." Upon these quotations two questions arise:

First—Whether by the term "ballot," in the Constitution, is meant an absolutely secret vote; and,

Second—Whether, if that is so, the sections quoted from the Law of Elections infringe the Constitution by making the ballot an open vote.

First—As to the meaning of the term ballot. We must presume, in the absence of decisive indications to the contrary, that the word is employed here as it has been at all times in other countries, particularly that from which we sprang, England.

The term ballot, from the Spanish word "balota," or the French word "balote," both meaning a little ball, is accordingly defined by Worcester to mean: (1) "A little ball, a slip of paper, or anything which is used in giving a secret vote; (2) a secret method of voting at elections." It is evident there are no tokens by which he who casts a ball of a particular color secretly into a box can be ascertained except by his own revelation. The same idea of secrecy is contained in the definition of "ballot," found in the Penny Cyclopædia; "ballot," "a word," it says, "used to designate a mode of voting employed upon occasions where it is considered desirable to preserve secrecy in regard to the opinion of each voter." (Penny Cyclopædia, title "Ballot.')

The same definition has for a century and a half been given to the word ballot in England, during which time a contest has been going on between those favoring and those opposing the ballot at elections. Hallam's Const. His. Eng.. p. 602 (note); May's Const. His. Eng., Vol. I., pp. 330, 352; Vol. II., pp. 235, 537. The advocates of the ballot declared that the landlords in the counties and wealthy customers in towns, coerced the free-will of the electors, and forced them to vote against their opinions and consciences. As a protection against such practices the necessity of secret voting by ballot was contended for. (May's Const. His. Eng. ubi supra.)

The following citations will indicate that their authors gave the same definition to the term. Filangieri (died at Naples in 1788) was opposed to the introduction of the ballot in place of the public vote, on the ground that "when the vote was public, questions for deliberation were more fully discussed, and that the people would have the benefit of the sentiments of the principal citizens." Here the contrast between the public vote and the ballot indicates the author's opinion as to the secrecy of the latter. (Heron, History of Jurisprudence, pp. 609-610.)

McCrary, in his work on the American Law of Elections, says: "The chief reason for the general adoption of the ballot in this country is that it affords the voter the means of preserving the secrecy of his vote; and this enables him to vote independently and freely, without being subject to be overawed, intimidated, or in any manner controlled by others, or to any ill-will or persecution on account of his vote. The secret ballot is justly regarded as an important and valuable safeguard for the protection of the voter, and particularly the humble citizen against the influence which wealth and station may be supposed to exercise. And it is for this reason that the privacy is held not to be limited to the moment of depositing the ballot, but is sacredly guarded by the law for all time, unless the voter himself shall voluntary divulge it." Citing People v. Pease, 27 N. Y., 81.

Judge Cooley, also, in his excellent work on Constitutional Limitations, says: "Public policy requires that the veil of secrecy should be impenetrable unless the voter himself voluntarily determines to lift it. His ballot is absolutely privileged, and to allow evidence of its contents, when he has not waived the privilege, is to encourage treachery and fraud, and it would in effect establish this remarkable anomaly, that, while the law, from motives of public policy, establishes the secret ballot, with a view to conceal the elector's action, it, at the same time, encourages a system of espionage, by means of which the veil of secrecy may be penetrated, and the voter's action disclosed to the public.' Pp. 506-7.

I will now refer to certain decisions of courts, involving a construction of the term ballot. I cite, first, Hartt v. Harney, 32 Barb., 55. The court say: "The rule, therefore, is, that the moment the ballot is deposited all control over it, and all power to inquire as to its legality, by the officers of the election, is ended."

The next case is Commonwealth v. Read, 2 Ashmead (Pa.), 261. The syllabus will state the case:

"If a quorum of the proper body" (meaning of a county board to which had been given the power to choose the county treasurer) "be present, and a majority of them either refuse to vote or vote in a manner different from that prescribed by law, a minority composed even of a single member is sufficient to make a valid election. If the law require the vote to be by ballot, and the majority vote viva voce, a single ballot, if given and received as such, is sufficient." In this case, the law under which the board were acting required them to elect certain officers by ballot. As the entire board, save one member, failed to vote thus, it was held that the vote of but that one was valid.

One of the most important cases is that of Williams v. Stein, 38 Ind., 89, of which, also, I shall read only the syllabus, which is as follows: "The second section of the acts of the Indiana legislature, approved May 13, 1869 (3 Ind. Stat., 235), requiring the inspector of any election on receiving the ballot of any voter to have the same numbered with figures on the outside or back thereof, to correspond with the number placed opposite the name of such voter on the poll-lists, is void, it being in conflict with Sec. 13 of Art. 2 of the Constitution of this State, which declares that 'all elections by the people shall be by ballot.' By the ballot the Constitution secures to the voter the protection and immunity of secresy. The ballot implies absolute and inviolable secresy." It will be seen that the language of the Indiana and Illinois Constitutions, as well as that of their several legislatures, is in substance identical. In that case the action was brought by a voter who had directed the inspector of elections not to number his ballot, but the latter did so, and it was held, on demurrer, that the numbering of the vote was illegal.

The next case is that of Temple v. Mead, 4 Vt., 535. The court, after stating that there are two common modes of voting, viva voce and by ballot, says: "The principal object of the last mode is to enable the elector to express his opinion secretly, without being subject to be overawed, or to any ill-will or persecution on account of his vote for either of the candidates who may be before the public."

To this I add the well-considered case of Hammer v. Swift et al. 7 Chicago Legal News, 167, decided by his Honor Judge Rogers, of the Circuit Court of this county. This case is identical with that cited from the 38th Indiana. It was held that the vote, which, against the protest of the voter, was numbered as required by the Illinois statute above cited, was void, and the statute so far unconstitutional.

Finally it appears, even from our statute, that the Legislature well knew that the ballot was and ought to be secret. Sec. 52 of the chapter on elections prescribes as follows: "The manner of voting shall be ballot. The ballot shall be printed or written, or partly printed and partly written, upon plain paper. * * * When the ballot is printed, the same shall be printed upon plain paper in plain type," etc.

Sec. 55 provides that "the ballot shall be folded by the voter and delivered to one of the judges of election, * * and immediately be put into the ballot box."

By Sec. 59 the ballots are to be strung on a thread and sealed up by the judges, and delivered to the County clerk, who shall keep them six months, and then burn them, without the package being previously opened, except in case of a contested election. But by the following section, in such a case they can only be examined and referred to in the presence of the officer having the custody thereof.

The purport of these provisions is that regularly the ballot should be kept perfectly secret; that the voter should be protected from the prying or interested curiosity of his employers, his enemies, or the official managers of the election. If the paper constituting the ballot be colored or mottled, so as to distinguish the voters of one or of both parties, for be lelt unfolded, or be carelessly or loosely kept, or be examined without the presence of the County clerk when desired in a contested election, it would no longer be a ballot, but a mere open vote.

From these provisions of the election law it was evidently, in legal effect, the intention of the Legislature to violate, but to violate as little as possible, the secrecy of the ballot; to violate it perhaps as often to enable party managers by fraudulent manifestation of votes to count in one who was not elected as fairly and honestly to count out one unlawfully declared elected.

Second—The second question is, have they done what in legal effect they must be held to have intended. I shall read but few words to show that they have. In the face of the Constitution, our law authorizes the numbering of the ballot of the voter so that by accident or design, and whether for a good or an evil purpose, the secret may be revealed. All that is needful is a corrupt or a careless County Clerk, or an unfaithful assistant clerk, or perhaps a sham contest of some election, and the vote of any voter may be known. The Legislature have no right to subject any citizen to the risk of injury by provisions such as those quoted. A contest may be carried on as to the validity of an election without resorting to such means, even were it within the power of the Legislature to employ them. How easily the secrecy of the ballot may be violated will appear from the fact that no affidavit or certificate from any officer or court declaring the purpose of examining the ballot is lawful, or that it is necessary to do so is required; and from the fact also that no penalty is imposed upon any officer in case he should violate the provisions in regard to keeping the packages of ballots secret. All the protection the voter has is the honesty of the officer and his oath of office. If he is honest, his oath may not be needed; if dishonest, it would be of no avail whatever. Considering the fact that there is no penalty, and that there is an oath, the security is nearly worthless. To a man in office money is much, but an oath too generally nothing at all. What security a voter would obtain from a mere oath of office one may guess who has been a few years in a position to hear the perjury so freely dispensed by witnesses in our courts of justice and by other persons outside of them.

I am constrained, therefore, to advise you, that the law concerning elections, so far as the point stated is concerned, is unconstitutional, and that, in refusing to place a number upon the ballots in question before the Grand Jury, the judges of election did but obey the Constitution, which is the supreme law, rather than the act of the General Assembly, which is in direct violation of it, and is the inferior law. Respectfully yours,

JOHN A. JAMESON,
Ex-Officio Judge Criminal Court.

THE LIMITS TO THE JURISDICTION OF COURTS.

LECTURE BY A. M. PENCE, ESQ., BEFORE THE UNION COLLEGE OF LAW.

Hence, you should be careful to read a decision with reference to the particular case before the court. You will find a very interesting discussion of this question—the distinction between void and voidable decrees—the difference between a want of power and a want of equity—by Lawrence, C. J., in Thompson v. Morris, 57 Ill., 333.

Also in Curtiss v. Brown, 29 Ill., 231; Davis v. The Mayor, 1 Duer., 451; Bangs v. Duckinfield, 18 N. Y., 595; People v. Sturtevant, 9 N. Y., 273.

You may have a perfectly good defense to an action which may be raised by demurrer to the bill or declaration, or otherwise, on the ground that the court should not exercise jurisdiction; but if your defense should be disregarded, and a decree rendered against you, the decree would be binding for all time to come, unless you should take the case to the Supreme Court for review, either by appeal or writ of error; and this, too, although it should be perfectly manifest, from an inspection of the record, that the decree is erroneous and should never have been entered.

It can never, in any collateral suit, be impeached or called in question.

Of course, I say this upon the supposition that the court had jurisdiction of the person of the defendant, by proper notice or by an appearance entered; and also that it had jurisdiction of that class of subjects attempted to be brought before the court in the particular case.

The point made is simply this: That the court having jurisdiction of the person and of that class of subjects generally, to which the litigation relates, that the decree or judgment can never again be called in question in any other suit, although grossly erroneous and improper.

The only remedy in such a case is by appeal or writ of error, when the court of appeals would set aside the judgment, and order you to try it over.

And it is upon the principle that it is for the interest of all that there should be an end to litigation.

This question is clearly brought out and demonstrated in the following cases: Donlin v. Hettinger, 57 Ill., 348; Kelly v. Donlin, 6 Chi. Leg. News, 254.

In the first case, it appears from the record that the decree was manifestly erroneous, and should never have been entered; that the court should not have acted; that the decree in the case transferred the title of two of the defendants to the complainant without right. The case, several years afterward, was taken by writ of error to the Supreme court by the two defendants. But one of the defendants had waited too long. The statute barred her right to a writ of error on account of delay.

The writ was dismissed by her before the Supreme Court considered the case. As to the other defendant, he was in time and the court reversed the decree of the court below as to him, after which the suit was dismissed as to him, but the decree remained in full force as to the other defendant.

The decision in the first case showed that both defendants were entitled to have the decree reversed had they both applied in apt time.

That is, the court below should not have exercised jurisdiction, although it had jurisdiction over that class of cases.

You will find in the second case, that of Kelly v. Donlin, that the defendant in the first case, as to whom the decree still stood, on account of delay in bringing the writ of error, undertook to attack the decree collaterally in another suit, but the Supreme Court held, that in the former suit the court below had jurisdiction, both of the person and of the subject matter.

And although that decree was grossly erroneous and should have been reversed had the party applied in apt time, yet there must be faith given to the adjudications of courts in all collateral proceedings—and that she had no remedy.

If you will study those two cases well, you will fully understand this branch of the question.

Young lawyers are greatly embarrassed oftentimes when they are through with a case, upon discovering that other facts and reasons existed upon which they might have succeeded for the plaintiff, or have made a successful defense, but which were not brought forward by them. Now, what can they do? Nothing. A case cannot be tried piecemeal.

In that class of cases, where the court has jurisdiction, but where the right to exercise it has been disputed, the objection can be raised in the first instance by demurrer, or by plea. I have spoken of that class of cases where a demurrer should be interposed. It must sometimes be raised by plea when the facts do not appear in the record. As when the party is sued in the wrong county, or where a suit is already pending about the same thing. These are called dilatory pleas, and the question must be raised at the first step. A party cannot submit himself to the jurisdiction of the court, by answering to the merits, and afterward insist upon such a dilatory plea.

But there are other pleas which go to the exercise of jurisdiction in the particular case, and are called pleas in bar, such as a plea of a former adjudication on the same issues, or the same subject matter between the same parties or their privies. If such a defense, by way of a plea or as evidence, is introduced, it is called an estoppel by the record, and in such case it is that your knowledge of what constitutes jurisdictional facts must be ample and complete. That is, you must determine whether the judgment of the court in that former case is binding in this.

And in order to determine that question you must inquire whether the court, in that case had jurisdiction to render the judgment it did render.

I have before stated that, in such case, you must look to the writ and the return upon it. The common law method of serving a writ is by reading, and if the method is not fixed by statute, it must be by reading. The form of the return in such case is of the greatest consequence, and you should remember this fact, that the return upon the writ must show upon whom the writ was served, the time when it was served, and the manner in which it was served. Botsford v. O'Connor, 57 Ill., 72.

You must not presume the returns made upon writs by the sheriff or his deputies to be correct, but must always examine them, for the presumption is, not that the return is properly made, but that it is improperly made, and especially is that so with the cases of deputies who come into office as the result of service done in the election of their chief. You will find that new deputies of the sheriff know nothing of the duties or responsibilities of their office, and often are exceedingly illiterate. The literary composition of an ordinary deputy, as it appears in the return made by him upon the back of a writ, both as to its orthography and grammar is a continual insult to 100,000,000 English-speaking people. There are exceptions.

But there is no duty more incumbent upon the lawyer than to examine the return upon his writ of summons, and he should be absolutely sure that it is in due form before he takes a default against the defendant.

Of course, if the defendant appears and defends, no exception can afterward be taken to the return, except in case of infants. As to them, no appearance by themselves nor by their guardian, or guardian ad litem will help an imperfect return of the officer. Infants must be served and the return upon the writ must show a proper service.

When you have practiced law for ten years, you will recognize the importance of this matter. Not only is it important to the attorney of the plaintiff who brings suit, because the record of the case in the future will stand or fall on account of it, but it is of the first importance in the trial of real estate cases and the examination of titles.

I can point you to many cases where parties, relying upon a judicial record for their title, have lost the same on account of a defect in the sheriff's return.

I refer you to but one case, because I am familiar with it, and it is enough—Botsford v. O'Connor, 57 Ill., 72.

Supposing, however, that where such a record is offered in evidence against you, upon examination, you find that there is no writ of summons or sheriff's return in the case, but that the defendant was defaulted. What would you do? It may have been lost from the files, or it may never have existed.

You should next inquire into the nature of the proceeding, the record of which is offered.

You must inquire whether it is an ordinary common law or chancery proceeding, conducted in accordance with the principles of the common law, or whether it is a proceeding where jurisdiction is given by virtue of some statute of the State, as, for instance, a suit by foreign attachment, or a proceeding to sell real estate of heirs to pay debts of their ancestor.

These are statutory proceedings, and are unknown to the common law, as it has come down to us in the State of Illinois.

This will now lead us into a discussion of the distinction between what is known as the common law jurisdiction of courts and the statutory jurisdiction of courts, and the jurisdiction of courts of limited or inferior power.

The distinction which I am about to mention must be constantly remembered, or you will be constantly beset with dangers, or plagued by doubts.

The rule of jurisdiction is, that "nothing shall be intended to be out of the jurisdiction of a Superior Court but that which especially appears to be so; nothing shall be intended to be within the jurisdiction of an inferior court but that which is especially alleged." Peacock v. Bell, 1 Saund., 74.

This rule, after much discussion and illustration, has been adopted by nearly all the courts, and in the State of Illinois it has been fully accepted and acted upon.

And the rule is carried still further and is applied to all courts of limited jurisdiction, such as our county or probate courts, and also to all cases which arise in our superior courts under some statute—that is, when the suit is not in accordance with the common law, when the court does not obtain its jurisdiction from the principles of the common law, but from statutory enactments.

I wish you to understand this. You know what courts are courts of superior jurisdiction. Our circuit courts, and superior court of Cook county, and all such courts as have power under the Constitution or statute to hear pleas on all kinds of subjects—that is, on all subjects that the courts at Westminster Hall had the power to entertain at the period of time at which the common law was adopted in the various States.

Justice of the peace are inferior courts.

The courts of probate are courts, not inferior, but limited in their jurisdiction.

And the superior courts are limited when they obtain jurisdiction solely from statutory enactments, such actions as foreign attachments, and formerly a proceeding to sell a dead man's real estate to pay debts in this State. The latter jurisdiction is now transferred wholly to the county courts of this State by a recent statute; although I notice that a recent writer on probate law contends that such jurisdiction cannot be taken away from the superior courts.

The Constitution does confer upon circuit courts "original jurisdiction of all cases in law or equity," but a proceeding under the statute to sell real estate of decedents is not a proceeding at law or in equity. It was not known at common law, and without the statute no power would exist anywhere for such purpose. The statute points out the court, and no other court can assume the power.

Now, as to superior courts following the course of the common law. You need not care whether such court in its decree or judgment finds that it had jurisdiction over the person of the defendant.

If there be no summons returned, or if the record be entirely silent as to jurisdiction over the person, the presumption will be entertained that the court had jurisdiction; for otherwise it would not have acted. Such is the presumption as to a superior court. That is, that nothing will be intended to be out of the jurisdiction of a superior court but that which especially appears to be so.

But as to the county court, or courts of limited or statutory jurisdiction. If there be no finding in the judgment or decree that the court had jurisdiction of the person of the defendant, and if the record be silent as to jurisdiction over the defendant, if there be neither return of sheriff nor finding in the decree, then the presumption is that the court did not have jurisdiction of the person. To give you an illustration:

Suppose you brought an action of ejectment to recover a certain lot, and upon the trial the defendant produces a judgment obtained in the circuit court against your plaintiff in an action of assumpsit, the execution issued therein, the levy, and sheriff's deed, although the judgment in that case was by default, and although the record is silent as to the jurisdiction of the court, there being no summons or return by sheriff, and no finding in the judgment, yet the presumption of law is, that the court had jurisdiction of the person in that case, and the record is a complete bar to your action of ejectment, you can proceed no further.

But suppose in the same action of ejectment brought by you, a judgment against the plaintiff in an action commenced by foreign attachment was introduced, the special execution levy and sheriff's deed. There is a default also in that case.

The record is silent about the jurisdiction of the court over the person.

No service of the attachment writ upon the defendant, no publication of notice as provided by the statute on file.

What would you do in this latter case? You have applied the same test as in the former suit. The record is silent in both cases as to the question of jurisdiction over the person of the defendant.

The court obtains jurisdiction in the latter case, only by virtue of a statute. It is not according to the course of the common law, and hence the jurisdiction of the person should affirmatively appear. And because it does not so appear the record and deed made thereunder would be no bar, and the plaintiff would be entitled to a judgment. The judgment in the former case would be a nullity.

The same rule would apply if the defense had interposed a decree, sale and deed under a proceeding against the plaintiff as heir of a deceased party—for the sale of the real estate descended to him from his ancestor. It must in such a case appear upon the face of the record that the court had jurisdiction of the person of the defendant, or it will be presumed that the court did not have such jurisdiction.

Having now seen the distinction and the presumptions indulged in favor of an action in one court, and against an action in another court, we will go a little further, and inquire whether these presumptions are conclusive or subject to explanations;—whether you can ever help out a record, or overthrow a record by outside evidence.

The finding of the court in favor of its jurisdiction over the defendant, is not conclusive, but may be disputed. Not, however, by any outside testimony, nor by anything outside of the record, but the whole record will be taken and construed together, and if there be anything in the record which contradicts the finding of the decree or judgment, then the jurisdiction will fail. As, for instance, a summons appears in the record the return upon which shows that the defendant was not properly served. If it appears to have been served by leaving a copy when it should have been served by reading, or if the manner of service is wholly omitted from the return, and if it appears on inspection that no other summons has been served than the one on file, and if no other summons could have been issued in the cause, then in such case the return shows that the court did not have jurisdiction, and that the finding of the court was not justified by the return. In other words, that the court acted without having the defendant before it. And such return contradicts the finding of the court, and the jurisdiction fails.

This is true both of proceedings in courts of inferior and limited jurisdiction and in courts of superior jurisdiction.

I refer you, for full information upon this most important branch of legal knowledge, to the cases of Fell v. Young, 63 Ill., 106; Firebaugh v. Hall, 63 Ill., 83; Heywood v. Collins, 60 Ill., 333; Botsford v. O'Connor, 57 Ill., 72; Donlin v. Hettinger, 57 Ill., 348; Clark v. Thompson, 47 Ill., 25.

The Supreme Court of Illinois, in Swearengen v. Gulick, 67 Ill., 208, seems to have crossed its track, and in that case it holds, that because the statutory proceeding was had in a superior court, that jurisdiction of the person will be presumed where the record is silent. This decision is in opposition to the cases above referred to.

The Supreme Court of the United States has heretofore disagreed with the Supreme Court of Illinois, and with almost all the other States of the Union, with reference to the necessity of jurisdiction over the person of a defendant appearing affirmatively where the proceeding was in a court of limited or statutory jurisdiction; and has held that jurisdiction over the person will be presumed although the record be silent upon the question. See Grignon's Lessee v. Astor, 2 How., 319; Florentine v. Barton, 2 Wall.

But that high court has recently receded from the above position in Galpin v. Page, 18 Wall., 350. Although it does not admit its former mistakes—a practice not uncommon with other courts.

You will scarcely be able to examine a single title to real estate, if you do not understand these questions.

It is very rarely, indeed, that a title has not passed through the courts, and if you do not know the rules with reference to the subject, you cannot go a single step toward a position in the profession, which I know you all intend to take.

You would be surprised to know what proportion of the litigation in the courts pertains to real estate questions, and how many of them grow out of this question of jurisdiction. It is the easiest thing in the world to make a mistake, and you may take it for granted that human nature is much the same inside and outside the profession of the law.

Some men blunder always.

I once examined a title where an estate had been sold under the direction of an attorney, by virtue of a law that had been repealed for ten years, and when I pointed it out to him he was greatly surprised and admitted that he had blundered.

What do you think his clients, who purchased the property and paid their money, had to say of his blunder?

He relied upon a book called a Probate Manual.

Now, you must not fail to understand that I have been discussing this question of jurisdiction over the person when it arises collaterally.

What might be a perfectly good title when it is called in question collaterally, might be erroneous, and would be reversed on appeal or writ of error. You understand that collaterally means in another suit, not brought for the purpose of impeaching the record of a former suit.

When the question arises, in another suit, whether the court in the former suit had jurisdiction, that is a collateral attack, and if it, the record in the former suit, be not a nullity, it cannot be called in question collaterally. If it be simply erroneous and not void, then no advantage can be taken in another suit, of any such error.

On appeal, or writ of error, in an action of assumpsit, in case of default, if the summons and return of the sheriff do not appear in the record, the supreme court would reverse the case and send it back, for no finding of the court will be sustained in a direct proceeding unless there be evidence to that end, and there would be no evidence in such a record that the defendant had been brought before the court. And no one can be bound unless an opportunity be given to defend.

But when the want of summons, or return in such a case, in such a court, is called in question collaterally, the presumption in favor of jurisdiction will prevail.

If you will remember the distinction, and will examine the decisions of the courts upon this question, by first inquiring whether the question arose in a direct suit on appeal, or writ of error, or whether it arose in a collateral action, you will be saved much trouble and confusion.

You will find the same distinction existing with reference to the presumptions indulged as to the jurisdiction of superior and inferior, or limited courts, whether it be with reference to jurisdiction over the person of the defendant, or over the subject-matter of the litigation. Jurisdiction over the subject-matter of the suit is obtained by the superior courts if there be anything to set the court in motion.

It has been said that a blank piece of paper, filed with a prayer attached, will give jurisdiction to the court to decree a specific performance, foreclose a mortgage, or declare a trust.

LAW REPORTS OF CASES ARGUED AND DETERMINED IN ENGLAND AND THE UNITED STATES ON WARRANTY ON THE SALE OF PERSONAL PROPERTY. By G. W. Hecker, Member of the Crawford County Bar. Meadville, Penn.: 1874. Sold by Ingham, Clarke & Co., Law Booksellers, Cleveland, Ohio.

A person, from reading the title of this volume, would think it much more of a work than it really is. It contains only 464 pages, is miserably bound, poorly printed, and, in its mechanical execution, is devoid of all taste. The index is the worst we ever saw in any law book. It is not arranged in alphabetical order, the cap headings to it are to the cases, as "English Cases," "Pennsylvania Cases," etc. There are no other headings to the index to denote what it contains. We cannot recommend this book to the profession.

OHIO DIGEST, CONTAINING ALL REPORTED OHIO CASES TO THE YEAR 1875. By J. Bryant Walker and Clement Bates. Vol. I. Cincinnati: Robert Clark & Co. 1875.

This work is complete in two volumes, the first of which has only reached us. It digests the opinions found in 52 volumes of reports and 41 volumes of law periodicals, which embraces all reported Ohio cases. The first volume contains 878 pages, and brings the subjects digested down to and including the letter M. No paragraph is repeated in the digest, but each is placed under the head that seems to the author most suitable. Where paragraphs could be placed nearly equally under more than one head, the system of cross-references has been adopted. Each paragraph has its black catch-words and synopsis in italics, designed to enable one, without reading any entire paragraph, to pass from one to another, until the one sought is recognized. To any one having the Ohio reports, this work is indespensable. Price, for both volumes complete, $12,00.

XXV. OHIO REPORTS.

Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company v. Joseph May.—p. 347.

CONTRACT—DEFENSE—GARNISHEE.

In an action to recover money due on contract, it is a sufficient defense to show that the money sought to be recovered has been attached by process of garnishment duly issued by a court of a sister State, in an action there prosecuted against the plaintiff by his creditors, although it appear that the plaintiff and such creditors are all residents of this State.

Hance, executor, v. Hair et al.—p. 349.

STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS.

A partial payment on a joint and several promissory note, by one of the several makers, will not prevent the running of the statute of limitations as to the other makers.

Zink v. Grant.—p. 352.

SALE OF LIQUOR—LANDLORD'S LIABILITY.

The provision of the 10th section of the act of May 1, 1854, to provide against the evils resulting from the sale of intoxicating liquors, etc., as amended April 18, 1870 (67 Ohio L., 103), which declares certain contracts void, does not apply to a contract whereby the lessor, in good faith, rented or leased his premises, and without any knowledge on his part that the rented or leased property should be used, in whole or in part, for the sale of intoxicating liquors.

A Texas judge is credited with the following decision: "The fact is, Jones, the jail is an old, rickety affair, as cold as an iron wedge. You applied to this court for a release on bail, giving it as your opinion that you would freeze to death, there. The weather has not moderated and to keep you from freezing, I will direct the sheriff to hang you at four o'clock this afternoon."

TRUSTEE'S SALE.—WHEREAS, BY THEIR CERtain deed of trust, dated the first day of May, A. D. 1875, recorded in Cook county, Illinois, in book 518 of records, on page 422, William A. Shepard and Harriet L. Shepard, his wife, conveyed to me, as trustee, all the premises situated in the county of Cook and State of Illinois, known and described as follows, to wit:

Lots numbered twenty-five (25) and twenty-six (26) in block numbered one (1), in Hoyt, Canfield and Matteson's subdivision of the south half (½) of the southwest quarter (¼) of the southwest quarter (¼) of section sixteen (16), township thirty-eight (38), north range fourteen (14), east of the third principal meridian, with all buildings and improvements then on, or which might be thereafter placed on said premises, to secure the payment of one promissory note dated January 10th, 1874, payable to the order of Elisha Gray, for the sum of fifteen hundred dollars, with interest at the rate of ten (10) per cent. per annum payable semi-annually, and due and payable five (5) years from the date thereof.

And whereas, default has been made in the payment of the installment of interest on said note due November 1st, A. D. 1875, and in accordance with the terms of said trust deed the whole principal sum thereby secured, and interest thereon to the time of sale, might, at the option of the holder of said note, become at once due and payable; and the holder of said note having elected to declare said note so due, and directed me to enforce the provisions of said trust deed to make the amount of the note unpaid.

Now, therefore, notice is hereby given that on Saturday the 18th day of December, A. D. 1875, in pursuance of the powers in me vested by said trust deed, I shall, at the north door nearest LaSalle street, of the building used as a court house, on the corner of Adams and LaSalle streets, in the city of Chicago, in said Cook county, at the hour of ten o'clock A. D. 1875, to the day of sale.

Chicago, November 12, 1875.

TRUSTEE'S SALE.—WHEREAS, HENRY H. WALker, bachelor, of the county of Cook and State of Illinois, by his trust deed, dated the fourteenth day of July, A. And whereas, it was, among other things, provided in said trust deed, that in case of default in the payment of said promissory notes, or any part thereof, then, on the application of the legal holder of said notes, it should be lawful for the undersigned, as trustee, to sell and dispose of said premises, and all the right, title, benefit and equity of redemption of said Henry H. UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT.

No. 8 and 17.—OCT. TERM, 1875.

8. v.
THE NATIONAL EXCHANGE BANK OF MILWAUKEE.
And
DAVID DOWS, JOHN DOWS MAIRS, and ALEXANDER ECTOR ORR, plaintiffs in error,
17. v.
THE WISCONSIN MARINE AND FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY.

In error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York.

1. McLaren & Co. purchased at Milwaukee with their own money, and became the owners of the wheat. Though they received orders from A. F. Smith & Co to buy wheat for them and to ship it they had not been supplied with funds for the purpose, nor had they assumed to contract with those from whom they purchased on behalf of their correspondents. They were under no obligation to give up their or the possession on any terms other than such as they might dictate. If, after their purchase, they had sold the wheat to any person living in Milwaukee, or elsewhere, other than A. F. Smith & Co., their vendee would have succeeded to the ownership. Nothing in the agency of A. F. Smith & Co. would have prevented it. Having then acquired the absolute ownership, McLaren & Co. had the complete power of disposition. They doubtless expected the firm to become purchasers from them and from their vendors. With that expectation accordingly they drew drafts for the price, but they never agreed to deliver the wheat to the drawees unless upon the condition that the drafts should be accepted and paid. They shipped it, but they did not consign it to Smith & Co., and they sent to the firm no bills of lading. On the contiary, they consigned the wheat to the cashier of the Milwaukee Bank, and handed over to that bank the bills of lading as a security for the drafts drawn against it—drafts which the bank purchased. It is of no consequence that they sent invoices.

2. EFFECT OF TRANSMISSION.—That the transmission of the invoices did not pass the property in the wheat without the acceptance and payment of the drafts drawn against it. Standing alone, an invoice is never regarded as an evidence of title.

3. REMAINED OWNERS.—That McLaren & Co. remained the owners of wheat, nothwithstanding their transmission of the invoices to A. F. Smith & Co., as owners, they had the right to transfer it to the plaintiffs as a security for the acceptance and payment of their drafts drawn against it; that this they did by taking bills of lading deliverable to the cashier of the plaintiffs, and handing them over with the drafts when the latter were discounted. These bills of lading, unexplained, are almost conclusive proof of an intention to reserve to the shipper the "jus disponendi," and prevent the property of the wheat from passing to the drawees of the drafts.

4. EFFECT OF BILL OF LADING.—The court states what is the effect of a bill of lading taken deliverable to the shipper's own order.

5. DELIVERY.—The expressed direction to hold the wheat for the payment of the drafts, and to deliver it only on payment, removes the possibility of any presumed intent to deliver it while the drafts remained unpaid. Effect of delivery to elevator.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS,]

Opinion of the court by STRONG, J.

The verdict of the jury having established that the wheat came to the possession of the defendants below, (now plaintiffs in error,) and that there was a conversion, there is really no controversy respecting any other fact in this case than whether the ownership of the plaintiffs had been divested before the conversion. The evidence bearing upon the transmission of the title was contained mainly in written instruments, the legal effect of which was for the court, and, so far as there was evidence outside of these instruments, it was either uncontradicted, or it had no bearing upon the construction to be given to them. We have, therefore, only to inquire to whom the wheat belonged when it came to the hands of the defendants, and when they refused to surrender it at the demand of the plaintiffs.

It is not open to question that McLaren & Co., having purchased it at Milwaukee and paid for it with their own money, became its owners. Though they had received orders from A. F. Smith & Co. to buy wheat for them and to ship it, they had not been supplied with funds for the purpose, nor had they assumed to contract with those from whom they purchased on behalf of their correspondents. They were under no obligation to give up their title or the possession on any terms other than such as they might dictate. If, after their purchase, they had sold the wheat to any person living in Milwaukee or elsewhere, other than A. F. Smith & Co., no doubt their vendee would have succeeded to the ownership. Nothing in any agency for A. F. Smith & Co. would have prevented it. This we do not understand to be controverted. Having, then, acquired the absolute ownership, McLaren & Co. had the complete power of disposition, and there is no pretense that they directly transmitted their ownership to A. F. Smith & Co. They doubtless expected that firm to become purchasers from them. They bought from their vendors with that expectation. Accordingly they drew drafts for the price, but they never agreed to deliver the wheat to the drawees unless upon the condition that the drafts should be accepted and paid. They shipped it, but they did not consign it to Smith & Co,, and they sent to that firm no bills of lading. On the contrary, they consigned the wheat to the cashier of the Milwaukee bank and handed over to that bank the bills of lading as a security for the drafts drawn against it—drafts which the bank purchased. It is true they sent invoices. That, however, is of no significance by itself. The position taken on behalf of the defendants, that the transmission of the invoices passed the property in the wheat without the acceptance and payment of the drafts drawn against it, is utterly untenable. An invoice is not a bill of sale, nor is it evidence of a sale. It is a mere detailed statement of the nature, quantity, and cost or price of the things invoiced, and it is as appropriate to a bailment as it is to a sale. It does not of itself necessarily indicate to whom the things are sent, or even that they have been sent at all. Hence, standing alone, it is never regarded as evidence of title. It seems unnecessary to refer to authorities to sustain this position. Reference may, however, be made to Shepherd v. Harrison, Law Rep., 4 Ap. Cas., 116, and Newcomb v. The Boston and Lowell Railroad Company, 115 Mass., 230. In these and in many other cases it has been regarded as of no importance that an invoice was sent by the shipper to the drawee of the drafts drawn against the shipment, even when the goods were described as bought and shipped on account of and at the risk of the drawee.

It follows that McLaren & Co. remained the owners of the wheat, notwithstanding their transmission of the invoices to A. F. Smith & Co. As owners, then, they had a right to transfer it to the plaintiffs as a security for the acceptance and payment of their drafts drawn against it. This they did by taking bills of lading deliverable to the cashier of the plaintiffs and handing them over with the drafts when the latter were discounted. These bills of lading unexplained are almost conclusive proof of an intention to reserve to the shipper the "jus disponendi," and prevent the property in the wheat from passing to the drawees of the drafts. Such is the rule of interpretation as stated in Benjamin on Sales, page 306, and in support of it he cites numerous authorities, to only one of which we make special reference—Jenkyns v. Brown, 14 Q. B., 496. There it appeared that the plaintiff was a commission merchant, living in London, and employing Klingender & Co. as his agents at New Orleans. The agents purchased for the plaintiff a cargo of corn, paying for it with their own money. They then drew upon him at thirty days' sight, stating in the body of the drafts that they were to be placed to the account of the corn. These drafts they sold, handing over to the purchaser with them the bills of lading, which were made payable to the order of Klingender & Co., the agents, and they sent invoices and a letter of advice to the plaintiff, informing him that the cargo was bought and shipped on his account. On this state of facts the court ruled that the property did not pass to the plaintiff; that the taking of a bill of lading by Klingender & Co., deliverable to their own order, was "nearly conclusive evidence that they did not intend to pass the property in the corn, and that by indorsing the bills of lading to the buyer of the bills of exchange they had conveyed to him a special property in the cargo, so that the plaintiff's right to the corn could not arise until the bills of exchange were paid by him. And that such is the legal effect of a bill of lading taken deliverable to the shipper's own order; that it is inconsistent with an intention to pass the ownership of the cargo to the person on whose account it may have been purchased, even when the shipment has been made in the vessel of the drawee of the drafts against the cargo, has been repeatedly decided. (Turner v. The Trustees of the Liverpool Docks, 6 Exch., 543; Schorman v. Railway Co., Law Reps., 2 Cha. Ap., 336; Ellerslaw v. Magniac, 6 Exch., 570.) In the present case the wheat was not shipped on the vessels of A. F. Smith & Co., and the bills of lading stipulated for deliveries to the cashier of the Milwaukee bank. When, therefore, the drafts against the wheat were discounted by the bank, and the bills of lading were handed over with the drafts as security, the bank became the owner of the wheat and had a complete right to retain it until payment. The ownership of McLaren & Co. was transmitted to it, and it succeeded to their power of disposition. That the bank never consented to part with its ownership thus acquired, so long as the drafts it had discounted remained unpaid, is rendered certain by the uncontradicted written evidence. It sent the drafts, with the bills of lading attached, to the Merchants' Bank, Watertown, accompanied with the most positive instruction, by letter and by indorsement on the bills, to hold the wheat until the drafts were paid. And when, subsequently, the Merchants' Bank sent orders to the masters of the carrying vessels to deliver it to the "Corn Exchange Elevator, Oswego, N. Y.," they accompanied the orders with letters to A. F. Smith & Co., the proprietors of the elevator, containing clear instructions to hold the grain and "deliver" it only on payment of the drafts. To these instructions Smith & Co. made no objection. Now, as it is certain that whether the property in the wheat passed to Smith & Co. or not depends upon the answer which must be given to the question whether it was intended by McLaren & Co., or by the Milwaukee bank, their successors in ownership, that it should pass before payment of the drafts, where can there be any room for doubt? What is there upon which to base an inference that it was intended A. F. Smith & Co. should become immediate owners of the wheat and be clothed with a right to dispose of it at once? Such an inference is forbidden, as we have already said, by the bills of lading made deliverable to W. G. Fitch, cashier of the Milwaukee bank, and it is inadmissible, in view of the express orders given by that bank to their special agents the Merchants' Bank at Watertown, directing them to hold the wheat subject to the payment of the drafts drawn against it. No intent to vest immediate ownership in the drawees of the drafts can be implied in the face of these express arrangements and positive orders to the contrary. It is true that A. F. Smith & Co. were the proprietors of the Corn Exchange elevator, and that the wheat was handed over to the "custody of the elevator" at the direction of the Merchants' Bank, but it cannot be claimed that was a delivery to the drawees under and in pursuance of their contract to purchase. The Merchants' Bank, having been only special agents of the owners, had no power to make such a delivery as would divest the ownership of their principals. (Stollenwerk et al. v. Thatcher, 115 Mass., 124). And they made no attempt to divest that ownership. They guardedly retained the "jus disponendi." Concurrently with their directions that the wheat should be delivered to the elevator, in the very orders for the delivery, they stated the cargoes were for the account of W. G. Fitch, cashier, and were to be held subject to their order. By accompanying letters to the proprietors of the elevator they stated the cargoes were delivered to them "to be held subject to and delivered only on payment of the drafts drawn by McLaren & Co." All this contemplated a subsequent delivery, a delivery after the receipt of the grain in the elevator and when the drafts should be paid. It negatives directly the possibility that the delivery into the elevator was intended as a consummation of the purchase, or as giving title to the purchasers. It was a clear case of bailment, utterly inconsistent with the idea of ownership in the bailees. A man cannot hold as bailee for himself. By the act of accepting goods in bailment he acknowledges a right or title in the bailor. When, therefore, as was said in the court below, "the proprietors of the Corn Exchange elevator, or A. F. Smith & Co., received the wheat under the instructions of the Merchants' Bank, they received it with the knowledge that the delivery to them was not absolute; that it was not placed in their hands as owners, and that they were not thereby to acquire title." They were informed that there was no intention with the holders of the drafts and bills of lading to let go their ownership so long as the drafts remained unpaid. The possession they had, therefore, was not their possession. It belonged to their bailors, and they were mere warehousemen and not vendees.

We agree that where a bill of lading has been taken containing a stipulation that the goods shipped shall be delivered to the order of the shipper, or to some person designated by him other than the one on whose account they have been shipped, the inference that it was not intended the property in the goods should pass, except by subsequent order of the person holding the bill, may be rebutted, though it is held to be almost conclusive. And we agree that where there are circumstances pointing both ways, some indicating an intent to pass the ownership immediately, notwithstanding the bill of lading—in other words, where there is anything to rebut the effect of the bill, it becomes a question for the jury whether the property has passed. Such was the case of Ogg v. Shuter, 10 Law Reps, Com. Pleas, 159. There the ordinary effect of a bill of lading, deliverable to the shipper's order, was held to be rebutted by the court sitting with power to draw inferences of fact. The delivery to the carrier was "free on board," and the bill of lading was sent to the consignor's agent. The goods were also delivered into the purchaser's bags, and there was a part payment. But in this case there are no circumstances to rebut the intent to retain ownership exhibited in the bills of lading, and confirmed throughout by the indorsements on the bills, and by the written instructions to hold the wheat till payment of the drafts. Nothing in the evidence received or offered tended to show any other intent. Hence, there was no necessity of submitting to the jury the question whether there was a change of ownership. That would have been an invitation to find a fact of which there was no evidence. The circumstances as relied upon by the plaintiffs in error as tending to show that the property vested in A. F. Smith & Co. cannot have the significance attributed to them.

It is certainly immaterial that the wheat was consigned to W. G. Fitch, cashier, care of the Merchants' Bank, Watertown, and that it was thus consigned at the request of A. F. Smith & Co., made to McLaren & Co. Had it been consigned directly to that bank, and had there been no reservation of the "jus disponendi" accompanying the consignment, the case might have been different. Then an intent to deliver to the purchasers might possibly have been presumed, but, as the case was, no room was left for such a presumption. The express direction to hold the wheat for the payment of the drafts, and to deliver it only on payment, removes the possibility of any presumed intent to deliver it while the drafts remained unpaid. A shipment on the purchaser's own vessel is ordinarily held to pass the property to the purchaser, but not so, if the bill of lading exhibits a contrary intent; if thereby the shipper reserves to himself, or to his assigns, the dominion over the goods shipped. (Turner v. The Trustees of the Liverpool Docks, cited supra). There are many such decisions. A strong case may be found in the Court of Queen's Bench, decided in 1840. It is Mitchell v. Ede, 11 Adol. and Ellis, N. S., 888. A Jamaica planter, being the owner of sugars, and indebted to the defendant residing in London, for more than their value, shipped them at Jamaica on the 4th of April, on a ship belonging to the defendant which was in the habit of carrying supplies to Jamaica to the owner of the sugars, and others, and taking back consignments from him and others. On the same day he took a bill of lading by which the goods were stipulated to be delivered to the defendant at London, he paying freight. Two days afterwards (April 6th) the shipper made an indorsement on the bill that the sugars were to be delivered to the defendant only on condition of his giving security for certain payments, but otherwise to the plaintiff's agent. He also drew drafts on the defendant. At the same time he indorsed the bill of lading and delivered it to the plaintiff, to whom he was indebted. The bill was never in the defendant's hands. The sugars arrived in London, and the defendant paid the drafts drawn by the shipper, but did not comply with the conditions of the indorsement of April 6th. On this state of facts it was held by the court that the plaintiff was entitled to the sugar; that the shipper had not parted with the property by delivering it on board the defendant's ship, employed as it was, nor by accepting the bill of lading, as drawn on the 4th of April; and that he was entitled to change the destination of the sugars till he had delivered them, or the bill. In the case now in hand there never was an instant after the purchase of the wheat by McLaren & Co., when there was not an express reservation of the right to withhold the delivery from A. F. Smith & Co., and also an avowed purpose to withhold it until the drafts should be paid. Consent to consign the wheat to W. G. Fitch, cashier, care of Merchants' Bank, amounts, therefore, to no evidence of consent that it should pass into the control and ownership of the purchasers.

It has been argued on behalf of the plaintiffs in error, that the correspondence between A. F. Smith & Co. and McLaren & Co. shows that the wheat was wanted by the former to supply their immediate need, and that, therefore, it was a legitimate inference both parties to the correspondence intended an immediate delivery. If this were so, it was still in the power of the vendors to change the destination of the property until delivery was actually, or at least symbolically made. And that the intention, if any ever existed, was never carried out, the bills of lading prove. It may be that A. F. Smith & Co. expected to secure early possession of the wheat, by obtaining discounts from the Watertown bank, and then by taking up the drafts. If so, it would account for their request that the drafts and bills of lading might be sent through that bank, but that has no tendency to show an assent by either McLaren & Co. or the Milwaukee bank, to an unconditional delivery of the property before payment of the drafts.

Nor does the fact that any engagement to hold themselves responsible for the safe keeping of the wheat for the plaintiffs, and subject to their orders until the drafts drawn against it should be paid, was exacted from the Watertown bank, have any tendency to prove such an assent. This was an additional protection to the continued ownership of the plaintiffs and the words of the engagement plainly negative any consent to a divestiture of that ownership.

Without reference, therefore, to the testimony of McLaren, which was in substance that before the shipments, Farwell, the agent of Smith & Co., was informed that while the shipping firm would agree to send their time drafts through any bank he might designate, and consign the property to any responsible bank Smith & Co. might designate, they would adhere to their positive business rule in such cases, and on no account consent that any property so shipped should pass out of the control of the banks in whose care it had been placed, until all drafts made against it had been paid; without reference, to this we think it clear the ownership of the wheat, for the conversion of which the defendants were sued, never vested in Smith & Co., never passed out of the plaintiffs.

This is a conclusion necessarily drawn from the written and uncontradicted evidence, and there is nothing in any evidence received, or offered by the defendants and overruled by the court, which has any tendency to resist the conclusion. It is unnecessary, therefore, to examine in detail the numerous assignments of error in the admission and rejection of evidence. None of the rulings have injured the defendants.

If, then, the Exchange Bank of Milwaukee was the owner of the wheat when A. F. Smith & Co. undertook to ship it to the defendants, and when the defendants received it, and converted it to their use, the right of the bank to recover in this action is incontrovertible. Smith & Co. were incapable of divesting that ownership. The defendants could acquire no title, or even lien, from a tortious possessor. However innocent they may have been, (and they were undoubtedly innocent of any attempt to do wrong,) they could not obtain ownership of the wheat from any other than the owners. The owner of personal property cannot be divested of his ownership without his consent, except by process of law. It is not claimed, and it could not be, that the defendants were deceived or misled by any act of the plaintiffs. They are the victims of a gross fraud perpetrated by A. F. Smith & Co., and however unfortunate their case may be, they cannot be relieved by casting the loss upon the plaintiffs, who are at least equally innocent with themselves, and who have used the extremest precaution to protect their title.

It is sufficient to add that, in our opinion, there is no just reason for complaint against the instruction given by the circuit judge to the jury, and his rulings upon the subject of damages and interest.

The judgment is affirmed.

This case differs in no essential particulars from the case of Dows v. The National Exchange Bank, Milwaukee, (just decided.) It presents the same questions, and is controlled by the same rules of law. The judgment must, therefore, be affirmed.

U. S. CIR. COURT, W. D. OF MO.

OPINION Nov. 23, 1875.

THE UNITED STATES v. 17 EMPTY BARRELS, etc., ADLER & FURST, Claimants.

Writ of Error to the District Court.

INFORMATION FOR HAVING DISTILLED SPIRITS IN POSSESSION WITH INTENTION, ETC.

1. NOTICE.—That the revised statutes prescribe the mode of proceeding as to notice, and not the rule of court.
2. WHAT SUFFICIENT ALLEGATION.—That it is a sufficient allegation to follow the language of the statute without alleging that the taxes were not paid on the spirits.
3. TOOLS FOUND ON PREMISES.—That the tools, etc., found and seized in the place where the distilled spirits were found and seized, were under the averments subject to seizure and forfeiture.
4. AVERMENT AS TO RAW MATERIAL.—The court considers whether the averment as to the raw material is sufficient.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

Opinion by DILLON, J.

The seizure of distilled spirits, raw materials, tools, etc., was made under section 3,453 of the Revised Statutes. The claimants, as owners, applied under sections 3,459 of the Revised Statutes for the return of the property seized, and executed the bond therein provided for, which was filed with the proper district attorney. The district court ordered personal service of notice of the pendency of the proceedings to be given to the parties executing the bonds ten days before the term fixed for trial. The required notice was given. A motion was made on a special appearance to quash the notice, because twenty days' notice had not been given as required by rule 45 of the United States district courts for the districts of Missouri.

The answer to this objection is that section 3,459 of the Revised Statutes prescribes the mode of proceeding in the case, and as to notice not the rule of the court referred to.

The third article of the information was demurred to and the demurrer was overruled and judgment of forfeiture entered. Without going into detail my judgment is that the allegations of the third article using and following the language of the statute are sufficient in substance. Under this article it is specially urged that it should be alleged that the taxes were not paid on the spirits. But the averment is that the spirits "were in the possession and ownership of the claimants for the purpose of being sold and removed by them in fraud of the internal revenue laws, and in the design to avoid the payment of said taxes." This is sufficient.

And it is my opinion that the tools, etc., found and seized in the place and inclosure where the distilled spirits were found and seized were, upon the averments of this article, subject to seizure and forfeiture. It is my opinion also that the fourth article is also good, upon a general demurrer. The court cannot judicially notice and on demurrer decide that the averment that certain materials were "raw materials" were not so in the face of the direct allegation of fact to the contrary.

I have some doubt whether the kind of article subject into which it is alleged these "raw materials" were intended to be manufactured for the purpose of fraudulently selling such manufactured article with the design to evade the payment of said tax, ought not to have been specifically averred, yet I am inclined to think this generality of statement would not be sufficient ground of reversal where judgment went upon a general demurrer. But, however this may be, the third count is sufficient to support the judgment.

I have no doubt as to the jurisdiction of the district court.

Affirmed.

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

JUNE TERM, 1875.

THE PEOPLE ex rel., etc. v. MCGOWAN.

NATURALIZATION OF ALIENS—CONCLUSIVENESS OF RECORD—COURTS OF "COMMON LAW JURISDICTION."

1. NATURALIZATION OF ALIENS—IMPEACHMENT OF RECORD.—A record of naturalization made by a court of competent jurisdiction, can not be impeached in a collateral proceeding, by showing that the preliminary steps required by law have not, in fact, been taken,—as where it is alleged that the person had not, at the time of the naturalization, resided one year in the State in which the naturalization took place.
2. COURTS OF "COMMON LAW JURISDICTION."—The Criminal Court of St. Louis county, Missouri, is a court having "common law jurisdiction," within the meaning of the act of Congress, relating to the naturalization of aliens, and is therefore competent to admit an alien to citizenship. What courts are embraced within the terms of this statute considered at length, and KNOX Co. v. Davis, 63 Ill., 405, overruled.

Opinion of the court by SCOTT, C. J.

The information alleges: Daniel McGowan, at an election held on the 8th day of October, 1874, was regularly elected judge of the City Court of East St. Louis, was duly qualified as judge, and entered upon the discharge of the duties of the office, but charges he could not lawfully hold the office of judge of that court, because he was alien born.

The plea filed admits defendant was born an alien to the United States, but avers he was duly naturalized on the 15th day of May, 1867, in the Criminal Court of the county of St. Louis at a regular term, that court having jurisdiction to admit aliens to citizenship. Two replications filed, first, the Criminal Court of the county of St. Louis had not jurisdiction to naturalize defendant, and, second, nul.tiel record; upon which issue was joined.

An exemplication of the record was offered in evidence, which shows that Daniel McGowan, a native of Ireland, applied to become a citizen of the United States at the May term, 1867, of the Criminal Court of the county of St. Louis, and it appearing he had resided in the United States and in the State of Missouri for the requisite length of time, and had complied with the law in all preliminary matters, he was admitted to citizenship on taking the usual oath of allegiance to this government.

On the trial, the people offered to prove that defendant, prior to May 15, 1867, had made no previous declaration of his intention to become a citizen; that he immigrated to the United States after he was twenty-one years of age; that he had never served in the army or navy of the United States, and that he had not resided in the State of Missouri one year previous to his application to become a citizen; which evidence was excluded by the court.

In the exclusion of this testimony, the court ruled correctly. The record of naturalization of an alien, like any other record of a court, imports verity. It can not be impeached for fraud, unless that defense has been specially pleaded, setting forth in what the fraud consists. No replication had been filed alleging fraud, or that the court had not jurisdiction of the person of the defendant. The replication as to jurisdiction is that the court did not have jurisdiction of the subject-matter, but does not put in issue the jurisdiction of the court as to the person of defendant. Hence the evidence was properly rejected. But had the issue been made by the pleadings, we are still of opinion the evidence was inadmissible. It seems clear, both on principal and authority, that a record of naturalization, made by a court of competent jurisdiction, cannot be impeached in a collateral proceeding, by showing that the preliminary steps required by law have not in fact been taken. It is upon the principle that such a record, like any other judgment of a court, affords complete evidence of its own validity. In proceedings of naturalization, matters are submitted to the decision of the court, and the presumption will be indulged that the court heard evidence, and was satisfied that the applicant had complied with the law; and its findings must be held conclusive as to all facts recited in the record. Spratt v. Spratt, 4 Peters, 393; The People v. Pease, 30 Barb., 588; Campbell v. Gordon and Wife, 6 Cranch, 176; McCarthy v. Marsh, 1 Selden, 263.

But the principal question in the case is whether the Criminal Court of the county of St. Louis had jurisdiction to admit aliens to citizenship. Under the act of Congress, any State court, being a court of record, having common law jurisdiction, a seal, a clerk or prothonotary, has jurisdiction in matters of naturalization of aliens. Our inquiry, then, is whether the Criminal Court of the county of St. Louis comes within the definition of State courts, mentioned in the act of Congress on that subject.

The Criminal Court of the county of St. Louis was established by an act of the general assembly of the State of Missouri, passed in 1855, and was given all the original and appellate jurisdiction which had been vested in the several circuit courts of the State. It is a court of record having a seal and a clerk, and was given all the powers, was to perform all the duties, and be subject to the restrictions of courts of record as such, according to the provisions of the laws of the State. The judge of the court was made a conservator of the peace, with power to issue writs of habeas corpus, and determine the same, to administer oaths, take and certify recognizances and exercise all the powers of an examining magistrate. Gottschalk's Laws, p. 89.

Subsequently, by an act of the legislature, the Court of Criminal Correction in St. Louis county was established and was given exclusive original jurisdiction of all misdemeanors under the laws of the State of Missouri, committed in the county of St. Louis, the punishment of which is by fine or imprisonment in the county jail or both, except in cases of assault and battery and affrays; but this act did not otherwise affect the jurisdiction of the criminal court. Gottschalk's Laws, p. 100.

It will be observed that the Criminal Court of the county of St. Louis answers, in every particular, the description of State courts designated in the act of Congress, which are given power to naturalize aliens, if it has "common law jurisdiction." We have no courts in this country that derive their existence from the common law; our State courts are all creatures of the organic law, or of legislative enactment. Their jurisdiction is not uniform. Some of our courts have only a statutory or special jurisdiction, limited as to subjects and amounts in controversy; others have original common law jurisdiction, unrestricted as to class of cases and as to amounts in controversy. But our State courts, having what is called common law jurisdiction, have not that jurisdiction to the same extent. By no means. We have courts with common law jurisdiction in civil cases only, and others exclusively in criminal causes. It was so with the English court, that had their origin in and existed under the common law, and derived their jurisdiction from that source. Some of them had jurisdiction only in certain classes of actions, and others in different and distinct actions.

Our statutory courts, although they may not have jurisdiction in all cases at law both criminal and civil, are none the less, for that reason, courts with common law jurisdiction, Their character in this regard is not determined altogether by the extent of their jurisdiction as to subjects over which they may adjudicate. We apprehend the State courts mentioned in the act of Congress, as having common law jurisdiction, are such as exercise their powers according to the course of the common law. It was not meant they should have all common law jurisdiction over every class of subjects, including all civil and criminal matters. If this were so, it is apprehended but few courts could be found in any of the States that would possess the requisite "common law jurisdiction." As a matter of fact, some subjects are excluded from the original jurisdiction of circuit courts in this State and in the State of Missouri; and perhaps no court in either State could be found with such extended and unlimited jurisdiction as to include within that jurisdiction all subjects determinable in the various courts, either under the statute, or under the common law. It may be accurately said that a court having jurisdiction only in civil cases is nevertheless a court of general jurisdiction, although limited to a certain class of cases. The same is true of courts with exclusive jurisdiction in criminal cases, with no civil jurisdiction. Such courts may, and do, exercise their respective powers according to the course of the common law; and their jurisdiction may, with as much propriety as with many of the common law courts of England, be said to be general.

Reference to the act of the legislature in evidence, creating the Criminal Court of the County of St. Louis, shows the Circuit Court of St. Louis county was thereafter prohibited exercising original jurisdiction in any criminal case, or appellate jurisdiction of any [criminal] case tried or determined before the justice of the peace or other magistrate. By positive statute some matters are excluded from the jurisdiction of the Circuit Courts in this State; but can it, with any propriety be said these courts are not for that reason courts of general jurisdiction? The proposition, it seems to us, would be absurd. The Circuit Court and Criminal Court of St. Louis county were created by positive law, and both courts may have had jurisdiction given by statute; but that does not militate against the proposition that they have common law jurisdiction over all matters submitted to them, and exercise not only statutory powers, but powers derived from the common law.

It was pertinently said in the matter of Martin Comner, 39 Cal., 98: "The act of Congress does not require that the court shall have all the common law jurisdiction which pertains to all classes of actions. It is enough that it has common law jurisdiction."

In Morgan v. Dudley, 18 B. Monroe, 693, the court, in an elaborate opinion, said: "The act of Congress, in designating the State courts that have authority to admit aliens to become citizens of the United States, does not describe them as courts of general common law jurisdiction, but as courts having common law jurisdiction, and consequently embracing all that has either limited or general common law jurisdiction."

In Ex parte Gladhill, 8 Metc., 168, it was held, Chief Justice Shaw delivering the opinion of the court, that the police court of Lowell, being a court of record, having a seal and clerk, and being vested with all the civil and criminal jurisdiction of justices of the peace, was a court of common law jurisdiction within the meaning of the act of Congress, with power to admit aliens to become citizens of the United States.

In the People v. Pease, 30 Barb., 588, one question was whether the County Court of New York had jurisdiction, under the act of Congress in matters of naturalization. The court said: "The county County Court has common law jurisdiction in the revision of all judgments given in justice's court. The court of appeals is a court of general common law jurisdiction, and yet it has no original jurisdiction. The county court, as an appellate court, is in like manner a court having common law jurisdiction." Allusion is made, in the opinion of the court, to a decision made by Justice McLean of the Supreme Court of the United States, holding that the probate courts of the several courties in Ohio had jurisdiction in naturalization proceedings, which is said to have been published in the Law Gazette, but we have not been able to find the case reported anywhere.

In Ex parte Burkhart, 16 Tex., 470, it was declared that the county courts of that State, though of limited jurisdiction, yet had common law jurisdiction within the meaning of the act of Congress.

In Mills v. McCabe, 44 Ill., 194, it was held that the "Marine Court of the City of New York" was not a court of record within the meaning of the act of Congress conferring jurisdiction upon State courts to admit aliens to citizenship. That court was created by statute, its jurisdiction defined, and, as we understand, was a court of record for some purposes, but not for all. The proceedings on trial were informal, the pleadings oral, and, in technical strictness, there was no judgment roll. De La Faniers v. Jackson, 4 E. D. Smith, 477.

It was in view of the fact that the courts of New York had thus characterized the "Marine Court," declaring its proceedings in part oral, that this court, in its opinion, said: "Having been decided by competent authority to be a court of record only to the extent that it was declared by statute, and not to possess other powers incident to such a court, we are not authorized to hold it a court of record;" and it was then added: "A fair and reasonable construction of the act of Congress requires us to hold that only a court of record for general and not special purposes was intended to bo embraced."

The case of Knox County v. Davis, 63 Ill., 405, declares that the court intended to be embraced in the act of Congress was one that exercised a general, although it might be a common law jurisdiction limited as to the sum or amount in controversy, and, it may be, where some kinds of actions are excluded. The conclusion was that the county court in this State, as organized under the Constitution of 1848, did not have jurisdiction to admit aliens to citizenship, and the reason assigned is that that court had no general common law jurisdiction in any matters. It is conceded those courts exercised a general and limited jurisdiction in the settlement of estates, and in all matters pertaining thereto; but that jurisdiction, it is said, was strictly statutory. The common law jurisdiction in actions of debt or assumpsit was limited to certain persons in their official capacity, and limited also as to the sum or amount in controversy, and hence the conclusion was reached that it had no common law jurisdiction within the meaning of the act of Congress.

But we are satisfied, on more mature reflection and a fuller examination of the reported cases, that this case, in so far as it held that the county courts of this State, as organized under the Constitution of 1848, had no jurisdiction to grant naturalization, is in conflict with those authorities, and that it should be overruled and so modified as to conform to the construction generally given to the act of Congress upon the subject of naturalization, which, under the Constitution, should be uniform. The construction of the act should be, as far as practicable, uniform by the decisions in the several States, in order that naturalization of aliens, valid by the decisions of the courts of one State, may not be declared invalid by the courts of another State.

It seems clear, upon authority, as well as upon construction of the federal statute, that the courts designated in the act of Congress, which have jurisdiction conferred upon them to hear and determine applications for naturalization, need not possess general common law jurisdiction over all classes of actions, but must be courts of record for all purposes, possessing powers incident to such courts, with common law jurisdiction over all subjects upon which they have authority to adjudicate, and must exercise their powers accordingly to the course of the common law.

Our conclusion is, that the Criminal Court of the County of St. Louis is such a court, and, it being shown to have "common law jurisdiction" within the meaning of the act of Congress in relation to naturalization, it was therefore competent to admit defendant to all the rights of citizenship.

The judgment of the Circuit Court must be affirmed.

SUPREME COURT OF TENNESSEE.

KNOXVILLE, JULY 19, 1875.

JOSEPH RUOHS, in error, v. M. C. YOUNGLOVE.

COVENANT OF SEIZIN—BREACH OF.—A deed purporting to convey the absolute estate in land in fee, the legal meaning of the covenant of seizin therein was that the maker of the deed had the very estate in quality and quantity which the deed purported to convey, that is, a fee title. As he did not have a fee simple title the covenant was broken and the plaintiff was entitled to recover.

SAME—MEASURE OF DAMAGES.—The measure of damages is the consideration paid with interest where there is an entire failure of title, or where the purchaser has no election to treat it as such. And if the purchaser chooses to sue upon the covenant at law, without a rescission or offer to rescind, he can only recover to the extent of the breach—the contract of sale and the conveyance remaining in force as to the part to which the title does not fail.

M'FARLAND, J. This action was brought by Younglove upon the covenants of seizin and warranty of title in a deed made to him by Ruohs for a tract of land in Chattanooga, both of which covenants are alleged to have been broken. Under the charge of the judge below the plaintiff recovered upon the breach of the covenant of seizin the full consideration paid with interest. The defendant excepted to the charge, and has appealed in error. The deed from Ruohs to Younglove purports to convey a fee simple title to the land. After giving a general description of the land, it says: "Being the same land purchased by me at a chancery sale, made under a decree at the Chancery Court at Chattanooga in the case of Sallie E. Bruce and Nash H. Burts, administrator, etc., against Mattie W. Bruce and others, which sale was made on the 30th of November, 1869, in bar of the equity of redemption, and the dower interest in it which I purchased from Sallie E. Bruce subsequent to said sale of the said chancery land."

It was shown upon the trial that upon a writ of error the decree of sale referred to, under which Ruohs purchased the land, was reversed, and it was adjudged that he acquired no title by his purchase. This is not controverted; but it was insisted that by the deed Ruohs conveyed to Younglove two separate estates—one the life estate of Sallie E. Bruce, the other the fee simple; and as there was no proof that the title was not good to the life estate of Sallie E. Bruce, the plaintiff was only entitled to recover the difference between said life estate and the fee. The deed purported to convey the absolute estate to the land in fee. The reference to the source of this title was not intended to limit or qualify the character of his conveyance or his covenant; the legal meaning of his covenant of seizin was that he had the very estate in quality and quantity which the deed purported to convey, that is, a fee simple title. As it is conceded that he did not have a fee simple title, it is clear that the covenant was broken and that the plaintiff was entitled to recover. See Kincaid v. Brittain, 5 Sneed, 119.

The question is as to the measure of damages. It appears that the bargainor claimed the dower interest of Sallie E. Bruce, and it is not shown but what his title to this extent was good. The question is, was the plaintiff authorized to treat the failure as entire and recover the entire purchase money, or was he bound to retain whatever title was acquired to the life estate and recover the difference in value between the fee simple title to the whole and the life estate in such part as was conveyed by the decree? Or, in other words, to recover the purchase money paid and interest or the value of the life estate? It is settled that the measure of damages is the consideration paid with interest, where there is an entire failure of title, or, as was said by Judge McKinney in Kincaid v. Brittain, 5 Sneed, where the purchaser has an election to treat it as such. And in the latter case the effect of a recovery of an equivalent in damages would be to entitle the bargainor to a re-conveyance of whatever title had passed by the deed, and this, if refused, a court of equity would enforce, and perhaps the effect of such recovery of damages would be by operation of law to vest the title in the bargainor, without more, that is, such title as was conveyed. See also Rawle on Cov., p. 76, et seq.

It is not clearly shown, however, in what cases the purchaser has the right to treat the failure of title as entire. In Rawle on Cov., p. 88, et seq., treating of the covenant of seizin it is said: "It is well settled that while upon a total breach of this covenant, a purchaser may, as a general rule, recover the whole consideration money; so, where there is a partial breach he may recover pro tanto. Thus in the early case of Gray v. Briscoe, one covenanted that he was seizin of Blackacre in fee simple, when in fact it was copyhold land, and the jury were directed to give damages according to the rate at which the court valued fee simple more than copyhold land. So, where in a case in New York, the parties had a life estate in four-sixths of the premises, and a fee in the remainder, it was held in an action on the covenant for seizin, that the damages should be measured by deducting the value of the life estate from four-sixths of the purchase money, and without interest, as there was no one to call upon the plaintiff for undue profit. So where a tenant for life having conveyed with covenant for seizin in fee, the purchaser was held entitled to recover the consideration money, deducting therefrom the value of the life estate, and for the same reason as in the case last cited, without interest. "The principle adopted in these cases," says the author, "has been recognized and applied in many others." See p. 90 and authorities cited in notes.

The argument against this is, that the purchaser ought not to be compelled to accept a title to a part, or an estate for life, when the fee or the entire estate was the inducement to the purchase. The reply is, that these would be important considerations upon an application to a court of equity for a rescission; but if the purchaser chose to sue upon a covenant at law without a rescission or offer to rescind, he can only recover to the extent of the breach—the contract of sale and conveyance remaining in force as to the part to which the title does not fail. See same authority, page 72; Morris v. Phelps, 5 John, 56. We have found no authority holding a contrary doctrine. The result is, the judgment must be reversed and a new trial awarded.

THE MICHIGAN CENTRAL R. R. CO. v. WILLIAM W BURROWS.

Error to Kalamazoo Circuit.

CONNECTING LINES—LIABITITY OF FIRST CARRIER—FRUIT DAMAGED BY FROST IN TRANSIT—MUST BE TRANSPORTED WITHIN A REASONABLE TIME—WHAT WILL EXCUSE A CARRIER FOR NOT DELIVERING IN USUAL TIME—RELIEF GOODS HAVE THE PREFERENCE.

1. The plaintiff in the court below shipped, Nov. 10, 1871, 4 car loads of apples, at Vandalia, Mich., to their agents in Minneapolis. The apples were transferred by the defendant at Chicago to the next carrier Nov. 17, and arrived at Minneapolis on Nov. 22, badly injured by frost, having been frozen after leaving Chicago on or about the 21st of November; that before the fire of Oct. 1871, the usual running time of freight trains between Vandalia and Chicago was 24 hours; that at the time this shipment was made the average running time was ten days in consequence of the road being blocked with relief supplies for sufferers by the Chicago fire. The apples were carried in seven days. Held,

First. That they were transported within a reasonable time under the circumstances of the case.

Second. That what would or would not constitute unreasonable delay can not be determined by a comparison between the actual time and what had been the average running time between two given points under usual and ordinary circumstances. The proper question would be what was the average running time under the extraordinary and unusual circumstances existing at the time of the alleged delay? And, then, to ascertain whether the goods in question had been unreasonably delayed beyond such time.

Third. That the company was justified in not sending forward goods in the order received, and giving relief goods the preference: that the law is not so unjust and harsh as to punish a common carrier who makes such a discrimination under the circumstances, but rather commends and approves what was done.

Fourth. Even if there was unnecessary delay between Vandalia and Chicago, the defendant would not, by reason thereof, be liable for the injury which the apples sustained by freezing while in the custody of the next carrier.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

MARSTON, J. — Defendants in error brought an action against the railroad company to recover damages claimed to arise from unreasonable delay on the part of the company in carrying apples from Vandalia, in this State, to Chicago.

It appeared that plaintiffs in the court below shipped, November 10th, 1871, four car loads of apples consigned to their agents at Minneapolis, in the State of Minnesota; that the apples were transferred by defendants, at Chicago, to the next carrier November 17th, and arrived at Minneapolis on the evening of Nov. 22d, badly injured by frost, having been frozen while in transit from Chicago on or after Nov. 21st.

It also appeared, and was not disputed, that the tracks of the railroad company were in good condition; that the company had abundant rolling stock of every kind to do all its business, and that it had no difficulty in moving, storing and taking care of freight previous to October 8th, 1871. That on the 8th of October a fire originated on the West side of the city of Chicago, and that about three hundred acres of the city were burned on that and the next day; that the depots belonging to the company caught fire from the surrounding buildings and were destroyed, as were also the tracks within three thousand feet of the depots, and also the tracks in the freight depots, thus rendering it impossible for the company to receive any fretght, having neither freight-houses to receive it in or tracks to handle it on. That the company immediately made all possible effort to temporarily replace their tracks and buildings, drawing, for snch purpose, their force of men from the east and west ends of their road. It further appeared, and was not disputed, that large numbers of people in Chicago, after the fire, were suffering and destitute, and that in order to relieve their immediate wants it became necessary to send clothing, provisions, building material, hardware, stoves, and other necessary supplies, known as relief goods, forward, which made the freight business threefold greater than it had been before the fire; that the company under these circumstances immediately issued orders, as soon as they were able to carry any freight, to give relief goods the preference, next in order fruit and perishable property, and then general merchandise.

It also appeared that at the time the apples in question were received by the defendant, its line of road was greatly blocked by an accumulation of freight occasioned by the causes already stated; that previous to the fire, the running time of freight trains from Vandalia to Chicago was about twenty-four hours; that at the time this shipment was made the average running time between the same points was ten days, on account of the fire and great increase of freight, and that the apples were carried in about seven days.

Under facts as stated, the defendant denied that there was any unreasonable delay on its road, and insisted that, having completed the carriage of the fruit over its road, and delivered it to the next carrier in good order, in no event could it be held liable for the alleged injury to the property, occurring while in transit, and in the custody of the next carrier.

Was there, then, under the circumstances stated, any unreasonable delay, on the part of the company, in the carriage of these apples between Vandalia and Chicago?

Railroad companies are bound to have all reasonable and necessary facilities and appliances for conducting and carrying on the business in which they are engaged in a prompt, skillful and careful manner. It is their duty to keep and maintain their tracks in a good condition and state of repair; have a sufficient supply of rolling-stock to carry, and suitable depots to receive, the usual and ordinary quantity of freight offered them for transportation, or which might reasonably and ordinarily be expected. They are not bound, however, to be prepared for unusual and extraordinary contingencies, which no ordinary prudence or foresight could reasonably foresee or anticipate, and where an unusual contingency has arisen, which, unexpectedly, largely increases the business, or prevents, as in this case, the handling of freight in so prompt and expeditious a manner as the company formerly had been accustomed to do, the company cannot be charged with unreasonable delay for not carrying freight in the same time it had done previous to such contingency.

In other words, what would or would not constitute unreasonable delay, can not be determined by a comparison between the actual time and what had been the average running time between two given points, under usual and ordinary circumstances. The proper question would be, What was the average running time under the extraordinary and unusual circumstances existing at the time of the alleged delay? And then to ascertain whether the goods in question had been unreasonably delayed beyond such time.

It appears, in this case, that the average running time between Vandalia and Chicago, when these apples were shipped, was ten days, while the time occupied in carrying and transferring the apples did not exceed seven, thus showing not only that there was really no delay in this case, but that these goods were given a preference, and were carried through in an unusually prompt and expeditious manner, under the circumstances. Look at the result of the doctrine, contended for by plaintiffs, if carried out. The usual and average time for carrying freight, before the fire, between Vandalia and Chicago was two days. Owing to the destruction of the company's tracks and depots, and the large and sudden influx of business, ten days was the average time actually required to carry freight between the same points, and it was impossible for the company to carry it in two days. Should the company, under the facts as presented, be liable for unnecessary delay in each case where more than two days was taken to transport freight between these points? To so hold would be to render the company liable in every instance, and that for a delay caused by circumstances over which it had no control.

The position taken by plaintiffs (defendants in error here), would make it the duty of the company to carry and deliver freight with the same rapidity, during the time of these extraordinary occurrences, that it did previous thereto, and hold it responsible for the delay if it did not. But the company found it impossible, without any fault on its part, so to do. The destruction of the tracks and depots utterly prevented the company from handling freight with its accustomed rapidity, and caused a blockade along the entire line. Circumstances beyond their control prevented, and the law does not seek to hold any one responsible, upon the ground of negligence, for not doing that which it was practically impossible to do.

It was urged, however, that it was the duty of the company to send forward freight in the same order in which it was received; that there should have been no discrimination made, no preference given, between the classes of freight received by the company for transportation.

After the fire large quantities of goods were being sent forward, by relief societies from all parts of the country for the purpose of both preventing and relieving the great suffering and distress which did exist, and otherwise would have existed among the people, who had, by a great public calamity, suddenly been left without proper clothing or houses to shield and protect them from the inclemencies of the season, or sufficient provisions to prevent many of them from imminent danger of starvation. So urgent was the demand for supplies, that relief societies sprung up as if by magic, all over the country. The people promptly responded to their calls, and the necessary supplies of all kinds were sent forward in such abundance that railroad companies, crippled as they were by the fire, found it difficult to promptly carry and dispose of their freights. Relief goods, therefore, were given the preference, and the companies would have been justly chargeable with public condemnation had they refused to give a preference to and carry all such goods offered for transportation, under the circumstances.

Although the company had suffered very great injury by the fire, yet it was doing all in its power to repair the damage as promptly as it could, and at the same time making every effort to carry forward all goods received, making, however, a just, proper and highly commendable discrimination in favor of that class of goods, which would alleviate the suffering and distressed. The law is not so harsh and unjust as to punish a common carrier who makes such a discrimination, under the circumstances, but rather commends and approves what was done.

While, therefore, it may be true as a general proposition, that it was the duty of the company to forward freight in the order in which it was received, yet, in this case, there was a great public necessity to which all general rules must bend, making it the imperative duty of the company to give relief goods a preference.

"The law itself and the administration of it," said Sir W. Scott, 2 Dods, 323-4, "must yield to that to which everything must bend—to necessity; the law, in its most positive and peremptory injunctions, is understood to disclaim, as it does in its general aphorisms, all intention of compelling to impossibilities, and the administration of laws must adapt that general exception in the consideration of all particular cases. In the performance of that duty, it has three points to which its attention must be directed. In the first place it must see that the nature of the necesity pleaded be such as the law itself would respect, for there may be a necessity which it would not.

A necessity created by a man's own act, with a fair previous knowledge of the consequences that would follow, and under circumstances which he had then a power of controlling, is of that nature. Secondly, that the party who was so placed used all practicable endeavors to surmount the difficulties which already formed that necessity, and which on fair trial, he found insurmountable. I do not mean all the endeavors which the wit of man, as it exists in the acutest understanding, might suggest, but such as may reasonably be expected from a fair degree of discretion and an ordinary knowledge of business. Thirdly, that all this shall appear by distinct and unsuspected testimony, for the positive injunctions of the law, if proved to be violated, can give way to nothing but the clearest proof of the necessity that compelled the violation." And it is also said to be a general rule, admitting of ample practical illustration, that, "where the law creates a duty or charge, and the party is unable to perform it, without any default in him, and has no remedy over, then the law will, in general, excuse him. Paradine v. Jane Alleyn, 27, cited per Lawrence, J., in 8 T. R., 267; Evans v. Hutton, 5 Scott, N. R., 670. This case comes within the principles quoted. Here was a necessity which the law would respect. It was not created by the company's own act, but by a power which proved to be beyond the control of man. The company used all practicable endeavors to surmount the difficulties which formed that necessity, and all this appeared by distinct and unsuspected testimony. We are all of opinion, therefore, that from the undisputed facts in this case there was not only no unreasonable or unnecessary delay in the transportation of the apples, but that the same were carried within the then average time of carrying freight between Vandalia and Chicago, and that the jury should have been so instructed.

Admitting, however, that there was unreasonable delay between Vandalia and Chicago, would the defendant, by reason thereof, be liable for the injury which the apples sustained by freezing while in the custody of the next carrier?

In Clark v. Moore et al., 3 Mich., 62, it was said: "No damages are ever recoverable in actions ex contractu, unless they are shown by the party claiming them to be the natural and proximate consequence of the breach complained of. Of course, each of the circumstances which concurred with the breach in producing the damage, and without which it would not have happened, is a part of its cause, and if any of these concurring circumstances are so far out of the ordinary course of nature, or of human affairs, that they cannot fairly be presumed to have been contemplated by the parties at the time of making the contract, then the damage is not the natural result of the breach, and is, therefore, not recoverable." This rule has been since repeatedly followed.

The contract which the defendant entered into, in this case, was to carry the property safely, and deliver it, within a reasonable time, to the next carrier at Chicago. The only breach of this agreement complained of was the failure to deliver within a reasonable time. Are, then, the damages claimed the natural and proximate consequence of such breach? We think not. To be so, the loss must be immediately connected with the supposed cause of it. The loss in this case might or might not have occurred, even had there been no delay. If, in the ordinary course of events, a certain result usually follows from a given cause, then we may well consider the immediate relation of the one to the other to be established. Cold, freezing weather does not, however, in the ordinary course of events, follow from mere delay. Such is not the natural and direct result of the delay. It is true that in certain climates and at certain seasons, such an injury would be much more likely to result from delay; while, at others, there would be not even a possibility of such a result following. It is very evident, therefore, that as we approach the one or the other, we must enter upon debatable ground, where it would be very difficult, if not, indeed, impossible, to say what the result of a given delay would be. Where fruit is to be carried a long distance, especially in such a country as this, where the climate is so changeable, it would as frequently result that delay would be the cause of averting such an injury as of contributing to it. It may be true that had there been no delay whatever, on the part of defendants, the loss would not have happened. The law, however, cannot enter upon an examination of, or inquiry into, all the concurring circumstances which may have assisted in producing the injury, and without which it would not have occurred. To do so would only be to involve the whole matter in utter uncertainty, for when once we leave the direct, and go to seeking after remote causes, we have entered upon an unending sea of uncertainty, and any conclusion which should be reached would depend more upon conjecture than facts.

Lord Bacon said: "It were infinite for the law to consider the causes of causes, and their impulses, one of another; therefore, it contenteth itself with the immediate cause, and judgeth of acts by that, without looking to any further degree." Bacon's Maxims.

The following cases are so directly in point, and the reasoning therein so satisfactory, that a reference thereto will render any further discussion unnecessary. Denny v. N. Y. C. R. R. Co., 13 Gray, 481; Railroad Company v. Reeves, 10 Wall., 176; Morreseri v. Davis, 20 Penn. St., 171; and Hoadley v. Northern Transportation Co., 115 Cass, 304.

The court, therefore, should have given defendant's eleventh request to charge. We think the court also erred in refusing to give defendant's twelfth request.

This request was based upon the assumption that the Chicago & Northwestern R R. Co. was guilty of negligent delay in carrying the apples, after delivery to them by the defendant, and the court was requested to charge, in substance: If the jury should find that without such delay the damage would not have occurred, then the plaintiffs could not recover. It is somewhat difficult to conjecture upon what theory the request was refused. If the jury should find that there was negligent delay on the part of the carrier to whom defendant delivered the apples, and that without such delay the injury would not have occurred, then clearly, this defendant should not be held responsible for an injury caused by the negligence of others, over whom it had no control.

Take the case of fruit during the summer season, shipped at San Francisco for New York. During the transit it passes over several different lines of railroad. There is a delay of two days on each line, and in consequence of the entire delay, the fruit, on reaching the ultimate consignee, is found badly damaged. Is the first carrier to be held responsible for the consequence of the entire delay? Such a rule, to say the least, would savor very much of harshness, and if carried out to its legitimate results, would, we think, end in absurdity. Suppose the fruit shipped at San Francisco was consigned to the European market, and each different carrier through whose hands it passed delayed it somewhat, and that in consequence of the combined delay, the fruit on arriving at its destination was found injured, or arrived during a riot and was wantonly destroyed, should the first carrier be held responsible for the entire loss? To so hold, there should be something in the undertaking or agreement into which the company entered to show that it contracted with reference to such an enlarged liability. In other words, such an injury would not be the natural result of the delay on the part of the first carrier, but the result in part of the combined delay. It would not, therefore, naturally result from the breach on the part of the first carrier. Nor could such a result have been contemplated by the parties at the time of entering into their agreement.

As the view we have taken of this case will be decisive upon a new trial, we do not consider it necessary to discuss the other questions raised. The judgment of the court below must be reversed with cosants, da new trial granted.

In a case where a firm requested a commission house in Milwaukee to purchase a quantity of wheat, which the commission house did, and consigned it to the cashier of the Milwaukee Bank, and handed over to the bank the bills of lading as a security for the drafts drawn against it, and sent invoices to the firm that requested to purchase the wheat. Naturalization of Aliens—County Courts May.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of this State by Scott, J., holding that a record of naturalizatlon made by a court of competent jurisdiction, can not be impeached in a collateral proceeding, by showing that the preliminary steps required by law have not in fact been taken, as where it is alleged that the person had not, at the time of the naturalization, resided one year in the State in which the naturalization took place; that the criminal court of St. Louis county, Missouri, has jurisdiction to admit aliens to citizenship. The most important portion of this opinion is that which overrules the doctrine laid down in Knox Co. v. Davis, that the County Court as organized under the constitution of 1848 did not have jurisdiction to admit aliens to citizenship. The Court say the construction of "the act should be, as far as practicable, uniform by the decisions in the several States, in order that naturalization of aliens, valid by the decisions of the courts of one State, may not be declared invalid by the Courts of another State." Breese, J., does not concur in the opinion.

WILL—GIFT TO CHILDREN—ILLEGITIMATE CHILDREN NOT INCLUDED.

The House of Lords in Dorin v. Dorin, 33 L. T. Rep. N. S., 281, held that the word "children," used in a will, prima facie means legitimate children, unless, when the facts are ascertained, some repugnancy or inconsistency would result from so interpreting it; that the probable intention of the testator cannot be taken into account. A testator gave all his real and personal property to his wife for life, with power to dispose of it "amongst our children" by will; and should she make no will, the property to be divided "equally between my children by her." At the time of making the will he had two illegitimate children by her, whom he had always treated as his own; he never had any other children by her. It was held, reversing the judgment of the court below, that the illegitimate children were not the objects of the power and could not take, in default of appointment; and that subject to the life estate of the wife, the property was not disposed of by the will.

PLEA IN FEDERAL COURT OF PRIOR ACTION PENDING IN STATE COURT.

The United States Circuit Court for the district of Iowa, in Brooks v. Mills Co., 2 Central Law Journal, 719, held that a plea to an action pending in the Circuit Court of the United States, which sets up the pendency of a prior litigation in a State court within the same district, between the same parties and upon the same subject matter, is a good plea in abatement; but if the plea on its face discloses that the parties to the litigation in the State court are not the same as those to the action in which the plea is filed, the defendant will be ruled to answer.

Some of the most spirited contests take place in these moot courts. There are 56 cases stated in this pamphlet. It may be obtained of Professor Denslow. Price, 30 cents.

The American Reports: Containing All Decisions of General Interest Decided in the Courts of Last Resort of the Several States, with Notes and References. By Isaac Grant Thompson. Vol. XV. Containing all Cases of general importance in the following Reports: 9 Bush., (Ky.); 47 Georgia; 49 Georgia; 50 Georgia; 4 Houston, (Del.); 44 Indiana; 45 Indiana; 46 Indiana; 10 Kansas; 11 Kansas; 12 Kansas; 111 Massachusetts; 115 Massachusetts; 27 Michigan; 28 Michigan; 56 New York; 57 New York; 24 Ohio St.; 74 Pennsylvania St.; 75 Pennsylvania St. Albany: John D. Parsons, Jr., Publisher. 1875.

This is a valuable series of Reports. The cases selected are the cream of those published in the State Reports. We think, however, that the author claims too much when he says that the present volume contains all cases of any general importance in twenty-one volumes of State Reports. Mr. Thompson is an experienced and skillful reporter. His head-notes are short, clear and accurate. Of the cases in this volume we notice the following: In Hunt v. State, 677, it is held to be error for a judge presiding at a criminal trial to limit the prisoner's counsel to forty minutes for his argument. In Hilderbrand v. The People, 435, where the prosecutor took a drink at a bar and handed a fifty dollar bill to the bar-tender, who took it and refused to give change, it was held to be larceny. In Beck v. Allison, 431, it is said that equity will not enforce specific performance of a covenant in a lease, on the part of the lessor, to repair damages by fire. In Stanly v. State, 605, it is held: the bringing into Ohio, by the thief, of goods stolen in the Dominion of Canada, or other foreign country, is not larceny in Ohio. In Conyers v. State, 687, it was held on the trial of a keeper of a billiard table, charged with permitting a minor to play billiards at his table without the consent of the parent or guardian of the minor, the burden of proving that the parent or guardian did not consent is upon the State.

Reports of Cases Argued and Determined in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Second Circuit. By Samuel Blatchford, Judge of the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York. Volume XII. New York: Baker, Voorhis & Co., Publishers, 66 Nassau street, 1875. For sale by E. B. Myers, law bookseller, Chicago.

This volume commences with cases of April, 1874, and ends with cases of June, 1875. We think some of the opinions could be pruned and made to occupy less than one-half the space. That they would be more valuable to the profession if more authorities were cited. Judges who deliver opinions orally, and have them taken down in short hand, are apt to extend them to an unreasonable length. The cases of this circuit involve as great a variey of important questions as any other in the United States, and its judges are able and experienced, which makes this series of reports one of the most valuable of the many federal reports.

The Loves of a Lawyer: His quandary, and how it came out. By Andrew Shuman, editor Chicago Evening Journal, Chicago: W. B. Keene, Cook & Co. 1875.

The first thing, upon opening the volume, that meets the eye is Cupid in his chariot drawn by two doves. This, suggestive as it may seem, is simply an insight into the contents of the book. It is a story with a good deal of love in it as its name implies, and yet brimful of good suggestions, capital hits, and most thoroughly sensible ideas. In typographical appearance, it is all one can wish for; it is very handsomely gotten up, and we predict for it a large sale, especially when we remember it is produced by one of Chicago's favorites—a man most highly esteemed by the citizens of the Garden City.

Injunction Dissolved.—On Tuesday Judge Farwell, of the Circuit Court, dissolved the injunction which prevented the county from paying Otto Peltzer $45,000 for his abstract books, which had been purchased by order of the county commissioners. Judge Farwell held that the county board had the authority to make the purchase, and that the court had no right to interfere with their discretion, unless in case of fraud, etc. Mr. Peltzer, soon after the injunction was dissolved, received his money.

The Lake Front.—The sale of a portion of the lake front is now being agitated by the Common Council of this city. It is said the railroads are anxious to purchase it. We are at a loss to see, in the face of Judge Drummond's opinion and injunction, how the city can sell this property. We published this opinion in 1 Chicago Legal News, 427. The learned judge held that there was a dedication of this property to public use subject to the condition that if was to be "public ground forever to remain vacant of buildings," and that the fee, subject to the dedication, was still in the United States. We should like to know by what authority the Council can sell the land of the United States. This injunction has remained in force ever since September, 1869. The railroads have not even dared to present the question to the Supreme Court of the United States, as they undoubtedly would have done before this if they believed the injunction could be dissolved.

Reduce the Rates of Postage on Third Class Matter.—Every lawyer, every clergyman, every literary man, every publisher, every reader of books in the United States, is interested in having the rate of postage on third class matter reduced one-half, which will bring it down to the old rate, where it was before the express companies succeeded in doubling it. Every person who orders a book or package of blanks to be sent by mail has to pay just twice as much postage as formerly, and as a consequence a large proportion of such packages are sent by express. The government, when it has a monopoly of carrying mail matter, ought certainly to be able to carry it as cheap as express companies. Let the people take this matter in hand and see that the old law is restored.

Vice President Wilson.—Vice President Henry Wilson died in what is known as the vice president's room, in the senate wing of the capitol, at an early hour on Monday of this week. It can truly be said of Mr. Wilson that he was a great and good man. For the last twenty years he has been one of the foremost leaders in the cause of liberty and equal rights. He believed that every citizen of lawful age, without regard to sex or color, should have a voice in the management of the government and the selection of officers. It is worthy of remark that Chief Justice Chase and Vice President Wilson, who were strong woman suffragists, should both die in office.

General Albert Erskine.—We regret to have to announce that General Erskine, deputy clerk of the United States District Court in this city, while attending to his official duties, about twelve o'clock on Monday, was, without any warning whatever, seized with an apoplectic stroke, of which he died the following evening. General Erskine was born in Bristol, Maine, and came to the west about twenty years ago. He served through the late war with distinction as colonel of the Thirteenth Illinois Cavalry. For gallant services he received, at the close of the war, a brevet brigadier generalship. He entered the government service after his retirement from the army and was appointed chief clerk in the office of General M. R. M. Wallace, then assessor of internal revenue for this district. Afterwards he held a position of trust in the Chicago post office. About three years ago he was appointed to the clerkship which he held up to the time of his death. He was a cousin of Judge Drummond, of the United States Court. General Erskine had a host of friends; he possessed a cultivated mind, was gentle in his manners, and exceedingly warm-hearted and sympathetic.

THE LIMITS TO THE JURISDICTION OF COURTS.

LECTURE BY A. M. PENCE, ESQ., BEFORE THE UNION COLLEGE OF LAW.

And if such decree is not reviewed by writ of error or appeal, that the title obtained under such a decree will be good and binding.

The test of the jurisdiction of a superior court over the subject-matter is this: Has such court jurisdiction over that class of subjects, viz.—to decree a specific performance—to foreclose mortgages or declare trusts, etc.?

If it has, then it matters little what may be the allegation of the bill.

And when you examine a title depending upon such a sale, you may be sure the title will not fail for want of jurisdiction of the subject-matter, although the averments of the bill are the most meagre, and the proceedings very erroneous. Thompson v. Morris, 57 Ill., 333.

And you will also remember, that although five years have not elapsed since the rendition of the decree or judgment, and hence is subject to a review by writ of error, and may be reversed, yet, if a title be acquired by judicial sale or otherwise by virtue of such judgment, in the mean time, it will be protected and stand, although the judgment on which it is based be reversed afterward.

Hence the importance of knowing what are jurisdictional facts and what are simply errors.

But no presumptions are indulged in favor of the jurisdiction over the subject-matter of a court of inferior or limited jurisdiction.

The facts which give jurisdiction must appear set out, properly averred in the bill or petition, or the court will have no power, and its proceedings will be a nullity. For instance, in the case of a petition to sell real estate which has descended to heirs, for purpose of paying debts of ancestor, it must appear by the petition that all the requirements of the statute have been complied with. It must appear affirmatively, or the court will have no jurisdiction of that special case, although it has jurisdiction generally to sell real estate for that purpose.

Every case in a court of limited jurisdiction must appear by the record to be within the jurisdiction, or it will be a nullity, and may be attacked collaterally everywhere. Stow v. Kimball, 28 Ill., 93; Bree v. Bree, 51 Ill., 367; Unknown Heirs of Langworthy v. Baker, 23 Ill., 489.

You know that letters of administration, or letters testamentary, must issue from the probate court of the county where the party resided at the time of his decease.

But suppose that a man resided in Sangamon county, Illinois, at the time of his decease, but that letters of administration were prayed for in Cook county, the petition setting forth that the deceased resided in Sangamon county, or was silent on that subject, the court here would refuse such letters.

But suppose that the petition filed stated that he resided in Cook county, when, in fact, he resided in Sangamon county, the court would hear evidence and decide upon that question. And if the court decided that he resided in Cook county at the time of his decease, which was a mistake of fact, that would give the court jurisdiction over his estate, and the question could never be raised again in a collateral action. If not set aside by a direct proceeding the finding of the court would be conclusive upon the world. Fisher v. Bassett, 9 Leigh, 119; Irwin v. Schreiber, 18 Cal., 499.

The court had jurisdiction to inquire into its jurisdiction, and although its decree was wrong upon the fact, yet, when found, its finding is conclusive in all collateral proceedings.

And there can be no inspection behind the judgment save by a direct proceeding.

But I take it, if the Court of Probate in Cook county granted letters in the first case, I mentioned, viz: where the petition showed that the decedent resided in Sangamon county, then in that case the proceeding would be a nullity and the administrator no administrator.

I understand that this very question has arisen and is now in the Supreme Court of this State, and the decision will be a matter of some interest. There is one instance in regard to attacking jurisdictional questions collaterally, which is an anomaly, and I call your attention to it. An act of Congress provides that full faith and credit shall be given in each State to the records and judicial proceedings of every other State as are given to them in the State where the proceedings arise. But it is held that any court may examine into the fact as to whether such court of a sister State actually have jurisdiction, and go so far as to contradict the finding of such court by parol, by outside evidence. Why such a rule has obtained I know not. It is contrary to all analogies. See Thompson v. Whitman, 18 Wall., 457; Bimeler v. Dawson, 4 Scam., 541.

How far is a judge responsible, in case he acts without having jurisdiction?

An action cannot be supported against a judge nor a justice of the peace acting judicially, and who has not exceeded his jurisdiction, however erroneous his decision or malicious his motive. Bradley v. Fisher, 13 Wall.; 1 Chitty Pl., 68

It is better that an individual should occasionally suffer a wrong, than that the course of justice should be impeded and fettered by constant restraints and apprehensions on the part of those who administer justice.

And the Supreme Court of the United States, in the case last referred to say in explicit terms, that however malicious a a judge may act, still having jurisdiction, no action can be maintained against him.

A judge is not bound at the peril of an action for damages or of personal controversy to decide right in a matter of law or of fact, but to decide according to his own convictions of right, of which his recorded judgment is the test, and must be taken to be conclusive evidence.

Now, it is manifest that to every controversy there are two sides, and that a decision in favor of one must be against the other, and this extends to every interest men hold most dear—to property, reputation and liberty, civil and social—to political and religious privileges—to all that makes life desirable—and to life itself.

If an action might be brought against a judge, by a party feeling himself aggrieved, the judge would be compelled to put in issue facts in which he has no interest, and the case would be tried before some other judge, who, in his turn, might be amenable to the losing party, and so indefinitely.

The losing party may always aver that the judge has acted partially or corruptly, and if the action was permitted, may offer evidence to prove it, and these proofs are addressed to the court and jury before whom the judge is called to defend himself, and the result is made to depend not upon his original conviction, the conclusion of his own mind in the decision in the original case, as by the theory of jurisprudence it ought to do, but upon the conclusion of other minds, under the influence of other and different considerations. See opinion of Chief Justice Shaw, in Pratt v. Gardner, 2 Cush., 68.

No one would ever dare to sit as a judge or make a decision if he could be accused of corruption and be called upon to defend himself. It would ruin him in estate and reputation.

Hence, the law throws a shield around the judge from public policy. If he acts corruptly he is liable to impeachment, but it cannot be permitted that he shall ever be called upon to defend himself in an action for damages.

Courts of review are established to correct erroneous judgments. Judges have been impeached for corruption, and that is the only remedy. When the judge has jurisdiction to pass upon the question submitted he is not liable in damages. But courts must act within their jurisdiction, and if they go beyond or exceed it they do become liable.

Thus, if the court of probate should issue a warrant to arrest a man for murder or burglary, and he should be arrested thereon, such judge would be held liable in an action for damages, for he has no more authority to issue such a writ than has any other individual.

But should a justice of the peace cause a man to be arrested upon a warrant for the same offense, he would not be held liable in damages, although the charge turns out to be unfounded, because the justice of the peace is given such authority, and he can not be called upon to account for a mistake in judgment, that class of cases being within his jurisdiction.

No person is liable in a civil action for what he has done as a judge, while acting within the limits of his jurisdiction; but if persons having a special or limited judicial authority do any act beyond the scope of their authority, they make themselves trespassers. Every such tribunal decides at its peril.

And process issuing therefrom is no protection to the court, attorney, party or officer who innocently executes it. If the act be done within the limit of their authority, although it be done through an erroneous or mistaken judgment, they are not thereby liable to such an action.

A judgment was rendered by a justice against A. and B., co-defendants, but over A. he had no jurisdiction.

An execution issued therein, in its terms leviable on the individual property of either defendant. Held, the justice was liable in damages for a levy upon the property of A.

A justice of the peace is liable for an arrest for contempt, when the act charged as a contempt was committed at a time when the justice was not actually engaged in a trial. See Winship v. People, 51 Ill., 296.

The want of jurisdiction which renders the judge liable, applies to want of jurisdiction either over the person or the subject-matter.

We have before seen that a party may appear and consent and submit to jurisdiction of the court when there is no service, but the want of a general jurisdiction over the offense can not be cured by assent, that is, a man can not give jurisdiction to the probate court to try him for burglary. Nor can he give jurisdiction to the criminal court of Cook county to try an action of ejectment. A judgment in such a case would be a nullity and could not be set up in defense in any action.

When, however, a court has a general jurisdiction over the subject-matter of a complaint or action, the proper way for defendant to take advantage of a want of jurisdiction over the person is at the time by plea.

And a party who fails to make the objection then may be precluded from relying upon it in the future.

A party cannot be relieved against a sentence for contempt, unless it should appear that the court pronouncing the contempt did not have jurisdiction in the matter.

A disobedience to the order of a court will be a contempt only when the court had the jurisdiction over the case in which the order was made. A proceeding for a contempt is a collateral action, and the jurisdiction of the court can only be attacked when there is an absolute want of power in the court to entertain jurisdiction over the class of subjects sought to be brought into adjudication by the proceeding in which the order was made.

Where there is a want of power, the decree is void collaterally; but where it is only meant by the term want of jurisdiction, that it would be erroneous to exercise the power, and the decree would be reversed on appeal. It means a want of equity, and not a want of power. A decision upholding the jurisdiction of a court is entirely consistent with a denial of any equity, either on the plaintiff or any one else. People v. Sturtevant, 9 N. Y., 273; Davis v. Mayor, 1 Duer., 451; Curtiss v. Brown, 29 Ill., 231.

As to courts of general jurisdiction that have the general power to commit for contempt, while in session, for acts done in their presence, if the sheriff, in return to a writ of habeas corpus, should simply make a general return that he held the party under a warrant issued by such a court for a contempt, nothing further could be done, and the petition for the discharge would be dismissed.

Either house of Congress or of the English Parliament has the authority of a superior court in such matters.

A very interesting case arose before Lord C. J. Denman, before referred to—that of Stockdale v. Hansard, 11 Ad. & Ellis, 292.

As before stated, Stockdale had obtained a judgment before the Queen's Bench against the Hansards, who were the parliamentary printers, on account of a parliamentary report, published by them, which contained a libel upon him. An execution was issued and levied upon their property; whereupon the House of Commons issued a warrant for the arrest of the sheriffs for contempt of their authority in ordering the same to be published, as was done by the Hansards. A habeas corpus was sued out by the sheriffs before the Queen's Bench. The attorney general directed the sergeant-at-arms to make a general return; that he held the bodies of the sheriffs by virtue of a warrant under the hand and seal of the speaker, for a contempt and breach of privilege of the House.

Lord Denman stated it, as clear law, that the Court of Queen's Bench could not examine into the validity of the commitment, but must presume that what any great court, much more, what either house of Parliament, acting on great legal authority (that of the Attorney-General Campbell), takes upon it to pronounce a contempt is so, adding, with graver sarcasm: "Indeed, it would be unseemly to suspect that a body acting under such sanctions as a House of Parliament would, in making its warrant, suppress facts which, if discussed, might entitle the person committed to his liberty."

As before stated the chief justice decided that the House had no such privilege as to cause the publication, and that hence, a party could not be committed for a breach of that which did not exist.

But the case well illustrates the powers and limitations of the courts.

The House having the general power to commit for contempt, the court could not inquire into its improper exercise by going outside of the record.

An amusing case occurred not long since in one of the English courts. R. V. Williams, County court judge and magistrate, was summoned before the magistrates of Rhyl, by Edward Powell, a car driver, for an assault. That is, he was summoned before his own court. He appeared before the other magistrates, and upon coming in he saw the car driver, and asked a police officer: "Is that the man?" On being informed that it was, the defendant went on to say: "I sentence you to seven days imprisonment in the jail at Mold. You interrupted me when I was coming to this court, and by the Act of Parliament I have the power to send you to jail without any evidence or any inquiry whatever." Mr. Justice Williams then pointing said: "Take this man to jail." And he was committed for contempt.

When the other magistrates arrived, although Mr. Justice Williams had stricken out the charge against himself with his own hand, they proceeded to try the cause. It appeared in the evidence that the justice had struck Powell over the face with his whip, on the road, because Powell did not get out of his way. After consultation the other judges found that the assault had been committed, and they inflicted the highest penalty upon their fellow judge—£5 and costs. Mr. Justice Williams said, "I shall not pay." Says the court, "In default, there will be fourteen days imprisonment."

The case shows not only the incorruptibility of English courts, but the sequel is this: Mr. Powell having been committed to jail for contempt, by the offending justice, the other judges could not interfere because each justice had general authority to commit for contempt.

The man remained in jail, and afterwards brought an action for damages against the judge, because he had no jurisdiction to send him to jail.

I believe that the judge subsequently was compelled to resign his office on account of public opinion against him, because of his illegal acts.

I have stated, that if a court exceeds its authority the judge becomes liable at the suit of the party injured, but it is sometimes a little difficult to determine whether the exercise of the power is simply erroneous, or whether the judge exceeds his powers.

A very interesting case has recently arisen in New York city. A party by the name of Lange was indicted before Judge Benedict of the U. S. District Court, for converting to his use certain mail bags. The penalty for the offense was a fine not exceeding $200, or imprisonment for one year. The court read or construed the penalty, maliciously or otherwise I do not know, to be $200 and imprisonment for one year; and upon conviction sentenced him to suffer both penalties. Lange paid his $200, and then after eleven days imprisonment, the term having ended, the court having discovered his mistake, sent for him and resentenced him for one year, omitting the first penalty which had been already paid.

Thus he paid one penalty, suffered 11 days, and was then sentenced for one year, making his whole punishment in in reality both penalties, and eleven days beside, whilst the law provided that he should suffer only the one or the other.

A habeas corpus was then sued out before His Honor, but without relief. Then he applied to Judge Blatchford, the Circuit Judge, without relief; and then he applied to the Supreme Court at Washington, who released him, upon the ground that the court exceeded its jurisdiction in sentencing him to both penalties, and having paid one, he was entitled to his release, and, especially, was the second sentence of the court, the term having ended, coram non judice, and void.

You know that a court can not interfere to change its judgment after the term is past.

Mr. Lange, who is said to be a gentleman, has sued Judge Benedict in the State court for a large amount of damages for false imprisonment.

The Judge pleaded his privilege as a judge, but Judge Van Brunt sustained a demurrer to his plea, holding that the plea is bad.

We may therefore see a high federal judge mulcted in large damages in a State court, for exercising jurisdiction where he had no right. But this is an open question.

Another case has also arisen in New York, with which the public is familiar, viz: the Tweed case, in which the Court of Appeals of the State of New York have attempted to apply the doctrine of the Lange case, in the interest of the greatest scoundrel on American soil, but without success.

It has been the law, wherever the principles of the common law had obtained, that a party might be tried for several misdemeanors at one and the same time, and cumulative sentences imposed, — one sentence commencing when the other ended. No legal writer has ever disputed the rule, and I believe that not a single case in England or America can be found holding a contrary doctrine. The same doctrine has just been announced by the Supreme Court of Illinois. But the New York Court of Appeals has chosen to lay down a different rule, commencing with Mr. Tweed, and in his interest. It would seem that the court might have commenced to announce its new doctrine with some other criminal than Tweed.

But the infamy of the decision does not consist in this change of a long established rule, because if the Tweed case had been taken to the court of appeals, by appeal or writ of error, and that court had seen fit to reverse the case and establish a rule, that only one misdemeanor could be tried at a time, then he might have been tried anew, upon all these charges, in separate suits; but having released him on habeas corpus, which is a collateral proceeding, he can not be tried again for the same offense, for if he were put on trial for the same offense, he could plead the former judgment, and defeat the action upon the ground that no one can be twice put in jeopardy for the same offense.

Tweed having raised the legality of his commutation sentences in a collateral action, the only question the court of appeals had a right to ask or decide was, whether the court of Judge Davis which tried him, had jurisdiction of the person of Tweed and over the subject matter. There was jurisdiction of his person, and the court had jurisdiction over misdemeanors, and how can any lawyer claim that the action of the court in the premises was absolutely void for want of jurisdiction. The court might have held the judgment erroneous (but without precedent), but that it should be held void, is a surprise and shock to the sense of the legal fraternity.

The Tweed case has nothing in common with the Lange case. There seems to have been an appeal taken from the Court of Appeals, to the people, and the question is now being discussed before that tribunal in the State of New York, and we may expect an earlier decision of the cause than the Court of Appeals could have reasonably anticipated.

CIRCUIT COUR OF COOK CO., ILL.

PERKINS v. PAUL.

JUDGMENT OF JUSTICE—FILING TRANSCRIPT—LIEN ON LAND—EFFECT OF APPEAL ON.

A plaintiff recovered judgment before a justice of the peace, swore out execution on the day of the judgment, had it returned no property found on the day it issued, and filed a transcript of the judgment in the office of the clerk of the Circuit Court. The defendant appealed the case to the Circuit Court, and moved the court to set aside the record of the transcript of the judgment, which the court refused to do on motion, holding that the appeal did not divest the lien of the plaintiff which he had acquired by filing the transcript.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

Opinion by ROGERS, J.

This case presents a question that I have not had occasion to consider before, and one that I am not aware has been considered by any of my brother judges.

Perkins and others obtained a judgment against Edgar T. Paul, before Justice Meech, on the 5th day of August last. An execution was immediately issued upon the affidavit filed by complainants, and returned by the constable the same day, "no personal property found" on which to levy an execution. Thereupon the complainants obtained a transcript of the record of the judgment, execution, et cetera, filed it in the clerk's office of this court, under the statute authorizing such a proceeding, and sued out an execution upon it. Before the twenty days had expired from the rendering of the judgment, within which time defendant had a right to take an appeal and file a bond before this court, which was approved, and his appeal was perfected by filing his transcript and bond in this court. Thereafter and during the present term of the court, a motion was made by the attorneys of the appellee to set aside the record of the transcript in this court, upon the ground that the case had been appealed, and upon his insisting that that superseded the judgment below, and that the party had no right to have his lien which he had obtained by filing his transcript in this court continued on the dockets of this court, or the records of this court.

I was very much inclined, when I first heard this case, and it was argued briefly before me, to sustain the motion at that time, suggesting, however, that the term having expired, I doubted my authority. And the case went over, but the motion was renewed, or again called up subsequently, and is now for my decision.

The statute gives that right. In express terms it authorizes a party upon obtaining a judgment before a justice having his execution issued and returned "no personal property found" to levy upon, to file his transcript here, which, in the language of the statute, is to have the effect of a judgment, and upon which he is entitled to his execution, and having the effect of a judgment, as a matter of course it makes a lien upon the real estate, and that, I suppose, is the trouble in this case. That is the reason they want to get clear of it. If it is a judgment of this court, then, having been filed and made a judgment in the July term of the court, I would have no right, I think, to set it aside; although it was insisted that, under the statute abolishing writs of error coram vobis and coram nobis, and giving this court jurisdiction in such cases upon motion, this court would have a right. I don't think so. There was no error committed by this court at all. There was no action by this court. It is a statutory provision—a statutory remedy—a right given by a statute, and there is no action of this court required at all. Under the statute it has simply to be filed in the clerk's office, made a matter of record, and thereupon, without any action of the court at all, it has the effect of a judgment. I don't think, therefore, that a writ of error from this court would have met the case under the old statutes, and I don't think that a motion can reach it now. First, because the term has expired if it is a judgment of this court; second, because it is a statutory remedy given, and the courts have no right to interfere with them. It is sharp practice. It is speedy action. But it does not give the plaintiff, at last, any more rights than the plaintiff in this court where we have original jurisdiction of cases entirely, when a case is tried here, and judgment rendered, and the case is appealed to the Supreme Court.

The judgment remains as a lien upon the real estate, and the party has his additional security, and of the appeal bond also, just as this plaintiff has the additional security here by his appeal bond. I don't think I have any right to interfere with it, and shall overrule your motion, sir, though I think it is a practice that is a little sharp.

A man ought to have a right to have time to turn round and take his appeal, before these liens are accumulated upon him. But if the statute gives him the right, this court has no right to interfere with it. My remarks, therefore, apply simply to my opinion that the law ought to be amended in some respects, but you will have to go to the legislature for that and not apply to this court.

All records for the Term must be filed by the second day of the Term.

Notice is also given that the people's docket is not enumerated here; they having preference over other cases; also rehearing docket.

Parties transmitting Records and Briefs, will please send same by express, charges paid.

E. C. HAMBURGHER, Clerk.

It is not strictly true to say, "all records for the Term must be filed by the second day of the Term." Mr. Hamburgher might have added in a note, that section 72, Revised Statutes 783, provides that if ten days, and not twenty, shall have intervened between the date of the decree judgment, or order appealed from and the sitting of the Supreme Court, then the record shall be filed on or before the tenth day of the Term.

TO THE MEMBERS OF THE CHICAGO BAR.

OFFICE OF CLERK SUPERIOR COURT OF COOK COUNTY, CHICAGO, ILL., NOV. 27TH, 1875.—As my term of office is about to terminate, I would respectfully ask the members of the bar to send to me by letter, or otherwise, a statement of the title of cause, date of receipt, and the amount of moneys that has been paid into court, in any cause in which they are interested, to abide event of suit, and which moneys still remain in the hands of the clerk.

I desire to compare these statements with my books, so as to correct any mistakes that may have occurred.

JUDGE MCALLISTER AND THE PRISONER WHOSE COUNSEL WAS NOT ON THE ROLLS OF THE COURT.

Judge McAllister, formerly of the Supreme Court of Illinois, was, several years ago, judge of the Criminal Court of Cook county, in Chicago. One morning, amongst other cases, a woman was arraigned before him for some offense. When her case was called, the Judge looked for some member of the bar—of which there were a goodly number present—to interpose in her behalf, but, as none moved in that direction, the Judge turned his attention to the prisoner, who, as appears, was a kind of religious enthusiast of some sort, and inquired. "Madam, who appears for you as your counsel in this case?" The woman promptly replied, with an air of the utmost unconcern, "Your Honor, the Lord is my counsel and defender." "That may be, madam," responded the Judge, "but he does not practice in this court."

Said James A. And whereas, default has been made by the said James A. Cameron in the payment of the entire principal and interest of the first one of the said notes executed by him, and in the entire principal and interest of the first one of the said notes assumed by him, and of the interest on all of the said six notes; nothing whatever having been paid on any of the said six notes, and the said James Hill and Matson Hill, the legal holders of the said three notes executed by the said James A. UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT.

No. 9.—OCT. TERM, 1875.

THE WILMINGTON AND WELDON RAILROAD COMPANY v. HENRY KING, executor of HARDY KING, deceased.

In error to the Supreme Court of the State of North Carolina.

CONTRACTS DISCHARGEABLE IN CONFEDERATE MONEY.

1. CONTRACTS DISCHARGEABLE IN CONFEDERATE MONEY—WHEN VALID.—Contracts made during the war in one of the Confederate States, payable in Confederate currency, but not designed in their origin to aid the insurrectionary government, are not, because thus payable, invalid between the parties.

2. EVIDENCE—VALUE OF CURRENCY.—In actions upon such contracts evidence as to the value of that currency at the time and in the locality where the contracts were made is admissible.

3. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—OBLIGATION OF CONTRACTS — NORTH CAROLINA STATUTE — CASE IN JUDGMENT.—A statute of North Carolina of March, 1866, enacting that in all civil actions "for debts contracted during the late war, in which the nature of the obligation is not set forth, nor the value of the property for which such debts were created is stated, it shall be admissible for either party to show on trial, by affidavit or otherwise, what was the consideration of the contract, and that the jury in making up their verdict shall take the same into consideration, and determine the value of said contract in present currency, in the particular locality in which it is to be performed, and render their verdict accordingly," in so far as the same authorizes the jury in such actions, upon the evidence thus before them, to place their own estimate upon the value of the contracts, instead of taking the value stipulated by the parties, impairs the obligation of such contracts and is, therefore, within the inhibition upon the State of the Federal Constitution. Accordingly, in an action upon a contract for wood sold in that State during the war, at a price payable in Confederate currency, an instruction of the court to the jury that the plaintiff was entitled to recover the value of the wood without reference to value of the currency stepulated, was erroneous. —Central Law Journal.

Mr. Justice FIELD delivered the opinion of the court.

The contract between the defendant and the plaintiff's testatrix, upon which the present action was brought, was made in North Carolina during the war. By its terms the wood purchased by the railroad company was to be paid for in Confederate currency. Contracts thus payable, not designed in their origin to aid the insurrectionary government, are not invalid between the parties It was so held in the first case in which the question of the validity of such contracts was presented, that of Thorington v. Smith, 8 Wallace, 1, and the doctrine of that case has been since affirmed in repeated instances. The treasury notes of the Confederate government, at an early period in the war, in a great measure superseded coin within the insurgent States, and, though not made a legal tender, constituted the principal currency in which the operations of business were there conducted. Great injustice would, therefore, have followed any other decision, invalidating transactions otherwise free from objection, because of the reference of the parties to those notes as measures of value. See Hanauer v. Woodruff, 15 Wallace, 448; Confederate Note Case, 19 Ibid., 556.

But as those notes were issued in large quantities to meet the increasing demands of the Confederacy, and as the probability of their ultimate redemption became constantly less as the war progressed, they necessarily depreciated in value from month to month, until in some portions of the Confederacy, during the year 1864, the purchasing power of from twenty-one to upwards of forty dollars of the notes only equaled that of one dollar in lawful money of the United States. When the war ended the notes, of course, became worthless and ceased to be current, but contracts made upon their purchasable quality existed in large numbers throughout the insurgent States. It was, therefore, manifest that if these contracts were to be enforced with anything like justice to the parties, evidence must be received as to the value of the notes at the time and in the locality where the contracts were made; and, in the principal case cited, such evidence was held admissible. Indeed, in no other mode could the contracts as made by the parties be enforced. To have allowed any different rule in estimating the value of the contracts and ascertaining damages for their breach, would have been to sanction a plain departure from the stipulations of the parties, and to make for them new and different contracts.

In the case at bar the State Court of North Carolina declined to follow the rnle announced by this court and refused to instruct the jury that the plaintiff was entitled to recover only the value of the currency stipulated for the wood sold, and instructed them that he was entitled to recover the value of the wood without reference to the value of that currency. This was nothing less than instructing them that they might put a different value upon the property purchased from that placed by the parties at the time. In this ruling the court obeyed a statute of the State, passed in March, 1866, which enacted "that in all civil actions which may arise in courts of justice for debts contracted during the late war, in which the nature of the obligation is not set forth, nor the value of the property for which such debts were created is stated, it shall be admissible for either party to show on the trial, by affidavit or otherwise, what was the consideration of the contract, and the jury in making up their verdict shall take the same into consideration, and determine the value of said contract in present currency, in the particular locality in which it is to be performed, and render their verdict accordingly."

This statute, as construed by the court, allowed the jury to place their own judgment upon the value of the contract in suit, and not require them to take the value stipulated by the parties. A provision of law of that character, by constituting the jury a revisory body over the indiscretions and bad judgments of the contracting parties, might in instances relieve them from hard bargains, though honestly made upon an erroneous estimate of the value of the articles purchased, but would create an insecurity in business transactions which would be intolerable. It is sufficient, however, to say that the Constitution of the United States interposes an impassable barrier to such new innovation in the administration of justice, and with its conservative energy still requires contracts, not illegal in their character, to be enforced as made by the parties, even against any State interference with their terms.

The extreme depreciation of Confederate currency at the time the wood, which is the cause of the suit, was purchased, gives a seeming injustice to the result obtained. But until we are made acquainted with all the circumstances attending the transaction, we can not affirm anything on this point. The answer alleges that the wood was to be cut by the defendant's hands, and that the plaintiff's testatrix was only to furnish the trees standing. It may be that under such circumstances the costs of felling the trees and removing the wood was nearly equal to the value of the wood by the cord as found by the jury, which was fifty cents. Be that as it may, it is not for the court to give another value to the contract than that stipulated by the parties, nor is it within the legislative competence of a State to authorize any such proceeding.

The judgment of the Supreme Court of North Carolina must be reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings.

Mr. Justice BRADLEY dissenting.

I dissent from the judgment of the court in this case. The parties never contracted that the price to be paid for the wood was to be equivalent to any amount of specie. The price contracted for was one dollar per cord. Specie at that time was worth twenty-one dollars to one of Confederate currency. Can it be supposed that the parties agreed on a value of five cents per cord for the wood? The suggestion does not appear to me to be reasonable. The truth is, that the relation between Confederate currency and specie in North Carolina at that time is entirely unsuitable to be used as a rule in estimating the value of contracts. Specie could not be had at all, and consequently the relations between currency and specie was no guide as to the value of currency in purchasing commodities. The verdict finds that the wood, at the time of the contract, was worth fifty cents in specie per cord, and yet it sold for a dollar in currency. This shows that currency was equivalent to fifty cents on the dollar in purchasing capacity. I hold, therefore, that the law of North Carolina, in allowing the jury to estimate the real value of the consideration, in cases where it is impossible to get at the true value of the money named in the contract, is a most sensible and just law.

By what authority do we scale down the price named in the contract at all? Is it not on the ground that the value of the money named by the parties is not a true criterion of the value of the contract? When once we admit this we make that money a mere commodity, and endeavor to find its true value. How, then, is its true value to be measured? Is it to be measured only by the amount of specie it would purchase at the time, when, perhaps, no specie existed in the country? Why not measure its value by the amount of United States treasury notes which it would buy? They were money, as well as specie. But suppose they were not to be had in the market any more than specie. Under such circumstances, is not the true method of ascertaining its value the purchasing capacity which it had? I hold that this is the true test, when, as stated by the legislature of North Carolina in its preamble to the act, it is impossible to scale the value of Confederate money accurately for all parts of the State under the varying circumstances that arose. Under such circumstances, the only fair mode of ascertaining the purchasing value of the currency used, is to ascertain the true value of the consideration or thing purchased. This is not to set aside the contract of the parties, but to carry out their contract. It is the proper method of ascertaining what their contract really meant, and giving it full force and effect.

Where a regular merchantable ratio exists between a paper currency and specie or other lawful money, of course it ought to be used as the rule to ascertain the true value of contracts. But when no such regular marketable value does exist, then the next best mode of getting at the value of the contract, or of the currency mentioned therein, is to ascertain the true value of the subject-matter about which the contract was made. This is what the legislature of North Carolina authorized to be done, and what was done in this case.

I think the judgment should be reversed.

U. S. DIST. COURT, D. OF OREGON.

OPINION NOV. 18, 1875.

In Re THE OREGON BULLETIN PUBLISHING AND PRINTING CO.—In Bankruptcy.

BANKRUPTCY — CORPORATION — PETITION MAY BE FILED BY ONE CREDITOR.

A petition to have a corporation adjudged a bankrupt may be maintained under § 5,122 of the R. S. by any creditor of such corporation, and the provision of § 12 of the act of June 22, 1874, in relation to the number and amount of the creditors required to join in such petition against a natural person does not apply.

The original bankrupt act of 1867, and all the acts amendatory thereof except the act of 1874 aforesaid, were superseded by the title BANKRUPTCY of the R. S., and repealed by § 5,596 of said statutes.

Quære, whether such repeal took effect from the enactment of the R. S. on June 22, 1874, or from December 1, 1873, the data on which said statutes took effect as declared in § 5,595 thereof.

DEADY, J.

On September 10, 1875, Blake, Robbins & Co., of San Francisco, Lewthwaite and Smith, H. W. Scott and H. L. Pittock, of Oregon, filed their petition in bankruptcy against the Oregon Bulletin Printing and Publishing Co., a corporation duly formed under the laws of Oregon, stating that they constituted one-fourth in number and one-third in value of the creditors of such corporation, and that the same owed each of them debts amounting in the aggregate to $4,481; that within the six calendar months next preceding the date of said filing, said corporation committed five several acts of bankruptcy; for that, being insolvent, said corporation did make four certain payments to certain of its creditors, amounting in the aggregate to $1,610, with intent to thereby give such creditors a preference, and also procure its property, to be taken on legal process for the purpose of foreclosing a chattel mortgage held by one of its creditors for the sum of $6,000, and praying that for these causes said corporation may be adjudged a bankrupt.

On September 21, the corporation filed an answer to the petition, containing, among other things, a denial that the petitioners constitute one-fourth in number and one-third in value of the defendant's creditors; and also a separate statement in writing to the same effect.

The petitioners now move to strike out said denials as being irrelevant.

The motion is made upon the ground that a petition to have a corporation adjudged a bankrupt, is not, as to the number and value of the creditors necessary to join therein, within the purview of § 39 of the bankrupt act, as amended by § 12 of the act of June 22, 1874, but is governed in this respect solely by § 5,122 of the R. S. The latter section is given in the title BANKRUPTCY of the R. S. in place of § 37 of the act of 1867. By the latter the provisions of the act were applied to corporations. It provided that a corporation might be declared a bankrupt "upon the petition of any creditor or creditors" of the same without any reference to the value of their debts.

The section as contained in the R. S. provides that the provisions of the act shall apply to private corporations, and that—

* * "upon the petition of any officer of any such corporation * * * duly authorized by a vote of a majority of the corporators at any legal meeting called for the purpose or upon the petition of any creditor of such corporation, * * made and presented in the manner provided in respect to debtors, the like proceedings shall be had and taken as are provided in the case of debtors."

The section further provides substantially as follows: (1) All the provisions of the act "which apply to the debtor or set forth his duties" in relation to the bankruptcy are made applicable to the officers of such corporation; (2) All payments, etc., declared fraudulent and void, when made by a debtor, are declared to have the same effect when made by a corporation; (3) All the assets of a corporation declared bankrupt are to be distributed to its creditors, and no allowance or discharge is to be granted to it.

The Revised Statutes of the United States appear to have taken effect from December 1, 1873 (§ 5595 et seq.), but were not enacted until June 22, 1874. They contain the title BANKRUPTCY, numbered LXI, which was intended as a substitute for the bankrupt act of March 2, 1867. On the same day congress passed "An act to amend and supplement" said act of 1867. By this latter act, § 39 of the original act, the same constituting §§ 5021, 5022 and 5023 of the R. S., was amended so as to require at least one-fourth in number and one-third in value of the creditors of a natural person to join in a petition to have him declared a bankrupt. Prior to this amendment it was only necessary that one or more creditors, the aggregate of whose debts amounted to $250, should join in such petition.

By means of § 5,122 the statute is first applied to corporations. Upon its language it cannot be contended that any particular number of creditors whose debts are of any particular value are required to join in a petition to have a corporation adjudged a bankrupt. The words of the section are unambiguous and too plain to leave any room for construction. "Upon the petition of any creditor of such corporation, made and presented in the manner provided in respect to debtors, the like proceedings shall be had and taken as are provided in the case of debtors." The petition may be brought by "any creditor" of the corporation without reference to the number of its creditors or the aggregate of their debts. True, the petition is to be "made and presented in the manner provided in respect to debtors." But surely, a direction as to the manner in which a petition is to be made and presented does not touch the question by whom it is to be made and presented—more especially, when, as in this case, the statute in that immediate connection—as it were in the same breath—declares that it may be made and presented by any creditor of the corporation.

Does § 39, as amended by the act of June 22, 1874, expressly or by necessary implication modify or amend § 5,122 of the R. S. in any particular?

The act of 1874 was passed on the same day as § 5,122. They are exactly cotemporaneous, and therefore there is nothing to be said in favor of such modification upon the ground that § 39 is the later expression of the legislative will. If there really is any conflict between the two sections, there is as much reason for holding that § 39 must yield to § 5,122 as otherwise, so far as the time of their enactment is concerned.

Again, the act of 1874, although it contains a general repealing clause (§ 21) as to "all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with its provisions," does not contain any general amendments to the act of 1867, leaving the court to ascertain, as best it might, how far and where they are in conflict with the original, and therefore repeal it by implication. On the contrary, all the amendments are specific; each section amended is named. The amendment is made by either striking out or inserting particular words at particular places, or, as in the case of § 39, by reforming the section so as to embody in it the desired changes, and then enacting it as amended. The rest of the sections are supplementary to the original act, and not in conflict with it.

There is, then, no reason to presume that the amendment to § 39, providing who must join in a petition to have a natural person adjudged a bankrupt, was intended to amend or modify § 37 of the act of 1867, or its substitute, § 5,122, as to who might maintain a petition to have a corporation declared a bankrupt. On the contrary, if it was intended to amend this section so as to require a certain proportion in number and amount of the creditors to join in a petition for that purpose, the inference from the circumstances is satisfactory that it would have been done specifically and directly, as in the case of the other 12 amended sections.

Section 5,122 not being amended by the act of 1874, it and § 39 stand in the same relation to one another that they did in the original act. By that, as has been shown, while a natural person could only be declared a bankrupt upon the petition of one or more of his creditors whose debts, in the aggregate, amounted to $250, a corporation might be so declared upon the petition of such creditors, without reference to the amount of their debts.

The two sections are separate provisions, relating to distinct subjects—the one, the involuntary bankruptcy of natural persons, and the other that of corporations. They are not contradictory or in conflict. and both may stand and have effect upon the subject-matter to which they respectively relate.

The reason of the difference between the two sections may not be so apparent as the difference itself. But several reasons suggest themselves. In the case of a corporation, the bankrupt is neither entitled to any allowance or a discharge. By reason of the adjudication it is in effect dissolved, and its existence terminated. There is nothing left to grant a discharge to. It is stripped of all its property and rights of property, and can acquire no more. The law creates it and the law destroys it. But in the case of a natural person, the bankrupt is entitled to an allowance and a discharge from his debts, upon certain conditions, and by the act of 1874 (§ 12), in a case of compulsory bankruptcy, he is entitled to a discharge, without reference to the proportion between his assets and debts, "or the assent of any portion of his creditors." On this account it may have been thougnt necessary to require, in the case of a natural person, a certain proportion in number and amount of the creditors to join in the petition, to prevent collusion between a debtor and a friendly creditor. The very fact that the act of 1874 (§ 12) requires the judge to be satisfied that the written admission of the debtor that the requisite number and amount of creditors have petitioned to put him into bankruptcy is made in good faith, gives strong color to this suggestion. When a statute requires a court to be satisfied, that an admission in the pleadings of the defendant that the plaintiff is entitled to sue, is made in good faith, it is a reasonable inference that the enactment was intended to guard against collusion.

Again, it is well known that the amendments contained in the act of 1874 were passed under the influence of the panic of 1873. Under such circumstances, sympathy for the debtor class may have induced Congress to provide that a natural person should not be forced into bankruptcy except upon the petition of a large proportion of his creditors, and thereby prevent his being pressed to the wall, unless, in an extreme case; while in the case of an artificial person, as a corporation, which is created upon the implied condition that its existence depends upon its solvency, no such consideration would or ought to have effect.

By the laws of most civilized countries, mere inability to pay its debts is a cause of dissolution against a corporation. Being insolvent, it has ceased to fulfill the law of its being, and ought no longer to exist, unless by the consent or forbearance of all its creditors. But if § 39, as amended by the act of 1874, is applicable to corporations, then their existence may be prolonged with impunity, against the wishes and interests of any number of the creditors less than one-fourth in number and one-third in value of the whole, long after they are both insolvent and bankrupt.

Or it may be that the difference between the two sections is a casus omissus—the result of a mere oversight on the part of Congress.

But however this may be, the distinction exists, as to who may maintain a petition in involuntary bankruptcy. One rule is prescribed in the case of a corporation, and another in that of a natural person. To confound or obliterate this distinction by construction—by the merest assumption that § 39 was intended to modify § 5,122—is not only going beyond the office and power of a court, but in a direct opposition to it.

As is well said by a distinguished commentator:

"Upon all acts of the legislature, such construction should be made as that one clause shall not frustrate or destroy, but on the contrary, shall explain and support another—sound exposition requiring effect to be given to every significant clause, sentence or word in a statute." Smith's Com., § 575.

On the argument of the motion, counsel for the defendant cited the clause in § 5,013 of the R. S. (§ 48 of the act), which declares that in the title, BANKRUPTCY, "the word 'person,' shall also include corporation," and argued therefrom, that as by § 39 a "person" can only be adjudged a bankrupt upon the petition of a certain proportion of his creditors, so is it, also, in the case of a "corporation," for the reason, that the word "person" being made to include that of "corporation," any provision of this title relating to a "person" is also applicable to a "corporation."

This conclusion may be admitted so far as the statute does not otherwise expressly or by necesssry implication provide. For instance, the statute provides, that a "person" shall be entitled to a certain allowance out of his property and under certain circumstances to a discharge from his debts. Now, in these two cases, the word "person" does not include a corporation because the statute (§ 5,122 R. S.) expressly provides that "no allowance or discharge shall be granted to any corporation or joint stock company, or to any person or officer or member thereof."

But the clause cited from § 5,013 of the R. S., declaring that the word "person" in the title BANKRUPTCY shall include "corporation," has no application to § 39 of the act of 1867 as amended by § 12 of the act of 1874.

A few words will make this apparent. The original act of 1867 and all the acts amendatory thereof, prior to that of 1874, are no longer in force. They are superseded by the title BANKRUPTCY of the R. S., which is itself a new statute differing in many particulars from the original one, and were repealed by § 5,596 of the R. S, on December 1, 1873, or June 22, 1874.

Therefore, § 48 of the act of 1874, containing this definition of the word "person" is no longer in force. § 5,013 has taken its place, but this section, in declaring the word "person" to include a corporation, limits its operation to the title BANKRUPTCY of the R. S. Now, § 39 of the act of 1867 as amended by § 12 of the act of 1874 is no part of the R. S., but is an independent statute passed on the same day as the latter. So it follows, that the word "person" in that section is not to be enlarged in its operation on account of the definition given to it as used in the Revised Statute, title BANKRUPTCY.

But it may be conceded that in the absence of any statute definition to that effect, the word "person" should be construed to include a corporation, unless it appears that it was used in a more limited sense. Such is the rule prescribed in § 1 of the R. S., which provides that "in determining the meaning" of said statutes or any act of Congress passed subsequent to February 25, 1871, "the word 'person' may extend and be applied to partnerships and corporations * * unless the context shows that such word was intended to be used in a more limited sense."

The act of 1874 being passed since 1871 is within the purview of this provision, and therefore the word "person" wherever it occurs in it, ought to be construed to include a corporation unless the context shows that such was not the intention. On this point there can be but little if any doubt. The context which is the title BANKRUPTCY of the R. S., and the contemporaneous act of 1874, shows plainly that the application of the statutes of bankruptcy, including § 12 of the act of 1874, to corporations, is generally provided for in § 5,122 of the R. S., and particularly as to who may maintain a petition against a corporation.

It was also objected to this motion by counsel for defendant that the allegations sought to be stricken out were made in response to an allegation in the petition. So far as I have looked into them, there seems to be some conflict or confusion among the authorities upon this point. None were cited on the argument.

I think the better rule is to allow a motion to strike out irrelevant or immaterial matter in a pleading, although it may be a mere denial of an immaterial allegation in a prior pleading. But in such case, the motion, in analogy to the rule in case of a demurrer, should be held to reach back to and include the first fault.

The motion to strike out is allowed, including the allegation in the petition concerning the number and amount of the creditors joining therein.

U. S. DIST. COURT, D. OF OREGON.

TUESDAY, Nov. 16, 1875.

In Re C. B. COMSTOCK & CO.—In Bankruptcy.

RIGHTS OF WITNESS BEFORE REGISTER—APPEARANCE OF ASSIGNEE.

A witness summoned before the register on the application of the assignee to be examined under § 5,087 of the R. S. is not a "party" to such proceeding, and is therefore not entitled "to take the opinion of the district judge upon any point or matter arising in the course of such proceeding."

A witness summoned as aforesaid, not being a "party" to the proceeding is not entitled to be attended or represented by counsel during his examination.

A creditor of the bankrupt is not a "party" to such proceeding, and is therefore not entitled to interfere with it, or be represented in it by counsel.

An assignee can only be represented in the written proceedings by his duly appointed attorney; but this does not prevent another attorney from appearing in court as counsel for the assignee in a particular proceeding therein pending, as provided in § 1,000 of the Or. Civ. Code.

An attorney who has no authority to appear in a proceeding instituted by the assignee, cannot be heard to question the authority of the attorney who appears in such proceeding as counsel for such assignee.

DEADY, J.—On the application of the assignee, W. W. Francis was summoned before the register to be examined in the above entitled matter.

Upon the appearance of Francis before the register, he was accompanied by an attorney of this court, who offered and desired to appear as attorney for the witness, and also for the Bank of British Columbia, a claimant against the estate of Comstock & Co.

Counsel for the assignee objected to the appearance of counsel for the witness or the bank, on the ground that neither the witness nor the bank is a "party" to the proceeding, although it was admitted that the proposed examination of the witness had reference to "an affair of the bankrupts with the said bank on and about Nov. 14, 1873."

The register ruled that the "witness is not entitled to counsel," and that "the bank cannot appear in this proceeding by counsel," and the question, "shall the ruling of the register be sustained?" was certified to the judge for decision.

No person is entitled, under § 5,010 of the R. S., "to take the opinion of the district judge upon any point or matter arising in the course of the proceeding" before the register unless he is a "party" thereto. The witness Francis is not a party to this proceeding. The only party to it is the assignee. The law gives him the right to examine this witness with reference to the affairs of the bankrupt, so as to enable him to act intelligently in the premises. The witness is no more a "party" to the proceeding than if he was being examined on behalf of the plaintiff or defendant in an ordinary action.

Neither is the bank a party to this proceeding. The examination of the witness is ex parte, and cannot be used as evidence against the bank in any action or proceeding to which it is a party. As has been stated, it is taken solely for the information of the assignee, to enable him, as the representative of all the creditors, to understand and assert or defend their rights in the premises. In re Fredenberg, 1 N. B. R., 270; In re Frienberg et al., 2 N. B. R., 426; In re Fay, 3 N. B. R., 661; In re Stuyvesant Bank, 7 N. B. R., 446.

This being so, the register might properly have refused to certify this question. In re Fredenberg, supra. Indeed, I think he ought to have refused it, and proceeded at once with the examination of the witness.

But for the same reason—that the witness is not a "party" to the proceeding—he is not entitled to counsel. It is only parties who are thus entitled. In this proceeding, whatever interest he may have in the matter sought to be inquired into, if any, Francis is merely a witness, and is no more entitled to appear or be attended by counsel than he would be if called as a witness in an ordinary action.

The same is true of the bank, and for the same reason. It is not a "party" to the proceeding, and the information elicited by it is merely for the benefit of the assignee. If the examination discloses the fact that the knowledge of the witness is or may be material in any controversy with the assignee, to which the bank is or may be a party, before such knowledge could be used against the bank he would have to be called and examined, subject to cross-examination, as an ordinary witness in such controversy.

The attorney who offered to appear as counsel for the witness and the bank also objected that the attorney who appeared as counsel for the assignee was not "the attorney of the assignee," and therefore not entitled to appear for him upon this proceeding.

While I have no doubt that the assignee can only be represented in the written proceedings by his duly appointed attorney, yet I see no reason why another attorney may not appear in court as counsel for the assignee, in a particular proceeding therein pending, as provided in § 1,000 of the Or. Civ. Code.

But the attorney seeking to appear for the witness that has no standing before the court in this proceeding, and therefore cannot be heard to question the authority of the attorney who appears as counsel for the assignee. For the same reason the question arising upon such objection ought not to have been certified.

The rulings of the Register are affirmed, and the clerk will certify a copy of this decision to him, and is hereby required under rule 58 to tax the expenses of this certificate together with a sum of $5 to be paid to the assignee or his attorney, against the attorney who sought to appear for the witness.

SUPREME COURT OF NEW YORK.

GENERAL TERM, NOV. 1875.

THE PEOPLE v. WILLIAM L. LEARNED, justice, etc.

CANAL INVESTIGATION—POWER OF COMMISSION TO COMMIT FOR CONTEMPT.

Held, that the commission was constitutionally created; that it was vested with authority to issue subpœnas, to enforce the attendance of witnesses, and to compel the production of books and papers; and in case of disobedience or refusal, it was authorized to proceed as if it were a court of record; that the refusal of the witness was without excuse, and the commission properly adjudged him guilty of contempt, and awarded a warrant of commitment against him.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

JAMES, J.—The return to the writ of certiorari shows that one Denison was brought before a justice of this court on habeas corpus issued to the sheriff of Albany county. In his return to the writ of habeas corpus, said sheriff set forth that said Denison was in his custody by virtue of a warrant of commitment for contempt, issued by the canal investigating commission; that said warrant recited the creation of such commission, the appointment of its members, the matters pending before it, that said Denison had been subpœnaed to attend before it to testify, and to bring with him certain books and papers relating to certain specified contracts with the State; that on the 14th day of July, 1875, said commission being duly organized as a board and holding a regular meeting for purposes of investigation, etc., said Denison appeared before it in answer to said subpœna, and did then and there admit that he had present with him the books and papers relating to the contracts with the State then under investigation—and did then and there in the presence of said commission willfully refuse to produce said books and papers, and to obey the subpœna issued to and served upon him; whereupon said Denison was adjudged guilty of contempt, and ordered to be punished.

After a hearing on the return to the habeas corpus, the said Denison was discharged from the custody of said sheriff, the learned justice holding that although the commission had power to enforce the attendance of witnesses, it had no power to compel a witness to answer, or to produce books and papers, or to punish him for refusal.

This investigating commission was created in March, 1875, by a concurrent resolution of the senate and assembly of this State. The members thereof were duly appointed by the governor, with the advice and consent of the senate. Its duty, as defined by the resolution, was to investigate the affairs of the canals of this State, etc., and power was given it to compel the attendance of witnesses, and require the production before it of any books or papers in the custody or possession of any witness touching the subject of such investigation, etc.

This resolution and the appointments under it were subsequently recognized and ratified by the legislature (chap. 91, laws of 1875, page 80), which also gave to the commission authority to issue subpœnas, compel the attendance of witnesses, and the production of books and papers before it; and, on failure of any witness to obey its mandate, power to issue attachments, with the like proceedings as courts of record.

In this case Denison had been properly subpœnaed to appear before said commission and to produce before it certain books and papers. He did so appear; he brought with him said books and papers, but he refused to produce them, without giving any reason or making any excuse.

Upon the argument it was claimed that the refusal was justified because the commission had no legal existence; no legal power to act. That it could not be legally created by concurrent resolution, and that all its doings were void. That such a tribunal could only be created by bill, enacted by both branches of the legislature, and signed by the governor. Certain clauses of the Constitution were cited in support of said objections. It is not necessary to discuss those in detail. It is sufficient to say that there is no clause in the Constitution expressly prohibiting the creation of a commission by concurrent resolution. People v. New York Central Railroad Company, 24 N. Y., 455, and where not expressly prohibited by the Constitution, the legislative power is unrestricted and unlimited. People v. Dayton, 55 N. Y., 580; Leggett v. Hunter. 19 N. Y., 445.

Appointing commissions for various purposes by concurrent resolution has been practiced by both State and national legislatures more or less from the organization of this government. It has been repeatedly done in this State since the adoption of the Constitution of 1846, as the Session Laws of the State will show. This fact alone would seem entitled to a controlling weight on the question of constitutionality. People v. Dayton, supra. Story on the Constitution, sec. 408. Cooley on Con., 67.

But, conceding the concurrent resolution unauthorized, the legislature has, by bill and enactment, recognized the commission as a legal entity, validated its creation, and vested it with all the powers exercised in this proceeding. Laws of 1875, chap. 91, p. 80.

But it is claimed this act is also unconstitutional. First, as in conflict with that clause of the Constitution which declares that "no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law." This provision has no more application to this act than it has to any other act requiring witnesses to answer, and authorizing their punishment if they refuse. In such cases the proceedings to adjudicate, and to impose sentence, if adjudged guilty, is due process of law. Second, as in violation of act 3, sec. 7, a new clause which came into the Constitution in January, 1875, which declares that "no act shall be passed which shall provide that any existing law, or part thereof, shall be made or deemed a part of said act, or which shall enact that any existing law shall be applicable to it, except by inserting it." The act in question is not obnoxious to said clause of the Constitution in the sense in which it is used in that instrument. The said act neither comes within the letter or spirit of the inhibition. And besides, this clause should receive a strict construction, and if said act is not strictly within the mischief sought to be provided against by the Constitution, it should be held as not within the inhibition.

I am, therefore, of the opinion that the commission was lawfully created; that it was vested with authority to issue subpœnas, to enforce the attendance of witnesses, and to compel the production of books and papers, and in case of disobedience or refusal it was authorized to proceed as if it were a court of record. It is true the language of the act does not say in express words, the commission may furnish, but that power is fairly to be implied from its whole scope and purpose.

In this case the witness was guilty of a willful disobedience; his refusal was without explanation or excuse, and the commission very properly adjudged him guilty of contempt and awarded a warrant of commitment against him. He should have been remanded.

The order of the justice should be reversed, and an order entered directing that the relator be remanded to the custody of the sheriff of Albany county, with costs against the relator.

C. S. FAIRCHILD, for the people.
WILLIAM C. RUGER, for the relator.

U. S. COMMISSIONER HAMLIN, BANGOR, MAINE.

THE UNITED STATES v. GUSTAVUS L. BEAN.

ARREST OF MAIL CARRIER ON CIVIL PROCESS.

Held, that a driver and carrier of the United States mail is exempt from arrest on civil process while engaged in the service, and this exemption extends to such driver or carrier while he is waiting for the mail.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

This was a proceeding before Commissioner Hamlin against Gustavus L. Bean for delaying by arrest for debt one John G. Withee, a mail carrier, who had come to the post office for the mail for Belfast, Nov. 15. The testimony was closed on the 25th, of November and the commissioner rendered his opinion. The case was based upon the Act of Congress, Revised Statutes, chap. 9, section 3,995, which provides that any person who shall knowingly and willfully obstruct or retard the passage of the mail, or any carriage, horse, driver, or carrier carrying the same shall, for every such offense be punishable by a fine of not more than one hundred dollars."

HAMLIN, J.

Upon these facts the question arises, was the arrest of the complainant by the defendant, taking into consideration the time when, and the place where, under these circumstances, such an obstruction or retarding of the driver and carrier as is within the intent of the statute? The defendant pleads that he is an officer of the law, a deputy of the sheriff, and in the legal exercise of his duty as such, having executions issued by courts of competent jurisdiction, requiring him to arrest the body of the complainant, and that the complainant was and had been under arrest all the time from November 8th down to the morning of the 15th, when he resumed the custody or re-arrested him. It does not appear necessary to determine whether the arrest made on the 8th of November and continued to the 11th, remained an arrest after Thursday or not, or whether, it having ceased at that time, the defendant could take the execution debtor as an escape, because it is not perceived how the officer on fresh pursuit could have any higher rights in the case than at the time the arrest was first made, if it were similar to that made Nov. 15th, and was unlawful. Was the last arrest then lawful? It was held in U. S. v. Harvy, 8 Law Reporter, p. 77, by Taney, C. J., "that a warrant in a civil suit against a mail carrier was no justification to the ministerial officer executing it, although he may have acted without knowledge of the law of Congress, and did not detain the carrier longer than was necessary for the execution of the warrant." In this case the retention was but a short time and the carrier got to the next office (Bel-Air) at his usual hour.

The Supreme Court of the United States recognized and affirm the principles of this decision in U. S. v. Kirby, 7 Wall, p. 482, and say: "All persons in the public service are exempt as a matter of public policy from arrest upon civil process while thus engaged," and "where the acts which create the obstruction are in themselves unlawful, the intention to obstruct will be imputed to their author, although the attainment of other ends may have been his primary object.

The justification of the defendant therefore in this respect fails, if the complainant at the time of the arrest was engaged in the public service. Was he so engaged?

It already appears that Withee was a sworn driver and carrier of the mail, and that in performance of his duty went to the Post Office to get the mail, which was about ready, and at the time of day when his duties as driver and carrier had begun. It should not be overlooked that the defendant was within the Post Office room in violation of the rules of the Postmaster General (Secs. 30 and 31, Postal Laws and Regulations) and therefore the place of arrest was as much within the prohibition of public policy as the arrest of the person of the complainant himself when in the performance of his duties; and the fact therefore that the driver had not at the time of the arrest actual possession of the mail, the delivery of which the defendant had forbidden, cannot avail the respondent.

The exemption from arrest of persons engaged in the public service as was the complainant Withee, does not depend upon the manual possession of the mail, but upon principles of public policy, which would be quite futile were the operations of the general government subject to be interrupted by the enforcement of merely private rights as in this case. Finally it was urged that the defendant did not know that the complainant was a driver or carrier of the mail when he arrested him November 15th. Something was said at the hearing which seemed to show the defendant had learned that Withee, some time about July 15, had abandoned his contract and defendant beileved that complainant had not had time or opportunity to be sworn as a driver after reaching Bangor late Saturday night, Nov. 13th, and before he came to the post-office on the morning of the 15th. Sufficient appears to show the driver was sworn, and no provision of the statute or regulation of the Post Office Department was pointed out requiring the driver to be sworn again, when he resumed the driving of the mail, Nov. 9th; nor does it appear to be material whether the complainant was the contractor or not, so long as he was acting as the driver or carrier.

No claim is made that Withee was exempt from arrest on civil process because of his being a contractor, but the exemption is put on the ground that he is and was a driver and carrier within the terms of the statute. Still less can the defendant set up his want of knowledge that the complainant was engaged in the public service as a driver or carrier of the mail.

It is impossible to reconcile the acts of the defendant in going into the post-office at so early an hour in the day, directing the clerk not to deliver the mail to Withee, and finally going with him to arrange for another driver to take the team upon any other theory, except that the defendant well knew the complainant was acting in the capacity of a driver, and it must be held that he run his own risk in delaying the mail, if acting with such belief, it afterwards turned out that he was mistaken.

Defendant ordered to recognize.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

QUESTIONING COMMISSIONER'S SALES IN COLLATERAL PROCEEDINGS.

Elizabeth Dawson, etc. v. G. W. Lifsey. From Daviess. Prior, Judge.

In May, 1851, Meredith McGee obtained a judgment in Daviess Circuit Court, enforcing his lien for the purchase money due on a tract of land sold by him to John A. Gist, in trust for Letitia Gist. The judgment directed the commissioner to sell so much of the land as would satisfy the debt, amounting to $316.26. The commissioner, instead of following the judgment, sold the land for $435, Harrison Yewell being the purchaser. The report of sale was made, confirmed by the court, and the purchase money having been paid, a deed was made to Yewell by the commmissioner, under an order of court, and recorded. Yewell sold the land to McGee, McGee to Wade, and Wade to J. M. Dawson. The latter having died, a deed was made to his widow and children. Letitia Gist having married G. W. Lifsey, and those parties being in possession of the land, the widow and children of Dawson instituted this action for its recovery, making the proceedings in the action of McGee to enforce his lien for the purchase money the evidence of their title. Lifsey and wife filed a demurrer to the petition upon the ground, as maintained by counsel, that it appearing from the record, in the case of McGee v. Lifsey, that the land was sold by the commissioner for more than the judgment, the sale and all subsequent proceedings under it were null and void, passing no title whatever to the land. But this court holds that said sale was not void, but only voidable, and that in order to avoid it, the party seeking to do so should have at the time resisted its confirmation, or by appeal in that case have had any wrong judgment therein righted. But the validity of the sale can not be questioned in a collateral proceeding like the present one. The court furthermore recognizes a distinction between the sale by a commissioner, in a case like this, and a sheriff under an ordinary execution. An error by the latter, like the one alleged here, would have been void, because it would be merely a ministerial act, while the act of the commissioner was a judicial one.

SUPREME COURT OF INDIANA.

[From the Indianapolis Sentinel.]

WILL—CONSTRUCTION OF—ESTATES TAIL AND REMAINDERS.

4412. Huxford, administrator, etc., vs. Milligan et al., Parke, C. C. DOWNEY, J.

The material question arises upon the construction of the following language in a will:

"Sixth—I bequeath to my two sons, Charles W. Huxford and Benjamin D. Huxford, all the residue of my estate, both personal and real, * * and should either of my sons, Charles W. Huxford, or Benjamin D. Huxford, die without issue, then their share of my estate to go back to my estate.

Seventh—Should any of the property herein bequeathed go back to my estate, I direct that it shall be divided equally among my children then living."

The question was what kind of estate was created by this will in the sons—and the court says: "It has been almost uniformerly held in England and in this country that a limitation over in the event that the first taker shall die without heirs, without issue, or on failure of issue creates an estate tail. The language generally is that the devise without the limitation over would create a fee simple, but with the limitation over is a fee simple cut down to an estate tail."

"We think that the limitation over after the death of the sons, Charles W. and Benjamin, vested in them an estate tail, or cut down the fee given to them to an estate tail. The court then held that this estate tail was converted by the statute into a fee, and that the remainder limited over, inasmuch as it was not to take effect until after an indefinite failure of issue, would be void as creating a perpetuity. Held, also, that as the limitation over of the real estate was void, a fortiori would the limitation over of the personal estate be void? Reversed.

ACTION ON PROMISSORY NOTE—LIABILITY OF THE BANKRUPT'S SURETY ON THE NOTE.

4361. George W. Gregg v. Wilson, Rush C. C. Worden, J.

Action by Wilson against George W. Gregg and John T. Gregg on a joint and several promissory note, executed by the two Greggs to Wilson. George W. Gregg answered that he was surety on the note; that John T. Gregg had been adjudged bankrupt; that the plaintiff had filed the note or a copy in the bankrupt court and there obtained judgment for the allowance of his distributive share of the assets when the same should be ascertained, etc. A demurrer to this answer was sustained, which is the error assigned. The court is of opinion that the answer sets up no ground of defense or suspension of the action, and that even if the note were joint only; and this opinion is based upon section 19 (see Bump, 402) of the bankrupt act. Under this section, if the appellant pay the debt, he will be entitled to stand in the place of the plaintiff, and receive whatever would come to him. Affirmed.

VACATION OF HIGHWAY—DAMAGES TO LAND OWNERS—REMONSTRANCE.

4253. Butterworth v. Bartlett et al., Laporte C. C. Worden, J.

This was a petition by the appellees to the Board of Commissioners of Laporte county for the vacation of a certain public highway. Viewers reported in favor of the vacation. Butterworth, who was the owner of a tract of land through which the road passed, filed his remonstrance against the vacation on the ground that the highway was of public utility, and on the ground that he would be damaged by the vacation to the extent of $1,000, which sum he claimed. The board struck out the remonstrance entirely. There was an appeal to the Circuit Court, where the remonstrance was allowed to stand in fact, but the portion as to damages was stricken out which is the error assigned.

The court is of unanimous opinion that the statute (sections 19, 20 and 21, 1 G. & H., 363) authorizes damages in behalf of one through whose land a highway runs which is sought to be vacated, and the majority of the court hold that such a person may remonstrate on the ground of the inutility of the proposed vacation, and in the same remonstrance claim damages in consequence of the proposed vacation. Reversed.

MOTION IN ARREST OF JUDGMENT—THE COMMON LAW DOCTRINE AND THE CODE.

4189. Gander v. the State, ex. rel., etc., Warrick C. C. Worden, J.

This was a suit on a gaurdian's bond. Appellant was surety on the bond.

The evidence is not in the record, so there is no question before the court except that arising on the motion in arrest of judgment.

The court is of opinion that the facts are stated in the complaint in "such a manner as to enable a person of common understanding to know what was intended;" and that these facts, fairly interpreted, uphold the finding of the court.

There was no demurrer to the complaint. There are many cases where the complaint will not stand a demurrer, and yet would be held good after verdict against a motion in arrest of judgment. The spirit of the common law doctrine on this subject (3 Blackstone 394) has been embodied in our code. 2 G. & H. 122, section 101. Affirmed.

WITNESS—RIGHT TO BE QUESTIONED BY HIS COUNSEL.

5239. Clark v. the State of Indiana, Clark C. C. Downey, J.

Indictmenl against appellant for murder; verdict of guilty; motion for new trial overruled, which is the error assigned.

Defendant was put on the stand, and after answering a few questions put by his counsel, was interrupted by the judge and instructed to give a general statement of the whole affair, the judge stating that he would not permit the witness to be questioned by his attorneys. Prisoner's counsel inquired if that would exclude such questions of the defendant as might be necessary to bring out any important points which he might omit to state. The court replied that he could not permit the defendant's attorneys to ask any questions. Thereupon the prisoner left the stand and did not further testify.

The defendant is allowed, at his option, to testify in his own behalf. (Acts 1873, p. 228). He has a right to testify as other witnesses do, and, as in case of other witnesses, his counsel have a right to interrogate him. (29 Ind., 124). Reversed.

COUNTERFEIT MONEY—DUE DILIGENCE TO ASCERTAIN ITS GENUINENESS.

3257. Samuels et al. v. King, Bartholomew C. C. Buskirk, J.

Action by appellee against appellants to recover the value of work done as a tailor.

The questions in the case are, whether appellants in the payment of $18.00, due appellee, paid him a $20.00 counterfeit bill, and whether appellee used due diligence in reference thereto.

The evidence is contradictory, so this court can not disturb the finding below on the weight of the evidence.

But the judgment is reversed on the ground that it does not appear from the evidence that the appellee used the proper diligence to ascertain whether the note was genuine. (Wingate v. Neidlinger—present term, reported below.) Reversed.

COUNTERFEIT MONEY—DILIGENCE IN ASCERTAINING THE SAME.

4,407. Wingate v. Neidlinger, Putnam C. C. Buskirk, C. J.

On the 26th day of February, 1873. appellant purchased clover seed of appellee and paid for them in currency. Appellee took the money home with him, and in August he returned to appellant a $50 legal tender treasury note, etc., which he claimsd he had received of him, and which was counterfeit.

The question presented in this case is, whether a person, who receives currency in payment of debt, is required to use diligence to ascertain whether it is genuine, and if it is discovered to be forged, to return it within a reasonable time after such discovery, or if it can not be returned to give notice of its character.

The court cites approvingly Atwood v. Cornwall, reported in the American Law Register for 1874, p. 230, answering these questions in the affirmative. Reversed.

PRACTICE.

TAXES.

1. When equity will restrain the collection of.—It is well settled in this State that a court of equity has the power to restrain the collection of taxes, where fraud has occurred, or where the assessment or levy has been made without legal authority.

2. Altering assessment without notice to owner.—The assessor has no power, after he has accepted from the owner a list and valuation of his property, arbitrarily and without notice to the owner, to alter the assessment and materially increase the valuation of his property.

3. Power of county board to increase assessment.—After an assessment of property for taxation has been made and equalized by the state board, the taxes extended thereon, and the books in the hands of the collector, it is extremely doubtful whether the county board has any legal authority to change the assessment; but it certainly has no power to make such change to the detriment of the taxpayer without notice to him, and so far as it may increase the assessment without notice its action is void.

4. By cities and towns.—The certificate of the amount required to be levied as taxes by cities and towns, etc., under section 122 of the act of 1871-72, must be filed with the county clerk within the time prescribed by law, or the levy will be void, and the collection of the same may be enjoined.

The American Insurance Company v. Padfield et al.

INSURANCE.

Breach of condition to keep house insured occupied.—A condition in a policy of insurance of a dwelling house that if the house should become vacant and unoccupied the policy should become void, is broken when the tenant occupying the same leaves the house two months before a loss by fire and gives the assured notice of the fact; and no recovery can be had on the policy for the loss. The fact that the tenant has left a few articles in the building and has not delivered the key to the owner, but with no intention of holding possession, will not change the rule.

City of Collinsville v. Cole.

ORDINANCE.

Licensing hackmen, teamsters, etc.—An ordinance that "there shall be levied upon every hackman, drayman, omnibus driver, carter, teamster, cabman or expressman, and all others pursuing a like occupation, the sum of ten dollars for a license." Held, not to embrace a farmer driving his team through the city. The purpose and object of such an ordinance is to impose a tax upon a business, calling or occupation, and not upon one who may occasionally haul a few loads in an emergency for another, when that is not his calling.

AGENCY—CONSEQUENCES OF A RATIFICATION.

[From the London Law Times.]

The maxim of the common law, as we have seen, is that a ratification has the effect of a previous command. In order, however, to see as clearly as possible the consequences which flow from a ratification, it will be well to consider the parties separately whose rights may be respectively affected. The relative rights then, which may be affected by a ratification are those of

(1) The principal and the agent.
(2) The principal and third parties.
(3) The agent and third parties.

In the first place, the consequences of a ratification as it affects the relative rights of the principal and agent will be considered. The general rule is, that if an act done for another by a person not assuming to act for himself, but for such otner person, though without any precedent authority whatever, it becomes the act of the principal if subsequently ratified by him. In such a case the principal is bound by the act whether it be to his detriment or for his advantage, and whether it is founded on a tort or a contract, to the same extent and with all the consequences which follow from the same act, if done by his previous authority. (Wilson v. Tumman, 6 M. & G, 236; 6 Scott, N. R., 894; 1 D & L, 513.) Hence, if an agent incur expenses by departing from his instructions, and the principal afterwards ratify such departure, the agent is entitled to recover the expenses so incurred. (Frixione v. Tagliafero, 10 M. P. C. C., 175.) In Hovil v. Pack (7 East, 164), the same rule was stated more briefly. If you adopt A. as your agent on your own behalf, you must adopt him throughout and take his agency cum onere. (See to the same effect Ramazotti v. Bowring, 7 C. B., N. S., 851, per Erle, C. J.; Attwood v. Small, 6 Cl. & F., 232.) The act done must be for the benefit of the principal. (Wilson v. Barker, 4 B. & Ad., 614; Goodtitle v. Woodward, 3 B. & Ald., 689.)

A ratification must extend to the whole of a transaction. So well established is this principle that if a party is treated as an agent in respect of one part of a transaction, the whole is thereby ratified. (Wilson v. Poulter, 2 Str., 859; Small v. Attwood, 6 Cl. & F., 232.) From this maxim results a rule of universal application, namely, that where a contract has been entered into by one man as agent for another, the person on whose behalf it has been made cannot take the benefit of it without bearing its burdens. The contract must be performed in its integrity. (Bristowe v. Whitmore, 4 L. T. Rep. N. S., 622).

The master of a ship entered into a charter party whereby he was himself to receive the freight. As a consideration for this he was to convey troops, and to fit the vessel for that purpose. He advanced money out of his own pocket, and drew bills on the owner for the rest of the expenses, to enable the ship to earn the freight. The contract was ratified by the owner. The House of Lords held that the owner could not take the benefit of the contract and leave the onerous parts; that the master, if sued by the owner for the freight as money had and received, would have had a right at law to deduct the money so advanced without pleading a set-off, and that he had a right in equity to be reimbursed out of the freight so earned, such a case not falling within the rule that the master has not, in ordinary circumstances, a lien on the freight for wages and disbursements (ib.). Lords Wensleydale and Chelmsford dissented from the opinion of the majority of the noble lords, on the ground that there was no question of ratification, and that the master should therefore look to the owner only for reimbursement in the usual way. They did not dissent from the principle above stated. The maxim "Qui sentit commodum sentire debet et onus" requires little to be urged in its support, founded, as it is, upon just and equitable grounds. Where a ratification is proved, the principle applies, but it is not always easy to decide whether the facts in a particular case support the inference of a previous but implied authority, or whether, not going to that length, they prove a ratification. Of course, in the former case, the principle has no application: (see Bristowe v. Whitmore, sup).

We now come to the second question, namely, the effect of a ratification upon the relative rights of the principal and third parties. As soon as there is a ratification the principal steps into the place of the agent He becomes immediately invested with all the rights and all the duties that flow from the transaction, or conduct by him ratified. The person whose conduct is ratified sinks into a subordinate position, and exchanges his original rights and duties, so far as these were due to the particular transaction, for the rights and duties of a duly authorized agent. Hence, where an unauthorized person entered into and signed, as agent of the owner, an agreement for the sale of an estate, and the owner afterwards signed it, expressing at the same time on the face of his instrument his sanction and approval of the agent's conduct, the agent could not be rendered personally liable upon the contract, the purchaser's remedy being against the principal. (Spittle v. Lavender, 2 Brod. & Bing, 452; and see Kendray v. Hodgson, 5 Esp, 228). So if a contpact in writing is made for a principal without authority, and the principal subsequently ratifies the contract, the ratification renders the agent authorized to enter into the contract under the Statute of Frauds. (Maclean v. Dunn, 5 Bing, 722; see also Wilson v. Tumman, 6 M. & G., 236; Bird v. Brown, 4 Ex., 786; Maclean v. Dunn, 4 Bing, 722; Hilbury v. Hatton, 2 H. & C., 822; Soames v. Spencer, 1 Dow. & Ry., 32).

One of the most recent cases upon the question of the operation of the Statute of Frauds in cases of ratification, came before the Court of Queen's Bench this year. (The Leather Cloth Company v. Hieronimus, 10 L. Rep. Q. B., 140). A verbal contract for the delivery of three cases of leather cloth to the defendant at Cologne was entered into in Feb., 1870, between the defendant's son, A., and the plaintiffs. The goods were to be sent from London, by Ostend. When the goods were ready, the plaintiffs had given up their Ostend route and returned to the Rotterdam route. They shipped the goods in March, and sent an invoice to the defendant, together with a notification of the change in the route. The defendant did not answer this letter, but ordered more goods, which were forwarded in the same way. In the voyage the three cases were much damaged. The defendant, in a letter dated 5th July, refused to pay for them, on the ground that the instructions were to send them via Ostend. Two questions on the above facts were raised at the trial: first, whether there was sufficient memorandum in writing signed by the defendant; secondly, whether he had, by his silence and subsequent conduct, assented to the changed route before the loss. Both questions were answered in the affirmative. The full court upheld the ruling of the learned judge at the trial. "It is impossible to say," said Lord Chief Justice Cookburn, "that there was not in this case a written memorandum of the original contract, and that the departure from the terms of that contract in the mode of delivery cannot be ratified by the other party without writing. If he receives the goods, or if he has ratified the mode by which they were sent, he cannot be heard to say that it was a new contract, and cannot be enforced because it was not in writing. There was sufficient evidence in the present case for the jury that the defendant had ratified the route by which the plaintiffs had forwarded the goods." Mr. Justice Blackburn spoke to the same effect: "The first part of the letter of the 5th July in the most distinct terms refers to the plaintiffs' letter of the 1st March, and clearly admits that all that was said in it was quite true. * * This letter was signed by the defendant or his agent, and therefore the statute has been satisfied, and there is a memorandum in writing by the defendant, the party to be charged, or his agent. But it was argued that though there was that letter of the defendant to the plaintiff, there was no assent in writing to the substituted contract." But, as his lordship pointed out, the plaintiffs did not rely on a substituted contract, but on the original contract.

TERMS:—TWO DOLLARS per annum, in advance Single Copies, TEN CENTS.

We call attention to the following opinions, reported at length in this issue:

Contracts Dischargeable in Confederate Money.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States by Field, J. holding that contracts made during the war in one of the Confederate States, payable in Confederate currency, but not designed in their origin to aid the insurrectionary government, are not, because thus payable, invalid between the parties.

Bankruptcy—Corporation—Law Relating to Construed.—The opinion of the United States District Court for the District of Oregon, by Deady, J., holding that a petition to have a corporation adjudged a bankrupt may be maintained under section 5,122, of the Revised Statutes by any creditor of such corporation, without regard to the number and amount of creditors required to join in such petition against a natural person. The learned judge states the effect the adoption of the title "bankruptcy" in the Revised Statutes had on the original bankrupt act and the amendments thereto.

Power of Canal Commission to Commit for Contempt.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of New York, at General term, by James, J., holding that the commission known as the Governor's Commission was lawfully created, and had the power to commit a witness for contempt in refusing to testify. We do not believe that this opinion will be sustained by the Court of Appeals. It has been carried there by writ of error. If every little commission created by the governor of a State or its legislature, has the same power to commit as a court of record, this is a dangerous country to live in.

Arrest of Mail Carrier.—The opinion of United States Commissioner Hamlin, of Bangor, Maine, holding that a driver and carrier of the mail is exempt from arrest on civil process while engaged in the service, and that this exemption extends to such driver or carrier while waiting for the mail.

NOTES TO RECENT CASES.

COMPOSITION.

The United States District Court for the District of Mass., held, In re Langdon, 13 N. B. R., 60, that a resolution of composition which provides for payment in indorsed notes is defective, and will not be ratified.

BANK—FUNDS OF BANKRUPT'S ESTATE.

The opinion of the Supreme Court of New York in Havens v. N. C. Bank of Brooklyn, 13 N. B. R., 95, holding that no State Court can require a bank in which the funds belonging to a bankrupt's estate are deposited, to pay a judgment against the assignee out of such funds.

THE SUPREME COURT JUDGESHIP.

Governor Beveridge has called a special election for the 21st of this month, to fill the vacancy on the Supreme Bench occasioned by the resignation of Judge McAllister.

Judge T. Lyle Dickey, on Thursday, issued the following card addressed to the voters of the Seventh District:

To the Voters of the Seventh District of the State of Illinois, for the election of Judge of the Supreme Court:

I place my name before you as a candidate for Judge of the Supreme Court of this State, at the election to be held on Tuesday, the 21st day of this month.

I do this in compliance with the expressed wish of a considerable number of citizens living in the different counties composing the district, embracing men of all political parties and of nearly all classes of the community: and among them several of the ablest members of the Bench and Bar.

For many years I have been a resident of this State, six of which years have been spent in Chicago. Many of you have known me personally.

As an assurance of fidelity to duty in case of my election, I refer to my past life, as a citizen, as a soldier, at the Bar and on the Bench.

T. Lyle Dickey.

Chicago, December 2, 1875.

We understand the republicans intend calling a convention to nominate a candidate for this office. It would seem from Judge Dickey's card that he intends to run independent.

CALL ON JUDGE HIGGINS.

The Hon. Van H. Higgins:

Dear Sir: Understanding there is to be a vacancy upon the Supreme Bench of this State, growing out of the probable resignation of Judge McAllister, the undersigned members of the Bar respectfully request you to become a candidate for the position.

Judge Higgins has also received a call signed by many of the leading merchants of the city. To these calls Judge Higgins responds as follows:

To the Members of the Bar, and to the Merchants and Business Men of the Seventh Judicial District of the Supreme Court:

Gentlemen: To be selected by you as a candidate for the highest judicial station in our State is, in my opinion, an honor as great as can be conferred upon any lawyer who loves his profession.

It is scarcely possible to overestimate the importance of the judicial department of the government, as the administration of justice is the great end for which society is organized.

There can be no higher function or dignity than that of the upright judge, who fairly and impartially administers justice between individuals and the country.

To be named as fit for such an office is an honor for which I shall always feel grateful to you. Thanking you for this expression of your confidence, I place myself at the will of the people, and if elected I will try to merit the good opinion you entertain of me.

Tennessee Chancery Reports. Reports of Cases Argued in the Court of Chancery of the State of Tennessee, and decided by the Hon. William F. Cooper, Chancellor of the Seventh Chancery District, at Nashville. Vol. I. St. Louis, Mo.: G. I. Jones & Co., publishers. 1875.

The mechanical execution of this volume is good, in fact it is better printed than any other law-book ever before printed in St. Louis. The manner in which the Missouri Reports are printed is not at all creditable to the State. Mr. Cooper, the chancellor who delivered the opinions reported in the volume before us, is one of the most experienced chancellors in the country, having devoted many years of his life exclusively to chancery practice. The opinions are able, and skillfully reported. We do not know of any recent volume of reports that contains as many valuable chancery cases as this one. We can cheerfully recommend it to the profession. We desire in this connection to not only call the attention of attorneys, but particularly the judges of State courts, to the following excellent rule of Chancellor Cooper:

"Rule 26, in Divorce Cases.—Where the defendant is out of the State, a solicitor of the court shall be appointed to defend, whose duty it shall be to write to the party and inform him or her of the charges of the petition; and if the place of residence be not stated in the petition, and the attorney appointed to defend is not assured of such place of residence, the plaintiff may be required to appear in court, or before the master, and be personally examined, on oath, touching the place where notice may be sent, and such other matters with respect to the fair conduct of the suit as to the chancellor may seem proper."

If such a rule were adopted by the judges in this State, and rigidly enforced we should not hear of so many fraudulent divorce cases. Since the crusade by the bar association against the divorce lawyers of this city, they have commenced less suits here. But we regret to say that it has, so far, only caused them to change the venue. They commence their cases defore the Circuit judges, in the country. We have no doubt that the judges in the country will take steps to stop this fraudulent practice. The above volume may be had of Soule, Wentworth & Thomas, Law Booksellers, of St. Louis.

The Chief Justice Declines.—Chief Justice Waite has written a letter, an extract from which appears in the Toledo (Ohio) Commercial, as follows:

Of course, I am always grateful to my friends for any efforts in my behalf, and no one ever had friends more faithful or indulgent; but do you think it quite right for one occupying the first judicial position in the land, to permit the use of his name for political position? The office came to me covered with honor, and when I accepted it my chief duty was not to make of it a stepping-stone to something else, but to preserve its purity, and, if possible, make my name as honorable as that of my predecessors. No man ought to accept this place unless he shall take a vow to leave it as honorable as he found it. There ought never to be any necessity for rebuilding from below. All additions should be above. In my judgment the Constitution might wisely have prohibited the election of a chief justice to the presidency. Entertaining such a view, could I properly or consistently permit my name to be used for the promotion of a political combination, as now suggested? If I should do so, could I at all times and in all cases remain an unbiased judge in the estimation of the people?

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

HEAD-NOTES TO RECENT CASES, PREPARED BY THE REPORTER.

Primmer v. Claybough.

WITNESS.

1. Widow a competent witness to protect her separate property.—When the litigation involves the separate property of the wife, she is made a competent witness to protect the same, and the fact that her husband is dead will not render her incompetent as a witness against his administrator, when her property is replevied in a suit by a party claiming under her against the administrator of her husband's estate.

MARRIED WOMEN.

2. Use of her property by husband.—The fact that a married woman allows her husband to have a general use and control over her personal property, such use and control being of a character consistent with their common interests and the proper enjoyment of it by both, will not make it liable for his debts, or entitle his administrator to claim the same as against her mortgage.

Burke v. Monroe County.

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW.

1. Whether statute embraces more than one subject and that is expressed in title.—The act entitled an act to restore uniformity in the taxation of real and personal property for all purposes, in the several counties and cities in the State, which took effect July 1, 1872, so far as it provides for the repeal of certain other acts, is not in violation of the constitutional provision which declares that no act shall embrace more than one subject, and that shall be expressed in its title.

2. Provision germane to general object and not be expressed in title.—Where the general object of an act of the legislature is to restore uniformity in taxation in counties and cities, the constitution does not require that the title should be as comprehensive as the act itself, and the act may contain any provision which is germane to the primary object of the bill. Therefore the repeal of special laws which interfere with uniformity of taxation may be promptly embraced in such an act.

STATUTE.

3. Construction of.—In construing statutes courts look at the language of the whole act, and if they find in any particular clause an expression not so large and extensive in its import as those used in other parts of the act, if upon a review of the whole, they can collect, from the mere large and extensive expressions used in other parts, the intention of the legislature, it is their duty to give effect to the larger expression.

4. Thus where the object of an act was to restore uniformity in taxations in counties, and for that purpose it provided that "all laws requiring any city to support and provide for its paupers, to assume liabilities or perform duties required of counties by the general laws of this State are hereby repealed," it was held that the repealing clause embraced incorporated towns as well as cities, as without it the object of the act could not be attained, and because the word city as defined by lexicographers embraced incorporated town.

The English Supreme Court of Judicature Act abolishes bills of exceptions and proceedings in error, and substitutes for them a motion for a new trial.

THE SECRET BALLOT.

REPLY TO OPINION OF HON. JOHN A. JAMESON ON THE CONSTITUTIONALITY OF THE ILLINOIS ELECTION LAW, BY A. M. PENCE, OF THE CHICAGO BAR.

To the Editor of the LEGAL NEWS:

The people of these States are profoundly interested in all questions pertaining to government. Hence the recent opinion or letter of Judge Jameson to the State's attorney of this county, published by you in your issue of the 20th ultimo, has excited much controversy; and grave doubts exist in the minds of many as to the soundness of the judge's views. And absolute conviction obtains on the part of a still greater number, that the opinion is without foundation.

If it be the law as there announced, then the only fraud known to the law which does not vitiate, is fraud in an election, and yet it would seem, that of all things in a republic, fraud in elections should receive the greatest condemnation.

It will not be denied by Judge Jameson, I presume, that the only effectual method by which fraudulent votes can be traced, is by identifying the ballot cast with the voter, whenever it becomes necessary to make investigation into the same, for it becomes useless to ascertain the name of the man who cast the vote, if no method remains whereby it can be ascertained for whom he voted. No election, however fraudulent, could ever be contested, if it could not be proven for whom the fraudulent votes were cast. Any method whereby such a fact could be ascertained, would be invading the constitutional right of parties to a secret ballot, according to the views of the Judge. The consequences of such logic, at once beget a distrust as to the soundness of interpretation.

1st. Is a secret ballot a constitutional right?

2d. How far does secrecy extend, and what is the object of secrecy?

The Constitution of 1848 and 1870 both provide that "all votes shall be by ballot." The right of suffrage is a public right and affects the whole community. The protection of private rights of individuals is provided for in other portions of the Constitution. There is no property or civil right of the individual involved in its exercise. We find an entire article of the Constitution given to the question of suffrage, and we would expect that the legislature, when called upon to legislate and carry into effect that part of the Constitution, would only have an eye single to the protection of the public, and not to the protection of the rights of the individual.

It would seem that the only object of secrecy is to prevent ihe citizen from being intimidated in the performance of this political duty, so that he may vote according to his sentiments or judgment, and thus secure the greatest benfit to the State, and not for the purpose of protecting the citizen from some subsequent undefined injury. It would seem that the laws were sufficient for the protection of the citizen from oppression, on account of his political views, just as they are sufficient to protect him from oppression on account of his religious views. Is there any doubt that religious fanaticism is stronger and more dangerous than political fanaticism? Why not frame a law to protect a man from disclosing or testifying upon the witness stand as to whether he is a Methodist or Catholic. The Constitution guarantees the free exercise and enjoyment of religious profession and worship, and if the views now entertained by Judge Jameson and the Indiana court are the true ones in regard to the guarantee of individual political freedom, there seems a much greater reason for guaranteeing to every person an individual religious freedom. He should be protected upon the witness stand, and everywhere, from a voluntary disclosure of his religious belief, and should not be compelled to disclose whether he worships at the shrine of the Virgin, or in a Joss house.

Judge Jameson thinks the object of the Constitution is to protect the individual, after the vote cast, from persecution. It seems to me that the only object of a vote by ballot is to protect the State by removing the pressure at the time the vote is cast, thus insuring the expression of the voter's real sentiment, and leaving him alone to protect himself afterwards, as every citizen protects himself from oppression on account of his religious views.

It seems to me very absurd to seek for a definition of a word a hundred or a thousand years ago, when it has a present meaning well understood. Words are forever changing their signification, and we are never confined to any period of time for their definition.

But the word ballot does not, by force of its own inherent character, ex necessitate rei, carry with it the idea of secrecy, but only the opportunity for secresy, or secresy to a common intent. It is admitted by the Indiana case, upon which the Judge chiefly relies, and of which his letter is only a re-statement, that a ballot did not necessarily imply secrecy in Greece, but in Rome during the Republic, it did. Having found a single instance, therefore, where it did not imply secrecy, the argument that it must, under all circumstances, imply secrecy, is utterly overthrown. The idea of secresy does not inhere in the word.

It seems to me to be perfectly evident, that it is simply a question of policy for each State. One State may think it politic to have absolute secresy—another, the contrary; and hence it cannot be claimed that the Constitution-makers intended, by the use of the word "ballot," to adopt the accidental incident of secresy, but rather to leave it to the legislature to make it secret or otherwise, or only to give an opportunity for secresy, at time of casting the ballot, as true policy might from time to time dictate.

But the present meaning of a word is to be ascertained, not by consulting former ages, but by referring to the every-day use of it. What do the people understand by the use of the word?

In the City of Beardstown v. the City of Virginia, 7 LEGAL NEWS, 314, the Supreme Court of Illinois laid down the following rules of interpretation. Says the court:

"It is not allowable to interpret what has no need of interpretation, and when the words have a definite and precise meaning, to go elsewhere in search of conjecture in order to restrict or extend the meaning.

"Statutes and contracts should be read and understood according to the natural and most obvious import of the language, without resorting to subtle and forced construction, for the purpose of either limiting or extending their operation. McClusky v. Cromwell, 11 N. Y., 601.

"The rule is well expressed by Johnson, J., in Newell v. The People, 3 Seld., 97, in these words: 'Whether we are considering an agreement between parties, a statute or a constitution, with a view to its interpretation, the thing we are to seek is the thought which it expresses. To ascertain this, the first resort in all cases is to the natural signification of the words employed in the order and grammatical arrangement in which the framers of the instrument have placed them. If thus regarded, the words embody a definite meaning which involves no absurdity, and no contradiction between different parts of the same writing; then that meaning apparent upon the face of the instrument is the one which alone we are at liberty to say was intended to be conveyed. In such a case there is no room for construction. That which the words declare is the meaning of the instrument, and neither courts nor legislatures have the right to add to or take away from that meaning.'

"The question in this and other cases of construction of written instruments is not what was the intention of the parties, but what is the meaning of the words they have used. (See Denman, C. J., in Rickman v. Carstairs, 5 B. & A., 129; see ibid, 129).

"It was said by Brennan, J., in Walker v. Harris, 20 Wend., 561, that 'the current of authority at the present day is in favor of reading statutes according to the natural and most obvious import of the language, without resorting to subtle and forced constructions for the purpose of either limiting or extending their operation.' And see People v. Purdy, 2 Hill, 35; 4 Hill, 384; Denn v. Reid, 10 Pet., 524; Spragins v. Houghton, 2 Scam., 377.

"These doctrines received the explicit recognition and approval of this court in Hills v. The City of Chicago, 50 Ill., 86.

"In view of the well-settled and sound and only safe principles applicable to the exposition of constitutions, statutes, and instruments in writing above declared, we do not feel at liberty to enter into the field of speculation and essay whether we may not construe away the plain and obvious meaning of the clearly expressed language in question according to some conjectural intention of the framers of the Constitution.

"The Constitution does not derive its force from the convention which framed, but from the people who ratified it, and the intent to be arrived at is that of the people. Cooley's Const. Lim., 55. Says Judge Story, in speaking of the Constitution of the United States: 'The people adopted the Constitution according to the words of the text in their reasonable interpretation, and not according to the private interpretation of any particular men.' 1 Story Com. on Const., 392, note."

Now then, according to the foregoing rules, what did the people understand by the word ballot, at the time of the adoption of the new Constitution in 1870? The question before us is not what political theorizers or persons accustomed to seek for the meaning of a word, by going back to its root, may suppose it once meant, but, what meaning does the public at large attach to it?

And first—Webster defines the word ballot as follows: "Originally a ball used in voting, hence a piece of paper or other thing used for same purpose." Our great lexicographer is supposed to be quite accurate, and he does not attach any meaning of secresy to the word. If secresy had been an inherent quality of the ballot, would not Webster have indicated that fact? Secresy no more inheres in the signification of the word ballot than does the idea of a ball. According to the same method of reasoning, the courts ought to declare the law unconstitutional, because the legislature provided for paper ballots, and not for balls, as the means of expressing the political wish. Because a ball was the ancient method, therefore it should continue forever. The idea of ball inheres in the word just as much as the idea of secresy. To such absurdities must we come.

The first Constitution of Illinois, that of 1818, provided that elections should be viva voce until altered by the General Assembly. As early as 1829, the General Assembly provided that the citizen might vote viva voce, or by presenting an open ticket with the name and the office written or printed upon it, and from that open ticket or ballot the clerks of the election were to write the name of the person voted for and the office, together with the name of the voter upon the poll-book. This was the first introduction of the ballot in Illinois. See Gale's Stat., p. 263. Thus we see an opportunity was given the voter to cast his ballot so as to conceal the same from those outside, at the time of voting; but no provision was made for a continual concealment, for the judges of election knew, and the poll-books showed for whom he voted. This mixed system of viva voce and ballot voting continued until the adoption of the Constitution in 1848, which provided for a vote by ballot exclusively. And the legislature, on February 12th, 1849, provided for the method of voting by ballot. There was no provision in that law for absolute concealment, but only for an opportunity of concealment at the time of voting. The statute made provision for a contest of elections and as there was no provision against an investigation but in favor of it, it must be presumed that the legislature intended that when necessary, a disclosure should be made as to the contents of the ballot. And we find many cases in Illinois where the poll-books were purged of illegal votes. The law continued unchanged until February 5, 1861, when a statute was passed which provided for the numbering of the ballot to correspond with the number set opposite the name of the voter on the poll-book, thus enabling all frauds to be directly traced. That statute continued up to the adoption of the new Constitution in 1870, which provided for a vote by ballot as the Constitution of 1848 did. Thus we find that a construction was given by the legislature chosen by the people of the meaning of the word ballot, and it must be presumed after such a lapse of time and such a general acquiescence, that the legislature construed the meaning of the word as the people understood it. Thus, by act of the legislature, from 1829 to 1849—a period of 20 years—an open ticket was voted; and from 1849 to 1861—a period of 12 years—a ticket which enabled the voter to conceal his vote while voting, and thus preventing an immediate control over his wishes, but without protection of secresy after the vote was cast. And then from 1861 to 1870, a period of 9 years, in which, by express provision of law, the ballot was numbered. If all this period of time is not suffieient in which to give a definition to a term, or to change its definition and meaning, if it ever had a different one, then we must admit that language is fixed as the hills, and that no change can take place.

Did not the people, at the time of the adoption of the Constitution of 1870, have a definite idea of the meaning of the ballot? Had they not acquiesced for nine years in the very law now upon the statute book, which compelled a numbering of every vote? How is it possible to obtain in a more explicit way, the public understanding of a term, than by looking to the laws of the people's legislature where it is defined, and by absolute acquiescence in that definition. The new Constitution was adopted with that definition before them; and, to repeat Judge Story: "The people adopted the Constitution according to the words of the text, on their reasonable interpretation, and not according to the private interpretation of any particular men." And to repeat again the language of the Supreme Court of Illinois: "The Constitution does not derive its force from the convention which framed it, but from the people who ratified it, and the intent to be arrived at is that of the people."

Even if it were true that the word ballot had a definite, well-fiefined signification of absolute secresy, at any particular time, or even at the time of the adoption of a constitution, it could not be claimed that such signification should always continue. For instance, the Constitution of the United States provides that "Congress shall have the power to establish uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States."

At the time of the adoption of the Constitution of the United States, the "subject of bankruptcy" was well defined. It had a certain signification in England, from whence our law came. It meant that the entire property of the bankrupt should be taken hold of and distributed among his creditors. But the Congress of the United States has now provided that such property need not necessarily be taken hold of at all or distributed, but it provides that a certain number of a man's creditors may assent to a composition, and accept from the debtor a certain percentage of his liabilities and discharge him from the balance. And such assent will bind all the creditors whether they all assent or not. Here is a taking away property and rights without due process of law. It could not be done under the English bankrupt act, or at common law, at the time of the adoption of our Constitution, but the law is held by the courts to be constitutional, and that Congress is not confined to the terms or signification of the old English bankrupt law, but they may change it so that it can scarcely be recognized. Hence, bankruptcy has a different meaning to-day from what it had a hundred years ago.

The Constitution of this State provides that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law.

As well might a party contend that due process of law means process of law in accordance with the common law practice, and that the legislature could not constitutionally change the practice and adopt the New York code system. Or, that the legislature could not change the rules of evidence so as to permit parties to a suit to testify, or husband and wife to testify against each other. All these things are subject to the control of the legislature as policy may from time to time dictate, and so long as the ballot is preserved, the legislature may or may not make it secret as to it seems best. The subject and its regulation is under the control of the legislature.

In the case of Byler v. Asher, 47 Ill., 105, the Supreme Court of Illinois said:

"There can be no question that the legislature may provide all reasonable safeguards to preserve the ballot-box from fraud, and to maintain the purity of our elections. As the wisdom of our laws, the fair and impartial administration of justice, depends upon the officers chosen by the people, and even the perpetuity of our present form of government can only be maintained by preserving our elections free from fraud and corruption, all reasonable requirements for the purpose, not calculated to abridge the elective franchise, are within the scope of legislative power."

Hence we perceive that our own Supreme Court recognized the importance of a pure ballot-box, and the power of the legislature to provide by law for its protection. And not only has the Supreme Court of this State laid down the salutary rule as a theory, but it has also actually decided that the parties who cast this ballot, which Judge Jameson holds should be an inviolable secret, may be called upon the witness stand and interrogated as to the person for whom he voted.

This idea of absolute secresy is now attempted to be used as a sword against the public instead of a shield to the well-being of the State. Frauds must go unpunished, and governments be revolutionized, in order that the individual may be protected from oppression, while the laws remain ample for his protection, as in all other cases of oppression—political, religious, or otherwise. The intent of the ballot is thus made to serve just the opposite end from which it was originally intended, viz., the protection of the State.

This is indeed a new political heresy. It has been invented in Indiana, and has never gone further than Indiana, where we hope it will be confined.

In the State of Missouri the constitution provides that elections shall be by ballot, as our constitution does. The question there arose as to the validity of the returns of a certain district, where the votes had not been numbered. The court excluded the whole poll because in conflict with the statute. In the decision of the case, West v. Ross, 53 Mo., 354, the court uses the following language:

"Can we say that this negative clause is only directory, and in that indirect way nullify or repeal, by a judicial decision, the whole provision of the statute requiring ballots to be numbered? If we deny the consequence affixed by legislature to the non-performance of a regulation provided by law, it, in effect, nullifies the law itself. It is said that to ascertain whether a law is intended to be directory or imperative does not depend so much on the construction of the language of the law as of its application. 'The statute is sufficiently clear; the only point is, what shall be the consequence of a disobedience of its directions.' (Sedg. Stat. and Com. Law, 369). In the statute now under consideration, the legislature has not only by the statute directed what shall be done, but has also declared what consequence shall follow disobedience.

"In the present case the legislature has provided and required that the ballots shall be numbered, and then provides, in express terms, that no ballot not numbered shall be counted. Can we say that such ballots shall be counted, without an attempt at judicial legislation? I think not, and it would be a misapplication of terms to say that such a statute is only directory."

It is strange, indeed, that the question was not even raised or alluded to by the court or counsel in that case, if the definition and meaning of the word ballot so clearly signifies secresy for all time to come. The very fact that the question was not raised, is the most conclusive evidence that the legal mind of Missouri had never imagined that the ballot meant absolute secresy.

It is simply a question of policy. One State thinks absolute secresy or partial secresy is the better policy. Another thinks openness and honesty and manhood are the better qualities of the true citizen of the republic. In my humble opinion it is a political or judicial heresy of the gravest consequence; and for a judge to construe a law to be in contravention of the Constitution is a deep responsibility, unless the provisions of the two instruments cannot be harmonized, and are utterly inconsistent.

OLD TIMES IN NEW YORK—LEGAL TRIALS OF THE DUTCH PERIOD.

Mr. James W. Gerard, who seems to be untiring in his archæological researches into the history of this city, has given us the result of his labors in a paper lately read before the New York Historical Society, entitled "The Old Stadt Huys of New Amsterdam."

The main interest of Mr. Gerard's account of the Old Stadt House or City Hall of New Amsterdam consists in the vivid portraiture of the manner, habits of thought, and social condition of the Dutch settlers of New York, as transmitted to us in the legal trials of the Dutch period, held in the Old Stadt Huys, which in 1654 stood on the corner of Coenties lane, facing Coenties slip, where now are the warehouses 71 and 73 Pearl street. In those days there was no State prison, and therefore the punishments inflicted were fines, banishment, the pillory, flogging, and confinement in one's own house, or for a limited time with the town jailor in the City Hall or Stadt Huys. Theft was punished by scourging with rods, or banishment and fine. Branding on the cheek was employed for hardened criminals. Violators of the Sabbath were severely punished. It was forbidden to go nutting or picking strawberries on that day. Fowling, running, sailing, driving, or playing any games, were also forbidden on that day.

"Albert the Trumpeter, when brought up for having an axe on his shoulder on the Sabbath, saved himself from punishment other than a reprimand by showing that he was cutting a bat for his little boy.

"Theft was punished severely.

"The defenses of Lysbert Anthony, brought up for stealing black seawant from her mistress, Mrs. Dominie Drysius, show a comical want of logic. Her defense was that 'Barbar, the negress, who lived at Jan, the joiner's, had stolen a silver bell from Burgher Jorison,' and for a second defense, 'that the cupping woman told her to steal.'

"Lysbert's pleas did not avail, and she was sentenced to be chastised by her mother Mary. 'Mary,' the chronicle reads, 'undertaking it, hath, with the assistance of long Anna, severely punished and whipped her daughter with rods in the presence of the worshipful magistrates.'

"We have also the record of a capital punishment from the earlier annals of 1641. The court proceedings before the Council, urged by the Fiscal, were against Jan, of ort Orange, Manuel de Gerritt, the giant, Anthony Portugese, Simon Congo, and five others, all negroes belonging to the company, for killing Jan Premero, another negro.

A GIANT ESCAPES HANGING.

"The prisoners having pleaded guilty, and it being rather a costly operation to hang nine able-bodied negroes belonging to the company, the sentence was that they were to draw lots to determine 'who should be punished with the cord until death, praying the Almighty God, Creator of heaven and earth, to direct that the lot may fall on the guiltiest,' whereupon the record reads, 'the lot fell, by God's providence, on Manuel Gerrit, the giant, who was accordingly sentenced to be hanged by the neck until dead, as an example to all such malefactors.' Four days after the trial, and on the day of the sentence, all Nieuw Amsterdam left its accustomed work to gaze on the unwonted spectacle. Indians also gathered to the scene. The giant negro was brought out by the black hangman and placed on the ladder against the fort, with two strong halters around his neck. After an exhortation from Dominie Bogardus, during which the negro chanted barbaric invocations to his favorite fetich, he was turned off the ladder. Under the violent struggles and weight of the giant, however, both halters broke. The man fell to the ground uttering piteous cries, twisting and grovelling in the earth on his knees. The women shrieked, the men joined in his prayers for mercy to the stern Director, but he was no trifler, and the law took its course. The hangman prepared a stronger rope. But the cry for mercy was so general that the Director relented, and the fortunate giant was led off the ground by his swarthy friends, somewhat disturbed in his intellect by his near view of the grim King of Terrors."

MALTREATING QUAKERS.

Although Mr. Gerard cannot and does not claim for our Dutch predecessors entire innocence of the charge of religious intolerance, for he is obliged to admit that "Stuyvesant hated and maltreated Quakers, and interdicted them from preaching. But," he continues, "Stuyvesant's harshness was not indorsed by the people, and met with the opposition of even his own sister."

"They were driven away from New Nederland, but were not led to the gibbet as in New England. Even when the colony was needy and suffering, Director Kieft, the predecessor of Stuyvesant, with heavy ransoms rescued the Jesuit fathers, Joques and Bressani, from the Indians, gave them refuge, food, and clothing, and free transport to Europe."

The only witchcraft trial in New York on record, is this:

"In 1670, the people of the town of Westchester, which was settled mostly by New Englanders, were very much disturbed, There came among them a poor old widow and her children, one Katherine Harrison. She was fleeing from religious people of Wethersfield, Conn., who wanted to praise God by hanging their fellow creatures.

"Complaint was made to the governor by the Westchestrians of this terrible visitation, and of a Capt. Richard Panton, who had humanely given the hunted woman asylum. It was prayed to the governor, by these valorous people, that he would order the old woman to be removed from among them.

"The governor scouted the petition of these who, in his words, 'pretend their fears to be of a public concern,' and the old woman having given bonds for her 'civil carriage and good behavior,' the ensuing court of Assizes held at New York peremptorily ordered the bonds to be discharged, and declared 'that she hath liberty to remaine in the towne of Westchester, where she now resides, or anywhere else in the Government, during her pleasure.'

"Thus peremptorily were the magistrates of the town of Westchester rebuffed." —N. Y. Sun.

JUDGMENTS BEFORE ACTING JUDGE.—The Supreme Court of Louisiana, on the 29th November gave an opinion in the case of the State of Louisiana against Pete Phillip appealed from the Superior Criminal Court. The defendant was convicted of perjury while Geo. H. Broughan, an attorney-at-law, was acting as judge under an order of Judge Atocha and was sentenced to the penitentiary for five years. The appellant alleged that Broughan had no legal right to act as judge, and that the judgment against Phillips should be annulled and the case remanded for trial according to law.

LEGAL TRIALS OF THE DUTCH PERIOD.

It seems that the barbaric sport of "gander pulling," which has been generally attributed to the south, as an institution peculiarly sectional, was not unknown to the old Knickerbockers.

"In 1654, we find there was a terrible to do between the fort and the City Hall; all arising out of the Governor's interference with the people's holidays, and preventing the boys and girls from riding at the goose at Shrovetide. This sport consisted in greasing a goose's neck, hanging the bird in the air, and trying to capture it in riding rapidly past.

"The Director and Council had issued an order prohibiting such festivities. Dominie Biom also issed a pronunciamento against them from Wyldwick. Whereat the worthy city representatives had demurred and grumbled greatly. Thence came another fulmination from the fort of a most sarcastic and belittleing character. It was addressed "to the small bench of justices."

THE BURGOMASTERS INDIGNANT.

"It recites the prior proclamation of the Director and Council, forbidding farmers' servants 'to ride the goose at the feast of Backus and Shrovetide, and that the Burgomasters and Schepens were aggrieved that the order should be made without their assent. It farther recites, 'Besides, in their time it has never been practiced here. Moreover, it is altogether unprofitable, unnecessary and criminal for subjects and neighbors to celebrate such popish and pagan feasts, and to practice such customs; and yet, notwithstanding, the same (as the Burgomasters and Schepens sustain,) may, in some places of Faderland, be tolerated and looked at through the fingers.'

"Several delinquents were legally summoned by Claes Van Elslant, the Court Messenger, but did not come, and on being cited and summoned by the Fiscal before the Director, some of their number began threatening, cursing, deriding and laughing at the High Council, in an insolent and contumacious manner, in the presence of the Director general and Council, for which they were properly commtited to prison. At which the Burgomasters and Schepens 'do feel themselves in their quality, particularly aggrieved,' forsooth! because the Director-general had done this without their consent and knowledge. As if, without the knowledge and consent of the Burgomasters and Schepens, no order can be made, no mob interdicted from celebrating the feast of Backus, much less have the privilege of correcting such persons as tread under foot the Christian and holy precepts, without the knowledge and consent of a little bench of justices.

"Thereafter, accordingly, the lads and lasses, instead of 'riding the goose,' and honoring Backus on Shrove Tuesday, or at 'Pinckster,' had to content themselves with pleasure parties to Nooten Island, the Knick Hock, or Bloemondael; or with rambling in the Maadge Paadtje and to the Common or Vlacke, now the Park, for nuts or strawberries."

Courts were jealous of their honor and authority under the Dutch regime.

"In 1660, Walewyn Van der Veen appeared in court to answer the charge of having called the court mere 'simpletons and blockheads' for a certain adverse decision against him on a bill of exchange. After proof of the fact that these terrible words were uttered, the court made sentence as follows:

"That Walewyn Van der Veen, for his committed insult, shall here beg forgiveness, with uncovered head, of God, justice, and the Worshipful Court, and moreover, pay as a fine 190 guilders.

"Walewyn having refused to obey the sentence, was committed a prisoner to his own house till the sentence was obeyed.

THE COURT ON ITS DIGNITY.

"On another occasion the court felt called upon to vindicate its dignity in the case of Pietertje Jans, widow of Claes Jansen Ruyter, whose house had been sold on an execution. She was brought up before the court for saying of the court, 'Ye despoilers! ye bloodsuckers! ye have not sold but given away my house.' The complaining officer stated that, as this is a sting that cannot be endured, he demands that Pietertje be severely reprimanded and fined. The reprimand and fine were decreed by the court.

"Ill fared it also with Jan Willemsen Van Iselstepa, commonly called Jan of Ecyden, who for abusive language and writing an insolent letter to the magistrates of Bushwyck, was sentenced to be fastened to a stake at the place of public execution with a bridle in his mouth, rods under his arm, and a paper on his breast with an inscription, 'Lampoon writer, false accuser, and defamer of magistrates.' He was afterward banished."

Among the records of the solemn surrender of the old colony to the English, 1664, comes in two amusing episodes. First, Albert the Trumpeter appears before the court and demands the prosecution of a certain attachment made on a hog. Following this record is the conclusion of the transfer of authority to Gov. Nichols, and then amid the solemn proceedings there is this amusing interlude:

"On the last day of the sessions of the old court comes Mrs. Pieterje Jans with a suit against Evert Duyckinck, for 'a little ornamental head-dress,' worth fifty-five guilders, bought by his daughter from plaintiff, but which Mrs. Duyckinck had sent back, saying that the daughter had no right to buy such without the knowledge of the parents. The defendant says he was not present when his daughter bought the head dress, and knew nothing of it, and says it is now no time to wear head-dresses, and, besides, that the price is extortionate. The plaintiff retorts that the defendant was near by at the time, and said it was his children's money, and what she states is as true as that she is a sinful woman and stands there. Mrs. Jans was awarded the price of the head-dress."—N. Y. Sun.

SERVED HIM RIGHT.—One morning this week upon the opening of the United States Court in this city, a juryman summoned staggered into the court room under the influence of liquor. Judge BLODGETT, noticing it, said, "Mr. Clerk, pay Mr. ——— what is due him up to this date. We have no use for such jurymen in this court."

JUDGE BLODGETT, on yesterday, fined James A. Ferguson, who was a juryman in his court, one hundred dollars, and ordered him committed to the county jail for sixty days, for attempting to communicate with the agent of the plaintiff in a case he was trying as a juryman.

And whereas, default has been made in the payment of all the interest due on said promissory note, and the legal holder has declared the whole of said indebtedness due, by reason of such default, and has applied to me, as such trustee, to sell said premises to pay the same.

Now, therefore, in pursuance of the power in me vested by said trust deed, I shall sell the said premises at public auction, for cash, to the highest bidder, on Wednesday, the 5th day of January, A. D. 1876, at one o'clock in the afternoon of said day, at the office of the Sheriff of Cook county, at Chicago, Illinois, and all right, title, equity of redemption and homestead rights of said grantors, their heirs and assigns therein.

11-14 WILLIAM C. IVES, Trustee.

BABCOCK, OF THE city of Chicago, county of Cook, and State of Illinois, by his certain deed of trust, duly executed, acknowledged and delivered, bearing date the 28th day of April, 1875, and recorded in the recorder's office of said county, on the second day of June, 1875, in book 526 of records, page 288, did convey to the undersigned, as trustee, the following described premises, situate in the said city of Chicago, to wit:

And whereas, it is provided in said trust deed, that in case of default in the payment of said notes, or any or either of them, or of any part thereof, either interest or principal, according to the tenor thereof, then, on application of the legal holder of said notes, it should be lawful for the undersigned to sell and dispose of said premises, and all right, title, benefit and equity of redemption of said Adalbert H. Babcock, his heirs and assigns therein, at public auction, at the southwest corner of Washington and LaSalle streets, in the city of Chicago, State of Illinois, or on said premises, or on any part thereof as might be specified in the notice of such sale, for the highest and best price the same would bring in cash, thirty days previous notice of such sale having been given by publication, once in each week for four successive weeks, in the Chicago Legal News, or in any newspaper at that time published in said city of Chicago, and to make, execute, and deliver to the purchaser or purchasers at such sale, good and sufficient deed or deeds of conveyance for the premises sold, and out of the proceeds or avails of such sale, and the purchase money paid thereon, after first paying all costs of advertising, sale and conveyance, including the reasonable fees and commissions of the undersigned, attorney's fees, and all other expenses of said trust, including all moneys advanced for insurance, taxes and other liens or assessments, with interest thereon at ten per cent, per annum, then to pay the principal of said notes, whether due and payable by the terms thereof or not, and interest on said notes up to the time of such sale, rendering the overplus (if any) unto said Adalbert H. Babcock, his legal representatives or assigns, on reasonable request.

And whereas, it was and is further provided in and by said trust deed, that in case of default in any of said payments of principal or interest, according to the tenor and effect of said promissory notes, or either of them, or any part thereof, then, and in that case, the whole of said principal sum thereby secured, and the interest thereon to the time of sale, might at once, at the option of the legal holder thereof, become due and payable, and the said premises be sold in the manner and with the same effect as if the said indebtedness had matured.

And whereas, default has been made in the payment of the semi-annual interest upon each and all of said notes, which interest became and was due and payable on the 28th day of October, 1875, and whereas said Louisa Augusta Uhlich, the legal holder of all of said notes, has elected to declare, and has declared, and hereby declares the entire principal sum so secured thereby, due and payable by reason of such default, and has made application to the undersigned, as trustee, to sell and dispose of said premises, under and by virtue of the power in said trust deed contained, and for the purposes therein specified.

CHICAGO LEGAL NEWS.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 11, 1875.

The Courts.

THROUGH the kindness of Senator UPTON, of this city, we have received the following important opinion:

UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT.

No. 35.—OCT. TERM, 1875.

MARY E. SANGER, plaintiff in error, v. CHARLES W. UPTON, assignee in bankruptcy of the GREAT WESTERN INSURANCE COMPANY.

In error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Illinois.

BANKRUPT INSURANCE COMPANY—POWER OF COURT TO ORDER AN ASSESSMENT UPON ITS CAPITAL STOCK.

1. POWER OF COURT TO ORDER PAYMENT.—That it was competent for the court to order payment of the stock, as the directors, under the instruction of a majority of the stockholders might, before the decree in bankruptcy, have done. The former is as effectual as the latter would have been. A court of equity has often made and enforced the requisite order in such cases. The bankrupt court possesses the same power in the case in hand.

2. VOID AGREEMENT.—An agreement that a stockholder may pay in any other medium than money is void, as a fraud upon the other stockholders, and upon creditors as well.

3. CAPITAL STOCK.—The capital stock of an incorporated company is a fund set apart for the payment of its debts. It is a substitute for the personal liability which subsists in private copartnerships When debts are incurred a contract arises with the creditors that it shall not be withdrawn or applied otherwise than upon their their demands. Until such demands are satisfied, the creditors have a lien upon it in equity. If diverted, they may follow it as far as it can be traced and subject it to the payment of their claims, except as against holders who have taken it bona fide for a valuable consideration and without notice.

4. RIGHTS OF ASSIGNEE.—The rights of the bankrupt Insurance Company passed to the assignee in bankruptcy, and he could enforce them by a legal remedy. The assignee was subrogated to all the rights, legal and equitable, of the bankrupt corporation. This suit was well brought in the form adopted; that the assignee might have filed a bill against all the delinquent shareholders jointly, but when a company is utterly insolvent, a separate action at law in each case is to be preferred. It is cheaper and more speedy.

5 APPELLANT'S INTEREST.—That under the evidence appellant was the owner of the stock. The certificates showed the par of the stock and the amount to be paid in. Upon receiving them the law implied an agreement on her part to respond to the balance whenever called upon in any lawful way to do so.

6. DEFECTS IN ORGANIZATION.—That where there are any defects in the organization of a corporation which might be fatal upon a writ of quo warranto, a stockholder who has participated in its acts as a corporation de facto, is estopped to deny its rightful existence.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

Justice SWAYNE delivered the opinion of the court.

Several errors are assigned and relied upon touching the admission of evidence and the instructions given to the jury.

We shall give our views of the case as it is presented in the record so as to meet these objections without adverting specifically to any of them.

The original charter of the Great Western Insurance Company fixed its capital at $100,000. By an amendment of the charter the capital was increased to $5,000,000. It became insolvent. A petition was filed against it in the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of Illinois, and on the 6th of February, 1872, it was adjudged a bankrupt. On the 11th of April, 1872, the defendant in error was appointed its assignee in bankruptcy. Upon the application of the assignee, the district court made an order that the balance unpaid upon the stock held by the several stockholders should be paid to the assignee on or before the 15th day of August, 1872; that notice of the order should be given by publication in a newspaper or otherwise, and that in default of payment the assignee should proceed to collect the amount due from each delinquent. The assignee gave notice by publishing the order accordingly, and by mailing a copy, with a demand of payment, to each stockholder. The plaintiff in error was so notified. It was claimed that she was the owner of $10,000 of the stock, upon which it was alleged there was due sixty per cent. The original charter required the payment of five per cent. of the capital stock, and that the balance should be secured in the manner prescribed. The amended charter is silent upon the subject. The stock certificates issued by the company set forth that twenty per cent. was to be paid in four quarterly installments of five per cent. each, "the balance being subject to the call of the directors as they may be instructed by the majority of the stockholders represented at any regular meeting."

This was a regulation of the company, and not a requirement of either the original or amended charter. It did not appear that any call was ever made by the directors or authorized by the stockholders.

The plaintiff in error having failed to pay pursuant to the order of the court, this suit was instituted by the assignee.

The order was conclusive as to the right of the assignee to bring the suit. Jurisdiction was given to the district court by the bankrupt act (Rev. Stat. U. S., sec. 4,972) to make it. It was not necessary that the stockholders should be before the court when it was made, any more than that they should have been there when the decree of bankruptcy was pronounced. That decree gave the jurisdiction and authority to make the order. The plaintiff in error could not, in this action, question the validity of the decree, and for the same reasons she could not draw into question the validity of the order. She could not be heard to question either except by a separate and direct proceeding had for that purpose. She might have applied to the district court to revoke or modify the order. Had she done so, she would have been entitled to be heard, but it does not appear that any such application was made. As a stockholder she was an integral part of the corporation. In the view of the law she was before the court in all the proceedings touching the body of which she was a member. In point of fact, stockholders in such cases can hardly be ignorant of the measures taken to reach the effects of the corporation. If they choose to rest supine until cases against them like this are on trial, they must take the consequences. Not having spoken before, they cannot be permitted to speak then, especially to make an objection which looks rather to the embarrassment and delay than to the right and justice of the case. A different rule would be pregnant with mischief and confusion. Hall v. U. S. Ins. Co., 5 Gill, 484; Sagory v. Dubois, 3 Sandf. Ch. Rep., 510.

This court has applied the same rule to an order made by the comptroller of the currency, under the 50th section of the national bank act, appointing a receiver and directing him to proceed to make collections from the stockholders of an insolvent bank. Kennedy v. Gibson and others, 8 Wall., 505.

In that case it was said: "It is for the comptroller to decide when it is necessary to institute proceedings against the stockholders to enforce their personal liability, and whether the whole or any part, and if a part, how much, should be collected. These questions are referred to his judgment and discretion, and his determination is conclusive. The stockholders cannot controvert it. Its validity is not to be questioned in the litigation that may ensue. He may make it at such time as he may deem proper, and upon such data as shall be satisfactory to him."

This principle was applied also in Cadle, receiver, v. Baker & Co., 20 Wall., 650.

It was competent for the court to order payment of the stock, as the directors under the instruction of a majority of the stockholders might, before the decree in bankruptcy, have done. The former is as effectual as the latter would have been. It may, perhaps, be well doubted whether the stockholders would have voluntarily imposed such a burden upon themselves. The law does not permit the rights of creditors to be subjected to such a test. It would be contrary to the plainest principles of reason and justice to make payment by the debtor for such a purpose in any wise dependent upon his own choice. A court of equity has often made and enforced the requisite order in such cases. The bankrupt court possessed the same power in the case in hand. The order rests upon a solid foundation of reason and authority. Ward v. The Griswold Manufac. Company, 16 Conn., 599; Adler v. The Mil. Pat. Brick Man. Co. et al., 13 Wisconsin, 61; Sagory v. Dudois, 3 Sandf. Chy., 510; Man v. Pentz, 2 Id., 285.

A resolution or agreement, that no further call shall be made, is void as to creditors. 3 Sandf. Chy., sup. An agreement that a stockholder may pay in any other medium than money is also void as a fraud upon the other stockholders and upon creditors as well. Henry et al. v. Vermillion and A. R. R. Co., 17 Ohio St. R., 187. The owner of stock cannot escape liability by taking it in the name of his infant children. Roman v. Fry, 6 J. J. Marshall, 634. Nor is it any defense to show that the holder took and held the stock as the agent of the corporation, to sell for its benefit. Allibone v. Hager, 46 Pa. St., 48.

The capital stock of an incorporated company is a fund set apart for the payment of its debts. It is a substitute for the personal liability which subsists in private co-partnerships. When debts are incurred, a contract arises with the creditors that it shall not be withdrawn or applied, otherwise than upon their demands, until such demands are satisfied. The creditors have a lien upon it in equity. If diverted, they may follow it as far as it can be traced and subject it to the payment of their claims, except as against holders who have taken it bona fide for a valuable consideration and without notice. It is publicly pledged to those who deal with the corporation, for their security. Unpaid stock is as much a part of this pledge and as much a part of the assets of the company as the cash which has been paid in upon it. Creditors have the same right to look to it as to anything else, and the same right to insist upon its payment as upon the payment of any other debt due to company. As regards creditors there is no distinction between such a demand and any other assets which may form a part of the property and effects of the corporation. Curran v. Arkansas, 15 How., 308; Wood v, Dummer, 3 Mason, 308; Slee v. Bloom, 19 Johnson, 474; Briggs v. Penniman, 8 Cow., 387; Society, &c. v. Abbot, 2 Beav., 559; Walworth v. Holt, 4 Mylne & Craig, 789; Ward v. Griswoldville Man. Co., 16 Conn., 598; Fowler v. Robinson, 31 Maine, 789; Angel & A. on Cor., sec. 600, and post; Wright v. Petrie, 1 Smedes & M., 319; Nevitt v. Bk. Port Gibson, 6 Id.; Nathan v. Whitelock, 3 Edw. C. R., 215; 4 Amer. Law Mag, 93.

The earliest authority upon the point under consideration is Dr. Salmon v. The Hamborough Company, decided in 1670, 1 Cases in Chancery, 204; 6 Viner's Abridg., 310-11. The bill in that case alleged that Salmon held a bond of the company of 1800 pounds, given to him for lent money. The company was incorporated, and had power to assess rates upon cloths, in which it dealt. "and by poll on every member, to defray the charges of the company." The company had imposed rates accordingly, to wit: "4*s.* 6*d.* upon every white cloth exported, and divers others, and thereby raised eight thousand pounds per annum," &c.

"And the bill did charge, that the company, having no common stock, the plaintiff had no remedy at law for his debt, but did charge that their usage had been to make taxes, and levy actions upon the members and their goods, to bear the charge of their company to pay their debts, and did complain that they now did refuse to execute that power, and did particularly complain against divers of the members by name, that they did refuse to meet and lay taxes, and that they did pretend want of power by their charter to lay such taxes; whereas, they had formerly exercised power, and thereby gained credit; whereupon, the plaintiff lent them two thousand pounds which was for the use and support of the company's charge, and so ought to be made good by them, and so prayed to be relieved."

The company, though served with a process, failed to appear. "But divers particular members being served in their natural capacities, did appear and demur for that they were not in that capacity liable to the plaintiff's demand." The Lord Chancellor sustained the demurrer and as to them dismissed the bill. The case was taken by appeal to the House of Lords. There the decree of the Chancellor was reversed and the case was remanded to his court with directions to cause the officers of the company "to make such leviation upon every member of said company who is contributory to the public charge, as shall be sufficient to satisfy the said sum to be decreed to the plaintiff in this cause, and to collect and levy the same, and to pay it over to the plaintiff as the court shall direct." Ample provision was made in the decree for the enforcement of this order. See, also, Curson v. The African Co., decided in 1682, 1 Vernon, 124.

By the deed of assignment, all the property and effects of every kind which belonged to the company when the petition to have it declared a bankrupt was filed, passed to the assignee. Rev. Stat. U. S., sec. 5,044; Bump on Bankruptcy, 473, 478. He was clothed with the power and duty to sue whenever suit was necessary. The statute in terms gave him the same right in any litigation he might institute which the bankrupt would have had "if the decree in bankruptcy had not been rendered and no assignment had been made." Idem, sec. 5,047; Bump on Bank., 528. The liability of the plaintiff in error, and the right and title of the company were legal in their character. If the company had sued it might have sued at law. The rights of the company passed to the assignee and he also could enforce them by a legal remedy. The assignee was subrogated to all the rights, legal and equitable, of the bankrupt corporation. This suit was, therefore, well brought in the form adopted. Hall v. U. S. Ins. Co., 5 Gill, 484.

The assignee might have filed a bill in equity against all the delinquent shareholders jointly. Oglevie et al. v. Knox Ins. Co. et al., 22 How., 380. But if the company is utterly insolvent, in any event, a separate action at law in each case is much to be preferred. It is cheaper, more speedy, and more effectual. If the contingency should occur that the assets realized exceed the liabilities to be met, the district and circuit courts will see that no wrong is done to those adversely concerned. It is not to be doubted that this power will be exercised upon all proper occasions.

Upon the trial a large mass of testimony was given by the plaintiff, consisting of a prospectus and the original charter of the company, certified copies of the papers in the office of the secretary of the State touching the amendment to the charter, the deed of the register to the assignee, the petition of the assignee and order of the district court relative to further stock payments, and proof of the publication of the order and of the sending of a copy of the order, with a demand of payment, to the defendant by mail. The admission of all this evidence was excepted to. Further testimony was given tending to prove that the defendant bought and received from the company two stock certificates of $5,000 each, dated March 10, 1870, in the usual form, and in all respects complete, except that there was a blank for the name of the owner, which was not filled up.

And further: "That said defendant paid for said stock twenty per cent. of the par value of the same, paying part of said twenty per cent. in northwestern land scrip, and giving her notes for the balance of said twenty per cent., which notes were duly paid to said company, and that said stock stood in her name upon the books of said company, and that there was evidence introduced tending to show that she received a dividend from said company thereon.

"And that shortly after the fire of October 9, 1871, General Stewart, the president of the company and brother of defendant, paid for her a call of twenty per cent. made upon said certificates of stock by the company, but that said defendant never authorized such payment, but repudiated the same, and that no more than forty per cent. had ever been paid on said stock.

"No evidence was introduced tending to show that said defendant ever subscribed for said certificates of stock or for any stock of said company, or that her name appeared on any list of stockholders of said stock circulated by said company.

"No other express contract was shown to have been made between said company and defendant."

The court charged the jury, in effect, that if they believed the testimony, the defendant was liable. The charge was excepted to by the defendant. It was clearly correct. The only question was whether she owned the stock. No one else claimed it. The certificates were issued and delivered to her. They belonged to her. They were the muniment of her title. She could have filled the blanks with her name whenever she thought proper. She had paid to the company all that was then payable, and subsequently received a dividend. Her name was placed upon the stock list. These facts were conclusive against her. She was estopped from denying her ownership. She could not assert her title if there were a profit, and deny it if there were a loss. The certificates showed the par of the stock and the amount to be paid. Upon receiving them the law implied an agreement on her part to respond to the balance whenever called upon in any lawful way to do so. UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT.

No. 571.—OCTOBER TERM, 1875.

THE UNITED STATES, appellant. v. THE UNION PACIFIC RAILROAD COMPANY.

Appeal from the Court of Claims.

THE ACTS OF CONGRESS RELATING TO THE CONSTRUCTION OF THE UNION PACIFIC RAILROAD AND THE PAYMENT OF THE INTEREST AND PRINCIPAL ON ITS BONDS CONSTRUED, AND ITS RELATIONS TO THE GOVERNMENT STATED.

Mr. Justice DAVIS delivered the opinion of the Court.

The Union Pacific Railroad Company, conceding the right of the government to retain one-half of the compensation due it for the transportation of the mails, military and Indian supplies, and apply the same to reimburse the government for interest paid by it on bonds issued to the corporation to aid in the construction of its railroad and telegraph lines, seeks to establish by this suit its right to the other moiety. The United States, on the other hand, having paid interest on these bonds in excess of the sums credited to the company for services rendered by it, insists upon its right to withhold payment altogether. One of the grounds on which this right of retention is sought to be maintained is by reason of the general right of set-off. It is true this right, as a general proposition, exists in the government, and is commonly exercised by it when settling with those having claims against it. But, manifestly, the rules applicable to ordinary claimants for services rendered the United States, do not apply to this controversy. The bonds in question were issued by the United States, in pursuance of a scheme to aid in the construction of a great national highway; in themselves they do not import any obligation on the part of the corporation to pay, and whether, when the United States have paid interest on them an obligation arises on the part of the corporation to refund it, depends wholly on the conditions on which the bonds were delivered to the corporation and received by it. These conditions are embodied in the legislation of Congress on the subject; and if, on a fair interpretation of this legislation, the corporation is found to be now a debtor to the United States, the deduction for interest paid on the bonds can be lawfully made. But if the converse of this proposition is ascertained to be trne, the government cannot rightfully withhold from the corporation one-half of its earnings.

In construing an act of Congress we are not at liberty to recur to the views of individual members in debate, nor to consider the motives which influenced them to vote for or against its passage. The act itself speaks the will of Congress, and this is to be ascertained from the language used. But courts may with propriety, in construiug a statute, recur to the history of the times when it was passed, and this is frequently necessary, in order to ascertain the reason as well as the meaning of particular provisions in it. (Aldridge v. Williams, 3 Howard, p. 24; Preston v. Browder, 1 Wheaton, 120.)

Many of the provisions in the original act of 1862 are outside of the usual course of legislative action concerning grants to railroads, and cannot be properly construed without reference to the circumstances which surrounded Congress when the act was passed. The war of the rebellion was in progress, and the country had become alarmed for the safety of the Pacific States, owing to complications with England. In case these complications resulted in an open rupture, the loss of our Pacific possessions was feared, but, even if this fear were groundless, it was quite apparent that we were unable to furuish that degree of protection to the people occupying them which every government owes its citizens. It is true the threatened danger was happily averted, but wisdom pointed out the necessity of making suitable provision for the future. This could be done in no better way than by the construction of a railroad across the continent. Such a road would bind together the widely separated parts of our common country, and furnish a cheap and expeditious mode for the transportation of troops and supplies. And if it did nothing more than afford the required protection to the Pacific States, it was felt that the government, in the execution of a plain duty, could not justly withhold the aid necessary to build it. And so strong and pervading was this opinion that it is by no means certain the people would not have sanctioned the action of Congress, if it had departed from the traditional policy of the country regarding works of internal improvements, and charged the government itself with the direct execution of the entreprise.

This enterprise was viewed as a national undertaking for national purposes, and the public mind was directed to the end to be accomplished rather than the particular means employed for the purpose. Although this road was a military necessity, there were other reasons active at the time in producing an opinion for its completion besides the protection of an exposed frontier. There was a vast, unpeopled territory lying between the Missouri and Sacramento rivers which was practically worthless without the facilities afforded by a railroad for the transportation of person and property. With its construction the agricultural and mineral resources of this territory could be developed; settlements made where settlements were possible, and thereby the wealth and power of the United States essentially increased. And there was also the pressing want, in times of peace even, of an improved and cheaper method for the transportation of the mails and supplies for the army and the Indians.

It was in the presence of these facts that Congress undertook to deal with the subject of this railroad. The difficulties in the way of building it were great, and, by many intelligent persons, considered insurmountable.

Although a free people, when resolved upon a course of action, can accomplish great results, the scheme for building a railroad 2,000 miles in length, over deserts, across mountains, and through a country inhabited by Indians jealous of intrusion upon their rights, was universally esteemed at the time to be a bold and hazardous undertaking. It is nothing to the purpose that the difficulties in the way of the undertaking, after trial, in a great measure disappeared, and that the road was constructed at less cost of time and money than was considered possible. No argument can be drawn from the wisdom that comes after the fact. Congress acted with reference to a state of things supposed to exist at the time, and no aid can be derived, in the interpretation of its legislation, from the consideration that the theory on which it proceeded turned out not to be correct. The project of building the road was not conceived for private ends, and the prevalent opinion was that it could not be worked out by private capital alone. It was a national work, originating in national necessities, and requiring national assistance.

The policy of the country, to say nothing of the supposed want of power, stood in the way of the United States taking the work into its own hands. Even if this were not so, reasons of economy suggested that it were better to enlist private capital and individual enterprise in the project. This Congress undertook to do, and the inducements held out were such as it was believed would procure the requisite capital and enterprise. But the purpose in presenting these inducements was to promote the construction and operation of a work deemed essential to the security of great public interests.

It is true the scheme contemplated profit to individuals, for without reasonable expectation of this capital could not be obtained, nor the requisite skill and enterprise; but this consideration does not in itself change the relation of the parties to this suit. This might have been so if the government had incorporated a company to advance private interests, and agreed to aid it on account of supposed incidental advantages which would accrue to the public from the completion of the enterprise. But the government proceeded on a wholly different theory. It promoted the enterprise to advance its own interests, and endeavored to enlist private capital and individual enterprise as a means to an end—the securing a road which could be used for governmental purposes. Whatever obligations, therefore, rest on the company incorporated to accomplish this purpose, must depend on the true meaning of the enactment itself, viewed in the light of cotemporaneous history.

It has been observed by this court that the title of an act, especially in congressional legislation, furnishes little aid in the construction of it, because the body of the act, in so many cases, has no reference to the matter specified in the title. (Hadden v. The Collector, 5 Wallace, page 110). This is true, and we have no disposition to depart from this rule, but the title, even, of the original act of 1862, incorporating the defendant (12 Stats., p 489), seems to have been the subject of special consideration by Congress, for it truly discloses the general purpose Congress had in view in passing it. It is "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad from the Missouri river to the Pacific ocean, and to secure to the government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes." That there should, however, be no doubt of the national character of the work which Congress proposed to aid, the body of the act contains these words: "And the better to accomplish the object of this act, namely, to promote the public interest and welfare by the construction of said railroad and telegraph lines, and keeping the same in working order, and to secure to the government at all times (but particularly in time of war) the use and benefits of the same for postal, military, and other purposes, Congress may at any time, having due regard for the rights of said companies named therein, add to, alter, amend, or repeal this act." (See 18th section of charter, 12 Statutes at Large, p. 497). Indeed, the whole act contains unmistakable evidence that if Congress was put to the necessity of accomplishing a great public enterprise through the instrumentality of private corporations, it took care that there should be no misunderstanding about the objects to be accomplished or the motives which influenced its course of action.

If it had been equally explicit in the provision regarding the bonds to be issued in aid of the road, there would have been no occasion for this suit. But even in this particular, looking to the motives which led to the act, and the objects intended to be effected by it, we do not think there is any serious difficulty to get at the true meaning of Congress. The act itself was an experiment and must be considered in the nature of a proposal to enterprising men to engage in the work, for there was no certainty that capital, with the untried obstacles in the way, could be enlisted. If enlisted at all, it could only be on conditions which would insure, in case of success, remuneration proportionate to the risk incurred.

The proffered aid was in lands and interest-bearing bonds of the United States. There is no controversy about the terms on which the lands were granted, and the only point with which we have to deal relates to the nature and extent of the obligation imposed by Congress on the company to pay these bonds. It is not doubted that the government was to be reimbursed, both principal and interest, but the precise question for decision is, whether the company was required to pay the interest before the maturity of the principal.

The solution of this question depends upon the meaning of the 5th and 6th sections of the original act of 1862, and the fifth section of the amendatory act of 1864. (12 Statutes at Large, 492; 13 Statutes at Large, 359). The fifth section of the original act contains the undertaking of the government, and the sixth defines the obligation of the company. By the fifth it is provided that on the completion of the road, in sections of forty miles, there shall be issued and delivered to the company a certain number of interest-bearing bonds of the United States, payable thirty years after date, with interest payable semi-annually. And "to secure the re-payment to the United States, as 'hereinafter provided,' of the amount of said bonds, together with all interest thereon which shall have been paid by the United States," it was further provided that the issue and delivery of the bonds should constitute a first mortgage on the property of the company, with a right reserved to the government to declare a forfeiture and take possession of the road and telegraph line in case "of the refusal or failure of the company to redeem said bonds, or any part of them, when requested to do so by the secretary of the treasury, in accordance with the provisions of the act." The manifest purpose of this section is to take a lien on the property of the corporation for the ultimate redemption of the bonds, principal and interest, but the manner of redemption and time of it are left for further provision.

That the government was expected, in the first instance, to pay the interest, is clear enough, for the mortgage was taken to secure the re-payment of the bonds, "together with all interest thereon which shall have been paid by the United States." This phrase implies a prior payment by the United States, whatever may be the duty of the corporation in regard to reimbursement, as subsequently defined. Besides this, when re-payment is spoken of, it is understood that something has been advanced which is to be paid back. Apart from this, had it been the intention that the corporation itself should pay the interest as it fell due, phraseology appropriate to such a purpose would have been used. But when and how the reimbursement was to be made was declared to be "as hereinafter provided"—that is, in conformity with the terms prescribed in another portion of the act. And that this is so, is evident enough from the latter part of the section, which directs the secretary of treasury to enforce the forfeiture and take possession of the road on failure of the corporation to redeem said bonds or any part of them (referring to the different periods of their issue), according to the plan of redemption thus provided, or, in other words, "in accordance with the provisions of this act." The obligations imposed on the corporation, or assumed by them, in relation to the re-payment of the bonds, are set forth entire in the next or sixth section, which, on account of its importance, is set forth at length.

"SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the grants aforesaid are made upon condition that said company shall pay said bonds at maturity, and shall keep said railroad and telegraph line in repair and use, and shall at all times transmit dispatches over said telegraph line, and transport mails, troops, and munitions of war, supplies and public stores, upon said railroad for the government, whenever required to do so by any department thereof; and that the government shall at all times have the preference in the use of the same for all the purposes aforesaid (at fair and reasonable rates of compensation, not to exceed the amounts paid by private parties for the same kind of service); and all compensations for services rendered for the government shall be applied to the payment of said bonds and interest, until the whole amount is fully paid. Said company may also pay the United States, wholly or in part, in the same or other bonds, treasury notes, or other evidences of debt against the United States, to be allowed at par, and after said road is completed, until said bonds and interest are paid, at least five per centum of the net earnings of said road shall also be annually applied to the payment thereof."

Leaving out of consideration the parts of this section not pertinent to the present inquiry, there are three things, and three only, which the corporation is required to do concerning the bonds in controversy. 1st. To pay said bonds at maturity. 2d. To allow the government to retain the compensation due the corporation for services rendered, and apply the same to the payment of the bonds and interest, until the whole amount is fully paid. 3d. To pay over to the government, after the road shall have been fully completed, five per cent. of the net earnings of the road, to be appropriated to the payment of the bonds and interest.

If we take the language used in its natural and obvious sense, there can be no difficulty in arriving at the meaning of the condition "to pay said bonds at maturity," which was imposed upon this corporation. As commonly understood, the word "maturity," in its application to bonds and other similar instruments, refers to the time fixed for their payment, which is the termination of the period they have to run. The bonds in question were bonds of the United States promising to pay to the bolder of them one thousand dollars thirty years after date, and the interest every six months. This obligation the government was required to perform, and as the bonds were issued and delivered to the corporation to be sold for the purpose of raising money to construct its road, it is insisted that Congress must have meant to impose a corresponding obligation on the corporation. In support of this construction it is sought to give to the word "maturity" a double signification, applying it to each payment of interest as it falls due as well as to the principal. But this is extending the operation of words by a forced construction beyond their natural and ordinary meaning, which is contrary to all legal rules. Courts cannot supply omissions in legislation, nor afford relief because they are supposed to exist. "We are bound," said Justice Buller, in an early case in the King's Bench, "to take the act of Parliament as they have made it; a casus omissus can in no case be supplied by a court of law, for that would be to make laws; nor can I conceive that it is our province to consider whether such a law that has been passed be tyrannical or not." (Jones v. Smart, 1 Term Reports, 44-52.)

Lord Chief Baron Eyre, in the case of Gibson v. Minet (1 H. Bl., 569-614), said: "I venture to lay it down as a general rule respecting the interpretation of deeds, that all latitude of construction must submit to this restriction, namely, that the words may bear the sense which by construction is put upon them. If we step beyond this line we no longer construe men's deeds, but make deeds for them." This rule is as applicable to the language of a statute as to the language of a deed. The words "to pay said bonds at maturity," do not bear the sense which is sought to be attributed to them. They imply, obviously, an obligation to pay both principal and interest when the time fixed for the payment of the principal has passed; but they do not imply an obligation to pay the interest as it accrues and the principal when due. It is one thing to be required to pay principal and interest when the bonds have reached maturity, and a wholly different thing to be required to pay the interest every six months and the principal at the end of thirty years. The obligations are so different that they can not both grow out of the direct words employed, and it is necessary to superadd other words in order to extend the condition so as to include the payment of semi-annual interest as it falls due. Neither on principle or authority is such a plain departure from the express letter of the statute warranted. And especially is this so when the construction leads to so great an extension of a condition to defeat a grant.

The failure to perform the condition is cause of forfeiture. If the natural meaning of the words be adopted as the true meaning there can be no forfeiture until the bonds themselves have matured. On the contrary, if the construction contended for be allowed, the grants made to the corporation are subject to forfeiture on each occasion that six months' interest falls due and is not met. It would require a pretty large inference to draw from the language used authority to enlarge in a particular so essential the terms of a condition assumed by the corporation when it assented to the act. Besides this, when Congress imposed this condition it well knew that the undertaking of the Government bound it to pay to the holder of any bond, interest every six months and the principal at the time the bond matured. With this knowledge, dealing as it did with the relations the company were to bear to the Government on the receipt of these bonds, had it intended to exact of the company the payment of interest before the maturity of the bonds, it would have declared its purpose in language about which there could be no misunderstanding. But, if the words "to pay said bonds at maturity" do not give notice that this exaction was intended, neither do the other provisions of the sixth section. They created no obligation to keep down the interest, nor were they so intended. The proposition to retain the amount due the company for services rendered, and apply it towards the general indebtedness of the company to the Government, can not be construed into a requirement that the company shall pay the interest from time to time, and the principal when due. It was in the discretion of Congress to make this requirement, and then, as collateral to it, provide a special fund or funds out of which the principal obligation could be discharged. This Congress did not choose to do, but rested satisfied with the entire property of the company as security for the ultimate payment of the principal and interest of the bonds delivered to it, and, in the mean time, with special provisions looking to the reimbursement of the Government for interest paid by it, and the application of the surplus, if any remained, to discharge the principal. The company, for obvious reasons, might be very willing to accept the bonds of the Government on these terms, and very unwilling to come under an absolute promise to pay the current interest as it accrued. If it were in a condition, either during the progress of the work or on its completion, to earn anything, there was no hardship in the proposed application of the compensation due it, but, it can be readily seen, if the company were required to raise money every six months to pay interest, when all its available means were necessary to the prosecution of the work, the burden might be very heavy. Congress did not see fit to impose this burden, and place the company in a position to risk the forfeiture of all its grants, in case of failure to provide the means to pay current interest. Besides, it is fair to infer that Congress supposed that the services to be rendered by the road to the Government would equal the interest to be paid, and that this was not an unreasonable expectation, the published statistics of the vast cost of transporting military and naval stores and the mails to the Pacific coast, by the ancient methods, abundantly show.

The views presented regarding the provision—that the Government shall retain the compensation for services rendered by the company, either before or after the road is completed, are equally applicable to the provision, that after the road is completed, five per cent. of the net earnings of the road shall be annually applied to the payment of bonds and interest. It is not perceived how, on any principle of construction, an obligation of the corporation to pay the interest on the bonds every six months after they shall have been issued can be predicated on the terms of this provision, any more than on the terms of the other. Both are reserved funds, out of which the Government was to be reimbursed in the first instance the interest it had paid, leaving the surplus, if any, to be applied to the payment of the principal of the bonds.

In addition to all that has been said, there is enough in the scheme of the act, and the purposes contemplated by it, to show that Congress never intended to impose on the corporation the obligation to pay current interest. The act was passed in the midst of war, as has been stated, when the means for national defense were deemed inadequate to the wants of the country, and the public mind was alive to the necessity of uniting by iron bands the destiny of the Pacific States with those of the Atlantic. Confessedly the undertaking was outside of the ability of private capital to accomplish, and only by the helping hand of Congress could the problem, difficult of solution under the most favorable circumstances, be worked out. Local business, as a source of profit, could not be expected while the road was in course of construction, on account of the character of the country it traversed; and whether when completed, as an investment it would prove valuable, was a question for time to determine. But vast as the work was, limited as were the private resources to build it, the growing wants of the country, as well as the existing and future military necessities of the Government, demanded that it be completed. Under the stimulus of these considerations Congress acted. It did not act for the benefit of private persons, nor in their interest, but for an object deemed essential to the security of the country, as well as to the prosperity of the country.

Compelled as it was to incorporate a private company to accomplish its object, it proffered the terms on which it would lend its aid, which, if deemed too liberal now, were then considered, with the lights before it, not more than sufficient to engage the attention of enterprising men, who, if not themselves capitalists, were in a position to command the use of capital. These terms looked to ultimate security, rather than immediate reimbursement. And for the obvious reason that the corporation would require all its available means in construction; and to exact from it, while the work was in progress, the obligation to keep down the interest on the bonds of the United States, would tend to cripple the enterprise at a time when the primary object with Congress was to advance it. There could, however, be no reasonable objection to the application "of all compensations for services rendered for the government" from the outset, and "five per cent. of the net earnings after the completion of the road" to the payment of the bonds and interest, and these exactions were accordingly made.

Of necessity there were risks to be taken in aiding with money or bonds an enterprise unparalleled in the history of any free people, which, if completed at all, would require, as was supposed, twelve years in which to do it. But these risks were common to both parties, and Congress was obliged to assume its share and advance the bonds or abandon the enterprise, for obviously the grant of lands, however valuable after the road was built, could not be available as a resource with which to build it.

If the road were a success, in addition to the benefit it would be to the United States, the corporation would be in a situation to repay advances for interest, and pay the principal when due. If, on the contrary, the investment proved to be a failure, subjecting the private persons who embarked their capital in it to a total loss, there was left for the government the entire property of the corporation, of which immediate possession could be taken on a declaration of forfeiture.

In view of the circumstances under which the act of 1862 was passed, and the purposes to be accomplished by it, appearing as they do in the title as well as the body of the act, and constituting as they do the public history of this legislation, this brief summary presents, as we think, fairly its scope and effect, which are inconsistent with the position asserted by the appellant.

Notwithstanding the favorable terms proposed by Congress the road languished, and the effect of this was the amendatory act of 1864. By this the grant of lands was doubled; a second in lieu of a first mortgage accepted by the government, and a provision inserted that "only one-half of the compensation for services rendered for the government by said companies (meaning this and the auxiliary companies incorporated at the same time) shall be required to be applied to the payment of the bonds issued by the government in aid of the construction of said road."

This amendment was, without doubt, intended merely to modify the provision in the original act so as to allow the government to retain only one-half of the compensation for services rendered, instead of all. Although the requirement in this provision is that the compensation shall be applied to "the payment of the bonds," and in the former "to pay the bonds and interest," yet it cannot be supposed Congress intended to relinquish the right secured in the former act to make the application in the first place to the interest and then to the principal. The purpose of Congress could have been nothing more than to surrender on behalf of the government the right to retain the whole of the companies' earnings and to accept in lieu of it the right to retain the half, leaving unaffected by this change any right touching this subject secured in the former act. The change was a very material one, and intended, doubtless, as a substantial favor to the companies, but on the principle contended for it would prove, instead of this, to be of no value. Of what possible advantage could it be to these companies to receive payment for one-half their earnings, if they were subject to a suit to recover it back as soon as it was paid? And this is the effect of the provision on the theory that the companies are debtors to the government on every semi-annual payment of interest. They could not, in the nature of things, have accepted the stipulation with an understanding that any such effect would be given it. If the government consents to the diminution of its security, so that only half of the prices due for sevices are to be applied to the payment of the interest or principal, what is to become of the other half? Surely there is no implication that the government shall retain it, and, if not, who is to get it? Manifestly the companies who have earned the money.

It is very clear that the Congress of 1864 did not suppose, in making this concession, that it would be barren of results, but as the rights of the parties have been settled by the construction given to the original provision on this subject, it is unnecessary to pursue the subject further.

The practice of the government, for a series of years, was in conformity with the views we have taken of the effect of the charter, until the Secretary of the Treasury arrested the payment of the money earned by the companies for services rendered the government, and directed that it be withheld. This action of the secretary brought the subject to the attention of Congress, and the act of March 3, 1871, (16 Stats. at Large, p. 525, section 9,) was passed, directing that one half of the money due the Pacific Railroad Companies for services rendered, either "heretofore or hereafter," be paid them, leaving open the question of ultimate right for legal decision.

After this, another act was passed on this subject, by virtue of which this suit was instituted by the appellee in the Court of Claims. (Act of March 3, 1873, section 2, 17 Statutes at Large, p. 508.) It is contended that the purpose of this act is to repeal that portion of the charter of the Union Pacific Company containing the provisions we have discussed. But, manifestly, the purpose was very different. It is true, the act directs the Secretary of the Treasury to withhold all payments to the Pacific Companies on account of freights and transportation, but at the same time it authorizes any company thus affected to bring suit in the Court of Claims for "such freight and transportation," and in such suit "the right of such company to recover the same upon the law and the facts shall be determined, and also the rights of the United States upon the merits of all the points presented by it in answer thereto by them." This means nothing more nor less than the remission to the judicial tribunals of the country of the question whether this company, and others similarly situated, had the right to recover from the government one-half of what it earned by transportation, which question was to be determined upon its merits.

The merits of such a question are determined when the effect of the charter is determined. It is hardly necessary to say that it would have been idle to authorize a suit to be brought if it were the intention to repeal the provision on which the suit could alone be predicated.

We cannot go into an argument on the consequences which follow our decision. Consequences are not an element to e considered in the determination of the question whether an act of incorporation is less beneficial to the government than it supposed. And whether an act of Congress be more or less politic and wise it is not our province to determine. When we have declared the meaning of it, if there be power to pass it, our duty in connection with it is ended.

The judgment of the Court of Claims is affirmed.

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

OPINION FILED OCT. 12, 1875.

FRANCIS BUTLER v. S. P. WALKER.

Appeal from Superior Court of Cook Co.

INSURANCE COMPANY UNDER SPECIAL CHARTER—EFFECT OF GENERAL LAW ON CHARTER—LIABILITY OF STOCKHOLDER FOR LOSS BY FIRE TO POLICY-HOLDER WHEN ALL THE STOCK IS NOT PAID—THE LIABILITY OF THE STOCKHOLDERS OF THE BANKRUPT EQUITABLE INSURANCE COMPANY.

1. The Equitable Insurance Company was chartered in 1861. The 14th section defined the liability of its stockholders, and the 16th provides that the act may "at any time be altered, amended, or repealed." Held, that the 16th section of the general law regulating insurance companies passed in 1869, which provides that "the trustees and corporators of any company organized under this act shall be severally liable for all debts or responsibilities of such company to the amount by him or them subscribed until the whole amount of capital of such company shall have been paid in, and a certificate thereof recorded as hereinbefore provided," works as an amendment to the charter of the Equitable Insurance Company.

2. LIABILITY OF STOCKHOLDER.—In this case the appellant insured in the company had the property destroyed by fire, brought suit against the appellee, who was a stockholder, after having pursued the company into bankruptcy, the whole amount of the stock not having been paid in and a certificate thereof recorded. Held, that she could recover of such stockholder her loss to the amount of his stock.

3. CAPITAL STOCK MUST BE PAID IN FULL.—The full amount of the capital stock should be paid in. If it is not, the law holds the several stockholders liable to the amount of their subscriptions for the debts of the company; it is, therefore, made the interest of each shareholder to see that the entire capital is paid in.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

Opinion by WALKER, J.

Appellee brought an action in the court below, against appellant, to recover the amount of loss she claims to have sustained from fire, under a policy of insurance.

To the declaration a demurrer was filed which was sustained by the court, and a judgment was rendered in bar of the action.

The General Assembly, by a special charter, on the 20th day of February, 1861, incorporated the Equitable Insurance Company. The charter confers the powers usual to such organizations. The fourteeth section of the charter contains this provision: "In case of any loss or losses, whereby the capital stock of said company becomes lessened before all the installments are paid in, each proprietor or stockholder shall be held accountable for the installments that may remain unpaid on his share or shares, at the time of such loss or losses taking place. Provided that the stockholders shall not be individually liable beyond the amount of stock held by them respectively.

The sixteenth section declares that the act shall take immediate effect, and continue in force for fifty years, but contains this reservation: "But may at any time be altered, amended, or repealed by the legislature of the State of Illinois."

The company organized, its capital stock being duly subscribed and a portion thereof paid by the stockholders. No change was made in the charter unless by the general act of incorporating and regulating insurance companies, which was adopted on the 11th day of March, 1869. The sixteenth section of this act provides that "the trustees and corporators of any company organized under this act, shall be severally liable for all debts or responsibilities of such company to the amount by him or them subscribed, until the whole amount of the capital of such company shall have been paid in and a certificate thereof recorded as hereinbefore provided" In this case the whole amount of stock was not paid in and a certificate thereof recorded.

The nineteenth section provided that "all insurance companies heretofore organized in the State of Illinois, and now doing business in this State, are hereby brought under all the provisions of this act, except that their capital may continue of the amounts and character named in and authorized by their respective charters, during the existing term of such charters, and the investment of the capital and assets of such companies may remain the same as prescribed by their charters, anything in this act to the contrary notwithstanding; and such companies shall be entitled to all the privileges and powers granted them by their charters." (Sess. Laws 1869, p. 217).

These are believed to be all the enactments which bear on the questions presented by this record.

About one and a half years after the adoption of this act the insurance company issued to appellant a policy of insurance on her property to the amount of $2,500, and whilst the policy was in force the property was destroyed by the fire in Chicago of the 9th of October, 1871. By reason of heavy losses, the company was prosecuted to bankruptcy. Appellant gave proper notice of her loss, proved her claim, but received nothing from the bankrupt estate. Appellee was a stockholder when the policy was issued, at the time of the fire, and until the company was declared a bankrupt, and owned two thousand five hundred dollars of the stock of the company. To render him liable as a stockholder, to the extent of her loss under the policy, she brought this suit. The declaration discloses the facts we have stated, and to it a demurrer was interposed, and sustained by the court, and a judgment in bar of the action and for costs was rendered. The case is brought to this court, and the judgment sustaining the demurrer is assigned for error.

It is agreed that but two questions arise in this record. First. Had the General Assembly the power, under the reservation in the charter, to alter, amend or repeal their charter or power to impose duties and liabilities not imposed, but from which they were exempted by the charter. And if there were such power, did the General Assembly exercise it in enacting the general insurance law?

Had the General Assembly the power to impose this liability upon the stockholders? We think they unquestionably had, by virtue of the reservation of the power to alter, amend or repeal the charter.

The question as to whether the General Assembly may alter or amend a charter which does not contain such a reservation of power, is not presented by this record, as the reservation is clear, distinct and unambiguous, and was assented to when the charter was accepted and the company organized. Hence, that question need not now be discussed.

But in a case like the present, when the general assembly in express terms reserves the right to alter, amend or repeal, that enters into and forms a part of the contract precisely as does any other provision of the charter. Any reasonable construction which can be placed on this reservation, must hold that the company entrusted the General Assembly with any and all powers in reference to the rights, duties and liability of the body and its members which they may deem proper to impose.

They, in receiving such a charter, trusted to the wisdom and justice of the General Assembly in their future action. The reservation is explicit and is ample in its terms, and we are at a loss to see how it can be questioned. If so plain a proposition required the citation of authorities to sustain it, many adjudged cases could be referred to directly in point.

The authorities referred to by appellee do not apply to this question. They are decisions growing out of amendments to charters imposing duties or restrictions on such bodies when the power was not reserved by the Constitution or in the charter itself, or where such a power was reserved, and the body had, under their charter, paid for property or privileges to others, of which the General Assembly subsequently attempted to deprive them by enactment. But we have not in our researches found any case which holds that when such power has been reserved that it may not be exercised constitutionally. Neither the fundamental law or public policy forbids the General Assembly and a corporation from making a contract that the former may alter, amend or repeal their charter at pleasure, or from its exercise, as was done in this case. The nineteenth section of the general insurance act is broad and comprehensive. It brings all insurance companies in plain and unmistakable terms under all of the provisions of the act with the enumerated exceptions. And the liabilities imposed by the sixteenth section constitute one of the provisions of the act. And the General Assembly having reserved the power without any limit to alter, amend or repeal the original charter of the company, they, it seems to us, intended to impose these liabilities on the shareholders of the Equitable Insurance Company. It was a company, theretofore organized in this State, and was then doing business in the State, and was manifestly brought under these and all other provisions of that law as fully as had the act in terms named this company.

When such a charter is obtained, the stock subscribed and the company organized, it procures business, and individuals receive policies on the faith that the entire stock so subscribed has been or will be paid in and held as a fund to meet all losses. It is this assurance that gives such a company credit in the community, and the general insurance law is designed to secure the policy-holders against loss from the insolvency of such companies.

Thus should be paid in the full amount of the capital subscribed, and if not, then the law holds the several stockholders liable, to the amount of their subscriptions, for the debts of the company. It is, therefore, made the interest of each shareholder to see that the entire capital is paid in, and a certificate of the fact made and recorded, as required by the law. And a failure to have that done, renders the several stockholders liable for the debts of the company to an amount equal to the stock he holds. Nor is the requirement of the law answered by a portion of the shareholders paying the full amount subscribed by them. They remain liable until the stock is all paid in and the certificate of the fact is made and recorded. Hence it is a matter of no importance in considering this question, whether appellee has paid in full for all of the stock for which he subscribed.

All the stock had not been paid in full, a certificate of the fact had not been made and recorded, and hence appellee was liable for the amount of appellant's claim for the loss under her policy. It then follows, that as the charter was amended by the general insurance law, and as its requirements were not observed, and the loss sustained by appellant become a debt against the company, appellee's liability became fixed to the amount of his stock therein. And the claim of appellant not exceeding that amount, the declaration disclosed a right to recover, and the court below erred in sustaining the demurrer, and the judgment must be reversed and the cause remanded.

AGENCY.—CONSEQUENCES OF A RATIFICATION.

The same learned Judge could not see why the assent to a substituted mode of performing one of the terms of a contract need be in writing, though the contract must have been in writing, there being totally different things involved, "the proof of a substituted contract of the prove of a ratification or approval, after performance, of the substituted mode of performance." A careful examination of this case will show no undue relaxation of the principle requiring substantial proof of a ratification (vid. sup.) In the first place, the substituted mode of delivery was the usual one when the port was open; secondly, the defendant made no objection before the loss, nor for four months after receiving notice of the change; thirdly, during this period, the defendants sent several orders, and the goods were sent by the route on which the loss occured.

In Cheetham v. Mayor, &c., of Manchester (L. Rep. 10 C. P. 201), an attempt was made to maintain the existence of a qualified kind of ratification. A town clerk, acting on behalf of the coporation, directed the surveyor who had certified as required by 3 Vict. c. 36 sect. 38, that there was imminent danger from a building of which the plaintiff was the owner and occupier, to cause the buildings mentioned in his certificate to be taken down or repaired in such manner as he should think fit. By sect. 39 of the above Act the expenses so incurred may be recovered from the owner. Assuming that the acts of the officers were ratified, it was contended by the Solicitor-General that a ratification might suffice to protect the agent from liability, and yet not make his acts the acts of the corporation, that the ratification might be valid as against the defendants, and have no further effect. The argument fell to the ground. No case was cited in its support, nor, upon principle, can anything be urged in its favour. If a ratification means anything it means that the party ratifying has, by his act, become invested with the rights and duties of a principal in relation to third parties, and to the individual whose conduct is ratified. Wherever a ratification is proved there can be no doubt that this is the general effect.

As regards the consequences of a ratification in the case of the agent and third parties, the rule is that wherever an agent acts without authority he is personally liable (East India Company v. Hensley 1 Soy. 112; Polhill v. Walter, 3 B. & A. 113; Bowen v. Morris. 2 Taunt. 385.) As between the principal and agent the want of authority is entirely remedied by a subsequent ratification (sup.) But in considering how a ratification affects the relative rights of the agent whose conduct is ratified and third parties, a distinction must be made between contracts and torts, when the contract of an agent is duly ratified, his rights and liabilities arising from that contract are wholly transferred to the party ratifying, and the agent occupies a position identical with that of one invested with full authority to do the act ratified. He can neither sue in his own right nor be rendered personally liable (see cases cited above). When, on the other hand, an individual duly ratifies a tort committed by another on his behalf, the ratification has not the same wide effect. For whilst on the one hand it avails to shield the agent from any liability to the principal from the conduct so ratified, it does not take away his liability by third parties who have suffered a tort at his hands. This distinction applies universally, except in cases of ratification by the Crown: (Baron v. Denman 2 Ex. 67.)

In Stephens v. Elwall (4 M. & S. 256), decided in 1815, Lord Ellenborough applied the principle in an action of trover brought against an agent. Wherever an agent is so sued, it is no answer that he acted under authority from another who had himself no authority to dispose of the property. So where a servant or other agent has done some act amounting to a trespass in assertion of his master's right, he is liable, not only jointly with his master, but for every penny of the damage. nor can he recover contribution (ib. 261). It is well established that an agent is liable in trover for a conversion to which he is a party, though it be for the benefit of his principal: (Perkins v. Smith, 1 Wil. 328; Cranch v. White, 1 New. Ca. 414; Davies v. Vernon, 6 Q. B. 443; and Hilbery v. Hatton, 10 L. T. Rep. N. S. 39, per Martin, B.) The Crown may ratify the torts of its agents, and such a ratification has a novel effect upon the relative rights of the agents and third parties. If an individual ratifies an act done on his behalf, the nature of the act remains unchanged, it is still a mere trespass, and the party injured has his option to sue either; if the Crown ratifies an act, the character of the act becomes altered, for the ratification does not give the party injured the option of bringing his action against the agent who committed the trespass, or the principal who ratified it, but a remedy against the Crown only, if there is any remedy at all, and exempts from all liability the person who commits the trespass: (Per Parke, B. in Baron v. Denman, 2 Ex. 167.)—The London Law Times.

We call attention to the following opinions, reported at length in this issue:

Bankrupt Corporation — Power of Assignee to Collect Balance Unpaid on Stock.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States, by Swayne, J., holding, in the case of a bankrupt insurance company, that the District Court has power to order, and the assignee of such company power, under such order, to collect the balance unpaid upon the stock held by the several stockholders of such company. Senator Upton has been remarkably successful in his litigation with the stockholders of this bankrupt corporation. In 8 Chicago Legal News we published the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States in a case brought by him in the U. S. Circuit Court of Iowa against another stockholder of this same company, reversing the judgment of Judge Dillon in the court below in favor of the stockholder.

Acts Relating to the U. P. R. R. Co. Construed. — The opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States, by Davis, J., construing the acts of Congress relating to the construction of the Union Pacific Railroad, and the payment of the interest and principal on its bonds. This is the most important case decided by the Supreme Court at its present term.

Insurance—Special Charter—General Law—Liability of Stockholder.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of this State, by Walker, J., holding there being a clause in the charter of the bankrupt Equitable Insurance Company of this city, that its charter "may at any time be altered, amended or repealed;" that the provisions of the general law regulating insurance companies relating to the liability of stockholders operated as an amendment to its charter, and that a person holding a policy in such company and having suffered a loss, the whole amount of the capital stock of such company not having been paid in, and a certificate thereof recorded, might sue a stockholder and recover of him for the loss to the amount of his stock. Many suits have been brought within a few weeks agaiust stockholders upon the strength of this opinion. We had a policy in this company at the time of the great fire. Under this decision we may be able to find some stockholder from whom we may recover for our loss.

Contested Will—Old Age—Undue Influence—Mental Capacity—Evidence of Experts.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of this State, by Breese, J., in a contested will case, as to what constitutes undue influence, and when a testator will be regarded of sufficient mental capacity to make a will. We know of no case where the weight to be given to the evidence of physicians, when introduced as experts, is so thoroughly discussed as in this opinion. Judge Breese says: "These doctors were summoned by the contestants 'as experts,' for the purpose of invalidating a will deliberately made by a man quite as competent as either of them to do such an act. They were the contestant's witnesses, and so considered themselves—Dr. Bassett, especially, whose whole testimony is pregnant with such indications. The testimony of such is worth but little, and should always be received by juries and courts with great caution. It was said by a distinguished judge, in a case before him, if there was any kind of testimony, not only of no value, but even worse than that, it was, in his judgment, that of medical experts. They may be able to state the diagnosis of the disease more learnedly; but upon the question whether it had at a given time reached such a stage that the subject was incapable of making a contract, as irresponsible for his acts, the opinion of his neighbors, if men of good common sense, would be worth more than that of all the experts in the world. If we give heed to such testimony, and suffer it to prevail against the flood of proof in favor of the testator's competency, we should be doing great wrong and departing from the rules we have laid down in like cases, to which we will hereafter refer. It must be apparent to every one, but few wills could stand the test of the fanciful theories of dogmatic witnesses, who bring discredit on science and make the name of 'expert' a by-word and a reproach. We concur with the judge above referred to; we would not give the testimony of these common-sense witnesses, deposing to what they know and saw almost every day for years, for that of so-called experts, who always have some favorite theory to support, men often as presumptuous as they are ignorant of the principles of medical science."

We know nothing of the facts in this case except as we gather them from the opinion, but we fully indorse what Judge Breese says about medical experts. There is no testimony, even when honest, that is so uncertain, and so often false. We remember a case tried before Judge Bradwell and a jury in the county court of this county some years ago, which shows how easy it is for the best doctors to be mistaken. A man had, some years before, been committed to the insane asylum, at Jacksonville, and for some months had been at large, It was alleged that he was restored to reason. The Judge refused to order a jury to try the question until the party had been examined daily for two weeks by physicians, and their certificates obtained that he was restored to reason. Doctor Wickersham, a physician of skill and respectibility, after repeated examinations, gave a certificate that he was restored to reason. Dr. Orin Smith, an excellent man and skillful physicinn, now deceased, appeared before the jury and testified that he had made repeated examinations of the party; that he was not only restored to reason, but that there was not the first symptom of insanity about him. The jury retired and wrote out their verdict finding him restored to reason. But, before they returned into court, the party raved violently, and said that $500,000 in gold, which God had given him one night in a shanty, had been stolen from him. The jury were recalled and instructed not to announce their verdict. Additional evidence was introduced, showing the conduct of the party during the absence of the jury, and a verdict was rendered the same afternoon finding that the petitioner was not restored to reason. This case was afterwards brought before the Cook county medical society and created considerable excitement at the time. In making these remarks, we say nothing against the medical profession as a profession; but we do say that too much weight is given to the testimony of doctors when called as experts. Hundreds of persons are to-day unjustly confined in the public and private insane asylums of the United States upon the mistaken opinions of medical experts.

The Law of Taxation. By Francis Hilliard, author of "The Law of Torts," "The Law of Mortgages," etc. Boston: Little, Brown & Company. 1875.

The typographical execution of this work is excellent, and reflects great credit upon its publishers. Its subject, the Law of Taxation, is one of the greatest importance to the American people at this time, when they are burdened with excessive State and Federal taxation. We examined this work of Mr. Hilliard's hoping to find it a thorough treatise, worthy of the patronage of the profession, and one to which they could resort for light, when in doubt upon any question relating to taxation, or the weight to be given to any particular decision; but we regret to say it is not such a work. It is more of a digest than a treatise. It bears evidence, upon its face, of hasty preparation. Many important opinions upon questions of taxation, rendered within the last few years, are not noticed. There is the greatest contrast between this volume and Mr. Bishop's work on Married Women, also noticed in this issue. The one is bold and incisive, stating legal principles, construing decisions, and giving the present state of the law, with an accuracy and clearness seldom found in a text-book. The practitioner who resorts to it feels its strength and relies upon it with confidence. The other is weak, and thorough in nothing. The practitioner will consult its pages without getting that aid which he had reason to expect from a book written by such a distinguished author as Mr. Hilliard.

Commentaries on the Law of Married Women under the Statutes of the Several States, and at Common Law and in Equity. By Joel Prentiss Bishop. Vol. II. Boston: Little, Brown & Company, 1875.

The law of married women under the statutes of the several States, is one of the most difficult branches of the law to treat upon in a text book, owing to the fact that the main principles upon which these statutes are framed were unknown to the common law, and have been adopted by the States within the past thirty years. The statutes are not uniform and the decisions are conflicting. The profession are to be congratulated that this difficult task has been undertaken by Mr. Bishop, the Napoleon of American law writers. Mr. Bishop says, the principal scope of the present volume is to bring to view the recent legislation, with the interpretations of it given by the courts; and to show how it modifies the doctrines of the unwritten law, both those doctrines which were presented in the first volume and those which were reserved for this. Mr. Bishop has not chosen the easy way many authors would have selected of introducing the statutes one after another, and showing what the courts have held under each of them; but after stating in a series of chapters, some rules by which these statutes are interpreted, and the effect of some forms of statutory provision under the restraints of our written constitutions, and bringing to view the doctrines which determine the consequences of these statutes in things beyond their terms, with some special applications of those doctrines, he takes up the several topics more at large; he then gives in the briefest possible form the substance of the legislation of the several States, and the decisions of the courts construing the same. Mr. Bishop undertakes to tell us what the law is, and not what it ought to be, and he does so in a vigorous style, and with his usual accuracy. We have not been able to find any of the recent statutes or decisions that have escaped his notice. This volume will not only be useful to the profession, but it should be read by every intelligent husband and wife.

A Treatise on the Doctrine of Ultra Vires, being an investigation of the Principles which Limit the Capacities, Powers and Liabilities of Corporations, and more especially of Joint Stock Companies. By Seward Brice. M.-A., L.L.D., London, of the Inner Temple, Esq., Barrister at Law. With Notes and References to American Cases, by Ashbel Green, of the New York Bar. New York: Baker, Voorhis & Co., Publishers, 66 Nassau Street. 1875. Sold by E. B. Myers, Law Bookseller, Chicago.

We have upon a former occasion given a favorable opinion upon the merits of the original English edition of this work. The present edition is of much more value to the American lawyer than the English, as it embraces the most important of the American cases upon the subject treated. The notes to the American cases are by Mr. Green, and are so arranged as to be distinguishable from the original English notes of Mr. Brice. The publishers present the American edition in an acceptable style.

THE SUPREME COURT JUDGESHIP.

The last Sunday's issue of the Tribune of this city contained the following letter of Mr. Hurd relative to his candidacy for Supreme Judge:

To the Editor of The Chicago Tribune:

Chicago, Dec. 4.—In your article this morning in regard to "the Supreme Court election," you say that I had "peremptorily declined to withdraw in favor of Mr. Higgins," implying that a request to that effect had been made upon me. Such is not the case. I have never been asked to withdraw in favor of Mr. Higgins, either by himself or any other person. Nor has a desire to that effect ever been expressed to me by any one. On the contrary, I have been repeatedly and earnestly urged to be a condidate, and that in a number of instances by the same persons whose names are attached to Mr. Higgins' published call. I have frequently said that it could not be expected that either of us would stand aside for the other, and the only proper way of determining who should be the candidate of the Republican party was by a nomination by a convention, and I am still of the same opinion. For many other reasons it is my firm conviction that the Republicans should in some authoritative way put forward the candidate to fill the place made vacant by the resignation of Judge McAllister. I cannot think even fair minded Democrats will deny that it would be better that the Court should stand three Republican Judges to four Democratic in preference to five Democrats to two Republicans. Yours, etc.,

H. B. Hurd.

Justices' Fees in Criminal Cases.—Judge Jameson, in a case before him this week, very properly decided that a justice of the peace had no right to charge a person who swears out a warrant in a criminal case his fees in the case. The only wonder is that there should ever have been any question about the matter. Justices have been in the habit of charging these fees, although they knew it was illegal. Just as many justices are now charging a fee for ordering themselves to issue a summons in civil cases.

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

OPINION FILED NOV. 4, 1875.

REUBEN C. RUTHERFORD et al. v. MARY ANN MORRIS et al.

Appeal from Adams.

CONTESTED WILL—EFFECT OF PROBATE IN COUNTY COURT—EFFECT OF VERDICT OF JURY IN CIRCUIT COURT UPON ACTION OF CHANCELLOR—EVIDENCE AS TO CAPACITY CONSIDERED—WHAT CONSTITUTES CAPACITY—UNDUE INFLUENCE—ISSUE OUT OF CHANCERY—SENILE DEMENTIA—OLD AGE DOES NOT DISQUALIFY A PERSON FROM MAKING A WILL—PREVIOUS DECLARATIONS OF TESTATOR—EFFECT TO BE GIVEN TO THE EVIDENCE OF EXPERTS CONSIDERED—IN THIS CASE THE EVIDENCE OF SIXTY COMMON-SENSE WITNESSES, NEIGHBORS OF THE TESTATOR, WAS TAKEN IN PREFERENCE TO THAT OF THE EXPERTS.

Opinion of the court by BREESE, J.

This was a proceeding on the chancery side of the Circuit of Adams county to contest the validity of the last will of John P. Robbins, late of that county, deceased.

The will in question purports to have been executed on the 3d day of May, 1866, all the forms of law having been observed, but when offered for probate it was refused probate. On appeal to the Circuit Court this judgment was reversed and the will admitted to probate. This bill in chancery followed.

The grounds of attack being: 1. Incompetency of the testator to make the will; and, 2. Undue and improper influence exercised over the testator, by Reuben C. Rutherford, leading to its execution.

The jury found the issue for the contestants, and having overruled a motion for a new trial, the Court, by its decree, eclared the instrument produced was ot the last will and testament of John . Robbins.

To reverse this decree, the proponents of the will appeal and assign various errors. We have examined the record with great care, and given to the testimony full consideration, and submit the conclusions we have reached.

It appears the testator, John P. Robbins, migrated from the south of New Hampshire to Adams county, settling near Quincy as a farmer in 1829. He had a good education, and by diligence and the proper application of his talents, acquired quite a fortune, chiefly in real estate. From the testimony of more than sixty witnesses, who had known the testator intimately for more than thirty years up to the time of making his will, who saw him, had frequent intercourse with him, and transacted business with him occasionally during all this time, it would appear he was a man of more than ordinary vigor, of strong mind and decision of character, and a good man whose sympathies and heart were very kind, combining intelligence and virtue, as well made and balanced as most men, He was a good reasoner and not easily converted to the opinions of others, of decided principles and views, and could not be easily influenced. When he formed opinions they were very fixed; had a good mind and sound judgment; was an honest man who intended to do right. This was his condition up to June, 1869, when he was stricken with paralysis, of which the record gives an imperfect account.

It further appears the testator had, at the time of making his will, a wife, who did not survive him, and two daughters surviving him; a third daughter had died leaving children by two different husbands, and who were living at the time of the execution of the will. To these daughters the testator had long before conveyed by deed real estate, near Quincy, in his judgment of equal value. His eldest daughter was Mary Ann, who had many years before intermarried with Isaac N. Morris, of Quincy, and who was under tood to be the possessor of a handsome fortune. They had long been absent from the paternal home, rearing a family of their own in affluence and abundance.

Rebecca Maria was the only remaining child. She seems to have been a favorite child, and on her marriage with Reuben C. Rutherford in 1854 she, with her husband, continued inmates of her father's house. Rutherford himself, apparently with the approbation of Robbins, taking charge of much of his business, and in co-operation with Mrs. Robbins, of their homstead establishment, all seeming to live in the greatest harmony, each bestowing and each inspiring confidence.

During the rebellion Rutherford was for a considerable portion of the time in the military service of the United States, on duty in distant States varied by occasional visits to his home in Quincy. He was so absent in May, 1866, when the will in question was executed, and it was executed under these circumstances:

On the second day of that month, the testator being then about 72 years of age, and in appearance, in the judgment of all who knew him, in the full possession of all his faculties, physical and mental, went unaccompanied, to the office of Goodwin & Davis, practicing lawyers of good standing in Quincy, where he remained some time in consultation with Mr. Goodwin in the inner office, the other room being occupied by Mr. Davis. Goodwin took notes of the conversation on sheets of paper.

The next day, or day after, unaccompanied as before, Robbins returned to the office and again conferred with Mr. Goodwin, then returned to the outer office, and pointing to the papers lying on Goodwin's desk, invited Davis to witness the paper, as his will, it having been signed by Robbins, which Davis did, and Goodwin, since dead, also signed it as witness.

Davis was the only surviving witness to the execution of the will—he knew the testator well—and testified he was at that time of sound mind and memory.

Robbins took the will with him when he departed, unattended as he came. What disposition he made of the will does not appear. It is not shown any member of his family knew anything about it, or knew he had made a will. From this date, May, 3d, 1866, the testator continued his usual course of life until some time in June, 1869, more than three years thereafter, he was stricken with paralysis, which did not wholly incapacitate him, and four years thereafter, on the 12th of June, 1873, he died in the midst of his family, then consisting of his daughter, with her children, and Dr. Rutherford, Mrs. Robbins having died some time previously.

By this will of May 3, 1866, appellant Reuben C. Rutherford was appointed sole executor, without being required to execute a bond. To his widow he devised his whole estate, real and personal, during her life. To Mrs. Morris, the appellee, one or more valuable tracts of land, in Adams county, subject to the life estate of her mother. To Mrs. Reuben Rutherford, wife of the executor named, other tracts of valuable land, and his homestead in the same county, subject to the same life estate, and also all the personal property which might remain after the death of the widow. To the children of his deceased daughter, Harriet Warren, he made certain specific devises of real estate.

The devise to Mrs. Rutherford, it is claimed, equals in value two thirds of the whole estate.

The first point made by appellants is as to the weight to be given to the verdict of the jury. They insist that the verdict in such cases as this is nothing more, and entitled to no greator consideration, than a verdict rendered on a feigned is sue out of chancery—that it is designed merely to inform the conscience of the judge, and which he may wholly disregard.

We do not approve this view. The statute is express when a will is attacked for any of the causes specified by bill in chancery, "an issue at law shall be made up, whether the writing produced be the will of the testator or testators or not, which shall be tried by a jury in the Circuit Court of the county, wherein such will. testament or codicil, shall have been proved, and recorded as aforesaid, according to the practice in courts of chancery in similar cases."

In chancery it is the received doctrine on issue directed thereout upon a disputed fact, supposed, being directed to the judge on his own motion, a verdict upon such an issue is merely advisory, which the jndge can disregard in arriving at his conclusions. But the issue in this case was not a feigned but a real issue, directed by the statute upon real facts, which the jury were sworn to try, and their finding must have the effect of a verdict rendered in any other cause upon an issue made up for trial. This was the view entertained by this court in Bromfield v. Bromfield, 43 Ill., 155, and we see no necessity for changing it.

Giving to the verdict in this case the same weight accorded to verdicts rendered on ordinary issues at law, the consequence follows, the verdict must stand if there be evidence to support it. And the rule is equally well settled, if there be a great and decided preponderance of evidence against the finding, the verdict will be set aside. And the more urgent is this command, if it shall appear from the whole record that injustice has been done.

Impressed with the great importance of this case to the parties litigant, and considering the large amount of property involvsd, some $100,000 or more, we have bestowed all the attention to this record, in our power to bestow, and have permitted no important fact to escape us, and we are well satisfied it furnishes no sufficient evidence of mental incapacity of the testator at the time he made the will in question, nor any evidence of any undue influence, exerted by any one over the testator, to induce the making of the will.

The testimony to sustain the first ground of attack, that of mental incapacity of the testator, is that of Moses F. Bassett, who had been for some years prior to, and up to 1864, two years before the will was made, the family physician of the testator, and who was examined as an expert, and who testified he had no intercourse with the testator from 1864 up to December, 1870; supplemented by the testimony of Dr. Wilson, who did not know the testator, who had heard the testimony of Dr. Bassett, and who said he thought the facts stated by him, disconnected from the cause would hardly designate what the testator's real condition was, and who said "absolutely and necessarily paralysis might occur in 1869, without there having been any softening of the brain in 1866, and that persons have paralysis without having softening of the brain, and that brain softening is not necessarily connected with premonitory symptoms of paralysis; and by Dr. Curtis, who did not hear Bassett's testimony, but had seen the testator in 1871 and 1872, and personally knew nothing about him previously, but who could not testify there was any softening of the brain in 1866; and Dr. Byrd, who never knew or saw the testator, but who says if a man was stricken with paralysis in 1869, it would not establish that he was afflicted with softening of the brain in 1866, and that Robbins might have been stricken with paralysis in 1869, and have been a sound man in 1866—paralysis follows other diseases besides softening of the brain; and Mrs. Hannah C. S. Brown, a sister of Mrs. Robbins, a resident of Hancock county, whose visits to the family were not very frequent, the last being in 1865, who testified: "In these visits Robbins would tell her of his having been sick and of the doctor's visiting him—of pain in his head, affection of the eyes; he would come in flushed, his bald head would show a flushed appearance; he would lie down and her sister would bathe his head, and he would be better; spoke of his eyes being sore and paining him; he did not say much of these attacks, but he seemed more feeble after them; could not endure as well, nor walk as far, because he said it pained him in the bottom of his feet sometimes; there was a place there he complained of; did not see him in any of the attacks after he moved into his new house; did not complain of dizziness at these times; he complained of this flush, and rush of blood; that he would shed tears readily, especially on coming to very fine passages when they were reading to each other; his voice, if he was reading, would be choked, and if she was reading his tears would fall."

These doctors were summoned by the contestants "as experts," for the purpose of invalidating a will deliberately made by a man quite as competent as either of them to do such an act. They were the contestants' witnesses, and so considered themselves—Dr. Bassett especially, whose whole testimony is pregnant with such indications. The testimony of such is worth but little, and should always be received by juries and courts with great caution. It was said by a distinguished judge, in a case before him, if there was any kind of testimony not only of no value, but even worse than that, it was, in his judgment, that of medical experts. They may be able to state the diagnosis of the disease more learnedly; but upon the question whether it had, at a given time, reached such a stage that the subject of it was incapable of making a contract, as irresponsible for his acts, the opinion of his neighbors, if men of good common sense, would be worth more that that of all the experts in the country.

The question in this case is: Was there senile dementia, no matter how occasioned, of this testator on the 3d day of May, 1866, the day he made his will? Is there any evidence of imbecility of old age at this time? Not one witness so testifies. There is not a particle of proof such was the condition of the testator at that time or at any time prior thereto or subsequent until stricken by paralysis.

No man has had the hardihood to testify in this case that there was the least weakness of intellect at this time. More than sixty witnesses of good common sense and observation, knowing the testator well, men of the highest character and of unquestioned judgment, all concur with extraordinary unanimity that up to 1869 no man excelled him in intellectual or physical vigor. There is no dissentient voice; all testify to the same effect. Is there any medical testimony sufficient to overturn this? Taking it to the extent claimed for it, it fails to establish mental incompetency, when the will was executed. What is the amount of this medical testimony? Dr. Bassett, the leading expert, says he was the family physician in 1864, and for several years previous; that the testator was subject to occasional attacks of fever, attended with pain in the head, delirium, nausea, which the doctor attributed to congestion of the brain—that the attacks lasted generally three or four days, and were relieved by the ordinary treatment usual in like cases; that at the time, these symptoms did not excite in his mind any suspicion of softening or other organic disease of the brain, but that in years afterward, in 1869, when the testator had been attacked with paralysis, he, the doctor, then connected these symptoms with the supposed softening of the brain, which he then conceived might have existed from the date of his last attendance upon him in 1864. Now what was there in the symptoms of these periodical attacks to warrant the supposition that they indicated cerebral softening? Pain in the head, delirium, nausea, these as we all know from our own observation are closely allied to, and are not the unusual concomitants of any form of fever, and it needs no doctor to instruct us that they generally pass off, leaving no trace of evil effect behind, either on the bodily health or mental vigor. Every day's observation teaches us this. It is notorious that some persons are highly delirious while under a slight attack of fever. All the head disturbances pass off with the fever which induced them, and the patient is soon restored to his wonted mental and bodily condition. We need no books or doctors to inform us that the symptons in the case of this testator were merely the ordinary symptoms of fever of almost every kind, and do not, in our judgment, taken in connection with the testimony of the testator's many neighbors and intimate acquaintances, warrant the conclusion there was active congestion of the brain in any of the attacks prior to 1869, much less that inflammatory softening followed these attacks. How few of us have escaped distressing periodical headaches, this temporary prostration of body and mind!

The neighbors of the testator who saw him and conversed with him almost every day during these attacks and afterwards never perceived they had any effect upon his mental or bodily vigor. We do not think the evidence satisfactorily shows that any of the ordinary symptoms of cerebral softening existed in the case of this testator at the time he made his will. No one has testified there was any paralysis or weakness of the muscular system other than such as might be expected in advancing age—no marked diminution of mental power. Indeed, the principal reason for supposing the mental powers were failing is found in the testimony of Mrs. Brown, and that was, that the testator was easily moved to tears on the recital of fine poetry, or when in an excited state of feeling. If this is to be received as evidence of mental imbecility or softening of the brain, many persons who now enjoy high public distinction, and are remarkable for strength of mind and great business capacity might deserve the care of a conservator, at least.

These experts tell us, as do the books, there is no necessary connection of softening of the brain and apoplexy or paralysis, nor does cerebral softening usually proceed at a slow pace of years before death ensues. On a careful review of the testimony of these experts, we are unable to discover anything in the symptoms and history of the case justifying the conclusions of Dr. Bassett, that the testator was suffering from a cerebral softening. If mental imbecility did exist, it must have arisen from some other cause, and we feel confident we will be more likely to arrive at a just estimate of the mental condition and business capaoity of the testator by relying on the accordant testimony of his lifelong acquaintances and neighbors with whom the testator was in frequent intercourse, rather than from the testimony of these medical gentlemen—and so would the jury.

If we give heed to such testimony, and suffer it to prevail against the flood of proof in favor of the testator's competency, we should be doing great wrong, and departing from the rules we have laid down in like cases, to which we will hereafter refer.

It must be apparent to every one, but few wills could stand the test of the fanciful theories of dogmatic witnesses who bring discredit on science and make the name of "experts" a by-word and a reproach.

We concur with the judge above referred to; we would not give the testimony of these common-sense witnesses, deposing to what they know and saw almost every day for years, for that of so-called experts, who always have some favorite theory to support—men often as presumptuous as they are ignorant of the principles of medical science.

It is upon the ground of senile dementia chiefly this case rests.

As this is wholly disproved as existing at the time of the execution of this will, or at any time previous, the verdict should have been for the proponents of the will.

What is the effect of old age upon testamentary capacity, is a subject which has received the attention of all courts, this among them, and it has never been held anywhere that age alone denotes incompetency. In Watson v. Watson, 2 B. Munroe, 74, one 86 years old and afflicted with disease, was held competent to execute a will. So, also, one of 80 years of age, with energies greatly impaired, ib., 79. In Van Abst v. Hunter, 5 Johns Ch. 148, Chancellor Kent said, in regard to the will of a person between 90 and 100 years of age: "A man may freely make his testament, how old soever he may be. It is one of the painful consequences of extreme old age that it ceases to excite interest, and is apt to be left solitary and neglected. The control which the law still gives to a man over the disposal of his property, is one of the most efficient means he has in protracted life to command the attention due to his infirmities. The will of such an aged man ought to be regarded with great tenderness, when it appears not to have been produced by fraudulent arts, but contained those very dispositions which the circumstances of his situation and the course of the natural affections dictated."

Admitting this testator had softening of the brain in 1864, which is not proved, still, if he retained capacity sufficient to transact his business, and knew the state of his affairs, his property, and the claims of his children, and acted understandingly, the will cannot be rejected. This court said, in Silby v. Wagoners, 27 Ill., 395, that a want of mental powers must be such as to render the testator incapable of acting rationally in the ordinary affairs of life, or incapable of understanding the effects and consequences of his act; and further, that legal soundness of mind, until inquest had, is a presumption of law to be overturned by proof only of incompetency at the time of the act in question.

In Fish v. Newell, 62 ib., 196, it was said that prior incompetency or insanity of the testator, arising from accident or temporary disease, does not presume after incompetency to make a will; it is enough if the testator understands the nature of the business in which he is engaged, has recollection of the property he intends to devise, of the persons who are the objects of his bounty, and of the manner in which it is to be distributed among them.

And the court further said that the best form of expressing the law as to the mental capacity is, were the testator's mind and memory sufficiently sound to enable him to know and understand the business in which he was engaged at the time he executed the will. The same doctrine was announced in Yoe v. McCord, decided at the September term, 1874, and in Meeker v. Meeker, decided at the same time, where it was said: "The law has adopted the rule, that where persons have arrived at full age, the presumption must be indulged that the party has the requisite capacity to enter into and bind himself by all lawful engagements, and amongst others may dispose of their property by will and testament. and to avoid their acts the presumption must be rebutted by evidencing a want of sufficient intellectual capacity to make the agreement or the disposition of his property by will. Like all other matters relating to the human mind, it is difficult to find any precise, undeviating rule by which it can be determined when a person has mind and memory. And further, it is a rule of law that a person who is capable of transacting ordinary business, is also capable of making a valid will. It is not required he should possess a higher capacity than that, than for the transaction of the ordinary affairs of business." Further on the court says: "And the usual test is that the party be capable of acting rationally in the ordinary affairs of life." Testing this case by this rule it is impossible for any man to say with truth, that the testator, on May 3d, 1866, was not capable of making a will. The whole weight of the testimony of more than sixty intelligent witnesses, the familiar acquaintances of the testator, is that up to the time of the paralytic stroke, in 1869, and during all the years prior thereto, he was a man remarkable for his physical and mental power. No one of his numerous acquaintances with whom he freely mingled, had the slightest suspicion of unsoundness of mind or memory, or a weakening even of his mental powers, save the testimony of Dr. Bassett, that in 1864 and prior there to he had occasional attacks of pain and headache not incapacitating him, however, from attending to his ordinary business.

That there is no necessary connection between these and the paralytic attack of 1869 is shown by the medical testimony produced by appellees.

But suppose the testator had incipient softening of the brain in 1864, there is no proof it incapacitated him from the transaction of ordinary business. The proof is ample that it did not, and his testamentary act is within the rule established by this court in the cases cited. We find no sufficient evidence of mental incapacity.

The next point is, the will was the result of undue influence exercised over the testator by Reuben C. Rutherford.

The principal witness to establish this is Edgar R. Morris, the son of appellee, Mrs. Morris; Mrs. Brown amounts to nothing. There is nothing whatever in his testimony tending to show undue influence of Rutherford, or any other person exercised upon the testator to make his will.

The witness was always on the best of terms with his grandfather, whom he visited quite frequently; thinks Rutherford had a good deal of influence over him; noticed it in his manner of life; he (his grandfather) as most western farmers do, had lived on corn-bread, bacon and coffee; he changed his diet, as he said, by Rutherford's advice; he got him to drinking weak tea and eating beef, as pork was not healthy; got him to quit the use of pepper to a greater or less extent, and on a great many occasions Mr. Robbins would quote Dr. Rutherford as to whether this drink was right and that was wrong. This the witness noticed within one or two years after the marriage of Rutherford.

He further says, he can only answer as to the influence of Dr. Rutherford over the testator, by stating circumstances which occurred. That influence increased up to 1866. Witness was at the house of testator on Broadway, when he lived on the McCoy place, and offered him a cigar. He (Robbins) said the doctor thought it was best not to smoke, and he had kind of promised not to smoke, but said he, "I like a cigar occasionally, lets go behind the stable and sit down and smoke and have a chat." He further says his grandfather was a very industrious man, and one day he asked his grandfather what Dr. Rutherford was going to do, as it was getting to be neighborhood talk that the doctor was not doing anything. The old gentleman said he thought it was time the doctor did something, but the old lady (his grandmother) said the doctor was a literary man; was getting ready to write a book; could not work now; was not his nature; was not made for that purpose; all they wanted him to do was to care for their old age and attend to Mr. Robbins' business. This was in 1858 or 1859, before they moved into the new house; and about building that house this witness thinks the doctor exerted his influence over Mr. Robbins,

It seems the family had overruled Mr. Robbins, and had the house built in the city on Twenty-fourth street, convenient to church, schools and places of amusement. This was the work of the doctor and his grandmother. Though it was not exactly the kind of house the old gentleman would have preferred, he yielded to their wishes, as they had set their hearts upon it. "They" being understood to mean his daughter Maria, Dr. Rutherford, and his grandmother. On one occasion in 1865–66 witness went to Mr. Robbins to borrow a reaper. He said witness would have to see the doctor, as he had charge of the reaper. This was in 1866. Declining to speak to the doctor about it, the old gentleman said he would speak to "grandma" about it, and witness got the reaper and took it home.

This is the substance of all the evidence on the question of undue influence, and that such trivialities should be introduced in a court of justice and against the objections of the opposite party, excites surprise. They fail to touch the question of the execution of the will.

In Broomfield v. Broomfield, supra, it was said, that fraud or undue influence to avoid a will must be directly connected with its execution; that although the testator acted under the advice of the devisee in his ordinary affairs and was influenced by that advice, such relations and influence would not tend to prove that he used undue influence in procuring the execution of the will. In Carmichael v. Reed, 45 Ill., 108, this court said that a wife who was the principal devisee in the will of her husband, might lawfully exercise the natural and proper influence of her position to induce the testator to make a will appointing her executrix, giving her what the law allows, and preferring her children over those by a former wife.

In Roe v. Taylor, ib., 575, this court said the rule is that the influence exercised must be of such a nature as to deprive the testator of his free agency and that neither advice, nor argument, nor persuasion would vitiate a will freely made, and from conviction, though the will might not have been made but for such advice and persuasion, that the influence to avoid a will must be such as to destroy the freedom of the testator's will, and thus render his act obviously more the offspring of the will of others than his own, and that it must be an influence specially directed toward the object of procuring a will in favor of particular parties. That these rulings are in strict harmony with those of other courts will be seen from the following citations: It is said in 1 Redf. on Wills, ch. 10, p. 523, that the influence to avoid a will must be such as to destroy the freedom of the testator's will, and thus render his act obviously more the offspring of the will of others than of his own; that it must be an influence specially directed toward the object of procuring a will in favor of particular parties, that if any degree of free agency, or capacity remained in the testator, so that when left to himself, he was capable of making a valid will, then the influence which so controls him as to render his making a will of no effect, must be such as was intended to mislead him to the extent of making a will, essentially contrary to his duty.

This influence, to avoid a will, must be one still operating at the time the will is made, and producing that persuasion of mind which made the will. Ib., 244. It is said a will is set aside in such cases on the ground it is not an honest will—that it does not reflect the unbiased intent or wishes of the testator, but, on the contrary, has been extorted—procured from the deceased in the weakness or imbecility of old age or disease, or by artifice, deceit, or imposition, or by persistent importunity, amounting to a species of coercion or moral duress. Under influence, in this sense being a fraud and for the fraud, it is not the act, deed or will of the deceased; upon no other ground has the court a right to set aside a deed or will executed by a person of sane mind or memory, when the execution of the same was not procured, and the free agency of the party overcome, by some contra-active coercion, duress or fraud. Kinne v. Johnson, 50 Barb., 70; Tyler v. Gardner, 35 N. Y., 610; Tyson v. Tyson, 37 M. D., 567; Eadie v. Sampson, 26 N. Y., 11. In Miller v. Miller, 3 Serg. & Rawle, 269, it was held that influence and persuasion may be fairly used; and a will procured by honest means, by acts of kindness, attention and importunate persuasions, which delicate minds would shrink from, would not be set aside on that ground alone. Influence, to vitate an act, must not be the influence of affection or attachment; it must not be the mere desire of gratifying the wishes of another, for that would be a very strong ground in support of a testamentary act. M. v. R. Cox, 355.

It was held, in Rubb v. Gersham, 43 Ind., 9, that advice, persuasion, or entreaty does not constitute undue influence. Nor will love, affection or gratitude afford ground from which undue influence may be inferred. Kinne v. Johnson, 50 Barb., 70, supra.

The fact that the beneficiaries of this will are those by whom the testator was surrounded, and with whom he stood in confidential relations at the time of its execution, is no ground for inferring undue influence. Wilson v. Moran, 3 Bradf. 185. Nor even where the principal beneficiary has for years had the exclusive management of the testator's property. Reynolds v. Post, 62 Barb., 207; nor when the provisions of the will, for the benefit of such person, may seem grossly unreasonable or unequal. Brown v. Mattison, 3 Wheaton, 131; Jackson v. Jackson, 39 N. Y., 152; Clapp v. Fullerton, 34 ib., 97; Bleeker v. Lynch, 1 Bradford, 471.

These being generally received principles governing cases of this kind, this case, tested by them, fails to show any undue influence in procuring the execution of this will.

That Dr. Rutherford, from his position, the husband of the testator's youngest and favorite child, as it would seem, residing in his family as his own, should have acquired some influence over the testator is not to be questioned. It was manifested in inducing the testator to quit a bad habit, and to regulate his diet on sanitary principles; to erect a more imposing edifice, in a more agreeable quarter, than was originally intended; but that the doctor was influential in the latter is not shown, though there can be no doubt he aided his wife and her mother in their efforts to that end. They were determined to have a fine house, in a fashionable quarter—the testator had the means with which to build it—and no doubt felt a secret gratification when occupying it that he had yielded to their importunities.

It is urged that these facts show an influence over the mind of the testator. Granted; but it is not such an influence as the books condemn as undue, when the execution of the will is considered. There is not a word of proof that any of the beneficiaries of this will exerted a particle of influence towards its execution, or that Rutherford ever knew of it until after Robbins' death. At the time of its execution he was absent from the State, and not a word or syllable of his is brought up against him to charge him with suggesting any portion of it, or his daughter, or her mother either. From all appearauces it was the unprompted act of the testator. He went alone and unattended from his home, distant a mile and a quarter from Quincy, to the office of a prominent law firm in that city, and after private consultation with Mr. Goodwin, the leading member of the firm, he left, on his return home. He returned a day or two thereafter, as before, unattended, signed the paper, calling in Mr. Davis to witness it as his will, in conjunction with Mr. Goodwin. He was then, and had been for thirty years and more prior to that time, in fine physical and mental health; was in the full possession of all his faculties; fully competent to make a will.

BAR ASSOCIATION.

DISCUSSION OF THE BILL IN REFERENCE TO WRITS OF ERROR AND APPEALS.

The regular meeting of the Chicago Bar Association was held Saturday afternoon, Dec. 4th, at their rooms, No. 148 Madison street. Mr. B. F. Ayer presided, and there was a large attendance.

The monthly report of the Treasurer was read by the Secretary, Mr. H. W. Jackson. It showed a balance at the end of the month of $860.68. Adopted.

Mr. Robert Hervey, of the Committee on Admissions, reported in favor of Philip Stein, Franklin H. Dennison, and O. Skinner. Laid over for a week under the rules.

On motion, J. G. Wilson, G. W. Smith, and J. L. High were appointed a Special Committee to audit the account of the Treasurer for last year.

The bill reported at the previous meeting by the special committee, consisting of W. P. Black, J. L. High and Obadiah Jackson, providing for writs of error and appeals from the decisions of the U. S. District Judge, while sitting as a circuit judge, to the Circuit Judge proper, and which had been made the special order for to-day, was then taken up and discussed. The bill, as reported by the committee was published.

Mr. W. P. Black, Chairman of the Special Committee which prepared the bill, moved to amend Sec. 6 by striking out the words "single or double costs," and inserting "including a reasonable attorney's fee not exceeding in any case $250," and by adding another section as follows:

SEC. 8. The provisions of this act shall apply to all cases tried and determined by the Circuit Court held by a district judge sitting alone, where the final judgment or decree has been entered in such cause within the six months prior to the passage of this act.

Mr. S. A. Goodwin inquired why the bill should be passed, and expressed himself opposed to it on principle.

Mr. Black defended and explained the objects of the bill in an able speech. He said, in view of the settled policy of the country, and in view of their knowledge of human nature, there was occasion and necessity for legislation of this kind. While the bill might not provide all that might be needed, still it was a step in the right direction—namely, in the direction of securing greater care, watchfulness and wisdom in the settlement of the property rights of our fellowmen. It might be argued that it would increase the labor of the circuit judges. But for what did the circuit judge exist? Not for his own comfort, convenience, leisure, or delight, but as the appointed servant of the people to determine their rights in the cases brought before him. If, however, the judge could not keep up with the increase of business, more judges could be appointed. The whole plan and thought of the judiciary system was the obtaining of justice, no matter at what cost.

Mr. M. W. Fuller suggested that, if the amendments were agreed to by the Committee, they should be embodied in the bill.

Mr. Black remarked that that was the intention of the committee.

Mr. Goodwin was not satisfied with the arguments brought forward in support of the bill. In his opinion the proposed legislation was a step in the wrong direction. The remedy for the evils which existed was not by a multiplication of hearings, but by an increase of the judiciary to enable the cases to be heard. This bill practically repealed that act of Congress which authorized the holding of the Circuit Court without the presence of the circuit judge. He suggested that the association frame a substitute, and submit it to the bar associations of New York, Philadelphia, and Boston, before undertaking to decide upon this question. He thought the remedy lay in the creation of an intermediate court between the Circuit and District Courts to hear those cases.

Mr. Fuller submitted the following:

Resolved, That the pending proposition and amendments be recommitted, with instructions to consider and report upon the expediency of pressing upon Congress the passage of bills reducing the $5,000 limit on appeal to $2,000; providing for two district judges in this district; repealing the act of Congress of March, 1875, providing for the removal of causes from State to United States courts; providing for the creation of an intermediate court; and such other measures as might relieve the Supreme and Circuit Courts of the United States from the accumulation of business.

Mr. Fuller said he believed it was inexpedient to press such a measure as the one before them; it certainly would not pass Congress. A series of measures, such as were indicated in the resolution, were needed. The jurisdiction of the United States courts had been improperly enlarged, and the whole tendency of congressional legislation was reprehensible in the extreme.

Mr. J. S. Cooper supported the bill in an effective speech.

Mr. Goudy moved to amend the resolution by referring to the Committee on Judiciary.

Mr. Fuller offered to amend by adding "and that the Judiciary Committee act with the said committee in considering the subject."

After further discussion, Mr. Goudy withdrew his amendment.

Mr. Black replied to the objections made to the bill, and claimed that it accomplished, in the main, what was contemplated by the resolution.

Mr. J. L. High, of the Special Committee, said that they had been instructed by the Association to report such a bill, and had simply endeavored to follow their instructions. They had not submitted the bill as perfect, and desired that it should be carefully dissected and considered. The discussion thus far had only strengthened him in the conviction that the principle of the bill was correct; and that it contained the germ, at least, of the desired reform. All were agreed as to the evil; the only difficulty lay in applying the specific remedy. Under the present system, defendants in the United States Circuit Courts, in actions determined by the district judge holding the Circuit Court, when the amount was under $5,000, were absolutely at the mercy of the district judge, without remedy and without appeal. Such despotic power was repugnant to our whole system of jurisprudence, and no such anomalous condition of affairs existed in any other common law country. He urged that an expression of the Association should be taken on the bill.

Col. Waterman thought the remedy for the existing evil was the system adopted in England and New York of taxing costs and attorneys' fees, and so making those interested bear a portion of the burden now thrown upon the public. He moved to refer to the committee on the Amendment of the Law. Lost.

Mr. Robert Hervey suggested there should be a full discussion of the bill presented by the special committee, and moved to postpone its further consideration until the next regular meeting. Carried.

On motion, the following committee was appointed to make arrangements for the annual dinner of the Association: Messrs. B. F. Ayer, M. W. Fuller, Robert Hervey, and Norman Williams.

The Association then adjourned.

S. W. PACKARD REMOVED.—Mr. PACKARD, of the well-known law firm of Cooper, Garnett & Packard, of this city, has removed to Yankton, Dakota, and opened an office for the practice of his profession there. Mr. PACKARD was induced to take this step, from the hope that that climate might restore the failing health of Mrs. PACKARD. The members of the Yankton bar will find Mr. PACKARD an able and honorable practitioner, and a gentleman worthy of their confidence.

UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT.

OCTOBER TERM, 1875.

In error to the Supreme Court, District of Columbia.

FRANCIS DAINESE, plaintiff in error, v. CHARLES HALE.

1. Judicial powers are not necessarily incident to the office of consul, although usually conferred upon consuls of Christian nations in the Pagan and Mahometan countries, for the decision of controversies between their fellow citizens or subjects residing or commorant there, and for the punishment of crimes committed by them.

2. The existence and extent of such powers depend on the treaties and positive laws of the nations concerned. In Turkey, for example, the judicial powers of consuls depend on the treaty stipulations conceded by the government of that country, and on the laws of the several States appointing the consuls.

3. The treaty between the United States and Turkey, made in 1862, (if not that made in 1830), has the effect of conceding to the United States the same privilege in respect to consular courts and jurisdiction which are enjoyed by other Christian nations, including civil as well as criminal jurisdiction; and the act of Congress of June 22, 1860, established the necessary regulations for carrying the jurisdiction into effect.

4. But as this jurisdiction is, in terms, only such as is allowed by the laws of Turkey, or its usages in its intercourse with other Christian nations, those laws or usages must be shown in order to know the precise extent of the jurisdiction.

5. The court can not ordinarily take judicial notice of foreign laws and usages; a party claiming the benefit of them by way of justification, must plead them.

6. The defendant, as consul-general of Egypt, in 1864, issued an attachment against the goods of the plaintiff, there situate, neither the plaintiff nor the persons at whose suit the attachment was issued being residents or sojourners in the Turkish dominions, but both being citizens of the United States. For this act the plaintiff brought suit to recover the value of the goods attached. The defendant pleaded his official character, and as incident thereto, claimed jurisdiction to entertain the suit in which the attachment was issued. Held, that the plea was defective for not setting forth the laws or usages of Turkey upon which, by the treaty and act of Congress conferring the jurisdiction, the latter was made to depend, and which alone would show its precise extent, and that it embraced the case in question.

Opinion by BRADLEY, J.

This action was brought to recover the value of certain goods, chattels, and credits of the plaintiff, which the defendant, in November, 1864, then being Consul-General of the United States in Egypt, caused to be attached. The declaration alleged that the defendant, by usurpation and abuse of his power as such Consul-General, and for the malicious purpose of injuring the plaintiff, took cognizance of a certain controversy between the plaintiff and Richard H. and Antony B. Allen, (all being citizens of the United States and none of them residents of or sojourners within the Turkish dominions at that time,) and made and issued the order of attachment by virtue of which the seizure in question was made.

The defendant pleaded that at the time of issuing the attachment he was agent and Consul-General of the United States in Egypt, and was furnished with a letter of credence from the President of the United States to the Pacha; that in his said official capacity he exercised the functions and duties of a minister, and by the law of nations, as well as the laws of the United States, he was invested with judicial functions and power over citizens of the United States residing in Egypt, and in the exercise of those functions took cognizance of the cause referred to in the declaration, and issued the attachment complained of.

To this plea there was a general demurrer.

The defendant, by his plea, asked the court to take judicial notice that his official character gave him the jurisdiction which he assumed to exercise. Could the court do this? Can this court do it?

It cannot be contended that every consul, by virtue of his office, has power to exercise the judicial functions claimed by the defendant, for it is conceded that this is not the case in Christian countries. And whilst, on the other side, it is also conceded that in Pagan and Mahometan countries it is usual for the ministers and consuls of European states to exercise judicial functions as between their fellow subjects or citizens, it clearly appears that the extent to which this power is exercised depends upon treaties and laws regulating such jurisdiction. The instructions given by the British Foreign Office to their consuls in the Levant, in 1844, as quoted by Mr. Phillimore do not claim anything more. They say:

"The right of British consular officers to exercise any jurisdiction in Turkey in matters which in other countries come exclusively under the control of the local magistracy, depends originally on the extent to which that right has been conceded by the Sultans of Turkey to the British Crown, and, therefore, the right is strictly limited to the terms in which the concession is made. The right depends, in the next place, on the extent to which the Queen, in the exercise of the power vested in her majesty by act of Parliament, may be pleased to grant to any of her consular servants authority to exercise jurisdiction over British subjects."—(Int. Law, vol. 2, p. 273, section 276.)

Historically it is undoubtedly true, as shown by numerous authorities quoted by Mr. Warden, in his treatise on the Origin and Nature of Consular Establishments, that the consul was originally an officer of large judicial, as well as commercial powers, exercising entire municipal authority over his countrymen in the country to which he was accredited. But the changed circumstances of Europe and the prevalence of civil order in the several Christian states, have had the effect of greatly modifying the powers of the consular office. And it may now be considered as generally true, that for any judicial powers which may be vested in the consuls accredited to any nation, we must look to the express provisions of the treaties entered into with that nation, and to the laws of the states which the consul represent.

The transactions which are the subject of this suit took place in 1864, and the powers of our Consul-General in Egypt at that time must be regulated by the treaties with Turkey and by the laws of the United States then in force.

The first treaty between the United States and the Ottoman Porte was concluded in 1830, and, amongst other things, it provided, in article III., that "American merchants established in well defended states of the Sublime Porte for purposes of commerce, shall not be disturbed in their affairs, nor shall they be treated in any way contrary to established usages." By article IV. it was further provided, as follows:

"If litigations and disputes should arise between the subjects of the Sublime Porte and citizens of the United States, the parties shall not be heard, nor shall judgment be pronounced, unless the American Dragoman be present. Causes in which the sum may exceed five hundred piasters shall be submitted to the Sublime Porte, to be decided according to the laws of equity and justice. Citizens of the United States of America, quietly pursuing their commerce, and not being charged or convicted of any crime or offense, shall not be molested; and even when they may have committed some offense they shall not be arrested and put in prison by the local authorities, but they shall be tried by their minister or consul, and punished according to their offense, following, in this respect, the usage observed towards other Franks."

In 1848 an act of Congress was passed, entitled "An act to carry into effect certain provisions in the treaties between the United States and China and the Ottoman Porte, giving certain judicial powers to ministers and consuls of the United States in those countries. (9 Stat. 276.) A treaty had been made with China in 1844, conceding to the authorities of the United States full civil and criminal jurisdiction between citizens of the United States in that country. The law was passed in reference to this treaty and that with the Ottoman Porte, before cited.

This act contained regulations as to the mode of exercising the judicial powers stipulated for in the treaty with China. It conferred these powers upon the resident commissioner and consuls respectively, and authorized them to adjudicate in accordance with the laws of the United States and the common law, supplemented, when these were insufficient, by decrees and regulations to be made by the commissioner himself. The commissioner with the advice of the consuls, was to prescribe the forms of processes and proceeding. By the 22d section of the act its provisions, so extended to Turkey under the treaty of 1830, to be executed by the ministers and consuls of the United States in that country, who were ex officio vested with the powers given by the act to similar officials in China, so far as regarded the punishment of crime.

It is evident that this act failed to confer upon the consuls of the United States in Turkey any power to exercise judicial functions in civil cases, whatever may have been the scope and intention of the treaty of 1830. Whilst it may be true that the expression in the third article of the treaty—that American merchants shall not be disturbed in their affairs, nor treated contrary to established usages—was understood to and did confer upon American merchants the same privileges of exterritorially enjoyed by the subjects of other Christian nations, the act of 1848 did not assume to enforce such a construction of it.

But in 1860 another act was passed to carry into effect a new treaty made with China in 1858, and other treaties made with Japan, Siam, Persia, and other countries (12 Stat., 72), by which very full and explicit regulations were again made in reference to the exercise of judicial powers by ministers and Consuls of the United States in those countries. By the 21st section of this act the same declaration was made as in the 22d section of the Act of 1848, in reference to the criminal jurisdiction to be exercised by the minister and consuls of the United States in Turkey; and a clause was added giving them civil jurisdiction also as follows: "who" (referring to such ministers and consuls) "are hereby ex officio vested with the powers herein conferred upon the minister and consul in China, for the purposes above expressed, so far as regards the punishment of crime," [adding,] "and also for the exercise of jurisdiction in civil cases wherein the same is permitted by the laws of Turkey; or its usages in its intercourse with the Franks or other foreign Christian nations."

So far, then, as the true construction of the treaty of 1830 would permit the exercise of civil jurisdiction by our consuls, the act of 1860 authorized it to be exercised, and supplied all the regulations necessary for that purpose.

In 1862 another treaty was entered into with the Ottoman Porte, by which after confirming all such parts of the treaty of 1830 as were not abrogated or changed, amongst other things, it was provided in article I., as follows: "All rights, privileges, or immunities which the Sublime Porte now grants, or may hereafter grant to, or suffer to be enjoyed by, the subjects, ships, commerce, or navigation of any foreign power, shall be equally granted to and exercised and enjoyed by the citizens, vessels, commerce and nativation of the United States of America." If, therefore, it be true, as laid down by writers and public documents, that the subjects of other Chistian nations have and enjoy in Turkey the right to have their civil controversies decided by their own minister and consuls, it would seem clear that under the treaty of 1862, if not under that of 1830, the same right is gauranteed to citizens of the United States.

But it is objected that in 1864 no act had been passed by Congress to carry the last treaty into effect. Such an act was passed in 1866, simply, however, extending to Egypt and the Consul-General there, the provisions of the act of 1860. (Sec. 11 of Approbation Bill, 14 Stat., 322.) This clause was probably adopted merely to obviate any doubt on the subject. For as treaties made under the authority of the United States are, by the Constitution, declared to be part of the supreme law of the legislation to carry them into effect, such legislation is not necessary for the purpose of giving them force and validity. So far as relates to the jurisdiction in question, this is the character of the treaty of 1862, taken in connection with the act of 1860. The act gave the jurisdiction, so far as usage in Turkey would permit it. The treaty secured the consent of the Turkish government to its exercise.

The State Department of the United States seems to have regarded the treaty of 1830 as establishing the jurisdiction in question. In the instructions contained in the Consuls' Manual, promulgated by the department in December, 1862, (adopting the learned opinion of Attorney-General Cushing, dated October 23, 1855,) it is said that the acts of Congress af 1848 [and 1860] provide in terms for the exercise of judicial authority by ministers and consuls in Turkey only so far as regards the punishment of crime, leaving the question of civil jurisdiction to stand upon treaties or the peculiar public law of the Levant. (Sec. 165.) And after referring to the language of Article III. of the treaty of 1830, which stipulated that "American merchants established in the well-defended states of the Sublime Porte for purposes of commerce, * * shall not be disturbed in their affairs, nor shall they be treated in any way contrary to established usages." And conceding that its construction might admit of discussion, the following conclusions were, nevertheless, reached; "As to all civil affairs to which no subject of Turkey is a party, Americans are wholly exempt from the local jurisdiction; and in civil matters, as well as criminal, Americans in Turkey are entitled to the benefit of 'the usage observed towards other Franks'. * * * * The phrase in the second article engages that citizens of the United States in Turkey shall not be 'treated in any way contrary to established usages.' The 'established usages' are the absolute exemption of all Franks, in controversies among themselves, from the local jurisdiction of the Porte.

"The general doctrine thus in force in the Levant, of the exterritoriality of foreign Christians, has given rise to a complete system of peculiar municipal and legal administration, consisting of—

"1. Turkish tribunals for questions between subjects of the Porte and foreign Christians.

"2. Consular courts for the business of each nation of foreign Christians.

"3. Trial of questions between foreign Christians of different nations in the consular court of the defendant's nation.

"4. Mixed tribunals of Turkish magistrates and foreign Christians, at length substituted in part for cases between Turks and foreign Christians.

"5. Finally, for causes between foreign Christians, the substitution at length of mixed tribunals in place of the separate courts, an arrangement introduced first by the legations of Austria, Great Britain, France, and Russia, and then tacitly acceded to by the legations of other foreign Christian nations." (Consuls' Manual of December, 1862, sections 169–171.)

These conclusions being publicly issued by the proper Executive Department of the government for the instruction and guidance of our consuls, be entitled to the highest respect in construing the statutes and treaties upon which their powers depend. And in view of the confirmatory, as well as independent, effect of the act of 1860, and the treaty of 1862, we have no doubt that in 1864, when the transactions in question took place, the minister and principal consuls of the United States in Turkey (including the Consul-General in Egypt) had all such jurisdiction in civil causes between citizens of the United States as was permitted by the laws of Turkey, or its usages in its intercourse with other Christian nations.

But here we are met by a difficulty arising from the extreme generality of the defense set up in the plea. What are the laws of Turkey and its usages in its intorcourse with other Christian nations, in reference to the powers allowed to be exercised by their public ministers and consuls in judicial matters? The plea does not inform us. It leaves the court to infer or to take judicial knowledge of of those laws and usages. But can it do this? Foreign laws and usages are, as to use matters of fact, and not matters of law; and although the court may take judicial cognizance of many matters of fact of public importance, yet, of foreign laws and customs, which are multiform and special in their character, it would be very dangerous for it to do so, at least without having had them brought to its attention and knowledge by previous adjudications or proofs. The general fact that public ministers and consuls of Christian states in Turkey exercise jurisdiction in civil matters between their fellow-citizens or subjects, might be assumed as sufficiently attested by the works on international law and the acts and instructions of our own government. But the precise extent of this jurisdiction is unknown to us. Whether it applies to any but residents in Turkey, or to travelers as well; whether to persons not in the country at all, but having property there, or claims against persons who are there; whether to cases like the present, where neither party resides in Turkey or is sojourning there, are questions which are not answered by the ordinary statements made in reference to this jurisdiction. As the power of the consuls of the United States, according to the treaties and laws as they stood in 1864, depended on the laws or usages of Turkey, those laws or usages should have been pleaded in some manner, however briefly, so that the court could have seen that the case was within them. For failing to do this, the plea was defective in substance, and judgment should have been rendered for the plaintiff on demurrer.

The judgment of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia must be reversed, and the cause remanded with directions to allow the defendant to amend his plea on payment of costs.

UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT.

JAMES BROWN AND WILLIAM SEAVEY, appellants, v. ENOCH PIPER.

Appeal from the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Massachusetts.

PATENT — PRESERVING FISH AND MEATS —WHEN THE PROCESS BELONGS TO THE GENERAL DOMAIN OF KNOWLEDGE AND SCIENCE PATENT VOID—WHAT THE COURT WILL TAKE JUDICIAL NOTICE OF.

1. The claim here was for a "new and improved method of preserving fish and meats." The court held that the patent was void on its face, and that the court below might have stopped short at that instrument, and without looking beyond it into the answers and testimony, sua sponte, if the objection were not taken by counsel, will have adjudged in favor of the defendant; that the principle and substance of the appellee's claim are set forth as belonging to the general domain of knowledge and science.

2. JUDICIAL NOTICE.—In trying the validity of a patent it is stated what facts the court will take judicial notice of.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

Justice SWAYNE delivered the opinion of the court.

The bill is founded upon two patents granted by the United States to the appellee—one numbered 732, of the 19th of March, 1861; the other numbered 36,107, and dated August 5th, 1862. The second and later patent was not relied upon in the argument here, and may, therefore, be laid out of view. Our attention will be confined to the prior one. It is declared in the specification to be "for a new and improved method of preserving fish and meats." The invention is alleged to consist "in a method of preserving fish and other articles in a chamber, and cooling the latter by means of a freezing mixture so applied that no communication shall exist between the interior of the preserving chamber and that of the vessels in which the freezing mixture is placed." The specification continues: "I do not profess to have invented the means of artificial congelation, nor to have discovered the fact that no decay takes place in animal substances so long as they are kept a few degrees below the freezing point of water, but the practical application of them to the art of preserving fish and meats, as above described, is a new and very valuable improvement. The apparatus for freezing fish and keeping them in a frozen state may be constructed in various ways and of different shapes. The apparatus shown in the drawing, however, will suffice to illustrate the principle and mode of operation."

The process and apparatus are then described as follows: A box of wood or other suitable material, surrounded by a packing of charcoal or other non-conducting substance, is to be provided, and the fish in small quantities laid in it on a rack. Metallic pans filled with a freezing mixture, such as salt and ice, are then to be set over them, and a cover shut over the pans. "In about twenty-four hours, the freezing mixture having been changed once in twelve hours, the fish will be frozen completely through."

After being frozen, the fish or meat may, if desired, be covered with a thin coating of ice, and this coating may be preserved by applying the substances named, which will exclude the air and prevent the juices from escaping by evaporation. "The fish are then to be packed closely in a large preserving box, which is enclosed in a still larger box, the space between the boxes being filled with charcoal or other non-conducting material, to exclude the heat." Other minor details are described, which it is not deemed material to repeat. The patentee then declares: "I do not desire to be understood as confining myself to the specific apparatus above described, nor to the use of either or both the preliminary processes of freezing and cooling; but I have described the mode of operation which, by experience, I have found best for preserving the most delicate varieties of fish." The summation and claim are: "Having described my invention, what I claim as new, and desire to secure by letters-patent, is, preserving fish or other articles in a close chamber by means of a freezing mixture, having no contact with the atmosphere of the preserving chamber, substantially as set forth."

The patent is not for the principle long and well-known to physicists, that a low degree of cold, like a high degree of heat, prevents the decay of animal matter, nor is it for the freezing of the articles to be preserved before or after they are placed in the preserving chamber, nor is it for applying, by means of an apparatus with any particular details of construction, cold to the articles to be preserved, nor is it for the frigorific effect of the freezing mixture upon the atmosphere of the inner chamber, but it is for the application to such articles of the degree of cold necessary to preserve them, by means of a "close chamber," in which they are to be placed, and a "freezing mixture having no communication with the atmosphere of the preserving chamber."

If this result be reached by the means designated, in any way substantially the same with that described, having the feature of the non-contact of the freezing mixture with the air of the preserving chamber, there is a clear invasion of the territory which the patentee has marked out and seeks to appropriate to himself.

It was earnestly maintained by the learned counsel for the appellees, that the essence of the invention is the creation of "a freezing atmosphere" in the preserving chamber.

To this there are several answers. There is nothing in the specification or claim to warrant the proposition. The direction is that "the fish are to be packed closely." This implies clearly that as many fish are to be put into the preserving chamber as it can be made to contain.

Atmospheric air is itself an agent of decay, and in all such cases it is important to preclude, as far as possible, its presence and contact. "If air be absolutely excluded, putrefaction ceases, and the result is the preservation of the substance in some circumstances, perhaps in all." 3 Ure's Dic. of Arts, 548. "On this principle is founded Appert's process, by which easily decomposible articles of food and drink, such as meat, fish, vegetables, milk, etc., are preserved for years, viz: by packing them in air-tight bottles or soldered tin cans, heating the vessels for several hours in boiling water, and keeping them carefully closed." 2 Watts' Dic. of Chem., 625. The patentee is to be presumed to have known this property of air.

The patent is for "a new and useful improvement" in the art to which it relates. It was issued under the act of July 4, 1836. The rights of the parties are to be considered in the light of that act. The defense relied upon in the answer is the want of novelty, and several instances of prior use and knowledge, with the requisite circumstances of time, place, and persons, are alleged.

We deem it sufficient to consider one of them. On the 17th of August, 1842, a patent was issued to John Good "for a corpse preserver." The apparatus, as described, was an outer case with a close-fitting lid. The case was made double, there being a partition to within four or five inches, more or less, of the top of the outer one, leaving a space between the two of several inches, which was to be filled with ice. There was a false bottom with holes in it in the inner compartment. It rested upon ledges, which kept it four or five inches above the bottom. The intervening space was a receptacle for ice. The corpse was despoited upon the false bottom; a tray was placed over it and under the lid; the tray was four or five inches deep, used to contain the freezing mixture, and had a flange to prevent the mixture from escaping. Proper outlets were provided for the passage of the water from the melting ice. There was no communication between the tray containing the freezing mixture and the inner compartment containing the body. Swartz, an intelligent and unimpeached witness, was examined on the 15th of October, 1869. He testified that he was an undertaker, and had used the apparatus for about twenty years—sometimes with ice under the false bottom, and sometimes without it. In either case he applied a sufficient degree of cold to prevent putrefaction before interment. He thought the bodies were sometimes frozen, but was not certain. The material point in his business was the prevention of decay for the time being, and that was always accomplished.

Here was the application of the requisite degree of cold exactly in the manner called for in the specification of the appellee.

This is hardly denied; but it is insisted that the process was never applied by the witness to the preservation of fish and meats.

The answer is, that this was simply the application by the patentee of an old process to a new subject, without any exercise of the inventive faculty, and without the development of any idea which can be deemed new or original, in the sense of the patent law. The thing was within the circle of what was well known before, and belonged to the public. No one could lawfully appropriate it to himself and exclude others from using it in any usual way for any purpose to which it may be desired to apply it.

This is fatal to the patent. Ames v. Howard, 1 Sumner, 487; Howe v. Abbot, 2 Story, 194; Bean v. Smalwood, id., 411; Winans v. B. & P. R. R., id., 412; Hotckiss v. Greenwood, 11 How., 266.

There is another view of the case that may properly be taken.

Evidence of the state of the art is admissible in actions at law under the general issue without a special notice, and in equity cases without any averment in the answer touching the subject. It consists of proof of what was old and in general use at the time of the alleged invention. It is received for three purposes, and none other: to show what was then old, to distinguish what was new, and to aid the court in the construction of the patent.

Of private and special facts, in trials in equity and at law, the court or jury, as the case may be, is bound carefully to exclude the influence of all previous knowledge. But there are many things of which judicial cognizance may be taken. "To require proof of every fact, as that Calais is beyond the jurisdiction of the court, would be utterly and absolutely absurd." Gres. Ev. in Eq., 294. Facts of universal notoriety need not be proved. See Taylor's Ev., § 4, note 2. Among the things of which judicial notice is taken are the law of nations; the general customs and usages of merchants; the notary's seal; things which must happen according to the laws of nature; the coincidences of the days of the week with those of the month; the meaning of words in the vernacular language; the customary abbreviations of Christian names; the accession of the chief magistrate to office and his leaving it. In this country such notice is taken of the appointment of members of the cabinet, the election and resignations of senators, and of the appointment of marshals and sheriffs, but not of their deputies. The courts of the United States take judicial notice of the ports and waters of the United States where the tide ebbs and flows; of the boundaries of the several States and judicial districts, and of the laws and jurisprudence of the several States in which they exercise jurisdiction. Courts will take notice of whatever is generally known within the limits of their jurisdiction; and if the judge's memory is at fault, he may refresh it by resorting to any means for that purpose which he may deem safe and proper. This extends to such matters of science as are involved in the cases brought before him. See 1 Greenleaf's Evidence, p. 11; Gresley's Ev., supra, and Taylor's Ev., § 4 and post.

In The Ohio L. & T. Co. v. Debolt, 16 How., 435, it was said to be "a matter of public history, which this court cannot refuse to notice, that almost every bill for the incorporation of companies" of the classes named is prepared and passed under the circumstances stated. In Hoare v. Silverlock, 12 Adolphus & Ellis, 624, N. S., it was held that where a libel charged that the friends of the plaintiff had "realized the fable of the frozen snake," the court would take notice that the knowledge of that fable existed generally in society. This power is to be exercised by courts with caution. Care must be taken that the requisite notoriety exists. Every reasonable doubt upon the subject should be resolved promptly in the negative.

The pleadings and proofs in the case under consideration are silent as to the ice-cream freezer. But it is a thing in the common knowledge and use of the people throughout the country. Notice and proof were therefore unnecessary. The statute requiring notice was not intended to apply in such cases. The court can take judicial notice of it, and give it the same effect as if it had been set up as a defense in the answer and the proof were plenary. See M. & A. Glue Co. v. Upton, 6 Patent Office Gazette, 843, and Needham v. Washburn, 7 id., 651—both decided by Mr. Justice Clifford upon the circuit. We can see no substantial diversity between that apparatus and the alleged invention of the appellee. In the former, as in the apparatus of the appellee, "the freezing mixture" has "no contact with the atmosphere" of the chamber where the work is to be done. If the freezer be full, and the preserving chamber be full, there would be room for but little air in either. If either were only partially full, the vacuum would be filed with that substance. The cold is generated by the same materials, and applied under the same circumstances. If the cream were taken out of the freezer and fish put in, there would be, in all substantial respects, the same apparatus, process, and result. If the preserving chamber were as tight as the freezer, either might be convertibly used for the purpose of the other.

"The preservative effect of cold, and especially of dry cold, is well known and exemplified in the keeping of meat and fruit in ice-houses. Animals have been found undecomposed in the ice of Siberia which belong to extinct species, and which must have been embalmed in ice for ages." Tit. "Antiseptic," 1 Amer. Encyclo., 570.

Artificial freezing is usually applied to water and articles of food. "There are two general methods of effecting it, viz: by liquification and by vaporization and expansion. The method by liquification is performed by freezing mixtures, which are formed by mixing together two or more bodies, one or all of which may be solid. They are used together in vessels having three or more concentric apartments—an inner one containing the article to be frozen; one eccentric to this containing the freezing mixture, provided with some contrivance for agitation; one, again, outside of this, filled with a non-conductor of heat, as powdered charcoal, gypsum, or cotton wool; and sometimes one between them for holding water." Tit. "Freezing," 7 id., 474.

Here the principle and substance of the appellee's claim are set forth as belonging to the general domain of knowledge and science. It is known that Lord Bacon applied snow to poultry to preserve it. He said the process succeeded "excellently well." The experiment was made in his old age, imprudently, and brought on his last illness.

Examined by the light of these considerations, we think this patent was void on its face, and that the court might have stopped short at that instrument, and without looking beyond it into the answers and testimony, sua sponte, if the objection were not taken by counsel, well have adjudged in favor of the defendant.

These views render it unnecessary to consider the exceptions to the master's report.

The decree of the circuit court is reversed, and the cause will be remanded, with directions to dismiss the bill.

U. S. DIST. COURT, D. OF OREGON.

OPINION Nov. 24, 1875.

THE ELIZA LADD.—In Admiralty.

The materials which constitute a ship become one as soon as she leaves the ways and her keel strikes the element for which she was originally designed.

A contract to furnish a ship with the means of propulsion or to change the mode of her propulsion after she is launched and afloat, is not a contract to build a ship, and is a maritime one.

Opinion by DEADY, J.

The amended libel in this case was filed October 18, 1875, and alleges, substantially, that the Eliza Ladd is a domestic vessel, propelled by steam, of the burden of 118.47 tons, and was enrolled at Portland on August 31, 1875, and is employed in navigating the waters of the Wallamet; that she was launched at Portland, near Smith's mill, in October, 1874, and on May 28, 1875, she made a voyage, in tow of another vessel, to the foot of Stark street, and there took on her boilers, engines, and machinery, the same having been in the ferry boat Portland No. 1, and from thence, on June 1, 1875, made a voyage in like manner to the libelant's works at Albina, on said Wallamet river; that on June 1, 1875, the libelant, The Oregon Iron Works, a corporation duly formed under the laws of Oregon, and engaged in business at Albina, was employed by the owner and claimant of said vessel—Joseph Knott—to furnish the material, in addition to the boilers, engines, and machinery aforesaid, and perform the labor necessary to fit, equip, and furnish said vessel for such sum as the same should be reasonably worth; that between said last mentioned date and August 18, 1875, said libelant performed said contract, and that the reasonable value of the materials and labor furnished by libelant in so doing is $1,498 in lawful money of the United States, and that no part of said sum, except $13.84, in old iron, has been paid libelants.

The claimant excepts to the libel, that the contract described therein is not a maritime one, and that this court has no jurisdiction to enforce the supposed lien incident thereto.

It is admitted that according to the ruling of the Supreme Court in People's Ferryboat v. Beers, 20 How., 393, and Roach v. Chapman, 22 How., 129, a contract to build or construct a ship, is not a maritime one, and therefore not within the admiralty jurisdiction of the United States. This rule is founded upon the assumption that such a contract is one "made on land to be performed on land." On the other hand it is admitted that, by the general maritime law of the civilized world, a contract to build a ship is a maritime contract, because it has relation to a ship as the agent or vehicle of commerce upon a navigable water. Ben. Ad., §§ 213, 264.

Under the law of the cases above cited, it is not always easy to determine what is a maritime contract. In the case in 20 Howard the contract "was for work done and materials employed in constructing the hull of a new steam ferry boat," while the case in 22 Howard was for furnishing "boilers and engines" to be placed in a steamboat at the time and place of the construction of the hull.

It is well established that a contract to furnish work and materials to be employed in making repairs on a vessel is a maritime contract. The St. Lawrence, 1 Black, 522; Peroux v. Howard, 7 Pet., 324. And in such cases, even if the vessel is a domestic one, if the local law gives the material man a lien, it may be enforced in the admiralty. The General Smith, 4 Whea., 438; The Lottawana, 21 Wall., 579.

Now repairs include all alterations and additions made to a vessel, short of destroying her identity. "A ship is always the same ship, although the original materials of which it was composed may, by successive repairs and alterations, have been in the course of time entirely changed." Ben. Ad., § 223

Suppose the Eliza Ladd to have been built and used as a barge, and that afterwards her owner had concluded to use her as steam ferry or tug boat, and for this purpose should make a contract with A B to put the necessary boilers and machinery into her, such an agreement would doubtless be a maritime contract. And yet a contract to build a steam ferry or tug boat outright would not be, under the decisions cited, a maritime contract.

My own impression is that any contract made to equip, fit or furnish a vessel after she is launched and afloat, is a maritime contract It is not in the language of 20 Howard, supra, "a contract made on land to be performed on land," but one made with reference to a ship already in existence and floating upon the element for which she was originally designed. Such a contract is to be performed on water as much as an ordinary contract of affreightment or repairs.

When the contract to build includes the fitting, furnishing and equipping also, it may be said, that as it is an entirety and not divisible, and the principal feature of it—the building and launching the hull—being non-maritime, it gives character to the whole of it.

When the contract set up in the libel was made the Eliza Ladd had been launched eight months, and for aught that appears was in the same condition she is now, as to her capacity for changing place or carrying freight and passengers, less the machinery necessary to propel her by steam. She was then, it appears to me, a ship, within the definition in Benedict's Ad., § 215—"a locomotive machine adapted to transportation over rivers, seas and oceans."

She was certainly a machine—an artificial contrivance, and one capable of locomotion or change of place, as is shown by the two short voyages she made before the performance of this contract; nor does it make any difference whether she was "propelled by the wind, the tide or paddles, by steam, by animals or by the human arm, or towed by another vessel," (Ben. Ad., 217) so that she floated in and moved through the water. Being of 118 tons burden she was also adapted to the transportation of freight and passengers so far as she had capacity for locomotion.

Separate pieces of timber or iron, or both being put together in a certain form, so as to float upon the water and transport or bear up freight or passengers, may become a ship. At what point of time is this change accomplished? I am inclined to think that the correct answer to this question is suggested in the brief for the libelant, and that it is "at the moment when she leaves the ways and her keel strikes the element for which she was originally designed." That is the moment of her birth as a ship, and the occasion when a name is usually bestowed on her. Thereafter all contracts to equip, furnish or repair this machine have direct reference to a vessel in esse with capacity for locomotion and transportation on navigable waters, and are, therefore, maritime.

Although a contract to build a ship is in fact a maritime one, under the rule laid down in 20 and 22 Poward, supra, it is to be otherwise regarded in this court. The difficulty is to determine what is included in building a ship—the contract for which, says the court, is not maritime, because it is "made on land to be performed on land." But even under that rule it seems safe to say, that a contract made after a vessel is launched and afloat, to furnish her with a particular means of propulsion as sails or steam paddles, or to change the mode of her propulsion is a maritime contract. Certainly it is not a contract to be performed on land; neither is it a contract to build, any more than any contract for repairs.

Athough this is a domestic vessel, and this work and materials were furnished in her home port, yet the libelant has a lien for the amount of his claim under § 17, p. 656 of the Oregon Code, and the contract being a maritime one, the lien may be enforced in the admiralty.

The exception is overruled.

JOHN W. WHALLY, for libelant.

E. C. BRONAUGH, for claimant.

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

OPINION FILED NOV. 4, 1875.

REUBEN C. RUTHERFORD et al. v. MARY ANN MORRIS et al.

Appeal from Adams.

CONTESTED WILL—EFFECT OF PROBATE IN COUNTY COURT—EFFECT OF VERDICT OF JURY IN CIRCUIT COURT UPON ACTION OF CHANCELLOR—EVIDENCE AS TO CAPACITY CONSIDERED—WHAT CONSTITUTES CAPACITY—UNDUE INFLUENCE—ISSUE OUT OF CHANCERY—SENILE DEMENTIA—OLD AGE DOES NOT DISQUALIFY A PERSON FROM MAKING A WILL—PREVIOUS DECLARATIONS OF TESTATOR—EFFECT TO BE GIVEN TO THE EVIDENCE OF EXPERTS CONSIDERED—IN THIS CASE THE EVIDENCE OF SIXTY COMMON-SENSE WITNESSES, NEIGHBORS OF THE TESTATOR, WAS TAKEN IN PREFERENCE TO THAT OF THE EXPERTS.

This will was not made when the testator was sick or in extremis, but at a period when the strength of his mind was equal to the purpose to which it was then applied. This is not, and cannot be disputed.

But it is said the disposition of the property is so unjust as to inspire a conviction; it was the product of undue influence, and the devices therein are so contrary to his previously expressed determination in that regard as to justify such conviction. Is this so? Who better than a father, laboring under no delusion, can appreciate the deserts of a child? Who can control such an one in the testamentary disposition of his property? This Court has said it is not uncommon that a father, in disposing of his property, is quite apt to lean in favor of those around him and in hourly and daily communication with him. His right to be so influenced none can question, and his caprices, no matter how apparently unjust, if they do not amount to insane delusion, and are not the result of undue influence, courts cannot disturb. Carmichael v. Reed, 45 Ill, 108. In Uhlich v. Muhlke, 61 ib., 499, it was said that children have no legal claim to property of living parents; that all parents have a right to judge who are the proper objects of their bounty, and if free from insane delusion or senile dementia, may give their property to aliens to their blood.

In Hauser v. Harris, 42 ib., 425, it was held that ever since the introduction of the practice of making wills, it has been universally conceded that the testator may dispose of his property by will as he pleases, and that no child has any natural right to the estate of his father. To the same effect in Clearwater v. Kimler, 43 ib., 272, which turned upon the execution of a deed, it being alleged, no consideration had been paid, the grantees being his son-in-law and daughter. The grantor having made them the recipients of his bounty, the other children had no right to complain.

How natural and how common it is for a father, in disposing of his property, to leave to the child who has been with him in his decline, and a member of his household—the sunshine of his home—and who married to a man highly appreciated by the father, is rearing a family of her own, under his own eyes, and who have nothing, that he should give them the largest share of his estate. The elder in this case had been absent from the home circle more than thirty years—had united in marriage with a gentleman possessed of a competent fortune, and whose wants were all supplied. Is it not natural the father, under such circumstances, should give to the youngest a greater share of his estate, and who has the right to question such a disposition of it?

The charge that there was a want of mental capacity, or undue influence used, is a mere pretense, not sustained by any single fact, or combination of facts in the case. That the testator in 1845 and in 1849 expressed an equal fondness for his children, and said he would make them equal, or if he made no will the law would do so, amounts to nothing. Suppose the deceased had in either of those years, or at any time previous to the 3rd of May, 1866, made a will according to those declarations, by which all his children were placed on equal grounds, would that prevent him from revoking the will for any cause deemed by him sufficient? His declaration can have no more force than a will actually executed, the power to change which cannot be denied. The youngest daughter did not marry until 1854, and on that event a new horizon was opened to his view; new hopes, new objects were created, such as influence every man in making a testamentary disposition of his property. No one can allege, with any semblance of truth, that the dispositions made by this will are so unjust as to force the conviction of senile dementia, or delusion in the testator. Appellee was well provided for. Charles Warren received as much as he would have been entitled to under the statute. The other children of Mrs. Warren were absent in the South, and do not seem to have possessed the confidence of the testator. It is apparent, that without improper influence being charged, he left his property as most sensible men would have left it under the same circumstances. But whether or not, the testator, being on the 3d of May, 1866, of good sufficient disposing mind and memory, and under no undue influence, had the clear right to dispose of his property by will as in his judgment seemed right, and no court or jury can change its destiny. Heuser v. Harris, supra. Giving to the evidence of the experts all the weight it can fairly claim, it is so completely overshadowed by the testimony of more than sixty practical, observing, sensible men, near neighbors and familiar acquaintances of the testator, and so opposed to science and our own observation, that we cannot hesitate a moment in giving to the latter a great preponderance. Contesting a will, it is only necessary to produce a few "experts" to give their understanding of mental capacity to a jury, and who may be incapable of diagnosing disease of the brain, and let it be supposed by the jury that injustice has been done by the testator, that he has not made "a fair divide," the beneficiaries have but little chance.

The jury trying this case would never have found the verdict they did had they been properly instructed by the court, and improper evidence excluded. In cases like this, all experience teaches us that juries will not be slow to set aside a will if it does not comport with their ideas of right and justice, and therefore is there an ever pressing necessity that they should be properly instructed, as to the law of the case, and no improper or irrelevant testimony allowed to go to them tending to draw their attention from the true issues in the case.

Appellants complain that certain instructions asked by them were refused. We will not particularize, but we are satisfied some of them, and the most important, were embraced in other instructions, given for them, and others presented propositions of law which, correct in themselves, the court might refuse to give without the imputation of error. But giving or withholding them, when we look at the instructions given for the appellants, could have been of no benefit or harm.

Complaint is made that the court instructed the jury for appellees. Of this we are satisfied. In cases like this, a court cannot be too careful in giving instructions. Here the only questions for the jury were: Was the testator, at the time the will bears date, of such mental capacity to attend to the ordinary affairs of life? Was the will the result of the undue influence of Reuben C. Rutherford? for this is the charge in the bill. The testimony was mainly directed to the points. The court gave to the jury this instruction: "If the jury believe from the evidence that the said John P. Robbins long prior to May 3, 1866, entertained a settled and long-cherished purpose to divide his property equally among his heirs-at-law, and if the jury further believe from the evidence that such instrument in writing, dated May 3, 1866, read in evidence and claimed by the defendants, Reuben C. Rutherford and Rebecca Maria Rutherford, to be the said Robbins' last will and testament, was not in accordance with such previous intentions of the said Robbins, that these facts should be taken into consideration by the jury in determining whether such instrument in writing was the will of the said Robbins, and also in determining whether the said Robbins was of sound mind and memory at the time of the execution of said instrument."

The objections to this instruction are so obvious as scarcely to need mention. In the first place, there is no evidence on which to base it in the latitude of expression. No witness proved the testator had entertained a settled and long-cherished purpose to divide his property equally among his heirs-at-law. All the evidence tending in that direction is the testator's answer to George Arrowsmith and one other when talking about the cholera in 1839, and about John Sharp making his will, Robbins replied, "Sharp had no children, but he had, and he served them all alike, and that the law made a good enough will for him." This falls far short of proof of entertaining such a settled and long-cherished purpose to divide his property equally or any fixed purpose whatever, and should not have been given. But it was wrong so to tell the jury, or to permit evidence of that character to go to the jury against the objection of proponents, for a previous intention to dispose of property in a particular way, no matter how fixed, is wholly immaterial. A person has been known to change the draft of his will many times—make a will and alter it in many particulars; it is wholly in his power, and he is not concluded by any thing he may have done or said prior to the execution of the will sought to be established. It does not matter, so all the authorities hold, what a testator may have said or done anterior to making his last will, as to his intention to dispose of his property. If he had made a will in 1849, executed in due form, giving his property according to our rule of descents, in a case of intestacy, no one will contend for a moment that he became trammeled thereby, and could not make a different disposition of his property. The proposition is absurd. Nor was the jury to be told as in the last branch of the instruction, if the will propounded was not in accordance with these previously expressed declarations, they should consider them in order to determine, if the writing presented was the last will of Robbins, and also for the purpose of determining the soundness of his mind and memory when he made the will. The propositions are more objectionable than the other; it was not a subject for consideration for the jury at all, for every man has an undoubted right to change his mind in regard to almost all matters, and especially as to the disposition of his property. A re-marriage or death in the family may cause a necessity for a change. Various circumstances may conspire to change a preconceived intention of a testator, and this instruction tells the jury, if we understand it, that such a change is a work of unsoundness of mind and memory, or of undue influence, which is not so understood. This instruction should not have been given. The ninth instruction in the modified terms in which it appears should not have been given, for the declarations made by the testator twenty years before he made his will, have nothing to do with making the will, nor does it tend to prove undue or other influence.

It was equally erroneous to give the fifteenth instruction for appellees. Besides being well calculated to mislead the jury, it is open to the objection urged to the eighth and ninth instructions, and embraces elements not recognized by any rules of law applicable to such cases. It is as follows:

"That in determining the question as to whether said alleged will was or was not procured to be executed by means of undue influence exercised over the said Robbins at the time of the execution of the same, as alleged in complainant's bill, it is the right and duty of the jury to consider all the evidence before them, as to the time and circumstances under which the same was made, the age and mental condition (as to strength and enfeeblement) of said Robbins, the relations at the time of said Reuben C. and Rebecca M. Rutherford to said Robbins, the feelings entertained by said Robbins towards all those persons naturally entitled to his affection and bounty, the declarations previously made by said Robbins as to his intention and purpose in regard to the final distribution of his property, the character of the provisions of the alleged will as to equity or inequity among the devises therein, and all the facts and circumstances in evidence in this case."

What have the jury to do with "the equity or inequity" of a testamentary disposition of property, made by one of sound mind and memory, and of sufficient mental capacity? This court, and all respectable courts have held that a proprietor may devise his property to whomsoever he pleases, if he be at the time of making a will, of sufficient mental capacity to transact ordinary business, and to manage the ordinary affairs of life, and making a will is of no higher order. The authorities heretofore referred to are full on this head. "The equity or inequity" of devises by a competent testator, is not a subject of inquiry by a jury, unless it may be on the point of undue influence, and on that it can have but little, if any, weight, all proof being wanting of undue influence being exercised to produce this "inequity."

The jury are in effect told, as the principal beneficiary under this will, being the daughter and son-in-law of testator and living with him in his family as members thereof, opportunities were afforded them of exerting an influence over the testator by which he was induced to change his mind, as previously expressed in regard to the disposal of his property, ergo, they did exercise an undue influence over him by which they were inequitably preferred to his other children, and the jury shall so find.

We insist, as there was a total want of evidence of undue influence, at the time of executing the will, or at any other time, exerted over the testator in any manner or form, the inequality of his testamentary disposition cannot be urged as proof of undue influence. If this was not so, no will ever made could stand if a supposed inequity exists in its various devises. The instruction was well calculated to draw the attention of the jury from the true issues in the case. Had the testator mental capacity sufficient to make a will? Was the proposed will made by the undue influence of Reuben C. Rutherford? These were the only issues, and the mere fact, that the principal beneficiaries were a part of the testator's family, is no evidence whatever they used any influence to cause the will to be made in their favor.

It was held, in Broomfield v. Broomfield, supra, that evidence showing that the testator, in his ordinary affairs, acted under the advice of the devisee, and was influenced by that advice, is not sufficient to establish the claim that he used undue influence in procuring the execution of the will. The instructions should not have been given.

When we consider the many different ideas entertained by different men of equity and justice in the various transactions of life, and the more especially in testamentary disposition of a large estate, how prone men are to question the justice of the latter, and how common the sentiment is that the children of the same parents "share and share" alike, it is quite easy to get the condemnation of a jury upon a will making an unequal disposition of the property. There is no authority for saying the "equity or inequity" of the testamentary disposition could be evidence of undue influence, or is a fit element for the consideration of a jury. Courts cannot be too careful in such cases in permitting evidence irrevalent and improper to go to the jury.

The instruction upon which we have commented substantially tell the jury that if the testator, years before the marriage of his daughter with Mr. Rutherford, had declared his intention to devise his property equally between his children, and, after the marriage, had changed his mind and devised the largest portion of it to Mrs. Rutherford, such disposition was inequitable, and the jury may find that such change and such disposition was brought about by the undue influence of Reuben C. Rutherford. This they are told in effect, when not a scintilla of evidence is produced that appellants had at any time a knowledge a will was to be made, or that it was in fact made, or any artifice, contrivance, or design of these parties, or by their instigation, to induce the testator to make a will. The influence their position gave them, as members of the family of the testator, and much beloved by him, was a legitimate influence, and no court or jury have a right to arraign a testator of mental incapacity for the inequality of his devises. But what is the proof of an undue influence on the part of Reuben C. Rutherford, for that is the issue? Absolutely nothing. Not a single fact or circumstance, save domestic relations, has been shown in evidence to establish it. There is a general concurrence in the testimony that up to 1869, three years after making the will, the testator was of sound mind and fine physical health; that up to this time he never manifested any signs of mental or physical debility, no defect of mind, memory or comprehension; was very intellectual, well read, had great power of discrimination, in general intelligence far exceeding ordinary men, of a strong mind, with very great strength of will; when he made up his mind was firm, persistent, and immovable against all opposition. To say that John P. Robbins was not of sufficient capacity to make the will in question, or was influenced unduly by others to make a will not his own, is saying what this record does not show. Who, in Quincy, up to 1869, would have had the temerity to intimate even that John P. Robbins was not of sound mind? Would Dr. Bassett dared to have so reported? Who could then have been found who entertained the notion that he could be unduly influenced by anybody? Not one, save, perhaps, the appellees in this case.

John P. Robbins was a marked and noted man among the citizens of Quincy, near which he lived for a third of a century, and his large circle of acquaintances, without a single exception, men of sense, observation and judgment, all testify he was a man of strong mind and will up to 1869, and it is proved that the attack of paralysis in that year did not wholly incapacitate him. No living man, save Dr. Bassett, questions his mental capacity, and his testimony, as has been shown, is not satisfactory. In such a case the testimony of a man claiming to be an "expert," is worth but little when placed alongside the testimony of more than sixty witnesses who knew the testator intimately, and far better than the doctor did, and who had his theories to support.

The verdict of the jury is clearly against the evidence. Valuable property honestly devised should not be lost to the devisee on such testimony as this record affords. In reviewing the whole case and the judgment rendered thereon, we cannot but regard it as another illustration of the proposition that there is nothing so absurd in fact but that it can be supported by some amount of evidence, and nothing so perverse in law but that in can be maintained with some show of authority.

We are satisfied the great preponderance of evidence is against this verdict, and that the court misdirected the jury to the prejudice of appellants.

For the reasons given, the verdict must be set aside, the decree rendered, and by direction of a majority of the court, the cause remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

WALKER, C. J.—I concur in holding that the instructions eight and fifteen, given for appellees, are erroneous, and for that reason the decree should be reversed, but I express no opinion on the weight of the evidence.

SEPARATE OPINION BY SCOTT, M'ALLISTER AND SCHOLFIELD.

We concur in reversing the decree of the court for these reasons:

First—The eighth instruction given at the instance of appellees is objectionable in singling out, and thereby giving undue prominence to particular portions of the evidence.

Second—Appellee's fifteenth instruction is obnoxious to the same objection as the eighth, and also to the further objection that it authorizes the jury to take into consideration the equitable or unequitableness of the provisions of the will as a test of mental capacity, thus to some extent making them the judges of the law, as well as the fact.

Third—The evidence fails to sufficiently satisfy us that the testator, at the time he made the will in controversy, was of unsound mind and memory, within the legal meaning of those words, or that he acted under undue influence as is charged.

Inasmuch as the case must go before another jury, we deem it unnecessary to express any further opinion upon the question discussed in argument by the respective counsel.

CRAIG, J., dissenting.

SKINNER & MARSH, and LAWRENCE, CAMPBELL & LAWRENCE, and WILLIAM MCFADON, for the appellants.

WHEAT, EWING & HAMILTON, JACKSON GRIMSHAW and H. L. WARREN, for appellees.

1. Filed after death of the debtor. — The filing of the transcript of a judgment recovered before a justice of the peace in the Circuit Court after the death of the defendant and the issue of an execution thereon, confers no right on the crediior to levy upon and sell lands of the deceased defendants, or to redeem from a prior sale, as a judgment creditor, and a sale of land in either case will be void and may be attached collaterally.

ADMINISTRATION.

2. Remedy of judgment creditors.—Where a judgment is not a lien on the land of the defendant at the time of his death, the creditor can only collect his debt in the due course of administration, and his judgment has no preference or priority over any other creditors holding ordinary demands.

3. Execution cannot issue within one and then not without notice. — When a judgment is a lien upon the land of the defendant before his death, no execution can be issued thereon before the expiration of one year after the defendant's death, and not then without three months notice to the executor or administrator as required by statute, or without a revivor by scire facias. A levy and sale in violation of these requirements is void and passes no title.

REDEMPTION.

4. Effect of, by one having no right. Where a redemption of land sold under a decree of foreclosure was made after the death of the debtor by a judgment creditor whose execution was void, and who had no right to levy and sell under the same, and the redemption money was accepted and acted upon as valid by the prior creditor, it was held that the acceptance operated to extinguish the prior sale the same as if the redemption had been properly made, and re-invested the heirs-at-law of the deceased debtor with the title to the land, and that they were not precluded from contesting the title claimed by such redeeming creditor by sale under his execution.

CHANCERY JURISDICTION.

5. Remedy at law. The loss of a justice's transcript filed in the circuit court, under which a sale of land was made, and under which a party claims title, affords no ground for equitable relief against the prosecution of an action of ejectment against him, as the remedy at law is complete by motion, on notice, in the circuit court to supply and restore the transcript.

Reitz et al. v. The People for use, etc.

ATTACHMENT.

1. Sufficiency of affidavit. Where the affidavit of a foreign attachment fails to state the place of residence of the defendants, or that on diligent inquiry the affiant is unable to ascertain the same, it will be in compliance with the statute and when judgment is by default the objection will be good on appeal or error.

2. Sheriff's return of levy. The statute requires that the sheriff's return of the levy of an attachment shall state that the property levied on is that of the defendant, or was levied on as his property.

JUDGES.

3. Holding court for another on request. When the placita of a record shows that a judge of another circuit presided at the trial it will be presumed that he did so by request of the proper judge whose duty it is to hold courts in such county. It would be well for the placita to show such fact, but it is not indispensable it should.

NOTES OF DECISIONS OF THE SUPREME COURT OF MICHIGAN.

OCTOBER TERM, 1875.

BY HENRY A. CHANEY, ATTORNEY AT LAW.

Michigan Central v. Lantz.

Error to Kalamazoo. Reversed with costs and new trial ordered. Opinion by MARSTON, J.

The charter provision permitting the Michigan Central Railroad Company to charge as warehousemen for the storage of goods left in its depots beyond a certain length of time applies not only to goods delivered by them directly to the final consignee, but to goods transferred to another carrier, as intermediate consignee, for further transportation. [Act 43 of 1846, § 16.]

The proviso in § 16 of the charter of the Michigan Central Railroad Company, that the company shall be responsible only as warehousemen for goods in deposit in any of its depots "awaiting delivery," refers to goods that are awaiting delivery to another carrier, as well as to goods destined to some final consignee on the line of the road itself.

Michigan Central v. Dolan.

Error to Jackson. Reversed with cos's and new trial granted. Opinion by CAMPBELL, J.

Notice to a person acting in a very humble or inferior capacity is not notice to his employer.

Employers, whether corporations or individuals, are not liable for the negligence of their servants, causing injury to fellow employees, unless these injuries arise out of the neglect of the employers.

Employers are bound to have safe rules of business, use care in selecting their immediate agents, and remove such persons or change such regulations as they believe to be unfit.

Employers have a right to trust that an agent or officer carefully chosen will use good judgment in making his appointments and doing his own duties, and to rest in that belief until, in the exercise of the general vigilance which devolves on them, they find they have been mistaken.

We call attention to the following opinions, reported at length in this issue:

Powers of Consuls.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States, by Bradley, J., as to the powers incident to the office of Consul. The questions discussed in this opinion are of general interest.

Patent—When Void.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States, by Swayne, J., holding a patent void on its face because the principle and substance of the patentee's claim belonged to the general domain of knowledge and science, it is also stated in such a case of what facts the court will take judicial notice. In this opinion, Judge Swayne beautifully describes the process of preserving meats by freezing.

Ship—What Constitutes—Contract to Build.—The opinion of the United States District Court for the District of Oregon, by Deady, J., holding that the materials which constitute a ship become one as soon as she leaves the ways, and her keel strikes the element for which she was originally designed; that a contract to furnish a ship with the means of propulsion or to change the mode of her propulsion, after she is launched and afloat, is not a contract to build a ship, and is a maritime one.

Real Estate Case.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of Michigan, by Graves, J., deciding several interesting questions relating to the title of real estate.

U. S. S. Court Adjourned.—The Supreme Court of the United States adjourned on Friday, the 17th inst., until Monday, January 3rd.

The College of Law.—The incidental lectures before the Union College of Law, during the first two and a half months of the present term, have been as follows: By Emery A. Storrs, two lectures, one on "Legal Definitions" and one on "Magna Charta"; by James P. Root, four lectures on "The Constitution of Illinois," one on "Corporations," and one on "Taxation and Eminent Domain"; by Obadiah Jackson, one on "The Practice in Tax Cases"; by John Borden, one on "Executions and Judgment Liens"; by Josiah H. Bissell, two on "Bankruptcy," and one on "Trust Deeds and Mortgages in Illinois"; by Judge Forrester, one on "The Statutes of Mortmain and Uses," one on "Reversions and Remanders," and one on "Powers"; by Leonard Swett, one on "How a Young Lawyer should go to work to become Eminent in his Profession"; by George Gardner, one on "Abstracts of Title"; by A. M. Pence, one on Limitations on the Jurisdiction of Courts"; by C. C. Bonney, one on "Legal Maxims and Principles," one on "The Relation of Counsel and Client," one on "Office Practice," and one on "Court Practice"; by Prof. Cumnock, one on "Elocution"; by Floyd B. Wilson, one on "Elocution," and one by W. C. Lyman on "Elocution"; by Prof. Denslow, twelve lectures on "Justinian's Institutes of the Roman Law," fifteen on "Criminal Law," and five lectures of a course on "Political Economy"; by Dr. N. S. Davis, twelve lectures of a course of twenty on "Medical Jurisprudence." The above lectures are in addition to the regular daily instruction of students, in the text-books by the Faculty, consisting of Judges Booth, Trumbull and Doolittle, and Profs. Hurd and Denslow. We doubt if any other school of legal instruction in the United States has afforded so diversified or thorough a course of instruction during the same period.

DIRECT THE JUDICIAL FORCE.

There are judges enough in the State of Illinois to dispose of all the cases brought in the State, within a reasonable time, if the cases were properly distributed among them. If Chief Justice Scott, of the Supreme Court, had the power to assign judges and distribute cases according to the wants of the different localities, the crowded dockets of some of our circuit courts could soon be cleared, and kept clear without any additional expense to the State. In England the Lord High Chancellor commands and directs in such matters as a general would his army. In order that our readers may form a correct idea of his power, and how he exercises it, we give the following order, entered by him in the chancery division of the high court of chancery on the 10th of last month:

Whereas, from the the present state of the business before the Master of Rolls and the Vice-Chancellor Sir Richard Marlins and Sir James Bacon, respectively, it is expedient that a portion of the causes set down to be heard before the Master of the Rolls and the Vice-Chancellor Sir Richard Marlins should be transferred to the book of causes for hearing before the Vice-Chancellor Sir James Bacon: Now, I, the Right Honorable Hugh MacCalmont Baron Cairns, Lord High Chancellor of Great Britain, do hereby order that the several causes set forth in the 1st and 2d schedules hereunto subjoined, be accordingly transferred from the books of causes standing for hearing before the Master of the Rolls and the Vice-Chancellor Sir Richard Malins, to the book of causes for hearing before the Vice-Chancellor Sir James Bacon. And I do further order that all causes so to be transferred (although the bills in such causes may have been marked for the Master of the Rolls and the Vice-Chancellor Sir Richard Malins, respectively, and notwithstanding any orders therein made by the Master of the Rolls and the Vice-Chancellor Sir Richard Malins, respectively, or their predecessors) shall hereafter be considered and taken as causes originally marked for the Vice-Chancellor Sir James Bacon; provided, nevertheless, that no order made by the Master of the Rolls and the Vice-Chancellor Sir Richard Malins, respectively, or their predecessors, in any such causes shall be varied or reversed otherwise than by the Court of Appeals. And this order is to be drawn up by the registrar, and set up in the several offices of the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice.

PARTNERSHIP—DISSOLUTION—JUDGMENT IN FOREIGN STATE.

No. 42. Hall & Lybrand v Lanning et al. Error to the Circuit Court for the northern district of Illinois. Opinion by Bradley, J. This was an action of debt brought on a judgment rendered in New York against the plaintiffs in error as partners. Lybrand questioned the judgment, alleging that he had not been served with process and did not appear, and that he was not a partner with Hall at the date of the judgment and had not been for more than six months before. The decision below was that the judgment was conclusive against Lybrand, notwithstanding his plea and his non-residence in New York. It is here held that after the dissolution of a copartnership one of the partners in a suit brought against the firm has no authority to enter an appearance for other partners living out of the State, and who have not been served with process, and that a judgment against all partners founded on such an appearance may be questioned by those not served with process in a suit brought thereon in another State and will not bind them. Reversed. Dissenting, Waite, C. J., Strong, J., Hunt, J.

No. 44. Phillips & Holby Construction Company v. Mark T. Seymour et al. In error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the northern district of Illinois. Justice Miller delivered the opinion, reversing the judgment of the Circuit Court with costs, and remanding the cause for further proceedings in conformity with the opinion of this court.

FRAUDULENT PREFERENCE—EVIDENCE OF CO-CONSPIRATOR.

No. 58. Nudd and Noe v. Burrows, assignee, etc. Error to the Circuit Court for the district of Illinois. Opinion by Swayne, J. This was an action by the defendant, here assignee in the bankruptcy of one Emmons, to recover certain money and property received of the bankrupt by the plaintiffs in error. The claim was that the property received was stock bought largely on credit at a time when Emmons was hopelessly insolvent, and that this fact was at the time known to the defendants, and that the transaction amounted to a fraudulent preference of creditors. The court below found the allegation true, having admitted as evidence the declarations of Emmons concerning the purchase of the stock, and the payment to the plaintiffs in error, notwithstanding the declarations were not made in the presence of either of them or brought to their knowledge. The court here affirm the judgment, sustaining the theory of the assignee that the evidence was competent, being the declarations of a co conspirator.

No. 57. The First Unitarian Society, of Chicago, v. H. F. Faulkner et al. In error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the northern district of Illinois. Clifford, J., delivered the opinion, affirming the judgment of the Ciriuit Court with costs and interest.

Joseph Buck, Jr. Appeal from the Circuit Court of the United States for the district of Massachusetts. Waite, C. J., delivered the opinion, affirming the decrees of the Circuit Courts in these causes with costs.

No. 75. James H. Woodford et al. v. The Canastota National Bank. In error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the northern district of New York. Waite, C. J., announced the decision of the court, affirming the judgment of the Circuit Court with costs and interest, on authority of Kennedy v. Gibson, 8 Wall., 498, and Farmers and Mechanics National Bank of Buffalo v. Dearing, decided at the present term.

No. 50. Isaac A. Bressler v. Nelson Maxson et al. In error to the Supreme Court of the State of Illinois. Waite, C. J., announced the decision, dismissing the writ of error for want of jurisdiction, on authority of St. Clair v. Lovingston, 18 Wall., 628, and Moore v. Robbins, 18 Wall., 588.

RELIGIOUS TOLERATION.

The Jews, persecuted everywhere else, were in New Netherland protected from insult, and it is to the credit of both the Dutch and English successors in the colony that there is no stain of blood on them based upon condemnation for religious opinions.

Although it must be admitted that the Dutch were honest, humane, and just, hospitable, kind, and friendly to their neighbors, equally with the grim New Englanders and the haughty Virginians, with both of whom they traded, their town being a sort of trading entrepot for both colonies, and besides that they were not deficient in matters of taste and refinement, still, when Mr. Gerard claims for them that they were "the leading people on this continent in civil and religious freedom, in commercial enterprise, and in culture, he lays himself open to contradiction from those who would claim that Maryland and Rhode Island ought not to be forgotten as pioneers in religious freedom; that culture and commercial enterprise marked the progress of each colony as it emerged from its first struggle with the wilderness and savage foes.—Legal Trials of the Dutch Period, in New York Sun.

We have received the following opinion through the courtesy of the law firm of BONNEY, FAY & GRIGGS, of this city:

SUPREME COURT OF MICHIGAN.

OCTOBER TERM, 1875.

GEORGE LIGARE v. JAMES SEMPLE and others.

Appeal from Delta.—In Equity.

1. Defendants purchased of complainant a large quantity of land, giving for part of the purchase price two conditional notes, secured by mortgage on the lands; by the conditions of the notes, one was not to become due and payable until the complainant should obtain a release of a certain "apparent right of dower" existing on some of the lands, or until such "apparent right of dower should otherwise cease to exist"; and the other was not to become due and payable until the complainant should "clear up" the taxes and tax-titles standing against the lands. Held, that the court, being called upon to administer the doctrines of equity, would look at the essence and substance of the transaction, and only require such performance of the conditions as would give the defendants a fair, marketable title. Held, further, that the court would look into the facts of the case to see if there was any real or "apparent right of dower" at the time the notes were given, and would not require complainant to obtain a release of that which did not exist.

2. Under the statutes of Michigan, a woman who resides with her husband out of the State at the time the husband alone conveys lands within the State, has no contingent or inchoate right of dower in the lands so conveyed, and the facts being conceded, she has no "apparent right of dower."

3. A married woman cannot be made a party to a foreclosure suit in a case like this, for the purpose of litigating her supposed inchoate right of dower, nor were there any other legal proceedings open to complainant as between him and such married woman to test the matter.

4. There being no right of dower, nor "apparent right" at the time of the transaction: Held, that the failure of complainant to obtain a release was no defense to the note.

5. Held, that in determining the question whether the tax-titles were extinguished, the court must act upon the evidence given; would not speculate upon possibilities, but determine from the evidence; and if, upon the proof, any tax-titles that were standing against the lands at the time of the transaction appeared to be extinguished, whether through the agency of the complainant or otherwise, they must be considered out of the way.

6. One who is a tenant, in common with others, of lands, can acquire no title adversely to his cotenants, by buying the lands for taxes levied thereon while he was such co-tenant. Nor will the purchase by him in the name of others create any title in such third persons adverse to his cotenants.

7. Held, that the purchase by complainant of tax-titles, for taxes levied after he had parted with his interest in the lands, prima facie cut off all prior tax-titles, and "cleared up" such prior titles, so as to satisfy the condition of the second note.

8. Where the condition had not been entirely performed before the filing of the bill, but complainant appeared on the hearing to be then able and willing to perform: Held, that he should have a reasonable time to do such things as were found still undone, on which performance he should be allowed to foreclose his mortgage.

Opinion by GRAVES, J.

On the 22d of March, 1867, the complainant deeded to defendants, Semple, Lynch and McDonald, the undivided one-half of certain described parcels of land, situated in the counties of Delta, Menominee and Marquette, the area of the whole parcels being more than seventeen hundred acres. At the same time, complainant and his wife being separate and respective owners of other tracts in the same counties, amounting to more than three thousand three hundred acres, joined in deeding them also to the same parties. The agreed purchase price for the transfers was $42,000, and of this sum $32,000 was to be secured by the personal obligations of the grantees, and their mortgage on the premises. Of the undivided half-interest mentioned, the most of it had been deeded to complainant May 28, 1864, by Elijah Peacock and wife and one Joseph Peacock, the latter being married, but his wife not having joined. This fact that Mrs. Peacock was not a party to the deed to complainant was known when the latter deeded to the three defendants, and at the same time it was also understood that there were outstanding tax titles against some portions of the land.

In this state of things, and after some parley respecting Mrs. Peacock's real and seeming rights, and concerning the tax titles, the particulars of which may be waived for the present, the securities for the $32,000 purchase money were drawn, executed, and delivered, and two of the personal obligations were framed as follows:

"$8,000. Escanaba, Delta Co., Mich., March 22, 1867. On or before the first day of August, in the year 1869, for value received, we jointly and severally promise to pay to the order of George Ligare the sum of eight thousand dollars, with interest at seven per cent. per annum from date, it being understood by the payers and payee of this note that the sum of money to be paid by this note, or any part thereof, shall not become due or payable until the payee hereof shall, at his own expense, obtain a release of an apparent right of dower that exists in the person of Margaret Peacock on some of the lands for which this note is given as part payment, or said apparent right of dower shall otherwise cease to exist.

JAMES SEMPLE.
JOHN LYNCH.
JOHN S. MCDONALD."

"$3,000. Escanaba, Delta Co., Mich., March 22, 1867. On or before the first day of August, 1869, for value received, we jointly and severally promise to pay to the order of George Ligare the sum of three thousand dollars, with interest at seven per cent. per annum from date.

The amount of money called for in this note shall not be payable until the said Ligare shall, at his own expense, clear up the taxes and tax titles standing against the lands for which this note is given in part payment.

JAMES SEMPLE.
JOHN LYNCH.
JOHN S. MCDONALD."

Some time after these obligations were given, and prior to August, 1869, complainant claimed that, in truth, Mrs. Peacock had no right of dower when his deed was given to defendants, and that the payment of the $8,000 was not rightly subject to be deferred on account of any right in her. The defendants, on the other hand, insisted that payment could not be required of them until what they called her apparent right was, in some way, released or removed; and, subsequently, the precise time not appearing, they offered $13,000 on the obligation, but subject to the proviso that it should be made to appear, by abstract or otherwise, that the conditions appended to the obligations had been carried out.

Finally, the two securities remaining unpaid, the complainant, on the 20th of June, 1872, filed this bill to enforce payment, by foreclosure, and also to subject the lands for taxes alleged to have been paid by complainant to protect his mortgage security.

The three makers of the mortgage and of the foregoing instruments were made defendants, and with them were joined the other parties, in character of subsequent purchaser incumbrancers, or otherwise.

All answered, and set forth, as final ground of defense, that the conditions attached to the obligations had not been performed, and hence, that no part of the money had yet fallen due.

Proofs were taken, and, the cause coming on upon final hearing, the court below dismissed the bill, and complainant appealed.

On the hearing, in this court, the cause was elaborately argued on the part of complainant, but was submitted by defendants on a printed brief. The basis of the defense was combated on different grounds, but it is not deemed needful to examine all the propositions made.

The defense to the obligation for $8,000 may be first considered, and it seems scarcely necessary to say that this court, called on to administer the doctrines of equity in a case of this nature must look at the essence and substance of the transaction and endeavor to guard against any construction likely to infringe any settled principle of the court.

It is well in approaching the question to notice somewhat the positions occupied by the parties and also some other facts. The complainant desired to sell the real property interest in question, and the three defendants were anxious to buy it. The purchase price was agreed upon, and this was considered fair if the defendants received what they bargained for. The money specified in this obligation is a portion of that price, and if withheld is so much taken therefrom. If it is withheld whilst the defendants hold a title free from legal objection, it is in effect so much forfeited to them out of the consideration. They are allowed to retain a large amount of complainant's property without compensation. What complexion does the transaction wear in regard to any right in defendants to withhold this $8,000? The restriction does not touch the existence or justness of the debt. It looks merely to the postponement of payment, and the impediment named is an outstanding apparent right of dower in Mrs. Peacock. When the three defendants made the obligation, they well knew that Mrs. Peacock was a resident of Illinois and not of this State at the time her husband deeded to complainant. This is shown by the answer and by the depositions of McDonald and Lynch, and the latter swears that the record of title showed it.

They further swear that their counsel informed them that in truth Mrs. Peacock had no right of dower because she lived out of the State, but that she had an apparent right, and Lynch testifies that the want of her signature to the deed was the circumstance which produced the apparent right.

McDonald further testifies that the condition was added because the question of dower was a subject of doubt among them all, and that the course adopted was taken to enable the matter to be then closed up, and to allow until the notes should be due to clear up the record. He says, "all we expected was for them to give us a perfect title with a record that was clear. Didn't expect to quibble about little and unnatural things; wanted a title that was good to keep or good to sell."

Lynch says "all parties agreed there was an apparent right of dower which existed in Mrs Peacock. All we wanted was to be satisfied that we had a good, fair title; we wanted the records to show this." Semple says, "the phrase, apparent right of dower, meant, as I understood, when Mr. Ligare made his title clear, the note was to be good. To make the title clear Mr. Ligare was to get Mrs. Peacock to sign the deed or to clear it up in some other way. The word apparent was put there to cover a supposed right which might exist."

The fair deduction from the defendants' explanation, is that they were to be made satisfied that Mrs. Peacock had no right of dower, and satisfied that the state of the record did not imply that she had. Accepting this view, they were bound to be satisfied on reasonable evidence, and are not at liberty to close their eyes against law and fact, and arbitrarily insist that they are not satisfied.

It is noticeable that Ligare tried to get Mrs. Peacock to give a release and that she refused. That she could not be compelled to make such a paper is too plain for argument, and we are not aware of any legal proceeding open to Ligare to make it less apparent that she has any right.

When defendants' counsel informed them she had no right at all they were certainly correct. The facts were all understood. This is admitted. And it was just as certain in view of those facts that no contingent right remained outstanding on her account, as it would have been if it had been known she had died in the life-time of her husband.

The precise point was not directly in judgment in Pratt v. Tefft, 14 Mich., 191, but it was strongly intimated. It was there held that in case a woman should reside here with her husband at the time of his conveyance, and thereafter should move away, and reside abroad at the time of his death, she would lose all right of dower in land so conveyed, and this was put upon the ground that the statute contained a negative implication against any right in her in case of her non-residence at her husband's death. Admitting this construction to be correct, the legislative purpose is much plainer to withhold the right in case she resides abroad when her husband conveys. The estate he has once absolutely conveyed, he cannot be seized of at his death, and the woman, if a non-resident, is only allowed a right of dower in lands of which her husband dies seized.

It is true, he may become seized anew or rather of a new estate in the same lands, and may die so seized, but in such case the second seizin and estate would not be identical with the first but separate and distinct, and any right of dower as regards the last would have no legal connection whatever with the first. If the woman is a non-resident at the time her husband conveys absolutely, and divests himself entirely of his seizin and estate, there can be nothing for the right of dower to attach to.

She is a non-resident and the estate and seizin are gone, and the same estate and seizin can never return.

Mrs. Peacock then, in fact, had no right of dower. The circumstance showing she had none was known. One of defendants swears that the record disclosed it. She had no apparent right in any proper sense, and of course no right subject to be released. There was as absolutely no more appearance of a right on her account, than there would have been if she had died the day after her husband's deed to complainant. Such being the case, the substance and essence of the transaction require nothing more. In no just sense is there any apparent right on account of Mrs. Peacock, and it would be very absurd for a court to say that complainant ought not to have his money until something which does not exist is made to cease to exist. The equity depends upon the existence or non-existence of the thing, and not upon fruitless subtleties.

There are other considerations springing from equitable analogies which lead to the same final conclusion, but the case does not require their presentation.

We cannot assent to the notion advanced by the learned counsel for defendants, that it is incompetent to find in this suit that Mrs. Peacock has no shadow of right inasmuch as she is not a party. It would have been irregular to have joined her as a party in this case in order to raise a litigation with her on this matter. Chamberlain v. Lyell, 3 Mich., 448; Merchant's Bank and Thompson, 55 N. Y., 7; Lewis v. Smith, 9 N. Y., 502.

And yet we have a complete case between complainant and defendants, and the point concerning Mrs. Peacock's right is as between such parties directly raised, and if as between them the court is powerless to decide, the consequence must be that no judicial settlement as regards the rights of the actual litigants can ever be had.

The difficulty suggested would be the same in principle if in a separate proceeding against Mrs. Peacock she had been finally adjudged to be without right. Because in such a state of things the adjudication would have to be introduced here when she is not a party. As the case is constituted with all the governing facts admitted, the statute decides, and there is no room for argument, no room for question as between these parties, a contrary opinion would require the court to insist upon the bringing in of the assignor of a mortgage in a fareclosure by the assignee when the admitted facts conclusively demonstrate that in point of law the assignment is absolute and complete.

Upon the whole we think no defense is made out on this record against the claim based on the obligation given for eight thousand dollars.

We next come to the resistance made to the foreclosure in respect to the obligation entered into for the payment of the three thousand dollars of the purchase money. The restrictive clause of that obligation declared that the money should not be payable until the payee should, at his own expense, clear up the taxes and tax titles standtng against the lands, for which the instrument was given in part payment.

This is not very plain or definite. The end to be accomplished was the clearing up, and in what that was to consist the parties did not explain if there was any distinct notion on the subject in their minds. No mode of action was suggested, and we can only suppose that the course was meant to be left to Ligare's discretion.

The parties were mutually eager to trade, and the oral testimony given by the defendants, who made the bargain with complainant, tends to show what we should infer without it, that nothing unfair or technical or unreasonable was intended or expected. All were business men and disposed to act upon practical business principles. No sharp advantage was thought of, nor any overreaching contemplated.

The three defendants were seeking to secure the fair marketable title in the undivided half of numerous tracts, and against this interest there were many traces more or less distinct of tax interests. They well understood that this was not an unusual thing, but common experience in regard to lands throughout many parts of the State, and especially in lumber and mining districts and in the region where the lands in question lie. They also knew that quite commonly indications of standing tax interests are really fallacious and liable to be dissipated by examinations and inquiry.

They were likewise aware that it sometimes happens that marks exist of an old tax sale, and yet the holder can not be found. As it was, time was lacking for investigation. Under these circumstances the arrangements in question were made, and it should be construed and applied in an equitable spirit. To enforce it in any extreme sense would be harsh and unreasonable, and would disappoint what we must think to have been the true purpose. If the judgment of the court comes short of what the defendants consider right, it must be remembered that the terms they dictated in the paper on being applied to the subject matter, are greatly wanting in clearness and precision.

It can hardly be imagined that if successful in getting a good marketable title, one not liable to be defeated on account of prior taxes, the defendants were still to be excused from paying the purchase money.

The stipulation as to taxes and tax titles was framed expressly to apply to such as were then standing against the interest for which the note was given in part payment, and whatever signs there were of taxes or tax titles, if in fact the taxes or tax titles so suggested were not then standing against the property, they were not made subject to be cleared up. And if without the aid of defendants, any taxes or tax titles which were standing at the time complainant deeded, have been since extinguished or been made to be not standing against the interest deeded, they have been cleared up within the spirit of the transaction. If any remain still outstanding, though subject to complainant's control, they ought to be considered in shaping the disposition of the case.

All of these matters must be decided upon the evidence given. If upon the proof, it turns out that any indicated taxes or tax titles were not standing against the land, giving the proof on the subject its due bearing and operation, then, for the purpose of this case, such indicated taxes or tax titles must be considered as out of the way. And if, upon the proof thus construed and applied it appears that any which were standing against the deeded property have, since the deed, been extinguished or caused to be not standing, through other means than the defendant's, they must be considered for the purpose of this case as cleared up.

We cannot speculate upon possibilities. We can only deal with the issues in the case upon the evidence given in the case, and we must look at this evidence according to its nature and aptness. There may be something beyond the record, but we cannot assume that there is. We may as well in any other case as in this, step aside and conjecture a state of things not disclosed to us.

It seems best to enter into some details even at the risk of being tedious.

[A review of the several conveyances here made sets forth:

That, January 28th, 1856, Joseph Peacock and wife deeded to complainant the undivided one-half of a portion of the lands claimed to be affected by the tax titles:

That, Oct. 28th, 1862, Joseph Peacock deeded to Elijah Peacock the undivided half of a portion of those contained in the above mentioned deed, together with others, also claimed to be covered by tax titles:

That, May 28th, 1864, Elijah Peacock and wife and Joseph Peacock deeded to complainant the undivided half of all the lands not deeded to him before:

That, Dec. 14th, 1866, Joseph Peacock and wife and Elijah Peacock and wife conveyed by warranty deed, to the defendants, Semple, Lynch & McDonald, the undvided half of the lands owned jointly by the Peacocks and complainant, which included all the lands against which defendants claimed there were outstanding tax titles: and

That, March 22d, 1867, complainant and wife, by deed of warranty, conveyed to the same defendants the undivided half of the same lands, and received the $3,000 obligation above set forth for a part of the purchase money.]

The lands to which the restriction in it relates comprise twenty-three parcels in Delta county, three in Menominee, and eight in Marquette county.

In tracing them, it will be most convenient to follow the plan of complainant's counsel, and number them from one to thirty-one, giving to number sixteen four parcels. Following this arrangement, the parcels numbered from one to twenty, inclusive, lie in Delta; from twenty-one to twenty-three, inclusive, in Menominee, and the remainder in Marquette.

Before proceeding, however, with this list, it is proper to premise that it appears, from the evidence, and especially by the deposition of Joseph Peacock, who was called and sworn for defendants, that S. Q. Perry and Elijah Peacock, who seem to have bid in several parcels, for different years, acted, in so doing, for Joseph Peacock, and that in substance and effect their purchases were his purchases.

[The court here reviews condition of the several parcels upon which tax titles were claimed to be outstanding at the time of the conveyance from complainant to defendants, with the following result:

The parcels numbered 1, 2, 4, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, and 17, had been purchased by one C. W. Butler, at sundry tax sales, before conveyance by complainant, and Butler had since then quitclaimed to complainant, who offered to turn over the interest acquired from Butler to defendants. Held sufficient.

The parcels numbered 1, 3, 4, 5, 8, 11, 12, 19, 20, 21, 22, and 23, had been purchased for taxes of 1859, and some other years prior to complainant's conveyance, by S. Q. Perry; but the court held, under the proofs, that the purchases made in the name of Perry were really the purchases of Joseph Peacock, who was, at the time of acquiring such tax titles, a part owner of the land; that Peacock and complainant, being tenants in common at the time, and Perry's purchase being the purchase of Peacock, the purchase was, in effect, a payment of the tax, as against complainant, and not an acquisition of an interest. Page v. Webster, 8 Mich., 263; Butler v. Porter, 13 Mich., 292. Therefore, no tax title interest was outstanding at the time of filing the bill, on account of the Perry purchases.

Complainant and Joseph Peacock had, before the sale by complainant, bid off certain of the lands for taxes of various years, and Elijah Peacock, brother of Joseph Peacock, had bid off some. The greater part of them had been so bid off while the parties held the lands as tenants in common, and all of them had, since such purchases, been conveyed by the two Peacocks and complainant to defendants. Held, therefore, that no tax titles were outstanding on account of these purchases.

The parcels numbered 21, 22, 23, 24, 26, 27, 28, and 29, were sold for taxes of sundry years to various persons prior to the sale by complainant. Since complainant's conveyance, the same parcels had been sold for taxes of several years, and complainant had acquired the title of the purchasers at such sales, and offered in his bill to turn them over to defendants. The court say "these later purchases are presumptively sufficient to cut off the purchases by White and others, and 'clear up the taxes and tax titles,' and the theory of complainant's case is understood as contemplating that use of them."

The parcels numbered 30 and 31 had been purchased by different persons for taxes of several years, but later tax titles had been purchased by one of complainant's counsel, which were offered to be turned over to defendants. Held sufficient to presumptively cut off all former titles.

The court concludes the opinion as follows:]

This examination doubtless might have been greatly abridged, and probably with advantage. But the nature of the case induced me to think it safer to set out descriptions and repeat dates, statements, and explanations, than to attempt a shorter and less tedious course.

As it is, the view shows, not of course with the certainty of demonstration, not in a way to exclude possibilities, but with such degree of moral certainty as the case admits of, such reasonable certainty as is afforded by such proofs as have been put in, and on which a decision must be based, if any decision is made.

First—That, as to several parcels, no taxes or tax titles were standing when the mortgage was made.

Second—That, as to others, there were prima facie tax title interests outstanding at that time, but which were "cleared up" before the bill was filed.

Third—That, as to others still, there were prima facie outstanding tax title interests which are now susceptible of being "cleared up" by proper transfers by complainant and his counsel. Mr. Ball, and that, without such transfers, tax titles will be still standing.

Some strong objections to the defense, and going to the validity of the tax proceedings in the three counties for a number of years, have not been considered.

They reach a great way beyond the cause, and the decision now called for does not imperatively require their solution.

The complainant was entitled to foreclose on account of the first obligation, and he appears to be now in a situation to meet the requirement in the restrictive clause of the second. He was, apparently, not in such situation when the bill was filed.

Under the circumstances, and by analogy to the rule in cases of specific performance, which allows relief if the party is able to make a good title before final decree (3 Par. on Con., 381 and notes, last ed.; Foy on Sp. Per., 2 Am. ed., p. 413, §§ 871, 872, 873), it appears to me that complainant should have reasonable time to cause to be transferred to his mortgagors, subject to his mortgage, the Ball tax title interest hereinbefore mentioned, and reasonable time for himself to transfer to his mortgagors, subject to his mortgage, the tax title rights and interests which he obtained from Butler by the deed or deeds mentioned of May 24th, 1872, and such as he obtained by the deed or deeds from the State mentioned of April 22d, 1873, and such as he acquired by the deed or deeds from Butler, referred to, of September 24th, 1870, and those he got by the deed or deeds from Walton of June 8th, 1872, and by deed or deeds of April, 1873, as Walton's assignee, and those he obtained by the deed or deeds of June 10th, 1872, on account of the Bishop purchase.

In case these transfers are made, I think he should be allowed to foreclose on account of both obligations, but ought not to recover interest on the second subsequent to the first day of August, 1869.

In case of failure to make, or cause to be made, these transfers, then I think his bill should stand dismissed as to the second obligation, but without prejudice. In either event he should be allowed to foreclose, as to the first obligation, for principal and interest.

The claim on account of subsequent taxes, paid, as was said, to protect the mortgage, is understood to be waived. If not, there would be much difficulty in drawing any distinct line between tax matters of that sort, relating to the undivided half in question, and those needful to meet the necessities of the restriction in the obligation.

If the court below had decreed for complainant on the eight thousand dollar demand, I should have thought differently from what I do now upon the question of costs. As the case is situated, I am of opinion that the decree of the Circuit Court should be reversed, and that a decree should be entered here in conformity with the views here stated, and allowing complainant the cost of both courts, and that the case should be remanded for further proceedings.

The east half of the southwest quarter of section thirty (30), township thirty-seven (37), north range fourteen (14) east of the third principal meridian. Also the north twenty-five (25) acres of the west half of the southwest quarter of said section thirty (30), township and range aforesaid, excepting, however, the right of way of the Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific Railroad Company over said first mentioned tract of land, to secure the payment of three certain promissory notes of even date with said trust deed made by said Benjamin P. Hinman, for the sum of fifteen thousand eight hundred and thirty-seven dollars and ninety-six cents (15,837.96) each, and each of said notes payable in one, two and three years from the date thereof, respectively, and each of said notes bearing interest at the rate of eight per centum per annum payable annually, and each payable to the order of Ernst Uhlich, Christian Kruger and John Sorgenfrei, trustees and executors of the last will and testament of Ludwig Kruger, deceased.

And whereas, it is further provided in said trust deed, that in case of default in the payment of said promissory notes, or either of them, or interest, as aforesaid, or of a breach of any of the covenants or agreements in said trust deed contained, the whole of said principal of said promissory notes, and the interest thereon to the time of sale, may at once, at the option of the legal holder thereof, become due and payable, and the said premises be sold, in the manner and with the same effect as if the said indebtedness had matured.

TRUSTEE'S SALE.—WHEREAS, SPARROW M. Nickerson, by his certain trust deed bearing date September 21st, A. CHICAGO LEGAL NEWS.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 25, 1875.

The Courts.

UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT.

No. 27.—OCTOBER TERM, 1875.

THOMAS J. SEMMES, claimant of six lots of ground, plaintiff in error, v. THE UNITED STATES.

In error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Louisiana.

CONFISCATION—OPENING DECREE—RIGHTS OF PURCHASER—EFFECT OF PARDON ON PROCEEDING — PRESIDENT'S PROCLAMATION.

1. POWER TO AMEND.—That the alleged preliminary defect is one of form, and that the power to amend all process returnable to the Circuit Court is vested in that court as fully as it is in the Supreme Court.

2. REVERSING DECREE.—That the decree of the Circuit Court ought not to be reversed for a defect of form in the process, which is amendable by the express words of an act of Congress.

3. EFFECT OF AMNESTY PROCLAMATION.—That it is not correct to suppose legal proceedings against the property of the respondent were dismissed by the amnesty proclamation, or that the amnesty proclamation provided for the restoration of all rights of property to persons engaged in the rebellion; on the contrary the proclamation contains the express exception as "to property with regard to slaves," and "in cases of legal proceedings under the laws of the United States."

4. THE DECREE IN THIS CASE.—That the decree in this case was entered before the amnesty proclamation, and was not affected by it.

5. JURISDICTION.—That complete jurisdiction of this cause was vested in the Circuit Court by virtue of the writ of error, and the Circuit Court having reversed the second decree of the District Court, might proceed to pass such decree as should have been passed by the subordinate court, and if a decree confirming the sale was necessary, it was competent for the Circuit Court to pass such a decree.

6. PROCEEDINGS UNDER ACT — PARDON —That such proceedings under the confiscation act in question are justified as an exercise of belligerent rights against a public enemy, and are not in their nature a punishment for treason, consequently confiscation being a proceeding distinct from and independent of the treasonable guilt of the owner of the property confiscated, pardon for treason will not restore rights to property previously condemned and sold in the exercise of belligerent rights as against a purchaser in good faith and for value.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

Mr. Justice CLIFFORD delivered the opinion of the court.

Proceedings in rem were instituted in the District Court, on the seventh of August, 1863, under the confiscation act of the seventeenth of July in the same year, against certain real property of the respondent, which proceedings resulted, on the fifth of April, 1865, in the condemnation of the property described in the libel. On the eleventh of the same month a writ of venditioni exponas was issued, commanding the marshal to sell the property, on the eighteenth of the same month; but the marshal did not sell the same on that day, for the reason, as appears by his return, that the best price bid at the time and place of the sale did not amount to two-thirds of the appraised value of the property, and for the reason stated the marshal with drew the property from sale and again advertised the same for sale, as directed by the prior order of the court.

Two lots of land were embraced in the libel and the decree of condemnation which, in fact, were not the property of the respondent. Accordingly the true owner of the same in the meantime, to wit, on the second of May, 1865, filed a petition in the same court, setting forth his right to the two lots in question, and stating that they were improperly advertised for sale by the marshal, and prayed the court to open the decree to allow him to assert his title.

Consent in writing to that effect having been given by the district attorney, the court subsequently entered a decree opening the decree of condemnation for the purpose of enabling the petitioner to submit to the court his claim to those lots, as evidenced by the proofs on file. Pursuant thereto the court, on the thirty-first of May, in the same year, rendered judgment restoring those two lots to the intervenor, as claimed in his petition.

Such correction of the decree of condemnation having been made, the return of the marshal shows that he sold the residue of the lots condemned, in pursuance of the second advertisement, to E. W. Burbank, for the amount specified in the record, and that he paid the money over to the clerk of the court.

On the fourth of March, 1868, the respondent having first suggested that the decree of condemnation had been opened and that a portion of the property libeled had never been condemned by any subsequent decree, moved the court to set aside the default against him, and for leave to file his claim and answer. Hearing was had on the motion, and the court ordered that the purchaser of the property should be made a party to the rule. Burbank, the purchaser, accordingly appeared and filed an exception to the rule, that his rights as purchaser could not be questioned in such a form of proceeding, and offered in evidence the deed of the marshal and the decree of condemnation, together with the writ of venditioni exponas. Both parties were again heard, and the court, on the fifteenth of April, in the same year, over ruled the exceptions of the purchaser and set aside the default of the respondent, and granted him leave to file his claim and answer.

Leave to that effect having been granted, the respondent filed his answer, alleging his ownership of the property, the insufficiency of the allegations contained in the libel, and denied that the president ever authorized the seizure of his property, and averred that he had been pardoned by the president, and that he was included in the general amnesty proclamation. Proofs were introduced, and the court, on the twenty-seventh of June following, entered a final decree, dismissing the libel and restoring the property to the respondent, upon the payment of all costs.

Proper steps were taken, in behalf of the United States, to sue out a writ of error, and the cause was by the United States removed into the circuit court, where the decree of the district court was in all things reversed, and a decree entered in favor of the United States that the decree of condemnation originally pronounced by the district court stand and remain in full force and effect, and that the sale made by virtue thereof do stand confirmed. Whereupon the respondent sued out a writ of error and removed the cause into this court.

Certain formal errors are assigned as follows, which will first be considered:

1. That the writ of error from the Circuit Court to the District Court was made returnable on the first Monday of December, instead of the first Monday in November, as it should have been; and because the writ of error was not returnable in accordance with the order allowing the same, nor according to the citation.

2. Errors affecting the merits are also assigned, as follows: (1) That the President had, by his proclamation of amnesty, dismissed all proceedings against any person or his property, engaged, or in any manner implicated, in the rebel lion. (2) That the original decree having been opened the property of the respondent could not be sold at all, as there was no subsisting decree of condemnation. (3) That the sale to the purchaser was null because it was not made on the day specified in the writ of venditioni exponas. (4) That the circuit court had no authority to confirm the sale to the purchaser. (5) That the special pardon as well as the amnesty proclamation entitle the respondent to a restoration of his property in case the sale by the marshal is null and void.

1. Evidently the alleged preliminary defect is one of form, and it is equally clear that the power to amend all process returnable to the circuit court is vested in that court as fully as it is in the supreme court, and the express provision is that the supreme court may allow an amendment of a writ of error when there is a mistake in the title of the writ or a seal to the writ is wanting, or when the writ is returnable on a day other than the day of the commencement of the term next ensuing; and by the true construction of the provision upon the subject the same power of amendment is vested in the circuit and district courts in all cases where the process is returnable in those respective courts. (17 Stats. at Large, 197; Hampton v. Rouse, 15 Wall., 686.)

Grave doubts are also entertained whether the supposed error would avail the respondent, even if no such act of Congress had been passed, as it appears that the copy of the writ lodged with the clerk of the district court was cor rect, and that the transcript of the record of the case was actually made out, returned, and filed in the circuit court before the commencement of the term of the circuit court next ensuing. Such being the fact the better opinion is that the supposed defect is now wholly immaterial.

Suppose, however, it is otherwise, still the court here is of the opinion that the decree of the circuit court ought not to be reversed for a defect of form in the process which is amendable by the express words of an act of Congress, unless it appears that the alleged defect may have injured the complaining party or that he would have been prejudiced if the defect had been amended.

2. Nor is it correct to suppose that legal proceedings against the property of the respondent were dismissed by the amnesty proclamation, or that the amnesty proclamation provided for the restoration of all rights of property to persons engaged in the rebellion. On the contrary, the proclamation referred to contains the express exception "as to property with regard to slaves" and "in cases of legal proceedings under the laws of the United States." (15 Stats. at Large, 700.)

Suffice it to remark that a decree of condemnation in due form of law was entered in this case nearly two years and a half before the amnesty proclamation was issued, which shows to a demonstration that the property in controversy in this case falls within the exception contained in that proclamation, which is all that need be said upon that subject.

3. Sufficient appears in the record to show that the decree was never opened except for the special purpose of allowing the true owner of the two specified lots to file his claim and answer to that part of the libel, as authorized in the written stipulation signed by the district attorney. Argument to show that the true owner of those lots, without such consent in writtng, would have been remediless, is unnecessary, and it is equally certain that the court could not open the decree three years after it was entered for any other purpose than that specified in the written stipulation, and the record shows that it never was attempted to be opened for any other purpose. Viewed in the light of the actual facts disclosed in the record, the assignment of error in that regard is utterly destitute of merit.

4. Properties condemned as forfeited to the United States under the aforesaid act of Congress become the property of the United States from the date of the decree of condemnation. (12 Stat. at Large, 591, sec. 7.)

Judgment of forfeiture was rendered in this case on the fifth of April, 1865, and the land in question became from that date the property of the United States, and it may well be contended that from that time it could not concern the respondent whether the proceedings of the marshal in selling the same were regular or irregular, as the title to the land was lost to him when it became vested in the United States. He now contends that the sale is null, because it was not made on the day named in the writ of venditioni exponas, to which the United States make answer that he cannot be heard to raise that question, as his title was divested by the decree of condemnation; but it is not necessary to rest the decision upon that ground, as it is well-settled law that the marshal in the exercise of a sound discretion, may adjourn the sale in such a case to another day, and the court is of the opinion that the circumntances disclosed in the record were of a character to fully justify the marshal in the course which he pursued. (Blossom v. Railroad, 3 Wall, 209; Collier v. Whipple, 13 Wend., 229; Requa v. Rea, 2 Paige, 339.)

5. Beyond doubt the original decree of the district court was eomplete and correct, and it is doubtless true that the decree of the circuit court reversing the second decree of the district court and adjudging that the first decree of the district court should stand and remain in full force and effect would have been sufficient without any decree confirming the sale by the marshal, but even if the decree confirming the sale be regarded as an act of supererogation, it cannot render invalid what would have been valid without it.

Complete jurisdiction of the cause was vested in the circuit court by virtue of the writ of error, and the circuit court having reversed the second decree of the district court, might "proceed to pass such decree as should have been passed" by the subordinate court, and it follows that if a decree confirming the sale was necessary it was entirely competent for the circuit court to pass such a decree. (1 Stat. at Large, 85.)

6. Such proceedings under the confiscation act in question are justified as an exercise of belligerent rights against a public enemy, and are not in their nature a punishment for treason. Consequently, confiscation being a proceeding distinct from, and independent of the treasonable guilt of the owner of the property confiscated, pardon for treason will not restore rights to property previously condemned and sold in the exercise of belligerent rights, as against a purchaser in good faith and for value. (Miller v. U. S., 11 Wall., 267; Confiscation Cas., 20 Id., 92; Gay's Gold, 13 Id., 351.)

By the seizure of the property the district court acquired jurisdiction to pass the decree of condemnation. All of the proceedings prior to and in the sale of the land were regular and the assumption of power by the district court, nearly three years subsequently, to restore the land, was wholly unauthorized and was clearly error. Nor did the opening of the decree as to the two lots, not owned by the respondent, afford any justification for the action of the court in restoring the residue of the property, as it is settled law that a judgment may be good in part and bad in part—good to the extent it is authorized by law and bad for the residue. (Bigelow v. Forest, 9 Wall., 339; Day v. Micou, 18 Id., 156; Ex parte Lange, 18 Id., 163.)

Much discussion of the special pardon is unnecessary, as it contained the provision that the respondent should not "by virtue thereof" claim any property or the proceeds of any property that had been sold by the order, judgment, or decree of a court under the confiscation laws of the United States. Authorities to show that a pardon may be special in its character or subject to conditions and exceptions are quite unnecessary, as they are very numerous and are all one way.

Decree of the circuit court is affirmed.

UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT.

No. 33—OCTOBER TERM, 1875.

WILLIAM H. SCUDDER, plaintiff in error, v. THE UNION NATIONAL BANK, of Chicago.

In error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Illinois.

ACCEPTANCE OF BILL BY PAROL — WHAT LAW GOVERNS AS TO ACCEPTANCE—WHAT AS TO PAYMENT.

1. MATTERS BEARING UPON EXECUTION.—That matters bearing upon the execution, the interpretation and validity of a contract, are determined by the law of the place where the contract is made.

2. MATTERS CONNECTED WITH ITS PERFORMANCE. That matters connected with the performance of a contract are regulated by the law prevailing at the place of performance.

3. MATTERS RESPECTING THE REMEDY.—That matters respecting the remedy, such as the bringing of suits, admissibility of evidence, statutes of limitation, depend upon the law of the place where the suit is brought.

4. THE LAW IN ILLINOIS.—That there is no statute of that State requiring an acceptance of a bill of exchange to be in writing, or that prohibits a parol promise to accept a bill of exchange; and its Supreme Court hold that a parol promise to accept a bill is an acceptance thereof.

5. CONTRACT TO ACCEPT IN THIS CASE. — That the contract to accept in this case was not only made in Illinois, but the bill was then and there actually accepted in Illinois, as perfectly as if Mr. Scudder had written an acceptance across its face and signed thereto the name of his firm. The contract to accept the bill was not to be performed in Missouri. It had already by the promise been performed in Illinois. The contract to pay was to be performed in Missouri, but that was a different contract from that of acceptance. —[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

Mr. Justice HUNT delivered the opinion of the Court.

It is not necessary to examine the question whether a denial of the motion to set aside the summons can be presented as a ground of error on this hearing. The facts are so clearly against the motion that the question does not arise.

Nor does it become necessary to examine the question of pleading, which is so elaborately spread out in the record. The only serious question in the case is presented upon the objection to the admission of evidence, and to the charge of the judge.

Upon the merits, the case is this: The plaintiff below sought to recover from the firm of Henry Ames & Co., of St. Louis, Missouri, the amount of a bill of exchange, of which the following is a copy, viz:

"$8, 125.00. CHICAGO, July 7, 1871.

"Pay to the order of Union National Bank eight thousand one-hundred and twenty-five dollars, value received, and charge it to the account of LELAND & HARBACH.

"To Messrs. Henry Ames & Co., St. Louis, Mo."

By the direction of Ames & Co., Leland & Harbach had bought for them and, on the 7th day of July, 1871, shipped to them at St. Louis 500 barrels of pork, and gave their check on the Union bank to Hancock, the seller of the same, for $8,000.

Leland & Harbach then drew the bill in question and sent the same by their clerk to the Union bank (the plaintiff below) to be placed to their credit. The bank declined to receive the bill unless accompanied by the bill of lading or other security. The clerk returned and reported accordingly to Leland & Harbach. One of the firm then directed the clerk to return to the bank and say that Mr. Scudder, one of the firm of Ames & Co. (the drawees), was then in Chicago and had authorized the drawing of the draft; that it was drawn against 500 barrels of pork that day bought by Leland & Harbach for them and duly shipped to them. The clerk returned to the bank and made this statement to its vice-president, who thereupon, on the faith of the statement that the bill was authorized by the defendants, discounted the same and the proceeds were placed to the credit of Leland & Harbach. Out of the proceeds the check given to Hancock for the pork was paid by the bank.

The direction to inform the bank that Mr. Scudder was in Chicago and had authorized the drawing of the draft, was made in the presence and in the hearing of Scudder, and without objection by him.

The point was raised in various forms upon the admission of evidence, and by the charge of the judge, whether, upon this state of facts, the firm of Ames & Co., the defendants, were liable to the bank for the amount of the bill. The jury, under the charge of the judge, held them to be liable, and it is from the judgment entered upon that verdict that the present writ of error is brought.

The question is discussed in the appellant's brief, and properly, as if the direction to the clerk had been given by Scudder in person. The jury were authorized to consider the direction in his name, in his presence and hearing, without objection by him, as made by himself.

The objection relied on is that the transaction amounted at most to a parol promise to accept a bill of exchange then in existence. It is insisted that such a promise does not bind the defendants.

The suit to recover upon the alleged acceptance, or upon the refusal to accept, being in the State of Illinois, and the contract having been made in that State, the judgment is to be given according to the law of that State. The law of the expected place of performance, should there be a difference, yields to the lex fori and the lex loci contractus.

In Wheaton on Conflict of Laws, § 401 p, the rule is thus laid down: "Obligations, in respect to the mode of their solemnization, are subject to the rule locus regit actum; in respect to their interpretation, to the lex loci contractus; in respect to the mode of their performance, to the law of the place of their performance. But the lex fori determines when and how such laws, when foreign, are to be adopted, and in all cases not specified above supplies the applicatory law."—(Miller v. Tiffany, 1 Wall., 310; Chapman v. Robertson, 6 Paige, 634; Andrews v. Pond, 13 Peters, 78; Lanusse v. Baker, 3 Wheat, 147; Adams v. Robertson, 37 Ill. R., 59; Ferguson v. Fuffe, 8 C. & F., 121; Bain v. Whitebarre R. C., 3 H. L. Cas., 1; Scott, v. Pilkington, 15 Abb. P. R., 280; Story Conflict Law, 203; 10 Wheaton, 383.)

The rule is often laid down that the law of the place of performance governs the contract.

Mr. Parsons, in his treatise on notes and bills, uses this language: "If a note or bill be made payable in a particular place, it is to be treated as if made there, without reference to the place at which it is written or signed or dated."—(p. 324.)

For the purposes of payment, and the incidents of payment, this is a sound proposition. Thus, the bill in question is directed to parties residing in St. Louis, Mo., and contains no statement whether it is payable on time or at sight. It is in law a sight draft. Whether a sight draft is payable immediately upon presentation, or whether days of grace are allowed, and to what extent, is differently held in different States. The law of Missouri, where this draft is payable, determines that question in the present instance.

The time, manner, and circumstances of presentation for acceptance or protest, the rate of interest when this is not specified in the bill, (Young v. Harris, 14 B. Munro, 556; Parry v. Ainsworth, 22 Barb., 118,) are points connected with the payment of the bill, and are also instances to illustrate the meaning of the rule, that the place of performance governs the bill.

The same author, however, lays down the rule that the place of making the contract governs as to the formalities necessary to the validity of the contract. (p. 317). Thus, whether a contract shall be in writing, or may be made by parol, is a formality to be determined by the law of the place where it is made. If valid there the contract is binding, although the law of the place of performance may require the contract to be in writing. (Dacosta v. Hatch, 4 Zabriskie R., 319).

So when a note was indorsed in New York, although drawn and made payable in France, the indorsee may recover against the payee and indorser upon a failure to accept, although by the laws of France such suit cannot be maintained until after default in payment. (Aymar v. Shelden, 12 Wend., 439).

So if a note, payable in New York, be given in the State of Illinois for money there lent, reserving ten per cent. interest, which is legal in that State, the note is valid although but seven per cent. interest is allowed by the laws of the former State. (Miller v. Tiffany, 1 Wall., 310; Depeau v. Humphrey, 20 Martin, 1; Chapman v. Robertson, 6 Paige, 634; Andrews v. Pond, 13 Peters R., 65).

Matters bearing upon the execution, the interpretation, and the validity of a contract, are determined by the law of the place where the contract is made. Matters connected with its performance are regulated by the law prevailing at the place of performance. Matters respecting the remedy, such as the bringing of suits, admissibility of evidence, statutes of limitation, depend upon the law of the place where the suit is brought.

A careful examination of the well-considered decisions of this country and of England will sustain these positions.

There is no statute of the State of Illinois that requires an acceptance of a bill of exchange to be in writing, or that prohibits a parol promise to accept a bill of exchange. On the contrary a parol acceptance and a parol promise to accept are valid in that State, and the decisions of its highest court hold that a parol promise to accept a bill is an acceptance thereof. If this be so, no question of jurisdiction or of conflict of laws arises. The contract to accept was not only made in Illinois, but the bill was then and there actually accepted in Illinois, as perfectly as if Mr. Scudder had written an acceptance across its face and signed thereto the name of his firm. The contract to accept the bill was not to be performed in Missouri. It had already by the promise been performed in Illinois. The contract to pay was, indeed, to be performed in Missouri, but that was a different contract from that of acceptance. (Nelson v. First Nat. Bk., 48 Ill., 39; Mason v. Dousey, 35 Ill., 424; Jones v. Bank, 34 Ill., 319.)

Unless forbidden by statute, it is the rule of law generally that a promise to accept an existing bill is an acceptance thereof, whether the promise be in writing or by parol. (Wynne v. Raikes, 5 East., 514; Bk. of Ireland v. Archer, 11 M. & W., 383; How v. Loring, 24 Pick., 254; Ward v. Allen, 2 Met., 53; Bk. v. Woodruff, 34 Vt. R., 92: Spalding v. Andrews, 12 Wright, 411; Williams v. Winans, 2 Green (N.J.), 339; Storer v. Logan, 9 Mass., 56; Byles on Bills, § 149; Barney v. Withington, 37 N. Y. R., 112; see the Illinois cases cited supra.)

Says Lord Ellenborough, in the first of these cases, "a promise to accept an existing bill is an acceptance. A promise to pay it, is also an acceptance. A promise, therefore, to do the one or the other, i. e., to accept or certainly pay, cannot be less than an acceptance."

In Williams v. Winans, Ch. J. Hornblower says: "The first question is whether a parol acceptance of a bill will bind the acceptor, and of this there is at this day no room to doubt. The defendant was informed of the sale and that his son had drawn an order on him for $125, to which he answered it was all right; he afterwards found the interest partly paid and the evidence of payment indorsed upon it in the handwriting of the defendant. These circumstances were proper and legal evidence from which the jury might infer an acceptence."

It is a sound principle of morality, which is sustained by well-considered decisions, that one who promises another, either in writing or by parol, that he will accept a particular bill of exchange and thereby induces him to advance his money upon such bill, in reliance upon his promise, shall be held to make good his promise. The party advances his money upon an original promise, upon a valuable consideration, and the promissor is, upon principle, bound to carry out his undertaking. Whether it shall be held to be an acceptance, or whether he shall be subjected in damages for a breach of his promise to accept, or whether he shall be held to be estopped from impeaching his word, is a matter of form merely. The result in either event is to compel the promissor to pay the amount of the bill with interest. (Townley v. Sumdel, 2 Peters, 170; Boyce v. Edwards, 4 Ib., 111; Goodrich v. Gordon, 15 John. R., 6; Scott v. Pilkington, 15 Ab. P. R, 280; Ontario Bk. v. Worthington, 12 Wend., 593; Bissell v. Lewis, 4 Mich. R., 450; Williams v. Winans, 2 Green, 389.)

These principles settle the present case against the appellants.

It certainly does not aid their case that after assuring the bank, through the message of Leland & Harbach, that the draft was drawn against produce that day shipped to the drawees, and that it was drawn by the authority of the firm, (while in fact the produce was shipped to, and received and sold by them,) and after the bank in reliance upon this assurance discounted the bill, Mr. Scudder should at once have telegraphed his firm in St. Louis to delay payment of the draft, and by a subsequent telegram should have directed them not to pay it.

The judgment must be affirmed.

U. S. DIST. COURT, D. OF MINN.

OPINION NOV., 1875.

In Re CRAMER, a bankrupt.

FRAUDULENT PREFERENCE.

Held, that although in case of actual fraud, a preferred creditor might prove for a moiety, he can do so only when he has fulfilled the requirements of section 5,084, and made a surrender of the advantage obtained by the preference. In this case there is no actual fraud, and if the claimants had surrendered their advantage before suit and perhaps before judgment, proof would have been allowed of their whole debt.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

Kiefer & Heck, creditors of the bankrupt, made a settlement with him just previous to his bankruptcy, and received in full credit for their account certain merchandise and notes to the full value of their claim.

The assignee in bankruptcy demanded the property from Kiefer & Heck, and upon a refusal to deliver, commenced a suit against them, alleging a fraudulent conveyance and preference, contrary to the terms of the bankrupt act.

Upon a trial before a jury, the assignee recovered a judgment. Kiefer & Heck now seek to prove their claim before the register. Objection is made by the assignee, and the matter comes before the court for settlement.

J. B. & W. H. SANBORN, for claimant.
ROGERS & ROGERS, for assignee.

NELSON, J.—Section 5,021 of the revised statutes authorizes the recovery by the assignee of all property received by a person having reasonable cause to believe that a debtor was insolvent, and knowing that a fraud on the bankrupt act was intended.

Section 5,128 defines the fraudulent preferences forbidden by the act; and section 5,084 declares under what circumstances and when a creditor who has received a fraudulent preference may prove the claim on account of which the preference is made or given.

The latter section forbids proof of a claim on account of which a preference is given until the creditor first surrenders to the assignee all property or advantage received under such preference.

I think in the light of these sections, inasmuch as judgment has been entered in favor of the assignee, in the suit brought against Kiefer & Heck, and the fraudulent preference clearly established, they are debarred from proving their claim. The assignee has been compelled to seek the aid of the court to recover the advantage sought to be obtained by these creditors; they contested his right to recover, and being defeated have constructively made themselves a party to the fraud, and the locus pœnitentiæ has passed; the payment of the judgment is not a compliance with the terms of section 5,084.

Although in case of actual fraud a preferred creditor might prove for a moiety, he can do so only when he has fulfilled the requirements of section 5,084 and made a surrender of the advantage obtained by the preference. In this case there is no actual fraud, and if these claimants had surrendered their advantage before suit, and perhaps before judgment, proof would have been allowed of their whole debt.

The right of these creditors to prove a claim represented by a note for $76, is not seriously contested. The objection of the assignee is sustained except to that extent.

Ordered accordingly.

CIRCUIT COURT OF COOK CO., ILL.

OPINION DECEMBER, 1875.

INTERNATIONAL BANK v. SAMUEL J. WALKER.

USURY—EVIDENCE—PRODUCTION OF BOOKS—WHAT WILL EXCUSE FROM—PENALTY.

1. The complainant filed a bill to foreclose several trust deeds against the defendant, Walker, given to secure money loaned to him. Walker claimed that there was usury in the transactions, and asked to have the complainant produce its books to show that fact. This was resisted on the ground that if produced they would have a tendency to expose the bank to the liability of the penalty for usury, etc. Held, that the bank should not be compelled to produce its books, unless the defendant in some legal form should agree to waive the forfeiture for usury, and upon such an agreement being made, the complainants will be compelled to produce its books.

2. The objection that if the books were produced they could be used in evidence on a proceeding against the bank for a forfeiture of its charter considered.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

Opinion by WILLIAMS, J.

The complainant having filed a bill to foreclose certain trust deeds against Samuel J. Walker, given to secure the indebtedness due to it for money loaned to Walker, and having made many parties claiming interests in the incumbered property, co-defendants with said Walker, these defendants have answered, setting up their respective defenses, and the defendant, Walker, has also filed a cross-bill for affirmative relief. Several other suits in reference to the subject matter of the litigation have, by the agreement of parties, been consolidated with the complainant's suit and the causes have been referred by stipulation to the master to take testimony with leave to either party to apply to the court for further directions. In the proceedings before the master, Mr. Lowenthal, president of the International Bank, was introduced as a witness on complainant's behalf, and upon his cross-examination it appeared that on the books of the bank an account had been kept with Walker in which discounts were entered; that upon the back of the negotiable paper discounted by the bank for Walker, were entries indicating extensions of such paper, and that the bank books contained entries of moneys paid at the time of making such extensions, and also in reference to the collaterals taken of Walker by the bank upon the making or extension of the loans. The witness having been previously served with a subpœna duces tecum was then requested upon the part of Walker and others to produce the bank books, which he declined to do for the reason that "if produced they would have a tendency to expose the International Bank as well as those claiming under the bank in these suits upon the notes of Samuel J. Walker, sold and transferred by the bank to them, to the penal liability of usury or forfeiture of the sum taken by them or contracted for with said Walker, and would have the tendency to subject said bank and said parties claiming under it to such penalty or forfeiture of usury, and would have a tendency to furnish evidence whereby the franchises and charter of said bank might be forfeited on account of such usury."

The question now to be determined is, whether the excuse for the non-production of its books upon the part of the complainant, is a valid one in law.

The general rule in regard to the limitations of a discovery of evidence may be stated to be, that no discovery will be compelled in any case where such discovery would have a tendency to subject the party to punishment of any kind or to any extent, or to expose him to a forfeiture or penalty. And in the event of an answer having such a tendency, the witness may refuse to answer, not only as to the principal fact but as to every incidental fact which may form a link in the chain of evidence going to establish the criminal act or the forfeiture. Adams' Equity, 2, 3; Mitford's Equity Plead., 193 to 197; 2 Phillipps on Ev., 937, and other cases.

Story in his work upon equity pleadings, at section 575, and in subsequent sections, states the rule thus: "The defendant shall not be obliged to discover what may subject him to a penalty or forfeiture, and not what must only. This doctrine seems founded on the great principles of constitutional right. * * * It constituted one of the first objections to the court of Star Chamber, that in criminal informations it compelled the party accused to answer upon oath to the accusation; and thus in arbitrary times became an instrument of gross oppression and injustice. But the court of chancery has always steadily refused to compel any man to criminate himself, and by analogy to disclose any fact which will subject him to a penalty or forfeiture; and it has assisted in carrying into complete effect the benign maxim of the common law above alluded to. So that it is the just boast of Lord Hardwicke that the general rule, established with great justice and tenderness in the law of England, is fully recognized and acted on in courts of equity, that no person shall be obliged to discover what may tend to subject him to a penalty or punishment, or to that which is in the nature of a penalty or punishment. * * * The doctrine is not confined to cases where the question or answer has a direct tendency to criminate the defendant or to expose him to a penalty or forfeiture, but it goes further and protects him from answering any question which may form a link in the chain by which such a case is to be established."

No rule can be laid down as to the extent to which collateral questions may involve the objection that their answer tends to expose the party to a forfeiture or penalty. As said by Story, "in many cases the line of distinction may be very clear between the questions which are within the reach of the objection and those which are without it. But in others the line must be extremely obscure; and the rule to be applied must rest upon the exercise of a sound discretion under all the particular circumstances of the case before the court." Story on Pl., sec. 578.

Lord Eldon said: "I have looked into all the cases and I find the distinctions between questions supposed to have a tendency to criminate, and questions to which it is supposed answers may be given, as having no connection with the other questions, so very nice, that I can only say the strong inclination of my mind is to protect the party against answering any question, not only that has a direct tendency to criminate him but that forms one step towards it." Paxton v. Douglass, 19 Vesey, 228.

The Vice Chancellor in Green v. Weaver, 1 Sim., 426, said "that the rule of a court of equity is, that a man shall not be compelled to answer any facts which may tend to criminate him or subject him to penalties or forfeitures, is undeniable."

Neither does the rule recognize any difference "between the forfeiture of a thing vested and a disability to take a thing inflicted as a penalty. Nor is the protection limited to the party himself, but it extends to parties claiming under him, whether they are devisees or are purchasers, for they are entitled to the same privileges, and take the estate under the same circumstances." Story on Pl., sec. 583.

The statute of this State has provided, in the absence of any express agreement relating to interest, that it shall be six per cent.; but parties may contract in writing for 10 per cent. If a greater sum shall be taken than allowed by statute, the party contracting to receive such excess shall forfeit the excess, and be allowed to recover only the principal loaned.

Is the loss of interest a forfeiture or penalty within the meaning of the law?

The word "forfeit" is used in the statute as applicable to such loss.

Webster defines the verb forfeit thus: "to lose, or lose the right to, by some fault, offense or crime; to render one's self by misdeed liable to be deprived of; to alienate the right to possess by some neglect or crime; as to forfeit an estate by treason." Burrill, in his Law Dict. (Art. Forfeit) defines the verb forfeit thus: "to lose what belongs to one by some fault, misconduct or crime." "Forfeiture (he says) involves not only of loss by the delinquent party, but of transfer or surrender to some other, whether it be an individual or the State." He defines forfeiture to be "the loss of what belongs to one by some fault, misconduct or transgression of law." Penalty, when spoken of in the text books and opinions in connection with forfeiture as exempting a party from discovery, may be regarded as a synonym of the latter word. Forfeiture is one of the definitions given by Webster of the word penalty. That each refers to pecuniary in contradistinction from personal punishment is obvious from the connection.

The text books and reports generally assert, first, that no discovery can be compelled where it would have a tendency to subject the party to "punishment" (i. e. personal punishment) "or to a forfeiture or penalty" (i. e. pecuniary loss and punishment.)

As thus used, "forfeiture and penalty" both pre-suppose the existence of property or right in the thing lost, and that the loss is the fault of the person who suffers it. A person cannot be properly said to have lost that which was never his; in which he had no property and to which he had no right, and it would in no sense be pecuniary punishment to deprive one of what did not belong to him. It might perhaps be true that in a case where no illegal interest had been actually paid to and received by the lender, but where he had come into court to recover his principal and the stipulated but illegal interest as a gross sum, that he might be compelled by the production of his books, or in some other way, to show the usurious contract. If this might be done it would be for the reason that as one statute prescribes only the loss of interest upon a usurious contract, and leaves the principal intact, that the lender never had any right to any interest, and therefore could not properly be said to forfeit anything.

Interest not having been recoverable at common law, springing only out of express or implied contracts therefor, and every contract which is in defiance of law being void, it might be argued, as it has been in this case, that in a State where the statute prescribes only the loss of interest, it leaves the lender who seeks to collect a debt tainted with usury, with no contract whatever for interest. In such a case it might be plausibly insisted that the only contract for interest being an illegal and void contract, the lender never acquired any rights under it, and therefore had nothing to lose or to forfeit and might be compelled to make discovery.

Though I am not prepared to assert that such is the law, as applicable to a suit upon a usurious contract where no part of the usury has been paid, and have found no case which fully sustains such a position; yet the position can be sustained by a strong argument, and is in part supported by the cases of Austin v. Burgess, 36 Wis., 191, and Dill v. Ellicott, Taney's C. C. R., 233. But the case at bar does not present such a question, or presents it connected with other questions. The books of the International Bank show a series of transactions with Walker running through several years. Negotiable paper to the amount of hundreds of thousands of dollars has been discounted by the bank for Walker. Much of it was short paper and has been paid, and the particular transaction closed. Upon this and also upon the unpaid paper, it is claimed that a large amount of illegal interest has been actually paid by Walker and received by the bank, and it is for the reason that the books tend to show usury paid by Walker and received by the bank upon this paid and unpaid paper, that the bank refuses to produce them. A party paying usury may recover it from the person to whom it is paid in a suit for money had and received, but he can recover only the illegal interest he has paid. The lender is entitled to retain the principal and his legal interest. If, then, in the case at bar, the bank has received, upon the securities discounted by Walker, illegal interest, and that fact is shown by its books, it can not recover for the legal interest, even though it may have been paid by Walker and accepted by the bank; but the whole amount paid must be applied upon the principal sum. To the extent, therefore, of the legal interest there would be a forfeiture by the bank, in case its books disclose the receipt by it of illegal interest It would be a loss, by the fault of the bank, of what it has in its possession, of what is rightfully its, of what it could not be deprived, in case a suit was instituted against it by Walker. Such a loss comes within all the definitions of forfeiture and penalty, either by lexicographers or law writers.

If a lender comes into court to recover upon a usurious contract, the court will not aid him to violate the law, and if the defendant establishes, by competent evidence, the fact of usury, the court will give the plaintiff or complainant what the law has declared he shall have, and no more. On the other hand, if the borrower comes into court asking relief by discovery from the defendant (the lender), the court will require him to tender or offer to the lender, before compelling a discovery, the principal and legal interest, on the ground that he who seeks equity must do equity.

The rule is the same where the defendant having set up the defense of usury, seeks to establish that defense by testimony extorted from the other party. If he can establish his defense of usury without the complainant's evidence, he can have the full benefit of the law; if not, he must do equity before he demands equity. These principles are settled by the following cases and many others: Livingston v. Harris et al., 3rd Paige, 528. In this case the chancellor says: "In accordance with these two principles, it had become the settled law of the court of chancery, previous to the adoption of the Rev. Stat., that a defendant was not bound to answer a bill seeking discovery as to the usurious transactions, where a disclosure of the usury would or might subject him to a forfeiture or loss of the whole or any part of the money actually lent or the legal interest thereon."

Blockway v. Copp, 3 Paige, 543; Rogers v. Rathbun, 1 John. Chy., 367; 1st Story's Equity Juris., sec. 301, 302; 2 Jones, Equity (N.C.), 62; Masters et al. v. Plenty. In the case of Hogshead et al. v. Baylor, 16 Gratton, 99, an action was brought at law against the makers and indorsers of a promissory note, to which they pleaded nil debet and usury, and under the statute of Virginia, filed interogatories seeking to establish their defense. The parties seeking the evidence where defendants who had not come voluntarily but had been brought involuntarily into court, they desired to establish their defense by the plaintiff's evidence. In these respects that case and the case at bar are similar. The law of Virginia then in force made it a forfeiture of the interest and not of the principal to take usury. In that respect the law of Virginia and Illinois are identical. They only differ in that the lender was compelled to pay the costs of his action. Both statutes allowed him to recover the principal.

The court in that case held "that as long as the defendants in the court below insisted on their defense of usury the plaintiff in the action was not bound to answer the interrogatory, and so give evidence which on the plea of usury might invalidate the note." Pye v. Butterfield et al., 5 Best and Smith, 828.

This was an ejectment case, and the plaintiff sought to have the defendant answer interrogatories where the answers might subject him to a forfeiture of a lease. The chief justice, in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "But whether fettered or left free to exercise our judicial discretion, we ought to abide by the principle on which this branch of jurisprudence has been for centuries administered in courts of equity. It is clear from the decisions of those courts which have been cited, and the expressions used by eminent text-writers, that it is a fixed rule that no bill of discovery will be allowed when the answers may have the effect of forfeiting the estate. * * * Courts of equity have exercised no discretion when a case falls within the rule. The present case is within it, and therefore we ought not to allow the plaintiff to administer these interrogatories in violation of the principles so established."

Taylor, in his work on evidence, after stating the rule that answers having a tendency to expose the witness to a penalty or forfeiture of any nature whatever will not be compelled, states that the rule is of great antiquity and was even recognized by Jeffries when it told against the prisoner, and prevails in law and equity. He adds that numerous authorities might be cited which clearly establish that, if the fact about which the witness is interrogated form but a single remote link in the chain of testimony which may expose him to a penalty or forfeiture, he is not bound to answer. 2 Taylor on Ev., secs. 1308, 1309.

The rules applicable to oral testimony are equally applicable to the production of books and papers, even when a statute exists requiring such production. 2 Blatch. C. C. R., 301, Finch v. Rikeman. In this case the court denied the motion for the production of defendants' books, on the ground that their production would expose defendants to a penalty.

I know of no rule of law more firmly settled or more constantly and rigidly enforced by courts than the general rule that no party shall be obliged to give evidence, the tendency of which shall expose him to a penalty or forfeiture.

The rule may have been more rigidly enforced because of the disfavor with which English chancery and common law judges have for the last 200 years regarded the inquisitorial proceedings of the Star Chamber, but it is certain that it conforms to the spirit of the common law which protects the citizen from being forced to become his own accuser or to furnish evidence against himself. American courts have been as jealous of protecting the liberty of the citizen in this regard as the courts of England. I am aware that the present case is one in which, in consequence of the many conflicting interests of the parties to the several suits which have been consolidated; the application of the rule is attended with difficulties, but I see in this no reason why the rule should be ignored.

If Walker was sole defendant, he having set up in his answer the defense of usury, and also filed his cross-bill, the application of the rule to him would be easy. It may also be applied to the other parties litigant. It is for the parties to determine whether or not they can establish the defense of usury without the aid of the books of the bank. If they can, then the complainant can recover his principal and no more, and all payments of interest go to the extinguishment of the principal. If the parties must resort to the help of complainants' books to establish the usury, then the books can only be had by them upon the condition that such parties as are in a position to take advantage of the forfeiture of interest, waive such forfeiture, and such of them as are liable upon the indebtedness, offer to pay what, if any, principal may be found due upon a final hearing of this cause, from them to the International Bank, with legal interest upon the same. What that legal rate shall be, whether six or ten per cent., it is not necessary now to determine. It has been earnestly urged in argument that as these books were necessary to establish the defense of Walker and the persons claiming under him, upon other points than that of usury, that they should be admitted notwithstanding they disclosed usury. But however necessary the evidence sought might be to the defendant, I have not been able, after a very thorough and exhaustive examination of the text books and reports, to find a single authority that will authorize the court to compel its production by any party who may be exposed thereby to a forfeiture or penalty.

The repugnance of courts to compelling any party to furnish evidence against himself which would expose him to punishment, forfeiture or penalty, has overridden every other consideration, and caused them to adhere invariably to the rule as above set forth. In the words of an English chief justice, before quoted: "Courts of equity have exercised no discretion when a case falls within the rule." I can have no doubt that the defendant, Walker, is within the rule, and all the other parties to the record who claim under him, to whom the benefit of the forfeiture would ensue. And the bank can insist upon the right of having the forfeiture waived, even though it has parted with the negotiable papers upon which usury was paid. Story's Eq. Plead., 583; Woodworth v. Huntoon, 40 Ills., 138.

The second point upon which the production of the books was resisted was that the proof of usury would expose the bank to the action of quo warranto for the forfeiture of its franchises.

I have not been able carefully to examine the authorities cited upon this point, but I do not see how the books could furnish evidence in this suit which could be used against the bank upon a trial of a quo warranto. The testimony in this case could not be used in the quo warranto case. The books, in order to furnish evidence against the bank in the quo warranto case, would have to be again introduced in that case, and such introduction could not be compelled. Again, the fact that the production of evidence would expose one to a civil suit is no reason why its production should not be enforced, and a quo warranto is now regarded as a strictly civil proceeding, resorted to for the purpose of testing a civil right. High's Extraordinary Leg Rem., 435, sec. 603.

Besides, I have found no usury case where evidence in reference to the transaction was not compelled upon the party who was entitled to claim the forfeiture, agreeing to waive it. In this case, the complainant has offered to produce its books, notwithstanding the objection on the ground of being exposed to a Quo Warranto, provided it could receive the principal and legal interest. I therefore deem it unnecessary to go into a further examination of this question. In case of a waiver of the forfeiture by the parties interested in it, in some legal form, I shall compel the production of the books. In the absence of such waiver, I shall allow defendants to make out their defense by their own testimony, unaided by a compulsory discovery from complainant. There will be no more hardship in their case than has fallen to the lot of hundreds of litigants whose names are to be fonnd in our reports. The rule, though it often results in benefiting usurers and others, who have been guilty of illegal practices, was not made for them, but in furtherance of justice and in the promotion of personal liberty. If, like the statute of frauds, it sometimes fails to promote justice, such exceptional cases will not authorize courts to ignore the well established law.

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

OPINION FILED JUNE 4, 1875.

THE ST. L. & S. E. R. CO. v. BRITZ.

INJURIES TO SERVANT CAUSED BY THE NEGLIGENCE OF FELLOW-SERVANT—NEGLIGENCE—SPECIAL VERDICT—GENERAL FINDING.

1. This was an action on the case by appellee against appellant to recover for injuries received while employed as a laborer on one of appellant's construction trains. The train on which he was ran into a passenger train standing on the track, and appellee was either thrown from the car by the effect of the collision, or he jumped from it to avoid anticipated harm, and was injured. The appellee having obtained a judgment in his favor, it is reversed, because there was error in giving an instruction as well as because the general verdict is inconsistent and not reconcilable with the facts specially found by the jury.

2. SPECIAL FINDING—NEGLIGENCE OF FELLOW-SERVANT—If, as the special finding shows, the injury to appellee could not have occurred if the train had been running at a proper speed and under full control as it approached the station, the converse must be true that he received his injuries in consequence of the train not being run at a proper rate of speed and under full control, as it approached the station. How this could be, and yet the fellow-servants of appellee be without fault, is to the court incomprehensible; that for negligence in managing the engine or the brakes, appellee is not entitled to recover, there being no claim made or proof that appellant was guilty of negligence in selecting its employees to whom those duties were assigned.

3. RULE OF THIS COURT.—That it is the rule of this court that although the negligence of the defendant may have been the prime cause of the plaintiff's injury and his negligence is not slight, and that of the defendant gross, when compared with each other, he cannot recover.

4. EMPLOYEE—RISKS OF SITUATION.—That when an employee, after having an opportunity of becoming acquainted with the risks of his situation, accepts them, he cannot complain if he is subsequently injured by such exposure.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

Opinion by SCHOLFIELD, J.

This was an action on the case by appellee against appellant for injuries received while employed as a laborer on one of appellant's construction trains. The train on which appellee was employed was used in hauling gravel, and appellee's principal work was that of a shoveler, in loading and unloading the cars. In the performance of this work it was necessary that he should ride on the train from the places of loading to those of unloading, and, while thus engaged, on the evening of the 3d of April, 1873, the train on which he was ran into a passenger train standing on the track at French Village, and appellee was either thrown from the car, by the effect of the collision, or he jumped from it to avoid anticipated harm, and thus received the injuries complained of.

The jury found, by their general verdict, that the defendant was guilty, and assessed appellee's damages at $250. They also found specially, in response to interrogatories propounded to them, as follows:

"1st. Was the plaintiff injured by the negligence of any of his fellow servants on the construction train, including the engine-driver or engineer? Answer. No.

2d. If the construction train had been running at a proper rate of speed, and under full control, as it approached the station, could the injury to the plaintiff have occurred? Answer. No.

3d. Does it appear, from the evidence, that the engine-driver or engineer was competent for that business? Answer. Yes."

The only questions necessary to be noticed arise upon those special findings, and the giving of an instruction at the request of appellee.

If, as the special finding shows, the injury to appellee would not have occurred if the train had been running at a proper rate of speed, and under full control, as it approached the station, the converse must be true—that he received his injuries in consequence of the train not being run at a proper rate of speed, and under full control, as it approached the station. How this could be, and yet the fellow servants of appellee be without fault, is, to us, incomprehensible. The engineer had charge of the engine, and there is no evidence that it was so defective in its construction, or so badly out of repair, that he could not control it, nor is there any pretense that it was controlled by any one else. It was the duty of the laborers on the train to assist in braking when required; and, although appellee denies that he was employed for that purpose, and it does not appear that he was ever specially called on to assist in braking, still the evidence shows that he was employed generally as a laborer on the train; that the running of the train, and the control and direction of its employees, were under one boss or conductor, and that it was the habits of the shovelers to assist in braking when required.

The engineer, brakemen, and shovelers were co-servants of appellant, engaged in the same branch of service, and bound by the commands of the same supervisor. This was settled in C. & A. R. R. Co. v. Keefe, 47 Ill., 108. The only difference in this respect between that and the present case is, there the principal employment of the laborers was handling railroad iron, while here it was shoveling gravel. In that case the laborer was injured through the negligence of the engineer in giving the proper signal before backing the train; and it was held that was one of the perils contemplated in his employment by the company. The court said:

"If his (the plaintiff's) duties attach him to the train as a part of its personal equipment, then his branch of service is not independent in any such sense as to exempt him from the general rule in regard to co-employees, in case he should be injured through the carelessness of the engineer." It was also said, in the same case: "In Horner v. I. C. R. R. Co., 15 Ill., 550; Ill. C. R. R. Co. v. Cox, 21st Ill., 20, and Moss v. Johnson, 22 ib., 633, this court, upon a full examination of the subject, and in conformity with the great current of authorities, held that one servant cannot recover against the common master for injuries resulting from the carelessness of a fellow servant, if the master has not due diligence in their selection." See, also, Chicago & Alton R. R Co. v. Murphy, 53 Ill., 496.

For negligence, then, in managing the engine or the brakes, appellee is not entitled to recover, there being no claim made or proved that appellant was guilty of negligence in selecting its employees to whom these duties belonged.

But it is claimed that appellant was negligent in not providing proper brakes for each of the cars, and the court, at the instance of appellee, instructed the jury upon this point as follows:

"The court instructs the jury that it is the duty of the railroad company, the defendant in this suit, when persons are carried upon its roads, to provide good and safe machinery, and keep the same in good order, while used in operating their road. And if, from the evidence, the jury believe that before and at the time of the accident complained of in the declaration, the defendant knew, or by reasonable diligence could have known, that its cars were not in proper order, that is, the brakes on the train of cars on which plaintiff was riding at the time of the accident, and that the injury to the plaintiff would not have occurred had said brakes been in proper order, then the jury must find for the plaintiff."

This instruction is entirely too broad and excludes from the jury the consideration of important evidence essential to the correct determination of the rights of the parties. There was evidence tending to show, but as to the weight of which we express no opinion, that plaintiff received his injuries solely in consequence of his carelessness in jumping from the train, contrary to the remonstrances of the conductor. It is familiar law in this court, that although the negligence of the defendant may have been the prime cause of the defendant's injury, yet if by the exercise of due care he might have avoided receiving the injury, and his negligence is not slight and that of the defendant gross, when compared with each other, he cannot recover. Yet this hypothesis, fairly presented to the jury by the evidence, is entirely excluded by this instruction, and it is made their duty to find for the plaintiff, however grossly negligent he may have been, upon the single hypothesis that the injury would not have occurred if the brakes had been in proper condition. This was a circumstance to be considered in determining the comparitive negligence of the parties, but not necessarily a controlling one, for many other hypothesis can be conceived without which plaintiff could not have received his injury, but which have nothing at all to do with the question of relative negligence, as, for instance, if the appellant had not had a railroad or had not had a construction train, or had not had it employed at the time and place it was, or had not employed appellee to work on it, he certainly could not have received that particular injury.

There was also evidence tending to show that appellee had been familiar with the defective condition of the brakes for some time; that he made no complaint to the officers of appellee on that account and freely continued to work and ride on the train with full knowledge of whatever peril was thereby occasioned. If this was true, then he cannot recover for any injury he may have received on account of such defective condition of the brakes, for the rule as stated by an eminent text writer is, "when an employee after having the oportunity of becoming acquainted with the risks of his situation accept them, he cannot complain if he is subsequently injured by such exposure. Wharton on negligence, § 214; see also Mass v. Johnson, supra; Jewell v. I. C. R. R. Co. 46 Ill., 99; Wright v. N. Y. Cent. R. R. Co., 25 N. Y., 564; Hayes v. The Western Trans. Co., 3 Cushing, 270. An instruction which assumes, as this does, to be in itself a complete statement of a case which, under the law, entitled the party to recover, must state fully all that need be proved, so that if there were no other evidence there could be no question as to the rights of the parties. The language of the instruction warranted the jury in laying aside all other instructions and considering the case upon it alone, and this they doubtless did.

For error in giving this instruction, as well as because the general verdict is inconsistent and not reconcilable with the facts specially found by the jury, the judgment is reversed and the cause remanded.

Reversed and remanded.

NOTES OF DECISIONS OF THE SUPREME COURT OF MICHIGAN.

OCTOBER TERM, 1875.

BY HENRY A. CHANEY, ATTORNEY AT LAW.

De Yoe v. Jamison.

Error to Allegan. Affirmed with costs. Opinion by COOLEY, J.

Where A neglects to make a payment by a day named, for goods taken from him under a judgment in replevin, and his adversary, B, seeks to collect it afterward, B thereby waives what right he may have had to a forfeiture of A's right to recover possession on making the payments.

Niles v. Muzzy.

Error to Berrien. Affirmed with costs. Per curiam.

The mayor or councilman of a municipality is not bound by his official position to give to the latter his professional services as a lawyer without charge.

Conrad v. Long.

Error to Wayne. Affirmed with costs. Opinion by CAMPBELL, J.

A stipulation in a will for the separation of husband and wife as a condition to the enjoyment of an estate, is void as against public policy.

A devise of an estate in remainder to a woman on condition of her ceasing to live with her husband, the property to go to another if she continues to live with him until her death, gives an estate clear of conditions. It provides for a forfeiture on breach of condition, but does not state a condition precedent.

An estate cannot vest and lapse from time to time according to circumstances.

Where a husband conveys his own title, and his wife's right of dower is not involved, the deed is good as against him, even though the certificate of acknowledgment does not conform to the law concerning deeds of married women.

An action of ejectment is defeated only by a conveyance of the legal title.

St. Johns v. McFarlan.

Appeal from Ionia. Affirmed with costs. Opinion by MARSTON, J.

Courts of chancery have no jurisdiction to restrain the threatened violation of a municipal ordinance unless the act amounts to a nuisance.

The erection of a wooden building within municipal fire limits is not of itself a nuisance.

Bird v. Perkins.

Error to Lenawee. Affirmed with costs. Opinion by COOLEY, J.

Defects in the proceedings under which a village government has been formed should be pointed out in a direct proceeding instituted on behalf of the State, and the State itself may be precluded from raising objections after the corporate government has been fairly established with general acquiescence. A private party can not collaterally question the assumption of municipal corporate powers which are not disputed by the State.

Where the resolution of the proper municipal board in appointing a marshal in place of one who has resigned, recites the resignation, and a person of the name of the one who is appointed signs the office bond, and begins to discharge his duties without opposition, these facts show his prima facie right to the office, even if the resignation of his predecessor is not proved.

An assessment roll is not made invalid by the omission of the dollar mark before the figures showing the valuation of property, when the meaning is plain; nor by an imperfect description of land which can be identified beyond question.

Where a new tax warrant is issued to a collecting officer after the old one has been extended and while it is still in force, the new one is nugatory. If either is valid, it is enough for his protection.

Process fair on its face is sufficient to protect the officer serving it against any illegalities but his own.

An officer who has levied on property is not necessarily a trespasser ab initio in keeping it a little longer than is necessary to giving notice and making sale. If the detention is lawful, the expense of it is a lawful charge; if not, the excess may be recovered in a proper action.

We call attention to the following opinions, reported at length in this issue:

Parol Acceptance—Law of Place of Acceptance—Law of Place of Payment.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States, by Hunt, J., holding, in the absence of any statute to the contrary, that a parol acceptance, or a parol promise to accept a bill of exchange, is valid; that matters bearing upon the execution, the interpretation, and the validity of a contract are determined by the law of the place where the contract is made. Matters connected with its performance are regulated by the law prevailing at the place of performance. Matters respecting the remedy, such as the bringing of suits, admissibility of evidence, statutes of limitation, depend upon the law of the place where the suit is brought; that a careful examination of the well-considered decisions in this country and in England will sustain these positions.

Confiscation Proceedings—Amnesty Proclamation—Pardon.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States, by Clifford, J., as to the validity of a confiscation proceeding commenced in 1863, and holding that such proceeding was not affected by the amnesty proclamation or the subsequent pardon of the owner of the property at the time it was condemned.

Fraudulent Preference.—The opinion of the United States District Court for the District of Minnesota, by Nelson, J., stating upon what conditions, in case of actual fraud, a preferred creditor will be allowed to prove his debt for a moiety.

Usury — Discovery — Production of Books.—The opinion of the Circuit Court of this county, by Williams, J., holding where a bank filed a bill to foreclose several trust deeds, and the defendant claimed that the books of the bank would show that the transactions were usurious and asked to have them produced in evidence, that the bank should not be compelled to produce its books unless the defendant would agree in some legal way to waive the penalty for usury. The questions involved in this case are important. Judge Williams has given them a very careful and thorough consideration.

Injuries to Servants Caused by the Negligence of Fellow Servants.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of this State, by Scholfield, J., as to the rule of law where one servant is injured by the negligence of a fellow servant, the duty of a corporation in selecting its servants, and the doctrine of comparative negligence.

Bank—Deposit—Confederate Money—Settlement.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of Tennessee, by Nicholson, C. J., where a depositor in a bank in Memphis, during the rebellion, received notice from the bank to come and withdraw his deposits, and went in accordance with such notice, and was compelled to take Confederate money or nothing and settled, receiving his balance in such funds. The question of the validity of such settlement is passed upon by the court.

Rates of Postage on Third-class Matter.—The opinion of the United States Circuit Court, at New York City, by Johnson, J., in a case brought against the postmaster of that city to compel him to send a book at the old rates, holding that a bill establishing rates of postage is not to be regarded as a bill for raising revenue within the meaning of the Constitution, and that the bill increasing the rates of postage on third-class matter was constitutionally passed.

JUDGE DICKEY.

The Honorable Theophilus L. Dickey was on Tuesday elected judge of the Supreme Court of this State, for the seventh judicial district, to fill the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Judge McAllister. Judge Dickey was born on the 2d of October, 1811; his father was the Rev. James H. Dickey, a presbyterian minister of the old school. The judge graduated at the Miami University, at Oxford, Ohio, in 1831. He was married in 1831, when but twenty years of age, to Juliet Evans, the daughter of an extensive land-owner. The judge, for about three years after his marriage, was a successful school-teacher. He is one of the oldest settlers of the State, having moved to Macomb, McDonough county in the winter of 1834-35. Here he met Cyrus Walker, an able lawyer, who persuaded him to study law. He was admitted to the bar of this State in 1835, and practiced law in Macomb for a year and a half. It is worthy of remark that his old law preceptor, Cyrus Walker, died last Saturday, at the age of 85, only four days before the elevation of his former student to the Supreme Bench. It requires no words of ours to tell the Illinois bar who Judge Dickey is. He has been one of them for over forty years; he has in that time held many positions of trust both civil and military, all of which he has filled with marked ability, and performed their duties with unflinching honesty. No taint rests upon his name. In 1836 he removed to Rushville and practiced law there for three years. In 1839 he settled in Ottawa, and for a time practiced with Lorenzo Leland. In 1846, at the commencement of the Mexican war, he organized a company of which he was appointed captain. The company was attached to the first regiment of Illinois volunteers. The judge having returned from the Mexican war, resumed his practice and was elected judge, in 1848, of the Circuit Court then comprising twelve counties. At the end of four years he resigned the position of judge and resumed his practice. In 1854 he moved to Chicago and practiced law here for four years. He then returned to Ottawa and practiced law with Gen. W. H. L. Wallace and his son Cyrus Dickey, until the war broke out in 1861. Soon after the battle of Bull Run, Judge Dickey raised a regiment of cavalry, got authority to appoint all his own officers, and in less than forty days had his regiment of 1,200 in the field, ready for service. He served in the army with distinction until 1863, when, his health failing, he resigned, returned to Ottawa, and resumed the practice of the law with John B. Rice as a partner. In 1866 he was the Democratic candidate for Congress for the State at large. He was appointed Assistant Attorney General of the United States in 1868, and held that position for a year and a half, when he resigned and went to Florida. Returning he practiced law for three years in Ottawa. In December, 1873, he again moved to Chicago, and practiced law with Hon. Barney G. Caulfield, until 1874, when he was appointed Corporation Counsel by Mayor Colvin, which position he resigns to accept that of Supreme Judge, to which he has just been elected. Judge Dickey is a polite, agreeable gentleman, and an able lawyer. He has filled the office of Circuit Judge, Assistant Attorney General of the United States, Corporation Counsel, and of Captain and Colonel in two wars, with ability and to the entire satisfaction of the public, and we predict that he will make an able, efficient and popular judge of the Supreme Court.

Reports of Cases Argued and Determined in the Supreme Judicial Court of New Hampshire. John M. Shirley, State Reporter. Volume LIV. Concord: Published by Josiah B. Sanborn. 1875. Sold by E. B. Myers, Law Bookseller, Chicago.

The judges of the Supreme Court of New Hampshire are experienced and able jurists, and as a consequence their opinions are exhaustive and of general interest to the American bar. In fact we know of no court that bestows more labor upon its opinions or cites more authorities. We have upon former occasions remarked that its opinions were in many cases too long. In this volume we see slight evidences of reform in this respect. Mr. Shirley very justly takes rank among the first of American reporters. We hope the printer may display a little more taste and exercise more care in the forthcoming volumes. Any lawyer of general practice possessing the means may very profitably add the New Hampshire reports to his library.

Reports of Cases Argued and Determined in the Supreme Court of the State of Kansas. By W. C. Webb, Reporter. Vol. XIII. Containing cases decided at the January and July terms, 1874. Topeka, Kansas. George W. Martin: Kansas Publishing House. 1875.

The mechanical execution of this volume is exceedingly creditable to the young State of Kansas. In Comm'rs of Neosho Co. v. Stoddart, p. 20, it is held that neither the District Court, nor the sheriff, nor both together, have power, without the consent of the County Commissioners, to contract for the county, or to create an indebtedness against the county for matting placed, or to be placed, upon the floor of the court-room; that the County Commissioners alone possess such power, and they alone can create such indebtedness. In Edwards v. Crume, p. 348, it was held where a minor son who lives with his father, and is under the father's control, commits certain wrongful acts, but where the said acts have not been authorized by the father, are not done in his presence, have no connection with the father's business, are not ratified by the father, and from which the father receives no benefit, that the father was not liable in a civil action for damages for such wrongful acts. In Giltenan v. Lemert, p. 476, it is held that a party in the rightful possession of real estate, claiming title thereto, has such an interest therein, although his title may be ever so defective that he may maintain an action to quiet his title and possesssion as against any adverse claimant whose title is weaker than his, or who has no title at all. Orders for this volume should be addressed to D. Dickinson, State Librarian, Topeka, Kansas.

Married.

Davis—Swayne.—One of the most notable events that has transpired in legal circles for a long time was the marriage, on Wednesday evening last, of Miss Sallie Worthington Davis, daughter of our much esteemed and honored Judge, David Davis, of the Supreme Court of the United States, at his residence in Bloomington, to Mr. Henry Stuart Swayne, of Toledo, O., son of Judge Swayne, associate judge with the bride's father. At the hour appointed for the ceremony the spacious parlors were filled by the invited guests, many of whom were attired in costly toilets in the height of fashion.

Among the distinguished guests were Justice Swayne and wife, and three brothers of the groom: H. Osburne, General Freight Agent of the Toledo, Wabash & Western Railroad; George W. Melmine and family, of Toledo; the Hon. John Wentworth and his daughter Roxanna; the Hon. Wirt Dexter; the Hon. N. K. Fairbank; the Hon. T. Lyle Dickey; the Hon. H. W. Brown, clerk of the United States Court, Chicago, and lady; the Hon. John D. Stewart and lady; the Hon. John A. Jones, clerk of the United States Court, Springfield; Philo J. Beveridge and lady; Mrs. Parsons, of New York, daughter of Justice Swayne; the Hon. C. H. Moore and family; the Hon. John D. Bishop and lady; the Rev. John Maclean and lady, of Clinton; H. P. Tracy and lady, of Elmwood; Miss Fannie Scranton (daughter of the late J. D. Scranton), of Scranton, Pa.; Misses Fannie and Emma Betts, of Bloomington, cousins of the bride; the Hon. Jesse W. Fell, of Normal; the Hon. Adlan E. Stevenson, Congressman from the Bloomington District; the Hon. W. D. Griswald of the Ohio and Mississippi Railroad; D. D. Walker and lady, of St. Louis; Gen. Gridley, of Bloomington; William J. Bond and lady, of Chicago.

The wedding ceremony was performed by the Rev. Samuel B. Taggart, pastor of the First Presbyterian Church of Bloomington, assisted by the Rev. John McLean.

The presents were many and valuable. At the close of the reception the happy couple departed for a wedding tour through the South, including Washington. May the union of the children of these distinguished jurists be lasting and happy.

The Supreme Court of Illinois.—The January term of this court will commence at Springfield on Tuesday, January 4th. We understand the docket is large. The place of Judge McAllister, on the bench, will be filled by Judge Dickey. We have a large force of compositors, and are prepared to print briefs and abstracts for this term of the court with the greatest dispatch.

New Law Books.—We call attention to the advertisement of Callaghan & Co., on the last page of this issue, of new law books. We have examined the advance sheets of Cooley on Taxation as they passed through the press. The work is exhaustive and thorough. The text is fully equal to the learned author's work on Constitutional Limitations. The notes show an industry and thoroughness in the examination and citation of authorities seldom found in any law treatise.

JUSTICE'S TRANSCRIPT—JUDGMENT LIEN—APPEAL.

To the Editor LEGAL NEWS:

The opinion of the Circuit Court of Cook county, (ROGERS, J. presiding) in re Perkins v. Paul, 7 LEGAL NEWS, p. 79, is so important in its consequences that I may be pardoned for discussing it.

The motion before the court was to set aside the record of the transcript in the Circuit Court, upon the ground that the case had been appealed within the 20 days allowed by law. The court overruled the motion, because the filing of the transcript is a statutory right given to the judgment creditor to acquire an additional lien, and that the courts have no right to interfere with it; in fact recognizing the validity of the lien but reprobating the practice as "a little sharp." I purpose, with due deference to the judge, to show, first, that the recording of such a transcript does not establish a lien, and second, that the court has the power to quash the writ issued upon such transcript judgment by the circuit court, if not to vacate the record thereof. For the purpose of judging whether such a judgment is a lien, we must examine the different sections of "the justice act" pari passu. We find that—

1. Appeals within 20 days from the entry of judgment may be had except on judgment confessed.

2. When proper appeal bond is filed within that time, either before the justice or with the clerk of "the appellate court," all proceedings are "suspended."

3. No execution can issue in any civil case until after the expiration of 20 days from the date of judgment, unless oath is made to the belief that the debt will be lost unless execution shall issue immediately; but no sale can be had within the 20 days nor shall the execution deprive the party of the right to appeal.

4. Executions can only be levied on personal property and are returnable in 70 days.

5. The real property of a defendant not exempt from execution, shall be bound from the date of the filing of a transcript of the judgment in the clerk's office, "as provided in this act."

6. When it shall appear by the return of an execution, that the defendant has not personal property sufficient to satisfy the judgment and costs, it shall be lawful for the justice to certify to the clerk of the Circuit Court a transcript which shall be filed by the clerk and the judgment shall thenceforward have all the effect of a judgment of said court and execution shall issue as in other cases.

7. The transcripts shall be recorded by the clerk in a book and must contain a copy of the process, original and final, the return of the officer thereon, and a copy of the docket in the case, duly certified.

To argue that these several provisions, construed together, allow an execution to be returned within the 20 days, the filing of a transcript and a lien consequent thereon, will bring about the following absurd result: A. recovers a judgment; he "swears out" an immediate execution, and procures some constable to make a return (whether bona fide or otherwise does not matter) within 20 days, "that the defendant has not personal property sufficient to satisfy the judgment and costs within his county." A. brings his transcript to the clerk, who files it; the lien on real estate is secured, and execution issues from the circuit court to the sheriff of the county. The judgment thus recorded has the effect of a judgment of the Circuit Court, and the costs are increased by requiring six dollars to be paid to the clerk for filing the transcript. B. perfects his appeal within 20 days. The suit is tried de novo, and the appellant loses again; a judgment is entered against him and thus we have two judgments for the same cause of action; one by recording the transcript and the other after trial. But before the case is tried de novo, the debtor's property has been sold by the sheriff, new costs have been made, and if the case happens in Cook county, the time of redemption will have passed before the appellant can prove by a trial de novo that the appellee has no cause of action.

Then chancery will be sought as a remedy, and perhaps the property has passed into the hands of a third person who bought at the execution sale. Again, it is possible that upon appeal a judgment may be rendered against appellee upon a set-off; then there would be a judgment against each party.

Thus I might multiply the absurdities and wrongs by recital. And in the face of all this wrong, the court abdicates its power to restrain the execution or set aside the transcript-judgment. Whatever may be the power of the court in setting aside a judgment, which the court did not render, there can be no doubt of the power to restrain the sheriff, the officer of the court, from enforcing an execution issued upon a judgment which has "all the effect of a judgment of the Circuit Court."

It needs no citation of authorities to prove the doctrine that an execution in the hands of the sheriff may be stayed for good cause appearing to the court. The statute (Practice Act, sec. 64 Hurd's Rev., page 782) provides for such a practice even in vacation, until the further order of the court. When, after judgment in the circuit court, an appeal is perfected during the term, the court will grant an order to stay an execution already issued. Why not stay the execution upon a transcript-judgment, after an appeal is perfected from the judgment of the justice? But this is but a partial remedy, for the judgment still remains as a cloud, although the appealing party be successful upon the trial, for there is no statutory provision authorizing the clerk to satisfy such a judgment, nor has the court the power to compel the losing party to enter satisfaction of the transcript-judgment, nor does the judgment against the appellee work a reversal eo instanti of the transcript-judgment. If the legislature had intended that such a transcript could be recorded within the 20 days, it is reasonable to suppose that some provisions of law would be found in the Justice Act to obviate the absurd result from having several judgments upon the same cause of action. The case is unlike the reversal of a judgment by the supreme court; upon the filing of the remanding order of the Supreme Court the judgment is vacated upon the record. It may safely be conceded that the framers of the law never intended such absurd results and the statute should not receive such an interpretation, if any other can reasonably be entertained. The statute does not in terms say that no transcript shall be recorded within the 20 days, but when the several sections are read together, an adverse conclusion is inevitable.

It may be argued that the clerk is a mere ministerial officer and must record the transcript if required. Must he not inspect the transcript to see if it is in the form prescribed by the statute? If he sees the return of an execution within the twenty days, may he not refuse to record it? The statute brings to his notice, that an appeal may be perfected in his office within twenty days, whereupon he shall issue a supersedeas enjoining the justice and constable from proceeding any further, yet the clerk may issue his execution upon the transcript-judgment, while the justice and constable are enjoined.

Since I investigated this subject I have found the case of Pardon v. Dwire et al., 23 Ill., 572, wherein a transcript-judgment rendered within twenty days was ruled upon, but the point as to its validity upon the point at bar, was not made by the parties or the court. In that case judgment was rendered on June 20, 1848, execution was sworn out on the same day and returned, "no property found;" the transcript was filed on June 26th, 1848, but (for some reason unexplained) was not recorded until May 7, 1849.

If the practice is legal, then a serious wrong has been discovered which ought to be obviated by legislation. A refusal by the clerk to record such transcript within twenty days, might be tested by mandamus and decided by the Supreme Court at the January term, 1876.

Respectfully,

ADOLPH MOSES.

THE SECRET BALLOT.

The decision of the Hon. Jameson on the secrecy of the ballot, has, in the language of Lord Bacon, come home to every man's business and bosom, to judge from the criticism which that decision has undergone. We wish to take no side in the logomachy, but we ask leave to point out a few logical errors that have crept in the discussion, dictated, perhaps, by party bias or prejudice.

The critic, page 86, present volume LEGAL NEWS, says, numbering the ballot is the only means by which fraudulent votes can be identified, forgetting that the same means will identify honest votes, and that pretense of fraud furnishes the means of destroying the very elements which make the ballot desirable—destroying the ballot itself. For ballot, be it repeated, means absolute secrecy. See Macaulay's Speeches and Essays of Sidney Smith; the latter arguing against the ballot, says: It must not be forgotten that in the ballot concealment must be absolutely compulsory. (Essay on ballot.) Again, in the same criticism we find a comparison (of constitutional provisions), between "the ballot and the guarantee of the free exercise and enjoyment of religious opinion," with the following comment: "He (every individual) should be protected on the witness stand and everywhere from a voluntary disclosure of his religious belief." We think he has this protection, 1 Green. Ev., § 370 and note, "the burden of proof is on the party producing the witness." The witness himself is never questioned in modern practice as to his religious belief. Swift Dig., 730. It is not allowed even after he has been sworn. 2 B. & B., 284. Not because it is a question tending to disgrace him, but because it would be a personal scrutiny into the state of his faith and conscience foreign to our institutions. No man is obliged to avow his belief. 1 Conn., 66. But it has never been contended either by the Hon. Jameson or Buskirk, that the individual voter has any better protection under the law than the individual professor of creed; you may challenge the one, and you may by proof aliunde prove the other. The protection is equivalent; and inquisitorial process unconstitutional in either; and Mr. Phillip, in his work on evidence, says: "Probably deeming it a less evil that the solemnity of an oath should in few instances be mocked by those who feel not its force and meaning, than that a citizen should in any case be deprived of the benefit and protection of the law on the ground of his religious belief." But what is the natural conclusion of the critic's logic? Because one man suspected of having voted fraudulently, therefore the vail of secrecy shall be taken from the vote of every citizen in the State (district), and by parity of reasoning, because one man suspected of infidelity, the whole sect shall be subjected to inquisitorial process. This is exactly what the critic's logic amounts to.

Again the critic says: "Judge Jameson thinks that the object of the Constitution is to protect the individual after the vote is cast, from persecution." "It seems to me that the only object of the vote by ballot is to protect the State," etc. Now it appears to us that if the judge does, he is correct. The error in this proposition lies in the ambiguity of the terms, individual and State. See Mill's Syst. of Logic, title Ambiguity and Fallacy, and answer what is a State if not the aggregate of individuals. A great political philosopher of our day says: "The works of Aristotle, Plato and Cicero are mainly occupied with the discussion of the question, Who shall govern? The safety of the State is their principal problem. The safety of the individual is one of our greatest." Lieber, Civ. Lib. and Self-Gov., p. 47. And on page 40, the same author says: "The term State means a society of men; that is, of beings with individual destinies and responsibilities, from which arise individual rights, that show themselves the clearer and become more important as man advances in political civilization."

Again the critic says: "It seems absurd to seek for a definition of a word a hundred or a thousand years ago, when it has a present meaning well understood." Understood by whom? But to follow up. He says: "Words are forever changing their signification, and we are never confined to any period of time for their definition." We are aware that language is not made, but, as Sir James Mackintosh says, "grows." The transition of language is founded on association, and words and terms become a different meaning in the course of time, that is, when the common attributes of a thing have been ascertained and specified, the name which belongs in common to the resumptive objects, acquire a distinct instead of a vague connotation, and become susceptible of definition. Such was the case when the term ballot became to be applied to secret voting. If this law of language I have stated correctly, then it follows that, if we take the attribute "secrecy" from the word ballot, it becomes utterly meaningless. But courts have their distinct rules of construction; yet a court has no arbitrary power to change the meaning of a word, nor can a court take cognizance of a change of words until such a change is universally, or at least generally recognized, which fact, upon principle of law, would have to be affirmatively proved by the party who seeks to benefit thereby.

However, Mr. Spence says: "The word 'ballot' does not carry with it the idea, but only the opportunity of secrecy"; yet does not the opportunity give rise to the idea, and is not secresy the only important and essential ingredient of the ballot? Sidney Smith says: "It would never do to let one man vote openly and another secretly. There must be a plain opportunity for telling an undiscoverable lie," (he wrote against Grote's measure of voting by ballot) "or the whole invention is at an end."

If we then settle on secresy as the correct meaning of the word ballot, the legislature has no right to use the word ex-officio in a different sense, unless their definition is expressly given. The legislature may and often does err, and their acts depend, according to the authority cited by Mr. Spence, (and which no one will call in question) entirely upon their reasonableness and public acquiescence; or else their acts and authority would be doubtful and as spurious as the acts of the Æcumenical Council that voted infallibility to the Pope. Nor is the language of the legislature a standard criterion; they say, for instance, R. S., '74 p. 489: "Any agent of any deceased person"; but the rule of law is, That the death of the principal operates, per se, as the revocation of the agency.

With reference to the construction of statutes spoken of in the paper in question, we are inclined to think that, so far as the authorities cited by the author have any bearing on the question, they support the Judge's opinion; but we must bear in mind the rule, that statutes must be construed pari materia; and that the enactment of a statute is not per se an amendment of the Constitution. The Constitution of 1818 provided for an amendment of the manner of voting viva voce, and therefore proves nothing in the present issue of secret voting by ballot, and is but surplusage. One word more about Webster's definition of the word ballot and we will go no further, having already occupied too much space. Webster had to go to the same sources to find the meaning of a word that others have to go to find the meaning of the same word, and with all deference to the giant mind of the illustrious lexicographer, when once found that the definition of a word as given by him, if not full enough or not correct, then it is not heresy to dissent from even the highest authority. We should not bow to an error, and though Webster be its author or though it have the sanctity of Scripture.

SUPREME COURT OF TENNESSEE.

NASHVILLE, FEBY. 6, 1875.

G. M. FOGG v. THE UNION BANK.

DEPOSIT—CONFEDERATE MONEY—SETTLEMENT—DURESS, COERCION AND UNDUE INFLUENCE.—Where it appeared that the testator, who had for many years been a depositor in the branch of the Union Bank of Tennessee at Memphis, had, during the pending of the civil war, and while Memphis and West Tennessee were under Confederate military rule, and the courts were suspended, received notice from said branch bank to come and withdraw his deposit; and that the testator declined the persistent offer of the bank to pay him the amount of his deposit in Confederate money, but waived and delayed the matter for eight days and then received the money under protest; and that there was a general public excitement on the subject of Confederate money, but the testator was not compelled to withdraw his deposit, nor did he act under a sense of impending danger produced either by threats of the bank or fears that he would incur the penalty of any military order. Held, (reversing the decree of the court below) that there was in the transaction no ground on which to hold that there was duress, coercion, or undue influence on the part of the bank, and the settlement made at the date of the withdrawal of the deposit was allowed to stand.—[The Commercial and Legal Reporter.]

NICHOLSON, C. J., delivered the opinion of the court.

The original bill was filed on the 31st of July, 1865, for the purpose of having the business of the Union Bank settled and closed up, in the Chancery Court at Nashville. The cross-bill was filed on June, 26, 1869, by the executor and executrix of Wm. H. Long, deceased, for the purpose of setting aside a settlement made by Wm. H. Long with the branch bank of Memphis, on the 28th of March, 1862, upon the allegation that the settlement was procured by duress, coercion, and undue influence. The Union Bank demurred to the cross-bill upon the ground that no such duress, coercion and undue influence was alleged as could authorize the court to set aside the settlement. The demurrer having been overruled, the bank has appealed.

The controlling question in the case is, whether the facts alleged in the bill constitute such duress, or coercion, or undue influence as entitles complainants in the cross-bill to have the contract of settlement, which they admit was made on the 28th of March, 1862, set aside. The facts alleged in the bill, on which the question arises, are as follows: Wm. H. Long, the testator, died on the 4th of May, 1867, in Madison county, Tennessee, where he lived, aged about seventy years; that for many years before his death he was much enfeebled in body and troubled in mind, in consequence of the effects of old age and the late civil troubles; that he had been for many years a depositor in the branch of the bank at Memphis, and that on the 28th of March, 1862, he had on deposit $31,656.34, and that a settlement appears on the books of the bank of that date, showing a withdrawal of his deposit, but which settlement their testator made under duress, coercion and undue influence, as will appear fully in the further statements and allegations of their cross-bill. After referring historically to the policy of the Confederate government in resorting to the issuance of treasury notes, as a means of prosecuting the late war, and in forcing the currency into circulation, if necessary, by military force, complainants alleged that in consequence of this settled policy, and the active co-operation of the military, a popular clamor and intense excitement were gotten up before the close of 1861, against all persons who refused to take the Confederate money; and that this feeling was particularly intense and bitter in the western part of the State; and that it was reported and believed in all business circles that Gen. Beauregard, then commanding a department including West Tennessee, issued, some time about the last of 1861, a military order requiring everybody in his department to take Confederate money under penalty of heavy fine and imprisonment for a refusal; and that soon after the reported issuance of this order, several persons were arrested and carried to Jackson, in Madison county, Tenn., and some of them imprisoned for refusing to take the money; and that the courts of the country had in the meantime been suspended; and by a military order of March 10, 1862, L. D. McKissick was appointed provost marshal and civil governor of the city of Memphis, and so continued until some time after the battle of Shiloh, in April, 1862; and that during this period the vigilance committee at Memphis were actively engaged in hunting down and bringing to punishment all persons who discredited or refused to take Confederate money; and that the terror and apprehension thus engendered in the public mind was well known to the testator when he was required to go to Memphis and withdraw his deposit. Complainants allege that somewhere about the 20th of March, 1862, when the excitement about the Confederate money was nearly or quite at its highest point, their testator received a notice from the said branch bank to come to Memphis and withdraw his deposit; that he was very much disinclined to go, because he had the charge of his three daughters and no male member of his family at home, but upon the advice of his friends that it would be safest and best, he went. Complainants allege that on his arrival at the bank he was required to withdraw his deposit at once and to receive it all in Confederate money, which for the time he declined and attempted to waive or delay the matter; that the bank persistently demanded the withdrawal of the deposit in that description of money, and that their testator protested against taking it, but demanded payment in the notes of said bank, and this was kept up for several days; that their testator, seeing no way to waive or longer delay the matter, and fearing the results of a positive refusal, did, still under protest, on the 28th of March, 1862, withdraw his deposit from said branch; that having in the meantime induced said bank, on his repeated assurances that Confederate money would be wholly worthless to him, to let him have some small amount in other money, he received from said bank $3,656.34 in the notes of southern banks, and the balance, $28,000, in worthless Confederate notes; that he left said Confederate money in Memphis with an officer in the Bank of West Tennessee, who has recently informed complainants that he carried the money south and invested part of it in Confederate bonds and had the balance in packages just as he received them, which bonds and packages will be filed with the papers in this cause. Complainants alleged that soon after the close of the war their testator engaged an attorney to file a bill or take necessary steps to collect the amount due him from the bank, but said attorney died before instituting proceedings; and that he spoke to two others to undertake his case, and they agreed to do so, but for various causes intervening they did not get ready to begin suit in the lifetime of testator.

Assuming the allegations of the bill to be true so far as they state facts, the question is, do they show that the testator made the settlement and withdrew his deposit from the bank on the 28th of March, 1862, in consequence of duress, coercion and undue influence? In 2 Greenl. Ev., § 301, it is laid down that "by duress, in its more extended sense, is meant that degree of severity, either threatened and impending, or actually inflicted, which is sufficient to overcome the mind and will of a person of ordinary firmness." This definition of duress was adopted in the case of Brown v. Pierce, 7 Wall., 214. In the case of McSwan v. Miller, decided at Knoxville, at September term, 1867, Judge Hawkins said: "The controlling question is, was the threat of such a character as, under the circumstances surrounding the parties at the time, sufficient to overcome the mind and will, or, in other words, to destroy the free agency of a person of ordinary firmness." In the unreported case of Hillis v. Wood, decided at Nashville, December term, 1870, this court said: "To make the defense of duress effective, there must be something more than a mere possibility that there may be danger of arrest. The apprehension of danger must be based upon threats or other evidence of impending danger calculated to awaken the real fears of a man of ordinary nerve." And in Rolling v. Cate, 1 Heisk., 102, this court said: "To hold that every citizen who possessed or received Confederate treasury notes, under some general or indefinite apprehension that his failure to recognize the currency would give offense to the government, or any of its officers, acted under duress, and that his action can now be repudiated and disowned, would open the flood-gates of litigation and unsettle all dealings and transactions in this State, in which the currency was employed. Nothing short of duress in its legal sense can invalidate executed contracts." The question whether the testator of the complainants made the settlement and withdrew his deposit under duress or coercion, must be determined by applying the facts to the rules laid down in the authorities referred to. The controlling question is, did the testator make the settlement and receive the deposit under such apprehension of impending danger, in view of all the surrounding circumstances, as deprived him of his free agency?

In determining this question, it is proper to look to the age and condition of the testator, as well as to his personal character, so far as the same is in proof. He died in 1867, at the age of seventy; he was consequently sixty-five years of age in 1862. It is not shown that he was then enfeebled by anything else than age, nor was it shown that he was not a man of ordinary firmness. We are assured that there was intense excitement in the public mind in consequence of the rumored issuance of a military order requiring all persons to receive Confederate money; but it is not alleged that any such order had in fact been issued, nor is it alleged that the testator had such information or belief.

It is alleged that there was a vigilance committee at Memphis enforcing the order as to Confederate money, but it is not alleged that testator knew of such committee, or that he was in any way interfered with by that committee. We are left to assume or to conjecture that the testator acted with a knowledge and under the influence of these causes of excitement in the public mind. It does not appear, after testator reached Memphis, that he was in any way influenced or controlled by the alleged terror there prevailing; no such allegation is made. It appears that when he called for his deposit the bank was ready to pay in Confederate money, but testator refused to receive it; yet it is not alleged that the bank made any threats of resorting to the military, or even alluded to the fact that there was any military order on the subject. Testator refused to receive the Confederate money, and the bank declined to pay any other money. Testator left and returned and renewed the negotiation for eight days, and finally received $28,000 in Confederate notes, and $3,656 in Southern notes. But it is not alleged that during these eight days of negotiation, during which testator was refusing to receive Confederate money, any officer of the bank ever intimated to him that by so refusing he was endangering his personal liberty, or that any member of the vigilance committee ever interfered to subject him to punishment for his refusal. Nor is it alleged that testator was in any way compelled to withdraw his deposit. He manifestly had his election to receive his deposit in Confederate notes or to let it remain and take the risks. He exercised his election to let it remain, for eight days, and being unable to make any better contract with the bank, he took $3,656 in Southern notes and the remainder in Confederate notes. We can see in the transaction no evidence that testator acted under a sense of impending danger, produced either by threats of the bank or fears that he would incur the penalty of any military order.

Applying the rules of law already cited to the facts of the case, and giving full force to the fact that testator was an old man of sixty-five years, and that there was a general public excitement on the subject of Confederate money, we are unable to see in the transaction any ground on which to hold that there was duress, coercion, or undue influence on the part of the bank. We are, therefore, of opinion that the chancellor erred in overruling the demurrer, but the same ought to have been sustained and the bill dismissed, which is now done.

U. S. CIR. COURT AT NEW YORK CITY.

OPINION FILED MONDAY, DEC. 6, 1875.

UNITED STATES Ex Rel. IVAN C. MICHELS v. THOMAS L. JAMES, postmaster of New York.

INCREASE OF POSTAGE ON THIRD-CLASS MATTER.

Held, that a bill establishing rates of postage is not to be regarded as a bill for raising revenue within the meaning of the Constitution, and that the bill increasing the rates of postage on third-class matter was constitutionally passed.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

Opinion of the court by JOHNSON, J.

The question upon the merits presented in this case is, whether a clause of the act of Congress, approved March 3, 1875, entitled an "Act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes, is or is not constitutional. The clause referred to increases the rate of postage upon third-class matter from one cent for two ounces to one cent an ounce. The ground of fact on which it is claimed that this clause was not constitutionally enacted is that the clause originated in the Senate and was not an amendment to a bill for raising revenue, originating in the house of representatives. The provision of the constitution which is claimed to render invalid the clause in question is this:—"All bills for raising revenue shall originate in the house of representatives; but the senate may propose or concur with amendments as on other bills (Constitution, art. 11, sec. 7, subd. 1); certain legislative measures are unmistakably bills for raising revenue. These impose taxes upon the people, either directly or indirectly, or lay duties, imposts or excises for the use of the government and give to the persons from whom the money is exacted no equivalent in return unless it be the enjoyment in common with the rest of the citizens of the benefits of good government. It is this feature which characterizes bills for raising revenue. They draw money from the citizens, they give no direct equivalent in return. In respect to such bills it was reasonable that the immediate representatives of the taxpayers should alone have the power to originate them. Their immediate responsibility to their constituents and their zeal and regard for the pecuniary interests of the people, it was supposed would render them especially watchful in the protection of those whom they represented. But the reason fails in respect to bills of a different class. A bill regulating postal rates for postal service provides an equivalent for the money which any citizen may choose voluntarily to pay. He gets the fixed service for the fixed rate or he lets it alone, as he pleases and as his own interests dictate. Revenue beyond its cost may or may not be derived from the service and the pay received for it; but it is only a very strained construction which would regard a bill establishing rates of postage as a bill for raising revenue within the meaning of the constitution.

This broad distinction existing in fact between the two kinds of bills, it is obviously a just construction to confine the terms of the Constitution to the case which they plainly designate. To strain those terms beyond their primary and obvious meaning, and thus to introduce a precedent for that sort of construction, would work a great public mischief. Mr. Justice Story, in his Commentaries on the Constitution (sec. 880), puts the same construction upon the language in question, and gives his reasons for the views he sustains, which are able and convincing. In Tucker's Blackstone, only so far as authorities have been referred to, is found the opinion that a bill for establishing the post office operates as a revenue law. But this opinion, although put forth at an early day, has never obtained any general approval, but both legislative practice and general consent have concurred in the other view. Another question has arisen which has some similarity with that under discussion, and which, unless adverted to, might give rise to misapprehension. Thus, in United States v. Bromley, 12 How., 88, the question was whether an act of Congress which gave a writ of error in any civil action brought by the United States for the enforcement of the revenue laws, embraced within its meaning an act to reduce rates of postage, and to prevent frauds on the revenue of the post office department. It was held that the latter act was within the meaning of the former, a revenue law of the United States, and that the writ of error could be sustained. The court says: "Revenue is the income of a State, and the revenue of the post office department, being raised by a tax on mailable matter conveyed in mail, and which is disbursed in the public service, is as much a part of the income of the government as moneys collected for duties on imports." All this may be conceded without involving the conclusion that such a law is an act for raising revenue.

The case of Warner v. Fowler, 4 Blatchford, C. C. R., 341, though involving other statutes, was put substantially upon the same ground as the preceding case. It was an action against a postmaster for non-delivery of certain letters. The defendant claimed that in delaying them he acted under the laws in relation to the post office department, and that he was entitled to have the suit removed to the United States Circuit court under the statute, as being for an act done under the revenue laws of the United States. This claim was sustained by Judge Ingersoll, holding the circuit court in this district. The decision was, in my opinion, correct, upon the ground that while the post office laws are revenue laws within the meaning of the statutes cited, they are not laws for raising revenue within the provisions of the Constitution. The motion should be denied.

AGENCY—JOINT PRINCIPALS.

The power of authorizing another to do a certain act or to ratify an unauthorised assumption of authority may be vested either in a single individual or in a number of individuals. It may be vested in a single individual in either of two cases; and these are where no other than that person can act as principal, and where he, in common with others, exercises a power of appointing agents. It is a fundemental rule of the law of agency that whatever a person may do in his own right he may do by means of an agent. Hence it follows that if one of several principals may of his own right act on behalf of the other principals, he may appoint an agent to act on their joint behalf. The power of joint principals to appoint an agent to act for all the principals is, then, a question of authority. One of several principals has clearly no such power where each of them has a distinct interest in the subject matter, unless the others consent. In order, however, to put the matter more clearly, it will be well to say a few words of the several varieties of joint principals.

Where more than one person has an interest in any chattel, they are either tenants in common, joint tenants or partners. With respect to joint tenants and tenants in common, the general rule is that one joint tenant or one tenant in common has no implied authority to appoint an agent to act for the other coowners. Joint tenants, it is said, are seised per my et per tout, they have only a right to a moiety respectively. Hence, if all joined in a feoffment, each gave but his part (Bac. Alr. Estates, K. 6).

The effect of a notice to quit given by one of several joint tenants who have joined in a demise was for some time warmly disputed. The question appears to have been first definitely raised in Right v. Cuthell (5 East 491), though, owing to the informality of the notice given in other respects, the opinion expressed by Lord Ellenborough was not a necessary part of the ratio decidendi, inasmuch as the notice to determine the lease was signed by two only of the three executors, there being a proviso in the lease that either landlord or tenant or their executors, in case they wished to determine the lease, should give notice in writing under his or their respective hands. Hence there was not a sufficient compliance with the terms of the proviso.

In Goodtitle v. Woodward (3 B. & Ald. 689), which was decided in 1820, the question came again incidentally before the Court of King's Bench. A notice to quit was given by an agent, who professed to act on behalf of all the joint tenants who had granted the lease. At the time of giving the notice he had authority from some only of the joint tenants The others subsequently ratified his conduct, and Abbott, C. J. was of opinion that the occupier, having received notice to quit, purporting to be given on the part of all the lessors, had then such a notice as he could act upon with certainty at the time it was given. Thus the learned judge decided the case by an application of the doctrine of ratification. It is submitted that this application of the doctrine is erroneous, though the decision itself may be well supported by the reasoning in Doe v. Summersett (1 B. & Ad. 135). This case, which was decided in the same court in 1830, fully raised the question whether a notice to quit, signed by one of several joint tenants on behalf of the others, will determine a tenancy from year to year or to all. The court, over which Lord Tenterden presided, decided in the affirmative. It would seem that his Lordship had modified the opinion expressed in Goodtitle v. Woodward (sup.) respecting the applicability of the doctrine of ratification in such cases. The Attorney General contended that the notice was valid, on two grounds—(1) that the adoption of the notice by the other lessor was equivalent to a prior command, and (2) that a notice to quit by one of several joint tenants put an end to the tenancy as to all. The court thought that the latter ground was right, nothing being said of the former. The reasoning of the judgment is worthy of notice. Where joint tenants join in a lease, each demises his own share (Co. Litt. 186*a*), and each may put an end to that demise, as far as it operates upon his own share, whether his companions will join him in putting an end to the whole lease or not: Doe v. Chaplain (3 Daunt, 120); so that upon a notice to quit by one of several joint tenants, no doubt his part might be recovered if there has been a separate demise. But though upon a joint lease by joint tenants each demises his own share, this is not the only operation of such a lease. Joint tenants are not only seised of their respective shares per my, but also of the entirety per tout (Litt. 288). Upon a joint demise by joint tenants upon a tenancy from year to year the true character of the tenancy is this, not that the tenant holds of each the share of each so long as he and each shall please, but that he holds the whole of all so long as he and all shall please; and as soon as any one of the joint tenants gives a notice ty quit, he effectaully puts an end to that tenancy. The tenant has a right upon such a notice to give up the whole, and, unless he comes to a new arrangement with the other joint tenants as to their shares, he is compellable so to do. If upon such a notice the tenant is entitled to treat it as putting an end to the tenancy as to the whole, the other joint tenants must have the same right. It cannot be optional on one side, and on one side only (per Curiam, Doe v. Summersett, sup.) This decision will render any further recourse to the reasoning in Goodtitle v. Woodward (sup.) unnecessary; but it will be noticed that the effect of the terms of the judgment in Doe v. Summersett (sup.) is so wide as to make it immaterial whether the notice is given in the names of all the joint tenants, or simply in the name of a single joint tenant. Proceeding, then, upon the principle that whatever one may do in his own right he may do by an agent, the reasoning of the court in this case would support the proposition that one of several joint tenants, of his own will and by means of his agent, without professing to act on behalf of the other joint tenants, may put an end to the whole tenancy, provided either the lessee or other lessors so will. Whether this proposition would be supported in its entirety has not been determined. Subsequent authorities, so far as they go, are not consistent with it. (See Doe v. Hughes, 7 M. & W. 139; Alford v. Vickery, C. & M. 280; and see Doe v. Foster, 3 C. B. 215.) However, there can be no doubt that if the agent of one of several joint tenants, who have granted a demise from year to year, is authorised by his principal to give notice to quit in the name of all the joint tenants, the notice is so far valid as to enable either the lessee or other lessors to act upon it.

Several principals may employ the same agent without incurring a joint liability, in other words without becoming liable as partners. In Lindley on Partnership (p. 59. Vol. I.) the learned author has pointed out with great clearness the salient distinctions between coownership and partnership. The distinctions are of value in an examination of the law of agency, because one partner, as such, is an agent, real or implied, of the others. Unlike partnership, coownership is not necessarily the result of agreement, nor does it necessarily involve community of profit or of loss. So true is it that partnership is a branch of the law of agency, that when a person is sought to be made liable on the ground of his being a partner, the true test is whether or not he has constituted the other alleged partner his agent in respect of the partnership business. (Buller v. Sharp, L. Rep. 1, C. P. 36; 35 L. J. 105, C. P.) So, too, one of several tenants in common has no power as such to appoint an agent for the others.

It will be sufficient to cite but a few cases in support of the above propositions. In Coope v. Eyre (1 H. Bl. 39), decided in 1788, E. employed a broker to buy a quantity of oil, and agreed with the other defendants that they should have aliquot parts of it when purchased. E. was the only purchaser known to the plaintiffs, and entire credit was given to him alone. The purchases were made on speculation. The price of oil fell, and E. failed. The plaintiffs then brought an action to recover the price of the oil from all the defendants. A majority of the court held that E. alone was liable for the amount. The cases put by Justice Gould, show the relation of the parties. A man goes into Yorkshire to buy as many horses as he can collect, or a limited number, and agrees with a friend that he shall have two; or a man is about to buy a tun of wine, and agrees that a friend shall have a hogshead. It surely cannot be contended that this could make the friend in either supposition a joint contractor, to subject him upon failure of the other to pay for the whole bargain. In an earlier case it had been laid down by Lord Mansfield that it would be most dangerous if the credit of a person who engages for a fortieth part, for instance, should be considered as bound for all the other thirty-nine parts: (Hoare v. Dawes 2 Doug. 371.) Gibson v. Lupton (9 Bing. 297) is a later decision of the Court of Common Pleas. A and B. ordered an undivided parcel of goods; each was to pay for his own share. The freight and charges were actually so paid, and the cargo upon its arrival was equally divided before it was warehoused. No partnership had existed between them antecedent to this period. The strongest fact in support of the contention that the defendants purchased on their joint account was the plaintiff's reply to the original order, signed by both defendants that a purchase had been made on their joint account. On the other hand, it was provided in the same order that payment was to be made by each of the defendants. Upon these facts it was held that the defendants were not jointly liable for the whole amount.

In Nicholson v. Ricketts (1 L. T. Rep. N. S. 54; 2 Ell. & Ell. 497). a decision of the Court of Queen's Bench in 1860, the defendants, merchants in London, entered into a contract with S. and Co., merchants at Buenos Ayres, for the purpose of carrying on certain exchange operations. S. and Co. were periodically to draw bills on the defendants to be accepted by them, then put the proceeds in the bank, and so profit by the rate of exchange. S. and Co. were also periodically to remit and redraw other bills on the defendants to the same amount; the proceeds of this operation to be applied to a common fund, it being agreed that there should be a community of profit and loss between them. S. and Co. drew bills on the defendants and sold them, in conformity with the arrangement; but the defendants refused to accept them. The present action was brought to establish the liability of the defendants upon the bills, on the ground that there was a partnership existing between S. and Co. and the defendants. The Court was unanimous in giving judgment for the defendants. It is a well known principle of the law of partnership that, in order to bind a partnership by an act done by another member of the partnership in the way of drawing or accepting a bill, such partner must have an express or implied authority so to bind his fellow partner. In ordinary cases of mercantile partnership there is no need of such express authority, as the laws implies it. So, also, if from the nature of the constitution of the partnership it is apparent that drawing bills by the members was intended thereby, by law the authority so to do will be implied. Although there was a partnership in one sense, S. and Co. had no authority to bind the defendants with the obligation of accepting these bills, still less to hold out to the world that they had authority to do so (per. Cockburn, C. J. ib.) Hence where A. B. and C. are in partnership and arrange that C. shall draw bills in his own name on A. and B., it cannot be said that C.'s signature to such bills binds the others: (see per Crompton, J. ib., and Re The Adansonia Fibre Company (Limited); Miles and Co's claim (31 L. T. Rep. N S. 9; L. Rep. 9 Ch. App. 635; 43 L. J. 732, Ch.) Part owners by the joint employment of a ship become partners in respect of the adventure: (Bovill v. Hammond, 6 B. & C. 149.) But one part owner cannot, without the common consent of the owners, insure the shares of the other part-owners, so as to make the insurance a charge upon the joint proceeds, unless the ship is partnership property: (Lindsay v. Gibbs, 28 L. J. Ch. 692; Hooper v. Lusby, 4 Camp. 66.)—The London Law Times.

Error to Wayne. Reversed with costs and new trial ordered. Opinion by COOLEY, J.

In a law suit involving the title to land, the plaintiff is not estopped from contesting the validity of certain foreclosure proceedings under which the title has been obtained, by his failure to raise that question in a former suit brought by him in chancery to set aside the mortgage as invalid.

One who fails to have a judgment set aside for fraud, is not debarred from contesting at law a void execution sale by not having put it in issue in his chancery suit.

A complainant may, if he chooses, make distinct controversies on the same matter, the subjects of separate suits.—[Supreme Court of Michigan, October Term.]

SATURDAY, JANUARY 1, 1876.

The Courts.

We are under obligations to JOHN JOHNS, Jr., of the Richmond, Va., bar, for the following opinion:

UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT.

No. 37.—OCTOBER TERM, 1875.

ANNIE KNOTTS, CARRIE KNOTTS AND EDWIN KNOTTS, infants, by their next friend, EMILY J. KNOTTS, Appellants, v.

FRANKLIN STEARNS, executor of C. J. BALDWIN deceased, VIRGINIA V. BALDWIN AND MARY F. BALDWIN.

Appeal from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Virginia.

GUARDIAN'S SALE—POSTHUMOUS CHILD—INVESTMENT IN CONFEDERATE MONEY.

1. JURISDICTION.—That the Circuit Court of Richmond had jurisdiction to order the sale.

2. RIGHTS OF A POSTHUMOUS CHILD.—Where a father died leaving two minor children and a widow, and the guardian of such children commenced proceedings to sell the real estate of the deceased and a posthumous child was born after the commencement of such proceedings, who was not made a party: Held, that it was no cause for setting aside the sale, because the posthumous child was not made a party.

3. That the posthumous child did not possess until born, any estate in the real property of which his father died seized, which could affect the power of the court to convert the property into a personal fund, if the interest of the children then in being, or the enjoyment of the widow's dower-right, required such conversion. Whatever estate devolved upon him at his birth, was an estate in the property in its then condition; that property had then ceased to be realty; it had become by the sale converted into personalty.

4. SALE—ORDERING FUNDS INVESTED IN CONFEDERATE MONEY.—Held, that the decree ordering the sale of the property and directing the investment of the proceeds in Confederate money, was not invalid, because of the direction of the investment of the proceeds in Confederate money. It was a lawful proceeding, and is not to be construed as in aid of the rebellion. This case is distinguished from that of Horn v. Lockhart.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

JOHN JOHNS, Jr., for the appellants, made the following points:

1. The Circuit court of Richmond city, Virginia, during the recent civil war, in 1863, had no legal authority to make the decrees for the sale, and the confirmation of sale, of the house and lot in the suit instituted for that purpose by the guardian of two of the infants. Code of Virginia, 1860, ch. 128, § 1, 2, 3, 4.

2. Such decrees, even if binding on the two infants whose guardian filed the bill, is not binding on the third, who was not named in the bill, nor a party to the proceeding. Code of Va., 1860, ch. 128, § 1.

3. The court had no authority to sell the house and lot as it did, and the sale was a nullity, being in aid of the rebellion. Horn v. Lochkart, 17th Wallace, 570–580; Sprott v. U. S., 20th Wallace, 459–464–465.

4. Whether or not before the sale and investment in Confederate bonds, the court was authorized to act duly in the premises, as against the two infants represented by guardian, its ratification of the investment in Confederate bonds as against the infant not named in the proceedings, was in direct aid of rebellion, and the deed to the purchaser was null and void.

Mr. Justice FIELD delivered the opinion of the Court.

This suit was brought to set aside a sale and conveyance of certain real estate situated in Richmond, Virginia, of which one Edwin Knotts died seized, made in 1865, under a decree of the circuit court of that city, and to compel a delivery of the property to the possession of the plaintiffs. The decree for the sale was obtained upon a bill filed for that purpose by the guardian of the infant children of the deceased, to which his widow was made a a party. The property sold consisted of a house and lot, which, with a few articles of household furniture, constituted the entire estate of the deceased. The house was at the time much out of repair; so much so that in its then condition it could not be rented, and neither the widow nor the children had any means to repair it. Nor had they any other estate to which they could look as a source of support. The widow was entitled to dower in the property, and it was incapable of partition according to the respective rights of the parties. It was, therefore, manifestly for the interest of all of them that the property should be sold, and the proceeds converted into a fund which would give to them some income. The circuit court of Richmond was invested with jurisdiction under such circumstances, upon a proper showing of the facts, to decree a sale of the estate of the children. A law of the State expressly conferred the jurisdiction, and authorized its exercise upon a bill filed by the guardian for that purpose, if it was clearly shown, independently of admissions in the answer, that the interest of the infants would be promoted by the sale, and the court was satisfied that the rights of others would not be violated by the proceeding (Code of Virginia of 1860, chap. 128.) The widow consented to the decree so far as her interests were concerned, and it is only with reference to the estate of the children that any inquiry into the validity of the sale can now be had.

The greater part of the papers and entries in the suit in the circuit court of Richmond was destroyed by the fire which occurred on the third of April, 1865, the day on which the city was occupied by the army of the United States; but their absence was in a great degree supplied by the testimony of the counsel of the guardian, under whose advice the suit was brought and conducted. That testimony and copies of the decrees preserved show that the proceedings were regularly taken in accordance with the provisions of the statute and the practice of the court. The bill was filed by the general guardian, and the widow and children were made parties defendants; they all appeared to the suit, the children by a special guardian ad litem appointed by the court. A reference was had to a commissioner to ascertain the facts required by the statute to authorize a sale; his report showed the condition of the property, and that the interest of all parties would be promoted by its sale, and that no rights of any other person would be violated thereby. The report was accepted and approved and a decree for the sale was accordingly made, which was entered on the 13th of March, 1863. The sale under it was had on the 5th of April following, when the testator of the defendant Stearns became the purchaser for the sum of $13,800 cash. The sale was approved and a deed of the property ordered and executed to the purchaser.

The widow gave birth to a posthumous child in May following the death of her husband, and the validity of the decree is assailed because this unborn child was not made a party nor its interests specifically considered in the previous proceedings in the suit.

The decree, after ordering a sale of the property, also provided for the investment of the proceeds in bonds or stock of the Confederate States, or of any State belonging to the Confederacy, or of the city of Richmond. The proceeds were invested in bonds of the Confederacy, and the investment was approved by the court. It is now contended that the decree of sale was invalid because of the direction for the investment of the proceeds, and the subsequent approval of the investment made, the counsel of the appellants insisting that aid was thus directly given to the rebellion.

These two grounds constitute the principal objection to the decree. Neither of them, in our judgment, affects the validity of the sale.

The posthumous child did not possess, until born, any estate in the real property of which his father died seized, which could affect the power of the court to convert the property into a personal fund, if the interest of the children then in being, or the enjoyment of the dower right of the widow required such conversion. Whatever estate devolved upon him at his birth was an estate in the property in its then condition. That property had then ceased to be realty; it had become by the sale converted into personalty. All that was then required for the protection of his interest in it was the appointment of a guardian to take possession of his proportion, and such a proceeding was had. A guardian was appointed, and upon a supplemental bill the original decree was so far modified as to provide for the child having an equal interest in the fund obtained with the other children.

But there is another answer to the objection. Assuming that the child, before its birth, whilst still en ventre sa mere, possessed such a contingent interest in the property as required his representation in the suit for its sale he was thus represented, according to the law which obtains in Virginia, by the children in being at the time who were then entitled to the possession of the estate. Parties in being possessing an estate of inheritance are there regarded as so far representing all persons who, being afterwards born, may have interests in the same, that a decree binding them will also bind the after-born parties. In the case of Franklin v. Davis, which is reported in the 18th of Grattan, this subject is elaborately and learnedly considered. In that case a trust estate, created for the benefit of a man and his wife during their joint lives, and the life of the survivor of them, and of their children living at the death of the survivor, and of the descendants of such of the children as might be then dead, had been sold by a decree of the circuit court of Richmond, rendered in a suit for that purpose brought by the surviving widow, in which the children were made parties, but in which no one appeared to protect the interests of any of their descendants; and the court held that the sale was valid, and that the descendants of any child dying in the life-time of the surviving widow were bound by the decree, on the ground that the children were to be considered as representing before the court any of their descendants who might upon their death become entitled under the trusts of the deed.

The statute of Virginia, as additional security against improvident proceedings for the sale of an infant's estate, requires that all those who would be heirs or distributees of the infant, if dead, shall be made parties. This requirement was met in the case under consideration, for upon the death of either child the mother and other child would have been its heirs and the distributees of its estate.

With the investment of the proceeds of the sale the purchaser under the decree had no concern. A purchaser at a judicial sale is not bound in any case to see to the application of the purchase money. That is under the control of the court, and the title of the purchaser is not affected, however unwise or illegal the disposition of the money.

The case of Horn v. Lockhart, 17 Wallace, 570, which is invoked by the appellants, lends no support to their pretensions. That was was the case of an executor in Alabama seeking to escape an accounting and payment to legatees of proceeds of property of the estate in his hands sold previous to the war, and retained by him for years after he had been called to a final account by the probate court of the State, by alleging a voluntary investment of the proceeds in bonds of the Confederate government. Those bonds were issued for the express purpose of raising funds to carry on the war then waged against the United States. The investment was, therefore, held to be illegal, because it constituted a direct contribution to the resources of the Confederate government, thus giving aid and comfort to the enemies of the United States; and the character of the transaction in this respect was not deemed to have been changed by the fact that the investment was authorized by the existing legislation of the State, and was approved by the subsequent decree of its probate court. A voluntary proceeding in aid of a treasonable organization could not be thus freed from its original unlawfulness.

There is no analogy between that case and the one at bar. Here no action is sought to be upheld which was taken in aid of the insurrectionary government. The sale in question was not made with any reference to that government, but solely to raise a fund which would yield an income for the support of the widow and children, and was, therefore a lawful proceeding.

The widow and the guardian were not compelled to take the bonds of the Confederate government; they were allowed the option of investing in such bonds, or bonds of any of the States of the Confederacy, or bonds of the city of Richmond. Having deliberately selected the securities of the insurrectionary government in which to place their money, it would be a strange thing if complaints could now be heard from them against the title of the purchaser of the property, who had nothing to do with the disposition of the money, on the ground that the court did not preserve them from the folly of that investment.

We perceive no error in the decree of the court below, and it is accordingly affirmed.

UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT.

No. 45.—OCTOBER TERM, 1875.

SARAH ANN JACKSON (NOW SARAH ANN DORSEY), appellant, v. SIMON JACKSON.

Appeal from the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia.

MARRIED WOMAN'S EARNINGS—SEPARATE PROPERTY—LAND PURCHASED BY WIFE—EFFECT OF DIVORCE ON WIFE'S PROPERTY.

In this case the land in controversy was purchased by the wife with money which she had, previous to her marriage, given to her by her father. The buildings erected thereon were constructed partly with such money and partly with her subsequent earnings. The deed of the land was taken in her name; the contract for the house was made by her alone with the builder. At the date of the marriage, and when the land was purchased and the improvements were made, the common law governed in the District of Columbia as to the rights of married women to the personal property possessed by them previous to their marriage. By that law the money that the wife possessed and her subsequent earnings belonged to her husband. But the husband being free from debt at the time, it was competent for him to allow her to invest them for her own use, so as to be beyond his reach and control: that the divorce decreed was not of itself a sufficient reason for restoring to the husband any rights to the property thus settled upon the wife. The decree of the District Court, so far as it awards any portion of the property in controversy to the husband, and directs a conveyance by the wife, is reversed.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

Opinion of the court by FIELD, J.

The land in controversy in this case was purchased by the wife with money which she had previous to her marriage, given to her by her father. The buildings erected thereon were constructed partly with such money and partly with her subsequent earnings. The deed of the land was taken in her name; the contract for the houses was made by her alone with the builder; the policy of insurance upon the buildings was executed to her, and she paid the taxes upon the property. It is true, at the date of the marriage, and when the land was purchased and the improvements were made the common law governed in the District of Columbia as to the rights of married women to the personal property possessed by them previous to their marriage, and not secured by a settlement or contract to their separate use, and as to their subsequent earnings. By that law the money which the wife then possessed and her subsequent earnings belonged exclusively to her husband. They vested as absolutely in him as though the money had been originally his, and the earnings were the proceeds of his own labor and industry. This harsh rule of the common law was founded upon the idea, that as the husband was bound by the marriage to support the wife and the rest of the family, he was entitled to whatever she possessed or subsequently acquired, which was available for that purpose; a rule which would have had some good ground for its existence, had it only applied when the money or earnings of the wife were necessary for that purpose. But becoming absolutely the property of the husband they were subject to his disposal without regard to the necessities of the family, and might be taken from them at the suit of his creditors. They partook of the condition and were subject to the fate of his separate property.

But though the money which the wife in the present case had at her marriage, and her subsequent earnings must be regarded as the property of the husband, it was competent and lawful for him to allow her to invest them for their own use, so as to be beyond his reach and control. Being at the time free from debt he could have taken whatever money she had, whether given to her or earned by her own labor, and purchased with it the land in controversy and received the deed in her name. The investment would then have been an advancement for her benefit, a voluntary settlement upon her. And the subsequent application of her earnings to the construction of improvements would have equally been a legal disposition of them. The improvement of property settled upon the wife is not forbidden to the husband, if not made with a fraudulent intent and the moneys used for that purpose do not interfere with any rights of existing creditors.

The law on the subject of post-nuptial settlements of this character is well settled and will be found stated in numerous adjudications of the American courts.

(Picquet v. Swan, 4 Mason, 444; Haskell v. Bakewell, 10 B. Monroe, 206.) The doctrine of resulting trusts, arising where a conveyance is taken in the name of one person and the consideration is advanced by another, has no application to investments of this kind. Such trusts are raised by the law from the presumed intention of the parties, and the natural equity that he who furnishes the means for the acquisition of property should enjoy its benefits. But no presumption that a personal benefit was intended to the party advancing the funds for a purchase in the name of another, can arise where an obligation exists on his part, legal or moral, to provide for the grantee, as in the case of a husband for his wife, or a father for his child. The circumstance that the grantee stands in one of these relations to the party, is of itself sufficient evidence to rebut the presumption of a resulting trust, and to create a contrary presumption of an advancement for the grantee's benefit. (Murless v. Franklin, 1 Swans., 17; Grey v. Grey, 2 Swans., 597; Finch v. Finch, 15 Vesey, 50; Guthrie v. Gardner, 19 Wend., 414; Perry on Trusts, Secs. 143 and 144.)

The case of Sexton v. Wheaton, (8 Wheaton, 229.) which arose in the District of Columbia, is a determination of this court upon the points here presented. There the husband had purchased a house and lot within the district and taken the conveyance in the name of his wife, and afterwards improvements were made upon the property. Subsequent creditors having obtained judgment against him, filed a bill to subject the property to its payment, contending that the conveyance to the wife was fraudulent and void as to them, and praying that if the conveyance was sustained the wife might be compelled to account for the value of the improvements. But the court held, Mr. Chief Justice Marshall delivering its opinion, that the husband at the time being free from debt, the conveyance to the wife was to be deemed a voluntary settlement upon her, which not being made with any fraudulent intent, was operative and binding against subsequent creditors; and that the improvements upon the property stood upon the same footing as the conveyance itself, they being made before the debts were contracted. The Chief Justice observed that it would seem to be a consequence of that absolute power which a man possesses over his own property, that he might make any disposition of it which did not interfere with the existing rights of others; that such disposition, if it were fair and real, would be valid, and that the limitations upon this power were those only which were prescribed by law. The Chief Justice then proceeded to show that the law only limited this power when its exercise impaired the rights of existing creditors, and that a voluntary settlement by a husband in favor of his wife could not be impeached by subsequent creditors, unless it was made to defraud them.

The present case is one much stronger than the case cited, for here there are no creditors complaining. It differs from the one cited in that the investment was made directly by the wife instead of being made through the husband, but we do not perceive in this fact any valid objection to the legality of the transaction. There can be no doubt that she acted with his approval. Fifteen years of acquiescence in her holding the land in her name and in making improvements thereon with her earnings, ought to be deemed satisfactory evidence of his original authorization of the investments. The amount paid for the land was only three hundred dollars, less than one-sixth of the sum received from her father, and the whole cost of the improvements for the fifteen years was only about two thousand dollars; and it does not appear that any third parties have been in any respect prejudiced by the investments or have ever questioned their validity.

The divorce decreed was not of itself a sufficient reason for restoring to the husband any rights to the property thus settled upon the wife. That was granted for cruel treatment, and whatever may be the power of the court over the property of parties upon the dissolution of the marriage relation, there was no call for its exercise in a case like the present.

The decree of the Supreme Court of the district, so far as it awards any portion of the property in controversy to the husband, and directs a conveyance by the wife to him, must be reversed; and it is so ordered.

Mr. Justice DAVIS dissenting.

I agree to the legal propositions advanced by the court, but, in my opinion, the evidence in this case does not warrant the application that has been made of them.

It would serve no useful purpose to discuss the evidence, in order to show that it is so, and I shall, therefore, content myself with saying, that it justified the conclusion reached by the court below, that the property should be divided between the parties. As the appeal only brought up the question of property rights, I am not at liberty to consider the merits of the decree for divorce.

U. S. CIR. COURT, N. D. OF ILL.

OPINION DECEMBER 7, 1875.

MARTIN T. CALKINS v. THEOPHILUS F. BERTRAND et al.

PATENT—RE-ISSUE—INFRINGMENT.

1. CLAIM ON A RE-ISSUE.—That the law of 1836 has been construed to authorize a patentee to claim on a re-issue whatever shall clearly appear to have been a part of his original invention as described or shown in his original specifications, drawings or models.

2. THIS CASE—INFRINGEMENT.—That the re-issue by which Gerber, as assignee of the Smith patent, was allowed to amend his specifications so as to secure the joint "M" as an element in his device or in the Smith device, and to cover the idea of jointing between the evener and the neck-yoke as a specific element in his invention, is a valid re-issue under the patent law as it then stood; and that having obtained the re-issue, and covering now the ground occupied by the defendants, the complainants are entitled to recover.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

Opinion by BLODGETT, J. This is a bill in equity for gains, profits and damages, and final injunction against the defendants for an alleged infringement of a re-issued patent "for an improvement in cultivators," granted to Julius Gerber, April 26th, 1870, upon an original patent issued to Imlus R. Smith, dated April 24th, 1860.

The answer denies that Smith was the first inventor of the improvement described and claimed in the original Smith patent, and as re issued, and also insists that the re-issued patent is not for the same invention as that described in the original patent. The defendants also deny that they infringed the plaintiff's patent even if its validity is conceded or established.

The drawings attached to the original Smith patent showed a cultivator frame mounted on wheels and fastened to the tongue at a point forward of the evener.

This frame worked freely above the axle, the axle gauging the depth which the shovels could run into the ground, The claim was for the combination of this frame as constructed with the wheels and tongue by the joint "M," as shown and specified. In the re-issue to the complainant Gerber, he was allowed to amend his specifications in several particulars, the most material of which is, that "the auxiliary frame is hinged or otherwise loosely attached to the main frame at a point between the evener and the neck yoke, by means of which great length of beam is obtained, and more purchase in the side motion." * * * "By means of the long swing obtained by bringing the beam of the auxiliary frame forward of the evener, the difference between the movements of the front and rear shovels, is rendered relatively less."

His general claim in 1860 was for the idea of mounting this cultivator frame upon wheels so that the operator could ride upon the wagon frame without his weight resting upon the cultivator frame, and operate the cultivator frame from his seat or platform. The patent was for the combination of the cultivator frame and the wagon frame together, connecting them by the joint "M." He did not seem to realize that there was any very special merit in bringing the beam forward to the point where he coupled it to the tongue; at least he makes no mention of it in his specification, as a novel or useful element in his machine. It was, however, found by experience that this cultivator, by reason of the long swing which it had in its beam, was much more readily manipulated and handled than any other which had been produced, and therefore the cultivator seems to have come into somewhat general use, and finally the owners of the patent surrendered it, and obtained a re issue covering, as a specific device, this idea of coupling the beam forward of the evener so as to secure a long swing as the essential element in the invention.

The claim of the re-issued patent is as follows: "First. An auxiliary frame carrying two or more shovel standards on each side as shown, when said frame is hinged to the pole between the evener and neck-yoke, as described for the purposes set forth."

There is no doubt but what Smith's original model shows that he hinged his plow beam forward of the evener. The evener as shown in the original model, and it is also shown in the drawings. And Gerber therefore had the right, as the assignee of Smith's patent, to cover that feature of the Smith invention by the re-issued letters patent. And it seems, too, that the Patent Office took the same view of the matter, and gave him what he claimed.

This re-issue was made on the 26th of April, 1870, and while the Patent Office was acting under the law of 1836 as amended up to the act of 1861, so far as related to the matter of re-issues. This law has been construed to authorize a patentee to claim on a re-issue whatever shall clearly appear to have been a part of his original invention as described or shown in his original specifications, drawings or models. There are ample authorities upon that point construing the act of 1836 with amendments up to 1861 in that regard, and giving the inventor the right to a re-issue where the new claim is clearly justified by his drawings or specifications or models, or either, and allowing him to amend his specifications if necessary so as to cover more fully what, upon experience, has proven to be a meritorious part of his invention. Battin v. Taggert, 17 How., 74; Gallahue v. Butterfield, 10 Blatch., 232; Wheeler v. Clipper Co., 6 Fisher, 1; Seymour v. Osborne, 11 Wallace, 544. It seems clear from the proofs in this case that as wheel cultivators came into use, the value of the long swing to the beams, in the practical working of the machine, became more apparent, and hence the owners of the Smith patent sought and obtained this re-issue for the purpose of covering this special feature in the original Smith machine.

The defendants contend that the re-issued patent is void because the distinguishing feature, the location of the joint forward of the evener, is not patentable. They urge that hinging forward of the evener instead of back of it, produces no new result; that no definite point is fixed and no directions given as to the point where the joint is to be placed. The evidence, however, seems to me to show that the "long swing," obtained by the hinging of the beam forward of the evener is a new and useful result.

The machines of Ganse and Whitehall shown in the proofs, which ante-date the Smith patent, show the shovel-beams hinged back of the evener, producing a jerky motion and rendering it almost, if not wholly, impossible to guide the shovels so as to avoid hills out of line, or stones, roots or other obstacles in the direct line.

The suggestion that this is not a change of result, but is only a change in degree, is, I think, not sustained by the proof. The long radius, in other words, secures a practicable cultivator which can be guided along the side of a crooked row of plants so as to avoid disturbing them, while the short beams would seem to be practically useless except in straight, or nearly straight rows. This is a practically new result and the proper subject of a patent as such. The objection that the first claim of the patent is void for uncertainty, because the precise location of the joint is not described or fixed in feet or inches, seems to me untenable. The amended specifications say: "This auxiliary frame is hinged, or otherwise loosely attached to the main frame at a point between the evener and neck-yoke, by means of which great length of beam is obtained and more purchase in the side motion." * * * * * * * * * *

"When two shovels are employed upon each side of the auxiliary frame, the rear set are necessarily wider apart than the front set, and as they swing in the arc of a larger circle, they move relatively over more ground.

"In the ordinary cultivator, this difference of relative movement is quite marked, and consequently there is danger, when the front shovels are swung aside to avoid irregularly planted hills, of the rear shovels interfering with the wheels or the adjacent rows.

"By means, however, of the long swing obtained by bringing the beam of the auxiliary frame forward of the evener, the difference between the movements of the front and rear shovels is rendered relatively less, and the difficulty referred to obviated." * * * *

"The easy but limited side motion of the auxiliary frame enables the driver to so control its action as to cultivate with safety those crops which have been irregularly planted, or which may have come up in other than straight lines."

Here the direction is to make the swing long enough to secure the desired result, and enables a person of skill who understands the result to be attained, to construct a machine embodying the principle, and this is all the certainty required by law.

So that when you consider these specifications, together with the idea that the end to be obtained is the "long swing," it seems to me there is sufficient in the specifications to notify a party who attempts to construct a cultivator as to the length of beam to be adopted. It does not say that the joint "M" shall be three feet six inches or five feet six inches forward of the evener, or that it shall be eight feet back of the point where the neck-yoke connects, but it says, it shall be far enough forward to secure that easy motion, that facility of handling, and that long radius which will secure ease of handling, and not bring the rear shovels in contact with the wheels, while it will move the forward shovels far enough to avoid the hills out of line or any inequality in the surface of the ground, such as a root or a stone, or a stump.

The next point made by the defendants is, that the complainant's machine is constructed upon a different principle than that of a swinging machine; that it is intended to act by a rocking and not by a swinging motion. There seems no doubt that the original Smith machine was intended to rock upon the saddle "P," but provision was also made for swinging, that is, there is play enough between the ploughs and the frame "O" to allow of a swing or side motion.

Now, I think there is no doubt, from the proof, that Mr. Smith, in his orignal patent, intended to not only swing his cultivator frame, but that he also intended to avoid small obstructions by rocking the plough beam upon this pivoted point, this saddle; and any one at all familiar with ploughing knows that a plough is very readily guided by rocking. that is, by tipping the top a little to the right or left. Now, the least tipping of a plough, we all know, causes the plough to run, as the ploughmen say, "to" or "from the land," and the tipping or the rocking of this frame, so that one set of shovels shall run deeper into the ground than the other, would, of course, cause the frame itself to swing to the side, because it would increase the draft on one side and relieve it on the other. So that the rocking motion of itself would cause the swinging motion. The moment that you rock the shovel enough to secure inequality in the hold upon the ground upon one side more than the other, you would of course produce a swinging motion if your plough was moving forward in straight lines, and undoubtedly this was one of the ideas in the mind of this inventor.

While the rocking motion is provided for in the original patent, nothing is said about it in the re-issued patent, and I can see no reason why the complainant is not at liberty to hang or suspend his auxiliary frame under the axle as well as to mount it on or over the axle. This point is not raised in the case, and I do not intend to decide it. Certainly the complainant leaves himself at liberty to rock or swing his shovels, or do both, as shall be deemed best in practice, by means of the joint "M" between the evener and the neck-yoke.

Now upon the question of infringement: I do not see that there can be any doubt that if Smith was the first to invent the "long swing," to be secured by jointing the beam to the pole between the evener and the neck-yoke, and is entitled to a patent for the idea, then the defendant's machine infringes the complainant in this particular.

I have here a model of the defendant's machine which has the plough beam jointed to the pole between the evener and neck-yoke and suspended under the axle, and operated by means of handles, the driver beiug seated upon a seat which is but an extension of the tongue or pole to the rear of the axle. Here we have provision for the long swing by the joint between the evener and the neck-yoke and the essential element of the complainant's device is manifestly in defendant's machine.

Both machines are limited in their side motion by the wheels, and the wheels must necessarily be so near together as to run freely between two rows straddling one.

I therefore come to the conclusion that the re-issue by which Gerber, as the assignee of the Smith patent, was allowed to amend his specifications so as to secure the joint "M" as an element in his device or in the Smith device, and to cover the idea of jointing between the evener and the neck-yoke as a specific element in his invention, is a valid re-issue under the patent law as it then stood; and that having obtained the re-issue and covering now the ground occupied by the defendants, the complainants are entitled to recover.

It will be necessary to make a reference in this case unless counsel agree upon the matter of damages.

U. S. DIST. COURT, D. OF OREGON.

TUESDAY, Nov. 30, 1875.

ROBERT W. JONES v. THE OREGON CENTRAL RAILWAY COMPANY.—Action at Law.

Section 866 of the R. S. gives the courts of the U. S. power to grant a dedimus to take the examination of a witness whenever in their judgment it may be necessary to prevent a failure or delay of justice; and §§ 863-4-5 of said R. S., relating to taking depositions de bene esse have no application to the granting or execution of said dedimus.

The mode of issuing and executing a dedimus granted in pursuance of said § 866 is regulated by "common usage" or practice, which usage or practice, as to this court, is prescribed by § 807-8-9 of the Or. Civ. Code, relating to taking depositions on commission; and title 7 of chapter 9 of said code, relating to taking depositions de bene esse does not apply.

A person appointed to execute a dedimus represents the court and not the parties; and his commission should contain full directions as to the manner of its execution, as set forth in § 809 of the Or. Civ. Code.

In certifying the deposition to the court it is not necessary for the commissioner to state when or where the examination of the witness was taken, nor by whom it was reduced to writing, or that the witness was "cautioned" before being sworn.

A witness examined under a dedimus should be sworn according to the law of the forum from whence it issued.

Section 860 of the Or. Civ. Code having provided that an affirmation may be made by any person in place of an oath, a dedimus which authorizes the commissioner to administer an oath to a witness, is well executed in this respect, when it appears from the return thereto that the witness was duly affirmed.

A return to a dedimus need not show how a witness was sworn or affirmed, so that it states substantially that the witness was duly sworn or affirmed; nor is it material whether the facts required to be stated in such return are stated in the introduction or conclusion of the examination, so that they are plainly referred to and included by the commissioner in certifying the deposition as a part of the proceeding and return.

DEADY, J.

The defendant moves to suppress the deposition of Charles S. Hinchman, taken at the instance of plaintiff herein, for the reason that the witness does not appear (1) "to have been cautioned, sworn or affirmed according to law;" nor (2) "to have been examined upon the interrogatories attached to the commission;" and that said deposition does not appear (1) to have been "taken, returned and certified according to law;" nor (2) "taken, certified and returned in accordance with chapter 9 of the Code of Oregon and the practice of this court."

On May 7, 1875, a dedimus potestatum, or commission, was issued by the clerk of this court to Samuel L. Taylor, of Philadelphia, giving him power to cause Charles S. Hinchman "to come before" him "at certain days and places to be appointed" by such commissioner, "and then and there" to take the examination of said "Hinchman on his corporal oath as a witness" in the above entitled cause upon the direct and cross interrogatories thereto annexed; and also "to reduce such examination to writing and certify and return the same annexed" to such commission "in a sealed envelope directed to the clerk" of this court "with all convenient speed."

This commission was issued under § 866 of the R. S., the same being the final proviso of § 30 of the judiciary act of 1789, and §§ 807 to 809, inclusive, of the Or. Civ. Code.

The examination of the witness was returned to this court in a sealed envelope on October 12, and published by order of the court on November 11. From the return, which is annexed to the commission, it appears that the deposition of the witness was taken in pursuance of the commision at the office of the commisioner in Philadelphia, on the 15th and 20th days of July, 1875, the witness being first "duly affirmed according to law to testify the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth." It also appears that the witness, being so affirmed, did depose, in answer to the several interrogatories annexed to the commission, as stated in the deposition. So much appears from the statement of the commissioner preceding and introductory to the answers of the witness to the direct and cross interrogatories. The examination is signed by the witness and then follows a certificate of the commissioner, from which it appears that the witness pursuant to said commission came before him "on the days above specified," at 3 P. M. of each day, and "being duly affirmed according to law did testify in the above case as is found above;" and that the deposition was by him reduced to writing and subscribed in his presence.

This motion appears to have been made under the apprehension that the provisions of § 30 of the judiciary act of 1789, now §§ 863-4-5 of the R. S., regulating the taking of depositions de bene esse apply to the examination of a witness upon a dedimus potestatum as authorized by the proviso to said § 30, now § 866 of the R. S., and that title 7 of chapter 9 of the Or. Civ. Code applies to depositions taken upon a commis ion as well as to those taken de bene esse.

But this is a mistake. Neither §§ 863-4-5 of the R. S., nor Title 7 aforesaid, is in any way applicable to a deposition taken upon a dedimus or commission. The argument for so applying Title 7 is founded upon the following clause in § 818 of the Or. Civ. Code: "A deposition taken, whether in the State or without, upon insufficient notice or otherwise, not substantially in conformity with the provisions of this chapter (C. 9), may be excluded from the case, unless," etc.

Title 6 of the same chapter provides for taking the deposition of a witness, out of the State, upon a commission. In such case it is only necessary for the return of the commissioner to show that he administered an oath to the witness and took his examination upon the interrogatories, or if there are none, in respect to the question in dispute, § 109 Or. Civ. Code. But Title 7 provides for taking depositions de bene esse upon notice, and in such case § 815 requires the officer to certify many details as to the taking of the deposition which are not required by § 809, in the case of depositions taken under a commission. Chapter 9 provides for two modes of taking depositions—the one upon commission, and the other upon notice. A deposition taken in either of these modes is taken "in conformity with the provisions of the chapter" when it is taken in conformity with the provisions or title of the chapter relating to the taking of such a deposition.

To hold that all the provisions of the chapter are applicable to a deposition taken under either mode, would not only violate the plain significance of the clause in question, but make the statute an impracticable absurdity. Why go to the trouble of providing for two different modes of taking depositions and then practically require them to be taken in the same manner in all cases—in effect in only one mode? It is not to be supposed that the legislature would provide different modes for taking depositions in the case of witnesses without or within the State and then declare that all the provisions applicable to either case should be complied with in the other; and there is nothing in the language of chapter 9 which gives the slightest countenance to such a conclusion. Therefore, it is not necessary that the return should show on what days or times the examination of the witness was taken, nor who reduced it to writing. The commissioner is the agent or officer of the court. Gilpens v. Consequa, Pet. C. C., 88. Power is given him to take the examination, and confidence is reposed in him that he will exercise this power according to the directions of the commission, which is his chart and guide.

Neither do the provisions of the R. S., relating to depositions taken de bene esse, apply to this deposition. In Seargent's Lessee v. Biddle, 4 Whea., 508, the Supreme Court held that depositions taken under a dedimus are not to be considered as taken de bene esse. To the same effect is the ruling in Nicholas v. White, 1 Cr. C. C., 50.

Therefore it is immaterial whether the witness was "cautioned" or not before being sworn, as required by § 864 of the R. S., in the case of depositions taken de bene esse. Neither is it material that the return should show anything more than that the witness was duly sworn or examined upon his oath duly administered. Where an oath is required by the commission, if the law declares that an affirmation is equivalent, an affirmation is sufficient. § 860 of the Or. Civ. Code provides that an affirmation may be made in place of an oath by any person who has conscientious scruples against taking the latter.

The commission being an act of this court, and the examination of the witness an exercise of judicial power through the intervention of its agent or officer, the commissioner, I think that the law regulating the proceeding in this court—the law of this State—controls the matter of how the witness should be qualified. On the other hand, if it should be held that the law of the place where the commission was executed would control in this respect, it can hardly be doubted, that an affirmation is equivalent to an oath in the quaker city of Philadelphia.

The objection that the witness was not examined upon the interrogatories, does not appear to be well founded in fact. As has been stated, the return shows that the witness deposed in answer to the first interrogatory as follows—giving the answer—and so on through all the series. This is found in the preamble or introduction to the deposition, and therefore it is contended that it is no part of the certificate to the deposition. Now the code, § 809 supra, does not require a certificate to be appended to the examination of the witness, but only that the commissioner shall "certify the deposition to the court." This is sufficiently done when he certifies that the following or the foregoing or accompanying is the examination of the witness given upon his oath or affirmation by me duly administered, in answer to the interrogatories annexed to the commission, or as therein stated. Keene v. Meade, 3 Pet., 1. In this case the certificate appended to the examination states that the witness "testified in the above case as is found above,"—that is, in answer to the interrogatories annexed to the commission. Indeed, the matter is too plain to waste words upon.

The power to grant a dedimus to take the examination of a witness is given to this court. "In any case where it is necessary, in order to prevent a failure or delay of justice," by § 866 of the R. S. It is to issue "according to common usage," which is construed to be the rule or law governing the practice of the court in this respect at the time. Lessee of Rhoades et al. v. Selin et al., 4 Wash. C. C., 723. In this case that law is found in §§ 807 to 809 inclusive of the Or. Civ. Code. The mode of issuing the commission and the authority and directions to be contained in it are prescribed by these sections, and it is to be executed accordingly. But the cases in which it may issue are not prescribed by the local law but by the U. S. Statute above cited. When it is necessary to grant a dedimus to prevent a failure or delay of justice, the court must determine either by a general rule or a special order in each particular case. It may become necessary to take the examination of a witness upon a dedimus as well within the State as without, and in such a case it would be done although the local law does not authorize it.

None of the objections made to this deposition are valid. It appears to have been taken in substantial conformity with the directions in the commission, and the motion to suppress it is disallowed.

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT.

HEAD-NOTES TO RECENT CASES PREPARED BY HON. NORMAN L FREEMAN, REPORTER.

Onecia Hagebush v. Willis A. Ragland. Appeal from Washington.

BAILMENT.

1. To whom loan made.—Where a married woman requested of a party the loan of a horse to visit her brother, and about a week after her husband and son went for the same, and not finding the owner at home, the husband sent the son, who procured the animal which was used to make the visit, it was held that the jury were warranted in finding the loan was made to the wife, notwithstanding she may not have directed her son to get the animal, or may not have known that he had gone for it when he did.

2. Degree of care required in case of a loan.—Where an animal is borrowed without hire, the borrower is bound to use extraordinary care of the same, and for any failure of such duty resulting in injury to the lender, the borrower will be liable.

PARTY AT LAW.

3. In suit against borrower.—Where a wife borrows property which is injured before its return, she alone is liable to the lender, and it is not error in the court to allow a dismissal as to the husband, on appeal, when both have been sued before a justice of the peace. It would be otherwise if the husband was liable.

The Ohio and Mississippi Railway company v. Samuel D. Noe.—Appeal from Richland.

REPLEVIN.

1. When demand and refusal necessary.—The law is well settled that where a party obtains the possession of property lawfully, on a chose of replevin cannot be maintained to recover it until a demand has been made and the possession refused.

2. Where goods are shipped by rail, the railway company having obtained possession lawfully, will have a right to hold them until the freight actually due is paid and a demand is made. If too much freight is charged the owner should tender the proper amount before bringing replevin. The tender is too late after the suit is commenced.

Prentiss D. Cheney v. The City National Bank of Chicago.—Appeal from Jersey.

1. Summons, Sufficiency of motion to quash.—Where the first summons issued in a cause was returned "not found," and thereupon within ten days of the commencement of the term, an alias summons was issued returnable to the same term, which was served and the cause continued, and the defendant at the next term to which the cause was continued, moved the court "to quash the writ issued herein," which was overruled. Held, that the motion was defective in not specifying which writ was intended, and hence the question was not properly presented whether the second summons issued within ten days of the term should not have been made returnable to the next succeeding term.

2. Plea.—Of incumbrance on land conveyed by warranty deed in action on note for the price.—To an action upon a promissory note given for the purchase money of land, the defendant pleaded that the land was conveyed by warranty deed, with full covenants; that the land was not free of incumbrance, but was incumbered and charged with the payment of certain taxes amounting to $448.40, which had not been paid, but was still a lien upon the land; Held, that the plea was bad on demurrer, as it failed to show that the grantee had paid the incumbrance or had been disturbed in the possession of the land in consequence of the same.

3. Failure of consideration.—Incumbrance on land sold—Where the grantee of land, under a deed covenanting against incumbrances, discharged an existing incumbrance for taxes on the land, he may in a suit upon the note given by him for the purchase money, sustain a plea of partial failure of consideration.

4. Remittitur.—Where the plaintiff, after the adjournment of the court at which he recovers judgment for too large a sum, files a remittitur of the excess, and a similar one in this court on appeal, with a request that it be acted upon under sec. 82 of the practice act of R. S. of 1874, this court will allow the same, and thus cure the error, if any.

CAN A WOMAN PRACTICE LAW IN WISCONSIN?

THAT IS THE QUESTION THAT THE SUPREME COURT OF THAT STATE IS TRYING TO SOLVE.

Miss Lavinia Goodell, of Janesville, Wisconsin, was more than a year ago admitted to practice in the Circuit Court of that place, after a very thorough examination. She has, since her admission, been practicing in that city very successfully, and with the approbation of her brethren of the Janesville bar. In the course of that practice, one of the cases which Miss Goodell tried in the Circuit Court was taken to the Supreme Court, the parties desiring that Miss Goodell, who had tried the case in the court below with so much ability, should follow it into the Supreme Court. On the 14th of last month she appeared before the Supreme Court at Madison and made application for a license from that tribunal. I. C. Sloan, the assistant attorney-general, appeared with Miss Goodell, and moved that she be admitted, read her argument, and supported the same with a powerful speech. The following is the petition and argument of Miss Goodell:

To the Honorable the Judges of the Supreme Court of Wisconsin:

Now comes your petitioner, Miss R. Lavinia Goodell, a resident of Janesville, Wisconsin, over twenty-one years of age, and presents to your honors the certificate of A. W. Baldwin, clerk of the Circuit Court of the Twelfth Judicial Circuit of the State of Wisconsin, stating that at a term of said court, begun and held at the court house, in the city of Janesville aforesaid, on the 17th day of June, A. D. 1874, your petitioner was examined in open court; and that, it appearing that she was a resident of the State of Wisconsin, more than twenty-one years of age, of good moral character, and possessed of sufficient legal knowledge and ability, she was duly admitted by said court as an attorney and counselor-at-law; and moves your honors that an order of this honorable court may be entered, granting a license to your petitioner to practice as an attorney in said court.

Your petitioner respectfully suggests that the only quastion involved in her case—if indeed there be any question at all—is, whether the fact of her being a woman disqualifies her, under the laws of Wisconsin, or the rules of this honorable court, for receiving a license to practice as attorney in said court, and claims that she is not so disqualified.

The statute providing for the admission of attorneys reads as follows:

"No person shall hereafter be admitted or licensed to practice as an attorney of any court of record in this State except in the manner hereinafter provided.

"To entitle any such person to practice as an attorney in the Circuit Courts of this State, he shall be first licensed by order of one of the judges thereof, made in open court, and no such order shall be made until the person applying for such license shall have first been examined in open court, by the judge thereof, or examiners by him appointed, as to his learning in the law and ability to practice as such attorney, nor until such judge shall be satisfied that such person possesses sufficient legal knowledge and ability to entitle him to practice as such attorney, nor unless such person be a resident of this State, more than twenty-one years of age, and of good moral character. His residence and age must be made to appear by his affidavit.

"Any person licensed by order of the court, as provided by section two of this act, shall be entitled to practice as attorney in any court of record of this State, except the Supreme Court; and to entitle any person to practice as an attorney in the Supreme Court, he shall first be licensed by order of such court." Tay. Stat. II. pp. 1343-4.

There is nothing contained in these provisions which can be so construed as to debar a woman from the privilege of obtaining a license under them, unless it be the use of the masculine pronoun. But by the statute, relating to the rules of interpretation, it is provided that "every word importing the masculine gender only may extend and be applied to females as well as to males." Tay. Stat., I., p. 181. This rule of interpretation is followed in the construction of all the statutes, and there appears no reason why it should not be applied to the particular statute under consideration, as well as to the statutes generally. It has been so applied to the statute providing for notaries public, and defining their duties, under which your petitioner has been appointed and now holds the office of notary.

Nothing appears, then, in the laws of the State tending to disqualify an applicant for admission in consequence of her sex.

There appears among the rules of said court none modifying the statute of the State in this respect.

Your petitioner can foresee no argument against granting her the license requested, under the laws of Wisconsin and the rules of said court, excepting it be the one used in giving the opinion of the Supreme Court of Illinois in the matter of the application of Myra Bradwell, Sept., 1869, viz.: That the admission of women to the practice of law was without precedent, unknown to the common law, and not within the thought and intention of the legislature at the time the statute providing for the admission of attorneys to practice was enacted. In giving their opinion in this case, the learned judges say:

"It is to be further remembered that when our act was passed, that school of reform which claims for woman participation in the making and administering of the laws had not then arisen, or if here and there a writer had advanced such theories, they were regarded rather as abstract speculations than as an actual basis for action. * * * In view of these facts we are certainly warranted in saying that when the legislature gave to this court the power of granting licenses to practice law, it was with not the slightest expectation that this privilege would be extended equally to men and women. Neither has there been any legislation since that period which would justify us in presuming a change in the legislative intent."

Your petitioner claims that this argument, whatever may be said of its applicability to the case to which it was applied, is wholly inapplicable to the present case. The statute of Illinois providing for the admission of attorneys was enacted in 1845 or earlier, as it appears in the Revised Statutes of 1845. The statute of Wisconsin above quoted was enacted in 1861, when progressive ideas concerning the enlargement of the sphere of woman's industries were more widely known and adopted, and so may reasonably be presumed to have been within the minds of the legislators, at the time of its enactment. But even if this were a question of doubt, further legislation in the State of Wisconsin clearly indicates that whatever the intention of the legislators in 1861 might have been—if other than that expressed by plain and unequivocal language—their subsequent intention has been to include women in the provisions made for the admission of attorneys to practice in all the courts of record in this State. By enactment passed in 1867 (ch. 17) women are admitted to every department, except the military, of the State University, "under such regulations and restriction as the Board of Regents may deem proper." Tay. Stat. I, p. 521. This statute admits women to the law department of the State University, with the privilege of pursuing the course of study marked out for its students, and of graduating from that department. Whether the clause, "under such regulations and restrictions as the Board of Regents may deem proper" gives said board power to exclude women from the full legal course and the privilege of graduating or not, it certainly gives them power to allow to women students such full course of study and graduation, if they see fit to do so. Now, by statute passed in 1870, "all graduates of the law department" (of the State University) "shall be entitled to admission to the bar of all the courts of this State, upon presentation to the judge or judges thereof, certificate of such graduation." Tay. Stat, II, 1344. Thus, by express legislative enactment, women may be admitted to the bar of all the courts of the State of Wisconsin, by graduating from the law department of the State University. Can it have been the intention of the legislature to give the Board of Regents of the State University the power to admit women to the practice of law in the Supreme Court of this State, and at the same time to withhold that very power from the Supreme Court itself? Will this honorable court decide that it is deprived by the legislature of the power of admitting women to its bar, while at the same time the Board of Regents of the State University are endowed with that power, and can control the membership of the bar of this honorable court under circumstances in which it cannot itself control it?

Again, the statute provides for the admission of attorneys from the State of Illinois and other States, under certain restrictions which do not apply to the question of sex. (See Tay. Stat. II., pp. 1344–5, sections 39, 40). Accordingly, women may be admitted to the bar of the Supreme Court of Wisconsin from Illinois and other States in which they are now, or may hereafter become practicing attorneys. If the courts of other States have a power to procure the admission of women to the bar of this State, have not its own courts such power?

Again, the constitution of Wisconsin (Tay. Stat. I., p. 113) provides for the conduct of suits by a party or his attorney or agent. Under this clause of the constitution no court would have the right or power to refuse a woman as party or agent the right to conduct suit in court on her own behalf, or that of her principals.

The matter of the application and refusal of Myra Bradwell being the leading case in apparent opposition to the claim of your petitioner, will be briefly reviewed. (See LEGAL NEWS, Feb. 5, 1870).

Upon application made in 1869 to the Supreme Court of Illinois, Mrs. Bradwell was refused admittance, Oct. 6. 1869, on the sole ground that she was a married woman, and as such, under existing laws, was incapable of making contracts. Mrs. Bradwell filed a pointed brief, replying to the opinion of the court in a lengthy argument, the most pertinent point in which was that, by statutes enacted by the legislature of Illinois, in 1861 and 1869, giving to a married woman the right to hold property in her own name, to control her own earnings, and to sue and be sued, the disabilities asserted by the court to exist had been removed, and could no longer form a barrier to her admission to legal practice. The court, in giving its opinion upon the brief, while still denying Mrs. Bradwell's application, retreated from its former position—thus virtually conceding Mrs. Bradwell's point, and refused her application no longer on the ground of her disabilities as a married woman, but simply and solely on the ground of her being a woman. The learned judges, while virtually admitting that nothing in the language of the statute precluded the admission of women, laid down this rule:

That "in all other respects," (aside from the limitations of the statute) "it is left to our discretion to establish the rules by which admission to this office shall be determined. But this discretion is not an arbitrary one, but must be held subject to at least two limitations. One is, that the court shall establish such terms of admission as will promote the proper administration of justice; the second that it should not admit any persons or class of persons who are not intended by the legislature to be admitted, even though their exclusion is not expressly required by the statute."

No argument was made upon the first limitation enumerated, and the refusal to admit the applicant was based solely upon the second.

None of the arguments urged in opposition to the claim of Mrs. Bradwell for admission apply to the case now presented by your petitioner. Your petitioner is not a married woman, and under no disabilities. But even if she were married, the recent Legislature of Wisconsin, giving to married women the right to control their own property and earnings, and to sue and be sued, removes their disabilities to contract, as in the case of similar legislation in Illinois, and so removes the barrier supposed to have existed to their admission to legal practice. (See Tay. Stat. II., pp. 1195-6, and ch. 155, Laws of 1872.)

The inapplicability to the case of your petitioner, of the argument upon which the second refusal was based, has already been shown.

One of the limitations to the discretion left by legislation to the court, as specified by the Supreme Court of Illinois, was "that the court shall establish such terms of admission as will promote the proper administration of justice." No argument was made against the admission of women under this head, and your petitioner would respectfully submit that "the proper administration of justice" would be better promoted by the admission of women to the practice of law than by their exclusion, for these reasons among others:

1. That a class wholly unrepresented in the courts of justice, can never obtain full justice in such courts; and that when that class is so numerous as to include one-half the human race, the promotion of "the proper administration of justice" requires that they be represented.

2. That a union of the peculiar delicacy, refinement, and conscientiousness attributed to women, with the decision, firmness, and vigor of man, are not only desirable but necessary in promoting "the proper administration of justice" in our courts.

3. That in excluding women from the practice of law, an injustice is done the community, in preventing free and wholesome competition of the best existing talent.

4. That a great injustice is done to one half the community, by shutting them out arbitrarily from an honorable and remunerative field of industry for which many of them have both taste and ability.

Besides the case of Mrs. Bradwell, the only apparently adverse decision to the admission of women to the practice of law, within the knowledge of your petitioner, is that of Mrs. Belva Lockwood, who was refused admission to the Court of Claims, Washington, D. C., in 1874, solely on the ground of her disabilities as a married woman; an argument wholly inapplicable to the present case, as has already been shown. (See LEGAL NEWS, May 23, 1874.)

The following precedents are in favor of the admission of women:

Iowa.—In 1869, Mrs. A. A. Mansfield was admitted to the bar of Iowa under a statute providing that "any white male person" with the requisite qualifications should be licensed to practice; by virtue of a statute providing that "words importing the masculine gender only may be extended to females;" and the court held that the affirmative declaration that male persons may be admitted, is not an implied denial of the right to females. (See LEGAL NEWS, Feb. 5, 1870; Mrs. Bradwell's case).

Missouri, under a statute providing that "any person" possessing certain qualifications may be licensed, admits women. (See case of Miss Barkaloo, in LEGAL NEWS, Apr. 3 and Apr. 9, 1870). Miss Barkaloo was also admitted to the Supreme Court of Missouri.

Michigan, under a statute using the word "citizen" as the statute of Wisconsin uses "person," admits women to practice.

Maine, under a statute similar to that of Wisconsin, admitted Mrs. C. H. Nash to Supreme Court in 1872. (See LEGAL NEWS, Oct. 26, 1872).

District of Columbia.—Charlotte E. Ray was admitted about 1872, on graduating from Howard University.

Ohio, under a statute similar to that of Wisconsin, has, I learn, admitted a woman to practice.

The Federal District Court of Illinois has admitted women. (See LEGAL NEWS, May 23, 1874).

Illinois and Iowa have recently made legislative provision for the admission of women.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

LAVINIA GOODELL.

December 14, 1875.

The court reserved its decision. Chief Justice RYAN indicated by his remarks that he doubted the right of the court to grant the motion. His associates, however, gave no indication of their opinion. We can assure the Supreme Court of Wisconsin, should they hold that, under the statutes of that State, they have no power to admit Miss Goodell, that at the very next session of the legislature a statute will be passed which cannot be construed to deprive her of the right to admission to the bar upon equal terms with men. Miss Goodell comes from a family that was never known to give up when in the right. Her father is the celebrated abolition speaker and writer, "Goodell," who did battle for so many years in the crusade against slavery. The question is, shall Miss Goodell, who has spent years of her life in preparing herself for her profession, has passed the required examination, has a paying practice, be allowed to continue it, or be financially ruined because she is a woman?

We call attention to the following opinions, reported at length in this issue:

Guardian's Sale — Confederate Money—Investment — Posthumous Child.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States, by Field, J., holding that a guardian's sale would not be affected by the birth of a posthumous child after the commencement of the proceedings, although not made a party; that the posthumous child did not possess, until born, any estate in the real property of which his father died seized, which could affect the power of the court to convert the property into a personal fund, if the interest of the children then in being required such conversion; that whatever estate devolved upon him at his birth, was an estate in the property in its then condition; that property had then ceased to be realty; it had become, by the sale, converted into personalty; that because the decree ordering the sale directed the money to be invested in Confederate money, did not affect the sale and was not void as aiding the rebellion. In the case of Botsford vs. O'Connor, 2 Chicago Legal News, the Supreme Court of this State held in a case very similar to the one under consideration, that the rights of a posthumous child in the lands of its deceased parent, could not be affected by the sale unless such child was made a party to the proceedings to sell. It would seem as if the rule as announced by the Supreme Court of this State is the safest to follow.

Married Woman's Property Rights upon Obtaining a Divorce.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States, by Field, J., where a man and woman were married in the District of Columbia, and the wife purchased land with money which her father gave her previous to the marriage, and improved it partly with such money and partly with her subsequent earnings, notwithstanding the fact that at the time of the marriage and at the time of the purchase of such land and its improvement, the common law prevailed in the District as to the property rights of married women. Held, that the husband being free from debt at the time, it was competent for him to allow her to invest such money for her own use, so as to be beyond his reach and control, and that a divorce between the parties was not of itself a sufficient reason for restoring to the husband any rights to the property thus settled upon the wife.

Patent—Re-Issue—Infringement.—The opinion of the United States Circuit Court for the Northern District of Illinois, by Blodgett, J., holding that the law of 1836 authorizes a patentee to claim on a re-issue whatever shall clearly appear to have been a part of his original invention as described or shown in his original specifications, drawings or models.

Depositions for U. S. Court.—The opinion of the United States District Court for the District of Oregon, by Deady, J., as to the manner and practice of taking testimony by deposition, to be used in the Federal courts.

NOTES TO RECENT CASES.

AGENT—COMMISSIONS—LIABILITY.

In Pownall v. Bair, 23 Pitts. Legal Journal, the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania held that an agent is entitled to commissions only when he discharges his duty towards his principal; that any departure from this rule, whereby the principal is subjected to loss, renders the agent liable for the damages sustained, as well as forfeiture of all his commissions.

POWER OF CORPORATION—INTEREST ON STOCK.

The Supreme Court of Penna. held, in Pitts. & S. R. R. Co. v. Allegheny Co., 32 Leg. Intel., 404, that the powers of a corporation must be found in its charter, or arise by necessary implication therefrom; that a railroad company, unless expressly authorized, has no power to contract to pay a certain interest on a portion of its stock; that all the stockholders are equally entitled to a dividend.

STATUTE OF FRAUDS—PAROL SALE OF GROWING TREES.

In Marshall v. Green, the English Court of Common Pleas, 33 L. T. Reps., N. S., 404, held that a sale, by parol, of growing trees, "to be got away as soon as possible," was not a contract for the sale of lands, tenements, or hereditaments, or any interest in or concerning them, within the meaning of the 4th section of the Statute of Frauds; that the parol license to enter and take the trees, being coupled with a valid sale of the trees, was irrevocable. The opinions delivered in this case contain a very thorough review of the authorities upon the important question under consideration.

STOCK COMPANY—ACTING DIRECTORS—FORFEITURE OF SHARES.

The judicial committee of the Privy Council, in the Garden Gully Mining Co. v. McLister, on appeal from the Supreme Court of the Colony of Victoria, 33 L. T. Reps., N. S., 408, held that, in a joint stock company, a valid call can only be made, and a valid forfeiture of shares, for non-payment of such call, can only be declared by directors properly appointed, in accordance with the rules of the company; and that a forfeiture declared by acting de facto directors, irregularly elected, must be held invalid.

BILL DRAWN AND INDORSED IN ONE COUNTRY, PAYABLE IN ANOTHER—RIGHTS OF INDORSEE AND DRAWER — CONTRACT BY WHAT LAW GOVERNED.

The English Court of Queen's Bench, in Bouquette v. Overmann et al., 33 L. T. Reps., N. S., 420, held, where a bill of exchange is drawn and indorsed in one country and payable in another, the rights and liabilities of drawer and indorsee are regulated by the law of the country where the bill is payable. It would seem that this opinion is, in principle, in conflict with the opinion of our Supreme Court in Barber v. Bell, also published in this issue.

BILL OF EXCHANGE—BANKRUPTCY OF DRAWER — PARTIAL PAYMENT — SET OFF OF DEBT DUE BY BANKRUPT DRAWER TO ACCEPTOR.

The opinion of the English Court of Common Pleas, in Thornton v. Maynard, 33 L. T. Reps., N. S., 433, that in an action by the indorsee of a bill of exchange against the acceptor, payment by the drawer is no defense, but only converts the indorsee into a trustee for the drawer of the amount of the drawer's payment. But when an indorsee sues under such circumstances (i. e., after having been paid or partially paid by the drawer), inasmuch as he sues in the character of trustee for the drawer, the acceptor is entitled to plead equitably, as a set-off, a debt due from the drawer to him, which would have been the subject of a good legal set-off in an action against him by the drawer; that the same rule holds good, although the drawer may have become bankrupt, and the indorsee have received a dividend from his estate in respect of the bill.

Probate of Will—Burden of Proof—Testimony of Experts.—We are under obligation to John M. Shirley, Reporter, for the following head-notes to the case of Hardy v. Merrill, decided Dec. 15, 1875:

The party who affirms that a will was duly and legally executed has the burden of proof and the accompanying duty to open and right to close; no matter in what form the issues may be drawn.

Upon an issue concerning the sanity of a testator, the opinions of nonprofessional witnesses, and who are not subscribing witnesses to the will, are admissible when founded upon thair knowledge and observation of the testator's appearance and conduct (overruling, in this point, Boardman v. Woodman, 47 N. H., 120, and State v. Pike, 49 N. H., 399.)

The leading opinion in this case was delivered by Foster, C.J., and is eighty pages in length, which excludes it from our columns. This decision makes the dissenting opinion of Doe, J., in Boardman v. Wirman, and State v. Pike, the law in New Hampshire and bring it into harmony with the law of every other State, if we except Texas, Maine and Massachusetts, and places the law and practice in New Hampshire back to where it was thirty years ago.

To Ill. Law Students.—We call the attention of persons desiring to be admitted at the term of the Supreme Court, which commences on Tuesday next, to the fact that the court has so changed the rule that instead of devoting Thursday and Friday of the first week of the term to the examination of applicants for admission to the bar, Thursday only of that week will be devoted to that purpose. Parties wishing to be admitted at this term will have to be examined on Thursday next.

The Sharswood Prize.—The alumni of the law department of the University of Pennsylvanis have appropriated the sum of fifty dollars annually, to be paid as a prize, know as the "Sharswood Prize," to be competed for by the graduating class in each year, for the best essay upon a given legal topic to be selected by the faculty. Is there not some society or rich member of the bar who will do as much for the graduating class of the Chicago College of Law? We shall be glad to announce the fact.

Mrs. Abaham Lincoln.—Mrs. Lincoln has been spending a few months very pleasantly with her sister Mrs. Edwards, at Springfield. She very appropriately on Christmas presented to Hon. Jesse K. Dubois, one of Mr. Lincoln's most intimate, personal and political friends, a gold-headed ash cane inscribed: "Cut from the birthplace of A. Lincoln, and presented by Dr. J. H. Rodman, of La Rue county." The cane was presented to President Lincoln during his lifetime, and is now given Mr. Dubois as a Christmas present.

Hon. W. C. Whitson, associate justice of the Supreme Court of Idaho, died suddenly at Omaha, Neb., Christmas night, of paralysis. He was on his way to Idaho.

THE CHICAGO BAR ASSOCIATION DINNER.

The Chicago Bar Association held its second annual dinner at the Grand Pacific hotel on last Thursday evening. The thanks of the members of the association are due to the committee, composed of Messrs. Ayer, Fuller, Smith, Williams and Hervey for the efficient manner in which they performed their duties. Mr. B. F. Ayer, the president of the association, presided, and by his easy and pleasing manner, contributed much to the enjoyment of the guests.

The following is a list of the invited guests seated at the grand table: On the right hand of the president were Chief Justice Scott, of the Supreme Court of the State; Judges Williams, Moore and Gary, of the courts of this county; the Hon. Leonard Swett, the Hon. J. Y. Scammon; Judge Blodgett, of the United States District Court; and Judge Lawrence. On the left of Mr. Ayer were Prof. David Swing, T. L. Dickey, Judge-elect of the Supreme Court; Atty. Gen. Edsall, Judges Rogers and Farwell, of the Circuit Court of Cook county; ex-Senator Doolittle, the Hon. Wirt Dexter and H. F. Waite.

The members included the following: District Attorney Reed, the Hon. H. F. Withrow, Gen. George W. Smith, M. F. Tuley, F. H. Kales, ex-Judge Harris, the Hon. J. P. Root, S. A. Goodwin, J. N. Otis, Robert Hervey, O. H. Horton, L. H. Bisbee, W. R. Page, J. L. High, George F. Harding, E. W. Evans, and J. E. Goodwin. A place was reserved among the invited guests for Judge Wallace, but, to the regret of the committee and bar at large, he was unfortunately absent. Mr. I. N. Arnold also, who had been invited, and who was expected to respond to the first toast, was unexpectedly kept away on account of sickness.

Letters of regret were read from the following:

At the conclusion of the dinner Mr. AYER, the president of the association, arose and said:

REMARKS OF PRESIDENT AYER.

GENTLEMEN: In rising at this time to perform one of the duties which custom assigns to the chair, it is very far from my intention to inflict upon you a set or formal speech. There are many gentlemen present, and among them I am happy to see several eloquent and distinguished guests who have honored us with their company, to whose voices you will esteem it a privilege to listen. Before calling upon them, however, you will permit me to express the satisfaction I feel, and which I am sure is shared by you all, at meeting here this evening so large a number of my brethren of the bar. The arduous labors and responsibilities which devolve upon lawyers, and especially upon those actively engaged in the practice of their profession in a large city, allow them to give but a small portion of their time to recreation or social enjoyment. Their hours of leisure are comparatively few; their seasons of rest and vacation rare and fortuitous; their occupation severe and almost incessant. If any class of men are entitled to seek occasional relaxation from the cares and duties which press upon their time and strength, those of whom I am speaking may certainly claim that indulgence.

There is another thought upon this subject which may be briefly suggested. The cultivation of social intercourse among members of the bar, and the habit of coming together upon suitable occasions for the interchange of sentiments and civilities, are powerful agencies in sustaining the tone and character of the profession, in keeping up the esprit du corps, in encouraging loyal obedience and fidelity to the rules of honor and conscience on the part of those who are admitted to its privileges, and preserving the practice of the law from those degrading tendencies which sometimes threaten to bring scandal and reproach upon the administration of justice. The necessity of doing something to keep alive the social spirit of the bar had been long sensibly felt when this association was organized; and to revive and stimulate that spirit was one of the main objects sought to be promoted by it. Hitherto, it must be confessed we have not been very prodigal of our efforts in that direction, but I am happy to say the object has never been wholly lost sight of. Prompted by the generous sentiment to which I have alluded, we gave a year ago in the tasteful and commodious hall in which we are now assembled, our first annual dinner. The complete success which attended it led many of us to indulge the hope that a yearly festival of that kind might become a regular and permanent feature of the association; and this feeling which is still cherished, has found befitting expression in the excellent and well-arranged banquet with which we have been regaled this evening.

It only remains for me, brethren, before proceeding to announce the first regular toast, to tender to you one and all a cordial and fraternal greeting. We are gathered to-night around the social and festive board, animated by common feelings and sympathies, and bound to each other by ties of warm personal regard and friendship. I would also in your name extend to our honored guests a like sincere and hearty welcome. We welcome you, gentlemen, to our festivities with feelings of the deepest gratification. I hope the few hours we pass together may prove hours not only of relaxation but of keen enjoyment, and that the occasion may be hereafter remembered with pleasure and satisfaction by us all.

"The Supreme Court."

Mr. AYER then read the first toast, as follows:
