The question in this case is whether, under the bankrupt act as passed in 1867, an assignee in bankruptcy, without regard to the citizenship of the parties, could maintain a suit for the recovery of assets in the Circuit court of the United States in any district other than that in which the decree of bankruptcy was made? If not, whether the amendatory act of 1874 (18 Stat., 178, § 3) validitated such a suit already commenced.

The jurisdiction of the Circuit courts in cases of bankruptcy, as conferred by the act of 1867, was two-fold, original and appellate; the latter being exercised in two different modes, by petition of review and by appeal or writ of error. But the enacting clauses which confer this jurisdiction make such direct reference to the jurisdiction of the District court, that it is necessary first to examine the latter jurisdiction. Of this there are two distinct classes: first, jurisdiction as a court of bankruptcy over the proceedings in bankruptcy initiated by the petition and ending in the distribution of assets amongst the creditors and the discharge or refusal of a discharge of the bankrupt; secondly, jurisdiction as an ordinary court, of suits at law or in equity brought by or against the assignee in reference to alleged property of the bankrupt or to claims alleged to be due from or to him. The language conferring this jurisdiction of the District courts is very broad and general. It is, that they shall have original jurisdiction in their respective districts in all matters and proceedings in bankruptcy. The various branches of this jurisdiction are afterwards specified, resulting, however, in the two general classes beforementioned. Were it not for the words "in their respective districts" the jurisdiction would extend to matters of bankruptcy arising any where, without regard to locality. It is contended that these words confine it to cases arising in the district. But such is not the language. Their jurisdiction is confined to their respective districts, it is true; but it extends to all matters and proceedings in bankruptcy without limit. When the act says that they shall have jurisdiction in their respective districts, it means that the jurisdiction is to be exercised in their respective districts. Each court within its own district may exercise the powers conferred; but those powers extend to all matters of bankruptcy without limitation. There are, it is true, limitations elsewhere in the act; but they affect only the matters to which they relate. Thus, by section 11, the petition in bankruptcy, and by consequence the proceedings thereon, must be addressed to the judge of the judicial district in which the debtor has resided or carried on business for the six months next preceding; and the District court of that district being entitled to and having acquired jurisdiction of the purticular case, necessarily has such jurisdiction exclusive of all other District courts, so far as the proceedings in bankruptcy are concerned. But the exclusion of other District courts from jurisdiction over these proceedings, does not prevent them from exercising jurisdiction in matters growing out of, or connected with, that identical bankruptcy, so far as it does not trench upon or conflict with the jurisdiction of the court in which the case is pending. Proceedings ancillary to, and in aid of, the proceedings in bankruptcy may be necessary in other districts where the principal court cannot exercise jurisdiction; and it may be necessary for the assignee to institute suits in other districts for the recovery of assets of the bankrupt. That the courts of such other districts may exercise jurisdiction in such cases would seem to be the necessary result of the general jurisdiction conferred upon them, and is in harmony with the scope and design of the act. The State courts may undoubtedly be resorted to in cases of ordinary suits for the possession of property or the collection of debts; and it is not to be presumed that embarrassments would be encountered in those courts in the way of a prompt and fair administration of justice. But a uniform system of bankruptcy, national in its character, ought to be capable of execution in the national tribunals, without dependance upon those of the States, in which it is possible that embarrassments might arise. The question has been quite fully and satisfactorily discussed by a member of this court in the first circuit, in the case of Shearman v. Bingham, 7 Bankruptcy Register, 490; and we concur in the opinion there expressed, that the several District courts have jurisdiction of suits brought by assignees appointed by other District courts in cases of bankruptcy.

Turning now to the jurisdiction of the circuit courts, we find it enacted in section two of the act of 1867, first, that the circuit courts within and for the districts where the proceedings in bankruptcy are pending, shall have a general superintendence and jurisdiction of all cases and questions arising under the act. This is the revisory jurisdiction before referred to, exercised upon petition or bill of review. Secondly, "said circuit courts shall also have concurrent jurisdiction with the district courts of the same district of all suits at law or in equity * * brought by the assignee in bankruptcy against any person claiming an adverse interest, or by such person against such assignee, touching any property or rights of property of said bankrupt transferable to or vested in such assignee." The act of 1874 changes the words "the same district" to "any district," and adds to "person claiming an adverse interest" the words "or owing any debt to such bankrupt." These changes make the jurisdiction of the circuit court for the future clear and undoubted in cases like the present. But we are endeavoring to ascertain what jurisdiction was conferred by the act as originally passed. Reverting to the language used in the second clause, above cited, it seems to be express and unqualified, that the circuit court shall have concurrent jurisdiction with the district courts of the same district. If, therefore, the district court has jurisdiction of suits brought by an assignee appointed in another district, the circuit court of the same district has concurrent jurisdiction therewith. There is no escape from this conclusion unless the phrase "the same district" is made to refer back to the beginning of the section, where mention is made of circuit courts within and for the districts where the proceedings in bankruptcy are pending. But the words "the same district" used in the second clause, refer more naturally to the district in and for which the circuit court is held. The phrase "the circuit courts shall have concurrent jurisdiction with the district courts of the same district" is, by itself, so clear and unambiguous that a doubt could not have been raised as to its meaning had it not been embraced in the same section with the other clause. And it is in accord with the general intent of the act to invest the circuit court with jurisdiction co-extensive with that of the district court, except that it is only revisory in reference to the proceedings in bankruptcy.

If jurisdiction was conferred (as we have seen it was) on the various district courts, to entertain suits brought by assignees appointed in other districts, there seems to be no reason why the same jurisdiction should not have been conferred on the various circuit courts; but, on the contrary, very cogent reasons why it should have been. Important cases would be very likely to arise, both in amount and in the questions involved, which it would be desirable to bring directly before the circuit court, in order, if necessary, that an early adjudication might be had in the court of last resort.

As, therefore, the reason for such a provision, the general intent of the act, and the words themselves, all coincide, we do not hesitate to say that the circuit court had jurisdiction of suits at law and in equity under the original act, co-extensive with the district courts, unless the qualifying words, at the end of the clause, confining the jurisdiction to cases "touching any property or rights of property of said bankrupt transferable to, or vested in, such assignee," may be deemed a restriction. In this case, however, the suit does concern and have reference to property transferable to the assignee. It is brought to compel the defendants to restore to the bankrupt's estate the value of property sold by them under a judgment alleged to have been confessed in fraud of the bankrupt act, and within four months of the commencement of proceedings in bankruptcy.

The amendatory act of 1874 has but little bearing upon the construction of the original act in the particular involved in this case. Different views had been expressed in relation to its meaning and the jurisdiction of the courts under it. The amendatory act removed any ambiguity that may have existed; but did not thereby impress a more restricted meaning upon the language of the original act than was due to it by a fair judicial construction.

As to the merits of the case, it is almost too plain for argument. The general denial of fraud in the answer of the defendants is equivalent to nothing more than a denial of a conclusion of law. The allegation that they were led to believe, by the letters and representations of the bankrupt, that he was solvent at the time of the confession of judgment, and was worth seven thousand dollars over and above his indebtedness, has but little force. If this were true why did they immediately levy on and sell his whole stock of goods? That sale produced but little more than half the amount of their judgment. These unquestioned facts are sufficiently significant, and the evidence of the bankrupt makes the case a very strong one for the complainant. He had executions against him and wrote to the defendants that he was in trouble, and requested them to come to his aid. They refused to do anything unless he would confess judgment for the amount due them, including the amount of the prior judgments. They then immediately levied on all his goods and sold him out. It was a clear case of preference by a debtor in insolvent circumstances, and known to be such by the judgment creditor.

The prior executions, one in favor of A. Coran & Co. for about six hundred dollars, and the other in favor of Henry Bloss for about nine hundred dollars, were probably valid. If the appellees satisfied those executions, or advanced the money for that purpose, the amount being embraced in their judgment, their own execution was good to that extent, and they should have credit therefor. As to the rest they were answerable for the value of the goods levied on and sold.

The decree of the circuit court must be reversed and the record remitted with directions to enter a decree in favor of the complainant below for the value of the goods of the bankrupt sold on the defendants' execution, with interest from the time that the same was demanded of them by the assignee, less the amount to which they may be justly entitled for advances to satisfy the said executions of A. Coran & Co. and Henry Bloss.

WE are under obligations to D. DON. DICKINSON, of the law firm of DICKINSON & GRIFFIN, of Detroit, for the following opinion:

U. S. CIRCUIT COURT, E. D. MICH.

LOWELL W. TINKER, Plaintiff in Error, v. PHILIP J D. VAN DYKE, et al., Trustees, etc., Defendants in Error.

BANKRUPT LAW—EFFECT OF REPEALS AND AMENDMENTS UPON RIGHTS GIVEN BY STATUTE.

1. THE AMENDMENTS TO THE BANKRUPT LAW.—The clause in section 5021 amending section 390 of the bankrupt law, by inserting the word knew instead of the words had reasonable cause to believe, is not to be applied to proceedings in bankruptcy commenced before the 1st of December, 1873.

2. REPEAL OF PENAL STATUTES.—Those clauses of the bankrupt law which authorize an assignee to recover the amount of unlawful preferences paid to particular creditors are not in their nature penal, and their repeal are not subject to the rule of construction applicable to the repeal of penal statutes.

3. EFFECT OF REPEAL OF LAWS.—When substantial rights are created by statute, or commercial contracts are regulated, the repeal of laws upon which they depend will not receive a retro-active application unless the law expressly or by necessary implication so declares.

4. CASES DISAPPROVED.—The cases Voorhees v. Frisbie, 25 Mich., 476, and Brigham v. Claflin, 7 N. B. R., 412, which decide that this clause of the bankrupt law is penal, and therefore will not be enforced in the State courts, disapproved and the cases contra cited and acquiesced in.

5. EFFECT OF REPEAL ON EXISTING CONTRACTS.—Judgments holding that statutes imposing liability upon corporators in certain exigencies for debts of the corporation were penal and consequently would not be enforced in other States, held not to be analogous to that clause of the bankrupt law. It is suggested they are all at war with 2 Wal., holding that the repeal of such clause as to existing contracts, impaired their obligation.

EMMONS, Circuit Judge.

Van Dyke was appointed trustee before the amendment of 1874, which so changed the former law as to require that a creditor obtaining a preference should know that the debtor was insolvent instead of "having reasonable cause to believe he was so insolvent." The bankrupt law transfers all the property of the bankrupt to the assignee as of the day of adjudication, Van Dyke, for the benefit of creditors, had a right unconditionally to one thousand dollars, in the hands of Tinker, as the immediate conveyance of the adjudication under the former law, but, as his suit was not commenced nor tried before the amendment, it is claimed by the defendants that it was necessary to prove under it, that he knew the insolvency of his debtor, and that "having reasonable cause to believe" was not sufficient.

It has been argued at two different hearings, with far more than ordinary pertinacity, that this clause in section 39 of the bankrupt act, is penal in that sense which brings it within the familiar rule that rights arising under such laws are gone by their repeal. It is said also to be remedial, so as to bring it within the rule of construction which applies statutory alterations of the mere form of the remedy to pending proceedings. The defence also, with much confidence, relied upon the frequently misapplied rule that actions given by statute are gone by its repeal.

No question of constitutional power is involved in this discussion. The authority of Congress to divest vested rights, and impair contracts in the enactment of a bankrupt law, is conceded. The question before us is purely one of interpretation: Did Congress, having an undoubted right so to do, intend to make the new rule applicable to pending causes?

As a very general rule, when we have repeatedly ruled a point, as we have this one, sustained as it is, by so much express decision, we should not deem it necessary to prepare a formal judgment. The exceptional labor of the argument for the defendant, and an influential dictum by Judge Dillon, we think justify the attention we give it.

The following judgments, expressly deciding this question, for the sake of that conformity which should characterize judicial rulings, ought to be followed, even if we did not as fully as we do, approve their principle.

11 B. R., 308, Van Dyke v. Tinker, is the report of this case in the court below. The learned District Judge relies chiefly upon the provision in the amendatory act, that the alteration of Section 39 here in question, shall apply to all cases of involuntary bankruptcy, commenced since Dec. 1, 1873, which he holds is equivalent to an express legislative declaration that it shall not apply to any cases commenced before that time. We see no answer to this argument. The repealing clause, properly construed and modified by the proviso of Section 39, leaves the whole of this section as it formally stood, in full force as to all causes pending before Dec. 1, 1873. 10 B. R., 461, Brooke v. McCraken, is a very intelligent opinion, holding that the amendment to Section 35, is not to be applied to pending proceedings; it notices the provision limiting the application of a similar amendment to Section 39, and declares that the 35th section comes within the general principle that all laws affecting substantial rights, are to be applied to the future only. Judge Deady cites the following federal judgments, announcing this rule: Harvey v. Tyler. 2 Wall., 347; Steamship Co. v. Jolliffe, id., 458; McEwen et al v. Densessee, 24 How.. 244; U. S. v. Stan, Kemp., 471; Schenck v. Paley, 1 Wool, 175; Ex parte Bieling, 3 Ben., 212; Ex parte Hope Ins. Co., 1 Sawyer, 110. We have examined these cases; they fully sustain the application of the rule to the case before the court. 2d Wallace, 458, Steamship Co. v. Jolliffe, was a case where a statute gave a pilot half fees for tendering his services. The tender was made, but before the action was brought, the statute was repealed, and another enacted in its stead, providing for the performance of the same duties. The opinion of Justice Field is somewhat ambiguous, but we think he does not intend to rest it upon the ground that by retro-active application of the law, the obligation of contracts would have been impaired, or the property of a citizen divested, without due process of law. He does call it a quasi contract, and speaks of the right as a vested one, but concludes this portion of his judgment by placing it upon the presumed intention of the legislature, and quoting Chief Justice Shaw, in Wright v. Oakley, 5 Met., 406, where it is substantially said that when one statute is repealed, and another modifying it only contemporaneously entered in its stead, the old law may be considered as still in existence in reference to causes of action which accrued under it. We think that the argument of Judge Field intends to concede the power of the legislature, by express enactment, to have barred the recovery; but that in all cases where such rights were involved as those which he decided the pilots in that case to be, the presumption was of a contrary intent. We think it a precedent for holding here, that the intention was, not to divest the unconditional right of the assignee to this sum of money. The right of the creditors was perfect, and should not be divested without express enactment, or an implication wholly unambiguous.

10 B. R., 173, Hamlin v. Pettibone. Judge Hopkins very fully considers this question, and decides that the amendment is not to have a retro-active application to causes arising anterior to Dec., 1873. He relies not only upon the express limitation in the act to that period, but applies the rule that statutes affecting substantial rights divesting causes of action which have fully accrued, are not without express declaration or the strongest implication, to be applied to past transactions.

In Hitchcock v. Way, 6 Ad. & El., 943, cited by him, an English court refused to apply ex post facto a statute which took away a defence in gaming contracts. even in favor of a bona fide purchaser, without notice. And see 12 B. R. in re Montgomery, p. 341, 12 B. R. 299, Bradbury v. Galloway, follows from the preceding cases, and quotes, as quite decisive of this question, Section 13 of the Revised Statutes, which provides "that the repeal of any statute shall not have the effect to release or extinguish any penalty, forfeiture or liability incurred under such statute, unless the repealing act shall so expressly provide, etc." The words "penalty" or "forfeiture" have no application here, unless the far-fetched argument be tenable, that this clause in section 89 be penal; we elsewhere say we think it is not. The law cited disposes of this question in favor of the plaintiff if it is so, and the word liability would serve the rights of the assignee in this case, whatever may be its nature. 12 B. R., 208, Singer v. Sloan, recently decided by Judge Dillon, contains a dictum relied on by the defendant to give this clause a retrospective application. Evidently the learned and usually careful judge had not, as he was not called upon to do, fully examined the subject. He cites Sedgwick Stat. and Com. Law, 129 et seq., that all rights dependent upon a statute fall by its repeal; but this same author, on p. 134, in discussing the same subject, after having noticed one exception to the rule quoted by Judge Dillon, says that a second exception is constituted of those cases "which affect rights of action which have attached and become vested under the original law, and existing at the time of the repealing statute." The facts upon which the judgments rest, cited by Mr. Sedgwick in illustration of this exception, clearly show it is applicable to the case before us. The words here quoted are almost literally like those in the judgment of Justice Field in Joliffe v. Steamboat Co., ante. 10 B. R., 566, In re King, by Justice Miller, held that the amendment providing that a bankrupt should be discharged although his assets did not pay 50 per cent., as provided by the original law, was applicable to cases commenced before the amendment in this respect, differing from the conclusion of Judge Blatchford, 10 B. R., 438. It may well be that this clause was intended to apply as Justice

Miller holds, while that before us should not be construed to divest the action of the assignee.

Upon authority, the question comes before us with six well considered judgments, holding directly upon the question before us, that the amendment did not apply to proceedings in bankruptcy commenced before Dec., 1873. The dictum of Judge Dillon is all that we find opposed to it.

Beyond this reference to these judgments upon the question before us, we shall do little more than testify that we have gone over the ground of the argument, and that suitors have had the benefit of our consideration of the labor of their counsel.

The following cases, unquestionably resting upon the penal character of the rights which were held to be abrogated by a repeal of the law, are acquiesced in as sound and wholesome law—21 Mich., 390, 3 Howard, 534. In the later case, Chief Justice Taney draws the line clearly between penal provisions in a law and its other clauses creating contracts and relating to substantial rights. 2 Dana, 330, 5 Rand., 657, 1 Wash. C. C. R., 84, 5 Cranch, 281, 13 How., 429, are all of the same general character, and are no more appropriately cited here than a very great number of other like adjuditions.

A few cases have been referred to upon statutes regulating political rights, supposed to be analogous to the clause now before us for construction. We see no similarity. In reference to such laws, it would require a very strong expression of the legislative will for the court not to apply them retrospectively in reference to all unclosed matters. 8 Mich., 128, Tivey v. People, People v. Green, 58 N. Y., 295, and 3 How., 534, 3 Peters, 157, 10 How., 402, 7 Wal., 506, are all of such character.

Several judgments were cited and analyzed to show the power of the State and Federal legislatures to effectuate the intention of parties by retroactive legislation, giving validity to imperfect contracts and insufficient action under former laws. This necessary and beneficent power is not questioned. All such laws should receive a most liberal construction to effectuate such purpose. Of this class are 16th Ohio, 377, 57 N. Y., 177. Similar adjudications in the Federal and State courts are numerous.

Decisions upon statutes which affect the form of remedy only are equally foreign to the case before us, such are all the following cases in defendant's brief: 1 Mich., 673, Robinson v. Steamer Red Jacket, and Moses v. Steamboat Missouri, referred to in it, contains the true distinction upon the subject; 21 Pick., 169, 9 Barn. & Cres, 750, 50 Mo., 554, 11 N. Y., 281, are to like effect. The general subject treated in these cases is too familiar to require additional citation and treatment.

To show that this clause which equally distributes all the property of a bankrupt among his creditors is penal, and consequently that a State court will not enforce it—the able judgment of Justice Christiancy, in 25 Mich.. 476, Voorhees v. Frisbee and Brigham v. Claflin. 74 B. R., 412, are cited.

Whatever we might have said of those judgments had jurisdiction been declined, upon the ground that the Federal Courts were the more fit forum for such actions, we most emphatically dissent from that portion of the reasoning, upon which they rest, declaring this clause of the bankrupt law to be penal in its character and applying the inapplicable rule announced in 3 Wheat., 240, Gilston v. Hoyt and 10 Wheat., 66 The Antelope.

One of these cases was in reference to a particular regulation of a foreign government, and the other a penal forfeiture to the United States. Their inapplicability to this clause of the bankrupt law is manifest. Neither the Michigan or the Wisconsin court takes any notice whatever of any one of the following judgments, many of them by the most elaborate and convincing argument deciding the point directly the other way. Brown v. Cuming, 2 Caims, 33, Barstow v. Adams, 2 Day, 70, Assignees of Barclay v. Carson, 2 Hayw., 243, Keely v. Holdship, 1 Brown, 36, Sullivan v. Bridge, 1 Man., 511 and in 1846, Dewey J., in 10 Met., 583, under the bankrupt law of 1841 cites the foregoing cases under the former law as setting at rest this question at that period. His discriminating judgment draws the distinction between a home National Bankrupt law, which ex rigore operating upon persons and property within the State, passes title in praesenti to the assignee, and a foreign one who must come here claiming rights solely under his judicial appointment. In 101 Mass., p. 109, Stephens v. Mechanics Bank, this principle was deemed so clearly applicable to the present bankrupt law that, as the court say, it was abandoned in argument. See fully in accord 102 Mass., 428, 7 Bush, 66, 64 Penna, 74.

We think these judgments could not have been called to the attention of the learned courts of Michigan and Wisconsin. These two opinions being recently cited in New York, called from the court of appeals in Cook v. Waters, 9 B. R., 155, a citation of a portion of the preceding cases and a most pointed dissent from the assertion that this clause of the law had any element of a penal character. Some respect is due to so long and unbroken history, and we can hardly be asked to follow two judgments asserting principles so novel and at war with precedent. The adverse adjudications might be greatly multiplied.

The 12 Green, 438, Halcey v. McLean and 33 Maryland, 487, and other similar adjudications holding that when laws impose liabilities upon the officers and shareholders of corporations for the non-performance of some duty upon the ground that they are penal in their character, they will not be enforced in foreign jurisdictions, have been cited as analogies for holding this clause of the bankrupt law to be of a similar penal character, whether these and the numerous other similar decisions collected and well analyzed in 33d Maryland are consistent with the judgment in 2d Wallace, 10, we briefly consider hereafter.

A law imposing liability for the debt of another as a consequence of a wrongful omission of duty, is clearly distinguishable from one which provides for the equal distribution of a bankrupt's assets among his creditors.

It is no more penal to declare that a creditor who receives payment in violation of the bankrupt law shall hand over what he receives to the assignee, than that he who holds personal property belonging to the bankrupt shall be subject to an action in trover if he refuses to deliver it upon demand.

As well might it be said that an action on the case for fraud in violation of the common law is penal in its character, because the citizen is made to respond for the consequences of his wrong. The many judgments authorizing suits in State courts by assignees in bankruptcy, declare that their rights rest upon the same general principles as if they accrued under the common law.

In 3d McLean Grant v. Hamilton, of which there is a very imperfect report only, which we argued when at the bar. an action was sustained in the Federal court to recover back property won upon a horse race under a statute of Michigan.

Upon a very full review of judgments Judge McLean held that the law was not a penal one, that it created property rights between citizen and citizen, and, like any other obligation created by law, could be enforced in the Federal courts—a penal law, it was conceded, could not be. Numerous adjudications were cited to his honor, showing that the many State laws, authorizing recovery back of property, which passed from citizen to citizen, in violation of law, were not penal unless a greater amount was authorized to be recovered than was actually received.

These cltations do not appear in his judgment. They have not been cited to us, and we have no time to reproduce them. They are all directly at war with the doctrine of the cases which hold the liability of corporations to be penal.

It would be unpardonable in a case like this to discuss at any length the rectitude of judgments, after having declared their inapplicability to the point in judgment.

The analogy, however, between the cases we have been considering and that of a suit to recover back money from a creditor who has unlawfully received a preference, was so urgently pressed that we add a word in regard to them. These judgments are so many and from courts of such high respectability, that we should feel great reluctance in disregarding them. We submit, with great respect, that they have entirely misapplied the doctrines upon which they rest. A law which creates a liability between citizen and citizen, as further security for the contracts of a corporation of which the obligated person is a member, has in it no penal element whatever in that sense which makes one court refuse to enforce the penalties of foreign governments. The history of this principle shows that it had its origin in the political hostility of opposing nations; laws intended to guard the revenue; penalties to enforce the political regulations of other countries were not enforced by tribunals, whose government was presumed to be opposed to the policy which such laws were intended to promote.

The rule never had any application to the colonies and much less to the several States and the federal judiciary after we became one nation, with a common commerce and a common interest in the power, peace, and prosperity of the whole people.

When penal actions founded upon the laws of other States were rejected by our courts, as in some instances upon the ground of comity they might have been, this old rule should not have been invoked.

All those provisions of law intended to secure the performance of private contracts, and in which the property rights of private citizens alone were concerned, should never have been deemed penal statutes within the rule excluding jurisdiction.

The federal courts would decline jurisdiction in a qui tam action under a State law for a penalty for a violation of the Sabbath, for defrauding a State tax law or any other law of a purely political character; here the rule would be applicable; to extend it to that large and rapidly growing class of cases, where the citizens of one State have rights of action against those of another, under laws creating liabilities for corporate premises, will make a fearful inroad upon the jurisdiction of the federal judiciary.

A very large percentage of all the commerce, manufacturers and trading of the country is coming to be done by State corporations; the citizen relies in large degree upon the security afforded by those obligations imposed upon officers and shareholders for an omission of their duty. To call this obligation a penalty is to exclude the jurisdiction of the federal courts by a mere name. We can see no distinction in principal between a State statute which should repeal a provision in a railroad or bank charter, rendering liable directors and shareholders if they incurred debts beyond the amount of the capital paid in, or failed to make proper scrutiny and publicity of the accounts of their corporation, and a law divesting such a liability unanimously held to be unconstitutional in 2 Wal. Hawthorne v. Calif.

In this case a railroad charter provided that shareholders should be liable to the extent of their shares for the debts of the corporation if there was a deficiency of corporate assets. This provision was repealed anterior to the bringing of an action; held, it violated the obligation of the contract implied between the shareholders and the creditor growing out of the statute and their reciprocal action under it. In this case the liability was fully statutory; there was no liability at common law on the part of the corporators for the debts of the corporation.

The court cites as analogous, Woodruff v. Trapnal, 10 How., 190, in which it was held that the repeal of a law which made bills issued by a bank receivable in payment of State debts, could not deprive a citizen of the liberty of so applying them. Corning v. McCullough, 1 Coms., 47, is also approbated, which quite fully accords with the principles stated.

Between the statute involved in 2 Wal., 10, and those which the State judgments cited, have held to be pure penalties, and therefore cognizable only in the courts of the State which enacts them, we see no such difference in principle as to cause a Circuit court of the United States to refuse to entertain an action upon the ground that one is penal, and to entertain it under the other because it is a contract.

To erect such a distinction into a rule of law, would enable State legislatures, by the mere form and phraseology of a statute, to create property rights of which the Federal Courts could take no cognizance, and thus do indirectly, what, in Ins. Co. v. Morse, 20 Wall., 445, the Supreme court said they could not do directly.

This liability constitutes a part of the law of the contract. See, also, 21 Wall., 252, 253, Ochetten v. R. R. Co.

The rule so frequently quoted in the books, that which is created by statute may be taken away by statute, was also largely relied upon at the bar. We remarked during the argument, and now repeat, there never was any such rule administered anywhere.

When remedies are created, penalties enacted, crimes defined and punished, political regulations established by statute, they may be abrogated by their appeal.

When repealed, the presumption is in favor of a retro-active application. It is a misdescription of the principle involved in these classes of cases, to say the right of action is gone becaase they are statutory.

They are gone on account of the nature of the statute, the right regulated, and the persons to be affected; because, in these peculiar instances, and other analogous cases, statutory rights are abrogated by repeal of the law, it by no means follows that all other statutory rights of a different character, creating substantial property rights, upon which business transactions between citizen and citizen are vested, fall in the same circumstances.

Large numbers of the latter class are protected by various constitutional inhibitions—Federal and State.

When you pass beyond the protection of the Constitution, and arrive at those vested rights which involve substantial property values, then, although the abstract proven may exist to destroy them, the presumption will be that the legislature did not intend to do so, unless it expressly so declares.

From the multitude of cases so declaring, we cite in addition to those already referred to, only the following: Dash v. Van Kluk, 7 J. R. 477, which contains a full discussion by most able judges, and reviews the elementary writers and decisions down to their date.

The duty of construing all laws prospectively, where rights are affected, is strongly insisted upon; and see 4 S. & R., 401; 2 Cranch, 272.

No principle is more familiar in the Federal jurisprudence.

It was also argued that, however courts might deal with affirmative provisions of law which prescribe new rules of conduct, and create new obligations, applying them prospectively only, when such appeared to be the intention of the lawmaker, that no such liberty of interpretation existed when a statute was unconditionally repealed.

We see no difference whatever, in principle, between the two cases, deeming it, in all instances, a mere matter of construction, depending upon the subject matter and language of the law. We should have thought it unworthy of consideration, but for the answer made by Justice Cowen, in Butler v. Palmer, 1 Hill, 324, to some judgments cited in favor of a wholly prospective application of a law in judgment before him.

He does distinguish them by saying they are cases of positive enactments, and not unconditional repeals. If we might impute to that learned judge the absurdity of saying, that in no case could the legislature repeal a clause in a statute, saving all rights accrued under it, his language, literally interpreted, might be read to mean that in every case of repeal, irrespective of circumstances, the courts are forbidden to confine its effects to future cases only. He cites many old English judgments in reference to political, penal, remedial and criminal statutes, in reference to which such a rule of presumption is rightfully declared; but all that is meant in the judgment, is that in case of a repeal, stronger language and more persuasive circumstances are required to authorize a limited application than will produce the same effect in reference to a new affirmative enactment.

The judgment, instead of being at war with our own, when rightfully understood, is an argument to show that in every instance the legislative will is to be ascertained and executed.

We call attention to the following opinions, reported at length in this issue:

The Enforcement Act—The Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments Construed—The Rights of Citizens of the U. S.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States by Waite, C. J., construing the Enforcement Act, the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments to the constitution of the United States defining the rights of citizens of the Federal and State governments, and holding on an indictment for conspiring, etc., brought under the sixth section of the Enforcement Act, that to bring the case under the operation of the statute, it must appear that the right, the enjoyment of which the conspirators intended to hinder or prevent, was one granted or secured by the constitution or laws of the United States; that the fourteenth amendment prohibits a State from depriving any person of life, liberty or property, without due process of law, but this adds nothing to the rights of one citizen as against another; it simply furnishes an additional guaranty against any encroachment by the States upon the fundamental rights which belong to every citizen as a member of society; that it does not appear in these counts that the intent of the defendants was to prevent the parties from exercising their right to vote on account of race or color.

Bankruptcy—Where Assignee May Bring Suit.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States by Bradley, J., holding that under the Bankrupt Act, as passed in 1867, an assignee in bankruptcy, without regard to the citizenship of the parties, could maintain a suit for the recovery of assets, in the Circuit Court of the United States, in any district other than that in which the decree of bankruptcy was made. There has been great conflict of opinion among the District judges upon this question. Judge Hopkins, of Wisconsin, was one of the first to hold that such suit could be brought in any district, and now his opinion is sustained by the Supreme Court of the United States. Judge Hopkins is a sound reasoner, a deep thinker, and is very generally right in his conclusions.

Effect of the Repeal or Amendment of a Statute.—The opinion of the United States Circuit Court for the Eastern District of Michigan, by Emmons, J., holding the clause in Section 5021, amending Section 390 of the Bankrupt Law, by inserting the word "knew," instead of the words "had reasonable cause to believe," is not to be applied to proceedings in bankruptcy commenced before the first of December, 1873; that those clauses of the bankrupt law which authorize an assignee to recover the amount of unlawful preferences paid to particular creditors, are not in their nature penal, and their repeal are not subject to the rule of construction applicable to the repeal of penal statutes; that when substantial rights are created by statute, or commercial contracts are regulated, the repeal of laws upon which they depend, will not receive a retro-active application, unless the law expressly, or by necessary implication, so declares.

Indictment for Burning a Building.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of this State, in a case where the accused was indicted for setting fire to a building with a view to defrauding an insurance company; and holding that the indictment should state that the company was incorporated, or, if not incorporated that he set the building on fire with intent to injure the persons composing that company, stating the names of such persons.

Preliminary Examination—Prisoner no Power to Waive.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of Nevada, by Hawley, C. J., stating when a party be found guilty of prison-breaking, and holding that in all cases where a person has been arrested, charged with crime and brought before a magistrate, an examination should take place; that the practice of allowing such party to waive an examination, is irregular, and should be discontinued. The general practice, all through the country, is, in preliminary examinations, to allow the prisoner to waive such examination, if he wishes.

Cause of Action for Injury Resulting in Death—Statute of Limitations.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of Tennessee, by McFarland, J., holding that there is no distinction made in the statutes between classes of cases where the injured party lives a time, and suit is brought in his lifetime, and where death is instantaneous; that both classes of cases are put upon the same footing; and whether the action be brought by the party himself, or by his representatives after his death, the cause of action is the same, and is governed by the same laws. This opinion is against the weight of authority in other States, and will well repay a careful reading.

NOTES TO RECENT CASES.

SALE IN PARTITION—MORTGAGE.

The Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. in Wright v. Vicars, Admrs., 33 Leg. Intel. 131, held, that a sale in partition discharges a mortgage made by one of the co-tenants upon his interest, and that the act of March 20, 1867, does not prevent this.

BANKRUPTCY—ASSIGNMENT UNDER STATE LAW.

The court of Common Pleas of Franklin Co., Pa., held, in Shryock et al. v, Bashore, 13 N. Reg. 481, that whether an assignment in proceedings under a State insolvent law is void is a question that may be raised in a collateral action; that a State law providing for the distribution of the assets of an insolvent bank is superseded by the bankrupt law; that an assignment made as a part of the machinery of a State insolvent law, and deriving all its validity from the statute, is void; that an assignment for the benefit of creditors which gives priority to certain creditors is void, except as against the assignee in bankruptcy.

BANKRUPTCY—AMENDMENT OF JUNE 22, 1874.

The New York Supreme Court of Oneida county, in Slafter v. Greer, T. S. & Co., 13 N. Y. R., 220, held, that the amendment of June 22, 1874, does not effect a suit brought to recover a preference which was brought prior to Dec. 1, 1873.

ACT OF BANKRUPTCY—DEPOSITION TO PROVE.

The United States District Court for the Western District of Ohio, in Cunningham v. Cady, 13 N. B. R., 525, held that a deposition to an act of bankruptcy consisting of a fraudulent conveyance, must allege or show the fraudulent intent of the debtor in making the conveyance; that a deposition to prove a claim in involuntary bankruptcy must show whether the claim is secured or unsecured; that a petition will not be dismissed because the depositions in support thereof are defective; but the petitioning creditor, on motion, will be allowed to file supplemental depositions.

MORTGAGE—MORTGAGEE IN POSSESSION OF BUSINESS PREMISES—RIGHT TO CARRY ON BUSINESS.

The English, High Court, Chancery Division, in Cook v. Thomas, 24 Weekly Reporter, 427, held that a mortgagee in possession of business premises is entitled to carry on the business for a reasonable time, so as to enable him to sell as a going concern, and for that purpose to use the name of the mortgagor's firm.

PATENT—WHEN USE OF DISCONTINUED.

The United States Circuit Court, W. D. Pa., 22 Int. Rev. Rec., 114, held in Shoup et al. v. Henrici et al., that where a device has been used, but discontinued, this does not give a subsequent inventor the right to take it up and appropriate it exclusively.

SECRETARY OF STATE—SALARY.

The Supreme Court of Nebraska, in State ex rel. Tzschuck v. Weston, 10 Western Jurist, 221, held that the Secretary of State is not ineligible to the office of Adjutant-General, and the allowance to him of a salary as such officer, does not conflict with that section of the Constitution fixing the salary of the Secretary of State at $2,000 per annum, and providing that he shall not receive to his own use "any fees, costs, or other compensation." We think the court would have been justified in holding that the office of Adjutant-General was incompatible with that of Secretary of State. In case of war the Secretary of State could not, without neglecting his civil duties, properly attend to his military duties as Adjutant-General. Many of the accounts of the Adjutant-General have to pass through the hands of the Secretary of State.

DEPOSITION OF WITNESS BEFORE GRAND JURY.

Under the English practice it was held, in Neg v. Gerrans, 34 L. T. R. N. S., 145, at the Hampshire Spring Assizes, that when a witness is unable to attend a trial, through illness, his deposition may be presented to the grand jury without any preliminary proof that the witness is ill, and that such deposition was regularly taken. In such case, the grand jury should be told that the court permits them to look at the deposition, and to act upon it if they think proper.

MASTER AND SERVANT—NEGLIGENCE OF FELLOW SERVANT—COMMON EMPLOYMENT.

The English Court, Common Pleas, Decision in Lowell v. Howell, 34 L. T. R. N. S., 183, held that to exempt a master from liabiliay to a servant for the negligence of a fellow servant, it is not necessary that the servant injured, and the servant whose negligence causes the injury, should be engaged in the same work. In this case, the plaintiff was hired to attend defendant's barges at defendant's wharfs during certain hours. He was sent for to defendant's counting-house for orders, at a time when he need not have been attending to the barges. On the way, he was injured by the negligence of defendant's servants, who were drawing up sacks to defendant's warehouse; and the court held that plaintiff was acting in the course of his employment in going to the counting-house for orders, and that the persons whose negligence caused the injury were fellow servants with the plaintiff, and a rule to enter a verdict for the plaintiff was discharged. This opinion, although supported by numerous English authorities, is in conflict with the opinions of the courts of several of the American States.

MECHANICS—GAS FIXTURES.

The Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, in Jarecki et al. v. the Philharmonic Society, 23 Pitt's Legal Journal, 134, held that gas fixtures, as distinguished from gas fitting, are not subject to Mechanic's lien, and do not belong to the building, and therefore do not pass to the purchaser of a house.

Leading and Select Cases on the Disabilities Incident to Infancy, Coverture, Idiocy, etc., with Notes. By Marshall D. Ewell. Boston: Little, Brown and Company. 1876 Sold by E. B. Myers, Law Book Publisher, Chicago.

This is a large handsome volume of 813 pages. It is a sufficient guarantee of its superior mechanical execution to say that it is from the press of John Wilson & Son, of Cambridge. We visited this printing establishment during the past winter, and found it one of the most complete and extensive in the country.

Mr. Ewell, in presenting this collection of cases upon the Disabilities of Infancy, Coverture, etc., did not intend it as an exhaustive presentation of the law upon those subjects respectively, but to present, in a convenient form for use by the practising lawyer and student, a collection of cases discussing the more salient points of the respective subjects, with especial reference to their influence upon the capacity to contract, through the subjects of testamentary capacity, torts, estoppel, and the marital rights over the wife's property, are to some extent also considered. The author, in referring to the subject of coverture says the law in this country not being as yet in a settled and stable condition, but in a transition state, rapidly tending towards the complete emancipation of woman from the antiquated illiberality and tyranny of the old common law respecting her rights in property, and towards a condition of complete equality with man in this respect, so that it could not with propriety be said, that there was any leading cases on the subject, in the sense in which that term is generally understood, it was therefore deemed expedient to restrict the selection of cases upon this subject to those discussing questions existing, at common law, the learning of which must long continue to be indispensably necessary in determining the true construction of the statutes making the innovations upon the common law.

Mr. Ewell has shown excellent judgment in the selection of cases, and when there has been a conflict of authority upon the question under consideration, cases discussing both sides have generally been presented, and what seemed to be the weight of authority has been pointed out in the notes, with the authorities supporting both sides of the question. These notes are very elaborate, and abound in the citation of authorities. In this respect Mr. Ewell has exercised great care and shown commendable industy. In our judgment this volume is worthy of the patronage of the profession.

WE have received from THOMAS SHIRLEY, of the Chicago bar, the following opinion:

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

OPINION FILED FEB. 3, 1876.

NICHOLAS STAADEN v. THE PEOPLE.

Error to DuPage Co.

INDICTMENT FOR BURNING A BUILDING TO DEFRAUD AN INSURANCE CO.

When a person is indicted for burning a building which is insured with a view of getting the insurance, etc. It should allege the insurance company is an incorporated company, etc., where the charge is the intent was to injure a body of persons by a company name, unless such company is incorporated it should be averred the accused set the building on fire with intent to injure the persons composing the company, stating the names of such persons.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

Opinion PER CURIAM.

The indictment in this case was found under section 14, division 1, of the criminal code, and charges that plaintiff in error unlawfully, wilfully, feloniously and maliciously set fire to a building, used as and for a storeroom and dwelling, which building was insured against loss by fire in the Ætna Insurance Company of Hartford, Connecticut, with intent to injure that insurance company, contrary to the form of the statute. R. S., 1874. p. 354, sec. 14.

One objection taken is fatal to the present indictment. It was necessary to aver the guilty intent, viz.; that the buiding was insured against loss by fire, and that the accused set it it on fire with intent to injure the insurer. Although the pleaded has attempted to make such an averment in this indictment, it is defectively done. It is apprehended the insured must be a natural person or a body corporate, some party capable of being injured. It is not alleged the Ætna Insurance, of Hartford, Connecticut, is an incorporated company, under the laws of that State.

Where the charge is the intent was to injure a body of persons by a company name, unless such company is incorporated, it should be averred the accused set the building on fire with intent to injure the persons composing that company, stating the names of such persons. The case of Wallace v. The People, 63 Ill., 451, is an authority for this view of the law.

This was not done, and the motion to quash the indictment ought to have been allowed. The judgment will be reversed and the cause remanded.

Reversed and remanded.

SUPREME COURT OF NEVADA.

OCTOBER TERM, 1875.

Ex Parte AH BAU and AH YOU.

PRELIMINARY EXAMINATION OF PRISONER —PRISON-BREAKING.

PRELIMINARY EXAMINATION SHOULD NOT BE WAIVED.—In all cases where a party has been arrested, charged with crime and brought before a magistrate, an examination should take place; the practice of allowing such a party to waive an examination is irregular and should be discontinued.

WHEN WAIVED NO GROUND FOR DISCHARGE.—The fact that the justice of the peace issued his commitment without the introduction of any testimony, although erroneous, furnishes no ground for petitioner's discharge upon habeas corpus.

PRISON-BREAKING ESSENTIALS OF THE OFFENSE.—Before any person can be found guilty of prison-breaking, the imprisonment from which he attempted to break must be shown to be lawful.

It is not merely those who are guilty of a crime that may be lawfully confined in a county jail for under circumstances many persons who are wholly innocent may be lawfully imprisoned by legal process, and in such cases they are bound to submit to the confinement until discharged by law.

If a party imprisoned upon a regular commitment, issued by a justice of the peace, charging him with a felony, breaks prison, he is guilty of the offense of prison-breaking, and may be convicted of said offense without being indicted, tried or convicted of the principal felony.

By the court, HAWLEY, C. J.:

Petitioners are held in custody by the sheriff of Washoe county, by virtue of a commitment issued from the justice's court of Reno township, which recites that they have been held to answer upon a charge of attempting to break jail. They ask their discharge upon two grounds: First. Because no examination has been had upon the charge alleged in the commitment. Second. Because, at the time of the alleged offense of prison-breaking, they were not lawfully confined in the county jail.

1. The statute contemplates that in all cases where a person has been arrested, charged with crime and brought before a magistrate, that an examination shall take place. The practice of allowing such person to waive an examination is irregular and should be discontinued. It appears that when petitioners were brought before the justice of the peace they were allowed to waive an examination and the justice issued the commitment without the introduction of any testimony. This action, although erroneous, does not furnish any ground for their discharge upon habeas corpus. They are entitled to a hearing, and upon demand the justice will undoubtedly grant it.

2. At the time of their alleged attempt to break jail, petitioners were in the custody of the sheriff, and were confined in the county jail under and by virtue of a regular commitment holding them to answer upon the charge of an attempt to kidnap. This court, upon a writ of habeas corpus, after examining the depositions taken before the committing magistrate on that charge and hearing oral testimony, decided that there was no reasonable or probable cause for their detention and discharged them. It is now claimed that such discharge, in legal effect, amounted to a decision that they were unlawfully held in custody and that they had the right to break jail.

The statute provides that, "every person lawfully confined in a county jail, or in the custody of any officer or person, under a lawful arrest, who shall escape or break away from such officer or person, or shall escape from or break out of or attempt to escape from or break out of, such jail, * * * and in case such person is under arrest, or confined in jail upon a charge of felony, and so escape, or break away from, such arrest, or escape from or break out of, or attempt to break out of, such jail, then, upon conviction, he shall be punished," etc. (1 Comp. L. 589, 2467.)

Upon a careful examination of the authorities it will be found that the law demands that before any person should be adjudged guilty of this offense, the imprisonment from which he attempted to break should be shown to be lawful. It will not be seriously contended that a person confined in jail contrary to law, should be found guilty of this offense for attempting, even forcibly, to regain his liberty. But it is equally clear that it is not merely those who are actually guilty of a crime that may be lawfully confined in a county jail; for under many circumstances persons who are wholly innocent may be lawfully imprisoned by legal process, and in such cases they are bound to submit to the confinement until discharged by due course of law.

The doctrine applicable to this case is thus expressed in 2 Hawkin's Pleas of the Crown, 185, ch. 18: "It is clear that if a person be taken upon a capias awarded on an indictment or appeal against him, for a supposed treason or felony, he is within the statute if he break the prison, whether any such crime were in truth committed by him, or any other person, or not; for that there is an accusation against him on record, which makes his commitment lawful, be he never so innocent, and the prosecution never so groundless." (Sec. 5.) "Also, if an innocent person be committed by a lawful mittimus on such a suspicion of a felony, actually done by some other, as will justify his imprisonment, though he be neither indicted nor appealed, he is certainly within the statute if he break the prison, for that he was legally in custody, and ought to have submitted to it till he had been discharged by due course of law." (Sec. 6.) "And on the other side, if the party be taken up for such slight causes of suspicion of a felony actually done as will not in strictness justify the arrest, yet if the justice before whom he is brought think them of such weight as to require a commitment, and do accordingly send the party to jail by a regular mittimus, it seems very dangerous for him to break the prison; for the practice of justices of peace in making such commitments being now grown into settled law, it seems reasonable that their mittimus be a good justification of the imprisonment which it commands, for a crime within their jurisdiction regularly brought before them; from whence it follows, that to break from such imprisonment must be unlawful." (Sec. 8.) This is substantially the principal announced by the various authors who have written upon this subject (2 Coke's Inst. 592; 1 Hale's Pleas of the Crown, 610; 1 Russ. on Cr. 428; 2 Bish. on Cr. L., Secs. 1033, 1034), and it is supported by all the authorities we have found bearing directly upon this question. (State v. Murray, 15 Me. 100; Commonwealth v. Miller, 2 Ashmead, 61.)

Petitioners' counsel relies upon a remark made by Sir Matthew Hale, as follows: "And yet I hold that if A. be indicted of felony and committed, and then breaks prison, and then be arraigned of the principal felony and found not guilty, now A. shall never be indicted for the breach of prison; or if indicted of it before the acquittal, and then he is acquitted of the principal felony, he may plead that acquittal of the principal felony in bar to the indictment for the felony for breach of prison." (1 Hale's Pleas of the Crown, 612.) This doctrine, if admitted to be correct, is of no avail to petitioners in this application, for they have not been acquitted of the principal charge. All the authorities agree that a party may be arraigned, tried and convicted for prison-breaking before he is convicted of the crime for which he was imprisoned. (1 Hale's Pleas of the Crown, 611; 2 Coke's Inst. 592; 1 Russ. on Cr., 430.)

In the case of the Commonwealth v. Miller, supra, the defendants were imprisoned by virtue of certain commitments issued by a justice of the peace charging them with the crime of "feloniously burning St. Peter's church," and the defendants while so in custody broke jail. At a subsequent term of court, and pending the indictments for prison-breaking, the grand jury returned the bills "ignoramus." The defendants on being arraigned "pleaded these facts in bar to the indictments for the breach of prison, and averred that they were, in truth and in fact, arrested and detained without any reasonable or probable cause of suspicion." Darlington, president of the court, to whom the question of the sufficiency of the demurrers was submitted, held "that if a man be imprisoned upon an indictment found, or upon a regular commitment, under the hand and seal of a justice of the peace, for a particular felony, or suspicion thereof, plainly set forth in the warrant, and he breaks prison and escapes, that he is guilty of felony, and this without his being indicted, tried or convicted of the principal felony" (p. 68).

Notwithstanding their discharge from custody, under the commitment accusing them of an attempt to kidnap, upon the ground that they were held without any reasonable or probable cause, petitioners might be indicted, tried and convicted of said offense; hence it follows that such an order is no bar to an indictment for prison-breaking, whatever might be the effect of an acquittal by a jury.

Petitioners are remanded to the custody whence they came.

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT.

ABSTRACT OF OPINIONS FILED AT OTTAWA IN 1876.

H. C. Todd, trustee, etc., v. K. & I. R. R. Co.—Appeal from Kankakee. — Opinion by WALKER, J.

ESTIMATING DAMAGES FOR RIGHT OF WAY—BENEFITS—TOWN BLOCKS.

Held, 1. That, in estimating damages for right of way to construct a railroad, benefits to the tract occupied may be set off; but not benefits to other tracts of the same owner, arising from the location of the road.

2. Where a town has long been laid off into blocks and streets, and ever since been so treated, then, for the purposes of assessing damages, the blocks are to be regarded as separate tracts, even if not platted as required by the statute.

Conrad Ross v. Eliza Ross.—Appeal from Peoria.—Opinion by WALKER, J.

ALIMONY — PROPORTION — MODE — PAYING WIFE'S DEBTS.

Held, 1. That, in a case of divorce, the allowance of alimony ranges from one-third to one-half of the income, and it is erroneous to allow the divorced wife the bulk of the husband's property.

2. Where there are special reasons, in allowing alimony, to vest the fee of real estate in the wife, this may be done, yet otherwise, this should not be done, but an annual allowance made.

3. A decree of alimony cannot properly require the defendant to pay the complainant's debts.

Wm. B. Ogden et al. v. Abner Kirby.—Appeal from Superior Court of Cook.—Opinion by CRAIG, J.

CONDITIONAL RAILROAD SUBSCRIPTION—LAW AND FACT.

STATEMENT.—Suit brought to recover a railroad subscription conditioned that payment should be made when the road was completed and in operation between certain points.

The terminus was a town of 3,000 inhabitants, and there was a very large township of the same name in which it was situated. It was not designated distinctly which was meant, the township or village, in the subscription.

Held, 1. That which was meant was purely a question of fact for the jury.

2. Also, when a railroad is completed and in operation is a question of fact.

3. But the facilities afforded by the railroad does not necessarily enter into the consideration of such contract, unless prescribed specifically in the condition—except that there should he reasonable facilities, such as are usual in a new road.

Commissioners of Highways v. Thomas Newell et al.—Appeal from Knox.—Opinion by WALKER, J.

TAXES FOR ROAD REPAIRS AND IMPROVEMENTS.

Held, 1. That a tax levied for repairs and improvements need not be actually collected before the work is begun, under the road and bridge law.

2. Work may even be done in anticipation of a levy the subsequent year, under the road and bridge law, where, from a flood or other inevitable cause, immediate repairs are necessary.

Thomas Crowley v. Catharine Crowley et al.—Appeal from Grundy.—Opinion by CRAIG, J.

PROBATE OF WILL—EVIDENCE REQUISITE.

STATEMENT.—Probate of a will refused by the county court and appeal to the Circuit court.

Held, 1. That, to entitle a will to be admitted to probate, four things must concur, namely: The will must be in writing, and signed by the testator, or in his presence, by some one under his direction. 2. It must be attested by two or more credible witnesses. 3. Two witnesses must testify that they saw the testator sign the will in their presence, or that he acknowledged the same to be his act and deed. And 4, they must swear that they believe the testator to have been of sound mind and memory at the time of signing and acknowledging the same.

2. If probate is refused, appeal may be taken, and then any competent evidence is available. But two witnesses must even then concur. This requisite of the statute cannot be dispensed with.

3. Verdicts cannot be directed in this State.

4. Only prejudicial error will reverse a cause.

143.—C. H. Harrison v. C. H. Willett.—Appeal from Superior Court of Cook.—Opinion by BREESE, J.

AFFIDAVIT OF MERITS IN ASSUMPSIT.

STATEMENT.—Suit on promissory note accompanied by affidavit of merits. Defendant pleaded and filed counter affidavit of merits; which affidavit was adjudged insufficient, and the pleas stricken from the files, because the affidavit was not in the exact language of the statute. Held,

That such an affidavit need not be in the exact words of the statute. It is sufficient if it substantially complies with the practice act.

141.—William Davis v. William A. Mericks.—Appeal from Knox.—Opinion per curiam.

DELIVERY OF GROWING CROPS.

Held, That a sufficient delivery of growing crops is effected, when ownership is transferred as far as the property is capable of it, and then, as fast as harvested, it is set apart for the claimant.

MECHANICS LIEN—TIME—ACT OF 1861.

Held, That, in express contracts, a lien for furnishing materials can only be enforced when the contract specifies a certain and not an indefinite time, within which the materials are to be furnished.

2. The act of 1861 only applies to implied contracts.

3. To deliver in a reasonable time is not sufficiently definite to sustain a lien.

SUPREME COURT OF INDIANA.

UNLAWFUL EXPULSION FROM RAILROAD CAR —VERDICT BY COMPROMISE WHEN THE ACTION IS FOR UNLIQUIDATED DAMAGES—RIGHTS AND DUTIES OF RAILROADS AS TO TICKET REGULATIONS—IMPROPER CONDUCT OF ATTORNEY—HOW MADE AVAILABLE.

4131. The St. Louis & Southwestern Railroad Co. v. Myrtlle, Posey, C. C. Affirmed. Opinion by BUSKIRK, J.

STATEMENT.—This was an action by the appellee to recover damages for an alleged injury and ejectment from the cars of the appellant. The complaint is in two paragraphs. The first alleges that it was a rule of the company not to permit passengers to travel on freight trains without tickets, and that plaintiff entered the cars of the company, but was unable to first procure a ticket, because the ticket-office of the company was not open before the train passed. That upon his failure to furnish a ticket, he tendered his fare to the conductor, who refused to receive it, but with force expelled him from the train, etc.

The second paragraph is substantially as the first. Verdict for plaintiff for $562.50.

Held, 1. That in an action to recover unliquidated damages, the jury may resort to means to arrive at a verdict, that are not allowed in criminal actions, or in a civil action where the damages are liquidated; and that if it did appear that the verdict for $562.50 was the result of a compromise, it would not violate it. (11 Ind., 156.)

2. That the appellant had a right to adopt a regulation that all persons who travel on a freight train should procure a ticket before entering the cars. (46 Ind., 293.) But such a regulation imposes the duty upon the company of having the ticket office open sufficiently long enough before the departure of the train to enable passengers to procure tickets.

3. That the expulsion of plaintiff from the train was wrongful, and that after careful consideration, the verdict cannot be disturbed on account of excessive damages.

4. That in order to make available as error, the improper conduct of an attorney, in going outside of the evidence and making improper comments in his argument to the jury, it must appear that objection was urged to such argument, or that the court was called upon to stop counsel and confine him within the record, and that the failure of the court to interpose, when opposing counsel are present and do not ask the interposition of the court, or object to the line of argument, will not entitle the party to a new trial.

SUPREME COURT OF TENNESSEE.

OPINION FILED APRIL 5, 1876.

H. P. FOWLKES, Admr., v. The N. & D. R. R. Co.

CAUSE OF ACTION FOR INJURY RESULTING IN DEATH.—STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS.—There is no distinction made in the statutes between classes of cases where the injured party lives a time, and suit is brought in his life time, and where death is instantaneous. Both classes of cases are put upon the same footing, and whether the action be brought by the party himself or by his representative after his death, the cause of action is the same and governed by the same laws.

DAMAGES.—The rule introduced by some of the cases, in regard to damages, in cases where the action is brought by the representative, that is, damages for the loss of husband and father, or relative, to the widow or next of kin, might be allowed beyond what would be proper where the action is brought by the party himself, doubted. The decisions of other States, being founded on their own statutes, are not controlling.—[THE COM. AND LEGAL REPORTER.]

M'FARLAND, J.

The question arises upon the plea of the statute of limitations.

The action is by a personal representative under section 2291 of the Code, as follows: "The right of action which a person who dies from injuries received from another, or whose death is caused by the wrongful act or omission of another, would have had against the wrongdoer, in case death had not ensued, shall not abate or be extinguished by his death, but shall pass to his personal representative for the benefit of his widow and next of kin, free from the claims of creditors." There is no statute of limitation made expressly applicable to this class of cases. But Sec. 2772, in the article prescribing the limitation of personal actions, provides that actions for personal injuries shall be commenced in one year after the cause of action accrued. It is manifest that if the injured party commenced the action in his life time, this statute would be applicable; and it is equally manifest that the action is for the same cause whether brought by the injured party himself in his life time or by his representative after his death, so that one year after the cause of action accrued is the limitation. But the question is, when does the cause of action accrue, and when does the statute begin to run.

It is apparent that under this statute cases often arise, where the injured party lives a time after the injury and then dies of the injury; and many other cases occur where death is, in the common acceptation of the term, instantaneous. In the first class of cases, where the injured party lives a time, it would seem clear that the cause of action accrued when the injury was received, or at the time of the wrongful act or omission. If in such cases an action be brought in the life time of the party and a recovery be had, or a settlement and a release of the claim, or accord and satisfaction, and the party afterwards die of the injury, his representative certainly could not then sue and recovery. See Sherman and Redfield on Negligence, Section 301.

This being so, the only question remaining is whether there is any distinction between cases where the death is instantaneous. There is certainly no such distinction indicated in the statute. Both classes of cases are put upon the same footing.

The purpose seems simply to have been to repeal that rule of the common law that actions for personal injuries die with the person, in those cases where the injured party dies of the injury; but whether the action be brought by the party himself or by his representative after his death, the cause of action is the same and is governed by the same laws. To show this conclusively, it is only necessary to refer to Section 2293, which in terms provides that if the action be brought by the party in his life time, it shall continue after his death without revivor, showing that in either case the action is essentially the aame.

The argument against this view is, that the action allowed by this statute is a new action given to the personal representative, an action which the injured party could not have maintained. That the action is given to the personal representative, on account of the death of the injured party. That his death is the cause of action. And this of course could not accrue to the injured party himself, but only accrues to his representative, and could not accrue to him until his appointment. This argument, though plausible, is not sound. As we have seen, the statute is equally applicable to cases where the injured party lives a time, and to cases where death is instantaneous. When the injured party lives a time after the injury, he has a right of action without the statute. If an action be brought by the party himself, and he then die of the injury before judgment, the effect of the statute is to prevent an abatement, and allow the cause to proceed notwithstanding the death, but not on account of the death. The cause of action was the injury, and in such case the action after the death is prosecuted for the same cause for which it was brought, and is the same action. In cases where no action is brought by the injured party himself, the statute allows the action to be brought by the representative.

This could not have been done at the common law, and it is therefore in this sense a new and statutory action. But it is brought for the same cause as if the injured party had himself brought the action.

The general rule is, that if a canse of action accrue in the life time of a party the statute of limitations begins to run and is not suspended during the time that elapses between his death and the appointment of his representative. Angell on Lim., Sec. 56.

It is different if the cause of action does not accrue until after the death; then in general the statute does not begin to run until the appointment of a representative. Angell on Lim. Chapter VII. Thurman v. Shelton, 10 Yerg.

The argument is, that the cause of action in cases of instantaneous death, could not accrue to the party in his life time, and it is true that for practical purposes it could not; but upon the theory that there is no such thing literally as instantaneous death the cause of action might be held to accrue to the party in his life time, though he should die before he could possibly bring an action.

But at any rate no distinction is made in the statute between the two classes of cases. Where the injured party lives long enough it is clear the action accrues to him and the statute begins to run. We are not authorized to establish a different rule where the death is in the common acceptance of the term, instantaneous. We could not determine how soon after the injury death should occur in order to take the case out of the other rule.

It is true that some of the cases seem to have introduced a new element of damages in cases where the action is brought by the representative, that is, damages for the loss of society of the husband and father, or relative, to the widow or next of kin; that in such cases damages might be allowed beyond what would be proper where the action is brought by the party himself.

Some of these cases stand upon doubtful grounds, but even where the action is brought by the party himself, damages might in a proper case be given to the same extent as if death had ensued. That is, where the injury permanently disables the party for life, the injury, in a pecuniary sense, would be the same as if death had ensued.

We have found no authority that we regard as controlling; the decisions of other States being founded upon their own statutes, which are not identical with ours. The case of Whitford v. The Panama R. R. Co., 23 New York Court of Appeals, is founded upon the New York statute, and conceding that the statute of that State is substantially the same as ours, it seems to us that the reasoning of Ch. Justice Constable, in a dissenting opinion, is far more convincing and satisfactory. Upon contrary holding, an action might be brought twenty years after the injury or death of the party.

Judgment should be affirmed.

PROBATE OF WILL—APPEAL—ATTESTATION.

Stewart v. Harriman.

The statute of July 2, 1822, provided, that in case any will should be proved without notice to the parties interested, any party interested should be entitled to have the probate re-examined, on petition presented to the judge of probate, etc., with this proviso: "Provided, that no such application shall be sustained unless preferred within one year from the time of the probate, nor if an appeal from such probate has been prosecuted before the Superior Court." By Gen. Stats., ch. 175, sec. 7,—which is the same as in the Revised Statutes of 1842,—it is provided that "Any party interested may have the probate of any will which has been proved without notice re-examined, and the will proved in solemn form before the court of probate, at any time within one year of such probate, if no appeal from such probate has been prosecuted before the Supreme Court." Held, that this change in the language did not change the meaning of the statute, and that the petition would be in season if filed within one year from the time of the probate in common form.

The attesting witnesses to a will must be competent at the time of attestation.

The executor named in the will, as also his wife, is a competent attesting witness, if he takes no beneficial interest under it.

The fees and commissions to which an executor is by law entitled in this State, do not constitute such a beneficial interest as to render him or his wife incompetent to attest the execution of a will.

SURPLUS CAPITAL OF NATIONAL BANKS—POWER OF A STATE TO TAX.

First National Bank v. Peterborough.

Chapter 49, section 5, of the General Statutes, subjecting the surplus capital on hand of banking institutions to taxation, is applicable to banks organized under the act of congress establishing national banks, approved June 3, 1864—13 Stats. at Large 111—as well as to banks established by the legislature of this State.

The taxation of the surplus capital of such banks, in excess of the amount they are required by said act to carry to their surplus fund semi-annually, is not prohibited by congress, and is not an encroachment upon the constitutional powers vested in the federal government.

The taxation of such surplus by State authority is not the taxation of the means or agencies employed by the general government for the execution of its constitutional powers, but is the taxation of the property of such agents. The right to tax such property has never been surrendered by the States to the general government.

UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT.

PROCEEDINGS OF.

Wednesday, April 5, 1876.

On motion of John A. Grow, George W. Carter, of New Orleans, La., was admitted.

No. 136. John Garsed v. William A. Beall et al. The argument of this cause was concluded by R. Toombs for appellant.

No. 201. The Coastwise Company, administrators, v. Nicholas de las Casas. No. 202. Nicholas de las Casas, appellant, v. the steamer Alabama. The argument of these causes was commenced by John E. Parsons for N. de las Casas, and continued by Edwards Pierrepont for steamer Alabama and by W. R. Beebee for steam tug Garnecock.

Adjourned until Thursday at 12 o'clock.

Thursday, April 6.

On motion of John E. Parsons, Carlisle Norwood, Jr., New York City, was admitted.

No. 204. The Coastwise Company, claimants of steamer Alabama, etc., v. Nicholas de la Casas. No. 202. Nicholas de la Casas v. the steamer Alabama, etc. The argument of these cases was continued by W. R. Beebe for steam-tug Garnecock, and concluded by John E. Parsons for N. de las Casas.

No. 557. The Central Railroad and Banking Company v. the State of Georgia. No. 578, the Southwestern Railroad Company v. the State of Georgia. The argument of these cases was commenced by A. R. Lawton for plaintiff, and continued by N. J. Hammond for defendant, and by David Dudley Field for the plaintiffs.

The Court heard arguments in the cases of the "Central Railroad and Banking Company," of the State of Georgia v. the State of Georgia, and the Southwestern R. R. Co. v. the State of Georgia. These cases came up on writs of error by the companies from the Superior Court of the State of Georgia, 1874. The question at issue is the collection of taxes alleged to be due the State from the companies, amounting to $46,034 from the Central Railroad and Banking Company, and $28,203 from the Southwestern Railroad Company. Arguments were made by A. R. Lawton for plaintiffs, N. J. Hammond, Attorney-General, for the State of Georgia, and David Dudley Field for plaintiffs, and will be continued to-morrow by Robert Toombs on the part of the State.

Adjourned until Friday at 12 o'clock.

Friday, April 7.

On motion of D. Dudley Field, William A. Boyd, of New York City, was admitted.

No. 577. The Central Railroad and Banking Company v. the State of Georgia. No. 578, the Southwestern Railroad Company v. the State of Georgia. The argument of these cases was continued by R. Toombs for defendant, and concluded by J. S. Black for plaintiff.

No. 203. The town of Danville v. J. B. Pace.

No. 294. The town of Danville v. J. B. Pace. Dismissed with costs.

No. 198. Gains Whitfield v. the United States. The argument of this cause was commenced by P. Phillips for appellant, and continued by Solicitor General Phillips for appellees.

Adjourned until Monday at 12 o'clock.

Monday, April 10.

On motion of F. J. Lippitt, Herman B. Magruder, Esq., of New York City, was admitted.

No. 178. Blakely Wilson v. Peter Boyce, and

No. 173. Blakely Wilson v. L. McClellis. In error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Missouri. Hunt, J., delivered the opinion of the court, affirming the judgment of the Circuit Court in these causes with costs.

No. 609. The Board of Liquidation, State of Louisiana, et al., v. H. S. McComb. Appeal from the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Louisiana. Bradley, J., delivered the opinion affirming the decree of the Circuit Court so far as it prohibits the funding of the debt due to the Louisiana Levee Company in the consolidated bonds issued, or to be issued under the funding act of January 24, 1874, and reversing said decree as to so much thereof as prohibits the issue of any other bonds to the Louisiana Levee Company in liquidation of its debts. Costs to be paid by appellants.

Mr. Justice Field did not sit in this cause and took no part in the decision.

No. 183. H. & George A. Meyer v. Chester A. Arthur, collector, etc. In error to Circuit of the United States for the Southern District of New York. Bradley, J., delivered the opinion, affirming the judgment of the Circuit Court in this cause, with costs.

No. 43. The Town of Concord v. The Portsmouth Savings Bank. In error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Illinois. Strong, J., delivered the opinion, reversing the judgment of the Circuit Court, with costs, and remanding the cause, with directions to award a new trial.

No. 532. The County of Moultrie v. the Rockingham Ten Cents Savings Bank. In error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of Illinois. Strong, J., delivered the opinion, affirming the opinion of the Circuit Court, with costs and interest. Dissenting, Miller, Davis, and Field, JJ.

No. 848. Joshua Converse v. City of Fort Scott. In error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Kansas. Strong, J., delivered the opinion, reversing the judgment of the Circuit Court, with costs, and remanding the cause, with directions to award a new trial.

IMPORTANT TO SECRET SERVICE AGENTS.

No. 167. Enoch Totten, admr., etc., v. The United States. Appeal from the Court of Claims. FIELD, J., delivered the opinion, affirming the judgment and holding that an action cannot be maintained in the Court of Claims upon a contract with the President for secret service to the Government. The ground of the decision is that the contract for secret service seals the mouths of both parties. The service was to be a secret service, and if, upon such a contract, an action against the Government may be maintained in the Court of Claims whenever an agent is dissatisfied with his compensation, the whole service in any case, and the manner of its discharge, may be exposed, to the serious detriment of the public. A secret service, with liability to publicity in such a way, would be impossible; and as such services are sometimes indispensable to the Government, its agents in those services must look for their compensation to the contingent fund of the department employing them, and to such allowance from it as those who dispense that fund may award.

AN HONORABLE DISCHARGE FROM THE ARMY DOES NOT ENTITLE TO FORFEITED PAY AND ALLOWANCES.

In this case it is held that an honorable discharge of a soldier from service does not restore to him pay and allowances forfeited by desertion, including bounty, as heard by the Court of Claims.

THE OSAGE LAND CASE DECIDED IN FAVOR OF THE GOVERNMENT.

Case 401. Leavenworth, Lawrence and Galveston Railway Company v. The United States. Appeal from the Circuit Court for the district of Kansas. This was the action of the government to vacate the patents issued to the road for what are known as the Osage ceded lands in Kansas. The patents were issued by the Governor of the State in pursuance of certified bids furnished him for the purpose by the Secretary of the Interior. The Court holds that the lands so embraced had not been granted by Congress to the State to aid in the construction of the road, but were reserved from sale by law, and that the patents must be cancelled. The Secretary of the Interior having erred, his acts are void, for public officers can bind the government only within the scope of their lawful authority. After examining the original legislation involved in the case, it is said that what is known as the Thayer act can have no effect upon the case. It was passed for a single purpose only—to enable the company to relocate the road, and a false recital therein contained cannot turn the authority to change the route of a railroad into a grant of lands or a recognition of one. Especially is this so when the act expressly leaves the rights of the road to be determined by the previously existing legislation. Besides this the lands at the time were in process of being sold under a joint resolution of Congress, and it cannot be presumed that the Congress of 1871 intended to change the disposition of them made by the Congress of 1869. Convinced that the act of 1863 did not grant the lands, nor the Senate amendment bring into being any right which did not exist without it, the Court affirms the decree in favor of the government.

Mr. Justice Davies delivered the opinion; dissenting, Justices Field, Swayne and Strong.

No. 165. The Piedmont and Arlington Life Insurance Company v. Ashley W. Ewing, Admr., etc. In error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Western District of Missouri. Miller, J., delivered the opinion of the court reversing the judgment of the Circuit Court with costs, and remanding the cause, with directions to award a new trial.

No. 194. Harvey Terry v. the Commercial Bank of Alabama. Appeal from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of Alabama. Miller, J., delivered the opinion of the court remanding the cause to the Circuit Court, with directions to modify the decree entered in this cause by the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of Alabama, in conformity with the opinion of this court. As so modified, it is hereby affirmed. Costs to be paid by appellee.

AN EX-SLAVE CLAIMS TITLE TO THE PROCEEDS OF COTTON.—PROOF OF FREEDOM.

In the case of Hall v. the United States, the court decide that the claimant, having been a slave in Mississippi at the time he claims the cotton was conveyed to him by a contract with one Roach, he was incapable of making a contract or of holding title, and that the proceeds rightfully belong to the personal representatives of Roach who was his master. It is also held that Hall was debarred from claiming that he was a free man, because he submitted to bondage and did not assert his freedom, as provided by the laws of the State. Swayne, J., delivered the opinion, affirming the judgment of the Court of Claims.

No. 189. Joseph Hobson and Jose M. Hurtado, v. Daniel W. Lord, In error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York. Clifford, J., delivered the opinion, affirming the judgment of the Circuit Court in this cause, with costs and interest. Dissenting, Bradley, J.

No. 181. The steamship City of Washington etc. v. Peter B. Baillie et al. Appeal from the Circut Court of the United States for the Eastern District of New York. Clifford, J., delivered the opinion, affirming the decree of the said Circuit Court in this cause, with costs and interest.

No. 174. Jilson P. Harrington v. Esther R. Meyer, widow, etc. In error to the Supreme Court of the State of Louisiana. Clifford, J., delivered the opinion, affirming the judgment of the Supreme Court, With costs.

No. 653. M. V. Cochrane et al., v. H. A. Clarke, et al. Appeal from the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia. Waite, C. J., announced the decision of the court, dismissing the appeal with costs.

No. 693. Daniel Hand v. Thomas C. Dunn, Comptroller-General of the State of South Carolina. Waite, C. J., announced the decision, denying the motion to advance this cause.

No. 738. Erasmus D. Force v. Wm A. McVeigh. Waite, C. J., announced the decision of the court, denying the motion to dismiss this cause.

Waite, C. J., announced to the bar that no case will be called for argument after April 28th, and the court will adjourn for the term on Monday, the 8th day of May.

No. 806. Henry Gantz and A. R. Appleman v. James Kennedy. On motion of M. Blair, for plaintiffs, dismissed with costs.

Adjourned until Tuesday at 12 o'clock.

Tuesday, April 11.

On motion of Assistant Attorney-General Smith, Daniel C. Linscott, of Boston, Mass., was admitted.

On motion of Matt H. Carpenter, George W. Park, of Boston, Mass., was admitted.

On motion of A. J. Vanderpoel, Granville P. Hawes and Michael H. Cardozo, of New York, were admitted.

No. 952. The Ebenezer Orphan Institute Jesse Yount et al. Appeal from the Circuit of the Evangelical Association v. Court of the United States for the Southern District of Illinois. On motion of Matt H. Carpenter docketed and dismissed, with co ts.

No. 198. Gaino Whitfield v. the United States. The argument of this cause was continued by Solicitor-General Phillips for appellee, and concluded by P. Phillips for appellant.

No. 205. N. H. Hammond et al., v. the Mason and Hamlin Organ Company. Passed.

No. 206. The brig Belle, etc., v. The Pacific Mail Insurance Company. Dismissed with costs.

No. 207. Hiram Barney, collector, etc., plaintiff in error, v. William Watson et al. This cause was argued by Assistant Attorney-General Smith, for the plaintiff in error, and by J. H. Ashton for defendants.

No. 208. James O'Brien v. George M. Weld et al. This cause was argued by A. J. Vanderpoel for plaintiff, and by Mr. Granville P. Hawes for the defendants in error.

Adjourned until Wednesday at 12 o'clock.

SUPREME COURT OF TENNESSEE.

[Head Notes from the Commercial and Legal Reporter.]

James Stevenson, alias Childers, v. The State.

CRIMINAL LAW.—BURGLARY. — INDICTMENT.—The Legislature did not, by the act of 1875, making a petit larceny a misdemeanor, contemplate a change of the law of burglary; and an indictment charging the breaking, etc., with intent to commit a felony, to-wit, larceny, is Held sufficient.

———. ———. TWO COUNTS.—The defendant, without demurring or moving to quash, having been convicted only on the first count, cannot object that the indictment contained another count for a misdemeanor upon which he has been acquitted.

———. ———. DATE.—The indictment charging the offence to have been committed previous to the finding of the indictment, but by mistake of the draftsman charging an impossible date, the date may be rejected. The indictment is good.

Charles Goaler v. The State.

CRIMINAL LAW.— EVIDENCE.—Where the court, to show the animus of the prisoner, and to illustrate the merits of the plea of self-defense, admitted proof of an old feud, and the frequent and deadly threats of the prisoner to take the life of the deceased, Held, this was not error.

———. ———. CHARGE.—The prisoner being on trial for murder in the second degree, it was not error for the court to charge the jury as to every grade of homicide. It is perhaps safe to enlighten the jury as to all other grades of homicide, that they may the better comprehend the precise crime with which the prisoner is charged, provided it be accompanied with an admonition that he cannot be convicted of any higher grade than that upon which he is arraigned.

Imperial Fire Insurance Co. v. James R. Van.

APPEAL.—BOND.—A contract of fire insurance, in the ordinary form, and without a seal, not being a contract by the company to pay a fixed and definite amount of money, but to pay the actual estimated value of the property destroyed or injured, is not one of the instruments described in section 3162 of the Code, and an appeal by the company upon a bond for costs and damages was properly granted.

THE POWER OF MAYORS UNDER THE MAYOR'S ACT OF 1875.

We take the following report of the decision of Judge Cochrane, of the Peoria Circuit Court, construing what is known as the Mayor's bill, and defining the powers of mayors under it, from the Peoria Transcript:

The court has hitherto refrained from an exercise of curiosity in regard to the questions involved in the decision of this case, and from reading any comments upon the question in the public press. I differ from the views of counsel on both sides in some respects.

In the view I take of the law of 1875, known as the "Mayor's Bill," the first part of section one provides that the mayors of all cities in this State shall have power to appoint all officers whose election by the qualified voters is not provided for by law.

Next, I find that this law gives the mayor power to remove from such offices all persons filling them.

It is claimed by counsel for the relator that the mayor has only power to remove the officers whom he has appointed, and this is the construction placed by the relator's counsel upon this language in the "Mayor's Act:" "And the mayor shall also have power to remove any officer so appointed, whenever, in his opinion, the interests of the city require such removal, etc."

I think that the act itself simply means that during the year the mayor has a right to say that any appointee, for reasons which the interests of the city requires, shall no longer act as city attorney, asking the city council to approve his action, and, unless by a two-thirds majority, of course the former officer is not restored to office.

The statute itself gives the mayor the right to say who, during the interregnum, in order that the office may not be vacant, shall be the proper officer. "The mayor may appoint any suitable person to discharge the duties of the office, from which he shall have removed any officer, until his successor is appointed and qualified, or such officer restored to office in the manner aforesaid." That is, in order that the office may not be vacant, the mayor has the right to say that some suitable person shall exercise the duties of the office.

Now, the case presented by this information, with the pleas here, is not such a case as is contemplated strictly by the statute; it is simply whether the term of office of Mr. Kettelle, as city attorney, has expired by law.

The mayor comes into office, and whatever may be his reasons, I don't know—it is not set out, nor is it necessary that these pleas should set out, the reasons in the mind of the mayor for wanting Mr. Kettelle out of office, for that is a matter for the city council to act upon—but the term of office having expired by limit of law, the mayor has the right to say his office has expired, and the right to suggest the name of his appointee to the city council, and if the city council has refused to approve his appointment, the mayor has the undoubted right to recognize the office as vacant for the time being, otherwise Mr. Kettelle for instance, (I only use the name as an illustration), might remain in the office fifteen or twenty years, while the law provides that his term of office shall expire at the end of one year, unless he is re-appointed and gives new bonds; and it don't lie in the power of the city council, by a majority vote, or otherwise, to keep any person in an office in that way.

Waiving these constitutional questions I think they have been substantially passed upon by the Supreme court.

It may be, if the case is carried up and the Supreme court has its attention called to the particular provision of this act, it might review its decision in the matter, and pronounce this act of 1875 unconstitutional.

Now, all that is claimed by these pleas is, that the defendant in this matter, is simply acting as an appointee of the mayor for the time being, until a suitable appointment can be made and approved by the city council.

I think that the pleas are good in substance, while there may be more in them than is necessary; so the demurrer will be overruled.

SOME eight years ago a citizen of Massachussetts was put in prison to serve out a life sentence for arson. By the confession of a perjured witness his complete innocence was proven, and he was lately pardoned. Note the word, pardoned! Having lost eight years of his life, he petitioned the state for an allowance for time wasted. The committee on claims hold that he is to blame for not showing that he was innocent, and have decided that he cannot recover. What a reversal of the principles of law which deem a man innocent until he is proved guilty! The worst of it is the state cannot be sued, and there is no chance for the innocent criminal, unless the legislature chooses to reopen the matter. What a chance for a Charles Reade or an Edward Jenkins; if we only had one or both to scarify this old commonwealth, which is becoming so economical that it shrinks at no meanness. —Arcadian.

WHAT IS A PINT?—A recent report issued by the Government official whose duty it is to gauge and certify to the correctness of measures shows that a doubtful quantity is still preferred to a fixed one for the bottle known as a "pint." Why this should be so we (Medical Examiner) do not profess to understand, nor do we see the justice of allowing the seller of champagne and the vendor of sauce to make rather less than twelve ounces go to a pint, while the dispenser of medicine must give the full twenty ounces. We all have learned the old standard liquid measure, which says, "twenty ounces make one pint," and should be glad to know the real views of our learned confrere, Dr. Latham, who, in his latest edition of "Johnson's Dictionary," gives as the only definition of a pint, "Half a quart (in medicine twelve ounces liquid measure)."—Public Opinion.

The Legal Gazette says:

John D. Lewis, Esq., a colored citizen, a member of the Supreme Court of Massachusetts, and of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, has at last been admitted as a member of the several Courts of Common Pleas and the Orphans' Court of Philadelphia county. Some doubt was expressed by the judges as to whether the production of a certificate of admission to the bar of the Supreme Court of this State would entitle the holder to admission to their respective courts under the rules adopted for the admission of attorneys by the Courts of Common Pleas, Nos. 1, 2 and 4.

An exchange says:

"George Beedle shot at Sheriff Newton, in Afton, N. Y., the other day, but a law book in the sheriff's hands stopped the bullet after it had gone through fifty leaves. Law books are good for something after all."

THE ADJOURNMENT OF THE U. S. SUPREME COURT.—No case will be called for argument in the Supreme Court of the United States, this term, after April 28th, and the court will adjourn for the term, on Monday the 8th of May, as announced in the proceedings of that tribunal, published elsewhere in this issue.

HIGH ON RECEIVERS.—The Southern Law Review closes its review of "High on Receivers" by saying: "The typography of the book is most excellent; clear, handsome, and severely plain, it is all the most fastidious could desire. the dress of the book is the work of the CHICAGO LEGAL NEWS COMPANY, upon whose good taste and enterprise it reflects high credit. To both printer and publisher the profession are in this instance under special obligations." In behalf of the enterprising publishers, Messrs. Callaghan & Company, we thank our cotemporary for its deserved compliment; but for ourselves, we shall rejoice if our "works praise us."

UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT.

Nos. 880 and 633.—OCTOBER TERM, 1875.

No. 880.—JOHN HENDERSON and THOMAS HENDERSON, Appellants, v. WILLIAM H. WICKMAN, Mayor of the City of New York, and the COMMISSIONERS OF EMIGRATION.

Appeal from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York.

AND

No. 633.—THE COMMISSIONERS OF IMMIGRATION, Appellants, v. THE NORTH GERMAN LLOYD.

Appeal from the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Louisiana.

TAX ON SHIP-OWNER FOR RIGHT TO LAND PASSENGERS—REGULATION OF COMMERCE—STATUTES OF NEW YORK AND LOUISIANA UNCONSTITUTIONAL AND VOID.

1. The case of the City of New York v. Miln, 11 Peters, 103, decided no more than that the requirement from the master of a vessel of a catalogue of his passengers landed in the city, rendered to the mayor on oath, with a correct description of their names, ages, occupations, places of birth, and of last legal settlement, was a police regulation within the power of the State to enact, and not inconsistent with the Constitution of the United States.

2. The result of the Passenger Cases, 7 How., 283, was to hold that a tax demanded of the master or owner of the vessel for every such passenger, was a regulation of commerce by the State, in conflict with the Constitution and laws of the United States, and, therefore, void.

3. These cases criticised, and the weight due to them as authority considered.

4. In whatever language a statute may be framed, its purpose and its constitutional validity must be determined by its natural and reasonable effect.

5. Hence, a statute which imposes a burdensome and almost impossible condition on the ship-master as a pre-requisite to his landing his passengers, with an alternative payment of a small sum of money for each one of them is, in fact, a tax on the ship-owner for the right to land such passengers, and in effect, on the passenger himself, since the ship-master makes him pay it in advance as part of his fare.

6. Such a statute of a State is a regulation of commerce, and when applied to passengers from foreign countries is a regulation of commerce with foreign nations.

7. It is no answer to the charge that such regulation of commerce by a State is forbidden by the Constitution, to say that it falls within the police power of the States, for to whatever class of legislative powers it may belong, it is prohibited to the States if granted exclusively to Congress by that instrument.

8. Though it be conceded that there is a class of legislation which may affect commerce, both with foreign nations and between the States, in regard to which the laws of the States may be valid in the absence of action under the authority of Congress on the same subjects, this can have no reference to matters which are, in their nature, national, or which admit of a uniform system or plan of regulation.

9. The statutes of New York and Louisiana, here under consideration, are intended to regulate commercial matters which are not only of national but of international concern, and which are also best regulated by one uniform rule, applicable alike to all the seaports of the United States. These statutes are, therefore, void, because legislation on the subjects which they cover is confided exclusively to Congress by the clause of the Constitution which gives to that body the "right to regulate commerce with foreign nations."

10. The constitutional objection to this tax on the passenger is not removed because the penalty for failure to pay does not accrue until twenty-four hours after he is landed. The penalty is incurred by the act of landing him without payment, and is, in fact, for the act of bringing him into the State.

11. This court does not, in this case, undertake to decide whether or not a State may, in the absence of all legislation by Congress on the same subject, pass a statute strictly limited to defending itself against paupers, convicted criminals, and others of that class, but is of opinion that to Congress rightfully and appropriately belongs the power of legislating on the whole subject.

Mr. Justice MILLER delivered the opinion of the court.

In the case of the City of New York v. Miln, reported 11 Peters, 103, the question of the constitutionality of a statute of the State, concerning passengers in vessels, coming to the port of New York, was considered by this court. It was an act passed February 11, 1824, consisting of several sections. The first section—the only one passed upon by the court—required the master of every ship or vessel arriving in the port of New York from any country out of the United States, or from any other State of the United States, to make report in writing, and on oath, within twenty-four hours after his arrival, to the mayor of the city, of the name, place of birth, last legal settlement, age, and occupation of every person brought as a passenger from any country out of the United States, or from any of the United States, into the port of New York, or into any of the United States, and of all persons landed from the ship or put on board, or suffered to go on board any other vessel during the voyage, with intent of proceeding to the city of New York. A penalty was prescribed of seventy-five dollars for each passenger not so reported, and for every person whose name, place of birth, last legal settlement, age, and occupation should be falsely reported.

The other sections required him to give bond on the demand of the mayor, to save harmless the city from all expense of support and maintenance of such passenger, or to return any passenger deemed liable to become a charge, to his last place of settlement, and required each passenger, not a citizen of the United States, to make report of himself to the mayor, stating his age, occupation, the name of the vessel in which he arrived, the place where he landed, and name of the commander of the vessel. We gather from the report of the case that the defendant, Miln, was sued for the penalties claimed for refusing to make the report required in the first section. A division of opinion was certified by the judges of the Circuit court on the question whether the act assumes to regulate commerce between the port of New York and foreign ports, and is unconstitutional and void.

This court, expressly limiting its decision to the first section of the act, held that it fell within the police powers of the States, and was not in conflict with the federal Constitution.

From this decision Mr. Justice Story dissented, and in his opinion stated that Chief Justice Marshall, who had died between the first and second arguments of the case, fully concurred with him in the view that the statute of New York was void, because it was a regulation of commerce forbidden to the States.

In the Passenger Cases, reported in 7 Howard, 283, the branch of the statute not passed upon in the preceding case came under consideration in this court. It was not the same statute, but was a law relating to the marine hospital on Staten Island. It authorized the health commissioner to demand, and if not paid to sue for and recover, from the master of every vessel arriving in the port of New York from a foreign port, one dollar and fifty cents for each cabin passenger, and one dollar for each steerage passenger, mate, sailor, or mariner, and from the master of each coasting vessel twenty-five cents for each person on board. These moneys were to be appropriated to the use of the hospital.

The defendant, Smith, who was sued for the sum of $295 for refusing to pay for 295 steerage passengers on board the British ship Henry Bliss, of which he was master, demurred to the declaration on the ground that the act was contrary to the Constitution of the United States and void. From a judgment against him, affirmed in the Court of Errors of the State of New York, he sued out a writ of error, on which the question was brought to this court.

It was here held, at the January term, 1849, that the statute was "repugnant to the Constitution and laws of the United States, and, therefore, void." — (7 Howard, 572.)

Immediately after this decision, the State of New York modified her statute on that subject, with a view, no doubt, to avoid the constitutional objection, and amendments and alterations have continued to be made up to the present time.

As the law now stands the master or owner of every vessel landing passengers from a foreign port, is bound to make a report similar to the one recited in the statute held to be valid in the case of New York v. Miln, and on this report the mayor is to endorse a demand upon the master or owner that he give a bond for every passenger landed in the city in the penal sum of $300, conditioned to indemnify the commissioners of emigration, and every county, city, and town in the State, against any expense for the relief or support of the person named in the bond, for four years thereafter. But the owner or consignee may commute for such bond, and be released from giving it, by paying, within twenty-four hours after the landing of the passengers, the sum of one dollar and fifty cents for each one of them. If neither the bond be given nor the sum paid within the twenty-four hours, a penalty of $500 is incurred, which is made a lien on the vessel, collectible by attachment at the suit of the commissioner of emigration.

Conceding the authority of the Passenger Cases, which will be more fully considered hereafter, it is argued that the change in the statute now relied upon, requiring primarily a bond for each passenger landed, as an indemnity against his becoming a future charge to the State or county; leaving it optional with the ship-owner to avoid this by paying a fixed sum for each passenger, takes it out of the principle of the case of Smith v. Turner—the Passenger Case from New York. It is said that the statute in that case was a direct tax on the passenger, since the act authorized the ship-master to collect it of him; and that on that ground alone was it held void; while in the present case, the requirement of the bond is but a suitable regulation, under the power of the State to protect its cities and towns from the expense of supporting persons who are paupers or diseased, or helpless women and children, coming from foreign countries.

In whatever language a statute may be framed, its purpose must be determined by its natural and reasonable effect; and if it is apparent that the object of this statute, as judged by that criterion, is to compel the owners of vessels to pay a sum of money for every passenger brought by them from a foreign shore, and landed at the port of New York, it is as much a tax on passengers if collected from them, or a tax on the vessel or owners for the exercise of the right of landing their passengers in that city, as was the statute held void in the Passenger Cases.

To require a heavy and almost impossible condition to the exercise of this right, with the alternative of the payment of a small sum of money, is in effect to demand payment of that sum. To suppose that a vessel which once a month lands from 300 to 1,000 passengers, or from 3,000 to 12,000 per annum, will give that many bonds of $300 with good sureties, with a covenant for four years against accident, disease, or poverty of the passenger named in such bond, is absurd, when this can be avoided by the payment of $1.50, collected of the passenger before he embarks on the vessel.

Such bonds would amount in many instances for every voyage to more than the value of the vessel. The liability on the bond would be, through a long lapse of time, contingent on circumstances which the bondsman could neither foresee nor control. The cost of preparing the bond and approving sureties, with the trouble incident to it in each case, is greater than the sum required to be paid as commutation. It is inevitable, under such a law, that the money would be paid for each passenger, or the statute resisted or evaded. It is a law in its purpose and effect imposing a tax on the owner of the vessel for the privilege of landing in New York passengers transported from foreign countries.

It is said that the purpose of the act is to protect the State against the consequences of the flood of pauperism immigrating from Europe and first landing in that city.

But it is a strange mode of doing this to tax every passenger alike who comes from abroad.

The man who brings with him important additions to the wealth of the country, who is perfectly free from disease, and the man who brings to aid the industry of the country a stout heart and a strong arm, is as much the subject of the tax as the diseased pauper who may become the object of the charity of the city in a week after he lands from the vessel.

No just rule can make the citizen of France landing from an English vessel on our shore, liable for the support of an English or Irish pauper who lands at the same time from the same vessel.

So far as the authority of the cases of New York v. Miln and the Passenger Cases can be received as conclusive, they decide that the requirement of a catalogue of passengers, with statements of their last residence, and other matters of that character, is a proper exercise of State authority, and that the requirement of the bond, or the alternative payment of money for each passenger, is void, because forbidden by the Constitution and laws of the United States. But the Passenger Cases (so called because a similar statute of the State of Massachusetts was the subject of consideration at the same term with that of New York) were decided by a bare majority of the court. Justices McLean, Wayne, Catron, McKinley, and Grier held both statutes void; while Chief Justice Taney and Justices Daniel, Nelson, and Woodbury held them valid. Each member of the court delivered a separate opinion, giving the reasons for his judgment, except Judge Nelson, none of them professing to be the authoritative opinion of the court. Nor is there to be found in the reasons given by the judges who constituted the majority, such harmony of views as would give that weight to the decision which it lacks by reason of the divided judgments of the members of the court. Under these circumstances, with three cases before us arising under statutes of three different States on the same subject, which have been discussed as though open in this court to all considerations bearing upon the question, we approach it with the hope of attaining a unanimity not found in the opinions of our predecessors.

As already indicated, the provisions of the Constitution of the United States on which the principal reliance is placed to make void the statute of New York, is that which gives to congress the power "to regulate commerce with foreign nations." As was said in United States v. Holliday, 3 Wall., 417, "commerce with foreign nations means commerce between citizens of The United States and citizens or subjects of foreign governments." It means trade and it means intercourse. It means commercial intercourse between nations and parts of nations in all its branches. It includes navigation, as the principal means by which foreign intercourse is effected. To regulate this trade and intercourse is to prescribe the rules by which it shall be conducted. "The mind," says the great Chief Justice, "can scarcely conceive a system for regulating commerce between nations which shall exclude all laws concerning navigation, which shall be silent on the admission of the vessels of one nation into the ports of another," and he might have added with equal force, which prescribed no terms for the admission of their cargo or their passengers.—(Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheaton. 190.)

Since the delivery of the opinion in that case, which has become the accepted canon of construction of this clause of the Constitution, as far as it extends, the transportation of passengers from European ports to those of the United States has attained a magnitude and importance far beyond its proportions at that time to other branches of commerce. It has become a part of our commerce with foreign nations of vast interest to this country as well as to the immigrants who come among us to find a welcome and a home within our borders. In addition to the wealth which some of them bring, they bring still more largely the labor, which we need to till our soil, build our railroads, and develop the latent resources of the country in its minerals, its manufacturers, and its agriculture. Is the regulation of this great system a regulation of commerce? Can it be doubted that a law which prescribes the terms on which vessels shall engage in it is a law regulating this branch of commerce?

The transportation of a passenger from Liverpool to the city of New York is one voyage. It is not completed until the passenger is disembarked at the pier in the latter city. A law or a rule emanating from any lawful authority, which prescribes terms or conditions on which alone the vessel can discharge its passengers, is a regulation of commerce, and in case of vessels and passengers coming from foreign ports, is a regulation of commerce with foreign nations.

The accuracy of these definitions is scarcely denied by the advocates of the State statutes. But assuming that in the formation of our government certain powers necessary to the administration of their internal affairs are reserved to the States, and that among these powers are those for the preservation of good order by punishment of crime, of the health and comfort of the citizens, and their protection against pauperism, and against contagious and infectious diseases, and other matters of legislation of like character, they insist that the power here exercised falls within this class and belongs rightfully to the States.

This power, frequently referred to in the decisions of this court, has been in general terms somewhat loosely called the police power. It is not necessary for the course of this discussion to attempt to define it more accurately than it has been defined already. It is not necessary, because whatever may be the nature and extent of that power, where not otherwise restricted, no definition of it, and no urgency for its use, can authorize a State to exercise it in regard to a subject-matter which has been confided exclusively to the discretion of Congress by the constitution.

Nothing is gained in the argument by calling it the police power. Very many statutes, when the authority on which their enactments rest is examined, may be referred to different sources of power, and supported equally well under any of them. A statute may at the same time be an exercise of the taxing power and of the power of eminent domain. A statute punishing counterfeiting may be for the protection of the private citizen against fraud, and a measure for the protection of the currency, and the safety of the government which issues it. It must occur very often that the shading which marks the line between one class of legislation and another is very nice, and not easily distinguishable.

But however difficult this may be, it is clear from the nature of our complex form of government that whenever the statute of a State invades the domain of legislation which belongs exclusively to the Congress of the United States, it is void, no difference under what class of powers it may fall, or how closely allied to powers conceded to belong to the States.

"It has been contended," says C. J. Marshall, "that if a law passed by a State, in the exercise of its acknowledged sovereignty, comes into conflict with a law passed by Congress in pursuance of the constitution, they affect the subject and each other like equal opposing powers. But the framers of our constitution foresaw this state of things, and provided for it by declaring the supremacy not only of itself, but of the laws made in pursuance thereof. The nullity of any act inconsistent with the constitution is produced by the declaration that the constitution is supreme." And where the federal government has acted, he says: "In every such case the act of Congress or the treaty is supreme; and the laws of the State, though enacted in the exercise of powers not controverted, must yield to it."—(9 Wheaton, 210.)

It is said, however, that under the decisions of this court, there is a kind of neutral ground, especially in that covered by the regulation of commerce, which may be occupied by the State, and its legislation be valid so long as it interferes with no act of Congress or treaty of the United States. Such a proposition is supported by the opinions of several of the judges in the Passenger Cases, by the decisions of this court in Cooly v. The Board of Wardens, 12 How., 299, and by the case of Crandall v. Nevada, 6 Wall., 35, and Gilman v. Philadelphia, 3 Wall., 713. But this doctrine has always been controverted in this court, and has seldom, if ever, been stated without dissent. These decisions, however, all agree that under the commerce clause of the constitution, or within its compass, there are powers which, from their nature, are exclusive in Congress; and in the case of Cooly v. The Board of Wardens, it was said that, "whatever subjects of this power are in their nature national, or admit of one uniform system or plan of regulation, may justly be said to be of such a nature as to require exclusive legislation by Congress." A regulation which imposes onerous, perhaps impossible conditions, on those engaged in active commerce with foreign nations, must of necessity be national in its character. It is more than this, for it may properly be called international. It belongs to that class of laws which concern the exterior relation of this whole nation with other nations and governments. If our government should make the restrictions of these burdens on commerce the subject of a treaty, there could be no doubt that such a treaty would fall within the power conferred on the President and Senate by the constitution. It is, in fact, in an eminent degree a subject which concerns our international relations, in regard to which foreign nations ought to be considered and their rights respected whether the rule be established by treaty or by legislation.

It is equally clear that the matter of these statutes may be, and ought to be, the subject of a uniform system or plan. The laws which govern the right to land passengers in the United States from other countries, ought to be the same in New York, Boston, New Orleans, and San Francisco. A striking evidence of the truth of this proposition is to be found in the similarity, almost identity, of the statutes of New York, of Louisiana, and California, now before us for consideration in these three cases.

It is apparent, therefore, that if there be a class of laws which may be valid when passed by the States, until the same ground is occupied by a treaty or an act of Congress, this statute is not of that class.

The argument has been pressed with some earnestness, that inasmuch as this statute does not come into operation until twenty-four hours after the passenger has landed, and has mingled with or has the right to mingle with the mass of the population, he is withdrawn from the influence of any laws which Congress might pass on the subject, and remitted to the laws of the State as its own citizens are. It might be a sufficient answer to say that this is a mere evasion of the protection which the foreigner has a right to expect from the federal government when he lands here a stranger, owing allegiance to another government, and looking to it for such protection as grows out of his relation to that government.

But the branch of the statute which we are considering is directed to and operates directly on the ship-owner. It holds him responsible for what he has done before the twenty-four hours commences. He is to give the bond or pay the money, because he has landed the passenger, and he is given twenty-four hours' time to do this before the penalty attaches. When he is sued for this penalty, it is not because the man has been here twenty-four hours, but because he brought him here and failed to give the bond or pay $1.50.

The effective operation of this law commences at the other end of the voyage. The master requires of the passenger, before he is admitted on board, as a part of the passage money, the sum which he knows he must pay for the privilege of landing him in New York. It is, as we have already said in effect, a tax on the passenger, which he pays for the right to make the voyage, a voyage only completed when he lands on the American shore. The case does not even require us to consider at what period after his arrival the passenger himself passes from the sole protection of the Constitution, laws, and treaties of the United States, and becomes subject to such laws as the State may rightfully pass, as was the case in regard to importations of merchandise in Brown v. Maryland, 12 Wheaton, 417, and in The License Cases, 5 How., 504.

It is too clear for argument that this demand of the owner of the vessel for a bond or money on account of every passenger landed by him from a foreign shore is, if valid, an obligation which he incurs by bringing the passenger here, and which is perfect the moment he leaves the vessel.

We are of opinion that this whole subject has been confided to Congress by the Constitution. That Congress can more appropriately and with more acceptance exercise it than any other body known to our law, State or national. That by providing a system of laws in these matters, applicable to all ports and to all vessels, a serious question, which has long been matter of contest and complaint, may be effectually and satisfactorily settled.

Whether, in the absence of such action, the States can, or how far they can, by appropriate legislation protect themselves against actual paupers, vagrants, criminals, and diseased persons arriving in their territory from foreign countries, we do not decide. The portions of the New York statute which concern persons who, on inspection, are found to belong to these classes, are not properly before us, because the relief sought is to the part of the statute applicable to all passengers alike, and is the only relief which can be given in this bill.

The decree of the Circuit court of New York, in the case of John and Thomas Henderson v. The Mayor of New York and the Commissioners of Emigration, is reversed, and the case remanded, with direction to enter a decree for an injunction, in accordance with this opinion.

The statute of Louisiana, which is involved in the case of The Commissioners of Immigration v. The North German Lloyd, is so very similar to, if not an exact copy of, that of New York as to need no separate consideration. In this case the relief sought was against exacting the bonds or paying the commutation money as to all passengers, which relief the Circuit court granted by an appropriate injunction, and the decree in that case is accordingly affirmed.

UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT.

No. 154—OCTOBER TERM, 1875.

THE REPUBLICAN RIVER BRIDGE COMPANY, Plaintiff in Error, v. THE KANSAS PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY.

In Error to the Supreme Court of the State of Kansas.

WHAT CAN BE RE-EXAMINED IN SUPREME COURT—LAND GRANT CONSTRUED.

1. WHAT CAN BE RE-EXAMINED.—That where a right is set up under an act of Congress, in a State court, any matter of law found in the record, decided by the highest court of the State, bearing on the right so set up under the act of Congress, can be re-examined in the Supreme Court.

2. MAY REVIEW ON BOTH THE LAW AND FACT.—That in chancery cases, or in any class of cases where all the evidence becomes a part of the record in the highest court of the State, the same record being brought into the Supreme Court of the United States, it can review the decision of the State court, both on the law and the fact, so far as may be necessary to determine the validity of the right set up under the act of Congress; but in cases where the facts are submitted to a jury, and are passed upon by the verdict in common law action, the Supreme Court has the same inability to review those facts, in a case coming from a State court, that it has in a case coming from a Circuit Court of the United States.

3. LAND GRANTS CONSTRUED.—The court construes the grant under which the defendant claims the land, and the grant under which the plaintiff also claims the land.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

MILLER, J.

This is a writ of error to the Supreme Court of the State of Kansas. The contest in the State court concerned the title to real estate, both parties claiming under grants from Congress made at different times. In the District Court for the County of Shawnee, where the suit was originally brought, the parties submitted the case to the court without the intervention of a jury, and that court found a series of facts, fourteen in number, on which it declared the law to be for the defendant. This judgment was affirmed on error in the Supreme court of the State, which decision the present writ of error brings before us.

The finding by the District court was received by the Supreme court of the State as conclusive as to all facts in issue, and it is equally conclusive upon us. Where a right is set up under an act of Congress in a State court, any matter of law found in the record, decided by the highest court of the State, bearing on the right so set up under the act of Congress, can be re-examined here.

In chancery cases, or in any other class of cases where all the evidence becomes part of the record in the highest court of the State, the same record being brought here, this court can review the decision of that court on both the law and the fact, so far as may be necessary to determine the validity of the right set up under the act of Congress. But in cases where the facts are submitted to a jury and are passed upon by the verdict, in a common-law action, this court has the same inability to review those facts in a case coming from a State court, that it has in a case coming from the Circuit court of the United States.

This conclusiveness of the facts found, extends to the finding by a State court, to whom they have been submitted by waiving a jury, or to a referee, where they are so held by State laws, as well as to the verdict of a jury.—(Boggs v. The Merced Mining Co., 3 Wall.,—; Crary v. Devlin, of this term.)

Two propositions of law ruled by the State court were excepted to by plaintiff, the first of which gives construction to the grant under which defendant claims the land, and the other to the grant under which the plaintiff claims. The first is in the following language:

"That the joint resolution passed by Congress, approved July 26, 1866, was and must be construed as a grant by Congress to the defendant of the land in controversy, and that upon the issuance of the executive order of the President, dated July 19th, 1867, the legal title to said land vested in defendant, and relates back to the date of the passage of said joint resolution of July 26, 1866."

The joint resolution here referred to is as follows:

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, subject to approval by the President, the right of way one hundred feet in width is hereby granted to the Union Pacific Railroad Company, and the companies constructing the branch roads connecting therewith, for the construction and operation of their roads over and upon all military reserves through which the same may pass; and the President is hereby authorized to set apart to the Union Pacific Railroad Company, eastern division, twenty acres of the Fort Riley military reservation for depot and other purposes in the bottom opposite 'Riley City.' Also fractional section 'one,' on the west side of said reservation, near Junction City, for the same purposes; and also to restore from time to time, to the public domain any portion of said military reserve over which the Union Pacific Railroad or any of its branches may pass, and which shall not be required for military purposes; provided, that the President shall not permit the location of any such railroad or the diminution of any such reserve in any manner so as to impair its usefulness for military purposes, so long as it shall be required therefor."

On the 19th day of July, 1867, the President, by a public proclamation, declared that by virtue of said resolution there is set apart to the Union Pacific Railroad Company, eastern division, (which was then the corporate name of the defendant), the twenty acres of the Fort Riley military reservation, and fractional section one, on west side of said reservation near Junction City, for a depot and other purposes, as designated on a map or survey accompanying the letter from the Secretary of the Interior, of February 15, 1867.

The first objection made here to the conclusion of law by the court, that the resolution and proclamation confer title to the land in controversy is, that the land of which defendant is in possession as fractional section one, is a part of the reservation, whereas the true construction of the joint resolution is, that it has reference to a fractional section one lying outside of the reservation and adjoining it on the west side.

No plat or survey, official or otherwise, accompanies this record to enable us to understand or decide this question in a satisfactory manner. Nor is this map or letter of the secretary in evidence. The circuit judge, among his findings of fact, states distinctly that the fractional section one referred to in the joint resolution, is inside of the reservation, and is the piece of land now in possession of the defendant, and claimed by plaintiff in this action. So far as the correctness of this finding depends, as it must largely depend, on surveys not produced to us, it is not open here to inquiry. And as it must from its very nature be a mixed question of law and fact, which would be concluded by the verdict of a jury, it must be equally conclusive here.

The law question being the construction of the words of the grant, and the fact being the manner in which the existing government surveys were made and numbered in reference to the fractional parts of section one.

Looking, however, to the manifest purpose of the joint resolution to make a grant of part of the military reservation, to the fact that neither the grant of the twenty acres, confessedly to be a part of that tract, nor of the fractional section one, were to be consummated until the President had determined that both could be given up without impairing the usefulness of the reservation for military purposes, we are of opinion that fractional section one on the west side of said reservation, meant such a section to be found in the reservation on its west side.

The next objection is that the grant does not purport to carry the fee, and as it was only a use or equitable right, Congress had the power to grant the fee as it did by the joint resolution of March 2, 1867, to plaintiff.

It is certainly true that the joint resolution of March 2 covers geographically the land in controversy, and so does the patent issued under it to plaintiff; and Frisbie v. Whitney, 9 Wall., 187, and the Yosemite Valley case, 15 Id., 77, are relied on to show that Congress could grant the land to other parties while the title of defendant was thus inchoate.

But there are two answers to this: 1st. The title of the defendant, whatever it was, became absolute on the issuing of the President's proclamation, and had relation back to the date of the joint resolution under which it was made. It is, therefore, whatever its nature, an older title than that of plaintiff. It is not necessary here to decide whether it is a grant of the legal title, or only the grant of a use or easement; for in either case it entitles the defendant to the possession, of which it cannot be deprived by an action of ejectment. 2. The joint resolution under which plaintiff claims, contains a proviso, that nothing therein contained, shall be construed to interfere with any grant of any part of said land heretofore made by the United States. As no other grant has been shown of any part of this land, except the one under which the defendant claims, this proviso was no doubt intended to exempt it from plaintiff's grant; and if there had been half a dozen other previous grants, it would have excepted them all as well as this, from the operation of the joint resolution in which it is found.

In the first conclusion of law, finding the title under the joint resolution of 1866 and the proclamation of the President, to be in defendant, we find no error.

The other proposition to which plaintiff excepted, declares that plaintiff had title to all the land covered by the joint resolution of March 2, 1867, and by the patent, except that claimed by defendant under the joint resolution of July 26, 1866.

As this conclusion follows necessarily from what we have already said, it is unnecessary to notice it further.

The judgment of the Supreme Court of Kansas is accordingly affirmed.

UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT.

No. 478.—OCTOBER TERM, 1875.

CHY LUNG, Plaintiff in Error, v. J. H. FREEMAN, R. K. PIOTROWSKI, Commissioner of Immigration, and WITLIAM MCKIBBEN, Sheriff of the City and County of San Francisco, California.

In Error to the Supreme Court of the State of California.

THE CALIFORNIA STATUTE RELATING TO THE LANDING OF PASSENGERS, UNCONSTITUTIONAL.

1. The statute of California, which is the subject of consideration in this case, does not require a bond for every passenger, or commutation in money, as the statutes of New York and Louisiana do, but only for certain enumerated classes among which are "lewd and debauched women.'
2. But the features of the statute are such as to show very clearly that the purpose is to extort money from a large class of passengers, or to prevent their immigration to California altogether.
3. The statute also operates directlv on the passenger, for, unless the master or owner of the vessel gives an onerous bond for the future protection of the State against the support of the passenger, or pays such sum as the commissioner of immigration chooses to exact, he is not permitted to land from the vessel.
4. The powers which the commissioner is authorized to exercise under this statute, are such as to bring the United States into conflict with foreign nations, and which can only belong to the Federal government.
5. If the right of the States to pass statutes to protect themselves in regard to the criminal, the pauper, and the diseased foreigner landing within their borders, exists at all, it is limited to such laws as are absolutely necessary for that purpose, and this mere police regulation cannot extend so far as to prevent or obstruct other classes of persons from the right to hold personal and commercial intercourse with the people of the United States.
6. The statute of California, in this respect, extends far beyond the necessity in which the right is founded, if it exists at all, and invades the right of Congress to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and is, therefore, void.

MILLER, J.

While this case presents for our consideration the same class of State statutes considered in the cases just disposed of, it differs from them in two very important points.

These are, first: The plaintiff in error was a passenger on a vessel from China, being a subject of the Emperor of China, and is held a prisoner because the owner or master of the vessel who brought her over refused to give a bond in the sum of five hundred dollars in gold, conditioned to indemnify all the counties, towns, and cities of California against liability for her support or maintenance for two years.

Secondly, the statute of California, unlike those of New York and Louisiana, does not require a bond for all passengers landing from a foreign country, but only for classes of passengers specifically described, among which are "lewd and debauched women," to which class it is alleged, plaintiff belongs.

The plaintiff, with some twenty other women, on the arrival of the steamer Japan from China, was singled out by the commissioner of immigration, an officer of the State of California, as belonging to that class, and the master of the vessel required to give the bond prescribed by law, before he permitted them to land. This he refused to do, and detained them on board. They sued out a writ of habeas corpus, which, by regular proceedings resulted in their committal, by order of the Supreme Court of the State, to the custody of the sheriff of the county and city of San Francisco, to await the return of the Japan, which had left the port pending the progress of the case; the order being to remand them to that vessel on her return, to be removed from the State.

All of plaintiff's companions were released from the custody of the sheriff on a writ of habeas corpus issued by Mr. Justice Field of this court. But plaintiff by a writ of error brings the judgment of the Supreme Court of California to this court, as we suppose, for the purpose of testing the constitutionality of the act under which she is held a prisoner. We regret very much that while the Attorney General of the United States has deemed the matter of such importance as to argue it in person, there has been no argument in behalf of the State of California, the commissioner of immigration, or the sheriff of San Francisco, in support of the authority by which plaintiff is held a prisoner, nor have we been furnished even with a brief in support of the statute of that state.

It is a most extraordinary statute. It provides that the commissioner of immigration is "to satisfy himself whether or not any passenger who shall arrive in the state by vessels from any foreign port or place (who is not a citizen of the United States) is lunatic, idiotic, deaf, dumb, blind, crippled, or infirm, and is not accompanied by relatives who are able to support him, or is likely to become a public charge, or has been a pauper in any other country, or is from sickness or disease, existing either at the time of sailing from the port of departure or at the time of his arrival in the state, a public charge, or likely soon to become so, or is a convicted criminal, or a lewd or debauched woman;" and no such person shall be permitted to land from the vessel, unless the master, or owner, or consignee shall give a separate bond in each case, conditioned to save harmless, every county, city, and town of the state against any expense incurred for the relief, support, or care of such person for two years thereafter.

The commissioner is authorized to charge the sum of seventy-five cents for every examination of a passenger made by him, which sum he may collect of the master, owner, or consignee, or of the vessel by attachment. The bonds are to be prepared by the commissiouer and two sureties are required to each bond, and for preparing the bond the commissioner is allowed to charge and collect a fee of three dollars, and for each oath administered to a surety, concerning his sufficiency as such, he may charge one dollar. It is expressly provided that there shall be a separate bond for each passenger, that there shall be two sureties on each bond, and that the same sureties must not be on more than one bond, and they must in all cases be residents of the state.

If the ship-master or owner prefers, he may commute for these bonds by paying such a sum of money as the commissioner may in each case think proper to exact, and after retaining twenty per cent. of the commutation money for his services, the commissioner is required once a month to deposit the balance with the treasurer of the State. —(See chapter I., article VII., of the Political Code of California, as modified by section 70 of the amendments of 1873–4.)

It is hardly possible to conceive a statute more skilfully framed to place in the hands of a single man the power to prevent entirely vessels engaged in a foreign trade, say with China, from carrying passengers, or to compel them to submit to systematic extortion of the grossest kind.

The commissioner has but to go aboard a vessel filled with passengers ignorant of our language and our laws, and without trial, or hearing, or evidence, but from the external appearances of persons with whose former habits he is unfamiliar, he points with his finger to twenty, as in this case, or a hundred if he chooses, and says to the master, these are idiots, these are paupers, these are convicted criminals, and these are lewd women, and these others are debauched women. I have here an hundred blank forms of bonds printed. I require you to fill me up and sign each of these for $500 in gold, and that you furnish me two hundred different men, residents of this state, and of sufficient means, as sureties on these bonds. I charge you five dollars in each case for preparing the bond and swearing your sureties, and I charge you seventy-five cents each for examining these passengers, and all others you have on board. If you don't do this you are forbidden to land your passengers under a heavy penalty.

But I have the power to commute with you for all this for any sum I may choose to take in cash. I am open to an offer, but you must remember that twenty per cent. of all I can get out of you goes into my own pocket, and the remainder into the treasury of California.

If, as we have endeavored to show in the opinion in the preceding cases, we are at liberty to look to the effect of a statute for the test of its constitutionality, the argument need go no further.

But we have thus far only considered the effect of the statute on the owner of the vessel.

As regards the passengers, section 2,963 declares that consuls, ministers, agents, or other public functionaries of any foreign government, arriving in this State in their official capacity, are exempt from the provisions of this chapter.

All other passengers are subject to the order of the commissioner of immigration.

Individual foreigners, however distinguished at home for their social, their literary, or their political character, are helpless in the presence of this potent commissioner. Such a person may offer to furnish any amount of surety on his own bond, or deposit any sum of money, but the law of California takes no note of him. It is the master, owner, or consignee of the vessel alone whose bond can be accepted. And so a silly, an obstinate, or a wicked commissioner, may bring disgrace upon the whole country, the enmity of a powerful nation, or the loss of an equally powerful friend.

While the occurence of the hypothetical case just stated may be highly improbable, we venture the assertion that if citizens of our own government were treated by any foreign nation as subjects of the Emperor of China have been actually treated under this law, no administration could withstand the call for a demand on such government for redress.

Or, if this plaintiff and her twenty companions had been subjects of the Queen of Great Britain, can any one doubt that this matter would have been the subject of international inquiry, if not of a direct claim for redress? Upon whom would such a claim be made? Not upon the State of California, for by our Constitution she can hold no exteror relations with other nations. It would be made upon the government of the United States. If that government should get into a difficulty which would lead to war or to suspension of intercourse, would California alone suffer, or all the Union? If we should conclude that a pecuniary indemnity was proper as a satisfaction for the injury, would California pay it, or the federal government? If that government has forbidden the States to hold negotiations with any foreign nations, or to declare war, and has taken the whole subject of these relations upon herself, has the Constitution, which provides for this, done so foolish a thing as to leave it in the power of the States to pass laws whose enforcement renders the general government liable to just reclamations which it must answer, while it does not prohibit to the States the acts for which it is held responsible?

The Constitution of the United States is no such instrument. The passage of laws which concern the admission of citizens and snbjects of foreign nations to our shores belongs to Congress and not to the states. It has the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations; the responsibility for the character of those regulations and the manner of their execution belongs solely to the national government. If it be otherwise a singl State can at her pleasure embroil us in disastrous quarrels with other nations.

We are not called upon by this statute to decide for or against the right of a State, in the absence of legislation by Congress, to protect herself by necessary and proper laws against paupers and convicted criminals from abroad, nor to lay down the definite limit of such right, if it exist. Such a right can only arise from a vital necessity for its exercise, and cannot be carried beyond the scope of that necessity. When a State statute, limited to provisions necessary and appropriate to that object alone, shall in a proper controversy come before us, it will be time enough to decide that question. The statute of California goes so far beyond what is necessary or even appropriate for this purpose, as to be wholly without any sound definition of the right under which it is supposed to be justified. Its manifest purpose, as we have already said, is not to obtain indemnity, but money.

The amount to be taken is left in every case to the discretion of an officer, whose cupidity is stimulated by a reward of one-fifth of all he can obtain.

The money when paid does not go to any fund for the benefit of immigrants, but is paid into the general treasury of the State and devoted to the use of all her indigent citizens. The blind, or the deaf, or the dumb passenger is subject to contribution, whether he be a rich man or a pauper. The patriot seeking our shores, after an unsuccessful struggle against despotism in Europe or Asia, may be kept out because there his resistance has been adjudged a crime. The woman whose error has been repaired by a happy marriage and numerous children, and whose loving husband brings her with his wealth to a new home, may be told she must pay a round sum before she can land, because it is alleged that she was debauched by her husband before marriage. Whether a young woman's manners are such as to justify the commissioner in calling her lewd may be made to depend on the sum she will pay for the privilege of landing in San Francisco.

It is idle to pursue the criticism. In any view which we can take of this statute it is in conflict with the Constitution of the United States, and, therefore, void.

The judgment of the Supreme Court of California is reversed, and the case remanded to that court with directions to make an order discharging the prisoner from custody.

U. S. CIRCUIT COURT, DISTRICT OF LOUISIANA.

MARCH, 1876.

In Equity.

HENRY R. JACKSON v. THE VICKSBURG, SHREVEPORT AND TEXAS RAILROAD COMPANY et al.

STOLEN BONDS PAYABLE TO BEARER, WITH THE PLACE OF PAYMENT LEFT BLANK, ARE NOT NEGOTIABLE COMMERCIAL PAPER, AND ARE NOT BINDING ON THE COMPANY.

1. Bonds issued by a railroad company, payable to bearer, are not commercial paper, unless the amount of the bond is fixed and definite.
2. Bonds were issued by a railroad company, by each of which it promised to pay to bearer 225 pounds sterling, in London, or one thousand dollars either in New York or New Orleans, with interest at eight per cent. The interest coupons attached to the bonds, called for nine pounds sterling each, if payable in London, or forty dollars each if payable in New York or New Orleans. The face of the bond recited that the President of the company was authorized to fix by his indorsement, the place of payment of both principal and interest. On the back of the bonds was a printed indorsement, signed with the genuine signature of the President, but the place of payment of the bonds was left blank. While in this condition, the bonds were stolen, and were transferred to bona fide holders for value. Held,
(a.) That such holders were not authorized to fill the blank left in the indorsement.
(b.) That the bonds were not commercial paper, and were not binding on the company in the hands of bona fide holders for value.

This cause was heard upon exceptions filed to the report of the master.

The purpose of the bill was to bring about a sale of the road of the defendant company, to pay the bonds secured by a mortgage executed by the company.

A reference was made to the master to ascertain and report what bonds were bona fide issued by the Vicksburg, Shreveport and Texas Railroad Company, the names of the owners, and the amount due to the holders of the said bonds so issued.

The master reported seven hundred and fifty bonds of $1,000 each, as having been bona fide made and issued by the company, and as secured by said mortgage.

The report then gives a list of two hundred and twenty-eight bonds of $1,000 each, which the master says were not bona fide issued by the railroad company, and are not secured by the said mortgage.

To this part of the report exceptions have been filed by several of the holders of the excluded bonds, on the ground that the master erred in reporting that said bonds were not secured by the mortgage. Upon these exceptions the case was heard.

Messrs, THOS. ALLEN CLARKE, THOS. L. BAYNE, Jos. P. HORNOR, for the exceptions.

Mr. JOHN A. CAMPBELL, contra.

WOODS, Circuit Judge.

The facts upon which the master relied for the basis of so much of his report as is excepted to, are as follows:

In April, 1864, during the late war carried on by the United States against the seceding States, the bonds in question were in the office of the railroad company, at Monroe, Louisiana. During the month just named, a raid was made upon Monroe by the naval forces of the United States, and at that time the office of the company was broken open, and these bonds carried off by persons connected with the expedition, without the consent or knowledge of any of the officers of the company. In short, the bonds were stolen from the office of the company. They were afterwards put in circulation, and bought by the holders at from fifteen to twenty cents on the dollar. The face of the bonds certified that the Vicksburg, Shreveport and Texas Railroad Company is indebted to John Ray, or bearer, for value received, in the sum of either two hundred and twenty-five pounds sterling, or one thousand dollars, lawful money of the United States of America, to wit: Two hundred and twenty-five pounds sterling, if the principal and interest are payable in London, and one thousand dollars, lawful money of the United States of America, if the principal and interest are payable in New York or New Orleans, which sum said company promises to pay to John Ray, or bearer, on the first day of September, A.D. 1877, and also to pay an interest thereon at the rate of eight per cent. per annum, on the first day of March and the first day of September of each and every year; * * * and the President of said company is authorized to fix by his indorsement, the place of payment of principal and interest, in conformity with the tenor of this obligation. The bonds were signed by the President and the treasurer, and bore the seal of the company.

Upon the back of each of the bonds in question, was an indorsement as follows: "I hereby agree that the within bonds and the interest coupons thereto attached, shall be payable in ——

"C. G. Young, President."

The coupons attached to said bonds declared that, "The Vicksburg, Shreveport & Texas Railroad Company will pay the bearer hereof (on a specified date) nine pounds sterling, if payable in London, or forty dollars, if payable in New York or New Orleans." Upon this state of facts, the question for solution is, whether the bonds are good in the hands of bona fide holders for value. If the bonds are negotiable, this inquiry must be answered in the affirmative.

Generally, bonds issued by a corporation and payable to bearer, have the qualities of negotiable instruments. Commissioners of Knox Co. v. Aspinwall, 21 How., 539; Woods v. Lawrence Co., 1 Black, 386; Mercer Co. v. Hackett, 1 Wall., 83.

But it is claimed that there are peculiarities about these stolen bonds which deprive them of their character as negotiable instruments. These are, that the amount for the payment of which the bond is given is uncertain. It is clear that the sum of two hundred and twenty five pounds, payable in London, with nine pounds interest payable every six months at the same place, is entirely different from one thousand dollars, payable in New York or New Orleans, with forty dollars interest, payable semi-annually at the same places. This uncertainty, unless cured, deprives the bonds of their character as negotiable interests. Story on Promissory Notes, §§ 20, 21; Story on Bills, § 42; Bayley on Bills, § 11; Parsons on Notes and Bills, § 37.

But it is claimed that the uncertainty is cured by the genuine signature of the President of the railroad company appended to the indorsement upon the bonds as above set forth. It is true that the indorsement leaves the place of payment blank, and so leaves the amount and interest of the bonds uncertain. But the argument is, that the President having signed the indorsement, and left the place of payment blank, the holder is authorized to fill the blank, and thus render the amount of the bond definite and certain, and that that is certain which can be made certain.

If the holder of the bill were authorized to fill this blank, doubtless the result claimed to flow from this fact would follow. But is the holder of these stolen bonds authorized to fill this blank in the indorsement? He is not expressly authorized, for the bond says that place of payment should be designated by the President. Can it be said when the President signed the indorsment and left the place of payment blank, he authorized any one who might steal the bonds or to whom the thief might sell them, to fill the blank? If any one was authorized by implied contract to fill the blank, it was some person to whom they had been issued by the company, or who had acquired them after such bona fide issue. There can be no implied authority to any one to fill the blank, unless the bonds were bona fide issued and delivered by the railroad company. To hold that the thief of the bond, or any one holding under him, had implied authority to perfect the bond, appears to me to be entirely untenable.

The uncertainty in the bond, as to amount of both principal and interest and place of payment, remains, notwithstanding the signature of the President to the indorsement; and this uncertainty deprives the bonds of the quality of negotiable instruments. The holders, though bona fide for value, are not protected by the rules which govern the transfer of commercial paper, and must hold the bonds subject to all the infirmities which attach to the title to them.

These views are sustained by the Court of Appeals of the State of New York, in a case arising upon some of these same stolen bonds, in which it was decided that a bona fide holder of the bonds was not authorized to fill the blank left by the President in the indorsement, and that he acquires and could convey no title to the bonds. Ledwick v. McKinn et al., 53 N. Y., 307.

The exceptions to the master's report must be overruled and the report confirmed.—The Louisiana Law Journal.

Through the kindness of MARK J. LEAMING, of the Jefferson City bar, we have received the following charge:

U. S. DISTICT COURT W. D. OF MO.

THE UNITED STATES v. SAMUEL L. HIGHLEYMAN.

EX. U. S. COLLECTOR—EXTORTION—GUILTY KNOWLEDGE.

1. The defendant was an ex-revenue collector; the charge was extortion, and the court dwells specially upon the guilty knowledge which the officer should have, in order to warrant a conviction on the charge of extortion; that by the use of the word knowingly, something more is meant than what is implied, in the legal presumption that every man must know the law.

2. SPECIAL TAX—WHEN NOT A DELINQUENT.—That a person who carries on business, requiring the payment of a special tax, without having paid the same, though violating the law, is not a delinquent within the meaning of the law, of whom, when he makes payment of his tax, mileage can be collected.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

Charge of Judge KREKEL:

The indictment which you are considering, is drawn under section 3169 of the U. S. Statute, and provides that "every officer or agent appointed and acting under the authority of any revenue law of the U. S. * * * who knowingly demands other or greater sums than are authorized by law, or receives any fee, compensation or reward, except as by law prescribed * * * shall be punished, etc."

About the defendant having been a revenue officer when he collected the several amounts charged in the indictment as having been illegally collected by him, there is no dispute.

The language of the law is, who knowingly demands or receives any greater sum than he is entitled to by law. By the use of the word "knowingly" something more is meant than what is implied, in the legal presumption that every man must know the law. In order to find the defendant guilty of demanding or receiving greater sums than he was entitled to under the law, you should be satisfied that he knew he was violating the law, and the fact that he demanded or received the several amounts charged in the indictment, is not of itself sufficient to sustain the indictment.

You must arrive at his knowledge from the facts and circumstances, testified to in the case. The law does not authorize the collection of fines, penalties or cost, from a tax-payer, until he is delinquent. By a delinquent, is meant a tax-payer to whom notice has been given, and demand made of the tax due from him.

A person who carries on business requiring the payment of a special tax, without having paid the same, though violating the law, is not a delinquent within the meaning of the law, of whom, when he makes payment of his tax, mileage can be collected. If you shall be satisfied from the evidence, that the defendant, Highleyman, while proceeding through his collection district, either by accident, or on inquiry, learned that the persons named in the indictment were doing business without having paid the special tax required by law, and he collected of them, or undertook, upon payment of the tax, to procure for them their stamps, he was not entitled by law to charge them mileage, and any amount demanded and received by him was illegal. In order to ascertain whether the defendant knew such collections to be illegal, you will carefully consider all said and done by him at the time, as well as afterwards, regarding the collections. The law requires all deputy collectors who collect under distraint warrants, to return such warrants with the amounts collected thereon, including all costs, fines and penalties, to the collector. If you shall find from the evidence either that the defendant had no distraint-warrant at the time of making the collections, or that he failed to return the distraint warrant to the collector as required by law, this is evidence which may be considered by you, in arriving at the knowledge defendant had of the nature of the collection made by him. You will, however, make up your verdict from the whole evidence in the case. You are the judges of the credibility of the witnesses, and it is with you to give what weight you will, to the testimony of every witness. You must be satisfied, without a reasonable doubt of the defendant's guilt. If you have such a doubt arising upon the facts and circumstances testified to in the case, you should acquit. Your duty is to find upon each count of the indictment, guilty or not guilty, except the first, which has been dismissed.

After an absence of about two hours, the jury returned a verdict of guilty on one count, there being four in the indictment.

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

OPINION FILED JANUARY 21, 1876.

WILLIAM W. HOLCOMB v. THE PEOPLE ex rel. HARRIET L. TUTTLE.

Appeal from Winnebago.

BASTARDY—APPEALS FROM COUNTY COURT—ACTS RELATING TO, CONSTRUED.

Opinion by WALKER, J.

A motion was entered in this court to dismiss the appeal, upon the grounds that an appeal did not lie from the County to the Circuit Court, and the case of Peake v. The People (unreported), is refered to in support of the motion. That motion having been reserved to the final consideration of the case, we have considered and decided the motion as preliminary to the examination of the errors assigned on the record. In Peake's case, supra, it was held that by the County Court Act of 1872, an appeal was given to the Circuit court in bastardy cases. But the right of appeal is given from the County to the Circuit courts by the act of 1874. The 187th section of that act (R. S., 344), declares that appeals may be taken from the final orders, judgments and decrees of the County courts to the Circuit courts, etc., in all matters, except as prohibited in the next section.

The 188th section allows appeals and writs of error to be prosecuted to this court from judgments, etc., for taxes and assessments, and orders for the sale of lands by administrators, etc. The language of the 187th section is certainly broad enough to embrace a bastardy case, and the 188th section is too narrow to exclude it. As the law was amended and now stands we have no hesitation in saying that the appeal may be taken to the Circuit court, and a trial de novo be there had.

The trial was had in the County court after the act of 1874 went into effect, and the practice in the case thereafter was regulated by the latter act, which was in force when the trial was had. The act of 1874 does not require cases then pending to be tried under the act of 1872, but by its own force it wiped out and abrogated it and supplied its place. Nor did the parties acquire a vested right to the rules of practice or modes of procedure prescribed by the act of 1872. They were liable to be rightfully amended, altered or repealed, and others substituted in their stead.

The remainder of the opinion, relating mainly to questions of fact, is omitted. —ED. LEGAL NEWS.

N. C. WARNER, for relator.

WHAT CONTRACTS ARE AGAINST PUBLIC POLICY.—The Supreme Court of Missouri, in delivering an opinion last week in a case which involved the question whether a contract was void as against public policy, said:

We see nothing contrary to the public policy in the contract set out in the petition, and think it is clearly one which the court must enforce.

What constitutes public policy is not perhaps exactly determinable; it is indefinite in its nature, changing with the habits, wants and opinions of society. Forestalling, regranting and engrossing were prohibited by statute in England three hundred years ago, and were considered to be against public policy so late as the time of Blackstone. They are now the great basis of profits—are not only practiced every day, but are recognized as the very life of trade, and without them it may be said that commerce, as known amongst us, would be at an end. To buy merchandise on its way to market, to buy provisions in any market and sell them again in the same market, or within four miles of the place, or to buy up provisions in large quantities for the purpose of selling them again, were statutory offenses in England in the middle of the last century, and were recognized as offenses at common law long after the repeal of the statute. It is quite safe to consider that they would not now be held to be against public policy.

Contracts in total restraint of trade or of marriage against the prohibitions of statutes, to infringe a copy-right, to defraud the government or third parties, to oppress third parties, or prevent the due course of justice, or induce a violation of public duty, that tend to encourage unlawful or immoral acts, or that are founded on trading with an enemy, are all against public policy and void. And probably this is a complete enumeration of the several classes to which contracts against public policy may be reduced. Undoubtedly the courts will give no countenance to an action founded on a contract which comes fairly under any one of these heads. But we utterly fail to see that the contract set forth in the petition can be brought under any one of them. It is urged that it is a combination against the public to keep up prices, but it seems very clear that it is nothing of the kind. A custom of offering a bonus to certain organizations to hold festivals in this private park, or in that, must, one would think, have a tendency to enhance the price of admission to the entertainment. An agreement to be no longer a party to such a system of unfair competition, strikes us as being eminently in the interest of good morals, fair and free trade, and honest rivalry in business. If dry goods houses in a certain town should agree to employ no drummers for trade, or hotel keepers to employ no runners, the contract would be much of the same character, and we can see nothing illegal about it.

We call attention to the following opinions, reported at length in this issue:

Tax on Ship Owner for Right to Land Passengers — Regulation of Commerce — Statutes of New York and Louisiana Unconstitutional and Void. — The opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States by Miller, J., holding, that the statutes of New York and Louisiana, imposing a tax upon ship owners as a pre-requisite to their landing their passengers under consideration, are intended to regulate commercial matters which are not only of national but of international concern, and which are also best regulated by one uniform rule, applicable alike to all the sea ports of the United States. That these statutes are, therefore, void, because legislation on the subjects which they cover is confided exclusively to congress by the clause of the constitution which gives to that body "the right to regulate commerce with foreign nations." That the constitutional objection to this tax on the passenger is not removed, because the penalty for failure to pay does not accrue until twenty-four hours after he is landed. The penalty is incured by the act of landing him without payment, and is, in fact, for the act of bringing him into the State. The court does not in this case, undertake to decide whether or not a State may, in the absence of all regulation by congress on the same subject, be strictly limited to defending itself against paupers, convicted criminals, and others of that class, but is of opinion that to congress rightfully and appropriately belongs the power of legislating on the whole subject. This is an unusually long opinion, but on account of its great importance and its general interest we give it entire.

What Questions can be Reviewed in the Federal Supreme Court.—The opinion of the Supreme court of the United States, by Miller, J., holding that where a right is set up under an act of Congress in a State court, any matter of law found in the record decided by the highest court of a State, bearing on the right so set up under the act of Congress, can be re-examined in the Federal Supreme court. The court construes the grant under which the defendant claims the land, also the grant under which the plaintiff claims the land.

The Statute of California Relating to the Landing of Passengers Unconstitutional.— The opinion of the Supreme court of the United States by Miller, J., holding that the statutes of California, which requires the master or owner of a vessel to give a bond before he is permitted to land certain passengers for the future protection of the State against the support of such passengers, or to pay such sum as the commissioner of immigration chooses to exact, is unconstitutional, and the powers which the commissioner is authorized to exercise under this statute, are such as to bring the United States into conflict with foreign nations, and which can only belong to the Federal government; that if the right of the States to pass statutes to protect themselves in regard to the criminal, the pauper, and the diseased foreignor, landing within their borders exist at all, it is limited to such laws as are absolutely necessary for that purpose, and this mere police regulation cannot extend so far as to prevent or obstruct other classes of persons from the right to hold personal and commercial intercourse with the people of the United States; that the statute under consideration in this respect extends far beyond the necessity in which the right is founded, if it exists at all, and invaded the right of Congress to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and is therefore void.

Stolen Bonds Payable to Bearer.— The opinion of the United States Circuit Court for the district of Louisiana, by Woods, J., holding that stolen bonds payable to bearer, with the place of payment left blank, are not negotiable commercial paper, and are not binding on the railroad company that issues them.

U. S. Collector—Extortion—Guilty Knowledge. — The charge of Judge Krekel, of the United States District Court for the western district of Missouri, in a case where an ex-deputy collector was indicted for extortion, the court dwells specially upon the guilty knowledge which the officer should have in order to warrant a conviction on the charge of extortion, and holds that by the use of the word "knowingly," something more is meant than is implied, in the legal presumption that every man must know the law. This ruling of the learned judge is in accordance with good sound reason. Congress, in using the word "knowingly," certainly meant that a person, before he could be convicted under this statute, should have done some act, or omitted to do some act, which he knew was a violation of the law.

Bastardy. — Appeal from County Court.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of Illinois, by Walker, J., in a bastardy case, as to the right of appeal from the County court, and construing the various statutes relating thereto.

Champerty.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of Missouri, by Bakewell, J., stating what is champerty as defined by the English authorities, stating that such decisions are not now applicable to Missouri, refusing to follow the opinion of the Supreme Court of Illinois in Thompson v. Reynolds, reported in 7 Chicago Legal News, 188, holding a champertous contract void, and the opinions of the Supreme Courts of Indiana and of Kentucky to the same effect; and holding that a contract made between attorney and client, that the attorney shall prosecute a suit for the recovery of real or personal property, the attorney to receive a portion of the property recovered, as full compensation for his services, is not void in Missouri, and that in Missouri the law places the lawyer, the doctor, the preacher and the school-master on the same footing of common right, as to the recovery of compensation. This is a very able and exhaustive opinion, but we think the rule laid down by the Supreme Court of Illinois is in accordance with the English authorities, sustained by the wisdom of ages and best calculated not to promote litigation. It is evident that the legislature of this State so regarded it, for after the opinion was published, that body, by a very large majority, refused to change the law so as to make it in this State lawful for a lawyer to take a suit on shares, as a farmer can a farm. We do not believe in this trading in lawsuits. This is an unusually interesting opinion to the profession.

NOTES TO RECENT CASES.

THE HOMESTEAD RIGHT OF A WIDOW AS AGAINST HEIRS.

The construction of the homestead law of 1873 was lately before the Circuit Court of Henry county, in a proceeding for partition, wherein the widow claims dower in all her deceased husband's real estate, and, in addition thereto, her right of homestead, and a decree was entered according to her claim, by Pleasants, Judge.

It will be remembered that all the homestead statutes previous to that of 1872, exempted the homestead to the widow only as against sales for the payment of debts. The acts of 1872 and 1873 exempts them also "from the law of descent and devise." Sections 1 and 2 of the act of 1873, and §§ 36, 37 of the dower act, also § 44 as amended by act of 1875, p. 75, were cited.

COURT OF CLAIMS—RULE OF EVIDENCE.

The Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of Moore v. The United States, 22 Int. Rev. Rec., 106, held that the Court of Claims, in which the court tries both fact and law, cannot adopt its own rules of evidence, but must be governed by the rules of the common law, unless Congress has otherwise enacted, or some special reason demands a different rule.

MALICE PROSECUTION.

In Sax v. Laws et al., 1 Cinn. Law Bulletin, 78, the Superior Court of Cincinnati held that an action cannot be maintained for damages for the malicious institution and prosecution of a civil suit, without cause, such suit being unaccompanied by an arrest of the defendant or the seizure of his property.

SHIPPING A CORPSE, AND RETURNING THE CASKET.

The District Court of Hamilton county, in the Am. Ex. Co. v. Eply, 1 Cinn. Law Bulletin, 77, held that the consignee of goods has the right to open the package and examine its contents, to ascertain whether they were such as were ordered by him, before he was bound to accept the package; that a consignor sending a casket containing a corpse has no lien on the corpse for the price of the casket; that to give him such a lien would be against public policy.

Recent Publications.

A Practical Treatise on Criminal Law, and Procedure in Criminal Cases, before Justices of the Peace and in Courts of Record in the State of Illinois, with full Directions and Forms for every Criminal Case. By Ira M. Moore, author of "Moore's Civil Justice." Chicago: Callaghan and Company. 1876.

Always upon the appearance of a new law book the profession desire to know its size and the subjects upon which it treats, and whether it is carefully and skillfully written. The profession always admire a fine appearing book, but they after all care more for the matter it contains than they do for its appearance. This volume contains 821 pages. It is divided into five chapters, as follows: Chapter 1 treats of Crimes in General; 2, Proceedings in Criminal Cases before Justices of the Peace; 3, Proceedings in Cases which may be tried before Justices of the Peace; 4, Specific Offenses; 5, Proceedings in the Circuit Court in Criminal Cases. These chapters are again appropriately divided into sections, devoted to branches of the general subjects treated of in the chapters.

It is wrong to suppose that this is a work intended only for justices of the peace. It states the law and gives the forms in criminal matters in the State for both courts of record and justices of the peace. There are many forms in this volume that cannot be found elsewhere; and so far as we have been able to examine them they appear to be well drawn, and just the forms needed in such a work. Much labor has been expended by Mr. Moore in the preparing of this volume.

The Notes occupy about one-third of it, and contain references to the authorities cited to support the law as stated in the text. These notes will save the criminal lawyer in this State a great amount of labor in searching for authorities. That portion devoted to the indictment, and giving forms of indictment, will be exceedingly useful in practice. The indictment drawn by our old friend Carlos Haven, under which William Jackson was tried, convicted and hung, is here given in full. Various forms of pleas and affidavits for continuances will be found useful in the haste of criminal practice. The closing portion of the work is devoted to the bill of exceptions and the manner of getting a criminal case into the Supreme court for review. Mr. Moore says the object of the book is, first, to furnish sheriffs and constables a full and complete guide in criminal cases, and, secondly, to furnish to the members of the profession and to the courts a concise statement of the law now in force relating to crimes and to the procedure for their punishment. The new constitution and the revised statutes of 1874, which so seriously changed the criminal law of the State, made it absolutely necessary for a volume embracing these changes, and bringing the decisions of the courts upon criminal law down to the present time. Mr. Moore, by the honest hard work bestowed on this volume, deserves the patronage of the profession.

On Poisons in Relation to Medical Jurisprudence and Medicine. By Alfred Swaine Taylor, M.D., F.R.S., Fellow of the Royal College of Physicians, and Lecturer on Medical Jurisprudence in Guy's Hospital. Tradidur Dies Die. Third American from the third and thoroughly revised English edition. With 104 Illustrations. Philadelphia: Henry C. Lea. 1875. Sold by Jansen, McClurg & Co., booksellers, Chicago.

Few men have done more for medical jurisprudence than Dr. Taylor. His works are always thorough and practical. The volume before us is the third American from the third English edition of his work on poisons. The former editions are too well known to both the legal and medical professions to require any extended notice in these columns. The author says the present volume is based on the two previous editions; but that the complete revision, rendered necessary by time, has converted it into a new work; that it is offered as a manual for the use of students and practitioners in law and medicine. The author has omitted a description of those poisonous substances which have not hitherto given rise to investigations before legal tribunals. A number of illustrations have been introduced. Some chapters have been omitted, some divided and others added, to make the work keep pace with the changes in medical science and the adjudications of the courts.

SUPREME COURT OF MISSOURI.

OPINION FILED IN APRIL, 1876.

BASIL DUKE et al. v. ASA HARPER et al.

Appeal from the Circuit Court of St. Louis County.

CHAMPERTY—MAINTENANCE—THE LAW IN MISSOURI, ILLINOIS AND OTHER STATES.

1. MAINTENANCE.—The court states what is maintenance.
2. CHAMPERTY.—The court states what is champerty, and does not follow the decision of the Supreme Court of Illinois in Thompson v. Reynolds, reported in 7 CHICAGO LEGAL NEWS, 188, holding a champertous contract void; nor the opinions of the Supreme Court of Indiana and Kentucky, to the same effect.
3. A CHAMPERTOUS CONTRACT IN MISSOURI.—That a contract made between attorney and client that the attorney shall prosecute a suit for the recovery of real or personal property, the attorney to receive a portion of the property recovered, as full compensation for his services, is not void in Missouri. Here, in Missouri, the law places the lawyer, the doctor, the preacher and the schoolmaster on the same footing of common right, as to the recovery of compensation.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

The court, by Judge BAKEWELL, after stating the facts in the case, proceeds as follows:

This record presents but one question for our determination—it is this: Whether a contract made between attorney and client, that the attorney shall prosecute a suit for the recovery of real or personal property, the attorney to receive a portion of the property recovered, as full compensation for his services, is void in Missouri, even though there is no agreement that the attorney shall pay costs or furnish any money toward the expenses of the suit or the proceedings instituted with a view to the recovery of the property in dispute.

If this contract is void, it is void for champerty. It seems necessary to determine, therefore, what is champerty, and if this contract comes within the definition of the offense, then to decide whether a champertous contract is void in this State.

Maintenance is an officious intermeddling in a suit that no way belongs to one by assisting either party with money, or otherwise, to prosecute or defend. It is said to be an offense against good morals, in that it keeps alive strife, and perverts the remedial powers of the law into an engine of oppression.

Coke makes champerty a subdivision of maintenance, and says it is "to maintain to have part of the land, or anything out of the land, or part of the debt, or other thing in plea or suit, and then is called cambi partia," (campi partitio) "or maintenance." [Co. Litt. 368 b.]

Hawkins follows Coke, [Hawk. P. C.] and if this definition is to be accepted as exact, there can be no question that the contract before us is champertous.

But the definition of Coke is not followed by later writers.

Champerty, says Blackstone, "is a species of maintenance, being a bargain with a plaintiff or defendant campum partire, if they prevail at law, whereupon the champertor is to carry on the party's suit at his own expense." This definition is adopted by Chitty [Cont. 676]. The law dictionaries, Tomlin's, Jacob's, Wharton and Bonner, all make the carrying on the suit at the expense of the champertor of the essence of the offense. And the first English statute on the subject (33 Edw.) defines champertors as those who move pleas or suits, or cause them to be moved, either by their own procurement or by others, and sue them at their proper costs to have part of the land in variance or part of the gain.

If these later definitions are accurate, the contract sued on is not champertous, and plaintiffs could maintain their suit.

Little help in arriving at an accurate definition of the offense is to be had from the decided cases, as the decisions are conflicting.

Champerty was an offense by common law and also by various statutes in the reign of Edward I., Edward III., and Henry VIII. The weight of authority would seem to be in favor of the view that the offense is complete if the contract be to receive a part of the thing to be recovered only when the contracting party is to aid the suitor by paying costs and expenses of the suit. But in view of the great authority of the definition of the offense by Coke it cannot be positively determined that a contract is clearly not champertous, merely because the attorney does not agree to pay the costs.

The question next to be determined is, whether a champertous contract be void in Missouri.

By the act of the 19th of January, 1816, the Spanish law was abolished in Missouri, and the common law of England adopted in its place. That statute provides that "The common law of England, and all statutes and acts of Parliament made prior to the 4th year of James I., and which are of a general nature, not local to that kingdom, which common law and statutes are not repugnant to, or inconsistent with, the constitution of the United States, or the statute law in force for the time being, shall be the rule of action and decision in this State, any law, custom, or usage to the contrary notwithstanding." [2 Wag., 866, § 1.]

Now there can be no question that in the fourth year of James I., champerty was a criminal offence in England, and that then, and until a very recent period, at least, a champertous contract was held, and would probably now be held, to be void in that country; but it is also true that at the same period, and even down to our own days, wager of battle and wager of law were methods of trial upon which the defendant in a suit of right, and in some other forms of action, might insist in England. It is not pretended that they were introduced into Missouri with the common law, and we must determine whether the statute just recited, makes the English law as to champerty of effect in this State.

By adopting as well the common law as such English laws as are of general nature, not local to that kingdom, the people of this State recognized and adopted, as one entire system, so far as applicable to our situation and government, a vast and comprehensive body of laws, consisting of infinite particulars applicable to a great empire, and which wisdom and prudence, both legislative and judicial, are constantly modifying and adapting to our varying circumstances.

Because champerty was a highly penal offence, both at common law and by statute, in the reign of James I., we do not think that it conclusively follows that champerty is an offence in Missouri today. The evil of buying of titles and pretended rights of persons not in possession, alleged as the mischief provided against by the laws against champerty, could hardly be considered a mischief or wrong in an unsettled country where few owners would be likely to occupy even the premises they actually had, or might readily acquire.

The generic offence of maintenance, of which champerty is a species, rests mainly on a series of statutes ending with 32 Henry VIII. It was, however, also punishable by fine and imprisonment at common law, and subjected the offender to a suit for damages.

The reasons for the ancient doctrine on the subject are admitted even now in England to have mainly ceased, and the courts treat the old learning on the subject with great disfavor. In Masters v. Miller, [4 T. R., 320] Butler, J., says: "It is curious, and not altogether useless, to see how the doctrine of maintenance has, from time to time, been received at Westminster hall. At one time, not only he who laid out money to assist another in his cause, but he that by his friendship or interest saved him an expense which he would otherwise be put to, was guilty of maintenance. Nay, if he officiously gave evidence, it was maintenance; so that he must have had a subpœna or suppress the truth. That such doctrine, repugnant to every honest feeling of the human heart, should soon be laid aside must be expected. Accordingly a variety of exceptions were soon made."

The rule of common law which prohibited the assignment of a cause in action was a breach of the law of maintenance. Coke expressly says so, and lays down the reasons as identical with those against champerty. [Co. Litt., 114 a.] But this was long ago so explained away as to remain at most only an objection to the form of action; and in this state the technical rule of the common law is utterly swept away in this regard, in a manner which manifests that liability to the principles of the law of champerty and maintenance which is so general in our sister States.

In 1798 a statute was enacted in New York against maintenance. In 1830 the revisors, in their report to the legislature, say, "It is proposed to abolish the law of maintenance and to qualify that of champerty." Accordingly the old law of maintenance was included in the general repealing act, and Chancellor Walworth speaks of the "absurd doctrines of maintenance that grew out of the necessities of a semi-barbarous age, being swept away in the general revision, having been virtually abrogated long before that time."

It was long ago held in Pennsylvania [Stoever v. Whitman, 6 Binney], Chief Justice Tilghman delivering the opinion of the court, in 1814, that it is no objection to a conveyance of land that the grantor is out of possession. "It may be affirmed with certainty," says that learned judge, "that the law on that subject as held there in England was never adopted. From the equality of conditions of persons in this country there was no danger of maintenance from the interference of powerful individuals."

It has been recently held in Missouri that an agreement between attorney and client that the attorney shall be paid by receiving part of the land recovered, is not void in that State [Allard v. Lannrende, 29 Wis.], and the court very truly says that the old common law rules as to champerty have been necessarily qualified or restricted by judicial decisions or otherwise; that agreements for a fee contingent on success are neither immoral, disreputable nor illegal; and that a contract that the attorney shall receive a certain percentage, measured on the amount recovered, which is undoubtedly good, cannot be on principle distinguished from an agreement to receive a percentage from the amount recovered itself, which has been held to be champertous and void. The court holds, however, that, under the authorities, the contract before it would have been bad, had the attorneys agreed to pay the expense of the action.

In Georgia it is held that 32 Hen., 8-9, is not law in that State. [Cain v. Monroe, 23 Geo].

In California it is held that champerty is not an offence; and champerty will not avail a contract. [Matthenson v. Fitch., 22 Cal]. This decision has been recently affirmed.

In Massachusetts the old doctrine is adhered to, but not with favor. [5 Pick., 548].

In New Hampshire and Iowa [5 N. H. 181; 3 Iowa, 482,] champerty does not avail a contract. The offence is unknown.

In Connecticut it is that the reasons which made a law against champerty and maintenance salutary or necessary in England do not exist here, certainly not to the same extent. [Richardson v. Rowland, 40 Conn., 1873].

Vermont, Delaware and Tennessee discard the rule. [28 Vermont, Danforth v. Streeter; Bayard v. McLane, 3 Harrington; Sherley v. Riggs, 11 Humph].

In Texas it is declared that the laws against champerty are not to be regarded as part of the common law in that State. The court says that the laws adapted to a kingdom with a strong landed aristocracy are wholly unfitted for a country where we have lands for the millions; and adds that, if a lawyer helps his client to recover lands from the possession of another and takes part of the land for his fee, it is no breach of the ethics of the professional or of the moral law. (Bentinck v. Franklin, 38 Texas, 1873).

In Virginia it is said that the question of champerty, or a savor of champerty, is wholly out of the way in discussing the validity of a contract. (Major v. Gibson, 1 Patton & Heath, 84.)

Chief Justice Parker, in giving the opinion of the court in Thurston v. Percival (1 Peck), says that "it sometimes is useful and convenient where one has a just demand which he is not able from poverty to enforce, that a more fortunate friend should assist him and wait for his compensation until the suit is determined, and be paid out of the fruits of it." And Mr. Justice Grier, in giving the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States in Roberts v. Cook, (20 How., 467), says that the ancient English doctrines respecting champerty and maintenance have not found favor in the United States, and that the enforcement of the law here would not always, perhaps not generally, promote justice.

No such contract has yet been declared void in our State, and we see no necessity for introducing the doctrine now. The state of society amongst us does not require it. The tendency of legislation and of judicial decisions is, we think, against it. Clients may be safely left to the protection of the courts, who will relieve against extortion or unfair dealing should a proper case arise. Public policy requires no other protection. Analogies from the Roman law, which regarded compensation to the advocate as a mere honorarium or gratuity, or from the old common law, which regarded it in a similar light, are out of place in a practical age. According to English law, the physician can recover a fee, the surgeon can not; the attorney is legally entitled to compensation, but the barrister's services must be paid in advance, because they are a mere gratuity. With us, the laborer is worthy of his hire, and the universal practice and the rule of law places the lawyer, the doctor, the preacher and the schoolmaster on the same footing of common right as to the recovery of compensation.

The whole doctrine of maintenance and champerty is a relic of a state of things long since passed away. During the Crusades, when land-holders were absent from home, dishonest men who had iniquitously asserted claims to the lands of absent owners, frequently, on the return of the proprietor, assigned their pretended claims to some powerful neighbor, that by the weight and influence of his name the right cause might be faced down; and it was to put an end to such wrongs that the statutes against maintenance and champerty were framed in affirmance of the common law. But there is no such mischief to be apprehended in our days, and the reason of the law would seem to have ceased. Contracts illegal at common law as being contrary to public policy, are such as injuriously affect or subvert the public interest. Ex turpi contractu actio non oritur. But we see nothing contrary to the welfare of society and the administration of justice in upholding a contract between attorney and client that the attorney shall be paid out of the thing recovered. On the contrary, many a poor man with a just claim would find himself unable to prosecute his rights, could he make no arrangement to pay his advocate out of the proceeds of the suit. Such contracts have been of constant occurrence throughout this state, and if they are immoral or illegal, there are perhaps few attorneys in active practice amongst us who have not been habitual violators of the law.

The Supreme court of Illinois has recently decided a champertous contract void. It is true that the contract considered by the court in that case (Thompson v. Reynolds 7, Chicago Legal News, 188,) different from the one at bar in that it provided that all expenses of litigation should be borne by the attorneys, and it was therefore champertous according to Blackstone's definition, while the contract before us was not. But the views expressed in Illinois are irreconcilable with those upon which this opinion is based. The same may be said of the case of Scohey v. Ross, [13 Indiana] and of other decisions in Kentucky and elsewhere. It is because of the conflict of authority on the subject that we have gone somewhat more at length into the question than was perhaps necessary; though not more so than the importance of the principles involved seem to demand.

We are of opinion that the Circuit court erred in sustaining the demurrer to the petition of plaintiff, and the judgment of the Circuit court is reversed and the cause remanded to be proceeded with in accordance with this opinion. The other judges concur.

RIGHTS OF SETTLER UNDER DONATION ACT OF OREGON.

The following are the head notes to the opinion of DEADY, J., of the U. S. District Court of Oregon, rendered on the 27th of March, in Wythe v. Haskell:

A settler under the Donation Act of Oregon acquires title to his donation from the passage of the act or the date of his settlement; and the patent which issues to him upon the performance of the conditions upon which the grant was made, is only record evidence of the existence of such title, or of the facts out of which it arose.

Under said act the Surveyor General had authority to partition the donation of a married settler, in equal parts as to quantity, between him and his wife at any point of the compass he might deem expedient; but his action in this particular, under § 1 of the act of July 4, 1836 (5 Stat. 107), was subject to the supervision of the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

When the Surveyor General issued a certificate to a settler under the Donation Act, the Commissioner of the General Land office was required to issue a patent thereon and in conformity therewith, unless he found some valid objection thereto; and if said objection was found it could not be disposed of, by issuing a patent so far contrary to the certificate, but the certificate should have been returned to the local office for correction, and the patent issued thereon.

A certificate and patent thereon, issued under said act, are parts of the same transaction or procedure and may be read together, for the purpose of correcting or explaining the patent, and where there is an absolute contradiction between them the certificate must prevail.

On July 28, 1853, the Surveyor General issued a certificate to William H. Willson and Chloe A., his wife, for donation 44, including the site of the town of Salem, assigning therein "the north ½ parallel with the south line of the claim, to Chloe A. Willson, and the south ½ to William H. Willson," upon which certificate, on February 4, 1862, a patent was issued, giving to said William H., "the south half" of said donation, and to said Chloe A., "the north half" thereof: Held, That the certificate and patent taken together showed that the partition line of the donation was a line running 70 degrees, 21 minutes east, and parallel with the southern boundary of the tract, and not a due east and west one.

THE TAXATION OF MORTGAGES.

If there is any one subject more than an other that is now agitating the minds of the American people it is that of taxation. How shall the people and property be taxed so as to make the burden of supporting the government—state, national and municipal—equal. We say burden, for it is a serious burden in these times, when whatever is required for the people costs three times its value, to say nothing of the corruption and dishonesty of so many of our officers, which go to increase the amount of taxation. one man is taxed four times what he is worth, and upon property he never owned, while his neighbor who is worth more is allowed to escape entirely. The revenue law of this state and the way it is administered, is driving millions of capital from our state every year, and preventing the formation of manufacturing companies which would add materially to the wealth, population and prosperity of our State. The following article upon the taxation of mortgages in the N. Y. Independent of this week expresses our views so well upon this subject that we give it entire:

The Supreme Court of California recently rendered an important decision in reference to the taxation of mortgages. The case before the Court was that of The People v, The Hibernia Savings and Loan Society. All the judges gave concurring opinions. The constitution of the state, (Article XI., Section 13), provides as follows:

"Taxation shall be equal and uniform throughout the state. All property in this state shall be taxed in proportion to its value to be ascertained as directed by law; but assessors and collectors of town, county, and state taxes, shall be elected by the qualified electors of the district, county, or town in which the property taxed for state, county, or town purposes is situated."

Judge McKinstry concludes his deliverance in the case by saying: "I am of opinion that 'credits' are not 'property' subject to taxation within the meaning of the section of the constitution above quoted." He understands by the term "property," as used in the constitution, actual wealth, and not mere choses in action or legal evidences of debt obligations. He says: "Supposing—what would thus be possible in theory—that the necessities of government required a tax of 100 per cent. on all values, or, what would be the result of such a tax, an appropriation of all the property in the state. It is plain that the state would receive no benefit from evidences of debt due by some of her citizens to others, and payable out of the tangible property which the state had already taken." He further says: "But if a debtor is found to be the owner of $1,000, and is assessed for that sum, and his creditor is found to be the owner of his note for $1,000, and is assessed for a like sum, and if the day after the visit of the assessor to the creditor the debtor shall pay his note, it is clear that the same value has been twice taxed, since the debtor has parted with his money, and received only that which is certainly not taxable property in his hands, and which can never afterward be assessed. When the debtor pays his debt he does not abstract or destroy any portion of the taxable property of the state. The aggregate of values remains the same."

So also Chief Justice Wallace says: "Mere credits are a false quantity in ascertaining the sum of wealth which is subject to taxation as property, and in so far as that sum is attempted to be increased by the addition of those credits, property taxation, based thereon, is not only merely fanciful, but necessarily the unconstiutional imposition of an additional tax upon a portion of the property already once taxed." He further says: "The taxation thus imposed nominally upon credits, having resulted in the double taxation of the money, the additional tax must, of course, be paid by some one. And here all human experience, as well as the settled theories of finance, concur that it is not the lender who pays, but the borrower. The borrower is the consumer. The interest which he pays to the lender is the prime cost of the delay for which he has contracted. If the government, by the imposition of additional taxes, increase the cost, the borrower, being the consumer, must pay it."

All the judges agreed in holding that, under the constitution of California, mortgages are not taxable in that State, placing their judgment on the two-fold ground that they were simply "credits," and not actual property, and that to tax them involved double taxation of the same property. If this is good law in California, then it ought to be good law in other States. Nearly all the States lay down the principle in their respective constitutions that taxation shall be equal and uniform, and that all property shall be taxed in proportion to its value, to be ascertained as directed by law; and if this principle excludes mortgage taxation in California, then it ought to have the same effect in other States, unless the California judges have erred in their decision.

Judge Cooley, in his "Treatise on the Law of Taxation" (pp. 150, 151) says: "There is also sometimes what seems to be a double taxation of the same property to two individuals, as where the purchaser of property on credit is taxed on its full value, while the seller is taxed to the same amount on the debt. How this would operate may be readily perceived by supposing the extreme case that all the property in a town is sold on credit; in which case, if the property is taxed to the purchasers and the debts to the sellers, it is manifest that the town taxes twice as much wealth as lies within its borders." This is a forcible illustation of what actually occurs in mortgage taxation, and, indeed, all taxation of credit claims. More property is taxed than really exists. If A builds a house which, including the lot, is valued at $5,000, and for the purpose of building it places a mortgage of $4,000 on the property, and then is taxed on $5,000, and B is also taxed on the mortgage for $4,000 lent by him to A and secured in this way, then a tax is levied on $9,000, when there is really but $5,000 worth of property. A, the borrower, and B, the lender, pay the tax in the first instance; but, ordinarily, B, in the terms of the loan, will manage to place the whole burden upon A, as the condition of making the loan to him. The borrower in the end, and not the lender, pays the tax. Mortgage taxation increases the difficulty of borrowing and imposes upon the borrower a heavier burden than he would otherwise have to bear. It is no benefit, but a positive damage, to the borrowing class.

LETTERS SENT BY POST.

It seems difficult at first sight to reconcile the decision in Taylor v. Jones, (34 L. T. Rep. N. S. 131) with that in Evans v. Nicholson (2) (32 Id., 778.) In the former case the defendant posted a letter containing an order for goods at a post office within the jurisdiction of the Lord Mayor's Court of London, addressed to, and received by, the plaintiff without the jurisdiction, and it was held by the Common Pleas Division that the letter must be taken to speak from the place where it was posted. So far, so good. But in Evans v. Nicholson, the converse case arose. There the defendant posted a letter containing such an admission of indebtedness as amounted to an account stated at a post office without the jurisdiction of the Lord Mayor's Court, addressed to, and received by, the plaintiff within the jurisdiction, and it was held by the Court of Common Pleas that the letter must be taken to speak from the place where it was received. We think, therefore, that we are not altogether unjustified in saying that prima facie that court appears in some sort impliedly to reject the proposition laid down in one of his comedies by Oliver Goldsmith, that a man's hat must either be on his head or off it, and rather to maintain with another distinguished Irishman that there are exceptions to every rule, and that as a bird may be in two places at the same time, so a letter may be taken to speak as well from the place where it is posted as from the place where it is received. The court, however, has ingeniously got rid of this seeming contradiction by endowing a letter in its course through the post with the faculty of continuous speech, from the time of posting to the time of delivery. We should have thought that the present was hardly a time for the introduction of legal fictions, but upon this occasion we are not disposed to be hypercritical, inasmuch as we are unfeignedly glad to see that by means of this judicial subtlety the jurisdiction of the Lord Mayor's Court has, in two opposed instances, been maintained by those who have sometimes been thought to be rather unduly prejudiced against it.

Irrespective of this, we find something in the more recent of the two cases mentioned above, which we take to be well worthy of notice, and we cannot refrain from repeating in connection with Taylor v. Jones what we have on a previous occasion alluded to in connection with Evans v. Nicholson, (ante, p. 192). Our readers may remember that we then pointed out that in that case no notice had been taken of the fact that Dunlop v. Higgins, (1 H. of L. Cas., 381), and its cognate cases, had been the subject of severe criticism in the British and American Telegraph Company v. Colson, (L. Rep. 6 Ex., 108). The same curious omission occurs in Taylor v. Jones, and we may, perhaps, be permitted to avail ourselves of the opportunity thus presented of continuing here the remarks previously offered by us on the subject of the effect of sending a letter by post.

In The British and American Telegraph Company v. Colson, the Court of Exchequer, after stating that the decision in Dunlop v. Higgins might be justified on the peculiar facts of that case, substantially held that where a letter is put into the post a presumptio juris only arises that it will reach its destination, which may be rebutted by proof to the contrary, it having been previously thought that Dunlop v. Higgins was an authority for maintaining that the presumption was one juris et de jure, and that consequently, when a letter is duly posted the contents of it will be binding on the party to whom it is addressed, notwithstanding that it may have been delayed in reaching, or have entirely failed to reach its destination. This, as it appears to us, most rational decision, has, however, failed to secure the approbation of our text-book writers: (see Addison on Contracts, 17; Chitty on Contracts, 12; Smith on Contracts, 150; Broom's Common Law, 308), who seem to think that its authority has been shaken if not destroyed by the subsequent decisions in Harris' case, (L. Rep. 7 Ch., 587), and Wall's case, (L. Rep. 15 Eq., 18) to which we shall therefore proceed, without running the risk of repetition, as in our previous observations space would not permit us to do more than barely allude to them.

Wall's case may be briefly dismissed. It was there held, that the bare unsupported statement of Wall alone was not sufficient to prove that a letter which had been posted to him had not been received by him. The decision turned on a question of evidence, and obviously contains nothing inconsistent with The British and American Telegraph Company v. Colson. But it will be said that Sir R. Malins in the course of his judgment expressed disapproval of that case. He certainly did so in a qualified manner, but it must be remembered that on a previous occasion in Townshend's case (L. Rep. 13 Eq., 148, 153), he had expressed approval of it, and as a matter of fact it is clear, from his language in Wall's case, (sup. 24, 25), that his change of opinion is only owing to what we conceive to be a slight misapprehension of certain dicta of the Lords Justices in Harris' case. He says: "When Townshend's case was before me, and the case of the British and American Telegraph Company v. Colson was cited, finding that the court there had decided the point that the letter was not binding unless received, I adopted that view. I thought there seemed to be considerable doubt, and I appear to have said: 'It seems to be the law, and I think not unreasonably.' But I have thought more of it since then, and my attention has been drawn to what the Lords Justices said in Harris' case, who, although they did not overrule the decision of the court of Exchequer, may be very fairly said to have thrown cold water upon it, for neither of the Lords Justices expressed any approbation of it; and although I did say in Townshend's case, 'It seems to be settled, and not unreasonably,' upon further consideration I do not think it is so reasonably settled." The only question that remains then is, May Harris' case "be very fairly said to have thrown cold water upon" The British and American Telegraph Company v. Colson? With great submission to the opinion of the learned Vice-Chancellor, we think not. In that case a letter of application for shares in a company was put into the post and duly received by the directors. One hundred shares were allotted, and the secretary of the company put into the post a letter addressed to the applicant, informing him of this. The letter was duly received by the applicant, but before he received it, and without waiting the due course of the post, he had dispatched a letter declining to accept any shares. This completely differs the case from the one in the Exchequer, and accordingly it was held that the contract was completed when the letter announcing the allotment was put into the post, Lord Justice James in his judgment expressly saying: "The British and American Telegraph Co. v. Colson established a distinction which does not apply to this case at all. The court there held that though the posting of the letter, if the letter arrives, is a complete contract, yet if from any cause the letter never arrives at all, then there is a difference." (L. Rep. 7 Ch., 592); and Lord Justice Mellish, though he declined the superfluous task of reconciling The British and American Telegraph Company v. Colson with Dunlop v. Higgins, stating that he saw no reason to disagree with the former case, "because although the contract is complete at the time when the letter accepting the offer is posted, yet it may be subject to a condition subsequent, that if the letter does not arrive in due course of post, then the parties may act on the assumption that the offer has not been accepted. That, however, is not the case before us; the letter did arrive in due time, and the question is, whether, under that state of circumstances, the parties are bound by the contract." (Ib., 597). "This," says Mr. Pollock, in his recent work on Contracts, (16), "must probably be taken as the best expression of the existing law that can be arrived at."

The result of what has been said, then, is, that putting Wall's case aside, so far from Harris' case having shaken the decision in the Exchequer, it appears rather to have confirmed and strengthened it, and that being so it would, we think, be well if that decision were more fully recognized as an authority by text-book writers, for it is very possibly owing to their strictures that the attention of the courts is not called to it upon occasions when, as in Evans v. Nicholson, and Taylor v. Jones, (see also Dickinson v. Dodds, 34 L. T. Rep., N. S. 19), its citation would naturally have appeared inevitable. Nothing can be more calculated to confuse both the law student and the practitioner than to find what would doubtless strike him as a well considered and rational decision, apparently treated as a dead letter in his books and in the law reports, unless it has been clearly overruled by a later authority, which is certainly not the case with The British and American Telegraph Co. v. Colson.—The London Law Times.

LVI. NEW HAMPSHIRE REPORTS.

We are under obligations to Hon. JOHN M. SHIRLEY, official reporter, for advance sheets of the LVI. Volume of New Hampshire Reports, from which we take the following head-notes:

PROMISSORY NOTE — FRAUDULENT ALTERATION.

Gerrish v. Glines, p. 9.

Where a negotiable promissory note was made payable upon a condition, and the condition was written below the note on the same piece of paper—Held, that the notes and condition were parts of a single entire contract, and that the fraudulent removal of the condition, by tearing the paper, was such a material alteration as rendered the note void in the hands of a bona fide holder.

HIGHWAY—NEGLIGENCE.

Cofran v. Sanbornton, p. 12.

A highway being encumbered with snow, under such circumstances that the town was not in fault, a person who held the office of surveyor of the district, undertook to assist the plaintiff over the incumbrance, and, by reason of his want of ordinary care, the plaintiff's horse was injured. Held, that these facts did not tend to show any liability of the town.

LAYING OUT HIGHWAYS—NOTICE.

Knox v. Epsom, p. 14.

Persons interested in the question of the laying out of a new highway, but not entitled by statute to notice of the petition, cannot object to the sufficiency of the notice to a town entitled by law to notice.

CHANGE OF COURTS—SERVICE OF WRITS—PRACTICE.

Jenkins v. Sherburne. p. 17.

A writ was issued from the Supreme judicial court, dated May 25, 1874, and near that time the defendant's property was attached. Said writ was made returnable to the Supreme judicial court at the October term, 1874. By an act approved July 10, 1874, and which took effect August 18, 1874, the Supreme judicial court was abolished, and its jurisdiction and trial terms conferred upon the Circuit court. Held, that a summons issued from the Circuit court and returnable at the October term of said court, dated Sept. 15, 1874, and tested in the name of the Chief Justice of the Circuit Court, and seasonably served upon the defendant, was in the form prescribed by law.

PROMISSORY NOTES — FRAUD — INNOCENT HOLDERS.

Matthews v. Crosby, p. 21.

A made his promissory note, expressed to be for value received, whereby he promised to pay B, or bearer, forty dollars profits with interest, one year from date. As to A, the note was entirely without consideration, and was obtained from him by fraud. The plaintiff subsequently became the innocent, bona fide purchaser thereof before maturity. Held, that the instrument in the hands of the plaintiff was a valid, negotiable promissory note, and might be recovered; that the word "profits," as to the plaintiff, did not express or suggest a contingency or uncertainty, but an absolute existing fund as the consideration of the promise, and on account of which the money was to be paid; and that the word, as inserted in the note, was not such an apparent defect or infirmity as to put the plaintiff upon inquiry.

POLICE JUSTICE OF MANCHESTER—CONSTRUCTION OF STATUTES—COMPENSATION FOR SERVICES—SALARY—FEES AND COSTS—CASE OVERRULED.

Upton v. Manchester, p. 54.

The charter of the dity of Manchester provided that all costs in criminal proceedings, which were not paid to the judge of the police court by respondents, should be made up, taxed, "paid and satisfied in like manner as provided by law in cases of justices of the peace." The effect of this was, to allow the judge of the police court to recover of the city, and to retain to his own use, those costs, in addition to his annual salary. Gen. Stats., ch. 250, sec. 13. Subsequent amendatory acts prescribe the salary of said judge, which is declared to be "in full compensation for all services performed by him in behalf of said city, * * and for all fees in actions for which the city would otherwise be responsible." Held, the police justice is not entitled to recover of the city fees in cases prosecuted by the city, in which city officers were complainants, and in which no costs were paid by the respondents.

Manchester v. Potter, 30 N. H., 409, overruled.

UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT.

PROCEEDINGS OF.

Thursday, April 13, 1876.

On motion of W. R. Steele, Edward C. Kehr. of St. Louis, Mo., was admitted.

On motion of T. D. Lincoln, William C. Wilson, of LaFayette, Ind., was admitted to practice.

No. 212. Thomas Sherlock et al. v. Charles Alling, administrator, etc. The argument of this cause was contined by T. D. Lincoln for plaintiffs, and by C. A. Korubly for defendant, and concluded by T. D. Lincoln for plaintiffs.

No. 78. (assigned). Charles R. Tyng et al. v. Moses H. Grinnell. This cause was argued by Assistant Attorney-General Smith for defendant, and submitted by C. Donohue for plaintiffs.

No. 210. Edward H. Wilson and Samuel V. Niles, executors, et al., v. the Cairo and Fulton Railroad Company. This cause was submitted on printed argument by U. M. Rose for appellants.

Adjourned until Monday at 12 o'clock.

Monday, April 17.

No. 170. James B. Pace v. Rush Burgess, collector and etc. In error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Virginia. Bradley, J., delivered the opinion, affirming the judgment of the Circuit Court in this cause with costs.

No. 184. John Montgomery Jr., assignee and etc., v. The Bucyrus Machine Works. In error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Western District of Missouri. Davis, J., delivered the opinion, affirming the judgment of the Circuit Court in this cause, with costs.

THE ILLINOIS TAX CASES.

No. 701. Henry B. Miller, collector, and etc., v. Morris K. Jessup et al. No. 702. Isaac Taylor, collector, and etc., et al., v. James F. Secor and William Tracey. No. 703. Herman Leib, H. B. Miller, collector and etc., et al., v. Henry P. Kidder and Daniel O. Stone. Appeal from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Illinois. Miller, J., delivered the opinion of the court, reversing the decree of the Circuit Court, with costs, and remanding the cause, with directions to dissolve the injunctions and dismissed the bill.

The court holds that the theory of the system of railroad taxation, established by the act of the State of Illinois in 1872, the operations of which the court below enjoined, is manifestly to treat the railroad tracks, rolling-stock, franchise and capital as a unit for taxation, and to distribute the assessed value of this unit according to the length of the road, in each county, city and town, bears to the whole length of the road, and that such a system is entirely within the authority of the State to create. After an elaborate examination of the objections made to the law, the court says that the question being upon the validity of the State law as affected by the State Constitution, it is together with the question of the construction of the statute altogether within the State jurisdiction, and that the decisions of the State courts in such cases are to be accepted as the rule of decision in the Federal courts, and as the State court has already decided the same question, involving the same consideration urged here, the judgment would be reversed for that reason, independent of any other decrees.

The cases were conducted solely by Attorney-General Edsall for the State. He has followed them and fought the railroads, and everybody else who have attempted to prevent the State from collecting its revenue, no matter how unjust such revenue laws were, believing it was his duty to enforce them.

No. 186. Robert A. Phillips v. Charles W. Payne. In Error to the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia. Swayne, J., delivered the opinion, affirming the judgment of the Supreme Court in this cause, with costs.

No. 196. Sarah C. Savage, executrix, v. The United States. Appeal from the Court of Claims. Clifford, J., delivered the opinion, affirming the judgment of the Court of Claims.

No. 151. G. DeRosset Lamar, executor and etc., v. Albert G. Browne et al., special agent and etc. In error to Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Massachusetts. Waite, C. J., delivered the opinion, affirming the judgment of the Circuit Court with costs. Dissenting, Field, J.

No. 210. E. H. Wilson and S.V. Niles, executors, and etc., et al. v. The Cairo & Fulton Railroad Co. Appeal from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Arkansas. Waite, C. J., announced the decision of the court, affirming the decree of the Circuit Court, with costs and interests.

No. 900. Michael McStay et al. v. Jos. S. Friedman. The motion to dismiss this cause was submitted on printed arguments, by A. A. Sargent in support of the same. Leave granted plaintiffs to file brief in opposition to motion.

No. 211. Frederick Roberts et al. v. The propeller Galatea, etc. The argument of this cause was commenced by R. D. Benedict for appellants.

Adjourned until Tuesday at 12 o clock.

Tuesday, April 18.

On motion of G. L. Fort, Geo. S. Eldridge, of Ottawa, Ill. was admitted.

On motion of A. H. Jackson, E. St. Julien Cox, of St. Peter, Minn., was admitted.

No. 211. Frederick Roberts et al. v. The propeller Galatea and etc. The argument of this cause was continued by R. D. Benedict for appellants, and Wm. M. Evarts for appellee, and concluded by R. D. Benedict for appellant.

No. 195. (in place of No. 212). Jacob Magee and Henry Hall v. the Manhatten Life Ins. Co. This cause was argued by P. Phillips for plaintiffs, and by J. D. McPherson for defendants.

THE SOUTH TOWN ELECTION.

No political excitement has ever been so great in this city as that over the fraud committed in the election of the South Town. Thousands met at the exposition building with the expressed intention of hanging those who committed the fraud. It was claimed that the vault in which the ballots were placed for safe keeping, before being counted, was entered at midnight, one of the boxes opened, a large number of tickets extracted and others substituted in their place so as to entirely change the result of the election; in fact when the votes came to be counted there was some fourteen hundred more names on the poll books than tickets in the boxes, which showed conclusively that somebody had been guilty of fraud. After the counting of the ballots and the declaring of the result, the town board, consisting of the justices of the peace, the town clerk and supervisor, fortified by the opinion of some of the best lawyers at the Chicago bar, that they had the power, called a special meeting, heard evidence of the fraud, found that there had been a failure to elect and declared the offices vacant and filled the vacancies by appointment. Justices Haines and Meech dissented from the opinion of a majority of the board, being of the opinion that the board in the case made had no power to appoint. The question of power is one that is not free from all doubt. If there was a vacancy in fact either from failure to elect, death or other cause, there could be no question that the board would have the right to fill the vacancy by appointment, but when there has been an election and the judges have counted the votes and the certificates of election have been made out and the result declared altogether, another question is presented, in such a case can the board hear evidence of the fraud and find that a vacancy exists, or must the case be first brought before the court having jurisdiction conferred upon it by statute, to try contested election cases. Suppose a proceeding was instituted by the Republicans who claim to have been elected, in a court of competent jurisdiction, and it should appear by the evidence of the man who stuffed the ballot box, and others, that they actually received a majority of all the votes cast at the election and the court should so find, what would become of the officers appointed by the town board? The officers appointed are all of them men of ability and unquestioned integrity, the only wonder is that any of them would accept a town office. It could only be done at a great sacrifice to themselves for the purpose of serving the public.

NEGOTIABILITY OF BILL OF LADING—STATUTE OF LOUISIANA.

The Supreme Court of Pa., in Henry v. the Philadelphia W. Co., 1 Louisiana Law Journal, 112, where a statute of Louisiana provided that the endorsement of a bill of lading by the holder carried the right of property in the goods specified in the bill to the transferee, so far as to give validity to any pledge, lien or transfer to the transferee, and that such bill of lading should be negotiable by endorsement in blank or specially, in the same manner and to the same extent as bills of exchange or promissory notes. A shipped certain goods, took a bill of lading, and was in actual possession of them by delivery from the factors. Held, under these circumstances, and by operation of the statute, A stood in a position to transfer the property in the goods to a bona fide pledgee for value, and without notice.

LAW DEFINED.—The word "law" is used in our language (says Sir Edward Creasy) in many various senses. It sometimes means a mere habit or tendency; and sometimes it merely expresses the general uniform sequences of phenomena which we observe in external nature. Dismissing these and other metaphorical usages of the term, and dealing only with the word "law" as it applies to man, to his rights and duties, we find one great line of distinction between the modes in which the term is employed. In one class of meanings, "law" comprises general doctrines of right and wrong, and of man's general duties towards his Creator and towards his neighbor; whereas in another class of meanings "law" is narrowed towards the precise sense of a definite imperative rule of conduct prescribed by a political superior, who has the power and the will to enforce by practical means the observance of such rule. "Law" in the first and ampler sense may be called "Moral Law"; in its narrower and stricter sense it is generally called "Positive Law."

THE RIGHT OF PROPERTY IN THE WEDDING RING.—At the Sheffield County court on the 30th ult., the judge (Mr. T. Ellison) gave judgment in a case which involved the question of a wife's control over a wedding ring. The wife died at her mother's house, and shortly before her death gave her her wedding ring. The husband now claimed the value of it as a set off against a claim brought against him for his wife's board and lodging. In giving judgment his honor said a wedding ring came under a class of articles which the wife had separately and independently of her husband, and she had power to keep them, but she had no power to give them away or to leave them from her husband. On the contrary the husband had power to give them away even during her life. In this case the wife had no power to give away the ring, and his judgment must be accordingly.

CHICAGO LEGAL NEWS.

The Courts.

UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT

Nos. 702, 701 and 703.—OCTOBER TERM, 1875.

No. 702.—ISAAC TAYLOR, Collector of Peoria County, et al., Appellants,
v.
JAMES F. SECOR and WILLIAM TRACY.

No. 701.—HENRY B. MILLER, Collector of Cook County, Illinois, et al., Appellants,
v.
MORRIS K. JESSUP et al.

No. 703.—HERMAN LIEB, Clerk, and HENRY B. MILLER, Collector of Cook County, et al., Appellants,
v.
HENRY P. KIDDER and DANIEL O. STONE.

Appeals from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Illinois.

1. While this court does not lay down any absolute rule limiting the powers of a court of equity in restraining the collection of taxes, it declares that it is essential that every case be brought within some of the recognized rules of equity jurisdiction, and that neither illegality or irregularity in the proceedings, nor error or mistake in the valuation, nor the hardship or injustice of the law, provided it be constitutional, nor any grievance which can be remedied by a suit at law, either before or after the payment of the tax, will authorize an injunction against its collection.

2. This rule is founded on the principle that the levy of taxes is a legislative and not a judicial function, and the court can neither make or cause to be made a new assessment, if the one complained of be erroneous, and also in the necessity that the taxes, without which the state could not exist, should be regularly and promptly paid into its treasury.

3. Quere: Whether the same rigid rule against equitable relief would apply to taxes levied solely by municipal corporations for corporate purposes as that here applied to State taxes? Probably not.

4. No injunction, preliminary or final, can be granted to stay collection of taxes, until it is shown that all the taxes conceded to be due, or which the court can see ought to be paid, or which can be shown to be due by affidavits, has been paid or tendered without demanding a receipt in full.

5. While the Constitution of Illinois requires a taxation, in general, to be uniform and equal, it declares, in express terms, that a large class of persons engaged in special pursuits, among whom are persons or corporations owning franchises and privileges, may be taxed as the legislature shall determine, by a general law, uniform as to the class upon which it operates, and under this provision a statute is not unconstitutional which prescribes a different rule of taxation for railroads from that for individuals.

6. Nor does it violate any provision of the Constitution of the United States.

7. The capital stock, franchises, and all the real and personal property of corporations are justly liable to taxation, and a rule which ascertains the value of all this by ascertaining the cash value of the funded debt and of the shares of the capital stock as the basis of assessment, is probably as fair as any other.

8. Deducting this from the assessed value of all the tangible real and personal property which is also taxed, leaves the real value of the capital stock and franchise as subject to taxation as justly as any other mode, all modes being more or less imperfect.

9. It is neither in conflict with the Constitution of Illinois, nor inequitable, that the entire taxable property of the railroad company should be ascertained by the State Board of Equalization, and the State, county and city taxes should be collected within each municipality on this assessment, in the proportion which the length of the road within such municipality bears to the whole length of the road within the State.

10. The action of the Board of Equalization in increasing the assessed value of the property of a railroad company or an individual, above the return made to the board, does not require a notice to the party to make it valid, and the courts can not substitute their judgment as to such valuation for that of the board.

11. The Supreme Court of the State of Illinois having decided that the law complained of in these cases is valid under her Constitution, and having construed the statute, this court adopts the decision of that court on the statute as a rule to be followed in the Federal courts.

Mr. Justice MILLER delivered the opinion of the court.

The three cases whose titles stand at the head of this opinion, are all appeals from decrees of the Circuit Court for the Northern District of Illinois, enjoining the appellants from the collection of taxes assessed by the proper officers of the State of Illinois against three several railroad companies, organized under the laws of that State, and doing business in it. The plaintiffs in the first named of the above suits, are mortgagees of the Toledo, Peoria, and Warsaw Railroad Company. In the other two cases the complainants are stockholders of the respective companies whose interests they represent, namely, the Chicago and Alton Railroad Company in No. 701, and the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy Railroad Company, in No. 703.

The act of the legislature of Illinois of March 30, 1872, under which the taxes complained of were assessed, makes special provisions for the taxation of railroads and other corporations, the main feature of which is the purpose of leaving to each county, city and town, the power of assessing for taxation what is properly local in the same manner that other similar property is taxed in that municipality, and at the same time to subject to like taxation on some fair basis that which is not in its nature so clearly local, but which, by reason of its being appurtenant or incident to the railroad, should pay its share to the state, to all the counties, towns and cities, through which any part of the road runs. The theory of the system is manifestly to treat the railroad track, its rolling stock, its franchise, and its capital as a unit for taxation, and to distribute the assessed value of this unit according as the length of the road in each county, city and town, bears to the whole length of the road.

It provides, therefore, for three separate valuations:

1. Of the real estate in each county, city and town, which is not a part of the track and right of way, and of the personal property, such as tools, implements, etc., which remain permanently at that locality. These are valued by the local assessor and taxed by the local authorities in precisely the same manner that other real and personal property are assessed and taxed.

2. The railroad track, including the right of way, the grading and superstructure, and such depots, buildings, and other improvements as are on it, and all the rolling stock and other personal property not local.

The entire value of this, owned by any company in the state, is ascertained by a report made by the proper officer of the railroad company, submitted to a State Board of Equalization, which fixes this value finally, and each county, city, and town taxes, the company on so much of this assessment as the length of the track within that locality bears to the whole length of the track assessed by the board.

These two subjects of assessment are by the statute called the tangible property of the company.

It is obvious, however, that while a fair assessment under these two descriptions of property will include all the visible or tangible property of the corporation, it may or may not include all its wealth. There may be other property of a class not visible or tangible which ought to respond to taxation, and which the state has a right to subject to taxation. Thus it may occur, as in fact is claimed by one of these companies, that, being insolvent, and its earnings not being sufficient to pay anything beyond its necessary expenses for operating the road and its repairs, that this tangible property represents more than the real wealth of the company and its property. While on the other hand another one of these companies is so rich that, after paying its expenses and interest on a large amount of debt, it declares large dividends, and this interest and these dividends, when looked to in reference to what is called the tangible property, show that there is here another element of wealth which ought to pay its share of the taxes.

3. This element the State of Illinois calls the value of the franchise and capital stock of the corporation. The value of the right to use this tangible property for purposes of gain. And this constitutes the third valuation, which is likewise to be made by the board of equalization, and which, when thus ascertained, is subjected to the taxation of the state, and the counties, towns, and cities, by the same rule that the value of the roadbed is, namely, according to the length of the track in each taxing locality. The word capital stock, as here used, does not mean the shares of the stock, but the aggregate capital of the company. This is obvious from the proviso to the fourth paragraph of section three of the revenue law. As this paragraph lies at the basis of these controversies, it is here given verbatim:

"The capital stock of all companies and associations now or hereafter created under the laws of this state, shall be so valued by the State board of equalization as to ascertain and determine, respectively, the fair cash value of such capital stock, including the franchise, over and above the assessed value of the tangible property of such company or association. Said board shall adopt such rules and principles for ascertaining the fair cash value of such capital stock as to it may seem equitable and just; and such rules and principles, when so adopted, if not inconsistent with this act, shall be as binding and of the same effect as if contained in this act—subject, however, to such change, alteration, or amendment as may be found, from time to time, to be necessary, by said board: Provided, That in all cases where the tangible property or capital stock of any company or association is assessed under this act, the shares of capital stock of any such company or association shall not be assessed or taxed in this State. This clause shall not apply to the capital stock or shares of capital stock of banks organized under the general banking laws of this State."

That the franchise, capital stock, business, and profits of all corporations are liable to taxation in the place where they do business, and by the State which creates them, admits of no dispute at this day. "Nothing can be more certain in legal decisions," says this court in Society for Savings v. Coite, 6 Wall., 607, "than that the privileges and franchises of a private corporation, and all trades and avocations by which the citizens acquire a livelihood, may be taxed by a State for the support of a State government."—(State Freight Tax Case, 15 Wall., 232: State Tax on Gross Receipts, 15 Wall. 284.) But it has been a desideratum, perhaps not yet fully attained, to find a method of taxing this species of property which will be at the same time just to the owners of it, equal and fair in its relations to taxes or other property, and which will enforce the just contribution that such property should pay for the benefits which, more than property generally, it receives at the hands of government.

The tax on the deposits of savings banks, in Savings Bank v. Coite, was held to be of this class by the court, the tax on freight, in the Freight Tax Cases, and the tax on gross receipts, in the other cases by the State of Pennsylvania, are all attempts at arriving at the desired result in the best mode.

The statute of Illinois and the rule adopted by the board of equalization, under the power conferred by the clause we have just recited, may not be the wisest mode of doing complete justice in this difficult matter, but we confess we have on the whole seen no scheme which is better calculated to effect the purpose, so far as railroad corporations are concerned, of taxing at once all their property and of making the tax just and equal in its relation to other taxable property of the State.

The rule adopted by the board is as follows:

"First. The market or fair cash value of the shares of capital stock, and the market or fair cash value of the debt (excluding from such debt the indebtedness for current expenses) shall be combined or added together; and the aggregate amount so ascertained shall be taken and held to be the fair cash value of the capital stock, including the franchise, respectively, of such companies and associations.

"Second. From the aggregate amount ascertained as aforesaid, there shall be deducted the aggregate amount of the equalized or assessed valuation of all the tangible property, respectively, of such companies and associations, (such equalized or assessed valuation being taken, in each case, as the same may be determined by the equalization or assessment of property by this board,) and the amount remaining, in each case, if any, shall be taken and held to be the amount and fair cash value of the capital stock, including the franchise, which this board is required by law to assess, respectively, against companies and associations now or hereafter created under the laws of this State."

It may be assumed for all practical purposes, and it is perhaps absolutely true, that every railroad company in Illinois has a bonded indebtedness secured by one or more mortgages. The parties who deal in such bonds are generally keen and farsighted men, and most careful in their investments. Hence the value which these securities hold in market if one of the surest criterias, as far as it goes, of the value of the road as a security for the payment of those bonds.

These mortgages are, however, liens on the road, and, taking precedence of the shares of the stockholder, they may or may not extinguish the value of his shares. They must in any event affect that value to the exact amount of the aggregate debts. For all that goes to pay that debt and its interest diminishes pro tanto the dividend of the shareholder and the value of his share.

It is, therefore, obvious that when you have ascertained the current cash value of the whole funded debt, and the current cash value of the entire number of shares, you have by the action of those who above all others can best estimate it, ascertained the true value of the road, all its property, its capital stock, and its franchises, for these are all represented by the value of its bonded debt and of the shares of its capital stock.

This would of itself be, perhaps, the fairest basis of taxation for the State at large, if all railroads were solvent and paid the interest promptly on their funded debt. But this has never been the case in Illinois, and it is doubtful if this happy state of affairs is likely to prevail soon in that or any other State of the Union. If taxes were assessable alone on the value of the capital stock and franchises of the corporation, cases might be found where these were worth nothing, and such companies would pay no tax even for their real estate and personal property. And this is precisely the main argument of counsel for the Toledo, Peoria and Warsaw Railroad Company in opposition to the law and to the rule of the board of equalization. But individuals do not escape taxation on their real and personal property because they are insolvent. In several of the States many men in effect pay tax on their lots or lands, and on the mortgage which covers it and exceeds it in value, and on a large amount of personal property, while the mortgage debt exceeds in amount all that they are worth in the world. No State has ventured to establish the principle of permitting its visible, tangible property to escape taxation, relying solely on a tax imposed on the individual on the basis of his estimated wealth in excess of his debts.

The system adopted by the statute of Illinois, and the rule of the board of equalization, preserve this principle of taxing all the tangible property at its value, and taxing the capital stock and franchise at their value, if there be any after deducting the value of the tangible property. The case of Toledo, Peoria, and Warsaw Company, as we have said, is used as an illustration of the inequality which this rule works, and which counsel say is forbidden by the constitution of the State, thus rendering the tax assessed against it void. That company is insolvent and in the hands of a receiver. It is unable to pay any interest on its bonds. Its capital stock is of no value. But the board of equalization assessed the capital stock and franchise at $2,003,415, and its tangible property at $2,629,367, thus assessing a property which pays but little, if anything, beyond its running expenses, at the sum of $4,632,782.

This sounds plausible, but it is nothing more. Concede for the present that the capital stock is sunk and is of no value—concede that the funded debt of the company has at present no market value, or is unsalable, there remains what is valued or worth over $2,600,000 of real and personal property, which, like all other property of individuals or corporations, ought to pay its proportion of the public burdens. There also remains the value of the franchise, which is not destroyed by the circumstance that the road does not pay interest on its debt. Does anybody believe that this debt is of no value—that the holders of it attach no value to this franchise? Are they willing to give up the right to operate the road, to receive freights and fares, to endeavor to make it pay something more than the mere value of the personal property of the track, the depots, the grounds, the rolling stock, and other tangible property? Is it supposed by anyone that they intend or will ever sell these separately or apart from the right to use them as a railroad? Why do not the bondholders sell all these things under their mortgage at auction as a man would sell town lots and household furniture, and horses and carriages? The reason is too clear to escape observation. It is because in the case of the railroad there is attached to all this property and goes with it a privilege, a right to use it through the whole extent of the richest counties of Illinois, in transporting persons and property, in a manner which adds immensely to its value when considered as so much iron, so much land, and so much personal property. By virtue of this privilege or franchise, this is all aggregated into a unit, well adapted to make money by its use in that way, with a chartered right to use it for that purpose.

It is this franchise which the legislature of Illinois intended to tax, which it had a right to tax, and in taxing it committed no injustice, if it was fairly assessed, though the corporation which holds it may be so utterly bankrupt that it must necessarily pass from it into other hands. In those hands, disembarrassed of its overweight of debt, who shall say that it is not worth $2,000,000, and who shall say that such is not the real value now of this franchise?

We shall presently consider the extent to which a court of justice can enter upon the consideration of this question: but we take occasion here to say that in the view we have taken of the matter there is no sufficient evidence in these cases to show that if the rule adopted by the board be just, that it has been unfairly applied to any of these roads, except in the single case of a mistake in the amount of the bonds of the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy Railroad Company—a mistake induced by the report of that company's officer to the State auditor.

Another objection to the system of taxation by the State is, that the rolling stock, capital stock and franchise are personal property, and that this, with all other personal property, has a local situs at the principal place of business of the corporation, and can be taxed by no other county, city or town, but the one where it is so situated.

This objection is based upon the general rule of law that personal property, as to its situs, follows the domicile of its owner. It may be doubted very reasonably whether such a rule can be applied to a railroad corporation, as between the different localities embraced by its line of road. But, after all, the rule is merely the law of the State which recognizes it, and when it is called into operation as to property located in one State and owned by a resident of another, it is a rule of comity in the former State rather than an absolute principle in all cases.—(Green v. Van Buskirk, 5 Wall., 312.) Like all other laws of a State, it is, therefore, subject to legislative repeal, modification, or limitation, and when the legislature of Illinois declared that it should not prevail in assessing personal property of railroad companies for taxation, it simply exercised an ordinary function of legislation. Whether allowing the rule to stand as to taxation of individuals, and changing it as to railroads or other corporations, it violated any rule of uniformity prescribed by the constitution of the State, we will consider when we come to the constitutional objections to the statute.

It is further objected that the railroad track, capital stock and franchise is not assessed in each county where it lies according to its value there, but according to an aggregate value of the whole, in which each county, city and town collects taxes according to the length of the track within its limits.

This, it is said, works injustice both to the counties and to the companies. To the counties and cities, by depriving them of the benefit of this value as a basis of local taxation. To the company, by subjecting its track and franchises, on the basis of this general value, to the taxation of the counties and towns, varying, as they do, in rate, without the benefit of the rule of assessment which prevails in those counties in the valuation of other and similar property. But, as we have already said, a railroad must be regarded for many, indeed for most purposes, as a unit. The track of the road is but one track from one end of it to the other, and, except in its use as one track, is of little value. In this track, as a whole, each county through which it passes has an interest much more important than it has in the limited part of it lying within its boundary. Destroy, by any means, a few miles of this track within an interior county, so as to cut off the connection between the two parts thus separated, and if it could not be repaired or replaced, its effect upon the value of the remainder of the road is out of all proportion to the mere local value of the part of it destroyed. A similar effect on the value of the interior of the road would follow the destruction of that end of the road lying in Chicago, or some other place where its largest traffic centers. It may well be doubted whether any better mode of determining the value of that portion of the track within any one county has been devised than to ascertain the value of the whole road, and apportion the value within the county by its relative length to the whole.

There are other objections urged by counsel against the equity and fairness of the Illinois mode of assessing and taxing railroad companies as a system. But we cannot notice them all. Those above commented on are the most important.

There is, however, an objection urged to the conduct of the board of equalization, resting on the action of the board in these particular cases, in which they are charged with a gross violation of the law to the prejudice of the corporations, which we will consider.

The statute requires the proper officers of the railroad companies to furnish to the State auditor a schedule of the various elements already mentioned as necessary in applying the statutory rule of valuation. It is charged that the board of equalization increased the estimates of value so reported to the auditor, without notice to the companies, and without sufficient evidence that it ought to be done, and it is strenuously urged upon us that for want of this notice the whole assessment of the property and levy of taxes is void.

It is hard to believe that such a proposition can be seriously made. If the increased valuation of property by the board without notice is void as to the railroad companies, it must be equally void as to every other owner of property in the State, when the value assessed upon it by the local assessor has been increased by the board of equalization. How much tax would thus be rendered void it is impossible to say. The main function of this board is to equalize these assessments over the whole State. If they find that a county has had its property assessed too high in reference to the general standard, they may reduce its valuation; if it has been fixed too low they raise it to that standard. When they raise it in any county, they necessarily raise it on the property of every individual who owns any in that county. Must each one of them have notice and a separate hearing? If a railroad company is by law entitled to such notice, surely every individual is equally entitled to it. Yet if this be so, the expense of giving notice, the delay of hearing each individual, would render the exercise of the main function of this board impossible. The very moment you come to apply to the individual the right claimed by the corporation in this case, its absurdity is apparent. Nor is there any hardship in the matter. This board has its time of sitting fixed by law. Its sessions are not secret. No obstruction exists to the appearance of any one before it to assert a right, or resent a wrong, and in the business of assessing taxes, this is all that can be reasonably asked.

As we do not know on what evidence the board acted in regard to these railroads, or whether they did not act on knowledge which they possessed themselves, and as all valuation of property is more or less matter of opinion, we see no reason why the opinion of this court, or of the Circuit court, should be better, or should be substituted for that of the board, whose opinion the law has declared to be the one to govern in the matter.

It is said that the statute of Illinois is void, because it violates the principles of uniformity, and taxes corporations in a manner different from that which governs taxation of individuals.

The sections of the constitution relied on in support of this proposition, are sections one and ten of article nine, which are as follows:

§ 1. "The general assembly shall provide such revenue as may be needful by levying a tax by valuation, so that every person and corporation shall pay a tax in proportion to the value of his, her, or its property; such value to be ascertained by some person or persons, to be elected or appointed in such manner as the general assembly shall direct, and not otherwise; but the general assembly shall have power to tax peddlers, auctioneers, brokers, hawkers, merchants, commission merchants, showmen, jugglers, innkeepers, grocery-keepers, liquor dealers, toll bridges, ferries, insurance, telegraph and express interests or business, venders of patents, and persons or corporations owing or using franchises and privileges, in such manner as it shall, from time to time, direct by general law, uniform as to the class upon which it operates."

§ 10. "The general assembly shall not impose taxes upon municipal corporations, or the inhabitants or property thereof, for corporate purposes, but shall require that all the taxable property within the limits of municipal corporations shall be taxed for the payment of debts contracted under authority of law, such taxes to be uniform in respect to persons and property within the jurisdiction of the body imposing the same."

As regards this latter section there is no claim that the rate of taxation levied by any municipal corporation, on the assessed value of railroad property within its limits, is greater than on other property.

Nor is it asserted that the valuation of that part of the property which the statute regards as strictly local, namely, real estate not a part of the track, and tools and implements used exclusively within the locality, has been assessed on any other principle than that which is applied to the property of individuals.

But the contention is that the rule of treating the road, its rolling stock and franchises as a unit, and assessing it as a whole, on which each municipality levies its taxes according to the length of the road within its limits, violates the principles of this section. We have already discussed this question, and are of opinion that taxes assessed by that rule on the railroad property by the municipality are uniform when the rate of taxation is the same on the assessment thus ascertained that it is on other property.

This court has expressly held in two cases, where the road of a corporation ran through different States, that a tax upon the income or franchise of the road was properly apportioned by taking the whole income or value of the franchise, and the length of the road within each State, as the basis of taxation.—(The Delaware Railroad Tax Case, 18 Wall., 208; Erie R. R. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 21 Wall., 492.)

As to section one, we need not inquire very closely whether the mode adopted by the statute and the rules of the board of equalization produces a valuation for railroad companies different from that of individuals, though, as we have already said, it does not appear to us to produce any inequality to the prejudice of the companies. But we need not pursue that inquiry very closely, because the latter part of the section in express terms authorizes the legislature to "tax persons and corporations owning or using franchises, in such manner as it shall from time to time direct, by general law," and the only restriction on the power, as applied to this class, is that it shall be "uniform as to the class upon which it operates."

There can be no doubt that all the classes named in this clause, including peddlers, showmen, innkeepers, ferries, express, insurance, and telegraph companies, are taken out of the general rule of uniformity prescribed by the first clause, and the only limitation as to them is that of uniformity as to the class upon which the law shall operate. That is, innkeepers may be taxed by one, ferries by another, railroads by another, provided that the rule as to innkeepers be uniform as to all innkeepers, the rule as to ferries uniform as to all ferries, and the rule as to railroad companies be uniform as to all railroad companies. As we have seen no evidence that the rule by which railroad property is taxed is not uniform in its action on all the railroad companies of Illinois, we can perceive no opposition to the constitution of the State in that rule.

But suppose it were otherwise; perfect equality and perfect uniformity of taxation as regards individuals or corporations, or the different classes of property subject to taxation is a dream unrealized. It must be admitted that the system which most nearly attains this is the best. But the most complete system which can be devised must, when we consider the immense variety of subjects which it necessarily embraces, be imperfect. And when we come to its application to the property of all the citizens, and of those who are not citizens, in all the localities of a large State like Illinois, the application being made by men whose judgments and opinions must vary as they are affected by all the circumstances brought to bear upon each individual, the result must inevitably partake largely of the imperfection of human nature and of the evidence on which human judgment is founded.—(Tappan v. Merchants' National Bank, 19 Wall., 504; Weber v. Renhard, 73 Penn. State R., 373; Commonwealth v. Savings Bank, 5 Allen, 247; Allen v. Drew, 44 Vermont, 174.)

But let us suppose that the complaints made in these cases against the taxes were well founded; that the mode adopted by the board of equalization to ascertain the value of the franchise and capital stock is not the best mode; that it produces unequal and unjust results in some cases; that the same is true of the mode of ascertaining the basis of assessment for the taxation of municipalities; that the board of equalization increased the entire assessment on each company without sufficient evidence;—in short, let us suppose that in these and many other respects the proceedings were faulty and illegal. Does it follow that in every such case a court of equity will restrain the collection of the tax by injunction, or will enjoin the collection of the whole tax when it is obvious that in justice a large part of it should be paid, and if not paid, that the complainant escapes taxation altogether?

We propose to consider these questions for a moment, because the immense weight of taxation rendered necessary by the debts of the United States, of the several States, and of the counties, cities, and towns, has resulted very naturally in a resort to every possible expedient to evade its force.

It has been repeatedly decided that neither the mere illegality of the tax complained of, nor its injustice nor irregularity, of themselves give the right to an injunction in a court of equity.—(Mooers v. Smedley, 6 Johns. Chy., 27; Dodd v. Hartford, 26 Conn., 239; Green v. Munford, 5 Rhode Island, 478; Messert v. Supervisors of Columbia, 50 Barbour, 190; Dow v. Chicago, 11 Wall., 108; Hannewinkle v. Georgetown, 15 Wall., 548.)

The government of the United States has provided, both in the customs and in the internal revenue, a complete system of corrective justice in regard to all taxes imposed by the general government, which in both branches is founded upon the idea of appeals within the executive departments. If the party aggrieved does not obtain satisfaction in this mode, there are provisions for recovering the tax after it has been paid, by suit against the collecting officer. But there is no place in this system for an application to a court of justice until after the money is paid.

That there might be no misunderstanding of the universality of this principle, it was expressly enacted, in 1867, that "no suit for the purpose of restraining the assessment or collection of any tax shall be maintained in any court." (Revised Statutes, § 3,224.) And though this was intended to apply alone to taxes levied by the United States, it shows the sense of Congress of the evils to be feared if courts of justice could, in any case, interfere with the process of collecting the taxes on which the government depends for its continued existence. It is a wise policy. It is founded in the simple philosophy derived from the experience of ages, that the payment of of taxes has to be enforced by summary and stringent means against a reluctant and often adverse sentiment, and to do this successfully other instrumentalities and other modes of procedure are necessary than those which belong to courts of justice. (See Cheatham v. Norvell, decided at this term; Nickoll v. United States, 7 Wall., 122; Dow v. Chicago, 11 Wall., 108.)

In this latter case this court, after commenting upon the necessary reliance of the State governments upon the prompt collection of the taxes for their support and maintenance, and the ill consequences of interference with their proceedings in that matter, says: "No court of equity will, therefore, allow its injunction to issue to restrain their action, except where it may be necessary to protect the citizen whose property is taxed, and he has no adequate remedy by the ordinary processes of the law. It must appear that the inforcement of the tax would lead to a multiplicity of suits or produce irreparable injury, or when the property is real estate, throw a cloud upon the title of complainant before the aid of a court of equity can be invoked." So, in the case of Hannewinkle v. Georgetown, the court says: "It has been the settled law of this country for a great many years, that an injunction bill to restrain the collection of a tax on the sole ground of the illegality of the tax cannot be maintained. There must be an allegation of fraud, that it creates a cloud upon the title, that there is apprehension of a multiplicity of suits, or some cause presenting a case of equity jurisdiction." (15 Wall., 548.) We do not propose to lay down in these cases any absolute limitation of the powers of a court of equity in restraining the collection of illegal taxes, but we may say that in addition to illegality, hardship, or irregularity, the case must be brought within some of the recognized foundations of equitable jurisdiction, and that mere errors or mistakes in valuation, or hardship or injustice of the law, or any grievance which can be remedied by a suit at law, either before or after payment of taxes, will not justify a court of equity to interpose by injunction to stay collection of a tax. One of the reasons why a court should not thus interfere, as it would in any transaction between individuals, is that it has no power to apportion the tax or to make a new assessment, or to direct another to be made by the proper officers of the State. These officers and the manner in which they shall exercise their functions are wholly beyond the power of the court when so acting. The levy of taxes is not a judicial function. Its exercise, by the constitutions of all the States and by the theory of our English origin, is exclusively legislative. (Heine v. The Levee Commissioners, 19 Wall., 660.)

A court of equity is, therefore, hampered in the exercise of its jurisdiction by the necessity of enjoining the tax complained of in whole or in part, without any power of doing complete justice by making, or causing to be made, a new assessment on any principle it may decide to be the right one. In this manner it may, by enjoining the levy complained of, enable the complainant to escape wholly the tax for the period of time complained of, though it be obvious that he ought to pay a tax if imposed in the proper manner.

These reasons and the weight of authority by which they are supported must always incline the court to require a clear case for equitable relief before it will sustain an injunction against the collection of a tax, which is part of the revenue of a State. Whether the same rigid rule should be applied to taxes levied by counties, towns and cities we need not here inquire, but there is both reason and authority for holding that the control of the courts, in the exercise of power over private property by these corporations is more necessary, and is unaccompanied by many of the evils that belong to it when affecting the revenue of the State. (High on Injunctions, § 369, and cases there cited.) The assessments in the cases before us, of which complaint is made, are all made by the State board of equalization, and though the taxes are collected by the county authorities, a large part of them go to make up the revenue of the State.

In the examination which we have made of these cases, we do not find any of the matters complained of to come within the rule which we have laid down as justifying the interposition of a court of equity. There is no fraud proved, if alleged. There is no violation of the constitution, either in the statute or in its administration by the board of equalization. No property is taxed that is not legally liable to taxation, nor is the rule of uniformity prescribed by the constitution violated. If there is an excessive estimate of the value of the franchise or capital stock, or both, it is by an error of judgment in the officers to whose judgment the law confided that matter, and it does not lie with the court to substitute its own judgment for that of the tribunal expressly created for that purpose.

But there is another principle of equitable jurisprudence which forbids in these cases the interference of a court of chancery in favor of complainants. It is that universal rule which requires that he who seeks equity at the hands of the court must first do equity.

The defendants in all these cases are the clerks and treasurers of the counties—the clerk who makes out the tax list, and the treasurer who collects the taxes. These taxes are both the State and county taxes. It is clear from the statements of the bills, and from what we have already said, that there must be in every county mentioned a considerable amount of real estate and personal property coming within the character of local tangible property, and subjected to taxation on precisely the same principles, and no other, that all other personal and real estate within the county is taxed. It is equally clear that the road-bed within each county is liable to be taxed at the same rate that other property is taxed. Why have not complainants paid this tax? In reference to the latter, it is said that they resist the rule by which the value of their road-bed in each county is ascertained, and therefore resist the tax. But surely it should pay tax by some rule. If the rule adopted gives too large a valuation in some counties, it must be too small in others. What right have they to resist the tax in the latter case? And in the former, is the whole tax void because the assessment is too large? Should they pay nothing, and escape wholly, because they have been assessed too high? These questions answer themselves. Before complainants seek the aid of the court to be relieved of the excessive tax, they should pay what is due. Before they ask equitable relief, they should do that justice which is necessary to enable the court to hear them.

It is a profitable thing for corporations or individuals whose taxes are very large to obtain a preliminary injunction as to all their taxes, contest the case through several years' litigation, and when in the end it is found that but a small part of the tax should be permanently enjoined, submit to pay the balance. This is not equity. It is in direct violation of the first principles of equity jurisdiction. It is not sufficient to say in the bill that they are ready and willing to pay whatever may be found due. They must first pay what is conceded to be due, or what can be seen to be due on the face of the bill, or be shown by affidavits, whether conceded or not, before the preliminary injunction should be granted. The State is not to be thus tied up as to that of which there is no contest, by lumping it with that which is really contested. If the proper officer refuses to receive a part of the tax, it must be tendered, and tendered without the condition annexed of a receipt in full for all the taxes assessed.

We are satisfied that an observance of this principle would prevent the larger part of the suits for restraining collection of taxes which now come into the courts. We lay it down with unanimity as a rule to govern the courts of the United States in their action in such cases. (Cooly on Taxation, 537; Palmer v. Napoleon, 16 Michigan, 176; Hersey v. Supervisors, 16 Wisconsin, 185; Roseberry v. Huff, 27 Ind., 12; Frazier v. Liebom, 16 Ohio State, 614; Parmely and others v. The Railroad Companies, 3 Dillon, 19.)

But if for no other reason, we should reverse the decrees of the Circuit court in these cases because the same questions, involving the same considerations urged upon us here, have been decided by the Supreme court of the State of Illinois in a manner which leads to the reversal of these. The cases referred to are those of Samuel R. Porter, County Treasurer, and John W. Cook, County Clerk v. Rockford, Rock Island and St. Louis Railroad Company, decided at the January term, 1874, and the subsequent case of The Chicago, Burlington and Quincy R. R. Co. v. J. J. Cole and another, decided in June, 1875. In these two cases all the points arising in the present cases were presented to the court and decided adversely to the railroad companies. These questions all grew out of the validity and the construction of the tax law involved in the present cases, and out of the same action of the board of equalization. The validity of the statute is not seriously questioned here on the ground of any conflict with the constitution of the United States. If any such claim be set up, it is sufficient to say it is without foundation. As the whole matter, then, concerns the validity of a State law as affected by the constitution of the State, that question, and the other one of the true construction of that statute, belong to the class of questions in regard to which this court still holds, with some few exceptions, that the decisions of the State courts are to be accepted as the rule of decisions for the federal courts.

It is, nevertheless, a satisfaction that our judgment concurs with that of the State court and leads us to the same conclusions.

The decrees in all these cases are reversed. The cases are remanded to the Circuit court, with directions to dissolve the injunction granted in each case and to dismiss the bills.

It was said on the argument, and seems to be conceded, that in the case of The Chicago, Burlington and Quincy R. R. Co. an agreement existed that the mistake of the board of equalization in assessing the company on bonds of its leased roads might be corrected in this suit. No such agreement is on file here and we cannot act on it. But when the case is returned to the Circuit, of course such decree can be rendered in that regard as counsel may agree on. A similar remark applies to what the brief of the attorney-general of the State admits to be an error to the prejudice of the Chicago and Alton Company.

No. 153—OCTOBER TERM, 1875.

THE BOARD OF THE COUNTY COMMISSIONERS OF THE COUNTY OF LARAMIE, Appellants,
v.
THE BOARD OF THE COUNTY COMMISSIONERS OF THE COUNTY OF ALBANY, and the BOARD OF THE COUNTY COMMISSIONERS OF THE COUNTY OF CARBON.

Appeal from the Supreme Court of the Territory of Wyoming.

POWER OF LEGISLATURE TO DIVIDE COUNTIES, CITIES AND TOWNS—RULE AS TO DIVISION OF PROPERTY.

1. That unless the Constitution otherwise provides, the legislature has the authority to amend the charter of a municipal corporation, enlarge or diminish its powers, extend or limit its boundaries, divide the same into two or more, consolidate two or more into one, overrule its action whenever it is deemed unwise, impolitic, or unjust, and even abolish the municipality altogether, in the legislative discretion.

2. PROPERTY RIGHTS UPON DIVISION.—That rules upon the subject of the division of the property, may be prescribed by the legislature; but if they omit to make any provision in that regard, the presumption must be that they did not consider that any legislation in that particular case was necessary. Where the legislature does not prescribe any such regulations, the rule is that the old corporation owns all the public property within her new limits, and is responsible for all debts contracted by her before the act of separation was passed. Old debts, she must pay without any claim for contribution, and the new subdivision has no claim to any portion of the public property, except what falls within her boundaries and to all that the old corporation has no claim.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

Mr. Justice CLIFFORD delivered the opinion of the court.

Counties, cities and towns are municipal corporations, created by the authority of the legislature, and they derive all their powers from the source of their creation, except where the constitution of the State otherwise provides. Beyond doubt they are in general made bodies politic and corporate, and are usually invested with certain subordinate legislative powers, to facilitate the due administration of their own internal affairs, and to promote the general welfare of the municipality. They have no inherent jurisdiction to make laws, or to adopt governmental regulations, nor can they exercise any other powers in that regard than such as are expressly or impliedly derived from their charters, or other statutes of the State.

Trusts of great moment, it must be admitted, are confided to such municipalities, and in turn they are required to perform many important duties, as evidenced by the terms of their respective charters. Authority to effect such objects is conferred by the legislature, but it is settled law that the legislature in granting it, does not divest itself of any power over the inhabitants of the district, which it possessed before the charter was granted. Unless the constitution otherwise provides, the legislature still has authority to amend the charter of such a corporation, enlarge or diminish its powers, extend or limit its boundaries, divide the same into two or more, consolidate two or more into one, overrule its action whenever it is deemed unwise, impolitic, or unjust, and even abolish the municipality altogether, in the legislative discretion. (Cooley on Const. (2d ed.), 192.)

Sufficient appears to show that the complainant county was first organized under the act of the third of January, 1868, passed by the legislature of the Territory of Dakota, which repealed the prior act to create and establish that county. When organized, the county was still a part of the territory, and embraced within its territorial limits all the territory now comprising the counties of Laramie, Albany and Carbon, in the Territory of Wyoming, an area of three and one-half degrees from east to west, and four degrees from north to south. Very heavy expenses, it seems, were incurred by the county during that year and prior thereto, greatly in excess of their current means, as more fully explained in the bill of complaint, which increased the indebtedness to the sum of twenty-eight thousand dollars. Other liabilities, it is alleged, were also incurred by the authorities of the county, during that period, which augmented their indebtedness to the sum of forty thousand dollars in the aggregate.

Pending these embarrassments, the charge is that the legislature of the territory passed two acts on the same day, to wit, December 16, 1868, creating the counties of Albany and Carbon, out of the western portion of the territory of the complainant county, reducing the area of that county more than two-thirds; that by the said acts, creating said new counties, fully two-thirds of the wealth and taxable property previously existing in the old county were withdrawn from its jurisdiction, and its limits were reduced to less than one-third of its former size, without any provision being made in either of said acts that the new counties, or either of them, should assume any proportion of the debt and liabilities which had been incurred for the welfare of the whole, before these acts were passed.

Payment of the outstanding debt having been made by the complainant county, the present suit was instituted in her behalf to compel the new counties to contribute their just proportion towards such indebtedness. Attempt is made to show that an equitable cause of action exists in the case, by referring to the several improvements made in that part of the territory included in the new counties, before they were incorporated, and by referring to the great value of the property withdrawn from taxation in the old county, and included within the limits of the newly created counties.

Process was served and the respondents appeared and filed separate demurrers to the bill of complaint. Hearing was had in the district court of the territory, where the suit was commenced, and the court entered a decree sustaining the demurrers and dismissing the bill of complaint. Immediate appeal was taken by the complainant to the Supreme court of the territory, where the parties having been again heard, the Supreme court entered a decree affirming the decree of the district court, and the present appeal is prosecuted by the complainant.

Two errors are assigned, as follows: (1) That the Supreme court erred in affirming the decree of the district court sustaining the demurrers of the respondents to the bill of complaint. (2) That the Supreme court erred in rendering judgment for the respondents.

Corporations of the kind are properly denominated public corporations, for the reason that they are but parts of the machinery employed in carrying on the affairs of the State, and it is well settled law that the charters under which such corporations are created may be changed, modified, or repealed, as the exigencies of the public service or the public welfare may demand. (2 Kent Com., 12th ed., 305; Angel & Ames on Corp., 10th ed., sec. 31; McKim v. Odom, 3 Bland, 407; St. Louis v. Allen, 13 Missouri, 400; The Schools v. Tatman, 13 Ill., 27; Yarmouth v. Skillings, 45 Me., 141.)

Such corporations are composed of all the inhabitants of the territory included in the political organization, and the attribute of individuality is conferred on the entire mass of such residents, and it may be modified or taken away, at the mere will of the legislature, according to its own views of public convenience and without any necessity for the consent of those composing the body politic. (1 Greenl. Ev., 12th ed., sec. 331.)

Corporate rights and privileges are usually possessed by such corporations, and it is equally true that they are subject to legal obligations and duties, and that they are under the entire control of the legislature, from which all their powers are derived. Sixty-five years before the decree under review was rendered, a case was presented to the Supreme court of Massachusetts, sitting in Maine, which involved the same principle as that which arises in the case before the court. Learned counsel were employed on both sides, and Parsons was chief justice of the court, and delivered the opinion. First, he adverted to the rights and privileges, obligations and duties of a town, and then proceeded to say: "If a part of its territory and inhabitants are separated from it, by annexation to another or by the erection of a new corporation, the former corporation still retains all its property, powers, rights, and privileges, and remains subject to all its obligations and duties, unless some new provision should be made by the act authorizing the separation." (Windham v. Portland, 4 Mass., 389.)

Decisions to the same effect have been made since that time in nearly all the states of the Union, where such municipal subdivisions are known, until the reported cases have become quite too numerous for citation; nor are such citations necessary, as they are all one way, showing that the principle in this country is one of universal application. Concede its correctness, and it follows that the old town, unless the legislature otherwise provides, continues to be seized of all its lands, held in a proprietary right, and continues to be the sole owner of all its personal property, and is entitled to all its rights of action, and is bound by all its contracts, and is subject to all the duties and obligations it owed before the act was passed effecting the separation.

Suppose that is so, as applied to towns, still it is suggested that the same rule ought not to be applied to counties, but it is so obvious that the suggestion is without merit that it seems unnecessary to give it any extended examination.—(County of Richland v. County of Lawrence, 12 Illinois, 8.)

Public duties are required of counties as well as of towns, as a part of the machinery of the State, and in order that they may be able to perform those duties, they are vested with certain corporate powers, but their functions are wholly of a public nature, and they are at all times as much subject to the will of the legislature as incorporated towns, as appears by the best text-writers upon the subject, and the great weight of judicial authority.

Institutions of the kind, whether called counties or towns, are the auxiliaries of the State, in the important business of municipal rule, and cannot have the least pretension to sustain their privileges or their existence upon anything like a contract between them and the legislature of the State, because there is not and cannot be any reciprocity of stipulation, and their objects and duties are utter incompatible with everything of the nature of compact. Instead of that, the constant practice is to divide large counties and towns and to consolidate small ones, to meet the wishes of the residents, or to promote the public interests, as understood by those who control the action of the legislature. Opposition is sometimes manifested, but it is everywhere acknowledged that the legislature possesses the power to divide counties and towns at their pleasure, and to apportion the common property and the common burdens, in such manner as to them may seem reasonable and equitable.—(School Society v. School Society, 14 Conn., 469; Bridge Co. v. East Hartford, 16 Conn., 172; Hamshire v. Franklin, 16 Mass., 76; North Hemstead v. Hemstead, 2 Wend., 109; Montpelier v. East Montpelier, 29 Vt., 20; Sill v. Corning, 15 N. Y., 197; People v. Draper, 15 Id., 549; Waring v. Mayor, 24 Ala., 701; Mayor v. The State, 15 Md., 376; Ashby v. Wellington, 8 Pick., 524; Baptist So. v. Candia, 2 N. H., 20; Denton v. Jackson, 2 John. Ch. R., 320.)

Political subdivisions of the kind are always subject to the general laws of the State, and the Supreme court of Connecticut decided that the legislature of that State have immemorially exercised the power of dividing towns at their pleasure, and upon such division to apportion the common property and the common burdens as to them shall seem reasonable and equitable.—(Granby v. Thurston, 23 Conn., 419; Yarmouth v. Skillings, 45 Me., 142; Langworthy v. Dubuque, 16 Iowa, 273; Justices' Opinion, 6 Cush., 577.)

Such corporations are the mere creatures of the legislative will, and inasmuch as all their powers are derived from that source, it follows that those powers may be enlarged, modified, or diminished at any time, without their consent, or even without notice. They are but subdivisions of the State, deriving even their existence from the legislature. Their officers are nothing more than local agents of the State, and their powers may be revoked or enlarged and their acts may be set aside or confirmed at the pleasure of the paramount authority, so long as private rights are not thereby violated.—(Russel v. Reed, 27 Penn. St., 170.)

Civil and geographical divisions of the State into counties, townships, and cities, said Thompson, Ch. J., had its origin in the necessities and convenience of the people, but this does not withdraw these municipal divisions from the supervision and control by the State, in matters of internal government. Proof of that is found in the fact that the legislature often exercises the power to exempt property liable to taxation, and in many other instances imposes taxes on what was before exempt, or increases the antecedent burdens in that behalf. It changes county sites, and orders new roads to be opened and new bridges to be built at the expense of the counties, and no one, it is supposed, disputes the exercise of such powers by the legislature.—(Burns v. Clarion County, 62 Penn. St., 425; People v. Pinkney, 32 N. Y., 393; St. Louis v. Russell, 9 Missouri, 507.)

Old towns may be divided, or a new town may be formed from parts of two or more existing towns, and the legislature, if they see fit, may apportion the common property and the common burdens, even to the extent of providing that a certain portion of the property of the old town shall be transferred to the new corporation.—(Bristol v. New Chester, 3 N. H., 521.)

In dividing towns, the legislature may settle the terms and conditions on which the division shall be made. It may enlarge or diminish their territorial liabilities, and may extend or abridge their privileges, and may impose new liabilities. Towns, says Richardson, Ch. J., are public corporations, created for purposes purely public, empowered to hold property and invested with many functions and faculties to enable them to answer the purposes of their creation.

There must, in the nature of things, be reserved, by necessary implication in the creation of such corporations, a power to modify them in such manner as to meet the public exigencies. Alterations of the kind are often required by public convenience and necessity, and we have the authority of that learned judge for saying that it has been the constant usage, in all that section of the Union, to enlarge or curtail the power of towns, and to divide their territory, and make new towns whenever the convenience of the public requires that such a change should be made.

Half a century ago, when that decision was made, the authority of the legislature to make such a division of a municipal corporation was deemed to be without doubt, and the same court decided that the power to divide the property of a municipal corporation is necessarily incident to the power to divide its territory and to create the new corporation—(Darlington v. Mayor, 31 N. Y., 195. Clinton v. Railroad, 24 Iowa, 475. Layton v. New Orleans, 12 La. An., 516).

Cases doubtless arise where injustice is done by annexing part of one municipal corporation to another, or by the division of such a corporation and the creation of a new one, or by the consolidation of two or more such corporations into one of larger size. Examples illustrative of these suggestions may easily be imagined: (1) Consolidation will work injustice where one of the corporations is largely in debt and the other owes nothing, as the residents in the non-indebted municipality must necessarily submit to increased burdens in consequence of the indebtedness of their associates. (2) Like consequences follow where the change consists in annexing a part of one municipal corporation to another, in case the corporation to which those set off are annexed is greatly more in debt than the corporation from which they were set off.

Hardships may also be suffered by the corporations from which a portion of its inhabitants, with their estates, may be set off, in case the corporation is largely in debt, as the taxes of those who remain must necessarily be increased in proportion as the polls and estates within the municipality are diminished. Even greater injustice may arise in cases where the legislature finds it necessary to circumscribe the jurisdiction of a county or town, by dividing their territory and creating new counties or towns out of the territory withdrawn from their former boundaries.

Legislative acts of the kind operate differently under different circumstances. Instances may be given where the hardship is much the greatest towards the new municipality, as where the great body of the property and improvements are left within the new boundaries of the old corporation. Other cases are well known where the hardship is much greater towards the old corporation, as where the newly created subdivision embraces within its boundaries all the public buildings and most of the public improvements and the most valuable lands. Circumstances of the kind, with many others not mentioned, show beyond doubt that such changes in the subdivision of a state often present matters for adjustment involving questions of great delicacy and difficulty.

Allusion was made to this subject by the Supreme Court of New Hampshire, in the case to which reference has already been made.—(3 N. H., 534.) Speaking of the power to divide towns, the court in that case say, that the power in that regard is strictly legislative, and that the power to prescribe the rule by which a division of the property of the old town shall be divided is incident to the power to divide the territory, and is in its nature purely legislative. No general rule can be prescribed by which an equal and just decision in such cases can be made. Such a division, say the court in that case, must be founded upon the circumstances of each particular case, and in that view the court here entirely concurs.—(Powers v. Commissioners of Wood County, 8 Ohio St., 290. Shelby County v. Railroad, 5 Bush., 228. Olney v. Harvey, 50 Ill., 455.)

Regulation upon the subject may be prescribed by the legislature, but if they omit to make any provision in that regard, the presumption must be that they did not consider that any legislation in the particular case was necessary. Where the legislature does not prescribe any such regulations, the rule is that the old corporation owns all the public property within her new limits and is responsible for all debts contracted by her before the act of separation was passed. Old debts she must pay without any claim for contribution, and the new subdivision has no claim to any portion of the public property except what falls within her boundaries, and to all that the old corporation has no claim.—(North Hemstead v. Hemstead, 2 Wend., 134. Dillon on M. Corp., sec., 128. Wade v. Richmond, 18 Gratt., 583. Higginbotham v. Com., 25 Id., 633.)

Tested by these considerations it is clear that there is no error in the record.

Decree affirmed.

SUPREME COURT OF TENNESSEE.

NASHVILLE, MARCH 11, 1876.

JERRY STOKES v. THE STATE.

MURDER.—EVIDENCE.—FOOTPRINTS.—Where the State brought a pan of mud into the court and placed it immediately in front of the jury, and proved by a witness that the mud was about as soft as the mud in the branch where he saw the track, and the prisoner was then called on by the Attorney-General to put his foot in the mud; Held, that the bringing in of the pan of mud and the request of the Attorney-General were improper, and should not have been permitted by the court.

———. ———. WITHDRAWING ILLEGAL TESTIMONY.—The practice of permitting incompetent and illegal testimony to be placed before the jury, and afterwards, at the close of the case, withdrawing it and telling the jury not to be influenced thereby, is deprecated. Such testimony should be promptly rejected, and not permitted to go to the jury at all.—[ED. COM. AND LEGAL REPORTER.]

LEA, Special J., delivered the opinion of the court.

The prisoner was indicted for the murder of Mrs. Housen, in the Criminal court of Davidson. He was tried, convicted of murder in the second degree, and sentenced to twenty years in the penitentiary. Mrs. Housen was taken from her house at night and carried some distance and hung to what the witnesses term a "hog pole." Near the place where she was hung a track was found in the mud, in a branch, made by a bare foot. The inference from all the surrounding circumstances is, that the person who made that track was one of the parties who were engaged in the murder. And upon an examination of the record, we are satisfied that the jury, in part, based their conviction upon the belief that the track found in the mud, in the branch near where Mrs. Housen was hung, was made by the prisoner. The question, then, whether the track was made by the prisoner, was of very great importance in the investigation.

Upon the trial of this cause, the bill of exceptions shows that "the State brought in a pan of mud and placed it immediately in front of the jury, and then asked the witness if the mud in the pan was about as soft as the mud in the branch where he saw the track. Witness said it was. (To all of which defendant objected, and the same was overruled.) The attorney-general then called upon the defendant to put his foot in the mud." Upon objection the court told the defendant he could put his foot in the mud if he wanted to, but he would not force him to do so.

Subsequently another witness was asked "if he saw the pan of mud setting then before the jury. He said he did, and he was asked if he saw any track in it. He said he saw none. (To all of which defendant objected.) Here the attorney-general again called upon the defendant to put his foot in the mud."

Because of this action of the attorney-general, and the assent of the court thereto, this cause is reversed and remanded. In the presence of the jury the prisoner is asked to make evidence against himself. The court should not have permitted the pan of mud to have been brought before the jury and the defendant asked to put his foot in it. We are satisfied the jury was improperly influenced thereby. And it is no sufficient answer that the judge afterwards told the jury that the refusal to put his foot in the mud was not to be taken as evidence against him. The bringing in of the pan of mud, and the request of the attorney-general, was improper and should not have been permitted by the court. We greatly deprecate the practice into which some Circuit judges have fallen, of permitting incompetent and illegal testimony to be placed before the jury and afterwards, at the close of the case, withdrawing it and telling the jury not to be influenced thereby. Such testimony should be promptly rejected and not permitted to go to the jury at all; for jurors with minds untrained to legal investigations and discriminations are sometimes likely to be influenced thereby, although such incompetent evidence may be afterwards withdrawn. And while we will not reverse because of the admission of incompetent evidence afterwards withdrawn, unless we are satisfied the jury was influenced thereby, yet the correct practice is to reject such evidence at once, and not permit it to go to the jury.

In this case, as before stated, we are satisfied that the action of the attorney-general in bringing the pan of mud into court and requesting the defendant to put his foot in it, had an influence upon the jury prejudicial to the prisoner. Although we might be satisfied of the prisoner's guilt, yet it is our duty to see that he has a fair and impartial trial, and this he must have, though costs may accumulate and punishment be long delayed.

On the 15th ult., the veteran Judge Cyrus Tolman died at his residence near Kane, in the 83d year of his age. Judge Tolman settled in Greene county in 1820, and was president of the Jersey county and vice-president of the Greene county old settlers' societies at the time of his death.

We call attention to the following opinions, reported at length in this issue:

Restraining the Collection of a Tax.—The Rule at to the Taxation of Capital Stock.—Franchises and the Real and Personal Estate of Corporations.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States, by Miller, J., as to when a court of equity will enjoin the collection of a tax, and stating the rule for the taxation of the capital stock, franchises, and the real estate and personal property of corporations. This opinion is of the greatest importance to the people of the State and the railroad companies. The decision of the Federal court below is reversed, and the rule adopted by the Supreme Court of this State, in this class of cases, followed by the Supreme Court of the United States. Judge Miller, in delivering the opinion, says, it is a satisfaction that our judgment concurs with that of the State court, and leads us to the same conclusions in this case. Attorney-General Edsall, single-handed, represented the State, and succeeded in reversing the judgment of the court below, although he was opposed by a number of the ablest attorneys in the State.

Power of Legislature to divide Counties—Property—Rights.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States, by Clifford, J., as to the power of the legislature over a county, city or town, and its right to divide such corporations, and the rule governing the ownership of property and the payment of debts upon such division.

Murder—Evidence—Foot-prints.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of Tennessee by Lea, Special J., in a trial for murder, where a pan of mud was brought into court and placed in front of the jury, and it was proved by a witness that the mud was about as soft as the mud in the branch where he saw the track, and the prisoner was then called upon by the Attorney-General to put his foot in the mud. Held, That the bringing in of the pan of mud and the request of the Attorney-General were improper, and should not have been permitted by the court. This is unquestionably a sound opinion. No human being should ever be placed in a position in a capital case that he is compelled to make evidence against himself or else have the jury, from his refusal so to do, infer his guilt and find accordingly. This ruling is in accordance with the ruling of the Supreme Court of this State in the case of Jumpertz v. The People, tried for murdering a woman, reported 21 Ill., 375. Experiments were tried before the jury for the purpose of illustrating whether the deceased could have committed suicide by hanging upon a screw or hook inserted in a door; and the door so experimented upon was exhibited to the jury during the recess of the court. Chief Justice Caton, who delivered the opinion, says we cannot approve of the exhibition to the jury during the recess of the court, of the door, screws, hooks, etc., or the experiments made with them in the presence of the jury during the trial. We will not say that in no case can experiments be made in the presence of the jury for the purpose of illustrating the points in controversy. Such a proceeding, to say the least, is uncommon, and should be permitted with great caution.

County Bonds in aid of Railroads—Effect of Constitution of 1870.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States by Strong, J., holding where a county was authorized by a special act of the legislature passed in 1869, to subscribe to the stock of a railroad and issue its bonds, and such county subscribed or agreed to subscribe to such stock in December, 1869, before the adoption of the Constitution of 1870, prohibiting such subscription, that whether the contract was a subscription or an agreement to subscribe, it was not annulled or impaired by the prohibitions of the new constitution; that although the new constitution abrogated the authority of the Board of Supervisors to make a subscription for railroad stock, still, contracts made under the power while it existed, were valid contracts, and the obligations assumed by the county continued after the power to enter into such contracts was withdrawn; that under the facts in this case, the county could not be permitted to set up that the subscription was not made until after the adoption of the constitution of 1870.

Validity of City Certificates—Constitutional—Limit of City Indebtedness.—The opinion of the Circuit Court of this county, by McAllister, J., holding that the corporation of the city of Chicago cannot become indebted beyond the limit named in the Constitution; that to borrow money and give an absolute undertaking to pay the same, is to "become indebted" within the meaning of the clause of the charter and of the Constitution in question, whether such loan be for one month or twenty years; and even though it might be the intention and purpose to apply the money so borrowed to pay current expenses; that the corporation having already reached the prescribed limit of indebtedness, it would be within the prohibition of the law to add to that indebtedness, by borrowing money and giving an absolute undertaking or obligation to repay it; that when an appropriation has been made for the ordinary current expenses and the tax levied to meet them, neither the incurring of such expenses, nor the anticipating of such revenues to discharge them, will constitute a debt within the meaning of the prohibition in question; and it is upon the principle that when the appropriation and tax levy are made, these means are to be regarded as being already in the treasury, and may be anticipated by orders or certificates specifically payable out of the proper fund, to meet the ordinary current expenses. This case did not involve the validity of certificates heretofore issued. This ruling of the learned judge, that when an appropriation for current expenses has been made, and a tax levied to meet them, orders drawn in anticipation of the collection of such tax and made specifically payable out of the same when collected, are not within the constitutional prohibition, and are valid, is undoubtedly correct. But this is as far as the letter and spirit of the Constitution will allow the corporation to go. It does not increase the debt of the city a single dollar, for if the tax is not collected, the city has nothing to pay. But once allow the city to consider the tax as paid when the appropriation is made, and the tax levied so that certificates may be issued payable out of the general funds of the city, instead of making them payable specifically out of the tax when collected, and the constitutional limitation is disregarded, and the debt of the city may be increased to almost any amount. If this can be done, and the tax for a given year is two millions of dollars, and the city having incurred indebtedness to the full extent of the constitutional five per centum, should issue certificates of indebtedness not payable specifically out of the tax when collected, but out of the city treasury, and only one million of dollars of the tax for that year is collected, the indebtedness of the city would be increased one million of dollars, and that clause of the Constitution which provides that "No municipal corporation shall be allowed to become indebted, in any manner, or for any purpose, to an amount, including existing indebtedness, in the aggregate exceeding five per centum on the value of the taxable property therein, to be ascertained by the last assessment for State and county taxes, previous to the incurring such indebtedness," would be violated. This provision of the Constitution is too plain to need any construction. If a city has incurred indebtedness to the full extent of the constitutional five per centum, and certificates of indebtedness are issued in excess of this amount, not made payable out of a particular fund, they are issued in defiance of this provision of the Constitution.

ALTERATION OF NOTE AFTER INDORSEMENT.

The Supreme Court of Missouri held, in the Iron Mountain Bank v. Armstrong et al., 3 Cent. Law Journal 251, that the liability of an indorser on a note, altered after indorsement, depends on the state of the note when purchased by the holder. If a blank has been so negligently filled as to easily allow an alteration or addition, without any means of detection by a prudent person, the indorser is liable.

THE MISSOURI STOCK LAW UNCONSTITUTIONAL—DELEGATING LAW-MAKING POWER.

The Supreme Court of Missouri held, in Lambert v. Lidwell, 3 Cent. Law J., 253 that the legislature cannot propose a law and submit it to the people to pass or reject it, by a general vote; that that would be legislation by the people; but a law may be passed which is complete in itself, to take effect upon the happening of an event; that the Missouri Stock-Law is in contravention of the Constitution, and void.

BANKRUPTCY—ATTACHING CREDITOR—NUMBER AND VALUE OF CREDITORS.

Held, by the United States District Court for the District of Kansas, 3 Cent. Law J., In re Scrafford, that an attaching creditor may intervene and oppose an adjudication in bankruptcy, and may show that the requisite number and amount of creditors have not joined in the proceedings; that in determining whether the required number and amount of creditors have joined, creditors who have obtained attachments on the respondent's property should not be excluded on that account.

BANKRUPTCY—CUSTOM OF TRADE.

The English Court of Appeal, in ex parte Powell, 34 L. T. R. N. S., 224, held, where a custom of trade is relied on to take goods out of the order or disposition of a bankrupt, the custom must be proved to have existed so long, and to have been so extensively acted upon, that the ordinary creditors of the bankrupt in his trade may be reasonably presumed to have known it; that the Court of Bankruptcy will take judicial notice of a custom which has been frequently proved in other cases, although it is not strictly proved in the case before the court.

ASSIGNMENT IN FRAUD OF CREDITORS.

The Court of Queen's Bench, in the case of Taylor v. Bowers, 34 L. T. R. N. S., 263, held, where money is advanced or goods delivered for an illegal purpose, the person advancing the money or delivering the goods, may repudiate the illegal purpose at any time before it has been carried out, and recover back his money or goods. In this case, the plaintiff assigned goods to A, in order to defraud his creditors. The defendant was a party to the scheme. No settlement was made with the plaintiff's creditors. A, without plaintiff's sanction, assigned the goods to the defendant. Plaintiff demanded the goods back, and sued in trover, and the court held that he was entitled to recover.

WILL—RAILWAY SHARES AND STOCKS.

The English House of Lords, in Morrice v. Aylmer, 34 L. T. R. N. S., 218, held, on appeal from the Court of Chancery in England, that a bequest of railway shares will pass railway stocks.

Champerty—A Mistake.—By a mistake of our St. Louis correspondent, the opinion in the case of Harper v. Duke et al., involving the validity of a contract, which, under the common and statute law of England, would have been void for champerty, published last week, was reported as an opinion of the Supreme Court of the State of Missouri. The decision was made by the Court of Appeals of that State—a court established under the new Constitution of that State, having appellate jurisdiction from Circuit Courts of the counties of Lincoln, Warren, St. Charles, and St. Louis. In all cases of a civil nature, involving more than twenty-five hundred dollars, and in many others, an appeal may be taken to the Supreme Court of the State. The question passed upon by the Court of Appeals, may not, therefore, be regarded as the settled law of the State. The Supreme Court, when it comes before them, may take the same view of the law as the Supreme Court of Illinois.

The Hon. Charles F. Cady has been appointed Judge of the St. Louis County Court of Criminal Correction, to hold until January 1, 1879.

Public Protection.—Some two years ago Colonel Henderson, the Chief Commissioner of Police for the metropolis, established "fixed points" at which constables were to be found within prescribed hours. The system has been found to work admirably in the prevention of violent assaults, with respect to which it was established. The Commissioner of Police has, within the last day or two, extended the "fixed points" arrangement to some of the most dangerous places in the metropolis after nightfall. Appended to the notice is the following instruction:—"In the event of any person springing a rattle, or persistently ringing a bell in the street or in an area, the police will at once proceed to the spot and render assistance." It is well known that since the establishment by Colonel Henderson of the "fixed points" system there has been a marked decrease in the number of violent assaults on the person committed in the metropolis at night.—Public Opinion.

UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT.

No. 532.—OCTOBER TERM, 1875.

In Error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of Illinois.

THE COUNTY OF MOULTRIE, Plaintiff in Error,
v.
THE ROCKINGHAM TEN-CENTS SAVINGS BANK.

SUBSCRIPTION OF COUNTY TO R. R. STOCK —EFFECT OF CONSTITUTION OF 1870 ON AGREEMENT TO SUBSCRIBE.

1. In this case, the county, before the new Constitution, by the act of 1869, had ample power to subscribe and issue its bonds in aid of the railroad. The court finds that what the county did before the adoption of the Constitution of 1870, constituted a subscription; but if the court could not have reached this conclusion, it would have made no difference, for the action of the board was, at least, an undertaking to subscribe, and this was assented to by the railroad company, and no matter whether the contract was a subscription or an agreement to subscribe, it was not annulled or impaired by the prohibitions of the new Constitution. The delivery of the bonds was no more than a performance of the contract.

2. EFFECT OF CONSTITUTION OF 1870 ON POWER OF BOARD.—The constitutional provision abrogated the authority of the board of supervisors to make a subscription for railroad stock; but contracts made under the power, while it was in existence, were valid contracts, and the obligations assumed by them continued after the power to enter into such contracts was withdrawn. The operation of the Constitution was only prospective.

3. CANNOT SET UP THAT SUBSCRIPTION WAS MADE AFTER 1870.—After the recitals in the record, and having assured a purchaser that their subscription was made in December, 1869, when they had power to make it, it would be tolerating a fraud to permit the county to set up, when called upon for payment, that it was not made until after July 2, 1870, when their authority had expired.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

Mr. Justice STRONG delivered the opinion of the court.

This case differs very materially from the case of The Town of Concord v. The Portsmouth Savings Bank, No. 43 of this term. In that, we held that the bonds were void because the legislative authority to issue them as a donation to the railroad company had been annulled by the Constitution of the State, before the donation was made. In the present case, the authority exercised was given to the county by the act of March 26, 1869, incorporating the railroad company. The tenth section of the act was as follows: "The board of supervisors of Moultrie county are hereby authorized to subscribe to the capital stock of said company, to an amount not exceeding eighty thousand dollars, and to issue the bonds of the county therefor, bearing interest at a rate not exceeding ten per cent. per annum, said bonds to be issued in such denominations, and to mature at such times as the board of supervisors may determine, provided that the same shall not be issued until the said road shall be opened for traffic between the city of Decatur and the town of Sullivan aforesaid." No approving popular vote was required.

It is not to be doubted that this section gave to the county complete authority to make a subscription to the capital stock of the company. The power was fettered by no conditions or limitations, except as to the amount which might be subscribed, but the payment of the subscription was directed to be postponed until the railroad should be opened. And, of course, as a greater power includes every constituent part of it, the legislative act empowered the board of supervisors to agree to subscribe preparatory to an actual subscription. The power thus granted was never revoked, unless it was by the new constitution of the State, which did not take effect prior to July 2, 1870. Whatever was done in pursuance of the power before that time, if anything was, could not be affected by the constitution, subsequently adopted. Subscriptions, or contracts to subscribe, made in pursuance of it before it was abrogated, remained binding, for a constitution can no more impair the obligation of a contract than ordinary legislation can. It must be conceded that had no subscription been made, or engagement to subscribe entered into before the new constitution took effect, none could have been made after. But the special finding of facts shows that one was made in 1869. On the 16th of December of that year, the board of supervisors met and informally resolved to subscribe $80,000.00 to the capital stock of the railroad company, and the resolution was referred to a lawyer, to put in form before being recorded on the records of the board. They were accordingly prepared from minutes furnished by the chairman of the board, and entered by the clerk upon the records, as of the date of the December meeting of the board, and duly attested. This must have been done prior to the first Tuesday in March, 1870. The record, as it appears under date of December 14, 1869, is as follows:

"And it is further ordered by the board of supervisors of Moultrie county that, under and by virtue of the authority conferred upon said board, by an act approved March 26th, A.D. 1869, entitled 'An act to incorporate the Decatur, Sullivan and Mattoon Railroad Company,' the county of Moultrie subscribed to the capital stock of the Decatur, Sulvan and Mattoon Railroad the sum of eighty thousand dollars, to aid in the construction of a railroad by said company, in pursuance of their charter.

"And be it further ordered by the board of supervisors aforesaid that, when said railroad shall be 'open for traffic,' between the city of Decatur and the town of Sullivan aforesaid, there be issued eighty thousand dollars of the bonds of said county, in denominations of not less than five hundred dollars, payable to said company, drawing interest, to be paid annually, at the rate of eight per cent. per annum; the principal to be due and payable ten years after date, or sooner at the option of the county; and that said bonds be delivered to said railroad company in full payment of the subscription of said county so made as aforesaid."

It is true there was no further order of this board to enter the resolutions of record, but it was the clerk's duty to make the entry. The substance of them had been adopted. They required no further action except to put them in form. No further action appears to have been contemplated. They remain of record still, and the board has never taken any action to correct the record. On the contrary it has been recognized by subsequent action. At the December meeting of 1872, a special committee was appointed to examine the records of subscriptions of railroad donations and report. The committee did report on the 25th day of December, 1872, that the subscription of $80,000.00 under the act of the general assembly of March 26, 1869, to aid in the construction of the Decatur, Sullivan and Mattoon Railroad, was in accordance with law. Under this action of the board, and the report of the committee, the bonds were delivered. It is impossible, therefore, to doubt that the resolutions adopted in December, 1869, as recorded, must be treated as the action of the board at that time. And, if so, they amounted to a subscription to the stock of the company, and created an obligation for the payment of the subscription in county bonds. It is true no subscription was made on the books of the railroad company until July, 1871, when one was made by Mr. Titus, chairman of the board, without any express authority, and then made for the purpose of enabling him to vote at an election. But a subscription on the books of the company was unnecessary, for that which amounted to a subscription had been made in December, 1869. The authorized body of a municipal corporation may bind it by an ordinance, which, in favor of private persons interested therein, may, if so intended, operate as a contract, or they may bind it by a resolution, or by vote clothe its officers with power to act for it. The former was the clear intention in this case. The board clothed no officer with power to act for it. The resolution to subscribe was its own act; its immediate subscription.—(Western Saving Fund Society v. The City of Philadelphia, 31 Penn. St., 174; Sacramento v. Kirk, 7 Cal., 419; Logansport v Blakemore, 17 Ind., 318.) In The Justices of Clarke County Court v. The Paris, Winchester, and Kentucky River Turnpike Company, 11 Ben. Monroe, 143, it was ruled that an order of the county court, by which it was said that the court subscribed, on behalf of Clarke county, for fifty shares of stock in the Turnpike company, if concurred in by a competent majority of the magistrates, was itself a subscription, and bound the county. There was no subscription on the books of the company, but the court of appeals said "we cannot, therefore, regard this order as a mere offer or pledge to subscribe the fifty shares in this particular road, but as actually taking, and in substance and legal effect subscribing for that number of shares. So in Nugent v. The Supervisors of Putnam County, 19 Wall., 241, it was said that to constitute a subscription by a county to stock in a railroad company, it is not necessary that there be an act of manual subscribing on the books of the company. These cases lead directly to the conclusion that the action of the board of supervisors in December, 1869, was in substance and in legal effect a subscription.

And if this conclusion could not be reached, it would make but little difference to the present case, for it could not be doubted that the action of the board was at least an undertaking to subscribe, and this was assented to or accepted by the railroad company. The resolutions were entered of record by the clerk and president of the railroad company, and the company made an appropriation of the bonds to be received in payment for the subscription, by a contract made on the 15th of April, 1870. In either aspect of the case, therefore, there was an authorized contract existing between the county and the railroad company when the new constitution came into operation. No matter whether the contract was a subscription or an agreement to subscribe, it was not annulled or impaired by the prohibitions of the constitution. The delivery of the bonds was no more than performance of the contract. For these reasons it is in vain to appeal to the decisions made in Aspinwall v. The County of Davies, 22 Howard, 364, and The Town of Concord v. The Savings Bank, decided at this term. In neither of those cases was there any contract made before the authority to make one was annulled. We do not assert that the constitutional provision did not abrogate the authority of the board of supervisors to make a subscription for railroad stock. On the contrary, we think it did. But we hold that contracts made under the power while it was in existence were valid contracts, and that the obligations assumed by them continued after the power to enter into such contracts was withdrawn. The operation of the constitution was only prospective. Indeed, it is expressly ordained in its schedule that "all rights, actions, prosecutions, claims, and contracts of the State, individuals, or bodies corporate shall continue to be as valid as if this constitution had not been adopted." It is hardly necessary to say that under the act of the general assembly, the authority to make a subscription was coupled with an authority and a duty to issue county bonds for the sum subscribed. No action of the board was needed after the subscription was made.

This disposes of the only material question in the case. There is, however, another consideration that is worthy of notice. The findings of the court are that the plaintiff below is a purchaser of the bonds for a valuable consideration, having purchased them before their maturity and without notice of any defence. They were executed by the president of the board of supervisors and the county clerk. They recite that they are issued by the county of Moultrie, "in pursuance of the subscription of the sum of eighty thousand dollars to the capital stock of the Decatur, Sullivan and Mattoon Railroad Company, made by the board of supervisors of said county of Moultrie, in December, A. D. 1869, in conformity to the provisions of an act of the General Assembly of the State of Illinois, approved Mar. 26, A. D. 1869."

Now, if it be supposed that the purchaser of bonds with such recitals was bound to look further and inquire what was the authority for the issue, where was he to look? Had he looked to the act of the general assembly of March 26, 1869, he would have found plenary authority for a stock subscription and for the issue of bonds in payment thereof. If he was bound to know that the constitutional provision terminated that authority after July 2, 1870, he knew that any subscription made before that time continued binding notwithstanding the constitution, and that bonds issued in payment of it were, therefore, lawful. If, then, he had inquired whether a subscription had been made before July 2, 1870, at the only place where inquiry should have been made, namely, at the records of the board, he would have found an order to subscribe, equivalent to a subscription made, in December, 1869, corresponding with the assertions of the recitals, and declared by them to have been a subscription. He could have made inquiry nowheres else with any prospect of learning the truth. Every step he could have taken assured him that the recitals were true. How, then, can the county be permitted to set up against a bona fide holder of the bonds, that the authority to make a subscription with all its legitimate consequences had expired before the subscription was made, in the face of the recitals and of the county records? Whether it had expired was a matter of fact, not of law, and it was peculiarly, if not exclusively, within the knowledge of the board of supervisors. After having assured a purchaser that their subscription was made in December, 1869, when they had power to make it, it would be tolerating a fraud to permit the county to set up, when called upon for payment, that it was not made until after July 2, 1870, when their authority expired.

It is unnecessary to say more. Some matters which we have not noticed were assigned as errors, but they were not mentioned in the argument; and, in our opinion, they exhibit no error in the court below.

The judgment is affirmed.

CIRCUIT COURT COOK CO., ILL.

OPINION, APRIL 27, 1876.

PRINDEVILLE, et al. v. COMTROLLER HAYES.

THE CONSTITUTIONAL LIMITATION OF CITY INDEBTEDNESS—THE RIGHT OF THE CITY TO ISSUE CERTIFICATES OF INDEBTEDNESS IN EXCESS OF THE LIMITATION, CONSIDERED—MAY ANTICIPATE THE COLLECTION OF A TAX BY ISSUING CERTIFICATES SPECIALLY PAYABLE OUT OF SUCH TAX.

1. CONSTITUTIONAL LIMITATION.—That the corporation can not become indebted beyond the limit named in the Constitution; that to borrow money and give an absolute undertaking to repay the same, is to become indebted within the meaning of the clause of the charter and the Constitution in question, whether such loan be for one month or twenty years; and even though it might be the intention and purpose to apply the money so borrowed, to pay current expenses, etc.

2. THE CORPORATION HAVING REACHED THE PRESCRIBED LIMIT, ETC.—That the corporation having already reached the prescribed limit of indebtedness, it would be within the prohibition of the law to add to that indebtedness, by borrowing money and giving an absolute undertaking or obligation to repay it.

3. ANTICIPATING THE REVENUE.—That when an appropriation has been made for the ordinary current expenses, and the tax levied to meet them, neither the incurring of such expenses nor the anticipating of such revenues to discharge them, will constitute a debt within the meaning of the prohibition in question. And it is upon the principle that when the appropriation and tax levy are made, these means are to be regarded as being already in the treasury, and may be anticipated by orders or certificates specially payable out of the proper fund, to meet the ordinary current expenses.

4. CERTIFICATES HERETOFORE ISSUED.—That this case does not involve the validity of certificates heretofore issued.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

Opinion of the court by MCALLISTER, J.

It appears by the facts alleged in relator's petition and admitted by the respondent, that, tested by the last assessment made for State and county taxes, the city of Chicago is already indebted in an amount at least equal, if not in excess of the sum of 5 per centum of the value of taxable property therein. The amount of the claim set out in the petition, to pay which the relators counsel urge that the city has the right to borrow the money, is upward of $20,000. Counsel base the power to borrow such sum, upon the act of 1865, amendatory of the former, charter of Chicago, and a further act amendatory of the latter (passed in 1869) and upon an ordinance of the common council, approved April 3, 1875, before the city became incorporated under the general law of 1872. By the act of 1865, it is provided: "To provide for monthly or any other payment which shall have been authorized by the common council and required to be made at any time, the comptroller may, with the sanction of the mayor and finance committee, borrow the necessary money for a time not longer than the 1st of February thereafter." By the act of 1869 it was provided that "The mayor and comptroller may make temporary loans to pay special assessments against city property when due, and may make all temporary loans now provided for, falling due on the 1st day of June of each year."

The first section of the ordinance of April 30, 1875, embodies the same provision in substance as the two statutes referred to. The second section enlarges the power conferred by the acts of 1865 and 1869. It reads: "If for any cause the city has heretofore or shall hereafter fail to collect any tax on the general tax warrant of said city, in any year, or in case the receipt of the revenues of said city shall fall short of the amounts appropriated by the common council, the mayor and comptroller shall be, and are hereby, authorized, with the sanction of the finance committee, to borrow a sufficient amount of money to meet any such deficiency, for any length of time not exceeding the close of the next municipal year, and to issue and negotiate bonds or certificates of indebtedness therefor, which said amount shall be provided for in the annual appropriation bill of the municipal year next succeeding such loan."

It is a legal proposition as well settled and supported by authority as any of which I have any knowledge, that the charter or statute by which a municipal corporation is created, constitutes organic law, and such corporation can possess or exercise only such rights and powers as are expressly granted to it, or as are necessary to carry into effect the rights and powers so granted, regard being had to the object of the grant. In Trustees v. McConnell, 12 Illinois, 138, the court say: "That a corporation, which is a mere creature of the law, can only exercise such powers as are conferred upon it by the act of incorporation is a well settled doctrine."

In Town of Petersburg v. Metzaka, 21, Ill., 205, it says: "The powers of all corporations are limited by the grants in their charters, and cannot extend beyond them."

Again in Caldwell v. The City of Alton, 33, Ill., 416: "It is a principle everywhere recognized that a corporation, public or private, possesses, and can exercise no other powers than those specifically conferred by the act creating it, or such as are incidental or necessary to carry into effect the purposes for which it was created." (Dillon on Municipal Corporations, section 55, and cases in note.)

The law is stated by that cautious and reliable author thus: "Of every municipal corporation, the charter or statute by which it is created is the organic act. Neither the corporation nor its officers can do any act, or make any contract, or incur any liability, not authorized thereby. All acts beyond the scope of the powers granted are void. Much less can any power be exercised or act done which is forbidden by statute." (Dillon on Municipal Corporations, section 55.) And the doctrine of the text is supported by numerous cases cited in the note to that section. An instance of the rigid application by the Supreme court of this State of the doctrine of the last clause above quoted will be found in the case of the President and Trustees of Lockport v. Gaylord, 61 Ill., 276. There the trustees ordered the street commissioner to repair or, rather, open Seventh street. He proceeded to do so, and in the execution of the work borrowed from the plaintiff and used for the purpose several hundred dollars. Upon the report of the commissioner the trustees ordered the clerk to issue to plaintiff orders on the treasury for the amounts borrowed. That being done, suit was brought to recover the amounts, and the plaintiff recovered in the Circuit court, and the defendant appealed to the Supreme court.

The charter of the village contained this provision:

"The said trustees shall have no power to borrow money or issue any evidence of indebtedness at any time for any amount above what is already provided for by taxes levied or other certain sources of revenue, unless specially authorized so to do by a vote of the majority of the legal voters of the corporation." It appeared that no such vote had been taken, and that the amounts borrowed were above what was provided for by taxes levied or other certain sources. The opinion of the court was delivered by Mr. Justice Sheldon. The court said: "It is contented that in this transaction the trustees borrowed money; that orders issued on the treasury are an evidence of indebtedness, and that as the conditions under the foregoing provisions of the charter on which these things might be done, did not exist, there can be no recovery in the suits. We incline to regard this position as well taken. By the provision in question the legislature seem to have undertaken to protect the citizens of the village against the disastrous consequences which have elsewhere resulted from the reckless and improvident financial management of municipal officers. It is much easier to make public improvements on credits than with ready money; to throw the expense of them upon others who are to come after them, than to pay for them at the time. The credit system tempts to the making of lavish and unnecessary expenditures. The contrary one leads to the making of such only as are needful and judicious, and tends to secure economy in making them. * * * We regard the transaction in question as essentially a borrowing of money to the trustees, and that to sanction it would be to allow a plain evasion of the charter. We deem it our duty to give effect to this provision of the charter and secure to the citizens of the village the protection intended and not fritter away the provision by construction. We hold, then, that the transaction with the appellee was unauthorized and void as within the direct prohibition of the charter."

With these doctrines in view, and they are authoritative upon this court, let us now examine the material. Provisions of the charter under which the city of Chicago is organized, and constitutes its organic law.

Section 62, of the act of 1872 (R. S. 1874, p. 218), is as follows: "The city council in cities and the president, etc., in villages shall have the following powers:

"5. To borrow money on the credit of the comptroller for corporate purposes, and shall issue bonds therefor in such amounts, and form, and in such condition as it shall prescribe, but it shall not become indebted in any manner or for any purpose to an amount, including existing indebtedness, in the aggregate to exceed five per centum on the value of the taxable property therein to be ascertained by the last assessment for state and county taxes previous to the incurring such indebtedness." Now the question is this: The city already being indebted in an amount which, when tested by the last assessment of property therein for state and county taxes, is conceded to be equal to five per cent. on the value of such property so ascertained; under these circumstances, can the comptroller, with the consent of the mayor and finance committee, go into the money market and, under the acts of 1865, 1869, and the ordinance referred to, borrow the sum stated in the petition, which is upward of $20,000, upon an absolute undertaking or obligation to repay it? It was earnestly insisted by counsel in argument that by construction this prohibitory clause of the charter could be held to apply to only permanent or long loans, and it therefore left the authority to make temporary loans as provided for in the previous statutes untouched. It would seem that the matter of temporary loans did not escape the attention of the legislature, as is apparent from the provisions of the 90th section of the act of 1872, (R. S., p. 227.) Temporary loans are here authorized in two specific cases only. One, to pay for improvements, the necessity for which had arisen after the annual appropriation bill, by reason of some casualty or accident happening after such appropriation is made. The other, to pay any judgment obtained against the corporation. In each case the time of the loan is to expire by the end of the next fiscal year. Now it might be argued this provision is directly repugnant to the acts of 1865 and 1869. However this may be, and even conceding that those former statutes are not repugnant to the provisions of the 90th section just referred to, still, under the prohibition of section 62, the power conferred by such former statutes could be exercised only in case the corporation of Chicago had not become indebted up to the prescribed limit. These former statutes, if in force, must be regarded as modified to that extent by the present charter of the city. But it cannot be disputed that the constitution is the fundamental law. Section 12 of article 9 contains the following: "No county, city, township, school district, or other municipal corporation shall be allowed to become indebted in any manner or for any purpose to an amount including existing indebtedness, in the aggregate exceeding five per centum on the value of the taxable property therein, to be ascertained by the last assessment for state and county taxes previous to the incurring such indebtedness."

Now, if, when the city has already become indebted up to the prescribed limit, when ascertained as prescribed in this provision, as is admitted in this case, the going into the market and borrowing the sum in addition required to pay the claim set out in the petition and giving an absolute undertaking to repay the money borrowed would constitute a debt within the meaning of that clause, then it is clearly unquestionably prohibited by it, and the legislature was powerless to authorize it to be done by any act continuing in force, either the amendatory act or the ordinance. The ordinance was passed in April, 1875. If the legislature could not then have passed an act authorizing it, much less could it delegate the authority to a municipal corporation. It is the duty of the courts to so construe the words of the constitution as to give effect to the intent of the people in adopting it. The framers of the constitution and the people who adopted it must be understood to have employed words in their natural sense and to have understood what they meant, and the doctrine is firmly established, that when the words employed when taken in their ordinary natural signification, and the order of their grammatical arrangement given them by the framers, embody a definite meaning which is apparent upon the face of the instrument, then that meaning is the only one the courts are at liberty to say was intended to be conveyed, and there is no room for construction. That which the words declare is the meaning of the instrument, and neither courts nor legislatures have a right to add to or take away from that meaning. These rules have been fully recognized by the Supreme court of this State, and are supported by other and higher authority in this country. (Hills v. Chicago, 60 Ill., 86; City of Beardstown et al. v. City of Virginia et al., 76 Ill., 34, and cases cited.)

In People v. Maynard, 14 Ill., 421, the court said: "When the said constitution took effect, any provision of a former law which was inconsistent with it became as much unconstitutional as if the law had been subsequently passed. A law cannot be in force in the State, no matter when passed, which contravenes the provision of the constitution of the State."

This principle has been recognized by the Supreme court in numerous cases since the new constitution of 1870.

The language employed in the prohibitory clause of section 12, article 19, above referred to, is clear and unambiguous, leaving no question open to a construction or judicial determination but the question whether a given transaction by the corporation amounts to "becoming indebted" within the meaning of the clause. As to that question, the words used seem to exclude all distinction between a permanent and what is called a temporary loan.

The language is that "No city, etc., shall be allowed to become indebted in any manner or for any purpose to an amount," etc. Nothing could be clearer than that these words forbid all distinction between a temporary and permanent loan, if the latter in form and substance constitute a debt, and I have not the least hesitation in holding, and I do so in the light of the decisions of the Supreme court of this State, which bind my judicial action as a member of a subordinate court, that to borrow money, and give an absolute undertaking to repay the same, is to "become indebted," within the meaning of the clause of the charter and constitution in question, whether such loan be for one month or 20 years, and even though it might be the intention and purpose to apply the money so borrowed to pay current expenses, like those accruing for cleaning and repairing streets and alleys, as in this case, and out of the revenues of the present year appropriated to that purpose. Such a loan is not in any legal sense an anticipation of such revenues, because it involves the creation of a liability wholly independent of them. But authorities have been cited, and I feel and recognize their force, to the effect that, as respects the ordinary current expenses of the corporation, if there have been an appropriation and tax-levy to meet them, such expenses, when so provided for, are not to be considered as debts within the prohibition of the clause either in the charter or constitution. The transactions covering the fiscal year are to be regarded as entire transactions, and when the appropriation and tax-levy are made, the moneys provided to meet such current expenses are, in legal contemplation, to be regarded as already in the treasury and no debt accrued. This doctrine is fully supported by the following authorities: Grant v. City of Davenport, 36 Iowa, 301, where the constitutional provision is the same as ours; People v. Pachecho, 27 Cal., 175; State v. Medberry, 7 Ohio State R., 536; Reynolds v. Shreveport, 13 La, Annual R., 426. "If a municipal corporation," says Dillon, "has means in its treasury to meet its indebtedness, the issue of warrants to an amount larger than 5 per cent. of its taxable property is not a violation of the section of the State constitution which provides that no municipal corporation shall be allowed to become indebted in any manner or for any purpose to any amount exceeding 5 per cent. of the taxable property within the corporation." "In such case it would not become indebted within the meaning of the constitutional clause." (Dillon on Municipal Corporations, section 88, and cases referred to in note 2.) The principle of these cases justifies the conclusion that there is no legal objection to the anticipation of the revenues so provided for by giving warrants specifically payable out of the revenues appropriated to the purpose out of which the claim arises, or to borrow money on warrants or certificates specifically payable as above stated.

In such cases the only liability the corporation would incur would be that of an implied undertaking to exercise due diligence to collect the taxes. (White v. Snell, 5 Pickering R., 425 S. C. G., Id 16, and recognized in Chicago v. The People ex rel. 56 Ill. 333.) Such a collateral or incidental liability could in no sense be considered as a debt or the incurring it, or as becoming indebted within the meaning of the law in question.

To this extent the authorities cited by relator's counsel go. But as I understand these cases, they none of them pass upon this question—whether the borrowing money and giving an absolute undertaking to repay it, though with the actual intention of applying the appropriate revenues to that purpose, would not constitute a debt within the meaning of the prohibition in question. And so far as they sanction the anticipation of the revenues are to be regarded as already in the treasury.

At the time of the demand upon the respondent and filing the petition in this case, there had in no legal sense been any tax levied. An appropriation bill is one thing, a tax-levy quite another. The levy of the tax is made by an appropriate ordinance of the city council. So far as this case shows, it has not been done. I cannot perceive how the principle of the cases cited can apply where no tax levy has been made, unless it be upon the theory that the transactions of the fiscal year are to be regarded as an entirety, as above suggested. The doctrine that the taxes levied are for the purpose of the ordinary expenses to which they are appropriated to be regarded as already in the treasury is measurably fictitious, and I cannot see how any such presumption can arise before they are actually levied.' It is not perceived how any inconvenience can arise from this view, as the levy consists only in the passage of the proper ordinance and certifying the matter to the county clerk, which may be done at any time after the appropriation is made. On the whole case I am of opinion that the corporation having already reached the prescribed limit of indebtedness, it would be within the prohibition of the law to add to that indebtedness by borrowing money and giving an absolute undertaking of obligation to repay it. I am further of the opinion that when an appropriation has been made for the ordinary current expenses, and the tax levied to meet them, neither the incurring of such expenses nor the anticipation of such revenues to discharge them will constitute a debt within the meaning of the prohibition in question, and it is upon the principle that when the appropriation and tax levy are made, these means are to be regarded as being already in the treasury, and may be anticipated by order for certificates specifically payable out of the proper fund to meet the ordinary current expenses. This mode seems to me free from legal objection; the orders, warrants, or certificates, so payable would be available, for they place the holder in a better position than even a judgment; as in the former case the holder need but present them, in the latter he might have to apply for a mandamus to compel a levy.

It is a misunderstanding to suppose that this case involves the validity of certificates heretofore issued. No such question is involved, and its determination would be whether the power to borrow money which is effectual before constitutional limit is reached absolutely ceases as to innocent holders the moment that limit is reached, as if it never had been granted. This question is nice and difficult, and so far as I know has never been directly decided.

Courts will be likely to so decide it as that such a prohibition shall not operate as a snare to innocent holders. But in this case the only question is as to the power and legal duty to borrow money under the circumstances as disclosed. I am inclined to deny the mandamus solely on the ground that no tax levy had been made, and the writ is accordingly denied.

A TREATISE ON THE LIMITATIONS OF ACTIONS AT LAW AND SUITS IN EQUITY AND ADMIRALTY; with an Appendix containing the American and English Statutes of Limitations. By I. K. Angell. Sixth edition; Revised and greatly enlarged, by John Wilder May, author of "Treatise on the Law of Insurance." Boston: Little, Brown & Company. 1876. Sold by Callaghan & Company, Law Booksellers, Chicago.

The first edition of Angell on Limitations, appeared just thirty years ago this month, and the work has been a leading text-book on the subject ever since, and is well known to the American and English bar. Mr. May, in his editions of Mr. Angell's work, has added very much to the value of the work; brought the law down to date, and cited the principal and leading opinions of the courts upon the subjects treated in the text. The present dress of this well-known text-book is in the best style of those celebrated printers, John Wilson & Son, of Cambridge.

THE BENCH AND BAR OF THE SOUTH AND SOUTHWEST: By Henry S. Foote. St. Louis: Soule, Thomas & Wentworth, 1876.

Mr. Foote is peculiarly fitted to write a book of reminiscences of the bench and bar of the South and Southwest. He has had a long and intimate acquaintance with the leading judges and lawyers of the South and Southwest, having been admitted to the Virginia bar in 1823, and been in public life ever since, either as a lawyer, senator, governor, or politician. Governor Foote possesses a retentive memory, a racy and vigorous style, and a command of language, which has enabled him to give the leading traits of character of the distinguished lawyers and judges of the South and Southwest, for the past two generations, so vividly that the men he describes seem to be before us, and again upon the active stage of life. We commend the practice of preserving and publishing the personal reminiscences of the leading members of the bar. This book will be of peculiar interest to the older members of the profession, as it will bring fresh to their minds the recollection of many of the friends of their youth who have long since passed away. To the young lawyer it will show the leading characteristics of the men who have led the bar during the past generation. Upon receipt of $2.25, the publishers will send this volume by mail, postage paid.

CRIME IN NEW YORK.—The catalogue of crimes shows that since January 1, 1870, there have been committed within the city limits 281 homicides; that seven of the murderers were executed, and 24 were sentenced to imprisonment for life In 1870, including the Nathan murder, there were 41 homicides; in 1871 there were 42, and of the whole lot only one, Foster, the car-hook murderer, had his neck twisted out of joint. In 1872 there were 55 murders and not one execution. In 1873 there were 53 homicides and of the list only one murderer, Nixon, the bill-poster, was executed. In 1874 there were 39 men, women and children slain by violent hands and not one case of judicial hanging. In 1875 there were 49 homicides and three executions, the three negroes who killed the pedler. Of all this whole catalogue of murderers one-third escaped without a trial of any kind

THE SUMMER VACATION.

Considerable dissatisfaction has existed among the bar of this city, for several years past, with the arrangements made by the various courts for the summer vacation, the times fixed by the different courts not being identical. The terms of the Superior and of the Circuit Court beginning respectively, on the first and third Mondays of each month, the vacations in these two courts have always begun and ended with reference to these dates. Thus, the vacation of the Circuit Court has usually extended from the third Monday in July to the third Monday in September, while that of the Superior Court has extended from the first Monday in August to the first Monday in October. The term of the Supreme Court at Ottawa beginning on the second Tuesday in September, the vacation has thus been practically limited to the month of August; at least, to all lawyers having business in the Supreme Court.

The whole subject was discussed at the last regular meeting of the Bar Association, when it was resolved that committees be appointed to wait upon the judges of the State and Federal Courts for the purpose of having the vacations made uniform in point of time, in these various courts. Messrs. Robert Hervey, J. S. Norton and G. W. Smith, were designated as the committee to confer with the Federal Judges, and W. C. Goudy, J. L. High, and W. H. King with the Judges of the State Courts. These committees were also instructed to request the judges to grant a vacation of three months, if possible; but if only two months could be obtained, that July and August be fixed as those months. A conference was held between these committees and the various judges, at the rooms of Judge Blodgett, on Saturday, the 22d inst., at 2 o'clock, P. M. There were present Judge Blodgett, representing the United States Courts, Judges Farwell, Rogers, Booth, Williams and McAllister of the Circuit Court, and Judges Jameson and Moore, of the Superior Court. After a full interchange of views by the judges and the representatives of the Bar Association, the following resolutions were unanimously adopted by the judges present:

Resolved, By the Judges of the Circuit, Superior courts, and Federal courts held in Cook county, that there shall be no compulsory call of their calendars, for trial or compulsory hearing of any matter except default and necessary business at chambers, from the first day in July, until the first Monday in September in each year.

Resolved, That during the month of September of each year, there be a call of the calendar of such courts as make up a calendar for trial; but whenever the court is satisfied that the counsel of either party in a case called for trial during that month, is actually engaged in the trial of a case in the Supreme court, or in making necessary preparations therefor, such case shall be passed until the cause of such passing shall have ceased to exist.

It will thus be seen that the bar obtained the months of July and August as the vacation months, and that they are free from compulsory attendance upon the courts in this city, while engaged in the preparation and trial of causes at the September term of the Supreme Court. The judges, however, will doubtless sit during the month of July, for the hearing of submitted cases, where both parties are ready for hearing, especially in the Chancery courts. The arrangement proposed seems to give entire satisfaction, both to judges and lawyers.

AMENDMENTS TO THE LAW — CONTRACTS UNDER SEAL.— At the meeting of the Chicago Bar Association, on April 1st, it was ordered that the following resolution, which was referred to the Committee on Amendment of the Law, be printed, and a copy sent to each member of the Association.

Resolved, That this Association respectfully recommends the enactment of the following bill by the next General Assembly of the State of Illinois:

A bill for an act relating to the execution and effect of contracts in writing.

SECTION 1. That the distinctions between contracts in writing bearing the seal of the person to be bound thereby, and contracts executed in all other respects with like formalities, are hereby abolished; that the addition of a private seal to an instrument in writing shall not affect its character in any respect; that all contracts in writing, signed by the party to be bound, or for him by his duly authorized agent or attorney, shall import a consideration; that the want or failure in whole or in part of the consideration of a contract in writing may be shown as a defense, total or partial, as the case may be, except as to negotiable paper, transferred in good faith and for a valuable consideration before maturity.

CHICAGO LEGAL NEWS.

SATURDAY, MAY 6, 1876.

The Courts.

THROUGH the kindness of JOHN I. DAVENPORT, clerk of the court, we have received the following opinion of HUNT, J., and of JOHNSON, J.:

U. S. CIRCUIT COURT, S. DISTRICT OF NEW YORK.

DION BOUCICAULT v. JOSHUA HART.

In Equity.

THE COPYRIGHT LAWS CONSTRUED—WHAT NECESSARY TO SECURE A COPYRIGHT—WHAT PROPERTY IN WORKS AT COMMON LAW.

1. WHO ENTITLED TO COPYRIGHT. — That no person is entitled to a copyright unless he shall file the title-page with the librarian, and within ten days from the publication thereof, deposit in the mail two copies of such copyright book.

2. FAILURE.—If he fails in either of these requirements, he can not have his copyright.

3. MUST BE PUBLISHED WITHIN A REASONABLE TIME.—That in order to secure a copyright of a book or dramatic composition, the work must be published within a reasonable time after the filing of the title-page, and two copies be delivered to the librarian.

4. RIGHTS AT COMMON LAW.—That, at common law, an author has, until publication, a property in his literary work, capable of being held and transmitted, and in the exclusive possession and enjoyment he and his assignees will be protected. That the representation of a play on the stage, is not such a publication or dedication to the public as will authorize others to print and publish it, without the author's permission; that the author has no exclusive right to multiply copies, or control the subsequent issues. This latter is the creature of the U. S. Statutes.

5. COMMON LAW RIGHT.—That the common law right of the complainant to a protection in the performance of his play, constitutes a good cause of action; but by reason of the parties being citizens of the same State, the U. S. Court has no jurisdiction to enforce the same.—ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

HUNT, J. The facts as alleged in the bill, are as follows: The complainant, Dion Boucicault, a citizen of the United States, and a resident of the State of New York, before October 26th, 1873, composed and wrote a dramatic composition called the "Shaughraun," of which he is sole proprietor. On the 26th of October, 1874, he mailed to the Librarian of Congress a printed copy of the title of this play, and received from the said librarian the usual certificate, setting forth the said filing of the title of said dramatic composition, "the right whereof he (said Boucicault) claims as author and proprietor, in conformity with the laws of the United States respecting copyrights." He complied in all respects with all the provisions of the Revised Statutes of the United States as to copyrights.

On the 24th of November, 1874, Boucicault caused said play to be performed before persons licensed by him to witness the same at Wallack's Theatre, for the especial benefit of said Boucicault, and such performances have continued there for his benefit and profit, and said drama has never been performed otherwise or elsewhere with his consent.

Boucicault never printed said play for circulation or publication or sale, and the play is still in manuscript, and has never been published, circulated or sold or copied, or used, in any way, with the permission of Boucicault, unless in the said performance of said play at Wallack's Theatre, for Boucicault's benefit.

The defendant, Hart, is owner of a theatre on Broadway, called the Theatre Comique.

He possessed himself, surreptitiously, without the consent of Boucicault, of the manuscript of the "Shaughraun," thus made himself acquainted with its contents, and printed and published the manuscript, or a material part thereof, under the name of the "Skibbeah," a play which professed to be "arranged" by one G. L. Stout.

This play has twelve scenes, and eight of them are copied from Boucicault's play of the "Shaughraun."

Defendant has printed and published said "Skibbeah," and publicly announced his intention to sell copies of the same, containing these eight scenes of Boucicault's play, without the license or consent of Boucicault.

Defendant Hart did also, on the 26th of January, 1875, and continuously since then, up to the granting of an injunction in this suit, publicly represent this "Skibbeah" at his Theatre Comique on Broadway.

Boucicault, at that time, remonstrated with the defendant, in writing, against his representing this play.

The "Skibbeah," as far as these eight scenes are concerned, is merely a copy of Boucicault's "Shaughraun."

It is in plot, situation, stage business, language, costumes, scenery, incidents and series and sequence of events, identical with Boucicault's play of the "Shaughraun."

The four scenes which are not taken from the "Shaughraun," are taken from a play, of which one Reeve is author, called "Pyke O'Callaghan," and these four scenes are merely introductory and accessory to the other eight scenes, which contain the material part of the said "Skibbeah," and are a mere copy of Boucicault's "Shaughraun."

The bill prays for an injunction, restraining the defendant from performing and representing the said play, or from printing or publishing any copy of the same, and for other relief.

To this bill the defendant demurs upon the following grounds, viz:

For that it appears on the face of the bill that the said drama called "Shaughraun," has been for a greater period than ten days prior to the commencement of this suit publicly performed, and caused to be publicly performed, by the complainant, upon the stage of a theatre; and it does not appear by said amended bill that two printed copies of said drama, or any copies thereof, were filed in the office of the Librarian of Congress, or sent by mail to said Librarian of Congress, at Washington, District of Columbia, within ten days after the public performance thereof, or at any other time.

And for that it is alleged in said amended bill that the complainant has never published, or caused to be published, the said drama called "Shaughraun."

And for that it does not appear by said amended bill that the complainant has ever given any notice that he has complied with the requirements of the Acts of Congress respecting copyrights.

And for that it does not appear by said amended bill that the complainant has ever given any notice that the said drama is secured by copyright.

It is admitted by these pleadings that the plaintiff is the author of the literary work in question. It is also admitted, that the defendant without the consent and against the remonstrance of the complainant, made use of said work for his own benefit, by performing the same at his theatre, and by printing and publishing copies thereof. The defendant insists that in so doing he has violated no law of the land—in other words, that the complainant has not taken the measures necessary to secure to himself the exclusive right to the performance or the publication of the drama called the "Shaughraun."

The complainant relies upon the deposit of a printed copy of the title with the Librarian of Congress, as the act upon which the grant of copyright depends, and having performed the act, insists that his copyright is complete. The defendant takes the position that no copies of the work being filed with the Librarian, there is no right to sue, and that to entitle an author to copyright, the author must deposit the book, as well as the title, with the Librarian.

This is the first question to be considered.

There is no common law of copyright which can affect this case. Wheaton v. Peters, 8 Peters, 657.

The rights of the complainant to a copyright, if any he has, are conferred by the Constitution and the Statutes of the United States. It is there that we must look for them, and unless there found, they do not exist.

If conditions are imposed by Statute, as preliminary to the existence of such rights, their performance must be shown. All the conditions clearly imposed by Congress are important, and their performance is essential to a perfect title. Wheaton v. Peters, supra.

The Constitution, in section eight, article one, gives to Congress power "to promote the progress of science and useful arts, by securing, for limited times, to authors and inventors, the exclusive right to their respective writings and discoveries."

The first Act of Congress upon this subject was passed May 31st, 1790; U. S. Stat., 1 vol., p. 124. The first section of that act secured to the author the sole right of printing, publishing, and vending his map, chart, or book, for the term of fourteen years "from the recording the title thereof in the clerk's office, as hereinafter directed."

The third section provided, that "no person shall be entitled to the benefit of this act, where such book has been already published, unless he shall first deposit, and, in all other cases, unless he shall before publication deposit, a printed copy of the title in the clerk's office," etc. "And such author shall, within two months, cause a copy of such record to be published in one or more newspapers, printed in the United States, for the space of four weeks."

The fourth section required, that, within six months after the publishing thereof, a copy of the book should be delivered to the Secretary of State, to be preserved in his office.

The sixth section provided, "that any person who shall print or publish any manuscript without the consent of the author," etc., shall be liable to damages.

By a statute passed in 1802 (U. S. Stat., Vol. II., p. 171), it was enacted, that, in addition to the above requisites, the author should give information by causing a copy of the required record to be inserted in the pages of the book, next to the title.

This act of 1802 was repealed, and the copyright acts were amended, in 1831. Laws of 1831, ch. 10, 4 Stat. at Large, 436.

Section 4 of that act provided, that no person should be entitled to the benefit of the act unless he should, before publication, deposit a printed copy of the title of book, etc., with the clerk of the District court where the author resided. It also provided, that the author or proprietor of such book, etc., should, within three months from the publication of said book, etc., deliver a copy of the same to the clerk.

The 5th section of that act provided, that no person should be entitled to the benefit of the act, unless he should give information of copyright being secured, by causing to be inserted, in each copy of each edition published, the words "Entered according to Act of Congress," etc.

In July, 1870, Congress passed an act to revise, consolidate and amend the statutes respecting patents and copyrights (16 Stat., 212.)

By § 90 of that act, it was provided, "that no person shall be entitled to a copyright, unless he shall, before publication, deposit in the mail a printed copy of the title of the book, or other article, or a description of the painting, drawing etc., for which he desires a copyright, addressed to the Librarian of Congress, and, within ten days from the publication thereof, deposit in the mail two copies of such copyright book or other article, to be addressed to the said Librarian of Congress, as hereafter to be provided."

The librarian is then directed to make a record of the name of such copyright book in words specifically furnished, and to give a copy of the same to the proprietor.

By § 93, the proprietor of every copyright book is required to mail to the Librarian of Congress, within ten days after its publication, two complete printed copies thereof, and a copy of every subsequent edition.

Section 97 enacts that no person shall maintain an action for the infringement of his copyright, unless he shall insert a notice thereof on the title page, or immediately following.

The various acts mentioned, have been referred to to show, to some extent, the history and previous condition of the law on the subject under consideration.

They are all superseded by the Revised Statutes of the United States, a work undertaken by authority of a statute passed June 27, 1866, and taking effect on the 1st day of December, 1873 (§5,595).

Those statutes provide as follows:

Section 4,952 provides that the author of any book, map, dramatic composition, etc., on complying with the provisions of the chapter, shall have the sole liberty of publishing and printing the same, and, in the case of a dramatic composition, of publicly representing the same.

Section 4,953 provides that copyright shall be granted for the term of twenty-eight years from the time of recording the title thereof in the manner thereinafter directed.

Section 4,956 provides that no person shall be entitled to a copyright, unless he shall, before publication, mail to the Librarian of Congress a printed copy of the title of the book and other article, etc., of which he desires copyright, nor unless within ten days from publication, he mails two copies of the copyright book or other article to the librarian.

Section 4,957 provides that immediately on receipt of the printed copy of the title of the copyright book or other article, the librarian is forthwith to record the same; and that he shall give a copy of the same when required.

Section 4,959 requires the delivery to the Librarian of Congress of two copies of the book within ten days after publication.

Section 4,960 provides that the proprietor of a copyright book or other article, failing to mail printed copies of the book, etc., is to pay a penalty of twenty-five dollars.

Section 4,964, referring to books, provides that if any person, after the recording of the title of any book, shall, without the consent of the proprietor of the copyright first had in writing, print or publish any copy of said book, he shall forfeit the copy and be liable to an action.

Section 4,965 makes a similar provision as to maps, charts, etc., and protects them from the time of the recording of the title.

Section 4,966 provides that any person publicly performing any dramatic composition for which a copyright has been obtained shall be liable to damages.

Section 4,967 provides that any person who shall print or publish any manuscript without the consent of the author, who is a resident of the United States, shall be liable for all damages occasioned by such publication.

In applying these statutes to the question before us, viz: whether a copyright becomes a perfected right upon the filing of the title of the book or composition with the librarian, or whether a deposit of the book is also necessary to complete that right, two points are apparent. The first is, that the letter of the law does not, in any of the statutes cited, former or present, require the book to be filed to confer a copyright. Under all of the statutes referred to, from that of 1790 to the Revised Statutes, the words of the law refer to filing the title page, and not to the deposit of the book. The second suggestion is, that it seems to be assumed throughout all of the statutes that a copy of the book will, and must, within a short time after filing the title page, be filed with the Librarian of Congress.

Of this idea, § 4,956 of the Revised Statutes affords an illustration. It had been enacted in the previous sections that a copyright should be secured to authors, designers and composers, and, in this section, a definition is given, in a negative form, of the persons entitled to the benefit of the law. "No person shall be entitled to a copyright unless he shall, before publication, deliver or deposit with the Librarian of Congress, * * * a printed copy of the title of the book, etc., nor unless he shall, also, within ten days from the publication thereof, deliver to the librarian two copies of the book, etc." Any person shall be entitled to copyright, who, before publication, first, shall deliver to the librarian a printed copy of the title of the book, and second, shall within ten days after the publication thereof, deliver to the librarian two copies of the same. The book may not be printed or published when the title page is filed, and some right (inchoate, perhaps) seems intended to be secured as of that date, although an actual printing or publication is not then made. But the expression "before publication," is based upon the idea that a printing or publishing will soon occur. This is put into clear meaning by the next clause of the section, that the author shall not be entitled to copyright "unless within ten days from the publication," he shall deliver two copies to the librarian. This means that the author is required to publish his work, and after he has so published it, and within ten days, he shall deliver two copies to the librarian. It is not a fair interpretation of this section to hold, that the filing of the title entitles to a copyright fully and absolutely, and that this may be defeated by a publication and failure to deliver two copies, but, as long as there is no publication, although it continue indefinitely, there is no lapse of the right.

This construction is not permitted, either by that idea which secures benefits to the author or inventor, upon the theory that the public is to be benefited, as well as himself, by his works, or by the principle pervading all this branch of the laws of patents, trade-marks, and copyrights, that an author or inventor must put his claim into the form of a well-defined specification, work or composition, and so place it upon record that he can not alter it to suit circumstances, and so that other authors and inventors may know precisely what it is that has been written or invented. The idea that an inventor may secure a patent for an invention of which he should not be required to file a specification, would not be tolerated. He may file preliminary or precautionary papers until his invention shall be completed, he may amend his specifications, and he may obtain reissues. It was never heard, however, that he could conceal the particulars of his invention, and by filing a general statement of a discovery or improvement, cut off the rights and claims of others. The principle I conceive to be the same in regard to a copyright, and I hold that, to secure a copyright of a book or dramatic composition, the work must be published within a reasonable time after the filing of the title page, and two copies be delivered to the librarian.

These two acts are, by the statute, made necessary to be performed, and we can no more take it upon ourselves to say that the latter is not an indispensable requisite to a copyright, than we can say it of the former.

In examining the rights of parties under the statutes of 1790 and of 1802, the court held in Wheaton v. Peters, (8 Peters, 663), that, to secure a copyright, all the requisites of the statute must be complied with. "The acts required," say the court, "to be done by an author to secure his right, are in the order in which they must naturally transpire. First, the title of the book is to be deposited with the clerk, and the record he makes must be inserted in the first or second page, then the public notice in the newspapers is to be given, and, within six months after the publication of the book, a copy must be deposited in the Department of State. A right undoubtedly accrues on the record being made with the clerk and the printing of it as required, but what is the nature of that right? Is it perfect? If so, the two other requisites are wholly useless. * * * But we are told they are unimportant acts. If they are indeed wholly unimportant, Congress acted unwisely in requiring them to be done. But, whether they are important or not is for the court to determine, not the legislature. * * * They are acts which the law requires to be done, and may this court dispense with their performance? * * * The notice could not be published until after the entry with the clerk, nor could the book be deposited with the Secretary of State until it was published. But these are acts which are not less important than those which are required to be done previously. They form a part of the title, and, until they are performed, the title is not perfect. The deposit of the book in the Department of State may be important to identify it at any future period, should the copyright be contested, or an unfounded claim of authorship asserted."

The language of the Revised Statutes is stronger than that of the act of 1870. By the latter act (16 U. S. Stat., 212) it is provided, that no person should be entitled to copyright unless he should file the title page with the librarian, "and, within ten days from the publication thereof, deposit in the mail two copies of such copyright book," etc.

In the Revised Statutes, two negatives are distinctly specified, and, in either case, the defect is fatal. He must file his title page—if he fails in this, he fails in all—but he cannot then have his copyright, "unless he shall also" deliver two copies within ten days from publication. In addition to the first, he must also perform the second requirement. See the opinion of Sawyer, C. J., in Parkinson v. La Salle, 21 Int. Rev. Rec., p. 163; Euer v. Coxe, 4 Wash. C. C. R., 490; Baker v. Taylor, 2 Blatchford, 83.

In this case, the title page was filed on the 26th of October, 1874. The bill, verified in February, 1875, does not allege any publication of the work, or any delivery of copies, or any reason why the same has not been done.

The complainant also insists that this action can be sustained by virtue of section 4,966 of the Revised Statutes. That section provides, that any person publicly performing any dramatic composition for which a copyright has been obtained, without the consent of the proprietor, shall be liable in damages, as therein stated. If no copyright has been obtained by the complainant for this composition, there has been no violation of a right secured by this action, and he takes nothing under this claim.

By the act of August 18, 1856 (11 U. S. Stat., 138), it was enacted, that the granting of a copyright to the author of a dramatic composition should be deemed to confer upon him the sole right to perform and represent the same on any stage, during the period for which the copyright was obtained. The same power is found in section 101 of the statutes of 1870 (16 Stat., p. 214.) Like the exclusive right to print, the exclusive right to perform, so far as these statutes are concerned, is dependent upon the existence of a copyright.

The bill alleges, also, that the defendant has, without the consent of the complainant, printed and published eight scenes of his play, and has publicly announced his intention to sell copies of the same. This proceeding is in violation of section 4,967 of the Revised Statutes, which provides, that every person who shall print or publish any manuscript without the consent of the author, if such author is a citizen of the United States, or resident therein, shall be liable to the author for all damages occasioned by such injury. The demurrer admits this publication, and the defendant must be restrained from printing or publishing the play.

The defendant seeks to avoid the effect of this allegation, by the statement, that the bill does not aver that such publication took place after the recording of the title of the complainant's play. This averment is not expressly made, but it must be taken to be the fact, upon the pleadings. It is averred, that the complainant composed and wrote the play previously to November 14th, 1874, that in October he filed a copy of the title page, and the librarian recorded the same in the proper book kept for that purpose; that, on the 14th of November, he caused the same to be performed at Wallack's Theatre; that he never has printed the play for circulation, and that the defendant, by means unknown to him, has obtained a knowledge of the contents of the manuscript, and, without his consent, has printed the same. The fair meaning of this is, that this action of the defendant took place after the title of the play had been deposited and recorded.

In dealing with this case I have given no effect to the general allegation of the bill, that the "complainant has complied in all respects with the requirements of the Revised Statutes" that were necessary to enable him to copyright his composition. A demurrer admits allegations of fact only, not allegations or inferences of law. That the allegation in question is not one of fact is well illustrated by this case. Does the allegation include an averment that the complainant has deposited with the librarian printed copies of his work as well as of his title page? If such deposit is a requirement of the statute, it does include it. If it is not, it does not include it. We are thus directed at once to the solution of a question of law instead of a point of fact. Instead of averring that he has deposited a copy of his title page, and also two copies of the body of the book, the bill alleges that the complainant has deposited a copy of his title page, and that he has never published his work, and was, therefore, not required by the statute to deposit copies of the work. This is the legal effect of the averment.

I am also of the opinion that there has never been a publication by the complainant of this work, within the meaning of the statute. The work has not been printed by the author, nor has it been abandoned or dedicated to the public. The author has permitted and procured its representation for his own benefit, and through his selected channels. This does not amount to a publication within the statute, or a dedication to the use of the public. Coleman v. Walker, 5 T. R., 245; DeWitt v. Palmer, 2 Sweeny, 547, S. C.; 47 N. Y. R., 536; Bartlett v. Chilton, 4 McLean, 400; Robert v. Megley, 23 Monthly Law Journal, 396; Ib., 660.

The English decision (Boucicault v. Delafield), cited to the contrary, is based upon the peculiar language of the English statute and is not an authority in this case.

I am of the opinion, however, that the defendant has violated the complainant's common law right of ownership in his dramatic composition. The copyright law is intended to preserve to the complainant his exclusive right to multiply copies, to publish, and, in my judgment, only attaches perfectly where a publication is made. The ownership, however, and the right of an author to retain and use his dramatic works for his personal benefit without publication, is a common law right. It is recognized and defined by the statutes cited, but it exists independently of the statute.

In Palmer v. DeWitt (2 Sweeny R., 547), the court says: "Whatever may have been the conflict of judicial opinion upon the effect of copyright laws upon the common law rights, it has never been disputed that by common law an author has, until publication, a property in his literary work, capable of being held and transmitted, and in the exclusive possession and enjoyment of which he and his assignees will be protected.

In the opinion of Monell, J., in that case, all the authorities are collected and presented.

The same case is reported in 47 N. Y., 536. It is there held that the representation of a play on the stage is not such a publication or dedication to the public as authorizes others to print and publish it without the author's permission. The manuscript and the author's right are still within the protection of the law. The common law rights of authors to their literary productions as they existed at common law, are now recognized. The author has the exclusive right to the first publication of his work, but no exclusive right to multiply copies or control the subsequent issues. This latter right is the creation of the statute of the United States.

Boucicault v. Fox, 5 Blatchford, 97; same v. Wood, 16 Am. Law Reg., 550.

Assuming this to be so, the difficulty arises that this court has no power to administer common law relief in a suit between citizens of the same State. The courts of the State are the proper, and, usually, the exclusive tribunals for the performance of that duty. The United States have jurisdiction of common law questions when the controversy is between citizens of different States. When the controversy is between citizens of the same State, its jurisdiction is limited to questions arising upon or under the laws or authority of the United States.

The result of my examination is, that the portions of the bill based upon alleged violations of the statute respecting copyright, cannot be sustained; and that the portions thereof based upon the alleged violation of § 4,967 of the Revised Statutes are well laid, and the cause of action therein set forth is a good one; and that the common law right of the complainant to a protection in the performance of his play constitutes a good cause of action, but by reason of the parties being citizens of the same State, this court has no jurisdiction to enforce the same.

The demurrer, must, therefore, be overruled, and the defendant is allowed to answer within thirty days after service of a copy of the order overruling the demurrer.

COPYRIGHT—THE WORK MUST BE PUBLISHED WITHIN A REASONABLE TIME AFTER FILING THE TITLE PAGE.

JOHNSON, Cir. J.

In the case of Boucicault vs. Hart, Mr. Justice Hunt in June, 1875, decided that to secure a copyright of a book or a dramatic composition, the work must be published within a reasonable time after the filing of the title page, and that two copies must then be delivered to the Librarian of Congress, as required by law. Upon this application for a preliminary injunction, it is fitting that, without further inquiry or examination on my part, this decision should be followed as the law of this circuit, and I must accordingly deny the motion.

OPINION, APRIL, 1876.

THE GLOBE INSURANCE CO., of Chicago,
v.
THE CLEVELAND INSURANCE CO.

BANKRUPTCY — EFFECT OF GENERAL ASSIGNMENT—ACT OF BANKRUPTCY.

1. That a general assignment is an act of bankruptcy.
2. That a voluntary assignment cannot defeat the operations of the bankrupt law.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

EMMONS, J.—Upon this writ of error, if there are any facts which prevent a decision upon the abstract question of law which we discuss from being a complete disposition of the case, they have not been called to our attention. The sole question for our determination is, whether the general assignment for the benefit of all creditors equally made by the Cleveland Insurance Company, is an act of bankruptcy and void under the statute.

For a number of years the anomalous condition has existed of a special local rule in the Sixth Circuit, in reference to general assignments under the bankrupt law, which pertains in no other part of the Union. In deference to an opinion expressed by Justice Swayne soon after the enactment of the law, in a case where the point did not arise, the District and Circuit Judges, in conflict with their own opinions, have refused to interfere with such conveyances. A letter from our brother Swayne desired us to decide the question as we deemed right, that it might be ultimately settled by the Supreme Court. A recent judgment by that tribunal, Mayer et al., assignee, etc., v. Hellman et al., October term, 1875. (8 CHICAGO LEGAL NEWS, 177), refers to, but expressly waives an expression of opinion upon the point. That tribunal is not accustomed thus to treat questions it deems too plain for discussion. In these circumstances, having been unable to change the views which we have always entertained upon this subject, as well under the law of 1841 as the present statute, we have deemed it proper to accompany the judgment which we render with a somewhat full statement of the reasons upon which we rest it. The very efficient aid which the learned counsel for the Globe Insurance Company have rendered us, enable us to do so with more fullness than otherwise would have been possible.

The following are a portion only of the cases which have been decided by the Circuit and District courts, declaring a general assignment void under the act of 1867. We do not take pains to exhaust the references upon this subject: 1, N. B. R., 558; in re Langley, was an assignment which had been recorded under the laws of Ohio five days before the bankrupt law came into operation. It is treated by the court like an ordinary general assignment. Judge Leavitt, erroneously, we think, holding that the statute had a retro-active effect, decided that a general assignment for the equal benefit of creditors was void, because it transferred the property to a different course of administration, and gave the appointment of the trustee to the debtor instead of to the creditors. He refers to Deacon on Bankruptcy, pages 72 and 73; Griffith on Bankruptcy, pages 107, 119, 120, to show that such had always been the interpretation of the English statutes, and to the American judgments which had given a like construction to the law of 1841.

We hereafter notice the judgment of Justice Swayne reversing this decision. 3 B. R., quarto 127, in re Goldschmidt, Judge Blatchford holds a general assignment an act of bankruptcy, and as grounds for refusing a discharge. 3 N. B. R., 24 in re Randall & Sunderland, Judge Deady makes precisely the same ruling. It does not detract from the effect of these judgments upon the principal point that other tribunals have not deduced the same consequences from such an act of bankruptcy. Judge Cadwalader in 3 N. B. R., 258, in re Pierce & Holbrook, rules the principal point in the same way, although he thought it was not such a fraud as prevented a discharge. Hardy, Blake & Co. vs. Bininger & Co., 4 N. B. R., 262, was a petition in review before Judge Woodruff.

An insolvent firm had procured in chancery a transfer of all their property to a receiver. This was held an act of bankruptcy, because it defeated the operation of the act by transferring the property to a different course of administration. The learned judge says it is immaterial that the citizen may select a better and more economical mode than that pointed out by the bankrupt law; and, after enumerating many of the leading features of the latter in reference to the settlement of claims, the investigation of frauds and the punishment of wrongs, the declaration of dividends and other features, says: None of these are secured by a transfer made by the bankrupt himself, whether fraudulent or not; it is enough "that it defeats the operation of the act" to avoid it.

In re Smith, 3 N. B. R., p. 377, Jugde Hall had previously ruled that a general assignment was an act of bankruptcy, resting his judgment upon reasons nearly identical with those of Judge Woodruff. These and other similar rulings in the Second Circuit show how differently the judges there considered the decision of Judge Nelson in Sedgwick v. Place, 1 B. R., 204, from the interpretation which has been given it when cited to sustain a contrary ruling. They do not refer to it as bearing upon the question. 10 N. B. R., 181, in re the Union Pacific Railroad Company, at pages 181 and 182, contains an intelligent statement of the English doctrine which has uniformly held a general assignment to be an act of bankruptcy, and adds an opinion that our law should receive the same interpretation. Judge Lowell thinks the creditors and not the bankrupts should have the power of selecting the trustee. 12 N. B. R., p. 538, in re Mendelsohn, Judge Hillyer, in holding an assignment void because it created a preference, says that the weight of authority is in favor of the invalidity of even a fair general assignment for the benefit of creditors. See 3 N. B. R., p. 518, in re Spicer & Peckham v Ward & Trow; 1 Dillon, 439, in re. Burt, Justice Miller, sitting with Circuit Judge Dillon, deciding a case upon review, held that a general assignment was an act of bankruptcy. The point was fully raised. 8 Philadelphia, Barnes v. Retter, in an elaborate judgment, which goes over the English and American history of this question and ably considering it upon principle and authority, holds that a general assignment for the equal benefit of creditors is per se an act of bankruptcy. The judgment is drawn up by Judge Cadwalader and concurred in by Circuit Judge McKennan. We recur to it again more fully in connection with our statement of the English law.

Opposed to these concurring judgments directly upon the point is that of Justice Swayne, in Langley v. Perry 2 N. B. R., 596; and his dictum in Farran v. Crawford, 17 Law Register (note). We are not aware of any other judgment under the law of 1867, so holding. There are a few dicta. We repeat only criticisms frequently made when it is said the point did not arise in Langley v. Perry. The assignment was made before the bankrupt law was in operation, and the latter could have no effect upon it. That it could not will hardly be doubted, but it has been frequently ruled. Day v. Bardwell, 97 Mass., 248; Chamberlain v. Perkins, 51, N. H., 336, 37 Cal., 208. This is familiar law, and would have been overlooked by the learned justice but for the accident that the District court had ruled the point and the rectitude of its judgment in that regard was not discussed or questioned in the Circuit court. The report of the judgment is very meager and is manifestly imperfect. We infer from what little we have of it that the argument turned mainly upon the question of fraud under the statute of Elizabeth and at common law. In Farran v. Crawford his Honor expressly says the point does not arise, and he remarks only, that he supposes the judgment in Langley v. Perry to be right. The opinion of Judge Nelson is elsewhere shown not to be opposed to our present ruling. 11 N. B. R., 185, in re Marter. Judge Brown of the Eastern District of Michigan, saying that he withheld an expression of his own opinion, followed that of Justice Swayne in re Langley, as have all the judges in this Circuit since it was rendered up to the present time. He refers to the judgment of Judge Hall, in re Wells, 1, N. B. R., 171, as in accord with that of Judge Swayne. Judge Hall decided only that, as the intent to delay creditors was denied upon the record and no issue was taken upon that intent, he was precluded by the averments from going into the question at all. He expressly disclaims a decision upon the question before us, whether a general assignment is or is not an act of bankruptcy. That he did not intend to decide as our brother Brown supposes is entirely clear from his able judgment deciding this point as we now rule it in 3 N. B. R., p. 377, re Smith, cited ante. A reference is also made to a like opinion by Judge Treat, of Missouri. In the report no opinion is given. It is simply said such a judgement has been rendered. That this is not the law administered in that district appears from the concurring judgments of Justice Miller, of the Supreme court, and Judge Dillon, already referred to.

Upon mere authority, therefore, being released from the obligation of following the precedent in our own circuit, this review shows we have no choice of judgment. Justice Miller, in a case where the point arose, and the entire body of Circuit and District Judges, in the Circuit and District courts, have followed the uniform decisions in England and in this country from the earliest periods of the bankrupt law, and have decided with entire unanimity, that a general assignment for the equal benefit of creditors, and all similar transfers procured by operation of law, are acts of bankruptcy and a fraud upon the act.

Under the law of 1841, several decisions of this precise question were made. During the administration of that law, when at the bar, we had occasion to examine it. Few doctrines were more generally acquiesced in at that time than that general assignments for the benefit of creditors, had become unlawful. Every lawyer of large practice will be enabled to say that the practice was abandoned throughout the country. The local judgments were then less frequently reported than now, or they would have been as numerous in the books as they are under the law of 1867. We are quite confident there are others, but our want of time enables us now to refer only to the two cases following, which ruled the precise point upon a general assignment. As we soon notice, however, the identical principle is involved in all those numerous judgments under both acts which hold similar assignments under local statutes to be acts of bankruptcy. When they are considered it will abundantly appear that the act of 1841 was interpreted as we construe the present law. In 3 McLean, 202, McLean v. Johnson, the precise point was presented under the law of 1841, and the assignment was declared to be a fraud upon the act, and the assigned property was directed to be delivered up to the assignee in bankruptcy. That act contained no clause providing that transfers should be void which defeated the operation of the act, like our present law; but it was held to be so by implication, in conformity to the English precedents. McLean v. Meline, 3 McLean, 199, involves the same questions and was decided in the same way.

The cases already referred to in terms involving a general assignment, are by no means all which pointedly and directly decide this very matter. All the numerous cases which have held that State insolvent laws are suspended by the enactment of a National bankrupt law, necessarily involves this identical principle. There is not a scintilla of difference distinguishing one class of judgments from the other. It is but an immaterial accident that in the one what is prohibited by the bankrupt law is effectuated by a voluntary general assignment, and in the other that a similar transfer is made in conformity with the State law. Such statutory conveyances are not held void as against the policy of the bankrupt act because of the State enactment, but on account of what those statutes authorize to be done. Sturgis v. Crowninshield, 4 Wheat., 122; Ogden v. Saunders, 12 Wheat., 213, and Cook v. Moffat, 5 How., 308, and the long list of Federal and State concurring judgments abundantly show that State legislation is authorized until Congress acts, and that such legislation is suspended so far only as it comes in conflict with Federal legislation. In determining whether it does so come in conflict, the very question asked in this case has to be answered. Is the matter which is authorized in conflict with the general policy and the mode of its execution provided by the National law? If the State statute authorized a transfer of all a debtor's property for equal distribution among his creditors, in the language of many of the cases, "acting upon the same persons and property," a transfer under it is void; not because the distribution is different, or because the proceedings are less plenary, but for the sole reason that a different tribunal is selected than that provided by Congress. The reasons given by the most learned judges who have discussed this subject are so strikingly like those found in the British decisions declaring general assignments void as against the English bankrupt law, that, were they interchanged, the opinions would be equally sustained. The remark is equally true of the American rulings, where a general assignment has been called in question. When, therefore it is decided that a State insolvent law is suspended because it takes the property of a bankrupt from the control of the National courts, a decision has been made which not only completely covers and declares void a general assignment, but goes very far beyond the doctrines necessary for its invalidity. They demand only that a different tribunal shall be sought, and for a much greater reason is an assignment void which not only seeks such other tribunal, but chooses the trustee by the uncontrolled election of the debtor, and practically avoids all the guards which the provisions of the statute are intended to throw around the rights of creditors.

In referring to the judgments deciding what proceedings are in conflict with the bankrupt law when authorized by State enactments, it is manifest we are not at all concerned with the differences in opinion between those judges who think the State provision is wholly suspended, and those who think proceedings under them are good until called in question by an assignee in bankruptcy. All are unanimous in declaring that transfers under them are void when questioned in that mode. It is this consistent feature in them all to which we point as determining the question now before us.

It would lead to most unwarrantable prolixity were we to analyze and reproduce the provisions of the various State statutes, for the purpose of showing by their particulars that all of them, with slightly varying forms, simply take the estate of the debtor, transfer it to trustees, convert it into money and distribute the proceeds among the creditors. They all do substantially, but in a better and more protective form, what a general assignment does; and we repeat, it is for this reason only they are adjudged to be in conflict with the bankrupt law. A perusal of the judgments we cite under this head will show that the reasons upon which they rest are literally and substantially precisely those which in England and this country sustain like decisions in reference to the invalidity of general assignments. It should be noticed particularly that no distinction whatever is made between those local systems which do and those which do not discharge the debt itself. It is the custody and appropriation of the assets which constitutes the wrong, 38 Conn., 80, Maltbie v. Hotchkiss, was a contest between an assignee under a State law and a levying creditor. The court reaffirms its judgment in Hawkins' appeal, 34 Conn., 548, that the State proceeding is good until some right is asserted under an adjudication in bankruptcy. But in reconciling its judgment with just relations to the Federal judiciary, the court by Carpenter, J., in a thoroughly argued opinion, shows that a general assignment for the equal benefit of all creditors, either with or without a local statute, is void under the bankrupt law, and that if an assignee claims the property from the State tribunal it would necessarily be transferred to him. This learned court identify the two cases of a statutory and a general assignment, holding both to be equally void. This case shows how grossly the case of Hawkins' appeal is misunderstood by those courts which have cited it as sustaining the validity of a general assignment against the bankrupt law. As construed by the court which pronounced it, it said no more than that the assignment would be upheld until questioned by proceedings in the national court. 9 N. B. R., 50, re Reynolds, is among the most intelligent discussions of the subject that we find in the more recent decisions. It reviews the leading cases and holds that a State insolvent law which appropriates all a debtor's property and distributes the proceeds ratably amongst his creditors, although it does not discharge the debtor, is wholly suspended by the enactment of a bankrupt law. It was said the State law took the entire assets from the court of bankruptcy and deprived the creditor of the protection which the Federal law was intended to secure.

The following cases upon this subject arose under the bankrupt law of 1841. 9 Meto, 16, Griswold v. Pratt, in deciding that the State law is ipso facto suspended without any proceedings in bankruptcy by the enactment of the bankrupt law of 1841, held that the two laws could not act upon the same person and the same property contemporaneously; and as the State law could not act without being subject to be defeated at any time, it ought not to be enforced at all. 2 Story, C. C., 322, ex parte Eames, says that Sturgis v. Crownishield, 4 Wheat.; Ogden v. Sanders, 12 Wheat., established the doctrine that the enactment of a bankrupt law suspended all State insolvent laws as to future cases, where the administration of the latter acted upon the same persons and property, thus divesting the jurisdiction of the federal and giving it to the State tribunals. And see 19 La., 497; 5 Rob., 27, 15 La., Ann., 602; 3 N. B. R., p. 435, applied the same principal to an insolvent corporation being wound up under the local law. 1 N. B. R., 86, Commonwealth v. Ohara, District Court of Pennsylvania; 2 N. B. R., 629; Martin v. Berry, California Supreme Court; 2 N. B. R., 485; Supreme Court of Maryland; 4 N. B. R., 569, Cassard v. Croner, Supreme Court of Maryland. The 37 Cal., 208, Martin v. Berry, is a very full consideration of this subject; 30 Md., 128, Van Nostrand v. Carr; 21 La. Ann, 446, Barker v. Rogers, 71 Penn. St., 362; Cassard v. Croner, 4 N. B. R., 569; re Stubbs, 4 N. B. R., 376; Reed v. Taylor, 4 N. B. R., 710. Nothing is gained in argument by further analysis of this numerous class of adjudications. They all depend upon a like reason, and that is substantially and literally applicable to the case of a general assignment irrespective of a State statute.

There is nothing in conflict with these decisions worthy of citation or criticism.

The entire body of the law in reference to State legislation upon general subjects, cognizance of which is given to Congress, is equally forcible to show that a general assignment is void as against the bankrupt law. When the inquiry is made whether a State regulation is in conflict with federal enactments regulating commerce, the militia, establishing a currency, or any other subject of national control, it is answered by the precise mode of inquiry and investigation demanded in this instance. The degree of conflict tolerated in those instances, and that which is held to be inconsistent and void, afford precedents for decision here. Were this a novel question, and need arose to go beyond adjudications of the precise thing, an argument equally demonstrative would be deduced from the facts and literal reasoning in Brown v. State of Maryland, 12 Wheat., 419; Wynne v. Wright, 1 Dev. and Bat. (N. C.), 19; McCulloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat., 316; Gilman v. Philadelphia, 3 Wal., 713, and the numerous other judgments of this class. They all go upon the ground that when Congress has regulated a subject, a State shall not regulate the same subject. And we add, much less can a citizen of his own volition so regulate the same matter as to take himself and estate without the operation of federal law.

The course of English adjudication upon the successive bankrupt laws of that country, the language of the British statutes and of our own, which have adopted them, constitute an argument against the validity of a general assignment for the equal benefit of creditors, which we should be unable to resist were the question wholly novel and uninfluenced by any adjudication in this country. 8 Philadelphia, Rep., 133, Barnes vs. Retter, is so full and satisfactory a history of English legislation and decision upon the subject that we omit the somewhat extended analysis of British statutes and judgments which we had prepared. The following is a brief condensation of its able argument with, in some instances, a slightly more full quotation of statutory provisions. The assignment was made under the law of Pennsylvania, and although its peculiar provisions are considered for the purpose of showing their antagonism with the bankrupt law, it is expressly said, as it is quite manifest upon principle, they are no more so than the general course of administration under an assignment to a trustee uncontrolled by statutory regulations. Judge Cadwallader shows that, from the time of James I, down to 1867, when our present law was enacted, there had been no substantial change in British legislation upon this subject. The act of James, unlike our own, contained no clause invalidating transfers which defeated the operation of the bankrupt law, but was simply a provision that if any trader should "make or cause to be made any fraudulent grant or conveyance of his lands, goods, etc., to the intent or whereby his creditors shall or may be defeated or delayed for the recovery of their just and true debts," he shall be deemed a bankrupt. This was farther simplified in 1825 by an enactment that if a trader should make "any fraudulent grant or conveyance of any of his lands, tenements, goods or chattels" * * "with intent to defeat or delay his creditors" he shall be deemed to have thereby committed an act of bankruptcy. It is shown that under these provisions it has been uniformly by numerous judgments held that a general assignment for the benefit of all creditors equally was an act of bankruptcy; upon the ground that such transfers were fraudulent, not at common law or under the 13 of Elizabeth, but because they defeated the rights of creditors secured by the bankrupt law to the choice of a trustee, to the summary jurisdiction of the court, and to the ample control which the law intended to give them over the estate of their insolvent debtor.

The familiar rule is invoked, that where a law is adopted from a neighboring State or country, which has received a judicial reading, the presumption of law is that its interpretation is also included; and the rule is said to be applicable with great force to so long and often repeated a construction of a succession of statutes adopted by Congress. And what is of still more significance, attention is called to the fact that Congress did not leave the adoption of this rule to an implication of law, but by express enactment adopted nearly the words of the British decisions, by adding in the law of 1867 that a transfer of property should be an act of bankruptcy, not only where it was fraudulent and to delay creditors, but if it was "to defeat the operation of the act." This "defeating the operation of the act" and "this putting the assets in a different course of administration," and this "transferring them to another tribunal," are the reasons given in the English judgments, why a general assignment is fraudulent. The following citations, here noted in the order in which they occur in this careful opinion, have all been re-examined; and we can say with confidence they fully sustain the conclusive argument, a mere outline of which we have suggested: 9 East., 487, 1 Crompton, M. & R., 779, 780; 3 Co., 80, b Twynes case; ex parte Bailey, 3 DeGex, Mc. N. & G., 534; Smith v. Carman, Ex. ch. 2 El. & Bl., 35: 16 Ves. 148, 17 Ves., 197; 1 Atkyn, 91; Ib., 88; Kettle v. Hammond; Coote B. L., 111; Cowp., 123; 8 D. & E., 140; 4 East., 200; Christian I., 188, second edition; Stewart v. Moody, 1 Crompton, M. & R., 777; 2 Burr, 828, Wilson v. Day.

The learned judge successfully shows that the judgments of Justice Swayne in Langley v. Perry and Farrand v. Crawford, and that of Justice Nelson in 1 B. R., p. 204, Sedgwick v. Place, do not necessarily decide this point.

1 De G. Fisher & Jones, 289, ex parte Alsop, 1859. Upon appeal Lord Justice Turner for the court said: That under the several bankrupt laws anterior to 1859 it was well established that a general assignment for the benefit of creditors equally was an act of bankruptcy; and that the only question left to be discussed was whether the act of that year had changed the law, and proceeded to show that it had not.

In 1 Burr, 467, Worsley et al. v. De Mattos, upon motion for a new trial in an issue out of chancery to ascertain whether an assignment was an act of bankruptcy, Lord Mansfield held it to be such upon two distinct grounds; first, because there were features in it which made it void at common law and under the statute of Elizabeth; and second, because it gave the debtor the choice of trustee, and took the assets to another tribunal. And in 3, M. & S., 374, Pickstock v. Lyster. Le Blanc, J., holding that a general assignment was good at common law, takes pains to say that the bankrupt law was not in question, as no proceedings had been taken under it. This distinction between a conveyance void under the statute of frauds, and one illegal because at war with the policy of the bankrupt law, is common to nearly all the British judgments. These two are referred to for the purpose only of showing how distinctly it is taken.

The following are but part of the older English judgments additional to those cited in 8 Philadelphia, reaffirming, in varying circumstances, the principle that an assignment of all a debtor's property whereby its conversion into money and its distribution among his creditors is given over to a trustee of his own selection, is an act of bankruptcy and void under the statute. Lindon v. Sharp, 7 Scott, N. R., 745. Hassels v. Simpson, 1 Doug., 89; Butcher v. Easto, 1 Doug., 295; Porter v. Walker, 1 Man, & G., 686; Ex. p. Bland re Murgatroyd De G. M. & G., 757. The elementary books are equally full. Eden on Bankruptcy, 28; Roche & Hazlett, 375, et seq.

The force in this country of these English adjudications must not be weakened by the supposition that any latitude of construction is indulged in these not applicable in our own tribunals. It is as familiar law in England as here, that all acts of bankruptcy must be expressly declared by statute. See Dutton v. Morrison 17, Ves., 193; Ex. p. Mayor 19. Ves. 542, and Roche & Hazlett's Law and Practice in Bankruptcy, edition of 1873. When, therefore, it is held that a general assignment is void, it is a determination that it comes within the express provision of the statute declaring that conveyances to hinder or delay creditors shall be void.

When the following very recent judgment was rendered the doctrine which it reannounces had become a part of English statutory law. It is referred to only as an authoritative exposition of the past history of this question there. L. R. 7, Ch. App., 302, in re Wood. The question was whether the transfer of all a man's property to secure a past debt was an act of bankruptcy. Mellish, Lord Justice, in arguing that the statute of 1869 had not altered the law in that respect, goes over the old principles and enumerating what had been well established, at page 306, says: "There were various conveyances which the court held to be fraudulent. A conveyance which was void under the statute of 13 Elizabeth was one; so was a conveyanee of a man's whole property for the benefit of all his creditors." After stating other instances he adds that in all of them "the law assumed that such acts were of necessity done with intent to defeat or delay creditors."

In view of this long and uninterrupted judicial reading, where our own re-enactment has in such unambiguous terms used language which plainly includes it by inhibiting conveyances "which defeat the operation of the act," it may well be asked with emphasis, why shall not the American law be construed like the English, from which it was taken? Why shall not the familiar rule be applied, that where a judicially construed law is adopted the construction is approbated by implication. We can imagine no condition where the following language of the Supreme Court of the United States is more applicable. They say where English statutes are adopted, "the known and settled construction of those statutes has been considered as silently incorporated into the acts." 2 Peters 2, Pennock v. Dialogue. and see 5 Pet., 263; 5 Ohio, 74; 1 Ks., 226; 4 Ks., 353; 3 Ill., 288; 13 Ill., 17; 19 Ill., 151; 21 Vt., 256; 41 Mo., 453; 21 Wis., 274. This rule is one upon which the lawyer and the citizen has the right to rely; because in ninety-nine cases in the one hundred, it is followed by courts. We understand it to be among the well-settled canons of construction which will not, without pressing reason, be departed from. It is not, of course, constraining and so obligatory as to be yielded to in instances where the home interpretation has become dissatisfactory, and productive of manifest evils. There are some such instances. But if anything were needed to complete and clinch the argument in favor of its application in this instance, it is found in the fact that, in the revision of the British law in 1869, the entire satisfaction of English judges and statesmen with the judicial interpretation which we have followed in this opinion is testified by inserting in the law an express provision making it an act of bankruptcy "that the debtor has in England or elsewhere made a conveyance or assignment of his property to a trustee or trustees for the benefit of his creditors generally." This, then, is no accidental or hasty interpretation, calling for dissent and review by our courts. It embodies the results of hundreds of years of experience, with commercial conditions strikingly like our own, and with a people whose modes of action and sense of justice are so kindred as to make their well-matured and long-administered rules of civil conduct the very highest evidence of their substantial fitness here.

To our mind one of the leading arguments against the validity of a general assignment grows out of the criminal features of the bankrupt law. They are pointedly referred to by Judge Woodruff in Hardy et al. v. Blake et al., by Judge Hall in re Smith, expressly and in more general form in other judgments. These crimes cannot be punished at all without an adjudication in bankruptcy against the offender. This is quite plain, and was so ruled in 4 N. B. R., 113, United States v. Prescott. If a general assignment is good against the bankrupt law, then every debtor clearly subject to criminal punishment would transfer his entire property to an assignee, thus leaving nothing to pay the expenses of proceedings in bankruptcy. It is certain creditors already sufficiently injured would not, without any hope of reimbursement incur the expense of an adjudication, simply for the purposes of punishment. It would seem that an act so protective of a criminal debtor, and throwing such impediments in the way of prosecution under the Federal law, must be considered in conflict with it.

The power to pass a bankrupt law is specifically given. But little argument would have been needed to have deduced it from the power to regulate commerce between the States in all instances of inter-State trade. Our active industry and the great interests of trade, our bills of exchange, the transit of our grain crop, and the productions of our mines, absolutely refuse to obey the behests of any class of politicians and stop at State lines. We do not believe there is a State in the Union, commercial centers in which have not far more intimate relations with similar points in other States than in their own. Not one bankruptcy in fifty finds all the creditors in a single district. The subject to be regulated is one essentially national. Commerce in a most compendious sense is not more so. Owing to the imperfections of the present law the general argument which this department of the subject ought to enable us to put forth is somewhat wanting. But even the present system, with its protections against preferences, the choice of a trustee, the distant proof of debts without the personal appearances of witnesses, the extraordinary efficiency in examining into past and preventing contemplated frauds, the summary examination of debtors and the full examination of his books, securities and correspondence, all of which pass to the assignee in bankruptcy, the criminal jurisdiction, dependent wholly upon an adjudication, and the other safeguards intended to protect the mutual rights of creditors and debtor, when contrasted with that old chronic instrumentality of fraud and delay known as a general assignment for the benefit of creditors, is so additionally protective as to dominate the latter by the mere force of its superiority and increased beneficence. A debtor, the fallacy of whose apparent prosperity is known only to himself, having transferred to members of his own family a large portion of his estate, may by one of these assignments, selecting his own trustee, render it morally certain that his fraud will never be successfully examined. The creditors, divided by distance, unknown to each other and without concert of action, are seldom willing individually to incur the enormous expense of such litigation. The mode of probing the fraud by bill in equity is cumbersome and even awkward. The history of the law's administration shows that more such transactions are set aside in a single year under the Bankrupt law than in ten by the old modes. The most frequent objection to the national law comes from those practitioners who advise the local debtor, and are, therefore, either interested against its efficiency, or, for want of familiarity with the practice under it and that of the distant tribunals in which it is enforced, have no share in the profits of its administration. If it is long enough continued to become well understood throughout the country, and means are provided still farther to carry into localities the performance of duties now executed at a few places only, an American bankrupt law will become as necessary a part of our civilization and commerce as is that of England to her people and that of every civilized commercial country in Europe to their respective subjects.

After much professional experience under previous laws, and judicial familiarity with the administration of this one, we believe the Bankrupt Law had far better be repealed than have it established that it is at the option of every debtor in the United States to determine whether he will or not submit himself and his assets to the control which the statute intends to give his creditors over them. Inevitably, he first knows of his own insolvency. In every instance, therefore, he has the power of selection. When that selection is once made, such is the embarrassment by citizens of other States growing out of the doctrine of parties in transferring causes from the State to the Federal courts that in a vast majority of instances the debtor may compel his widespread creditors in the distant commercial centers where he has incurred his debts, to come to the county courts of the State for the settlement of those important questions for the trial of which the Bankrupt Law secures a different tribunal. It is no disrespect to these local courts to call attention to the universality with which citizens of other States prefer a tribunal removed from the local influences which so naturally interfere with complete impartiality. They prefer a jury from the whole district instead of the narrow vicinage in which the liberality of their debtor, by which their property has been squandered, has rendered himself personally popular. Every one of the great leading reasons which underlie the Federal jurisdiction between citizens of different States in all cases, and those which led to the conferring upon Congress of this bankrupt power at the outset for the regulation of this eminently national subject, forbid an interpretation of the present statute which would enable an attorney of the most common intelligence utterly to defeat every practical benefit intended to be secured by its adoption.

We call attention to the following opinions, reported at length in this issue:

The Copyright Laws Construed—Who Entitled to Copyright.—The opinion of the United States Circuit Court for the Southern District of New York, by Hunt, J., holding, under the Revised Statutes of the United States, an author, to obtain a copyright, must file the title-page of his work with the Librarian of Congress, and within ten days from the publication thereof, deposit in the mail two copies of the copyright book; that if he fails in either of these requirements, he cannot have his copyright. It is also held that the work must be published within a reasonable time after the filing of the title-page. The court states the common law right of an author to protection.

Copyright Publication.—The opinion of the Circuit Court of the Southern District of New York, by Johnson, J. following the opinion of Judge Hunt, also published in this issue, holding that in order for an author to obtain a copyright, his work must be published within a reasonable time after the filing of the title page with the Librarian. We commend this opinion of Judge Johnson. He states the point, that it has been decided by Judge Hunt that that opinion is binding upon him, and renders judgment accordingly. The whole opinion occupies less than half a page of legal cap. We wish we had more such judges; they would make less work for themselves and less for the bar. The great evils attending the administration of justice at the present day are long opinions, long speeches and long briefs.

Bankruptcy—Effect of Voluntary Assignment.—The opinion of the United States Circuit court for the western district of Michigan, by Emmons, J., holding that the making of a general assignment is an act of bankruptcy, and that a voluntary assignment cannot defeat the operations of the bankrupt law. The precise question involved in this case has never been decided by the Supreme Court of the United States. The learned Circuit Judge has cited all the adjudications of the lower courts upon the question. It is to be hoped this case will be taken to the Supreme Court of the United States and the question be finally settled. In settling questions arising under the bankrupt law, the Supreme court has been much more conservative than the lower courts.

The Liability of a Bank to whom Commercial Paper is Sent—A Second Bank collecting the Paper is not Liable to the Owner of the Paper.—The opinion of the United States Circuit court for the northern district of Illinois by Hopkins, J., holding under the late opinions of the Supreme court of the United States that when an owner of commercial paper sends it to and it is accepted by a bank for collection, whether payable at the place where such bank is located or elsewhere, in the absence of any contract to the contrary, there is an implied agreement with such bank arising from the acceptance of the employment, that it will perform all the acts necessary for the collection, and if not paid, of charging the parties thereto. It is not regarded as the appointment of the bank, as the attorney of the owner of the paper authorized to select other agents suitable and competent for the purpose of collecting the note, but, on the contrary, "its position is that of an independent contractor, and that the instruments employed by such bank in the business contemplated, are its agents and not the agents of the owner of the note," that its duty is not discharged when it selects suitable agents to perform the duty entrusted to it; that the owner of the paper is not to look at the responsibility of the agents entrusted by the bank with his collection; that the bank to which he commits the paper is alone responsible to him for the performance of all acts necessary to secure his rights, including the payment of the money when collected, and that the liability to pay over attaches as soon as the money is paid either to it or a sub-agent selected by such bank to collect for it. Judge Hopkins admits in this opinion that he is forced to the decision given by the recent opinion of the Supreme court of the United States cited by him. We are glad to note that fact, for we are satisfied that if he had felt himself free to decide the case upon principle, he never would have rendered the judgment entered in this case. If this opinion is the law of the federal courts, then every bank that sends a note out for a customer in the regular course of business, for collection to another bank, becomes an insurer of the solvency of the bank to which it is sent, no matter how careful it may have been in the selecting of such bank. Under this rule the most prudent and solvent banks may be ruined in panic-y times by sending notes to other banks to collect for their customers. This is a dangerous decision for bankers. It is to be hoped the Supreme court of the United States will put a different construction on their recent decision which Judge Hopkins felt compelled to follow.

House of Representatives—Witness Contempt.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, by Cartter, C. J., holding, that since the adoption of the Revised Statutes, and the repeal of the former laws relating to the punishment of a witness by the House, for contempt of the House, in refusing to testify, when the House adjudges the witness in contempt, its power to punish terminates, and it can only certify the fact of such contempt to the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, as provided by the recent statute. Under this decision, a witness, if he wishes can defy Congress, and defeat any investigation into fraud and corruption, if the evidence is solely within his knowledge or power, simply by refusing to speak, and Congress has no way of punishing him for his contumacy.

The Supreme Court of Illinois.—The next term of the Supreme Court of this State will commence at Mt. Vernon, on the first Tuesday of June. The official term of Judge Walker will expire during the coming term of court. He has performed his official duties so satisfactorily to the people and the bar, that he will undoubtedly be re-elected without serious opposition.

Reports of Cases in the Superior Court of Judicature of New Hampshire. John M. Shirley, State Reporter. Volume LV. Concord: Published by Josiah B. Sanborn. 1876. Sold by E. B. Myers, Law Bookseller, Chicago.

The mechanical execution of this volume is somewhat better than some of its predecessors, from which we infer that Mr. Shirley has been looking closer after his printer. This volume commences with the opinions delivered in December, 1874, and ends with those delivered in August, 1875. We have, by the kindness of Mr. Shirley, given our readers quite full notes to the opinions in this volume before its appearance. Those wishing the full opinions can now obtain them by sending for this volume. The most interesting portion of the volume is a characteristic reporter's note, by Mr. Shirley. From it we learn that a law was passed in 1815, requiring every practising attorney in the Supreme Judicial Court to pay annually to the clerk of the court, within the first quarter of every year, five dollars, and the clerk to pay the same to the person "who is reporter for the time being," which should be in full compensation of all the services performed by the reporter. Judge Smith was the first reporter of the State, being appointed soon after the passage of the act of 1815. No evidence that he was appointed or took the required oath can be found in the State House, and it can only be proved by the newspapers of the day. It would seem that there were some Grangers in New Hampshire in 1815, or the legislature would not have compelled the lawyers to pay the salary of the reporter.

A Treatise on the Law of Negotiable Instruments, including Bills of Exchange, Promissory Notes, Negotiable Bonds and Coupons, Checks, Bank Notes, Certificates of Deposit, Certificates of Stock, Bills of Credit, Bills of Lading, Guaranties, Letters of Credit, and Circular Notes. By John W. Daniel of the Lynchburg (Va.) Bar. In two Volumes. Vol. I. New York: Baker, Voorhis & Co., Publishers, 66 Nassau Street. 1876. Sold by E. B. Myers, Law Book Publishers, Chicago. Price, $13.00.

The above work comprises two volumes and contains about fifteen hundred pages. The handsome manner in which it is presented, entitles the publishers to the thanks of the profession. These volumes are divided into six books, as follows: Book I. The Making of the Instrument. II. Who may be Parties. III. The Negotiation of the Instrument. IV. Protest and Notice; and Excuses for want of Presentment, Protest and Notice. V. Action on Negotiable Instruments; and Defenses, Discharges, and Damages. VI. Varieties of Negotiable Instruments other than Bills and Notes.

These books are again divided into fifty-six chapters. The recent editions of old works upon the various branches of the law upon negotiable instruments, are little more than reprints of works prepared many years ago, and cannot be expected to state correctly what the law is to-day, relating to negotiable instruments, which is ever changing to accommodate itself to the wants and necessities of commerce. When Judge Story wrote on negotiable instruments, he did not deem it advisable to embrace the whole subject in a single treatise, but devoted one treatise to notes, another to bills, etc., and, as a consequence, there was much in one that was a mere repetition of what was in another. The present is an effort to embrace in one treatise a classification of all negotiable instruments, with an exposition of the law touching each variety of them. Mr. Daniel says this is the first effort to accomplish this object. Within a few years, the transactions in municipal bonds and coupon bonds and notes have become immense, and a large portion of the surplus wealth of the country has been invested in these instruments, and, as a consequence, this branch of the law has not only grown in importance, but the cases making the law regulating the transfer and liability on such instruments has greatly increased in number. The text of Mr. Daniel is written in a pleasing style, is clear, and his meaning easily understood by the reader. The notes to the cases cited are numerous, but are not brought down to as late a date as they ought to have been. In our examination, we noticed several very important recent cases were omitted. We regard the work as one that will be exceedingly useful to the profession, and one that should be consulted on all questions relating to negotiable instruments. The liability of a bank receiving notes for collection, for the acts of its bank correspondent, being the question involved in Judge Hopkins' opinion, published in this issue, is fully discussed in volume one of this work, from pages 250 to 259, and the conflicting opinions upon the question cited. Mr. Daniel believes the doctrine, as announced by the Supreme Court of the United States, to be correct, although at the time of writing his work, he had not seen the opinion upon which Judge Hopkins mainly relies.

Reports of Admiralty and Revenue Cases, argued and determined in the Circuit and District Courts of the United States, for the Western Lake and River Districts. By Henry B. Brown, District Judge, Eastern District of Michigan. Vol. I. New York: Baker, Voorhis & Co., Publishers, 66 Nassau street. 1876. Sold by Callaghan & Co., Law Book Publishers, Chicago. Price $7.50.

This volume is designed by the reporter as a continuation of the series commenced by Mr. Newberry, and is devoted exclusively to cases arising upon the Western Lakes and Rivers.

We have often thought it strange that some enterprising publisher had not continued the series of Mr. Newberry. We suppose it may be accounted for on the ground that few lawyers, comparatively speaking, devoted much time to admiralty practice, and consequently the sale for such a series must be limited. It is very appropriate that Judge Brown shold have undertaken the work. He is a gentleman of culture and liberal education, of much experience in admiralty law, and is the successor of Judge Longyear, one of the ablest of the admiralty judges whose opinions are reported in this series. The volume before us contains the more important admiralty decisions rendered in the sixth circuit during the last eighteen years. Judge Brown says that the accidents of compilation have limited it to cases arising in the two Districts of Michigan and the Northern District of Ohio; but subsequent volumes, if published, will probably include cases from other districts; that this volume, without formal dedication to that effect, is intended as a tribute of respect to the memory of Judge Longyear. The judges, whose opinions are reported in this volume, are McLean, Swayne, Emmons, Wilkins, Wilson, Withey, Longyear, Sherman and Brown. Judge Brown has performed his duties as reporter with skill and great accuracy. The mechanical execution of the volume reflects credit upon the publishers.

WE are under obligations to the law firm of DENT & BLACK, of this city, for the following opinion:

U. S. C. COURT, N. D. OF ILL.

ALBERT G. HYDE et al.,
v.
THE FIRST NATIONAL BANK OF LACON.

THE LIABILITY OF A BANK TO WHOM COMMERCIAL PAPER IS SENT FOR COLLECTTION—A SECOND BANK RECEIVING THE PAPER FROM THE FIRST AND COLLECTING THE MONEY ON IT, IS NOT LIABLE TO THE OWNER OF THE PAPER.

1. That the law, as now settled by the Supreme Court of the United States, is as follows: That when an owner of commercial paper sends it to, and it is accepted by a bank for collection, whether payable at the place where such bank is located or elsewhere, in the absence of any contract to the contrary, there is an implied agreement with such bank, arising from the acceptance of the employment, that it will perform all the acts necessary for the collection, and if not paid, of charging the parties thereto. It is not regarded as the appointment of the bank, as the attorney of the owner of the paper, authorized to select other agents suitable and competent for the purpose of collecting the note; but, on the contrary, "its position is that of an independent contractor, and that the instruments employed by such bank in the business contemplated, are its agents and not the agents of the owner of the note;" that its duty is not discharged when it selects suitable agents to perform the duty entrusted to it; that the owner of the paper is not to look to the responsibility of the agents intrusted by the bank with his collection; that the bank to which he commits the paper is alone responsible to him for the performance of all acts necessary to secure his rights, including the payment of the money when collected, and that the liability to pay over attaches as soon as the money is paid, either to it or a sub agent, selected by such bank to collect for it.

2. In this case, the money was collected by the defendant bank, before the Cook County Bank, to which the owner sent the paper, failed, and was by the defendant placed to the credit of that bank, the day before its failure, so that the Cook County Bank's liability to the plaintiff for the money attached before the failure, which brings the case, in the judgment of the court, within the doctrine of Hoover, assignee, v. Wiese, 8 CHICAGO LEGAL NEWS, 193.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

HOPKINS, J.

This action was brought to recover of defendant, a certain sum of money, charged to have been collected by defendant for plaintiffs, of John Hutchins. Plea, general issue. It was tried, by stipulation, by court.

The evidence showed that John Hutchins, of Lacon, in this State, gave his note to the plaintiffs, residents of New York city, for $407.63, on the 15th day of September, 1874, payable in four months, at the First National Bank of Lacon, the defendant. The plaintiffs indorsed the note to the order of A. Hest, Esq., cashier, for collection for their own account. Hest then indorsed it to the defendant for collection for Cook County National Bank. Mr. Hest was the cashier of the Cook County National Bank, and sent the note in letter to defendant, on the 11th day of January, 1875, with instructions "to collect and credit." The defendants kept an account with the Cook County Bank, and then had a considerable sum in that bank. The note was paid to defendant on the 18th of January, 1875, and credited to the Cook County Bank, as other collections in the usual course of business. The defendant remitted, on that day, to the Cook County Bank, more money than this collection amounted to, and had at that time, a large balance due it from that bank.

The Cook County bank failed on the 19th January, but the defendants had no knowledge of its failure or embarrassment until about noon on the 19th.

The testimony also showed that custom between that bank and defendant, and also between the other Chicago banks and their country correspondents, was to make collections of notes sent there for that purpose, and credit the proceeds to the bank transmitting them. That no account was kept with any other person of such paper sent for collection, and that this custom prevailed as well when the paper was indorsed to the bank sending for collection on account of their own, as when indorsed generally, and accounts of all such transactions, in all cases, were kept in the same way.

These are the substantial facts, and the law applicable as now settled by the Supreme Court of the United States, may be stated as follows: that when an owner of commercial paper sends it to, and it is accepted by, a bank for collection, whether payable at the place where such bank is located, or elsewhere, in the absence of any contract to the contrary, there is an implied agreement with such bank arising from the acceptance of the employment, that it will perform all the acts necessary for the collection, and if not paid, of charging the parties thereto. It is not regarded as the appointment of the bank as the attorney of the owner of the paper, authorized to select other agents suitable and competent for the purpose of collecting the note, but on the contrary "its position is that of an independent contractor, and that the instruments employed by such bank in the business contemplated, are its agents and not the agents of the owner of the note." That its duty is not discharged when it selects responsible agents to perform the duty entrusted to it. That the owner of the paper is not to look to the responsibility of the agents entrusted by the bank with his collections. That the bank to which he commits the paper is alone answerable to him for the performance of all acts necessary to secure his rights, including the payment of the money when collected. 47 N. Y., Ayrault v. Pacific Bank, 570. And that the liability to pay over attaches as soon as the money is paid, either to it, or a sub-agent selected by said bank to collect for it.

This being so, it follows that the owner is to look to his immediate contractor, and has no remedy against the under contractor or agent employed by the bank. That such agents or contractors have no privity of control with the owner and are not liable to him, but are only liable to the party immediately employing them. In short, that the sub-agent employed by the bank owes no duty to the party who deposited the paper for collection with his principal, and hence is not responsible to him for any damages. This, I understand to be the effect and meaning of the late decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Hoover, Assignee, v. Wiese, 8 Ch. L. N., 193.

Although prior to that decision I had considered the weight of authority was in favor of the owner's having a right of action against the party who actually collected the money upon the note, a secondary agent, unless he had paid it before notice of the owner's claim, or had made advancement upon the paper to the party from whom he received it in such a way as to enable him to hold the proceeds on the ground that he was a bona fide holder of the paper for value.

But this decision, by declaring that a secondary agent is not liable at all to the owner, completely overthrows the theory upon which such supposed liability was based, and excludes the consideration of tha question of the rights of such agent, as against his immediate principal, and renders immaterial the question as to whether he knew the bank employing him was the owner of the paper or not, for not being answerable to the owner in any case, without some arrangement changing the implied contract, arising from the said employment to collect, it is unimportant to the owner to inquire what right such agent may have against his employers.

In the case of McBride v. The Farmers Bank, 26 N. Y., 450, a recovery was had against the seconday agent, which, at first, seems to be in conflict with the earlier New York cases cited, and followed in the opinion of the U. S. Supreme Court above mentioned. But on examining that case carefully, it appears that the bank gave an order to the owner of the paper, or its agent, for the notes, before the payment of the notes, and that he demanded them of the agent before payment, and that the failure of the bank was before payment, which distinguishes it from the case cited, and from this also; for here the money was collected by the defendant before the Cook County Bank failed, and was by this defendant passed to the credit of that bank, the day before the failure, so that the Cook County Bank's liability to the plaintiff for the money attached before its failure, which brings the case, in my judgment, clearly within the doctrine of Hoover, assignee, v. Wiese, supra.

It is difficult to reconcile this decision with that of Dickenson v. Waron, 47 N. Y., 439, and Sweeney v. Eaton, 1 Wallace, 166. But it is not for me to reconcile these cases; the case of Hoover v. Weise being the latest expression on that subject, it must be regarded as the law, by this court.

The defendant is, therefore, entitled to a judgment.

TENNEYS, FLOWER & ABERCROMBIE, for plaintiffs.

DENT & BLACK, for defendant.

SUPREME COURT, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

BEFORE CHIEF JUSTICE CARTTER, SITTING IN CHAMBERS.

No. 11,314—Criminal Docket.

POWER OF THE NATIONAL HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES TO PUNISH FOR CONTEMPT.

1. That since the adoption of the Revised Statutes and the repeal of the former laws relating to the punishment of a witness by the House, for contempt of the House in refusing to testify, when the House adjudges the witness in contempt, its power to punish terminates, and it can only certify the fact, through its proper officers, to the Supreme Court of the District, as provided by the statute.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

The relator, Hallet Kilbourne, presents his petition under oath, stating therein that he is unlawfully imprisoned in the common jail of the District of Columbia by John G. Thompson, Sergeant-at-arms of the House of Representatives of the United States Congress, under an order of said House, and asking that the writ of habeas corpus shall issue to said Sergeant-at-Arms, commanding him to bring the relator before the court, to the end that the cause of his detention may be inquired into; and if found to be illegal, that he may be discharged from custody.

The writ is duly issued and served upon the Sergeant-at-Arms, who responds thereto by bringing the relator before the court, and makes a full and formal return of the causes for which he is held in custody.

The respondent states at length the history of the case leading to the arrest and confinement of the relator, the substance of which statement, in brief, is as follows:

The House of Representatives, being duly organized, was in lawful session on the 24th of January, 1876, and on that day resolved to appoint a special committee to inquire into the nature and history of a certain matter known as the "Real Estate Pool," in the District of Columbia, and the character of a settlement alleged to have been made by the trustee in bankruptcy of the estate of Jay Cooke & Co., with said real estate pool, the government being a creditor and interested in the assets of said bankrupt firm.

Such committee was duly empowered to send for persons and papers, and directed to report the result of their investigation to the House.

The committee subsequently appointed, commenced its inquiry, and, to that end, caused a subpœna duces tecum to be issued and served upon the relator, commanding him to appear before it to testify, and to bring with him certain deeds, books, maps, and other papers relating to certain described lots and squares of ground in said district.

The relator appeared in obedience to the subpœna, and testified in answer to certain questions, but on being asked whether he had brought the papers and documents referred to in the subpœna, answered in the negative. He was asked further, if he was willing to produce them, and he again answered in the negative.

He was then asked if he refused to produce them in response to the subpœna, and he answered in the affirmative, claiming that his papers related to his private business; and that like every private citizen not accused of violating law, he had the right to be protected in his papers.

The relator further declined to answer certain other questions asked him, as to the place of residence and the names of the persons who were members of said real estate pool, besides the firm of Jay Cooke & Co.

From this refusal of the relator so to answer questions, and produce papers, the committee reported the matter to the House, and that body ordered a warrant to issue for the arrest of the relator, and to bring him before the House to show cause why he should not be punished for contempt.

In obedience to this warrant, the relator was brought to the bar of the House, where the Speaker asked him the same questions which he had refused to answer before the committee; and on his again refusing to answer the questions, or to produce the papers, he was adjudged to be in contempt of the House, and was ordered into custody of the respondent, to be kept in his custody in the common jail of the District of Columbia, until he should purge himself of the contempt, by signifying his willingness to obey the subpœna. That in pursuance of this order of the House, a warrant was duly issued to respondent, and in obedience thereto he arrested, and now detains the relator.

To this return to the writ of habeas corpus, the relator makes reply, in which he states that on the 17th of March, 1876, the Speaker of the House of Representatives sent his certificate to the U. S. attorney for the District of Columbia, stating therein the fact of the subpœna, and the refusal of the relator to obey the same, or to answer the questions put to him touching the matter under investigation; that the district attorney had presented said certificate to the grand jury; and that an indictment had been found against the relator, on which a bench-warrant had duly issued to the marshal of said district, and had been returned unexecuted, the respondent herein declining to surrender the relator to the marshal.

That the indictment charges the relator with having committed the same offense and contempt mentioned and described in the return of the respondent herein; and that said indictment is still depending in said court.

Whereupon he prays that he may be admitted to bail to appear and answer said indictment, and on giving such bail, discharged from custody.

It is claimed by counsel for relator, that the question, whether the House has power to punish for contempt generally, need not be inquired into in the present case, as the facts are so fully set out in the return and reply thereto, as to make this a special matter, so that the only subject for inquiry here is, has the House jurisdiction to punish the particular contempt described in this case?

It is admitted by counsel that the power to punish for contempt does exist in the House, to the extent, at least, of self-preservation; to protect its own being; and that this power is an implied power, which, it is urged, must not be carried beyond its necessity.

It is claimed, that both houses of Congress, being thus protected in their sessions by this implied power to punish for contempt, can then, by legislative enactment, provide methods and tribunals for the punishment of offenders, and for the better protection of themselves, than by this undefined and implied power; and that, having so combined and passed a law, as the act of 1857, (R. S., p. 17), wherein the certain offenses therein described is to become a misdemeanor, and is to be punished in a certain manner, to wit: by indictment and trial in the District of Columbia, then that that particular offense, of refusing to testify, or to bring papers in obedience to the order of either house, can be no longer punished under the implied power vested in the House where the contempt is committed, but must be certified to the grand jury of said district in obedience to said law, there to be tried as any other criminal offense, by a jury. It is further claimed that this particular contempt, having been declared by said statute to be a misdemeanor, cannot be punished by the House under its implied power, and again by the court under the express authority of the statute, for that would be in violation of the constitutional provision that no person shall be twice put in jeopardy for the same offense.

It is claimed by counsel for respondent, that the implied power to punish for contempt, is granted to the House of Representatives by the Constitution, as clearly as though it had been expressed in words; and that being so granted, it must remain where the Constitution places it.

Consequently, that no legislation can annul, divest, or delegate that power to any other branch of the government.

That if a law was passed expressly forbidding the exercise of this power by either House of Congress, such law would be absolutely void.

That then the House, having this constitutional authority, has in respect thereto all the attributes of a court; and having exercised the power, as in this case, its action is a judicial act, and its judgment cannot be reviewed, revised or questioned by any other tribunal.

That having passed to judgment, the imprisonment, as in this case, follows as due process of law; being the execution of a judgment duly rendered by a competent tribunal, having jurisdiction of the subject matter.

That the statute of 1857 was not intended to, and does not divest the House of this power; but only adds an additional penalty to the offense, and makes it a crime against society at large.

That therefore, the punishment by the House is for the offense committed against its own person; and that by the court under the power of the statute, for the offense against society.

That while the act is one, the offenses are two; and that therefore the punishment is not double.

That the offense against the House is not within the meaning of the word as used in the section of the Constitution, which provides that no person shall be subject for the same offense, to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb.

That whether the matter under investigation by the House, when the contempt was committed, though claimed to be for proper legislative purposes, was strictly within the scope of its jurisdiction as a legislative body or not, cannot now be the subject of inquiry; that that was a question for the house to decide, and not for the witness; and that the contempt was equally an offense against the House in either case.

That in a trial by the House for contempt, the matter of jurisdiction is the contempt itself, and not the matter on trial when the contempt was committed.

That if the matter under investigation by the House has color of law for its support, and is not sheer usurpation of authority, and an act of violence, then the courts are powerless to interfere with its judgment for contempt committed by a witness during the progress of such investigation.

That the imprisonment of the relator, while it is in the nature of a punishment for the offense, it is also for the more important purpose of compelling him to testify; and in this view, is remediable in its nature, and can be terminated by the relator himself, on his signifying a willingness to testify, and to produce his papers. That while he can thus liberate himself from the restraint imposed by the House, at any moment, by thus purging himself of the contempt, he has no power to relieve himself from punishment under the statute, for his offense against the public; and that this shows conclusively that two offenses have been committed in the one act.

Opinion by CARTTER, C. J.

The consideration of this case, in the light of authority and the able and exhaustive argument of counsel, with such reflection as I have been able to bring to the aid of judgment, has reduced the questions involved in it to the inquiry, whether the House of Representatives possessed jurisdiction for punishment over the person of the relator?

If the House of Representative had jurisdiction in the subject-matter of the investigation, and that jurisdiction was not terminated by the judgment for contempt, the jurisdiction was exclusive of the power of the writ; and it is not within the province of the law, or law tribunal, to inquire into, or question it.

On the other hand, if the House did not possess constitutional power to make the investigation; or if that power, in punishment of the relator had exhausted itself with the judgment for contempt, the rights secured to the relator and every other citizen by virtue of the writ supervene, and the jurisdiction and power of the law tribunals charged with the duty to give the writ effect, obtain.

It may be regarded, in the light of unvarying authority that punishment for contempt within the limitations of the jurisdiction of the house, whether the house is to be considered as a court or not, is conclusive of judgment, and may not be inquired into by writ of habeas corpus or otherwise. It is a right inherent in the jurisdiction of the tribunal, essential to its integrity and preservation, and inviolate from the interference of jurisdiction disconnected with the tribunal exercising it.

This predicate of judgment leads me first to the inquiry, whether the power of the house to inflict the punishment involved in its order, had been transferred by law to the adjudications of the courts?

The first effort of congress to regulate the subject of punishment for contempt by law, transpired Jan. 24, 1857, (and is found on page 155 of the 11 volume of the statutes at large,) in an act entitled, "an act more effectually to enforce the attendance of witnesses on the summons of either House or Congress, and to compel them to discover testimony."

The second section of this act relates to the protection of the witness from prosecution for testimony so given; and the first and third sections are as follows:

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled. That any person summoned as a witness by the authority of either house of Congress, to give testimony or to produce papers upon any matter before either House, or any committee of either house of Congress, who shall wilfully make default, or who, appearing, shall refuse to answer any question pertinent to the matter of inquiry in consideration before the house or committee by which he shall be examined, shall, in addition to the pains and penalties now existing, be liable to indictment as and for a misdemeanor, in any court of the United States having jurisdiction thereof, and on conviction, shall pay a fine not exceeding one thousand dollars, and not less than one hundred dollars, and suffer imprisonment in the common jail not less than one month nor more than twelve months."

"Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, that when a witness shall fail to testify, as provided in the previous sections of this act, and the facts shall be reported to the House, it shall be the duty of the speaker of the House or the president of the senate to certify the fact under the seal of the House or senate to the district attorney for the District of Columbia, whose duty it shall be to bring the matter before the grand jury for their action."

Again, on the 24th day of January, 1862, by an act, entitled, "An act amending the provisions of the second section of the act of January twenty-fourth, eighteen hundred and fifty-seven, enforcing the attendance of witnesses before committees of either house of Congress." 12 Stat. Large, 333.

This amendment is not material to the matter under consideration, further than as a legislative recognition of the other sections of the statute then existing.

This is the history and terms of the action of Congress up to the act of June 22, 1874, entitled:

"An act to revise and consolidate the statutes of the United States in force on the first day of December, Anno Domini, one thousand eight hundred and seventy-three." The last expression of legislation, and the present law.

Sections 102 and 104 of this act, are as follows:

"Sec. 102. Every person who, having been summoned as a witness by the authority of either house of Congress, to give testimony or to produce papers upon any matter under inquiry before either house, or any committee of either house of Congress, wilfully makes default, or who, having appeared, refuses to answer any question pertinent to the question under inquiry, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, punishable by a fine of not more than one thousand dollars nor less than one hundred dollars, and imprisonment in a common jail for not less than one month nor more than twelve months."

"Sec. 104. Whenever a witness, summoned as mentioned in section one hundred and two, fails to testify, and the facts are reported to either house, the president of the senate or the speaker of the house, as the case may be, shall certify the fact under the seal of the senate or house, to the district attorney for the District of Columbia, whose duty it shall be to bring the matter before the grand jury for their action."

The first and natural inquiry in the light of this legislation is the question, why was it enacted in the form and substance that we find it?

Ordinarily, to a legal tribunal charged with the administration of the law, where the law is unobscured and its language definite, it is sufficient and conclusive that it is written by the law maker; but inasmuch as the constitutionality and purpose of these statutes have been controverted in the argument, it may not be out of place to inquire why they were passed.

My reflection has no difficulty in finding apt and ample reasons for the interposition of the statute.

The antecedent condition of the power was latent, undefined and unpublished. Common justice to the citizen required that it should be defined and made known.

Again, it is a truth well known to the constitutional student of the history of this government, that a large and intelligent portion of its statesmen has denied, early and late, the implied power of either House of Congress to inflict any punishment.

These appear to me ample reasons for this legislation.

These statutes have further significance. By reference to the statutes of 1857, it will be seen that Congress contemplated additional penalties to the penalties that inhered in the power of the respective houses, and so expressed it in the words, "in addition to the pains and penalties now existing." The present statute, for some reason in the wisdom of Congress, rejected the language commanding additional punishment, leaving the penalty of the last amended statute as the sole punishment for the offense.

This last statute stands unembarrassed, not only as an expression of the legislative will, but as a legislative interpretation of Congressional power to inflict double punishment.

It provides in express terms that the offense shall constitute a misdemeanor, and shall be punished by fine and imprisonment through process of indictment and trial by jury.

To avoid the force of its plain mandate, it is objected,

First. That if it is substitutional of the right of the house also to punish, it is unconstitutional; that it is not in the power of the united branches of the national legislature to supersede by law the authority residing in either branch to inflict the punishment; that either branch of Congress inherits its power from the constitution; and that it is inalienable, although alienation is concurred in by the entire law making power.

This proposition invites me, sitting as a judge at chambers, to pronounce unconstitutional the solemn legislation of congress, in deference to a latent power residing in the House, at the request of the House of Representatives which pronounced its judgment of its constitutionality by uniting in the passage of it.

If reasoning inclined me to the conclusion urged, I should hesitate long before resolving it into judgment; but it does not. The act does not imply the abnegation of power on the part of the House or of the Senate to inflict punishment for contempt; but on the contrary, recognizes that power, and exercises it in denominating the offense a misdemeanor and punishing it as such.

Again it is urged, that the penalty of this law is cumulative of the punishment and not substitutional of the law and punishment that resided in the House before its passage.

The first answer to this position is that there is nothing in the language of the statute or its nature indicating that the penalty imposed by it is to operate as an addition to any penalty that might be inflicted by the House for the same offense. If there was any such purpose, it is more than doubtful whether the Constitution would permit it to be exercised.

The second clause of the 5th amendment to the Constitution is this:

"Nor shall any person be subject for the same offense to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb."

It has been attempted to justify this matter by the authority that double punishment may be inflicted where the act involves two offenses; as in the case of committing a contempt in the process of committing a crime; and in the case of committing, in the same act an offense against two sovereignties. While this is true, it constitutes no aid to judgment here, inasmuch as here the sovereignty is the same, and the offense is the same, and that is, contempt.

The offense against the House and the offense involved in the prosecution of the indictment, being the same, a double punishment cannot wait upon it under the Constitution.

That the offense is conclusively one is made certain by all the documentary evidence in the case.

We find the offense first described in the record of the proceedings of the committee where it occurred as follows:

"Q. State whether you have in your possession now and have brought to the committee room, the papers, documents, memoranda, etc., referred to in the subpœna duces tecum served upon you?

A. I have not.

Q. State whether you are prepared to produce them at this sitting of the committee?

A. I am not prepared to produce them to-day.

Q. State whether you are willing to produce them now, or at any future sitting of this committee?

A. As at present advised, I am not prepared.

Q. You refuse to produce them before the committee in response to this subpœna?

A. Yes sir. I would like to state the reasons therefor, etc."

This describes that part of the offense which consisted of the refusal to produce the papers. The refusal to answer questions is described as follows:

"Q. How many members of the pool were there before you became a member? I believe you have in fact answered.

A. Five gentlemen besides Jay Cooke & Co., put in $5,000 apiece.

Q. Will you state where each of these five members reside?

A. I do not know that I could do that. Mr. Chairman, if you will indulge me, I respectfully decline to give any testimony as it relates to these individuals.

Q. Do you decline to state where they reside?

A. I do not know that I could, I could upon reflection probably.

By the Chairman.

Q. Would you refuse to state if you knew? We want to know whether that is one of the questions you decline to answer.

A. I decline to answer except upon consultation with my counsel.

By Mr. New:

Q. For the present you decline to state, even if you were certain as to the locality, where they do reside?

A. Yes sir: I respectfully decline to state anything in relation to individuals who did business with us except upon consultation with my counsel.

Q. Will you please state their names?

A. That I beg to include in the same answer."

The offense, then, is made up of two things—the refusal to produce the papers, and the refusal to give the place of residence, and the names of the five members of the real estate pool.

This offense is again described in the same words, in the report of the committee to the House; in the proceedings of the House when the relator was brought to the bar of the House to show cause; in the certificate of the speaker to the district attorney; and in the indictment presented by the grand jury.

In fact it is consented on all sides that the offense is one; one act, one fact.

But it is urged, although one offense, it meets its several punishments in the several forums for distinct purposes; that the relator is punished in the courts in the penalty of transgression, in the House, to make him testify. In one place to visit him with the penalty for what he has done or refused to do; in the other place to compel him to do.

This proposition avows the doctrine that in addition to penalties and punishments for contempt, the House has the power to coerce the recusant witness to testify. This power as distinguishable from penalty is not given by the Constitution, in express terms, either to courts or legislators; nor is it to be derived from the spirit of the Constitution, or found in the genius of our institutions, or the spirit of our people.

It is so obnoxious to the common law as administered, universally in the courts of the country, that they will not even permit confession of guilt under duress.

If by coercion is meant merely the influence that penalty furnishes to pursuade the party to testify, coercion enters into the law provided for the punishment, and Congress has already provided for it by law. It is urged again, that if the power of the House of Representatives is resolved into this law for the punishment of contempts, it renders the House helpless in the way of enforcing compliance with its orders to testify.

If this be so, the reply is, that Congress is the law making power of the country; and if the law that they have instituted is inadequate to the end, they have the power to make it severer. Or if no law will supply the place of the inherent and undefined authority of either house, they have the power to repeal it, and re-possesses themselves of the undefined authority displaced or defined by this statute.

The power of punishment under the statute, is not in extinguishment of the constitutional right of punishment for contempt, but in definition and expression of it.

A repeal of the expression and limitation of the exercise of the power, leaves the subject where the statute found it.

With the judgment of the House in contempt, its power to punish terminated, and the punishment prescribed by law supervened; in pursuance of the authority and command of the law, the speaker certified the offense to the district attorney; and the grand jury found an indictment against the relator, which brings his body within the jurisdiction of the court charged with trying the offense stated; to which tribunal I feel it my duty to deliver him for trial.

I cannot dismiss the subject without noticing the fact that the chief labor and learning expended in the argument before me with great ability, has been devoted to the enlightment of questions not brought into my decision; arguments illustrative of the power, or want of power, to institute the investigation; the obligation of the citizen to bear testimony in such investigation; whether the question belongs to the House of Representatives or the courts; and whether the relator was bound to uncover the history of his private business as a contribution to the investigation.

The conclusion which I have reached as to the office of the statute, renders it unnecessary, if not improper to determine these questions now. They enter into the issue of the guilt or innocence of the relator under the indictment, and should be passed upon by the tribunal trying that issue.

Adjourned until Monday at 12 o'clock.

As per announcement of WAITE, C. J., published in the LEGAL NEWS of April 15th, no case has been called for argument since the 28th of April, and the court will adjourn for the term, on Monday next, May 8th.

Attorneys have commenced printing their abstracts and briefs for the June term of the Supreme Court of this State, which commences on the first Tuesday of next month.

RE-INSURANCE.

The law relating to re-insurance in England has been of a singularly changeful character. Until the year 1746 it was perfectly lawful for any one who had underwritten a policy of insurance to re-insure the risk which he had undertaken. In that year, however, the statute 19 Geo. 2, c. 37, was passed, by which, among other restrictions, re-insurances were prohibited unless the insurer became insolvent or a bankrupt, or died, in which case his representatives were permitted to insure the amount which had already been insured. This act was passed with the intention of hindering gambling re-insurances, which were then in vogue, and which were caused by the same spirit which induced the various commercial bubbles of that period. But it is clear that it met with little approval from those honorably engaged in commercial undertakings, for we find that it is complained of by Nicholas Magens, a London merchant who wrote a treatise upon insurance soon after this statute became law. But this restriction was removed in 1864 by a clause in a stamp act, (27 & 28 Vict., c. 56), and from this date a re-insurance has been a perfectly valid mercantile contract. But until quite recently no case upon this subject is found in the reports, and therefore the decision in Mackenzie v. Whitworth, (33 L. T. Rep. N. S., 655), which was lately given by the Court of Appeal, should not be passed by without comment. The action was originally tried at Liverpool, and the facts were exceedingly few and simple. The plaintiff, an insurance broker, effected the insurance for "£5,000 upon cotton," on behalf of the United States' Lloyd's and individual underwriters of New York, who had already insured the goods to the amount of £80,000. The fact that this transaction was a reinsurance was not disclosed to the second underwriters, the defendants, hence arose the first point, that there had been a concealment of a material fact, and consequently that the policy was void The jury, however, found that this was not a concealment of a material fact, and consequently this important point did not arise before the Court of Appeal. But this tribunal had to decide whether the description in the policy "on goods" was such a description of the subject-matter of the insurance as to cover the risk actually insured. This question was answered in the affirmative.

It is perfectly certain that it is preposterous to forbid re-insurance, but it seems equally advantageous that the fact that the second underwriters are about to reinsure should be communicated to them, and that the subject-matter of the insurance should be more definitely and more accurately defined. If this course were adopted, it would in the first place prevent litigation, because if the previous insurance is not disclosed, although in this particular instance its non-disclosure was not considered material, yet it may be surrounded with circumstances which would make it so, and moreover a London or a Newcastle jury might hold a different opinion from a similar body in Liverpool. Again, to disclose the nature of the transaction would be no sort of injury to honorable and upright underwriters, who from perfectly honest circumstances might be desirous of running less risk than they had originally intended. Not to disclose the character of the affair, to place the subject matter in such vague terms in a policy, is to open a door to fraudulent transactions most difficult to detect and most undesirable in their consequences. No doubt there was to some extent a policy in respect of goods, because if goods were lost, the original underwriters would be liable on the policy, but the actual subject-matter of the second insurance was the risk or the liability to pay which the first underwriters had incurred by entering into the original policy. That this position is correct, is shown by the very clear statement of Emerigon. "The risks," he says, (vol. 1, p. 252), "which the assurer has undertaken, form, as between himself and the reassurer, the subject-matter (matiere) of the re-assurance, which is a new contract totally distinct from the first, which, however, remains in full force." There may be, and probaoly are, very many underwriters who would hesitate and perhaps refuse to enter into a policy which was a reinsurance without much more detailed inquiries than they would consider necessary in an original contract. For the very nature of an underwriter's business makes it improbable that he will enter into a re-insurance unless under very exceptional circumstances. It is the duty of the assured to communicate to the underwriter any fact which would induce him either not to enter into the contract or enter into it on different terms. As Lord Mansfield observed, in the celebrated case of Carter v. Boehm, "Men argue differently, but it seems difficult to say that the mind of an underwriter would not be affected by the fact that he was about to enter into a re-insurance, not into an original contract." A plausible argument on the other side is, that if the original subject-matter is known to the second underwriter, he can obtain full information upon the subject, but it is obvious that he will require much more detailed information in cases of a re-insurance than in cases of an original contract, because in most cases a broker effects the contract, whichever it may be. Therefore it is, we think, to be regretted that re-insurance, after being for so many years restricted in a way quite unnecessary, and quite contrary to the practice of America and the Continental States, should, by the case under discussion, have been suddenly developed to a most unnecessary and undesirable extent, and have been placed under far less restriction, than exist either in European or American laws, especially at a time when the legislature is desirous of putting an end to any means which enable fraudulent persons to avail themselves of the law for their personal benefit.—London Law Times.

THE RAILROAD TAX DECISION.

The following circular letter which has been addressed to county authorities by Attorney General Edsall, we take from the Springfield Journal of May 3:

STATE OF ILLINOIS,
ATTORNEY GENERAL'S OFFICE,

To the several County Boards and County Collectors of Illinois:

Pursuant to the course of proceeding indicated in the circular addressed to you from this office, dated September 27, 1875, the appeals prosecuted from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Illinois to the Supreme Court of the United States, in the railroad cases, have been urged to a final, as well as successful issue.

As you have been apprised through the public press, the decrees of the Circuit Court have been reversed, with directions that the injunctions be dissolved and the bills dismissed.

To answer a general inquiry as to what steps are now to be taken in order that the collection of the taxes may be proceeded with, I have to say, that as soon as I can procure an official copy of the opinion of the United States Supreme Court, and the proper mandates from that Court to the United States Circuit Court, I shall take proceedings to dissolve the injunctions in the various pending cases, as well as in those from which appeals were prosecuted. This will probably be accomplished within the next three or four weeks.

The decision of the Supreme Court is of such character, that I have no doubt that the United States Circuit Courts will dissolve the injunctions heretofore granted in this class of cases; and the County Collectors will then have power to proceed with the collection of the taxes.

I am very respectfully,
JAMES K. EDSALL,
Attorney General.

We published the opinion referred to in the above letter on the 29th of April, and have had an official copy in our possession since the 26th of April.

The name of Judge Davis, of the U. S. Supreme Court, is among those who are prominently mentioned for President. Should he be nominated, his reputation for honesty and capability, and the State pride of Illinois voters, might have the effect not only to give him the vote of the State, but to carry with him the whole State ticket.

We call attention to the double-column advertisement of the law publishing-house of Callaghan & Co., on the last page of this issue.

1. LAND GRANTS.—The court states the rule for construing land grants.

2. TITLE VESTED.—That the words, "there be and is hereby granted," vest a present title in the State of Kansas, though a survey and a location are necessary to give precision to it, and attach it to any particular tract. After the location of the road the grant becomes certain, and, by relation, has the same effect upon the selected parcels as if they had been specially named at the date of the act. In other words, the grant was afloat until the line of the road should be definitely fixed.

3. THE OSAGE LANDS.—That Congress did not intend that this grant should reach the Osage lands, further than to allow the company to construct its line of road through them.

4. RIGHTS OF THE INDIANS.—That the Indians are acknowledged to have the unquestionable right of the lands they occupy, until that right shall be extinguished by a voluntary cession to the government, and this right of occupancy is as sacred as the title of the United States to the fee.

5. INTENTION OF CONGRESS AS TO THE OSAGE LANDS.—That this perpetual right of occupancy, with the correlative obligation of the government to enforce it, negatives the idea that Congress, even in the absence of any positive stipulation to protect the Indians, intended to grant their lands to a railroad company, either absolutely or cum onere. For all practical purposes, the Osages owned the lands, as the actual right of possession. The only thing they deemed of value was secured to them by the treaty of June 2, 1825, until they should elect to surrender it to the United States. In the free exercise of their choice, they might occupy their lands forever; and whatever changed this condition, or interfered with it, violated the guarantees under which they had lived since that date.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

Mr. Justice DAVIS delivered the opinion of the court.

This suit was brought by the United States to vacate certain patents issued to the appellant for portions of the Osage ceded lands, so called, in Kansas. These patents were properly issued by the governor of the State, conformably to "certified lists" furnished him by the Secretary of the Interior, if the lands embraced in the "lists" had been granted by Congress to the State to aid in the construction of the appellant's railroad. But the United States contend that the lands were not so granted. If such be the fact, it follows necessarily that the patents should be annulled, for public officers can bind the government only within the scope of their lawful authority. This court said, in The United States v. Stone, (2 Wallace, 525,) "that patents are sometimes issued unadvisedly, or by mistake, where the officer has no authority in law to grant them, or where another party should have received the patent; in such case the law will pronounce them void." The cancellation of a patent is, however, a judicial act, and whatever may have been formerly the prevailing doctrine, it is now settled that a court of equity is better adapted to that purpose than a court of law, and that the United States by its instrumentality, can, if thereto entitled, obtain relief. (U. S. v. Stone, supra.)

The act of Congress of March 3, 1863, (12 Stat., 772,) is the starting point in this controversy. Upon it, and the treaty with the Osage tribe of Indians, proclaimed January 21, 1867, the appellant rests its claim of title to the lands covered by the patents. It is, therefore, of primary importance to ascertain the scope and meaning of that act. The parties differ radically in their interpretation of it.

The United States maintain that it does not dispose of the Osage lands, and that it was not intended to do so. On the contrary, the appellant insists that the grant did not operate upon any particular lands until the line of its road was located, when it took effect upon these lands, as the Osage title had been then extinguished, and they had become in the proper sense of the term, public lands. This difference would seem to imply obscurity in the act, but be this as it may, the rules which govern in the interpretation of legislative grants are so well settled by this court that they hardly need be re-asserted. They apply as well to grants of lands to States to aid in building railroads, as to grants of special privileges to private corporations. In both cases the legislature, prompted by the supposed wants of the public, confers on others the means of securing an object which it is desirous of promoting, but is unwilling directly to undertake.

The main question in The Dubuque and Pacific Railroad Company v. Litchfield (23 Howard, 66) was whether a grant to the Territory of Iowa, to aid in the improvement of the navigation of the Des Moines river, extended to lands above the Raccoon fork, or was confined to those below it. The court, in deciding it, say: "All grants of this description are strictly construed against the grantee; nothing passes but what is conveyed in clear and explicit language; and as the rights here claimed are derived entirely from the act of Congress, the donation stands on the same footing of a grant by the public to a private company, the terms of which must be plainly expressed in the statute, and, if not thus expressed, they cannot be implied." This grant, like that to Iowa, was made for the purpose of aiding a work of internal improvement, and does not extend beyond the meaning and intent expressed in it. It should be neither enlarged by ingenious reasoning, nor diminished by strained construction. The construction must be reasonable, and such as will give effect to the intention of Congress. This is to be ascertained from the terms employed, the situation of the parties, and the nature of the grant. If these terms are plain and unambiguous, there can be no difficulty in interpreting the act, but if they admit of different meanings—the one of extension, and the other of limitation—they must be accepted in the sense most favorable to the grantor. And if a right be asserted against the government, it must be so clearly defined that there can be no question of the purpose of Congress to confer it. In other words, what is not given expressly, or by necessary implication, is withheld. (Dubuque and Pacific Railroad Company v. Litchfield, supra; Rice v. Railroad Co., 1 Black, 380; Charles River Bridge v. Warren Bridge, 11 Peters, 120.) Applying these rules to this controversy, there does not seem to be any difficulty in deciding it. Whatever is included in the exception is excluded from the grant, and it, therefore, becomes important to ascertain what was excepted in order to determine what was granted. But if there was no exception, and the proviso was omitted, the language used in the body of the act cannot be construed to include the Osage lands.

It creates a present interest, and does not indicate a purpose to give in future. "There be and is hereby granted" are words of absolute donation and import a grant in præsenti. This court has held that they can have no other meaning, and the land department, on this interpretation of them, has uniformly administered all previous similar grants.—(R. R. Co. v. Smith, 9 Wallace, 95; Schulenberg v. Harriman, 21 Id., 60; 1 Lester, 513; 8 Opinions, 257; 11 Id., 47.) They vest a present title in the State of Kansas, though a survey and a location are necessary to give precision to it, and attach it to any particular tract. After the location of the road, the grant becomes certain, and by relation has the same effect upon the selected parcels as if they had been specifically named at the date of the act. In other words, the grant was a float until the line of the road should be definitely fixed. But did Congress intend that it should reach the Osage lands? It is in general terms which neither include or exclude any particular lands. It is of every alternate section designated by odd numbers, within certain defined limits, but without the consent of the Indians there can be no entry on their reservation for the purpose of surveying it. Only the public lands owned absolutely by the United States are subject to survey and division into sections, and to these lands this grant is applicable. It embraces such as could be sold and enjoyed, and not those which the Indians, pursuant to treaty stipulations, were left free to occupy.—(Rice v. Railroad Co., 1 Black, 358.) Since the land system was inaugurated, it has been the settled policy of the government to sell the public lands at a small cost to individuals, and for the last twenty-five years to grant them to States in large tracts to aid in various works of internal improvement. But these grants have always been recognized as attaching only to so much of the public domain as was subject to sale or other disposal, although the roads of many subsidized companies pass through Indian reservations.

And such grants could be treated in no other way, for Congress cannot be supposed to have thereby intended to include lands previously appropriated to another purpose, unless there be an express declaration to that effect. A special exception of them was not necessary, because the policy which dictated the grants confined them to lands which Congress could rightfully bestow, without disturbing existing relations, and producing vexatious conflicts. The legislation which reserved them for any purpose excluded them from disposal in the manner that the public lands are usually disposed of, and this act discloses no intention to change the long-continued practice with respect to lands set apart for the use of the government or of the Indians. As the attempted transfer of any part of an Indian reservation, secured by treaty, would also involve a gross breach of the public faith, the presumption is conclusive that Congress never meant to grant it.

"A thing which is within the letter of the statute is not within the statute unless it be within the intention of the makers."—(1 Bacon Abr., 247.) The treaty of 1825 secured to the Osages the possession and use of their lands "so long as they may choose to occupy the same," and this treaty was only the substitute for one of an earlier date with equal guarantees.

As long ago as The Cherokee Nation v. Georgia (5 Peters, 1) this court said that "the Indians are acknowledged to have the unquestionable right to the lands they occupy until that right shall be extinguished by a voluntary cession to the government," and recently (U. S. v. Cook, 19 Wallace, 591-3) this right of occupancy has been held to be as sacred as the title of the United States to the fee. Unless the Indians were deprived of the power of alienation, it is easy to see that they could not peaceably enjoy their possessions with a superior race constantly encroaching on their frontier. With the ultimate fee vested in the United States, coupled with the sole right to buy that right in case the Indians were willing to sell, they were safe against intrusion if the government discharged its duty to a dependent people. And this it has indicated a willingness to do, for in 1834 an act was passed (4 Stats., 729, sec. 11) prohibiting, with heavy penalties, a settlement on the lands of an Indian tribe, or even an attempt to survey them. This perpetual right of occupancy, with the correlative obligation of the government to enforce it, negatives the idea that Congress, even in the absence of any positive stipulation to protect the Indians, intended to grant their lands to a railroad company, either absolutely or cum onere. For all practical purposes, the Osages owned the lands, as the actual right of possession, the only thing they deemed of value, was secured to them by the treaty of June 2, 1825, until they should elect to surrender it to the United States. In the free exercise of their choice they might occupy their lands forever, and whatever changed this condition, or interfered with it, violated the guarantees under which they had lived since that date. The United States have frequently extinguished the Indian title to make room for civilized men, the pioneers of the wilderness, but they never engaged in advance to do it, nor was constraint, in theory at least, placed upon the Indians to bring about their acts of cession. This grant, however, if it took effect on the Osage lands, carried with it the obligation to extinguish the Indian right. This will be conceded, if a complete title to them were granted, but it is equally true, if only the fee subject to that right passed to the grantee. It would be idle to grant what could be of no avail, unless something be done which the grantee is forbidden to do, but which the grantor has power to accomplish. And this applies with peculiar force to a grant like this, intended to be of immediate practical benefit to the grantee. The lands were expected to be used in the construction of the road as it progressed, but no one would buy them, or even loan money upon them, so long as the Indian right of occupancy attached to them. The grantee was not at liberty to negotiate with the Indians at all, but the United States might by treaty put an end to that right. As Congress cannot be supposed to do a vain thing, the present grant of the fee would be an assurance to the grantee that the full title should be eventually enjoyed. This would be in effect a transfer of the possessory right of the Indians before acquiring it—a poor way of observing the treaty of 1825. How could they treat on an equality with the United States under such circumstances? They would be constrained to sell, as the United States were obliged to buy. Although it might appear that the sale was voluntary, it would, in fact, be compulsory. Will the court, in the absence of words of unmistakable import, presume that Congress intended to do an act so injurious to the Indians? The statute does not evince such a purpose, and yet it is not difficult to express it. If Congress really meant that this grant should take effect in the Osage country, on the surrender of the Indian title, it would have so declared. It is true the route of the road, as defined by the act, passed through that country, but many other roads, aided by similar grants, ran through Indian reservations, and in no case, before this, has land, included in them, been recognized as falling within any grant, whether the Indian right was extinguished before or after the definite location of the road. And if Congress intended this grant to have a different effect, it would at least have provided an adequate indemnity to the Osages for their surrender of that right, and sanctioned a delay in locating the road until their consent should be declared. Instead of this, the act leaves them unprotected, and contemplates that the road shall be finished as soon as practicable. This is inconsistent with a purpose to subject their land to this grant, for they had not proposed to relinquish their possession, nor had the president encouraged them to do so. In the face of this, it is hard to believe that Congress meant to hold out inducements to the company to delay fixing the route of their road, until a contingency had happened which the act did not contemplate. Besides the improbability that Congress would offer a premium for delay, in making a railroad, it was bound by every consideration affecting the condition of the Indians to retain their lands within its own control. But it is said that the general appropriation bill for the Indians became a law the same day as the act under consideration, and that it authorized the president to enter into negotiations with the Kansas Indians for the extinction of their title and their removal from the State. This is true, but it does not prove that Congress, in making this grant, had in view the extinction of the title for the benefit of the grantee, or for any other purpose. If Congress contemplated at that time any such thing, it would have spoken directly, as it did in the Pacific railroad act, and not in an indirect way near the end of one of the general appropriation bills. The Congress that made this grant made one eight months before to aid in the construction of a railroad from the Missouri river to the Pacific ocean, and of other roads connecting therewith, in which it agreed to extinguish as rapidly as possible the Indian title for the benefit of the companies. It was necessary to do this because the roads ran through territory occupied by tribes of wild Indians; but this road passed through a reservation, secured by treaty, and occupied by Indians at least partially civilized. To subject it to grant was wrong, and as no mention was made of it in the act, there is no reason to suppose that Congress, in making the grant, contemplated the extinction of the Indian title at all. Besides, the provision in the appropriation act did not look to the extinction of this title for railroad purposes. The avowed object was to remove the Indians from the State to the Indian territory south of it. If any ulterior hidden purpose was to be thereby subserved, Congress is not responsible for it, nor can it affect this case. The language used is to be taken as expressing the intention of Congress, and the large inference attempted to be drawn from it is not authorized. It does not follow, because Congress was willing to open negotiations with the Indians for the purpose of removing them, that it also contemplated obtaining their title in order to subject it to this grant. The policy of removal—a favorite one with the government, and always promoted by it—looked to the extinguishment of the Indian title for the general good, and not for the special benefit of any particular interest. It might well be that the same Congress which made this grant, should, in another act, sanction a negotiation with a view to removing them as a disturbing element from Kansas, and to procuring their lands for settlement. But the two laws have no necessary connection with each other, because they happened to be approved on the third of March. The laws approved by the president that day occupy one hundred pages of the 12th volume of the statutes.

We are not without authority that the general words of this grant do not include an Indian reservation. In Wilcox v. Jackson, (13 Peters, 498,) the president, by proclamation, had ordered the sale of certain lands, without excepting therefrom a military reservation included within their boundaries. The proclamation was based on an act of Congress supposed to authorize the sale of these lands, but the court held that the act did not apply to the case, and then say: "We go further and say, that whenever a tract of land shall have been once legally appropriated to any purpose, from that moment the land thus appropriated becomes severed from the mass of public lands, and that no subsequent law, proclamation, or sale would be construed to embrace or operate upon it, although no reservation were made of it." It may be said that it was not necessary for the court in deciding the case to pass upon this question, but, however this may be, the principle asserted is sound and reasonable, and we adopt it as a rule of construction. And the Supreme courts of Wisconsin and Texas, in cases where the point was necessarily involved, have also adopted it. — (State v. Delesdenier, 7 Texas, 76; Spaulding v. Martin, 11 Wisconsin, 274.) It applies with more force to Indian than to military reservations. The latter are the absolute property of the government. In an Indian reservation other rights are vested. Congress cannot be supposed to grant them by a subsequent law, general in its terms. Specific language, leaving no room for doubt as to the legislative will, is required for such a purpose.

But this case does not rest alone on the general words of description in the act, for the Osage lands are expressly excepted from the grant by force of the following proviso: "That any and all lands heretofore reserved to the United States, by any act of Congress, or in any other manner by competent authority, for the purpose of aiding in any object of internal improvement, or for any other purpose whatsoever, be, and the same are hereby, reserved to the United States from the operation of this act, except so far as it may be found necessary to locate the routes of said road and branches through such reserved lands; in which case the right of way only shall be granted, subject to the approval of the President of the United States." In construing a public grant, as we have seen, the intention of the grantor, gathered from the whole and every part of it, must prevail. No rule requires a proviso to be construed differently from the grant itself. Both are to be construed alike; but if, on examination, there are doubts about that intention, or the extent of the grant, the government is to receive the benefit of them. This proviso, however, has no doubtful meaning. Attached in substantially the same form to all railroad land grants since 1850, it was employed to make plainer the purpose of Congress to exclude from their operation lands which, by reason of prior appropriation, ought to be withheld. They were not in a condition to be granted, and for this reason were excepted from the category of lands to be donated to a state to aid it in building railroads. And it would be strange, indeed, in a land-grant act, if Congress meant to give away property which a just and wise policy had devoted to other uses. There were lands in Indian occupancy along the lines of many of the projected roads, and to such alone could the proviso to this particular grant apply, for there were no military reservations which the railroad of the appellant could penetrate.

That lands dedicated to the use of the Indians should, upon every principle of natural right, be carefully guarded by the government and saved from a possible grant, is a proposition which will command universal assent. And what ought to be done, has been done. The proviso was not necessary to do it, but it serves to fix more definitely what is granted by what is excepted. All lands which had been "heretofore reserved," that is, reserved before the passage of the act, by competent authority, for any purpose, are excepted by the proviso. This language is broad and comprehensive. It unquestionably covers the Osage lands. They had been reserved by treaty before the act of 1863 was passed. It is said, however, that having been reserved, not "to the United States," but to the Osages, they are, therefore, not included within the terms of the proviso. This position is inadmissible. It would leave the proviso without effect, as there is nothing but Indian reservations on which it can act. And that it was intended to apply to them is evident enough, because all the reservations through which this road was to pass were Indian. This fact was recognized, and the right of way granted through them, subject to the approval of the President. There was no mode of obtaining that right except through his negotiations with the Indians, and he secured it in season for the operations of the company. Besides, there were no other lands over which he could exercise any authority to obtain that right. And why grant it by words vesting its immediate enjoyment, unless it was contemplated that the roads would be constructed during the existence of the reservations? But the verbal criticism, that the Osage lands were not, within the meaning of this proviso, reserved "to the United States," is unsound. The treaty, the joint work of the United States and the Indians, reserved them as much to one as the other of the contracting parties. Both were interested therein and had title thereto. In one sense, the lands were reserved to the Indians, but in another and broader sense, to the United States, for the use of the Indians.

Every tract set apart for some special use is reserved to the government, to enable it to enforce that use. And there is no difference, in this respect, whether it be appropriated for Indian occupancy or for other purposes. There is an equal obligation resting on the government to see that neither class of reservations is diverted from the uses to which it was assigned. Out of a vast tract of land ceded by the Osages, a certain portion was retained for their occupancy and exclusive use, so long as they chose to possess it. The government covenanted with them that they should not be disturbed, except with their voluntary consent, first obtained, and a grant of these lands would be such a manifest breach of this covenant, that Congress, in order to leave no room for doubt, specially excepted them by means of the proviso. A construction which would limit it to lands set apart for military posts and the like, and deny its application to lands appropriated for Indian occupation, is more subtle than sound. This proviso, or rather one couched in the same language, has been the subject of consideration by this court, and has received a liberal, instead of the technical and narrow construction claimed for it by the appellant. Wolcott v. Des Moines Navigation Co., 5 Wallace, 681, was a controversy concerning the effect of two grants. The latter, it was conceded, covered the lands in dispute, unless excluded by the proviso. The court, in construing it, held that they were excluded, although they had not been reserved "to the United States." They had been, in fact, granted by the United States to the State of Iowa. This decision was re-ffirmed in Williams v. Baker, 17 Id., 144.

The scope and effect of the act of 1863 cannot, in our opinion, be mistaken. The different parts harmonize with each other, and present as an entirety, in clear light, the scheme proposed by Congress to aid the State of Kansas. She needed railroads to develop her resources, and Congress was willing to aid her to build them, so far as a grant of a part of the national domain, in a condition at the time to be sold or granted, could accomplish the object. A grant was accordingly made of alternate sections of the public lands, within ten miles on each side of the contemplated roads, but they could not be identified until the lines of the roads were established on the ground. In the early days of the land-grant system, lands supposed to be affected by a grant were, as soon as it was made, if not in advance of it, withdrawn from market. But experience proved that this proceeding retarded the settlement of the country, and the practice was, at the date of this act, not to withdraw them until the road was actually located. In this way the ordinary working of the land system was not disturbed. Private entries, pre-emption and homestead settlements, and reservations for special uses, continued within the supposed limits of the grant, the same as if it had not been made. But they ceased when the routes of the roads were definitely fixed, and if it then appeared that a part of the lands within those limits had been either sold at private entry, taken up by pre-emptors, or reserved by the United States, an equivalent was provided. The companies were allowed to select, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, in lieu of the lands disposed of in either of these ways, an equal number of odd sections from the public lands nearest to the granted sections, and within twenty miles of the line of the road. Having thus granted lands in place and by way of indemnity, Congress deemed it wise to declare, what the act already implied, that lands otherwise appropriated when the act was passed, were not subject to it.

The grant itself was in præsenti, and covered all the odd sections which should appear, on the location of the road, to have been within the grant when it was made. The right to them did not depend on such location, but attached at once on the making of the grant. It is true they could not be identified until the lines of the road were marked out on the ground, but as soon as this was done it was easy to find out what lands were granted. And if the company did not obtain all the lands within the original limits, by reason of the power of sale or reservation retained by the United States, they were to be compensated by an equal amount of substituted lands. These could not be selected within those limits on any contingency, and the attempt to give this effect to the indemnity clause receives no support, either in the scheme of the act, or in anything that has been urged by counsel. It would be strange, indeed, if Congress, without saying so, intended the clause to perform the office of making a new grant within the ten-mile limits, or enlarging the one already made. This would imply that Congress meant to buy out the Indian title for the benefit of the companies, and thus defeat the policy of the act of 1837, (5 Stats., 135), which contemplates the sale of all Indian lands ceded to the government. It would imply, also, that Congress meant that the companies, instead of building the roads as soon as practicable, should profit by delay. Surely these implications cannot be indulged in such a grant, unless its language leaves no other alternative. Instead of this, the words employed show clearly that the only purpose of that clause is to give lands outside of the ten-mile limits for those lost inside by the action of the government in keeping the land offices open between the date of the granting act and the location of the road. This construction gives effect to every part of the act, and makes each part consistent with the other. But even if the clause were susceptible of a different and more extended meaning, it is still subject to, and limited by, the proviso, which operates at once, and excludes from the grant all lands then reserved, and not simply those found to be reserved when the lines of the road were definitely fixed. This contingency had been provided for, in the clause, and if the proviso did not take effect until this time, it would be wholly unnecessary. And if the Osage lands are within the terms of the proviso, as we hold they are, then they are absolutely and unconditionally excepted from the grant, and it makes no difference whether or not they have since that time become a part of the public lands of the country.

But the appellant claims that the lands in question were subjected to this grant by virtue of the Senate amendment to the Osage treaty, made in 1865, and ratified in 1867. If this amendment has the effect attributed to it, it was certainly proposed on grounds entirely foreign to the treaty, and inconsistent with its purposes. Neither party to it contemplated the advancement of private interests. The United States had not made an absolute or contingent grant of the lands, and there was, manifestly, no reason why the Osages should bestow a gratuity on the appellant. But the treaty itself, as originally framed, is a disclaimer by them of such an intention. Whatever they did give was limited to persons from whom they had received valuable services, and they so stated expressly. Confessed poverty, and the desire to improve their condition, as their annuities had ceased, induced them to negotiate the treaty. They had more land than they needed, but were without money. And the United States, in pursuance of a long-settled policy, were solicitous to lessen the territory of the Indians whenever suitable opportunity offered, in order to open their lands to settlement. Induced by these considerations, the parties concluded a treaty, which was submitted to the Senate for its approval. By the first article the Osages ceded to the United States a large and valuable part of their possessions on certain conditions to be performed by the United States. They were required to survey and sell it on the most advantageous terms for cash, in conformity with the system then in operation for surveying and selling the public lands, with the modification that neither pre-emption claims nor homestead settlements were to be recognized. And the proceeds of these sales, after deducting enough to repay large advances, and expenses, were to be placed in the treasury to the credit of the "civilization fund," for the benefit of the Indian tribes throughout the country.

The fund arising from the sale of the lands ceded by the second article was for the exclusive benefit of the Osages, but the relation of the United States to the property in each case is the same. And it can make no difference that the trust in one is specifically declared, and in the other is to be ascertained from the general scope of the language. It is an elementary principle that no particular form of words is necessary to create a trust. In neither case is the government a beneficiary. In both the money is to be applied to promote the well-being of the Indians, an object which it has been the favorite policy of Congress to promote.

Neither of the contracting parties contemplated that any part of the lands was to be used to aid in building a railroad. And it is manifest that the treaty cannot be carried into effect, nor the trusts in connection with it executed, if the appellant takes any of the lands. As the act of 1863 does not grant them, nor the treaty in its original shape, the inquiry presents itself, what effect upon the question has the amendment inserted in the first article after the word "laws."

The provision on this subject, with the amendment in brackets, reads as follows: "Said lands shall be surveyed and sold under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, on the most advantageous terms for cash, as public lands are surveyed and sold under existing laws, [including any act granting lands to the State of Kansas in aid of the construction of a railroad through said lands,] but no pre-emption claim or homestead settlement shall be recognized." Interpreted by the literal meaning and gramatical construction of the words, this amendment relates to the survey and sale of the lands, and cannot be extended further. This interpretation would relieve the case of all difficulty, and it was doubtless given to the amendment by the Indians when they accepted it. But obscure as it is, and indefinite as is its meaning, it was intended to do more than specify other laws to be observed in surveying and selling the lands. But whatever purpose it was meant to serve, it obviously does not, proprio vigore, make a grant. To do this, apt words must be introduced, but treaties, like statutes, must rest on the words used—"nothing adding thereto, nothing diminishing." In Rex v. Barrel (12 Ad. & Ellis, 468), Patteson, J., said: "I see the necessity of not importing into statutes words which are not found there. Such a mode of interpretation only gives occasion to endless difficulty." And courts have always treated the subject the same way when asked to supply words in order to give a statute a particular meaning which it would not bear without them. (Rex v. Poor Law Com'rs, 6 Ad. & Ellis, 7; Everett v. Wells, 2 Scott. N. C., 531; Green v. Wood, 7 Q. B., 178).

It is urged that the amendment, if it does not make a grant, recognizes one already made. It does not say so, and we cannot suppose that the Senate intended that the Indians, by accepting it, should recognize a grant that had no existence. Information was, doubtless, communicated to that body that there were grants covering some of the ceded lands, which might interfere with the absolute disposal of them required by the treaty. If there were such grants, it was obviously proper that the treaty should be so modified as not to conflict with rights vested under them. But the Senate left that question to be decided by the proper tribunal, and it declared in substance and effect, that if such grants had been made by existing laws, they should be respected in the disposition of the lands. On this interpretation the amendment is consistent with the treaty. But if that given to it by the appellant be correct, the treaty is practically defeated. If no such grant had been made, lands would be taken from the Indians and appropriated to building railroads, without the consent of either Congress or the Indians, for no one can fail to see that interested outside parties, having access to these ignorant persons, would explain the amendment as a harmless thing. In negotiating the treaty neither the Executive Department nor the Indians supposed that any grant attached to the lands, for, as we have seen, all of them were to be sold, and the proceeds invested. Did the Senate, with this treaty before them, intend to charge the lands in question with a grant, whether it had really been made or not? If they did, they would not have suffered the treaty to remain in its present shape, but would have altered it to conform to so radical a change in its essential provisions. They would at once have excepted the lands covered by the grant, and not directed them to be sold. Why sell all the lands, if the status of a part of them is fixed absolutely by the amendment? In such a case, justice to the companies required that they should have the lands granted to them. The United States should, also, to this extent, be relieved of their trust. But if the words of the amendment were only intended to operate in the contingency that a grant had been made, there was no occasion to alter the treaty further than to say, as it now substantially does say, that the companies, if entitled to the lands, should have them. No exception could justly be taken to such a provision. It preserved vested rights, but did not create new ones. It did not solve the problem whether or not a grant had been made, but it did decide that the companies should get the land if there was a previous grant therefor, and that their rights, if any they had, should not be defeated or embarrassed by reason of the general terms of the treaty. It is argued that the Indians are not injured by a grant of a portion of their lands, as an enhanced value would be given to the rest, by the construction of a railroad through them. This is taking for granted what may or may not be true, for it does not necessarily follow that if the grant was allowed, the lands would bring more than without it. Besides, the Indians cannot be despoiled of any part of their inheritance upon such a fallacious pretense, and they choose to have all their lands sold. To this the United States assented by positive stipulation. We do not think that it was the intention of the amendment to annul that stipulation or to construe statutes upon which the claim of the appellant depends. Its office was to protect rights that might exist, independently of the treaty, but not to assert that any such right had been conferred.

The Thayer Act, as it is called, is invoked, but it can have no effect upon this case. It was passed for the sole purpose of enabling the company to relocate its road, and a false recital in it cannot turn the authority thereby given into a grant of land or a recognition of one. Especially is this so, when it expressly leaves the rights of the appellant to be determined by previous legislation. Besides this, these lands at the time were selling under a joint resolution, and it cannot be presumed that the Congress of 1871 intended to change the disposition of them, directed by the Congress of 1869.

It is urged that parties have loaned money on the faith that the lands in question were covered by the grant.

This is a subject of regret, as is always the case when a title, on the strength of which money has been advanced, fails, but it is to be hoped that the security taken upon the other property of the company will prove to be sufficient to satisfy the claims of the holders of its bonds. But whether this be so or not, it is hardly necessary to say that the title to the land is not strengthened by giving a mortgage upon it; nor can the fact that a mortgage has been given, throw any light upon the title of the mortgagor.

Upon the fullest consideration we have been able to bestow upon this case, we are clearly of the opinion that the decree below should be affirmed; and it is so ordered.

UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT

OCTOBER TERM, 1875.

Appeal from the Court of Claims.

ENOCH TOTTEN, Administrator, Appellant,
v.
THE UNITED STATES.

AN ACTION CAN NOT BE MAINTAINED AGAINST THE GOVERNMENT IN THE COURT OF CLAIMS UPON A CONTRACT FOR SECRET SERVICES DURING THE WAR, MADE BETWEEN THE PRESIDENT AND THE CLAIMANT.

Mr. Justice FIELD delivered the opinion of the court.

This case comes before us on appeal from the Court of Claims. The action was brought to recover compensation for services alleged to have been rendered by the claimant's intestate, William A. Lloyd, under a contract with President Lincoln, made in July, 1861, by which he was to proceed south and ascertain the number of troops stationed at different points in the insurrectionary states, procure plans of forts and fortifications, and gain such other information as might be beneficial to the government of the United States, and report the facts to the President; for which services he was to be paid two hundred dollars a month.

The Court of Claims finds that Lloyd proceeded, under the contract, within the rebel lines and remained there during the entire period of the war, collecting, and from time to time transmitting, information to the President, and that upon the close of the war he was only reimbursed his expenses. But the court being equally divided in opinion as to the authority of the President to bind the United States by the contract in question, decided, for the purposes of an appeal, against the claim and dismissed the petition.

We have no difficulty as to the authority of the President in the matter. He was undoubtedly authorized during the war, as commander-in-chief of the armies of the United States, to employ secret agents to enter the rebel lines and obtain information respecting the strength, resources, and movements of the enemy, and contracts to compensate such agents are so far binding upon the government as to render it lawful for the President to direct payment of the amount stimulated out of the contingent fund under his control. Our objection is not to the contract, but to the action upon it in the Court of Claims. The service stipulated by the contract was a secret service; the information sought was to be obtained clandestinely, and was to be communicated privately; the employment and the service were to be equally concealed Both employer and agent must have understood that the lips of the other were to be forever sealed respecting the relation of either to the matter. This condition of the engagement was implied from the nature of the employment, and is implied in all secret employments of the government in time of war, or upon matters affecting our foreign relations, where a disclosure of the service might compromise or embarrass our government in its public duties, or endanger the person or injure the character of the agent. If upon contracts of such a nature an action against the government could be maintained in the Court of Claims, whenever an agent should deem himself entitled to greater or different compensation than that awarded to him, the whole service in any case, and the manner of its discharge, with the details of dealings with individuals and officers, might be exposed, to the serious detriment of the public. A secret service, with liability to publicity in this way, would be impossible, and as such services are sometimes indispensable to the government, its agents in those services must look for their compensation to the contingent fund of the department employing them, and to such allowance from it as those who dispense that fund may award. The secrecy which such contracts impose precludes any action for their enforcement. The publicity produced by an action would itself be a breach of a contract of that kind and thus defeat a recovery.

It may be stated as a general principle that public policy forbids the maintenance of any suit in a court of justice, the trial of which would inevitably lead to the disclosure of matters which the law itself regards as confidential, and respecting which it will not allow the confidence to be violated. On this principle suits cannot be maintrined which would require a disclosure of the confidences of the confessional, or those between husband and wife, or of communications by a client to his counsel for professional advice, or of a patient to his physician for a similar purpose. Much greater reason exists for the application of the principle to cases of contract for secret services with the government, as the existence of a contract of that kind is itself a fact not to be disclosed.

Judgment affirmed.

WE are under obligations to JOSIAH H. BISSELL, official reporter, for the following opinion:

U. S. CIRCUIT COURT, N. DISTRICT OF ILLINOIS.

ROBERT E. JENKINS, Assignee of Commercial Ins. Co., v. JOSEPH F. ARMOUR. SAME v. SIX OTHER DEFENDANTS.

1. STOCK—NOTES IN INSOLVENT COMPANY—SET-OFF.—A stockholder in an insurance company, rendered insolvent by a fire, cannot escape his liability on a stock note, by surrendering a certificate of indebtedness on one of the adjusted policies, and withdrawing his note.

TRUST FUND.—Such a note constitutes a trust fund for the benefit of the creditors of the company, and the transaction is, in effect, a conversion of the company assets.

3. INTEREST.—The stockholder must pay interest from the date of the withdrawal of his stock-note.

There were seven suits against as many different defendants, on stock-notes given to the company. At the time of subscribing for the stock, each stockholder paid twenty per cent. in cash, and gave his note to the company for the balance, without interest, payable upon demand when needed to pay losses. The dividends, from time to time, declared by the company, had been applied upon these notes, until at the time of the great Chicago fire, of October 9, 1871, there was only thirty-five per cent. remaining unpaid on the notes.

Soon after this fire, each of these defendants purchased policies from other persons, procured their adjustment by the company, taking certificates of loss for the amount, which certificates they then surrendered to the treasurer at par in payment of their stock-notes.

BLODGETT, J.—There can be no doubt that each of these defendants, at the time of the transactions alleged, knew of the insolvency of the company and dealt with it upon that basis. The object of each of them was to obtain payment to themselves in full of their claims, notwithstanding the fact that such payment would be a withdrawal of the assets of the company from other policy holders; for these notes against the several defendants were in effect cash, and the amount thereof should have been paid in cash into the treasury of the company for distribution among the creditors. The defendants were all responsible, and the contingency having arisen when the cash was needed upon these notes to pay losses, it became their duty to pay it in to the company,

Following the law then, as laid down in Hitchcock v. Rollo and Sawyer v. Hoag, decided by Judge Drummond in this court, 3 Bissell, 276 and 293, and in the latter case as decided in the Supreme court, 17 Wallace, 610, and particularly the principles laid down by Judge Drummond in Scammon v. Kimball, 6 Chicago Legal News, 1, there can be no doubt but that such surrenders and transfers were a fraud, and such a fraud as would be set aside by the court without especial reference to the provisions of the bankrupt law. The stock-notes were a part of the capital stock of the company, and as such were a trust-fund for the creditors, and by collusion with the officers of the company, the defendants withdrew them from the treasurer. The fact that some of the defendants were also officers of the company made no difference, and those who were only stockholders are equally liable.

An important question, and one not easy of solution, arises as to the time when interest should begin to run on these stock notes, whether from the date of demand by the assignee, or of the exchange by the stockholders of these certificates for their notes. As against the company if it had continued solvent, interest would only run from the time of a proper demand. But in these cases the liability of the defendants arises from their own acts under circumstances where they are properly chargeable as trustees. They, in fact, wrongfully converted to their own use the assets of the company at the time when they made these exchanges. They received payment of debts in full from the company when they knew it to be hopelessly insolvent, and withdrew from the treasury of the company their notes which were valuable assets. The effect is the same as though they had taken and converted the amount in cash from the coffers of the company, and therefore they come within the rule that a trustee must pay interest from the date of conversion.

Judgment for plaintiff in each case with interest at 6 per cent. from date of withdrawal of stock-notes.

U. S. CIRCUIT COURT W. D. OF WISCONSIN.

JOHN V. FARWELL et al., v. C. D. CURTIS.

BANK CHECKS—RIGHTS OF HOLDERS AND DRAWERS—PRESENTMENT BY MAIL.

1. LOSS OF HOLDER.—That if a check is not regularly demanded, and the bank should fail after the time it ought to have been demanded, the loss will be the loss of the holder, who will be considered as having made the check his own by his laches. That if the check is presented and not paid, notice of dishonor must be given the drawer in order to charge him.

2. THE RULES NOT REGARDED IN THIS CASE.—That these rules were not regarded in this case. The plaintiffs sent the check in time, and if the presentation by a letter was a good demand, which the court doubts. It was presented on the 7th, in the morning: then it should have been paid on the 7th, and if not, the drawer should have been notified of its non-payment. But, instead of being paid in money, it was paid by draft on Chicago, and it was claimed that the plaintiffs had time to present that, to see whether it would be paid, and that if not paid, they could then protest the check; held, that this is not the law. The holder of a check cannot extend the time for which the drawer would be liable.

3. DUTY OF HOLDER.—The drawer had a right to have his check paid on the day presented, and it was the duty of the holder to see to it that it was so paid, or if not protested; and if the holder accepts the check or draft of the bank in payment, in lieu of money, he must present and collect it the same day, or else he is chargeable with laches. That he cannot, as in this case, keep it three days, as by so doing, he would extend the drawer's liability for two days beyond the time fixed by the law.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

HOPKINS, J.—This action was brought to recover the price of certain goods sold by plaintiff to the defendant in April, 1875. The defence is payment. The issue has been tried by the court. The real point of the defence is, whether a check given by defendant on the 5th of April, 1875, for $800, was and is to be held as a payment. The parties have stipulated the facts to be: that on the 5th day of April, 1875, the defendant, a resident of New Lisbon, in this State, purchased goods of plaintiffs in Chicago, their place of business, to the amount of eight hundred dollars and over, and on that day gave his check to the plaintiff for the sum of $800 upon the Bank of New Lisbon, a banking house doing business in that place, to apply as payment towards the goods so purchased by him to that amount; that the plaintiffs, on the same day, sent the check per mail to the bank, the drawees, with instruction to collect and return; that there is a daily mail between Chicago and New Lisbon; that the check was received at the Bank of New Lisbon on the morning of the 7th of April, and was paid out of defendant's funds on deposit in the bank, there being sufficient for that purpose, and charged to his account; that the bank, on the 7th of April, sent to the plaintiffs, through the mail, a draft for the amount of the check on the Union National Bank, Chicago, which was received by them on the morning of the 9th, which they on that day deposited in the Bank of Montreal, of Chicago, for collection, and which was, on the 10th of April, presented to the Union National Bank for payment, and not paid, and was returned on the same day to the plaintiffs, who, on the same day, wrote the New Lisbon Bank that the check would go to protest if not paid on Monday, and to defendant that it was not paid, and asking him "to poke up the bank on the matter." It not being paid, was, on Monday, the 12th, protested, of which defendant was notified per mail.

It is further stipulated that the Bank of New Lisbon could have paid said check in money up the 10th day of April; but that on the close of the day's business on that day it stopped payment, having up to that time paid all checks presented for payment; that the bank had not the funds in the Union National Bank to meet the draft when they drew it, nor authority to draw it without funds.

These are the material facts established by the evidence, and the question is, whether the plaintiffs were guilty of such negligence in presenting the check and demanding payment as to discharge the drawer.

The practice of sending checks by mail to the drawee I think is not usual and has not received much judicial consideration, and not any direct sanction that I can find. In Morse on banking, page 334, he says it is a good presentment, and cites for his authority Bailey v. Bordenham, 10 Law Times, N. S., 422. I have examined that case, and it gives some countenance to his assertion, but I think the point is not absolutely decided.

In these days when such facilities are furnished by express companies for presentation at distant places, there is no reason for adopting a less direct or effective mode to accomplish the object. In this case there is a daily mail, by railroad between Chicago and New Lisbon, and a daily express also, with route agents and local agents, which furnished ample opportunities for presentation at the bank counters, as early as the morning of the 7th of April, and probably on the morning of the 6th, if it had been sent by the first opportunity. But if sent by the last train on the 6th, it would have reached New Lisbon on the morning of the 7th, and could have been collected and returned so as to have reached the plaintiff by the morning of the 8th of April. To send by mail to the drawees with instructions to collect and return, under such circumstances, is hardly equivalent to a demand at the counter for payment. The bank could not have paid the currency if it had it, there was no one to pay it to. The admission is that the bank was paying and had the money to pay up to and including the 10th, so that if the money had been asked on the 7th, it would have been paid. Now, as the plaintiff adopted another course than the one which the exercise of ordinary care and diligence would have dictated, and loss has resulted by reason of it, they should stand it. But it may not be necessary to settle this point, as Morse, who says a presentation by mail is good, as well as the case cited by him to support the assertion, says, also, that when the holder sends by mail to the drawee directly, if the money does not come back by the return mail, notice of dishonor should be given. Adopting this rule would not relieve these plaintiffs, for they did not comply with it, the money did not come back by the next mail, nor was the check protested as required. But instead of the money on the 9th, four days after the receipt of the check, a draft came back on the Union Bank, but that was not presented until the 10th for payment, and was not protested until the 12th, so that conceding that the presentation by mail was sufficient, the plaintiff was guilty of laches in not presenting the draft before the 10th. This delay is inexcusable according to any rule of diligence that I know of, so that assuming that Mr. Morse states a safe and satisfac tory rule, it does not exonerate thesplaintiffs from laches. But I think if the time is extended beyond what it would have been if sent by the usual and ordinary modes, that is, by express, or to some party to present, and beyond the period established by law as reasonable for presentation, and a loss happens by reason of the failure of the drawee, the payee of the check is alone chargeable unto it.

For instance, in this case, it is admitted that the bank had the money to pay the check up to and including the 10th, so that if payment had been demanded in the usual way, it would have been paid, and if the parties chose to make the drawee their agent and the drawee, as their agent, sent a worthless draft instead of the money, which he would have paid to any party presenting the check at the counter and charged the check to the drawer, the same as if paid in money, so that he had no right to enforce his claim or power to protect himself. The payee should incur the loss instead of the drawer, that ensued by the subsequent failure. The charge to defendant's account was made on the 7th of April, in the morning, and the check marked paid, and what was done after that time was done by the bank at plaintiffs' request, and as their agent, and whether in good or bad faith on the part of the banker, the defendant is not to blame or chargeable therewith, or for any loss resulting therefrom.

The common or commercial law has fixed certain times within which checks must be presented to the drawees for payment, and when it appears that the bank was paying during that time, and the drawee's account was good for the same, and the refusal or failure to obtain payment after, was by reason of the failure of the bank occurring subsequent thereto, the loss has to be borne by the payee or holder of the check. That rule is in cases where the parties all reside in the same place, that it must be presented for payment before the close of business on the day following its date or delivery to the payee; and in cases where it is drawn upon a bank at another place, it must be sent at the fartherest, by the last mail on the next day after it is received and be presented by the party receiving it on the day following the reception by him. 20 Wen, Smith v. Janes, 192—Story on promissory note, 493.

If not thus regularly demanded, and the bank or bankers should fail, after those times, the loss will be the loss of the holder, who is considered as having made the check his own by his laches. If the check is presented and not paid, notice of dishonor must be given the drawer, in order to charge him. Now, in this case, it is plain that the plaintiffs did not observe these rules. They sent the check in time, and if the presentation by letter was a good demand, it was presented on the 7th in the morning; then it sould have been pald on the 7th, and if not, the drawer should have been notified of its non-payment. But instead of being paid in money it was paid by draft on Chicago, and it is claimed that the plaintiffs had time to present that, to see whether it would be paid, and that if not paid, they could then protest the check. This is not the law. The holder of a check cannot in that way extend the time for which the drawer would be liable. The drawer had a right to have his check paid on the day presented, and it was the duty of the holder to see to it that it was so paid, or if not protested, and if the holder accepts the check or draft of the bank in payment in lieu of money, he must present and collect it the same day, or else he is chargeable with laches. He cannot, as in this case, keep it for three days and then go back upon the drawer of the check if it is not paid, as by so doing he would extend the drawer's liability for two days beyond the time fixed by the law. Alexander v. Bruchfield, 7 Man. & G., 1061.

This point is directly decided in Smith v. Miller, 43 N. Y., 171. In that case the check of the drawee was taken and presented at the bank on the following day—but before its presentation the drawers of the check had failed. The party accepting the payment thereupon protested the draft which they received it in payment of, and brought suit to recover the amount of the draft, claiming that as the check was presented on the next day after its date, it was duly presented, and if not paid, the draft for which it was given was not paid.

On the contrary it was claimed that as the drawers of the check were paying all of the day on which it was given, and that if it had been presented on that day it would have been paid, and that as it was taken in lieu of the money, it should have been presented on that day, that the party could not have the whole of the next day to present a check taken under such circumstances, which was sustained by the court, which said:

"It was the duty of the plaintiffs to present the check at the bank, at least during the day on which they received it, and obtain either the money or a certificate, or cause the same to be protested for non-payment, and not having done so, they were chargeable with negligence and the consequent loss."

Here, even giving the plaintiffs the benefit of the time allowed when sent by mail, as in other cases, and they are guilty of negligence, they received the banker's check on the 9th, but delayed presenting it for payment to the Union National Bank until the 10th, Certainly such negligence cannot be tolerated in treating with paper that they had taken in lieu of money, without the consent or knowledge of defendant. The plaintiffs cannot hold the defendant liable on his check during the time they were thus experimenting with the check they received from the bankers, in payment of his check to them.

The bankers may have, and probably did, practice a fraud upon the plaintiffs when they sent this draft on the Union Bank. But the defendant is not chargeable with that. He can say to the plaintiffs, if you had sent the check to a party here to present in the usual way it would have been paid, and I have a right to require you to pursue the ordinary course in such case, and if you depart therefrom, and are defrauded by your agent, which in this case was the banker, it is your loss, and you alone are liable, as you brought it unnecessarily upon yourself.

Under the evidence, defendant must therefore have judgment.

SUPREME COURT OF WISCONSIN.

OPINION, APRIL, 27, 1876.

A RESIDENT ATTORNEY OF ILLINOIS CANNOT BE ADMITTED TO THE BAR IN WISCONSIN.

In the matter of the motion for the admission to the bar of this court, of Ole Mossness, a member of the bar of the State of Illinois.

Opinion by RYAN, C. J.

It is, we believe, the general practice of courts of record in the several States, to permit gentlemen of the bar in other States to appear as counsel, on the trial or argument of causes. Such has been the uniform practice of this court. And under all ordinary circumstances, it will always be a pleasure to us to permit members of the bar of other States to argue causes here, whenever they may appear here to do so. No license to practice here is necessary or proper for that purpose; the usual and proper practice being to grant leave, ex gratia, for the occasion.

But general license to practice here as attorney and counselor rests upon quite different considerations. The bar is no unimportant part of the court; and its members are officers of the court. Thomas v. Steele, 22 Wis., 207; Cotteren v. Connaughton' 24 Wis., 134; See Bacon's Abr., Attorney, H.; 1 Tidd's Pr., 60; 3 Black, 25; 1 Kent, 306; Ex parte Garland, 4 Wall, 333. And if officers of the court, certainly in some sense officers of the State for which the court acts. Re Wood, Hopk., 6. This is not really denied in 20 Johns., 492, decided in the same year. And if it were, we have no doubt that the chancellor was correct; and that attorneys and counselors of a court, though not properly public officers, are quasi officers of the State, whose justice is administered by the court.

The State may have extra territorial officers, as commissioners to take acknowledgments, &c. But these are exceptions; and the general business of the State, within the State, executive, legislative and judicial, must be performed by citizens or denizens of the State; and the officers charged with it must be resident in the State. State v. Smith, 14 Wis., 497; State v. Murray, 28 Wis., 96.

So the courts may have extra territorial officers, for extra territorial functions, as commissioners to take depositions, &c. But for all functions within the jurisdiction of the courts, their officers must be residents of the State. This is essential to the nature of the functions themselves, and to the proper control of courts over their officers.

The office of attorney and counselor of the courts is one of great official trust and responsibility in the administration of justice; one liable to great abuse; and has always been exercised, in all courts proceeding according to the course of the common law, subject to strict oversight and summary power of the court. It would be an anomaly, dangerous to the safe administration of justice, that the office should be filled by persons residing beyond the jurisdiction of the court, and practically not subject to its authority. We take it that members of the bar of this State lose their right to practice here by removing from the State. After they become non-residents, they can appear in courts of this State ex gratia only. Our courts cannot have a non-resident bar.

This all appears to us to be so very plain, that it is difficult to believe that chap. 50 of 1865 was intended to do more than to authorize the appearance here, as counsel in the trial and argument of causes, of gentlemen of the bar of other States. If intended to do that, it was probably unnecessary. If intended to ro more, it was clearly without the power of the legislature.

For the reason only that the gentleman whose admission is moved is not a resident of the State, the motion must be denied.

UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT.

No. 471.—OCTOBER TERM, 1875.

MISSOURI, KANSAS, and TEXAS RAILWAY COMPANY, Appellant,
v.
THE UNITED STATES.

Appeal from the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Kansas.

Mr. Justice DAVIS delivered the opinion of the court.

The decision in Leavenworth, Lawrence, and Galveston Railroad Company v. The United States, just rendered, controls this case. Each company claims a grant of land within the Osage reservation. This case involves substantially the same questions as the other, with this difference, that the act of 1866, under which this appellant claims, was passed after the Senate amendment was acted upon, and was beyond the control of the Senate.

In any aspect of this case the appellant cannot recover. The Senate amendment does not apply to the act of 1866, for it was adopted before this law was in force, and only refers to existing laws. It is true that the bill which subsequently became a law, was pending in Congress at the time the treaty was before the Senate, but if that body intended the amendment to affect not only existing but contemplated grants, language appropriate to such a purpose would have been used. And this remark applies to Congress also, for if it knew that the treaty, with its provisions, was pending, and meant, notwithstanding this, to grant these lands, they would have employed words to include them, or at least take them out of the excepting clause of the proviso. But the effect upon this case is the same, whether the act of 1866 is to be treated as taking effect before or after the treaty became operative by the proclamation of the President on the 21st of January, 1867. If it took effect for all purposes on the day it was passed, then the Indian title even was not extinguished, as the treaty had not been ratified. But if it be considered, so far as regards the provisions of the treaty, as in any sense taking effect after the treaty was ratified, then the claim of the appellant is defeated by the terms of the treaty appropriating the lands to other purposes. As these lands were set apart to be surveyed and sold for the benefit of the Indians, they were "otherwise appropriated" as much as they were before the treaty, and, consequently, within the meaning of the excepting clause in the act, reserved for the purposes to which they were appropriated.

Decree affirmed.

As an illustration of the absurdities produced by the "codes," the case of Bennett v. Butterworth, above referred to by Mr. Justice Grier, is worthy of attention. In that case the court were unable to discover from the pleadings the nature of the action or the remedy sought. It might with equal probability be called an action of debt or detinue, or replevin, or trover, trespass, or a bill in chancery. The jury and the court seem to have labored under the same perplexity. The jury gave a verdict for twelve hundred dollars, and the court rendered judgment for four negroes!

We call attention to the following opinions, reported at length in this issue:

Land Grants by Congress to aid Railroads—The Osage Ceded Lands—Effect of Land Grant on Indian Reservation.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States by Davis, J., stating the rule of construction in determining the meaning of land grants by Congress, and holding that the words, "there be and is hereby granted," vest a present title in the State of Kansas, though a survey and a location are necessary to give precision to it, and attach it to any particular tract. After the location of the road the grant becomes certain, and by relation has the same effect upon the selected parcels as if they had been specially named at the date of the act; in other words, the grant was afloat until the line of the road should be definitely fixed, but Congress did not intend that this grant should reach the Osage lands further than to allow the company to construct its line of road through them; that the Indians have the right to the lands they occupy until that right shall be extinguished by a voluntary session to the government, and this right of occupancy is as sacred as the title of the United States to the fee. That this perpetual right of occupancy with the correlative obligation of the government to enforce it, negatives the idea that Congress even in the absence of any positive stipulation to protect the Indians, intended to grant their lands to a railroad company, either absolutely or cum onere. For all practical purposes the Osages owned the lands, as the actual right of possession, the only thing they deemed of value, was secured to them by the treaty of June 2, 1825, until they should elect to surrender it to the United States. In the free exercise of their choice they might occupy their lands forever, and whatever changed this condition or interfered with it, violated the guarantees under which they had lived since that date. Notwithstanding the length of this opinion, on account of its importance to a large number of our western readers, we publish it entire.

Public Policy — Action on Contract for Secret Service.—The opinion of the Supreme court of the United States by Field J., holding that an action cannot be maintained against the government in the court of claims upon a contract for secret services during the war, made between the president and the claimant. In delivering the opinion the court says, that public policy forbids the maintainance of any suit in a court of justice, the trial of which would inevitably lead to the disclosures of matters which the law itself regards as confidential, and respecting which it will not allow the confidence to be violated.

Stock Notes in Insolvent Insurance Companies.—The opinion of the United States Circuit court, Northern District of Illinois by Blodgett J., holding that a stockholder in an insurance company rendered insolvent by a fire, cannot escape his liability on a stock note by surrendering a certificate of indebtedness on one of the ajusted policies and withdrawing his note; that such a note constitutes a trust fund for the benefit of the creditors of the company and the transaction is in fact a conversion of the companies assets; that the stockholder must pay interest from the time of the withdrawal of the stock note.

A Non-Resident Attorney Cannot be Admitted to the Bar in Wisconsin.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of Wisconsin, by Ryan, C. J., holding that an attorney, residing in the State of Illinois, and only licensed by the Supreme Court of that State, cannot be admitted to the bar in Wisconsin. That no person but a resident of the State is entitled to receive license to practice law from the Supreme Court of Wisconsin. We have no doubt of the power of the legislature of a State to provide that a non-resident of the State may be admitted to its bar. And that when such a statute is passed, that it is the duty of all courts to follow it, no matter how high or learned they may be. We regard the doctrine as announced by Chief Justice Ryan, as dangerous; not because it excludes non-resident attorneys, or women, from the bar of Wisconsin, but because if followed it places the Supreme Court above the legislature, in all matters of practice. The legislature may pass statutes for the government of the court in matters of practice, and the court may follow them or not, as it pleases—as the court has done in this case. The legislature of Wisconsin has said: "It shall be the duty of any court of this State, upon application and proof aforesaid, to admit any attorney of the State of Illinois," etc. But Chief Justice Ryan says he won't do it. In this connection, we call attention to the comments of Mr. Mosness, upon this opinion, refusing him admission to the Wisconsin bar, on page 271 of this issue.

Bank Checks.—The opinion of the United States Circuit Court for the Western District of Wisconsin, by Hopkins, J., as to the rights, duties and obligations of the holders and drawers of bank checks. The court discusses whether the presentation of a check by mail is a valid presentation.

NOTES TO RECENT CASES.

THE STATE UNIVERSITY OF IOWA NOT A CORPORATION.

The Supreme court of Iowa in Weary et al. v. State University et al., 10 Western Jurist, 286, hold that the State University is not a corporation, but is the result of the legislative will, under the Constitution and is regulated and controlled like any other public institution of the State. Hence, a judgment against the university, if it were allowed, would be of no value.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—POWER TO ISSUE BONDS—RAILROAD.

The Supreme court of Iowa in Jefferies et al. v. Lawrence et al., 10 Western Jurist, 290, held where a city by its charter was authorized to subscribe stock to a railroad and pay for the same in its bonds, upon a vote of a majority of its citizens therefor, but after the citizens had voted to subscribe the stock and issue the bonds, a general law was passed by the legislature prohibiting all cities from subscribing stock, or issuing bonds therefor, that the general law pro tanto repealed the city charter and that after the general law took effect there was no power to issue the bonds and that no tax could be legally levied for the same. The authorities upon the question decided in this case are not all one way, in some cases holding that if the subscription is voted, the corporation may do all that is necessary to complete it after the passage of such a general law, that is if there is what amounts to an agreement to subscribe when the corporation has the power to subscribe. The subscription may be completed after the power has been taken from the corporation to subscribe.

The Supreme Court of the United States.—This tribunal adjourned for the term on Monday last, after being in session for seven months with only two recesses of ten or twelve days each. The business of this term has been greater than at any previous term. The number of cases on the docket was 973, of which only 330 have been disposed of. In 206 of these cases written opinions were delivered. There are now on the docket, undisposed of, 643 cases. The court adjourned with over a hundred more cases pending than at any previous term. The cases upon the docket of this court are continually increasing, and the question arises, what is to be done? The court does not meet until October. With over 600 cases now pending on its docket, it certainly does not look promising for any one having a case returnable to the October term, to get a hearing within any reasonable time. It often amounts to a complete denial of justice to have three or four years elapse before a case can be heard in a court of last resort. We do not believe that the bill now pending in Congress, if passed, would give the required relief. The best legal talent in the House and Senate should unite and perfect a bill that would enable parties to have their cases passed upon within a reasonable time by the Federal Supreme Court. For some reason or other, the federal courts have, in the last ten years, grown in popularity with the people. Points of law are often strained by suitors, and perjury committed in order to bring cases into these courts. They are less liable to be effected by local influences and prejudices. The jurors are selected from a larger extent of country; are generally men of greater experience, and better fitted to try cases than those selected in the State courts. The judges being appointed for life are more independent than they would be if they had to go before the people for re-election every four or six years.

A Deserved Compliment.—The Hon. John Wentworth in his lecture last Sunday, on the early history of Chicago, said that Judge Breese of the Supreme court of this State, knew more of the early history of the State of Illinois and the city of Chicago than any other living man.

The Practice on Appeals to the Supreme Court of Indiana; on Writs of Error from the Supreme Court of the United States to a State Court; on the Removal of Causes from State Courts to the Circuit Court of the United States; and a Complete Table of Cases Decided by the Supreme Court of Indiana, with Annotations Showing where any of such cases have been Cited, Distinguished, Criticised, Modified, Doubted or Overruled by Subsequent Decisions. By Samuel H. Buskirk, LL. D. Indianapolis: Jay V. Olds, Publisher. 1876.

The title of this volume states its contents. We have examined it with some care. It is absolutely indispensible for every Indiana lawyer, and will be found useful to the practitioner in States where a code prevails. A portion of the work is devoted to what is necessary to be done in the trial court to prepare a case for review in the Supreme Court. Another to the various modes of appealing a cause to the Supreme Court; and a third to the modes of procedure and rules of practice in such court. The practice in the courts of original jurisdiction has been examined only so far as was necessary to show how error must be made to appear upon the face of the record. A skeleton transcript is given for the purpose of showing what questions become a part of the record by force of the statute, and what must be made so by bill of exceptions or order of court. The chapters on writs of error from the Supreme Court of the United States to a State court, and on the removal of causes from a State court to a Circuit Court of the United States, will be of general interest to the bar. The recent decisions of the courts upon these questions, are cited. The table of cases will be useful to any person having a set of Indiana reports. The experience of Judge Buskirk upon the Supreme bench of the State, has fitted him for the preparation of such a work.

Referring Actions.—A very admirable practice (says the Law Times) is obtaining amongst solicitors in regard to the mode of referring actions. It is this: It being arranged to refer an action, say, to a professional man, agreed upon between the parties, a form of order of reference (sold, we believe, by Messrs. Evison & Bridge, the law stationers, in Chancery lane) is filled up and settled between the parties; this done, an order at chambers is—in the form arranged—drawn up in the usual way, thus avoiding the delay and expense of a summons to refer, and the disputes that often arise as to the form of the order to be made on such summons. We consider the plan is one which may well be universally adopted in such cases, as it enables solicitors to arrange the form of the order of reference, after taking their clients' instructions on all queries. When such matters are worked out by summons at chambers, much delay is often necessary before the parties can proceed.

The above, taken from the Public Opinion, is worthy of the consideration of our judges and law makers. If a proper law was passed, giving the courts power to assign cases to members of the bar for trial, without having first to get the consent of the parties. the judicial force we have would be ample, with the aid of the bar, to dispose of all cases within a reasonable time, and keep cases from accumulating on the dockets. With the legal talent in this country, justice ought to be administered without delay, It is all owing to our defective system that cases are allowed to remain on our dockets years, awaiting trial.

In the case of Musselman v. Musselman, in the Indiana Reports, vol. 44, p. 107, 1873, we find, among others, the two following head notes:

"Where it does not appear, on appeal, how smoking in court by the judge and attorneys prevented a party from having a fair trial, and the party assigning such conduct as a ground for a new trial does not appear to have objected to it, there is nothing for the Supreme court to consider in relation to such conduct."

"The assignment as a reason for a new trial, 'that the court erred in sleeping or sitting with his eyes closed during the reading of the written evidence on the part of the plaintiff at the trial of the cause,' is too vague and indefinite. If the judge were asleep, the party should have ceased reading or awakened him; if he sat merely with his eyes closed, it is presumed he did so to hear the more acutely."

XXIV. OHIO STATE REPORTS.

We are indebted to Robert Clark & Co., publishers, for advance sheets of the 24th volume of Ohio State Reports, from which we take the following head-notes:

DEDICATION OF STREET—REVOCATION.

The dedication of a street, as laid out on a town plat which is not executed in accordance with the statute, may, as against the corporation within which the land is situate, be revoked at any time before its acceptance by the corporation or by the public, notwithstanding lots laid out on the plat may have been sold; and a conveyance of the land in fee simple, by a deed of general warranty, operates, in law, as a revocation.—Village of Lockland v. Smiley, p. 94.

CONSOLIDATED RAILROAD COMPANIES—RATES.

Consolidated railroad companies, organized in pursuance of the act of April 10, 1856 (4 Curwen, 2791), are corporations formed under a general law, within the meaning of article 13, section 2, of the constitution of 1851, and as such are subject to the limitations and reservations contained in that section, and in article 1, section 2, of that instrument; and the general assembly has power to alter and regulate rates of fare chargeable by such companies.—Shields v. Ohio, page 90.

NATIONAL BANKS—INTEREST—PENALTY.

1. The knowingly taking or receiving by a national bank of a rate of interest greater than is allowed by law upon a loan of money, does not entitle the person paying the same to have it applied as a payment of so much of the principal, in an action brought to recover the principal debt more than two years after such payment was made.—Higley et al. v. First N. Bank of Beverly, p. 76.

2. The rights and liabilities of the parties in such case are prescribed in the national bank act, and cannot be controlled by State legislation.

3. Before judgment, the penalty allowed for the taking or receiving of usurious interest by a national bank does not bear interest.

ASSIGNMENTS—JUDGMENT LIENS.

Under section nine of the act regulating the mode of administering assignments in trust for the benefit of creditors, the priority of judgment liens is to be determined as the liens existed at the time the assignment took effect.—Scott et al. v. Dunn, p. 64.

PURCHASE OF MORTGAGE—INTEREST ON INTEREST.

1. Where one purchases land subject to a mortgage lien, and, as part of the consideration, agrees to pay the mortgage debt, he can not defend against the mortgage on the ground of usury.—Cramer v. Sepper et al., p. 60.

2. Under a contract for the payment of interest at a specified rate annually, upon default of payment, interest on the interest will be computed at six per cent.

CONTRACT FOR STREET IMPROVEMENT—PUBLICATION SHOULD BE IN A NEWSPAPER IN THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE.

1. A resolution of the city council awarding a contract for the improvement of a street, and directing the city auditor to enter into the contract with the bidder, is not a resolution of a "permanent or general nature," within the meaning of section 98 of the municipal code.—Cincinnati use, etc. v. Bicket et al., p. 49.

2. Where the preliminary ordinance for the improvement of street, and a subsequent ordinance assessing its cost upon abutting lots, are duly passed by concurrence of two-thirds of the members, it is not necessary, in order to constitute the work an improvement made by the concurrence of two-thirds of the members of such council within the meaning of section 540 of the municipal code, that two-thirds of such members should concur in the resolution awarding the contract to the successful bidder.

3. Where a statute of the State requires a publication to be made in a "newspaper," in the absence of any provision to the contrary, a paper published in the English language is to be understood as intended, and a publication in a paper printed in any other language, is not a compliance with the statute.

4. In cases under section 550 of the municipal code, where the court is authorized to render judgment against the defendant notwithstanding defects or irregularities in the proceedings of council in making an assessment for improvement, the sum "properly chargeable" against the defendant, and for which such judgment should be rendered, is not the amount of benefits accruing to him from the improvement, but that portion of the entire assessment which would have been chargeable to him, had the assessment been legally made.

5. In order to exempt abutting lots from assessment for construction of a sewer, on the ground that they are "already provided" with drainage, as specified in section 613 of the municipal code, it is not enough to show that an ordinance was passed years ago, but never carried into execution, authorizing the construction of other sewers for the drainage of such lots.

POWER TO DISMISS CHIEF OF DEPARTMENT—MANDAMUS.

Under the act of March 21, 1874 (71 Ohio L. 38), the board of fire commissioners is invested with power to dismiss for cause, members of the department; and having removed the chief of the department for incompetency, it can not be compelled by mandamus to restore him to his former position.—Ohio ex rel. Hill v. The B. of F. Com. of Cleveland, p. 24.

SUPREME COURT OF TENNESSEE.

Head notes to recent opinions from the Commercial and Legal Reporter:

JACKSON, SEPT. TERM, 1875.

Mary Routon v. Louisville & Nashville R. R. Co.

RAILROAD: SPECIAL PRECAUTIONS AGAINST ACCIDENTS.—Where the proof showed that there was no reversing of the engine in addition to the other precautions used to stop the train, because the danger apprehended therefrom was that of being thrown from the track and destroying human life on board; held, that the statutes intend that this is one of the means to be resorted to only when it can be done with safety. The protection of property is a secondary consideration, the paramount object of our rigid statutes being the protection of human life.

NASHVILLE, APRIL 1, 1876.

EVIDENCE: HEREDITARY INSANITY.—The question of the prisoner's insanity being before the court, it was error to refuse to permit an inquiry into the mental condition of any of his immediate family.

STATEMENT OF EXPECTED PROOF.—Where the materiality of the proof proposed to be made was evident, it is not required to state the purport of the answer of the witness to show its materiality.

WITNESS.—The court having refused to permit a question to be answered by the first witness examined, it was not necessary, and would have been improper, for the counsel to have asked the question of any other witness.

LARCENY: PROOF OF OWNERSHIP.—There must be proof showing a property, either general or special, in the person charged in the indictment to be the owner of the property stolen.

The State v. James Williams.

April 5, 1876.

ASSAULT WITH INTENT TO COMMIT MANSLAUGHTER: INDICTMENT.—Manslaughter being a felony in this State, an attempt to commit manslaughter is an offense; and an indictment for an assault with intent to commit manslaughter is good under § 4630 of the Code.

AGENCY—POWERS PRIMA FACIE INCIDENT TO EVERY ASCERTAINED AUTHORITY.

MEANS JUSTIFIED BY THE USAGES OF TRADE.

The rule that an agent is empowered to use all the ordinary means justified by the usages of trade in executing his authority, was well established long anterior to the decision of the King's Bench in Sutton v. Tatham (10 Ad. & E. 27) in 1839. The defendant there had employed the plaintiffs as brokers, to sell 250 shares in a company. On the day after receiving authority they sold 109 shares, and on the following day 100 more. On the latter day, but after the sale, the defendant told the plaintiffs that he had made a mistake and intended to sell only fifty shares, and was informed that the sales could not be made void. The defendant left the matter in the hands of the plaintiffs to do the best they could. By the rules and usages of the Stock Exchange, if upon a sale of this description, the vendor was not prepared to complete his contract, the purchaser may buy the requisite number of shares, and the vendor is bound to make up the loss, if any, resulting from a difference in prices. The purchaser having bought at a loss, the broker paid the difference and then sued in assumpsit for money paid. At the trial Lord Denman thought that the principal was liable, but he left it to the jury to say whether the bargain for the loss on the second purchase was made within a reasonable time after the mistake was discovered. The jury found for the plaintiff. A motion for a new trial on the ground of misdirection was refused by the full court. The defendant relied chiefly upon the case of Child v. Morley (8 T. Rep. 610). But it is clear from the remarks of Lord Kenyon that the broker had a cause of action, though there were doubts as to the form in which it should be tried. His Lordship having made some severe remarks upon the nature of the defence set up, continued: "But I cannot perceive what benefit the defendant can propose to himself by such conduct; for the court have no doubt but that at all events the verdict must stand for the £12 10s., the amount of the plaintiff's commission as broker;" but as to the rest of the claim, there is a difficulty in the form of action; and perhaps it would have been better framed ex delicto than ex contractu. In Sutton v. Tatham (sup.), Littledale, J., laid down the rule in general terms: "A person who employs a broker must be supposed to give him authority to act as other brokers do. It does not matter whether or not he himself is acquainted with the rules by which brokers are governed." The former decision does not appear to have been at all discussed by the learned judges. Taking it in its widest extent, it is only an authority limiting the scope of the action of assumpsit.

In Taylor v. Stray (2 C. B., N. S., 175), Willes, J., traces the rule applicable to such cases to the rule which pervades the whole law of principal and agent, namely, that the principal is bound to indemnify the agent against the consequences of all acts done by him in pursuance of the authority conferred upon him. The court decided that the defendant, by directing the plaintiffs to purchase shares, necessarily gave them authority to pay for them according to the rules of the Stock Exchange.

Smith v. Lindo (5 C. B., N. S. 587), decided in 1858, presents some new features. The plaintiff, though he was not duly licensed, assumed to act as broker (in London) in the purchase of shares for the defendant, and had been obliged to pay to the seller the price of the shares by the usage of the share market. There was nothing to show that the payment was made in pursuance of any illegal contract, nor was it a necessary part of the duty of a broker as such to pay the money. The plaintiff brought an action for the amount paid by him on behalf of the principal, and for commission. At the trial a verdict was found for the plaintiff, and the Court of Common Pleas afterwards held that, although the plaintiff was, by the 6 Anne, c. 16, rendered incapable of suing for commission by reason of his not being duly licensed as a broker, yet that he might recover from his principal the price which, pursuant to a usage of the share market, he had been obliged to pay to the person from whom he purchased, the statute of Anne not making the contract void, but merely precluding the unlicensed broker from recovering any remuneration from his services in making it. The defendant's appeal from this decision was heard in the Exchequer Chambers before Wightman, Erle, Crompton, and Hill, J. J., and Martin, Bramwell, and Watson, BB. The decision of the court below was upheld, Crompton, J. alone dissenting, on the ground that the payment of the commission and the repayment of the money paid, both stand on the same footing. The view of the majority is supported by the decision of the Court of Exchequer in Pidgeon v. Burslem (3 Ex. 470). It is certainly the more just one.

With this decision may be compared the more recent case of Rosewarne v. Billing (15 C. B., N. S., 316; 33 L. J. 55, C. P.) The plaintiff sued the defendant for money alleged to be paid for the defendant at his request. To this the defendant pleaded that the money became due by reason of certain wagering contracts made by the plaintiff for the defendant with certain other persons since the passing of the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109. To this the plaintiff demurred. Judgment was given for the plaintiff. "Now," said Chief Justice Erle, "the law as to gaming contracts is that all such contracts are null and void, and no action can be maintained upon them. But they are not therefore illegal. The parties making them are not liable to any action or to any penalties. . . . I am clearly of opinion that if a man loses a wager, and gets another to pay the money for him, an action lies for the recovery of the money so paid." This is consistent with Jessopp v. Sutwyche (10 Ex. 614), and Knight v. Chambers (15 C. B. 562). The effect of these cases, and others of the like kind, is that an agent's authority to act for his principal may be implied in any case where there is no illegality proved.

The law is now well settled that when a contract for the purchase and sale of shares has been entered into between individuals through their respective brokers, or with the intervention, as purchasers or their sellers, of jobbers, members of the Stock Exchange, the lawful usages and rules of the Stock Exchange are incorporated into, and become part and parcel of all such contracts, and the rights and liabilities of individuals, parties to any such contracts, are determined by the operation upon the contracts of these rules and usages. (Per Kelly, C. B., in Browning v. Shepherd, 7 L. Rep. Q. B. 309; Grissell v. Bristowe, 4 L. Rep. C. P., 36; Coles v. Bristowe, 4 L. Rep. Ch. 3.)

But although the authority of an agent prima facie includes an authority to act in accordance with established and reasonable usage, yet such authority will not be extended to cases where the agent is compelled to make a payment in the course of his agency by reason of a default of his own. In Duncan v. Hill (6 L. Rep. Ex. 255; 8 L. Rep. Ex. 242), finally decided in 1873, the defendant, (who was not a member of the Stock Exchange) instructed the plaintiffs (brokers on the Stock Exchange) to buy certain shares for him for the account of July 15th, 1870. On that day, acting upon his instructions, the plaintiffs carried the shares over to the account of July 29, and paid differences amounting to £1688. The plaintiffs subsequently became defaulters, and on the 18th were declared defaulters, and their transactions were closed in conformity with the rules of the Stock Exchange. The accounts were made up at the prices current on the 18th, without the knowledge of or any reference to the defendant. The result was that the sum due, including the £1688, upon the whole transaction was £6013 13s. 5d. For the plaintiffs it was argued that a defaulting broker has no right to avail himself of a usage regulating the mode of dealing with defaulters in order to fix his principal with an additional liability. The court below, accepting the principle (Grissell v. Bristowe, L. Rep. 3, C. P. 112; L. Rep. 4, C. P. 36; and Maxted v. Paine, L. Rep. 4, Ex. 203; L. Rep. 6, Ex. 132) that the whole of the usages and practice of the Stock Exchange were imported into the contract, thought that the plaintiffs had authority to bind the defendant, that the defendant being the real purchaser was so identified with the plaintiffs, his agents, as to be liable to the performance of the contract made in all its incidents, and with all its consequences, and that he was accordingly liable for any result due to the operation of those rules of the Stock Exchange, which operated only in cases of default by the agent. This decision is open to the serious objection that it makes a plaintiff liable to the agent for losses which are directly due, not to the execution of the agency, but to a default on the part of the agent. The Court of Exchequer Chamber, consisting of Blackburn, Keating, Grove, Brett, Quain, Archibald, and Honyman, JJ., unanimously reversed the judgment of the court below upon that ground alone. The result is that a principal is bound to indemnify his agent for losses incurred by the latter, by the operation of an acknowledged usage or custom, unless the usage is unreasonable, or unless the loss is incurred by a default of the agent himself, as in this case, by reason of his insolvency. "It is argued," said Blackburn, J., in delivering the judgment of the court, "that where the agent, as in this case, is subjected to loss, not by reason of his having entered into the contracts into which he was authorized to enter by his principal, but by reason of his insolvency, brought on by want of means to meet his other primary obligations, it cannot be said that he has suffered loss by reason of his having entered into the contracts made by him on behalf of his principal, and consequently there is no promise which can be implied on the part of his principal to indemnify him. . . These allegations, both as to fact and law, seem to us to be correct." A curious circumstance in both the arguments and judgment is that no case was cited in support of the principle upon which the decision was based —London Law Times.

MR. MOSNESS ON JUDGE RYAN'S OPINION.

MRS. MYRA BRADWELL, Editor LEGAL NEWS, City:

Dear Madam: Since the application of Miss Goodell, of Janesville, for admission to the bar of the Supreme Court of Wisconsin, it seems that Chief Justice Ryan has thought it necessary to take the position that the legislature has not the power to provide who may practice in "his" court, or the legislature of Wisconsin might enact a law expressly providing for the admission of women in that State. The chapter referred to in the opinion herewith enclosed, provides as follows: "Any person who has been duly admitted and licensed to practice as an attorney and counsellor at law in the Supreme Court of the State of Illinois, and all other States in the Union where counsel of this State are admitted as counsel of such State, on the same terms hereinafter prescribed, shall be admitted and licensed to practice as an attorney and counselor at law in all the courts of this State, upon written application signed by such person, and upon presenting to such court proof that he has been so admitted to practice in the Supreme Court of Illinois, and all other States in the Union where counsel of this State are admitted as counsel of such State, on the same terms hereinafter prescribed, and an affidavit of good moral character, and that he is a resident of said State of Illinois." Taylor's (Wis.) Statutes, p. 1,344, § 39.

"It shall be the duty of any court of this State, upon application and proof aforesaid, to admit any attorney of the State of Illinois, and all other States," etc., etc. Ibid., p. 1,345, § 40. I was informed by several members of the bar of the court of which the learned Chief Justice is a member, that attorneys had habitually been admitted under this act, and that I was the first attorney whose motion had been denied, and it was generally supposed that Miss Goodell's case was the cause which actuated the court now for the first time to disregard the plain provision of the statute. Whether women ought or ought not to practice law I do not care to consider, but if the court was influenced in its opinion by motives founded on prejudice against women in the practice of law, it manifests a weakness inconsistent with the long-recognized ability of the learned Chief Justice who delivered the opinion. If the court continue to concede the power of the legislature as to this act, it must of course do so as to the other acts providing for the admission of attorneys, and hence the supposition that this opinion is a warning to the legislature of that State that an act providing for the admission of women to the bar, if attempted, will be unavailable.

Respectfully,
O. MOSNESS.

LADY LAWYERS IN LONDON.

I know of two lady-students of law. They are English women, living in London. They have chambers in Chancery Lane, these girls of the period; their names are on the door, flanked by those of legal gentlemen in the same house. They are installed in a large room, with the usual clerk's office, and they were, when I visited them, poring over massive volumes, each with a solemn reading-lamp before her. There was an abundance of green baize in the room, (green baize seems to be as necessary to lawyers as red tape is to governments,) and there were huge inkstands and formidable quill pens, like those which figure at the signing of a contract on the stage. The book-shelves were, of course, a store of legal wisdom, and, foremost among the treasures, there was a comprehensive edition of Blackstone, upon which my learned friends prided themselves greatly. These legal ladies were very simply dressed—one in gray, the other in black—and were thoroughly bent on abjuring the frivolities of womanhood and working like men. Now, I not being "a man"—or woman—"of the law, that have my tongue to sell for silver or favor of the world," as John Knox has said, could not see at first what work these ladies could do, since as yet they are not barristers or solicitors. But they assured me that as conveyancers they did not find time hang heavily on their hands; that they had as much work to do as they could possibly achieve; and their only fear was that when it was discovered how lucrative their branch of the legal profession might be, numbers of women would be anxious to join in it, and that Chancery Lane might thus be invaded by the gentler sex, its courts and passages ever echoing the rustle of feminine petticoats and the ripple of feminine laughter.

By the time, however, such progress is made, as that I have indicated, petticoats will have ceased to distinguish feminine humanity, and may have been relegated to men! In fact, one might almost think that men were forewarned of their doom as regards costume, and, in anticipation of the time when women shall wear trousers, are accustoming themselves to the skirts of an Ulster—that the transition may not be too complete. I am not as afraid of an overflow of legal ladies as are my friends the conveyancers, however, who have reached their present position, not only because they are clever women, but because they are more clever than the average young man. Each of them has taken signal honors, one of them having won prizes for jurisprudence and political economy over the heads of male students, while the other was far advanced in the study of medicine, when she was persuaded to turn her attention to law, and enter into partnership with the political economist. Such women as these are rare, it must be owned; and I may add that I think the qualities that go to make a clever lawyer are especially rare in women.

Logical acuteness, impassibility that is unmoved by sentiment and appearances, and strict impartiality are surely requisite in legal workers, yet, in these three qualities women are conspicuously deficient; and though several eminent judges have differed from me, and though I heartily wish to uphold the women who attempt to break away from the old conventional restrictions that forbade them to do more than mix a pudding and make a pinafore, I cannot think that the woolsack is the truest and most fitting feminine ideal. A due course of serious reading and thinking will not, depend upon it, interfere with, but rather improve upon, the mixing of the pudding and the sewing of the pinafore; but every woman who can read and thinks i not fit for one of the liberal professions, any more than the girl who has indulged in gymnastic exercises and school drill is fit to be a soldier.—Home Journal.

REMOVAL OF MR. KETTELLE FROM PEORIA TO CHICAGO—ADDITION TO THE CHICAGO BAR.—George H. Kettelle, late of the Peoria bar, has removed from that city to Chicago. At a meeting of the Peoria bar held on last Saturday, Wellington Loucks occupied the chair, and R. S. Bibb acted as secretary. The committee appointed at a previous meeting to draft resolutions relative to the proposed departure of Mr. Kettelle to Chicago, reported the following preamble and resolutions which were unanimously adopted:

WHEREAS, George H. Kettelle, Esq., a member of the bar of our city, is about to remove to Chicago to practice his profession, therefore,

Resolved, That having known Mr. Kettelle for a long period of time, and having always recognized the sterling integrity, ability and indefatigable energy which have made him not only one of the distinguished members of our bar, but also one of our most valued citizens, we deeply regret his intended departure from us, but trust that in his new field of labor his efforts will be rewarded with prosperity and success.

Resolved, That the secretary of this meeting furnish a copy of the foregoing preamble and resolutions to Mr. Kettelle, and also to the daily papers of Peoria, the Chicago Legal News and the Legal Adviser, with a request for the publication of the same.

Remarks relative to the occasion were made by Messrs. J. S. Lee, Thos. Cratty, A. C. Hewett, J. S. Starr, M. C. Quinn, E. G. Johnson, J. W. Cochran, Josiah Cratty, and Wellington Loucks.

Mr. George H. Kettelle responded with appropriate remarks, after which the meeting adjourned.

We understand Mr. Kettelle intends entering into a co-partnership with the Hon. W. W. O'Brien, formerly of Peoria.

UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT.

PROCEEDINGS OF.

VALIDITY OF BONDS.

710. Marcy v. Township of Oswego. Error to the Circuit Court for the District of Kansas. In this case, plaintiff sued on a number of bonds belonging to a series of $100,000 issued by the township, claiming that they were issued regularly in pursuance of the provisions of the statute authorizing them. The question was, therefore, whether in such a case, brought by a bona fide holder, for value, it could be shown, as defense, that at the time of voting and issuing the series of bonds the value of taxable property of the township was not in amount sufficient to authorize the voting and issuing of the whole series. It is held that the recital of the bonds that they were executed and issued by virtue of and in accordance with the act of the legislature of the State, was sufficient to charge the township, and the defense is not sustained. Justice Strong delivered the opinion. Justice Miller read a dissent, in which Justices Davis and Field concurred.

Under this decision, it would seem no matter what may be the limitations placed upon a municipal corporation as to the issuing of bonds, either by the Constitution or the statute; if the corporation does issue bonds in excess of he amount allowed by law, and it is recited in the bonds that they are issued in accordance with the provisions of the law, and they are in the hands of an innocent holder, that such corporation is helpless, and can make no defense to such bonds.

COTTON CLAIM.

908. United States v. Raymond, assignee in bankruptcy of Maybin and 12 other cases. Appeals from Court of Claims. These are a number of cases in which the identity of captured cotton was lost and property of different owners could not be traced. Much of the cotton was taken for military or defensive purposes in the siege of Vicksburg, and much of it was stolen, destroyed and lost after the surrender of Vicksburg. All that was of any value was collected aud became intermingled, and was stored in a common mass. In this condition it was forwarded and sold by treasury agents. The court affirms the judgment of the court of claims, sustaining the creation of a fund out of that money realized for cotton and distributing it among claimants, as a fund in trust for that purpose, upon their establishing their claims and affirming the propriety of the appointment of a commissioner to pass upon accounts presented. The Chief Justice delivered the opinion.

RAILWAY BONDS.

190. Chamberlain v. The Sioux City Railway Company, Southern Minnesota Railroad Company et al. Where land is conveyed to the State by the corporation as indemnity against losses on her bonds loaned to it, bondholders have no equity for the application of land payment bonds which can be enforced against the State, and her grantees take the property discharged of any claim of the bondholders. Affirmed. Justice Field delivered the opinion.

CUSTOMS DUTIES.

207. Barney, collector, v. Watson, etc. Error to Circuit Court for Southern District of New York. In this case, importers paid an ad valorem duty on certain flannels without protest, but afterward when the collector enacted a specific duty on the same goods, a protest was served, but not until the department had sustained the collector on the trial. The verdict was nearly twice the amount of the specific duty enacted, as to which excess there was no protest. The court hold that there can be no recovery except as to the amount required for the protestant. Reverse judgment. Justice Bradley delivered the opinion.

PATENTS.

215. Breckendorre v. Faber. Error to Circuit Court for Southern District of New York. This was a bill filed to restrain the alleged inf.ingement by Faber of an improvement in lead pencils, consisting in the construction of a pencil enlarged and recessed at one end for the reception of an eraser. The decision is that in the construction of the pencil patented, there is no new result in the combination of lead eraser which will make the improvement claimed patentable. It is also held that the decision of the commissioner of patents on the question whether the improvement or invention is patentable is not final, but will be reviewed by the courts. Affirmed. Justice Hunt delivered the opinion. Justice Strong dissented as to the patentability of the improvement.

DEPARTMENT CONTRACT.

937. Garfelde v. The United States. Appeal from Court of Claims. It is here held that the proposal or bid made in pursuance of the department advertisement and its acceptance by the department, creates a contract of the same force and effect as if a formal contract had been written out and signed by the parties. The Court of Claims, however, held that the contract in this case was invalid because the schedule of time was not given in the department notice. It is here said that the distance being given, the number of trips per month to be made, and the time of arrival and departure given, the notice was sufficient to sustain the contract, and valid. Justice Hunt delivered the opinion.

INSURANCE.

222. Franklin Fire Insurance Company of Philadelphia v. Vaughan. Error to Circuit Court of Arkansas. In this case it is said that in seeking to recover the amount insured upon his goods, destroyed by fire, the insured was bound to prove only his policy, his loss and service or preliminary proofs. Defense was that insured was not absolute owner of the property, because it was not paid for in full, and was not to be removed from the place where it was purchased until the balance of purchase money was paid. The court find that there was no claim of the vender to any ownership of the property, and that there was nothing in the circumstances stated to defeat the policy. Justice Hunt delivered the opinion.

NO JURISDICTION.

213. New York Life Insurance Company v. Henderson. Error to Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. In this case it is said the pleading, as well as instructions asked and refused, present questions of general law alone, and no Federal question was involved. Dismissed for want of jurisdiction. The Chief Justice delivered the opinion; dissenting, Mr. Justice Bradley.

CRIMINAL REWARD.

223. Shaey, executor of St. Marie, v The United States. Appeal from Court of Claim. In this case, court agree with the Court of Claims that the claim of St. Marie for $15,000 for services in apprehending Suratt, did not entitle him to the reward. The giving of information which led to the arrest, say the court, and the act of making it are distinct things, and were so recognized in the proclamation offering the reward. Affirmed. Justice Swayne delivered the opinion.

COTTON—CONFEDERATE STATES—CONTRACT.

198. Whitfield v. The United States. Appeal from Court of Claims. In this case it is held that cotton sold to the Confederate States during the war, by a resident of Alabama, he receiving confederate bonds in payment, passed to the Confederate States and became their property, liable to capture and confiscation by the government. Nor did it affect the transfer that the Confederate States afterwards became insolvent. The contract was executed before insolvency, and completed sales in such cases will be enforced, although contracts of sale in aid of rebellion would not be. The Chief Justice delivered the opinion.

WAR CLAIMS.

176. The United States v. Deckleman. Appeal from Court of Claims. This was a claim for damage by a Prussian subject for detention of the ship Essex at New Orleans by military authorities, in September, 1862. The substance of the decision is that by going to New Orleans the Essex subjected herself to the operation of martial law, and must be content. She went there for gain, and voluntarily assumed all chances of the war into whose presence she came. The Chief Justice delivered the opinion.

DECREES AFFIRMED.

205. A. H. Hammond et al., appellants, v. Mason & Hamlin Organ Company. Appeal from the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Massachusetts. Justice Miller delivered the opinion of the court, affirming the decree of the Circuit court with costs.

195. Jacob Magee and Henry Hall, plaintiffs in error, v. Manhattan Life Insurance Company. In error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of Alabama. Mr. Justice Swayne delivered the opinion of the court, affirming the judgment of said Circuit court in this cause, with costs and interest.

78. Charles R. Tyng et al, plaintiffs in error, v. Moses H. Grinnel. In error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of New York. Mr. Justice Clifford delivered the opinion of the court, affirming the judgment of said Circuit court in this cause with costs.

PROPELLER GALATEA.

211. Frederick Robert et al., appellants, v. Propeller Galatea, etc. Appeal from the Circuit court for the Southern District of New York. Mr. Justice Clifford delivered the opinion of the court, reversing the decree of the Circuit court with costs and remanding the cause with directions to enter a decree affirming the decree of the District court.

CAMDEN AND AMBOY RAILROAD.

219. Steam ferry-boat America, etc., Appellants, v. Camden & Amboy Railroad and Transportation Company. Appeal from the Circuit Court for the Southern District of New York. Justice Clifford delivered the opinion of the court, reversing the decree of the Circuit court, with costs, and remanding the cause for further proceedings, in conformity with the opinion of the court.

No. 900. Michael McStay et al., v. Joseph S. Friedeman. In error to the Supreme Court of California. Waite, C. J., delivered the opinion, dismissing the writ of Error for the want of jurisdiction.

AMENDMENTS TO RULES.

Amendments to rules were adopted as follows:

Add at the end of paragraph 3, rule 6: There may be united with a motion to dismiss a writ of error to a State court, a motion to affirm on the ground that although the record may show that this court has jurisdiction, it is manifest the writ was taken for delay only, or that the question on which the jurisdiction depends is so frivolous as not to need further argument.

Add to rule 10, paragraph 1, so that it will read as follows: In all cases the plaintiff in error, or appellant, (on docketing a case and filing the record), shall enter into an undertaking to the clerk with security to his satisfaction, for the payment of his fees, or otherwise satisfy him in that behalf.

Paragraph 6, change so that it will read as follows: In all cases of dismissal for want of jurisdiction, the fees for the copy shall be taxed against the party bringing the case into court, unless the court shall otherwise direct.

Adjourned to the time and place appointed by law.

The court adjourned on Monday, May 8th. for the term.

In a case that came before the magistrates at Willenhall, a report of which will be found elsewhere, the question was raised as to whether an innkeeper can be fined for being drunk on his own licensed premises. The magistrates decided the case on the ground that the drunkenness was not proved; but they intimated their opinion that the case was not within the Act. The exact words of sect. 12 of 35 and 36 Vict., c. 94, are: "Every person found drunk in any highway or other public place, whether a building or not, or on any licensed premises, shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding 10s.," &c. This would certainly include the landlord in the letter, if not in the intention; and we find a case, decided by some Yorkshire magistrates, mentioned in Wharton's Law Relating to Innkeepers, p. 81, in which a landlord was fined under this section, having been found drunk in bed in his inn by a police officer. That the landlord's private room, even after closing hours, comes within the term "licensed premises," is shown by the case of Patten v. Rhymer, (29 L. J., 189, M. C.), where it was held that an innkeeper is guilty of permitting gaming within the licensed premises, who allows his own private friends to play at cards for money in his own private room; and this was followed in Hare v. Osborne, 34 L. T. Rep. N. S. 294.—The London Law Times.

AN OLD STATUTE.—A case came before vice chancellor Hall, the other day, in which a tenant for life under a settlement had disappeared, and the reversioners, under a statute passed in the reign of Queen Anne, moved that the tenant for life should be produced at the door of the new church at Chingford, Essex. The vice chancellor, after saying that his jurisdiction had not been taken away by the Judicature Act, granted the application, and directed that the wife of the tenant for life should produce her husband one month after service of the order.

It seems strange to us Americans that an English vice chancellor should at this time consider that old statute in force, and order a wife to produce her husband at a church door within thirty days from the date of the order. If this statute is in force in England, is it not in force here? We suppose, however, that our judges would hold it is not applicable to this country.

MR. ANDREW P. CALLAGHAN, of the law book publishing house of Callaghan & Company, of this city, leaves to-day for the east, to be gone about three weeks. He will visit the law publishing houses of Albany, New York, Philadelphia, Boston, Baltimore and Washington. Mr. Callaghan is an energetic western business man, and our eastern publishers will do well if they succeed in infusing some of his spirit into their enterprises. The success of this house is wonderful. There is but one larger publishing house in the United States.

THE whisky trials have again commenced in this district. D. Munn, former supervisor, is being tried for conspiracy to defraud the government out of its revenue. He is being ably defended by Colonel Ingersoll. Mr. Ayer, in his opening for the government, stated a very strong case. Will the proof sustain the statement.

JUST as we go to press, we learn of the death of Major James Brown, of the law firm of Brown & Mosness, of this city, at his residence, at 8 o'clock this morning, after an illness of about ten days.

A SUNDAY QUESTION IN BALTIMORE.—An exchange says: A case was decided in Baltimore, on Saturday, which will be interesting to members of clubs, whose wont it is to frequent their club-houses at different times during the week, including Sunday, for social purposes. Four clubs of this character were recently presented in Baltimore for violating the Sunday liquor law, the question before the court being whether it was a violation of the law for these clubs to supply, on their own premises, their members and regular inmates with wines, liquors and meals on Sundays, as well as on days. Judge Gilmor took the view that the clubs in question had not violated the law, and consequently gave a verdict in their favor; saying that the object of the Sunday law was to prevent business traffic on Sunday, whereas in the club-houses there are no barter and sale, no profits as inducements to membership, nor any business relations, but rather retirement from business pursuits.

UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT.

Nos. 557 and 558.—OCTOBER TERM, 1875.

W. S. GILMAN, N. A. COWDRY, LUTHER C. CLARK and HENRY A. BARLING, Appellants,
557. v.
THE ILLINOIS & MISSISSIPPI TELEGRAPH COMPANY, THE DES MOINES VALLEY RAILROAD COMPANY, and Others.

Appeal from the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Iowa.

H. COYKENDALL, Garnishee, Plaintiff in Error.
558. v.
THE ILLINOIS & MISSISSIPPI TELEGRAPH COMPANY.

In Error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Iowa.

GARNISHEE—THE EARNINGS OF AN INSOLVENT R. R. CO. — RIGHTS OF THE MORTGAGOR TO THE RENT OR EARNINGS OF THE MORTGAGED PROPERTY—PRACTICE.

1. The garnishee asked for further time to produce evidence. The case having been submitted to the court and argued by the counsel of both parties, the garnishee not having asked for a jury, the record in this respect shows no error. It is to be taken that both parties waived a jury, and they are to be bound accordingly.

2. POWER TO EXAMINE RULING.—That the proceeding not having been according to the act of March 3, 1865, this court has no power to examine any ruling of the court below, excepted to during the progress of the trial.

3. DISCRETION OF THE COURT.—That if this queston was before the court in such a shape that it could consider it, it would be a conclusive answer that the matter was one resting in the discretion of the court.

4. RIGHTS OF MORTGAGOR TO EARNINGS.—That in the suit for foreclosure and sale in the State court by the mortgagees in the second mortgage, those in the first having been made parties, and that mortgage thus brought before the court, that court had full jurisdiction as to the rights of the parties touching both instruments; that it would have been competent for the court, upon a proper showing, to appoint a receiver and clothe him with the duty of taking charge of the road, and receiving its earnings, with such limit of time as it might see fit to prescribe. When the final decree was made, a receiver might have been appointed and required to receive all the income and earnings until the sale was made and confirmed and possession delivered over to the vendee; that it is clearly implied in these mortgages that the railroad company should have possession and receive the earnings until the mortgagees should take possession, or the proper judicial authority should interpose. Possession draws after it the right to receive and apply the income. In this case the whole fund belonged to the company, and was liable to its creditors, as if the mortgages did not exist.—ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

Mr. Justice SWAYNE delivered the opinion of the court.

These cases have been argued together and will be decided together. The case last mentioned will be first considered.

On the 24th of May, 1872, the telegraph company recovered in the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Iowa, a judgment for the sum of $23,734.04 and costs. On the 13th of June following execution was issued. The marshal to whom the process was directed, on the 16th of that month, served it by attaching as garnishees several persons, one of whom was Coykendall, the plaintiff in error. On the 27th of October, 1873, he filed his answer, and on the 27th of October, 1874, he filed a further answer.

By the first answer he admitted that since he was garnisheed he had received for, and paid over to the railroad company more than $37,000. In his second answer he set forth that he was the agent of the railroad company at Des Moines, and that his duties were to sell tickets and receive and ship freight, and to receive the charges upon such freight. For the moneys received both for tickets and freight, a large proportion belonged to other companies, but how much he did not know. All the moneys he received were regularly transmitted to the assistant treasurer of the Des Moines company.

The proper apportionment of the moneys was made by the officers of that company at Keokuk, and the Des Moines company was accountable to the other companies for what belonged to them. He was not in the employment of any other company or person during the time mentioned, and was not responsible to any other company or person for the moneys which he received, as before stated.

The gross amount received by him, between the time he was garnisheed and the appointment of the receiver who took possession of the road, was $27,000.

The case was submitted to the court, and argued by the counsel upon both sides The next day it was stated to the court by the counsel for the defendant, that proof could be adduced of the proportion of the moneys in question which belonged to other companies, and time was asked to procure it. The application was overruled, and the court gave judgment for $27,000 and costs. The garnishee thereupon excepted to the ruling of the court, refusing further time.

The case having been submitted to the court and argued by the counsel of both parties, the garnishee not asking for a jury, the record in this respect shows no error. It is to be taken that both parties waived a trial by jury, and they are bound accordingly. Phillips v. Preston, 5 How., 278; Campbell v. Boyreau, 21 How., 224; Kelsey v. Forsythe, Id., 86. The proceeding not having been acccording to the act of March 3, 1865, this court has no power to examine any ruling of the court below excepted to during the progress of the trial. Campbell v. Boyreau, supra; Guild and others v. Fontin, 18 How., 135; Kearney v. Case, 12 Wall., 275; Dickenson v. The Planters' Bank, 16 Id., 241. The only point attempted to be presented by the bill of exceptions was the refusal of the court to give time for the production of further evidence. If this subject was before us in such a shape that we could consider it, it would be a conclusive answer that the matter was one resting in the discretion of the court. Its determination, therefore, could not be reviewed by this tribunal.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

This brings us to the examination of the case in equity.

The bill was filed to prevent, by injunction, the collection of the moneys upon which the judgment in favor of the telegraph companies was founded. There is no controversy between the parties as to the facts.

On the 16th of February, 1857, the railroad company, by its then corporate name, executed a mortgage, and on the 1st of October, 1868, by its corporate name as altered, executed another. Both were given to secure the payment of its bonds, as set forth. A part of the premises described and pledged by both mortgages, besides the road, was its income.

In case of default in the payment of interest or principal the mortgagees were authorized to take possession and collect and receive the income and earnings of the road and apply them to the debt secured, and upon the request of one-third of the bondholders to sell the mortgaged premises.

The conditions of both mortgages having been broken the mortgagees in the second mortgage filed their bill of foreclosure in the Circuit court of Polk county, in the State of Iowa. The mortgagees in the second mortgage, various judgment and lien creditors, among the former the telegraph company, were made defendants. On the 31st of May, 1873, a decree of foreclosure and sale was rendered. It fixed the priorities of the several parties, and held that the judgment of the telegraph company was a lien subject to the mortgage in suit and other specified liens. It ordered a sale of the mortgaged property. The road was still in possession of the company. The decree made no provision for disturbing their possession, and none whatever as to the income of the road between the time of the decree and the time of the sale. The telegraph company proceeded, as we have stated, in disposing of the case at law. On the 20th of June, 1873, the appellants, who are the trustees in the two mortgages, filed this bill. On the 9th of September, 1873, after the sheriff had advertised the mortgaged premises for sale, the decree in the State court was amended by providing for the appointment of "a special receiver of all the income and earnings of the road" between the date of the decree and the time fixed by the sheriff for the sale to be made by him. This was done with a saving of the rights of the telegraph company. The special receiver took possession on the 15th of September, 1873. The sale by the sheriff was made on the 17th of October, 1873. The road was operated by the company up to the time when the receiver took possession.

During this period the fund was received for which judgment was given against Coykendall.

The proceedings in the case at law having been held valid, the telegraph company is entitled to the fund in controversy, unless the appellants have shown a better right to it. The question arises upon the mortgages. The civil law is the springhead of the English jurisprudence upon the subject of these securities. Originally, according to that jurisprudence, mortgages of the class to which those here in question belong, vested the fee, subject to be divested by the discharge of the debt at the day limited for its payment. If default was then made the premises were finally lost to the debtor. In the progress of time more liberal views prevailed, and the debt came to be considered as the principal thing, and the mortgage only as an incident and security. In the present state of the law, where there is no prohibition by statute, it is competent for the mortgagee to pursue three remedies at the same time. He may sue on the note or obligation, he may bring an action of ejectment, and he may file a bill for foreclosure and sale.—1 Hilliard on Mort., 9, 62; Ib., 104, 111; Andrews v. Sutton, 2 Bland, 665.

The remedy last mentioned was resorted to in the State court by the mortgagees in the second mortgage, those in the first having been made parties, and that mortgage thus brought before the court. That court, therefore, had full jurisdiction as to the rights of all the parties touching both instruments. It would have been competent for the court in limine, upon a proper showing, to appoint a receiver and clothe him with the duty of taking charge of the road and receiving its earnings, with such limit of time as it might see fit to prescribe. It might have done the same thing subsequently, during the progress of the suit. When the final decree was made, a receiver might have been appointed and required to receive all the income and earnings until the sale was made and confirmed and possession delivered over to the vendee.

Nothing of this kind was done. There was simply a decree of sale. The decree was wholly silent as to the possession and earnings in the meantime. It follows that neither, during that period, was in anywise affected by the action of the court.

They were as if the decree were not.

As regards the point under consideration, the decree may, therefore, be laid out of view.

The stipulation renders it unnecessary to consider the amendment to the decree.

Without that stipulation the result would have been the same. It could not affect rights which had attached before it was made.

Nothing was done in the exercise of the right which the mortgages gave to the mortgagees to intervene and take possession. We may, therefore, lay out of view also both these topics.

This leaves nothing to be examined but the effect of the mortgages, irrespective of any other consideration.

A mortgagor of real estate is not liable for rent while in possession.—2 Kent's Com., 172. He contracts to pay interest, and not rent. In Chinnery v. Black, 3 Doug., 391, the mortgagor of a ship sued for freight earned after the mortgage was given, but unpaid. Lord Mansfield said: "Until the mortgagee takes possession the mortgagor is owner to all the world, and is entitled to all the profit made." It is clearly implied in these mortgages that the railroad company should hold possession and receive the earnings until the mortgagees should take possession or the proper judicial authority should interpose. Possession draws after it the right to receive and apply the income. Without this the road could not be operated and no profit could be made. Mere possession would have been useless to all concerned. The right to apply enough of the income to operate the road will not be questioned. The amount to be so applied was within the discretion of the company. The same discretion extended to the surplus. It was for the company to decide what should be done with it. In this condition of things, the whole fund belonged to the company and was subject to its control. It was, therefore, liable to the creditors of the company as if the mortgages did not exist.

They in no wise affected it.

If the mortgagees were not satisfied they had the remedy in their own hands.

They could at any moment invoke the aid of the law or interpose themselves without it.

They did neither.

In The Galveston Road v. Gowdry, 11 Wall., 482, substantially the same question arose as that we are considering. The mortgage there contained provisions touching the income of the road similar to those in the mortgages before us.

This court held that, at least until after a regular demand was made, those who received the earnings were not bound to account for them.—See also The City of Bath v. Miller, 51 Maine 341; Noyes, Receiver, v. Rich, 52 Maine, 115.

Upon both reason and authority we think the appellants have no right to the fund in controversy.

The decree of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT.

No. 184—OCTOBER TERM, 1875.

JOHN MONTGOMERY, JR., Assignee of Stewart, Porter, & Co., Plaintiff in Error,
v.
THE BUCYRUS MACHINE WORKS.

In Error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Western District of Missouri.

FRAUDULENT REPRESENTATIONS — RIGHT TO RESCIND CONTRACT.

That the corporation had the right to rescind the contract on the ground of fraud, and follow the property, or its proceeds, wherever they could find it. This it did not do. But equity and good conscience required that the proceeds of property obtained from it by fraud, should be paid to it, or that the property itself, if unsold, be returned.

2. Having no information to the contrary, until after the bankruptcy of Stewart and Porter, and the receipt of the proceeds of its own property fraudulent procured from it, the corporation is not liable to the assignee of Stewart and Porter for such proceeds.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

Mr. Justice DAVIS delivered the opinion of the court.

There can be no question, on the conceded facts of the case, that Stewart, Porter, and Wallace were co-partners under the firm name of Stewart, Porter & Co., so far as the transaction and contract with the defendant are concerned, and that they are bound to it by the duties and obligations arising out of that relation. The firm of Stewart, Porter & Co. was formed at Sedalia, Missouri, in January, 1870, by Stewart and Porter, to deal in agricultural implements, with a view to include Wallace, if he chose to join it, and the name of the partnership was taken for this purpose. Wallace was sent by Stewart and Porter soon after this to Ohio, where the works of the defendant, a manufacturing corporation, were situated, to make contracts with it as their partner, if he elected to become such. This election was all that was required to render him a member of the firm; there was no necessity that he should sign any articles of co-partnership.

Wallace, when he reached Ohio, elected to join the firm. Pursuant to the express authority conferred upon him by his associates in business, he entered into a contract of purchase with the defendant, to whom he represented that the firm, consisting of Stewart, Porter, and himself, was solvent and doing a good business, and that Porter was wealthy. Previous to this the defendant knew nothing of the firm, but relying on the truth of his statements, parted with its property to a firm composed of Stewart, Porter, and Wallace; nor did it learn that Wallace had retired from the firm until after proceedings in bankruptcy were commenced against Stewart and Porter. It dealt throughout, as it had commenced, with a firm composed of the three persons, and, so far as it is concerned, the firm was not changed.

It is true, before it closed its dealings it acted under the belief that this firm was insolvent, but this was a mistaken belief, as the firm owed no one else, and the firm composed of Stewart and Porter, which was insolvent, was not indebted to the defendant.

By the terms of the contract made by Wallace, on behalf of the firm, with the corporation, one car-load of machines was sold and delivered at the time, and there was a further agreement to fill all orders as soon as practicable. From time to time orders were made and machines forwarded. They were generally shipped direct to the different persons who had engaged to sell them for Stewart, Porter & Co., and the proceeds of these machines, when sold, were devoted, with the consent of all parties, to discharge the debt due the corporation, and the unsold machines were returned to it.

It had the right to rescind the contract on the ground of fraud, and follow the property or its proceeds wherever they could be found. This it did not do, because its agents and officers had no reason to believe that Wallace had actually misled them to its injury until after the machines were all sent forward. But equity and good consicence required that the proceeds of property obtained from it by fraud should be paid to it, or that the property itself, if unsold, be returned. This was recognized by Stewart, Porter and Wallace, and the arrangement by which this was done is binding on them and the corporation. The machines did not lose their identity, nor can it be said that they formed a part of the permanent stock of goods of the bankrupts, Stewart and Porter, so that they can be considered as having thereby obtained credit. Their creditors, therefore, have no right to complain, as the settlement was made in the absence of actual fraud. And the mere fact that when it was made the corporation knew that Porter and Stewart were insolvent, does not render it fraudulent under the bankrupt law. The transaction by which it got part of the machines back and received the proceeds of those which had been sold, was, under the circumstances, most equitable; and it cannot be defeated by the consideration that Wallace, after he had made the contract, was allowed to retire from the firm. It would be a great wrong to the corporation, who knew nothing of this, or of the untruthfulness of Wallace's representations until after the property had all been delivered. It always dealt with the firm as composed of Stewart, Porter, and Wallace. Having no information to the contrary, until after the bankruptcy of Stewart and Porter, and the receipt of the proceeds of its own property fraudulently procured from it, the corporation is not liable to the assignee of Stewart and Porter for such proceeds.

Judgment affirmed.

UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT

No. 43.—OCTOBER TERM, 1875.

THE TOWN OF CONCORD, Plaintiff in Error.
v.
THE PORTSMOUTH SAVINGS BANK.

In Error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Illinois.

EFFECT OF CONSTITUTION ON ACT AUTHORIZING TOWN TO SUBSCRIBE OR MAKE DONATIONS TO RAILROAD COMPANIES.

The Town of Concord voted, on the 20th of November, 1869, that it would make a donation, provided the company would run its railroad through the town. On the 20th of June, 1870, the company gave notice of its acceptance of the donation; but the town was not empowered to make the donation until the road was located and constructed through the town. It had no authority to make a contract to give, and the acceptance was an undertaking to do nothing which the company was bound to do before the authority of the town to make a donation, or to engage to make a donation came into existence. There was no contract to be impaired. A contract should be clearly proved before it invokes the protection of the Federal Constitution. That at the time the donation was made, there was no authority in the municipality to make a donation to the railroad company, it having been taken away by the Constitution of 1870, and, consequently, no authority to issue the bonds, and the bonds and coupons are void.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

Mr. Justice STRONG delivered the opinion of the court.

The bonds to which the coupons in suit were attached purport to have been made under legislative authority given to the town officers by the act of March 7, 1867. Their recitals make direct reference to that act by its title, which is set forth at length, with an averment that they were issued under and by virtue of it. The primary question, therefore, is whether that statute did in reality give to the supervisor and clerk of the town, power to execute and deliver town bonds on the 9th day of October, 1871, (when the bonds were in fact issued), as an appropriation or donation to the railroad company. The first and second sections are the only ones to which reference need be made. By the first it was enacted that certain incorporated towns and cities, and towns acting under the township organization law, (among which it is conceded the town of Concord was one,) should be and were severally authorized to appropriate such sum of money as they might deem proper, to the Chicago, Danville and Vincennes Railroad Company, to aid in the construction of the road of said company; to be paid to the company as soon as the track of said road should have been located and constructed through said city, town or township respectively. To this was attached the following proviso: "Provided, however, that the proposition to appropriate moneys to said company shall be first submitted to a vote of the legal voters of said respective townships, towns or cities, at a regular annual or special meeting, by giving at least ten days notice thereof; and a vote shall be taken thereon by ballot at the usual place of election, and if the majority of votes cast shall be in favor of the appropriation, then the same shall be made, otherwise not." The second section empowered and required the authorities of said municipalities to levy and collect a tax and make such provisions as might be necessary for the prompt payment of the appropriation under the provisions of the law.

The authority given to the town of Concord by this statute was not to subscribe to the stock of the railroad company, but to make an appropriation or donation in aid of the construction of the road, and even that donation was not permitted to be made until after the completion of the location and construction of the road through the town. It has been strenuously insisted during the argument that the act conferred no power upon the town to make an appropriation or donation by the issuing of bonds or certificates of indebtedness. It is said other provision was made for the donation; provision by the levy and collection of a tax. We do not care, however, to discuss this matter, for in the view which we have of the case it is quite immaterial. A popular election having been held, and a majority of votes cast at the election having been in favor of the appropriation, it may be conceded that payment of the appropriation could lawfully have been made in town bonds, instead of money, if the donation itself was authorized. The real question is, whether the authority to make the donation existed when it was made. The act of the legislature of 1867 may have been authority for a donation at any time prior to July 2, 1870 and no authority at all afterwards. And such we think it was. The popular vote in favor of an appropriation was on the 20th of November, 1869, but it was not itself an appropriation or donation, and the town was not authorized to make it until the railroad was located and constructed through the town. Before that time, and before any attempt at a donation or appropriation was made, the authority to make it was withdrawn. If no effect be attributed to the rescinding vote of June 30th, 1870, the new constitution of the State, which came into operation on the 2d of July, 1870, annulled, we think, the power of municipalities to make donations to railroad companies. It ordained that "no city, town, township, or other municipality shall ever become subscribers to the capital stock of any railroad, or private corporation, or make donation to, or loan its credit in aid of such corporation. Provided, however, that the adoption of this article shall not be construed as affecting the right of any such municipality to make such subscriptions, where the same have been authorized under existing laws by a vote of the people of such municipalities prior to such adoption." This article, in our opinion, makes a clear distinction between subscriptions to the capital stock of a railroad company, or a private corporation, and donations or loans to such corporations. The latter are prohibited under all circumstances. The former may still be made, if they have been authorized by a vote of the people prior to the adoption of the constitution. A very able and ingenious argument has been submitted to us, aiming to show that in fact the article makes no such distinction, and that donations and subscriptions are put upon the same footing; but we cannot yield to it our assent. No matter what may have been the intention of the mover of the proviso, the intent of the framers of the article, and of the people adopting it, must be gathered from the article itself. There was reason for the distinction. For subscriptions to capital stock the municipality got something for which there was at least a possibility of return, more than was possible in the case of donation. In both cases public convenience may have been contemplated, but in the one more than that may have been contemplated and expected, and this may have been the prevailing motive for assent to a subscription. It cannot be doubted that a subscription would have been voted in many cases where a donation, or a loan of credit would not have been.

If, then, the State constitution prohibited donations to railroad companies, made after its adoption, the act of the legislature of 1867 became ineffective after July 2, 1870. After that date the power no longer existed in the municipality.

We do not say that the new constitution could annul or impair any contract that was made between the town and the railroad company, during the time in which the town had authority to make it. A constitution can no more impair the obligation of a contract than ordinary legislation can. But the record exhibits no contract made before July 2, 1870 The town voted on the 20th day of November, 1869, that it would make a donation, provided the company would run its railroad through the town. On the 20th of June, 1870, the company gave notice of its acceptance of the donation. But the town was not empowered to make the donation until the road was located and constructed through the town. It had no authority to make a contract to give. And the acceptance was an undertaking to do nothing, which the company was not bound to do before the authority of the town to make a donation, or to engage to make a donation came into existence. What is called the acceptance of the railroad company cannot be construed as an engagement to locate and build the railroad through the town. It amounted to no more than saying. "if we build our road through your town, we will receive your gift." There was, therefore, no consideration for the town's promise to give, even if the popular vote can be considered a promise. There was no contract to be impaired. A contract should be clearly proved before it invokes the protection of the federal Constitution.

We conclude, then, that at the time the donation was made there was no authority in the municipality to make a donation to the railroad company, and consequently no authority to issue the bonds. It follows that the bonds and coupons are void.

The judgment is reversed, and the record is remitted for a new trial.

WE are under obligations to the law firm of BISHOP & MCKINLAY, of Paris, Ill., for the following opinion:

U. S. CIRCUIT COURT, S. DISTRICT OF ILLINOIS.

OPINION MARCH, 11, 1876.

HENRY HERVEY et al., v. THE ILLINOIS MIDLAND R. R. COMPANY.

APPLICATION TO REMOVE THE CASE FROM THE EDGAR CIRCUIT COURT.

The statutes relating to the removal of cases from State to Federal Courts construed. The Court states in what cases, and by whom a cause may be removed, from a State Circuit to a Federal Court. —[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

Opinion by DRUMMOND, J.

This case we think is not in such a condition that we can at present take jurisdiction of it.

We will state its condition, and the reasons why we cannot assume jurisdiction.

There was an original bill filed in the Edgar county Circuit court, on the 11th of September, 1875, by one Henry Hervey who claimed to be owner of the majority of the stock of various railroad companies; the Paris and Decatur, R. W. Co., the Peoria, Atlanta and Decatur R.W. Co., and the Paris and Terre Haute R. W. Co., all of which had been merged in the Illinois Midland Railway Company and which was made a defendant. The only plaintiffs in the original bill were Hervey and some judgment creditors of the Peoria and Decatur R. W. Co.

The original bill alleged that there were very large claims in judgment and otherwise against these various companies and that executions had been issued and that owing to the purchase by the Peoria and Atlanta R. W. Co., of the other roads, it could not be ascertained how the judgments could be collected or appropriated, and therefore asked for the appointment of a Receiver.

The claims outstanding — what are called the floating debts of the company —were said to be something over three hundred thousand dollars.

A receiver was appointed. An amended bill was then filed which set out in more detail the various facts stated in the original bill and also included numerous plaintiffs besides those in the original bill.

These various parties were stockholders of the road, and also judgment and other creditors, and it was stated in the amended bill that if the property was placed in the hands of a receiver, and thus a foreclosure prevented by the sale, under execution of the property, the company might be placed upon a stable footing, and that something might be realized for the stockholders and the creditors.

The receiver took possession; various applications were made by him to the court; money was paid under the direction of the court, and contracts also entered into with approbation of the court, by which the receiver became liable to pay certain moneys from time to time, and to issue certificates—a very objectional thing—which, however, the courts have, to some extent, countenanced of late, while the property is in possession of the receiver; but only to be permitted, I think, under extraordinary circumstances; so that the Edgar Circuit Court had retained possession of this property for a very considerable time.

The only defendant to the original and amended bill, was the Illinois Midland Railway Company. These were substantially the facts: When, in February, two creditors, Albert and Morris Grant, citizens of Great Britain, and representing themselves to be bondholders of all these various companies merged into the Illinois Midland Railway Company, came into court and asked to be made parties defendant, and also for leave to file a cross-bill. At the same time Secor, representing himself to be trustee of the mortgage executed by the Peoria, Atlanta & Decatur R.W. Co., asked to be made a party. An order was accordingly made by the court. The order seems to have anticipated the actual application—the order being on the 7th of February, and the application not being in fact made in the clerk's office until about the 15th of February. This, perhaps, is not material. They were made parties, on leave given by the court. They then filed answers to the original and amended bills, in which Secor set up that he was mortgagee and trustee of the Peoria, Atlanta & Decatur road; that he represented thirteen hundred thousand dollars for which the mortgage was given, and that the plaintiffs were seeking to make the property, which he states was covered by the mortgage, available to them to pay the claims which they had against these companies, alleging an independent fact—that the Midland Railway company, and all these companies, were insolvent, and that they had not property enough to pay the various mortgage debts against them, and that the bonds secured by the mortgage, were a prior lien over the claims represented by the various claimants in the original and amended bills.

These were also the substantial allegations of Albert and Morris Grant, with the exception that they represented in their answer that they were bondholders of these three companies. They allege also that there was a mortgage made by the Paris and Decatur road, of which they held bonds, and also by the Paris and Terre Haute road, of which they were the owners of the bonds, but who the mortgagees and trustees were they do not say. All that is stated is that there were mortgages or deeds of trust to secure bonds of which they were the holders.

Now this was the status of the case when, on the 16th of February these defendants, Albert and Morris Grant and Secor, filed a petition in the clerk's office of the Circuit Court of Edgar county, to have the cause removed to this court, for the reason that there was a controversy, which could be wholly determined as between the trustee and these bondholders and the plaintiffs in the original and amended bills; and if that were so there would be no objection in one aspect of the case for the court to take jurisdiction, because the language of the law is, that when the controversy is wholly between citizens of different States, the court may have jurisdiction, although perhaps the implication is, there may be other controversies in the case between other parties.

It can hardly be said that is true in this case. For instance, in the original and amended bills, there is no allusion whatever to any of the bonds issued—to any paramount claim over that of the stockholders and the judgment and other creditors. But it is insisted that the property, if put in the hands of a Receiver, and taken care of, and an arrangement made by which the floating debt can be paid off, it can become valuable to the stockholders; and there is nothing in the original or the amended bill to indicate that the Midland Railway Company, which is a citizen of this State, has no interest in the property. And it is manifest that the case cannot be transferred without affecting the interest of the Midland Railway Company very seriously, and the only ground upon which it could be transferred by these bondholders and this trustee is that the Midland Railway Company is a mere nominal party.

If it is a real party, it being one of the defendants as well as the bondholders and the trustee, it is a controversy between that company as one of the defendants and the judgment and other creditors, the plaintiffs in the original and amended bills, and therefore it cannot be wholly determined as between these parties who seek for a removal.

But, independent of that, it appears that Albert and Morris Grant are citizens of Great Britain. They are not citizens of one of the States of this Union, which we think is the meaning of the last clause of the second section of the act of the 3d of March, 1875, under which this case is sought to be removed.

"Between citizens of a State and foreign States, citizens or subjects," is one of the conditions under which the federal court has jurisdiction. Now "citizens of a State" there means citizens of one of the United States, and the suits contemplated are suits between citizens of one of the States of the Union on one side and foreign States or citizens or subjects on the other.

Then the section proceeds to say, "and when in any suit mentioned in this section there shall be a controversy which is wholly between citizens of different States," (that means different States of this Union—not citizens of one of the States of this Union and foreign States, citizens or subjects; and the suits referred to are the suits which can be fully determined as between them,) "then either one or more of the plaintiffs or defendants actually interested in such controversy may remove such suit."

Now, as I have said, we cannot determine the controversy, whatever it may be, between these parties seeking a removal, and the plaintiffs in the original and amended bills without affecting the controversy which may exist between the Midland Railway Company and them, and therefore it is not wholly a controversy between the parties seeking such removal and the plaintiffs in the original and amended bills.

Why there was this distinction made—why the language was dropped in the last clause of the section which is contained in another part—it is not for us to determine. It is sufficient that the phraseology is changed, and seems to be limited when less than the whole of the plaintiffs or defendants have the right to remove the suit so that they must be citizens of different States of the Union, and the controversy must be wholly between them.

In this case it is not so. There is a controversy between citizens of the same State, namely, some of the plaintiffs, citizens of Illinois, and the Midland Railway Company, also a citizen of Illinois.

Again, it is stated in the application for removal, that some of the plaintiffs are foreigners. Waring and Company are bondholders, and are citizens of Great Britain and Ireland, and another party is a citizen of Canada. These are included among the plaintiffs in the amended bill.

Of course they are to be affected by the settlement of any controversy between the other plaintiffs and these defendants who seek a removal. For instance, if it is to be held that the trustee of the bondholders seeking the removal are to have a prior claim over the judgment creditors, then a foreigner is to be affected by that adjudication of the court, whatever it may be. So, in relation to the bondholders who are foreigners and plaintiffs, with the others.

It is not therefore in this aspect of the case a controversy wholly between citizens of different States, but it is a controversy between the citizens of a foreign country and citizens of one or more of the United States.

It has occurred to us as a question whether or not these difficulties may be removed, as in this very complicated case it has been suggested might perhaps be better for the interest of all parties that this court should take jurisdiction of the case. But of course we can only take it where the law enables us to do so. It is said that the Midland Railway Company, which is the only other defendant, has no interest in this controversy. If it be true, if it is actually insolvent, and all these various railroad companies of which it is the successor, are also insolvent, and there is not more than enough, or not enough, to pay the bonded debt, then it may be that and the other companies are merely nominal parties. They may have no real interest in the controversy. So perhaps it might be if the stockholders were parties and the stock was of no value whatever.

The controversy then would be, whether the bondholders should have this property or the judgment, and other creditors represented in the original and amended bills.

But we cannot assume now, in the present aspect of the case, as it appears upon the record, that this is so. It is alleged on one side, it is true, but it is in an answer which has not, as yet, judicially come to the knowledge of the court, and this allegation is entirely different from that in the bill.

We think that it must affirmatively appear that the court has jurisdiction. These answers were filed in vacation. The State court has never had its attention drawn to them—they never have come under its judicial cognizance in any way. It is to be observed that the Midland Railway Company has never answered, and the Paris and Decatur R. R., The Paris and Terra Haute R. R., The Peoria, Atlanta and Decatur Companies have never appeared directly in the case, nor have their trustees or mortgagees, except Mr. Secor.

The Midland Railway Co. may admit it, or it may appear to the satisfaction of the court that it has only a nominal interest, and so of the other parties named.

It may be remarked further there was no necessity for these bondholders, Albert and Morris Grant, to be made parties. The trustees could act for them, as there seems to be no antagonism or breach of duty on their part, especially under the allegation contained in Secor's answer, that he is requested by them to appear for the protection of the bondholders. He is so far actually interested, within the meaning of the last clause of the second section of the act of 1875, as to enable him to represent them, although he is a mere trustee, yet as a trustee representing their interests, he can become a party to the suit.

So then, if it did appear, or shall be made to appear that these various railroad companies are only nominally interested, and are nominal parties to this controversy, if the trustees shall come in and desire to appear as defendants, for the purpose of directing and controlling the litigation, and if it shall prove that there is no other real controversy in the case, except between them as representing the bond holders and the judgment and other creditors of these various companies, and that they are citizens of different states—then we think that the court may take jurisdiction.

Mr. Ingersoll—This case then remains as it is, as I understand it, as though no motion had been made. I will try to make it appear to this court by proper evidence on giving the other parties notice.

The Court—We understand that the Circuit court of Edgar county sits on Monday. I think you had better appear before that court and make your regular application, and then if what is proposed is true a proper case may be made.

Mr. Ingersoll—It seemed sufficient to say in the answer and petition, that the road is utterly insolvent, and that there is not property enough to pay the bonds—and to make it appear that they are merely nominal parties.

The Court—That may not be true.

Mr. Ingersoll—I say I supposed that would be sufficient.

The Court—I think the proper allegation would be to allege, that they were, from these circumstances, mere nominal parties.

It does not seem that we had better make any order in the case.

R. N. Bishop—It will be proper, then, for the Circuit Court of Edgar County to take notice and proceed with the case.

Judge Treat—The case is not here.

Mr. Bishop—I will state I have been perfectly willing to adopt the suggestion of the court, as to the removal of the cause here at the proper time, as soon as I have consulted my client, to strike out everybody that stands in the way.

Through the kindness of the law firm of TULEY, STILES & LEWIS, of this city, we have received the following opinion:

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

No. 312.—OPINION FILED JANUARY 21, 1876.

SUSAN W. HARRIS v. MOSES W. LESTER et al.

Appeal from Cook.

SALE OF REAL ESTATE TO PAY THE DEBTS OF A DECEASED PERSON—JURISDICTION—ATTACKING PROCEEDINGS COLLATERALLY—AFFIDAVIT OF NON-RESIDENCE—PUBLICATION NOTICE—RESTORING LOST RECORDS—RECITALS IN DECREE AS TO PUBLICATION—EFFECT OF FAILING TO MAKE GUARDIAN A PARTY AS SUCH.

1. WHAT A SUFFICIENT AFFIDAVIT.—An affidavit is simply a declaration on oath, in writing, sworn to by a party, before some person who has authority under the law to administer oaths. It does not depend on the fact whether it is entitled in any cause, or in any particular way, without any caption whatever, it is, nevertheless, an affidavit. That the affidavit is fully identified as having been filed in that cause: and what possible difference can it make, whether the title of the cause was written on the face above the affidavit, or on the back of it, or not at all?

2. JURISDICTION.—That should courts hold judgments invalid, as having been pronounced without jurisdiction, for such unsubstantial reasons, purchasers at judicial sales would have slight security for the titles to their property.

3. NOTICE.—That the notice contained everything the statute required it should contain, except a description of the premises to be sold, and was published for the requisite length of time.

4. RESTORING RECORDS ON EX-PARTE AFFIDAVITS.—That where the records in a case are destroyed by fire, and restored by the court upon ex parte affidavits, without notice to the parties adversely interested, the proceedings to restore the lost files are without authority of law and void. That the power of the court to replace that which has been lost or destroyed, from the files, for any cause, cannot be invoked except upon reasonable notice to parties adversely interested.

5. RECORD—EVIDENCE AS TO VALIDITY.—That a judicial record contains evidence of its own validity, and should the testimony de hors the record itself be admitted to contradict or vary its recitals, it would render such records of no avail, and defective sentences would afford but slight protection to the rights of parties once solemnly adjudicated; hence all records must be tried and construed by themselves.

6. RECITALS IN DECREE AS TO PUBLICATION.—That when a decree is attacked collaterally, the recital in it, "it appearing to the court that the said defendants have been duly notified of the pendency of said petition by publication, in accordance with the statute in such case made and provided," will be regarded as sufficient evidence of the fact that due publication was made as to all the defendants as the law directs.

7. PAROL EVIDENCE AS TO SERVICE.—Where service is by summons, verbal testimony cannot be received to prove or aid it. That can only be shown by the officer's return. It is otherwise where the service is by publication, when parol evidence may be received to prove the notice was published.

8. A DISTINCTION.—That there is a marked distinction in the cases where the decree is assailed on error or appeal, and where the same is attacked in a collateral proceeding.

9. OMISSION OF PERSON.—The court states the effect of omitting a person whom the statute says shall be made a party.

10. DESCRIPTION OF DEFENDANT.—Mrs. Douglas was made a party defendant in the proceeding to sell the land, and whether she was described as widow, devisee, or guardian, or by no description at all, is a matter of no consequence.

11. RIGHTS OF CREDITORS.—That persons who purchase at judicial sales, have rights that are just as sacred, and as much within the protection of the court, as the rights of minors.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

Opinion by SCOTT, C. J.

Subject to the payment of his debts Stephen A. Douglas devised all his real estate, one half to his wife, Adele Douglass, and the other half to his two sons, Robert M. and Stephen A. Douglas. He nominated his wife and Daniel P. Rhoades, as executors of his will, but only the latter qualified and took upon himself the duties of the trust imposed. Such proceedings were subsequently had in the Circuit court of Cook county, where the testator had resided, and where the lands are situated, on the petition of the executor, that he was authorized by a decree of that court to sell, and did in pursuance of the decree sell all the lands of which the testator died seized, to pay the debts of the estate. The lands passed into the hands of bona fide purchasers, and many of them have since been conveyed to other parties, who have made valuable improvements, and from that cause and the general prosperity of the country, they have risen greatly in value. Mr. Douglas died in June, 1861, his will was admitted to probate in July following, and in 1864, the sale of the property to pay debts, took place.

Complainant claims to have been a creditor of the estate, but she never presented her claim, whatever it may have been against the estate for allowance.

In 1874, Robert M. and Stephen A. Douglas, who had then become of age, conveyed by quit claim deed whatever interest they had in the undivided half of the lands in controversy to complainant. The consideration named in the deed is nominal, but it is alleged the conveyance was made in consideration of the indebtedness due from the estate to her. Upon obtaining this title complainant filed a bill for partition, claiming to be the owner in fee of one half of the property, and that the proceedings under which the executors sale took place were void. Making defendants the unknown owners of the interest of Mrs. Douglas, and persons holding under her as parties claiming the other half, and also the purchaser at the executors sale, and parties claiming under him. She asks to have the title to one half of the lands in controversy established, and that the proceedings of the court and the executor's sale thereunder, be declared void, and removed, as a cloud upon her title. Most of the defendants answering admit the death, will, and seizure of the testator, and claim title under the executor's sale.

There is no controversy, the present holders all acquired title in good faith, for a valuable consideration, and with no other notice of any defect in their respective titles, than what may appear on the records of the court under which the executor's sale was made. A great many objections have been taken to the validity of the proceedings, under which defendants obtained their titles, but being collaterally assailed—as they are, it will only be necessary to notice such as have relation to the jurisdiction of the court to pronounce the decree.

No principal of law is better settled, than where a court has jurisdiction of the subject matter, and the persons of the parties, its judgment or decree when questioned collaterally will be held valid, and notwithstanding the court may have proceeded irregularly, a purchaser in good faith under its judgment or decree will be protected. This rule has its foundation in the policy of the law, and is intended to give permanancy to all judicial transactions, and rights acquired thereunder. The petition for the sale of the lands of the estate was by the executors filed in the Circuit court of Cook county. It is in the usual form, and contains every material allegation necessary to give the court jurisdiction in the premises. It sufficiently appears from the record, the real estate was situated in said county, and that it had been the residence of the testator. Under the statute said court had jurisdiction to order the sale of the real estate to pay debts. The heirs of the testator and his wife, all of whom were devises under the will were made defendants. A summons in the usual form was issued against them, but was returned by the sheriff, not found as to all of the defendants. Our statute has made provision where the defendants in any such proceeding are non-residents of the State, for bringing them into court by publication.

This was done, but one of the principal objections urged as showing a want of jurisdiction in the court to pronounce the decree, is that the affidavit of Jackson as to the non-residence of the several defendants is a nullity, and the reason assigned is, it was not entitled in any court, or in any cause, nor could it be told from it who was the plaintiff that was sueing the persons called defendants. The argument is, that such a paper is not an affidavit, but we are unable to appreciate the reasoning by which such a conclusion is reached. An affidavit is simply a delaration on oath in writing, sworn to by a party, before some person who has authority under the law to administer oaths. It does not depend on the fact whether it is entitled in any cause, or in any particular way. Without any caption whatever, it is nevertheless an affidavit.

All the statute requires in such cases is, that petitioner shall file an affidavit in the office of the clerk of the court in which his petition is pending, showing that any defendant resides, or has gone out of the State, to authorize the clerk to make publication as to such defendant. It does not require the affidavit shall be in any particular form, or even that it shall be entitled in the cause. Petitioner is only required "to file with the clerk of the court in which the petition is pending, an affidavit showing that any defendants resides or hath gone out of the State," to authorize the clerk to make publication. The record in this case declares affirmatively, an affidavit showing that all the defendants in the proceeding in the Circuit court to sell the real estate of the testator, were non-residents of the State, was filed in the office of the clerk of the court in which the cause was pending with the files of the cause immediately before publication was made, and that is all the law required to be done. This view of the meaning of the statute is a full and complete answer to all the subtle reasoning of counsel upon this subject. The affidavit is fully identified as having been filed in that cause, and what possible difference can it make, whether the title of the cause was written on the face above the affidavit, or on the back of it, or not at all. Upon what principle, or by what process of reasoniog however subtle, could so trifling an omission, even if the statute had directed the affidavit to be entitled in the cause, which it does not, be regarded in a collateral proceeding as of sufficient importance to vitiate a solemn judgment of a court of superior jurisdiction, long years after it had been pronounced, and after parties strangers to the record had acquired rights under it. Should courts hold judgments invalid as having been pronounced without jurisdiction, for such unsubstantial reasons, purchasers at judicial sales would have but slight security for the titles to their property.

But a question is made as to the sufficiency of the publication notice to give the court jurisdiction of the persons of defendants because it did not contain a "description of the premises described in the petition." The statutory provision is, the notice shall contain "the names of the parties thereto, the title of the court, and the time and place of the return of the summons, and a description of the premises described in the petition." The notice in fact contained everything the statute required it should contain, except a description of the premises to be sold, and was published for the requisite length of time.

The original records of the Circuit court in which the proceedings to sell the lands of the testator were had were destroyed by fire in 1871. All the evidence we have of the contents of the original records in that cause is derived from a certified copy of the record that was made in 1870, on the application of the widow and heirs to have the clerk make a complete record of all the files of the cause on the record books of the court, under the provisions of the statute which gives a party the right to have complete record made at his own cost. When the clerk came to make up the record no copy of the publication notice, or the publisher's certificate, could be found among the files. This fact he reported to the court.

A petition was then filed by the parties interested in which they recited the proceedings to cause a complete record to be made up, and the inability of the clerk to comply with the order, and with it brought into court what they insisted was a copy of the publication notice and a copy of the proof of publication, and asked that such copies might be filed as of the proper time, and be substituted in place of the originals so lost or mislaid in making a complete record. On this application the court heard ex parte affidavits, and on the 28th day of March 1870, an order was entered finding that the publication notice part of the files in the original cause had been lost and could not be found, and directed the one recited in the application, be substituted in the place of the one lost, as a part of the record, and further finding that the notice had been published in the Chicago Post, and a certificate of such publication made, which had also been lost, and in like manner directed a copy of it to be filed as a part of the record. These proceedings were had in the Circuit court without any notice to the petitioner in the original cause, or to any of the purchasers at the executor's sale or to any other person adversely interested. Nearly six years had elapsed from the making up of the final order in the original cause after the sale, and we may presume it had been off the dockets for that length of time. There being no notice to any whose interests were to be affected or the adverse party, the proceedings to restore the lost files were without authority of law, and void. This proposition is so plain it need not be elaborated. Here was a proceeding to make a publication notice a part of the record, in place of the original one lost from the files, which would in the opinion of counsel, show the court had no jurisdiction of the cause, and yet the parties most vitally interested had no notice any steps were being taken in the cause. The title of all the purchasers at the executor's sale and their grantees in possession of the property to be affected was to be invalidated if this adjudication of the court is to be permitted to stand in a proceeding to which they were in no wise made parties, and of which neither they nor any one interested in maintaining the decree of the court had the slightest notice. On the plainest principles of natural justice the orders of the Circuit court to restore the lost publication notice and make the substituted one a part of the record, must be regarded as a nullity. The power of the court to replace that which has been lost or destroyed, from the files for any cause cannot be invoked except upon reasonable notice to parties adversely interested. The authorities in this court and elsewhere are to this effect. Heyworth v. Collins, 60 Ills., 328; Freeman on Judgment, Sec. 89.

The court in the original cause found it appeared, "the defendants have each been duly notified of the pendency of said petition by publication in accordance with the statute in such case made and provided." Evidence was offered on the hearing of this cause to prove the notice contained in the record was the only publication ever made, and was the one upon which the court must have relied. But one purpose could have been had in view in offering this evidence, viz: to contradict the recitals in the decree and establish the fact in opposition to the solemn finding of the court, the defendants had not been notified of the pendency of the petition in accordance with the provisions of the statute. Even for this purpose it was inadmissible under any rule of law with which we are familiar. We had occasion in the recent case of Barnett v. Wolf, (Sept. T. 1874,) to consider this question fully. The doctrine of that case is, the record of a court can never be contradicted, varied or explained by evidence beyond or outside of the record itself. Any other rule would be most disastrous in its results. A judicial record contains evidence of its own validity, and should testimony de hors the record itself be admitted to contradict or to vary its recitals, it would render such records of no avail and defective sentences would afford but slight protection to the rights of parties once solemnly adjudicated. Hence all records must be tried and construed by themselves.

The wisdom of the rule of law on this subject is apparent from what was done in the case at bar. The files of an old newspaper were examined and a notice published in it is produced and offered in evidence to contradict the finding of the court on a jurisdictional fact in a cause tried before it. It is a matter of common notoriety, of which the court may take notice that at the date the proceedings were had in the original cause other newspapers were published in the county of Cook. Non constat such a notice as the statute requires in such cases may have been published in some one of them, or even in the journal in which the alleged defective notice was found, and by fraud or accident lost from the files. But it is unnecessary to elaborate the argument or multiply illustrations, for the rule on this subject is settled by the decision of this court, and we see no reason to depart from it. The case of Barnett v. Wolf, in many points is analogous with the case at bar, and its reasoning is conclusive on this branch of the case. There can be no serious doubt that the publication notice found in the record is the one substituted for the original by the court on the ex parte hearing in March, 1870. Regarding it as we must do, as constituting no part of the record, it follows the record contains no publication notice. Hence the question arises, whether the recital in the decree "it appearing to the court that the said defendants have each been duly notified of the pendency of said petition by publication in accordance with the statute in such case made and provided," will be regarded as sufficient evidence of the fact that due publication was made as to all the defendants as the law directs.

In all collateral proceedings we entertain no doubt such pendency is sufficient evidence of service by publication as to defendants, nothing appearing in the record to the contrary, and to warrant the decree as in cases of regular notice by publication. There is absolutely nothing in this record after expunging that which was improperly introduced into it, to show the court found unadvisedly or incorrectly on this jurisdictional fact. It was the province of the court at the threshold of the investigation to determine whether it had jurisdiction of the defendants in any lawful way in that proceeding, and that question it did determine, and recorded its solemn finding and judgment. Upon the authority of the adjudged cases in this court, the record stating the court found the defendants had been duly notified of the pendency of the petition, by publication in accordance with the provisions of the statute, and nothing appearing to the contrary, such finding is evidence of the existence of that jurisdictional fact. According to the doctrine of Botsford v. O'Conner et al., 57 Ill.. 72, where the service is by summons, verbal testimony cannot be received to prove or aid it. That can only be shown by the officer's return. It is no doubt otherwise, where service is by publication, when parol evidence may be received to prove the notice was published. Before any court will proceed to adjudicate upon the rights of parties litigant, the presumption is, it heard evidence, and was in some legitimate mode satisfied the defendant had been duly notified, according to the provisions of the statute so as to confer jurisdiction.

In Reddick v. The State Bank, 27 Ill., 145, it was said: "It is to be presumed that no court will state of record the existence of facts which had no existence, or pass a decree or render a judgment, unless proof of service or notice were actually produced." In Moore v. Niel, 39 Ill., 256, it was objected that the notice was defective in not stating the first and last days of publication, as the statute required. The decree, however, recited that, "it appearing to the court that notice according to law was given of the pendency of this cause." It was held that this recital in the decree was sufficient evidence that the proper notice had been given. The court approve the cases of Gibson v. Roll, 28 Ill., 92, and Goudy v. Hall, 36 Ill., 319, and says: "Although the certificate of the printer was defective, yet we must presume from this recital that the court received other evidence of the date of publication."

The case of Miller v. Handy, 40 Ill., 448, is a well considered case, and on the authority of Reddick v. The State Bank, and Goudy v. Hall, the court says: "The record, therefore, stating the fact of the return of two nihils—and nothing to the contrary appearing—must be held prima facie evidence at least of the existence of that fact; and there is nothing in the case to show that the finding of the court was not in strict accordance with the fact."

Other cases in this court are to the same effect.

It will be observed that there is a marked distinction preserved in all the cases where the decree or judgment of the court is assailed on error, or on appeal, and where the same is attacked in a collateral proceeding. This distinction explains the apparent conflict in some of the cases on this question. By his will Mr. Douglas made his wife, Adele Douglas, the guardian of his children during their minority, and the point is made the Circuit Court had no jurisdiction to order the sale of real estate to pay debts, because the guardian in that capacity was not made a party with the heirs. A guardian, ad litem, was, however, appointed by the court for the heirs that were alleged in the petition to be minors, who took upon himself the trust, and assumed to act in their behalf.

The guardian of the minor heirs is one of the persons whom the Statute directs shall be made defendant to any proceeding had on the part of the executor or administrator to sell real estate to pay the debts of the deceased, but whether the omission to make such guardian a defendant would affect the jurisdiction of the court as to persons regularly before it, is a question that is pressed upon our attention, as affecting the validity of the decree under which the executor's sale was made. It would doubtless be a ground of error in any direct proceeding to reverse the decree, but where the decree is assailed collaterally, it would seem the omission of any person whom the statute directs shall be made defendant, in such proceedings, would not render the decree void as to persons made parties, and over whom the court had jurisdiction by service of process or otherwise. At most it would be but error, and would not concern the jurisdiction of the court. In Botsford v. O'Conner, this question was considered, and it was there said: "We do not understand the statute as requiring all persons in interest to be made parties, to confer jurisdiction of the subject matter upon the court. The court acquires that jurisdiction from the death of the party seized of the real estate; the grant of letters testamentary, or of administration, and his indebtedness, and filing the petition showing these facts. These are facts which confer jurisdiction upon the court as to the subject matter. * * * The failure to make the guardian a defendant may be an error, but it can not be held to be necessary to the jurisdiction of the court, because he is not made a defendant, and the omission is not objected to in the court below. We cannot hold that the court thereby failed to acquire jurisdiction over those properly in court."

But aside from this view of the law, Mrs. Douglas was made a defendant with the heirs in the proceedings had in the Circuit court, to sell the real estate, and whether she was described as widow, devisee, or guardian, or by no description at all, is a matter of no consequence. Having been made a defendant, and duly notified of the pendency of the petition, it will be presumed she was in court, and could defend in any capacity she chose. She was the widow of the testator and under his will she was a devisee and guardian of his minor children. It would be a work of supererogation in making her a defendant to describe her in three distinct capacities. The law will require no such useless formality. It is sufficient to answer all the requirements of the statute in such cases, that the guardian is in fact made a defendant with the heirs and brought into court, whether such party is described as guardian or not. It would be more regular to designate the guardian officially, but it is mere form, and the omission to do so would not deprive the court of jurisdiction.

The other objections taken to the validity of the proceedings under which defendants obtained title, all relate to mere irregularities, but do not concern the jurisdiction of the court. Some of them might have been fatal on error or on appeal, but not being jurisdictional do not vitiate the proceedings when called in question collaterally. We have therefore omitted any discussion of them. Undoubtedly the court had jurisdiction of the subject matter to order the sale of the real estate of the testator to pay the debts of the estate, and having acquired jurisdiction of the persons of all the parties whom the statutes direct to be made defendants by publication, in accordance with the provision of the statute, notwithstanding the court may have proceeded irregularly, its decree and the proceedings had thereunder were effectual to pass the title of the heirs and devisees to the lands sold to the purchasers at the executor's sale.

This is a contest between a creditor of the estate and purchasers at the executor's sale under a decree of court with jurisdiction of the subject matter, and of the persons of the parties affected,

We call attention to the following opinions, reported at length in this issue:

Practice—The Earnings of an Insolvent R. R. Co.—The Rights of Mortgagors to the Earnings.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States, by Swayne, J., as to several questions of practice, and holding that where there are mortgages foreclosed against an insolvent railroad company, and the court does not appoint a receiver to run the road, or make any order in regard to the earnings, that the company is entitled to the earnings until the possession is taken under the mortgages, the same as if such mortgages did not exist, and the company being entitled to the earnings, they were liable to the creditors of the the company.

Fraudulent Representations—Right to Rescind Contract.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States, by Davis, J., as to the right of a party in case of fraudulent representations, to rescind the contract, and follow the property or its proceeds.

Effect of the Constitution of 1870 on Act Authorizing Town to Make a Donation to a R. R. Co.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States, by Strong, J., holding that the bonds and coupons in suit issued by the Supervisor and clerk of the town of Concord, under the act of March 7, 1867, are null and void. The Court states the effect of the Constitution of 1870, upon acts of the legislature authorizing towns and cities to subscribe to railroad stock or make donations to railroads. The act of 1867 was authority for a donation at any time prior to July 2, 1870, but was no authority at all afterwards; that the new Constitution annulled the power of municipalities to make donations to railroad companies; that a clear distinction is made in the Constitution between subscriptions to the capital stock of a railroad company, or a private corporation, and donations or loans to such corporations. The latter are prohibited under all circumstances; the former may still be made, if they have been authorized by a vote of the people prior to the adoption of the Constitution; that after July 2, 1870, the day when the new Constitution became effective, the power to make donations no longer existed in the municipality. The principle announced in this opinion will relieve several towns in the State from the payment of their bonds donated to railroads.

Removal of Cases from State to Federal Courts.—The opinion of the United States Circuit Court for the Southern District of Illinois, by Drummond, J., construing the statute relating to the removal of causes from a State Circuit Court into the Federal Courts, and stating in what causes and by whom a case may be removed from a Circuit Court of a State into a Circuit Court of the United States.

Sale of Real Estate to Pay Debts—Jurisdiction — Attacking Proceedings Collaterally—Affidavit of Non-Residence—Recitals in Decree as to Publication—Restoring Lost Records—Failing to Make Guardian Party.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of Illinois, by Scott, C. J. In a case brought to test the validity of a sale of the real estate of the late Senator Douglas to pay his debts, made by order of the Circuit court of Cook county, the court held that an affidavit is simply a declaration on oath in writing, sworn to by a party, before some person who has authority under the law to administer oaths; that it does not depend upon the fact whether it is entitled in any cause or in any particular way, without any caption whatever; it is, nevertheless, an affidavit; that it makes no difference whether the title to the cause was written on the face above the affidavit, or on the back of it, or not at all; that if courts should hold judgments invalid, as having been pronounced without jurisdiction, for such unsubstantial reasons, purchasers at judicial sales would have slight security for the title to their property. That where the records in a case are destroyed by fire, and restored by the court upon ex parte affidavits, without notice to the parties adversely interested, the proceedings to restore the lost files are without authority of law and void; that a record contains evidence of its own validity, and should testimony de hors the record be admitted to contradict or vary its recitals it would render such a record of no avail. All records should and must be tried and construed by themselves. The court states that recitals in a decree will be regarded as sufficient evidence of publication, and when the decree is attacked collaterally; that there is a marked distinction in the cases where the decree is assailed on error or appeal, and where the same is attacked in a collateral proceeding, the effect of not making the guardian of one of the minor defendants a party stated. The court says Mrs. Douglas was made a party defendant in the proceedings to sell the land, and whether she was described as widow, or guardian, or by no description at all, is all a matter of no consequence. As Judge John M. Wilson used to say, this opinion "bristles with fine legal questions." It settles the law upon several important questions of practice. This ruling of the Supreme Court will have a tendency to put a stop to the sharp practice of throwing a party out of court, because he does not happen to entitle his affidavit exactly as the case is entered on the docket.

Note—Usury—What Law Governs.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, by Olin, J., holding that a promissory note actually made and signed in the city of Washington, but dated at Leavenworth, in the State of Kansas, and sent to the Second National Bank of Leavenworth, and by it discounted, is to be governed as respects a question of usury by the laws of Kansas.

Personal Property Taxed in One State may be Taxed in Another.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of Rhode Island by Durfee, C. J., where a resident and taxpayer in Tiverton, Rhode Island, owned certain shares of manufacturing corporations, organized under the laws of Massachusetts, and located with their property in Fall River, in that State, where all their property was invested; was taxed in Fall River for these shares, assessed under the laws of Massachusetts at their fair market value, and paid the tax. In the same year he was again taxed in Tiverton, under the aws of Rhode Island, for the same shares. Held that this second tax was valid.

Receiver—Trust Deed.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of Tennessee, by Freeman, J., holding that the beneficiary in a trust deed may have a receiver appointed, and the proceeds of the security impounded for his benefit during the litigation, after his right to a sale of the property has been adjudged.

NOTES TO RECENT CASES.

INSURANCE—THROAT DISEASE.

The U. S. Circuit Court, E. D. of Missouri, by Dillon, J., 3 Cent. Law J., 302, held that the words "throat disease," in a proposal for life insurance, mean something more than a temporary inflammation, which, at the time the proposal was made, was cured.

PREMIUM NOTE—NON-PAYMENT OF INTEREST—DAYS OF GRACE.

Judge Brown, of Michigan, in the U. S. Circuit Court, W. D. Tenn., in Jarman v. St. M. Ins. Co., 3 Cent. Law J., 303, held that a premium note, when negotiable, is entitled to grace, like other commercial paper, and that a tender of interest on such note, within the days of grace, will prevent a forfeiture for non-payment of interest at maturity of the note.

SETTING ASIDE A DISCHARGE IN BANKRUPTCY—LIMITATION.

Judge Parker, of the U. S. District Court, W. D. of Arkansas, in Pickett v. McCarick, 3 Cent. Law J., 303, refused to follow the opinion of Taft, J., in Perkins v. Gray, 3 N. B. R., 772, that a discharge may be attached at any time for fraudulant concealment, and held, that, although under the ordinary statutes of limitations, the rule is, that where the cause of action is based upon fraud, the statute does not commence to run until it has become known to the party injured by the fraud; still, as by Section 34 of the bankrupt act, it is positively provided that the discharge may be contested within two years after the date thereof, this must be taken as the limit, and the plea of the statute of limitations is not a good plea.

RAILROAD — NEGLIGENCE — BURDEN OF PROOF.

The Supreme Court of Nebraska, in B. & M. R. R. Co., v. Westover, 10 Western Jurist, 277, held, where damage is caused by the escape of fire from a railroad engine, the burden is upon the company to show that their engine was properly constructed, equipped and operated; and the question of the efficiency of such construction and equipment, is one of fact for the jury; that it is not necessarily negligence for a railway company to permit dry grass to remain on its right of way. The fact, however, is evidence for the jury, who may find negligence from it.

THE ATTORNEY GENERALSHIP.

The people of the State are interested in having a good lawyer and an honest man fill this position. It is gratifying to know that there are so many good lawyers who are qualified to fill the position, and will take it. The Republican Convention meets next week, at Springfield. Mr. Edsall, the present incumbent, has performed the duties of his office with ability, and has kept a watchful eye over the interests of the State, and is a lawyer of recognized ability.

Senator Canfield, who is a candidate for the office, is an able lawyer, a fine debater, and has had experience as a legislator. In this capacity he served his constituents faithfully and with distinguished ability. He took a leading part in securing the passage of the law authorizing the refunding of the taxes to the people illegally assessed under the act of 1869.

Senator Steele is a candidate for the office. He was a leader in the Senate, is one of the most eloquent speakers in the State, was one of the Revisors of the Statutes of 1874—and many of the reforms in the laws of that year originated with him. He is a lawyer of ability, and whatever he does he will do well and faithfully.

Mr. Callahan is a candidate for this position. He is an able lawyer, and an honest man. He was a member of the house in the last general assembly, and in that capacity served his constituents with marked ability.

Obituary.

Major James Brown, of the law firm of Brown & Mosness, of this city, departed this life on the 13th inst., after an illness of about ten days, leaving a wife and three children. Mr. Brown was born at Ash Ridge, Brown County, Ohio, on the 2d of July, 1835. He was a brother of the late Wm. B. Brown, Colonel of the seventieth Ohio regiment of infantry, who was killed at the battle of Atlanta.

The deceased served in the same regiment, as one of the bravest of soldiers, during four years, when he attained the rank of Major, and, after the war, established his residence in Ford County, in this State, where he held the office of superintendent of schools, for two terms. He commenced the practice of law in 1869; came to Chicago in 1871, where he has since been engaged in the successful practice of his profession. He was an active member of the United Presbyterian Church, a good Christian, an exemplary gentleman, and a lawyer of recognized ability.

Thomas S. Bowen, a member of the Ottawa, Ill., bar, died at his residence, in East Ottawa, on Monday last. Mr. Bowen was one of the soldiers of the late war. He enlisted as a private soldier, and lost his right arm in battle; since the war he has practiced law in Ottawa. He was thirty-two years of age, and highly respected by his professional brethren and friends. A meeting of the Ottawa bar was held at the court house, on Tuesday, at which a committee was appointed to draft resolutions, and report at a meeting to be held to-day.

Rev. David J. Perry, of Normal township, Ill., died at his residence on Monday morning, aged 80 years, from paralysis, which first disabled him about two years ago. Mr. Perry was for many years the pastor of the first Presbyterian church of Bloomington. After retiring from the active duties of the ministry, he held a position in the McLean county bank. He was the father of the wife of John M. Scott, the esteemed chief justice of the supreme court of this State. He was a good citizen, a christian gentleman, and much respected by all who knew him.

Chief Justice Gilpin, of Delaware, was taken suddenly ill at the court house, at Dover, on Saturday, 29th ult., and in an hour was dead. Heart disease was the cause.

and it cannot be said complainant has any superior equities over defendants, because she dereigns title from the heirs who were minors when the proceedings were had. Purchasers at judicial sales who invest their capital upon the faith of a decree of court of competent jurisdiction have rights that are just as sacred and as much within the protection of the court as the rights of minor heirs. With the wisdom of this sale in the first instance, and of the propriety of making it in the manner it was, are questions with which this court has nothing to do in the present case. The defendants are in no way responsible for it, and are in no way answerable for any irregularities that may have intervened in conducting it.

The decree dismissing the bill will be affirmed.

SUPREME COURT, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,

IN GENERAL TERM.

JANUARY, 1876.

THE SECOND NATIONAL BANK OF LEAVENWORTH
v.
SAMUEL S MOOT, SAMUEL C. POMEROY and EHUD N. DARLING.

At Law.—No. 12,432.

1. A promissory note, actually made and signed in the city of Washington, but dated at Leavenworth, in the State of Kansas, and sent to the Second National Bank of Leavenworth, and by it discounted, is to be governed as respects a question of usury by the laws of Kansas.
2. To take out interest in advance on discounting a note by a bank is not usurious.
3. A contract for a loan of money at a rate of interest which is legal in the place where the contract is made, though the money is to be repaid in a State where the rate of interest is lower, is not usurious, provided it be not a mere device to evade the laws of the State where the money is to be repaid.

The case is stated in the opinion of the court.

REGINALD FENDALL for plaintiff.

T. T. CRITTENDEN for defendant.

Mr. Justice OLIN delivered the opinion of the court.

The action in this case was brought by plaintiff as holder of a promissory note made by the defendants, Smoot and Pomeroy, bearing date on the 27th of Nov., 1873, for $7,000, which note was made payable to the order of the defendant, Darling, at the Second National Bank, Leavenworth, Kansas, with 12 per cent. interest until paid. This note thus made and indorsed was transferred by indorsement to the plaintiff.

The cause was tried at the Circuit court in this district, before Justice Humphreys, which resulted in a verdict for the plaintiff, though I cannot find that in the record; but I suppose if the verdict had been in favor of the defendants, they would not have brought the case here on a bill of exceptions, and I think for this reason, and this alone, that the verdict of the jury must have been against the defendants.

But this is by no means the chief objection to this paper called a bill of exceptions. After wading through the bill of exceptions, in which seems to be printed not only every question put by counsel on either side, but also questions put by the court, comments, or remarks by counsel and court, whether the same were of any or the slightest importance in the world.

The whole thing looks like an attempt to daguerrotype all the ludicrous features of a trial rather than attempt to present such questions of law as the facts proven on the trial tended to raise.

For the evidence of this, select any page of the 48 printed pages of this bill of exceptions, so called. Take for illustration, pages 18 and 19 of this record.

The case is in this wise:

Some time before 1873, Smoot, one of the defendants, obtained a loan from the plaintiff, (2d National Bank, Leavenworth, Kansas,) of $20,000.

This loan of $20,000 from the bank was secured by the promissory notes of Smoot and Pomeroy, the latter said to be a Senator from Kansas. These notes were given, one for $8,000, one for $7,000 and one for $5.000. These notes were made payable on time, executed and sent from Washington, D. C., to the bank in Kansas; and the bank paid to the defendant, Smoot, the proceeds of these notes, less the discount for the time they had to run, at the rate of 12 per cent. per annum; the rate of interest agreed upon in the notes was 12 per cent. per annum after the maturity of the notes until paid. Twelve (12) per cent. per annum being the highest rate of interest allowed by law to be taken for the loan of money in the State of Kansas. These notes not being paid at maturity, some or all of them, new notes were given in renewal, and the new notes secured the payment of the amount due, including principal and interest, at the rate above mentioned.

Thus went on the dealings between Smoot and the bank until all of the loan of $20,000, and interest thereon was paid, except a note for $7,000, dated the 27th of November, 1873, payable 90 days after date at the bank in Kansas, made by Smoot and Pomeroy and indorsed by the other defendant, Darling, upon which note this suit is brought.

The plea interposed was the general issue. Under that issue was attempted to be tried whether, if the loan was not usurious in its inception, it did not become so by the arrangements that were made on the renewal of the various notes that were given. Without stopping to inquire whether the defense of usury may be interposed to a suit brought upon a promissory note where the plea of the general issue is alone interposed, on looking through this cause it seems quite unnecessary to consider that question.

The defense seems to have relied mainly on three propositions:

1st. That the notes given to secure the original loan of $20,000, being actually made and signed in this city and sent to Bank of Leavenworth, and by it discounted, it was a contract made in Washington, and not in Kansas, and that the law upon the subject of usury in this District must govern this contract of loan, instead of the usury laws of Kansas, the rate of interest authorized to be contracted to be paid being much less per annum than the rate allowed by the law of Kansas.

We think this proposition cannot be maintained. No valid contract was made for this loan of $20,000, until the notes offered as a security for its payment were accepted by the plaintiff, and the money advanced upon them. It seems hardly necessary to inquire whether, in such a transaction, the law of usury of this District should be applied to it, or the law of the State of Kansas, in which State the plaintiff had a legal existence and nowhere else.

2d. That by the arrangement entered into by which the discount was taken out of the proceeds of these notes, whether of original or renewals, the contract was usurious.

This proposition cannot be sustained. To take out interest in advance, is discounting a note without regard to the rules of rebate or discount, and there is no distinction between bankers and others. Manhattan Bank v. Osgood, 15 Johns., 168; Bank of Utica v. Wager, 2 Cow., 712; New York Fireman's Insurance Co. v. Ely., 2 Cow., 678; New York Fireman's Insurance Co. v. Sturges, 2 Cow.. 664; Utica Insurance Co. v. Bloodgood, and 4 Wend., 652.

3d. That some one or more of the renewal notes were made payable in the city of New York, in which State the law allowed, upon contracts made by its citizens to be performed within the State, a rate of interest not to exceed 7 per cent. per annum. That this agreement did not render the loan usurious. see Pratt v. Adams, 7 Paige Chy., 655, in which it was held that a contract for a loan of money at a rate or interest which is legal in a State where the contract is made and where the loan is to be advanced, though the money is to be repaid in a State where the rate of interest is lower, is not usurious, provided it be not a mere device to evade the laws of the State where the money is to be repaid.

The corporate existence of the plaintiff was confirmed by law to the limits of the State of Kansas, and both under the laws of Kansas and the laws of Congress, it was authorized to loan money at such rate per annum as was allowed by the law of Kansas. The bank was not authorized to transact its business outside of the limits of the State of Kansas, yet no law of Congress or of the State of Kansas precluded a citizen of this district or of any other State in the Union, from making a loan from the plaintiffs at any rate of interest allowed by law in Kansas.

I see no error in the ruling of the justice who presided at the trial prejudicial to the defendant. The defense interposed was that of usury; and as we think there was no evidence in the case, all of which was recited in the bill of exceptions, proving or tending to prove any usurious agreement, the judgment of the court below must be affirmed with costs.

SUPREME COURT OF RHODE ISLAND.

OPINION MARCH 21, 1876.

CHARLES DYER, Collector of Taxes, v. JOSEPH OSBORN.

PERSONAL PROPERTY TAXED IN ONE STATE MAY BE TAXED IN ANOTHER STATE.

1. O., a resident and tax-payer in Tiverton, R. I., owned certain shares of manufacturing corporations organized under the laws of Massachusetts, and located with their property in Fall River in that State, where all their property was invested. O. was taxed in Fall River for these shares, assessed under the laws of Massachusetts at their fair market value, and paid the tax. In the same year he was again taxed in Tiverton under the laws of Rhode Island for the same shares.
Held, That under Gen. Stat. R. I., cap. 38, § 1, and cap. 39, § 10, this second tax was valid.
2. Held, further, that it did not conflict with Art. I., § 2 of the Constitution of Rhode Island, which provided that "the burdens of the State ought to be fairly distributed among its citizens."
3. Held, further, that the Massachusetts tax, even if valid, could not divest Rhode Island of its jurisdiction, and that the amount of tax levied "is, within reasonable limits at least, a legislative, not a judicial question."

DURFEE, C. J.—This is an action on the case to recover a tax of $280.00 assessed on the defendant in the town of Tiverton, in the year 1874. The defendant pleads in bar of the action, that in compliance with a notice given by the assessors as prescribed by the statute, Gen. Stat. R. I. cap. 40, § 6, he rendered an account on oath as required by § 7 of that chapter, and this tax was duly assessed by the assessors upon the ratable property and estate in said account mentioned, and was by him promptly paid to the collector of taxes, and he further avers and pleads, "the taxes in the plaintiffs declaration mentioned were assessed upon other property of the defendant, to wit: upon forty shares of the capital stock or corporate property of certain manufacturing corporations, organized under the laws of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, and located with their said property in the city of Fall River, in the said commonwealth, which said shares were of the par value of $40,000; all of which said capital stock of said corporations was then invested in lands, factory buildings, tenement houses, permanent and movable machinery and stock in process, all located and established in Fall River aforesaid, and said shares in the said corporate property were all taxed to this defendant in said Fall River at their fair market value, and which said tax in said Fall River he duly paid; and this defendant avers that the tax in the said plaintiff's declaration mentioned was assessed on the said shares in the said corporate property, and not upon other and different property or estate of the defendant, and that the said property was not ratable in the said town of Tiverton, and that the said tax mentioned in the plaintiff's declaration and assessed thereon was and is illegal and void," etc. To this plea the plaintiff demurs.

The declaration describes the defendant as "of Tiverton," and for anything that appears in the plea, he was a citizen or inhabitant of the State, having his domicil in that town. The question, therefore, which is presented by the pleading is, whether a citizen or inhabitant of the State is liable to pay a tax assessed against him in the town of his domicil upon shares of stock which he owns in a manufacturing corporation of another State, he having been taxed and paid the tax on the same shares in such other State.

The question arises under chapters 38 and 39 of the General Statutes. The first section of chapter 38 declares that "all real property in the State, and all personal property belonging to the inhabitants thereof, shall be liable to taxation unless otherwise specially provided." Section 10 of chapter 39 declares that "personal property, for the purposes of taxation, shall be deemed to include all goods, chattels, debts due from solvent persons, moneys and effects, wherever they may be; all ships or vessels at home or abroad; all public stocks and securities, except those issued by the government of the United States; all stocks or shares in any bank or banking association; in any turnpike, bridge, or other corporation within or without the State, except such as are exempted from taxation by the laws of the State."

The language is plain. It clearly makes the shares of any corporation, whether manufacturing or other, whether without or within the State, liable to taxation, if the owner is an inhabitant of the state, unless such shares are exempted from taxation by the laws of the state. At the time the tax now sued for was assessed, shares in the stock of a manufacturing corporation of another State was not exempted from taxation by the laws of this State. Upon what ground then can we hold that the assessment of the tax was illegal and void?

The defendant says the practice of assessors in regard to the taxation of such shares has varied, and that in a majority of the towns such shares have not been taxed to their owners living in this State. A practice under a statute which has been uniform and long continued is entitled to weight in construing a statute, if the construction is open to serious doubt. The practice here invoked has not been uniform, and we do not think there can be any serious doubt of the true construction of the statute.

The defendant contends that the assessment, even if within the statute, was illegal and void. He does not point to any specific provision of the Constitution of either the State or the United States which is infringed by the assessment, or by the statute which authorized it, but he plants himself upon the broad ground that the assessment of such a tax is not the exercise of a legitimate power of the State. He has cited numerous cases which he contends support this position. The cases specially referred to are Green v. Van Buskirk, 7 Wall. 139; Railroad Co. v. Jackson, 7 Wall. 262; State Tax on Foreign-held Bonds, 15 Wall. 300; Jones v. Town of Bridgeport, 36 Conn. 283; Hoyt v. The Commissioners of Taxes, 23 N. Y. 224; Duer v Small, 17 How. Pr. 201; People ex rel. Trowbridge v. Com. of Taxes, 11 N. Y. Supreme Ct. 595.

In Green v. Van Buskirk, 7 Wall. 139, a resident of New York mortgaged personal property in Illinois to secure an existing debt. In New York no record or delivery of the property was required to give the mortgage effect, but in Illinois the mortgage without record and delivery was ineffectual as to third persons. The property was attached in Illinois after the mortgage was made and before it could be recorded. The Supreme court of the United States held that the property, though personal, being situated in Illinois, was subject to the law of Illinois, in respect to attachment.

In Railroad Co. v. Jackson, 7 Wall. 262, the point decided was that interest on bonds issued by a corporation created by two States, and binding the road in both States, could not be specifically taxed in one of the States. In this case the bondholder was a non-resident.

In State Tax on Foreign-held Bonds, 15 Wall. 300, it was decided that bonds issued by a railroad company of Pennsylvania and Ohio, and held by a non-resident, were not taxable in Pennsylvania, upon the ground that, being held by a non-resident, they were only property in his hands, and thus were beyond the jurisdiction of the taxing power of the State, and that the law authorizing their taxation impaired the obligation of the contract between the corporation and the bondholder.

In Jones v. Town of Bridgeport, 36 Conn. 283, real estate in Connecticut, belonging to a corporation in New York, was taxed to the corporation, after an assignment in bankruptcy, the assessors being ignorant of the assignment, which had not been recorded in Connecticut, and the tax was sustained.

In Hoyt v. The Commissioners of Taxes, 23 N. Y. 224, under a statute providing that "all lands and all personal estate within this State, whether owned by individuals or corporations, shall be liable to taxation," etc., it was decided that a resident of New York was not liable to taxation in that State for his capital employed in business in New Orleans, or for his farm stock and household furniture in New Jersey.

In Duer v. Small, 17 How. Pr. 201, it was held that a statute was not unconstitutional which provided that a non-resident doing business in New York was taxable the same as a resident upon his personal estate invested in the business.

The doctrine of these cases appears to be that personal property which is visible and tangible, and which therefore can have a situs independent of its owner, may for certain purposes, and especially for taxation, be localized, so to speak, and subjected directly to the law of the State where it is situated; but that if it be a mere debt or pecuniary obligation, it is incapable of having a situs apart from its owner, and therefore can only be taxed to its owner in the State where he resides. We do not find anything in either of the cases which is to the effect that the shareholders of a corporation can only be taxed in the State where the corporation is situated.

The case of Trowbridge v. Com. of Taxes, 11 N. Y., Supreme Ct., 595, is more nearly in point. It was held in that case that the shares of a foreign corporation, owned in New York, were not property within that State, under the tax law of that State, but simply representatives of capital or property invested in the business of the corporation in the State where it was situated. The case seems to hold that the property of the shareholders is not distinguishable from the property of the corporation, and therefore cannot have a separate situs or locality. This may be so within the meaning of the tax law of New York, but ordinarily the property of shareholders is distinguishable from that of the corporation; for, whereas the shares are and must be personal estate of the nature of choses in action, the property of the corporation may be real estate or visible and tangible chattels or effects. Angell & Ames on Corp. (7th ed.), §§ 560, 561, and cases cited; Arnold v. Ruggles, 1 R. I., 167-9.

There are cases which expressly hold that an owner of shares in the stock of a foreign corporation is liable to taxation for such shares in the State where he resides. In Great Barrington v. County Commissioners of Berkshire, 16 Pick., 572, under a statute subjecting to taxation "shares or property in any incorporated company for a bridge or a turnpike road," it was held that a citizen of Massachusetts was liable to be taxed in that State for his stock in a New York turnpike corporation, notwithstanding the fact that under the law of New York the corporation held the soil of the road in fee. "No exception," say the court, "is made of companies in other States, and the court perceive no reason for raising any by implication."

In McKeen v. The County of Northampton, 49 Pa. St., 519, a person residing in Pennsylvania and owning 472 shares of stock in a manufacturing corporation of New Jersey, the capital of which was invested in a foundry, machine-shop, and other real estate in New Jersey, and taxed under the laws of that State, was held liable to taxation for his shares in Pennsylvania for State and county purposes. The court say: "The defendant below, being a citizen of this State, it is clear he is subject personally to its power to tax, and that all his property accompanying his person, or falling legitimately within the territorial jurisdiction of the State, is equally within its authority. The interest which an owner of shares has in the stock of a corporation is personal; whithersoever he goes it accompanies him, and when he dies his domicil governs its succession." The court also averts to the fact that the tax is not assessed upon the shares specifically, but upon the person of their owner, the shares being merely a measure of taxation, and is enforced by warrant against the owner personally or against any property he has, whether taxed or not. See also Whitesell v. The County of Northampton, 49 Pa. St., 526.

It has been held that shares in the stock of a corporation are taxable as such to their owner, though the corporation is itself exempt from taxation by charter. Union Bank v. The State, 9 Yerg., 490; or though the capital of the corporation is invested wholly or in part in United States bonds, which cannot themselves be taxed. National Bank v. Commonwealth, 9 Wall, 353; St. Louis Building and Savings Association v. Lightner, 47 Mo., 393. In Union Bank v. The State, 9 Yerg., 490, the doctrine of the court was that such a tax must be, from its very nature, a tax in personam and not in rem. "Bank stock," say the court, "is not a thing in itself capable of being taxed on account of its locality, and any tax imposed upon it must be in the nature of a tax upon income, and of necessity confined to the person of the owner, and if he be a non-resident, he is beyond the jurisdiction of the State, and not subject to her laws."

These cases are to the effect, that shares in the stock of a corporation are in the nature of choses in action, incorporeal, and have no situs independently of their owner, and that, consequently, the State has jurisdiction over them to tax them by having jurisdiction over their owner, the tax being in fact a tax upon the owner on account of his ownership, rather than upon the shares themselves. In the light of these cases, we think the defendant's claim, that the tax sued for could not be legally assessed for want of jurisdiction, cannot be sustained.

The plea avers that the defendant has already paid a tax assessed upon the shares in Massachusetts. It is doubtless a hardship for him to pay taxes on the same property in two States. But the Massachusetts tax, even if valid, could not divest this State of its jurisdiction. The laws of Rhode Island are paramount in Rhode Island, and all the inhabitants of the State are subject to them without regard to the laws of any other State. If there be any ground upon which the defendant is entitled to exoneration because of the Massachusetts tax, it is that clause of our Constitution which declares that "the burdens of the State ought to be fairly distributed among its citizens," and upon the claim that it is unfair to tax him in Rhode Island for property on which he has paid a tax in Massachusetts. We do not think, however, that the tax ought to be declared void under that clause of the Constitution. It would certainly be going too far to hold that a man of wealth, living in Rhode Island, cannot be taxed at all in Rhode Island, if his property is all invested in the stocks of a manufacturing corporation of another State, and there subject to taxation. And if such a man can be taxed at all in Rhode Island, the question of how much is, within reasonable limits at least, a legislative, not a judicial question.

The defendant's plea will be overruled, and judgment entered for the plaintiff for the amount of the tax with interest.

Demurrer sustained.

FRANCIS P. PECKHAM, for plaintiff.

WILLIAM P. SHEFFIELD, for defendant.

SUPREME COURT OF RHODE ISLAND.

NOTES TO CASES DECIDED IN 1876.

AMENDMENTS.

A statute providing that the court may at any time allow either of the parties to an action to amend any defect in the process of pleading.—A motion was made to substitute for the name of the plaintiff, H. H. Thayer, described in the declaration as "assignee of Walter W. Salter and Max F. Greene, both of said New York, copartners, as W.W. Salter & Company," the words, "W. W. Salter and Max F. Greene, both of the city, county and State of New York, copartners, as W. W. Salter & Company, as trustees for H. H. Thayer, of said city of New York, assignee of said W. W. Salter & Company. Held, that the amendment being tantamount to the substitution of a new action could not be allowed.—Thayer v. Farrell.

ATTACHMENT.

A statute providing that "every original writ issued against a female founded on a contract shall be a writ of summons."—a writ in assumpsit was served on an executrix de son tort by attaching her personalty. Held, the service was illegal. Martin v. Hand.

EXECUTION.

Execution for costs against the body of a plaintiff in trover was served by arrest. Held, on petition for habeas corpus, that as it did not appear the imprisoned plaintiff was about departing from the State without leaving sufficient estate to satisfy the judgment, or that he had fraudulently concealed and detained or disposed of his property, the execution against the body was illegal.—Thayer's Petition.

MUNICIPALITY.

Contract made by D. "in behalf of the city of Providence," signed and sealed by D. Held, the contract of D., not that of the city. Semble, that the general rule, that contracts by a public officer in his official capacity in behalf of the public, will not bind such officer personally, does not apply to municipal officers.—City of Providence v. Miller.

INDICTMENT.

1. In an indictment for embezzlement, or in one for aiding and counseling embezzlement, the day named for the commission of the offense is not material, and evidence may be given referring to any other day before the finding of the indictment.

2. An accused, indicted for embezzlement, will, on application to the prosecutor, be informed of the specific acts to be proven against him. This information, if refused, may be ordered by the court.

3. Arrangements for embezzlement by the fraudulent issue of checks, were made between C., the aiding and abetting accomplice, and B., the principal, September 21. The embezzlement was consummated by cashing the checks, September 24. Held, that C.'s offense was continuous from the arrangements of the 21st to the consummation on the 24th. State v. Cushing.

ULTRA VIRES.

1. A corporation was created by the legislature of Rhode Island under the name of the W. Co. Nothing in the act of incorporation specified the business to be done, nor did anything in the corporate name suggest it. All its stock was held by a single stockholder. The corporation entered into a partnership with A., to be terminated at will by the corporation.

Held, that the partnership was not ultra vires on the part of the corporation.

2. Semble, that if A. was to have no control as partner, and was to receive part profits for his services, the partnership could not on any principle be ultra vires on the part of the corporation. Allen v. Woonsocket Co.

SUPREME COURT OF INDIANA.

From the Indianapolis Sentinel:

CRIMINAL PRACTICE — CERTAINTY OF DESCRIPTION IN INDICTMENT.

John Ripley Arnold v. the State of Indiana, Shelby C. C. Buskirk, J.

It is not necessary in an indictment for the larceny or robbery of bank-notes to state the numbers upon the bills; but the number of the bills stolen, with their denominations and value, should be stated. The indictment in the case in judgment should have been quashed for its failure to state the denominations (or the equivalent words for the payment of a certain sum of money) of the bills alleged to have been taken. Judgment reversed.

PRACTICE—BILLS OF EXCEPTIONS.

Leander Bringham v. William Elmore, White C. C. Downey, J.

The only question submitted for decision in this case is as to the correctness of an instruction given by the court. The instruction is not in any bill of exceptions, nor is it signed by the judge or by the attorney of the defendant. There is this entry at the bottom of it: "Given and excepted to," signed by the attorney of the plaintiff. We think the instruction is not properly in the record. 37 Ind. 325, 46 Ind. 197. Judgment affirmed.

Peter Kutch v. John J. Combs, Greene C. P., per Curiam.

This case having been dismissed before the opinion was filed, and that fact having been overlooked, it is now ordered that the judgment of this court reversing the judgment below be set aside, and that the cause stand dismissed according to the former order.

AGENCY—THE CONSTRUCTION OF AN AGENT'S AUTHORITY WHERE THE AUTHORITY IS GIVEN BY A FORMAL INSTRUMENT.

When an authority is conferred upon an agent by a formal instrument, as by a power of attorney, there are two rules of construction to be carefully attended to:—

1. The meaning of general words in the instrument will be restricted by the context, and construed accordingly.

2. The authority will be construed strictly, so as to exclude the exercise of any power which is not warranted either by the actual terms used, or as a necessary means of executing the authority with effect.

With respect to the former rule, which is not confined to questions of ageucy, a leading case upon the general principle is Lord Arlington v. Merrick (2 Wms. Saunders, 411a), decided at the King's Bench in 1672. An action of debt on a bond having been brought against the defendant, he prayed oyer of the condition of the bond. Lord Arlington, Postmaster-General for the time being, had appointed one J., as his deputy at Oxford for the term of six months following, on condition that he would faithfully perform all the duties of the office. One of the deputy's duties was, at the end of every month to pay into the General Post Office all moneys received by him in his office. The bond was dated and executed in 1667. Within two or three years of its execution J. received money for which he failed to account, and an action was thereupon brought against the defendant as his surety. Hale, C. J., and the other learned judges were clearly of opinion that the condition should refer only to the recital by which the defendant was bound for six months, In Rooke v. Lord Kensington (2 K. & J., 753) the subject was fully considered by Sir W. Page Wood, V. C. Jenner v. Jenner (L. Rep. 1 Eq., 361) is a later authority; but the above principle is well established, and has been applied in a variety of cases, for example, by Lord Mansfield in Moore v Magrath (1 Crop., 9.)

Now let us turn to the more modern cases in which the question had reference to the authority of an agent. In Hay v. Goldsmidt (referred to in Hogg v. Snaith, 1 Taunt. 349) decided by the Court of King's Bench in 1804, the action was brought to recover money received by the defendants upon a bill of exchange. The bill was payable to the plaintiff's testator or his order. The testator had granted to J. and R. a power of attorney authorizing them to ask, demand and receive "all money that might become due to him on any account whatsoever, and to transact all business, and upon non-payment or non-delivery thereof, for him, and in his name, to use all such lawful ways and means for the recovery thereof as he might or could do if he was personally present and did the same." They received the bill abovementioned under this power, and having severally indorsed it in the name of the testator, discounted it with the defendants, who afterwards received the value from the acceptors. At the trial a verdict was found for the plaintiffs, but a rule was granted for setting aside the verdict and entering a nonsuit, on the ground that J. and R. had authority to indorse and discount the bill. Upon argument, the court held that the power "to transact all business" did not authorize the indorsement, and that inasmuch as the largest powers must be construed with reference to the subject matter, the words "all business" must be confined to all business necessary for the receipt of money. So in Hogg v. Snaith, (sup.) decided in 1808, where the power of attorney authorized the agent to receive all salary and money, to compound, discharge, give releases, and appoint substitutes, it was held that the power did not authorise the negotiation of bills received in payment, nor the indorsing of them in the agent's own name. It was further held that evidence of an usage at the navy office to pay bills indorsed by the attorney in his own name, and negotiated by him under such a power, could not be received to enlarge the operation of the power.

The above decisions were approved in Murray v. East India Company, (5 B. & A. 204), decided 1821, in which it was held that a power of attorney empowering an agent to demand, sue for, recover and receive all moneys, debts and dues, and to give discharges, did not authorize him to indorse bills for his principal.

Similar questions were again raised in Attwood v. Munnings, (7 B. & C. 278), decided in 1827. The defendant, a member of a firm of merchants, on going abroad, granted a power of attorney to A., B., and C. his wife, jointly and severally for him and in his name, and to his use, to sne for and get in moneys and goods, "to indorse, negotiate and discount, or acquit and discharge the bills of exchange, promissory notes, or other negotiable securities which were or should be payable to him, and should need and require his indorsement." By another power of attorney subsequently executed, he gave to his wife C., amongst other powers, authority for him and on his behalf, to pay and accept such bills of exchange as should be drawn or charged on him by his agents or correspondents as occasion should require, ... and generally to do, negotiate and transact the affairs and business of him, defendant, during his absence, as fully and effectually as if he were present and acting therein. While he was abroad, A., who was also one of the partners in the same business, and who acted as the defendant's agent, drew four bills of exchange upon the defendant, for the purpose of paying creditors of the partnership business. They were accepted by the defendant's wife in his name, and the proceeds applied in payment of the partnership debts. The plaintiffs were indorsees of the bills. The court decided, upon these facts, first, that the right of the indorsee depended upon the authorities given by the attorney: secondly, that the powers applied only to the defendant's individual and not to his partnership affairs; thirdly, that the special power to accept extended only to bills drawn by an agent in that capacity, and that A. did not draw the bill in question as agent, but as partner; and lastly, that the general words in the powers of attorney were not to be construed at large, but as giving general powers for carrying into effect the special purposes for which they were given. "By the first of the powers in question," said Mr. Justice Bayley, "the defendant gave to certain persons authority to do certain acts for him, and in his name and to his use. It is rather a power to take than to bind; and, looking at the whole of the instrument, although general words are used, it only authorizes acts to be done for the defendant singly; it contains no express power to accept bills, nor does there appear to have been an intention to give it. The first power, therefore, did not warrant acceptance. The second power gave an express authority to accept bills for the defendant and on his behalf. No such power was requisite as to partnership transactions, for the other partners might bind the firm by their acceptance." A judgment of nonsuit was entered.

This decision of tho Court of King's Bench was mentioned with approval in the Court of Common Pleas two years afterwards, in the case of Withington v. Herring, (5 Bing. 442), 1829, where, however, owing to the different facts of the case, a different ratio decidendi applied. C. entered into an agreement with the defendants in which he undertook to carry on certain mining speculations for them in America. He was furnished with instructions and a letter of authority to draw on the defendants for £10,000. By a power of attorney he was authorised "to take and work mines, to purchase tools and materials, and erect the necessary buildings, and to execute any deeds or instruments he might deem necessary for the purpose." After he had raised the £10,000 under the letter of authority, he obtained £1,500 of the plaintiff in America, and applied the money to the use of the defendants. He did not show the letter of authority to the plaintiff, nor did it appear that the plaintiff knew that money had been previously raised by C. The court was of opinion that the plaintiff was entitled to recover the £1,500 from the defendants, as money had and received to their use. The court was of opinion that the agent had an implied authority to raise the money advanced, for the reason apparently that the exercise of authority in raising the money was an act necessary for executing the original authority with effect. This seems to be the true ground of the decision.

The rule was stated by Baron Alderson in a later case, (Esdaile v. La Nanze, 1 Y. & C. 394, 1835), to the effect that general words "must be construed with respect to the antecedent matter which states the purpose for which the letter of attorney was given. Perhaps they would be sufficient to confer all powers not specifically enumerated, but necessary to carry the principal purpose of the letter of attorney into effect."—The London Law Times.

THE London Solicitors' Journal says: "A curious case has recently arisen in Japan, bearing on the press laws which exist in that country. A British subject claiming the rights of a free press under the extra-territorial jurisdiction clause of our treaty, established a Japanese newspaper, and began to circulate it. The press laws insist on the registration of a Japanese paper; this was unregistered. They control the expression of opinion; the proprietor of this journal claimed that he was liable to no such control. The Japanese represented to Sir Harry Parkes the anomaly and manifest injustice involved in this claim; and, feeling the justice and reason of the representation, Sir Harry issued a notification, in virtue of the powers vested in him by the Order in Council for China and Japan, making it penal for British subjects to publish newspapers in the Japanese language.

NASHVILLE, JAN. 22, 1876.

Bidwell and Wife v. Paul and Others.

RECEIVER.—The beneficiary in a trust deed may have a receiver appointed, and the proceeds of the security impounded for his benefit, during the litigation, after his right to sale of the property has been adjudged.—Ed. Com. and Legal Reporter.

By the court, FREEMAN, J.

This is an application for a receiver. Property was conveyed by deed of trust to secure payment of debts. One side claimed the deed was fraudulently obtained, and the beneficiary filed cross-bill to enforce trust by sale of property, asking for a receiver. None was appointed, however, in the court below, and no steps taken in that direction, we believe.

The Chancellor finally decreed sale of the property to pay a debt ascertained by him as a lien on the fund under the trust deed. An appeal is prosecuted in forma pauperis. In addition, it is alleged in the cross-bill, that the security is scarcely sufficient to pay the debt claimed.

Under these facts a receiver must be appointed and property rented out—the fund thus arising to be held subject to final disposition of the cause. In case of strict mortgage, it is well settled the mortgagee is entitled to a receiver of the rents during progress of the suit to foreclose, and that one will be appointed, even though there be no prayer for it in the bill, if the facts stated or shown to the court require it. Henshaw, Ward & Co. v. Wells et al., 9 Hum., 583. A deed of trust is in substance a mortgage, though some immaterial differences may be found between them. The trustee in this case was bound to have sold long since by terms of the deed. The security may be impaired by use, and change of circumstances of the country. It has been conveyed to the trustee for payment of this debt. It is not unreasonable that the proceeds of the security shall be impounded for benefit of creditor during the litigation, especially after his right to sale of property has been adjudged. In renting the property, the claimants will be entitled to preference, upon securing the rent by note to the receiver. The property will be rented for a year from this time.

U. S. CIRCUIT COURT OF OREGON.

BEFORE DEADY, J.

W. T. Wythe v. A. Myers—Action to recover possession of real property.

Monday, April 10, 1876.

In an action to recover possession of real property, a statement in the answer of the grounds upon or means by which the defendant claims to be the owner of the property is irrelevant, and may be stricken out on motion.

An allegation in the answer to the effect that the defendant derives title to the premises from the administrators of W. H. Willson, it not appearing that said Willson was ever seized or possessed of the property, is frivolous, and may be stricken out on motion.

An allegation of the administrators of said Willson conveyed the premises to the defendant's grantors on March 30, 1859, "in obedience to an order of the probate court of Marion county," of March 29, 1859, may be stricken out as frivolous and irrelevant—it not appearing therefrom that said order was duly or lawfully made, or that such court had authority to make the same.

The defendant may allege in his answer that he is the owner of the premises in controversy, but if he couples such allegation with a statement of the grounds of his title from which it does not appear that he is such owner the matter may be stricken out as sham.

A counter-claim for permanent improvements should not be pleaded to the whole complaint, but only to so much thereof as to which it is an answer or defence; and it should allege the present value of said improvements, and that they better the condition of the property for the ordinary purposes for which it is used.

The right to damages for withholding the possession of real property given by the Or. Code, (§§ 313, 318), is equivalent to the action of trespass for mesne profits given by the common law, and includes all damages to which the owner is entitled on account of the wrongful occupation of the premises, as well as for waste committed or suffered by the occupant as the value of the use and occupation; such right is a distinct cause of action, and if joined with a claim for possession, should be separately stated.

Lapse of time short of twenty years is not a bar to an action to recover possession of real property when the defendant claims under a sale by an administrator, except where the sale was made under § 42 of chap. V., of the Code of 1854, to pay the decedent's debts, and the plaintiff claims under such decedent.

If a defendaut wishes to contest the citizenship of the parties to an action in the national courts, he must do so by plea in abatement; and such a plea, if joined to one to the merits, may be stricken out; but is not liable to a demurrer.

DR. KENEALY AND THE BENCHERS OF GRAY'S INN.—The long pending suit between Dr. Kenealy and the benchers of Gray's Inn has at last been set down for hearing in the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice. The benchers claim possession of the set of chambers which Dr. Kenealy formerly occupied as a bencher of the Inn, and which, they claim, reverted to the Inn when the Doctor was disbarred. Dr. Kenealy, on the other hand, seems to insist that his estate in the rooms in question is a freehold for his life, while he adds a counter-claim in tort for wrongful and malicious disbarment, in respect of which he estimates his damages at £25,000. There can be, of course, no doubt, (says the Observer) as to the decision at which the Vice Chancellor, before whom the case is heard, will arrive. Dr. Kenealy, however, if he chooses to contest the point by way of advertisement for himself and his wrongs, will be able to carry an appeal to the full court, and thence, if he pleases, to the House of Lords. The principle that an Inn of Court is a perfectly voluntary body like a club, and is not liable at law for anything which it may choose either to do or to refuse to do, has been repeatedly affirmed; and we may consequently take it for granted that the Doctor's case will be tried, not upon the facts, but upon demurrer, and that whatever development the cause may assume, the bencher's of Gray's Inn will ultimately succeed in their ejectment. At the same time it is clear that the position of an Inn of Court, as a purely voluntary body, is not without its disadvantages. If the benchers of Gray's Inn had been ordinary landlords, and Doctor Kenealy an ordinary tenant, notice to quit could have been served and ejected effected long ago, without all the trouble and expense of a chancery suit.—Public Opinion.

THE Supreme Court of Illinois will meet at Mount Vernon, on Tuesday, June 6th. There will undoubtedly be a large number of the members of the bar from southern Illinois, in attendance at this term—this being the presidential year. The bar in southern Illinois have, for years, made it a practice to endeavor to meet their brethren at the June term, and talk over political matters.

UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT.

No. 857.—OCTOBER TERM, 1875.

H. G. ANGLE, Appellant,
v.
NORTHWESTERN MUTUAL LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY

Appeal from the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Iowa.

AUTHORITY OF AGENT—RIGHT TO FILL BLANKS IN NOTE—EFFECT OF ERASING WHAT IS WRITTEN OR PRINTED IN A NOTE.

1. AUTHORITY OF AGENT.—That persons dealing with an agent are entitled to the same protection as if dealing with the principal, to the extent that the agent acts within the scope of his authority.

2. FILLING BLANKS IN NEGOTIABLE NOTE.—That where a party to an negotiable instrument, intrusts it to another for use as such, with blanks not filled up, such instrument so delivered, carries on its face an implied authority to complete the same, by filling up the blanks; but the authority implied from the existence of the blanks, would not authorize the person entrusted with the instrument, to vary or alter the material terms of the instrument, by erasing what is written or printed as part of the same, nor to revert the scope and meaning of the same, by filling the blanks with stipulations repugnant to what was plainly and clearly expressed in the instrument before it was delivered.

3. WHEN CHANGES MAKE NOTE INVALID.—That when one entrusted with negotiable securities for use by the parties to it, may, if it contain blanks, fill the same; but if he materially change words which are printed or written, the note, by such change, would be rendered invalid.

4. WHERE THERE ARE MARKS OF ALTERATION ON FACE OF NOTE.—That where a person takes a note with such marks upon its face, he must be presumed to have knowledge of what it imported.

5. ACTUAL NOTICE.—That actual notice, in such a case is not required, even in suits founded upon negotiable securities, where the evidence of its infirmity consists of matters apparent on its face; nor is any different or stricter rule applicable in cases like the present, it appearing that the printed words, though erased so as to be inoperative, were still entirely legible, even to the casual reader, and the words "current funds," inserted before the erased word "drafts," were plainly repugnant to the erased words "drafts to the order of," which followed them in the same connection.

6. CONSTRUCTIVE NOTICE.—That constructive notice, in such cases, is held sufficient, upon the ground that when a party is about to perform an act which he has reason to believe may affect the rights of third persons, an inquiry as to the facts is a moral duty, and diligence an act of justice. Whatever puts a party upon inquiry in such a case, is sufficient notice in equity, where the means of knowledge are at hand: and if the party, under such circumstances, omits to inquire, and proceeds to do the act, he does so at his peril, as he is then chargeable with all the facts which, by a proper inquiry, he might have ascertained. —[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

Mr Justice CLIFFORD delivered the opinion of the court.

Persons dealing with an agent are entitled to the same protection as if dealing with the principal, to the extent that the agent acts within the scope of his authority.

Pursuant to that rule, it is settled law that where a party to a negotiable instrument intrusts it to another for use as such, with blanks not filled up, such instrument, so delivered, carries on its face an implied authority to complete the same by filling up the blanks; but the authority implied from the existence of the blanks, would not authorize the person intrusted with the instrument to vary or alter the material terms of the instrument by erasing what is written or printed as part of the same, nor to pervert the scope and meaning of the same by filling the blanks with stipulations repugnant to what was plainly and clearly expressed in the instrument before it was so delivered.

By virtue of the implied authority, such a depositary may perfect, in his discretion, what is incomplete, by filling the blanks, but he may not make a new instrument by erasing what is written or printed, nor by filling the blanks with stipulations repugnant to the plainly expressed intention of the same, as shown by its written or printed terms. (Goodman v. Simonds, 20 How., 361; Bank v. Neal, 22 Id., 108.)

Much reference to the pleadings will be unnecessary, as the questions presented for decision arise chiefly out of the facts deducible from the proofs exhibited in the record. Suffice it to say, in that regard, that the suit was instituted by the complainant to procure a decree that the bond and mortgage and the two fire insurance policies described in the bill of complaint, were delivered and assigned to the respondents without consideration, and to obtain a decree setting aside said bond and mortgage and for a return of said policies, the same having been delivered to the respondents as additional security for a loan of ten thousand dollars, the proceeds of which never came to the hands of the complainant; and he charges that the proceeds of the loan were never forwarded to him by his authority, that if the insurance company ever paid the same in current funds to the person through whom the loan was negotiated, upon any order signed by him, as pretended by the respondents, the order was forged by the party who presented it or by some person interested, to cheat and defraud the complainant out of the money.

Service was made and the corporation respondents appeared and filed an answer, in which they allege that the bond, mortgage and fire policies were duly delivered to the company by the agent of the complainant, and they deny that the order for the payment of the proceeds of the loan was forged, and aver that they made the payment to the person who presented it, in good faith. Proofs were taken, and the court, having heard the parties, entered a decree dismissing the bill of complaint, and the complainant appealed to this court.

Sufficient appears to show that the respondents are a corporation created by the laws of Wisconsin, and that they were doing a life insurance business throughout the Northwestern States, and it also appeared that they were accustomed to loan money on real estate securities. Agents were appointed by the respondents, in the different States, whose duty it was to solicit applications for policies and to transact other matters connected with their insurance business.

State agents were appointed by the company, but it is conceded that they in turn appointed sub-agents to perform the same duties, and it appears that the commissions for all such services were paid by the company to the State agents.

Applications for loans of money were frequently made to the company through the state agents, and it appears that such agents of the company were furnished with blank forms for such applications and for the appraisement of real estate intended as security for such loans. When an application for a loan was made the blank forms were filled up by the agent, and it was the business of the borrower to furnish abstracts of the title of the real estate offered as security, all of which were transmitted by the agent to the home office for examination, and if approved, the course of business was that the bond and mortgage were prepared and forwarded to the agent to be delivered to the applicant for execution and return.

Of course the applicant might still refuse to execute the bond and mortgage, but if he was satisfied with the terms of the instruments, and completed the same they were given back to the agent and were by him returned to the company, and it seems that the money loaned was usually transmitted to the applicant by means of a draft payable to the order of the borrower, or, in certain cases, the money was paid by the company at the home office, pursuant to the written order of the borrower, evidenced by a receipt on the back of the order by the person in whose favor it was drawn. Such papers from the home office to the borrower and from the borrower to the company, it is conceded, are usually mailed to the State agent, and that they pass through his office but it is insisted by the respondents that he has no interest in the business and that he receives no compensation from the company for his services.

Sub agents, it is conceded, were employed by the agents appointed by the company, and it appears that I. T. Martin, during the winter and spring of 1871, was a regular agent of the company, appointed for the State of Iowa, and that he employed one C. W. Copeland, as sub-agent, to solicit applications for life insurance, and that Copeland claimed to be the agent of the company to effect loans in their behalf on security of real estate, and that he represented to the complainant that he, the sub-agent, could procure for the complainant a loan from the company of ten thousand dollars on such security.

Both the complainant and Copeland then resided at Cedar Rapids, and it was at that place and about that time that the former was introduced to the latter, and it appears that Copeland was, at that time, canvassing for the company, to procure customers to take policies in the company, and to induce persons to take loans from the company on security of real estate. About the same time Copeland published a card in one or more of the local newspapers, representing that he was the agent of the company, and it appears that he exhibited to the complainant pamphlets, circulars, and other documents, of the kind prepared and distributed by the State agents as the means of extending the business of the company, and that notice was published by the same party, in one or more of the local journals, in which he is described as the agent of the insurance company.

Evidence entirely satisfactory was introduced, showing that it was during that period that the complainant commenced negotiations with Copeland to obtain for him a loan from the company for the sum of ten thousand dollars, to be secured by bond and mortgage of real estate. Conversation ensued between them, and the evidence shows that Copeland told the complainant that he was going to quit preaching, and that he had made arrangements to act as attorney for the said insurance company, that he had already secured a loan for one person, and that, being an intimate friend of the general agent, he could get the money whenever he recommended a loan.

Blank forms were requisite, and it appears that Copeland furnished the complainant with a printed blank form of an application for a loan, and that he requested the complainant merely to insert the description of the property to be offered as security and his valuation of the same, stating that he, the agent, would fill the other blanks and send the application forward. Accordingly the complainant inserted the description of the property, giving his valuation of the same in figures, and also gave the name of his wife and the date of the instrument and his own name and place of residence. Incomplete, though the instrument was, yet the witness states that he delivered it to Copeland, and that he, the witness, never saw it afterwards until he gave his deposition in the case, and that the endorsements on the back of the instrument were not there when it left his possession.

Due notice was received by the complainant, from the president of the company, that his application for the loan was accepted, and he was also informed, in the same communication, that abstracts of the title of the property and certain certificates were required to show that the property was free of incumbrances and liens, and that when the same were received, if found to be correct, that their attorney would prepare the bond and mortgage and forward the same to him for execution.

Such abstracts and certificates were procured by the complainant, at the instance of Copeland, and they were delivered by the complainant to him at his request, and it appears that Copeland presented to the complainant the bond and mortgage, ready for his signature, he having procured the signature of the complainant's wife to the mortgage before the instruments were exhibited to the complainant for execution. They were signed by the complainant at his house, no one being present except his wife and Copeland, and the complainant testifies that he then and there delivered the same to Copeland, together with two fire policies of insurance, in order that the fire policies might be endorsed by the agent of the companies issuing the same, in a way to make the loss, if any, payable to the corporation respondents. Decisive proof that Copeland received the bond and mortgage for record and transmission is also exhibited by the receipt which he gave in behalf of the company and which he signed as agent.

Throughout the whole transaction the negotiations with the complainant were conducted by Copeland, and the evidence shows beyond doubt that all the instruments and documents which were delivered by the complainant to Copeland were by him delivered or transmitted to the State agent of the company, and that they were all forwarded by the latter to the company at their home office, where the officers of the company transact all their business.

Such applications for loans are usually made direct to the executive committee, and are required to be signed by the party desiring the loan, and when the loan papers have been perfected the company pay to the owner directly, either in checks or drafts to his order, unless the borrower, by written request or order, may have otherwise directed, but the president, in his testimony, admits that the State agent sometimes forwards applications to the executive committee for parties residing in the State, and that the home office does advise such parties, through him, of the action of the company in respect to such applications. Cases of the kind, therefore, it may be assumed, had occurred before, where the business was transacted through the State agent, but if not, still it is proved beyond all doubt that all the negotiations with the complainant were conducted by the sub agent, and that all the propositions to and from the company in respect to the loan in question were transmitted to the company through the same State ageut.

Satisfactory abstracts and certificates having been forwarded, and the due execution and delivery of the bond and mortgage having been procured, nothing remained to be done to enable Copeland to carry his fraudulent scheme into effect, except to get an order for the money in such a form that he could convert the fund to his own use, without danger of immediate exposure and detection. Antecedent conversations between the parties made it known to him that the complainant expected to receive the proceeds in drafts payable to his own order, it appearing that the complainant had told him that he wanted the amount in two drafts, one for six thousand dollars and the other for four thousand dollars, each payable to his own order. Apprised of what the complainant desired, he doubtless thought it prudent to seem to conform to his expressed wish. Circumstances occasioned some delay, but Copeland finally informed the complainant that the papers had gone forward, and stated that notice that the papers were satisfactory might come any day, and suggested that the complainant might as well sign the blank order for the money, adding that he "would fill it out," and the witness testifies that he looked at the blank, and seeing that it contained the words "in drafts to the order of," he put his signature to it and placed it in the drawer of Copeland, and went home.

Taken as a whole the evidence satisfies the court, beyond all doubt, that the blank form which the complainant signed was without date, except the year, which was in printed figures; that it contained no direction except the printed word "To," followed by a blank; that it did not contain the name of any payee nor anything upon the subject, except the printed words "Pay to," followed by a blank; that it did not specify any amount, nor contain anything upon the subject, except the printed word "dollars," preceded by a blank; that it did not specify for what the payment was to be made, nor did it contain anything upon the subject, except the printed words "on account of," followed by a blank; and that it contained nothing in respect to the medium of payment, except the printed words "in drafts to the order of," the word "of" immediately preceding the name of the plaintiff, H. G Angle, and so close to the first initial of the signature as to leave no blank between the erased sentence and the name of the complainant.

Subsequent to the time when the blank form was signed by the complainant and was left in the drawer of Copeland, the printed words "drafts to the order of," just preceding the signature of the complainant, were erased, evidently with pen and ink, and the words "current funds" were inserted in writing between the printed word "in" and the word "drafts," which is the first word of the sentence "drafts to the order of," the effect of which was to authorize the company to pay the proceeds of the loan "in current funds," instead of "drafts to the order of" the signer of the blank form.

Armed with that instrument, the blanks having been filled and the words "current funds" having been inserted, in lieu of the words "drafts to the order of," which were erased, Copeland went to the home office and obtained the whole proceeds of the loan, and absconded with the whole amount.

Full power to receive the proceeds of the loan would have been conferred upon the person who presented it, even if the holder of the blank form had done nothing more than to fill the blanks contained in the incomplete instrument, but it is quite obvious that if he had merely filled the blanks of the instrument, the company would have been obliged to make the payment "in drafts to the order of" the complainant, which, it is easy to see, would have defeated the fraudulent intent of the party who presented it for payment, as the drafts, if payable to the order of the complainant, could not be by that party converted into current funds Had he merely filled the blanks, the body of the completed instrument would have read as follows, to wit: Pay to [the person named] ten thousand dollars, on account of bond and mortgage, in drafts to the order of H. G. Angle. Evidently such an instrument would not have answered the purpose of the holder of the blank form, if he intended to betray his trust, and to convert the proceeds of the loan to his own use, without the consent of the lawful owner of the fund.

Blanks necessary to complete the instrument and render it operative, it may be admitted, might be filled by the holder of the instrument, but it is clear that it was not possible, within the meaning of that rule, to give the instrument such a form as would make it answer the supposed fraudulent intent, without doing violence to the scope and design of the blank form, as evidenced by the printed terms it contained, which, as outlines, plainly indicate that the signer required that the payment of the proceeds of the loan should be made in drafts to his own order. Manifest as that indication was, and as it would be, even to the casual reader, it became necessary, in order to make the completed instrument answer the fraudulent intent of the holder, to change the scope and design of the same, which he effectually accomplished by erasing the printed words "drafts to the order of," which immediately preceded the name of the signer, as before explained, and by inserting the words "current funds" between the erased word "drafts" and the word "in," between which and the erased word "drafts" there was a short blank, scarcely sufficient to admit the written words "current funds," as will be seen by reference to the instrument actually presented to the company, which was sent up with the transcript as an original paper.

Compare the altered instrument with what it would have been if nothing had been done to it except to fill the blanks, and the criminal character of the act is manifest. By the erasure and insertion of the words "current funds," it was made to read as follows: Pay to [the person named] ten thousand dollars, on account of bond and mortgage, in current funds.

Such an alteration, it is insisted by the complainant, is not and can not be justified by any implication which arises from the existence of blanks in the instrument, inasmuch as the alteration consists both of the erasure of material words and the insertion of other material words in lieu of those erased, which change the scope and legal effect of the instrument from what it would have been if the blanks had been filled without any such erasure and insertion.

Complainant concedes that blanks in such an instrument may be filled by the person to whom it is intrusted for use, but he contends that the said alterations made in the instrument in this case were a forgery, which renders the completed instrument void, and the court here concurs in that proposition.

Negotiable instruments are frequently delivered for use, with blanks not filled, and in respect to such instruments, it is held that where a party to such an instrument intrusts it to the custody of another for use, with blanks not filled up, whether it be to accommodate the person to whom it was intrusted, or to be used for the benefit of the signer of the same, such negotiable instrument carries on its face an implied authority to fill up the blanks necessary to perfect the same; and the rule is that, as between such parties and innocent third parties, the person to whom the instrument was so intrusted, must be deemed the agent of the party who committed the instrument to his custody, in filling the blanks necessary to perfect the instrument.—(Violet v. Patton, 5 Cran., 142. Russell v. Langstaffe, 2 Doug., 514. Collis v. Emmet, 1 H. Black., 313. Montague v. Perkins, 22 Eng. L. & Eq. 516.)

Questions of the kind most frequently arise in respect to negotiable instruments, but the court here is of the opinion that the same rule is properly applicable to the case before the court. Authority to act for another may be express or it may, in certain cases, be implied, but an implied authority has its limitations as well as that which is express. Examples to prove that proposition exist everywhere, but it would be difficult to give one more apposite and striking than the one presented by the case in decision, where the authority to fill blanks is implied from their existence in an instrument intrusted to another for use.—(1 Greenl. Ev. (12th ed.) sec. 567.)

Beyond all doubt such a party may fill every blank which it is necessary should be filled to perfect the instrument and render it operative, within its scope and design, if the terms or words of the instrument sufficiently indicate what that scope and design are. Cases arise, it must be conceded, where a party signs his name to a blank paper and intrusts the paper containing his signature to another for use, but it is sufficient to say upon the subject, that the case before the court is not of that character. Instead of that the blank form signed by the complainant contained terms clearly indicating that the money was to be paid on account of "the bond and mortgage," and that the signer of the blank form required the payment to be made "in drafts to the order of" the signer of the same, and it was no more competent for the person to whom it was intrusted, in that state of the case, to erase the words "drafts to the order of," and to insert in the short blank preceding that sentence, the words "current funds," than it would have been for that person to have prepared and executed a new instrument in the name of the signer, requesting the company to pay the proceeds to the order of the holder of the blank form.

Argument is scarcely necessary to support that proposition, as it is self evident that the erasure of the words "drafts to the order of" changed the manifest scope and design of the incomplete instrument, and it is equally clear that the words "current funds," which were inserted, are utterly repugnant to the printed terms "drafts to the order of," which were erased by black lines.—(Bank v. Douglas, 31 Conn., 180.)

Properly applied that case is decisive of the present case. It appears that the defendant in that case put his name upon an inchoate bill of exchange, drawn and signed by the maker, on a certain firm, blanks being left for the date, amount, time of payment, and the name of the payee, and that the defendant delivered the paper, thus indorsed, to the maker of the same, who struck out the name of the place where it was made, and the name of the firm on which it was drawn, and filled out the instrument, so as to make it a promissory note for three thousand five hundred dollars, payable to the order of another party. Upon these facts the court held that an inference arose, which in favor of a bona fide holder of the paper was irresistible, that the person to whom the paper was intrusted, was authorized, by filling the existing blanks, to complete the instrument and to fill the blanks, so as to bind the defendant as indorser of a bill of exchange, drawn by him on the firm therein named, for any sum, payable at any time and place. But, say the court, no inference or presumption of authority, can arise that he might turn the bill drawn on one firm into a bill drawn on another, or to turn it into a promissory note. Neither dictum nor decision, say the court, has been cited to warrant such a claim, and they add that they suppose that none such can be found. Suit in that case was brought by the bank, claiming to be an innocent holder, but the court held that, notwithstanding the erasures, unmistakable evidence of the original character of the instrument remained, and that the evidence was amply sufficient to excite distrust and make it the duty of any one to whom the paper was offered to inquire when and by what authority, such erasures and alterations had been made.—(Gardner v. Walsh, 32 Eng. L. & Eq. 162.)

Where blanks exist, in negotiable securities, delivered to another for use, the custody of the paper, under such circumstances, gives the custodian the right to fill the blanks, but it does not confer authority to make any addition to the terms of the note, and if any such, of a material character, are made by such a party, without the consent of the party from whom the paper was received, it will avoid the note, even in the hands of an innocent holder.—(Ivory v. Michael, 33 Missouri, 400.)

Proof was given in that case that the parties had for many years been in the habit of endorsing for each other, that the defendant endorsed the note, which was in blank, as to the time of payment, and was payable without defalcation or discount. Before using it the other party filled the blank with thirty days, and added after the word discount, "bearing ten per cent. after maturity." Attempt was made in argument to sustain the right to make the addition to the note, because it was delivered before the blank was filled, but the court held that the insertion of the words "bearing ten per cent. after maturity," was not the filling of a blank, and that it rendered the note invalid.—(Wood v. Steele, 6 Wall., 80.)

Persons intrusted with negotiable securities for use, by the parties to it, may, if it contains blanks, fill the same, but Mr. Parsons, though he admits that rule to its fullest extent, adds that if one materially changes words which are printed or written, the note by such change would be rendered invalid, and certainly it must be so if the change substantially varies the scope of the instrument, to the prejudice of the party from whom it was obtained.—(2 Pars. on B. & N., 566.)

Suppose that is so, still it is insisted by the respondents that the rule is not applicable in this case, because they had not notice of the defect in the blank order, but the court here is entirely of a different opinion. Even the holders of negotiable securities, taken in the usual course of business, before the securities fall due, are held chargeable with notice where the marks on the instrument are of a character to apprise one to whom the same is offered of the alleged defect.—(Goodman v. Simonds, 20 How., 365.)

When it is proposed to impeach the title of a holder, for value, by proof of any facts and circumstances outside of the written instrument itself, it is a very different matter. He is then to be affected, if at all, by what has occurred between other parties, and he may as well claim an exemption from any consequences flowing from their acts, unless it be first shown that he had knowledge of such facts and circumstances at the time the transfer was made. These principles are of universal application, but where a person takes a negotiable security which, upon the face of it, is dishonored, he cannot, says Taney, Ch. J., be allowed to claim the privileges which belong to a bona fide holder.—(Andrews v. Pond, 13 Pet., 65.)

If he chooses to receive it under such circumstances he takes it with all the infirmities belonging to it, and is in no better condition than the person from whom he received it; and the same doctrine was enforced and applied in a subsequent case, where, in speaking of a promissory note, so marked as to show for whose benefit it was to be discounted, the court held that all those dealing in paper "with such marks on its face, must be presumed to have knowledge of what it imported."—(Fowler v. Brently, 14 Pet., 318. Brown v. Davis, 3 Term., 80.)

Actual notice in such a case is not required, even in suits founded upon negotiable securities, where the evidence of its infirmity consists of matters apparent on its face; nor is any different or stricter rule applicable in cases like the present, it appearing that the printed words, though erased, so as to be inoperative, were still entirely legible, even to the casual reader, and that the words "current funds," inserted before the erased word "drafts" were plainly repugnant to the erased words "drafts to the order of," which followed them in the same connection.

Constructive notice in such cases is held sufficient, upon the ground that when a party is about to perform an act which he has reason to believe may affect the rights of third persons, an inquiry as to the facts is a moral duty, and diligence an act of justice. Whatever fairly puts a party upon inquiry in such a case is sufficient notice in equity, where the means of knowledge are at hand; and if the party, under such circumstances, omits to inquire and proceeds to do the act, he does so at his peril, as he is then chargeable with all the facts which by a proper inquiry he might have ascertained.—(Hawley v. Cramer, 4 Cow., 712. Hill v. Simpson, 7 Ves., Jr., 170. Kennedy v. Green, 3 Myl. & Keen, 722. Booth v. Barnum, 9 Conn., 286. Pitney v. Leonard, 1 Paige, 461. Pringle v. Phillips, 5 Sand., 157.)

Authorities to show that the material alteration of a written instrument renders it void is unnecessary, as it is a principle of universal application.

Decree reversed and the cause remanded, with direction to enter a decree in favor of the complainant.

UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT.

No. 503.—OCTOBER TERM, 1875.

G. D. NEWHALL, Appellant, v. CHALES W. SANGER.

Appeal from the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of California.

GRANTS OF LAND TO AID RAILROADS—SPANISH OR MEXICAN CLAIMS.

1. GRANTS IN AID OF RAILROADS.—That grants of land to aid in the construction of works of internal improvement, attach only to so much of our national domain as might be sold or otherwise disposed of, and that they do not embrace tracts reserved by competent authority, for any purpose or in any manner, although no exception of them was made in the grants themselves.

2. PUBLIC LANDS.—That the words, "public lands" are habitually used in our legislation to describe such as are subject to sale, or other disposal under general laws.

3. STATUS OF SPANISH OR MEXICAN CLAIMS.—That the status of lands covered by Spanish or Mexican claim, pending before the tribunals charged with the duty of adjudicating it, must be determined by the condition of things which existed in California at the time it was ceded, and by our subsequent legislation.

4. FAILING TO PRESENT CLAIM.—The act declares that all lands, the claims to which should not have been presented within two years, should be deemed held, and considered to be a part of the domain of the United States." A failure, therefore, to present the claim within the required time, or a rejection of it either by the commission or the District court, without seeking to obtain a review of their respective decisions, or by this court, rendered it unnecessary to reserve the claimed lands from settlement and appropriation. They then became public in the just meaning of that term, and were subject to the disposing power of Congress. This is the true interpretation of the act of 1851.

5. RELATION BACK—TERM.—There is a fiction of law that a term consists of but one day; but such a fiction is only tolerated by the courts for the purpose of justice. To antedate the rejection of a claim, so as to render operative a grant which would be otherwise without effect, does not promote the ends of justice, and cannot be sanctioned. —ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

Mr. Justice DAVIS delivered the opinion of the court.

The object of this suit is to determine the ownership of a quarter section of land in California. The appellee, who was the complainant, claims through the Western Pacific Railroad Company, to whom a patent was issued in 1870, in professed compliance with the requirements of the acts of Congress commonly known as the Pacific Railroad Acts. The appellant derives title by mesne conveyances from one Ransom Dayton, whose patent, of a later date than that issued to the company, recites that the land was within the exterior limits of a Mexican grant called Moquelamos, and that a patent had, by mistake, been issued to the company. The court below decreed that the appellee was the owner in fee simple of the land, and that the patent under which the appellant claims, so far as it relates to the land in controversy, should be cancelled.

The act of July 1, 1862, (12 Stat., 492,) grants to certain railroad companies, of which the Western Pacific, by subsequent legislation, became one, every alternate section of public land designated by odd numbers, within ten miles of each side of their respective roads, not sold, reserved, or otherwise disposed of by the United States, and to which a homestead or pre-emption claim may not have attached at the time the line of the road is definitely fixed. It requires that within a prescribed time a map designating the general route of each road shall be filed in the Department of the Interior, and that the secretary thereof shall then cause the lands within a certain distance from such route to be withdrawn from pre-emption, private entry, and sale. The precise date of the location of the Western Pacific road is not stated in the record, but the inference is that it took place between the first day of the December term (1864) of this court, and the 13th day of February, 1865. At all events, the withdrawal for this road was made on the 31st of January, 1865, and the records of the court show that the Moquelamos grant, which had been regularly presented to the commissioners, under the act of March 3, 1851, and duly prosecuted by appeal, was rejected here February 13, 1865. It is a conceded fact that the lands embraced by it fall within the limits of the rail road grant, which were enlarged by the amendatory act of 1684. (13 Stats., p. 358.) This act also declares that any lands granted by it, or the act to which it is an amendment, "shall not defeat or impair any pre-emption, homestead, swamp-land or other lawful claim, nor include any government reservation or mineral lands, or the improvements of any bona fide settler."

There can be no question that, by the withdrawal in question, the grant took effect upon such odd-numbered sections of public lands within the prescribed limits as were not excluded from its operation, and the question arises whether lands within the boundaries of an alleged Mexican or Spanish grant, which was then sub judice, are public lands within the meaning of the act of Congress under which the patent, whereon the appellee's title rests, was issued to the railroad company.

The subject of grants of land to aid in constructing works of internal improvement was fully considered at the present term, in Leavenworth, Lawrence and Galveston Railroad Company v. The United States. (8 CHICAGO LEGAL NEWS, 265.)

We held that they attached only to so much of our national domain as might be sold or otherwise disposed of, and that they did not embrace tracts reserved by competent authority for any purpose or in any manner, although no exception of them was made in the grants themselves. Our decision confined a grant of every alternate section of "land" to such whereto the complete title was absolutely vested in the United States. The acts which govern this case are more explicit and leave less room for construction. The words "public lands" are habitually used in our legislation to describe such as are subject to sale or other disposal under general laws. That they were so employed in this instance is evident from the fact that to them alone could, on the location of the road, the order withdrawing lands from pre emption, private entry, and sale, apply.

The status of lands covered by a Spanish or Mexican claim, pending before the tribunals charged with the duty of adjudicating it, must be determined by the condition of things which existed in California at the time it was ceded, and by our subsequent legislation. The rights of private property were not impaired by the change of sovereignty and jurisdiction. They were fully secured by the law of nations, as well as by treaty stipulation. The country, although sparsely populated, was dotted over with land claims. Without our establishing a tribunal clothed with full authority to examine and decide them, their extent and validity could not be determined. It had been the practice of Mexico, to grant large tracts to individuals, sometimes as a reward for meritorious public services, but generally with a view to invite emigration, and promote the settlement of her vacant territory. Exact information in regard to them, although indispensable, could hardly be obtained during the eager search for gold which prevailed soon after we acquired California. It was not until 1851 that our government undertook to discharge the obligation it assumed, to adjust the property rights arising under Mexican or Spanish grants. The act of March 3, of that year, created a commission to pass upon them, and allowed two years from that date within which to present claims. Prior to, or during this period, as an extension of our land system to California would have produced the utmost confusion in title to real estate, it was wisely withheld by Congress until such claims should be presented, or be barred by lapse of time. The act declared that all lands, the claims to which should not have been presented within said two years should "be deemed, held, and considered to be a part of the public domain of the United States." This was notice to all the world that lands in California were held in reserve to afford a reasonable time for asserting rights thereto before a tribunal authorized to take cognizance of them. The claimant was not concluded by an adverse decision of the commission, but was entitled to have it reviewed by the district court, with a right of ultimate appeal to the Supreme Court. If he, however, neglected to take, within the time prescribed by the statute, the proper steps to obtain such review, the decision was thereby rendered final and conclusive. The lands then fell into the category of public lands. The same remark will apply to the judgment of the district court; but if he prosecuted his appeal to the tribunal of last resort, the lands retained their original character in all the successive stages of the cause, and they were regarded as forming a part of our national domain only after the claim covering them had been "finally decided to be invalid."

A failure, therefore, to present the claim within the required time, or a rejection of it either by the commission or by the district court, without seeking to obtain a review of their respective decisions, or by this court, rendered it unnecessary to reserve the claimed lands from settlement and appropriation. They then became public in the just meaning of that term, and were subject to the disposing power of Congress.

This is, in our opinion, the true interpretation of the act of 1851. In view of the circumstances which then existed, the intention of Congress cannot be mistaken.

It may be said that the whole of California was part of our domain, as the United States acquired it by treaty and asserted dominion over it. The obvious answer is that the ownership of so much of the soil as was vested in individual proprietorship did not pass to them. They took the remaining lands, subject to all the equitable rights of private property therein which existed at the time of the transfer. Claims, whether grounded upon an inchoate or a perfected title, were to be ascertained and adequately protected. This duty, injoined by a sense of natural justice and by treaty obligations, could only be discharged by prohibiting intrusion upon the claimed lands until an opportunity was afforded the parties in interest for a judicial hearing and determination. It was to be expected that during that time of feverish speculation in California, unfounded and fraudulent claims would be presented for confirmation. There was no way of separating them from those which were valid without investigation by a competent tribunal, and Congress, therefore, shaped our legislation so that all lands to which a claim attached should, until it was barred or passed upon, be excluded from any mode of acquiring them.

Until recently, this view of the act of 1851 was adopted by the Interior Department upon the advice of the law officers of the government, (Opinions of Att'y-Gen'l, vol. 11, p. 493; Id., 13, p. 388,) and it was, at least by implication, sanctioned by this court in Frisbie v. Whitney (9 Wallace, 187). No subsequent legislation conflicts with it. On the contrary, the excepting words in the sixth section of the act of March 3, 1853, introducing the land system into California (10 Stats., 246), clearly denote that Congress did not treat lands in the condition that these were at the time of the location of the road, as a part of the public domain. They were not in a condition to be acquired by individuals or granted to corporations. This section expressly excludes from pre-emption and sale all lands claimed under any foreign grant or title. It is said that this means "lawfully" claimed; but there is no authority to import a word into a statute in order to change its meaning. Congress did not prejudge any claim to be unlawful, but submitted them all for adjudication. Besides the act of March 3, 1853, which submitted to settlement and purchase the lands released by the operation of the previous law of 1851, there was a general law (Id., 244) passed on the same day which conferred upon a settler on lands theretofore reserved on account of claims under foreign grants, which had been, or should thereafter be, declared by the Supreme Court to be invalid, the rights granted by the pre-emption law, after the lands should have been released from reservation—a class of lands which it had been the policy of the government to reserve until all claims thereto of that character had been adjusted.—(See Act of 1811, 2 Stat., p. 664-5, sec. 6 and 10.) This authorized right of pre-emption so conferred, clearly implies that no rights previously attached to lands by reason of their settlement and cultivation prior to the rejection of such claims.

It is unnecessary to dwell longer upon this question or to review subsequent statutes touching the government lands in California. It suffices to say, that there is nothing in any of them which weakens the construction we have given to the act of 1851. This controversy depends upon that act and the Pacific Railroad Act which we have cited.

The appellee invokes the doctrine that judgments of a court during a term are, by relation, considered as having been rendered on the first day thereof. There is a fiction of law that a term consists of but one day; but such a fiction is only tolerated by the courts for the purpose of justice.—(Gibson v. Chouteau, 13 Wallace, 92). To antedate the rejection of a claim, so as to render operative a grant which would be otherwise without effect, does not promote the ends of justice and cannot be sanctioned.

As the premises in controversy were not public lands, either at the date of the grant or of their withdrawal, it follows that they did not pass to the railroad company.

The decree of the Circuit Court is reversed and the case remanded to that court with directions to dismiss the bill.

Mr. Justice FIELD dissenting.

I am not able to agree with the majority of the court in this case. The only lands excepted by Congress from its grant to the Western Pacific Railroad Company, consisted of sections within certain limits, which at the time the line of the road was definitely fixed, had been "sold, reserved, or otherwise disposed of by the United States," or to which a pre-emption or homestead claim had then attached. The exception was intended to keep the public lands open to settlement and sale until the line of the road was established. I cannot understand how the presentation of a fraudulent claim to any portion of the lands within the limits designated, founded upon an invalid or forged Mexican grant, could change the character of the sections as public lands, or impair the title of the company, or have any other effect than to subject the company to the annoyance and expense of exposing and defeating the claim. Nor can I perceive the bearing upon the case of the act of March 3d, 1853, "to extend pre-emption rights to certain lands therein mentioned;" for that act applies only to pre-emption rights, and by its terms is limited to lands previously reserved.

I think the judgment of the court below should be affirmed; and Mr. Justice Strong concurs with me in this opinion.

UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT.

OCTOBER TERM, 1875.

HENRIETTA HOFFMAN, Appellant,
v.
JOHN HANCOCK MUTUAL LIFE INS. CO.

Appeal from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Ohio.

An agent can only bind the company by acts done in the way usual in the line of business in which he is acting.

The acceptance of a horse in part payment of a life premium by the agent, was ultra vires, and did not constitute a valid contract, binding the company.

Decree affirmed.

Opinion by SWAYNE, J. There is a direct conflict in the testimony of the two principal witnesses in this case, and the discrepancies are irreconcilable. According to our view, the case must turn upon the application of legal principles to facts about which there is no controversy. An elaborate examination of the testimony is therefore unnecessary. A brief statement will be sufficient for the purposes of this opinion.

Justin E. Thayer was the general agent of the appellee at Cleveland, Ohio. He was authorized to appoint sub-agents, and on the 7th of April, 1869, appointed A. C. Goodwin such agent. This arrangement continued until the 7th of June, 1869. It was then put an end to by the parties, and they agreed that thereafter, Goodwin should act as an insurance broker, and that he should receive for such applications as he might bring to Thayer, thirty per cent. of the first premium paid for the insurance.

On the 7th of August, 1869, Goodwin gave to Frederick Hoffman a receipt, signed by Goodwin as agent, setting forth that he had received from Hoffman $922.57, "being the first annual premium on an insurance of eight thousand dollars on the life of Frederick Hoffman, for which an application is this day made to the John Hancock Mutual Life Insurance Company, of Boston. The said insurance to date from August 7th, 1869, subject to the conditions and agreements of the policies of said company, and provided that the said application shall be accepted by the said company and a policy be by them granted thereon. The said policy, if issued, to be delivered by me when received to the holder of this receipt, which shall then be given up. It is expressly agreed and understood that if the above mentioned application shall be declined by the said company, it shall be deemed that no insurance has been created by this receipt, but the amount above receipted shall be returned to the holder of this receipt, which shall then be given up."

The amount of the premium specified was paid by Hoffman to Goodwin, as follows:

A horse valued at . . .	$400 00
A sixty day note to Goodwin,	100 00
A canceled debt owing by Goodwin to Hoffman, ...	53 57
A premium note of	369 00

Goodwin reported the application to Thayer, but said nothing of the receipt. Thayer forwarded the application, and in due time received the policy. Some time afterward Hoffman called for the policy. Thayer demanded the premium. Hoffman refused to pay it, and produced Goodwin's receipt. Thayer then, for the first time, learned the existence of the receipt and the particulars of the alleged payment of the premium. He refused to ratify the transaction.

Ineffectual attempts were made to sell the horse. Finally Thayer, to save trouble to his company, offered, if Hoffman would take back the horse and pay in its stead $250 to the company, the transaction should be closed and the policy be delivered. This Hoffman refused to do, and sued the company in the Court of Common Pleas of Cuyahoga County for what he had delivered to Goodwin. A verdict was found for the defendant. He took a new trial under the statute of Ohio. Upon the re trial a verdict was rendered in his favor. The defendant moved for a new trial, which was granted. The suit abated by his death, and was not revived. Thereupon his widow, Henrietta Hoffman, filed this bill. It prayed that the company should be compelled to deliver the policy to her and to pay the amount of the insurance money specified. The policy was upon what is known as the "endowment plan." It provided that the amount insured should be paid to Hoffman at the end of ten years, or to his wife in the event of his death in the meantime. No part of what was paid by Hoffman to Goodwin ever came into the hands of Thayer or the company, or inured in any wise to the benefit of either.

Goodwin testified that his share of the premium was "two hundred and seventy-six dollars and some cents," and further, that Thayer assented to the transaction in advance, and with full knowledge of the facts ratified it subsequently.

If it be admitted that the facts as to the assent and ratification by Thayer are as stated by Goodwin—a concession by no means warranted, in our judgment, by the state of the evidence—the question arises, what is the legal result?

Agencies are special, general and universal. Story's Agency, sec. 21. Within the sphere of the authority conferred, the act of the agent is as binding upon the principal as if it were done by the principal himself. But it is an elementary principle, applicable alike to all kinds of agency, that whatever an agent does can be done only in the way usual in the line of business in which he is acting. There is an implication to this effect arising from the nature of his employment, and it is as effectual as if it had been expressed in the most formal terms. It is present whenever his authority is called into activity, and prescribes the manner as well as the limit of its exercise. Upton v. Suffolk Co. Mills, 11 Cush., 586; Jones v. Warner, 11 Conn., 48; Story's Agency, sec. 60, and note; 3 Chitt. Law of Com. & Manuf., 199; U. S. v. Babbitt, 1 Black, 61; 1 Parsons on Contracts, 4th ed., pp. 41, 42.

Life insurance is a cash business. Its disbursements are all in money, and its receipts must necessarily be in the same medium. This is the universal usage and rule of all such companies.

Goodwin had settled his own debt to Hoffman of $53.57, and had appropriated to himself Hoffman's note of $100.

If he had the right to take his percentage in such way as he might think proper, this did not justify his taking the horse at $400 Nor, if Thayer had expressly agreed to take the horse in payment of the premium pro tanto, could that have given validity to the transaction. If the agent had authority to take the horse in question he could have taken other horses from Hoffman, and have taken them in all cases. This would have carried with it the right to establish a stable, employ hands, and do everything else necessary to take care of the horses until they could be sold. The company might thus have found itself carrying on a business alien to its charter, and in which it had never thought of embarking.

The exercise of such a power by the agent was liable to two objections. It was ultra vires, and it was a fraud as respects the company. Hoffman must have known that neither Goodwin nor Thayer had any authority to enter into such an arrangement, and he was a party to the fraud. No valid contract as to the company could arise from such a transaction. This objection is fatal to the appellant's case.

It is insisted by the counsel for the appellee that Hoffman, by the bringing of his action at law, repudiated and rescinded the contract, if there was one, and that the appellant is thereby estopped from maintaining this bill. Authorities are cited in support of this proposition. Herrington v. Hubbard, 2 Illinois, 569; Dalton v. Bently, 15 ib., 420; Smith v. Smith, 19 ib., 319; Cooper v Brown, 2 McLean, 495; Williams v. Washington Life Ins.Co.,4 Big.Life & Acc.Ins. Rep.56.

As the point already determined is conclusive of the case, it is unnecessary to consider this subject.

The decree of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

OUR thanks are due JOHN J. ALLEN, of the Brooklyn,N. Y., bar, for the following opinion:

U. S. DISTRICT COURT, E. DIST. OF NEW YORK.

OPINION FILED APRIL 11, 1876.

In re the PETITION OF H. B. TITUS for a Habeas Corpus.

THE LAWS RELATING TO THE EXTRADITION OF FUGITIVES FROM ONE STATE TO ANOTHER.

On November 7th, the Governor of Arkansas commissioned the petitioner to present to the Governor of New York, his requisition for the surrender of McDonald, a fugitive from justice, together with a copy of the indictment. The petitioner presented the requisition to the Governor of New York, who issued his mandate to the sheriff of Kings county, directing the arrest of McDonald, and his delivery to the petitioner. The sheriff arrested McDonald for the purpose of delivering him to the petitioner, but before he could make such delivery he was released from his custody on habeas corpus, issued by a State judge. After being so released, McDonald brought an action for malicious prosecution, in the State court, against the petitioner, who was arrested in such action, and now makes this application for a habeas corpus to be discharged from custody. Held,

1. That this is a case in which a judge of a United States Court has a right to grant a writ of habeas corpus.
2. That acts performed in and about the surrender of fugitives from justice, are acts done in pursuance of the laws of the United States.
3. That the petitioner, who was a mere messenger of the Governor of Arkansas, was not bound to look into the indictment and determine whether it charged a crime within the meaning of the United States statutes.
4. That the petitioner has done no more than is prescribed to be done by the laws of the United States, acting under the direction of the executive, who, by the law, was authorized to give such a direction.
5. No personal liability was therefore incurred by the petitioner, nor is the case changed by the allegation that the motives actuating the petitioner were malicious.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

BENEDICT, J.—The petitioner, H. B. Titus, presents his petition for a writ of habeas corpus directed to the sheriff of the county of Kings, to the end that he may be discharged from the custody of such sheriff. The facts upon which the petitioner bases his demand for a discharge are as follows:

On the 7th day of November, the governor of the State of Arkansas commissioned the petitioner to present to the governer of the State of New York the requisition of the governor of Arkansas for the surrender of a fugitive from justice from the State of Arkansas, named Augustine R. McDonald, together with a duly authenticated copy of an indictment found against the said McDonald by the grand jury of Ashley county, Arkansas. In pursuance of his commission and the instructions of the governor of the State of Arkansas, the petitioner as such agent presented said requisition, together with said authenticated indictment to the governor of the State of New York, who thereupon issued to the sheriff of the county of Kings, his mandate directing the arrest of McDonald, and his delivery to the petitioner, the agent of the State of Arkansas, duly commissioned and authorized to receive said fugitive, in accordance with the laws of the United States in such case made and provided. The sheriff of Kings county, on receipt of the mandate of the governor, arrested McDonald for the purpose of delivering him to the petitioner in accordance with the terms of the mandate, but before such delivery was made the fugitive was released from the custody of the sheriff upon habeas corpus issued by a justice of the Supreme Court of the State of New York. After being so released McDonald brought an action for malicious prosecution against the petitioner, and obtained from the Supreme Court of the State an order for his arrest, in pursuance whereof he is now held in custody by the sheriff of Kings county. Being so detained in custody, he presents his petition to this court, setting forth the above facts, and claims his discharge at the hands of this court upon the ground that he is detained in custody by reason of acts committed by him in pursuance of the laws of the United States, and which are justified by such laws. Notice of the application having been given to the attorneys for McDonald, at whose suit the petitioner is imprisoned, they have appeared and, in opposition to the petition, deny the jurisdiction of this court to issue the writ of habeas corpus, upon the ground that the acts of the petitioner, which were the foundation of the action against him, are not acts done in pursuance of any law of the United States, and the further ground that the indictment presented to the governor of the State of New York, and upon which he issued his mandate to the sheriff, does not charge any crime of which the grand jury of Ashley county, Arkansas, could take cognizance; whence it is contended that all the proceedings toward the surrender of McDonald were void, and afford no justification for the petitioner, and no foundation for the interposition of this court. By the Constitution of the United States the whole subject of interstate extradition is remitted to the cognizance of the general government. This jurisdiction of the government of the United States is exclusive. (Prigg v. Commonwealth of Penn., 16 Pet., p. 622.) The act of 1793, now section 5,278 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, provides the method by which such extradition is to be accomplished. That statute authorizes the Executive authority of any State from which a fugitive from justice may have fled, to demand his return of the executive authority of the State to which such person has fled, upon producing to such executive a copy of an indictment found, or an affidavit made before a magistrate of the State, charging the person demanded with having committed treason, felony, or other crime, such indictment or affidavit to be certified as authentic by the governor or chief magistrate of the State from which the person so charged has fled. Upon receipt of the requisition and certified indictment, the executive authority of the State to which such person has fled, is authorized to cause him to be arrested and secured, and to cause notice of the arrest to be given to the executive authority making the demand, or to the agent of such authority appointed to receive the fugitive, and to cause the fugitive to be delivered to such agent when he shall appear.

The peititon and accompanying documents disclose plainly that the only acts charged upon the petitioner, and because of which he is arrested, are acts performed by him as the agent appointed by the Executive of the State of Arkansas, in pursuance of the commission issued to him by such Governor, which acts are those prescribed by act of 1793, as above stated.

The case of the petitioner, therefore, is that of a ministerial officer acting within the scope of an authority conferred upon him by the Governor of a State by virtue of the provisions of the act of 1793, who, being held in custody by reason of such acts, applies for his discharge from such custody by virtue of the provisions of law found in Chapter 13, Title 13 of the United States Revised Statutes.

Those provisions of law make it the duty of the Judges of the Courts of the United States, within their respective jurisdictions, to grant writs of habeas corpus for the purpose of inquiring into the cause of restraint of liberty where a prisoner is "in custody for an act done or omitted in pursuance of a law of the United States." (Sec. 753, U. S. Revised Statutes.)

The question, therefore, is whether the petitioner is in custody for acts intended to be covered by Section 753 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

It is contended in opposition to the petition that acts performed in and about the surrender of fugitives from justice are not acts done in pursuance of the laws of the United States, but are the acts of a Governor of a State done in discharge of his duty to the State, and not otherwise. Reliance is placed upon the case of "Commonwealth of Kentucky vs. Dennison." (24 How., p. 66), for this position. But I do not find the position to be supported by the authority referred to, nor do I consider it tenable on principle. The case of "Kentucky vs. Dennison" simply decides that the Supreme Court of the United States has no power to issue a mandamus to compel the Governor of a State to cause the surrender of a fugitive when demanded by the Executive of the State from which he has fled. The question here raised could not arise in that case, for the reason that in that case the Governor of Ohio refused to act at all. Here the Governors respectively have acted, and the acts performed are those required by the laws of the United States to be performed. It seems clear that the authority exercised is an authority conferred by the laws of the United States and by no other laws. The Supreme Court of the United States in "Prigg vs. Commonwealth of Pennsylvania," when speaking of the act of 1793, say "as to the authority so conferred upon State magistrates, while a difference of opinion has existed and may exist still, on the point in different States, whether State magistrates are bound to act under it—none is entertained by this Court, that State magistrates may, if they choose, exercise that authority, unless prohibited by State legislation." So in "Kentucky vs. Dennison," where it was argued that the act of 1793 must be held to speak only to State authorities, and to leave its execution wholly to the authorities of the States themselves and therefore to be void, the Supreme Court maintaining the validity of the act, declares that the act makes it the duty of the State Executive to cause a fugitive from justice to be delivered up, and that "as the duty of the Governor of the State where the fugitive was found, is in such cases merely ministerial without the right to exercise either executive or judicial discretion, he could not lawfully issue a warrant to arrest an individual without a law of the State or Congress to authorize it."

There are no laws of the State to authorize the acts specified in the act of Congress. The Governors and their agents are compelled therefore to rely upon the statute of the United States for authority to do the acts required thereby, and the statute of the United States affords them justification. It seems impossible, therefore, to hold that when they so act they act otherwise than in pursuance of a law of the United States. In so acting they but discharge an absolute obligation created by a law of the United States, which they are bound to perform and for which there is no other law, and their acts are none the less acts done in pursuance of a law of the United States, because, as decided in Kentucky v. Dennison, there is no power in the General Government to use coercive measures to compel performance.

This view of the scope of section 753 appears to be in harmony with the object of the statute which plainly is intended to afford to all persons arrested for acts done in discharge of obligations to the United States, and arising under the constitution and laws thereof, a summary method of obtaining release from unjust imprisonment. Certainly those are entitled to such protection and clearly within the spirit of the act who, in conformity with a law of the United States, exercise that portion of the delicate and important power in respect to fugitives from justice granted by the constitution to the National Government, which has been called into operation by the act of 1793—a power of necessity belonging to the National Government, but which operates largely, if not exclusively, in the interest of harmony between the States.

Entertaining these views, which find support in the case of Smith (3d Mahon, p. 131), I am bound to hold that the petitioner is entitled to require of this court a writ of habeas corpus, to the end that an inquiry be had into the causes of the restraint of his liberty.

A further question presented by the petition has been discussed upon this motion, and may here be decided. It arises out of the matter charged in the indictment which accompanied the requisition of the governor of Arkansas, and discloses the judicial proceeding in Arkansas upon which the surrender of the fugitive was demanded.

The contention upon the indictment is that it is an indictment found by the Grand Jury of Ashley county, Arkansas, and undertakes to charge McDonald with a crime not cognizable by any Court of the State of Arkansas, the charge being subornation of perjury committed within such State in procuring one Martin to commit willful perjury within said State before a United States Commissioner in a deposition taken by such commissioner to be used in an action then pending between said McDonald and the United States.

This indictment, it is said, is void, because it charges no crime within the jurisdiction of a grand jury of the State of Arkansas, and renders all the proceedings taken in regard to the surrender of the fugitive void; whence, it is concluded, that the acts performed by the petitioner cannot be held to be acts done in pursuance of a law of the United States.

But I cannot accede to this view. If it be true that it is competent for this court to look into the indictment transmitted by the governor of Arkansas and authenticated by him, and if this court can be called upon to determine whether a crime has been charged therein in the manner required by the laws of the State of Arkansas, and whether as matter of law subornation of perjury committed within the State of Arkansas can by the laws of the State of Arkansas be made an offense against the laws of that State, when the perjury is committed before a United States commissioner in a deposition taken to be used in a court of the United Slates. Still it cannot be that the petitioner, who is simply a messenger of the governor of the State of Arkansas, and who is not alleged to have done otherwise than is required by his commission, was bound to look into the indictment and required at his peril to determine whether it charged a crime within the meaning of the laws of the United States. The petitioner did not arrest the fugitive nor demand his arrest. The arrest was made by direction of the governor of the State of New York upon the demand of the governor of Arkansas. And if there can be said to have been anything done by the petitioner in respect to the arrest of the fugitive which could render him liable in an action for malicious prosecution, his acts are plainly ministerial, and he is justified therefor by the directions of the governor.

The jurisdiction of the executive of the State over the subject matter is clear, and the petitioner has done no more than is prescribed to be done by the laws of the United States, acting under the direction of the Executive, who by the same law was authorized to give such direction. No personal liability was therefore incurred.

Nor is the case changed by the allegation that the motives actuating the petitioner were malicious. So long as the acts done were within the scope of the authority conferred upon him, and justified by the laws of the United States, it matters not what feelings the petitioner entertained toward the fugitive, nor what result he hoped would follow from the action taken by the governor of the State.

My determination therefore is, that the petitioner is entitled to his writ of habeas corpus as prayed for.

For the petitioner, John J. Allen, esq.; opposed, Algernon S. Sullivan and ex-Judge Ray.

We call attention to the following opinions, reported at length in this issue:

Authority of Agent—Right to Fill Blanks in Note—Effect of Erasing what is Written or Printed in a Note.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States, by Clifford, J., holding that persons dealing with an agent are entitled to the same protection as if dealing with the principal, to the extent that the agent acts within the scope of his authority; that where a party to a negotiable instrument entrusts it to another for use as such, with blanks not filled up, such instrument, so delivered, carries on its face an implied authority to complete the same by filling up the blanks; but the authority implied from the existence of the blanks, would not authorize the person entrusted with the instrument to vary or alter the material terms of the instrument, by erasing what is written or printed as part of the same, nor to pervert the scope and meaning of the same by filling the blanks with stipulations repugnant to what was plainly and clearly expressed in the instrument before it was delivered; that when one entrusted with negotiable securities for use by the parties to them, may, if they contain blanks, fill the same; but if he materially change words which are printed or written, the note, by such change, would be rendered invalid. This opinion is of more than usual interest to bankers and commercial men.

Land Grants—Mexican or Spanish Claims.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States by Davis, J., construing the law relating to land grants by the general government, in aid of internal improvements, and Mexican or Spanish claims.

Insurance Agent no Authority to Take a Horse for Premium.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States, by Swayne J., holding that an insurance agent can only bind the company by acts done in the usual way in the line of business in which he is acting; that the acceptance of a horse in part payment of a life premium by the agent was ultra vires, and did not constitute a valid contract, and did not bind the company. Courts have gone to the very verge of the law in not holding insurance companies liable for the acts of their agents. If an insurance company send an agent out to solicit insurance and deliver policies, and he takes a horse in payment instead of money, the company or the agent ought to stand the loss, if there is any, and not the farmer. If a farmer sent his hired man to the city with a load of wheat, with instructions to sell it for cash, and he sold it to an insurance company and took a policy of insurance on the farmer's property at the usual rates in payment, no court would relieve the farmer from the acts of his agent.

Extradition of Fugitives from Justice—Liability of Messenger.—The opinion of the United States District Court, for the Eastern District of New York, by Benedict, J., where the Governor of Arkansas commissioned one Titus to present his requisition for the surrender of one McDonald, a fugitive from justice, to the Governor of New York, and Titus presented the requisition to the Governor of New York, who issued his mandate to the sheriff of Kings county, directing the arrest of McDonald and his delivery to Titus. The sheriff arrested McDonald for the purpose of delivering him to Titus, but before he could make such delivery, McDonald was released from his custody on a habeas corpus, issued by the judge of a State court. After being released, McDonald brought an action in a State court, against Titus, for malicious prosecution, who was arrested in such action. Held, that the Federal judge had power to issue a writ of habeas corpus, and to discharge him from such arrest; that Titus was the mere messenger of the Governor, and could not be made liable for following the directions of the requisition; that he was not bound to look into the copy of the indictment which accompanied the requisition, to determine whether a crime had been charged within the meaning of the United States statutes; that if the messenger acted through malicious motives, it would not change his liability. There are several novel and interesting questions decided in this opinion.

Controversies Between Foreign Seamen on Foreign Ships.—The opinion of the United States District court for the district of Louisiana by Billings, J., holding that the limitation in the acts of congress allowing the arrest of the defendant on mesne or final process, issuing out of the courts of the United States, only in cases, in which the courts of the State in which the United States courts sit could cause arrests, applies to the admiralty as well as to the common law process. The court also defines the jurisdiction of the United States courts in controversies between foreign seamen on foreign ships.

Raised Check.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of Louisiana, upon the liability of a bank to pay a raised certified check.

Rights of Persons of Color in Theatres.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of Louisiana, by Ludeling, C. J., in a case where a colored man recovered, in the court below, $5,000 for being ejected from a theatre on account of his color and the Supreme Court reduced the judgment to $300.

THE STATE CONVENTION.

The Republican State Convention met at Springfield on Wednesday and nominated a full ticket. S. M. Cullom was nominated for Governor. He has served three terms in the House of Representatives of the State, and was twice elected Speaker of the House. He has also served the State in the House of Representatives at Washington. Mr. Cullom is popular with the people of the State. For years he has been in the habit of giving annual parties at his residence at Springfield. These parties have been attended by more people than any others at the Capital, and were an evidence of the good feeling of the people of the State toward Mr. Cullom.

Andrew Shuman, the editor of the Chicago Evening Journal of this city, received the nomination for Lieutenant Governor. Mr. Shuman is well known by the people of the State. He is in favor of good laws, good government, and an honest administration of public affairs, and, should the ticket upon which he has been nominated be successful, he will make an excellent officer.

The convention endorsed the official action of Attorney General Edsall by renominating him. He has made an excellent law officer for the State, and it is no disparagement to the able lawyers that contended with him for the nomination that they were not selected.

George H. Harlow, the present Secretary of State, received a re-nomination. He has made an excellent and obliging officer. The books and papers of the State have been kept in an orderly and careful manner, and the business of the Secretary's office transacted with accuracy and despatch.

City Matters.—Mayor Hoyne, who was elected Mayor at the late city election, has been recognized as the Mayor of the city by the council, and presides at its meetings, and performs the duties of the office. He has removed the Comptroller, City Marshal, Building Inspector, etc. Mayor Colvin still claims to be Mayor, and has sued out a quo warranto to test the legality of Mayor Hoyne's election. From the way Mr. Hoyne is exercising the duties of the office, it is evident he is not afraid to take the responsibility when he thinks the interests of the city require prompt action. It is to be regretted that the law has been so carelessly drawn that two persons should claim to be Mayor of the city at the same time, and find lawyers who advocate the claims of both, believing they are right. Mr. Hoyne is an old citizen of Chicago, and has the interests of the city at heart. He is an able, positive man, and has for years been one of the leading members of the bar. He will administer the affairs of the city as he would his own.

Samuel J. Frost was executed on yesterday at the county jail in Worcester, Mass., for the murder of his wife's brother, Franklin P. Toune, on the fourth of July, 1875, in a barn. When the drop fell, a terrible scene was enacted. The fall was so great that the head of Frost was jerked from his body, and hung in the rope which had been the means of taking the life of the unfortunate man. Such scenes as this are enough to convince any one, if the lives of human beings are to be taken by sentence of the law, there should be some improvement in the manner of the execution of the sentence.

The execution of Thomas A. Piper, formerly the sexton of the Warren Avenue Baptist Church, in Boston, took place at the Charles street jail, in that city, on yesterday. Piper was convicted last February, on his second trial, of the murder of Mabel Young, aged only five years, in the tower of the church on the 23d of May, 1875. The circumstances connected with the murder were the most revolting. Such was the feeling against the criminal, that when it was announced from the jail that the execution had taken place, the crowd outside gave round after round of applause.

The great trial of Ex-Collector Munn, before Judge Blodgett and a jury, for conspiracy to defraud the Government, has resulted in a verdict of not guilty.

On Wednesday, B. W. Parks, the father-in-law of Col. R. G. Ingersoll, was buried in Springdale. At the grave, Col. Ingersoll said: "With morn, with noon, with night, with changing clouds and changeless stars; with grass, with trees and birds, with leaf and bud, with flowers and blossoming vine, with all the sweet influences of nature, we leave our dead."

Abridgment of Elementary Law; Embodying the General Principles, Rules and Definitions of Law, together with the Common Maxims and Rules of Equity Jurisprudence as stated in the Standard Commentaries of the leading English and American authors; embracing the subjects contained in a regular law course; collected and arranged so as to be more easily acquired by Students, comprehended by justices, and readily reviewed by young practitioners. By M E. Dunlap, counselor-at-law. St. Louis: Soule, Thomas & Wentworth, 1876.

This is a volume of 425 pages. It is designed to aid students in their course by presenting to them, in a condensed form, pruned of all redundancies, the leading and important principles, rules, and definitions of law as laid down in the standard elementary works. It contains the pith of the important branches of the law student's course, collected from Blackstone's Commentaries and leading authors on Evidence, Contracts, Pleading and Equity. The author says the work is not intended as a substitute for text-books, but simply to lighten the labors and shorten the work of the student when he shall have carefully read the whole course, and commenced his review preparatory to final examination for the bar. This is the second edition of the work.

Obituary.

Hiram M. Chase, a member of the Chicago bar, and one of the Masters in Chancery of the Circuit Court, died at his residence on the 23rd inst., after a protracted illness. Mr. Chase was born in Essex county, New York, in 1831, and was admitted to the bar of old Essex in 1853. He read law with Judge Simmons, of Keyesville. Mr. Chase fitted himself so thoroughly for the bar that he achieved success very soon after entering the profession, and became the law partner of Samuel Ames of Keyesville, a lawyer of great ability. In 1856, he was elected State's Attorney of Essex county, and was re-elected in 1858. He gave universal satisfaction to the people of his county, and discharged the duties of his offices with fidelity to the people, and with marked ability.

In 1860, at the close of his second term as Prosecuting Attorney, he moved to Chicago, where he has since resided, with the exception of a short time, he resided in Lexington, Mo., where he went to regain his failing health.

He was Master in Chancery of the Recorder's Court of this city until that court was abolished by the new Constitution; and upon the remodeling of the courts he was appointed one of the Masters in Chancery of the Circuit Court, which position he held up to the time of his death. He was at one time the senior member of the law firm of Chase, Sawin & Munson, and then of Chase, Storrs & Munson, and afterwards of Chase & Munson. As a Master in Chancery, he gave universal satisfaction to the bar, and possessed the confidence of the judges; as a lawyer, he was able and ever faithful to the interests of his clients; as a man he was kind hearted, courteous, and generous. He was respected by all who knew him. He had been for a number of years prior to his death one of the leading elders in the Westminster Presbyterian Church.

Mr. Chase leaves a wife and only daughter to mourn the loss of a faithful husband and an affectionate father. Mrs. Chase has our sympathy, as she has that of all her friends and acquaintances.

U. S. DISTRICT COURT, DISTRICT OF LOUISIANA.

OPINION, APRIL, 1876.

JURISDICTION OF UNITED STATES COURTS IN CONTROVERSIES BETWEEN FOREIGN SEAMEN ON FOREIGN SHIPS.

ANTHONY FRY v. LLEWELLYN COOK, ET ALS.—IN ADMIRALTY.

The limitation in the acts of the Congress allowing arrest of the defendant on mesne or final process, issuing out of the courts of the United States, only in cases in which the courts of the State in which the United States courts sit could cause arrests, applies to the Admiralty as well as to the Common Law processes.

When a suit is brought by a foreign seaman against the ship of a friendly foreign government, or its officers, growing out of a round voyage to and from the ports of such government which the libellant contracted to make, in the midst of such voyage, and when there has been no discharge of the seaman, or termination of the voyage, or brutality on the part of the officers, and the resident consul of such friendly government protests, the courts of the United States are bound by the comity between nations to decline to exercise jurisdiction.—The Louisiana Law Journal.

Opinion by BILLINGS, J.

This is an action brought to recover damages for assault and battery alleged to have been committed on the high seas. An order of arrest was at first issued, which, on argument, was vacated on the grounds that the statutes of the United States and the rules of the Supreme Court allowed an arrest by virtue of a process from a court of the United States only in cases in which an arrest authorized by the laws of the State in which such court was sitting; that this limitation applied to admiralty as well as to common law processes; and that, according to the laws of the State of Louisiana, the body of a non-resident could not be taken on any mesne process, unless he was an absconding debtor.

The case is now before me on an exception to the exercise of jurisdiction on the part of this court. I had directed testimony to be taken summarily before the commissioner on the merits, so that all the facts are before me. The question is, ought this court, from a regard to the commerce of a friendly government, to refrain from granting relief.

It appears that the libellant is a foreigner and a seamen on a British vessel, upon which the beating is alleged to have been inflicted, he having shipped in Liverpool for the round voyage to this country and back, and upon that voyage, and having arrived at the port of New Orleans; that the defendants are all British subjects.

The British Consul, resident at this port, having been notified, came before me and remonstrated against this court taking cognizance of the cause.

Independently of the considerations which arise from the nationality of the parties and vessel, the weight of evidence is against the libellant. But as these considerations have been so fully and ably presented, I will avail myself of the aid which the proctors have rendered, and state my conclusion, as to the duty of courts in interfering or withholding jurisdiction in such cases.

It is undoubtedly true, as a general proposition, that an action for a personal tort follows the person, and may be brought in any foreign court.

It is also true that the courts of a nation are established and maintained for the convenience of its own citizens or subjects, and if foreigners are permitted to become actors therein, it is because of what is termed comity between nations. American Law Review, vol. 7, p. 417, and Daniel Webster's Works (Everett's edition), vol. 6, pp. 117 and 118.

The only ground upon which a foreigner could urge a claim to become a libellant in our courts, would be, that it was by comity due his government that its subject should be thus heard; and so far as this claim could be considered as a right, it could be insisted on only by that government, and except in cases of inhumanity or gross injustice, would disappear whenever the claimant's government took a position against it.

There is in this case no circumstance—such as the unwarranted termination of the voyage, the discharge of a seaman, or brutality—which might possibly constitute a proper ground for the interposition of the jurisdiction of a foreign court without the request of the representative of libellant's government.

It is a suit brought by a foreigner, springing out of a voyage on the ship of a friendly nation, in the midst of that voyage, against the subjects of that nation, on account of alleged grievances. The libellant not only proposes to disconnect himself from the ship, but asks the detention of ship, officers and crew, in a foreign port, in order to settle a dispute, which can far better be settled by the tribunals of the country in which, under whose laws and in connection with whose commerce, he made his contract, and to which he agreed to return. The representative of that country asks this court not to interfere. It is urged, and that fairly, that by the very agreement of the parties, the articles of shipping, the courts of the kingdom of Great Britain have been made the forum for the settlement of this dispute; that they afford adequate redress, and that for courts to entertain this and similar suits, during a voyage which the parties had agreed to make, at intermediate points at which the vessel might touch, would impose delays which might seriously and uselessly embarrass the commerce of a friendly power.

The exercise of jurisdiction in such a case is discretionary, and, until the Congress of the United States controls the subject by legislation, is discretionary with its courts. In this case I am satisfied by reason and abundant authority that the court should decline to entertain jurisdiction.

Let the libel be dismissed.

Let the suit of the same libellant against the British bark Carolina, for the same reasons be dismissed.

SUPREME COURT OF LOUISIANA.

OPINION FILED MAY 19, 1876.

PETER HELVESE v. HIBERNIA NATIONAL BANK.

Appeal from the Sixth District Court, Parish of Orleans.

LIABILITY UPON A RAISED CERTIFIED CHECK.

Opinion of the court: Plaintiff appeals from the judgment rejecting his demand against the defendant on a certain check for $4,150. The defense is the check was raised after it was certified, and the date was altered.

It appears the Hibernia Bank on the 2d of July, 1874, certified a check of its customer, J. Weidner, for $41. That there was a blank between the words "forty-one" and "dollars," in which the drawer inserted the words "one hundred and fifty;" that the date was changed from the 2d to the 7th of July, and that plaintiff acquired it on the 7th of July in due course of business for value; also, that Wiedner has absconded.

The bank was negligent in certifying the check without drawing a line with a pen across the blank between the words forty-one and dollars, thereby enabling the drawer to perpetrate the fraud. It is admitted that if George Soule, an expert, had been produced as a witness, he would testify, "that if a line had been drawn from these words (forty-one) to the word dollars, it would have been impossible to erase it without leaving a mark; there was no such line drawn; such a line could not have been taken out by the use of chemicals without leaving some traces of the action of the acid on the paper."

The evidence is, there was nothing in the appearance of the check to excite the suspicion of the plaintiff as a prudent man of business.

We think this case is controlled by the case of Isnard v. Torris and Marquis, 10 A, 103, where the indorser was held liable for a note raised from $150 to $450 under similar circumstances. The court said: "There was a want of proper caution on the part of Marquis in indorsing a note containing such a blank. This want of proper caution on his part enabled Torris to commit a fraud by filling up the blank so as to increase the amount in a manner entirely free from suspicion; and surely the equity of Marquis, whose case is certainly a hard one, is inferjor to that of Isnard, who has parted with his money on the faith of a state of things which the imprudence of Marquis enabled Torris to create. By the Law Merchant of this country the certificate of the bank that a check is good, is equivalent to acceptance." 10 Wallace, 647.

It is therefore adjudged that the judgment herein in favor of defendant be annulled, and that plaintiff recover of defendant $4,150, with legal interest from 7th July, 1874, and costs of both courts.

SUPREME COURT OF INDIANA.

From the Indianapolis Sentinel.

ASSAULT AND BATTERY—INDICTMENT FOR CONSTRUCTION OF THE STATUTE.

5567. The State v. Wright et al, Allen C. C. C. Affirmed. Worden, J.

Held, That an indictment for an assault and battery should allege that the unlawful touching, striking, etc., was either in a rude, insolent or angry manner. Indictments upon statutes should embrace a charge of all the particulars that enter into the statutory description of the offense, either in the language of the statute or its equivalent. (See 2 G. and H., 459, sec. 97.)

CHANGE OF GRADE OF STREET—CONSEQUENTIAL DAMAGES—CONSTRUCTION OF STATUTE (3 IND. STAT. 74, SEC. 27.)

4459. The city of Wabash v. Alber, Kosciusko C. C. Reversed. Downy, J.

The authorities of the incorporated town of Wabash established a grade of the streets in the town, and they were graded accordingly in 1863; in 1865 the incorporated town became a city, under the act of 1865; afterwards the city changed the grade of the streets previously fixed, cutting them down, adjoining the appellee's property, some five feet, destroying access thereto, etc.: and, in addition to this, the city assessed against the lot a portion of the cost of the charge. The question presented is: Could the city thus change the grade of the street without the payment to the appellee of the consequential damages sustained by him?

The court is of the opinion that the provision of the statute (3 Ind., stat. 74, sec. 27) which declares that "when the city authorities have once established the grade of any street, * * * such grade shall not be changed until the damages occasioned by such change have been assessed and tendered," or, does not apply to this case. The city authorities had never before established the grade of the street in question. It has been done by the town authorities. In the absence of any statutory prohibition streets in towns and cities may be changed at pleasure, and there is no liability of the corporation for consequential damages, provided the work be done in pursuance of legal authority and with reasonable skill.

INDICTMENT FOR BEING INTOXICATED IN A PUBLIC PLACE, UNDER SEC. 11, ACT OF MARCH, 1875.

5380. The State v. Sowers, Parke C. C. Affirmed. Petitt, J.

Held, That the private house of a gentleman, at which he holds a social party, cannot be understood to be a "public place."

INDICTMENT FOR ALLOWING A MINOR TO PLAY AT BILLIARDS, (ACTS 1873, P. 30).

4996. Donniger v. The State, Decatur C. C. Reversed. Worden, J.

Held, 1. That the indictment is bad in not allowing that the minor was allowed to play at the game or upon the billiard table.

Held, 2. That the indictment is defective in not stating the name of the person with whom the minor was suffered to play the same. (47 Ind. 463.)

ACTION ON THREE PROMISSORY NOTES—DURESS AS, TO MAKER—EFFECT OF, AS TO SURETY.

4287. Coffelt and Anderson v. Wise et al., Warren C. C. Reversed. Biddle, J.

This case turns upon the question whether the answer of appellants to the complaint was good. It was averred, substantially, that one Wiles came to the defendant, Coffelt, representing himself as a United States officer, armed with a warrant issued by the United States Court for his arrest, etc., and, producing something like a warrant, said that he would arrest him unless he (Coffelt) would give his notes with the defendant, Anderson, as surety, etc., payable to appellees, or

Held, "That when there is an arrest for improper purposes without a just cause, or when there is an arrest for a just cause but without lawful authority, or when there is an arrest for a just cause under lawful authority for unlawful purposes, it may be construed a duress;" (3 N. H., 508); or, "If a man execute a bond for fear of unlawful imprisonment, he may avoid it on the ground of duress;" (Whitfield v. Longfellow, 13 Maine.)

Held, 2, That a bond obtained by duress is not only void as to the principal, but also as to the surety. (15 John R. 256; 27 Alabama 44; 20 Ind. 97; 41 Ind. 312; 49 Ind. 573. That the answer therefor was good.)

EVIDENCE—HUSBAND AND WIFE.

3794. McConnell v. Martin and Martin, Tippecanoe, C. C. Affirmed. Downey, C. J.

STATEMENT.—This was an action by appellees against the appellant to recover possession of certain real estate. The land had been sold and conveyed to appellees, the plaintiffs, as husband and wife, and afterwards sold on execution against the husband. Appellant claims title under a sheriff's deed. It was claimed in the trial that the deed to the husband and wife was void as against creditors, the title having been conveyed in that manner to defraud creditors.

Held, That the husband could testify in his behalf and the wife in her behalf, though the evidence of each might inure to the benefit of the other, they having been deprived of the estate by entirety. (46 Ind., 1.)

OBSTRUCTING HIGHWAY—PRESUMPTION OF DEDICATION.

5151. Sullivan v. The State, Switzerland, C. C. Reversed. Buskirk, J.

STATEMENT.—This was a prosecution for obstructing a highway.

Held, 1, That the second instruction complained of is objectionable; by it the jury was told that if the road had been used by the public for a considerable length of time with the knowledge of the owner, a dedication might be presumed. The knowledge of the owner is not sufficient, for he may have objected and protested against its use. (See Somers v. The State, present term.)

Held, 2, That the other instructions complained of are not objectionable.

LICENSE TO SELL INTOXICATING LIQUORS—FORFEITURE—AGENT.

5335. Runyon v. The State, Marion, C. C. Reversed. Worden, J.

STATEMENT.—The appellant was indicted of the offense of selling intoxicating liquors without license. Samuel McKay had a license to sell liquor at the time and place of the sale, and McKay and appellant had a contract under which appellant was acting.

Held, That a license to sell spirituous liquors is not transferable by assignment or otherwise (5 Blackf., 151), and that a removal from the State operates as an abandonment of the license (47 Ind. 519) but while the licensee remains in the State he may carry on his business by his agent, and the agent will not be responsible, as for selling without license, (20 Ind., 116). That in this case it does not appear that the licensee had in any manner forfeited his license; and that appellant was acting as agent for McKay.

EVIDENCE—VARIANCE BETWEEN INDICTMENT AND PROOF—CHRISTIAN NAME.

5088. Choen v. The State, Cass, C. C. Affirmed. Worden, J.

Held, That where one is indicted for assault and battery upon one described as "George W. Shott," and the evidence shows an assault and battery upon "George Shott," there is no variance between the indictment and the proof. The law knows but one christian name. The initial letter of the middle christian name may be regarded as surplusage. (5 John., 84; 1 Hill, 102; 14 Barb., 255—307; 3 Green, 130; 21 Ill., 242; 40 Ill., 116; 6 Col., 205; 4 Watts, 329.) Pettit, J., dissenting.

Held, 2, That the evidence sustains the verdict.

Clerk Supreme Court.

AGENCY—THE CONSTRUCTION OF THE AUTHORITY.

WHERE THE INSTRUCTIONS ARE AMBIGUOUS.

When the instructions given to an agent are clear and defined, his duty is to observe them faithfully. He will not be allowed to violate them in any particular, provided they may be lawfully carried out. On the other hand, if the instructions are given in such uncertain terms as to be susceptible of two different meanings, and the agent bona fide adopts one of them and acts upon it, it is not competent to the principal to repudiate the act as unauthorized because he meant the instructions or orders to be read in the other sense of which it is equally capable. It is a fair answer to such an attempt to disown the agent's authority to tell the principal that the departure from his intention was occasioned by his own fault, and that he should have given his order in clear and unambiguous terms: (Per Lord Chelmsford in Ireland v. Livingstone, L. Rep. 5 H. of L. 416.)

In one of the earliest reported cases, Moore v. Mourgue (Cowp. 479), decided in 1776, the action was for negligence in not insuring a cargo of fruit according to the plaintiff's directions. At the trial it did not appear that the plaintiff had given any particular directions how or with whom to insure. The instruction was a general one to insure the cargo. The defendant insured with a company which always in policies upon fruit inserted the clause "free from particular average." After insurance a partial loss occurred. The proceeds of the damaged part of the cargo were insufficient to pay the salvage claim. There were apparently two offices in which the exception was never put in policies. "To maintain this action," said Lord Mansfield, "the defendant must be guilty either of a breach of orders, gross negligence, or fraud. . . In delivering their verdict they (the jury) say they did not think the defendant guilty of gross negligence, or that he acted mala fide. The court, herefore, will not say so. . . He (the plaintiff) gives no directions at all. Therefore, he left it to the discretion of his correspondent, who, if he meant no fraud, was at liberty to disbelieve the underwriters. . . If upon all the circumstances the jury had found for the plaintiff, it might have been a cast whether the court would have granted a new trial. A fortiori in a hard action, where as no particular orders were given, there has certainly been no breach of orders; where the defendant appears to have acted bona fide, and where the plaintiff has himself been guilty of the first omission in giving no directions at all, there seems to be no ground for the court to interfere against the defendant." The other judges concurred, and a rule for a new trial was discharged.

The principle deducible from this case is that where the instructions are ambiguous, an agent will be protected if he acts in a way warranted by one of the constructions to which the instructions are susceptible, provided he is guilty of neither mala fides nor gross negligence.

The Court of Common Pleas decided in 1851, a case in which a similar principle was involved, (Boden v. French, 10 C. B., 886.) The defendant was employed by the plaintiff to sell for him a quantity of coal at such a price as would realize "not less than 15s. per ton, net cash, less your commission for such sale." The defendant sold one hundred tons of the coal at 15s. 6d. per ton, at two months credit. The plaintiff then sued in assumpsit, averring in his declaration that the defendant promised the plaintiff that he would not sell the coals otherwise than for ready money. At the trial before Chief Justice Jervis, the plaintiff was nonsuited, the learned judge being of opinion that the instructions did not bear the construction put upon them in the declaration. It was customary in the coal trade to sell coals at a credit of two months, except on the wharf. Leave was reserved to move to enter a verdict for the plaintiff, if the court should be of opinion that the evidence sustained the declaration. The rule was discharged by the full court. "The letter of instructions," said Chief Justice Jervis, "will admit of at least three significations. It may mean sell for cash down, 15s., or at such price as will eventually realize 15s., or a del credere (p. 887) . . . it is the plaintiff's duty to make out that the construction which he has put upon it in declaring is the true one; and this he has failed to do if the matter be at all doubtful." This case was decided upon more technical grounds than the former; there is, nevertheless, a similarity in the ratio decidendi.

The decisions of the Court of Queen's Bench, the Exchequer Chamber, and the House of Lords in Ireland v. Livingstone (L. Rep. 2 Q. B. 99; 5 ib. 516; 5 H. of L. Cas. 395), the final decision being given in 1872, should be carefully studied. The defendant wrote to the plaintiffs, who were commission agents at Mauritius, "Should the beet crop prove less than usual there may be a good chance of something being made by importing cane sugar, at about the limit I am going to give you as a maximum, say 26s. 9d., for Nos. 10 to 12, and you may ship me 500 tons, to cover cost, freight, and insurance; 50 tons more or less of no moment, if it enables you to get a suitable vessel. I should prefer the option of sending vessel to London, Liverpool, or the Clyde; but if that is not compassable you may ship to either Liverpool or London." According to the ordinary course of purchasing sugars in the Mauritius, it was not usual, or even possible, to buy the whole of the sugar at once. The usage there was to make shipments of less than the whole quantity ordered. The plaintiffs accordingly purchased about 400 tons, being unable to get any more within the defendant's limit. They were shipped about the end of September. The prices of sugar fell in England in the meantime, and the defendant wrote a countermand of his order, which was received by the plaintiffs on the 20th Oct. The defendant refused to accept the 400 tons when they arrived in England, on the ground that his order had not been complied with. The Court of Queen's Bench, consisting of Chief Justice Cockburn, Justices Mellor and Shee, decided that the defendant was bound to accept and pay for the 400 tons. Nothing turned upon any ambiguity on the instructions. The grounds upon which the court decided were simply that a discretion was given to the plaintiffs by the words "fifty tons more or less," and that the defendant must be taken to have given the order with reference to the circumstances of the Mauritius market. On appeal to the Court of Exchequer Chamber, Baron Cleasby and Mr. Justice Montague Smith were of opinion that the judgment of the Queen's Bench should be affirmed, whilst the majority, Chief Baron Kelly, Barons Martin and Channell, and Mr. Justice Keating reversed that judgment on the ground that the instructions gave no discretion; that the order being unambiguous for a single cargo of 500 tons in a single ship, no question could be raised respecting the custom at the Mauritius. On behalf of the respondent it was contended, on the authority of Bayliffe v. Butterworth (1 Ex. 425; 17 L. J., Ex. 78), that inasmuch as the order was not so unambiguous as to exclude the custom, the custom of the market at Mauritius must be referred to to explain it. This was the opinion of Mr. Justice Montague Smith, one of the minority. In the House of Lords this opinion prevailed, and it was held by the Lords present, namely, Lords Chelmsford, Westbury, and Colonsay, to be sufficient for the decision of the case. The judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber was reversed.

An examination of the judgments of the several learned judges who heard the case shows that there were two material questions involved in the case. The first related to the relation existing between the plaintiffs and the defendants—was that relation that of principal and agent, or that of vendor and vendee? The other related to the construction of the distinctions sent to the defendant—was the order given for an entire quantity to be shipped in one ship, or was a discretion allowed?

Upon the former question a difference of opinion existed among the judges who touched upon it. Baron Martin, in the Exchequer Chamber, relying upon Feise v. Wray (3 East 93) and Kreuger v. Blanck (L. Rep. 5 Ex. 179), thought there could be no doubt that the relation existing was that of vendor and vendee. Baron Cleasby and Mr. Justice Byles were of the contrary opinion, and Mr. Justice Blackburn, in his elaborate opinion, delivered before the House of Lords, explained the twofold character of consignors. "If the consignor is a person who has contracted to supply the goods at an agreed price, to cover cost, freight, and insurance, the amount inserted in the invoice is the agreed price, and no commission is charged. . . . Every party there takes upon himself the risk of the rise or fall in price, and there is no contract of agency or trust between them, and therefore no commission is charged. But it is also very common for the consignor to be an agent, who does not bind himself absolutely to supply the goods, but merely accepts an order by which he binds himself to use due diligence to fulfil the order. In that case he is bound to get the goods as cheap as he reasonably can, and the sum inserted in the invoice represents the actual cost and charges at which the goods are procured by the consignor, with the addition of a commission; and the naming of a maximum limit shows that the order is of that nature." His Lordship then proceeds to examine the argument of Martin B.: "It is quite true that the agents who in thus executing an order, ships goods to his principal, is in contemplation of law a vendor to him. The persons who supply goods to a commission merchant sell them to him, and not to his unknown foreign correspondent, and the commission merchant has no authority to pledge the credit of his correspondent for them . . . the commission merchant is a vendor, and has the right of one as to stoppage in transitu." This, however, is no reason for saying that it is not a contract of agency. "When the order was accepted by the plaintiffs there was a contract of agency, by which the plaintiffs undertook to use reasonable skill and diligence to procure the goods ordered, at or below the limit given."

The difference of opinion upon the second question was even greater than upon the first. In the Queen's Bench, Chief Justice Cockburn, justices Mellor and Shee were of opinion that the words "50 tons more or less" gave a discretion, and that they had reference to the advantage of getting a suitable vessel. In the Exchequer Chamber this was substantially the opinion of Baron Cleasby, Mr. Justice Montague Smith, Chief Baron Kelly. Barons Channell and Martin, and Mr. Justice Keating, on the other hand, thought that the authority pointed to a single shipment of one cargo and by one vessel. The judges having been summoned to the House of Lords, Barons Cleasby and Martin supported their former opinions. Justices Byles, Blackburn, and Hannen supported the judgment of the Queen's Bench. After having heard the opinions of the judges, the learned Lords decided—(1) That the question was one between principal and agent, though the plaintiffs might in some respects be looked upon as vendors to the defendant, so as to give them a right of stoppage in transitu, following the opinion of Mr. Justice Blackburn. (2) That the ambiguity of the order justified the plaintiff's mode of executing it. The case was thus brought within the operation of a well-established rule.—London Law Times.

LORD ST. LEONARD'S WILL.

PROBATE — LOST WILL — PRESUMPTION OF REVOCATION — SECONDARY EVIDENCE OF CONTENTS — INTERESTED WITNESS — DECLARATIONS OF TESTATOR — CONTENTS OF WILL NOT ALL PROVED. — We have heretofore given an account of the decree entered by the President of the Probate Division of the High Court of Justice admitting the will of Lord St. Leonard to probate. An appeal was taken from that decree to the Court of Appeals in Chancery. The appeal was heard on March 7, 8, 10 and 13, before COCKBURN, C. J., JESSEL, M. R., JAMES and MELLISH, L. JJ., and BAGGALLAY, J. A. The opinion of this court in the case is published in the London Law Times Reports for May 13, and occupies 16 double column pages. The following are the head notes to this remarkable opinion as published in the Reports:

Where a will traced to the possession of the testator cannot be found after his death, and there is no evidence what has become of it, the presumption arises that the will has been destroyed by the testator for the purpose of revoking it, but this presumption may be rebutted by parol evidence.

All statements and declarations, written or oral, made by a testator, whether before or after the execution of the will, are admissible as secondary evidence of its contents.

Quick v. Quick (10 L. T. Rep. N. S., 619; 3 Sw. & T. 442) overruled (Mellish, L. J. dissenting).

The absence of evidence as to some of the contents of a lost will will not prevent the court from granting probate, if it is satisfied that the instrument propounded contains the substantial parts of the lost will.

A testator duly executed a holograph will and eight codicils, and deposited them in a box, the key of which he always kept in his own possession. He frequently expressed adherence to the will down to within a few days of his death. On his death the codicils were found in the box, but the will was missing, and could nowhere be found. Thereupon the testator's unmarried daughter C., who had lived with him all her life, and had frequently read the will, in the preparation of which she had assisted him, wrote out from memory the alleged contents of the will, which included a bequest to her of 6000*l.* and of one-third of the residuary personal estate (equivalent to 10,000*l.*). Some corroboration of C's account of the contents of the will was found in the codicils and in certain quasi testamentary papers of the testator. But her testimony as to the residuary bequest was not at all corroborated. C. admitted that the contents of the will as written out by her were not complete, there being some small legacies and certain ulterior limitation of real estate which she could not remember. C's veracity was not questioned by the persons who opposed the granting of probate:

Held (affirming the decision of the President of the Probate Division), that C's statement of the contents of the will was substantially correct, and that probate should be granted accordingly.

A REMEDY FOR STATE ANARCHY.

The following is the amendment to the National Constitution which was proposed by Mr. C. C. Bonney, to provide a remedy for the anarchy lately existing in some of the Southern States:

Whenever it shall appear by vote of two-thirds of the members of the House of Representatives, that the State government of any one of the United States is unable to protect the people thereof against domestic violence; or that a condition of anarchy exists therein; or that there are conflicting State governments in such State, and that the conflict between them has not, within a reasonable time been determined, and that in consequence of such conflict, the persons and property of the people are seriously endangered; thereupon, the president of the United States shall, without any unnecessary delay, nominate and appoint, subject to confirmation by vote of two-thirds of the members of the Senate, seven judicial commissioners to ascertain the facts of the case, and to recommend such measures as may appear to be necessary for the restoration of peace and the establishment of good government. None of said commissioners shall be residents of the State in question, nor shall more than one commissioner be taken from any one State. Said commissioners may, among other things, recommend the removal of officers of such State, or persons acting as such officers, and that vacancies of any State offices be declared; and they may also recommend suitable persons to be appointed and installed provisional officers de facto, to hold office, executive, legislative, or judicial, as the case may be, until their respective successors shall be chosen and accept in due course of law. Said judicial commissioners shall have, so far as may be necessary, all the powers of a judicial court, for the purpose of ascertaining the facts in the case; and the reasonable expenses of said commission shall be paid out of the treasury of the United States.

The president of the United States shall have power, and it shall be his duty to carry all such measures as shall be recommended by said judicial commission under this amendment, and as shall be conformable to its intent and purpose, into speedy and complete effect.

The unreasonable continuance of such provisional government, and any serious abuse of power under this amendment, may be restrained or annulled, as occasion may require, under such rules as the Supreme court of the United States, may establish in that behalf.

SUPREME COURT OF LOUISIANA.

OPINION FILED AT NEW ORLEANS, APRIL 10, 1876.

PETER JOSEPH v. DAVID BIDWELL. FROM FOURTH DISTRICT COURT, PARISH OF ORLEANS.

A COLORED MAN RECOVERS A JUDGMENT OF $5000 FOR BEING EJECTED FROM A THEATRE ON ACCOUNT OF HIS COLOR, AND THE SUPREME COURT REDUCE IT TO $300.

Opinion of the court by LUDELING, C. J.

The plaintiff, a colored man, sued the defendant, the proprietor of the Academy of Music, a public theatre in the city of New Orleans, for $5000 damages, for refusing to admit him into the theatre after he had purchased a ticket which entitled him to a seat in the parquette of said theatre. The case was tried by a jury, who disagreed, and, under the statute of the State, the court discharged the jury, and rendered a judgment in favor of the plaintiff.

We have been unable to discover anything unconstitutional in the act of 1870 or 1871, referred to by counsel. The provision of the Constitution of the United States, which guarantees trials by jury, has no application to trials in State courts. This has been repeatedly decided, and is not an open question. Article thirteen of the Constitution declares that "all persons shall enjoy equal rights and privileges upon any conveyance of a public character; and all places of business or of public resort, as for which a license is required by either State, parish or municipal authority, shall be deemed places of a public character, and shall be open to the accommodation and patronage of all persons, without distinction or discrimination on account of race or color."

This article of the Constitution does not enunciate a mere abstraction, but it guarantees substantial rights. To facilitate the enforcement of these rights, the General Assembly has enacted laws, and it is the duty of courts, when called upon, to enforce them.

An examination of the evidence in this record satisfies us, that the plaintiff was rudely denied admittance to the theatre solely on account of his being a colored man. See Sauvinet vs. Walker and Decuir vs. Benson. Mr. Justice Taliaferro and I think the amount of damages awarded by the lower court not too high, but as a majority of the court do not agree in this, the judgment will be reduced to $300, with interest from the date of the judgment. It is therefore ordered that the judgment of the lower court be amended by reducing the amount of the judgment in favor of the plaintiff to $300, with five per cent. per annum from the eighth of June, 1874, and costs of the lower court, the cost of the appeal to be paid by the appellee.

Justice Taliaferro concurring:

After a very careful perusal of all the evidence found in the record of this case, I am well satisfied there has been, through the conduct of an agent of the defendant, a wanton violation of a right and privilege secured to the plaintiff by the Constitution and laws of this State, as well as by the paramount law of the land. I am equally well satisfied that this violation of that right was perpetrated from no other consideration than that the plaintiff is a man of color, and that the personal indignity offered him proceeded solely from the same cause. The violation of the plaintiff's legal right to enter, on the same conditions that all other spectators enter the place of public amusement managed by the defendant, renders the latter liable in damages to the plaintiff; for the act of the agent, under the circumstances of this case, must be regarded as the act of the principal. The amount awarded by the lower court as damages is not exorbitant or unreasonable. The judgment ought to be affirmed.

Justice Wyly dissents.

THE POSTAGE QUESTION.

On the 28th of April, Hon. S. S. Cox, of New York, introduced a bill in Congress to remedy the blunders of the last Congress on the postage question. If this bill becomes a law, attorneys and others can receive books, blanks, etc., by mail, at the rate of eight cents per pound. Every attorney, as well as every literary person, is interested in having this bill pass. We hope Mr. Cox will not allow it to sleep. The bill is entitled one to fix the rate on certain small matter, and for other purposes, and runs as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That from and after the passage of this act, first class mail matter shall include all written matter except corrected proof sheets passing between authors and publishers, and except the written presentation in any book or pamphlet and the name and address of the sender, preceded by the word "from," and also the number and price, and a brief statement of the contents, and only the contents, which may be written on the wrapper, and only on the wrapper, of any article or package, of mailable matter of the second, third or fourth class. without subjecting the same to any higher rates than would otherwise be chargeable; and except all such matter as is otherwise classified by this act. Second class matter shall comprise specimens of ores, minerals, precious stones, jewelry, teas, sugar, coffee, flour and all other granular articles, unless specially excepted, and shall be prepaid for by weight and with stamp, as heretofore provided for third class matter, the rate to be one cent per ounce. Third class matter shall comprise all transient and occasional printed publications, such as pamphlets, handbills, posters, unsealed circulars, prospectuses, books, proof sheets, corrected proof sheets, maps, prints, engravings, blanks, exclusively in print, flexible patterns, sample cards, photographic paper, letter envelopes, postal cards, upon which there is neither printing nor writing other than that which is printed by Government, and the written or printed address of some person or persons to whom they are to be sent through the mail, postal envelopes and wrappers, cards, plain and ornamental paper, photograpic representations, types, seeds, bulbs, roots, cuttings, scions, and all other matter not otherwise provided for and not by law excluded from the mails, and to be paid for by weight and in bulk, the same as heretofore provided for second class matter, the rate to be one cent for two ounces. Fourth class matter shall embrace only periodical matter issued regularly at stated periods from a known office of publication or news agent, and as frequently as once in three months, and shall be carried at a uniform rate, to be paid by weight and in bulk, as heretofore prescribed for second class matter; the rate to be two cents per pound. All mailable matter of the first second and third class may be registered on the prepayment of a registration fee in addition to the postage, under such rules and regulations as the Postmaster General may prescribe.

Sec. 2. That when the postage on any mailable matter deposited in a post office for forwarding or delivery shall, through inadvertence of the writer or sender thereof, have been left wholly unpaid, or prepaid to any amount less than full rate, such matter shall, if the name or address of the writer or sender be known or can be readily ascertained by the postmaster, be returned to such writer or sender in order that the postage on the same may be fully prepaid; and if such name and address are not known and cannot be readily ascertained by the postmaster, then such matter shall be forwarded to destination, charged with double the amount of postage found deficient at the rate as provided for such matter when prepaid, which charge shall be collected before delivery; provided, that no matter of the first class, the postage on which shall have been purposely or designedly left either wholly unpaid or prepaid to an amount less than one full rate, shall be forwarded or delivered, but shall be held for postage and forwarded to the Dead Letter Office in Washington, unless returned to the writer or sender thereof as by law provided.

Sec. 3. That all provisions of law inconsistent herewith are hereby repealed.

The bill was read twice, referred to the Committee on Post Offices, and ordered to be printed.

EVIDENCE.

We clip the following paragraphs from a compendium of Louisiana Jurisprudence on evidence, published in the Louisiana Law Journal:

SEC. 165.—Signatures and Handwriting.—The opinions of witnesses or experts are received for the purpose of proving the genuineness of signatures, whether such opinions are based on a previous knowledge of the parties' signatures, or are the result of comparison with other signatures, whose genuineness is undisputed. C. C. Art. 2245 (2241); C. P. Art 325; Greenleaf Evid. § 440, 576 7; See Infra. § 343.

SEC. 166.—Experts.—With regard to persons who may be sworn as experts for such purpose, it is not required that they should belong to the trade or profession in question, provided it be shown that they are skillful or proficient in that respect; their opinions are admissible in evidence subject to be weighed like all other evidence. Langfit vs. Clinton R. R., 2 R. R. 217. Of this hereafter.

SEC. 164.—Matters of Law; Opinion.—Matters of law, involved in a case, are the exclusive province of the Court, and, as a general rule, are not open to the opinions of witnesses. Bowman v. Flower, 7 L. R., 111; Zeringue v. White, 4 A. R., 301. Nor are their opinion of facts any more admissible; they must relate only facts; and upon these the judge forms and pronounces his opinion. Kreutler v. U. S. Bank, 11 R. R, 216; Harris v. Allnut, 12 L. R. 465; Fleming v. Hall, 17 L. R., 1; Mechanics' Bank v. Watson, 7 R. R., 451. To this rule an exception lies as regards foreign laws, the proof of which must be made as of any fact, since the courts cannot take judicial cognizance of their existence. Such laws may be proven by witnesses testifying simply to their existence; or in case of laws of sister States, by the production of the volume, purporting to be an official publication. Supra. § 5 10; Layton v. Chalon, 4 A. R., 318.

To the rule that witnesses must testify as to facts and not express their opinions, an exception lies in questions of science, skill, trade or other of like kind, when men versed therein are admitted to give their opinions or experience in evidence. Thus "terms of art or technical terms and phrases are to be interpreted according to their received meaning and acceptation with the learned in the art, trade or profession, to which they refer." C. C. Arts. 15 (15), 1947 (1942).

Thus it is customary to take the opinions of physicians as to the sanity of individuals, the cause of decease or death, or the consequences of wounds, whether such opinions be founded on personal observation or on a hypothetical case. Such testimony, however, is far from being always conclusive; it must be weighed like other evidence.

Besides, it must not be allowed to extend to the general merits of the case, but must be limited to the particular fact which gives rise to the expression of such opinion. Greenleaf Evid. § 440; State v. Bailey, 4 A. R., 377. In Brabo v. Martin, 5 L. R., 276: "The general rule of evidence is, that facts are to be proved to a jury. An exception is made on questions of science, in matters purely professional, and particular branches of trade or manufacture. Opinions of persons skilled in these respective matters are received; and those of physicians fall within one of the classes just stated. Their opinions, are evidence, but they must state the facts upon which these opinions are based; and in case witnesses of this description differ in opinion, the jury must judge at last which of them is entitled to most weight." Holland v. Cammett, 5 A. R., 705; Dupre v. Demarest, 5 A. R., 591; Roca v. Slawson, 5 A. R., 708; Virgin v Dawson, 15 A. R., 532; Cahn v. Costa, 15 A. R., 612: Paty v. Martin 15 A. R., 620; Forsyth v. Desperveis, 14 L. R, 215. "But witnesses are not receivable to state their views on matter of legal or moral obligation; nor, on the manner in which other persons would probably be influenced, if the parties acted one way, rather than another." Greenleaf evid., § 441. As to opinions in matters of insurance, involving questions of skill and judgment, see Greenleaf Fvid., § 441; Phillip Am. Ed. Evid., § 899; 2 Starkie Evid., 886–888 of 3d London Ed. See also Bonnier, Preuves, pp. 71-90, Expertise et visite sur les lieux.

THE LIABILITY OF DIRECTORS OF RAILWAY COMPANIES.—A somewhat remarkable case has lately been decided in the Common Pleas Division of the High Court. As is well known, a shareholder in a railway company who has not paid the calls on his shares, is liable to the extent of such calls to the creditors of the railway; but certain directors of an abortive railway, called the Didcot, Newbury, and Southampton, concluded that they were not so liable on the shares allotted them for their qualification, because no shares or scrip certificates could be proved to have been issued, and no register of shares kept, or even procured. They argued that there was no proof that they were shareholders, or could be proceeded against as such. But the court of course said, that if a register was not kept, it was the fault of the directors, and that they could not be allowed to take advantage of that fault to excuse themselves from liability. The fact as we (Economist) understand the circumstances to be, is that the directors in question were promoters of the company, and took their "qualification" in shares accordingly, without much considering the liabilities it involved. But this is a reason for holding them bound to pay calls, rather than the contrary. Such persons are the principal agents in the announcement and commencement of abortive railways, and they must be made to understand that they will have to pay the debts of such companies, at least as far as the calls on the shares which qualify them to be directors will go.

SEA INSURANCE POLICIES.—An Act of Parliament has just been printed, and recently passed, to amend the law relating to the stamping of policies of sea insurances. It is now provided that a policy by which the separate and distinct interests of two or more persons are insured, being stamped in respect of the aggregate of such interests, but not duly stamped in respect of each of such interests, may be stamped with an additional stamp or stamps at any time within one month after the last risk has been declared. Section 16 of the Stamp Act, 1870, is to apply to a policy of sea insurance. Such policy for the purposes of the section is to be an instrument which may be legally stamped after execution, and the penalty payable by law on stamping is to be £100.

UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT.

No. 149.—OCTOBER TERM, 1875.

Appeal from the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of South Carolina.

HENRY H. BLEASE, Appellant, v. ALBERT C. GARLINGTON.

MISREPRESENTATIONS ON SALE OF CLAIM—HOW EVIDENCE MUST BE TAKEN IN EQUITY CAUSES IN FEDERAL COURTS—EXCEPTIONS—PRACTICE.

1. MISREPRESENTATIONS ON SALE OF CLAIM.—The court states the effect of making misrepresentations on the sale of a claim against a person in precarious circumstances, and the duty of a person to whom such representations are made, to endeavor to determine whether they are true or false.

2. EXAMINATIONS OF WITNESSES ORALLY IN FEDERAL COURT.—The court does not say that even since the Revised Statutes, the Circuit Courts may not, in their discretion, under the operation of the rules, permit the examination of witnesses orally in open court, upon the hearing of causes in equity. The court does not say that now they are not by law required to do so, and that if such practice is adopted in any case, the testimony presented in that form must be taken down, or its substance stated in writing, and made part of the record, or it will be entirely disregarded by the Supreme Court on appeal.

3. WHEN TESTIMONY OBJECTED TO.—If testimony is objected to and ruled out, it must still be sent to the Supreme Court with the record, subject to the objection, or the ruling will not be considered by the Court.

4. CASE WILL NOT BE SENT BACK.—That a case will not be sent back to have the rejected testimony taken, even though the court, on examination, might be of the opinion that the objection to it ought not to have been sustained.

5. PRACTICE IN STATE COURTS.—The statute of 1872, providing that the practice, pleadings and forms, and mode of proceeding in civil causes, in the Circuit and District Courts, shall conform as near as may be, to the practice, etc., in the State courts of the State, has no application to this case, because equity and admiralty cases are, in express terms, excepted from the operation of the act.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

Mr. Chief Justice WAITE delivered the opinion of the court.

This suit was brought for the foreclosure of a mortgage made by Blease to Garlington. The bill is in the ordinary form. Blease, in his answer, admits the execution of the note and mortgage, but insists, by way of defense, that Garlington "deceived him as to the value of the consideration of the said note and mortgage and has not complied with his positive agreement." The history of the transaction, he says, is as follows:

"The complainant, as the administrator of J. M. Young, deceased, held a large claim against the estate of John B. O'Neall, deceased, who had been the guardian of the said J. M. Young, and Robert Stuart and H. H. Kinard were the sureties on his bond. The complainant had commenced suit on said bond against Robert Stuart, and proceeding to force him into bankruptcy, and his life seemed to be endangered by the excitement which this last proceeding produced, he being naturally in very feeble health. Under these circumstances, negotiations were commenced between the complainant and this respondent, the friend of the said R Stuart, in regard to the sale of the claim of the said complainant against the said Robert Stuart, as surety on the said guardianship-bond of said J. B. O'Neall, deceased, and this respondent was induced to purchase said claim at six thousand dollars, (four thousand dollars of which was paid in cash, and the note described in bill given for $2,000), by the assurance of the complainant that said claim was worth at least six thousand dollars, and he made some calculations to show this, and said, as this claim was worth six thousand dollars, it would not be right for him to take less than that sum, and that he would not do it. This purchase was made upon the further assurance and undertaking of the complainant that he would obtain judgment to this respondent. This defendant avers that said purchase would not have been made by him at that price, but for the said assurance and promise of the complainant in which this respondent put implicit confidence. This respondent, further answering, states, that the said Robert Stuart died before judgment was obtained in said claim, and this respondent has been informed and believes that his estate is so utterly insolvent, that it will not pay anything like the sum of six thousand dollars on said claim, and he asks that this case be not tried until the true condition of said estate can be ascertained. This defendant further submits to this honorable court that, the complainant having deceived this defendant as to the value of said claim against Robert Stuart, and not having complied with his part of the contract, to obtain judgment on said claim, is not entitled to enforce collection of said note and mortgage in this court, where equity is administered, and asks that the whole contract may be set aside, and the complainant required to deliver up to this defendent the said note and mortgage, to be canceled, and to refund the four thousand dollars paid in cash to him on said contract, with interest."

Upon the hearing in the court below, after the plaintiff had submitted his case upon the pleadings and his mortgage, the defendant presented himself as a witness to be examined orally in open court and proposed to testify to the following facts, to wit:

"1. That one of the conditions of the original agreement for the sale of the liability of Robert Stuart, as one of the sureties of the bond of J. B. O'Neall, as guardian of J. M. Young, plaintiff's intestate, to the defendant, was that the plaintiff should obtain judgment against the said R. Stuart, and that when the agreement was drawn up and presented to the defendant, he called attention of plaintiff to the fact that that part of the agreement which obligated him to get judgment had been left out, and insisted that it should be inserted, and he was assured that that condition should be carried out, and that it was not necessary to rewrite the agreement for the purpose of putting it in.

"2. That during the negotiations for the sale of the aforesaid liability of R. Stuart, the plaintiff presented to the defendant that said liability or claim was worth at least six thousand dollars, and that in fact it is not worth twenty-five hundred dollars.

"3. That the defendant did not know the then financial condition of R. Stuart, and put implicit confidence in the promises and representations of the plaintiff, and would not have made the trade but for such assurance."

His proposition made in writing is sent here as part of the record. The court refused to receive the testimony, and it was not taken. A decree having been entered in favor of Garlington, Blease brings the case here by appeal.

Cases in equity come here from the Circuit courts and the District courts, sitting as Circuit courts, by appeal, and not by writ of error. (Rev. Stat., sec. 692.) They are heard upon the proofs sent up with the record from the court below. No new evidence can be received here. (Rev. Stat., see. 698.)

The facts relied upon by Blease were neither proven nor admitted in the court below. Testimony in support of them was offered, but it was not received. We do not know that if it had been received it would have been sufficient. If we find that the court erred in refusing the testimony, we shall be compelled to affirm the decree because of the lack of proof, or send the case back for a new hearing.

An important question of practice is thus presented for our consideration.

The judiciary act of 1789 (1 Stat., 88, sec. 30) provided that the mode of proof by oral testimony and examination of witnesses in open court should be the same in all the courts of the United States, as well in the trial of causes in equity as of actions at common law. By section 19 of the same act it was made the duty of the Circuit court, in equity cases, to cause the facts on which they founded their decree fully to appear upon the record, either from the pleadings and decree or a statement of the case agreed upon by the parties or their counsel, or if they disagreed, by a stating of the case by the court. Subsequently, in 1802, (2 Stat., 166, sec. 25,) it was enacted that in all suits in equity the court might, in its discretion, upon the request of either party, order the testimony of witnesses therein to be taken by depositions. In 1803 (2 Stat., 244, sec. 2) an appeal was given to this court in equity cases, and it was provided that, upon the appeal, a transcript of the bill, answer, depositions, and all other proceedings in the cause should be transmitted here. The case was to be heard in this court upon the proofs submitted below.

In Conn. v. Penn., 5 Wheat., 424, decided in 1820, this court held that a decree predicated in part upon parol testimony must be reversed, because that portion of the testimony which was oral had not been sent up. For this reason, among others, the cause was sent back for further proceedings according to equity. Chief Justice Marshall, in delivering the opinion of the court said (p. 426): "Previous to this act (that of 1803) the facts were brought before this court by the statement of the judge. The depositions are substituted for that statement, and it would seem, since this court must judge of the fact as well as the law, that all the testimony which was before the Circuit court ought to be laid before this court. Yet the section (of the act of 1789) which directs that witnesses shall be examined in open court, is not, in terms, repealed. The court has felt considerable doubts on this subject, but thinks it the safe course to require that all the testimony, on which the judge founds his opinion, should, in cases within the jurisdiction of this court, appear in the record."

Under the authority of the act of May 8, 1792. (1 Stat., 276, sec. 2,) this court, at its February term, 1822, adopted certain rules of practice for the courts of equity of the United States. (7 Wheat., v.) Rules 25, 26, and 28 related to the taking of testimony by depositions and the examination of witnesses before a master or examiner, but by Rule 28 it was expressly provided that nothing therein contained should "prevent the examination of witnesses viva voce when produced in open court."

These rules continued in force until the January term, 1842, when they were superseded by others then promulgated, (1 How., xlii.,) of which 67, 68, 69, and 78 related to the mode of taking testimony, but made no reference to the examination of witnesses in open court further than to provide, at the end of Rule 78, that nothing therein contained should "prevent the examination of witnesses viva voce when produced in open court, if the court shall in its discretion deem it advisable."

Afterwards, in August, 1842, Congress authorized this court to prescribe and regulate the mode of taking and obtaining evidence in equity cases.—(5 Stat., 518, sec. 6.) While these rules remained in force substantially as originally adopted, and before any direct action of the court under the special authority of this act of Congress, the case of Sickles v. Gloucester Co., 3 Wall., Jr., 186, came before Mr. Justice Grier on the circuit, and he there held that, notwithstanding the rules, witnesses might still be examined in open court. It was his opinion that the act of 1789 guaranteed to suitors the right to have their witnesses so examined if they desired it; that rule 67 did not affect or annul the act of Congress or the policy established by it, and that a party had therefore the right to demand an examination of witnesses within the jurisdiction of the court ore tenus, according to the principles of the common law, either by having them produced in court or by having leave to cross-examine them, face to face, before the examiner.

This case was decided in 1856, and, at the December term, 1861, of this court, rule 67 was amended so as to provide for the oral examination of witnesses before an examiner. The part of the rule as amended, pertinent to the present inquiry, is as follows: "Either party may give notice to the other that he desires the evidence to be adduced in the cause to be taken orally, and thereupon all the witnesses to be examined shall be examined before one of the examiners of the court, or before an examiner to be specially appointed by the court, the examiner to be furnished with a copy of the bill and answer, if any; and such examination shall take place in the presence of the parties, or their agents, by their counsel or solicitors, and the witnesses shall be subject to cross examination and re-examination, and which shall be conducted as near as may be in the mode now used in common law courts. The depositions taken upon such oral examinations shall be taken down in writing by the examiner in the form of narrative, unless he determines the examination shall be by question and answer in special instances; and, when completed, shall be read over to the witness and signed by him in the presence of the parties or counsel, or such of them as may attend; provided, if the witness shall refuse to sign the said deposition, then the examiner shall sign the same: and the examiner may, upon all examinations, state any special matters to the court as he shall think fit; and any question or questions, which may be objected to, shall be noted, by the examiner, upon the deposition, but he shall not have power to decide on the competency, materiality, or relevancy of the questions; and the court shall have power to deal with the costs of incompetent, immaterial, or irrelevant depositions, or parts of them, as may be just."

The act of 1789, in relation to the oral examination of witnesses in open court, was not expressly repealed until the adoption of the revised statutes, sec. 862 of which is as follows: "The mode of proof in causes of equity and of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction shall be according to the rules now or hereafter prescribed by the Supreme Court, except as herein specially provided."

Since the amendment of rule 67, in 1861, there could never have been any difficulty in bringing a case here upon appeal, so as to save all exceptions as to the form or substance of the testimony, and still leave us in a condition to proceed to a final determination of the cause, whatever might be our rulings upon the exceptions. The examiner before whom the witnesses are orally examined is required to note exceptions, but he cannot decide upon their validity. He must take down all the examination in writing, and send it to the court with the objections noted. So, too, when depositions are taken according to the acts of Congress or otherwise, under the rules, exceptions to the testimony may be noted by the officer taking the deposition, but he is not permitted to decide upon them. And when the testimony, as reduced to writing by the examiner, or the deposition, is filed in court, further exceptions may be there taken. Thus both the exceptions and the testimony objected to are all before the court below, and come here upon the appeal as part of the record and proceedings there. If we reverse the ruling of that court upon the exceptions we may still proceed to the hearing, because we have in our possession and can consider the rejected testimony. But under the practice adopted in this case, if the exceptions sustained below are overruled here, we must remand the cause in order that the proof may be taken. That was done in Conn. v. Penn., which was decided before the promulgation of the rules. One of the objects of the rule in its present form was to prevent the necessity for any such practice.

While, therefore, we do not say that, even since the revised statutes, the Circuit courts may not in their discretion, under the operation of the rules, permit the examination of witnesses orally in open court upon the hearing of cases in equity, we do say that now they are not by law required to do so, and that if such practice is adopted in any case the testimony presented in that form must be taken down or its substance stated in writing and made part of the record, or it will be entirely disregarded here on an appeal. So, too, if testimony is objected to and ruled out, it must still be sent here with the record, subject to the objection, or the ruling will not be considered by us. A case will not be sent back to have the rejected testimony taken, even though we might on examination be of the opinion that the objection to it ought not to have been sustained. Ample provision having been made by the rules for taking the testimony and saving exceptions, if parties prefer to adopt some other mode of presenting their case, they must be careful to see that it conforms in other respects to the established practice of the court.

The act of 1872 (17 Stat. 197, Rev. Stat., sec. 914) providing that the practice, pleadings, and forms, and modes of proceeding in civil causes in the Circuit and District courts shall conform, as near as may be, to the practice, etc., in the courts of the States has no application to this case, because it is in equity, and equity and admiralty causes are in express terms excepted from the operation of that act.

We might, therefore, affirm the decree below because there is no testimony before us in support of the defence. But if we waive this question of practice, which, on account of its importance and the misapprehension that exists in respect to it in some of the circuits, we have thought it proper at some length to consider and determine and look to the merits of the case, we find no error.

The defence, as stated in the answer, amounts to nothing more than that Garlington, in the progress of the negotiations for the sale of the claim against Stuart to Blease, stated that the claim was worth six thousand dollars, and undertook to obtain judgment upon it for Blease, and that Stuart died before a judgment was obtained, and his estate was so utterly insolvent that it would not pay anything like six thousand dollars on the claim. There is no pretence that there was not at least six thousand dollars due from Stuart, or that Garlington had any better means of knowing his pecuniary condition than Blease had. On the contrary, it appears that Blease made the purchase because he was the friend of Stuart and desired to put a stop to the proceeding on the part of Garlington to force him into bankruptcy, which seemed to be endangering his life in his then feeble state of health. Certainly, under such circumstances, it would have been easy for Blease to test the truth or falsehood of the statement made by Garlington, and if he did not, it was his own fault. He had no right to rely upon the representations of Garlington. It was his duty to use reasonable diligence to enquire and ascertain for himself whether Garlington's estimate of the value of the claim was correct or not.

But, again, from the answer itself, it is apparent that the statement relied upon was only an expression of opinion as to the value of the claim, and that Blease had no right to consider it as anything else. The language is that "this respondent was induced to purchase said claim at six thousand dollars by the assurance of the complainant that said claim was worth at least six thousand dollars, and he made some calculations to show this, and said as this claim was worth six thousand dollars it wonld not be right for him to take less than that sum, and that he would not do it." There seems to have been no dispute as to the amount. All depended upon the ability of Stuart to pay. Each of the parties had equal opportunity of judging as to that. Certainly there is nothing to show that Garlington had any advantage over Blease in this respect. Garlington was pressing Stuart into bankruptcy to coerce payment. This Blease desired to prevent, and for that purpose was willing to purchase the debt and pay for it as much as it was worth. The parties were engaged in endeavoring to ascertain what this was, and the whole subject was equally open to both for examination and enquiry. Under such circumstances, neither party is presumed to trust the other, but to rely upon his own judgment.—(Smith v. Richards, 13 Pet., 37.)

So, too, as to the alleged undertaking on the part of Garlington to obtain judgment on the claim. There is no allegation that he was not proceeding for that purpose, without unnecessary delay, up to the time of the death of Stuart, or that Blease, when Stuart did die, was not in as good condition, for all the purposes of collection, without a judgment as he could have been with. We are clearly of the opinion, therefore, that the answer, if taken as true, did not present a valid defence, and, as the defendant could not make any defence by his proof different from that set out in his pleading, the court below very properly refused to hear any testimony in support of the answer.

This makes it unnecessary to consider the questions presented in the argument as to the competency of the proof offered.

The decree of the Circuit court is affirmed.

U. S. CIRCUIT COURT—SOUTH CAROLINA.

In re BLUE RIDGE RAILROAD COMPANY.

Where property which is encumbered by liens, is sold at the suggestion of the general creditors, and brings no more than the amount of the liens, it is not chargeable with any costs, except the actual costs of sale.

Where property is sold free from a mortgage, the Bankrupt court has no authority to adjust the claims of the trustee under the mortgage against the cestui que trust, nor to ascertain what is due by him to his counsel.

BOND, J.—It appears from the record in this case that the Blue Ridge Railroad Company is a corporation under the laws of South Carolina, and that on the 20th day of April, 1854, it executed a mortgage of all its property whatsoever, to certain persons therein mentioned, to secure the payment of certain bonds named in said mortgage, and the interest thereon to accrue.

And further it appears, that after the mortgage debt aforesaid became due and payable, and was unpaid, certain creditors of said bankrupt filed a petition in the District Court, asking that the said corporation might be declared a bankrupt, which was accordingly done, and assignees were duly appointed to take charge of the bankrupt.

It appears also that the said corporation, at the time of its adjudication as a bankrupt, had no other property whatever than that covered by the said mortgage, and that the property mortgaged was totally inadequate, when sold, to pay the debt for which it was pledged.

It appears further, that on the 16th of January, 1873, the assignees of the said bankrupt filed a petition in the bankrupt court, asking that the property of the corporation, mortgaged as aforesaid, might be sold, and the court directed a sale thereof. At which said sale one Robert K. Scott, who was authorized by his fellow bondholders to purchase the road in their behalf, became the purchaser thereof, being the highest bidder therefor.

Prior to said sale, the bankrupt court made an order directing James Simons, Esq., as special master in the case, "to inquire and report what compensation the trustees and assignees were entitled to, by way of commissions, expenses incurred, services rendered and to be rendered up to and including the sale proposed, and also inquire and report what fees the counsel for the trustees and assignees were entitled to, and out of what fund payment should be made therefor." Under this order, the special master filed his report of the 12th of March, 1874, by which he allowed to the assignees of the bankrupt certain commissions, fees and expenses for themselves and their counsel, and to the trustees under the mortgage, another large sum of money by way of commissions, counsel fees, and expenses, amounting in all to about thirty thousand dollars, and he directs or recommends that the larger part of those payments be made out of the proceeds of the sale of the mortgaged property, and bases his estimate upon the supposition that the road is worth two hundred and fifty thousand dollars.

The property of the railroad sold at the sale for fifty thousand dollars.

From the order making the reference to Special Master Simons, and from the order overruling the exceptions to his report and confirming the same, the petitioners here file their petition, asking the aid of the supervisory jurisdiction of the Circuit court.

It is plain from the record in this case, that at the time of the filing of the petition in bankruptcy, the bankrupt company had no property, the sale of which would produce anything for its general or unsecured creditors. All that it owned was mortgaged greatly beyond its value.

The only justification of the petition of the assignees for the sale of this property by the Bankrupt court, is that they supposed it would realize something for the general creditors. This the sale did not do, and every one concerned in the proceeding had reason to know it would not. When a Bankrupt court, at the suggestion of the general creditors, authorizes the sale of property encumbered by liens, and the proceeds of sale amount to no more than the claims of the lien creditors, it has no control over the fund but to pay it to such lien creditors, and it is not chargeable with any costs in the bankrupt proceeding, except the actual costs of sale. The fund is sacred, and is devoted to the payment of the lien creditors whose property has been sold, and they are chargeable with no other or further costs than they would have incurred had they sold the property under their liens. The assignees in this proceeding were acting not for the benefit of the bondholders who were secured by mortgage, but for the general creditors of the bankrupt. By what rule of equity can the lien creditors be required out of their funds to pay the expenses of a litigation which was solely for the benefit of the general creditors? Both they and their counsel must look to the general assets of the bankrupt estate for payment of their claims, if they be entitled to payment at all.

Nor can the allowance by the special master to the trustees and their counsel, which was confirmed by the Bankrupt Court, be permitted.

The District Court, when it ordered the sale of the railroad property, was acting solely for the general creditors. When the property was sold under its own order, and it was found there was nothing in hand belonging to them, its sole duty was to ascertain who the lien creditors were, the priority and amount of their claims, and to pay over to them the proceeds of the sale.

It had no authority in this proceeding to adjust the claims of the trustees under the mortgage against their cestui que trusts, nor to ascertain what was due by trustees to counsel.

The mortgaged property in the hands of the Bankrupt court, was and is bound for nothing but for the lawful charges for the administration of that property in that court.

The sale not being objected to, and no motion being made to set it aside, will be allowed to stand, but the Circuit court will pass an order revoking the order of the District court, referring this cause to special Master Simons for report, and reversing the order of the District court confirming the report of said master, and will direct that this cause be remanded to the District court with directions to ascertain what were the actual costs incurred in the sale of said mortgage property, as determined by the bankrupt law, and which, in accordance with this opinion, are properly chargeable to the proceeds of this sale.

OUR thanks are due EARL BILL, clerk of the court at Cleveland, for the following opinion:

U. S. CIRCUIT COURT N. D. OF OHIO.

OPINION FILED MAY 20, 1876.

WILLIAM BRICE et al. v. HENRY SOMMERS et al.

Petition for Removal of Cause.

REMOVAL OF CAUSE FROM STATE TO FEDERAL COURT.

1. BEFORE FINAL HEARING.—That the act of Congress of March 2, 1867, under which the removal is asked, only authorizes a removal where an application is made before the final hearing or trial of the suit, and this means before final judgment in the court of original jurisdiction where the suit is brought.

2. WHEN CASE APPEALED.—That when a case is commenced in the common pleas court of a State, and a trial had in such court, and the case appealed to the District court of the State, it is then too late to ask to have such cause removed into the United States Court, under the above-named act.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

Opinion by WELKER, J.

William Brice & Co., on the 18th day of November, 1872, filed their petition in the court of Common Pleas of Stark County, Ohio, against Henry Sommers and others, including George W. Trimble, to foreclose a mortgage executed to them by said Henry Sommers, on a tract of twenty acres of land owned by him, situate in Stark county, with a distillery and other buildings thereon, the same being recorded the 10th of February, 1872, and on which they claimed the sum of $7,107.01. George W. Trimble was made a defendant, with others who claimed interests in, or liens upon said real estate. Trimble in his answer, sets up as a defense, that after the execution of the mortgage to William Brice & Co., Sommers and others associated with him, carried on the distillery business on the premises so mortgaged, and that divers taxes were assessed against them, under the internal revenue laws of the United States, by the officers of the government, which taxes, it is averred, were a first lien on the distillery and premises, and a superior lien to the mortgage of Brice & Co.; that the taxes not being paid the collector of the district on the 10th day of October, 1872, in pursuance to the provisions of the revenue law, sold said mortgaged premises to the defendant Trimble to pay the taxes so assessed, and gave him the proper certificate of purchase; that under said sale he took and holds possession of the mortgaged premises and claims title thereto. Brice & Co. filed their reply to this answer, making an issue upon the same.

At the February term, 1874, of the Court of Common Pleas of Stark county, a hearing was had of the case, and the issue found in favor of the defendant, Trimble, and a decree was entered dismissing the petition of Brice & Co., at their costs. Within the time prescribed by the Ohio statute, William Brice & Co., in the manner provided by law, appealed said case to the District Court of said Stark county, where the same is now pending. Whilst said cause was so pending in Stark county, on the 30th day of September, 1875, this petition for removal to this court was filed by the defendant, Trimble. In it he alleges as cause for removal, that he holds title to the mortgaged premises derived from the Collector of Internal Revenue, an officer of the United States, and that the action is brought against him to defeat his title, and affects the validity of the Internal Revenue laws of the United States.

Brice & Co. now file their motion in this court to dismiss the petition of Trimble for such removal.

1. Because the case, previous to the filing of this petition, whilst pending in the Court of Common Pleas of Stark county, had been finally heard and tried in that court, and there was there a final trial and final hearing of the cause between the parties, and a final decree entered therein, and therefore this court after such fact has no jurisdiction.

2. Because of other manifest reasons apparent on the face of the proceedings.

On the argument it was claimed that the petition did not show that by the defence set up in the answer of Trimble, the validity of the Internal Revenue law was affected, so as to constitute a cause for removal under section 643 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

In the view I take of the motion, it is not necessary to decide this question.

The first ground for the motion involves the construction of the provisions of sec. 643, fixing the time at which a petition for removal may be filed. It provides that it may be filed "at any time before the trial or final hearing thereof." This has been construed to mean the same as if it read "final trial, or final hearing;" and that trial refers to cases at law, and hearing to chancery causes. This case is what would be denominated in this court a chancery cause. The inquiry here arises, and this is the question to be determined, what is a final hearing within the meaning of the act of Congress? Does it mean a final hearing in the court in which the suit is commenced, or does it mean the final hearing in an appellate court to which it may be carried? In the case of Insurance Company v. Dunn, 19 Wallace, 214, the Supreme Court decided that where a second trial is allowed in the same court, by the statute of the State, the first trial is not a final trial, and before the second trial a petition for removal could be filed. The statute of Ohio (S. & S., 589) does not allow a second trial in the class of cases now before us. Instead thereof, an appeal is allowed by either party upon giving bond, etc., from the Court of Common Pleas to the District Court of the county, and it provides "that the action so appealed shall be again tried, heard and decided in the District Court in the same manner as though said District Court had original jurisdiction of the action." After the appeal is thus perfected, the case is tried or heard in the appellate court as though originally commenced there, and does not return to the Common Pleas for any action in reference to the trial or hearing, but may come back for the purpose of execution of the judgment or decree of the District Court.

It is claimed by counsel for Trimble, that such appeal vacates the decree of the Common Pleas, and that the hearing or trial in the District court is a second hearing or trial, and that therefore the first hearing in the Common Pleas is not a final hearing; that the case of Insurance Company v. Dunn is not authority against this view, but substantially supports it; that the hearing on appeal is but the second hearing of the same case, and amounts to the same as the second trial in the same court. It is true that the appeal vacates the decree of the Common Pleas, but is it not also true that the decree so far as that court is concerned is final—no other or further hearing thereof can be had in that court? In which court, then, is the "final hearing" referred to in the statute, before which the petition may be filed? In the case of Stevenson v. Williams, 19 Wallace, 572, the Supreme court, it seems to me, has settled that question. In that case, Justice Field delivering the opinion, says: "The act of Congress of March 2d, 1807, under which the removal is asked, only authorized a removal where an application is made "before the final hearing or trial of the suit," and this clearly means before final judgment in the court of original jurisdiction where the suit is brought." In that case suit was originally brought in the District court by Williams to annul a judgment before that time recovered by Stevenson, and a judgment rendered in the District court in favor of Williams, which was appealed from that court to the Supreme court of Louisiana, and while so pending on such appeal the petition for removal to the Circuit court of the United States was filed by Stevenson. It does not appear in the case whether the appeal vacated the judgment of the District court, but that did not seem to be important in the case, as the court put it upon the ground that there had been a final judgment of the court of original jurisdiction, and where the suit was brought, and after that, it was too late to file the petition for removal. This construction is supported by the phraseology of the section of the statute itself. It provides that where any civil suit, etc., is commenced in any court of a State, not pending in any court of a State, against an officer, etc., a petition for removal may be filed, etc. The same words are substantially used in all of the removal statutes from the act of 1789 to the present time. Again, the section also provides that where suit is commenced in a State court by summons, petition for capias, etc., the clerk of the Circuit court shall issue a writ of certiorari, or habeas corpus, to be served upon the clerk of such State court, requiring him to send copies, etc. These expressions of the act seem to refer alone to the cases pending in the State court in which they were commenced. Any other construction would in effect make this court an appellate court from the court of Common Pleas, making the State District court a mere highway to reach this court by way of appeal. To reach this court parties could try the case in Common Pleas, and on defeat appeal to the District court, and while the case was there pending, file the petition here for removal, and then re-try the case in this court. But it is claimed by counsel for the defendant, Trimble, that two terms of the Circuit court having been held after the filing of the transcript and pleadings, and before the motion to dismiss was filed, it was too late to do it then. If the complainants had appeared and pleaded in the case after such filing, it might be regarded as a waiver of the right to make the motion, and an admission of the jurisdiction of this court. No new pleadings were, however, filed by the complainants before their motion to dismiss, and this objection is not, therefore, well taken.

The motion to dismiss is sustained, and order entered accordingly.

U. S. DISTRICT COURT, DISTRICT OF OREGON.

THE UNITED STATES v. CHARLES BROWN. SAME v. DAVID MANNING; SAME v. JOHN JOHNSON; SAME v. FRED. ANDERSON.

Information for Disobeying Orders on Shipboard.

A PROSECUTION CANNOT BE MAINTAINED AGAINST A SEAMAN FOR ANY OF THE OFFENCES DEFINED IN SECTION 4596 OF THE R. S., UNLESS AN ENTRY OF THE CIRCUMSTANCES IS MADE BY THE MASTER IN THE OFFICIAL LOG-BOOK OF THE VESSEL AS SOON AS POSSIBLE AFTER THE OCCURRENCE, AND READ OVER TO HIM OR A COPY FURNISHED HIM, AND HIS REPLY THERETO ENTERED IN THE SAME MANNER.

Separate informations were filed against the defendants in the above entitled cases, charging each of them with wilful disobedience to the lawful commands of the master of the ship, William H. Thorndyke, upon which they were lawfully engaged as seamen on a voyage from Philadelphia to Sitka, at Sitka, on February 14, 1876, by refusing to discharge cargo.

The defendants pleaded not guilty, and were tried together by the court.

The prosecution called the master of the ship, and offered to prove the commission of the offense by him. The defense objected, and demanded the production of proof of the entry in the official log book concerning the same, as required by section 4597 of the R S. The log book was produced, but contained no entry on the subject.

Opinion by DEADY, J.

The crimes defined by section 4596 of the R. S., which includes the charge against the defendants, relate to the discipline and conduct of the ship rather than the general public. If the master intended to prosecute a seaman for the commission of any of them, it is made his duty by sections 4290, 4291 of the R. S., to make an entry concerning the same in the official log-book as soon as possible after the occurrence, and to read the same to the offender, or furnish him with a copy of the same, and enter his reply thereto. Section 4597 of the R. S. provides that "in any subsequent legal proceedings" said entries "shall, if practicable, be produced or proved, and in default of such production or proof, the court hearing the case may, at its discretion, refuse to receive evidence of the offense."

It is maintained on the part of prosecution that when an entry was made, it must be produced or proved, or the court in its discretion may refuse to hear the evidence in support of the charge, but when it appears that no entry was made, then the statute does not apply. But this construction of the statute would make it almost devoid of meaning and useless. The evident purpose of the statute is to prevent prosecutions for breaches of discipline on shipboard, except in those cases where the master shall deem the matter of sufficient importance, while the circumstances are all fresh in his memory, and before there is any temptation to make use of it as a means to some other end, to enter a charge against the offender, together with his reply, in the official log-book. If any difficulty arises between the crew and the master, a previous offense or dereliction of which no entry was made, cannot be invoked or trumped up, as a make-weight in this subsequent controversy.

In this case it appears by the affidavit of the master, made before the deputy collector and ex-officio shipping-master at Sitka, that the defendants, in company with one Antonio Page, attempted to desert the ship in a small boat at Sitka, but being capsized, were discovered and rescued by the officers of the ship, except Page, who was drowned. The defendants then refused to work, and the master, by the advice of the collector, put them in irons until they consented to work, and made this affidavit of the transaction instead of making an entry in the log-book. The confinement of the defendants was proper enough, if they refused to work, but if it was intended to prosecute them also for the offense of disobeying orders, it was incumbent on the master to have made the proper entries in his log-book. This not having been done, the law presumes that it was not deemed of sufficient importance at the time, but it is now sought to be done as an afterthought or with some ulterior purpose.

The defendants are found not gullty and discharged.

BALTIMORE CITY COURT.

ALBERT ORDWAY v. THE CENTRAL NATIONAL BANK OF BALTIMORE.

NATIONAL BANK—DISSOLUTION OF—ACTION AGAINST FOR TAKING MORE THAN LAWFUL INTEREST IS TO RECOVER A PENALTY—STATE COURT NO JURISDICTION.

1. CLOSING NATIONAL BANK.—The court states the manner and effect of a national bank going into liquidation and closing up.
2. SUIT FOR A PENALTY.—This was an action brought against a National bank in a State court, to recover double the amount of interest alleged to have been usuriously taken by such bank. Held, that it was a suit brought to enforce a penalty under an act of Congress.
3. INTENTION OF CONGRESS.—That it was the intention of the act to give State courts jurisdiction in such cases.
4. ACT UNCONSTITUTIONAL.—That the act is unconstitutional so far as it seeks to give State courts jurisdiction to enforce penalties under an act of Congress.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

Opinion of the court by BROWN, J.

This suit was docketed as of the 25th of July, 1874, and is an action of debt brought to recover double the amount of interest alleged to have been usuriously charged by the defendant, which is a national banking association chartered under the laws of Congress on the 16th of January, 1871, on certain loans made by it to the plaintiff.

A suggestion has been filed by the counsel of the defendant that the defendant has been legally dissolved by its own voluntary act in pursuance of the act of Congress of 1864, chapter 106, section 42, and therefore that this suit, being an action at law, must abate and be discontinued.

The act provides (section 4) that such an association shall have succession for twenty years, unless sooner dissolved, according to the provisions of the articles of a sociation or by the act of its shareholders owning two-thirds of its stock, or unless the franchise shall be forfeited by a violation of this act. The articles themselves provide that the association is to continue for twenty years unless sooner dissolved by the act of its stockholders owning at least two-thirds of its stock, who may dissolve and close up the association in such manner as they may deem to be for the interest of the stockholders and creditors of the association, but subject to the restrictions, requirements and provisions of the act.

If it has been dissolved it is conceded that the legal consequence suggested would follow.

The said forty-second section of the act provides "that any association" (that is, any national banking association) "may go into liquidation and be closed by the vote of its shareholders owning two-thirds of its stock."

Proof was offered that on the 15th of July, 1874, it was voted by the shareholders of defendant "owning more than two-thirds of its stock that said association go into liquidation and be closed."

Objection has been made to the sufficiency of the proof on this point, but for the purposes of the case it will be considered as sufficient.

The claim of the plaintiff was made known to the defendant on the 25th of July, 1874, the day on which this suit is by agreement to be considered as docketed.

Whenever a vote is so taken the same section requires a notice to be published for two months "that said association is closing up its affairs, and notifying holders of its notes and other creditors to present the notes and other claims against the association for payment, and at any time after the expiration of one year from the time of the publication of such notice as aforesaid, the said association may pay over to the treasurer of the United States the amount of its outstanding notes in the lawful money of the United States, and take up the bonds which said association has on deposit with the treasurer for the security of its circulating notes, which bonds shall be assigned to the bank in the manner specified in the nineteenth section of the act, and from that time the outstanding notes of said association shall be redeemed at the treasury of the United States, and the said association and the shareholders thereof shall be discharged from all liabilities therefor."

The notice was published by the association, and at a proper time thereafter the amount of the outstanding notes was paid by it to the Treasurer of the United States, whose duty it became to redeem them, and the bonds which the association had on deposit for the security of its notes were then assigned by the Treasurer of the United States to the defendant. Why were they by law required to be so assigned? Clearly because they were assets of the association, to be used by it for the purpose of paying, in the first place, the debts of the association, in pursuance of the call in the published notice for creditors, other than note holders, to present their claims, and, in the next place, after the debts were paid, for distribution among the stockholders. The fact that the act requires the bonds to be assigned to the defendant demonstrates that it was then an existing association, and while the process of paying the debts was going on or ought by law to have been going on, it could not dissolve itself. It would be contrary to all sound principles of interpretation to suppose that the act was framed with any such intent, because such a construction would enable every national banking association, by going into voluntary dissolution, to deprive its creditors of all their legal remedies. The vote by two-thirds of the stockholders to "go into liquidation and be closed," was not of itself an act of dissolution, and did not profess to be so. It was simply a resolve to cease active business and to wind up its affairs, an essential part of which was to pay the debts it owed, and the claims for which it was liable. The suggestion of dissolution is, therefore, overruled.

But a demurrer to the declaration has also been filed, under which three principal questions have been presented.

First. Is this a suit for a penalty under a law of the United States?

Second. Did the act of Congress intend to give the State courts jurisdiction of such a case?

Third. If it did, was the provision constitutional?

First. I have no doubt that this is a suit for a penalty.

It is brought under the thirtieth section, which provides that "the knowingly taking, receiving, reserving or charging a rate of interest greater than aforesaid, shall be held and adjudged a forfeiture of the entire interest which the note, bill, or other evidence of debt carries with it, or which has been agreed to be paid thereon: and in case a greater rate of interest has been paid, the person or persons paying the same, or their legal representatives, may recover back, in any action of debt, twice the amount of interest thus paid from the association taking or receiving the same." The excessive interest must not only have been taken, but must have been knowingly taken, and the consequence of such taking is declared to be that the excessive interest is forfeited, and that the borrower can recover from the association taking it, double the amount of the interest paid in an action of debt. When the notes fell due on which the interest in these cases was exacted, the plaintiff could have refused to pay them to the defendant unless the excessive interest was abated, and the defendant could only have recovered the amounts of the notes, less the excessive interest. This point has recently been decided by the Supreme court of the United States in the unreported case of the Farmers and Mechanics' National Bank of Buffalo v. Dearing. But in addition to this forfeiture of the excessive interest to be paid, which the plaintiff failed to exact, he is entitled to recover double the amount of the interest paid in an action of debt for which he now sues. This is certainly more than a compensation to the plaintiff, it is a punishment or penalty imposed on the defendant for the violation of the law. An action of debt is the usual mode of enforcing such penalties, and it was undoubtedly competent for Congress to provide, as it has done, that the amount should be recovered by the borrower or his legal representatives. The case above referred to expressly declares that the "said thirtieth section is remedial as well as penal," and this, I think, establishes the penal character of this suit, and that the claim is for a penalty.

Second. Did the act intend to give this court jurisdiction of the case?

The 57th section of the act provides "that all suits, actions and proceedings against any association under this act may be had in any circuit, district or territorial court of the United States held within the district in which such association may be established, or in any state, county or municipal court in the county or city in which said association is located, having jurisdiction in similar cases." The language is so broad and comprehensive that its meaning cannot well be doubted. It declares that all suits, actions and proceedings against any association under this act may be had in any State court in which the association is located, having jurisdiction in similar cases. This is an action of debt for a penalty, and in similar cases this court has jurisdiction, and therefore it necessarily follows that the act intended to give jurisdiction in this particular case. It is true that the judiciary act of 1789, section 10, first statutes at large, page 77, declares that the district courts of the United States have exclusive original cognizance of all suits for penalties and forfeitures incurred under the laws of the United States, and that the same provision has been re-enacted in the revised statute, page 134, but it is also true that various acts of Congress since 1789 have in terms professed to give jurisdiction to State courts over actions brought to recover certain specified penalties, and therefore it cannot be successfully contended that the policy of Congress not to confer on State courts jurisdiction over penalties is so clearly established that the 57th section of the act of 1864 must be construed as not being intended to do so, although by the plain meaning of the language used such jurisdiction is conferred. Moreover, as the said section confers on the State courts and on the United States courts precisely the same jurisdiction, it follows that if the act did not intend to confer on the State courts jurisdiction over cases for penalties, neither did it intend to confer such jurisdiction on the United States courts, and the result would be that it did not intend to confer jurisdiction in the matter on any court. This is a conclusion which the court cannot adopt.

Third. But the important question still remains whether it is possible for an act of Congress to confer jurisdiction on a State court over penalties for violation of a law of the United States?

The Constitution of the United States declares (article III. section 1,) that "The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme court and in such inferior courts as Congress may from time to time order and establish," and that—

Sec. 2. "The judicial power shall extend to all cases in law and equity arising under this Constitution, the laws of the United States and treaties made, or which shall be made, under their authority."

It declares (article VI.) that the Constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, "shall be the supreme law of the land, and the judges in every State shall be bound thereby." But it nowhere declares that Congress can confer jurisdiction on the State courts. In Houston v. Moore (3 Wheat, 25) it is declared that "Congress cannot confer jurisdiction upon any courts but such as exist under the Constitution and laws of the United States, although the State courts may exercise jurisdiction in cases authorized by the laws of the State and not prohibited by the exclusive jurisdiction of the federal courts."

Many rights arising under the laws of the United States can be enforced in the State courts, just as many rights arising under the laws of the States can be enforced in the courts of the United States, but in all cases the courts respectively derive their jurisdiction from the authority which created them.

The doctrine is not questioned that the criminal jurisdiction under the laws of the United States belongs exclusively to the courts of the United States. "No part of the criminal jurisdiction of the United States," says Chancellor Kent in his Commentaries, vol. 1, p. 397, "can, consistently with the Constitution, be delegated to State tribunals." It has been suggested as a reason for this rule, that "Every criminal prosecution must charge the offense to have been committed against the sovereign whose courts sit in judgment upon the offender, and whose executive may pardon him." 1 Kent's Com., 397.

But if the State court had jurisdiction of such a case, there could be no difficulty in the indictment charging the offense to have been committed against the United States, and in case of conviction, the President would have his constitutional right to pardon. The real reason why a State court can have no jurisdiction of a crime against the United States, and why a United States court can have no jurisdiction of a crime against a State, is that the crime is committed only against the government whose law is violated, and because, in reference to crimes and offenses committed against the States respectively or the general government, they are independent of each other. The same objection which applies to the punishment by State courts of crimes against the United States, extends to the recovery of penalties imposed by the laws of the United States by suits in the State courts. These penalties are punishments for offenses committed, not against the State, but against the United States. They are penal, although they are recovered in a civil action.

And this is a doctrine which is sustained by a great preponderance of authority. I quote from Story's commentaries on the Constitution, vol. iii., section 1750. He says: "In regard to jurisdiction over crimes committed against the authority of the United States, it has been held that no part of this jurisdiction can consistently with the Constitution be delegated to State tribunals. It is true that Congress has in various acts, conferred the right to prosecute for offenses, penalties and forfeitures in the State courts. But the latter have in many instances declined the jurisdiction, and asserted its unconstitutionality; and certainly there is at the present time, a decided preponderance of judicial authority in the State courts against the authority of Congress to confer the power." The authorities which he quotes fully sustain this position. It is also supported by the more recent authorities. See cases cited in Jordan v. Downey, 40 Md., 410.

In the case of the First National Bank of Plymouth v. Price, 334 Maryland, p. 487, the Court of Appeals refused to enforce a penalty imposed by the laws of Pennsylvania on the directors of a coal company, a corporation created under the laws of the State of Pennsylvania, on the principal that "it is well settled that no State will enforce penalties imposed by the laws of other States; such laws are universally considered as having no extra territorial operation or effect."

It is true that the laws of the United States, which are operative over the whole Union, cannot be considered as extra-territorial in any part, but while in our complex system of government there are two sovereignties, each exercising different powers within the territory of each State, the rights of the different sovereigns in their respective spheres, are as separate and distinct as if they occupied separate territories. Each sovereignty has its own code of crimes and offenses. The law of the State of Maryland, 1st code, article xcix., section 9, provides, "that any person guilty of usury, shall forfeit all the excess above the real sum or value of the goods and chattels actually lent or advanced, and the legal interest on such sum or value, which forfeiture shall inure to the benefit of any defendant who shall plead usury and prove the same." This is the forfeiture and the only forfeiture which this court is authorized by the statue law of the State to enforce. The common law right of a borrower to recover back in an action for money had and received, the usurious interest he has paid still remains, but has been very materially limited by an act of Assembly which will go into effect on the 1st of June next. The law of Maryland does not apply to this defendant, which is a creature of the general government, and which is subject to the penalty for usury which Congress has thought proper to impose, but this court can not inflict a forfeiture different from that which the power that created it has chosen to prescribe. In the case above cited, of the Farmers and Mechanics National Bank of Buffalo v. Dearing, which originated in a State court of New York, and was finally decided by the Supreme Court of the United States, and was a suit to recover the amount of a note from which illegal interest had been discounted in advance, it was held that the New York court should have deducted the interest unlawfully taken and have given judgment for the residue; and it has been insisted in argument that such deduction was in fact enforcing by a State court a forfeiture imposed by the law of the United States; but the answer to this position is that the deduction was not the enforcement of a penalty, but simply withholding an amount illegally claimed under a contract. The statute did not make the contract wholly void, but only the part of the contract which was for usurious interest. The court say: "Where a statute prescribes a rate of interest and simply forbids the taking of more, and more is contracted for, the contract is good for what might be lawfully taken and void only as to the excess."

The case of the Chesapeake Bank v. The First National Bank of Baltimore, garnishee, 40th Maryland, page 269, has been relied on as conclusive to show that this court has jurisdiction in the present case; but I understand that case as deciding only that the act of Congress of 1873, which declares that no attachment, injunction or execution shall be issued against a national banking association or its property before final judgment in any suit, action or proceeding in any State court is valid, on the ground that Congress has the right to provide in what tribunals these banks shall be sued and to what suits or actions they shall be subjected, because it is the sole judge what provisions tend to promote the efficiency of these banks in performing the functions by which they were designed to serve the government. But to admit the right of Congress to prohibit certain legal proceedings from being instituted against the banks in the State courts does not concede the right of Congress either to impose on State courts the duty, or to give them the power to enforce penalties imposed on those banks for violations of the laws of the United States. The two propositions have no logical connection with each other.

After a careful investigatian I have arrived at the following conclusions:

First. That the suit in this case is to enforce a penalty under an act of Congress.

Second. That it was the intention of the act to give this court jurisdiction in such a case.

Third. But that the act is unconstitutional in this respect.

It is insisted that the declaration is defective in some other respects, but as these defects, if they exist, could be amended, and as the question of jurisdiction is conclusive of the case, it is not necessary to consider them. The demurrer is sustained.

ENGLISH COURT OF APPEAL.

THURSDAY, FEB. 3, 1876.

(Before the LORD CHANCELLOR, LORD COLERIDGE, and MELLISH, L. J.)

RUMMENS v. HARE and ANOTHER.

Appeal from an order of the Exchequer Division.

POLICY OF ASSURANCE—GIFT OF—DETINUE—DONEE'S RIGHT TO RETAIN POSSESSION OF PAPER-WRITING AGAINST DONOR'S ADMINISTRATOR.

J., having insured his life for 100*l*., handed over the policy to the defendant, who was his mother, as a voluntary gift. He afterwards paid two premiums upon the policy, and gave the receipts for such payments to the defendant. Some time after the gift of the policy to the defendant, J. married, and he died intestate, leaving a widow.

Held, (affirming the judgment of the Exchequer Division below), that the defendant was entitled to retain possession of the paper-writing of the policy as against the widow, who claimed as administratrix of J.

On the 27th Aug., 1873, one J. G. Rummens, who was then living with his mother, effected an insurance on his own life for the sum of £100 in the Breton Medical and General Life Association. Shortly afterwards, upon his mother asking him to make provision for her, he handed over to her the policy of assurance, saying, "If I die, you will receive the money."

He afterwards paid two premiums on the policy, the receipts for which payments he also handed over to his mother. No money consideration passed from mother to son for the policy, which has remained in the mother's possession since the gift of it to her.

J. G. Rummens married in 1874, and died, intestate, on the 25th Jan., 1875, leaving his widow, Elizabeth Rummens, him surviving.

Elizabeth Rummens, as the administratrix of the estate, being unable to obtain payment from the company of the £100 secured by the policy, unless she produced the policy itself, thereupon commenced an action against the defendants, the mother of the intestate and her solicitor, to recover the possession of it.

The cause was tried before Cleasby B. at the sittings for Middlesex, after Hilary Term, 1875.

The plaintiff's declaration was "for that the defendants detained from the plaintiff a certain policy of assurance of the plaintiff, numbered 38,135, for assusuring £100 on the life of the said intestate (J. G. Rummens) in the Breton Medical and General Life Association; also certain receipts for premiums paid thereon by the said intestate; and also divers other documents and papers connected therewith, whereby the plaintiff has not only been deprived of the possession of the same, and also of the power of raising money thereon for the purposes of the said administration, but has also been delayed, as well in proceeding to obtain payment of the said policy, as also in administering the proceeds thereof as assets in the said administration." There was a further count in the declaration for conversion of the policy, receipts, etc., and the plaintiff claimed a return of the policy, receipts, and documents, and damages for their detention.

The defendants pleaded: Non detinet, that the property was not the plaintiff's as alleged, and not guilty, and issue was joined on these pleas.

The jury found for the defendants on both counts.

On the 21st July, 1875, a rule was obtained in the Exchequer by the plaintiff calling upon the defendants to show cause why the verdict entered for them should not be set aside and a new trial had, on the ground that, upon the facts as proved at the trial, no interest passed to the defendant, Sarah Rummens, in the policy of assurance itself, and that the learned judge should have directed a verdict for the plaintiff.

On the 7th Dec., 1875, the Exchequer Division made an order discharging this rule, and it was from this order the defendants now appealed.

The case will be found reported on another point, 32 L. T. Rep. N. S. 428.

Tapping, for the appellant, plaintiff below (with him the Solicitor-General).—There was no valid assignment of the policy to the defendant. By sec. 3, of the 30 and 31 Vict., c. 144, notice of the assignment must be given to the assurance company, in order to make the assignment good; and by sec. 5, such assignment may be made by indorsement or by a separate instrument. This was an imperfect voluntary gift. The intestate's intention could not be carried out, and the property remained in him; the defendant has no right to retain the policy. She cannot obtain the money secured by it: Searle v. Law (15 Simon's Reports, 95). It is true that the principle laid down in this case has been considered in Barton v. Gainer, 3 H. & N. Ex. Rep., 387.

Grantham for the defendants (with him Day, Q. C.) not called on.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR.—This is a question not involving the right to the money secured by the policy of assurance. It is an action brought in order to recover possession of the actual policy itself, and different considerations apply to proceedings to recover the paper writing than would apply to proceedings to recover the money. The intestate, having insured his life, gave to his mother, upon her remonstrances, the policy of assurance, and told her to take and keep it, which she did until his death. He also gave her receipts for two premiums which he had paid After his death his widow sues the defendant as administratrix, and the court below has held, upon the authority of Barton v. Gainer, that the administratrix could not maintain trover against the defendant, the donee of the policy. I agree with that holding. This was a gift without consideration, no doubt, but still it was a gift. The plaintiff may not be able to recover evidence of her debt, and yet the person having the paper may not be able to recover the money secured by it, but the defendant is entitled to retain what was given to her—the paper and writing of the policy.

The rest of the Court, (Lord Coleridge, C. J., and Mellish, L. J.), concurred.

Judgment for respondents, defendants below.

Solicitor for the plaintiff, A. S. Hatchett Jones.

Solicitors for the defendants, Wood and Hare.

THE CARRIERS' ACT.—A simple point, but one of great importance, under the Carriers' Act, was recently decided by the Queen's Bench Division, in Way v. The Great Eastern Railway Company. The facts appear, says the Law Times, to be that the plaintiff delivered three pictures by Vandyke, Poussin, and Wilson, to be carried by the plaintiffs, without declaring their value, which was agreed to be £1,000. The pictures were stolen by a person who pretended to be one of the company's servants, but in fact was not. It was argued the acting as a servant constituted the thief a servant pro hac vice within the meaning of the 8th section of the Carriers' Act. But Mr. Justice Blackburn observed that "the question under the Act was whether the thief was in truth the servant of the company, and in truth he was not so. It was highly artificial reasoning to say that because he succeeded in imposing upon the company, therefore he became their servant." Judgment was therefore entered for the company, and the decision appears to be perfectly correct. That there was negligence in the company seems probable enough, but it was held in Hinton v. Dibbin (2 Q. B. 646), that the Carriers' Act is a protection even in the case of the grossest negligence. And, indeed, Mr. Way's case appears to have been just one of those which the Carriers' Act was intended to meet. If the company had known that they were carrying Vandykes and Poussins they would have "charged £50, and sent a policeman" with them. As it was, they charged 3s., and took at least no more than "ordinary care"—with the result as we have stated.—Public Opinion.

We call attention to the following opinions, reported at length in this issue:

MISREPRESENTATIONS ON SALE OF CLAIM—HOW EVIDENCE MUST BE TAKEN IN EQUITY CASES IN THE FEDERAL COURTS—ACT OF 1872.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States, by WAITE, C. J., stating the effect of making misrepresentations on the sale of a claim against a person in precarious circumstances, and the duty of a person to whom such misrepresentations are made, to endeavor to determine whether they are true or false, and holding that the statute of 1872, providing that the practice, pleadings and forms, and mode of proceeding in civil cases in the Circuit and District courts of the United States shall conform as near as may be to the practice in the State courts of the State, has no application to the case before the court, it being a case in equity, and equity and admiralty cases being excepted from the act.

BANKRUPTCY—SALE OF PROPERTY—COSTS—LIENS.—The opinion of the United States Circuit Court of South Carolina, by Bond, J., holding that where property which is encumbered by liens is sold, at the suggestion of the general creditors, and brings no more than the amount of the liens, it is not chargeable with any costs except the actual costs of sale; that where property is sold free from a mortgage, the bankrupt court has no authority to adjust the claims of the trustee under the mortgage against the cestui que trust, nor to ascertain what is due by him to his counsel.

REMOVAL OF CASE FROM STATE TO FEDERAL COURT.—The opinion of the United States Circuit Court for the northern district of Ohio, by WELKER, J., holding that when a case is commenced in the Court of Common Pleas of a State, and a trial had in such court, and the case appealed to a District Court of the State, it is then too late to ask to have such case removed into the United States Court under the act of March 2, 1867.

DISOBEYING ORDERS ON SHIP BOARD.—The opinion of the United States District court of Oregon by DEADY, J., holding that a prosecution cannot be maintained against a seaman for any of the offenses defined in sections 4596 of the revised statutes, unless an entry of the circumstances is made by the master in the official log book of the vessel, as soon as possible after the occurrence, and read over to him or a copy furnished him, and his reply thereto entered in the same manner.

NATIONAL BANK—DISSOLUTION OF—ACTION AGAINST FOR TAKING MORE THAN LAWFUL INTEREST—STATE COURT NO JURISDICTION.—The opinion of the City Court of Baltimore by BROWN, J., stating the manner and effect of a national bank going into liquidation and closing up, and holding that an action brought in a State court against a national bank to recover double the amount of interest alleged to have been usuriously taken by such bank, is a suit brought to enforce a penalty under an act of Congress, and that a State court has no jurisdiction of such an action. The reader will find a very elaborate opinion of the Supreme Court of this State by WALKER, C. J., in the case of the Miss. River Telegraph Co. v. The First National Bank, etc., reported 7 CHICAGO LEGAL NEWS, 158, in which the same conclusion is arrived at as in the Baltimore case.

POLICY ON LIFE—GIFT OF—RIGHT TO POSSESSION.—The opinion of the English court of Appeal where J., having insured his life for 100*l*, handed over the policy to the defendant, who was his mother, as a voluntary gift. He afterwards paid two premiums on the policy, and gave the receipts for such payments to the defendant. Sometime after the gift of the policy to the defendant, J. married and he died intestate, leaving a widow. Under this state of facts the court held affirming the judgment of the Exchequer Division below that the defendant was entitled to retain possession of the paper writing of the policy as against the widow, who claimed as administratrix of J.

BIGAMY NOT A CONTINUING OFFENCE—STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS.—The opinion of the Supreme court of Pennsylvania by PAXSON, J., holding that bigamy is not a continuing offence in Pennsylvania, nor is the offence perpetuated day by day by cohabitation under the second marriage; that the second and unlawful contract of marriage is the offence in the eye of the law and cohabitation is not an element of the offence but a separate and distinct offence of itself; that the statute of limitations begins to run from the time of the execution of the illegal contract of marriage; that the statute runs from the time the offender becomes liable to the penalties of the law.

LAWS REGULATING THE SALE OF PATENT RIGHTS.

The Common Pleas Court of Dauphin Co., Pa., in Bowen v. Kemer et al., reported 5 Luzerne Legal Register, 104, where a note, not negotiable, was given for the purchase of a patent right, and no notice to that effect was endorsed on the note. Held, that it was illegal and void, and that there could be no recovery thereon, as such a transaction was in violation of the act of 1872 relating to the sale of patents. We had supposed that it was understood by all good lawyers and judges that a State had no constitutional authority to pass laws regulating the sale of patent rights. Our own Supreme Court, in the case of Halladay et al. v. Hunt, reported in 6 CHICAGO LEGAL NEWS, 343, held an act of the legislature of Illinois regulating the sale of patent rights passed in 1869, similar to the Pennsylvania statute, to be unconstitutional. Judge Davis, in the United States Circuit Court for the D. of Indiana, in ex parte Robinson, reported 2 CHICAGO LEGAL NEWS, 297, held that the law passed by the legislature of Indiana to regulate the sale of patent rights was void; that property exists in inventions by virtue of the laws of Congress, and no State has the right to interfere with its enjoyment or to annex conditions to the grant.

THE AUTHORITY OF THE PRESIDENT OF A R. R. CO.

The Supreme Court of Pennsylvania in the J. R. R. Co. v. The Penn. R. R. Co., 33 Leg. Intel., 193, held, where the president of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company is its chief executive officer and general agent in the matter of operating its lines under the powers contained in the charter; that he cannot, as such agent, give away a dollar of its property, an inch of its track, or the least of its franchises.

COMMON CARRIER—LIMITING LIABILITY.

The Court of Appeals of Virginia in V. & T. R. R. Co. v. Sayers, 15 Am. Law. Reg., 297, held that a common carrier may, by contract or by notice, restrict his common law liability as insurer against purely accidental loss or injury, but that he cannot even by express contract, avoid liability for negligence, nor limit it to gross negligence. This is an elaborate and well considered opinion.

THE COUNTY RING.—For years it has been charged that our county affairs have been managed by a ring, and that those who did not contribute as the managers of the ring directed could not secure a contract of the county officials, no matter how low their bid might be. Some of the County Commissioners have done their duty faithfully and tried to break the ring, but it was too strong for them. The newspapers have cried fraud and corruption. Grand juries have endeavored to indict, but failed to get the necessary evidence and the work of the ring went on. This week, however, the Grand Jury, profiting by the labors of previous grand juries and the evidence obtained from some of the conspirators, returned into court indictments for conspiracy to defraud the county, against George B. Kimberly, the present warden of the Poor House, C. F. Periolat, Patrick O'Donnell, Hugh H. Sweetson, and A. B. Johnson, John McCaffery, Patrick Carroll, John J. Russell, John Crawford, Samuel Ashton, John Jones and C. C. P. Holden, now or late County Commissioners. These trials should be conducted with the utmost fairness and dispatch. No one should be convicted because he is found in bad company, but such of the defendants as the evidence shows to be guilty should be punished to the extent of the law. It is difficult to name a greater crime than that of a number of County Commissioners and contractors conspiring together to defraud the county and to deprive the helpless insane and miserable paupers of proper clothing and wholesome food. No one has had more to do in breaking up this contractors' ring than Mr. Story, of the Times. For months he has assailed it vigorously in his paper and as foreman of the last Grand Jury, he grouped together the leading facts and circumstances in such a manner as to enable the present Grand Jury to obtain the necessary evidence to indict. Editors make the best kind of grand jurors. Mr. Shehan, of the Tribune, is on the present Grand Jury, and rendered it valuable aid in its investigations.

AGAINST FATE—A True Story, by Mrs. M. L. Rayne. Chicago: W. B. Keen, Cook & Co. 1876.

The graceful, spicy correspondent of the Chicago press, Mrs. M. L. Rayne, who used to write for the Chicago Tribune, under the name of "Vic.," and who in later years was the Editor and Publisher of the Chicago Magazine, has entered upon a new field, viz: that of book making. She has succeeded in producing a most readable book.

The narration purports to be a true story, although it reads very much like a romance. It has so much of every day life, so faithful a picture of the over-zealous reformer, and the poor girl, struggling for a livelihood, that if we judge of her by what she has said in her story, we must conclude that she has a keen sympathy with what is earnest and honest. Success to the fair writer and her book. It will no doubt have a ready sale, as it most richly deserves.

A PRACTICAL TREATISE ON THE LAW OF EVIDENCE. By Thomas Starkie, Esq., of the Inner Temple, one of Her Majesty's counsel. The tenth American, from the fourth London edition, by Dowdeswell and Malcolm, of the Inner Temple, barristers-at-law. With the notes to former American editions, by Metcalf, Ingraham and Gerhard, and additional notes and references to American cases, by George Sharswood. Philadelphia: T. & J. W. Johnson & Co., law booksellers, publishers and importers, No. 535 Chestnut street, 1876. Sold by E. B. Myers, law bookseller, Chicago.

There is not a common law lawyer in England or America but what knows and will admit the great merits of Starkie on Evidence. The publishers will receive the thanks of the profession for bringing out this edition of their favorite text book on the Law of Evidence. Mr. Sharswood, the editor of the present American edition, proclaims himself in favor of the repeal of all arbitrary rules for the exclusion of evidence. He says, in a note under date of April, 1876, that the Fourth English Edition has been adapted to the present state of the law in England. That it is true some of the alterations recently adopted by statute in that country have not yet been universally introduced into this. In many of the States, however, they have already been incorporated into their legislation. The experience of those States where the law of evidence has been simplified by the repeal of all arbitrary rules of exclusion speaks so loudly in favor of that reform, that the example must spread. That the labors of the former American editors have been carefully retained. Notes and references to the more recent decisions have been added to bring up the work to the present time. Attorneys who have not already got Starkie will do well to add this volume to their libraries.

THE CONSTITUTIONAL AND POLITICAL HISTORY OF THE UNITED STATES. By Dr. H. Von Holst, professor at the university at Freiburg. Translated from the German by John J. Lalor and Alfred B. Mason. 1750—1833. State Sovereignty and Slavery. Chicago: Callaghan and Company, 1876.

This is the most extensive work of the kind ever undertaken in Chicago — the translation and publication of several large volumes of a foreign work, being the Constitutional History of the United States by a foreigner. The undertaking of such an enterprise reflects credit upon the publishers, Messrs. Callaghan and Company. The translation is entirely a Chicago production. The translators, Messrs. Lalor and Mason, are Chicago men. The composition is by Blakely & Brown. The plates from the foundry of Marder, Luse & Co. The press work by the Chicago Legal News Company, and the binding by A. J. Cox and Company. We take pleasure in saying that the translating has been done in the most admirable and skilful manner. Von Holst is one of the great thinkers of Europe. He says in his preface that he has one great advantage over all his American predecessors: he is a foreigner. This he considers to be an advantage, though during his sojourn in the United States (1867-1872) he had frequently to hear, "you are a foreigner, you cannot fully understand our system of government." The professor very appropriately commences his preface by saying: "The United States are about to commence the second century of their life as an independent commonwealth and as a republic. It is a curious fact that, at the same time, they evidently are entering upon a new phase of their political development. The era of buoyant youth is coming to a close: ripe and sober manhood is to take its place. I take it to be a good omen for the success of this work that just at this moment an English translation of it is to be offered to the American public." We cannot perhaps give the reader a better idea of this volume than by stating its contents. It is divided into twelve chapters as follows: 1. The Origin of the Union, the Confederation and the Struggle for the Present Constitution. 2. The Worship of the Constitution and its Real Character. 3. The Internal Struggles during Washington's two Administrations. Alexander Hamilton. The First Debate on the Slavery Question. Influence of the French Revolution. Consolidation of Parties. Gradual Intensification of Geographical Differences. 4. Nullification. The Virginia and Kentucky Resolutions. 5. The Presidential Election of 1801. The Fall of the Federalist Party. Jefferson and the Purchase of Louisiana. The Burr and Federalist Intrigues. 6. The Embargo. Madison and the Second War with England. The Hartford Convention. 7. History of the Slavery Question to 1787. The Compromises of the Constitution on Slavery. 8. History of the Slavery Question from 1789 until the Missouri Compromise. 9. The Economic Contrast Between the Free and Slave States. The Missouri Compromise. 10. Development of the Economic Contrast Between the Free and Slave States 11. The Panama Congress. Georgia and the Federal Government. 12. The Doctrine of Nullification. The Compromise between South Carolina and the Federal. Government. The professor intends visiting this country again before completing his work. How industriously he has collected and digested the material at his command every page of this volume bears witness. We Americans will not all agree with him in the estimate he has put upon our great men who founded this government, who to a certain extent have become our national idols nor in his views on the great questions which have threatened our existance as a nation, and been the subject of controversy for the last hundred years. But we will all give him credit after reading his work of having expressed his opinion of us and our institutions unmoved by passion and uninfluenced by prejudice either for or against us. We predict that the work will have an extensive sale.

UNITED STATES DIGEST; A DIGEST OF DECISIONS OF THE VARIOUS COURTS WITHIN THE UNITED STATES. By Benjamin Vaughan Abbott. New series, vol. VI, Annual Digest for 1875. Boston: Little, Brown & Company, 1876. Sold by Callaghan & Co., Law Book Publishers, Chicago.

This series of the United States Digest by Mr. Abbott, is absolutely indispensable to every lawyer who wishes to refer readily to the cases in the recent volumes of reports. There are ninety-one volumes of reports comprised in this volume of the Digest—eleven United States Reports and eighty State Reports. The 64, 65, 66, 67, 68 and 76 of Illinois Reports are also comprised in it. It is a sufficient guarantee of its mechanical execution to say that it is from the press of John Wilson & Son, and published by Little, Brown and Company, the largest law publishing house in the world.

SUPREME COURT OF PENNSYLVANIA.

GISE v. THE COMMONWEALTH.

Error to the Quarter Sessions of Luzerne County.

1. Bigamy is not a continuing offense in Pennsylvania, nor is the offense perpetuated day by day by cohabitation under the second marriage.
2. The second and unlawful contract of marriage is the offense in the eye of the law and cohabitation is not an element of the offense, but a separate and distinct offense of itself.
3. The statute of limitation (two years) begins to run from the time of the execution of the illegal contract of marriage. The statute runs from the time the offender becomes liable to the penalties of the law.
4. Bigamy is a misnomer of the offense, polygamy is the proper word to signify the crime.

Opinion by PAXSON, J. Delivered May 18th, 1876.

This case presents a single question, the plaintiff in error was indicted for the crime of bigamy. Upon the trial in the court below, the statute of limitations was set up as a defence. It appears that the second marriage took place more than two years prior to the commencement of the prosecution. The court ruled that bigamy was a continuing offence, and that the statute did not apply. The defendant was convicted and sentenced, and the record having been brought into this court upon a writ of error, we are required to decide upon the correctness of this ruling.

Our statute of limitations contains no clause excepting bigamy out of its operation. Its language is; "all indictments which shall be brought or exhibited," &c. Were we now to say that all indictments except bigamy shall be barred unless brought or exhibited within the statutory period, we should be vesting into the act of assembly that which the law-making power has not placed there. This is clearly not within the province of the judiciary. It is said, however, that the statute of limitations does not apply by reason of the peculiar phraseology of the section of our code defining bigamy; that the offence is the having of two wives or two husbands at one and the same time, and is of a continuing nature. This is certainly a very literal construction of the act, and taken in this strict sense it defines no offence, for the reason that under the law of Pennsylvania it is impossible as a legal proposition for a man to have two wives, or a woman to have two husbands at the same time. A man who takes a wife here cannot have a second wife so long as his former marriage is undetermined by divorce or death. He may indeed enter into a second marriage contract pending the first. But the second woman is never a wife; the law strikes down such second contract as void, and the offence is bigamy on the part of the man.

It is very clear that at common law the crime of bigamy occurs and is complete when the second marriage is accomplished. It follows that the statute would commence to run from that time. This has never been questioned. But it is said that owing to the peculiar language of our statute it seeks to extend the offence of bigamy beyond the mere marriage contract and cover the subsequent cohabitation of the parties, which being continuous in its nature is not affected by the bar of the statute. Yet a little reflection will show that our code so far from being peculiar in its terms, merely defines the offence of bigamy at common law. It is said in Bacon's Abridgment that bigamy is the "having of a plurality of wives," and that the offence consists of "marrying a second wife, the first being alive." Bouvier defines it to us, "the state of a man who has two wives, or of a woman who has two husbands living at the same time." Blackstone says, it is the "having of a plurality of wives at once." It will be seen that our code, 34th section of act of 31st of March, 1860, P. L. 392, uses almost the precise phraseology of the text writers. Its language is: "if any person shall have two wives or two husbands at one and the same time," or, nor can it be claimed that there is anything novel in this section. It is but a re-enactment of the act of 1705 (1 Smith's Laws, 29), so far as it relates to the description of the offence. In a note to the last named act, it is said that this statute merely defines the offence of bigamy which "is understood in law to be where a person marries a second wife or husband, the first being living." Such has been the uniform construction of our statute since the act of 1705. Our indictments have been so drawn. The forms which are given by Mr. Wharton in his Precedents, at page 582, charge the second marriage as the offence as at common law. One of those forms was prepared by Mr. Jared Ingersoll, while attorney-general, in 1795; the other by Attorney-General Bradford in 1790. Both of these eminent lawyers evidently regarded the second marriage as the offence; and such has been the uniform construction from that day to the present time. That they were right in this is manifest from the fact that the indictment for bigamy is always under our practice found within the jurisdiction where the second marriage took place. That the venue must be so laid is elementary law. Wharton's A. C. L., § 2627; Finney v. State, 3 Head., 544; People v. Mosher, 2 Parker, 195. It is not so in England, nor in New York, nor Virginia. But this rests upon statute. We have no such statute, and the common law rule prevails.

What our statute forbids is the contracting of a second marriage during the lifetime of a former husband or wife, as was said in the State v. Patterson, 2 Iredell, 346: "Marriage, or the relation of husband and wife, is in law complete when parties able and willing to contract, actually have contracted to be man and wife, in the form and with the solemnities required by law. It is marriage; it is their contract which gives to each right or power over the body of the other, and renders a consequent cohabitation lawful; and it is the abuse of this solemn and formal contract, by entering into it a second time when a former husband or wife is still living, which the law forbids, because of its outrage upon public decency, its violation of the public economy, as well as its tendency to cheat one into a surrender of the person under the appearance of right. A man takes a wife lawfully when the contract is lawfully made. He takes a wife unlawfully when the contract is unlawfully made, and this unlawful contract the law punishes." In Reg. v. Baron, 1 Cox, C. C. 34, it was said by Lord Denman, C. J.: "The offence consisted in going through the ceremony of marriage and appearing to contract that which was a legal and binding union at the time when she (the defendant) had already a husband living. That single fact constitutes the crime and the proof of it." It is needless to multiply authorities.

The doctrine now for the first time asserted that the continuing cohabitation is the offence, does not need an extended discussion. It is not necessary to allege or prove cohabitation upon an indictment for bigamy. Cayford v. Case, 7 Greenleaf, 58; Gahagan v. The People, 9 Parker; State v. Patterson, supra. On the contrary, a man may be convicted of bigamy who separates from his second wife at the altar, and has never cohabited with her at all. The gravamen of the offence is the second marriage contract, by means of which the offending party fraudulently obtains dominion or control over the body of the other. Mere lewdness or unlawful cohabitation is provided for by other sections of the code. The doctrine of continuing offences is novel. No text writer in England or America has ever asserted it. No respectable authority has ever recognized it. It is wholly unknown to the criminal law. There is a period in the history of every crime when it is completed, and the offender becomes liable to the penalties of the law. From that moment the statute commences to run.

It is said that if the statute runs from the second marriage, a man can defy the law by keeping his second marriage secret until after the statutory period has passed. This hardly rises to the dignity of an argument. Carried to its legitimate conclusion, it would apply to every case of crime, and entirely annul the statute. It is true, a man may live openly with his second wife after the bar of the statute. So he may with any other woman. I do not see that the scandal, or the injury to the public morals is greater in the one case than in the other. In either case, he may be punished according to the nature of his offence. When a married man unlawfully cohabits with a woman, he commits the crime of adultery. When he contracts a second marriage, he is guilty of bigamy. The difficulty in this case arises from the attempt to punish a man for one offence under a statute defining and punishing a different offence.

The statutes of several of the States differ from our own. So does the English statute. But the difference is more in form than substance. They are generally intended to define and punish the offence of bigamy. We have already seen in what that offence consists.

I have used the word bigamy according to its popular signification. Strictly speaking, it means twice married, as its derivation clearly shows. This was never an offence at common law, although made so by the canonists. Polygamy is the proper term to describe the offence we have been discussing, but by long usage bigamy has come to be understood in law to be the state of a man who has two wives, or of a woman who has two husbands at the same time.

The statute of limitations is a bar to this prosecution. It follows, therefore, that the plaintiff in error was illegally convicted and sentenced, and should be restored to his liberty. The judgment is reversed, and the record remitted to the Court of Quarter Sessions, with directions to carry this order into effect.

RELIGIOUS AMENDMENT OF THE CONSTITUTION.

By SAMUEL T. SPEAR, D. D.

It is the opinion of a portion of the American people that our National Constitution ought to be so amended as to establish "a Christian government." The amendment proposed for this purpose, if adopted, would make the preamble read as follows:

"We, the people of the United States acknowledging Almighty God as the source of all authority and power in civil government, the Lord Jesus Christ as the ruler among the nations, and His revealed will as of supreme authority in order to constitute a Christian government, to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquility, provide for the common defence, promote the general welfare and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves, and our posterity, do ordain and establish the following Constitution for the United States of America."

The words in italics are the ones which the advocates of a religious amendment to the Constitution desire to insert in its preamble. The object is to make the Government "a Christian government," and the method of doing it is to assert these three propositions: 1. That God is the source of all authority and power in civil government. 2. That the Lord Jesus Christ is the ruler among the nations. 3. That His revealed will is of supreme authority.

It is undoubtedly true that neither the Constitution nor the Government is now Christian in the sense contemplated by this amendment. It is, however, true that the Constitution establishes "a Christian government" in the sense of providing for those great moral ends that refer to the present welfare and happiness of society. Unity among the people, justice, tranquility, the common defense, the general welfare, and the blessings of liberty are enumerated as ends to be attained. These, surely, are not anti-Christian ends; and it is not straining the import of the term to say that they are Christian, considered with reference to that department of Christianity which relates to the interests and duties of time. In this sense the Constitution already provides for "a Christian government."

Let us then see in what further sense the Constitution would establish "a Christian government" if the preamble were amended in the manner proposed. What would be the legal effect? In answering this question, it is important to remember that the preamble of the Constitution is simply an enacting clause, analogous to the title of a legislative act; and that, in itself considered, it makes no grants of power, imposes no restraints, and contains no provision for the organization and administration of a government. Except in connection with what follows in the several articles of the Constitution, it is as meaningless and powerless as would be a legislative act if the whole of it consisted in its title. The preamble, for example, declares the establishment of justice to be one of the ends sought; yet this mere statement would be utterly inoperative if the Constitution, in the legislative, executive, and judicial grants of power to the General Government contained no provisions for the attainment of the end. The same would be true of all the other objects specified in the preamble, if divorced from those provisions which are designed and adapted to secure them. Justice Story, in his "Commentaries on the Constitution" (section 462), says:

"And here we must guard ourselves against an error which is too often allowed to creep into discussions upon this subject. The preamble never can be resorted to to enlarge the powers confided to the General Government or any of its departments. It cannot confer any power per se; it can never amount by implication to an enlargement of any power expressly given. It can never be the legitimate source of any implied power when otherwise withdrawn from the Constitution."

It, hence, follows that, if the preamble were amended as proposed, not the slightest practical change would be made in the Constitution itself or in the character of the government. The added words would be in the preamble; but the government would be no more "Christian" than it is without them. It would still be true that "no religious test shall ever be required as a qualification to any office or public trust under the United States;" that "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof;" and that "the powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution nor prohibited by it to the States are reserved to the States respectively or to the people." These provisions would remain in the body of the Constitution; and unless we adopt the false doctrine that the preamble is itself a grant of powers to the General Government the words proposed to be added to it would be legally a dead letter. The Constitution is not constructed to give any effect to such words or the ideas which they convey. There is nothing in it corresponding to them or that furnishes any method or legal machinery for their application. In this sense they would be perfectly useless.

The proper mode of making the Government "a Christian government," according to the model proposed, is to adopt an amendment that would substantially read as follows:

"SECTION 1. It is hereby declared that God is the source of all authority and power in civil government, that the Lord Jesus Christ is the ruler among the nations, and that his revealed will is of supreme authority.

"SEC. 2. Congress shall have power, by appropriate legislation, to enforce the provisions of this article."

This, which might be called the Sixteenth Amendment, would certainly gain the end proposed on the basis of the three religious doctrines affirmed. But, in securing this end, it would fundamentally change the whole theory of the Constitution in regard to religion and, in the powers of Congress, establish a complete religious despotism. The doctrines, being thus constitutionally affirmed and thus accompanied with an enforcing power in Congress, would "constitute a Christian government" in a sense that might well fill the country with alarm. If, however, these doctrines were simply in the preamble, dissevered from any enforcing power, they would have no more legal significance than if they were found in a treatise on theology.

Moreover, if these propositions were added to the preamble, and all the other parts of the Constitution were left unchanged, there would be no authoritative method of determining their meaning, or in what sense they would make the government "a Christian government." Congress could not legislatively express any opinion on the subject, since it would have no power of legislation in reference to it. The Supreme Court of the United States could not judicially expound or apply the propositions, since no case under them could arise over which it would have jurisdiction. Ecclesiastical courts could not determine their meaning, since they are not the authorized interpreters of the Constitution. Their meaning would be purely a matter of private interpretation, and no such interpretation would have any authority. The words would be in the preamble; but, as a national confession of faith, they would be accompanied by no legislative or judicial commentary on their import. Whether God is the source of all authority and power in civil government, merely in the general sense of creation and providence, or in the special sense of investing such government with a portion of his own authority; whether the Lord Jesus Christ is the ruler among the nations in any other sense than that in which he is the ruler over the fowls of the air and the beasts of the field; where his revealed will is to be found, and for what purposes and in what relations it is to be applied—these and the like questions would be open to all sorts of answers, according to the varying notions of different persons, with no tribunal and no authority anywhere to give the true answer. The words themselves are sufficiently elastic to be capable of different interpretations; and, hence, in the absence of an authentic expounder, there would be no means of deciding in what sense the people use hem in the preamble.

Nor do we see any reason why, if the door is to be opened sufficiently wide to admit these three religious dogmas, it may not be opened wide enough to admit forty—indeed, to permit the ingress of all the cardinal doctrines of Christianity. Why not also declare that Christ died for our sins, according to the Scriptures; that he rose again on the third day; that he ascended into Heaven; and that he will come again to raise the dead and judge the world? These and the like are certainly Christian truths; and the theory which demands the utterance of three such truths may just as well be extended to the whole system. It imposes upon itself no limitation. Indeed it would be a question of interpretation, without anybody authorized to answer it, whether the phrase "his revealed will" would not by implication embrace the whole circle of Christian doctrine and precept as given in the Bible. Words, when used in constitutions, are generally interpreted to include everything to which, being taken in their natural sense, they are applicable; and under this rule the phrase referred to would have a very broad import.

What practical service would the insertion of these words in the preamble, with no power in the government either to explain them or put them into legal execution, render to either God or man? A church creed is operative for its appropriate purposes, because behind the creed we have a church organization to work it; but such a creed, either in whole or in part, in the constitution of a government, without the power to work it, would be of no productive value. It might gratify the wishes of a certain class of the people, while it would be contrary to the convictions and wishes of a much larger class; but it would not make one Christian more or one sinner less. It would not increase the religious zeal of the people or add to the general influence of Christianity upon the popular mind. It would not make the careless thoughtful, or convert Atheists and Deists to the faith. It would not build a church or raise a dollar for religious purposes. It would not control the legislation of the government or furnish any guaranty that the legislation would be just and right. It would not add to the sense of God in the councils of the nation or in individual hearts. It would not purify political parties or make officeholders more circumspect. We are at an utter loss to see how the simple creed contained in the words proposed, unaccompanied by any enforcing power, as it would be if found merely in the preamble, and as it must be, or be the basis of a most dangerous religious despotism—would secure any desirable result that would not just as well and just as certainly be secured without it. There is not a solitary thing which the creed in this form of utterance would or could do to make the government a "a Christian government" in any sense not now real, or to make the people any more Christian than they now are. Some might think it a religious ornament to the Constitution; yet a much greater number would regard the ornament as not being in its proper place.

The one great objection to the amendment, though, as we have shown, it would be legally meaningless and powerless, consists in the principle which underlies it, and which those who framed the Constitution meant utterly to exclude. The American people, so far as they are religious at all, are Christian by a very large preponderance, and in this sense they may be justly spoken of as being a Christian people; and yet nothing is more conspicuous in their political and civil institutions than their general refusal to incorporate pro forma their christianity into the language of their constitutions or laws. The great idea which they have sought to realize is that of the most perfect religious liberty and equality among all the citizens of one common government; and, in order the more effectually to gain this end, they have denied to civil government any jurisdiction in matters of religious faith and practice, beyond that of extending an impartial protection to all the people. Adopting this principle, they have with scrupulous care limited their constitutions and legal systems to the attainment of purely temporal ends, and hence omitted to place in them any affirmations or denials of religious dogmas.

There can be no doubt that the amendment proposed, though confined to the preamble of the Constitution, and really granting no power to the general government, would, nevertheless, be a departure from this principle. By it the people of the United States, not as individuals, but in their political and corporate capacity, would place a confession of religious faith in their national constitution. This would be a step in the wrong direction, provided the doctrine of absolute religious equality is to be maintained. The next step would be to clothe the government with power in respect to this confession; and this would at once erect a religious despotism. The safe course for the people is not to take the first step; and if they do not propose to take the second step there is no occasion for taking the first. When they are prepared to make christianity a legalized system, then and not till then will it be seasonable to stamp its doctrines with a constitutional affirmation.

Looking, finally, at the process by which the proposed amendment must be adopted, if at all, we cannot resist the conviction that its advocates are engaged in the most hopeless of all undertakings. In order to succeed, they must persuade two thirds of both houses of Congress to propose the amendment, or two thirds of the legislatures of the several States to ask Congress to call a convention to propose it. And when they have gained this end, they must persuade three-fourths of the legislatures of all the States or conventions in three fourths of the States to ratify the proposition. This is the constitutional method of changing the fundamental law of the land. Does any man in his senses suppose that the amendment in question can be carried through this process? Nothing short of a largely predominant public sentiment could secure the result. No such sentiment now exists, and there is not the remotest probability of creating it by any amount of discussion. The tendency of discussion would be in the opposite direction. A political party organized on the basis of such an amendment would not live long enough to be entitled to a name, and any existing party adopting it as an article of its political creed would be crushed by its weight. The advocates of the amendment may as well save their time and money, and apply both to the attainment of more practical objects.—N. Y. Independent.

THE EFFECT AS AGAINST THE CREDITORS OF A TESTATOR OF AN EQUITABLE MORTGAGE BY A DEVISEE.

The case of the British Mutual Investment Company v. Smart is noteworthy, inasmuch as it overruled the decision of Vice Chancellor Kindersley, 2 Drewry, 248; 23 L. J., 629; 2 L. T. Rep., 235, and extends to bona fide alienations in equity by an heir to purchasers or persons in the position of purchasers the protection which bona fide common law alienations enjoyed under 11 Geo. 4, and 1 Will. 4, c. 47, in the administration of a testator's assets.

Sir John Romilly's act for consolidating and amending the laws for facilitating the payment of debts out of real estate, (11 Geo. 4, and 1 Will. 4, c. 47), s. 6, directs that in all cases where any heir-at-law shall be liable to pay the debts or perform the covenants of his ancestors in regard of any lands, tenements, or hereditaments, descended to him, and shall sell, alien, or make over the same before any action brought or process issued out against him, such heir-at-law shall be answerable for such debt or debts in an action or actions of debt or covenant to the value of the said lands so by him sold, aliened, or made over, in which case all creditors shall be preferred, as in actions against executors and administrators, and such execution shall be taken out upon any judgment or judgments so obtained against such heir to the value of the said land as if the same were his own proper debt or debts, saving that the lands, tenements and hereditaments bona fide aliened before the action brought shall not be liable to such execution.

The facts in Carter v. Sanders were as follows: N. and C., the daughters of M., were jointly indebted to W. S., and the debt was secured by deposit of title deeds of property belonging to C. M. appointed N. her executrix. Part of her property consisted of a mortgage debt, and after her will she purchased some real estate, which descended to N. and C. N. died, leaving a large amount of M.'s debts unpaid, and she made the plaintiff her executrix, so that the plaintiff was personal representative both of M. and N. After the death of M., N. and C. borrowed money of S. upon deposit of the title deeds, by which M.'s mortgage debt was secured, and of the title deeds of the real estate which descended to N. and C. S. knew that the money was only partially wanted for the purposes of M.'s estate. There had been another suit to administer the estates of M., and part of the real estate of M. sold on a bill by the plaintiff against S. seeking to recover the title deeds deposited. Vice Chancellor Kindersley held that the mortgage by N. and C., as heiresses of M., did not relieve the purchaser from the suit of M.'s representative. A deposit of the deeds with a creditor for an advance was not within the principle of a mortgage by the heir of the legal estate, or of all the interest that he had.

In Coope v. Cresswell (14 L. T. Rep. N. S., 202; L. Rep. 2 Ch. 112), Lord Chancellor Chelmsford impugned the principles of Carter v. Sanders, holding that under the Statute of Fraudulent Devises (3 W. & M., c. 14) an equitable devisee might be sued for breach of a covenant by the testator, and further, that a conveyance to new trustees was not such an alienation within sect. 7 as would preclude the action. "For under the statute the liability attaches upon the land and not upon the person, except in case of alienation, and therefore, although the trustees are not liable to the debts of the devisor, yet the creditors may through them make the land available for the satisfaction of their debts. Upon a judgment against the trustees, execution would of course extend to the whole estate. But if any beneficial interest in it had been bona fide aliened before action brought, the court would upon application, semble, prevent the interest so aliened from being affected by the execution." If so, a mortgagee would be protected.

Accordingly the Lords Justices held that there was no doubt that the alienation of the assets by the heir or devisee prevented the creditors of the executor or testator from following the assets in the hands of a bona fide purchaser where the alienation was a legal one. It also appeared to them "that by analogy the court ought to treat an equitable alienation of equitable assets as having the same effect. Vice Chancellor Hall had treated Carter v. Sanders (2 Dr., 248) as an authority; but that case was contrary to the opinion expressed by Lord Chancellor Chelmsford in Coope v. Cresswell, (L. Rep. 2 Ch. App., 122)." Independently of the statute, the law seems now to be settled that a person having only an equitable estate may avail himself of the defense of purchase for valuable consideration without notice against another having a legal title without an equity. (Colyer v. Finch, 5 H. of L. Cas., 905; Bowen v. Evans, 1 Jo. & L., 264). In Rogers v. Seale, (2 Freem., 84), Lord Chancellor Nottingham decreed otherwise. Lord Chancellor Rosslyn apparently thought the decree made by the reporter, and not by the judge, and decided in opposition thereto. Lord St. Leonards thought Lord Rosslyn's decision, which has since been acted upon, to be correct.—The London Law Times.

CONTRACT—CONSIDERATION—ADMINISTRATOR—ESTOPPED.

3945. Howard Lee, administrator of

George Clem v. Allen Carter, Bartholomew, C. C. Affirmed. Buskirk, J.

Held, 1—That the Court cannot consider the error assigned calling in question the action of the court below in overruling the motion to reject the amended complaint, the motion not being in the record.

Held, 2—That services rendered under an express agreement that they were to be compensated by a provision to be inserted in the will of the party for whom they were ventured, were a sufficient consideration for such promise, and that the promise alleged upon that consideration made a valid contract, not affected by the statute of frauds, and for a breach of which an action arises as in any other case of breach of contract. (24 Ind., 286.)

Held, 3—That in an action to recover a money judgment against the estate of a descendent, the administrator of such estate cannot set up an estoppel in his favor in his individual capacity.

SHERIFF'S SALE—PAYMENT OF TAXES BY THE VENDEE—SET OFF.

4483. Semans v. Harvey, Hamilton C. C. Affirmed. Downey, J.

Statement—Appellee sued appellant for money had and received, and for work and labor performed. The case comes up on demurrer sustained to the fourth paragraph of the answer. This paragraph sets up that the defendant purchased at a sheriff's sale, on a decree of foreclosure, certain real estate in Hamilton County, which was then owned in fee by plaintiff, subject to the mortgage afore aid; that the taxes for three years prior were unpaid; that the plaintiff failed to redeem under the sale, and the lands were conveyed to the defendant by the sheriff, and that thereafter the defendant paid said taxes, etc., and prayed that the amount so paid be declared a set-off.

Held—That in judicial sales there is no warranty; the purchaser takes what he gets. (Roser on sales, p. 167).

Held—That the defendant having purchased the land with the incumbrance upon it, it may be presumed that he took the incumbrance into account in determining the value of the land, and, therefore, the demurrer was correctly sustained.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATION—LIABILITY AND DUTIES—PLEADING—NEGLIGENCE.

4874. Rall et al. v. The City of Indianapolis, Marian C. C. C. Affirmed. Biddle, J.

STATEMENT—Action by appellants against appellee, charging the wrongful establishment of an insufficient sewer and certain catch basins, and improperly turning certain drainage into them, whereby the plaintiffs were injured in their property.

Held, 1—That municipal corporations are not liable to individuals for judicial errors, although private rights may be injured thereby.

Held, 2—That such corporations are not liable to individuals for this exercise of their ordinary powers, however mistaken, or even corrupt, their policy may be, and although private injuries may result therefrom.

Held, 3—That such corporations are liable to individuals for wrongful acts of derelictions of duty, in the exercise or their ministerial acts, whenever injury to private rights is the direct and natural consequence.

Held, 4—That when liable they are liable the same as individuals would be under the same circumstances.

Held, 5—As to the cross-error: That in such a case as this the plaintiffs need not allege that the wrongs complained of were without any fault or negligence on their part; such allegation is necessary only in cases wherein the issue is solely a question of negligence.

Austin B. Webber v. John C. Donnelly. Error to Superior Court.

JOHN C. HOWLAND and MAYBURY & CONELY for plaintiff in error.

ATKINSON & ATKINSON for defendant in error.

Opinion by MARSTON, J.

Donnelly sued Webber in assumpsit to recover the amount of a draft drawn by Enwright & Kelley, of Chicago, upon Webber. The draft purported to have been accepted by one Henshaw. Defendant denied the authority of Henshaw to accept the draft and denied any subsequent ratification of his act. The court below found that Henshaw had no authority to accept the draft, but also found that the subsequent conversations and acts of Webber amounted to an assent or ratification of Henshaw's act.

Held, That there being evidence tending to show such ratification the question whether it was sufficient to establish that fact is not for this court to determine, but is one addressed to the court below, and the conclusion there arrived at as to the weight of the evidence is conclusive.

It appeared that C. S. Parsons called upon the defendant and presented the draft to him for payment. Upon cross-examination he was asked, "By whose authority did you call upon him?" This was aked to prove plaintiff was not a bona fide holder. It was objected to and excluded. Atkinson was also asked as a witness, "How did he (Kelley) come to turn it (the draft) over to you?" which was also excluded on objection. The court, however, found that plaintiff was not a bona fide holder.

Held, That this finding cured any error in excluding the evidence.

The court below found that Enwright & Kelley, prior to and on February 22, 1875, were copartners in the business of selling spirituous and intoxicating liquors at wholesale in Chicago; that Webber, during the same time and till May, 1875, was engaged in a similar business at Detroit; that on February 22, 1875, Webber at Detroit sent by mail to Enwright & Kelley at Chicago an order for five barrels of whisky, who in pursuance of the order shipped the goods to Webber, delivering them to the Michigan Central Railroad Company at Chicago, to be conveyed in the ordinary course to defendant at Detroit; that the goods were so conveyed and received by defendant and entered into and became part of his stock in trade and that the same were spirituous and intoxicating liquors; that for a long time prior to this order Webber had purchased such liquors of Enwright & Kelley; that the contracts for such purchases had been generally made with Kelley in person, at Webber's store, and that Kelley had on several occasions been at Webber's store when his liquors were sold and knew his course of trade. Defendant offered to show that Enwright & Kelley sold these liquors to Webber in the ordinary course of business transactions with Webber, and that they knew that Webber was a dealer in spirituous and intoxicating liquors here contrary to the laws of Michigan. This was objected to and excluded.

Held, 1. That the contract entered into between the parties was made in Illinois and that such contract must be presumed to be valid in that State, no showing to the contrary having been made.

Held, 2. That the undoubted weight of authority is that mere knowledge by the vendor that the vendee at the time of the purchase of property intends to use it for an illegal purpose, will not prevent his recovering from the vendor the value of the property.

Held, 3. That the contract here in question is not malum in se, and not being shown to be malum prohibitum, but being presumptively valid where made, the same reasoning will not apply as would be applicable to a contract malum in se; and reference is made to Tracy v. Tallmadge, 14 N. Y., 162, and Hill v. Spear, 50 N. H., 253, as covering the whole ground.

Andrew Crawford v. William Edwards, et al. Appeal in Chancery from Berrien Circuit.

POTTER & POTTER for complainant.

MUZZY & GILBERT for defendants.

Opinion by Marston, J.:

This was a foreclosure bill. The case raises the question of the position of one who accepts a deed which is made expressly subject to a prior mortgage and which he therein stipulates to pay as part of the consideration of the deed.

Held, 1. That the acceptance of such a deed binds the grantee as effectually as though the deed had been inter partes and had been executed by both grantor and grantee, and is tantamount to an express agreement to assume and pay the mortgage.

Held, 2. That this case differs from that of a conveyance of property simply subject to the mortgage and that in the latter case the property would be made primarily liable for the debt, but the grantee would not have assumed and would not be personally liable for its payment.

Held, 3. That where such a grantee assumes and expressly agrees to pay the mortgage and the amount of the mortgage is deducted from the purchase price of the land, his obligation to pay enures in equity to the benefit of the mortgagee, who may enforce it against such grantee in a bill to foreclose his mortgage.

Held, 4. That the mortgagor's personal liability to his mortgagee would not be discharged by the acceptance of such a deed, except at the option of the mortgagee, but the latter may treat both the mortgagor and his grantee under such a deed as principal debtors to him and have a personal decree against either or both.

The grantee in this case insists that he had no knowledge that the deed contained such agreement and did not accept it, and that, owing to a mistake in the description of the premises in his deed, he obtained no title by it to the lands mortgaged, and ought not to be held responsible.

Held, That the evidence satisfactorily shows that he did accept the deed and knew of its contents, and that though by reason of the mistake he obtained no legal title to the premises, he did thereby obtain possession of the same, with the right to have the mistake corrected, and that if he did not avail himself of that right, but permitted a conveyance to a third person in order to cut off the mortgage, a court of equity will not step in and sanction and complete the transaction thus fraudulently commenced in order that a party to the fraud may thereby make a gain.

It is also urged that as there was a like mistake in the deed to the mortgagor, so that he got no title to the lands for the purchase price of which the note and mortgage were given, and that therefore the note and mortgage were without consideration and could not be enforced against the mortgagor; and that consequently his grantee under a deed containing a stipulation to assume and pay the mortgage is entitled to the benefit of this defense.

Held, That a similar theory was set up in Comstock v. Smith, 26 Mich., 321, and was held no defense, and that case disposes of this question.

Decree below reversed and decree entered here in favor of complainant and against defendant, William Edwards, personally, with costs of both courts.

HIRAM M. CHASE.

MEETING OF THE BAR.

According to previous notice a Bar meeting in memory of Hiram M. Chase, whose death we announced in our last issue, was held Saturday afternoon in the rooms of the Chicago Law Institute. The meeting was fully attended, and those present were deeply impressed by the death which had so unexpectedly called them together. William P. Black was chosen chairman, and Franklin Denison secretary.

The chairman, Judge Van Buren, E. W. Evans, Gen. R. W. Smith, and Rufus King addressed the meeting and spoke feelingly of their friendship for the deceased, and gave just tribute, by their remarks, to his high character as a lawyer and a man.

Gen. R. W. Smith, M. F. Tuley, and W. H. King were appointed a Committee on Resolutions, and presented the following, which were unanimously adopted:

WHEREAS, It has pleased the "Judge of all the Earth" to summon from among us our friend and brother, Hiram M. Chase, in the prime of his life, and the noon-time of his hopes and usefulness; therefore,

Resolved, That in the death of Brother Chase the Bar has lost one of its valued members, the community a good citizen and worthy man, and his family a faithful husband and loving father.

Resolved, That in his fidelity to his clients, his integrity and devotion to his profession, he has filled up the measure of a just lawyer and an honest man, and left us an example well worthy of imitation.

Resolved, That we mourn with his family in their affliction, and tender them our warmest sympathy in this their sad bereavement.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be furnished his family, and that they be presented to each of the courts of this city with the request that they be spread upon their records.

The following gentlemen respectively were designated to present the resolutions adopted to the courts of record in this city: Circuit Courts, E. W. Evans; Superior Court, E. Van Buren; United States Court, Robert Hervey; County Court, R. W. Smith.

JUDGE T. F. TIPTON, of McLean county, was nominated for Congress by the Republican convention held at Lincoln, Ill., on the 30th ballot. We think the Judge has made a mistake. He was popular with the bar as a judge, and could undoubtedly have held that position as long as he desired. A Congressman's term is only for two years, and it is a very uncertain office. A man may be honest and do his duty faithfully for the two years, and at the expiration of the term be repudiated by the politicians, and turned out because he has refused to use his influence to have their corrupt tools appointed to Federal offices.

THE EVANS-CALLAGHAN QUO WARRANTO.—Judge MOORE filed in the Criminal Court, on yesterday, an elaborate opinion in the case of the People ex. rel. Michael Evans v. Bernard Callaghan, being a petition for leave to file an information in the nature of a quo warranto against the defendant to determine his right to hold the office of Collector of the town of South Chicago. The Court refused to grant the petitioner leave to file the information. Mr. M. W. Fuller, counsel for Evans, prayed an appeal to the Supreme Court. which was granted on condition that a bond in the sum of $200 be filed in twenty days.

THE will of A. T. Stewart, the late merchant prince of New York, is to be contested. In many cases if men could only know how their relatives would fight for their property after their death, they would be their own executors and dispose of their property while living. How much good Mr. Stewart could have done for poor suffering humanity while living.

RELIGIOUS AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION.—The article in the New York Independent, by Dr Speer, discussing the question of adding a religious amendment to the Federal Constitution, so nearly expresses our views that we republish it entire. UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT.

No. 147.—OCTOBER TERM, 1875.

WILLIAM BARNES, Plaintiff in Error,
v.
THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

In Error to the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia.

LIABILITY OF CITIES FOR INJURIES CAUSED BY THE NEGLIGENCE OF BOARDS OF SUCH CITIES.

1. LIABILITY OF A MUNICIPAL CORPORATION FOR NEGLIGENCE.—Held, that a municipal corporation is liable for an injury to an individual, arising from negligence in the construction of a work authorized by it.
2. BOARD OF PUBLIC WORKS OF DISTRICT.—That the Board of Public Works of the District of Columbia, is invested with the entire control and regulation of the repair of streets and alleys, by the legislative Assembly or by Congress. That they may disburse all the moneys appropriated for the improvement of streets, etc.
3. FEE IN UNITED STATES.—That the fee of the streets is in the United States, and not in the munipal corporation, is not material to this case.
4. LIABILITY OF DISTRICT.—That the District of Columbia is liable to a party injured through the negligence of the Board of Public Works in not keeping the streets of the city of Washington in repair.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

Mr. Justice HUNT delivered the opinion of the court.

This is an action to recover damages for a personal injury received by the plaintiff on the 14th of October, 1871, in consequence of the defective condition of one of the streets in the city of Washington. The accident occurred on K street east, and arose from the construction of the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad through that street. The road was built by permission of the corporation, and authority was given to the road to change the grade of the streets according to a plan filed. In making this change, a deep pit or excavation was made, into which the plaintiff fell. The injury to the plaintiff, the defective condition of the street, and the negligence of those having it in charge, are not before us. These questions were submitted to the jury, and the jury have found the issue upon each of them in favor of the plaintiff The verdict of the jury, by which they awarded to the plaintiff the sum of three thousand five hundred dollars as damages, besides his costs, and the judgment thereon, were set aside by the general term of the district, and judgment ordered in favor of the defendant. From this judgment the present writ of error was brought.

The municipal corporation, "the District of Columbia," was organized under the act of Congress of February 21st. 1871. (16 Stat. at Large, 419.)

[We omit to give here about three pages of the opinion, which are devoted to the acts of Congress relating to the District of Columbia, stating how a municipal corporation may act, and the powers of the Board of Public Works. The opinion concludes as follows:

1. The four persons composing this board are nominated by the President, and hold their offices for a fixed period of time. They cannot be removed except by the President of the United States. The same thing is true of the governor and of the secretary of the District, except that as to them there is no power of removal. Each is appointed in the same manner, and holds until the expiration of his term and until his successor is qualified. The same is true, also, of the members of the council, except that their term is of shorter duration. It is true, also, in relation to the house of delegates, except that they are elected by the people and hold their offices for a fixed term of one year. We have already endeavored to show that it is quite immaterial, on the question whether this board is a municipal agency, from what source the power comes to these officers, whether by appointment of the President or by the legislative assembly or by election.

2. This board is invested with the entire control and regulation of the repair of streets and alleys, and all other works which may be entrusted to their charge by the legislative assembly or Congress. They shall disburse all the money appropriated by the legislative assembly or by Congress, or collected from property-holders for the improvement of streets and alleys.

It is to be noticed here, that the municipal corporation, as represented by the legislative assembly, may impose upon this board such other duties as they think proper. The board is to perform "all other work entrusted to their charge by the legislative assembly or Congress." In this respect, certainly, it is not an independent body. It is subject to two masters, either of whom may impose upon it any other work it may choose, and which work it is bound to perform. Its dependence upon Congress and upon the legislative assembly in this respect rests upon the same basis. It will not be claimed by anyone that it is not subject to the control of Congress and dependent upon that body.

3. The board shall disburse all moneys appropriated by the United States to the District of Columbia, or collected from property-holders for improvements of streets or alleys. In doing the two acts here first specified the board again acts as the hand and agent of the United States or of the district, as the case may be.

4. On or before the first Monday of each year, the board is required to make a report of their transactions during the preceding year, to each branch of the legislative assembly, and also to the President, to be placed before Congress by him. This duty is also an indication of their subordination equally to Congress and to the legislative assembly. The powers given to this board are not of a character belonging to independent officers, but rather those which indicate that it is the representative of the municipal corporation.

Notwithstanding these features, and notwithstanding we find this power given by the act which creates the municipality, and that this is one of the powers ordinarily belonging to a municipal government, and although the manner of its bestowal and the selection of the agents who exercise it are similar to that of the other appointees and agents of the municipal corporation, it is still contended that no liability exists on the part of the corporation to compensate the plaintiff for his injuries.

It is denied that a municipal corporation (as distinguished from a corporation organized for private gain) is liable for the injury to an individual arising from negligence in the construction of a work authorized by it. Some cases hold that the adoption of a plan of such a work is a judicial act, and if injury arises from the mere execution of that plan no liability exists. (Child v. Boston, 4 Allen, 41; Thayer v. Boston, 19 Pick., 511.) Other cases hold that for its negligent execution of a plan good in itself, or for mere negligence in the care of its streets or other works, a municipal corporation cannot be charged. City of Detroit v. Blackely, 21 Mich. R., 84, is of the latter class, where it was held that the city was not liable for an injury arising from its neglect to keep its sidewalks in repair.

The authorities establishing the contrary doctrine, and that a city is responsible for its mere negligence, are so numerous and so well considered that the law must be deemed to be settled in accordance with them. (English Authorities.—Mayor v. Henley, 2 Cl. & Fin., 331; Mersey Docks v. Gibbs; Same v. Penhallow, 1 H. Ld. Cas., N. S., 93; 1 H. & N., 439; Lan. S; McCombs v. Akron, 15 Oh., 476; Rhodes v. Cleveland, 10 Ib., 159.)

And here a distinction is to be noted between the liability of a municipal corporation, made such by acceptance of a village or city charter, and the involuntary quasi corporations known as counties, towns, school districts, and especially the townships of New England. The liability of the former is greater than that of the latter, even when invested with corporate capacity and the power of taxation. (1 Dillon, §§ 10, 11, 13; 2d, § 761.)

The latter are auxiliaries of the State merely, and when corporations, are of the very lowest grade and invested with the smallest amount of power. Accordingly, in Conrad v. Ithaca, 16 N. Y., 158, the village was held to be liable for the negligence of their trustees, while in Weet v. Brockport, the town was said not to be liable for the same acts by their commissioners of highways. (Ib., 163, 4, 9; see "Brooks' Abridgement," "Action on the Case;" Russell v. Men of Devon, 2 T. R., 308, and cases there cited; 16 N. Y., supra.)

Whether this distinction is based upon sound principle or not, it is so well settled that it cannot be disturbed. Decisions or analogies derived from this source are of little value in fixing the liability of a city or a village. (See Dillon, supra.)

Again: It is contended that the board of public works of the District of Columbia is an independent body, acting for itself, not forming a part of the corporation, and that the corporation is not responsible for its acts. We have analyzed the power of this body in a previous part of this opinion, and have set out in full the language of the 37th section.

Upon this point, also, we are able to derive assistance from the adjudged cases.

The case of Bailey v. Mayor, in the Supreme court of New York, 3 Hill, 531, and again in the court of Errors, 2 Denio, 431, is a leading authority upon this question. In the year 1834 the legislature of the State of New York passed an act "to provide for supplying the city of New York with pure and wholesome water." —(Sess. Laws, 1834, p. 531.) The act provided that the governor should appoint five persons, to be known as water commissioners, whose duty it was made to examine all matters relative to that subject (§ 2); to employ such engineers as they should deem necessary (§ 3); to adopt such plan as they should deem most advantageous for procuring such supply of water; to ascertain the amount of money needed for the purpose, and to make conditional contracts for the purchase of lands required, subject to the ratification of the common council of New York (§ 4). The plan, the estimate of the expense, the conditional contracts, and all other matters connected therewith were to be presented by the commissioners to the common council of New York, (§§ 5 6,) who were directed to submit the plan to the electors of New York for their rejection or approval (§ 7). If approved, the council were to direct the commissioners to proceed with the work, and the council was authorized to raise by loan $2,500,000, which money was to be applied to the purposes of the act "by or under the direction of the commissioners" (§ 11). The commissioners were authorized to enter upon lands, agree for their purchase or take measures for their condemnation, (§§ 12, 13, 14,) and to use the ground or soil under any street or highway within the State for the purpose of introducing the water (§ 15). The commissioners were authorized to draw on the city comptroller for all sums due for the purchase of lands, and sums due to contractors, and for their own incidental expenses, and the payments were required to be reported to the council once in every six months.

Under this statute a plan was prepared and approved by the citizens of New York, money was raised, and the work was entered upon. It was proved that the commissioners entered into a contract with Crandall & Van Zandt for building a dam across the Croton river, which was about forty miles from the city of New York and in another county, in pursuance of the plan adopted. The plaintiff offered also to prove that it was so negligently and carelessly constructed, that upon the occurrence of a freshet in 1841 it was swept away and the property of the plaintiff, real and personal, situate on both sides of the river below the dam, was destroyed to the value of $60,000. The circuit judge rejected the evidence and directed the plaintiff to be non-suited. The case was carried to the Supreme court, where the non-suit was set aside. The judgment was delivered by Nelson, Ch. J., whose opinion opens in these words: "The principal ground taken at the circuit against this action, and the one upon which it was understood the cause there turned, was that the defendants were not chargeable for negligence or unskillfulness in the construction of the dam in question, inasmuch as the water commissioners were not appointed by them nor subject to their direction or control." The learned judge repudiates the argument arising from the fact that the commissioners were appointed by the State; that the defendants had no control over their actions; that they were bound to employ them and submit to the independent exercise of their control. He held that the commissioners were the agents of the city, and that the latter was responsible for their negligent conduct.

The case was then carried to the court of Errors of the State of New York, (2 Denio, 433,) where the judgment of the Supreme court was affirmed. Chancellor Walworth bases his opinion of affirmance chiefly upon the fact that the city was the owner of the land on which the dam was built, and, therefore, liable for the negligent conduct of those who built it. Senators Hand, Bockee, and Barlow base their judgments of affirmance on the ground that the commissioners were the agents of the city. Gardner, lieutenant-governor, delivered an able dissenting opinion.

This case is nearer to the one we are considering than any other reported in the books. The struggle in the New York courts was between the dictates of that evident justice and good sense which required that the city should indemnify a sufferer for the loss arising from the acts of those doing a work under its authority and for its benefit, and the technical rule which exempted it from liability for acts of officers not under its control or appointed by it.

If these courts had had before them the additional facts which exist in this case, to wit, that in the very statute which made the city of New York a municipal corporation these persons had been appointed to do everything necessary to be done respecting the care and improvement of the streets, being invested with their exclusive control; that without that body, and two other equally independent bodies, to wit, the mayor and the legislative assembly, neither of them being declared in words to be parts of the municipal body, the municipal corporation had no one part of an organized existence, we think they would have arrived at the same conclusion, but would have found less difficulty in choosing a ground on which to place their judgment.

In the case before us we think that Congress intended to make the board of public works a portion of the municipal corporation. The governor, or mayor, as he would ordinarily be called, represented the executive department; the legislative assembly, like a common council, had the exclusive authority to pass all laws or ordinances upon the large class of subjects committed to its charge, with certain specified restrictions; and to the board of public works, like an ordinary agent of the corporation, was given the exclusive control of the streets and alleys. Names are not things. Perhaps there is no restriction on the power of Congress to create a State within the limits of the District of Columbia, but it does not make an organization a State to call its mayor a governor, or its common council a legislative assembly, or its superintendent of streets a board of public works, especially when the statute by which they are created opens with a declaration of its intention to create a municipal corporation. We take the body thus organized to be a municipal corporation, and that its parts are composed of the members referred to, and we hold, therefore, that the proceedings by that body, in the repair and improvement of the street, out of which the accident in question arose, are the proceedings of the municipal corporation. That in such case the corporation is responsible we have already cited the authorities to show.

No doubt there are authorities holding views not in all respects in harmony with those we have expressed. Among these are Thayer v. Boston, 19 Pick., 510; Walcott v. Swampscott, 1 Allen, 101; Child v. Boston, 4 Allen, 41. The first of these cases holds that a city corporation is liable in tort provided the act is done by the authority and order of the city government, or those branches of the government invested with authority to act for the corporation; but that it must appear that the act was done by the express authority of the city, or bona fide in pursuance of a general authority on the subject. To this we assent. Walcott v. Swampscott was an action against a town. The surveyor of highways employed one O'Grady to drive a horse and cart with a load of gravel for the repair of a highway, and while thus engaged he came in collision with the plaintiff. The town was held not to be liable, on the theory that the surveyor was not an agent or servant of the town, but an independent officer appointed to perform a public duty in which the town had no interest. In Child v. The City of Boston it was held that the city was not responsible for any deficiency in the plan of drainage adopted by the city, although the plaintiff was injured thereby; that the duty in this respect was of a quasi judicial nature, involving discretion, and depending upon public considerations; that in this they acted not as agents of the city, but as public officers. In this respect the case is in hostility to Roc. White Lead Co. v. Rochester, 3 N. Y., 463, where the city was held liable because it constructed a sewer which was not of sufficient capacity to carry off the water draining into it. The work was well done, but the adoption and carrying out of the plan was held to be an act of negligence. The Boston case, however, held that if a sewer, originally well constructed, becomes defective by reason of low lands being filled up so that the outflow is obstructed, it becomes the duty of the city so to extend the sewer that its efficiency should be restored, and that for a failure to do so it becomes liable to those whose property was injured by the overflow of the sewer. In its practical results this is one of the strongest cases to be found in favor of municipal liability.

We do not perceive that the circumstance that the fee of the streets is in the United States, and not in the municipal corporation, is material to the case. In the most of the cities of this country the fee of the land belongs to the adjacent owner, and upon the discontinuance of the street the possession would revert to him. The streets and avenues in Washington have been laid out and opened by competent authority. The power and the duty to repair them is undoubted, and would be no different were the streets the absolute property of the corporation. The only questions can be as to the particular person or body by which the power shall be exercised, and how far the liability of the city extends.

The judgment of the general term is reversed, and the case is remanded to the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, with directions to affirm the judgment of the special term upon the verdict.

Dissenting, Mr. Justice SWAYNE and Mr. Justice STRONG.

FIELD, J.—I dissent from the judgment in this case. I do not think the District of Columbia should be held responsible for the neglect and omission of officers whom it has no power to select or control.

Mr. Justice BRADLEY concurs in this dissent.

UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT.

No. 710.—OCTOBER TERM, 1875.

THE TOWN OF ELMWOOD, Plaintiff in Error,
v.
GEORGE O. MARCY.

In Error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Illinois.

RAILROAD AID BONDS—TOWNSHIP OF ELMWOOD—WHEN THE DECISIONS OF THE SUPREME COURT OF A STATE WILL BE FOLLOWED.

1. RAILROAD AID BONDS.—Held, that under the facts in this case, and the legislation of Illinois applicable to them, there existed no power and lawful authority to issue the bonds and coupons in controversy, so as to render them valid and collectible in the hands of the plaintiff below.

2. LAWS OF 1869.—The court construes several sections of the laws of Illinois, of 1869, relating to the power of towns and cities to subscribe for railroad stock and issue bonds.

3. CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISION AND DECISIONS.—The court cites the Illinois opinions which hold that the clause of the Constitution under consideration, is a limitation upon the power of the legislature to grant the right of corporate or local taxation to any other persons than the corporate or local authorities of the municipality or district to be taxed, and that the legislature could not compel a municipal corporation, without its consent, to issue bonds or incur a debt for a merely corporate purpose.

4. POWER OF LEGISLATURE.—That it is not competent for the legislature to single out the supervisor and town clerk, and confer on them, powers which the Constitution limits to the corporate authorities as an aggregate body.

5. WHEN STATE DECISIONS WILL BE FOLLOWED.—That the decisions of the Supreme Court of Illinois adjudged that these bonds are void, and there being no conflict in the decisions of the Illinois Supreme Court, these decisions are binding upon the court. That the Federal Supreme Court has always followed the decisions of the highest court of a state in the construction of its own Constitution and laws. That it is only where they have differed, that, in cases like this, the court has adopted the rule, and followed the first and rejected the last.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

Mr. Justice DAVIS delivered the opinion of the court.

The judges of the Circuit court were divided in opinion whether under the facts of this case and the legislation of Illinois applicable to them, there existed power and lawful authority to issue the bonds and coupons in controversy, so as to render them valid and collectible, in the hands of the plaintiff below, who is defendant here. Judgment was rendered in his favor, and the cause is brought here for review. From the certificate of division it appears that the Dixon, Peoria and Hannibal Railroad Company, was incorporated March 5th, 1867, that prior to February 11th, 1869, the road of said company was located in said township of Elmwood; that at the date last named, an election was called under the provisions of the charter of said company, to be held on March 16th, 1869, to determine whether said township would subscribe to the stock of said company and give its bonds for $35,000, the maximum amount permitted by law; that five days afterwards, to wit, on the 16th of February, 1869, notice was given of another election, not purporting to be in pursuance of said charter, to be held at the same time and place with that aforesaid, to determine whether said township would subscribe to the stock of said company, and issue the bonds for a further sum, over and above the amount authorized by law as aforesaid; that said first named election resulted in favor of subscribing said $35,000, and the second named election resulted in favor of an additional subscription of $40,000; that after both said elections were notified, and seven days before they were held, viz: on the 9th of March, 1869, the charter of said company was amended so as to authorize towns in which said road might be thereafter located, to vote and subscribe $100,000 to its capital stock. Also that thirty-two days after said election, viz: on the 17th day of April, 1869, the legislature passed a validating act, and that ten days thereafter, on the 27th of that month, the supervisor and town clerk issued the bonds and coupons, contemplated by both elections. It legalized and confirmed the subscription for $40,000 to the capital stock of the company over and above that for $35,000, which was confessedly legal and made in accordance with the provisions of the original charter. The bonds in suit are part of those issued for the greater sum, and the question is, whether they are binding on the town.

They have been the subject of litigation in Marshall v. Silliman, 61 Illinois, 218, and Wiley v. Silliman, 62 Id., 170. The last case involved the validity of the identical bonds in question here, but both were in all substantial particulars alike the only difference being that the act of March 9th, 1869, did not apply to the first case. They were bills in equity to enjoin the collection of taxes for the payment of interest, and the court decided that neither the law of March 9th nor the curative act of April 17th, gave any power to issue the bonds. In reaching that conclusion the opinion affirms that when the notice for the vote was posted, the charter of the company only authorized a subscription for $35,000, and that the notice under which the vote for $40,000 was taken, was a mere call for a special town meeting, signed only by twelve voters, which did not seek to follow the provisions of the charter, as, indeed, it could not do, since the power under them was already exhausted, and that it was an utterly void proceeding, and that law is disposed of in these words: "It is true that on the 9th of March, 1869, the legislature passed another act authorizing towns to subscribe $100,000, but a new notice was not given. The charter required twenty days' notice, and only seven intervened between the passage of the act and the vote."

It was insisted, however, that the curative act passed after the vote had been taken, gave validity to the bonds. On this position counsel placed their chief reliance, and to it the court directed its principal attention.

The act was direct and positive and left nothing to inference. It was intended so far as the legislature could do it, to make the bonds binding on the township, and collectible in the same manner, as if the subscription had been authorized by the charter, and voted for in accordance with its terms. The court held it to be a violation of the 5th section of the ninth article of the constitution of 1848, which declares "that the corporate authorities of counties, townships, school districts, cities, towns and villages, may be vested with power to assess and collect taxes for corporate purposes, such taxes to be uniform in respect to persons and property, within the jurisdiction of the body imposing the same." The decision was placed on the ground that this section having been intended as a limitation upon the law making power, the legislature could not grant the right of corporate taxation, to any but the corporate authorities, nor coerce a municipal corporation to incur a debt by the issue of its bonds for corporate purposes. In the opinion of the court the act was an effort to do both these things, as it attempted to confer the power of municipal taxation upon persons who were not by themselves, the corporate authorities in the sense of the Constitution, and to compel the town to issue its bonds for railroad stock, by declaring a said proceeding to be a valid subscription.

Counsel argued that the act might be treated as an authority to the supervisors and town clerk to issue the bonds without a vote of the people and cited, The Town of Keithsburg v. Frick, 34 Ind. 420, which recognizes that the legislature can constitutionally bestow upon the trustees of a town, the power if they think proper to exercise it, to subscribe for and take stock in a railroad company, without requiring the subject to be submitted to a vote of the people. The court adhering to the doctrine of that case, but distinguishing it from the one under consideration, said "that the town supervisor and clerk who issued the bonds in controversy, do not represent a township as the board of trustees represent an incorporated town, or the common council a city. The supervisor and town clerk are but a part of the corporation. They have no power of taxation, nor power of themselves to bind the city in any way," and cited Loovingston v. Wilder, 53 Id, 302, as authority on the subject. But even if these two officers could be recognized as the corporate authorities, the court observed, "that they cannot be said to have voluntarily incurred this debt in behalf of the town. The act gave them no discretion. It declared the subscription shall be binding and may be collected and left to the town authorities, only the ministerial function of executing the behest of the legislature."

The main doctrines of these cases were not new, but had been settled by the repeated adjudications of the Supreme Court, and that learned tribunal has given no decision in conflict with them.

In Howard v. The St. Clair Drainage Company, 53 Id., 130, the clause of the Constitution under consideration in Marshall v. Silleman, and Wiley v. Silliman, was construed to be a limitation upon the power of the legislature to grant the right of corporate or local taxation to any other persons than the corporate or local authorities of the municipality or district to be taxed. To the same effect are Hessler v. Drainage Company, 53 Id., 110, and Lovingston v. Wilder, Id., 302. The people ex rel., etc., v. The Mayor of Chicago, 51 Id., 30, decides that the legislature could not compel a municipal corporation, without its consent, to issue bonds or incur a debt for a merely corporate purpose.

So far as we can see, the only new point determined in the cases we have first cited, is that it is not competent for the legislature to single out the supervisor and town clerk, and confer on them powers which the Constitution limits to the corporate authorities as an aggregate body.

We are not called upon to vindicate the decisions of the Supreme Court of Illinois in these cases, nor to approve the reasoning by which it reached its conclusions; and if the questions before us had never been passed upon by it, some of my brethren who agree to this opinion, might take a different view of them. But are not these decisions binding upon us in the present controversy? They adjudge that the bonds are void, because the laws which authorized their issue, were in violation of a peculiar provision of the Constitution of Illinois. We have always followed the highest court of the State in its construction of its own Constitution and laws. It is only where they have been construed differently at different times, that in cases like this, we have adopted as a rule of action, the first decision, and rejected the last. This has been done on the ground that rights acquired on the strength of the former decisions, ought not to be lost by a change of opinion in the court. But where the construction has been fixed by an unbroken series of decisions, the Federal courts accept and apply it in cases before them. If a different rule were observed, it is not difficult to see that great mischief would ensue.

There has been no conflict of judicial opinion in Illinois, on the controlling question in this suit; but, on the contrary, settled uniformity, and as these concurring decisions of the court of last resort in that State, are grounded upon the construction of its Constitution and statutes, it is the duty of this court to conform to them.

The judgment is reversed, and new trial ordered.

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

OPINION FILED JAN. 21, 1876.

GOLDIE v. MCDONALD.

FILING AFFIDAVIT OF MERITS.—An affidavit of claim filed more than ten days prior to the commencement of the term at which the declaration is filed, will be regarded as having been filed with the declaration.

CERTIFICATE OF NOTARY AMENDABLE.—A certificate of a notary, in a foreign State, to an affidavit of claim, may be amended. The law presumes a defendant is a resident of the county in which he is served with process.

Opinion by SCOTT, C. J.

The amendments permitted to be made to the pleadings in this case, were all within the discretion of the court. An affidavit of claim filed more than ten days before the convening of the court, for the term at which the declaration is filed, will be regarded as having been filed "with the declaration," within the meaning of the statute on that subject. R. S., 1874, p. 779, sec. 37.

It was proper for the court to permit the additional certificate of the notary public to be filed, showing that under the laws of the State of Wisconsin, he had authority to administer oaths. The amendment to the certificate of the notary to the affidavit of claim, it being under his official seal, made it prima facie evidence under the statute, that the oath required by law to be made, was taken before such officer. R. S., 1874, Sec. 6.

Although allowed five days for that purpose, defendant filed no affidavit of merits with his plea, and hence, under the statute, it was properly stricken from the files and judgment rendered against him as upon default.

It will be presumed defendant was a resident of the county in which he was served with process, within the meaning of the statute, under which plaintiff's damages were assessed, until, in some appropriate manner, it is made to appear from the evidence, he was not a resident of the county in which he was served, and in which the action was pending. R. S., 1874, p. 779, Sec. 37.

The judgment of the court below must be affirmed.

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

OPINION FILED JANUARY 21, 1876.

TOWN OF PARTRIDGE v. JOHN SNYDER.

Appeal from Woodford.

APPEALS FROM JUSTICES—SUITS TO RECOVER FINES—BY WHOM APPEAL.

1. APPEAL SUIT TO RECOVER PENALTY.—That a suit to recover a penalty before a justice of the peace, is a civil and not a criminal proceeding, and an appeal from a judgment of a justice of the peace, in such a suit, may be taken to the Circuit Court by either party. That an appeal is allowed in such cases, under the general statute allowing appeals from justices of the peace, although the statute which prescribes the fine or forfeiture for the offense, is silent as to an appeal.

2. CIVIL PROCEEDINGS.—That suits for the violation of town or city ordinances are civil proceedings.

3. SUITS IN NAME OF TOWNSHIP—APPEAL BOND.—That in suits brought in the name of the town, the appeal bond should be executed by the supervisor, in the name of the town.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

Opinion by SHELDON, J.

This was a proceeding commenced before a justice of the peace by the Town of Partridge, on the complaint of William Crank, one of the commissioners of highways of the town, to recover a penalty for obstructing a public highway. A trial was had, resulting in a verdict and judgment for the defendant. An appeal was taken to the Circuit Court, where, on motion of the appellee, the appeal was dismissed, from which judgment of dismissal this appeal was taken.

The main question presented is, whether an appeal lay in this case from the judgment of the justice of the peace to the Circuit Court.

The general statute in relation to justices and constables, (Rev. Stat., 1874, Ch. 79), confers jurisdiction upon justices of the peace "in all cases where the action of debt or assumpsit will lie, if the damages claimed do not exceed $200," and provides that, "appeals from judgments of justices of the peace to the Circuit Court, shall be granted in all cases except on judgment confessed."

In Edwards v. Vandemack, 13 Ill., 633, and Ward v. The People, Ib., 635, it was held that under a similar provision for an appeal in the former statute, this right of appeal did not apply to judgments rendered by justices of the peace in criminal prosecutions, for fines and penalties, for crimes or misdemeanors, and in the latter case it was decided that an appeal did not lie from the judgment of a justice of the peace for a penalty under the "act to prohibit the retailing of intoxicating drinks." Approved, April 18th, 1851.

This was in 1852. The provision of the former statute, then in force, granting jurisdiction, although similar, was somewhat different from that of the present statute, it being "for all debts or demands claimed to be due, in which the action of debt or assumpsit will lie."

After these decisions, the legislature, by an act approved February 9, 1853, granted the right of appeal from a justice of the peace, mayor of a city, or other officer, in all cases of fines and penalties.

This last law remained until the revision of 1874, when it was repealed. (Rev. Stat. 1874, p. 1019, Sec. 204), and no provision of a like nature re-enacted.

It is contended then, that the decision in Edwards v Vandemack, and Ward v. The People, apply here in full force, and govern and are conclusive against the right of appeal, in this case, from the justice of the peace. As to its comiug within the bearing of those decisions, it becomes important to inquire into the character of this proceeding, as to whether it is a criminal prosecution or for an offense criminal in its nature, or but a civil suit. The penalty sued for is under Sec. 58, of the act in relation to "Roads and Bridges," Rev. Stat. 1874, p. 921, which provides, that if any person shall obstruct a public road, etc., he shall forfeit for every such offense, a sum not less than $3 nor more than $10, and an additional sum for every day he shall suffer the obstruction to remain after notice to remove it, complaint to be made by any person feeling himself aggrieved. Various other penalties are imposed by the act. It provides, that all suits for the recovery of any fine or penalty under the act, shall be brought in the name of the town, etc., that all fines recovered under the provisions of the act shall be paid over to the commissioners of highways to be expended upon roads and bridges; and that justices of the peace shall have jurisdiction in all cases arising under the act, where the penalty does not exceed their jurisdiction.

In Webster v. The People, 14 Ill., 365, it was held, that actions of debt to enforce a statute penalty, are not necessarily criminal prosecutions; and an action of debt for the recovery of the penalty of $100 imposed by the statute for hawking and peddling without license, was there held not to be a criminal prosecution, either in form or substance. And as denoting it not to be such, it was remarked that it was not an offense at common law, nor indictable under the statute; that in form, it was an action of debt, and not a criminal prosecution; that it was not required to be brought and carried on in the name of the people of the State of Illinois, as all criminal prosecutions must be; that the violation of the statute for which the action was given was not made a misdemeanor; that no fine was inflictad, but simply a penalty imposed. And a contrast was drawn between that case, and the one of Ward v. The People; and as marking the latter as a criminal proceeding, it was dwelt upon, that the offense there, was made expressly indictable by statute, and a specific fine was imposed, which might be recovered either by indictment or as action of debt; that the statute had made the offense a misdemeanor, and although the fine might be recovered in a civil form of action, yet the offense was criminal in its nature. The features which were thus considered to mark the case of Ward v. The People, as a criminal action, or one of a criminal nature, will be found to be absent in the case at bar, and that it has belonging to it the circumstances which were held to denote the case of Webster v. The People to be, in contra-distinction from the former, but a mere civil suit.

In Ewbanks v. Town of Asheley, 36 Ill., 177, it was said: "At common law, a penalty given by statute might be recovered in either an action of debt or assumpsit, in any court of general jurisdiction. Nor should such a penalty be recovered in a criminal proceeding." It has repeatedly been held by this court, that a proceeding to collect a penalty for the violation of a town ordinance, is a civil suit. That such a penalty cannot be recovered in any criminal proceeding. Town of Jacksonville v. Black, 36 Ill., 507; Granbrier v. City of Jacksonville, 50 Id., 87; Hoyer v. Town of Mascoutah, 59 Ill., 137.

It is argued that the repeal in the revision of 1874, of the act of February 9, 1853, giving the right of appeal from the judgments of justices of the peace in cases of fines and penalties, conclusively shows the intention of the legislature that there should be no appeal in such cases. In that revision are numerous acts wherein penalties are imposed for the violation of their provisions, and jurisdiction in suits for their recovery is conferred upon justices of the peace, but there is granted no right of appeal unless the general law allowing appeals applies. It can hardly be supposed to have been the intention of the legislature to take away the right of appeal in all those cases. In the one act concerning "Railroads and Warehouses" in the Revised Statutes of 1874, may be found no less than nine different cases where penalties are imposed, and are recoverable before justices of the peace.

In section 94 of that act it is declared: "In all cases under the provisions of this act, the rules of evidence shall be the same as in other civil actions, except as herein otherwise provided," thus showing that the legislature regarded all these actions given in the act for penalties, as civil actions.

It may be, that the legislature in the repeal of the act of February 9, 1853, deemed it as needlessly cumbering the statute book—that the case was covered under the statute as now found, by the general provision for an appeal in all cases before a justice of the peace.

But whatever the legislative intention in such repeal, this is a civil action for the recovery of a penalty, and is not a criminal action, nor the case one of a criminal nature.

In the same statute, concerning justices of the peace, which gives them jurisdiction "in all cases where the action of debt or assumpsit will lie, if the damages claimed do not exceed $200," is the provision that "appeals shall be granted in all cases except on judgments confessed." This is a case of an action of debt or assumpsit for the recovery of a penalty; it plainly falls within the words of the general statutory provision, that "appeals shall be granted in all cases." And we do not know why the words should not be allowed to have their natural effect. If their generality is to have a limitation, it would seem, certainly, that they should embrace one of the cases which the same statute, in express terms, grants jurisdiction over, to justices of the peace. We are of opinion the right of appeal from the justice of the peace existed.

It is further insisted that appellant did not take any appeal from the justice of the peace to the Circuit court; and this because the appeal bond was executed by Crank, commissioner of highways of the town, instead of by the Town of Partridge. The bond should have been executed by the supervisors of the town in the name of the town. Gardner v. Town of Chambersburg, 19 Ill., 99. On leave for that purpose, appellant filed in the Circuit Court its appeal bond, executed in its name by the Supervisor of the town; and afterward on motion of appellee, the court dismissed the appeal.

In Hubbard v. Freer, 1 Scam., 469, it was said: "This court has frequently decided, that when an appeal bond is adjudged to be insufficient, the statute is imperative that the Circuit Court shall permit a good and sufficient bond to be filed; and in Waldo v. Averett, Ib., 489: "But if it is admitted that the bond was ever so defective, the court nevertheless erred in dismissing the appeal; it ought to have allowed the motion of appellant's to file a good bond." In Bragg v. Fessenden, 11 Ill., 544. "And whenever a party intends appealing, and makes such an attempt at the execution of a bond, that the officer authorized to approve it accepts the bond, it is not the design of the statute that the appellant should be prejudiced by any informality or deficiency of the bond." There, the agent of Bragg, attempted to take an appeal for the latter, from a justice of the peace by executing an appeal bond in the name of Bragg, on the 21st of July, 1849, without having any authority under seal to do so.

In November, 1849, Bragg executed and filed in the office of the clerk of the Circuit Court a power of attorney under seal, ratifying the act of the agent, in signing the appeal bond and taking the appeal. It was held that the bond filed had been made good by the ratification, although it was a long while after the expiration of the time for taking an appeal, and that it was error to dismiss the appeal for the insufficiency of the bond.

In Trustees of Schools v. Starbird, 13 Ill., 49, there was a judgment before a justice of the peace against the trustees of schools of a certain township. An appeal bond wes entered into by one of the trustees and approved by the clerk of the Circuit Court. It was held error to dismiss an application to amend the bond and to sustain a motion to dismiss the appeal; that the bond was defective because not executed by the corporation against which the judgment was rendered; but, that the court should have permitted the trustees to perfect the appeal by the execution of a bond obligatory on the corporation. It was said: "the trustees intended to take an appeal that would enable the corporation to have the case reheard, and for that purpose executed a bond which was approved and accepted by the clerk." The same may be said with regard to the action of Crank, the commissioner of highways here, and the approval and acceptance of his bond. The road and bridge act makes it the duty of the commissioners of highways to prosecute for all fines and penalties. Under the act, Crank, as commissioner of highways, had made the complaint in the case. The appeal purported, in the appeal bond, to be taken on behalf of the town.

Under the authorities cited, the allowance of the filing of the bond executed by the supervisor in the name of the town was clearly proper, and the appeal should not have been dismissed. The judgment will be reversed.

Judgment reversed.

CIRCUIT COURT OF COOK COUNTY, ILLINOIS.

OPINION, JUNE 5, 1876.

BEFORE MCALLISTER, WILLIAMS, ROGERS, BOOTH, AND FARWELL, JUDGES OF THE CIRCUIT COURT OF COOK CO., ILL.

WHO IS THE LEGAL MAYOR OF CHICAGO.

1. TERMS NOT EXTENDED.—The five Judges agree that Mr. Colvin's term, as Mayor, was not extended by the new charter.

2. MR. COLVIN'S TERM.—Three of the five Judges are of the opinion that Mr. Colvin has the right to hold over until his successor is legally elected and qualified, and that Mr. Hoyne's election was not a legal election.

3. ELECTION WITHOUT NOTICE, ETC.—Three of the Judges are of the opinion that the election for Mayor, at which Mr. Hoyne was elected, not having been called by the council, and no official notice of it having been given, that it was nugatory.

4. LEGALITY OF MR HOYNE'S ELECTION.—Two of the five Judges are of the opinion that Mr. Hoyne's election was legal, and that he is now the legal mayor of Chicago.

5. MAY CALL SPECIAL ELECTION.—Three of the five judges are of the opinion that the common council may call a special election to fill the vacancy in the office of Mayor.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

Majority opinion by MCALLISTER, J.

This is a proceeding by information in the nature of a quo warranto, instituted by Harvey D. Colvin as relator, against Thomas Hoyne, the respondent, charging the latter with having usurped and intruded himself into the office of Mayor of the city of Chicago.

The questions raised rise upon demurrer to relator's replication. The pleadings are unnecessarily voluminous, and we shall not attempt an analysis of them. The material facts evolved are few and free from complication. At a regular election under a former charter of the city, held Nov. 4, 1873, the relator was duly elected Mayor. His term of office was two years from the 1st day of December of that year, and until his successor should be elected and qualified.

On May 3, 1875, said city became reincorporated by virtue of an election under a general law of the State, which went into force July 1, 1872. By section 3 of that act, it was provided as follows: "If a majority of the votes cast at such election shall be for city organization under the general law, such city shall thenceforth be deemed to be organized under this act; and the city officers then in office shall, therefore, exercise the powers conferred upon like officers in this act until their successors are elected and qualified." The position was taken by counsel for relator in argument, that by force of that provision of the act, and others prescribing the time of election and term of office for Mayor, the relator, who held the office at the time of the reorganization in May, 1875, has conferred upon him a term which will not expire until 1877. If this position is well taken, then it would follow, of course, that no mayor could be legally elected in April, 1876, without the previous resignation of relator, of which there is no pretense in the case.

It is the opinion of the majority of the court, including the writer of this opinion, that that position is not tenable. After a full and careful consideration of all the provisions of the statutes of 1872, we are brought to these conclusions: That the vote to re-organize under that act, ipso facto, wiped out the term of Mayor under the act of 1863, and it is upon this ground, although the term of office under the act of 1872, is in duration the same under the charter of 1863, yet its commencement and close are at different points of time. By the old charter the term begins on the 1st day of December, whereas, by Section 486, the law of 1872, it is prescribed that: "A general election for city officers shall be held on the third Tuesday of April of each year," and by Section 49, that "At the general election held in 1873, and biennial thereafter, a Mayor shall be elected by each city." These provisions are clearly inconsistent with the act of 1873, and by the expressed declarations of Section 6 of the act of 1872 are, by the latter, repealed and there is nothing contained in any other provision tending to show a contrary intention. The office of Mayor is not a constitutional office; it is like all other offices of a municipality, the creature of the statute, and the same power which made can unmake or destroy. While the term under the former act was by the re-organization brought to a period, there is nothing in the statute of 1872 which, in the opinion of the majority of the court, can by construction be held to operate as a statutory investment of the Mayor in office at the time of the reorganization, with the term of office prescribed by the act under which the new incorporation was affected by the latter. The term of the office of Mayor commences from the day of general election in April, 1873, and in every two years thereafter. The re-organization took place in May, 1875. Now all there is upon the subject are the two lines at the close of Section 3, thus, "And the city officers then in office shall thereupon exercise the powers conferred upon like officers under this act." How long? Up to what time? Until the next general election for Mayor? No; but "until their successors shall be elected and qualified." This, in our view, means until a successor is elected and qualified under any power or authority conferred by that act, whether for a general or special election. The Mayor in office at the time becomes a Mayor locum tenens, as much as if the provision had said the comptroller then in office should exercise the powers and perform the duties of Mayor until the Mayor was elected and qualified.

The result of this view is that the term as such of the office of Mayor prescribed by the act of 1872 was not filled by the relator—that he had no term. His term for which he was elected was brought to a period by the reorganization, and the law which created it repealed by that failure, and the law under which it was accomplished He was nevertheless authorized to exercise the powers of the office, by the mere force of the statute, until his successor was elected and qualified. Such a declaration implies, of course, that a successor shall be legally elected. From this view it follows—and a majority of the court hold—that from the time of the reorganization in May, 1875, there was a vacancy as respects the term of the Mayor prescribed by the act of 1872. And we are now brought to the main question in this case. Assuming that there was a vacancy, was the supposed election of the respondent in April, 1876, under the provisions of the act of 1872, and the circumstances set forth in the record, a legal election, or was it altogether nugatory and void, for want of the requisite legal authority to hold it? In determining these questions we start with the assumption that there was a vacancy. Then it may be asked, what difficulties do you find in your way to the conclusion that the election held in April, 1876, when the respondent was the only candidate, was legal and valid? We answer, many and insuperable difficulties, if the city of Chicago is to be governed by law.

Section 15 is as follows: "Whenever a vacancy shall happen in the office of Mayor, when the unexpired term shall be one year or over from the date when the vacancy occurs, it shall be filled by an election." If, therefore, the vacancy occurred, as a majority of the court hold, at the reorganization, and taking into consideration the term, as prescribed by the act of 1872, the unexpired term was over a year, and could be filled, especially while it remained over a year, only by an election. Section 61 reads thus: "If there is a failure to elect any officer herein required to be elected, or the person elected should fail to qualify, the City Council or Board of Trustees may forthwith order a new election therefor; and in all cases when necessary for the purposes of this act may call special elections, appoint judges and clerks thereof, canvas the returns thereof, and provide by ordinance for the mode of conducting the same, and shall give notice of such special election, in which shall be stated the question to be voted upon, and cause such notices to be published or posted for the same length of time and in the same manner as is required in the case of a regular annual election in such cities or villages."

Now, instead of the City Council ordering or calling such an election for Mayor, it expressly refused to do so, and in the official notice of election for the general election in April, 1876, at which the supposed election of respondent was had, the office of Mayor was not included. So that the question is fairly raised, whether the election of the respondent in April, 1876, without any order, or call, or notice emanating from the City Council, is or can be held to be legal. A majority of the court, including the writer of this opinion, unhesitatingly holds that it is not.

The substance of the whole matter is this: although the relator was elected under a statute which prescribed his term of office to be two years, to commence on the 1st day of December, 1873, yet by the statute of 1872, if there was a majority vote in favor of being incorporated under that law, upon a legal submission to the electors of the municipality, his term, as prescribed by the former statute terminated; and thereafter he exercised the powers of his office only by virtue of the statute. His term by the former statute was gone, and he had none by the new. The City Council had the right to order an election to fill the unexpired term. Instead of doing so, they expressly refused, and the respondent was elected at a general election, without order or notice from the City Council. Now, what is the legal rule applicable to such a case? We understand the result of the authorities to be this: if the law provides for an election, and fixes the time, then, although it may impose upon certain officers the duty of giving notices, still, if not given, the time being fixed by law will be regarded as sufficient notices,and the election will be held valid, although such officers fail to give the notice directed Such, however, is not this case. The law, so far as it fixes the time, does so at another and different time from that at which the election of the respondent took place. It is true that the 48th section declares:

"A general election for city officers shall be held on the third Tuesday of April of each year." There were city officers to be then elected to which that would apply, but can any unprejudiced mind conclude that that section fixes the time for the election of mayor? Why, the very next section says: "At the general election held in 1873, and biennially thereafter, a Mayor shall be elected in each city." There is not a clause in the statute which can be tortured into the expression that if a vacancy occurs in the office of Mayor it may be filled at the next annual election. If such vacancy can be filled at all by an election, it can be only under sections 15 and 61. Section 15 declares: "Whenever a vacancy shall happen in the office of Mayor, when the unexpired term shall be one year or over from the date when the vacancy occurs, it shall be filled by an election."

Then to take the case out of the category of section 49, which provides for biennial elections after the general or April election of 1873, come the provisions of section 61, authorizing the city council to order special elections, and prescribing the manner of doing so. Here, as in a vast number of other instances, the city council is invested with a certain amount of discretionary power. This function of ordering or calling a special election, if exercised, is a part of the sovereignty of the State. It has been conferred by the State upon the body known as the city council, and upon nobody else. It has been given subject to certain restrictions and regulations. It therefore can be exercised only by the body and substantially in the manner prescribed by the act from which alone the power is derived. The electors of Chicago at large have no more authority to exercise it than the voters at large of Cook county. It never having been exercised by the body upon whom it was conferred, except by expressly refusing to order a special election, the votes cast for Mayor at the April election of 1876 were altogether nugatory.

Judge Cooly, in his reliable work upon constitutional limitations, gives the result of the authorities thus:

"In some other cases preliminary action by the public authorities may be requisite before any legal election can be held. If an election is one which a municipality may hold or not at its option, and the proper municipal authority decides against holding it, it is evident that individual citizens must acquiesce, and that any votes which may be cast by them on the assumption of right must be altogether nugatory. The same would be true of an election to be held after proclamation for the purpose, where no such proclamation had been made." Cooley's Constitutional Limitation, 603.

Judge Dillon, in his work on "Municipal Corporations," section 136, says: "Where it is discretionary with municipal authorities whether they will hold an election or not, votes cast at an unauthorized election are simply nullities. Elections fixed by law at a certain time and place may be legally holden,although notice has not been published but if the time be not defined by statute, and is to be fixed by notice, the notice required is imperative."

It is too plain to justify one moment's discussion, that the act of 1872 nowhere fixes any time for an election for Mayor except that in section 49, which declares that "at the general election held in 1873, and biennially thereafter, a Mayor shall be elected in each city." This certainly does not fix the general election in 1876 as a time at which a Mayor may be elected. The very eminent and zealous counsel for the respondent, admitted upon the argument that the statute contained no other provision fixing the time, but they relied upon section 48, which declared that a general election for city officers shall be held on the third Tuesday of April each year; when the very next section declares that the election for Mayor shall be held biennially after such general election in 1873, which would, of course, exclude one at the general election in 1876. The term not being fixed by statute, the action of the city council fixing the time and giving the statutory notice was indispensable to a valid election.

The respectability of the respondent or the number of votes cast for him cannot affect the principle; it is as vital to an election under the circumstances as service of process and an opportunity for a day in court is to judgment. Counsel says there was an equivalent for the notice required by law. The fact that respondent was running for the office was notorious. Suppose it was. The trouble with the argument is that under the circumstances of this case the law can recognize no equivalent for the order and statutory notice. Suppose a judgment rendered against A B without service of process. If the defendant should move to set it aside for that reason, would any lawyer say that the plaintiff could defeat the motion by showing that the fact of the suit having been brought was notorious and several persons had in fact spoken to defendant about it? The difficulty with the judgment there would arise from the same principle as with the election in question without the order of the city council and the statutory notice.

In either case there would be simply a want of power of jurisdiction. The State having vested this municipality with a part of its sovereignty, and affixed to its exercise certain restrictions and regulations, it can be exercised only in the manner substantially as is appointed by the statute. The term of the office with its commencement and close is prescribed by the statute. According to the view of a majority of this court, that term has never been filled. From the reorganization to this time, there has existed a vacancy as respects that term. Of course, the unexpired term was more than a year from the date when the vacancy occurred, and by the provision of section 15, it could only be filled by an election. By virtue of the section just referred to as a vacancy, and the sixty-first section authorizing special elections by order of the city council upon notice, it was fully competent for the city council, in its discretion, to have ordered a special election to fill such vacancy. The council failing to so order, the relator, by force of the statute, was authorized to exercise the powers of Mayor until his successor should be elected and qualified. As no valid election could be held without the order of the city council, and the prescribed notice, the supposed election of respondent Hoyne was nugatory. The sixteenth section declares that "If the vacancy is less than one year, the city council shall elect one of its members to act as Mayor, who shall possess all the rights and powers of the Mayor,until his successor is elected and qualified." The next annual election would in that case necessarily be the biennial election before alluded to. Whether such an election from the body of the city council would be authorized under the circumstances of this case, is a question which has not been discussed. But from our examination of the statutes, we are inclined to the view that the vacancy can only be legally filled, even now, by an election ordered by the city council.

The conclusion arrived at by a majority of the court is, that the first fault in pleading is in respondent's pleas. His demurrer to the relator's replications, must, therefore, according to the established practice, be carried back and sustained to those pleas; and inasmuch as the facts cannot be changed by amendments, judgment of ouster against respondent must follow.

DISSENTING OPINION BY JUDGE BOOTH.

Judge Booth then read the following dissenting opinion:

I concur in the opinion of the majority of the court upon the question whether a vacancy in the office of Mayor existed upon the adoption of the act of 1872, but upon the main point in the case, whether the election of Mr. Hoyne to fill that vacancy is valid,I do not concur.

It seems very plain that it was never intended that by the adoption of this act the term of office of any city official should be extended beyond its original limit, but that the old officers should be simply retained provisionally in the discharge of their respective functions under the new act, and thus bridge over the interval until their successors for the discharge of those functions should be elected and qualified. Upon the adoption of the act, the term of office was at an end, and he became a mere locum tenens, holding the place, discharging its duties, waiting for his successor. This, in my judgment, is the fair meaning of the latter clause of Article 1, Section 3, of the act, and the only construction admissible with due respect for the letter and spirit of the constitution.

If, then, the decision of the court upon this preliminary question is correct, and a vacancy in the office of Mayor existed from the date of the adoption of the act on the 3d of May, 1875, it became the plain duty of the council to call an election to fill that vacancy. Article 2, Section 2, provides that "whenever a vacancy shall happen in the office of Mayor, when the unexpired term shall be one year or over from the date when the vacancy occurs, it shall be filled by an election." The official term of the Mayor, fixed by article 4, sections 1 and 2, commences on the third Tuesday of April, in the odd years, and extending for two years, so that the unexpired term was more than one year.

The right and duty of the people, therefore, to elect their Mayor on the third Tuesday of April, 1876, was unquestionable, and the official duty of the council to call an election for that purpose was equally clear. The question is thus distinctly presented, whether the neglect of their duty by that body has in this instance, under the law, deprived the people of Chicago of the most cherished right of American citizens,the right upon which all their other rights chiefly depend—that of electing their rulers. It is a question of grave importance, not only as it affects the pending issue, but in its future bearings. For if it be decided affirmatively, the wrong may be repeated, and the people are practically without a remedy.

A brief statement of the facts as they appear from the pleadings is necessary for a full understanding of the law of the case. In accordance with Article 4, Sec. 1 of the act, which provides that "a general election for city officers shall be held on the third Tuesday of April of each year," the common council called an election for all city officers required by this act to be elected by the people with the exception of the Mayor, purposely omitting the Mayor in the call, having previously, by vote, expressly determined to exclude that office. All the arrangements for holding a general election, including judges, clerks, polling places, were provided. If the council had performed their duty as required by law, and included the Mayor in the call, no question whatever could be raised as to the legality of his election, provided there was an existing vacancy, as this court has decided. The people, acting upon the assumption that they had the legal right to elect their Mayor, notwithstanding the refusal of the council to include him in the call, avail themselves

NEGLIGENCE OF MUNICIPAL CORPORATION.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States, by HUNT, J., holding that a municipal corporation is liable for an injury to an individual arising from negligence in the construction of a work authorized by it.

RAILROAD AID BONDS—A CLOSE CASE.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States, by DAVIS, J., holding, under the facts of the case and the legislation of Illinois applicable to them, there existed no power and lawful authority to issue the bonds and coupons in controversy, so as to render them valid and collectible in the hands of the plaintiff below. The court passed upon several sections of the Illinois laws of 1869, relating to railroad bonds, and the decisions of the Supreme Court of Illinois construing said laws. It is stated, when the decisions of the highest court of a State will be followed by the Federal Supreme Court. The history of this case shows that the questions involved in it are not only important, but are questions upon which the most learned of Judges do not agree. Shortly after the passage of the act of Congress, providing that the amount in controversy requisite to entitle a case to be removed from the Circuit Courts to the Supreme Court of the United States, by appeal or writ of error, should be raised from $2,000 to $5,000, several suits brought upon coupons for interest, due on certain railroad bonds issued by the town of Elmwood and other towns, were tried in the United States Circuit Court for the Northern District of Illinois. All the suits involved the same questions, but in no one of them did the amount in controversy reach $5,000. These suits were tried before Judges DRUMMOND and BLODGETT, in June last. The Judges were divided in opinion as to the validity of the bonds, and judgment was rendered for the plaintiffs upon the opinion of Judge DRUMMOND, Judge BLODGETT dissenting. The case went up on a certificate of division of opinion between the Circuit and District Judges. In the Supreme Court, Judge STRONG delivered a dissenting opinion, in which Judges CLIFFORD and SWAYNE concurred.

AFFIDAVIT OF CLAIM—NOTARIES' CERTIFICATE AMENDABLE.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of Illinois, by SCOTT, C. J., holding that an affidavit of plaintiff's claim, filed more than ten days prior to the commencement of the term at which the declaration is filed, will be regarded as having been filed with the declaration; that a certificate of a notary public in a foreign State, to an affidavit of plaintiff's claim, may be amended; that the law presumes a defendant is a resident of the county in which he is served with process.

APPEALS FROM JUSTICES—SUITS TO RECOVER PENALTIES.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of this State, by SHELDON, J., holding that a suit to recover a forfeiture or penalty, before a justice of the peace, is a civil and not a criminal proceeding, and that an appeal from a judgment of a justice of the peace, in such a suit, may be taken to the Circuit Court by either party, on appeal; that an appeal is allowed in such cases, under the general statute allowing appeals from justices of the peace, although the statute which prescribes the penalty or forfeiture, is silent as to such appeal.

WHO IS THE LEGAL MAYOR OF CHICAGO.—The opinion of Judges MCALLISTER, WILLIAMS, ROGERS, BOOTH and FARWELL, of the Circuit Court of this county, as to who is the Mayor of Chicago. All five of the Judges agree that Colvin's term was not extended by the new charter. Three of the five judges are of the opinion that Mr. Colvin has the right to hold over until his successor is elected and qualified, and that Mr. Hoyne's election was not a legal election. Two of the five Judges are of the opinion that Mr. Hoyne's election was legal, and that he is now the legal Mayor of Chicago. Three of the Judges are of the opinion that there is a vacancy in the office of mayor, and that the common council have power to call a special election to fill it.

QUO WARRANTO.—The opinion of the Criminal Court of this county, by MOORE, J., holding that leave will not be granted to file an information in the nature of a quo warranto against a person who has been elected or appointed to an office, to test his right to such office, unless it is shown that he has taken possession of the office. In this case, Mr. Callaghan had been appointed to the office of town collector by the town board, and taken the oath of office, but the court held as he had not yet given his bond, that he had not usurped the office within the meaning of the statute, and refused to grant leave to file an information.

LIABILITY OF CLERK AND MASTER FOR MONEY LOANED.—The opinion of the Supreme court of Tennessee, by MCFARLAND, J., as to the liability of a clerk and master, who had loaned money and the security had failed.

THE HON. P. H. WALKER.—As we said some weeks ago it ought to be and would be, Judge WALKER was again, on Monday last, re-elected to the Supreme Bench, without opposition. The Judge owes his election to no party, no clique, no ring; but having performed his judicial duties for so many years, with the strictest honesty, and with distinguished ability, the people of his district, by re-electing him unanimously, have said, we respect your ability and appreciate your honesty. What can be a grander sight, than to see the faithful judge, worth but little more than his home, and depending on his salary for his own and his family's support, administering justice and deciding cases involving millions of dollars, "unawed by power, and uninfluenced by gain."

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

On Tuesday of this week the Supreme Court met at Mount Vernon with a large number of lawyers in attendance. All the judges were present at the opening of the term except Judge WALKER.

On Wednesday, the court ruled in the case of The People v. Robert T. Lincoln et al., and The People v. Herman Lieb et al., being a petition for a mandamus, that leave must be obtained to file petitions, and that mandamus cases would be set for hearing at the next term, unless a public necessity required immediate attention.

The following named gentlemen, upon motion of Wm. S. Coy, were admitted to practice upon diplomas from the Bloomington Law School: Geo. L. Marlow, Charles F. Wertz, Joseph L. Colvin, Wm. P. McMurray, Lester M. Hall, Wm. D. Hayne, Richard A. Wade, Henry D. Spencer. Henry E. Averill, of Ohio, was upon the motion of the attorney-general, admitted to practice upon his license in the former state.

JUDGE UNDERWOOD.—In the afternoon the venerable Judge Gillespie, of St. Clair county, presented the following resolutions of the bar in respect to the late Judge Wm. H. Underwood:

The bar of the supreme court of the state of Illinois, assembled at the supreme court-room, at Mount Vernon, Ill., on Wednesday, the 8th day of June, 1876, on the occasion of the death of their brother, William H. Underwood, who died at his residence in Belleville, Ill., in testimony of their affection and esteem for him in life and their sense of the loss which the court and bar of the state and community at large suffer in his death, do adopt the following resolutions:

Resolved, That we find in the professional life and distinguished services of our deceased brother, both at the bar and as a representative in the legislative councils of the state, a career for our admiration, and that for the integrity and uprightness of his professional life, and for the estimable qualities that characterized him as a man, we hereby record our high appreciation, and unite in the hope that we may learn lessons of wisdom by the example he has left us.

Resolved, That we deeply and sincerely sympathize with the family of the deceased in the great bereavement they have sustained in the death of our departed brother.

Resolved, That the Hon. Gustavus Koerner and Hon. Jas. Gillespie be, and they are hereby requested to present these resolutions to the supreme court of the state of Illinois, now in session, with suitable remarks, and request the court that they be spread on the record, and that a copy of the same be transmitted to the family of the deceased.

Judge Gillespie, in presenting the resolutions, spoke very feelingly, and was listened to with interest. He was followed by ex-Gov. Palmer, who paid a glowing tribute to the memory of the deceased. Chief Justice Sheldon, in a few appropriate remarks, ordered the resolutions spread upon the minutes.

MR. JUSTICE BREESE spoke of the deceased in the most eloquent and touching manner as one of the purest of men the ablest of lawyers and best of citizens. On Thursday the court having appointed as a committee to examine students Messrs Coy, Barge, and Bryan, the class, containing forty-one candidates, was formed, and the examination proceeded with until 12 o'clock, when the court adjourned until 9 o'clock Friday morning.

At the opening of the court on yesterday morning Chief Justice SHELDON announced that the following applicants had successfully passed the examination of Thursday, and were entitled to license to practice: Jacob Abbott, James F. Asay, Samuel P. Avery, Marcus R. Bacon, Wm. H. Boyer, Presby G. Bradberry, John A. Brown, Ferdinand L. Copps, Rufus C. Carpenter, Wm. R. Curran, Sidney C. Eastman, Rudolph B. Forest, Alexander Flanigan, George R. Gill, Amos H. Gleason, Wm. H. Harry, Wallace Hickman, James Johnson, George B. Leonard, James H. Manner, James H. Martheny, Nicholas McConn, Edward McDonald, Henry M. Miner, Isaac J. Monser, Enmore L. Murphy, William R. Powers, Collins Pratt, Jefferson Rainey, Wm. R. Robertson, Adam Russell, Edward C. Springer, David Sullivan, Felix B. Tate, Jonathan Taylor, Thomas H. Turner, Charles M. Wallar, Wm. F. Whiting, Robert B. Shirley, Austin O. Sexton.

In the important mandamus from Cook county against Lieb, county treasurer, and Lincoln, supervisor, involving the question of Chicago bummerism, township organization, and the alleged crooked mode of the recent election in the South town, Mr. Justice Breese said that a majority of the court were of opinion the cases should be heard at the present term. Accordingly, by agreement of counsel, the court appointed Thursday next to hear the arguments.

The contested Madison county election case of Dale vs. Irwin, involving the right to the county judgeship, came up to-day on a petition for rehearing, which was overruled.

The Judges of the Circuit Court have appointed Maj. Horatio L. Waite, Master in Chancery in place of the late Hiram M. Chase. The term will expire in July. Maj. Waite is a member of the law firm of Barker, Buell & Waite, has been a practising lawyer here for a number of years, and is well known for his genial qualities as a gentleman, as well as for his learning and uprightness as a lawyer. Though, under the present statutes, the fees of a Master in Chancery are remarkably low, yet there were twenty-four applicants for the position, several of them occupying very enviable positions at the bar, so that a selection was not a little difficult. Major Waite will make an excellent and popular Master.

NASHVILLE, JAN. 31, 1876.

JANE SUMMAR v. J. W. PAGE and Others.

LIABILITY OF CLERK AND MASTER FOR MONEYS LOANED—PROOF OF GOOD FAITH.

A party to whom C. & M. loaned money without security at the time, but afterwards took as security the partner of the borrower, and the parties soon afterwards failed, Held, the circumstances make a cause requiring proof showing clearly and satisfactorily the good faith of C. & M. in the transaction.

By the court, MCFARLAND, J.

The question before us is, whether or not there is error in that part of the decree below holding A. F. McFerrin, former clerk and master at Woodbury, liable for a fund loaned by him under the orders of the court, in the event the money cannot be collected from J. W. Page, to whom the money was loaned, and Milliken, his surety. As McFerrin alone has appealed, this is the only question.

It appears that Page, to whom the money was loaned, was the son-in-law of McFerrin; that he took no security at the time, but Milliken, a partner of Page in a distillery, afterwards signed the note—McFerrin presenting the note and urging him to do so. He had been previously spoken to on the subject by Page. McFerrin afterwards bought Page's property and gave it to his daughter, (Page's wife) giving Page a note for part of the price, which was transferred to another.

The circumstances make a case requiring proof on the part of McFerrin showing clearly his good faith in the transaction. This proof is wanting. Page proves, it is true, that he and Milliken were solvent at the time the note was given, but their sudden embarrassment and failure soon after is not satisfactorily explained. The law requires of a public officer of this character the utmost good faith, and this must appear satisfactorily.

It is said in argument that the money might have been made after judgment was taken upon the note, but for the interference of the complainant's solicitors, who would not agree to the issuance of execution; but this is not satisfactorily shown, and in fact the circumstances do not sustain this conclusion.

The decree against McFerrin was proper.

The fund originally belonged one-third to Ivory Summar, from whom complainant was divorced, and two-thirds to complainant and her children; but the record, we think, shows that Ivory Summar had received his full share, and the whole of the fund loaned to Page belonged to complainant and her children—that is, to complainant during her life and then to her children. The decree therefore should be so modified that instead of allowing complainant to recover the fund it will be paid into court and secured or loaned so as to give complainant the interest thereon and secure the body of the fund to her children.

To this end the cause will be remanded.

McFerrin will pay the costs of this court.

of the arrangement for holding a general election of city officers, placed the respondent in nomination and elected him by a vast majority of all the votes polled. There is no pretense of any want of publicity, of any surprise, fraud or concealment in the conduct of the election. The respondent was nominated by one of the largest mass meetings ever held by the citizens of Chicago. Every voter on election day and before knew that he was a candidate for the office, and had the opportunity to express his preference for or against him at the polls. There is no question but that he was the choice of the people, although themselves, like the old Mayor, a provisional body, holding over only until their successor should be elected and qualified. The old council refused to canvass the votes for Mayor. The new council, elected together with the respondent, did make the canvass, and declared the result, and he is now the acting chief magistrate of the city by the will of the people fairly expressed at the polls.

Surely there should be some cogent reason founded on wise public policy, or some well settled rule of law, inexorable as fate, bending the understanding and conscience of the court to justify a decision which shall reverse the one thus made by the people, displace their chosen chief officer and restore to provisional authority of one of whom they have so clearly expressed the wish that he shall not rule over them. Cases of this character are apt to be sui genesis, each depending largely upon its own peculiar facts, and not easily reduceable to any uniform rules or principles. The elements of concealment, fraud, surprise, imposition, which figure so largely in many election cases, have no place here. There is no pretense that there was any unfair practice resorted to in order to secure the election of the respondent. or that all was not open or above board, All the safeguards which surrounded the exercise of the elective franchise were provided in this case. They operated as fully and completely to secure a full and fair expression of the will of this electoral body in the case of the respondent as in the case of any other candidate. It is safe to assert that no case can be found in the books where there were so many and so cogent reasons concurring in favor of the validity of an election, which the court has seen fit to set aside. Is there any sound reason in public policy, or any imperative rule of law which requires it to be drawn in the present instance? The question of any existing vacancy having been decided against the relator, his case must rest solely upon the omission or refusal of the common council to call the election. It is claimed, inasmuch as the office was to be filled for a fraction of a time larger than a year, the full term being two years, that a special election was necessary for the purpose, and that such election could be held only upon the call of the common council. Various cases have been cited in support of this position, and while it is doubtless the general rule that in order to fill a vacancy a special election must be called by the proper authority, with specification of time and place, and all needful arrangements for holding the same, yet there are exceptions to the rule, and I do not consider that the rule has application to this case at bar. This case is not within the reason of the rule laid down in the cases cited on behalf of the relator. Article 4, section 1, already cited, provides—a general election for city officers shall be held on the third Tuesday of April of each year.

SECTION 2. At the general election held in 1870, and biennially thereafter, a Mayor shall be elected in such city."

The language of Section 1, "a general election for city officers," is certainly broad enough to include the mayor, Nor is its scope confined, in my opinion, by the provision of the following section, that "at the general election held in 1873, and biennially thereafter, a mayor shall be elected in such city." It should be borne in mind that this act went in force on July 1, 1872, and the language employed in the section in question is the same as if it were intended by the Legislature that all cities should adopt the act in season to hold a general election on the third Tuesday of April, 1873. Yet nothing of the kind could possibly have been expected. It was not practicable for the city of Chicago to hold its general election in 1873 or biennially thereafter, since its adoption of the act was too late in 1875 to hold its general election that year. A full comparison thereof with the terms of this section is and has been from the first impracticable except in the case of those cities, if any, which adopted the act at a time sufficiently prior to the third Tuesday of April, 1873, to hold an election on that day. Why, then, should this section, which prescribes for cities adopting the act subsequent to April, 1873, the performance of an impossibility, be construed so as to limit the broad power contained in the first section, which is eminently beneficial and practicable to all? Is not sufficient scope been given to section two, if we hold that it was the intention thereby simply to make the term of office of mayor in all cities organized under the act throughout the State uniformly two years, commencing on the third Tuesday of April in the odd year, leaving untouched the provision in the first section for a "general election of city officers—mayor included—on the third Tuesday of April of each year," should occasion require? And in this connection should be borne in mind the provisions in section 2, article 2. "Whenever a vacancy shall happen in the office of mayor, when the unexpired term shall be one year or over from the date when the vacancy occurs, it shall be filled by an election.

How is a positive requirement that when there is a vacancy, and the unexpired term is a year or more, it shall be filled by an election? Such a vacancy existed in the present case, and a general election for city officers was at hand.

Was any further authority necessary in order to fill the vacancy? And was it in the power of the common council to set at naught the command of the statute, and defeat its obvious requirement by neglect or refusal to call the election? Was any special call necessary when the statutes had already provided the means of its fulfillment? To my mind the answer to those questions is obvious.

Some stress has been placed upon section 14 of article 4, which provides; "If there is a failure to elect any officer herein required to be elected, or the person elected shall fail to qualify, the city council or board of trustees shall forthwith order a new election therefor; and in all cases, when necessary for the purposes of this act, may call special elections, appoint judges and clerks therefor, canvass the returns thereof, and provide by ordinance for the mode of conducting the same; and shall give notice of such special election," etc. But if the views already stated are correct, though it was the plain duty of the common council to call the election, give notice, etc., yet their omission to do so did not affect its validity, since the election was not special within the meaning of this section.

If the claim of the relator under the various provisions of the act were less beset with difficulties than I think it is, the effects and consequences of the construction contended for in his behalf, in my judgment, should cause the court to hesitate before pronouncing in his interest. A construction which, in the event of a vacancy occurring [illegible] of a term, places it in the power of the council, if so disposed, practically to prevent an election of their chief magistrate for a period of nearly two years, is surely not to be favored. Nor is this confined to the case of a vacancy occurring in the office of mayor, for it applied equally to the case of aldermen. What is to prevent a political majority in the council from disfranchising a ward obnoxious to them for its party politics for a period of two years, if a vacancy occurs at the commencement of an aldermanic term? But if the construction is adopted favorable to the respondent, the longest period for which, in either case, an expression of the will of the elective body could be postponed, would be a fraction of a year. Believing, therefore, that a decision adverse to the claim of the relator would be in the interest of sound government and popular rights, will especially be opposed to that bane of American politics, corrupt rings, I have felt it my duty, for the reasons already stated, as well as others urged in argument on behalf of the respondent, to dissent from the opinion of the majority of the court on the main question in the case.

Judge Farwell then stated his view of the case as follows:

Inasmuch as this case is of great importance, it is probably due to myself and to the parties, that my views should be known on this question, as one of the members of this court. I agree with Judge McAllister and with Judge Booth upon the question as to whether by the law of 1872 the term of the then acting Mayor was extended to 1877. I am of opinion that that term was not extended, but that it is evident from the law itself that the term ceased, and that the acting Mayor under the old organization was merely an acting Mayor under the new law until his successor should be chosen and qualified. We being agreed upon that, the question then follows, What are the rights of the parties under the facts as stated? The old Mayor being a person merely filling the office, and discharging the duties for the time being without any right or holding any term not expired, it would have been proper for the common council, as soon as in their discretion it was proper, to call an election for this and other officers. They did not exercise that right. The time fixed by the law for a general election arrived. By the law itself, as we understand it, the then acting Mayor had no term; he was merely discharging the duties of an office, which was in the eyes of the law vacant. That being a general election, I am of opinion that the voters had a right to vote for Mayor at that election if no notice should be given; that it was the duty of the common council, not having called any special election before the coming general election, to have given notice that a Mayor would be voted for at that time, that that vacancy would be filled; but that they cannot, by failing to discharge their duty, either from intention or from ignorance, deprive the voters of the right which they have upon a general election to elect all officers who, with propriety and according to law, should be elected. The reasons which have been given by my brother, Judge Booth, cover substantially the case, and the views which I have on this subject, I therefore do not deem it necessary to say more.

Judge Rogers—Since Judge Farwell stated that he concurred in the dissenting opinion, I will say that Judge Williams and myself concur with Judge McAllister in the main question, that the election held last April for Mayor was an absolute nullity and nugatory. Speaking for myself, assuming that there was a vacancy, if Mayor Colvin was not entitled under the charter to hold his office until 1877, then I concur, and so does Judge Williams concur, in the reasoning of the opinion as read by Judge McAllister.

CRIMINAL COURT OF COOK CO., ILLINOIS.

OPINION FILED JUNE 2, 1876.

THE PEOPLE ex rel. MICHAEL EVANS v. BERNARD CALLAGHAN.

Application for Leave to File an Information in the Nature of a Quo Warranto.

QUO WARRANTO—WHEN LEAVE TO FILE INFORMATION WILL NOT BE GRANTED—WHAT CONSTITUTES A USER—PRACTICE.

1. PRACTICE.—The court states the practice under the statute, in quo warranto cases.
2. THERE MUST BE A USER.—That before leave will be granted to file an information in the nature of a quo warranto, it must be shown that the respondent has taken possession of the office.
3. USER.—The court states what constitutes a user.
4. WHEN OFFICER HAS NOT GIVEN BOND.—Held, in this case, where the respondent had been appointed town collector by the town board, and taken the oath of office, but had not given his official bond, that he had not, within the meaning of the statute, usurped the office, and that leave would not be granted to file an information.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

The opinion of the court was delivered by MOORE, J.

The statute of this State provides, "that in case any person shall usurp, intrude into, or unlawfully hold, or execute any office or franchise * * the State's attorney * * at the instance of any individual relator, may present a petition to the court for leave to file an information in the nature of a quo warranto, in the name of the people, and if the court be satisfied that there is probable ground for the proceeding, the court may grant the petition and order the information to be filed, and process to issue (Rev. Stat., ch. 112. § 1).

This, however, is no new provision of law, our statute being a transcript of the English statute. It has ever been held that when the court is satisfied that probable ground for the proceeding exists, leave will be granted to file the information. But before such leave can be granted, the probable ground MUST BE SHOWN TO EXIST. The court must be satisfied that the probable ground for the proceeding exists. At this stage of the case, however, the case must not be tried upon its merits;—the court is now only to inquire if the probable ground is made to appear.

The petition in this case shows that the relator, Michael Evans, is, and for many years has been, a resident and legal voter in the town of South Chicago; that in 1875, he was duly elected collector of said town for one year, and until his successor should be elected and qualified; and that he was duly qualified and discharged the duties of said office until he was elected and qualified as his own successor; that an election was held on the 4th of April, in all things according to law, that at that election the proper number of officers to which said town was entitled to by law were elected, and that for the office of town collector 8,883 votes were cast, and that of them the said Evans received 4,273 votes; that one A. J. Galloway received 3,372 votes, and that one P. O'Brien received 1,338 votes, and that thereupon the town clerk declared that Evans was duly elected town collector of the town of South Chicago, and that he also declared the result as to the other town officers, which showed that the proper number of town officers were elected at said town meeting and election, and that a statement of the result of the election was duly recorded; that a certificate of his election was made and delivered to said relator on the 8th day of April, 1876, and that on the same day the said Evans took and subscribed the oath of office prescribed by the constitution, and filed the same in the office of the town clerk, according to law; that within the prescribed time, and according to law, the town clerk filed in the county clerk's office a list of officers elected for the town. The petition also shows that "whenever any town shall fail to elect the proper number of town officers * * it shall be lawful for the justices of the peace of the town, together with the supervisor and town clerk, to fill the vacancy by appointment, by warrant, under their hands and seals, and that the persons so appointed shall hold their respective offices during the unexpired term of the persons in whose stead they have been appointed, and until others are elected and appointed in their places;" that on the 15th of April, the justices of the peace in the said town, together with the supervisor and town clerk, held a meeting, and that then it appeared from the records that according to law, P. K. Ryan was elected supervisor, James Gleeson town clerk, Edward Phillips assessor, and the relator, Evans, collector; that thereupon it was determined by a majority to hear evidence in relation to said election, and that statements were made, which, it was claimed, tended to show that frauds had been committed at said election; that during the meeting Ryan resigned as supervisor, and Robert T. Lincoln was appointed in his place; that thereupon the meeting by a majority vote determined that there was a failure to elect, at the annual town meeting of the town of South Chicago on the first Tuesday in April, a clerk, supervisor, assessor, and collector, and that they would proceed to appoint such officers to serve until the election of town officers at the annual town meeting to be held on the first Tuesday in April, 1877; that a majority of said justices of the peace, together with said Lincoln, acting as supervisor, pretended to appoint one W. S. Carver town clerk, and W. B. H. Gray assessor, and one Bernard Callaghan collector of the town of South Chicago, upon the pretense that there was a failure to elect these officers at the annual town meeting held on the first Tuesday of April, 1876, and that therefore vacancies existed in said offices; that within the prescribed time thereafter the majority of said justices of the peace, and Lincoln, acting as supervisor, and said Carver, pretending to act as town clerk, issued to the said Callaghan a pretended warrant of appointment to the office of said collector; that the same was delivered on the 17th of April, and that Carver, as clerk, made out and delivered to Callaghan a pretended certificate of such appointment, and that Callaghan thereupon on the 17th of April, 1876, accepted said pretended appointment, and took and subscribed the oath prescribed by the constitution as such collector, before an officer authorized by law, in that behalf, and filed the same with said Carver, as clerk, within the prescribed time, and that the said Carver filed in the office of the county clerk a list of the names of the pretended town officers so pretended to have been appointed within the time prescribed by law.

The petition claims that the appointment of Callaghan is void, and that since the 17th of April, 1876, he has been, and is, unlawfully usurping, intruding into, and unlawfully holding and pretending to execute the office of such collector. Wherefore, on the relation of said record, the petition asks for leave to file an information in the nature of a quo warranto against the said Callaghan, and asks for process, for answer, etc.

According to well settled practice, in this State and elsewhere, the defendant has produced and filed ex parte affidavits, controverting the probable ground relied upon by the petition. The proof thus made conduces to show that fraud was practiced at the election by persons other than Evans. This evidence is of such a character as entitles it to the highest consideration, and yet some of the most important witnesses may be mistaken in what they honestly believe, and state they saw. On the other hand, some of the witnesses who are introduced to sustain the view taken by the relator must know the truth; and if their testimony be true, then some witnesses introduced by the respondent must be mistaken. If the vault door was opened, as is claimed by the respondent, then those who claimed to be keeping watch must have known it. They say it was not so opened. It is not, however, necessary at this stage of the case to determine the truth. The petition need not make out an undoubted case, it must show only probable ground. If, at this stage of the case, doubt exists as to the rights of the parties, it should be resolved in favor of the relator. The invariable course is to allow the information to be filed when a question of law or fact is in dispute and doubtful. Leave to file the information is not granted as a matter of course, when asked, but depends upon the sound discretion of the court. It will, however, usually be granted where the right, or the fact on which the right depends, is disputed and doubtful. Bacon's Abr. Informations, (D); The People v. Sweeting, 2 Johns Rep., 184; The People v. Richardson, 4 Cowen, 102. This is the view maintained by the relator, and it is a view so well sustained by authority and precedent that it cannot, at this day, be questioned. If, then, this application depended only upon the question as to whether there was a fair election, or any election on the first Tuesday of April—if the application depends only on the question as to whether, at the time of the appointment by the town board, there was a vacancy in the office of town collector, it must be determined in favor of the application, and for the purposes of this motion, it must be determined, that, prima facie, the election was fair, and there was no vacancy, to be filled by appointment. If the user was averred and admitted, and no other question was raised at this stage of the case, then leave would be granted to file the information, in order that an issue of fact might be made and tried, and the right of the defendant to this office determined, either for or against him, as the truth might require.

The next inquiry that is to be considered is whether the user is averred? The essential parts of the petition have been set out at considerable length, in order that it might be seen what is averred. It is averred that the relator was duly and lawfully elected, and that he had qualified by taking the oath prescribed by the constitution. It is claimed for the relator that he has done all that the law requires of him up to this time. More than this is claimed. It is shown that he was the collector for 1875, duly elected and qualified; and that as such collector for 1875 he took the oath prescribed by the constitution, and gave the bond required by law, and discharged the duties of the office, and that he is the town collector until his successor is elected and qualified, and enters upon the discharge of his duties. The relator has done all that he can to take possession of and become incumbent of the office as his own successor. On the other hand, it is claimed that Callaghan has not been elected or appointed according to law, but that, without authority, he has been appointed by a majority of the justices of the peace of the town of South Chicago, together with the one who claims to act as supervisor and the one claiming to act as clerk. It is averred, in substance, that no vacancy existed, and that no right existed to make the appointment, and yet that the appointment was made without authority, and that the defendant took the oath in manner and form as prescribed by the constitution, and thereby indicated his determination to accept of the office, and so usurped and intruded into, and unlawfully holds the office of such collector. Is this usurping the office? Does this amount to an intrusion into the office? Do these averments show that the defendant holds the office? Has he executed any of the duties of the office? Has he used the office? To answer these questions it is necessary that the authorities cited by the learned counsel be examined. Thus it may be ascertained what constitutes a user.

"In case any person, against whom an information is filed, is adjudged guilty, the court gives judgment of ouster against such person from the office (Rev. Stat., ch. 112, sec. 6), and all authorities in relation to quo warranto go to the same extent. It is insisted from this as a beginning point, that a party cannot be ousted from that of which he has never had possession, and this view is not seriously controverted by the counsel representing the relator. Both admit that there must be a user, a possession, before there can be an ouster. Both admit that the usurpation, the intrusion into, or the unlawful holding or executing the office, must amount to an actual possession, an actual use, or there can be no ouster, and unless this state of case be presented by the petition, the request for leave to file the information must be denied. No case exists in which the information has been allowed to be filed by the court, where the party against whom it was applied for has not been in the actual possession of the office. The petition in this case is based upon the well recognized principles hereinbefore recited, and upon the well established rule in pleading, that it is not sufficient to aver that the defendant has accepted and usurped an office, without specifying the manner in which the usurpation has been made. Hence, it follows that the motion for leave to file the information must be denied, unless the actual possession—the actual user appears from the averments in the petition. (High on Ex. Remedies, secs. 627, 655, and notes and authorities there cited. The People v. Thompson, 16 Wendell, 656 and cases there cited; The People v. Tisdale, 1 Douglass, 61.) The petition relies upon the fact that the defendant has taken the oath prescribed by the constitution, as the act, the fact that constitutes user, that amounts to taking possession of the office.

In an early case it was held that a swearing in, though defective in law, yet being the act by which the party claimed to be a free burgess of a corporation, held a sufficient user to warrant an information in the nature of quo warranto. (Rex v. Tate, 4 East., 337; Rex v. Harwod, 2 East., 177.) The free burgess performs duties (amongst others) not unlike those of a county commissioner, or alderman of a city. He was not required to give bond, and was held to be in possession by simply taking the oath of office. The governor of a State, a judge of a court, and a member of the legislature simply take the oath of office, and are thereby inducted into office. The treasurer of a State, county, or city, like unto the sheriff of a county, in addition to the oath of office, is required to give bond, with approved surety, and cannot be inducted into office without such bond. Hence it is insisted that the case of Rex v. Tate does not sustain the position of the relator, inasmuch as a town collector must give bond, with surety. In the one case it was held that taking the oath made the party a free burgess, while it is claimed that the defendant does not become a collector de facto until he gives his bond, in addition to the oath. Before the information can be allowed, both in England and in this country, it has been held that it must be shown that the party is in office de facto, and it is not sufficient to say that the defendant has accepted the office. It is not sufficient to aver that the defendant admits and claims that he is in office, user in some way or other must be shown. (Regina v. Slatter, 11, ad. and el., 505; Rex v. Whitwell, 5 T. R., 85; Rex v. Ponsonby, Sayer's rep.. 245 b.; Regina v. Pepper, 7 A. and E., 745.) In this last recited case the party complained of had claimed to be a free burgess, and as such had voted for a member of parliament, which he could not have done but for the fact that he was a free burgess. This vote was expunged from the list of voters, and it was held that such voting did not amount to such user as would authorize the information. The court will deny the request to file the information, unless it appear that the defendant has de facto exercised the duties of the office. (Regina v. Armstrong, 34 E., L. and E., 288; Grant on Corporations, 410.)

If it be true that the party has done something that amounts to user, and then, after proceedings are commenced against him, he abandons the office, still the judgment will be for the ouster. But in all such cases there must have been an actual user. (High on Ex. Rem., sec. 754, and authorities there cited.)

It is held that there is a difference between accepting and acting.

If the party against whom the quo warranto is demanded, has acted, it is immaterial whether he has accepted or not. He may accept, and never intrude into the office; or he may even decline acting. In such case no harm is done but by acting he interferes and meddles with the interest of the public. (Cole's Crim. Infer., p. 185.)

There can be no question, but that the petition seeks the only remedy, if there be an evil to remedy. The remedy can be neither by mandamus nor injunction. (People v. New York, 3 Johns cases, 79; St. Louis Co. Crt. v. Spark, 10 Mo., 117.)

From these and very many other authorities, both English and American, it is found that the court will deny the request made for leave to file the information, unless it is made to appear that the defendant has taken actual possession of the office, and unless it appears that he has not merely accepted the office. He must have used the office, he must have done something, that manifests an actual user.

In this connection it must be ascertained what may be required by the law of this State. How is a town collector inducted into office? How does he take the possession of the office? What must he do in order that it may be said he is in the office, and that he is using the office?

"The person elected or appointed to the office of collector, before he enters upon the duties of his office, and within 10 days after he shall be notified of his election or appointment, shall take and subscribe the oath of office prescribed by the constitution, which shall, within eight days thereafter, be filed in the office of the town clerk." (Rev. Stat., chap. 139, art. 9, sec. 85). This oath is to the effect that he will faithfully discharge the duties of collector. If the office was like unto that of free burgess, or alderman, or county commissioner, or judge, and if nothing more was required, it is probable that such "swearing in" might be held to amount to an induction into office. By another section it is provided that neglect to take and subscribe such oath, shall be deemed a refusal to serve. (Sec. 86.) "Every person elected to the office of collector, before he enters upon the duties of his office, shall give the bond required by law." (Sec. 88.) "If any person elected to the office of collector shall not give such security and take such oath within the time limited for that purpose, such neglect shall be deemed a refusal to serve." (Sec. 89.)

The time of giving this bond and its requisites may be ascertained by reference to the chapter of the statute on revenue: "Every town collector, before he enters upon the duties of his office, and within eight days after he received notice of the amount of taxes to be collected by him, shall execute a bond with sureties to be approved, etc., in double the amount of such taxes, conditioned, for the faithful execution of his duties as such collector." (Ch. 120, sec. 133, p. 879.) The statute declares that the sheriff "before entering upon the duties of his office, he shall give bonds"—(Ch. 125, sec. 2)—and he "shall also before entering upon the duties of his office, take and subscribe the oath." If he fails to give the bond, or take the oath, the office shall be deemed vacant. In relation to the State treasurer, it is provided, "before entering upon the duties of his office he shall give bond." (Ch. 130, sec. 1.) It is further provided, "he shall, before entering upon the duties of his office, take the oath." The law makes similar provisions in relation to county treasurer. (Ch. 36, secs. 1, 2.) The like provisions exist in relation to the auditor of public accounts. (Ch. 15, secs. 1, 2.) It is claimed by the relator that the provision of the revenue law that provides for the bond does not require him to discharge well and faithfully the duties of his office, but that the bond is conditioned for the faithful execution of his duties as such collector, and that the prescribed form only provides that "he shall perform all the duties required as collector of taxes." But is any such inference to be drawn from the provisions of the bond? The office is but one. It may impose varied and dissimilar duties, and may require a bond for the faithful discharge of one kind of duties, and it may not require a bond in reference to other duties. Still all these duties are to be discharged by one and the same officer, and "before he enters upon the duties of his office—before he enters upon any of the duties of his office, he shall not only take an oath, but he shall also give a bond with surety. There are some other town officers who are not required to give bond. Before they enter upon the duties of their respective offices they shall take the prescribed oath only, and by taking the oath alone it may be that they enter into the use and possession of the office. But in relation to the office of town collector it is difficult to distinguish between the requirements for sheriff, auditor, treasurer and town collector. With each the law requires the bond, as well as the oath, before they enter upon the discharge of the duties of their respective offices; and yet it does not appear to be doubted but that the sheriff, the treasurer, and these others all fail to use and possess the office until they give the bond as well as take the oath. Before the collector enters upon the duties of his office, before he can use the office—before he can possess the office—before he can hold or execute the duties of the office, the collector must give the bond and take the prescribed oath. It is not pretended that the defendant has either given or offered to give any bond required by law. The defendant may yet be deemed to have refused to serve as collector, as it has been found from the statute "that if he does not give such security and take such oath within the prescribed time, such neglect shall be deemed a refusal to serve." If he thus neglects, then no harm results to anyone, and no one has any wrong of which to complain; "such neglect shall be deemed a refusal to serve"—that is to say, such neglect shall amount to a failure to possess or use the office.

From all these considerations—from the fact that the information cannot be allowed unless there be a user by the defendant, and from the fact that there can be no user until the party shall have given the required bond, and until he shall have taken the prescribed oath, therefore, it follows that no cause of complaint exists as against the defendant. The prayer of the petition in this behalf for leave to file an information in the nature of a quo warranto in the name of the people of the State of Illinois is denied.

Immediately after the rendering of the decision, the counsel for the relator asked for an appeal, which was granted, and the petitioner was allowed twenty days in which to file his appeal bonds.

The report was placed on file.

THE SUMMER VACATION.

Mr. W. C. Goudy, from the committee appointed at a previous meeting to confer with the judges of the various courts in regard to the summer vacation, reported that the judges had decided to take a recess during the coming months of July and August, they doing chamber business only. The month of September would not be included in the vacation, although it was decided that any member of the profession who should be necessarily engaged in attendance upon the Supreme Court of the State during that month would be excused, and practically the month would be included in the vacation term.

CALL OF THE DOCKETS.

At a former meeting of the association a committee was appointed to confer with the federal judges in regard to the call of the docket in the federal courts. Mr. W. H. King reported in behalf of that committee, that the matter was not considered at the meeting of the various judges, although the federal judges were present.

Mr. Bond desired to call the attention of the association to the equity calendar in the federal courts, and mentioned the delay before trial could be arrived at. He thought some protection was necessary for home attorneys from foreign attorneys. Mr. Sleeper referred to the system adopted by Judge Moore in disposing of the chancery business in the Cook county superior Court, and remarked that it doubled the business if the two chancery judges on the circuit side, and intimated that the courts could conduct their business with greater facility with the co-operation of the bar; he thought some arrangement might be made in this matter that would result beneficially to all interested. Following these views, Judge E. A. Otis offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the committee having in charge the matter of consulting with the judges of the United States Circuit court as to a call of the calendar, be requested to confer with the judges of the Circuit court hearing chancery causes, and urge upon them the adoption of a practice in relation to the call of their dockets similar to that adopted by Judge Moore in the superior court. And also to see the judges of the United States courts and urge the adoption of the practice of a chancery calendar and call as above indicated.

On motion, Messrs. Otis, Sleeper and McCoy were added to the committee, and the resolution of Judge Otis was carried.

RESIGNATION OF MR. LOCKWOOD.

Mr. H. W. Jackson tendered the resignation of Mr. Joseph D. Lockwood as a member of the board of managers, and stated that this action was owing to the impaired health of Mr. Lockwood.

The resignation was thereupon accepted.

RECEPTION OF CHIEF JUSTICE WAITE.

Mr. Jackson also stated to the meeting that, as the former secretary of the association, he was requested to interview Chief Justice Waite some months ago, as he passed through Chicago to attend a meeting of the board of directors of the Soldiers' Home at Milwaukee, of which he was a member, as to his pleasure at receiving a reception at the hands of the Chicago Bar Association. This he had done, and the chief justice intimated that upon his next visit to Milwaukee he would be pleased to accept of the courtesies of the association during his stay in Chicago. He therefore moved that Secretary Ullmann be instructed to correspond with Judge Waite, in order to ascertain at what time he expected to be again in the city, so that suitable preparations could be made for the reception of their anticipated guest. The secretary was thereupon instructed in accordance with the motion.

HIRAM M. CHASE.

President McCagg referred in a touching manner to the death of the late lamented Hiram M. Chase, a member of the association, and said that it would be only proper that some action should be taken in regard to his death. They knew there were many acts during his life-time that endeared the deceased individually to his associates, and there was more than one member of the bar who could lay a chaplet upon the grave of their deceased brother. It would be a source of pleasure to his widow to know that some such action had taken place.

Mr. W. H. King thought the association should take the same action upon the death of one of its members as did the legal profession at a late meeting held at the Law Institute in regard to the death of Mr. Chase, and, therefore, he would move that a committee be appointed to draft resolutions expressive of their manifold regrets for the demise of Brother Chase.

Mr. Black suggested that inasmuch as the vacation was so near at hand the association would not have the time to pass upon these resolutions when drawn, therefore he would move, as a substitute, that the committee be authorized to draft a brief memorial to the memory of the dead, and a copy be presented to his family; also that the same be enrolled upon the books of the association. The substitute was accepted and passed, the chair reserving the appointment of the committee to some future but early day, in order that it might ascertain who of the association were most intimately associated with Mr. Chase in his life.

JUDGE DRUMMOND'S PORTRAIT.

The regular business being disposed of, Mr. McCagg referred to the life like portrait of his honor Judge Drummond, of the United States circuit court, that adorned their rooms, and which had lately been presented to them.

He said:

It gives me great pleasure to call the attention of the members present to the portrait of Judge Drummond, recently presented to the association. It evidences, as it hangs on our walls, the appreciation in which his brethren, the men who by daily contact with him know him best, hold the distinguished judge who has so long adorned the bench of this country; their esteem and regard for him, and their recognition of the probity and judicial knowledge which has marked his long career.

It serves also to show that the bar is not unmindful of the value of such an example, and that kindly relations exist between the two. It is a large measure of power that is committed to a judge—perhaps the only approach to a despotism known to our government. To so wield it as to commend it, is high praise. To be able to say that it has been so wielded—that no thought of prejudice or injustice has entered into the minds of those men who, day by day, must see their own convictions overruled—is not only praise to the judge, but shows a willingness to criticise fairly, to exercise, so far as may be, a dispassionate judgment, which is creditable to the members of our profession. For both it evidences both.

The thanks of the association are due to the gentlemen through whose kindness it has become the property of the association, and to Judge Drummond for consenting to sit for it.

Mr. S. A Goodwin followed Mr. McCagg with a beautiful tribute to the integrity of Judge Drummond, and a vote of thanks was extended to the gentlemen who had presented the picture of the great and eminent jurist to the association.

The meeting then adjourned till the first Saturday in September next.

LVI. NEW HAMPSHIRE REPORTS.

We are under obligations to Hon. JOHN M. SHIRLEY, official reporter, for advance sheets of the LVI. Volume of New Hampshire Reports, from which we take the following head-notes:

STATUTE OF FRAUDS—PAROL AGREEMENT TO CONVEY LAND.

Gordon v. Gordon.—p. 183.

The plaintiff being indebted to H. L. G., husband of the defendant, conveyed to him certain real estate, with the parol agreement that he would reconvey to the plaintiff upon payment of the debt. H. L. G. died without having reconveyed the premises. After his death, the plaintiff, for the purpose of restoring the legal title to himself, entered into a parol agreement with the administrator of the deceased, and with the defendant, by the terms of which he was to be allowed a debt of $4,042.16 against the estate of the deceased: the administrator was to obtain license and sell the premises. The plaintiff was to bid off the same at $5,000, being the amount allowed the plaintiff against the estate, with $957.84 more still due from the plaintiff, according to the parol contract, for a reconveyance; and the defendant at the same time agreed by parol to convey her right of dower to the plaintiff. The administrator obtained license, and sold the premises to the plaintiff for $5,000, who paid $957.84 to the administrator (being the difference between $5,000 and $4,042.16), and received from him a deed of the premises. The administrator accounted for said sum as assets belonging to the estate. The defendant refused to convey her right of dower to the plaintiff, but demanded and caused the same to be set out to her. The plaintiff brought this suit to recover one-third part of said sum of $5,000. Held, that the plaintiff could not recover.

HIGHWAY—APPEAL—LAYING OUT, WHEN INVALID—WAIVER.

Underwood v. Bailey.—p. 187.

Where a condition is affixed to the laying out of a highway for the accommodation of a person applying therefor, any land-owner, or other person aggrieved and appealing from such laying out, may take advantage of the illegality resulting from the imposition of such condition, notwithstanding the individual for whose benefit the highway was laid out is willing to assent to such imposition.

In such a case, the party aggrieved will not be regarded as having waived his objections, by a neglect to give notice of or specify them at the first term of court to which the report of the commissioners upon his appeal was returned.

REMOVAL TO FEDERAL COURT — PETITION FOR, WHEN ENTERTAINED.

Chandler v. Coe.—p. 184.

In accordance with the provisions of the revised statutes of the United States, enacted June 22, 1874, and the subsequent act of congress of March 3, 1875, a cause will not be removed from a State court to the Circuit court of the United States, unless the petition for such removal be filed in the State court before or at the term at which said cause could first be tried, and before the first trial thereof.

Such petition will not, therefore, be entertained, when filed in the State court after a verdict in the cause has been rendered, notwithstanding the verdict may have been set aside for error and a new trial ordered.

THE RAILWAY PASSENGER DUTY.—The whole question of the railway passenger duty is now being considered by a Select Committee of the House of Commons, but (says the Law Times) it is well to call attention to the case of North London Railway Company v. The Attorney-General (34 L. T. Rep. N. S., 297), which we reported last week. It appears that the House of Lords affirmed the judgment of the Court of Exchequer—that the duty is payable in respect of third-class trains not stopping at all stations—but affirmed that judgment for different reasons. The judgment of the Court of Exchequer proceeded on the very slight distinction between signal and market stations on the one hand, and general stations on the other, and held that the dispensing power of the Board of Trade as to stoppage could only be exercised with reference to stations of the former character. The House of Lords takes a wider view, and holds that the dispensing power of the Board cannot be exercised as to stoppage at all. Lord Hatherley observes, that to give such a dispensing power to the Board of Trade would be to "say that there are a certain number of persons residing along the line who shall have no benefit from the cheap trains whatever." The decision is an important one at the present juncture, and will probably lead, at least, to an alteration in the form of the law. The judgments contain no remarks on the policy of the tax, and the alleged unfairness of it in the case of companies who give a certain proportion of third-class passengers far better accommodation than the Cheap Trains Act was intended to secure for them.

SCOTCH LAW COURTS.—Most people know the irreverent and slovenly way in which the oath is administered to English witnesses. The witness hurries up to the box, and while judge and jury and the spectators are chatting and rustling in a pause of the business, the clerk of the court hands him a small Bible, which he holds in his right hand. The officer then recites his mumbled formula—"The evidence you shall give to the court and jury, touching the matter in question, shall be the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. So help you God!" The witness, without uttering a word, ducks his head and puts his lips to the Bible cover, unless he is cunning and ignorant enough to evade the ceremony by kissing his thumb. Now, in Scotch courts the proceedure is far more dignified and impressive. When the witness appears, the judge himself rises from his seat, and raising high his right hand, looks fixedly on the offerer of the evidence, who, as instructed, also raises high his right arm, and looks the judge in the face. The judge, then, amid general silence, calls the witness to say aloud after him—"I swear by Almighty God to speak the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth!" No paltry symbol is added to the simple solemnity of this declaration, which appears likely to be far more binding on the conscience of him who makes it before the judge, and in the silence of the crowded court. —Leisure Hour.

UNWISE PUBLICITY.—Any remarks on the extraordinary case sub judice, in which murder or conspiring to compass death is alleged, would, of course, be illtimed and reprehensible; but we (Lancet) cannot refrain from a passing censure of the restless way in which pseudo-medical suggestions are placed before the public. It is quite within the range of possibility that some weak-minded persons without the wit to detect the gross absurdity of statements—remarkable chiefly for their grotesque ignorance—contained in certain letters which have been printed in evidence, may be induced to practice the supreme folly indicated. Whether this contingency actually occurs is unimportant to the point to which we call attention, namely, the inexpediency—we had almost said the lawlessness—of this custom of publishing anything and everything that appears in court as "evidence." The procedure evinces a strange disregard of public safety.

INTERESTING TO ARTISTS.—A judgment of great interest to artists has just been given by the Tribunal of Correctional Police at Bruges, in Belgium, and afterwards by the Court of Appeal at Ghent. The painter Carolus had prosecuted a picture-dealer of Brussels, named Flevez, for offering for sale a copy of the artist's work, "The Departure of the Newly-married Couple," on which the signature of J. Carolus had been imitated. The price demanded was 2,000f. The tribunal decided that a dealer who purchased a picture has a right to have it copied, with the signature, if the painter in selling it has not stipulated to the contrary, and that there would be no fraud unless the reproduction was sold as the original. That verdict was confirmed by the Court of Appeal.

TRADE-MARKS.—Mr. Sampson Lloyd, M. P., has addressed a letter to the Foreign Office, on behalf of the Chambers of Commerce, asking that provision should be made in all treaties of commerce that protection should be given to all British trade-marks, and the following reply has been received: "I am directed by the Earl of Derby to state that provision has been made in all treaties of commerce recently concluded between this country and foreign powers, and that communications are now taking place between her Majesty's Government and the Swiss Government, with the view to secure more effectual protection in Switzerland for British trade-marks.—I am, &c., T. V. LISTER."

The Courts.

UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT.

No. 856.—OCTOBER TERM, 1875.

JOHN WARREN and J. KEARNEY WARREN, Plaintiffs in Error,
v.
SHERIDAN SHOOK, late Collector of Internal Revenue.

In Error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York.

INTERNAL REVENUE—WHO IS A BANKER—WHO IS A BROKER. WITHIN THE MEANING OF THE REVENUE LAWS—WHO LIABLE TO PAY A SPECIAL TAX.

This case was tried upon the following agreed statement of facts:

First. "That the plaintiffs, from the first day of April, 1865, to the first day of May, 1866, were copartners in the city of New York, doing business under the firm name of 'John Warren & Son.'"

Second. That during such time the plaintiffs, as such copartners, had a place of business in the thirty-second collection district of New York, where credits were opened by the deposit and collection of money and currency subject to be paid or remitted upon draft, check, or order, and where money was advanced and loaned by plaintiffs on stocks, bonds, bullion, bills of exchange and promissory notes, and where stocks, bonds, bullion, bills of exchange, and promissory notes were received by plaintiffs for discount and sale.

Third. That during the period aforesaid, the said plaintiffs, as such copartners, duly paid the special tax imposed upon them as bankers, in accordance with the provisions of the seventy-ninth section of the act of Congress entitled "An act to provide internal revenue to support the government," etc., approved June 30th, 1864.

Fourth. That during the period aforesaid the defendant was collector of internal revenue for the said thirty-second collection district of New York.

Fifth. That during the period aforesaid the plaintiffs bought and sold stock and gold, both of their own property on their own account, and also upon commission for other parties.

The sales in question were of three kinds:

First. Sales of their own property.

Second. Sales of gold, stocks, bonds, bullion, etc., transmitted to them by their correspondents, and the same or the proceeds drawn against; in some of which cases the sales of the transmitted property were made immediately, and the proceeds at once applied to the payments of drafts so drawn; and in others of which the drafts were accepted or paid; and the gold, stock, etc., were held for a better market, or to await further orders, and in the meantime stood as their security for their advances, and to provide reimbursement therefor. In other cases there were no actual advances, but the property held for sale, and, when sold by order of the customer, the proceeds were placed to credit, subject to draft.

Third. Sales of stock made in pursuance of an arangement for what is called carrying stocks on a margin, wherein they, upon a deposit with them of a per centage on the amount of the stocks, advance money and purchase stock for the dealer or speculator, (who dealt in hope of making a profit by the rise in the market price), and held the same subject to his order to sell, and finally sold the same for his account as to profit and loss. These transactions were conducted in the name of the plaintiffs, the name of the customer not being disclosed to those to whom the stocks were finally sold.

Upon these purchases and sales they charged and received for their customers the usual commission for purchasing and selling stocks for account of others, and the tax imposed and paid to the United States on the sales were also charged to such customer. If the transaction showed a profit, it was paid to the customer, with a return to him of the cash or security held as a margin. If the transaction resulted in a loss, the amount of such margin returned to the customer was correspondingly reduced.

Sixth. That during the period aforesaid the assessor of internal revenue for the said district assessed monthly against the said plaintiffs, the tax of one-twentieth of one per centum on stock, securities, gold, etc., provided for by the ninety-ninth section of the act aforesaid, to be paid by brokers, and bankers doing business as brokers, and assessed such tax against the plaintiffs alike upon the securities, stocks, bulion, etc., sold by them on commission for others, and upon those owned by said plaintiffs and sold by them upon their own account.

Seventh. That at the times of the said several assessments so made by said assessor, the plaintiffs protested against their liability to pay and against the right of the said assessor to impose or assess the said tax of one-twentieth of one per centum, or any other sum whatever, upon the value of the stocks, gold, or securities owned by said plaintiffs and sold by them upon and for their owu account, and not upon commission or for others.

Eighth. That the assessment-roll containing said assessment was transmitted to the said defendant as such collector, and the said defendant as such collector demanded from said plaintffs the whole sum so assessed against them by said assessor as and for the said tax, and the plaintiffs were compelled to pay, and did pay under protest to the said defendant as such collector, the said tax upon the whole amount of their sales during said period, including sales made on their own account as aforesaid.

Ninth. That the amount of such payments so made by the said plaintiffs, with the dates thereof, are correctly set forth in the schedule hereto annexed, marked "A," the first column in such schedule showing the whole amount of such tax paid at the respective dates therein indicated; and the second column showing the portions of said several payments which were for taxes upon sales made by plaintiffs upon their own account and not upon commission, and which plaintiffs seek in this action to recover.

Tenth. That about the third day of December, 1870, the plaintiffs duly appealed pursuant to law and the regulations of the Treasury Department, made in pursuance thereof, to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, from the assessment and collection of said taxes, imposed upon said plaintiffs, upon sales made by them upon their own account, and claimed by them to be erroneously and illegally assessed against and collected from them. And the said commissioner, on the 24th day of May, 1871, and less than six months before the commencement of this action, rendered his decision upon said appeal adversely to these plaintiffs.

No further evidence was offered by either party.

Thereupon the counsel moved the said court that judgment be entered for the defendant, and said plaintiffs' counsel moved that judgment be entered for the plaintiffs.

After argument and deliberation, the court decied the said motion of said plaintiffs' counsel, whereupon the said counsel for the plaintiffs did then and there duly except thereto.

The court then directed that judgment be entered for the defendant; to which direction and conclusions of law of the court upon the foregoing facts set forth in said direction, the said plaintiffs' counsel then and there duly excepted.

B. K. PHELPS, for the plaintiffs in error.

EDWIN B. SMITH, Asst. Atty.-Gen., for the defendant in error.

Mr. Justice HUNT delivered the opinion of the court.

The plaintiffs were licensed brokers in the city of New York. They also bought and sold gold and stocks for others upon a commission paid to them for that service. On their own account they also dealt largely in gold and stocks. They have paid the taxes imposed by the revenue laws upon bankers. The government agents have now imposed upon them and collected the taxes chargeable by law upon brokers. This includes the tax of one twentieth of one per cent. upon sales made by the plaintiffs on their own account, as well as upon sales made for others. It is to this that the plaintiffs object, and the present action is brought to recover back such taxes.

The questions would seem to be—

1st. Do the transactions specified make the defendants brokers within the meaning of the revenue laws?

2d. Are licensed bankers, who also do business as brokers, liable to the additional tax imposed upon brokers?

3d. More precisely, are the plaintiffs liable to pay taxes upon sales made on their own account as well as when made for others?

Section 110 of the act to provide internal revenue, etc., approved June 30, 1864, (13 U. S. Stat. at Large, 277,) imposes a duty of one-twenty-fourth of 1 per cent. each month on deposits, one twenty-fourth of 1 per cent. each month on the capital, one-twelfth of 1 per cent. each month on the circulation, and an additional one-sixth of 1 per cent. on certain specified excess of circulation, to be paid by "any bank, association, company, or corporation, or person engaged in the business of banking, beyond the amount invested in United States bonds."

Section 79 subdivision of the same act, (13 U. S. Stat. at Large, p. 251,) provides "that bankers using or employing a capital not exceeding the sum of $50,000 shall pay $100 for each license," and for every additional $1,000 of capital $2, and that "every person, firm, or company, and every incorporated or other bank having a place of business where credits are opened by the deposit or collection of money or currency, subject to be paid or remitted upon draft, check, or order, or where money is advanced or loaned on stocks, bonds, bullion, bills of exchange, or promissory notes, or where stocks, bonds, bullion, bills of exchange, or promissory notes are received for discount or sale, shall be regarded a banker under this act."

The same section 79, subdivision 9, as amended by the act of March 3, 1865, (13 U. S. Stat. at Large, p. 252, 472,) provides "that every person, firm, or company, except such as hold a license as a banker, whose business it is, as a broker, to negotiate purchases or sales of stocks, exchange, bullion, coined money, bank notes, promissory notes, or other securities for themselves or others, shall be regarded as a broker under this act; provided, that any person holding a license as a banker shall not be required to take out a license as a broker," and it further provides that "brokers shall pay fifty dollars for each license."

The 99th section of the same act provides (13 U. S. Stat. at Large, 273) "that all brokers and bankers doing business as brokers, shall be subject to pay the following duties and rates of duties upon the sales of merchandise, produce, gold and silver, bullion, foreign exchange, uncurrent money, promissory notes, stocks, bonds, and other securities, as hereinafter mentioned, etc., that is to say, upon all sales and contracts for sales of stocks and bonds, one-twentieth of one per centum on the par value thereof, and of gold and silver, bullion and coin, foreign exchange, promissory notes, or other securities, one-twentieth of one per centum on the amount of such sales and of all contracts for sales."

The sections we have quoted furnish satisfactory definitions of the business of a banker and of that of a broker. "Every person, etc., having a place of business where credits are opened by the deposit or collection of money or currency, subject to be paid or remitted upon draft, check, or order, or where money is advanced on stocks, bonds, bullion, bills of exchange, or promissory notes, or where stocks, bonds, bullion, bills of exchange, or promissory notes, are received for discount or sale, shall be regarded as a banker under this act."—(§ 79, sub. 1.)

Having a place of business where deposits are received and paid out on checks, and where money is loaned upon security, is the substance of the business of a banker.

By the same section, sub. 9, a broker is defined to be one whose business it is to negotiate purchases or sales of stocks, exchange, bullion, coined money, bank notes, promissory notes, or other securities for himself or for others. Ordinarily, the term broker is applied to one acting for others, but the part of the definition which speaks of purchases and sales for himself, is equally important as that which speaks of sales and purchases for others. All parts of the definition are qualified by the words "whose business it is." Thus, if A. B. has ten thousand dollars which he desires to invest, and purchases United States stock, or State stock, or any other securities, he does not thereby become a broker. Nor if he owns ten thousand dollars of U. S. stock which he wishes to sell to raise money to pay his debts, or because he is not satisfied with six per cent. interest, is he thereby made a broker. It is only when making sales and purchases is his business, his trade, his profession, his means of getting his living or of making his fortune, that he becomes a broker within the meaning of the statute. Nor is it believed that a sale by one doing a banking business only, of a security received by him for the repayment of a legitimate loan, would make him a broker and subject to the tax. This would not be deemed an act of brokerage, either under the statute or upon general principles of law. When it is his business, the statute properly holds all such acts, whether in the name of himself ostensibly or in the name of others, as the acts of a broker. The danger and the facility for evasion of the statute, furnish excellent reasons for the adoption of this provision.

The contention of the plaintiffs is, that because they hold a license as bankers, they are not liable to the duty of one-twentieth of one per centum on sales made on their own account This is based upon the words of § 79, sub. 9, that all persons, &c., except such as hold a license as bankers, shall be liable to this duty on sales made for themselves as well as others, and upon the further suggestion that section ninety-nine does not contain the words "for themselves and others." We agree with the statement of Mr. Justice Grier in Fisk v. U. S., 3 Wall., 445, that the idea of Congress would have been better expressed, if the words "for themselves or others" had been inserted in section ninety nine, rather than where they are now found. Still we find no difficulty in reaching the conclusion that the tax in this case was properly imposed.

The intent of Congress to subject to taxation all sales made by those engaged in the business of brokers, is plain enough. When it was said (§ 99) "that all brokers and bankers doing business as brokers, shall be subject" to the duties specified, it was intended to encompass the entire class of persons engaged in the business of buying and selling stocks and coin. Brokers were included by name and by definition. Bankers would not so certainly be embraced by the definition given in section 79, subdivision one. To meet this possible exception, it was enacted. that when bankers should do the business of brokers, they should be subject to the duty specified. In this manner brokers technically, and bankers doing the business of brokers, were made liable to the duty. If the right to tax bankers upon sales made for themselves rested on the seventy-ninth section alone, a plausible argument could be made in the plaintiff's favor, arising from the words "except such as hold a license as a banker." But when we read in section ninety-nine, "that all brokers and bankers doing business as brokers" shall be subject to the tax, and consider the statutory definition of a broker, the plausibility of the argument ceases.

We have carefully considered the cases of U. S. v. Fisk, 3 Wall, 445; U. S. v. Cutting, Ib., 441, and Clark v Gilbert, 5 Blatch., 330, but do not deem it necessary to comment upon them in detail.

The judgment is affirmed.

UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT.

No. 150.—OCTOBER TERM, 1875.

G. W. HARTMAN v. BATES COUNTY.

In Error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Western District of Missouri.

TOWNSHIP RAILROAD AID BONDS—WHEN VOID.

1. CONSTITUTIONAL RESTRICTION.—The restriction in the Constitution against the issuing of railroad aid bonds, applies as well to townships as to counties, cities and towns.

2. THE RECITALS IN THE BONDS.—That sufficient notice of the objections to the validity of the bonds, stated in the opinion, is contained in the recital of the bonds.

3. CONSOLIDATION OF COMPANY.—The court states the effect of the consolidation of a railroad to which a subscription has been granted, with another road.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

Mr. Justice BRADLEY delivered the opinion of the court.

This is an action brought to recover the amount due on certain coupons attached to bonds of Bates county, Missouri, issued at the request and on account of Mount Pleasant township, in said county, in payment of a subscription on behalf of the township to the capital stock of the Lexington, Lake and Gulf Railroad Company. The subscription was made under a law of Missouri, called the "Township Aid Act," passed in 1868, by which, on the application of twenty-five tax-payers and residents of any township for election purposes in any county, the county court may order an election to be held in such township to determine whether, and on what terms a subscription to any railroad to be built in or near the township shall be made; and if two-thirds of the qualified voters of the township, voting at such election, are in favor of the subscription, the County court shall make it in behalf of the township, and if bonds are proposed to pay the subscription, the court shall issue such bonds in the name of the county, but to be provided for by the township. It is contended that this law is repugnant to the 14th section of article 11 of the Constitution of Missouri, adopted in 1865, by which it is declared that "the general assembly shall not authorize any county, city, or town to become a stockholder in, or to loan its credit to, any company, association, or corporation, unless two-thirds of the qualified voters of such county, city, or town, at a regular or special election to be held therein, shall assent thereto." Now, the law of 1868, only requires the assent of two-thirds of the qualified voters who vote at such election. This is certainly a broad difference; and if the constitutional restriction extends, by implication, to townships as well as to counties, cities and towns, an election not conforming to the requirements of the constitution, would be invalid, and confer no authority to make a subscription. The petition in this case only alleges that two-thirds of the qualified voters voting at the election voted in favor of the subscription, which does not satisfy the demands of the Constitution. The question therefore arises whether townships are within the restriction of the constitutional provision. A township is a different thing from a town in the organic law of Missouri, the latter being an incorporated municipality, the former only a geographical subdivision of a county. As said in the State v. Linn County Court, 44 Mo., 510, "it has no power by itself to make independent contracts or to become bound in its separate capacity. The law has not invested it with that power. It forms an integral part of the county and the county to a certain extent controls and acts for it." That the framers of the Constitution intended to require the assent of two-thirds of all qualified voters of a "county, city or town," as a prerequsite to a subscription to a railroad or other company, and did not intend the same thing with regard to townships, seems almost absurd. It was undoubtedly supposed that every case was provided for. The 13th section of article 11 declared that the credit of the State should not be given or used in aid of corporations; the 14th section then imposes the restriction referred to with regard to counties, cities and towns. This specification embraced every political organization which could be supposed capable of making a subscription. To contend that the mere subdivisions of counties into townships enabled the legislature to defeat the constitutional provision is to ignore the manifest intention and spirit of that instrument. It cannot be possible that it was intended to restrict the legislature as to counties and not to restrict it as to mere sectional portions of counties. Had counties alone been mentioned there might have been no restriction as t cities and towns, because they are separate and distinct organizations, corporate in character and often clothed with legislative functions. But in Missouri, in 1865, when the Constitution was adopted, a township had no corporate character, but, as before stated, was a mere geographical section of a county, partitioned off for purposes of local convenience in the matter of elections and a few other things. They had no power to act as corporate bodies. If the legislature could clothe these geographical portions of a county with power to subscribe to stock companies at all, it certainly could not set at naught the constitutional requirement of the people's consent thereto.

The court below did not decide the case on this ground, probably in consequence of certain decisions of the State courts which were deemed inconsistent with it. But we are not aware of any decisions of those courts, which hold that the constitutional restriction in question could be ignored with regard to townships any more than with regard to counties, cities or towns.

Another objection to the validity of the subscription for which the bonds were given in this case is, that the township voted a subscription to one company, and the county court subscribed to another. This is sought to be justified on the ground that the former company became consolidated with another, thereby forming a third, to whose stock the subscription was made. This consolidation was effected under a law of Missouri authorizing consolidation and declaring that the company formed from two companies should be entitled to all the powers, rights, privileges and immunities which belong to either, and it is contended that this provision of the law justified the County court in making the subscription without further authority from the people of the township But did not the authority cease by the extinction of the company voted for? No subscription had been made. No vested right had accrued to the company. The case of The State v. Linn County Court (44 Mo., 504), only decides that if the County court refuses to issue bonds after making a subscription, a mandamus will lie to issue them. There the authority had been executed and a right had be come vested. But so long as it remains unexecuted, the occurrence of any event which creates a revocation in law will extinguish the power. The extinction of the company in whose favor the subscription was authorized worked such a revocation. The law authorizing the consolidation of railroad companies does not change the law of attorney and constituent. It may transfer the vested rights of one railroad company to another upon a consolidation being effected; but it does not continue in existence powers to subscribe for stock given by one person to another, which, by the general law, are extinguished by such a change. It does not profess to do so, and we think that it does not do so by implication.

As sufficient notice of these objections is contained in the recitals of these bonds themselves to put the holder on inquiry, we think there is no error in the judgment of the Circuit court, and it is therefore affirmed.

UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT.

OPINION FILED MAY. 8, 1876.

WILLIAM BURDELL et al. v. AUGUSTUS DENNING et al

In Error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of Ohio

DAMAGES FOR THE INFRINGEMENT OF A PATENT RIGHT.

1. IN CASES WHERE PROFITS ARE THE MEASURE.—In cases where profits are the proper measure, it is the profits which the infringer makes, or ought to make, which govern, and not the profits which plaintiff can show that he might have made.
2. PROFITS—ACTION AT LAW.—That profits are not the primary or true criterion of damages for infringement in an action at law. That rule applies mainly to cases in equity, and is based upon the idea that the infringer shall be converted into a trustee, as to those profits, for the owner of the patent which he infringes.
3. SALES OF LICENSES.—That the court has repeatedly held that the sale of licenses of machines or of a royalty established, constitutes the primary and true criterion of damages in an action at law.
4. CONTRACT CONSTRUED.—The court construes the instrument offered in evidence, and finds that it was a contract, and not revokable.
5. EVIDENCE.—That it was competent to introduce the receipt showing the payment of money after the commencement of the suit—not for the purpose of defeating the action, but to reduce the damages.—ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

Mr. Justice MILLER delivered the opinion of the court.

The plaintiffs in error were plaintiffs in the Circuit court in an action for an infringement of the patent of A. B. Wilson, for a feeding device in sewing machines. They recovered a judgment for $125, but insist that they were entitled to a much larger judgment, of which they were deprived by the rulings of the court in the progress of the trial.

The objections to these rulings will be considered by us under three heads, to which all the assignments of error relate.

1. As to the measure of damages.

Evidence was given tending to prove that plaintiffs had advertised to sell their machines, and had actually sold a shop-right to use one of them for $12.50, and has given a verbal license to another person to use an old machine in his house for $5, but afterwards refused to sell or license for Franklin county, and told defendants they desired to retain the use of the machine as a close monopoly. Evidence had also been given as to profits made by defendants. On this testimony they asked the court to instruct the jury that "this testimony was not sufficient to change the rule of damages from the profits which plaintiffs would have made if they had not been embarrassed by the interference of the defendants, to a mere license price, because they do not establish a customary charge for the right to use the invention in Franklin county," which the court refused.

There are two sufficient objections to this prayer:

1. In cases where profits are the proper measure, it is the profits which the infringer makes, or ought to make, which governs, and not the profits which plaintiff can show that he might have made.

2. Profits are not the primary or true criterion of damages for infringement in an actiou at law. That rule applies eminently and mainly to cases in equity, and is based upon the idea that the infringer shall be converted into a trustee, as to those profits, for the owner of the patent which he infringes—a principle which is very difficult to apply in a trial before a jury, but quite appropriate on a reference to a master, who can examine defendant's books and papers, and examine him on oath, as well as all his clerks and emyloyees.

On the other hand, we have repeatedly held that sales of licenses of machines or of a royalty established, constitute the primary and true criterion of damages in the action at law.

No doubt, in the absence of satisfactory evidence of either class in the forum to which it is most appropriate, the other may be resorted to as one of the elements on which the damages or the compensation may be ascertained, but it cannot be admitted, as the prayer which was refused implies, that in an action at law the profits which the other party might have made is the primary or controling measure of damages. (Packet Company v. Sickles, 19 Wall., 617.)

2. A paper was introduced in evidence by defendants, signed Sarah Burdell, authorizing H. Crary, for the full term of four years, to sell, use, and grant to others the right to use in said county of Franklin, A. B. Wilson's sewing machines. It was agreed that the paper should have the same effect as if signed by Wm. Burdell and the other plaintiff in whom the title was when it was executed. It is too long a paper to insert here, but will be given verbatim by the reporter, and its true construction is the foundation of the alleged error of the court in admitting it, and also in admitting a receipt given to the defendants by Crary for the use of four of he machines for which they were sued.

It is claimed that the instrument is but a power of attorney, revocable at the pleasure of the maker, and that it was so revoked before the receipt given in evidence was executed by Crary.

But we are of a different opinion. We think the instrument is a contract. That Crary acquired rights under it for four years, which, whether he may have so acted or not as to enable plaintiffs to have it rescinded or set aside in a suit in chancery, could not be revoked at their mere volition; and that these rights were such that his receipt for the use of the four machines mentioned in it was a valid acquittance of any claim for the same thing by plaintiffs in this suit.

It is said that the court erred in admitting the receipt in bar of the action, because it was executed after the suit was brought and could not be so used without a special plea setting it up.

The fallacy of this argument consists in assuming that it was introduced as a bar to the action. It was only used to reduce the amount of the recovery and not as a complete bar, and as it excluded from the computation of damages only four machines, out of a larger number, it was admissible under the general issue, or any other form of plea which left the amount of recovery in dispute.

We see no error in this branch of the case.

3. The defendants introduced also the following paper, and gave evidence of an assignment by Lowe to Singer & Co., and of a license from Singer & Co., to defendants:

"In consideration of the sum of eighty dollars, to me paid by J. Payne Lowe, the receipt whereof is acknowledged, I do hereby assign, transfer and set over unto the said Lowe, his representatives and assigns, the exclusive right to use, and sell to others to be used, in the county of Franklin, in the State of Ohio, Singer's patent sewing machines, as mentioned in the patent granted to Isaac M. Singer, dated August 12th, 1851, together with the right to have the said machines delivered to be used, or sold to be used, in said county of Franklin, in the State of Ohio.

"And I hereby covenant that I have good right to make the assignment aforesaid.

"In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and seal, this 4th day of February, A.D. 1857.

"Wm. Burdell. [Seal.]"

Evidence was also given tending to show that the machines called Singer machines, used by the defendants, were made as Singer's machines had always been made.

And after all the testimony was closed the plaintiff asked the court to instruct the jury that the license of Burdell to J. Payne Lowe, of the 4th of February, 1857, did not authorize him, and those deriving rights under that license, to use in the machine known and called Singer machine, in said county of Franklin, the feeding device patented to A. B. Wilson, which the court refused to give, but did charge the jury that the said license authorized the said Lowe and all claiming title from him, to use in Franklin county the Singer machine, with a feeding device operating upon the principle and plan of that patented to Wilson; to which refusal of the court to charge as asked, and to the said charge as given, the plaintiffs then and there excepted.

In defense of this ruling it is said that Burdell never had any interest in the Singer patent, that the instrument called the Singer machine, which was in use when Burdell made the above assignment to Lowe, was a Singer machine with the Wilson feeding device, and that as Burdell did own the patent for this device, what he intended to assign was the right to use the Singer machine with that device. It is certainly true that in constructing a written instrument, it is necessary and admissible to look to all the surrounding circumstances of the transaction which are necessary to discover its meaning. And it may be admitted that if the facts above stated were conceded to be true, it would follow that the reasonable construction of the contract would be such as the court held it to be. The refusal of the court to give the instruction asked by counsel for plaintiffs was, therefore, justifiable.

But these facts were not conceded by plaintiffs. Nor does the bill of exceptions say that they were proved. It says nothing at all about Burdell's interest, or want of interest, in the Singer patent; and in regard to use of the Wilson feeding device in the Singer machine, it says no more than that there was evidence tending to prove that it had always been so used in all these machines.

If these things were not proved, then there was no ground for the construction of the contract given by the court, and whether they were proved or not, was a matter for the jury and not for the court to decide. The jury may not have believed the witnesses, or if believed, may not have found their testimony established what the bill of exceptions declares it tended to prove. The court, therefore, in telling the jury peremptorily, on this testimony, that the license to Lowe did authorize him to use the Singer machine with a feeding device operating upon the principle and plan of that patented by Wilson, took away from the jury the right to weigh that testimony. If the judge had said that if they believed these facts to be established, then the license to Lowe authorized the use of the Wilson device in the Singer machine, we would affirm the judgment, but because he, in this respect, assumed a function which belonged to the jury, and for that reason alone, the judgment must be reversed and a new trial awarded.

U. S. CIRCUIT COURTS, SIXTH JUDICIAL CIRCUIT.

(Ohio, Michigan, Kentucky and Tennessee.)

Before Hon. FLAMEN BALL, Register.

In re JOHN K. BOOTH, Bankrupt.

ARE FUNDS BELONGING TO A BANKRUPT'S ESTATE, IN THE HANDS OF AN ASSIGNEE IN BANKRUPTCY, SUBJECT TO A LOCAL TAXATION.

We publish below the decision of the Hon. Flamen Ball, Register in Bankruptcy for the Second District of Ohio, (the former law-partner of the late Chief Justice Salmon P. Chase), on an apparently new question, namely:—whether the funds belonging to a bankrupt's estate are subject to local taxation, and must be listed for that purpose by the assignee. The opinion of Register Ball is fully indorsed by Judge Swing, United States Judge for the Southern District of Ohio, and the question was not taken to a higher tribunal, both parties being satisfied with the correctness of the decision of Register Ball.

The facts of the case are as follows:

On the 7th day of January, 1876, the Treasurer of Hamilton County, Ohio, made proof of and filed a claim for taxes for the year 1875, alleged to be due to the State of Ohio from Samuel P. Cary, assignee of the bankrupt, John K. Booth. The tax bill prepared by the County Auditor amounts to $723.96, which is claimed as the tax for the year 1875, chargeable upon moneys of the estate in the hands of the assignee at a valuation of $29,169.

On the 10th of January, 1876, the assignee, acting in pursuance of the thirty-fourth general order in bankruptcy, of the Supreme court of the United States, filed his petition with Register Ball, praying for an order for the re-examination of said claim, and a day was assigned for the hearing of said petition, of which due notice was given to the County Treasurer, and on the 1st day of February, 1876, the County Auditor, by Mr. Cappeller, the Tax-omission Clerk, and the County Treasurer, by Mr. Logan, his attorney, appeared before the Register; Mr. Carey, the assignee appearing in person.

BALL, Register.

From the testimony produced in the cause, I find established the following state of facts:

Captain Booth was adjudicated a bankrupt in this court, July 18, 1874 The property of which he was then possessed consisted of several steamboats and barges, a house and a lot of land in Cincinnati, and a small amount of outstanding debts due him. In October of that year, the assignee, by order of this court, made sale of the boats and barges and also of the real estate, and deposited the whole proceeds to his credit, as assignee, in the First National Bank of Cincinnati, in pursuance of the order of this court; and out of this fund, by virtue of another order of court, he paid to the County Treasurer all the taxes due the State of Ohio on the real and personal property of the bankrupt, as provided for by section 5101 of the Revised Statutes of the United States (Section 28, Bankrupt Act). A portion of those proceeds, amounting to $19,445, remained in bank until after the annual assessment in April, 1875, and was then held by this court, subject to the termination of a complicated litigation which had arisen between various claimants, who asserted divers and conflicting liens upon the fund, which litigation was not ended so as to enable the court to distribute the fund to its various owners until November, 1875. The assignee, who resided at College Hill, in Millcreek Township, in said county, but whose law office was in Cincinnati, in listing in April, 1875, his personal property for taxation, did not include this fund or any part of it, "as it was not within the control of this petitioner, but was in the custody of this court for the purpose of distribution among the creditors of the bankrupt when the proper lienholders were ascertained." The Auditor of the county, however, ascertaining this fact, caused the fund to be listed as personal property of the assignee in Cincinnati, adding to it the penalty of fifty per centum imposed by the law of Ohio against such persons as "shall make a false return or shall evade making a return."

Upon this state of facts the following questions arise:

First.—Is this fund so in the custody of this court, through its officer, subject to taxation under the laws of Ohio?

Second.—If so liable, is the assignee guilty under the circumstances of making a false return, or of evading making a return?

Third.—If the fund be taxable, shall it be listed as property in Cincinnati, or in College Hill, in Millcreek Township?

The Tax Law of Ohio subjects to taxation, among other things, all moneys and credits, and it defines the terms "money" or "moneys" to mean "and include gold and silver coin and bank-notes in actual possession of solvent banks, and every deposit which the person owning, holding in trust or having the beneficial interest therein, is entitled to withdraw in money on demand."

Under the revised instructions by the Auditor of State to township assessors, it is provided that "all gold and silver coin, bank-notes and deposits with banks or persons, payable on demand, are moneys, and must be returned as such whether in national bank notes or greenbacks,"

Is this fund, therefore, "moneys payable on demand" within the meaning of the Tax Law and the instructions just quoted? The assignee is an officer of this court. He is required by the bankrupt act to "deposit all money belonging to the bankrupts in some bank in his name, as assignee, (Revised Statutes of the United States, Section 5059; Section 17, Bankrupt Act,) and by General Order 28 this court is required to designate in each district a National Bank "in which all moneys received by assignees or paid into court in the course of any proceedings in bankruptcy shall be deposited." The rule further provides "that no moneys so deposited shall be drawn from such depository, unless upon a check or warrant signed by the clerk of the court, or by an assignee, and countersigned by the judge of the court, or one of the registers designated for that purpose, stating the date, the sum, and the account for which it is drawn."

Under these rules these funds were deposited by the assignee in the First National Bank of Cincinnati, where they were held by the court, and subject alone to the control of the court. The assignee could not withdraw a dollar of it, except by the special order of the court. Such a fund comes neither within the letter nor the spirit of the Tax Laws of Ohio, and is not such a fund as the assignee was required by those laws to list for taxation as a trust fund in his hands payable on demand.

The bankrupt law (Rev. Stat. U. S, Sec. 5101, Sec. 28 of the original act), provides "that all debts due to the State in which the proceedings in bankruptcy are pending, and all taxes and assessments made under the laws thereof," shall be entitled to priority of payment next after the costs and expenses of the bankruptcy and all debts and taxes due the United States; and that provision has been strictly complied with by this court in directing the assignee to pay all the taxes assessed upon the real and personal property of the bankrupt, and from which the fund in controversy was derived. But it is claimed by counsel for the treasurer that inasmuch as that fund received the protection of the laws of Ohio after it came to the hands of the assignee, it, in common with all other taxable property in the State, should bear its proportion of the burden of taxation. This is true enough as a general proposition of law applicable to all property receiving the protecting care of the State government. But this is not such a case. From the moment the fund came into the possession of this court, that moment it ceased to be under the protecting care of the government of the State. It passed into the custody of a court of the United States, under and by virtue of the laws of the United States, and was, therefore, necessarily under the sole protection of the government of the United States. No State court and no officer of the State had any control over it or any power to interfere with it. "The sovereignty of the United States and of a State are distinct and independent of each other within their respective spheres of action, although both exist and exercise their powers within the same territorial limits." (Alleman v. Booth, 21 How. R., 506, per Taney, C. J.)

Such portions of that fund as were decreed to belong to the citizens of Ohio, constituted "credits" within the meaning of the Tax Laws of Ohio, which those citizens were required to list for taxation in their annual returns, and it is to be presumed that those citizens performed their duty in making such returns; if not, it is not too late for the auditor to have such omissions corrected, as he has attempted to do in the case now before the court.

The view I have taken of the first proposition renders it unnecessary for me to consider the two others.

I shall therefore order that the claim of the treasurer filed in this cause be expunged.—The Cincinnati Law Bulletin.

U. S. DISTRICT COURT, DIST. OF MASSACHUSETTS.

OPINION MAY 22, 1876.

Ex Parte H. BECKER, et al,
In re C. H. NORTH, et al.

BANKRUPTCY—COMPOSITION—CONTRACT—DAMAGES FOR FAILURE TO DELIVER—MEASURE OF.

1. COMPOSITION—BREACH OF CONTRACT. — The creditors and debtors submitted to the court the question, what damages should be proved against the assets for an admitted breach of contract. A case between the parties had been tried in the Circuit Court, resulting in a verdict for the creditor plaintiffs for $1,250, but being dissatisfied with the rule of damages laid down at the trial, they filed a bill of exceptions, which had been allowed. Since the trial the defendants became insolvent, and have offered a composition to their creditors, which the plaintiffs in this case are willing to accept for such sum as they could recover at law.

2. DAMAGES FOR BREACH OF CONTRACT.—The general rule is, that the damages for a breach of a contract to deliver goods, is the difference in price of that precise kind of goods at the time and place of performance.

3. WHERE GOODS ARE BOUGHT FOR FOREIGN MARKET.—That it results from the cases cited, that, not that the foreign market is to rule, but that if the domestic buyer cannot indemnify himself by buying the article in the home market, he may have his actual loss, whether that happens to be more or less, and whether it is measured by a domestic or foreign standard.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

The creditors and debtors respectively submitted to the court the question, what damages should be proved against the assets for an admitted breach of contract. A case between the parties had been tried in the Circuit court, resulting in a verdict for the plaintiffs, the creditors, for $1,250 and interest, but being dissatisfied with the rule of damages laid down at the trial, they had filed a bill of exceptions which had been allowed. Since the trial the defendants have become insolvent, and have offered a composition to their creditors, which these plaintiffs are willing to accept for such sum as they could recover at law.

The contract was that the defendants should deliver a large quantity of pork of a certain description and quality at Boston, free on board a steamer or sailing vessel during the month of March, to be shipped to Antwerp at a stipulated freight; and they wholly failed to perform this contract. The plaintiffs, who were merchants in New York, claimed to recover the difference between the contract price, and the market price in Antwerp, at the end of March, or some later time, which would give them $5,628; and the defendants admitted a liability for the difference in price at Boston. Correspondence which passed between the parties before and after the breach was submitted de bene, and contained some statement, concerning a loss by re-sale, but such loss was not proved, nor relied on by the plaintiffs.

J. T. BARRETT, for the creditors.

N. MORSE & W. E. L. DILLAWAY, for the debtors.

LOWELL, J. The distinctions adopted on this subject are very nice, and this case comes near to some that are on each side of the line. The general rule is that the damages for a breach of contract to deliver goods, is the difference in price of that precise kind of goods at the time and place of performance. That rule would give the plaintiffs only the sum awarded by the jury under the instructions of the court. If Boston is to be regarded as the place of performance. It is argued by the plaintiffs that when goods are known to be bought for a particular market, and the seller agrees to forward them to that market, the latter becomes the place of performance or, if not, it becomes the place whose market price is to govern the damages. A passage from Addison On Contracts (7 Lond. Ed. 1875) p. 473, is cited to the effect that if a foreigner orders goods in England to be forwarded to a foreign market for sale and the seller knows of this purpose and undertakes to forward the goods, but neglects so to do, the measure of damages is the difference between the contract price and that of the foreign market. The cases cited by Mr. Addison do not sustain this proposition, but I agree to its correctness, as I understand it. The distinction between the case supposed and this case is that the foreigner has no means of indemnifying himself until it is too late; he is not in England nor bound to be there, and the market price there is of no consequence to him, he has a right to go and meet his goods in the foreign country, or to await them there, if it is his own country and his loss arises not only out of the breach of the contract to sell, but also of that to forward the goods. Such a case was Bell v. Cunningham, 3 Peters, 59, cited by the plaintiffs; where a correspondent abroad being ordered by a merchant here to ship certain goods to Havana, by a certain vessel, shipped something else and it was held the damages were to be ascertained at Havana.

In the many cases against carriers who have undertaken to deliver goods at a certain place, of course the damage is to be ascertained at that place.

Here, both parties were contracting at home and the goods were to be delivered at Boston, on board ship, to be sure; but the contract was divisible, and the plaintiffs would have a clear right to revoke that part which required them to be shipped, and to say, "We will take the goods in Boston and pay the full price." If, then, it had happened that the price had risen here and fallen in Antwerp, so that the plaintiffs would have made a large loss by the shipment, would they not have had the right to offer to take the goods here, and if delivery was refused, to insist on the measure of damages which the defendants now insist on? I think so. And the rule must be the same for both parties, and under both contingencies, excepting that if the plaintiffs still desired the goods for shipment, he may recover any increased charges, such as freight and insurance, in addition to the increased price.

Of the two cases cited by Mr. Addison one was against a carrier for non-delivery at A., and of course the damages were suffered at that place. The other is Borries v. Hutchinson, 18 C. B, (N. S.) 445. In that case two material facts were found: 1st. There was no market price in England; 2d. The seller knew that the buyer bought to sell again; and the court allowed, not the difference of market price in the two places, but the actual profit of the re sale. A very recent case in England, later even than the last edition of Addison, was decided on the authority of Borries v. Hutchinson. It was this: the seller knew that the buyer was to ship the goods to a foreign country; and upon the breach, there being no market price for such goods in England, and no such goods to be had, the buyer purchased in England such goods as were most like them, and thus filled his sub-contract, and was allowed the increased price of those goods above the contract price. Hinde v Liddell, L. R., 10, 2 B., 265. It results from these cases; not that the foreign market is to rule, but that if the domestic buyer cannot indemnify himself by buying the article in the home market, he may have his actual loss, whether that happens to be more or less, and whether it is measured by a domestic or a foreign standard, if this loss was such, as, by reason of notice or contract, the parties may be presumed to have contemplated. I understand, too, that in the last case the court considered that a notice that the goods were for shipment, was equivalent to notice of a re-sale, or at least of an intent to sell again. In this case no evidence has been given of actual loss; no evidence of a re-sale; of a rise in freights or insurance; of the lapse of a season in the trade; of anything peculiar in the circumstances. The naked facts are presented, of a market price here and a higher market price in Antwerp; and on that showing I say there is no rule of law and no decision known to me or cited in argument that takes it out of the ordinary doctrine of the difference between the market price in Boston, and the contract price. Two American decisions were cited: Messmore v. N. Y. Shot and Lead Co., 40 N. Y., 422; Merrimack M'f'g Co., v. Quintard, 107 Mass, 127. In the former the defendant undertook to furnish in New York bullets of a certain kind and quality, and was informed that they were ordered to fill a particular contract with the State of Ohio; it was held that the plaintiffs might recover their actual loss in Ohio. In the second, coal was to be delivered in Pennsylvania for use in the plaintiff's factory in Massachusetts, and was delivered, but of inferior quality and later than the contract required, and the damages in Massachusetts were allowed. The latter of these cases is a good illustration of the proposition above cited from Addison, because the plaintiffs had no agent at Philadelphia to inspect or accept the coal. In neither of these cases was it proved or admitted that the plaintiff had an opportunity to recoup himself by buying the article at the market price of the day, at the time and place of the breach; but the contrary is to be clearly inferred from the facts of both those cases.

I do not mean to say that the plaintiffs here might not have recovered not only the considerable sum they ask for, but much more, if the facts were that they had suffered more. This decision rests upon the simple ground that evidence of a market price in Boston makes out prima facie the measure of damages claimed by the defendants, and that the plaintiffs should go further and show, if they can, that they have necessarily lost more in this particular case. That such additional loss is proved, was or should have been within the contemplation of the parties, is perhaps sufficiently shown by the agreement to ship the goods to Antwerp; but it is not proved, and in the mode the case is presented I have the right to infer that it was incapable of proof, though mentioned in some of the plaintiff's letters.

One word more to prevent misapprehension. It was said that the defendants had prevented the plaintiffs from shipping other goods by promising to make the shipment after the regular time of performance. I do not think the letters of the plaintiffs give any consent to a postponement. They insist throughout that they shall hold the defendants for full damages. But supposing that there was a postponement, the rule of damages would be the same at the end of the extended time as before; and for the reasons already given I cannot find that any other damage was suffered at that or any time.

Debt admitted for $1,250 and interest.

THROUGH the kindness of S. W. PACKARD, of the Yankton bar, formerly of this city, we have received the following opinion:

SUPREME COURT, DAKOTA TERRITORY.

B. E. WOOD et al., v. A. J. BANGS et al.

Appeal from District Court for Bon Homme County

CONTRACT TO BUILD A COURT HOUSE—WHEN A COURT OF EQUITY WILL ENJOIN THE ACTS OF TOWN OR COUNTY OFFICERS—WHO MAY FILE THE BILL.

1. WHEN ACTS OF BOARD WILL BE RESTRAINED.—The court states under what circumstances a court of equity will interfere, by injunction, to restrain the acts of a corporation, or the acts of a administrative officer or board.
2. WHEN INJUNCTION WILL NOT BE GRANTED.—That an injunction will not be granted to restrain the doing of an act which is unlawful and irregular, unless substantial and positive injury will result from a refusal to grant the writ. That an injunction will never be granted when it will be productive of hardship, oppression or injustice, or public mischief.
3. THE CONTRACT TO BUILD THE COURT HOUSE.—That, even conceding that the commissioners exceeded their authority in entering into a contract to build a court house, without having the question submitted to a vote of the people, the county needing a court house, and the contract being for a low price and for the advantage of the county; and to have it declared void would also work injury to the contractors. The court refuses to entertain a bill for an injunction, and to have the contract declared void.
4. WHO MAY BRING SUIT.—That persons having no interests except that which is common to all taxpayers, cannot maintain a suit in equity to set aside the acts of town or county officers.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

Opinion by BARNES, J.

BARTLETT, TRIP & WOOD, for appellant.

MOODY & CROMER and SPINK, for respondents.

This action is brought by the plaintiffs, residents and tax payers of Bon Homme county, against the defendants, Bangs, Zitker and Donley, as County Commissioners of Bon Homme county, George J. Rounds, treasurer of said county, A. M. English and H. H. Calhoun, as contracting parties for the building of a court house for Bon Homme county, and W. A. Burleigh and A. J. Faulk, persons having purchased and holding county orders issued to English and Calhoun on said court house contract, and by them transferred to Burleigh and Faulk.

The plaintiff asks that a certain contract, made between the commissioners on the part of the county and English and Calhoun, the contractors for the building of the court house, be set aside, amended, and declared void, that the county warrants issued in pursuance of that contract and in the hands of Burleigh & Faulk, be returned and cancelled, the same having been issued without authority of law, and that the treasurer Rounds be perpetually enjoined from paying warrants issued in payment for building the court house. The court below refused the demands of the plaintiffs, and judgment was entered for the defendants. From that judgment the plaintiffs appeal. The first question to be considered is this: Under what circumstances will a court of chancery interfere by injunction to restrain the acts of a corporation, or the acts of an administrative officer or board?

An injunction will not be granted to restrain the doing of an act which is unlawful and irregular unless substantial and positive injury will result from a refusal to grant the writ. See High on Injunctions, sec. 9.

An injunction will never be granted when it will be productive of hardship, oppression or injustice, or public or private mischief. See 9 Wisconsin, 166.

The court of equity will not interfere or restrain the execution of a deed for land sold for taxes, on the ground that the tax proceedings were irregular or void, unless it further appears that the tax proceedings are inequitable, and that it would be against equity and good conscience to refuse the writ. See U. S. Digest, sec. 6, vol. 1, new series, and cases there cited; 14 Wis., 618. See also Pettibone v. The Milwaukee & LaCrosse R. R. Co., 14 Wis., 443. In the case just cited, the court uses this somewhat significant language: "The inconvenience which would result from an injunction adds great weight to the reason for refusing it." The granting or refusing an injunction rests in the sound discretion of the court and will never be granted when productive of hardship, oppression or public mischief. Injunctions will not be granted when the benefits secured by it to one party is of but little importance, while it will operate oppressively and to the great annoyance and injury of the other party, unless the wrong complained of is so wanton and uprovoked in its character as properly to deprive the wrong doer of the benefit of any consideration as to its injurious consequences. 20 New Jersey (1869) page 530. An injunction will not be granted when the injury complained of is slight compared to the inconvenience to the defendant and the public, that would result from the granting the injunction, 20 New Jersey, 435. But perhaps the strongest case bearing on this question is that of Kneeland v. The City of Milwaukee, 15 Wisconsin, 414. The legislature of Wisconsin passed a law allowing the railroad corporations to pay a certain per centage upon their earnings each year to the State treasurer, in lieu of all taxes, State, county and municipal. This mode of taxation had been followed for a number of years when the present case was before the court, the court declared the act of the legislature void as being in conflict with the provision of the State constitution, which provides that taxation shall be equal, and both the Chief Justice and Justice Paine in unmistakable language declare that whatever the consequence of their decision may be, they being satisfied that the law referred to was in violation of the provisions of the constitution, they must and will so declare it. It was soon discovered that that decision would unsettle and make void a large proportion of the assessments and collection of taxes in the State for several years past, that the confusion, embarrassment and litigation that would flow from it would be disastrous. They therefore ordered a re argument of the case, and while adhering to their former expressed opinion that the law was unconstitutional, yet in view of the disastrous consequences that must follow their decision, they reverse that decision, and thus allow the wrongful, unequal and inequitable tax to be collected, and this, too, solely upon the ground that granting the plaintiff that which the court says he was equitably entitled to, would work a great hardship to the public generally.

I will now consider the facts in this case, and for the purpose of this argument and that only, will assume that the county commissioners exceeded their authority, and will also assume for the purpose of this argument that the plaintiffs, as tax payers, unitedly have a right to maintain this action.

From the facts disclosed in this case it appears that by an act of the legislature of the territory two terms of the District court are required to be held in Bon Homme county each year.

It further appears that the county has no court house nor place for holding court, or transacting county business, nor is there any place at the county seat, that can be procured by the county for that purpose. The law makes it the duty of the commissioners to provide a place for holding court and the transaction of other county business. The law also authorizes them to make contracts for the erection of county buildings and also to make contracts for the repair of the same whenever necessary. From these facts it clearly appears that there was a pressing if not an imperative necessity for action on the part of the county commissioners.

Recognizing this necessity they assembled at their usual and accustomed place of meeting, they cause public notice to be given that proposals will be received for the building of a court house. Proposals are submitted to them, are duly examined by them, and the fact disclosed that the defendants, English & Calhoun, are the lowest responsible bidders and to them is awarded the contract for building the court house. The plaintiffs it appears, or some of them, are present at these meetings and enter their objection or protest against the action of the board (now we will not stop to enquire whether these plaintiffs feeling aggrieved by the action of the commissioners, should not have appealed from that decision and whether that was not the proper and only remedy) but we examine the action of the commissioners for the purpose of noting the fact that they appear to have acted in good faith, an important consideration in an equity proceeding.

It further appears that the contract was made with the defendants, English & Colhoun, to build the court house for the sum of three thousand three hundred and thirty-three dollars, that that sum was to be paid in county warrants. It also appears conclusively that it was worth in cash to build the court house the sum which the defendants, English & Calhoun, received, or were to receive in warrants. And it appears with equal clearness that these warrants were in part worth not to exceed fifty cents on the dollar. I think too, it also appears from the evidence that the defendants, Burleigh & Foulk, being solicitors for this improvement, purchased these county warrants of English & Calhoun and paid their face or par value. Be this as it may, the fact nevertheless appears that Bon Homme county have their court house at about one half its value. When we reduce the warrants in which payment for the improvements have been made to a cash basis. From this statement it will be at once seen that the building of the court house has not depreciated the value of county warrants.

It should now be observed that the defendants, the commissioners in contemplation of law represent all the residents, the tax payers and freeholders of their county, that they thus represent the plaintiffs, who being tax payers have no interests that is not an interest in common with all tax payers.

Assuming, therefore, that the commissioners exceeded their authority in entering on a contract on the precise terms of this contract, or assuming even that this contract is void, the question of the building of the court house not having been submitted to a vote of the electors, the fact is nevertheless clear that the commissioners have so discharged their duty that the tax payers of the county have secured the building of a court house absolutely and indispensably necessary for the county, and on terms exceedingly advantageous to the taxpayers, the plaintiffs included.

I thus reach the conclusion that the plaintiffs suffer no loss, present or prospective, by refusing the injunction asked for, that, on the contrary, it is clear the defendants would suffer irreparable loss and injury by setting aside and declaring void the contract for the building of the court house and granting the injunction asked for.

But another and equally important question is this: Can persons having no interest except that which is common to all the taxpayers, maintain a suit in equity to set aside the acts of town or county officers? A leading case, and one that seems to me to be decisive of this question is the case of Doolittle v. The Supervisors of Broome County, 18 N. Y., 155. The opinion is by Justice Denio. The object of this suit was to obtain a judgment declaring null and void a certain act of the board of supervisors of Broome county, by which that board divided the former town of Chenango into three towns, to be called respectively Chenango, Binghampton and Port Craine. The plaintiffs, seventeen in number, representing themselves to be and to have been for more than four months residents and freeholders of that part of the town of Chenango which by the act of the board of supervisors was sought to be erected into a separate town by the name of Port Craine. They state that they commence the action on behalf of themselves and all other persons who have an interest with themselves in restraining the organization of the new towns. The court say, "The first question is this—have the plaintiffs such an interest as will enable them to maintain this action? This raises a question of much importance, which, if it be now doubtful, ought to be definitely settled. It is not pretended that the plaintiffs have any interest which is not in common with all resident freeholders of the proposed new town of Port Craine. The grievance is that they are all threatened to be subjected, for the purpose of local administration to a jurisdiction not created according to law. This will affect not only the other freeholders besides the plaintiffs, but all the inhabitants of that local district whether they are freeholders or not.

Assuming that the proceedings under which the new towns is proposed to be organized was void, as claimed by the plaintiffs, no private interest of the plaintiffs has been invaded, and no injury peculiar to them is threatened. The Court further say, the acts of the Supervisor has no bearing on the plaintiff's individual interest.

Whatever concerns they may have in the question belongs to them only as citizens and members of the community. If this action can be sustained, then any tax-paying citizen may compel the public authorities to litigate in the courts the acts of any administrative board or officer in the State; and thus proceedings of this kind can only be perfected by the judgment of the court of final appeal. Every person may legally question the constitutional validity of any act of the legislature which affects his private rights, but if a citizen may maintain an action for such a purpose in respect to his rights as a voter and tax-payer, the courts may regularly be called upon to revise all laws that may be passed. They may, at the instance of any tax-payer, be required to injoin the Comptroller from drawing warrants on the treasurer, and that officer from paying them, in every case where it may be considered that the law authorizing the expenditure was passed without constitutional authority. The State tax of 1855 was lately impeached upon plausible grounds, as having been unconstitutionally enacted. This was done by a direct proceeding of the Attorney-General, against the board of Supervisors, but upon the plaintiff's position in this case, the State and county officers might be compelled to litigate the questions of constitutionality with every tax payer, and thus the fiscal business of the State would be transacted mainly with the courts. The law in my judgment does not afford such an opportunity for excessive litigation. No private person or number of persons can assume to be the champions of the community, and in its behalf challenge the public officers to meet them in the courts of justice, to defend their official acts.

In the case of Hale v. Cushman, 6 of Met., 425, a town in Massachusetts had passed a vote to pay certain expenses which the plaintiffs, who were legal voters, and who together were liable to pay more than one half of all the taxes to be assessed on the inhabitants of the town, claimed to be illegal—they filed a bill to injoin the payment; the bill was dismissed upon the ground above recognized. This, too, is an elementary principle. Blackstone says: "It would be unreasonable to multiply suits giving a man a separate right of action for what

We call attention to the following opinions, reported at length in this issue:

BROKER—INTERNAL REVENUE.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States, by HUNT, J., as to the liability of bankers or brokers to pay a special tax under the revenue laws, upon sales made by them.

RAILROAD AID BONDS.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States by BRADLEY, J., construing the provision of the Constitution relating to the authority of cities, towns and counties to subscribe for railroad stock, or to issue bonds in aid of such roads.

PATENT—INFRINGEMENT—DAMAGES.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States by MILLER, J. As to the proper rule for estimating the damages for the infringement of a patent, The Cincinnati Law Bulletin says: "This case is an instance of the delays of justice so frequently complained of. It was commenced in the Circuit Court of the Southern District of Ohio, 15 years ago. Of the eminent lawyers originally engaged in the case, on the side of the plaintiff, two—Thom. Ewing, Sr., and H. Hunter, of Lancaster, O., died years ago; and Judge Coffin alone remains. Of the three attorneys of the defendants, one—S. S. Fisher is dead, Judge Alphonso Taft is the present Attorney-General of the United States, and A. F Perry is the only one left in practice. How it will be with the evidence at the new trial to which the case has been remanded, may become a serious question. Besides, there are four or five other cases commenced simultaneously with this case, pending in our Circuit Court, that have been continued from year to year there, many years awaiting the final result of this case. In view of these facts, the general complaint of the great delay in carrying cases to a final decision in the United States Supreme Court must appear just."

TAXATION—BANKRUPT'S ESTATE.—The opinion of REGISTER BALL, of the Sixth Judicial Circuit, whether funds belonging to a bankrupt estate, in the hands of an assignee in bankruptcy, are subject to local taxation.

COMPOSITION—BREACH OF CONTRACT—DAMAGES—FOREIGN MARKET.—The opinion of the United States District Court for the District of Massachusetts, by LOWELL, J., in a case where the parties who had committed the breach of contract, had failed, and proposed a composition to their creditors, and the question was what damages should be allowed against the assets for an admitted breach of contract. The court states the general rule to be that the damages for the breach of a contract to deliver goods, is the difference in price of that precise kind of goods at the time and place of performance; that where goods are bought for a foreign market, it does not follow that the foreign market is to rule; but if the domestic buyer cannot indemnify himself by buying the article in the home market, he may have his actual loss, whether that happens to be more or less, and whether it is measured by a domestic or foreign standard.

INJUNCTION AGAINST OFFICER OR BOARD.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of Dakota, by BARNES, J., stating under what circumstances a court of chancery will interfere by injunction to restrain the acts of a corporation, or the acts of an administrative officer or board, and who may file a bill for that purpose.

FOREIGN INSURANCE COMPANY — CERTIFICATE.

The Supreme Court of Pennsylvania in Thorne v. Travelers' Ins. Co., 33 Leg. Intel., 185, held that a foreign insurance company which had not complied with the act of 1868, could not recover against the sureties of an agent for his malfeasance; that the certificate of the auditor-general is not absolutely conclusive evidence of a previously existing but terminating agency.

CHATTEL MORTGAGE — AFTER ACQUIRED PROPERTY.

The United States District Court of Massachusetts in Brett v. Carter, 22 Int Rev. Rec., 152, held that a mortgage of chattels which permits the mortgagor to continue in possession and to sell the goods in the ordinary course of business, is not void per se; that whether there is a fraud in the particular case is a question of fact; that in Massachusetts a mortgage of after acquired chattels is valid; that the decision of the Supreme Court of that State in Moody v. Wright, 13 Met., 17, where the opposite doctrine is held, dissented from.

THE LAW OF ADOPTION IN THE UNITED STATES, AND ESPECIALLY IN MASSACHUSETTS. By William H. Whitmore, A. M. With an Appendix, Containing the Massachusetts Act of 1876. Albany: Joel Munsell. 1876

REPORTS OF CASES ARGUED AND DETERMINED IN THE SUPREME COURT OF JUDICATURE OF THE STATE OF INDIANA, with Tables of the Cases Reported and Cases Cited, and an Index. By James Black, Official Reporter. Vol. L. Containing the cases decided at the May Term, 1875, not published in Volume XLIX, and cases decided at the November Term, 1875. Indianapolis: Journal Company, printers and binders, 1876

Mr. Black takes rank among the first reporters. His volumes are always neat in appearance. The opinions are very carefully prepared. His head notes are skillfully constructed and in as few words as practicable give the points decided by the court. In this volume are quite a number of important cases, among them the case of the State v. Wilson, where, on an indictment for murder, after the jury had been deliberating of their verdict for thirty-two hours, and after they had answered and there was no probability of their agreeing upon a verdict, the court discharged the jury without the presence of the defendant, he being confined in jail, Held, that such discharge might be pleaded in bar of a further prosecution. In Sumner et al. v. Beeler it is held that ministerial officers and other persons are liable for acts done by them under an unconstitutional and void enactment of the legislature, and, in an action against them for damages, they cannot justify under such enactment.

CASES DETERMINED IN THE UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURTS, FOR THE EIGHTH CIRCUIT. Reported by John F. Dillon, the Circuit Judge. Volume III. Davenport, Iowa: Day, Egbert & Fidlar. 1876. Sold by E. B. Myers, Law Bookseller, Chicago.

This, the third volume of the series, commences with cases decided in 1874, and concludes with cases of this year. An appendix to the volume contains the "whisky cases" of the United States against Ulrich, McDonald, McKee and Babcock. In these cases, a number of new and important questions are passed upon, and now that there are so many indictments against parties for conspiracy to defraud the government of its revenue, these are of more than usual interest to the profession. Judge DILLON is not only an upright and talented Judge, but an excellent reporter. His reports are fully equal to any other series in the United States. His head-notes are concise and clear, his statements short, and the opinions, when delivered by himself, always able. The notes of the learned Judge, to the opinions, are exceedingly valuable. He not only cites from the regular series of reports, but from the various leading periodicals of the country, which places these opinions within the reach of a large number of lawyers who would not otherwise be able to obtain access to them. A list of the acts of Congress construed in the opinions, is given at the commencement of the volume. The great variety of legal questions arising in this circuit, make this series one of the most valuable of the Federal court reports.

HON. J. D. WARD.—We are glad to announce that the indictment found against Mr. Ward, in the United States Court for this district, was brought to a sudden termination on Tuesday by the government entering a nolle prosequi. The government by voluntarily dismissing the case on its own motion, admits that it has no case against Mr. Ward and never had. We have been acquainted with him for more than twenty years, first as a young attorney, then as alderman, and for many years as an able and faithful State Senator; afterwards, as Congressman and more recently as United States Attorney in the very court in which he was indicted. Mr. Ward filled the different official positions to which he was elected with marked ability and has always been considered an honest and faithful officer. His many friends will rejoice to learn of the ending of the proceedings without subjecting him to the cost and vexation of a trial.

SETTING ASIDE WILLS.—The Supreme Court of Pa., in Cauffman v. Long, 33 Leg. Int., 212, say the growing disposition of courts and juries to set aside last wills and testaments, and to substitute in lieu thereof their own notions as to what a testator should do with his property, is not to be encouraged. This suggestion of the court is timely. It is getting too common to contest wills and have them set aside on false evidence, and for light and trivial reasons.

BUT FEW WOMEN IN THE PENITENTIARY.—There are fifteen hundred and eighty-five convicts in the Illinois Penitentiary, and of these only nineteen are women. There being full as many women in Illinois as men, would it not be well for our law makers, and those who administer justice, to learn what causes so many more men to be sent to the penitentiary than women?

MRS. ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

On Thursday afternoon Mr. Edwards of Springfield, a brother-in-law of Mrs. Abraham Lincoln, filed in the County Court of this county a petition signed by her praying that the management and care of her estate which was taken from her one year ago by order of the same tribunal might be restored to her. Mr. Swett appeared in court. The conservator, Robert T. Lincoln, made no objection to the proceedings, and waived the ten days' notice required by statute.

The petition was as follows:

STATE OF ILLINOIS, COOK COUNTY—In the County Court—To the June term, A. D. 1876—To the Hon. M. R. M. Wallace, Judge of the County Court of the county of Cook, State of Illinois—Your petitioner, Mary Lincoln, respectfully represents unto your Honor that on the 14th day of June, at the June term of 1875 of the County Court, in and for said county, that Robert Lincoln, whom your petitioner prays may be made defendant to this petition, was appointed under the provisions of Chapter 86 of Revised Statutes of said State, now in force, her conservator. Your petitioner showeth to your Honor that she is a proper person to have the care and management of her own estate. Your petitioner therefore prays that her said conservator may be removed, and that your Honor may enter an order fully restoring her to all the rights and privileges enjoyed by her before her said conservator was appointed, and that her said conservator may be required to restore to her all the money, estate, title, and pension papers, United States bonds, leases, and all other effects with which he is chargeable as her conservator.

MARY LINCOLN.

Ninian W. Edwards was the first witness called, and testified as follows:

Mrs. Lincoln has been with me for nine or ten months, and her friends all think she is a proper person to take charge of her own affairs. That she is now in such condition that she can manage her own affairs. She has not spent all that she was allowed to spend during the last year, and we all think she is in a condition to take care of her own affairs.

The case was then given to the jury, which, after being absent long enough to attach their respective signatures to a verdict, reported that Mrs. Lincoln was able to manage and control her estate.

After the above action was had, the conservator, Robert T. Lincoln, filed his report, accompanied by an inventory of the property of Mrs. Lincoln placed in his hands on the 14th of June, 1875 It showed that in cash there was $1,029 25; United States stocks and bonds $58,000; personal obligation of conservator, $8,875; lace curtains, $549.83; wearing apparel and personal jewelry, $5,000; other items, $7.936.17, making a total of $81,390.25. The report covering the period between May 19, 1875, and June 15, 1876, showed that the conservator's receipts had been $11,140.35, and the disbursements $6,875.97 for Mrs. Lincoln's personal expenses, and $4 264 38 for investment in United States bonds. The report was approved, and upon the conservator presenting the receipt of Mrs. Lincoln to the Court for the amount found to be in his hands, he will be discharged.

Under our statute after a conservator is once appointed, a proceeding will not be entertained for his discharge except for neglect, etc., until one year from his appointment. In this case the proceedings were instituted in one year and a day after the date of the conservator's appointment.

LAWYERS' DIRECTORY.—Mrs. Lambkin has anticipated the regular city directory some weeks, and published upon a large card a Lawyers' Directory, containing the names and addresses of the Chicago lawyers, judges, masters in chancery, justices of the peace, and constables. It is furnished for $1.00, and should be in every lawyer's office in the city.

damnifies in common only with the rest of his fellow citizens." Book 4, 167. See also 16 Howard, Term Reports, 512 and 137; 19 How., 525, and 35 How., 82; 27 N. Y., 348; this case refers to the decision in 18 N. Y., 157, and expressly approves the same.

In Newcomb v. Horton, 18 Wisconsin, 566, the plaintiff sues on behalf of himself and other tax-payers of a school district to prevent the collection of a tax to pay a certain judgment fraudulently obtained, and to cancel the judgment. The first objection is in substance, that the respondent could not bring this action in his own behalf, and on behalf of several tax payers of the school district that there is no common right or common interest of those persons in the property affected by the tax; that the tax is upon and against the individual property of each tax payer; and that if there is any injury, it is an injury to the property and rights of each tax payer alone, and not an injury affecting a common right or interest, and this objection must prevail.

There is no general or common interest affected by the assessment and tax in the case. The property is owned in severalty, and each tax payer may sue alone, and obtain ample relief. So far as his rights and property are concerned, there is no necessity for one tax payer to unite another with him in a suit for this purpose. It is true, selling land for an illegal or void tax would be injurious to all persons whose property was sold. But this does not prove that one tax payer may bring this suit for himself and others. Their rights and interests are entirely distinct, and one tax payer may obtain complete relief without making another a party.

From a careful examination of all the cases I have been able to find, I am satisfied that the doctrine enunciated in the above cases is sound, and may be safely followed.

It occurs to me that in holding to the contrary (holding that two or more tax payers may unite in one action) is to assume that because the same state of facts exist as touching each of the tax payers, and because the same defense may be interposed in each case, that that constitutes a united and joint interest. That cannot be true. But to authorize two or more tax payers to unite in the same action, it must appear that the lien, if created, or the tax, if collected, would be collected from property owned in common. There is still another consideration, not to be lost sight of, which I will only allude to, namely, that generally a party that comes into court asking for equitable relief, must first restore that which he has received from the defendants.

It may be said that these plaintiffs have received nothing from the defendants—that answer will not suffice; the tax payer has in fact received the labor, material and money of the defendants, English & Calhoun, and if these plaintiffs now represent the tax payers of Bon Homme county, and as such seek to set aside and avoid the contract under which English & Calhoun performed valuable services, and expended their money, then these tax payers must do that which is equitable.

I come now to the consideration of the only remaining question which I regard as important in this case. Section 27, chapter 4, Laws of 1869, gives the county commissioners authority and power to erect and repair court-houses, jails, and other county buildings, and expressly authorizes them to make contracts for that purpose. Section thirty-one of the same chapter authorizes an appeal from the decisions of the commissioners upon all matters properly before them, by any person aggrieved, to the District Court of the county. Section thirty-four provides that all appeals taken from the decision of commissioners shall be docketed as other causes pending therein, and the same shall be heard and determined de novo. Section thirty-five provides that the District Court shall render final judgment, and cause the same to be executed, or the District Court may send the same back to the commissioners with an order how to proceed, and require the board to comply with the order, by mandamus or otherwise. Here, then, is a plain, simple, sensible, cheap and adequate remedy given by statute to all persons aggrieved by the action and decisions of the board of commissioners.

The record in this case discloses the fact that the plaintiffs well knew of the action of the commissioners, they were in fact present and protested, as appears of record, against the action and demonstration of the board.

If they were dissatisfied it was their duty to have pursued the remedy given by statute.

Here is a plain statute empowering the commissioners to build a court house, and the same statute gives all parties aggrieved by the decision of the commissioners the right of appeal. It seems hardly necessary to cite authorities in support of this position, that where a statute confers upon public officials authority to do an act and then the same statute points out the remedy secured or given to all parties aggrieved that the party aggrieved must pursue his legal or statutory remedy, and that such aggrieved party has no standing in a court of equity.

See 15 Wallace, 227. This is the language of the court. It has been insisted by the counsel for the appellant that there is a complete remedy at law, and that the bill must therefore be dismissed. Such must be the consequence if the objection is well taken.

In the jurisprudence of the United States the objection is regarded as jurisdictional, and may be enforced by the court though not raised by the pleadings nor suggested by the counsel. See also 2 Black., 551, and 15 Wallace, 373, and cases there cited.

We are therefore unanimously of the opinion that so much of the preliminary injunction as remains in force should be dissolved, and that this action be dismissed.

THE USE OF EXTRINSIC EVIDENCE TO SUPPLEMENT OR CONTROL DOCUMENTS OF TITLE.

[From the London Law Times.]

LORD ST. LEONARDS v. SUGDEN AND OTHERS.

The leading case of Lord St. Leonards v. Sugden and others, has not only been to the public the cause celebre of the present year, but it has called professional attention to the extent to which courts of justice will allow extrinsic or, as some writers loosely call it, parol evidence to supplement as testimony of intention, or as a settlement of controversy, to control the most solemn of all documents, viz., the last will and testament of one deceased.

Accustomed as we have been for many a year to turn over the pages of Sugden's Practical Treatise on the law of Vendors and Purchasers of estates, of his exhaustive work on Powers, of his skilful comment on the Real Property Statutes, and his authoritative treatise on the Law of Property as administered by the House of Lords; versed as we were in the reports in the Irish Courts by Lloyd and Goold, Drury and Warren, Drury, and Jones and Latouche, which contained the lucid, comprehensive, and decisive judgments of the great conveyancer, author, and chancellor, it was with a feeling of disappointment, if not consternation, that we first heard it alleged that he had left behind him an invalid last will and testament. But as the Lord Chief Justice Cockburn, when presiding in the court of Appeal, in Lincoln's Inn, remarked, the legal and the judicial mind revolts from the idea that on such a point of business any fault can be attributed to Lord St. Leonards. Nevertheless, an important failure in the documentary evidence was caused by the absence unexplained of a codicil to the will, and what is most important to the lawyer, the want was supplied by extrinsic evidence of the declarations and intentions of the testator, so that probate has actually been granted of a portion of a will not in existence, or at least not produced. Seeing that it is reasonable when persons have deliberately signed or otherwise properly executed definite contracts in writing, last wills and testaments, or deeds of "grant, livery, partition, or exchange of corporeal interests, and of grant, assignment, or surrender of those that are incorporeal" to presume that they meant such instruments to be the solemn and only evidence of their intentions, seeing that it is the interest of the public that such instruments should be upheld and litigation ended; seeing also that for the pure administration of justice the courts have held it necessary, in order to prevent similar dealing, to make it one of the fundamental rules of evidence that the best evidence must be produced, unless exceptional circumstances exist, it seems not a useless task to enumerate what these exceptional circumstances are in each class of documents, and to discuss the latest decisions thereon.

In cases where written contracts are in issue, extrinsic evidence may relate to their variation, rescission, or novation, on the ground of mistake, surprise, or fraud, or it may be used in suits for specific performance, though with greater freedom by defendants than plaintiffs. Where wills and last testaments give rise to controversy, this species of evidence is admissible for the following purposes:—(1) to identify the document referred to by a will or codicil, in order to its incorporation therewith; (2) to ascertain the time of an alteration or interlineation; (3) to remove latent ambiguities; (4) to show that particular lands were acquired by the testator after signing his will; (5) to rectify mistakes; (6) to evince the animus revocandi in ambiguous acts; (7) to recover the contents of a will, wholly or partly lost; (8) to rebut and fortify equitable presumptions. Where deeds are the matter of inquiry, this evidence is available to prove that they were delivered as escrows, the nature of the condition, its performance and breach (Rym v. Campbell, 6 E. & B. 370). It is also good where fraud is the ground of a claim for cancellation or surrender. Seeing that the great case of Lord St. Leonards v. Sugden, is not only the most recent, but is a very important authority as to the admission of this secondary evidence, we will take last wills and testaments first.

1.—INCORPORATION OF DOCUMENTS.—Lord Eldon. in Smart v. Prujean (6 Ves. 565), was of opinion that in order that a testamentary paper duly executed might incorporate another, it must refer thereto as a written document then existing, in such terms that it may be ascertained. This opinion was adopted by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, in Allen v. Maddock (11 Moo. P. C. 454), where they held that a reference in a will might be in such terms as to exclude parol evidence, as where it is to papers not yet written, or where the description is so vague as to be incapable of being applied to any instrument in particular, but that the authorities seemed clearly to establish that where there is a reference to any written document described as then existing, in such terms as to be capable of being ascertained, parol evidence is admissible to ascertain it.

In Allen v. Maddock, the Privy Council held that an unattested paper, which would have been incorporated in an attested will or codicil executed according to the Statutes of Frauds, is now in the same manner incorporated, if the will or codicil is executed according to the requirements of the Wills Act (1 Vict. c. 26, s. 9), and that where the reference is such as to render the unattested paper capable of identification, parol evidence is admissible.

Of Allen v. Maddock it is sometimes said the principle will not be extended (see Re Greeves, 7 W. R. 86). but still the case is good law. It was approved, and its principles explained, by Sir Cresswell Cresswell, in Straubenzee v. Mouck (8 Jur. N. S. 1159), where that able judge said: "In Habergham v. Viniers (2 Ves. Jun. 204), it was held that the testator's intention to incorporate any particular document with his will must be gathered from the will itself. In Allen v. Maddock the court went further, and held that the identity of the document to be incorporated might be ascertained by the evidence of the surrounding circumstances, such evidence being only used in aid of the construction of what was written." In the case before him A inclosed and sealed up in an envelope two sheets of paper, on which she had in writing expressed her wishes as to the disposal of certain moneys belonging to her, and also of her jewelry and other personal effects. These papers were not duly executed. On the inner side of the envelope she wrote as follows: "It is my wish for my dear husband to administer the moneys, and for the smaller bequests dear B will attend to them." This memorandum was signed by the deceased in the presence of two witnesses. The only surviving witness deposed that after the execution two sheets of paper similar to those found therein were placed and sealed up in the envelope by the deceased, but that she could not further identify them. There was evidence that the envelope had been opened after the execution. Sir C. Cresswell held that the reference in the paper A was not to another document, as being then in existance, and that the reference was not sufficiently distinct to enable the court to identify any document at all. Secondly, that it was not proved at what time the papers B and C were enclosed in the envelope, and the mere fact of their being found there afforded no presumption that they were the documents the deceased intended to refer to in the paper A. He accordingly pronounced against the papers being admitted to probate. In In the goods of Stewart the will referred to a list of papers. The evidence showed that the list was made before a codicil confirming the will. The list as incorporated was admitted to probate. In In the goods of Pascall (19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 366; L. Rep. 1 P. & M. 606), the testator by will desired that instructions previously given by him the same day to an attorney's clerk should be carried out. The instructions were oral, but the clerk had at the same time made short notes of them in the testator's presence. Probate of the notes was refused. The rule was approved by Sir J. P. Wilde in In the goods of Mary Sunderland (14 L. T. Rep. N. S. 741, and L. Rep. 1 P. & D. 198). There the testatrix by her will bequeathed the residue of her property "save and except such articles of furniture as shall be ticketed or described in a paper in my own handwriting to show my intention regarding the same." As the will did not describe the lists as then existing parol evidence that they had been shown to her legal adviser, and to the witnesses who attested a codicil, was excluded Sir J. P. Wilde remarked, "If the court were at liberty to turn to independent sources of information and investigation, the question whether she intended those papers to form part of the will independently of the language in which she is supposed to have referred to them, there is abundant parol evidence to satisfy the court that the testatrix did intend these lists to form part of her will." But after consideration, he was of opinion that the court was not at liberty to enter into that question, and to receive that parol evidence.

2.—ALTERATIONS AND INTERLINEATIONS. Cooper v. Borhett (4 Moo. P. C. C. 419; 10 Jur. Rep 93) laid down the presumption that alterations in a will were made after execution. In Williams v. Ashton (1 J & H. 115), Lord Chancellor Hatherley, then Vice Chancellor Wood, expressed the rules somewhat differently, saying, "I do not think it is quite a correct mode of stating the rule of law to state that alterations in a will are presumed to have been made at one time or another. The correct view, as enunciated in the case of Doe v. Palmer (16 Q. B. 74) is that the onus is cast upon the party who seeks to modify the terms of a will to give some evidence from which a jury may conclude that the alterations in the will were made before execution. In In the goods of H. H. Sykes (28 L. T. Rep. N. S. 143), Sir John Hannen said, "Stated as the rule generally is, the presumption is that alterations were made after execution, but that presumption may be rebutted by declarations made before execution, but not after. Doe v. Palmer (sup.) is an authority for that." The case of Lord St. Leonards v. Sugden shows that the authority of Doe v. Palmer, as to the non-admission of a declaration made after the will, is overruled. It is also to be remarked that Re Cadge (L. Rep. 1 P. & M. 113) is in favor rather of Lord Hatherley's way of stating the general presumption, than that commonly adopted.

Colonel Sykes left a will with many interlineations and erasures; by one of them a Dr. Sykes was appointed executor. Before re-publishing his will by a codicil, the testator mentioned the appointment of Dr. Sykes. Sir J. Hannen admitted evidence of this declaration, and granted him probate.

THE UNION COLLEGE OF LAW.

CLOSING EXAMINATIONS AND GRADUATION EXERCISES.

The graduating exercises closed last week, and were in every respect gratifying to the friends of the two institutions under whose auspicies the law college is controlled. Thirty-three juniors were examined for admission to the senior class of next year, of whom twenty-five were admitted, viz.: George A. H. Baker, Charles O. B. Brockway, Hamlet Collamore, E. F. Dunne, R. P. H. Durkee, F. H. Follansbee, H. E. Hadley, W. A. Hornsburger, Frank Hills, A. C. Leland, John McKeough, S. M. Meek, C. B. Morrison, A. C. Merritt, N. A. Partridge, J. F. Rhodes, L. M. Trumbull, James H. Tait, Mr. Underwood. James C. Worrall, F. Walker, C. H. Webster, and M. W. Webster.

In the senior class of the present year sixty-three students received instruction, of whom fifty-two were examined for diplomas. These are Louis Allen, of Carlyle, Ill.; Benjamin R. Burroughs, of Edwardsville, Ill.; Rufus W. Bellamy, Charles A. Berdel, F. B. Eisen Bockius, Charles W. Butterfield, Albert W. Brickwood, John T. Barrow, Clarence A. Burley, William F. Congan, Geo. N. W. Carroll, Wallace L. Dewolf, Thomas B. Drake, Edward F. Goiton, Dwight W. Grave, Adrian C. Honore, Arnold Heap, Robert M. Ireland, Martin O. Lewis, Hempstead Washburne and James H. Ward of Chicago, Illinois. Nathaniel Brown, of Prospect Park; William F. Congan; Albert G. Crawford, of Pittsfield, Ill.; LeFavour F. Campbell, of Macomb, Ill.; Benjamin H. Chapman, of Raymond, Ill.; George B. Chapin, of DeWitt, Ill.; William Y. Chamberlain, of Yellow Spring, Green county, O.; A. Lee Doud, of Gardner, Ill.; William M. Farmer, of Vandalia, Ill.; Thorn H. Harden, of Pontiac, Ill.; Ezra A. Helm, of Sycamore, Ill.; Addison W. Hastie, of Galesburg, Ill.; Silas E. Kelsey, of Lisbon, Ill.; William L. McGarry, of Evanston, Ill.; William R. Nicholson, of Prince Edward's Island, Can.; Franklin C. Peatt, of Warren, Ill.; Zach. W. Taylor, of Bloomington, Ill.; Charles S. Frank, of Caledonia, Minn.; William W. Rathburn, of Swedona, Ill.; Alfred R. Rich, of Metamora, Ill.; William H. Steward, of Shipman, Ill.; Henry C. Stearns, of Watseka, Ill.; James M. Scott, of Sterling, Ill.; Eric Winter, of New York City; Charles H. Wooster, of Amboy, Ill.; Robert M. Wing, of Lisbon, Ill.; James R. Williams, of Carmi, Ill.; George W. Wilbur, of Belvidere, Ill.; Kimball Young, of Mattoon, Ill.; and David L. Zook, of Goshen, Ind.

The examination was conducted chiefly by the Faculty, assisted by Mr. James P. Root and Edward Roby. The Hon. Thomas Hoyne, Chairman of the Board of Management of the College, James L. High, and other lawyers, being present at portions of the examination. The entire senior class exhibited a high standard of excellence.

The programme of the commencement exercises consisted in the reading of essays, of which there were six, and for which there was a prize of $50 offered by H. O. Horton, for the best essay upon a legal topic The judges of the essays were Hon. I. N. Arnold, Judge R. H. Forrester, and James L. High. Judge Doolittle presided over the exercises, and Hon. Thos. Hoyne, chairman of the executive committee, was present. There was a large number of students in attendance, and much interest was manifested in the proceedings. The first essay was read by A. D. Rich, who was awarded the Horton prize. It is as follows:

UNANIMITY IN THE JURY.

Hallam calls the requirement of unanimity in jury trials, "that preposterous relic of barbarism." It is my purpose to inquire whether, in "these days of grace and rascality," our juries, in the State courts at least, should not be permitted, under proper restrictions, to return as their verdict the opinion of an adequate and proper majority. To discuss the subject properly, it seems almost necessary to review the conditions under which the prevailing rule of unanimity originated, in fact the history of the jury itself; but the limits imposed in respect to time forbid only the briefest allusions.

In the first place, the so-called jury systems of the various nations of Europe, seem to have differed from the moderu English jury particularly in the following points: The number often varied from twelve; unanimity was not usually required; the juries were in all cases, judges as well of the law as of the fact, the position of the chief officer connected with the court, by whatever name he was known, was simply that of president, or "moderator of the meeting;" while the trial itself partook more of the character of a modern arbitration. The doctrines of compurgation, wager of law, and a system of "legally appointed witnesses," with duties similar to those of our subscribing witness, figured largely in the early formation of the English jury. The early Britons suffered the hardships of repeated invasion and the tyranny of foreign races, kings and freebooters.

Each change in the government brought new customs, new laws, new languages. With William the Conqueror came the new and oppressive doctrines of the federal system; and the early Norman kings, conscious of the injustice of their claim to the English throne, sought to pacify dissatisfaction and to attach a liberty-loving people to their interests, by numerous concessions and the establishment of various wise and wholesome laws; and among them the trial by jury.

With the establishment of the Grand Assize by Hen. II, the English jury seems to have first taken its distinctive feature as the proper tribunal of fact alone.

The jury examined no extrinsic evidence, but based their verdict upon their individual knowledge of the facts in the case, and, while their number must be not less than twelve, if they failed to agree, the assize was afforced, that is, others were added, until the composition of the jury was such that twelve of them could agree upon a verdict; so that in common with the practice of compurgation, a verdict under such circumstances simply determined the number of witnesses, or the amount of evidence the policy of the law required to establish a conclusive presumption of fact, and judgment was rendered upon this presumption. As soon as the jury began to consider evidence other than their own, the practice of afforcement was rendered impracticable, and, with the final abandonment of this custom, unanimity was regarded a necessity. Again, when we consider the history of the struggle between the king and parliament in reference to the royal prerogative; when judges were appointed to further the interests of the king in whatever manner necessary; the extreme barbarity of criminal prosecutions in general, especially those for political offences and the sin of witchcraft; the bloody details of State Trials and Parliamentary impeachments, we seem forced to assent to the assertion that to no one human institution of the past does the world owe so much for the preservation of civil and religious liberty as to trial by jury; and the very life of the system itself was the rule of unanimity.

Under such conditions of oppression and ignorance was the English jury gradually developed, and it was while contemplating rather the struggles of the past, than the possible needs of the future, that the founders of our Republic gave such weight and prominence to this "palladium of liberty." While our entire system of government is radically different, the structure of our courts and their administration of justice is scarcely less different. Our judges hold their offices for definite periods, are appointed by the people, responsible only to the people, and err, if at all, in the interests of the people. The tendency is strong, especially in popular governments to mitigate the force of all rules that seem, under any circumstances, to bear heavily upon the individual; and popular sympathy is apt to be with him, who, for the time being, seems most to need it; and a question frequently presenting itself is, whether this tendency, though good in itself, may not be carried too far in the structure of our jurisprudence, in our administration of justice and in the formation of our statute law? The latitude now allowed the prisoner in criminal cases is proportionally wide as it formerly was restricted; and the "benefit of a doubt" is made to "hide a multitude of sins" and shield a multitude of sinners.

Treason, as a crime, either against State or national authority is here practically unknown, while the number of crimes punishable with death is reduced from one hundred and sixty-four in the time of Blackstone, to one in some States, to none in others.

The rules of evidence have been reduced to the nicest precision. Instead of the crown advocate eagerly quizzing the prisoner and torturing every statement into evidence against him, our prisoner is protected in every possible way against the prosecuting attorney, and is allowed by law every privilege and help in his defence that innocence even can ask. In a word, few, if any of the original reasons for the rule of unanimity remains either in criminal or civil cases, while there are many reasons for a change.

The boast of the common law system of pleading was its tendency to reduce the controversy to one plain issue readily comprehended by the average juryman. Their civil litigation related chiefly to questions concerning real estate, wherein the issues were usually clear and well defined; while on the contrary, our systems of pleading fail to secure the same degree of precision, and our litigation, arising out of an almost infinite variety of commercial and other interests, continually presents questions that only experts can comprehend; yet, we require each of twelve men chosen without discrimination, if properly chosen, and not likely to be above the average degree of information or mental capacity, to weigh carefully all the intricate and conflicting points of evidence, whatever the issues to which the evidence may relate, and finally to all arrive at the same result. When, from any reason whatever, one juror fails to agree with the rest, he may candidly think it his misfortune to be thus pitted against "eleven of the most unreasonable men in the kingdom;" yet, as a matter of course, the trouble, expense and delay of a new trial must necessarily ensue. No stronger reason exists for the reluctance which the best citizens of a community feel against performing what is termed jury duty, than the fact that, even could their number be composed entirely of competent men—which is practically out of the question—it would frequently be impossible to arrive at a verdict at once unanimous, and still satisfactory to each.

Again, how often is unanimity rather apparent than real, and purchased only at the sacrifice of truth. Jurors are sworn to render their verdict in accordance with their individual opinions as to the value of the evidence before them, and, to accede to any other opinion is to violate their oaths; yet how often is the verdict the result of compromise and concession—a patched up affair, and not the real opinion of any? How often, too, does the verdict depend upon the opinion of the juror who, from any reason, good or bad, wields the greatest influence among his fellows.

Again, in many cases involving questions relating to damages, there is frequently no better way of arriving at a unanimous verdict than by a kind of a "hotchpot" proceeding, by which the average opinion of the whole respecting the amount, constitutes the verdict, or the basis of it; and if, before they resort to this, they shall have discussed the merits of the case among themselves, which is all the law contemplates in any case, they may, to use the expression of the stock broker, be divided into bulls and bears; and, in that case, it lies in the power of one or two to make the unanimous (?) verdict either much more or much less than is adequate or just, thereby laying the foundation for a new trial or an appeal. Forsyth, in summing up a discussion of this question pertinently asks: "Since, then, the chances against a real unanimity are very great, and the temptation to apparent unanimity is strong, ought a rule to be maintained, the tendency of which is to bring about such results?"—(Trial by Jury, 207.)

As to civil trials, he answers the question in the negative, but in criminal cases, on account of the more disastrous consequences that may possibly follow an error, it is thought by many, and he among them, that the rule should still be retained; because, for some reason hardly apparent, it is said the opinion of the twelve is much less liable to be erroneous than the united opinion of nine or ten or any other number, without regard to the motives that may influence the dissenting jurors. Some one has said with truth that an innocent man charged with crime would often choose to be tried by the court, if the law would permit, while a guilty one, seldom or never; each regarding a jury trial as usually conducted, much less liable to do him justice than no jury at all. The innocent man, too, will select an intelligent jury—the best he can get—while with the guilty one the reverse is true; and, however guilty he may be, with the assistance of able counsel, such as money will always procure, the proper selection of one or more jurors by the skillful use of challenges, the proper manipulation of the evidence, either when given or in the address to the jury, or perhaps, by adroitly leading the court itself into some error if an acquittal is not obtained, a disagreement may be secured or some other ground laid for a new trial or appeal; and, as a rule, with every delay the prospect of an ultimate acquittal grows better. It is a terrible thing to even risk the execution or imprisonment of an innocent man for the crime of another, and it is said with great force that, until sufficient evidence is produced to convince the entire jury, no one should be placed in such jeopardy; but the difficulty is that no possible degree of evidence can convince the juror who is there not to be convinced, and there is usually little practical difficulty in securing at least one such juror. On the other hand, it is quite as fearful to contemplate that homicides and murders, not to speak of the infinite number of lesser crimes, should be of daily occurrence and punishments so rare And while the want of a unanimous verdict may sometimes justly spare the prisoner, in a far greater proportion of cases does the acquittal of those who clearly deserve punishment imperil the public safety, and endanger the lives, property and honor of the innocent by the encouragement it gives to the vicious. Besides, a verdict of conviction is hardly ever conclusive, but the prisoner will always have a new trial and the protection of the Supreme court when entitled to it; and in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, upon any adequate ground, he can as a last resort obtain either a commutation of his sentence or a pardon from the governor. It is far more easy to protect the prisoner from the error or vindictiveness of the jury than to protect the public against the incompetency or corruption of the jury.

It is perhaps well said that the rule of unanimity has grown with the growth and strengthened with the strength of the system itself, and having long stood the test of time and filled its purpose well, there is a halo of veneration about it that ought to protect it from innovation; yet it may be further said that a mode of trial developed hundreds of years ago may, in its strictly original form, be no better adapted to our altered circumstances than is a system of pleading, or of real estate law, both of which have undergone numerous modifications and have been improved thereby.

The objection that in capital cases, as a measure of precaution, the verdict ought to be unanimous, derives the most of its force from the remembrance of the bloody times of the Star-Chamber Commission, and is equally applicable as an argument for the abolition of capital punishment altogether, and undoubtedly had its effect in causing the provision of our statute which leaves the death penalty to the discretion of the jury. I would not change the statute in this respect, but, out of abundant caution, would still require a unanimous verdict to inflict death; but in all other cases let three-fourths, or some other number less than all, be competent to return a verdict.

But the strongest argument I have met for the retention of the rule of unanimity is, that it necessitates a thorough consideration of each case; that the views of each individual of the jury must be considered by all the rest; that the evidence will be scanned from every point, and hastily formed verdicts rare. Aside from the remarks heretofore made in reference to the practical working of the system, the only way that occurs to me of meeting this argument—and I think it on the whole fully adequate—is to provide that in no case shall a verdict other than unanimous be received, until the jury shall have had ample time to fully consider the case in all its bearings, the minimum of this time to be fixed by law, and to be increased in the discretion of the court. This is no fancy provision. It has long been the custom in Scotland, and in various governments on the continent, and has been repeatedly urged in the English Parliament.

Although it has been intimated that the entire abolition of the right to trial by jury in criminal cases, might contravene the spirit of the Federal Constitution, yet, since the various decisions upon the scope of the early amendments to that instrument, the proposed change would hardly be held to contravene its provisions; and though it might necessitate an alteration of our State Constitution, that should not be considered a very serious objection.

To recapitulate: With scarcely an exception, the requirement is contrary to the spirit of our civil institutions, it being required, as it occurs to me, in but one other instance—the execution of certain powers. Ours is a land of majorities. The laws are made and repealed, the courts instituted and abolished, and the judges, of the State, courts at least, both elected and impeached by majorities. The final decision upon the constitutionality of a law, and the rights of parties under it, is determined by a bare majority. Though the fundamental law of the land, in one sense, may be said to have been originally established by the unanimous consent of the people then concerned, yet it is amended, it has been upheld and vindicated, and provides under certain exigencies for its temporary suspension and the substitution of military rule, by the requisite majorities. We intrust our most sacred and vital interests to the watch and ward of the majority or to its representatives, no matter who compose that majority, or how it is obtained; yet we tie our hands and give to those who abuse their trust, perfect immunity if they shall be able, by any means, to procure one to sit in judgment on their case and say, "I forbid." Fraud, peculation and open robbery are practiced in every branch of the public service. Our system of requiring pecuniary bonds from public officers, too frequently results only in visiting penalties upon those whose greatest fault is too implicit confidence in the integrity of men; for the corrupt, defaulting officer, when caught and prosecuted, too often hides himself, both from the public and his bondsmen, behind the jury. It is upon rocks like these that republics founder. The requirement of unanimity would not exist to day, either in England or America, but for the Star-Chamber trials of Great Britain; and whatever revolutions are yet to sweep over us, the world will never again see sustained, for any length of time, a similar tribunal. And as the memory of those times fades, let us hope for a more reasonable procedure in trials by jury.

"The Ethics of the Legal Profession," by Mr. Charles S. Trask, was a logical, labored production. He treated upon the subject of the morality of the bar, and denounced in strong terms the tendency of many young lawyers to prostitute the profession by lending themselves as willing tools to the basest of schemes and schemers. He spoke of the many mushroom so-called lawyers who sprang into existence in a night, without any pretense whatsoever to preparatory training, and essayed to push themselves into the ranks of the legitimate practitioners of the law, and, with brazen effrontery, sought to aspire to notoriety, if not reputation, without a scintilla of a foundation to work upon. Mr. Trask's essay partook largely of a religious and moral tone throughout. The essayist took the ground that the lawyer could be true to his client and yet be true to his manhood and dignity. If he could successfully blend the two, he would attain to the highest dignity ever accorded to man.

Mr. Arnold Heap followed with an essay on "Husband and Wife." He wished his audience to go back with him to the early period of the Saxons, and view the condition of the woman in that period. Man might disfranchise, but he never could legislate her out of existence. Time had been when he who took to himself a wife owned and possessed her, and all the goods and chattels which she brought to him. He was likewise made responsible for all her debts. He became liable for all her responsibilities before marriage, and if she wished to recover money or property due her before marriage, her husband might either join with her in a legal proceeding, or he might prosecute a claim on his own account. This was for a long time the common law. The law aforesaid also allowed the husband to beat his wife for certain offenses, with a whip or with his fists; for other offenses the husband was permitted to inflict slighter chastisements. To offset these heavenly privileges, the husband was held individually responsible by law for the conduct of his wife; he had complete control over the effects and person of his wife. Mr. Heap proceeded, in his well-written essay, to expound the technicalities of the law to the remainder of his class in a manner which testified to his knowledge of his subject, and his familiarity with these nice law points. He is considered as one of the first in his class, and will no doubt make his mark in the noble profession which he has selected.

Next came Mr. James R. Williams, with an essay on "The Doctrine of Uses." This subject, he said, would not be regarded with a great deal of interest by persons who had not studied the matter fully, but it was full of interest to those who had bestowed time and thought upon it. He explained the origin of the subpœna, and the administering of the oath. His essay was an extremely long one, and he maintained his ground by means of numerous quotations and references, displaying thereby an abundant amount of hard study, research, and a thorough understanding of the law points covered by his theme.

Mr. George W. Wilbur instructed his hearers upon the subject of "Eminent Domain," in a strong essay, which was filled with erudition. This young gentleman possesses the gift of a fine voice, coupled with an admirable presence.

The closing essay was by Mr. W. W. Rathburn, on "The Feudal System in England." He explained the theory of the federal system from a legal standpoint, and in doing this he gave a great deal of history that was highly interesting.

After the reading of the essays, the prize, a check for $50 from O. H. Horton Esq., was by the unanimous decree of the judges, awarded to Mr. Albert R. Rich, as having the best written essay, and treating the subject in the most masterly manner.

The following is the report of the judges:

To the Honorable, the Faculty of the Union College of Law:

GENTLEMEN: The undersigned, having been designated by your body as a committee to examine the various essays submitted by members of the graduating class competing for the Horton prize, beg leave to submit the following as their report.

Sixteen essays have been submitted for examination, the author's names being withheld, and the essays being designated respectively by the letters of the alphabet from A to P inclusive. We desire to give expression to our sense of the high degree of merit displayed in all of the essays submitted, many of which exhibit a familiarity with the subjects discussed, as well as an originality of thought and a vigor of expression which would do credit to older members of the profession. In this view we regard them as equally creditable to their respective authors, and to the faculty and corps of instructors under whose tuition these gentlemen have been prepared for the bar. In view of the high merit of all the essays presented, the only regret entertained by your committee in the discharge of their duties, is that they have but one prize to award. All of the essays have been carefully read and their comparative merits thoroughly weighed and discussed by the committee, and it is our unanimous conclusion that the essay marked "B," entitled, "Unanimity in the Jury," occupies the first rank, and that its author is clearly entitled to the Horton prize.

Your committee, having been also requested to designate six of the essays exhibiting most merit, for the purpose of being publicly read at the graduating exercises of the class, would report the following as, in their opinion, entitled to such distinction:

B. "Unanimity in the Jury."*
L. "Eminent Domain."
H. "Husband and Wife."
C. "The Ethics of the Legal Profession."
I. "The Doctrine of Uses."
P. "The Feudal System in England."

In concluding their labors, the committee desire to congratulate the profession and the public, that we have, in Chicago, a law school which is already taking rank with the oldest and best schools in the country, and whose graduates exhibit by their high scholarship and professional attainments the best possible commentary upon the thorough and efficient course of instruction which is here pursued.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

ISAAC N. ARNOLD,
JAMES L. HIGH,
R. H. FORRESTER, } Com.

* The authors of the above essays respectively were as follows:

"Unanimity in the Jury," Albert R. Rich, of Metamora, Ill.

"Eminent Domain," Geo. W. Wilbur, of Belvidere, Ill.

"Husband and Wife," Arnold Heap, of Chicago, Ill.

"The Ethics of the Legal Profession," Chas. S. Trask, of Caledonia, Minn.

"The Doctrine of Uses," James R. Williams, of Carmi, Ill.

"The Feudal System in England," W. W. Rathburn, of Swedona, Ill.

Judge Booth then announced that he had the honor of reading the list of graduates upon whom the faculty had the honor of conferring the degree of bachelor of laws. The chair accompanied the reading of the names, 50 in number, with a few remarks, upon sending the young men out into the world, after which the diplomas were informally presented to the graduates by Mr. V. B. Denslow.

At the close of the proceedings, Mr. David L. Zook, in behalf of the class, came forward, and, with an appropriate speech, presented a photograph of all the graduates, by Brand, to Judge Booth, as a mark of the esteem in which he was held by the members.

LVI. NEW HAMPSHIRE REPORTS.

We are under obligations to the Hon. JOHN M. SHIRLEY, official Reporter, for advance sheets of the LVI. Volume of New Hampshire Reports, from which we take the following head-notes:

INTEREST ON LEGACY — CONSTRUCTION OF WILL AND CODICILS—CUMULATIVE LEGACIES.

Rice v. Boston Port and Seaman's Aid Society.—p. 191.

The rule in this State is, that a pecuniary legacy, payable generally, without designation of any time of payment, is payable at the end of one year from the death of the testator, without interest; and that if not then paid, it bears interest after the expiration of the year.

Considerations which should govern the court in determining whether legacies given in separate testamentary instruments are cumulative or substitutionary, discussed.

A. R., in her will, named the defendants among a number of other benevolent societies to whom she gave $5,000 each, and, in a codicil executed about a year afterwards, named them in another list of other benevolent societies to whom she also gave $5,000 each. Held, (Smith, J., dissenting), that, under the circumstances shown at length in the case, the second bequest should be regarded as substitutionary for the first.

PRACTICE—REFERENCE OF CAUSES.

Gray v. White Mts. (N. H.) Railroad.—p. 182.

An order was made by the Circuit court, sending an appeal from an assessment of land damages by the railroad commissioners and selectmen to a referee for trial; but no action was taken under the order by reason of exceptions which were transferred to this court. Before the exceptions were reached for decision here, the statute was amended by excluding such cases from its operation. Held, that the order of reference should be rescinded.

LEGAL ALBUMS FOR THE CENTENNIAL.—C. D. Mosher of 951 Wabash Avenue, has produced the most beautiful and artistic photographs of the prominent men of Chicago we have ever seen. His photographic and historic patent albums for families, churches, colleges, members of the bar and ministers, are a new feature. One page is devoted to the photograph of a person the next to a brief sketch, giving the leading events of his life. Mr. Mosher has devoted two of these albums to the bench and bar. The first volume was sent to the centennial some weeks ago, the second as soon as completed will follow it. The first volume contains the photographs and sketches of the following judges and members of the bar:

Sidney Breese, John Dean Caton, Thomas Drummond, H. W. Blodgett, Erastus S. Williams, John A. Jameson, Joseph E. Gary, W. H. McAllister, Henry Booth, Wm. W. Farwell, John G. Rogers, Samuel M. Moore, Martin R. M. Wallace, Lambert Tree, James R. Doolittle, Norman B. Judd, Robert Hervey, Van H. Higgins, Corydon Beckwith, Joseph P. Clarkson, M. F. Tuley, Charles Carrol Bonney, J. M. Walker, Lyman Trumbull, E. G. Asay, S. A. Goodwin, Charles H. Reed, John Van Arman, Wirt Dexter, Thomas Hoyne, Elliott Anthony, Hamilton N. Eldridge, I. N. Stiles, Leonard Swett, L. L. Bond, James B. Bradwell.

Judge David Davis, Gov. Beveridge and Hon. Lyman Trumbull head the list in the second volume. Members of the bar visiting the centennial and examining these albums will feel almost as if they were surrounded by their friends attending a bar meeting in Chicago.

THE ILLINOIS PRESS ASSOCIATION AND THE RAILROADS.—The Illinois Press Association held its annual meeting at Joliet last week. Its session occupied three full days. The members of the Association visited the Penitentiary, the Stone Quarries, the Iron and Steel Works, and other places of interest. On the eve before their departure they were entertained by the citizens with a banquet and ball. There was a very large attendance this year. The Association passed resolutions expressing its appreciation of the courtesies it had received from the city, citizens and railroads of the State. Of all the railroads, none, have extended to the Association more courtesies than the Alton and St. Louis and the Baltimore and Ohio. While the Association was in session, Mr. McMullen, General Superintendent of the former road, telegraphed to President Rounds that he would place at the disposal of the President a train to take the members to the city. The Association expressed its thanks to the worthy and efficient Superintendent by telegraph. The following resolutions relating to the Baltimore and Ohio road were passed:

WHEREAS, The Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company having, in the spring of 1874, extended to this Association the courtesy of a free train from Chicago to Washington, Baltimore, and return, enabling us to make one of the most pleasant excursions ever enjoyed by this Association, and

Whereas, Mr. C. M. Wicker, Gen'l Agent of the line at Chicago, in a recent courteous communication to the officers and Executive Committee, while deprecating the fact that under the recent action of the Louisville Railroad Convention this company cannot deviate from the transportation rates there made, he will be glad to furnish, on proper notice, a special train and special conductor, and afford every possible facility for a pleasant excursion.

Be it Resolved, That this Association extends to the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad its sincere thanks for past courtesies, and to Mr. C. M. Wicker, especially, its general agent at Chicago, for his courteous communication and generous proposal therein made.

Resolved, That while it is not deemed advisable at this time to make arrangements for a general excursion of the Association, yet those of its members who visit the Centennial will bear in mind the kind courtesies before alluded to, and endeavor to reciprocate them by our individual influence and patronage, esteeming it, as we do, to be one of the most pleasant, safe and satisfactory routes in visiting the Centennial and the East.

Resolved, That this resolution be spread upon our minutes, and that the president and secretary furnish Mr. C. M. Wicker with a copy of the same.

The Courts.

UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT.

GREGORY v. MCVEIGH.

FEDERAL QUESTION—WRIT OF ERROR TO STATE COURT—HIGHEST COURT OF STATE.

1. Where, by the laws of a State, an appeal can be taken from an inferior court of the State to the highest court of the same, and that leave has been refused in any particular case, in the regular order of proceeding—the refusal not being the subject of appeal—a writ of error, if there be a "Federal question," as it is called in the case, properly lies under section 709 of the Revised Statutes, to the inferior court, and not to the highest one.

2. A Federal question exits when, in a suit by a person who seeks to recover property, on the ground that a judgment and execution on it by a court of the United States, interpreting a staute of the United States, has deprived him of the property in violation of the first principles of law, the defendant sets up a title under that judgment and execution, and the decision is against the title so set up.

Chief Justice WAITE delivered the opinion of the court.

The motion to dismiss this cause for want of jurisdiction is denied.

"A final judgment or decree in any suit, in the highest court of a State in which a decision in the suit could be had," may in a proper case be re-examined in this court. Revised Statutes, § 709.

The Court of Appeals is the highest Court in the State of Virginia. If a decision of a suit could be had in that court, we must wait for such a decision before we can take jurisdiction, and then can only examine the judgment of that court. If, however, the suit is one of which that court cannot take jurisdiction, we may re-examine the judgment of the highest court which, under laws of the State, could decide it. Downham v. Alexandria, 9 Wallace, 659.

The Court of Appeals has revisory jurisdiction over the judgments of the Corporation Court of the city of Alexandria, but parties are not permitted, in the class of cases to which this belongs, to take such judgments there for review as a matter of right. Leave for that purpose must first be obtained. Two modes for obtaining this leave are provided. One by petition to the Court of Appeals itself, and the other by petition to a judge thereof. If the petition is presented to a judge and he denies it generally, without more, it may be again presented to the court. But if the judge to whom the application is made "shall deem the judgment, &c., plainly right," and reject it on that ground, if the order of rejection shall so state, no other petition shall afterwards be presented to the same purpose. (Code of Virginia, 1873, chapter 178, § 10.) The parties are left free to present their petitions to the court or to a judge thereof, as they may find it most convenient or desirable.

It has long been settled that if a cause cannot be taken to the highest court of a State except by leave of the court itself, a refusal of the court upon proper application made to grant the leave, is equivalent to a judgment of affirmance, and is such a final judgment as may be made the basis of proceedings under the appellate jurisdiction of this court. (Railroad Co. v. Railroad Co., 13 Howard, 80.)

In the present case, the Court of Appeals has no power to review the judgment of the court below. It cannot even entertain a motion for leave to proceed. A judgment has been rendered by the highest court of the State in which a decision can be had. The Court of Appeals has never, in fact, had jurisdiction. A suit cannot be taken there, except upon leave, and that leave has, in the regular order of proceeding, been refused in this case. From this refusal there can be no appeal. Everything has been done that can be to effect the transfer of the cause. The rejection of a petition by one judge does not prevent its presentation to another. Here the petition has been presented to each and every one of the judges and they have all rejected it because the judgment was "plainly right." Thus the doors of the Court of Appeals have been forever closed against the suit, not through neglect, but in the regular order of proceeding under the law governing the practice.

We think, therefore, that the judgment of the Corporation Court of the city of Alexandria, is the judgment of the highest court of the State in which a decision of the suit could be had, and that we may re-examine it upon error.

Without stopping to discuss the other question presented by the motion, it is sufficient to say that we think the case involves the consideration of a Federal question. The proceeding in the District Court was under the authority of the United States and its validity is drawn in question.

Motion to dismiss denied.

U. S. CIRCUIT COURT, N. D. OF ILLINOIS.

JUNE 19, 1876.

BANKRUPTCY—SALE OF PERSONAL PROPERTY—POWER OF COURT TO SET ASIDE—RIGHTS OF PURCHASERS—NOTICE—SUPERVISORY JURISDICTION—RIGHT TO GRANT A SUPERSEDEAS—REPLEVIN IN STATE COURT.

On Saturday, June 3d, the arguments of counsel were heard before the Hon. DAVID DAVIS, Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, in the Chambers of Judge DRUMMOND, on the motion for a supersedeas from the decision of Judge Drummond, of the United States Circuit Court, to the Supreme Court, in the matter of the possession of the dredging machinery and property of the bankrupt firm of Fox & Howard. It will be remembered that Judge Blodgett confirmed, some months ago, the sale of this property for $40,500, to Conro & Carkin, and subsequently Judge Drummond reversed the action of Judge Blodgett, and decreed the right of possession to Crane & Hodgkins, the original bidders, directing that the former account to the latter for the profits arising therefrom during the time they have used it. An application was thereupon made for an appeal to the Supreme court, which was refused by Judge Drummond, who intimated, however, that if they thought an appeal would lie from his decree, where it was made under the supervisory jurisdiction given the Circuit court by the bankrupt law, they could present the matter before Judge Davis. Therefore, when Judge Davis was in Chicago on the 3d inst., the matter was fully presented to him and he took it under advisement. Prior to this, however, the property was taken, on a writ of replevin issued by the Supreme Court of Cook County, from the possession of Conro & Carkin, on giving bonds in $80,000. This was done after the decision of Judge Drummond.

On Monday, June 19th, the parties assembled in Judge Drummond's chambers to receive the decision of the associate justice. Judge Davis said this case presented no difficulty for him when it was first heard, but he had since then turned the matter over in his mind a good deal, and the first impressions he had about it had been confirmed. The only point that was argued and that he had considered at all, was whether there was such a question growing out of the exercise by the district court of its summary jurisdiction, as ought to be reviewed by the Supreme court. He had come to the conclusion when he had heard the case, and reflection had convinced him that he was right, that the case ought to go to the Supreme court for its opinion. He did not want to express any opinion as to whether the District court had jurisdiction in this case or not. It all turned on this point in his opinion. Nor had he read the evidence with a view to ascertaining anything in relation to the merits of the transaction. A good deal could be said on both sides of that question. It was one of great importance, and he knew of no decision in this country, either by the District court or by the United States Circuit court, that exactly met it. In his own opinion there were grave doubts whether the District court had summary jurisdiction of this matter; and, although, as he had stated before, he had no fixed opinion upon that question, yet he thought it was right to the party, under the rules applicable to all courts granting a writ of supersedeas, to be allowed to take the case to the Supreme court. He did not wish to go on and give his opinion at all. Although he had a strong opinion as the case exists now, he did not wish to give any at all upon the question, reserving himself free, when the case shall be argued in the Supreme court, in order to pass upon it. It was very certain that the question was one that ought to be passed upon by the Supreme court. If the Supreme court was of opinion that the District court had summary jurisdiction in this matter, the case, of course, would be dismissed. If, in the judgment of the Supreme court, the District court had not the summary jurisdiction which was invoked, then the case might be retained there, and could be disposed of at that time. Had there not been so much feeling on this subject he would have had no doubt that this was a proper case to take to the Supreme court. He did not believe it was the intention of congress to give the District court exclusive jurisdiction in anything. It was neither his duty nor pleasure to pass upon any questions passed upon by the Circuit or District courts except what had been brought up here to be determined now. If there was any question about this case at all, with reference to the court granting a supersedeas, there was no question that when Mr. Cooper, on behalf of Crane & Hodgkins, made an application for a writ of replevin, he was guilty of a gross contempt of court. The question as to whether these parties have been in contempt or not was for the District and Circuit courts to determine. Thereupon Judge Davis directed Clerk Bradley to draw up the supersedeas, in order that he could sign it. Considerable side discussion ensued between Mr. Cooper, Mr. Ayers, and Judge Davis regarding the matter. Judge Davis said that inasmuch as the property had been replevied from Conro & Carkin, contracts made, and the season pretty well advanced, he was of the opinion that it would be about the proper thing to place the property in the hands of a receiver until the matter could finally be disposed of. The great difficulty, he said, existed in the bad feeling between the respective parties; it was entirely wrong to go into the State court for the purpose of obtaining the property in question when it was in the bankruptcy court of the United States. That, however, was a matter, he said, between Judges Drummond and Blodgett. He thought there was not a spirit of compromise manifested by either side. This piece of litigation is becoming quite interesting, and where it will end 'tis impossible for the wisest to say. The United States Supreme court will not meet before October, hence there will be considerable time for the parties interested to bring about a compromise in the matter.

WE are under obligations to C. S. VARIAN, U. S. Attorney at Carson City, for the following charge:

U. S. DISTRICT COURT, NEVADA.

JUNE 13, 1876.

THE UNITED STATES v. ADOLPH WAITZ, Register of the United States Land Office, etc.

THE DUTY OF U. S. LAND REGISTERS—FEES—EXTORTION—CANNOT ACT AS ATTORNEYS IN MATTERS BEFORE THEMSELVES.

The indictment was for extortion of money as U. S. Land Register. The prosecution was conducted by C. S. Varian, Esq. Hon. C. E. DeLong was counsel for the defendant. The charges upon which the trial was based are that Mr. Waitz received $200 for obtaining a patent, and that this fee was in excess of the amount he was entitled to receive as Register of the Land Office. The main facts, we believe, were not denied, but the plea of the defendant was that the money was paid to him as an attorney. The case of the guilt or innocence of the defendant of the charges preferred would seem to depend upon whether or not he could lawfully act as attorney in a case, the proceedings of which were to be conducted before him as U. S. Land Register. The case is very fully stated by Judge Hillyer in his charge to the jury, the principal portion of which is here given:

Section 5481 provides that "every officer of the United States who is guilty of extortion, under color of his office, shall be punished by fine," etc.

It is important at the outset that the jury should have, and bear in mind, a clear definition of the offense of extortion with which the defendant is charged.

Extortion, then, is thus defined: It is the unlawful taking by any officer, by color of his office, of any money or thing of value that is not due to him, or the taking of any money or thing of value, by color of his office, in excess of what is due him, or before it is due to him.

The fees of the Register of the land office are prescribed by law, and it is a general rule that no public officer may lawfully take any other fees or rewards for doing anything relating to his office than such fees as some statute in force gives him.

The statute law of the United States allows the following compensation to Registers:

First. A salary of $500 a year.

Second. A commission of one per centum on all moneys received at the Receiver's office of his land district.

Third. A fee of five dollars for filing and acting upon each application for mineral lands.

Fourth. A fee of 15 cents per hundred words for writing done in the land office in establishing claims for mineral land.

Their compensation for one year, including salary, commissions and fees, shall not exceed 3,000 dollars.

It is further enacted that upon satisfactory proof that a Register has charged or received fees or other rewards not authorized by law, he shall forthwith be removed from office.

He is also required to administer all oaths required by law or the instructions of his department, connected with the entry and sale of public lands without charging, or receiving directly or indirectly any fee therefor.

From all these provisions of the law it is plain that the compensation of a Register of the land office is definitely fixed by the statutes of the United States, and that it is not lawful for him to charge or receive any other fees or rewards directly or indirectly, for doing anything relating to his office of Register.

It is the aim of the law maker in fixing the fees of a public officer to give him what will be sufficient to pay for doing the duties required of him. It will rarely or never happen that every thing which it is the duty of the officer to do is set down in the fee bill. But a salary, or commission, or fee is given him which will make the office sufficiently remunerative, in the judgment of the legislators. For those items for which a fee is fixed the officer must take the sum given, and the applicant must pay it and be content. Those duties for which no fee is set down in the law must still be performed by the officer without charge, or rather are regarded as covered by the salary. The commissions or fees given for other matters.

In the next place, it will be advisable to ascertain as clearly as may be what the duties of a Register are in reference to these applications for mineral lands, and then, having a knowledge of his duties and his lawful fees, you will be able, I trust, without difficulty, to come to a right decision upon the main question in this case, viz.: whether money was taken by the defendant from the prosecutrix for the execution of his official duty, when either no fee was due for the service, or when a less one was due than he took.

By section 2478 of the U. S. Revised Statutes, the Commissioner of the General Land Office, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, is authorized to enforce and carry into execution by appropriate regulation, this statute in relation to mineral lands. He has made these regulations, and I will now call your attention to some of them.

From these instructions you will see that the duties of Register extend over, and have relation to, everything that is done, from filing the application until the papers are sent to Washington with his and the Receiver's opinion on them. It is true he is not bound to draw up the paper called an application, but if he does he can lawfully charge but 15 cents a folio of 100 words for writing it. So as to other affidavits.

As I have already stated, for doing anything pertaining to his official duties he must take such fee as the statute gives him. If the statute gives him none he must still do the duty and take no fee as in the case of applicants in land cases.

It is not denied that the defendant took a larger sum of money from Mrs. Grandona than he was entitled to as Register, but his plea is that the money was taken as an attorney's fee, not as a Register's fee.

This plea of the defendant has received much consideration on my part, and the result is, that I consider it perfectly clear and so charge you, that the defendant while Register could not lawfully act as attorney for any applicant for a patent whose application was filed, and the proceedings on which were to be conducted before him and in his office.

Many of the duties of the Register are of a judicial character and require the exercise of his impartial judgment. He should see that no fraudulent claim is enforced against the government. He has to pass upon the regularity of all the proceedings, and how can he do this impartially if he is the paid attorney of either party before him?

But if this thing might lawfully be done, a more serious evil would result from the power it would give the officer to obtain money from those who were compelled to come to him as Register.

If the jury believe from the evidence that Mrs. Grandona paid the defendant 200 dollars, or other sum, for getting her patent, and that this sum was paid defendant as well for the execution of his official duties as doing some other things relating to the getting of the patent, and that there was no specified portion of it taken as compensation or fee for the one or the other, and that the sum taken was in excess of his legal fees, then the taking of the money was extortion.

The compensation of the Register is fixed by law, as well as his duties; citizens are compelled to go to him to make an application for a patent, and hence it is of great importance that his fees should be fixed with precision, so that he may have no excuse for taking excessive fees or imposing upon the ignorant. For this reason the legislature have fixed the fees of the Register, so that each citizen may know what he has to pay. But the Register cannot lawfully engage himself to an applicant to do all that may be necessary to get a patent, and charge a gross sum for his services, covering his legal fees and those he is not entitled to as Register. And the reason is that in so doing he puts himself on unfair ground toward the applicant. Some of the services he is bound to apply to the Register for, because no one else can do them. Hence to allow him to take a sum in excess of his legal fees under the name of attorney's fee, would be in effect the placing of every applicant for a patent in the power of the Register.

The jury could not agree, and were discharged. They stood six for acquittal, and six for conviction.

SUPREME COURT OF PENNSYLVANIA.

SMITH v. THE CITY OF PHILADELPHIA. SMITH'S APPEAL.

Error to the District Court of Philadelphia County.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATION—NEGLIGENCE—LIABILITY OF CITY IN A CLAIM FOR LOSS OF WATER FROM FREEZING OF THE WATER MAINS—MEASURE OF DAMAGES.

Upon a claim for damages arising from a deficient supply of water:

Held, That the plaintiff could recover only the water rent for the time during which the supply was deficient, and not for loss of rents of the premises.

Semble, That water is supplied by the city under a license which is paid for, and not under a contract.

Action on the case by Jacob K. Smith against the city of Philadelphia for damages resulting from the loss of tenants and rents, loss of the benefit of payment by tenants for mains, water permits and water rents, and for expense of repairing pipes, attachments, etc., in consequence of the freezing of water mains, negligently laid by the defendants in the street upon which certain houses of plaintiff were situated. The court instructed the jury that the plaintiff could not recover for the loss of rents, but only the actual amount of the water rents or sums paid by the owner of the houses to the city for the liberty of drawing off the water from the city mains, and using the same for the time during which the supply was deficient, which instruction was the specification of error.

Jos. W. HUNSICKER for plaintiff in error.

A municipal corporation is liable like an individual; and the measure of damage is actual loss sustained, which reasonably includes the loss of tenants, etc.

Shearman and Redfield on Negligence, §§ 120-137; Mersey Docks v. Gills; Same v. Pierce, 11 H. C. L., 686; Western Savings Fund v. City of Philadelphia, 7 Cas., 185; Addison on Torts, 731; Lacour v. City of New York, 3 Duer's Rep., 406; City of Pittsburgh v. Grier, 10 Harris, 54; Pottstown Gas Co. v. Murphy, 3 Wright, 263.

Robert N. Wilison, assistant city solicitor, (with whom was C. H. T. Collis, city solicitor), for defendant in error.

The supplying of water is discretionary with the city; therefore, where the circumstances complained of as working an injury, are the same as if the work had not been undertaken, it is not liable.

Wharton on Negligence, sec. 264; Carr v. Northern Liberties, 11 Casey, 324; Grant v. The City of Erie, 19 Sm., 420: City of Atchison v. Challis, 9 Kan., 603; Mills v. City of Brooklyn, 32 N. Y., 489.

The maxim causa proxima non remota spectatur, is applicable. Penna. R. R. v. Kerr, 12 Sm., 353.

THE COURT.—The claim here is not for damages arising from the bursting of the water pipes laid by the city, but for the loss of the water caused by the bursting of the pipes leading to the plaintiff's houses, from the action of frost. The real claim is for the loss of the water, and this will not implicate the city in any loss beyond the consideration paid for its use by the water rents, and these were allowed. The introduction of water by the city into private houses is not on the footing of a contract, but of a license which is paid for.

PER CURIAM. Judgment affirmed.

U. S. CIRCUIT COURT, E. D. OF VIRGINIA.

THE UNITED STATES v. A DISTILLERY AT PETERSBURG.

Error to the District Court.

The seizure, by the order of an Executive officer of the Government, of the books kept by a distiller, in obedience to the requirements of the statute, does not exclude them from use as evidence under the provisions of section 860 of the Revised Statutes, concerning private books and papers.—[ED. Internal Revenue Record.

Opinion by WAITE, C. J.

Section 3303 of the Revised Statutes provides that every distiller shall from day to day make, or cause to be made, in a book or books to be kept by him in such form as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue may prescribe, certain specified entries recording in detail his transactions at the distillery. Section 3304 then provides that these books "shall always be kept at the distillery, and be always open to the inspection of every revenue officer . . . and whenever required shall be produced for the inspection of any revenue officer."

On the first day of November, 1875, the collector of internal revenue for the second collection district of Virginia, acting under special authority for that purpose from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, seized the distillery, which is the subject matter of this action, for a violation of section 3257 of the Revised Statutes, and with it took possession of the books kept upon the premises pursuant to the requirements of section 3303.

At the trial of this suit in the District court, the United States, to maintain the issue on their part, offered these books in evidence, but the claimants objected to their admissibility, upon the ground that they had been obtained from the distillers by means of a judicial proceeding. This objection was based upon section 860 of the Revised Statutes, which is as follows:

"No pleading of a party, nor any discovery or evidence obtained from any party or witness by means of a judicial proceeding in this or any foreign country, shall be given in evidence, or in any manner used against him or his property or estate, in any court of the United States in any crimiual proceeding, or for the enforcement of any penalty or forfeiture; Provided, that this section shall not exempt any party or witness from prosecution and punishment for perjury committed in discovering or testifying as aforesaid."

The District Court sustained the objection and excluded the evidence. To this ruling the United States excepted in due form upon the record, and the first question presented for our consideration arises upon that exception.

The books of a distiller, kept in obedience to the requirements of the statute, are, so to speak, quasi records. They are intended for use as much by the government as the distiller. They constitute part of the machinery which the law has provided for the enforcement of the revenue laws. Their object is to furnish the government with evidence of the daily business of the distillery, and with the means of detecting frauds. They are to be preserved two years for that purpose, and are to be produced for the inspection of the proper Government officials whenever demanded. They are, in a sense, part of the distillery itself, and as much subject to inspection and use for the purpose of securing the payment of the revenue as the building or any part of the fixtures or apparatus. False entries therein, or an omission to make such entries as the law requires, or a refusal to produce them upon proper demand, will subject the distillery to forfeiture.

The possession of the books in this case was not obtained by means of any judicial proceeding. The seizure was not by virtue of any warrant issued by a court or judicial officer, but upon an order of one of the executive departments of the Government, made in the legitimate exercise of its powers for the enforcement of the laws. The books were taken because found on the premises in the place where the law required they should be kept for the purposes of evidence to be consulted and considered by the Government. They were no more excluded by this statute from use as evidence, on account of the manner in which they were obtained, than were the tubs or other apparatus seized at the same time.

This case is entirely different from that of the United States v. Hughes (21 Int. Rev. Record, '76), decided by Judge Blatchford in the Southern District of New York. There the warrant of seizure was issued by a judge and made returnable to the court (14 Statute, 547, sec. 2). The evidence obtained consisted exclusively of private books and papers, which were in no sense whatever public. They were excluded because they had been obtained under a warrant issued in a judicial proceeding by a judge to a marshal, returnable with the papers, etc., to the judge for his judicial action. Here, as has been seen, the books were public books, kept for the purposes of evidence, and intended for use as well by the Government as the distiller. The United States have the right to demand their production without judicial process for all purposes connected with the revenue liabilities of the distillers or the distilleries.

We think the District Court erred in excluding the testimony, and the judgment must for this reason be reversed. It is unnecessary now to consider any other questions presented by the record, as upon another trial, with additional evidence, the Court may be able to find the facts more specifically and definitely than they appear in the present record.

The case is remanded for a new trial.

SUPREME COURT OF TENNESSEE.

JANUARY TERM, 1876.

J. D. EASLEY, Trustee, v. JOHN G. TARKINGTON.

TRUST ESTATE—RENTS AND PROFITS.—Where the deed makes no stipulation in regard to the rents and profits, and contains no waiver of the right of redemption in the event of sale by the trustee, and the maker remains in possession, he and not the trustee, is entitled to the rents and profits until foreclosure.

SUPREME COURT—DECREE—MATTERS NOT ADJUDICATED—MISTAKE.—Where the decree of the Supreme Court contains an adjudication of a question neither involved in the litigation nor discussed in the opinion, the court will treat so much of the decree as a mistake apparent on the face of the record, and at any time after final judgment it may be corrected or expunged. Such a decree not binding on the Chancer Court.—[ED. Commercial and Legal Reporter.

SNEED, J., delivered the opinion of the court.

The complainant as trustee in a deed of trust executed by defendant Tarkington, brought this bill on the 29th Sept., 1871, against the said Tarkington to recover the rents of the land conveyed for the then current year, and to secure the same attaches the crop grown upon the premises that year. The bill alleges that defendant Tarkington executed a deed of trust on the land for the benefit of divers creditors, on the 12th of July, 1865, and that he has continued in possession of the same ever since, and was in possession at the time of the filing of this bill. That complainant had instituted proceedings to have said trust foreclosed, and that the said proceedings were, at the time of the filing of this bill, pending upon appeal in this court. The complainant claims that he is entitled to the rents and profits of the land after the expiration of the time fixed in said deed, one year from the date thereof, when authority was given him by the deed to sell the land. The defendant admits the execution of the deed, admits his continued possession as charged, but denies that the complainant is entitled to the rents and profits of the land as claimed.

The deed is exhibited with the bill, and is in the ordinary form of a conveyance in trust for creditors, with authority in the trustee to sell at the expiration of one year, if the debts be not paid. The deed has no stipulation whatever in regard to the rents and profits, and contains no waiver of the right of redemption in the event of a sale by the trustee. It seems that pending this litigation in the court below, the case of Swanson & Gray v. Tarkington et al, was decided in this court. This case is reported, 7 Heisk., 612. The bill in that case was filed by the complainants, who are the postponed creditors in the deed, against the trustee, the maker of the deed, and certain preferred creditors, to enjoin the sale for the benefit of said preferred creditors, on the ground that their debts were not valid debts against the defendant Tarkington; and to have the land subjected to the payment of the debts of complainant. This relief was denied them. But the question of rents and profits was not involved in that litigation, and the opinion of this court makes no reference whatever to that question.

But in the preparation of the decree of this court in that case, after the questions really at issue were disposed of these words were included in the decree that "the deed conveyed a good title to the land, to the trustee Easley, and the right on the part of said Easley to the possession and the rents and profits thereof from the 12th day of July, 1866." This decree was entered about the 28th Feb., 1872, and the complainant in the present bill thereupon took a transcript of said decree and opinion, and produced the same in the court below and upon its authority insisted that the question of rents and profits involved in this case was adjudicated in that.

WHEN A COURT OF CHANCERY WILL ORDER TREES TO BE CUT AND LAND TO BE CLEARED.

CUSHING, C. J. From the cases of Delapole v. Delapole, 17 Ves., 150; Bewick v. Whitfield, 3 P. Wms., 267; Tooker v. Annesley, 5 Sim., 235; Hussey v. Hussey, 5 Mad., 44, cited in Tooker v. Annesley, and Waldo v. Waldo, 7 Sim., 261, I infer that it is an ordinary exercise of the powers of a court of chancery to order timber trees to be cut. The vice-chancellor, Sir Launcelot Shadwell, in Tooker v. Annesley, said, "I apprehend that the principle upon which the court acts in directing timber to be cut, in cases like the present, is not the personal benefit of the parties, but the benefit of the estate itself—the inheritance."

In this country, where it so often occurs that it is necessary to cut off the wood and timber in order to make the land fit for cultivation, it may be that the inquiry before the master would take a somewhat wider range than in the English practice. In Chase v. Hazelton, 7 N. H., 171, it was held that clearing land, which the jury finds to be bad husbandry, is waste; from which I infer that by the law of New Hampshire the clearing of land may be necessary as a part of good husbandry, and for the benefit of the inheritance.

The matter should be referred to a master to report whether any of the trees, either from their situation in regard to other trees, or from their being decayed, ought, for the benefit of the estate, to be cut. I think, also, that it would be within the spirit of the cases to extend the inquiry in this country to the point, whether, for the sake of fitting the land for cultivation, the benefit of the estate requires it to be cut.

If it should turn out that, on the report of the master, there should be an order by which any of the land should be cleared or any of the timber sold, it will then be time enough to consider what shall be done with the money ob tained from the sale.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT, N. D. OF GEORGIA.

In re SMITH,

Before Hon. W. B. WOODS, Circuit Judge,

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW — AMENDATORY BANKRUPT ACT OF 1873—EXEMPTIONS.

1. ACT OF 1873 CONSTITUTIONAL.—The amendatory bankrupt act of 1873, (17 Stat., 577), which enacts "that the exemptions allowed the bankrupt, etc.," shall be the amount allowed by the Constitution and laws of each State, respectively, as existing in the year 1871; and that such exemptions be valid against debts contracted before the adoption and passage of such State Constitution and laws, as well as those contracted after the same, and against liens by judgment or decree of any State court, any decision of any such court rendered since the adoption and passage of such Constitution and laws to the contrary notwithstanding," is uniform and hence constitutional.

Argument 1. A bankrupt law which adopts the exemption from execution prescribed by the laws of the several States, is uniform so far as such exemptions are concerned. The exemptions may differ widely in different States, but still the rule is uniform, namely, to subject to the payment of the bankrupt's debts all his property not exempted by the law of the State wherein he resides.

Argument 2. Congress may adopt the State laws at a particular date, in reference to exemptions, and the legislation is uniform, although the laws in some of the States may afterwards be repealed by the legislature, or declared null by the courts.

2. PRESUMPTION IN FAVOR OF CONSTITUTIONALITY.—In passing upon the constitutionality of an act of Congress, all the presumptions are in favor of the law, and the courts will not pronounce a law unconstitutional, unless its incompatibility be clear, decided and inevitable.

PEEPLES & HOWELLS, for petitioner.
BOYNTON & DESMUKE, contra.

WOODS, Circuit Judge.—This is a petition filed to reverse a decree of the district court in bankruptcy.

The facts of the case appear from the pleadings and evidence to be as follows: John W. A. Smith was adjudged a bankrupt by the District court in the Northern District of Georgia, on the 3d day of June, A. D. 1873. At the date of the adjudication the petitioner was the judgment-creditor of the bankrupt in the sum of $———. The judgment bore date prior to the 21st day of July, 1868, when the present constitution of Georgia went into effect, and was a lien upon the real estate of the bankrupt.

By an act passed prior to and in force in 1864, and in force when the debt due to petitioner was contracted, and which remained in force until the adoption of the constitution of 1868, there was allowed to the head of a family, as a homestead, exempt from execution, fifty acres of land for each of his children under sixteen years of age.

By the constitution of 1868, and by an act of the legislature, passed Oct. 3d, 1868, to carry the constitutional provision into effect, there was allowed to the head of a family a homestead of realty, exempt from execution, of the value of $2,000 (in specie).

The judgment of the petitioner against the bankrupt was duly proven and allowed as a debt against his estate prior to the 30th of June, 1874. On that day, the assignee in bankruptcy set off to the bankrupt his homestead, according to the provisions of the act of 1864, namely: ninety acres of land, that being fifty acres and five acres in addition thereto for each child of the bankrupt under sixteen years of age. The bankrupt claimed that he was entitled to have assigned to him the homestead allowed by the constitution of 1868, and the act of Oct. 3d, 1868, to wit: realty to the value of $2,000 (in specie). He therefore filed with the register his objections to the assignment made by the assignee. The register referred the question thus raised with his opinion thereon, sustaining the objections of the bankrupt against the assignment, to the district judge, who also sustained the objections of the bankrupt, and held that he was entitled to have his homestead set off, under the provisions of the act of Oct. 3d, 1868, notwithstanding the fact that the debt of the objecting creditor was contracted and the judgment therefor, a lien upon the realty of the bankrupt, before the change in the homestead law.

To review and reverse this decree of the District judge, is the purpose of the petition.

The case turns upon the constitutionality of the act of Congress approved March 3, 1873, entitled "An act to declare the true intent and meaning of the act approved June 8, 1872, amendatory of the general bankrupt law. 17 Statute, 577, Rev. Statute, sec. 5045. This statute enacts, "that the exemptions allowed the bankrupt * * * shall be the amount allowed by the constitution and laws of each State, respectively, as existing in the year 1871, and that such exemptions be valid against debts contracted before the adoption and passage of such State constitution and laws, as well as those contracted after the same, and against liens by judgment or decree of any State court, any decision of any such court rendered since the adoption and passage of such constitution and laws to the contrary notwithstanding."

To put the question clearly in view, it must be stated that after the adoption of the constitution of 1868, and the passage of the act of Oct. 3, 1868, to carry the exemptions provided for by the constitution into effect, the Supreme court of Georgia at its January term, 1873, in the case of Jones v. Brandon, 48 Ga., 593, decided that the provisions of the constitution and of the law, as far as they increased the exemption of property from execution, as against debts contracted before their adoption, was in conflict with that provision of the constitution of the United States which declares "No State shall * * pass * * any law impairing the obligation of contracts (Constitution of the U. S., Art. 1, Sec. 10,) and were, therefore, null and void. The same decision had, in effect, been previously made by the Supreme court of the United States in the case of Gunn v. Barry, 15 Wallace, 610. It follows from this state of the law, as declared by the courts, that when the assignee undertook to set off the homestead of the bankrupt on the 30th of June, 1873, he was not authorized to set apart, as against Whitefield's Adm'r, any greater amount of realty than was authorized by the act of 1864, except as he derived his authority from the act of Congress of March 3, 1873, above cited. In other words, there was no valid and operative State law by which the bankrupt could claim that he was entitled to a homestead of the value of $2,000 (in specie) as prescribed by the constitution and law of 1868.

The question, therefore, whether the act of Congress, March 3, 1873, is constitutional, is vital to the decision of this case.

The objection to this act is not that it impairs the obligation of contracts, for Congress is not prohibited by the constitution from passing such a law. Evans v. Eaton, Peters C. C. 328; Sallerbe v. Matthewson, 2 Peters, 330; Bloomer v. Stalley, 5 McLean, 158. Besides the power expressly given to Congress "to establish uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States," implies the power to impair the obligation of contracts. Stephens v Griswold, Wall. 603; The Legal Tender Cases, 12 Wall. 457.

The ground of objection is that the law is not uniform as required by the constitution of the United States. In my judgment, a bankrupt law which adopts the exemption from execution prescribed by the laws of the several states is uniform so far as such exemptions are concerned. The exemptions may differ widely in different states, but such an act would apply a uniform rule, namely, to subject to the payment of the bankrupt's debts all his property not exempted by the laws of the state wherein he resided. Upon this ground the original provision of the bankrupt, which adopted the state exemption laws in force in 1864, was declared to be uniform. In re Beckerford, 1 Dillon, 45.

But it is said that the act of 1873 does not adopt the exemption laws as they exist in the states, but gives effect to all those which were upon the statute books of the states in 1871, even though some of them may have been declared unconstitutional, invalid and inoperative by the state courts; that the operation of the act of Congress is therefore not uniform, because in some states the exemption allowed by the state laws is followed, while in others exemptions are permitted which the state laws, as interpreted by the courts, do not allow.

The same objection would apply to the original bankrupt act of 1867. That declared that the exemptions allowed by the state laws in force in 1864 should be allowed under the bankrupt act. The constitutionality of this provision has never been declared, and yet, before the 3d of March, 1867, the date of the bankrupt act, many of the states might have altered, amended or repealed the exemption laws which were in force in 1864. Doubtless many of them did so before the passage of the act of 1873. Yet the bankrupt act of 1867 undertook to give effect, not to the exemption laws as they existed at its passage, and as they might be thereafter altered or amended, but as they existed in 1864. So, if the original act was uniform, the amendment of 1873 must be uniform.

Congress has undertaken to say tha, all exemptions in force at a certain date by laws of the state, shall have effect under the bankrupt act. I think this sufficiently meets the requirement of uniformity, and that, to make the law uniform it was not necessary to enact that the bankrupt act should follow the shifting legislation of the states on the subject of exemptions, or the decisions of the state courts.

Thus the bankrupt act of 1867 continued the exemptions that were in force in Georgia in 1864, although those exemptions had been repealed and new ones established by the act of October 3, 1868.

Suppose the bankrupt act of 1867 had declared that all exemptions by the state law in force at the date of its passage should have effect under the bankrupt act. That would clearly be a uniform enactment. Would it cease to be such and become unconstitutional merely because the legislature of a state had, at a subsequent time, amended its exemption laws, or the courts of another state had declared its exemption laws unconstitutional? I think it would not. In other words, I think Congress may adopt the state laws on the statute books of the state, at a particular date, in reference to exemptions, and that the legislation is uniform, although the laws in some of the states may afterwards be repealed by the legislature or declared null by the courts.

I am advised that a different view of the subject has been taken by the United States Circuit Court for the Eastern District of Virginia, in re Deckert 1 American Law Times and Reports, 326, in which case the chief justice of the supreme court pronounced the opinion. But, in passing upon the constitutionality of an act of Congress, all the presumptions are in favor of the law. While, therefore, disposed to yield great weight to this high authority, I cannot forget that in the opinion of the Congress of the United States this law is constitutional, and that the highest judicial authority has said that the courts ought not to pronounce a law unconstitutional unless its incompatibility be clear, decided and inevitable. Fletcher v Peck, 6 Cranch, 87; Dartmouth College v. Woodward, 4 Wheat. 625; Livingston v. Morse, 7 Peters, 663.

While I admit that the argument against the constitutionality of this act is plausible and persuasive. yet I cannot say that it is entirely convincing; it does not make the unconstitutionality of the act clear, decided and inevitable.

Resolving doubts, therefore, in favor of the law, I must decline to declare it unconstitutional, and I must affirm the decree of the district court.—The Central Law Journal.

SUPREME COURT OF MISSOURI.

MAY TERM, 1876.

ELIZABETH L. SWEANY et al. v. J. H. MALORY et al.

Appeal from Clinton Circuit Court.

ADMINISTRATOR'S SALE—WIDOW'S DOWER—WHEN SHE WILL BE ESTOPPED FROM CLAIMING DOWER.

1. WHEN WIDOW ESTOPPED.—That if the dower is guilty of fraudulent practices, in inducing the purchaser to take the estate under a belief that she waives her right to dower, she will be estopped from afterwards setting up her claims.

2. WHEN WIDOW PRESENT AT SALE AND ASSENTING.—That, where the administrator put up the real estate of the deceased for sale, representing that it was free from incumbrance, and that he would make a perfect title, and the widow of the deceased was present and assented to it, and stated that it would be sold free from her claim of dower, and the purchaser bought on such representations; held, under the facts in evidence, that the widow was estopped from afterwards claiming dower in the premises so sold.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

Opinion by WAGNER J.

This was a suit brought by plaintiff formerly widow of George Mallory, deceased, for the assignment of dower in the real estate of which her late husband died seized and possessed.

The defendants in their answer alleged that in his lifetime George Mallory mortgaged the land (in which mortgage plaintiff Elizabeth joined, relinquishing her right of dower) to secure the payment of a debt of one thousand dollars, and died leaving the debt unpaid; that the holder of the debt and mortgage obtained a judgment thereon in the Circuit Court against George Mallory's Administrator for the sum of about thirteen hundred dollars, and foreclosing the equity of redemption to the said lands. Afterwards the Administrator obtained an order from the Probate Court for the sale of the real estate, and in pursuance of that order he exposed the same for sale to the highest bidder; that the administrator caused the absolute title to be sold, including the dower of the plaintiff, who was present at the sale and assented to the same, and admitted that the sale was absolute and free from her claim of dower, and that the purchaser would acquire an absolute title free from any claim of dower on her part; that one of the defendants, Ray, relying on the assent and admissions of the plaintiff, was induced to purchase the said real estate in good faith and for full value, at the price of one thousand seven hundred and eighty-two dollars and fifty cents, and that he received a deed for the same; that out of the purchase money the amount due on the mortgage and judgment was paid, and that defendant went into possession of the lands and made valuable and lasting improvements on them, for which reasons the plaintiff should be estopped from claiming dower in the premises.

The answer further claimed that defendant was entitled to be subrogated to all the rights of the mortgagee.

All the above recited and foregoing parts of the answer were stricken out as constituting no defense, and the defendant excepted.

The Court then proceeded and had dower assigned.

In the case of Jones v. Bragg, 33, Mo. 337, it was held that the doctrine of subrogation was not applicable to a case like that.

The only question then presented for our consideration is whether the matters alleged in the answer constitute an estoppel.

In his treatise on dower, Mr. Scribner says: "It is a point upon which the authorities are generally agreed, that if the doweress is guilty of fraudulent practices in inducing the purchaser to take the estate under a belief that she waives her right to dower, she will be estopped from afterwards setting up her claims. (2 Scrib. on Dower, p. 251.)

Numerous cases are referred to by the author, which support the doctrine laid down in the text.

In Doughey v. Topping (4 Paige, 94), where real estate of a decedent was sold by an administrator and administratrix, under a surrogate's order, in which estate the administratrix was entitled to dower, and in the terms of sale it was stated that a clear and satisfactory title would be given, and the purchaser paid the full value of the premises, under a belief that he was obtaining a perfect title, it was held that the silence of the administratrix as to her claim of dower, was such a fraud upon the purchaser as to preclude her from afterwards setting up such claim against him or his assigns. In determining the case, the Chancellor remarked as follows: "As the administratrix joined in the report of the sale to the surrogate, she must have been present at the sale, either personally or by her agent, and must have seen the written terms of the sale in which it was stated that the purchaser was to have a clear and satisfactory title. It was the brewery, and the lot on which it stood, and not merely the decedent's interest therein, for which a clear and satisfactory title was to be given to the purchaser, and that necessarily excluded the idea that the purchaser was to take the property encumbered with a right of dower, which had then become vested by the death of the husband. It, therefore, seems to be impossible that any of the parties could have supposed the purchaser was to take the property at its full value, and yet that the claim of dower was not to be relinquished. As the defendant must have known that Vassar was paying his money under a supposition that he was getting a perfect title, if Mrs. Topping did not intend to part with her dower, conscience required her to speak, and silence under such circumstances, was such a fraud upon the purchaser as to prevent her from afterwards making her claim for dower in the premises."

In Snurley v. Wright, 2 Ohio, 506, a widow was present at a sale of her husband's lands by his administrator, and consented that the sale might be made free from her claim of dower. The purchaser relying upon this promise, bid off the property at a much larger sum than he would otherwise have paid. A bill for dower afterwards brought by the widow was dismissed. The court, in disposing of the case, said: "It is a well-established principle in equity, that if a person having a right to an estate, permit or encourage a purchaser to buy it of another, the purchaser shall hold it against the person who has the right, and the rule prevails even against feme coverts and persons under age. It is contended on the part of the complainants, that the acts and declarations of Mrs. Smiley, at the time of the sale of the lots in question, ought not to bar her of the aid of a court of equity, because she was at that time ignorant of her rights; nor can they be considered as a fraud upon the purchaser, as he had notice of her title. It is unnecessary to consider whether a person having legal title to lands, who encourages the sale by another, shall be permitted to show his ignorance of that title to the prejudice of a bona fide purchaser for a valuable consideration. As we are clearly of the opinion that the evidence does not prove Mrs. Smiley's ignorance of her rights at the time of the sale by the administrator * * * If she had not, in fact, relinquished her right of dower, her standing by, permitting the property to be sold free of dower, without asserting her claim, was calculated to deceive and defraud the purchaser, and did induce him to pay a much larger sum for the property than he would otherwise have given. He believed that she had relinquished her dower, and acted upon this belief. To permit her to assert her title to dower against a bona fide purchaser for a valuable consideration, who was induced by her to purchase, because she has never executed any formal act of assignment or release of her dower, would be to aid her in the commission of fraud."

So in Ellis v. Dedy (1 Cart. Ind. 561) which was a proceeding for dower, the defendant pleaded in bar, that the guardian of the heirs of the deceased husband obtained an order for the sale of the lands in which dower was claimed; that the widow was present in Court and concurred in the application for the order; and that the premises were sold to the defendant, the widow receiving a portion of the purchase money in payment of her rights of dower. He further averred that the widow was present at the sale and heard the Commissioners represent that the purchaser would receive a title free from all claims, and concurred therein, and gave no notice of any claim upon the estate. It was held if the matters so alleged were true, the petitioner was estopped from asserting a right of dower.

Many more cases might be cited to the same effect, but is unnecessary.

Now, the allegations in the answer are, that the administrator put up the real estate for sale, representing that it was free from incumbrance and that he would make a perfect title; that the plaintiff was present and assented to it, and stated that it would be sold free from her claim of dower, and that, relying upon the representations of the administrator, and the assent and declarations of the plaintiff, defendant purchased and paid full value for the premises. If these averments are true, they will undoubtedly stop the plaintiff from prosecuting the claim. She was at the time a feme sole laboring under no disability; and to permit her to recover in the face of these facts would be enabling her to perpetrate fraud upon the purchaser. The Court erred in striking out the answer, and the judgment will be reversed and the cause remanded.

All the judges concurring except Judge Vories, who is absent.

SUPREME COURT OF MICHIGAN.

APRIL TERM, 1876.

Abstract of opinions from the Michigan Lawyer.

WILLS—HANDWRITING—FORGERY—PHOTOGRAPHIC COPIES—EVIDENCE—COMPARISON OF WRITING—PAPERS NOT IN THE CAUSE—SIGNATURES—OPINIONS—JURORS—EXPERTS.

In the matter of the will of Alfred Foster. Error to Oakland Circuit.

A. C. BALDWIN for contestants.
M. E. CROFOOT for proponents.
Opinion by CAMPBELL, J.

The proponents of the will proved its execution by the two subscribing witnesses, whose testimony was direct and positive to all the requisites of a valid will. The contestants proposed to furnish the jury with photographic copies of the will, but the court declined to permit it. A witness named Toms was called to testify concerning Foster's handwriting, and having produced a note and mortgage which he asserted to have been signed by Foster, the court refused upon application to allow these papers to be used before the jury for purposes of comparison. Permission to have the jury take the original will to their room to compare its body with the signature was refused, no application having been made by the jury, and the opposite counsel declining to assent unless the jury desired to see it.

Held, 1. That if the photographic copies had been given to the jury, with proper precautions as to their identity and correctness, it might not perhaps have been error; yet it is not always true that every photographic copy would be safe on any inquiry requiring minute accuracy, or that all photographs are absolutely faithful resemblances, since it is quite possible to tamper with them, and an impression which is at all blurred would be very apt to mislead on questions of handwriting where forgery is claimed; but that whether or not it is permissible to allow such documents to be used, their use can never be compulsory; that the original and not the copy is what the jury must act upon, and no devise can be properly allowed to supersede it.

Held, 2. That the refusal to require the jury to take the original will to their room when they had not desired it was not contrary to law or practice; that the purpose avowed in this cause of having the jury use the document to look for resemblances between the body and the signature and thereby to infer forgery, indicates some danger in permitting it, since it would involve a jury room inquest upon facts that should only be determined on evidence given in open court, and would in effect allow the suspicions and surmises of men who, in many instances, would be incompetent to give their opinions as witnesses upon the subject, to fix the rights of parties by their fanciful notions of resemblances or differences; that while juries can and undoubtedly must use their judgments more or less concerning documents laid before them, yet the law presumes they will act on testimony chiefly, if not entirely; and that when the genuineness of the documents is involved, opinions gathered by inspection and comparison by the jury stand much in the same light as would their statements to each other of ordinary facts of which they had personal knowledge relative to the issue before them.

Held, 3. That while opinions of experts are necessarily received and may be valuable, yet this kind of testimony is at best but a necessary evil, and that every degree of removal from personal knowledge, in the case of signatures or handwriting, into the domain of what is sometimes called with great liberality scientific opinion, is a step towards greater uncertainty, and the science which is so generally diffused is of very moderate value; that when subjected to cross-examination it may be reduced to the minimum of danger, but in a jury room, without any check or correction, it would be very dangerous indeed.

Held, 4. That the question of allowing papers not otherwise in the case to be received and proved for purposes of comparison was disposed of in this State in Vinton v. Peck, 14 Mich., 287, where it was held that testimony of handwriting might be based on papers in the cause, but that when to the danger of hasty and perhaps biased opinions is added the disputed genuineness of papers produced and the difficulty of producing all that might be of use for comparison on both sides, the risk is too great to justify the reception of such means of proof; and that the fact that an English statute has allowed the reception of documents satisfactory to the court, does not satisfy this court that their former judgment was erroneous or that a change would be desirable.

Judgment affirmed, with costs.

ENGLISH COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.

THURSDAY, FEB. 17, 1876.

(Before BLACKBURN and LUSH, JJ.)

RANDALL v. NEWSON.

NEGLIGENCE—MANUFACTURER'S LIABILITY—MEASURE OF OBLIGATION AS TO SOUNDNESS OF GOODS SUPPLIED—LATENT DEFECT.

A manufacturer is bound to use reasonable skill and care in supplying any article, to ascertain that that article is fit for the purpose for which it has been made, but he is not bound to supply an article that shall be absolutely fit for such use; and, therefore he is not responsible for any damage arising from a latent defect.

This action was brought by the plaintiff to recover damages from the defendant for having supplied a pole for a phaeton carelessly and negligently, and made of such bad and improper wood, that by reason of that it broke, and the plaintiff's horses ran away and sustained very serious injury.

The plaintiff is a solicitor practising in, London, and the defendant is a carriage manufacturer carrying on business at 30 New Bond street. It appeared that in the month of August, 1874, the defendant sold to plaintiff a Stanhope phaeton for a pair of horses. The carriage was used twice or thrice a week up to 16th Oct., 1875, on which day the plaintiff was driving to Wimbledon. The horses were driven at the rate of about six miles an hour. While driving along the level road the near horse started or stopped suddenly at a puddle of water upon which the sun was shining brightly at the time. When he pulled up short the pole immediately broke, and the carriage came against him, whereupon he kicked and plunged in such a way as to injure both himself and the other horse; the carriage was also considerably damaged.

At the trial which took place at Westminster before Archibald, J., and a special jury, a great amount of scientific evidence was given as to the quality of the pole, and also as to the nature of the wood of which it was made. Finally, the questions put to the jury were as follows:

1. Was the pole reasonably fit and proper for the use of the carriage? Answer: We are of opinion it was not.

2. Was there any negligence on the part of the defendant in supplying the pole? Answer: No.

3. What is the amount of the damages? Answer: £3 (the price of a new pole).

Upon these findings, Sills (with him Cave, Q. C.) moved to have the verdict entered for the defendant.

Gates, Q. C. and Pollock, contra.—This case is a totally different one from Readhead v. The Midland Railway Company (16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 485; 36 L. J. 181, Q. B.; L. Rep. 2 Q. B. 412). The object there was to put carriers of passengers on the same footing as carriers of goods. Railway companies are on a different footing to manufacturers, for the latter impliedly warrants that the article he supplies, is in fact, absolutely good. The question of latent defect was not raised at the trial, but the defense was that the accident arose from the conduct of the horses, and not from any defect at all in the pole. That there is an obligation on the part of a manufacturer to supply a thing fit for the use for which it is intended is determined by Jones v. Bright (5 Bing., 533), and by Brown v. Edington (2 M. & G. 279). In giving judgment in the case of Jones v. Just (18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 208; Law Rep. 3 Q. B. 107; 37 L. J. 89, Q. B.), Mellor, J., says, cases which bear upon the subject do not appear to be in conflict, and he goes on to divide them into five classes. In the fourth class, he says, "arise cases, where a manufacturer or a dealer contracts to supply an article which he manufactures, or produces, to be applied to a particular purpose, so that the buyer necessarily trusts to the judgment or skill of the manufacturer or dealer; there is in that case an implied term or warranty that it shall be reasonably fit for the purpose to which it is to be applied." Again, in the Civil Code of New York, sect. 883, there is the rule that a maker of an article is liable for any latent defect produced in its manufacture. Upon all these authorities the defendant must be held liable in this case.

Sills was not called upon to reply.

BLACKBURN, J.—Since Readhead v. The Midland Railway Company (ubi sup.) has been decided as it has been, judgment in this case, in my opinion, ought to be for the defendant. There is an obligation on a person who supplies goods to another that the articles should be reasonably fit for the purpose for which it is intended, and this rule applies equally to the person who supplies it, whether he be manufacturer or not. Before that decision I was of a different opinion. I thought that the article supplied should be sufficient for the purpose in fact, and that the policy of the law imposed upon the person who supplied the article an absolute duty to supply a sufficient one, and I thought the cases supported that view. But now, by the decision in the above mentioned case, both in this court and in the Exchequer Chamber, all due and proper care is all that is now required. It has been argued that in this case there was no suggestion of a latent defect—if you mean that there was no hole or anything of that kind—there was no evidence; but if the pole broke from no perceptible defect, then it must have broken from some latent defect that could not have been discovered by reasonable skill and care. I find that the attention of the jury was very distinctly drawn to that, and they find that it was latent, so that it could not be discovered by reasonable care and skill. Judgment must be entered for the defendant.

LUSH, J., concurred.—No doubt what the jury intended to find was that the wood was not fit for making into a pole, and, in the second place, no one could find out that it was unfit until the pole broke, and that, in my opinion, brings the case within the decision in Readhead v. The Midland Railway Company (ubi sup.)

We call attention to the following opinions, reported at length in this issue:

WRIT OF ERROR TO STATE COURT—FEDERAL QUESTION.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States, by Waite, C. J., as to when a writ of error lies from the United States Supreme Court to a State Court, what is to be regarded as a Federal question within the meaning of the United States statute, and what is to be considered the judgment of the highest court of a State.

BANKRUPTCY—SALE OF PERSONAL PROPERTY—SUPERSEDEAS.—The brief note to a decision of Judge Davis, Associate Justice of the United States Supreme Court, upon granting a supersedeas in a case in bankruptcy to remove it for review from the Circuit to the United States Supreme Court.

U. S. LAND REGISTER—FEES—EXTORTION.—The charge of Judge Hillyer, of the United States District Court for Nevada, as to the duties of a United States Land Register, what fees he may charge, when he will be guilty of extortion, and holding that he cannot act as attorney in matters before himself. This charge states the correct doctrine. Officers should perform their duties for the fees given by statute. The law does not allow them to make their own schedules of fees. There is a tendency in officers, at the present day to charge for some service in matters before them which they claim is not official service. This is only an indirect way of trying to make extortion in office respectable.

ACTION AGAINST CITY—FREEZING OF WATER MAINS—DAMAGES.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, in action against the city of Philadelphia to recover damages for the loss of water, caused by the bursting of the pipes leading to the plaintiff's house, from the action of the frost.

SEIZURE OF DISTILLER'S BOOKS—EVIDENCE.—The opinion of the United States Circuit court for the Eastern district of Virginia, by WAITE, C. J., holding that the seizure by the order of an executive officer of the government, of the books kept by a distiller, in obedience to the requirements of the statute, does not exclude them from use as evidence under the provisions of section 860 of the Revised Statutes, concerning private book and papers.

TRUST DEED—RENTS AND PROFITS.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of Tennessee, by SNEED, J., holding that where a trust deed makes no stipulation in regard to the rents and profits, and contains no waiver of the right of redemption in the event of sale by the trustee, and the maker remains in possession; he and not the trustee is entitled to the rents and profits until foreclosure.

ORDERING TREES TO BE CUT.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of New Hampshire by CUSHING, C. J., stating under what circumstances a court of chancery will order trees to be cut and land to be cleared.

AMENDMENT TO BANKRUPT LAW OF 1873—The opinion of the United States Circuit Court, Northern District of Georgia, by DODGE, J., construing the amendment to the bankrupt act of 1873.

DOWER,—WHEN WIDOW WILL BE ESTOPPED FROM CLAIMING.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of Missouri by WAGNER, J., holding that when a widow, who is present at an administrator's sale of her husband's real estate, and hears the administrator represent that the land will be sold and that there is no incumberance on it, and assents to it, that she will be estopped from afterwards asserting her claim for dower in the real estate so sold.

NEGLIGENCE—MANUFACTURER'S LIABILITY.—The opinion of the English Court of Queen's Bench Division, as to the liability of a manufacturer for damages arising from a latent defect in an article made by him.

NOTES TO RECENT CASES.

BANKRUPTCY—ASSIGNMENT OF ALL DEBTOR'S PROPERTY.

The English Court of Appeal, in ex parte King, 34 L. T. Rep. N. S., 466, held where a debtor assigns all his property to a creditor to secure a past debt as well as a fresh advance, the fresh advance, if a substantial one, prevents the assignment from being an act of bankruptcy, just as effectually as the omission of a substantial part of the debtor's property from the assignment would do; that it depends upon the circumstances of each case whether the advance is substantial or not.

APPOINTMENT OF RECEIVER ON GIVING SECURITY—EXECUTION CREDITOR.

The English Court of Appeal, in Edwards v. Edwards, 34 L. T. Rep. N. S., 472, held, where on a motion for a receiver an order is made that a person named in the order, upon his giving security, be appointed receiver, the appointment takes effect only from the date of the chief clerk's certificate that the security is perfected. Therefore where, after such an order, and before the receiver so appointed had perfected his security, an execution creditor who had not received notice of the appointment, put the sheriff in possession of the goods over which the receiver was appointed: Held, reversing the judgment of Malins, V. C., that the execution creditor was entitled to the goods.

REMOVAL TO U. S. COURT—RE-HEARING IN STATE COURT.

The Supreme Court of Iowa, in McKinley v. Chicago & N. W. R. R. Co., 10 Western Jurist, 343, held, where a judgment has been reversed in the Supreme Court of the State, the cause remanded, and a procedendo therefor duly issued and filed in the State court, and the cause had been removed under the act of 1875 to the United States Circuit Court, and thereafter, and within the sixty days allowed therefor, a petition for a re-hearing was filed in the Supreme Court: Held, that the cause was still pending in the Supreme Court, and a motion to dismiss the petition for a re-hearing should be overruled.

PROFESSIONAL MANNERS.—We have frequently remarked in these columns, "that if Judges did their duty, there would never be an ill-mannered bar." It is a fact, that the keeping of the manners of the bar is with the Judges. When lawyers so far forget their duty to the Court and their clients, as to leave their case and abuse each other in court, they should at once be made to feel the power of the court in a mild but firm manner. We are glad to note the fact that Judge MCADAM, of the Marine Court in New York, recently administered a merited rebuke to two legal functionaries who were contesting a case before him. The Judge's attention was called to a document left for his signature, when the words "shyster," "pettifogger," and "fraud," reached his ears in the excited tones of the pleaders, who forgot the respect due to the court and to each other. The gavil of the Judge coming down heavily, called them to order, and the Judge in a determined manner said:—"If members of the learned profession of the law are to be permitted in a court of justice to call each other "shyters," "pettifoggers," and such like opprobrious terms without rebuke from the court, it may probably lead to the suspicion that such ungentlemanly, unprofessional and undignified conduct meets its approbation. To effectually remove all such suspicions, I wish it to be understood for all time hereafter, that any member of the bar so far forgetting his manners as to indulge in such impropriety, will be disciplined by the court, not only by fine but by imprisonment. This court can be enlightened only by legal argument made with deliberation and judgment, and lawyers unable to furnish such aid to the court had better employ others who can. The court will take into consideration the nature and amount of the punishment to be imposed, and will see that its order is literally enforced."

THE USE OF EXTRINSIC EVIDENCE TO SUPPLEMENT OR CONTROL DOCUMENTS OF TITLE.

In Lord St. Leonards v. Sugden, Doe v. Palmer was expounded and applied. Lord Chief Justice Cockburn was of opinion that, speaking generally, the declarations of deceased persons are admitted in evidence as exceptions to the rule requiring the best evidence, because they are the declarations of persons having peculiar means of knowledge, for testators must be taken to know the contents of their wills. In Doe v. Palmer, such declarations were admitted to rebut the presumption of interlineation. They are admissible to rebut the presumption of revocation animo revocandi. Morally, such statements are entitled to weight. If admitted for two purposes, why, asked the Lord Chief Justice, should they not be admitted as to lost contents, there being an equal degree of knowledge and an equal absence of motive to speak untruly? As to subsequent statements, he afterwards said, Doe v. Palmer and Quick v. Quick (3 Swa. & Trist.) do cause a difficulty, but in his opinion there was no real difference to adopt. Such a rule would tend to anomalies. The statement in Doe v. Palmer, excluding subsequent declarations, was an obiter dictum, and therefore not binding. Quick v. Quick was a direct authority, but he and the other judges of the Court of Appeal felt bound to overrule it. Lord Justice Mellish, while agreeing with the court that probate ought to be granted of the lost part of the will, differed as to Doe v. Palmer and Quick v. Quick, which latter case he was not prepared to say was bad law. There was, he thought, a material difference between statements made before and after the execution of the will. He did not doubt the wisdom of establishing a new exception to the rule requiring the primary evidence, but he thought that was for the legislature, not for the judges to do.

In Guardhouse v. Blackburn, (14 L. T Rep. N. S. 69; L. Rep. 1 Prob. 115), Sir

J. P. Wilde cited with approbation the lauguage of Mr. Justice Williams on Executors, vol. 1, p. 313. "In a court of construction, when the factum of the instrument has been previously established in the Court of Probate, the inquiry is almost closely restricted to the contents of the instrument itself, in order to ascertain the intentions of the testator. But in the Court of Probate the inquiry is not so limited, for there the intentions of the deceased as to what shall operate as and compose his will, are to be collected from all the circumstances of the case taken together. They must, however, be circumstances existing at the time the will was made." Neither Guardhouse v. Blackburn nor the citation from Mr. Justice Williams, were alluded to by the Court of Appeal, but as to the exclusion of declarations subsequent to the execution of the will, they must be considered to have lost their authority. In respect of the necessity of extrinsic evidence to justify them, interlineations differ from alterations in a will. In In the goods of Ann Cadge (L. Rep. 1 P. & D. 543) a will contained several unattested interlineations, most of them of single words, each of which was required to complete the sentence to which it belonged. They were apparently written with the same ink at the same time as the rest of the will, but at the time of execution the body of the will was covered up by the testator, so that the witnesses could not see whether the interlineations were there or not. Lord Penzance held that the court was not bound to presume that these interlineations were made after execution, and included them in the probate.

3. LATENT AMBIGUITIES.

When the Right Hon. Sir James Wigram first laid before the public his seven propositions respecting the admission of extrinsic evidence in aid of the interpretation of wills, it might well be feared that the author had not occupied a position which could give him so clear a view of the entire subject as would enable him to make each proposition consistent with every proposition that complete treatise ought to contain. Time has dissipated these fears, and the editor of the edition published soon after the premature decease of the eminent Judge, could justly boast that the seven propositions not only embraced but exhausted the theory of the rules examined, though he might lament that the most entire assent to a canon of exposition in the abstract, by no means insured its just application to the facts of each particular case, and that an undue degree of laxity in this latter respect might, it was conceived, be detected in certain of the reported decisions. We refer to the authority of a great master in the law of extrinsic evidence in relation to wills, not only because the celebrated case of Lord St. Leonards v. Sugden (34 N. T. Rep. N. S. 372) has confirmed or established a new canon as to the use of such evidence in the granting of probate of a lost will, but because the Lord Chief Justice, in his lucid judgment, founded a great portion of his argument upon the principles contained in Sir James Wigram's seventh proposition. Cheney's Case (5 Coke, 68), and Altham's Case (2 Coke 155*a*) show that even before the Statute of Frauds it was a general rule not to admit parol evidence to control what appeared on the face of a deed or will.

Lord Chief Justice Kenyon held in Lord Walpole v. Eearl of Cholmondeley, (7 T. Rep. 138) that parol evidence may be admitted to explain a latent ambiguity in a will or deed. But where a devisee made one will in 1752, and another in 1756, without disposing of his personalty or appointing executors by either, and by a codicil (reciting that by his said will of 1752) he had made no disposition of his personalty, disposed of it and appointed executors, it was held that there was no latent ambiguity so as to admit parol evidence to show that the testator intended by his codicil to confirm the will of 1756, and not to republish that of 1752.

In Lord St. Leonards v. Sugden, the Lord Chief Justice made the following remarks upon Doe v. Hiscocks. He considered it not only the great authority as to the admission of parol evidence to explain latent ambiguities. Its principle was also a justification for the use of such evidence to supply the contents of a lost will. He thought the observations of Chief Baron Abinger, as to the mischief of excluding such evidence, were applicable in the case before them. If verbal declarations and drafts were admissible in the one case, the prior instructions, declarations of intention and other extrinsic evidence of the will, were admissible in the case before them. The replication might be made that declarations as to execution were not admissible; but the rejoinder was that it required the statute to exclude them.

In Doe d. Hiscocks v. Hiscocks (5 Mee & Wels. 363) the Lord Chief Baron Abinger thus laid down the law: "The object in all cases is to discover the intention of the testator. The first and most obvious mode of doing this is to read the will as he has written it, and collect his intention from his words. But as his words refer to facts and circumstances respecting his property, and his family, and others whom he names or describes in his will, it is evident that the meaning and application of his words cannot be ascertained without evidence of all those facts and circumstances. To understand the meaning of any writer, we must first be apprised of the persons and circumstances that are the subjects of his allusions or statements; and if these are not fully disclosed in his work, we must look for illustrations to the history of the times in which he wrote, or to the works of contemporaneous authors. All the facts and circumstances, therefore, respecting the persons or property to which the will relates are undoubtedly legitimate, and often necessary evidence to enable us to understand the meaning and application of his words. * * But there is another mode of obtaining the intention of the testator, which is by evidence of his declarations of the instructions given for his will and other circumstances of a like nature, which are not adduced for explaining the words or meaning of the will, but either to supply some deficiency, or remove some obscurity, or to give some effect to expressions that are unmeaning or ambiguous" So far his Lordship's statement of the law is perspicuous and sound. He then continues: Now there is but one case in which it appears to us that this sort of evidence of intention can properly be admitted, and that is where the meaning of the testator's words is neither ambiguous or obscure, and where the desire is, on the face of it, perfect and intelligible; but from some of the circumstances admitted in proof, an ambiguity arises as to which of the two or more things, or which of the two or more persons (each answering the words in the will), the testator intended to express. It appears to us that in all other cases parol evidence of what was the testator's intention ought to be excluded upon this plain ground, that his will ought to be made in writing; and if his intention cannot be made to appear by the writing explained by circumstances, there is no will.

STATE CONSTITUTIONS AND RELIGION.

BY SAMUEL T. SPEAR, D. D.

[From the N. Y. Independent.]

The several states of the Union exist and operate under written constitutions, which, subject only to the Constitution of the United States, form their supreme law. All of these constitutions, while substantially similar in the powers of government and the manner of their distribution, contain provisions relating to religion, designed for the most part, to protect the religious liberty of the people against encroachments by governmental agency. Some of the provisions, however, found in the constitutions of some of the states are exceptions to this statement and to the general character and scope of the constitutions of the American states. They appear as inconsistencies and deformities, and also vestiges of ideas once entertained, but now generally obsolete.

The constitution of New Hampshire (Part I, section 6) furnishes one of these exceptions, in empowering "the legislature to authorize from time to time the several towns, parishes, bodies corporate, or religious societies within this state to make adequate provisions, at their own expense, for the support of public Protestant teachers of piety, religion and morality"; and, also, in providing (Part II, sections 14, 29, 42) that "every member of the House of Representatives . . . shall be of the Protestant religion"; that "no person shall be capable of being elected a senator who is not of the Protestant religion"; and that "no person shall be eligible to the office of Governor unless he shall be of the Protestant religion." The legislature is here authorized to grant to the towns, parishes, bodies corporate, or religious societies within that state the compulsory power of taxation for the support of Protestant teachers of religion. The constitution also establishes a religious test as a qualification for the office of representative, senator and governor.

The constitution of Pennsylvania (Article I, Section 4) declares that "no person who acknowledges the being of a God and a future state of rewards and punishments shall, on account of his religious sentiments, be disqualified to hold any office or place of trust or profit under this commonwealth." This immunity against disqualification does not, by its very terms, apply to those who deny the existence of God, or deny a future state, or deny the doctrine of rewards and punishments in that state. All such persons it leaves exposed to the liability of a religious test by the will of the legislature, and protects only those who acknowledge the doctrines recited.

The constitution of North Carolina (Article VI, section 5) provides that "all persons who shall deny the being of Almighty God" "shall be disqualified for office." The constitution of South Carolina (Article XIV, section 6), of Mississippi (Article XII, section 3), and of Tennessee (Article IX, section 2), contain a similar provision, with the extension of the exclusion in the last of these constitutions to any person who denies a "future state of rewards and punishments." The constitution of Maryland (Declaration of Rights, sections 36, 37) declares that no person, "otherwise competent," shall "be deemed incompetent as a witness or juror on account of his religious belief, provided he believes in the existence of God, and that under his dispensation such person will be held morally accountable for his acts and be rewarded or punished therefor either in this world or in the world to come," and also declares that "no religious test ought ever to be required as a qualification for any office of profit or trust in this State, other than a declaration of belief in the existence of God." These provisions are religious tests, and, as Judge Cooley, in his "Constitutional Limitations" (p. 468) remarks, "show some traces of the old notion that truth and a sense of duty are inconsistent with skepticism in religion." They exclude persons from office on religious grounds. Maryland has quite an extended religious belief as a qualification to be a witness or perform the duty of a juror.

So, also, some of the State Constitutions exclude clergymen, priests, and teachers of any religious sect from civil office. The Constitution of Delaware (Article VII., Sec. 8,) provides that "no ordained clergyman or ordained preacher of the Gospel of any denomination, shall be capable of holding any office in the State, or of being a member of either branch of the legislature while he continues in the exercise of the pastoral or clerical functions." The Constitution of Kentucky (Article II., Section 27), declares that "no person while he continues to exercise the functions of a clergyman, priest, or teacher of any religious persuasion, society, or sect * * shall be eligible to the General Assembly." The Constitution of Maryland (Article III., Section 11,) says that "no minister or preacher of the Gospel or of any religious creed or denomination * * * shall be eligible as senator or delegate." The Constitution of Tennessee (Article IX., Section 1,) declares that "no minister of the Gospel or priest, of any denomination whatever, shall be eligible to a seat in either house of the legislature." These are examples of constitutional exclusion of persons from the exercise of civil functions on account of their ecclesiastical character and office, and, so far, examples of proscription on religious grounds. The reason of the exclusion and the fact itself involve the practical results of a religious test.

These provisions are the exceptions, rather than the general rule, in the Constitution of the American States. The great mass of these Constitutions exclude religious tests and qualifications to hold office or to perform any civil duty or exercise any political or civil right or privilege; and also exclude the power to levy taxes for the support of religion, and guarantee to each person the full enjoyment of the rights of a religious conscience within the limits of decency and public order. It would be tedious to go through the whole list of provisions that secure these results, and, hence, a few examples must suffice.

The Constitution of Illinois, (Artticle II., Section 3), declares that "the free exercise and enjoyment of religious profession and worship, without discrimination, shall forever be guaranteed, and no person shall be denied any civil or political right, privilege, or capacity on account of his religious opinions," and that "no person shall be required to attend or support any ministry or place of worship against his consent, nor shall any preference be given by law to any religious denomination or mode of worship." The Constitution of Iowa (Article 1, Sections 3, 4), declares that "the General Assembly shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; nor shall any person be compelled to attend any place of worship, pay tithes, taxes, or other rates for building or repairing places of worship, or the maintenance of any minister or ministry. No religious test shall be required as a qualification for any office or public trust, and no person shall be deprived of any of his rights, privileges, or capacities, or disqualified from the performance of any of his public or private duties, or rendered incompetent to give evidence in any court of law or equity, in consequence of his opinions on the subject of religion." The Constitution of Michigan (Article IV., Sections 39, 41), declares that "the legislature shall pass no law to prevent any person from worshipping Almighty God according to the dictates of his own conscience, or to compel any person to attend, erect, or support any place of religious worship, or to pay tithes, taxes or other rates for the support of any minister of the Gospel or teacher of religion. The legislature shall not diminish or enlarge the civil or political privileges and capacities of any person on account of his opinions or belief concerning matters of religion." The Constitution of New Jersey, (Article I., Section 4), provides that "no religious test shall be required as a qualification for any office or public trust, and no person shall be denied the enjoyment of any civil right merely on account of his religious principles." The Constitution of Oregon (Article I., Sections 3, 4, 6), says: "No law shall, in any case whatever, control the free exercise and enjoyment of religious opinions or interfere with the rights of conscience. No religious test shall be required as a qualification for any office of trust or profit. No person shall be rendered incompetent as a witness or juror in consequence of his opinions on matters of religion, nor be questioned in any court of justice touching his religious belief to affect the weight of his testimony."

Similar provisions more or less full, are found in the constitutions of most of the other States, and in all the States there are constitutional restrictions designed to protect the rights of a religious conscience against encroachment by legislative power.

Some persons are conscientiously averse to bearing arms; and in many of the States we find constitutional provisions granting them an exemption from this service. Thus the constitution of Indiana (Article XII, section 6) says: "No person conscientiously opposed to bearing arms shall be compelled to do militia duty; but such person shall pay an equivalent for exemption, the amount to be prescribed by law." The constitution of Alabama (Article X, section 1) says: "All citizens of any denomination whatever who, from scruples of conscience, may be averse to bearing arms shall be exempt therefrom, upon such conditions as may be prescribed by law." Provisions of the same general character occur in the constitutions of many of the other States.

So also some persons are conscientiously opposed to taking a legal oath, and, hence, provision is made that they may simply affirm, as the equivalent of an oath. On this point the constitution of Missouri (Article II, section 12) says: "If any person shall declare that he has conscientious scruples against taking an oath or swearing in any form, the said oath may be changed into a solemn affirmation and be made by him in that form." The constitution of Indiana (Article I, section 8) says: "The mode of administering an oath or affirmation shall be such as shall be most consistent with and binding upon the conscience of the person to whom such oath or affirmation may be administered." Like provisions are found in the constitutions or statutes of other States.

Some of the state constitutions expressly prohibit the appropriation of any funds or property for religieus or sectarian uses. Thus the constitution of Illinois (Article VIII, section 3) says: "Neither the general assembly, nor any county, city, town, township, school district, or other public corporation, shall ever make any appropriation or pay from any public fund whatever anything in aid of any church or sectarian purpose, or to help support or sustain any school, academy, seminary, college, university, or other literary or scientific institution controlled by any church or sectarian denomination whatever; nor shall any grant or donation of land, money, or other personal property ever be made by the state or any such public corporation to any church or for any sectarian purpose." The constitution of Missouri (Article IX, section 10) contains a similar provision. The constitution of Indiana (Article I, section 6) declares that "no money shall be drawn from the treasury for the benefit of any religious or theological institution." The constitution of Oregon (Article I, section 5) provides that "no money shall be drawn from the treasury for the benefit of any religious or theological institution, nor shall any money be appropriated for the payment of any religious service in either house of the legislative assembly." The constitution of Michigan (Article IV, section 40) declares that "no money shall be appropriated or drawn from the treasury for the benefit of any religious sect or society, theological or religious seminary, nor shall property belonging to the state be appropriated for any such purposes." The constitution of Minnesota (Article I, section 16) and that of Wisconsin (Article I. section 18) contain a similar provision.

Looking, then, at these various constitutional provisions as a whole, and as indicating the general policy of the American States in regard to religion, Judge Cooley, in his "Constitutional Limitations" (chapter xiii), says that "those things which are not lawful under any of the American constitutions may be stated thus:"

1. "Any law respecting an establishment of religion." 2. "Compulsory support, by taxation or otherwise, of religion." 3. "Compulsory attendance upon religious worship." 4. "Restraints upon the free exercise of religion according to the dictates of the conscience." 5. "Restraints upon the expression of religious belief."

"These," he adds, "are the prohibitions which in some form of words are to be found in the American constitutions, and which secure freedom of conscience and of religious worship. No man in religious matters is to be subjected to the censorship of the State and the State is not to inquire into or take notice of religious belief, when the citizen performs his duty to the State and to his fellows." He also says that "it is not toleration which is established in our system, but religious equality." The exceptions to this principle referred to and illustrated by citations in the commencement of this article, he treats as exceptions not often put into practice, and by no means representing the general character of our American State constitutions. They are, rather, the relics of ideas once prevalent, but now for the most part discarded in this country. They are, moreover, generally found in the older constitutions, and not in those of more recent date. The American people have out-grown the doctrine of religious tests and that of taxation for religious purposes. The tendency of public thought has been toward a complete severance of church and State.

Mr. John Norton Pomeroy, in his "Introduction to Municipal Law," (p. 292), states as follows the general theory in regard to religion on which our national and State constitutions are built:

"The theory of our national and State constitutions is that the State, as an organic body, has nothing whatever to do with religion, except to protect the individuals in whatever belief and worship they may adopt; that religion is entirely a matter between each man and his God; that the State, as separated from the individuals who compose it, has no existence except in a figure; and that to predicate religious responsibilities of this abstraction is an absurdity. Whatever, then, the State does, whatever laws it makes touching religious subjects, are done and made not because the State is responsible, but simply that the people may be secure in the enjoyment of their own religious preferences. Public labor is forbidden by law on Sunday, not because the State, as such, respects the sacredness of the day or attempts to enforce its observance; but because a large portion of its worthy citizens do regard the day as sacred and employ it for public and private worship, and have a right to be protected in the quiet use of the time for these purposes. So far as the State is concerned, the laws forbidding public labor on Sunday stand on exactly the same footing as those forbidding disorderly houses, public intemperance, and all other acts which disturb the peace."

Reasoning from these principles, Mr. Pomeroy says: "Indeed, although the people composing our body politic are doubtless as much impressed with Christian ideas as those of any other nation, our governments, both State and national, by ignoring the whole subject, can hardly be called Christian." This is undoubtedly the truth. Neither Christianity nor any other religious system forms any part of the Constitution of the United States. The same is true of the State constitutions, as a general fact. The exceptions are such as were specified in the first part of this article; and even these exceptions are limited to a few particulars and in practice are mostly obsolete.

The all-pervading principle, then, of our American constitutions is that the State, as such, has nothing to do with religion, beyond affording to the people protection in the enjoyment of their religious rights, and that, too, with no discrimination among them. It is difficult to see how a state established upon this principle, and for reasons of State policy, conducting a school system at the public expense, can make that system the instrument of religious instruction or worship in any form. It manifestly cannot do so without contradicting the fundamental law of its own organic life.

RESTRAINTS ON ALIENATION.

Recent decisions in the Vice-Chancellor's courts have thrown great difficulty in the path of those who are called on to advise whether in a given case a restraint on alienation is to be treated as a condition subsequent, and, therefore, repugnant and void, or as a conditional limitation defining the duration of the period for which an estate or interest is to be enjoyed by the donee, and, therefore, valid. To assist in the discrimination between condition on the one hand, and conditional limitation on the other, we have been accustomed to adopt the rule as laid down by the late Lord Justice Turner, when Vice-Chancellor, in Rochford v. Hackman (9 Hare, 581)—to which, as being too long for quotation, we refer our readers—and from which it appears that the intention of the testator is to be collected from the whole of his will; first, as to the extent of interest primarily given; and, secondly, as to the extent and events in which that interest is defeated, and that if, on the whole will, it appears that a life interest is not to continue beyond the event of alienation it ceases accordingly, and that a gift over is not necessary to the operation of the cesser proviso on the original interest. This being, as we say, the true rule, we will now look at the case of Hunt-Foulston v. Furber, before Vice-Chancellor Hall on the 20th ult., shortly stated in the Weekly Notes for the 3rd inst. There, a testatrix bequeathed £20,000 stock to be laid out by her trustees in the purchase from the Commissioners for the reduction of the National Debt, in the name and for the benefit of S. F. Hunt, of an annuity for his life, and there was a direction that he should not be entitled to the value of his annuity in lieu thereof, and that if he should sell, mortgage, pledge, or anticipate the annuity, the same should cease and form part of the testatrix's residuary estate. The trustees purchased an annuity accordingly, and the annuitant having contracted to sell the same the purchaser objected to complete, on the ground that the annuitant was not absolutely entitled. The Vice-Chancellor, however, held that he was.

It will be noted that there was in the case this peculiarity, viz., that the trustees of the testatrix were entirely to divest themselves of all control over the annuity, which was to be purchased in the name and for the benefit of the annuitant. The annuitant, therefore, was intended to have complete legal control over the annuity, and could probably have made a good title to a purchaser without notice, even if the cesser proviso had been, as we say it was, a valid one, since it could scarcely have been allowed to operate as against him. This we may concede; but it goes a very little way indeed to support the proposition necessary to the Vice Chancellor's decision, viz., that the annuity itself was not in equity, and as between the annuitant and the residuary legatee, intrinsically subject to and charged with the liability to pass from the annuitant to the residuary legatee in the event of alienation.

We are utterly unable to see the repugnancy on which the Vice Chancellor's decision is founded, and we do see very plainly indeed that the testatrix's clearly expressed intention is utterly defeated by that decision. It also appears to us that the view taken by Sir C. Hall is incompatible with the decision of Vice-Chancellor Malins, only six days before, in Hatton v. May, (Weekly Notes, May 20), in which he distinctly and emphatically adhered to the principles enunciated by him in Power v. Hayne (L. Rep. 8 Eq, 262), where he declined to follow the case of Day v. Day (1 Drew 569) before Sir R. T. Kindersley. With the principles so laid down by Sir R. Malins we entirely agree, and are strongly induced to believe, that though Hunt-Foulston v. Furber may be distinguished from Hatton v. May, it cannot on any sound or comprehensive principle be differentiated from the last-named case. —The London Law Times.

SUPREME COURT OF IOWA.

NOTES TO RECENT OPINIONS.

TAX-SALE.

Where land was sold for taxes in 1861, and the deed could have been made in 1864, but the holder of the tax-certificate never obtained a deed for the land: Held, That after eleven years have elapsed from the time when the deed could have been obtained, the presumption is, that the purchaser has abandoned his rights to obtain the deed, and those purchasing the land of the owner may presume such abandonment. They would be authorized to purchase and pay for the land upon this presumption, and a purchaser at a tax-sale could not afterwards take a deed thereon and defeat the title thus acquired.

VENDOR'S LIEN.

The doctrine of vendor's lien is well established in this State. Aside from the intervening rights of purchasers without notice, the execution of a conveyance does not affect the existence of a lien. It attaches to the estate as a trust equally, whether it be conveyed or only be contracted to be conveyed. If, however, the rights of innocent purchasers have attached, of course such purchaser cannot be affected by the lien.

HUSBAND AND WIFE.

In an action against a railroad company for damages for injuries to a married woman: Held, That the husband may recover for such losses of services of the wife, caused by the injury, as are sustained by him, but the wife herself cannot recover for such loss of services. The husband could also recover from the defendant for expenses incurred by him on account of medical attendance and other proper care for the comfort and recovery of his wife.

FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCE.

Where a party conveyed his property to his sons, for a certain sum of money, and for the support of himself and wife for the remainder of their lifetime: Held, That such conveyance was fraudulent as to creditors, as a party cannot place his property beyond the reach of his creditors, and still retain to himself the benefits of it.

SETTING OUT FIRE.

The statute forbids any person from setting out any fire on the prairie or timbered land, by which any one's property is injured, and makes him liable in damages, etc.: Held, That the statute does not include the setting out of any fire in a cultivated field.

CAPITAL STOCK OF CORPORATIONS.

The unpaid subscription to the capital stock of a corporation is a trust-fund for its general creditors. The stockholder is liable to a creditor to the extent of the unpaid installments on the stock owned by him. As between the stockholder and a creditor, the stock shall be considered paid only to the extent of the fair value of the property conveyed, and that, for the balance, the stockholder shall be held individually liable, in the event of his failure to point out corporate property subject to levy. The record of a deed is no constructive notice to a person proposing to trust a corporation, that its capital stock had peen paid up in full by a conveyance of a certain amount of land.

CITY SOLICITORS.

As the duties of a City Solicitor are not prescribed by statute, he may perform such duties as are prescribed by ordinance. If, in a case where the interests of the city required his services, even where such services were not prescribed by ordinance, and he acts with discretion and renders the city a service, he is not regarded as acting without authority, and he will be entitled to compensation for his services.

HOMESTEAD.

The homestead is liable for the debts contracted prior to its occupation as such, and the date of contracting the debt is the test when the liability attached rather than that of the rendition of the judgment against the owner thereof. The new homestead is liable for the debt contracted or the purchase of the old homestead, where there was simply an exchange of homesteads; in such case, the liability of the old homestead for the purchase money to be paid for it, is simply transferred to the new homestead. The assignment of the note given for the purchase money of the real estate carries with it the lien of the vendor, and all the equities and remedies the latter would have had if he had never parted with the debt. Where a homestead is to be sold on execution for the purchase-money, the lien of the judgment relates back to the time of contracting the debt by the operation of the law, and such lien can be enforced by general execution.

STOCK-TRESPASSING.

Under Chap. 26, Statutes of 1870, it is enacted that "The owner of any stock trespassing upon improved lands of another shall pay to the owner of the land so damaged the actual amount of damage sustained. The person who is in possession of the land so trespassed upon may distrain any trespassing stock, and retain the same in some safe place at the expense of the owner thereof, until the damages are paid: Held, That the above law was in force without a submission to the vote of the county; and the owner, also, under the above statute is liable for damages committed, whether the premises trespassed upon were inclosed with fences or not.

CHATTEL MORTGAGE.

Where the defendant mortgaged two cows, and the plaintiff allowed him to retain possession of them, and the mortgage was duly recorded; but afterwards the defendant sold two calves of eighteen months old, the increase of the cows, and the mortgage did not specify the increase of the cows; Held, That the purchaser of the calves taking them without notice, either actual or constructive, the sale to him was a valid sale, and the mortgage cannot cover them.

JURISDICTION.

A Justice of the Peace has no jurisdiction to try an action on an account in which the defendant in the suit is a resident of another county; and the appearance of the defendant in such a case does not confer jurisdiction.

ABUTTING LOTS.

The amount of any judgment obtained against the city on extra work done on the streets can be assessed on the abutting property, provided the work was authorized by proper officers.

NEGLIGENCE.

Where a person was employed about a threshing machine, and he was injured, without his fault or negligence, by the tumbling-rod not being boxed and properly covered as required by statute: Held, That the person so injured, can recover for such injury from the owner of the machine.

CONVEYANCE.

Where a conveyance was obtained by fraud from the grantor, and afterwards the lands passed into the hands of an innocent purchaser in good faith, without notice of the fraud, the title to such lands is valid in their hands.

The court has also decided the vexed question of John Rogers' "nine small children, and one at the breast," which has vexed Christendom for many years. A lease contained the following: "And the party of the second part, for and in consideration of the rentage and leasing aforesaid, is to pay as rent to the party of the first part, . . . and in addition thereto, as part rent, is to board the said party of the first part and his family, consisting of two adult persons": Held, That the defendant was to board three persons,—two in addition to the first party. Under this ruling, John Rogers had ten children.

SALE OF PERSONAL PROPERTY—CHANGE OF POSSESSION.

W. Perry Phillips v. Vick Reitz.—Error from Johnson county.

BREWER, J.

1. To support a sale of personal property where there is no change of possession, as against a creditor or subsequent purchaser, proof of good faith is as essential as proof of a sufficient consideration.

2. A continuance of possession by the vendor is evidence of a want of good faith as well as of a want of sufficient consideration. It does not raise a presumption of law that the sale is fraudulent and void, but simply one of fact, which may be overborne by other testimony. Like the possession of recently stolen property it casts upon the party the duty of explaining the possession, and may, if unexplained, become conclusive evidence against the sale.

3. Knowledge of facts sufficient to excite the suspicions of a prudent man and put him upon inquiry, is as a general proposition equivalent to knowledge of the ultimate fact.

4. If a party knows of the fraudulent intent of a vendor and buys with that knowledge, he is not a bona fide purchaser for he is knowingly helping the vendor to accomplish the fraud and do the wrong.

SERVICE OF SUMMONS—RECITAL IN RECORD MORTGAGE—BANKRUPTCY.

Lewis Orun and Abbie E. Orun v. The Merchants National Bank of Fort Scott, Kansas, and the Missouri River, Fort Scott & Gulf Railroad Company.—Error from Crawford County.

VALENTINE, J.

1. Where the court below finds that a sufficient service of summons was had upon the defendant and renders a judgment against him, and there is nothing in the record brought to the Supreme Court which shows that no such service was in fact had, or that the defendant did not make a voluntary appearance in the case, and it does not appear that the whole of the record has been brought to the Supreme court: Held, That although it may not appear affirmatively from the record brought to the Supreme court, except as above stated, that any such service or appearance was in fact made, still it will not be presumed from such a record, for the purpose of reversing the judgment of the court below, that the judgment was rendered without a sufficient service of summons or appearance.

2. The defendant owed a large sum of money to a National Bank. To partially secure the payment thereof he gave a mortgage to the bank on some property owned by him in Chicago, Illinois. There was a prior lien of $2,000 on the Chicago property which the defendant agreed to pay. Five hundred dollars of the same became due; and the bank, in order to save and protect its own lien on said Chicago property, and at the request of the defendant, paid said sum of $500, and then took the note and mortgage now sued on for that amount on property situated in Crawford county, Kansas: Held, That the taking of the last mentioned mortgage is not a violation of the National Banking Law, and that the mortgage is not void.

IMPANNELING A JURY—OBJECTIONS TO.

John Lane v. Wm. Scoville et al.—Error from Atchison county.

BREWER, J.

1. Where, at the time of impanneling a jury, a party knows of the disqualifications of a juror, and fails to challenge him on account thereof, he will not be permitted thereafter to raise the objection.

2. Where a juror is called and upon his voir dire testifies that he has no knowledge of the case, a party is ordinarily justified in resting on such testimony.

3. Where there is no reason to suspect the juror who has thus testified, a party is, though there has been a previous trial, under no obligations to examine the record of such trial to ascertain whether the juror did not serve upon such trial, nor is he ordinarily chargeable with gross negligence or laches in forgetting the fact of such service.

COMMON CARRIER—DELIVERY OF GOODS—REASONABLE TIME.

The L. L. & G. R. R. Co. v. W. H. H. Maris. — Error from Montgomery county.

BREWER, J.

1. The extraordinary liability of a railroad company as carrier of goods extends not merely to the termination of the actual transit of the goods to the place of destination, but also until the consignee has a reasonable time thereafter to inspect the goods and remove them in the usual hours of business and in the ordinary course of business.

2. This reasonable time is not a time varying with the distance, convenience or necessities of the consignee, but is such time as would enable a person living in the vicinity of the place of delivery, in the usual course of business, and within the ordinary hours of business, to inspect the goods and take them away.

3. Where goods are permitted by the consignee to remain eight days in the depot of the company at the place of delivery, that is more than a reasonable time, and if the goods are then lost or destroyed without any negligence on the part of the carrier, it is not responsible.

4. After the expiration of such reasonable time the carrier is responsible, not as carrier, but only as warehouseman, and for ordinary negligence.

5. Where the carrier and shipper by special contract stipulate for notice without any limitations or conditions the reasonable time for removal commences from the time of the notice and not from that of the arrival of the goods.

6. Where after a stipulation for notice, without any agreement as to the form or conditions thereof, the carrier gives notices with a condition written thereunder that the liability of the carrier terminates upon the arrival of the goods, and the consignee receives such notices without objection and continues his shipments over the road: Held, that this was equivalent to a construction by the parties and binding upon both that the agreement for notice was simply for the accommodation of the consignee and without extending the extraordinary liability of the carrier.

NOTE OF CORRECTION FROM MR. EDWARDS.

Editor State Journal:

After having made my statement to the jury in Chicago, in Mrs. Lincoln's case, in consequence of the judge having asked me to speak louder, I repeated substantially what I had previously stated. This accounts for the repetition in the statement published in the papers. The statement over my signature was read in the presence of Robert Lincoln. I at first objected to sign it because it contained the repetitions, but did so under the supposition that it was for his private use, intending to substitute in lieu of it another in my hand writing. It was read to me in a low voice, and as I was about to leave, in haste to send a second dispatch to Springfield. I had no idea that it was intended for publication or I never would have signed it, and especially without my reading it. I was not surprised that the editor of the Chicago Times stated that "it rather singularly contained a number of repetitions." By request of Mrs. Lincoln, her sister and a number of her friends, I wrote and presented the petition, signed by her, asking to be restored to all her rights; and stated substantially that we all believed that she was capable of managing her own affairs, and that she was a proper person to have the care, management and custody of her property,—and might have added that no one could have managed an estate better than she has managed hers, both previous to and since the death of her lamented husband.

N. W. EDWARDS.

PROPERTY IN LETTERS.

In the famous scene in the House of Representatives concerning the letters written by Mr. Blaine to Mr. Fisher, and which Mr. Mulligan having got in his possession, had threatened to publish. Mr. Blaine said:

"I claim that I have the entire right to these letters, not only by natural right, but on all the precedents and principles of law. The man who held them in his possession held them wrongfully, and the committee which attempted to take these from this man for use against me proceeded wrongfully."

Mr. Knott, the Chairman of the Judiciary Committee, said:

"I take this occasion to say that, so far as these letters were concerned they were legally the property of Mr. Fisher, and were legally in the possession of his bailee, Mr. Mulligan, and that Mr. Blaine had no more right to their possession than I had."

Mr. Hunton, Chairman of the Sub-Judiciary Committee, said:

"I claim that according to the well-settled principles of law, those letters belonged to Warren Fisher from the time that he received them until he delivered them to Mr. Mulligan, and from that time forth Mr. Mulligan was entitled to the ownership of them. Mr. Blaine had no more property in these letters than he had to my watch, or in any other piece of my property."

The question whether there is any property in letters constituting ordinary private correspondence, and, if so, in whom it vests, is not a new one. It has been considered in about a dozen cases in the English and American courts. In 1741, the poet Pope successfully sought the aid of a court to restrain the unauthorized publication of letters which he had written to Swift. Later, the famous letters written by Lord Chesterfield to his son, were the subject of litigation; and more recently in this country, Judge Story decided a controversy concerning letters written by Washington.

Since Pope's time, the doctrine has been well established in the English courts, and has been adopted in this country, that the writer of a letter has a property in it after it has passed into the hands of the receiver, and may prevent the latter from publishing it, or making of it any other use not within his implied privileges as receiver. This right is not based on considerations of policy or social ethics, but is purely one of property existing at common law. There are doubtless circumstances in which the wrongful publication of a letter by the receiver would be restrained by equity as a breach of implied confidence. But where the right has been recognized, it has been on the sole ground of property.

The theory has been advanced in the English courts, but has met with little favor, that the writer has a property after transmission only in letters of literary value. This absurd doctrine was adopted by the New York Court of Chancery, in 1841 and 1848, but was scouted in the United States Circuit Court by Judge Story, who emphatically declared "that the author of any letter or letters (and his representatives), whether they are literary compositions or familiar letters, or letters of business, possess the sole exclusive copyright therein; and that no persons, neither those to whom they are addressed, nor other persons, have any right or authority to publish the same upon their own account, or for their own benefit." And in 1855, Judge Duer, pronouncing the unanimous judgment of the full bench of the New York Superior Court, after an elaborate review of the authorities, affirmed the doctrine so clearly expounded by Judge Story, and held "that every letter is, in the general and proper sense of the term, a literary composition," which cannot lawfully be published by the receiver, or any third person, without the consent of the writer, except for purposes of vindication. This doctrine, which is the sound one, may now be regarded as settled.

While the writer has this general property in, and control over his letters after transmission, there is one case in which he has not the power to prevent publication by the receiver; and this is where he has made unjust charges against the receiver, or imputations upon his character. In this case the publication of the letter may be necessary to the vindication of the receiver; and the law gives him the right to publish it for such purpose, notwithstanding the protests of the writer. But this is merely a special or qualified property (if it be a right of property at all) in the letter; it is a personal right or privilege, and is not transferable. It cannot, therefore, rightly be exercised by a third person who has obtained the possession of the letters or copies, either with or without the consent of the receiver.

In all the adjudicated cases on this point, the object of the writer was simply to prevent the publication or other unwarranted use of his letters, and the extent to which the courts have gone is to declare that the writer's property is in the contents of the letter, without expressly deciding to whom belongs the material on which the letter is written. The important question then remains whether the writer has any lawful means of regaining possession of a letter after it has passed into the hands of the receiver. This question has not arisen in any reported case. It must therefore be determined on general principles and analogies, and not by precedent. Much can be said to show that the property in the material, as well as in the contents, with the exception above noted, remains in the writer. At any rate, it is clear that a third person can acquire no proprietory title to a letter except through the writer.

THE RECENT BANKRUPT ACT.

Below will be found the exact status of the Bankrupt Act, as approved by the President, after its having passed both Houses.

It relates exclusively to cases commenced in the Territories prior to June 22, 1874.

"SECTION 1. That in all cases in bankruptcy commenced in the Supreme courts of any of the Territories of the United States prior to the twenty-second of June, 1874, and now undetermined therein, the clerks of the said several courts shall immediately transmit to the clerks of the District courts of the several districts of said Territories all the papers in, and a certified transcript thereof, all the proceedings had in each of said cases; and the said clerks of the District courts shall immediately file the said papers and transcripts as papers and transcripts in the said Districts courts.

"SECTION 2. That the clerks of the said several Supreme courts shall transmit the papers and transcripts provided for in section one of this act, in each case, to the clerk of the District court of the district wherein the bankrupt or bankrupts, or some one of them resided at the time of the filing of the petition in bankruptcy in said case; and as soon as the said papers and transcript in any case shall have been transmitted and filed, as herein provided, the District court in which the same shall have been so filed shall have jurisdiction of the said case, to hear and determine all questions arising therein, and to finally adjudicate and determine the same in all respects as contemplated in other bankruptcy cases by the act entitled 'An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States,' and approved March second, 1867, and amendments thereto."

The Courts.

UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT.

OCTOBER TERM, 1875.

HUMBOLDT TOWNSHIP, Plaintiff in Error, v. LONG, et al.

In Error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Kansas.

VALIDITY AND NEGOTIABILITY OF TOWN BONDS—RIGHTS OF BONA FIDE HOLDER.

Irregularities in the issue of town bonds in aid of railroads do not affect their validity in the hands of a bona fide holder, provided the original legislative authority to issue them is constitutional, and the bonds recite that they were issued in pursuance of such authority. Miller, Davis, and Field, JJ., dissenting.

The negotiability of town bonds in aid of the construction of a railroad, is not affected by the recital that the bonds were issued "for the construction of the same through said township." The construction of the road is not a condition on which the payment of the bonds depends.

Mr. Justice STRONG delivered the opinion of the court.

The first question certified from the court below is whether the bonds to which the coupons in suit were attached are negotiable bonds, such as to entitle the plaintiff to the rights of a bona fide holder of negotiable paper taken in the ordinary course of business before maturity.

They are certificates of indebtedness to the railroad company, or bearer, each for one thousand dollars, lawful money of the United States, payable on a day certain, with interest at the rate of seven per cent., payable annually on the first day of January in each year, at a specified banking-house, on the presentation and surrender of the respective interest coupons thereto annexed. If this were all, there could be no doubt of their complete negotiability. But it is said the subsequent language of the certificates controls the absolute promise, and shows that payment was to be made only on a contingency. This is argued from the recital contained in the instrument and from what follows it. We quote: "This bond is issued for the purpose of subscribing to the capital stock of the Fort Scott and Allen County railroad, and for the construction of the same through the said township, in pursuance of and in accordance with an act of the legislature of the State of Kansas, entitled 'An act to enable municipal townships to subscribe for stock in any railroad, and to provide for the payment of the same, approved February 25, 1870;' and for the payment of the said sum of money and accruing interest thereon, in manner aforesaid, upon the performance of the said condition, the faith of the aforesaid Humboldt township, as also its property, revenue and resources is pledged." Relying upon this clause of the certificate, the township contends that the construction of the railroad through the township was a condition upon which the payment was agreed to be made.

We think, however, this is not the true construction of the contract. The construction of the road as well as the subscription for stock were mentioned in the recital as the reasons why the township entered into the contract, not as conditions upon which its performance was made to depend. It was for the purpose of subscribing, and to aid in the construction of the road that the bond was given. The words "upon the performance of the said condition," cannot then refer to anything mentioned in the recital, for there is no condition there. A much more reasonable construction is that they refer to a former part of the bond, where the annual interest is stipulated to be payable at a banker's "on the presentation and surrender of the respective interest coupons." Such presentation and surrender is the only condition mentioned in the instrument. But that stipulation presents no such contingency as destroys the negotiability of the instrument. It is what is always implied in every promissory note or bill of exchange, that it is to be presented and surrendered when paid. As well might it be said that a note payable on demand is payable upon a contingency, and therefore non-negotiable, as to affirm that one payable on its presentation and surrender is for that reason destitute of negotiability.

The next question certified is, whether the bonds are invalid because of the fact that the election was held within less than thirty days after the day of the order calling for it.

The act of the legislature under which the bonds purport to have been issued (passed in 1870) is the act under which the bonds considered in the case of Marcy v. The Township of Oswego were issued. We held in that case that by its provisions the board of county commissioners, who caused the bonds to be issued, were constituted the authority to determine whether the conditions of fact, made by the statute precedent to the exercise of the authority granted to execute and issue the bonds, had been performed, and that their recital in the bonds issued by them was conclusive in a suit against the township brought by a bona fide holder. In so ruling we but decided what had often before been decided, and what ought to be regarded as a fixed rule. Applying it to the solution of the question now before us, it is plain that the bonds are not invalid, because all the notice of the popular election was not given which the legislative act directed. The election was a step in the process of execution of the power granted to issue bonds in payment of a municipal subscription to the stock of a railroad company. It did not itself confer the power. Whether that step had been taken or not, and whether the election had been regularly conducted, with sufficient notice, and whether the requisite majority of votes had been cast in favor of a subscription and consequent bond issue, were questions which the law submitted to the board of county commissioners and which it was necessary for them to answer before they could act. In the present case the board passed upon them and issued the bonds, asserting by the recitals that they were issued "in pursuance of and in accordance with the act of the legislature." Thus the plaintiff below took them, without knowledge of any irregularities in the process through which the legislative authority was exercised, and relying upon the assurance given by the board that the bonds had been issued in accordance with the law. In his hands, therefore, they are valid instruments.

The third question certified is answered by what was decided in the case of Marcy v. The Township of Oswego, to which we have already referred. There is no essential difference between this case and that. The assessment rolls of the township may have been proper evidence for the consideration of the board of county commissioners when they were inquiring what the value of the taxable property of the township was, but the bonds are not invalid in the hands of a bona fide holder by reason of their having been voted and issued in excess of the statutory limit, as shown by the rolls. Whatever may be the right of the township as against those who issue the bonds, it cannot be set up against a bona fide holder of the bonds that the amount issued was too large, in the face of the decision of the board, and their recital that the bonds were issued pursuant to and in accordance with the act of 1870

The judgment of the Circuit court is affirmed.

Mr. Justice Miller dissenting.

We have had argued and submitted to us during the present term some ten or twelve cases involving the validity of bonds issued in aid of railroads by counties and towns in different States.

They were reserved for decision until a late day in the term, and the opinions having been delivered in all of them within the last few weeks, I have waited for what I have thought proper to say by way of dissent to some of them until the last of these judgments are announced, as they have been to-day.

I understand these opinions to hold that when the constitution of the State or an act of its legislature imperatively forbids these municipalities to issue bonds in aid of railroads or other similar enterprises, all such bonds issued thereafter will be held void. But if there exists any authority whatever to issue such bonds, no restrictions, limitations or conditions imposed by the legislature in the exercise of that authority can be made effectual if they be disregarded by the officers of those corporations.

That such is the necessary consequence of the decision just read, in the cases from the State of Kansas, is too obvious to need argument or illustration. That State had enacted a general law on the subject of subscriptions by counties and towns to aid in the construction of railroads, in which it was declared that no bonds should be issued on which the interest required an annual levy of a tax beyond one per cent of the value of the taxable property of the municipality which issued them.

In the case under consideration, this provision of the statute was wholly disregarded. I am not sure that the relative amount of the bonds, and of the taxable property of the towns is given in these cases with exactness, but I do know that in some of the cases tried before me last summer in Kansas it was shown that the first and only issue of such bonds exceeded in amount the entire value of the taxable property of the town as shown by the tax list of the year preceding the issue.

This court holds that such a showing is no defense to the bonds, notwithstanding the express prohibition of the legislature. It is therefore clear that so long as this doctrine is upheld it is not in the power of the legislature to authorize these corporations to issue bonds under any special circumstances, or with any limitation in the use of the power, which may not be disregarded with impunity. It may be the wisest policy to prevent the issue of such bonds altogether. But it is not for this court to dictate a policy for the States on that subject.

The result of the decision is a most extraordinary one. It stands alone in the construction of powers specifically granted, whether the source of the power be a State constitution, an act of the legislature, a resolution of a corporate body, or a written authority given by an individual. It establishes that of all the class of agencies, public or private, whether acting as officers whose powers are created by statute, or by other corporations or by individuals, and whether the subject-matter relates to duties imposed by the nation, or the State, or by private corporations, or by individuals, on this one class of agents, and in regard to the exercise of this one class of powers alone, must full, absolute, and uncontrollable authority be conferred on them or none. In reference to municipal bonds alone, the law is that no authority to issue them can be given, which is capable of any effectual condition or limitation as to its exercise.

The power of taxation which has repeatedly been stated by this court to be the most necessary of all legislative powers, and least capable of restriction, may by positive enactments be limited. If the Constitution of a State should declare that no tax shall be levied exceeding a certain per cent. of the value of the property taxed, any statute imposing a larger rate would be void as to the excess. If the legislature should say that no municipal corporation should assess a tax beyond a certain per cent., the courts would not hesitate to pronounce a levy in excess of that rate void.

But when the legislature undertakes to limit the power of creating a debt by these corporations which will require a tax to pay it in excess of that rate of taxation, this court says there is no power to do this effectually. No such principle has ever been applied by this court, or by any other court, to a State, to the United States, to private corporations or to individuals. I challenge the production of a case in which it has been so applied.

In the Floyd Acceptance Cases, 7 Wall., 666, in which the Secretary of War had accepted time drafts drawn on him by a contractor, which, being negotiable, came into the hands of bona fide purchasers before due, we held that they were void for want of authority to accept them. And this case has been cited by this court more than once without question. No one would think for a moment of holding that a power of attorney made by an individual cannot be so limited as to make any one dealing with the agent bound by the limitation, or that the agent's construction of this power bound the principal. Nor has it ever been contended that an officer of a private corporation can, by exceeding his authority, when that authority is express, is open, and notorious, bind the corporation which he professes to represent.

The simplicity of the device by which this doctrine is upheld as to municipal bonds, is worthy the admiration of all who wish to profit by the frauds of municipal officers. It is, that wherever a condition or limitation is imposed upon the power of those officers in issuing bonds, they are the sole and final judges of the extent of those powers. If they decide to issue them, the law presumes that the conditions on which their powers depended existed, or that the limitation upon the exercise of the power has been complied with, and especially and particularly if they make a false recital of the fact on which the power depends in the paper they issue, this false recital has the effect of creating a power which had no existence without it.

This remarkable result is always defended on the ground that the paper is negotiable, and the purchaser is ignorant of the falsehood But in the Floyd Acceptance cases this court held, and it was necessary to hold so there, that the inquiry into the authority by which negotiable paper was issued was just the same as if it were not negotiable, and that if no such authority existed it could not be aided by giving the paper that form. In county bond cases it seems to be otherwise.

In that case the court held that the party taking such paper was bound to know the law as it affected the authority of the officer who issued it. In county bond cases, while this principle of law is not expressly contradicted, it is held that the paper, though issued without authority of law, and in opposition to its express provisions, is still valid.

There is no reason, in the nature of the condition on which this power depends in these cases, why any purchaser should not take notice of its existence before he buys. The bonds in each case were issued at one time, as one act, of one date, and in payment of one subscription. All this was a matter of record in the town where it was done.

So, also, the valuation of all the property of the town for the taxation of the year before the bonds were issued is of record both in that town and in the office of the clerk of the county in which the town is located. A purchaser had but to write to the township clerk or the county clerk to know precisely the amount of the issue of bonds and the value of the taxable property within the township. In the matter of a power depending on these facts, in any other class of cases, it would be held that before buying these bonds the purchaser must look to those matters on which their validity depended.

They are public, all open, all accessible. The statute, the ordinance for their issue, the latest assessment roll. But in favor of a purchaser of municipal bonds all this is to be disregarded, and a debt contracted without authority, and in violation of express statute, is to be collected out of the property of the helpless man who owns any in that district.

I say helpless advisedly, because these are not his agents. They are the officers of the law, appointed or elected without his consent, acting contrary, perhaps, to his wishes. Surely, if the acts of any class of officers should be valid only when done in conformity to law, it is those who manage the affairs of towns, counties and villages, in creating debts which not they but the property owners must pay.

The original case on which this ruling is based, is Knox County v. Aspinwall, 21 How. 544. It has, I admit, been frequently cited and followed in this court since then, but the reasoning on which it was founded has never been examined or defended until now. It has simply been followed. The case of The Town of Coloma v. Eaves, decided a few days ago, is the first attempt to defend it on principle that has ever been made. How far it has been successful I will not undertake to say. Of one thing I feel very sure, that if the English judges who decided the case of The Royal British Bank v. Torquand, on the authority of which Knox County v. Aspinwall was based, were here to-day, they would be filled with astonishment at this result of their decision.

The bank in that case was not a corporation. It was a joint-stock company in the nature of a partnership. The action was against the manager as such, and the question concerned his power to borrow money. This power depended, in this particular case, on a resolution of the company. The charter, or deed of settlement, gave the power, and when it was exercised, the court held that the lender was not bound to examine the records of the company to see if the resolution had been legally sufficient.

This was a private partnership. Its papers and records were not open to public inspection. The manager and directors were not officers of the law, whose powers were defined by statute, nor was the existence of the condition on which the power depended, to be ascertained by the inspection of public and official records made and kept by officers of the law for that very purpose. In all these material circumstances that case differed widely from those now before us. It is easy to say, and looks plausible when said, that if municipal corporations put bonds on the market, they must pay them when they become due. But it is another thing to say that, when an officer, created by the law, exceeds the authority which that law confers upon him, and in open violation of law issues these bonds, the owner of property lying within the corporation must pay them, though he had no part whatever in their issue, and no power to prevent it.

The latter is the true view of the matter. As the corporation could only exercise such power as the law conferred, the issuing of the bonds was not the act of the corporation. It is a false assumption to say that the corporation put them on the market. If one of two innocent persons must suffer for the unauthorized act of the township or county officers, it is clear that he who could, before parting with his money, have easily ascertained that they were unauthorized, should lose rather than the property-holder, who might not know anything of the matter, or if he did, had not power to prevent the wrong.

Mr. Justice Davis and Mr. Justice Field concur with me in this opinion.

UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT.

OCTOBER TERM, 1875.

HENRY M. NEBLETT v. J. E. MACFARLAND.

Appeal from the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Louisiana.

FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES—RETURN OF CONSIDERATION.

Mr. Justice HUNT delivered the opinion of the court.

The allegation of error in this case is confined to a single point. In his brief, the counsel for the appellant says: "The court erred in not making the payment of our bond a condition precedent to the reconveyance of the plantation, as set forth in our motion for a new trial; and on this ground, and from this point of the decree, do we appeal and ask for relief."

The action was brought to set aside the conveyance of a plantation in Louisiana, made by Macfarland to the appellant, Neblett, upon the allegation that the conveyance was obtained by the fraudulent acts and representation of Neblett and his father.

The only consideration given or professed to be given by Neblett for the conveyance, was the cancellation of a certain bond for the sum of fourteen thousand four hundred sixty-four 51-100 dollars, executed by Macfarland to Sterling Neblett, the father, and alleged to be the property of Henry Neblett.

The court below adjudged the transaction to be fraudulent, directed the execution of a deed reconveying the property, and ordered the return and re-delivery of the bond for $14,464.51, unaffected by any indorsement of credit or payment thereon, and the same, with the mortgage made for its security, to retain the same lien thereon and the same force and effect as if the deed had not been made or any cancellation of the bond taken place.

The complaint now made is that, instead of directing a return of the bond in specie, as a condition for the return of the land, the court should have directed the payment of the amount of money secured thereby.

In cases of this character the general principle is that he who seeks equity must do equity; that the party against whom relief is sought shall be remitted to the position he occupied before the transaction complained of. The court proceeds on the principle that as the transaction ought never to have taken place, the parties are to be placed as far as possible in the situation in which they would have stood if there had never been any such transaction. Bellamy v. Sabine, 2 Phillips R. (Eng. Ch.) 425; Samy v. King, 5. H. & L., 627; West. Bank of Scotland v. Addie, L. R., 1 Scotch App. Cas. 145; Gatley v. Newell, 9 Ind. 572; Johnson v. Jones, 13 Sm. & M., 580; Kerr on Fraud, 335, 343. This is, no doubt, the general rule.

We do not, however, perceive that the principle will benefit the complaining party in this suit.

1. He is restored here to his property that he had and parted with when he received his deed, to wit, his bond and mortgage. If he had paid $14,500 in money and received in return only a bond for the like amount, of doubtful security and impaired by the lapse of time, he might well have complained. But he paid no money. He surrendered a bond against an insolvent debtor who had left the country, and a mortgage upon an estate abandoned by the owner, and in relation to which the Nebletts, father and son, make the most bitter complaints of its insufficient security.

In his letter of September 29, 1869, Henry Neblett says: "Your deed lay in the hands of your uncle as an escrow. * * * I have hesitated whether to abandon the place or to struggle to save something by borrowing a large sum and risk of forced culture in latitude 30½." Sterling Neblett, the father writes: "If Mendoza be correct, as he just advised, that there are numerous debts and some judgments against Mossland (the plantation in question), liens on the property that Henry nor I did not know of, the trust deed on record at St. Martins gives the only protection against them. * * * Henry is absent, and has long been the true owner of James Edmunds' bond. I thought of you if interested and my deed to Henry could arrange matters. But alas! so far unsuccessful—debts to others, less and less probability of buying the Bruossade bonds. * * How much money will you provide Henry, if he decides to go?"

The letter of the same person, of February, 1869, is filled with the accounts of the embarrassments and difficulties, of the depreciation of the estate, the claims for taxes, judgments, and general creditors. Among other things, he says, "I know Henry would let you have his debt (the bond in question) for fifty cents on the dollar."

We are not able to say, nor is it very material to know, whether these statements were false and fraudulent, or whether the security was really so inadequate as is here represented. Whether good or bad, he receives now the same security that he then gave to his vendor. It would be a perversion of justice to give him the full amount in money for a security then worth but fifty cents on the dollar. If, on the other hand, it was then an adequate security, it is the same now.

But, 2d. It is no objection to a restoration of property received on a fraudulent sale, that it has fallen in value since the date of the transaction. Blake v. Morrell, 21 Bervan, 613: Veazie v. Williams, 8 How., 134, 158. Nor if the property is of a perishable nature is the holder bound to keep it in a state of preservation until the bill is filed. Scott v. Perrin, 4 Bibb., 360; Kerr, 337.

A party seeking to set aside a sale of shares is not bound to pay calls on them to prevent forfeiture after filing his bill. Same author. Nor is it fatal to his right of rescission that some of the shares have been thus perfected.

We have no means of knowing whether there can be a defense made to the bond, arising from the statute of limitations. It would seem that when the bond has been so recently adjudged by the court, to be a subsisting security, and to be a lien upon the plantation directed to be reconveyed, the party in substance redelivering the bond as a condition of obtaining such reconveyance, that a defense of this character could not be a good one. But of this the appellant must take his chance. If the bond has become thus impaired, it is no worse than the loss of a perishable article, or the forfeiture of shares during the litigation. These circumstances do not alter the rule of law. In Gatley v. Newell, supra, it is said: "The party defendant is not bound to rescind until the lapse of a reasonable time after discovering the fraud. Hence the parties cannot be placed in statue quo as to time."

Parties engaged in a fraudulent attempt to obtain a neighbor's property are not the objects of the special solicitude of the courts. If they are caught in their own toils and are themselves the sufferers, it is a legitimate consequence of their violation of the rules of law and morality. Those who violate these laws must suffer the penalty.

The judgment was right and must be affirmed.

U. S. CIRCUIT COURT OF OHIO.

BRICE et al. v. ELLIOT.

U. S. REVISED STATUTES §§ 934-3224—PROPERTY DISTRAINED UNDER AUTHORITY OF THE REVENUE LAWS IRREPLEVIABLE.

Demurrer to plea.

This was an action of replevin to recover the possession of fifty-two barrels of high wines, to which the plaintiffs claimed ownership by purchase from F. Bergenthal & Bro.

The amended plea of the defendant set forth that he was Collector of Internal Revenue for the first district of the State of Pennsylvania at the time and before this suit was brought, and that he held possession of the property under the revenue laws of the United States, by virtue of a levy duly made by him for tax due the United States, alleged to be owing by Bergenthal & Brother.

To this plaintiffs demurred, assigning for cause that the property was not taken for a tax due by the plaintiffs.

This action is in violation of the acts of Congress, and is intended to prevent the collection of taxes.

Revised Statutes, §§ 934 3224.

Purdon's Dig., 1226, Sec. 4.

Pullan v. Kinsinger, 11 Int. Rev. Rec., 197.

Stiles v. Griffith, 3 Yeates, 83.

Pott v. Old Wine, 7 Watts, 173.

The court, MCKENNAN, Cir. J., gave judgment for the defendant upon the demurrer, saying that the Acts of Congress (Rev. Stat., § 934), explicitly declares that property taken or distrained under authority of the revenue law shall be irreplevinable, and that the form of action of replevin is taken away from persons claiming property so taken or distrained.

CAROLINE M. FORSYTH and JACOB FORSYTH v. JOHN SMALE, et al.

THE BOUNDARIES OF LAND BORDERING ON A NON-NAVIGABLE LAKE.

1. BOUNDARY OF LAND BORDERING ON STREAM.—That the law upon the subject of the survey of land bordering upon navigable and non-navigable streams, is that the navigable streams are to remain navigable; that the land covered by the water is not to be sold. The acts of Congress require that these streams shall always remain navigable as public highways; and in relation to streams not navigable, the law has always been that the purchaser takes the land to the center of the stream.

2. THE CASE OF A NON-NAVIGABLE LAKE.—This is the case of a non-navigable lake, not of a stream, and, so far as the court can judge from the statement made in the pleadings, that does not change the principles of the case as stated.

3. WHERE THE LINE IS MEANDERED ON STREAM.—That there seems to be no reason for taking this case out of the general rule, where land is purchased bordering upon a non-navigable stream, and where the line is meandered upon the stream for the purpose of quantity, and the stream is intended as the boundary of the land. That the government did not intend to exclude from the operation of the grant made to the purchaser, any land between the meander line and the water.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.

Opinion by DRUMMOND, J.

We will state the views that we have taken of this case, as it is presented in the pleadings.

The question comes up on a demurrer by the defendants to the complaint—it being an action of ejectment to recover from the defendants some land, in what is called Lake George, in the county of Lake, in this State.

According to the statement contained in the complaint, Lake George is a body of water about two miles long, north and south, and about three-quarters of a mile wide, east and west; the depth of the lake is not stated in the pleadings. It is called a non-navigable lake, and it is said that for many years after the survey was made by the United States, in 1835, the lake had no outlet. The plaintiffs are owners of the title from the government, of two tracts of land on the east side of the lake, called lots No. 3 and 4, being parts of fractional section 18, in township 37 north, range 9 west, the western boundary of section 18 being most of it in the lake, certainly that part of it immediately west of lots 3 and 4.

Proceeding south on the shore line of the lake, the plaintiffs are owners of parts of section 19, which extend to the southern boundary of the lake; they are also the owners of parts of sections 24 and 13, extending around the lake by its south boundary, and north on its western boundary, so as to include the land immediately opposite lots 3 and 4. The plaintiffs are thus the owners as alleged, of all the land bordering the lake east and west, as well as south, that is to say, south of a line produced west on the northern boundary of lot 3, so as to cross the lake, and it would include all south of that, and on both sides of the lake, as the property of the plaintiffs. The complaint admits that when the survey was made, the lines were run, not upon the water's edge of lots 3 and 4, but they were run in the usual way, for the purpose of ascertaining the quantity of land, and from point to point near the boundary of the lake.

The complaint alleges that the defendants claim that the boundaries did not include whatever land was left west of Lots three and four, between the meander line and the lake. It is insisted, however, on the part of the plaintiffs, that this meander line was run simply for the purpose of ascertaining the quantity of land, and not to exclude from that quantity the land between the meander line and the lake.

The complaint produces and makes part of the pleading, two plats, copies of the government survey, according to which it appears that the western boundary of Lots three and four was the lake. There is no land shown on the west between the meander line and the lake, but the lines are run from the eastern boundary of section 18, and of lots three and four to the lake, and it is admitted, extending the lines thus surveyed and as marked in rods they would not reach the lake; but this is not shown upon the surveys produced in evidence; on the contrary, as before stated the western line of lots three and four appears to be the lake. There is no gore or tongue of land represented on lot three at all, according to this survey, but the water line is represented to be the ordinary varying line of the lake. The declaration alleges that there is a gore or strip of land extending from lot three in a south-westerly direction into the lake, and it is in relation to that gore or strip of land that this controversy arises.

Defendants are in possession of that land, and the plaintiffs claim it for the reason as they allege, that whatever land is there is a part of lot three; at any rate so far as the northern line of lot three, when produced west, would describe the boundary of that gore or strip of land. The complaint says nothing about the condition of the lake at the time of the survey, whether it is the same now or at the time the suit was brought, as it was at the time of the survey. Whether any changes have taken place in the condition of things does not appear.

The first question to be determined is, whether the boundaries of lots three and four did extend to the lake, or whether, on the other hand, they did not include more or less of land which might be left between the meander line and the lake, and, I think, upon the face of the pleadings as they stand when connected with the maps, we must assume that the boundaries extended to the lake.

It seems to me that the principles which are decided by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of the Railroad Company against Schurmeir, which is referred to by the counsel on both sides, and reported in 7 Wallace 272, must to a great extent control this case. That was a case where there was a tract of land surveyed on the Mississippi River; a meander line was run, outside of which was the tract of land in controversy in the case, which was claimed by the railway company, by virtue of a grant from the government to the State of Minnesota, but which was also claimed by the party who had entered the land bounded by the river. That line was run just as this was, with a meander line upon the river, and the party purchased the land of the government as so much land, and took his patent for it, and the question was, whether the patent included the land outside of the meander line, and which was sometimes covered with water and sometimes bare. The Supreme Court held that the patentee had the better right to the land because his patent covered the land in controversy. The meander lines were run for the purpose of ascertaining the quantity of land, but the intention of the government was to leave the river as the boundary of the land, and the court says:

[Here the court read from 7 Wallace, in the case of Railway Company v. Schurmeir, 286–289.]

Now these principles are strictly applicable to this case, and, in accordance with the facts of this case, the only difference is, the court was there speaking of a navigable river, in this case it appears that the lake, so far as we know anything about it, is non-navigable. But why should that, by any possibility, exclude the plaintiffs from the operation of the principle? One would think that, so far from having that effect, it might be brought within the rule of law in relation to non-navigable streams. The law upon the subject of the survey of land bordering upon navigable and upon non-navigable streams is, that the navigable streams are to remain navigable; that the land covered by the water is not to be sold. The acts of Congress require that these streams shall always remain navigable as public highways; and in relation to streams not navigable, the law has always been that the purchaser takes the land to the centre of the stream, as is stated by the Supreme Court in the case of the Railway Company against Schurmeir. So that, as to navigable streams, the purchaser takes the land only to the border of the stream, with the right, of course, to make improvements upon the stream, as wharves, just as can be done in water-courses where the tide ebbs and flows. This is the case of a non-navigable lake, not of a stream, and the question is, whether that changes the principles of the case as stated. So far as we can judge from the statement made in the pleadings, it seems to me that it cannot. In the argument of this case a great many facts have been stated of which the court can take no judicial notice. For example, it is stated that the government, in many cases of these non-navigable lakes, has regarded the land covered by the water as still belonging to the government, and has had it surveyed, and has sold it in several instances. Some cases in Missouri are referred to in the statutes, and another on the Calumet river, in Illinois and Indiana. We do not undertake to lay down any absolute rule upon the subject. We do not say but that circumstances might change the principle applicable to such a case as this, but if it be true, as we have the right to assume upon the pleadings that it may be, or is, that the physical condition of this lake has not substantially changed between the time of the survey and the time when this suit was commenced, then it seems clear that the plaintiffs, in obtaining the titles to lots three and four would have the right to include within the boundary of their land, as that which was sold by the government, all of the extension into the lake.

Whether or not this was the effect of a gradual accretion upon the land, or of some sudden cause, all we can judge from is the facts as they appear from the pleadings. As this lake is only three quarters of a mile wide, it may be doubtful whether the same rule ought to be applicable to this case as to a larger lake, which, owing to the cultivation of the country or other cause, might dry up gradually or suddenly. For example; the plaintiffs being the owners of all the land on the east and west and southern boundaries of this lake, suppose that there is a gradual withdrawal of the lake, and the bed of the lake bordering upon the plaintiff's land should become dry land, what is to prevent the principle of accretion from operating in such a case as this, where the lake is only three quarters of a mile wide? Ought there to be any difference in this case from that of a non-navigable stream, so called? Is not this within the spirit of the Act of Congress? Whether that would be true of a large body of water where the water gradually or suddenly retired, it is not necessary to decide. It might be supposed in such case that the Government did not intend to convey the land covered by the water, but that perhaps is not necessary to be decided in this case. Neither do I feel inclined to decide absolutely as to the rights of the parties in this case.

It may be that if the facts were all known to us, if the changes which had occurred since the time of the survey and the sale, and the time when this suit was brought were known, we might take a different view of the case. But as far as we can at present see, there seems to be no reason for taking this case out of the general rule, where land is purchased bordering upon a non-navigable stream, and where the line is meandered upon the stream for the purpose of quantity, and the stream is intended as the boundary of the land. The uniform rule as to the description of lands in deeds is that the great natural object is to govern, and courses and distances are to yield to the object. The great natural object here was the lake or the water, and the plat shows that the western line of lots three and four was intended to be the water, and we conclude that the government did not intend to exclude from the operation of the grant which was made to the purchaser, any land between the meander line and the water, so without actually deciding what may be the ultimate rights of the parties, we must hold that the demurrer is not well taken, and must be overruled.

BAKER, HORD & HENDRICKS, for plaintiffs.

DISTRICT COURT, DISTRICT OF NEBRASKA.

THURSTON v. THE UNION PACIFIC RAILROAD COMPANY.

Gamblers may be excluded from travel on railway trains if they are seeking to use the trains to ply their vocation, and are not traveling upon lawful and legitimate business.

It was alleged, and not denied, that plaintiff had purchased from the road, for fifty cents, a ticket for crossing the river on the transfer train, and that when the train was about starting he attempted to board it, but was prevented. He also purchased for ninety cents from the company a ticket good for another road, but was forcibly ejected from the train and was obliged to remain in Omaha several days before he could safely get away, for which he asked $5,000 damages. The defendant admitted that the necessary force (but no more) was used to prevent his entering the train. It was claimed that he had been for years a notorious gambler, and was then engaged in traveling on the defendant's road for the purpose of plying that calling, and was about to enter the train for that purpose. This the plaintiff denied. Upon the question whether the defendant has the right to exclude gamblers from its trains.

DUDLEY, J., charged the jury:

The railway company is bound as a common carrier, when not over crowded, to take all proper persons who may apply for transportation over its line, on their complying with all reasonable rules of the company. But it is not bound to carry all persons at all times, or it might be utterly unable to protect itself from ruin. It would not be obliged to carry one whose ostensible business might be to injure the line; one fleeing from justice; one going upon the train to assault a passenger, commit larcency or robbery; or for interfering with the proper regulations of the company; or for gambling in any form; or committing any crime; nor is it bound to carry persons infected with contagious diseases, to the danger of other passengers. The person must be upon lawful and legitimate business. Hence defendant is not bound to carry persons who travel for the purpose of gambling. As gambling is a crime under the state laws, it is not even necessary for the company to have a rule against it. It is not bound to furnish facilities for carrying out an unlawful purpose. Necessary force may be used to prevent gamblers from entering trains, and if found on them engaged in gambling, and refuse to desist, they may be forcibly expelled.

Whether the plaintiff was going upon the train for gambling purposes, or whether from his previous course, the defendant might reasonably infer that such was his purpose, is a question of fact for the jury. If they find such to have been the case, they cannot give judgment for any more than the actual damage sustained.

After the ticket is purchased and paid for, the railroad company can only avoid compliance with its part of the contract by the existence of some legal cause or condition which will excuse it. The company should in the first case refuse to sell tickets to persons whom it desires and has the right to exclude from the cars, and should exclude them if they attempt to enter the car without tickets. If the ticket has been inadvertently sold to such person and the company desires to rescind the contract for transportation, it should tender the return of the money paid for the ticket. If it does not do this, plaintiff may under any circumstances recover the amount of his actual damage, viz: what he paid for the ticket, and perhaps, necessary expenses of his detention.

In this case the jury rendered a verdict for actual damages ($1.74) and costs, the company not having tendered the money.

WE are under obligations to R. S. TUTHILL, City Attorney, for the following opinion:

CIRCUIT COURT OF COOK COUNTY, ILLINOIS.

OPINION, JUNE, 1876.

JOHN W. CONNETT v. THE CITY OF CHICAGO.

CHANGING ACTION FROM ASSUMPSIT TO CASE—STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS, WHEN IT COMMENCES TO RUN.

1. WHEN STATUTE COMMENCES TO RUN.—Where a husband commenced an action of assumpsit against the city of Chicago, in June, 1874, to recover damages for injuries to his wife, caused by a defective sidewalk in 1869, and in March, 1876, by leave of the court, changed his action from assumpsit to case, held, on the statute of limitations being pleaded, that for the purpose of determining whether the action was barred or not, the suit was to be regarded as commenced at the time when the action was changed from assumpsit to case.

2. EXPENSES FOR DOCTORING, ETC., WILL NOT PREVENT STATUTE FROM RUNNING.—That the injuries to the plaintiff's wife constituted the ground for the action, and the right of action accrued at the time of the injury: from that time to the change of the action into case, was more than five years, and it was consequently barred by the statute of limitations; and the fact that the plaintiff had expended money in curing his wife of the injury, within the five years, would not prevent the statute from running, although, if the action was not barred, such items would be a proper subject for damages.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

Opinion by MCALLISTER, J.

John W. Connett brought an action of assumpsit in the Circuit court of Cook county, June 17, 1874, against the city of Chicago, and declared on the common courts in assumpsit. There was a bill of particulars added to the declaration, the first item of which was $150 cash paid to Mrs. Johnson for attendance upon Mrs. Connett while recovering from injuries received by reason of defective sidewalk in said city. In March, 1876, finding out probably that he had misconceived his action, his attorney upon motion obtained leave of the court to change the cause of action from assumpsit to case, and thereupon filed a declaration against the city of Chicago, charging the latter with negligence in respect to keeping the sidewalk upon Centre Avenue in safe and secure condition and suffering it to be out of repair, in consequence of which, Emily Connett, his wife, while walking thereon September 6, 1869, and in the exercise of ordinary care, was thrown down, fell and was injured, alleging that in consequence of said fall, and injury so caused as aforesaid, said Emily Connett, said wife of said plaintiff, was made sick and helpless, and required and needed the care and attention of nurses and physicians," etc. Then, after setting out the special damages, plaintiff claimed damages to the amount of $1,500. To this new declaration, the defendants pleaded: 1. Not guilty. 2. Specially the statute of limitations, viz.: that the cause of action in the declaration mentioned did not accrue at any time within five years next, before the time when plaintiff changed his cause of action from assumpsit to case. 3. The statute of limitations generally that the supposed cause of action did not accrue to plaintiff at any time within five years next before the commencement of the suit. To the second plea, the plaintiff demurred, and on the first and third took issue. The court sustained the demurrer to the second plea, and the case was tried on the issues formed by the other pleas and replications thereto, such trial resulting in a judgment in favor of plaintiff for $1,500. The defendants having appealed to the Supreme court, the parties, by their counsel, entered into a stipulation to submit the case to me, to determine the following questions: Was the defendant's second plea a good plea in bar, and does the evidence sustain the third plea in bar of plaintiffs action? If the decision shall be in favor of defendants, the plaintiff shall release said judgments; if in favor of plaintiff, then the appeal taken by the city, shall be withdrawn.

I am of opinion that the second plea of defendant to which the court sustained the demurrer, was a good plea in bar, and that the demurrer should have been overruled. The plaintiff's action as originally commenced was assumpsit, and belonged to the class known as actions ex contractu, and can be maintained only where the cause of action arises out of contract.

When the plaintiff applied and obtained leave in March, 1876, to change his action, he thereupon changed it from an action ex contractu to one of another class known as an action ex delicto, applicable only to torts or wrongs; and under which, the plaintiff can never recover for a mere breach of contract as under the former class. In making this change of actions the plaintiff virtually and necessarily discontinued his action ex contractu. Suppose he had changed from what it was, to an action on the case for slander. A cause of action for slander could, under no circumstances, be made a ground of recovery in assumpsit; no more could one for a tortious breach of duty by a municipal corporation, which is the ground of the recovery set out after the change was made. Now when the change is made, what has become of the action of assumpsit? Can it be said to exist even in contemplation of law? No. It is discontinued. It is as if it had never been begun. Before the act of 1872, a plaintiff finding he had misconceived his action, as here, would be compelled to dismiss and bring a new suit. But by the provisions of the statute, the change may be made without being put to that trouble and delay. By virtue of the statute the court retains jurisdiction of the person, while the change is effected. But the legal effect, so far as the statute of limitations is concerned, is the same. The suit is from the time of the change to be deemed as then brought upon the new cause of action. But it has been decided by the Supreme court of this State, that when a new cause of action is introduced into the declaration by a mere amendment, bringing another subject matter, though belonging to the same class as the other causes of action, such new causes of action will be subject to the pleas of the statute of limitations the same as if the suit had been brought solely upon it at the time of the amendment. Ill. Cent. R. R. Co. v. Cobb, Christy & Co., 64 Ills., 140. This case is entirely conclusive of the question under consideration. Nor is it in any wise affected by the bill of particulars added to the original declaration. Such bill of particulars is no part of the declaration, and any good lawyer would know, if called upon to defend, that the plaintiff would be bound, in order to recover under the original declaration, to show a contract on the part of the city to pay the expenses thus specified.

The other point submitted is equally clear for the appellant. The case shows that the injury to Mrs. Connett occurred September 6, 1869. The legal ground upon which a husband may recover for an injury to his wife arising from the tortious act or omission of another, is the marriage relation, and the loss of the service and society of his wife as a consequence. It is a rule supported by the general current of authority, that the statute of limitations begins to run only from the time when the right of action accrued. When the wife became injured by reason of the sidewalk being in a bad and unsafe condition through the negligence of the city, and she was thereupon rendered sick and helpless, as is alleged, the right of action accrued to her husband, and he could have brought his action immediately and maintained it. On the trial he could have shown expenses for doctoring and nursing necessarily incurred, if set out in his declaration, down to the time of the trial. Kerns v. Schoonmaker, 4 Ohio, 331, and authorities there cited. Bank of Hartford v. Waterman, 26 Conn., 344.

It appears that plaintiff relied upon the fact of incurring such expenses within the five years to take the case out of the statute of limitations. There is no doctrine or principle known to the law which would sustain that position. Such expenses are mere special damages which are the natural, though not the necessary, result of the injury, and are required to be stated as such in the declaration. In Argall v. Bryant, 1 Sandford (N. Y.) 98, it was held that the cause of action for the negligent or unskilful performance of a work or duty accrues at the time the act complained of is done, and not when the consequent injury happens to the plaintiff. Now here in the case under consideration, the negligence of the city and the consequent personal injury to plaintiff's wife, constitute the gravamen of the action, so that the right of action accrued at the time of the injury; from that time to the introduction of that cause of action into the case, was more than five years, and it was consequently barred by the statute of limitations. My decision is thus far in favor of the city upon all the questions submitted.

SUPREME COURT OF IOWA.

JUNE TERM, 1876.

NANCY JEWETT v. LOREZ WANSHURA.

Appeal from Jones County District Court.

ACTION BY WIFE FOR SELLING LIQUOR TO HUSBAND—SETTLING WITH ONE OF SEVERAL—SEPARATE ACTION—INTOXICATING LIQUOR.

1. INTOXICATING LIQUOR.—The court construes the various sections of the Iowa statutes, defining what are intoxicating liquors.

2. FOR SELLING INTOXICATING LIQUORS.—That Section 1557 gives a remedy for injuries caused by the sale of intoxicating liquor. Section 1539 classes wine and beer as intoxicating liquors, when sold to a person intoxicated, or in the habit of getting intoxicated; hence, Section 1557 gives a remedy for injuries caused by such sales of wine or beer.

3. WHEN SETTLING WITH ONE DOES NOT RELEASE OTHER.—When the drunkenness complained of consists not of a single fit of intoxication, contributed to by two or more, the action is not joint but several, and each is only liable for the injuries produced by his own acts; and in such a case, settling with one does not release the others.

4. WIFE CONSENTING TO SALE—INFERENCE.—The plaintiff's husband was an habitual drunkard; the plaintiff forbade the sale of liquor to her husband, and a day or two after, it is claimed, she came to the saloon in company with her husband, and in his presence, as defendant claims, directed him to sell her husband all the liquor he wanted. The only reasonable inference from such conduct is, that the act of plaintiff was under coercion or restraint, and the jury had a right to find from the testimony, that defendant drew the reasonable inference from the facts which he knew, and hence that he had knowledge that the plaintiff did not act voluntarily.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

This action was commenced against defendant and eight others, under Section 1557 of the Code, to recover damages for selling intoxicating liquors to plaintiff's husband when he was intoxicated and when he was sober, thus causing him to become intemperate and drunken, and injuring her in her property and means of support. The defendant filed a motion that plaintiff be required to state more specially whether said defendants each kept a separate saloon, and whether each at his own saloon, by himself and independently of the others, sold to plaintiff's husband as alleged. Afterwards, the plaintiff elected to dismiss all the defendant's except Wanshura, who filed an answer denying all the allegations of the petition. Pending the trial, the defendant filed an amended answer, alleging that the plaintiff authorized and requested the defendant to sell ale and beer, wine and liquor to her husband.

Subsequently, the defendant filed a second amended answer, alleging that plaintiff commenced an action against H. Babbe and John Rueger, charging them with the commission of the same acts, and at the same time, constituting the wrongs and injuries imputed to defendant; that she has fully settled with said Babbe and Rueger, and acknowledged satisfaction for the alleged injuries, and that by reason thereof plaintiff is barred from further proceeding with this suit.

There was a jury trial, resulting in a verdict for the plaintiff for $10,000, and $2,000 exemplary damages.

Motion for a new trial overruled. Judgment upon the verdict.

Defendant appeals.

M. W. HERRICK and J. L. PETERS, for appellant.

J. Q. WING and A. J. MORRIS, for appellee.

DAY, J. I. The court refused to direct the jury: "That unless you find from the evidence that the defendant sold the said S Jewett intoxicating liquors other than ale or beer, within the time specified in the plaintiff's petition, the jury will find for the defendant." And in substance insisted that since the adoption of the Code of 1873, which took effect September 1, 1871, parties may recover for injuries sustained from intoxication, produced by reason of the sale of beer, ale and wine to persons intoxicated, or who are in the habit of becoming intoxicated, the same as for injuries sustained from drunkenness produced by any other intoxicating liquor. The defendant excepted to this action of the court, and now assigns it as error.

Section 1583 of the Revision, which is Section 1, Chapter 143, Laws of 1858, and substantially the same as Section 1555 of the Code, provides that "wherever the words intoxicating liquor" occur in this act, or the act to which this is amendatory, the same shall be construed to mean all spiritous and vinous liquors: provided, that nothing in this act shall be so construed as to forbid the manufacture and sale of beer, cider from apples, or wine from grapes, currants or other fruits grown in this State."

Whilst the law stood thus, Section 2, Chap. 47, Laws of 1872, Section 1557 of this Code was enacted. This provides that "every wife, child, parent, guardian, employer or other person, who shall be injured in person or property, or means of support, by any intoxicated person, or in consequence of the intoxication, habitual or otherwise, of any person, shall have a right of action in his or her own name, against any person who shall by selling intoxicating liquors, cause the intoxication of such person, for all damages actually sustained, as well as exemplary damages."

It may be conceded that this section authorizes a recovery of damages only for a sale of such intoxicating liquors as the law prohibits. It must be conceded however, that the limiting of intoxicating liquors to spiritous and vinous liquors is purely arbitrary, for it is a matter of general knowledge and observation, that malt liquors are in fact intoxicating. The law standing thus, Section 1539 of the Code was enacted. This, in substance, provides that it shall be unlawful for any person to sell any spiritous or other intoxicating liquors, including wine or beer, to any intoxicated person, or to any person who is in the habit of becoming intoxicated. The effect of this is to superadd to the arbitrary classification of intoxicating liquors, beer and wine, though manufactured from grapes or other fruits grown in this State, if the same be sold to persons intoxicated or in the habit of becoming intoxicated. Section 1557 gives a remedy for injuries caused by the sale of intoxicating liquors. Section 1539 classes wine and beer as intoxicating liquors, when sold to a person intoxicated or in the habit of becoming intoxicated. Hence, Section 1557 gives a remedy for injuries caused by such sales of wine or beer, and the court, in the action under consideration, did not err. The case of Worsley v. Spurgeon et al., 38 Iowa, 465, relied upon by appellant, is not in point. The question of selling to a person intoxicated, or in the habit of becoming intoxicated, was not presented in that case.

II. The court instructed the jury as follows: It appears from the original petition, as well as from the evidence in the case, that others were selling intoxicating liquors to the husband of the plaintiff during the time complained of, and it appears that she has settled and compromised her claim for damages against some of them.

These settlements by the plaintiff do not, in a case of this character, operate as a discharge of those not settled with. When the drunkenness complained of consists not of a mere simple fit of intoxication, contributed to by two or more, the action is not joint, but several, and each is only liable for the injuries produced by his own acts. It is proper, however, to consider whether the defendant, if liable at all, is liable for all the injury complained of. If others sold him liquors which contributed to produce drunkenness, which led to idleness and squandering of his property to the injury of plaintiff, each party contributing to the injury is liable for the injury which he alone did."

The giving of this instruction is assigned as error. The evidence introduced by plaintiff covered a period of two years. In LaFrance v. Kreuger, Dec. term, 1875, Western Jurist, 1874, p. 29, we held that a joint action does not lie for injuries sustained as alleged plaintiff's petition. When a joint action does not lie, each party must be liable for the injury which he occasioned, and as a corollary a settlement with one does not bar an action against another.

As intimately connected with this question, see Woolhealther v. Risley, 38 Iowa, 486; Kearney v. Fitzgerald, at the present term.

III. The evidence shows that plaintiff's husband became a confirmed drunkard, and that he visited the saloons almost daily. The plaintiff forbade the defendant selling liquor to her husband. A day or two thereafter plaintiff and her husband went to defendant's saloon, plaintiff's husband called de endant out, telling him his wife wanted to see him, and defendant claims that plaintiff then countermanded the previous order and directed him to sell her husband whatever he wanted. The plaintiff claims that she authorized defendant only to sell her husband a glass of beer occasionally. The plaintiff proved that she was counselled to retract the order by the threats of her husband that he would abandon her and take from her, her child. Knowledge of the threats were not brought home to the defendant. The court instructed the jury, "The defendant denies the alleged sales, and also insists that for a part of the time the plaintiff herself, authorized the sale of liquors to her husband. If the plaintiff did direct the defendant to sell what beer he wanted, and the defendant in good faith supposed that such request was made of her own free will, there is no liability for any sales made under those circumstances. But if you find from the evidence that the defendant knew that Jewett was an habitual drunkard, and knew that the wife only requested the sales to be made under the restraint of her husband and to keep peace with him, then the defendant is not excused if he did sell to the husband and make him drunk." The objection urged to this instruction is that there is no evidence that defendant knew that plaintiff acted under the restraint of her husband. That there is no direct evidence of this fact, is conceded. But knowledge consists of two kinds of facts which are unmistakably established, and the necessary conclusions or inferences from such facts. If it should be proved that a gun loaded with ball, was fired vertically into the air, a jury would be authorized to find from such testimony that the ball went up and came down, although no one testified that he saw it go in either direction.

They would so find because it is a law of nature that the fact proved produces the other results found. Now it is a law of human nature, not as absolute and unvariable as the physical law above named, but still a law, that a wife would not ordinarily, unless under restraint, request liquor to be sold to a husband who is an habitual drunkard, and especially is this so when she has so far manifested her disapprobation, as to go to a saloon and forbid such sale. Plaintiff's husband was an habitual drunkard and must have been known to defendant to be such. Plaintiff forbade the sale of liquor to her husband. A day or two thereafter she came to the saloon in company of her husband, and in his presence, as defendant claims, directed him to sell her husband all the liquor he wanted. The only reasonable inference from such conduct, is that the act of plaintiff was under coercion or restraint. The jury had a right to find from the testimony that defendant drew the reasonable inference from the facts which he knew, and hence that he had knowledge that plaintiff did not act voluntarily.

IV. It is urged that the verdict is excessive. We think not. Plaintiff's husband has become a confirmed drunkard, has abandoned a lucrative business in which he was earning five dollars a day, and has squandered a valuable property. If the verdict had been larger we could not have disturbed it.

Affirmed.

ENGLISH PROBATE COURT.

MAY, 1876.

JAMES and Others v. SHRIMPTON and Others.

WILL REVOKED BY MARRIAGE—REVIVAL BY CODICIL—DESTRUCTION OF CODICIL—MISTAKE AS TO EFFECT OF DESTRUCTION.

The testator made a will and afterwards married. Immediately after the marriage he executed a codicil to the will, making provisions for his wife, and in all other respects reviving, ratifying and confirming the will. Upon his wife's death he destroyed the codicil, being under the belief that the will would still remain operative.

The court held that the codicil was not destroyed animo revocandi, and granted probate of both will and codicil.

The plaintiffs propounded the will and codicil of John James, of Leamington, Warwickshire. The will was executed in 1871, the testator being at that time a widower. In 1872 he was again married and on the same day (after the marriage) he executed what purported to be a codicil to the will of 1871, making a provision for his wife, and containing the words, "In all other respects I revive, ratify, and confirm my said will." His wife predeceased him, and he then destroyed the codicil, the will alone being found after his death. The case was tried without a jury. The due execution and attestation of the codicil were proved, and evidence was given of its contents. The defendants did not oppose the grant of probate.

DR. SPINKS, Q. C., and C. A. MIDDLETON, for the plaintiffs.

SEARLE, for the defendants.

May 23.—HANNEN, P.—The material facts in this case are as follows: The deceased had made a will before his marriage. On the day of his marriage he executed what purported to be a codicil to his will, making provision for his wife, and in other respects reviving, ratifying, and confirming the will. On his wife's death he destroyed the codicil, and the question for me to determine is whether the physical destruction of the codicil, which had revived the revoked will, left the latter inoperative. I concluded, from the evidence given, that it was not his intention to leave the will inoperative, but that his idea was that, having been once revived, it would remain in force, notwithstanding the destruction of the codicil, and I was asked to grant probate of both the will and the codicil, on the ground that the latter was not destroyed animo revocandi. In all cases where an instrument is destroyed by a testator, the court must consider the condition of his mind as to the effect of the destruction. As I conclude that the physical destruction of the codicil took place without any intention of making the will inoperative, and under a misconception of the facts, and of the effect of the proceeding, I hold that the testator did not do the act animo revocandi, and I shall allow probate of both will and codicil.

GRIEVANCES OF EAST INDIA LAWYERS.—A lay contemporary, in dealing with what it calls "Indian grievances," observes: "Another man with a grievance was a Mohammedan barrister from Bombay. This gentleman has been in legal practice for six years in the presidency. Wishing to have the privilege of taking his talents and experience to another part of India, he found that he could not do so unless he made the journey to England and ate dinners at the Temple for three years. This is a harder case than that of the Irish law students, for he has had to relinquish a position as an employed practitioner, and during his period of exile must excommunicate himself altogether from friends as well as clients." It certainly is a hardship upon the natives of India, that in order to secure a call to the bar, they should be obliged to take up their residence in England for three years.—Law Times.

It was in Omaha. A lawyer was addressing the judge, and the judge was eating peanuts and reading a novel. The lawyer bore it some time, and then angrily remarked: "I suppose I am entitled to claim the attention of the court?"—"Well, sir," retorted the judge, "the court has long suspected you, and will do its duty the first chance it gets."

We call attention to the following opinions, reported at length in this issue:

VALIDITY OF TOWN BONDS—RIGHTS OF BONA FIDE HOLDERS.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States by STRONG, J., holding that irregularities in the issue of town bonds in aid of railroads do not effect their validity in the hands of a bona fide holder, provided the original legislative authority to issue them is constitutional, and the bonds recite that they were issued in pursuance of such authority; that the negotiability of town bonds in aid of the construction of a railroad is not affected by the recital; that the bonds were issued "for the construction of the same through the township"; that the construction of the road is not a condition upon which the payment of the bonds depend.

FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCE—RETURN OF CONSIDERATION.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States, by HUNT, J., as to the duty of a party asking to have a fraudulent sale set aside, to restore the consideration, and in what condition it must be.

PROPERTY DISTRAINED UNDER REVENUE LAWS.—The opinion of the United States Circuit Court in Ohio, by MCKENNAN, J., holding that the action of replevin is taken away from persons claiming property taken or distrained under authority of the revenue law.

BOUNDARY LINE ON NON-NAVIGABLE LAKE.—The opinion of the United States Circuit Court for the district of Indiana, by DRUMMOND, J., stating the law for defining the boundary line where land is purchased bordering upon a non-navigable lake, and where the line is meandered upon the lake for the purpose of quantity. This opinion was delivered upon demurrer. The final opinion of the learned Circuit judge will be awaited with much interest, as there are thousands of acres of land in the western States, the title to which depends upon the proper solution of the questions raised in this case.

EXCLUDING GAMBLERS FROM THE CARS.—The charge of the United States District court for the district of Nebraska, by DUDLEY, J., as to the power of a railway company to exclude gamblers from traveling on their cars.

CHANGING ACTION FROM ASSUMPSIT TO CASE—STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS.—The opinion of the Circuit Court of this county, by MCALLISTER, J., holding, where a husband commenced an action of assumpsit against the city of Chicago in June, 1874, to recover damages for injuries caused by a defective sidewalk, in 1869, and in March 1876, by leave of the court, changed his action from assumpsit to case, that on the statute of limitations being pleaded, for the purpose of determining whether the action was barred or not, the suit was to be regarded as commenced at the time the action was changed from assumpsit to case; that the fact the plaintiff had expended money within the five years, for the purpose of curing his wife of the injury, would not prevent the statute from running. The question decided in this case by the learned Judge, is an important one. The case was appealed to the Supreme Court, but by stipulation of the parties, the appeal was abandoned, and the case submitted to Judge McAllister, with the agreement that his opinion should be final. The plaintiff, in this case, is a well known citizen of Chicago. Soon after the opening of the Illinois and Michigan canal, he became popular with the traveling public as the captain of a packet boat. He figured extensively in politics. Some years ago he was admitted to the bar of the Supreme Court, and was for several years employed in the law department of the city.

SALE OF INTOXICATING LIQUOR TO HUSBAND.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of Iowa, by DAY, J., construing the statutes of that State defining what are to be regarded as intoxicating liquors, under what circumstances a wife may sue a saloon keeper for selling her husband intoxicating liquor, and, if several saloon keepers sell intoxicating liquors to an habitual drunkard, when the wife may sue one alone and when the action must be joint. The court holds that when the facts are such as not to require the action to be joint, that the wife settling with one of the saloon keepers does not release the others. This is an opinion which will be of value to the profession in States where there is a similar liquor law to that in Iowa. Some of the questions in this case have, we believe, never been decided before.

REVOCATION OF WILL.—The opinion of the English Court of Probate deciding some interesting questions relating to the revocation of a will, and the revival of a will by a codicil.

HOMESTEAD—LIEN—RESIDENCE.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of Nebraska, by MAXWELL, J., holding that after a judgment has been recovered against him, a debtor cannot prevent the enforcement of the lien thereby created on his real estate, by moving thereon and occupying it as a homestead.

NOTES TO RECENT CASES.

REMOVAL OF CAUSE.

The U. S. District Court, District of La., in Watson v. Bondurant, 3 Cent. Law Journal, 398, held where an execution issued by a State court, has been enjoined by that court at the suit of a citizen of the same State, the cause may, under the act of March 3d, 1875, be removed into the Federal court, if the party issuing the execution be a citizen of another State.

PROTEST FEES.

The Supreme Court of Kansas held, in Wooley et al. v. Van Volkenburgh, 3 Cent. Law Journal, 399, that protest damages are recoverable only when protest is legally necessary to fix the liability of some party to the note. Protest is not necessary to hold a guarantor, and therefore protest damages cannot be recovered in a suit by the payer of a note against the maker and guarantors.

BONDED WAREHOUSE—TRANSFER OF GOODS IN BOND.

In the case of the U. S. v. McCullogh, 22 Int. Rev. Rec., 202, Judge BLATCHFORD held that dealers in foreign as well as in domestic spirits are subject to the requirements of the 45th section of the Acts of 1868, and are obliged to keep the books therein provided, and, in so far as they can, to make the entries therein specified. That under this act and under the warehouse act, the bonded warehouse in which the liquor dealer stores his goods is to be regarded as his premises for the purposes of the suit before the court, the warehouse becoming, by the transfer of the goods in bond, the premises of the vendor instead of the vendee.

DAMAGE DONE BY SHIP TO REALTY ABROAD.

The English Court of Appeals on appeal from the Admiralty Division, in re, the Moxham, 34 L. T. Rep. N. S. 559, held that the question of the liability of ship owner, proceeded against in the English Admiralty Court, for an injury done by his ship to a pier projecting into the sea, but attached to the soil of a foreign country, is governed by the lex loci and not by English law.

LAWYERS IN CONGRESS.—An exchange says: "There are forty thousand lawyers in the country, one hundred and ninety-eight of whom are in Congress. There are two million five hundred thousand farmers and only eighteen of them in Congress." There is a growing disposition with some newspapers, and with the mass of the people, to find fault because there are so many lawyers in official positions. In the state and national governments, lawyers always have, and always will, exercise a controlling influence in the governmental affairs of this nation and the states which comprise it. It is proper that they should do so. Their whole lives are devoted to the science of law, and as a consequence they are better qualified than any other class of men, to make and administer the laws. Would any one claim that an agricultural fair, held exclusively by lawyers, who never owned an acre of land or planted a hill of corn in their lives, would be a success? The farmers should not array themselves against the lawyers, but be willing that they should take the lead in making and administering the laws. We would not be understood as saying that all our law-makers should be lawyers. We would have farmers, and the various trades and professions represented in Congress and in our State legislatures, but we would have a controlling influence in the hands of the legal profession. They are more conservative and less liable to be led astray by passion or prejudice than any other body of men.

THE SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.—The judges since the adjournment of the June term, have been in conference at Mt. Vernon, until last Thursday, when they separated and went to their respective homes, not to rest and spend the summer vacation in idleness, but to resume the writing of opinions to be delivered at the September term at Ottawa. Some idea of the labor performed and to be performed by the judges, may be formed when it is known, that in addition to the cases previously submitted, the judges at the September term took 656 cases for decision, at the January term 354 cases, and at the June term just closed 242, thus making in ten months 1,252 cases submitted, in which the records, the briefs of counsel and the abstracts are to be examined, and the opinions written by the seven judges of the Supreme Court. A large portion of time has also to be spent in the examination of authorities. On Thursday the judges delivered 350 opinions which are divided between Mt. Vernon, Springfield and Ottawa. Those for Ottawa and Springfield were sent by express. We regret that we have not been able to obtain the lists of these cases in time for this issue.

THE DEMOCRATIC CONVENTION.

ON WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

On Tuesday, during the session of the National Democratic Convention at St. Louis, Mr. Weed of New York, made a motion to adjourn to 5 o'clock in the afternoon.

The Chairman arose and said—The gentleman from New York will be good enough to withdraw his motion until the Chair makes an announcement.

Mr. Weed—I will, sir.

The Chairman—The Chair desires to state that he is requested by delegates from the Woman's Rights National Convention to state that representatives of that organization are here and desire about ten minutes to make a statement to the convention.

["Hear them! hear them!"]

The Chairman — Without objection they will now be heard. The Chair will appoint Mr. Tweed, of New York, and Mr. Smalley, of Vermont, a committee to escort the ladies to the platform. [Applause and laughter.]

A delegate—Mr. President—

The Chair—No motion is in order. A lady has the floor. [Laughter.]

Several voices—Mr. President—

The Chair—Gentlemen will take their seats. The Chair has stated that a lady has the floor. The Chair has the honor to present to the Convention, Miss Phœbe Couzins, of St. Louis. [Applause.]

A delegate—I rose to a point of order.

The Chair—The gentleman is out of order and will take his seat immediately.

The same delegate—Can't I make a point of order?

The Chair—No, sir. A lady has the floor, and no point of order is in order. [Cries of "Hurrah for the Chair."]

Miss Couzins then stepped forward and delivered the following address:

THE SPEECH.

MR. PRESIDENT AND GENTLEMEN OF THE NATIONAL DEMOCRATIC CONVENTION: The Centennial anniversary of our national birthday is also happily a Centennial leap year. It is in order then, I take it, not only to receive proposals from fair women, but also to accept them. Taking advantage of this right and of your courtesy, I, as a delegated authority of the fair sex, am here not only to reaffirm for them the principles of liberty and equality, but to sue for the hand of those here assembled in National Convention; and the hand, Mr. President, must be neither larger nor smaller than a man's nand.

In the good old days of our ancestors, it was deemed an unpardonable offense if the leap-year privilege accorded to women were not unhesitatingly acquiesced in, and he who would not joyfully say "Yes" to the sweet maiden's coy wooing, was regarded with supreme contempt, and in the isolation of single miserableness, died ere yet his race was run, unwept, unsung of women. So, then, gentlemen, if as a party you would live long, be prosperous and happy, give heed to the warning from out the gates of Paradise, "It is not good for man to be alone," and accept for your companion in the political household "she who binds all the discordant elements of life unto the Divine harmony, sweet nature's better half." James Madison said, let it be remembered, that it has ever been the pride of America that the rights for which she contended were the rights of human nature, and, gentlemen, we ask their recognition, not as women but as human beings. Our magna-charta is, Equality of Rights, and to-day we sue for this, not by force of might and power, but by the more potent voice of truth and justice, speaking to every thinking man's conscience in tones more persuasive than those which appealed to King John on the field of Runnymede. We cannot assert this right by a resort to the sword. We confess our inability to thunder forth our claim from the canon's mouth, or to fire a shot that can be heard around the world; but in this grand Centennial year, when all others are free, and when our souls, too, are responding to the music of the utterance of Jefferson, of Hancock, of Adams, and of Patrick Henry, with mind expanding to a realization of their grandeur, with pulse beating for the freedom they proclaimed, we would fain pluck a live coal from off the altar of our liberties that shall kindle in your souls a zeal for the rights of the individual, the universal humanity, such as our fathers had when they thrilled the hearts of the people with the cry "Taxation without representation is tyranny," and with burning thoughts and noble utterances, they wrote by the camp-fires of the Revolution that immortal truth, "Atl humanity is created free and equal."

Gentlemen, we appeal to your sense of justice and the right, using but the grand old truths of our fathers to support our claims; and here we rest our case, commending to you in closing, the truth that a sense of justice is the sovereign power of the human mind. The most unyielding of any, it rewards with a higher sanction; it punishes with a deeper agony than any earthly tribunal; it never slumbers, never dies. It constantly utters and demands justice by the eternal rule of right, truth and equity, and on this eternal foundation-stone—right, truth and equity—we stand.

FORMAL ADDRESS.

The address which Miss Couzins presented is as follows:

PHILADELPHIA, Pa., June 20, 1876.—To the President and Members of the National Democratic Convention assembled at St. Louis, June, 27, 1876—GENTLEMEN: In reading the call for your Convention, the National Woman-Suffrage Association were gratified to find that your invitation was not limited to voters, but cordially extended to all citizens of the United States. We accordingly send delegates from our Association, asking for them a voice in your proceedings, and also a plank in your platform declaring the political rights of women. Women are the only class of citizens still wholly unrepresented in the government, and yet we possess every qualification requisite for voters in the several States. Women possess property and education; we take out naturalization papers and passports; we pre-empt lands, pay taxes, and suffer for our own violation of the laws; we are neither idiots, lunatics, nor criminals, and according to your State Constitutions, lack but one qualification for voters, namely: sex, which is an insurmountable qualification, and therefore equivalent to a bill of attainder against one-half of the people, —a power no State nor Congress can legally exercise, being forbidden in Art. I., Secs. 9 and 10 of the Constitution. Our rulers may have the right to regulate the suffrage, but they cannot abolish it altogether for any class of citizens, as has been done in the case of the women of this Republic, without direct violation of the fundamental law of the land. As you hold the Constitution of the fathers to be a sacred legacy to us and our children forever, we ask you to so interpret that magna charter of human rights as to secure justice and equality to all United States citizens, irrespective of sex. We desire to call your attention to the violation of the essential principle of self-government in the disfranchisement of the women of the several States, and we appeal to you, not only because as a minority you are in a position to consider principles, but because you were the party first to extend suffrage by removing the property qualification from all white men, and thus making the political status of the richest and poorest citizen the same. That act of justice to the laboring masses insured your power, with but few interruptions, until the War. When the District of Columbia Suffrage bill was under discussion in 1866, it was a Democratic Senator, Mr. Cowan, of Pennsylvania, who proposed an amendment to strike out the word "male," and thus extend the right of suffrage to the women as well as the black men of the District. That amendment gave us a splendid discussion on woman suffrage that lasted three days in the Senate of the United States. It was a Democratic Legislature that secured the right of suffrage to the women of Wyoming, and we now ask you, in National Convention, to pledge the Democratic party to extend this act of justice to women throughout the nation, and thus call to your side a new political force that will restore and perpetuate your power for years to come.

The Republican party gave us a plank in their platform of 1868, pledging themselves to a special consideration of our demands. But by their constitutional interpretations, legislative enactments, and judicial decisions, so far from redeeming their pledge, they have buried our petitions and appeals under laws in direct opposition to their high-sounding promises and professions, and now, in 1876, they give us another plank in their platform, approving "the substantial advance made toward the establishment of equal rights to women," cunningly reminding us that the privileges and immunities we now enjoy are all due to Republican legislation. Although under a Republican dynasty inspectors of elections have been arrested and imprisoned for taking the votes of women; temperance women arrested and imprisoned for praying in the streets; houses, lands, bonds, and stock of women seized and sold for their refusal to pay unjust taxation, and, more than all, we have this singular spectacle,—a Republican woman who had spoken for the Republican party throughout the last Presidential campaign, arrested by a Republican officer for voting the Republican ticket, denied the right of trial by jury by a Republican judge, convicted and sentenced to a fine of $100 and costs of prosecution, and all this for asserting at the polls the most sacred of all the rights of American citizenship—the right of suffrage specifically secured by recent Republican amendments to the Federal constitution.

Again, the Supreme court of the United States, by its recent decision in the Miner v. Happersatt case, has stultified its own interpretation of constitutional law. A negro, by virtue of his United States citizenship, is declared under the recent amendments a voter in every State in the Union, but when a woman, by virtue of her United States citizenship, applies to the Supreme court of the United States for protection in the exercise of this sole right, she is remanded to the State by the unanimous decision of the nine judges on the Bench that the "Constitution of the United States does not confer the right of suffrage upon any one." All concessions of privileges or redress of grievances are a mockery for any class that has no voice in the laws and law-makers. Hence we demand the ballot, that sceptre of power, in our own hands, as the only sure protection for our rights of person and property under all conditions. If the few may grant or withhold rights at their pleasure, the many cannot be said to enjoy the blessings of self government. Jefferson said: "The God who gave us life gave us liberty. At the same time the hand of force may destroy, but cannot disjoin them." While the first and highest motive we would urge on you is the recognition in all your actions of the great principles of justice and equality that underlie our form of government, it is not unworthy to remind you that the party that takes this onward step will reap its just reward. Had you heeded our appeals made to you at Tammany Hall, New York, in 1868, and again in Baltimore, in 1872, your party might now have been in power, as you could have had what neither party can boast to-day—a live issue on which to rouse the enthusiasm of the people.

REFORM IS THE WATCHWORD OF THE HOUR.

But how can we hope for honor and honesty in either party in minor matters so long as both consent to rob one-half the people, their own mothers and sisters, wives and daughters, of their most sacred right? As a party you defended the right of self-government in Louisiana ably and eloquently during the last session of Congress. Are the rights of women in all the Southern States, whose slaves are now their rulers, less sacred than those of the men of Louisiana?

"The whole art of government," says Jefferson, "consists in being honest." It needs but little observation to see that the tide of progress in all countries is setting toward the emancipation and enfranchisement of women, and this step in civilization is to be taken in our day and generation. Whether the Democratic party will take the initiative in this reform and reap the glory of crowning fifteen million women with the rights of American citizenship, and thereby vindicate our theory of self-government, is the momentous question. We ask you to decide in this eventful hour as we round out the first century of our national life.

ELIZABETH CADY STANTON,
President.
MATILDA JOSLYN GAGE,
Chairman Executive Committee.
SUSAN B. ANTHONY,
Corresponding Secretary.

THE PROPOSED PLANK.

Accompanying this address was the following plank for the Democratic platform:

WHEREAS, The Democratic party was the first to abolish the property qualification and extend the right of suffrage to all white men in some of the older States; and

WHEREAS, It was a Democratic legislature that extended the right of suffrage to the women of Wyoming; therefore,

Resolved, That we pledge ourselves to secure the right of suffrage to the women of the United States on equal terms with men.

WHAT TO DO WITH IT.

The Chair—The Convention has heard the memorial, and the Chair will entertain a motion as to what disposition to make of it.

Mr. McClernand, of Illinois—I move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Resolutions for their respectful consideration.

The Chair—Without objection, the resolution will be referred under the rule, as moved by the gentleman from Illinois.

THE WHISKEY CASES.

On last Saturday Judge Blodgett, of the United States District Court, finally disposed of twelve of the revenue cases known as the "whiskey cases." The parties had pleaded guilty or been found so, by the verdict of a jury of revenue frauds. The counsel for the parties convicted had previously been heard, and testimony introduced to mitigate the punishment, so that nothing remained to be done, but for the court to pass sentence.

The court room was full and overflowing at an early hour. Of the defendants, Mr. Hesing, was the first to come in. He was accompanied by his son, Mr. Washington Hesing. Mr. Burroughs and Buffalo Miller soon came in, and were followed by Pahlam and Rush, Dickinson, Abell, Powell and the others, to the number of twelve. All of them took seats in the jury box, filling it up. The Government was represented by District Attorney Bangs, and his assistant, Mr. Burke, and by Messrs. Ayer and Boutelle, of the special counsel. Of the counsel for the defendants, there were present Messrs. Storrs, Stanford, Lawrence, Jussen, Dow and Leffingwell.

There was a deep hush as Judge Blodgett entered the court-room, at ten minutes past 10, with the United States Statutes under his arm. The court was called to order immediately, and Judge Blodgett first decided the motion for a new trial in the Cullerton case.

The court said: No. 217—United States vs. Cullerton. The motion for a new trial and an arrest of judgment is entered in this case. The defendant was indicted under eight counts. Some charged him with conspiracy; others with negligence; others with designedly allowing fraud. The jury found him guilty on the second charge only. The motion for a new trial said that the proof did not show any intentional violation on the part of the defendant. This is the gist of the motion. The main charge was that of allowing the wine-room to be opened when the gauger was not there. The counsel laid too much stress upon the testimony of the defendant, and Hinckly, Miller and Burroughs. I can't concur in the statement that it relies upon their testimony alone. I think the testimony did warrant the finding of a verdict of guilty for negligence.

As to the motion for the arrest of judgment, the counsel based their argument upon the fact that the indictment was ambiguous and the verdict equally so. I think it was sufficient to charge that the defendant, being a Government officer, did negligently permit the government to be defrauded, under the meaning of the statute. The offense is laid with sufficient definiteness. It has been in accordance with a previous decision of this court where an arrest of judgment is asked, as in this case, to require an exception to be taken before the trial. The court would have allowed the indictment to be quashed, or allowed a bill of particulars to have been filed before the trial. But as he pleaded not guilty, went to trial and never asked for these, it seems to me that the indictment should stand. I have come to the conclusion that both the motion in arrest and for a new trial should be overruled. I shall not sentence the prisoner to-day.

PASSING SENTENCE.

The court then said he would proceed to pass sentence on such of the defendants as were called up last Monday. He would first dispose of the case of Anthony C. Hesing. Mr. Hesing here arose and stood up in front of the bar. The court said: Mr. Hesing, I have heard your counsel at length in mitigation of punishment in your case. Have you anything further to say yourself why sentence should not be pronounced?

Mr. Hesing paused for a moment, and then, very much flushed, and with considerable apparent effort, he addressed the court. He spoke substantially as follows:

MR. HESING'S REMARKS.

I simply wish to state, Your Honor, and would state the same if I were called now to the day of judgment, that while I have technically erred, I have never been guilty of any criminality. I have taken no oath of office; I have not corrupted anybody, seduced anybody, have not participated in any frauds or had anything to do with any frauds. I was only a stockholder in a distillery, but had nothing to do with the running of it. That was done by others, and so help me God (with great vehemence), I never had one word of conversation with these gentlemen on the subject of frauds.

I asked you, as my counsel has, to be as lenient with me as you possibly can. I helped ferret out frauds in 1868. Twice I might have had the Collectorship from President Grant, and twice it was refused. Not a dishonest dollar has ever stuck to my fingers. It was only when misfortune overtook me that I ever became interested in a distillery at all. Mr. Hesing then went over some of the events in his life, laying particular stress on his financial misfortunes. He also said that if others were to receive immunity for furnishing testimony and information, he wished to state a fact that had not come out in any of the trials. Before he was indicted at all, he went to J. R. Jones and gave him information against a dishonest Deputy Collector. Had his words been heeded, or had Mr. Jones been listened to, the deputy collector would have been taken and punished. But he was not listened to; the deputy collector referred to was allowed to act for months after that, and is now beyond the reach of the law, in Canada."

Mr. Hesing concluded in these words: "This is all I have to say. I beg of Your Honor that you will treat me as leniently as your conscience will permit."

Judge Blodgett said the defendant had pleaded guilty to two counts, which he went on to specify. The conspiracy count subjects the offender to a penalty of a fine not to exceed $10,000 and imprisonment not to exceed two years. The court then said he did not desire to add any unnecessary words. The evidence satisfied his mind that Mr. Hesing was one of the original conspirators, banded together in this city for the purpose of defrauding the revenues. He regarded it as of little consequence which of the conspirators seduced the others. They all acted together in this scheme of corruption, which included the wholesale corruption of the public officers and the public service, for which the court was ready to say almost that he could not see the slightest excuse. In regard to the distillers who had families to support, and were drawn into the conspiracy, he could see some excuse, but not so as to those who had originally formed the scheme. In fixing the sentence he had been as lenient as he possibly could. The sentence of the court was here pronounced, which was that Mr. Hesing pay a fine of $5,000, and be imprisoned in the County Jail of Cook county for a term of two years.

When these words were pronounced, Mr. Hesing flushed deeper than before; his eyes turned to the floor, and he stood without moving, until directed by the court to resume his seat. He had evidently not expected so long a term of imprisonment, and the thought of being shut up among common criminals for two years was a terrible one to his proud spirit.

George T. Burroughs was next called. He stood up, and the court said:

George T. Burroughs, you have pleaded guilty to the third and sixth counts in the indictment. Have you anything to say in addition to what your counsel have said?

Burroughs—No, sir.

Court—The evidence has shown that you were one of the chief conspirators. Your sentence is a fine of $3,000 and imprisonment for one year in the county jail.

O. B. Dickinson and Jonathan Abel were next called. They had nothing to say why sentence should not be pronounced. The court said: Your sentence is a fine of $1,000 each and imprisonment of three months in the county jail. The fine is the lightest in the power of the court. The imprisonment might be less, but I think this much is warranted.

Simon Powell was the next one called. He had nothing to say, and was sentenced to pay a fine of $3,000, and imprisonment in the county jail for a term of six months.

Henry B. Miller was called next. In answer to the question of the court whether he had anything to say, he said he thought, in justification of himself, he might add a little to what his counsel had said. The gaugers at his distillery, when the crookedness commenced, were Herman Becker and Adolph Mueller. They had both testified on the stand that they were engaged in crooked business before that time. While he did not wish to shirk any responsibility, he would submit that they corrupted him instead of his corrupting them. He then mentioned his efforts, in conjunction with others, to have the frauds stopped. But they were not listened to. All distillers would have preferred to remain honest, but as they could not, he thought that ninety-nine men out of every hundred would have done as they did. He closed by saying that he should have to take whatever the court gave him. He was sentenced to pay a fine of $3,000, and imprisonment for six months in the county jail.

Frederick L. Reid had nothing to say. The District Attorney had said that in this case, considering the circumstances, he would be satisfied with a light punishment. The sentence of the court was that he pay a fine of $1,000 and be imprisoned in the county jail for one day.

Herman J. Pahlman and D. G. Rush were called. The court said: "Have you anything to add to what your attorney said in mitigation of punishment?"

P. and R.—"We have not."

The court said that they had been found guilty by the jury on five counts. He did not feel it his duty to go to the full extent of the law. The sentence is a fine of $1.000 each, and imprisonment in the county jail for three months.

William Cooper was requested to stand up. The court said that the District Attorney had added his recommendation to the statements of defendant's counsel in favor of a light punishment. His sentence was a fine of $200 and imprisonment for three months.

James H. Hildreth was next called by Judge Blodgett, but he did not respond. It became evident at that moment that the report of his flight was true.

Judge Lawrence, however, rose and said his law-firm was called on by Mr. Hildreth, a week ago to-day, and asked to make statements in his behalf on Monday. Judge Lawrence accordingly appeared at the time and did. He also sent a note to his house, yesterday, giving him notice to appear for sentence to-day. The inference is that he has escaped. Had the speaker known that he had any such intention he would not have appeared for him Monday. Judge Lawrence hoped it was not necessary to say that neither he nor any of Hildreth's counsel advised this escape, or had any knowledge of it. The defendant had acted entirely without their advice or knowledge. He would consider it gross misconduct for counsel to advise or connive at anything of the kind.

The court said that no such imputation rested on Judge Lawrence, or on any of Mr. Hildreth's counsel.

Judge Bangs wanted Mr. Hildreth called, and his bail defaulted. His bondsman was Frank W. Warren, and the bail $5,000. It was declared forfeited and a scire facias ordered to issue against Mr. Warren.

Ben P. Hutchins and David Cochrane were next called before the bar of the court. In mitigation of punishment they had nothing to say. They had plead guilty to the conspiracy count in the indictment. The sentence was a fine of $1,000 each, and an imprisonment in the county jail of three months.

IN CUSTODY.

This completed the number to be sentenced this morning, and the court directed Marshal Campbell to take the prisoners in custody and convey them to jail.

Colonel Jussen applied for a suspension of sentence until application for pardon could be made. He thought twenty days would be sufficient. He did not wish to take up any time in making the application.

The court said they had had ample opportunity. For months their case had been before the court. Moreover, there was no reasonable ground for hope of pardon. They had pleaded guilty. He was obliged to refuse the application.

Mr. Storrs suggested that there might be good reason for a suspension until Monday morning. The defendants might desire to visit their friends. There is no such thing as run in them. They are men advanced in years, and have families. He thought these might be reasons why the court would give them Sunday.

The court said that these men were brought up last Monday for sentence, and had had all the time since then to prepare. They all knew, and their counsel knew, that they must be imprisoned. He had given them all the time since Monday, and could give them no more. He again directed the Marshal to take them in custody. The defendants were requested by the Marshal to remain in their seats until the crowd got out of the court room.

THE USE OF EXTRINSIC EVIDENCE TO SUPPLEMENT OR CONTROL DOCUMENTS OF TITLE.

3. LATENT AMBIGUITIES.

Falsa demonstratio non nocet is a maxim which still embodies the rule of the courts. In Bernasconi v. Atkinson, 10 Hare, 345, Lord Chancellor Hatherley, then Vice-Chancellor Wood, held that George Vincent Bernasconi, the son of a deceased uncle of the testator, named Joseph, took, on the ground that the testator was mistaken in description rather than in the name of the legatee, and also upon evidence that George Vincent Bernasconi frequently visited and dined with the testator, who usually called him Vincent. In Adams v. Jones, 9 Hare, 485, the bequest was to Clare Hannah Adams, the wife of Thomas Adams. The wife's name was Hannah only, but there was an infant daughter whose name was Clare Hannah. Vice-Chancellor Turner held that the wife took. In Bradshaw v. Bradshaw, Lord Abinger allowed the name to yield to the description. The devise was in terms to Robert Blagrove Bradshaw, the second son of the testator's daughter. Robert Blagrove was the eldest son, but the Chief Baron, holding that the second son was to take, did so, because the will itself, as well as a parol evidence, showed the intention of the testator to provide for him. In Gillett v. Gane, a testator devised certain freehold property to trustees to the use of his son George Gillett for life, and after his decease to the use of Robert Gillett, the fourth son of George Gillett, in fee, in case he should attain twenty-one, but if he should die under that age, to the use of the fifth son, in fee, and if he should die under twenty-one, to the first son coming after the fifth who should attain twenty-one. Robert H. Gillett was the third, and John William Gillett was the fourth son of George Gillett, who had seven sons. Vice-Chancellor Malins considered that there were reasons apparent from the evidence why the testator passed over the first and second sons, but not for passing over the third, and he held that the name must prevail over the description, citing the maxim, Veritas no minis tollit errorem descriptionis, L. Rep., 10 Eq. 29; 22 L. T. Rep. N. S., 58.

In Farrer v. St. Catharine's College, Cambridge, L. Rep., 10 Eq. Cas., 19; 28 L. T. Rep. N. S., 801, a testator by his will gave legacies of £25 each to the Rev. J. B., the Rev. N. L., and the Rev. J. D. C. W., described as curates of Holy Trinity church, Brompton. At the date of the will and the death of the testator there had been no curate of that church of the name of W. Lord Chancellor Selborne held that it was a case of falsa demonstratio, that extrinsic evidence was not admissible, and that W. was entitled; and as to the admission of evidence approved of Drake v. Drake, 8 L. C., 172.

In Wells v. Wells, L. Rep., 18 Eq., 504, the Master of the Rolls held that in Grant v. Grant the Exchequer Chamber only decided that the primary meaning of the word nephew included not only the child of the testator's own brother, but also the child of his wife's brother. That, he thought, was a question not of law, but of the English language; the ordinary meaning of the words nephews and nieces is a man's own nephews and nieces, that is, by consanguinity, and not by affinity. Sir George Jessel did not discuss the question of extrinsic evidence, or consider the circumstances of Grant v. Grant. He concluded that as in Blower's Trusts Lord Justice Mellish observed, "the words nephews and neices prima facie mean the children of brothers and sisters," and as the same learned judge took the same view in Sherratt v. Mountfort, L. Rep., 8 ch., 928, they must, in the case before him, have their primary sense unless there was something in the context to give them a different meaning. He even went further, and considered that you cannot import the secondary meaning of the word into the residuary gift merely because it has been used in the former part of the will, citing as an authority the case of Smith v. Lidiard. With all respect to the learned Master of the Rolls, we are bound to say that we think he attributes to testators a more scholarly use of the English language than they exhibit. "Bigne faciendæ sunt interpretationes, propter simplicitatem laicorum ut res magis valeat quam pereat; et verba intentioni nom e contra debent inservire:" Co. Litt., 36a.

A testator appointed as his executor his son Forster Charter. He had no son of that name, but he had two sons named William Foster Charter and Charles Charter. Lord Penzance was of opinion that if a man be christened by several names they constitute in law but one christian name, and anyone of them, the rest being omitted, is not the full legal name of the individual. He did not deny that a bequest to a man by his first christian name, or by any one of them by which he was familiarly known, or even commonly called by the testator, would be good. But the present case being one in which the name used was neither the legal christian name nor the first name, nor a name by which the man was ever called, there was such an ambiguity as to admit parol evidence in its explanation. After considering the circumstances under which the testator wrote the will, the position of the parties about him, and the contents of the will itself, the court decreed probate to Charles Charter. Charter v. Charter, 25 L. T. Rep. N. S., 575.

A testator appointed his nephew to be executor of his will. At the date of the will there was living a son of the brother of the testator of that name, with whom he was not on terms of intimacy. The nephew of the testator's wife was also of the same name, had lived with him for many years, and had latterly managed his business. Lord Penzance held that where a word is used in a will as part of the description of a person specified by name, and is applicable to persons so named in an ordinary and popular sense as well as in a strict and primary sense, an ambiguity is raised, and the court may receive evidence of the circumstances in which the testator was placed when he executed his will, and of the sense in which he was accustomed to use the word in order to ascertain the person indicated. Grant v. Grant, L. Rep. 2 P. & M., 8; 21 L. T. Rep. N. S., 645.

In Millard v. Bailey, L. Rep. 1 Eq Cas., 378; 35 L. J., 312, Ch., a testatrix bequeathed thirty-three shares in the Epsom and Ewell Gas company amongst her four children, and the remaining shares to her godchild. She had thirty-seven original paid-up shares, in respect of which thirty-seven bonus shares had been allotted. The children claimed double shares, and gave evidence of a conversation in which the testatrix said that her husband treated them as such, and that she continued to do so. Lord Chancellor Hatherley, then Vice Chancellor Wood, was of opinion that the authorities show that in particular counties there may be particular denominations used for measure of land or other things of universal application in the district, and that parol evidence is admissible for the purpose of explaining the custom of the district, or of the usage of the particular class of persons to whom the testator belonged. But he held that these new shares appearing on the register in different numbers from the original shares, and one at least of the holders having dealt with them separately from the original shares, no evidence was admissible to show that the shares were treated by all holders as double shares. The particular expressions attributable to the testatrix could not prevail, not being the general language universally applicable to the particular subject matter.

In Re Sayers' Trusts, L. Rep., 6 Eq. Ca., 319; 18 L. T. Rep. N. S., 787, the testator made a bequest to a married woman for life, with remainder to her children for life, with remainder to the grandchildren. The gift to the children would be void for remoteness if the class of children was to include other than those living at the death of the testator. Evidence was therefore offered that the married woman was then past child bearing. Vice-Chancellor Malins refused to admit it, saying, to do so would be attended with the utmost danger, because a lawyer, on looking at the instrument, could say whether the gift was good or void for remoteness, whereas if parol evidence were admitted an inquiry would be necessary in every case into the position of beneficiaries named in it.

4. THE ACQUISITION OF LANDS AFTER THE DATE OF THE WILL.

Statute 1 Vict. c. 26, s. 24, enacts that every will shall be construed with reference to the real and personal estates comprised in it, to speak and take effect as if it had been executed immediately before the death of the testator, unless a contrary intention shall appear by the will.

A preliminary question to the use of parol evidence is whether there is a contrary intention or not. In Doe v. Walker, 12 M. & W., 591, parol evidence was used, notwithstanding the testator spoke in his will of "the lands which I have."

In Cole v. Scott, 1 Man. & G., 518, Lord Chancellor Cottenham held that the use of the adverb "now," in the expression "lands which I now have," showed the intention of excluding from the devise after acquired lands, and therefore the evidence was not admissible. In Lord Lifford v. Powys Keck, L. Rep. 1 Eq., 347, the testator gave all his freehold estate of or to which he was seized or entitled, and gave the copyhold estate which he was, or at the time of his death should be possessed of or entitled to. The Master of the Rolls, Lord Romilly, gave no sanction to the argument that the testator had, with reference to the copyholds, but not with reference to the freeholds, pointed to the acquisition of other property. This he considered did not show a contrary intention of the testator; but effect was to be given to the broad intention of the legislature, and that a gift of all his freehold estate should pass all he had at the date of the will, as well as all he acquired afterwards, 30 Bea., 300. Vice Chancellor Knight Bruce, with some degree of wit, 2 De G. & Sm., 793, put the question, "Suppose a man to have a brown horse, and bequeath it and then to sell it and buy another brown horse, and die, does the horse of which he was possessed at the time of his death pass." In Castle v. Fox, L. Rep. 11 Eq. Cas., 542; 24 L. T. Rep. N. S., 536, Vice-Chancellor Malins made use of the illustration, and replied, "Yes. Unless other words describe the brown horse, all the judge is at liberty to ask is, Had he a brown horse when he died?" A brown horse is given, it is to that the description is applied, and it is perfectly immaterial that he had another brown horse when he made the will. The same learned judge remarked that whether it be a particular description, or whether it be a general description, if a testator gives property by a particular name, the question is not what was known by that name when he made his will, but what was known by that name, and treated by him as coming under that description at any time during his life, and, therefore, evidence as to his treatment of the property, and what he called the particular estate after the date of his will, is just as legitimate evidence as evidence of what he did before the date of his will, because the words of the statute are that the will is to be read as speaking immediately before the death of the testator, unless a contrary intention appears.

In Lady Langdale v Briggs, 8 De G. M. & G., 391, Lords Justices Knight Bruce and Turner held that where a testator, after the date of his will became entitled to the personal estate of a deceased sister, as one of the next of kin, leaseholds forming part of the sister's general estate, passed under a bequest of the testator's leasehold property, though it might be specific, the will speaking from death by virtue of sect. 24 of the Act.

5. MISTAKE.

Hall v. Cazenove, 4 East, 476, is an authority for the admission of extrinsic evidence to show that a charter-party was wrongly dated; so is Jayne v. Hughes, 10 Ex., 430, where it is sought to rebut the date of a deed; so is Randfield v. Randfield, H. L. 6 Jur. N. S., 901, to correct the date of a will, even where the correction brought the will within the new law of the Wills Act. Randfield v. Randfield was followed by Sir J. P. Wilde in Reffell v. Reffell, 12 Jur. N. S. 910; L. Rep. 1 P. & D, 139 He was of opinion that where the question is not as to the factum of the document, or as to the time of its execution, but as to the meaning of the language used, then the doctrine of latent and patent ambiguities is, as it always has been, applicable.

If some plain and palpable error has crept into any written document equity formerly, and the courts of law now, sanction the admission of evidence to expose the error: Wake v. Harrop, 6 H. & N., 768; Story, p. 772.

6. REVOCATION—DEPENDENT RELATIVE REVOCATION.

As early as 1754, Sir George Lee laid down the law in Helyar v. Helyar, 1 Phil Rep., 472 that if a will was last seen in the testator's custody, and a diligent search has failed to discover it, a presumption, though not a conclusive one, arises that he destroyed it animo revocandi. Lord Wensleydale, in Phillips v. Phillips, 1 Moo. P. C., 299, affirmed the rule, as also did Dr. Lushington, in Cutts v. Gilbert, 9 Moo. P. C., 131. Accordingly, in Brown v. Brown, 8 Q. B., 876, where A executed a will, and afterwards executed a second will, which he took away with him, and on his death the earlier was found, but the second was not, and the solicitor from recollection deposed that the second revoked the first, the Court of Queen's Bench, Chief Justice Campbell, and Justices Coleridge, Wightman, and Crompton, held that the evidence of revocation was conclusive. In Lord St. Leonard's case, the Court of Appeal held that on the loss of a will traced to the testator's custody, there arose a presumption that it had been revoked; but that such presumption was not de jure, and might be rebutted by parol evidence.

As the acts by which a testator may physically destroy or mutilate a testamentary instrument may be the result of accident or of a single intention, or of various intentions, they are equivocal in their nature. It is, therefore, necessary in each case to study the act done by the light of the circumstances under which it occurred, and the declarations of the testator with which it may have been accompanied. For unless it be done animo revocandi, it is no revocation. In such cases parol evidence is admissible. "What then," asked Sir J. P. Wilde, in Powell v. Powell, 14 L. T. Rep. N. S., 800; L. Rep. 1 P. & D., 209, "if the act of destruction be done with the sole intention of setting up and establishing some other testamentary paper for which the destruction of the paper in question was only designed to make way?" It is clear that in such cases the animus revocandi had only a conditional existence, the condition being the validity of the paper intended to be substituted. In accordance with this principle, where a testator had executed a will in 1864, revoking all former wills, and in 1865 destroyed this will, at the same time expressing a wish to substitute for it a will which he held in his hand. Sir J. P. Wilde held that, inasmuch as the statute 1 Vict. c. 26 prevented the revival of the will prior, this physical destruction of the instrument of 1864 did not prevent its testamentary dispositions being admitted to probate.

Though an equivocal act of physical destruction may be controlled by evidence of the intention with which it was done, so that a will so destroyed may not lose its effect, yet such a condition has never been engrafted on the physical destruction of another written instrument; for example, a revoking codicil or will qualifying and making a prior one of no effect if it should fail in law to carry out the intention of the parties: Newton v. Newton, 12 Ir. Ch. Rep., 118. In Wood v. Wood, L. Rep. 1 P. & M., 309: 15 L. T. Rep. N. S., 593, Lord Penzance admitted parol evidence of the contents of a later will. The former will was found after the testator's death, but not the later, in which it was asserted that there was a clause of revocation. On proof by parol of the execution, of the existence of the clause at that time, of the testator's keeping the will in his custody until death; that it could not then be found, and that he had declared an intention to destroy it, the court pronounced for an intestacy, the Judge expressing his approval of Brown v. Brown.

SUPREME COURT OF NEBRASKA.

BOWKER, KENNARD and WHEELER v. G. W. COLLINS.

HOMESTEAD.—After a judgment has been recovered against him, a debtor cannot prevent the enforcement of the lien thereby created on his real estate, by moving thereon and occupying it as a homestead.

Error from Pawnee County.

Opinion by MAXWELL, J.

On the fifteenth day of April, 1874, Boker, Kennard & Wheeler recovered a judgment in the District Court of Pawnee county against G. W. Collins and W. H. B. Strout, for the sum of $718.12 and costs of suit. Collins at that time was the owner of the undivided half of the northeastern quarter of section 17, township 1, north of range 11, east, in Pawnee county, which appears to have been unoccupied; on or about the 16th day of October, 1874, defendant, Collins, removed with his family on to the land in question, and has ever since resided thereon. On the eighth day of February, 1875, an execution was issued out of the District Court of Pawnee county, on the judgment heretofore mentioned, and was levied on the interest of Collins in the above described land; on the thirteenth day of February, 1874, the defendant, Collins, served a notice on the sheriff that he claimed the land above described as a homestead; the land was sold to W. H. B Strout. Afterwards, on motion of Collins, the sale was set aside, on the ground that the land in question was exempt from sale, under the homestead law, to which the plaintiff excepted, and now brings the case into this court, by petition in error. "The statute makes it a material condition to the exemption of the property, that it is owned and occupied by a resident of this State. The word 'homestead' means a place of residence, which again implies occupancy, possession." Upham v. Bank, 15 Wis., 453.

"If the property is not a homestead when the judgment is obtained, it is a lien upon it.

"The property not being a homestead, in other words not being exempt, when the judgment is obtained, the judgment creditor has a right to levy upon it, to the exclusion of other adverse interests, subsequent to the judgment; and when the levy is made, the title of the creditor relates back to the judgment, so as to cut off intermediate incumbrances." Ib. 452.

In Fogg v. Fogg, 40 N. H., 285, the plaintiff had no other real estate, the buildings were erected by him for the purpose of being occupied as his family home, and just completed, and ready for his family, and he had commenced moving in before the attachment, and had got in a substantial part of the furniture, and intended to finish that day, and would have done so, but for the attachment. Under these circumstances, the plaintiff was considered as being in possession at the time of the levy of the attachment.

It is clearly shown that the lien of the judgment had attached to the lands in question, at the time Collins entered thereon for the purpose of claiming the same as a homestead; does the right of homestead attach in such a case so as to defeat the lien of the judgment? We think not. The law evidently requires that the lands to be selected as a homestead shall be actually used for that purpose, at the time the judgment is recovered. The homestead law being remedial in its character, should receive the most liberal construction consistent with justice, for the purpose of preserving a home to the unfortunate. But it must not be forgotten that the payment of just obligations is the foundation on which rests our industrial and commercial prosperity. And the design of the homestead law is not to enable those claiming its benefits to evade the payment of debts justly due, but to prevent the household being broken up and destroyed; and to leave under the control of the debtor the means by which he may, by economy, retrieve his fortune, and be enabled, in time, to meet his obligations.

But lands not occupied for homestead purposes at the time judgment was recovered, it is reasonable to suppose were used as a means of obtaining credit; their occupation at that time was not considered necessary for the purpose of preserving a home for the family, and a party cannot be permitted to defeat the payments of just debts, by afterwards removing thereon and asserting a claim of homestead. To sanction such doctrine under the pretext of liberality of construction of the homestead law, opens the door to gross abuse and fraud, and offers a premium to dishonesty, while but few of those for whom the homestead law was designed would be benefited thereby.

The judgment of the District Court is therefore reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings.

Cutting v. Jackson.—p. 253.

FRAUDULENT SALES—RETAINING POSSESSION AY VENDOR.

S, being indebted to C and D, sold to them certain cattle and hay for $90, who endorsed the amount upon a note held by them against S. The sale was made in the presence of a witness. The cattle and hay were left in the possession of S to feed the hay to the cattle, also to his own cow at his own expense; and it was agreed that the manure made by the cattle should become the property of S. The creditors of S attached the cattle and hay as the property of S, and C and D replevied them. Upon the trial, these facts appearing, it was ruled that the sale was void as to creditors, and that the facts furnished no sufficient explanation of the retaining the possession of the propertyb y S; and a verdict was ordered for the defendant. Held, that the ruling was correct.

When the possession of chattels is retained by the vendor after an absolute sale, it is no sufficient explanation to show that the sale was made in the presence of a witness, where it was not attended with such publicity as would naturally give notoriety to the transaction, and when there was no change in the possession or use of the chattels to indicate that any change in the ownership had taken place.

Currier v. Lebanon Slate Co.—p. 262.

CORPORATIONS—PURCHASING IN OF SHARES—REDUCTION OF CAPITAL.

An insolvent corporation cannot purchase in a portion of its capital stock. Such a transaction would be in conflict with Gen. Stats., ch. 135, sec. 3. A corporation, whose capital stock as fixed and limited has not been fully paid in, cannot relieve a delinquent stockholder from payment of assessments upon his stock by a purchase of the same, especially against the objection of another stockholder.

A corporation cannot reduce its capital stock, under the provisions of ch. 134, sec. 6, Gen. Stats., by purchasing the shares of any stockholder. In order that such reduction may operate justly to all the stockholders, each stockholder should be allowed to surrender such proportion of his stock as the amount of the proposed reduction bears to the whole amount of capital stock.

NINETY-NINE YEAR LEASES IN MARYLAND—RENEWAL OF INJUNCTION.—One of our Baltimore exchanges of the 23d instant, says the court of Appeals of that State has just rendered an important decision regarding leasehold estates.

In this city a very large number of the most valuable lots and improvements are held by leasehold tenants for the term of ninety-nine years, renewable at the request of the lessee. Some of these leases have recently expired, and in cases where no application was made for renewal, suits have been instituted to recover possession of the property. In the case just decided, lease was made of a lot containing one quarter acre on Fells Point, Baltimore, at a yearly rent of two pounds ten shillings, sterling money, for ninety-nine years, renewable, if request was made at any time within the said period of ninety-nine years. The original term expired on the 18th of January, 1871. In the meantime the reversion of the fee, as also the leasehold interest, become vested in purchasers not parties to the original lease. At its expiration the lease was not renewed. In May, 1874, the owner of the fee brought ejectment to recover the property, and on October 24, 1874, the owner of the leasehold interest filled a bill in the Circuit Court for a renewal of the lease and injunction to restrain the ejectment. It thus appears the bill was filed a little more than three years and nine months after the expiration of the original term, and about five months after the action of ejectment. The case was submitted on bill and answer, and the Circuit Court passed a decree directing the defendant, upon the complainants paying the renewal fine of two pounds ten shillings, sterling, with all arrearages of rent due under the lease up to the time of such payment, and costs, to execute a new lease of ninety-nine years, commencing at the end of the original term of the lease at the same rates. The Court says it is of opinion that our courts of equity ought to grant the relief asked for, and compel a renewal on the equitable conditions stated in the decree before it.

The court of Appeals affirms the decree of the Circuit court. The possession of millions of dollars worth of property in this city is quieted by the decision.

REHM'S CASE.—On yesterday Rehm was brought up before Judge Blodgett for sentence. The statements of counsel heard as to the promises which were made him by the government attorneys if he would go on the stand and testify truthfully to what he knew of the whisky frauds, and the Judge after hearing the arguments of counsel upon the law relating to the case, and the amount of punishment that should be inflicted on Rehm, took the case under adviseiment for a few days.

UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT.

No. 60.—OCTOBER TERM, 1875.

JOHN H. KENNARD, Plaintiff in Error,
v.
THE STATE OF LOUISIANA ex rel. PHILIP HICKEY MORGAN.

In Error to the Supreme Court of the State of Louisiana.

CONTEST FOR THE OFFICE OF JUDGE—DUE PROCESS OF LAW.

Held, That the State of Louisiana, acting under the statute of January 13, 1873, through her judiciary, did not deprive Kennard of his office of Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the State, without due process of law.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.

Mr. Chief Justice WAITE delivered the opinion of the court.

The sole question presented for our consideration in this case, as stated by the counsel for the plaintiff in error, is whether the State of Louisiana, acting under the statute of January 13, 1873, through her judiciary, has deprived Kennard of his office without due process of law. It is substantially admitted by counsel in the argument that such is not the case, if it has been done "in the due process of legal proceedings, according to those rules and forms which have been established for the protection of private rights." We accept this as a sufficient definition of the term "due process of law" for the purposes of the present case. The question before us is not whether the courts below having jurisdiction of the case and the parties, have followed the law, but whether the law, if followed, would have furnished Kennard the protection guaranteed by the Constitution. Irregularities and mere errors in the proceedings can only be corrected in the State courts. Our authority does not extend beyond an examination of the power of the courts below to proceed at all.

This makes it necessary for us to examine the law under which the proceedings were had, and determine its effect. It was entitled, "An act to regulate proceedings in contestations between persons claiming a judicial office." Section one provided that "in any case in which a person may have been appointed to the office of judge of any court in this State, and shall have been confirmed by the Senate and commissioned thereto, * * * such commission shall be prima facie proof of the right of such person to immediately hold and exercise such office."

It will thus be seen that the act relates specially to the judges of the courts of the State, and to the internal regulations of a State in respect to its own officers.

The second section then provides "that if any person, being an incumbent of such office, shall refuse to vacate the same and turn the same over to the person so commissioned, such person so commissioned shall have the right to proceed by rule before the court of competent jurisdiction, to have himself declared to be entitled to such office, and to be inducted therein. Such rule shall be taken contradictorily with such incumbent, and shall be made returnable within twenty-four hours, and shall be tried immediately without jury, and by preference over all matter or causes depending in such court, * * * and the judgment thereon shall be signed the same day of rendition."

There is here no provision for a technical "citation," so called, but there is in effect provision for a rule upon the incumbent to show cause why he refuses to surrender his office, and for service of this rule upon him. The incumbent was, therefore, to be formally called upon by a court of competent jurisdiction to give information to it, in an adversary proceeding against him, of the authority by which he assumed to perform the duties of one of the important offices of the State. He was to be told when and where he must make his answer. The law made it the duty of the court to require this return to be made within twenty-four hours, and it placed the burden of proof upon him. But it required that he should be called upon to present his case before the court could proceed to judgment. He had an opportunity to be heard before he could be condemned. This was "process," and, when served, it was sufficient to bring the incumbent into court and to place him within its jurisdiction. In this case, it is evident from the record that the rule was made, and that it was in some form brought to the attention of Kennard, for on the return day he appeared. At first, instead of showing cause why he refused to vacate his office, he objected that he had not been properly cited to appear, but the court adjudged otherwise.

He then made known his title to the office; in other words, he showed why he refused to vacate. This was, in effect, that he had been commissioned to hold the office till the end of the next session of the Senate, and that time had not arrived. Upon this he asked a trial by jury. This the court refused, and properly, because the law under which the proceedings were had, provided in terms that there should be no such trial. He then went to trial. No delays were asked except such as were granted. Judgment was speedily rendered, but ample time and opportunity were given for deliberation. Due process of law does not necessarily imply delay, and it is certainly no improper interference with the rights of the parties to give such cases as this precedence over the other business in the courts.

The next section provides for an appeal. True, it must be taken within one day after the rendition of the judgment, and is made returnable to the Supreme Court within two days. The proceeding on appeal was given preference over all other business in the appellate court, and the judgment upon the appeal was made final after the expiration of one day. Kennard availed himself of this right. He took his appeal and was heard. The court considered the case and gave its judgment.

From this it appears that ample provision has been made for the trial of the contestation before a court of competent jurisdiction — for bringing the party against whom the proceeding is had before the court and notifying him of the case he is required to meet—for giving him an opportunity to be heard in his defense—for the deliberation and judgment of the court—for an appeal from this judgment to the highest court of the State and for hearing and judgment there. A mere statement of the facts carries with it a complete answer to all the constitutional objections urged against the validity of the act. The remedy provided was certainly speedy, but it could only be enforced by means of orderly proceedings in a court of competent jurisdiction in accordance with rules and forms established for the protection of the rights of the parties. In this particular case, the party complaining not only had the right to be heard, but he was in fact heard both in the court in which the proceedings were originally instituted, and, upon his appeal, in the highest court of the State.

The judgment is affirmed.

U. S. CIRCUIT COURT, N. D. OF ILLINIOS.

OPINION JUNE 30, 1876.

SEYMOUR et al. v. THE PHILLIPS & COLBY CONSTRUCTION CO. et al.

THE RIGHT TO SUE IN THE UNITED STATES COURT ON A SUPERSEDEAS BOND, IRRESPECTIVE OF THE CITIZENSHIP OF THE PARTIES.

Held, Where a suit had been commenced in the Circuit Court of the United States, judgment entered against the defendants, and a writ of error had been sued out to the Supreme Court of the United States, and a supersedeas bond given, and the writ of error dismissed, that a suit could be maintained in the Circuit Court of the United States where the original suit was commenced, on the supersedeas bond, independent of the citizenship of the parties.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.

Opinion by DRUMMOND, J.

The facts of the case are substantially these: The plaintiffs recovered a judgment in this court against the Phillips & Colby Construction Company, in July, 1873, and thereupon the defendants in that case, sued out a writ of error to the Supreme Court of the United States, and gave a supersedeas bond, to which the defendants in this case are parties, as obligors. The writ of error having been dismissed, and the judgment of this court affirmed, a suit was brought upon the bond given, to which a plea in abatement is put in, alleging that all the plaintiffs and all the defendants are citizens of this State, and that this court, therefore, has no jurisdiction of the case; and the question is, whether, in consequence merely of the suit being upon a bond given under the circumstances mentioned, this court has jurisdiction of the case, independent of the citizenship of the parties; and I am inclined to think that it has.

I would state that, in giving this opinion at this time, I do not desire to foreclose any of the rights of the defendants. If, as the result of my opinion, there shall be a finding against them upon the demurrer, there may be a motion made in arrest of judgment, and they may take the opinion of the Justice of the Supreme Court for this Circuit, upon the question; and if they should plead to the merits, and an issue shall be found against them before the court or a jury, in that case also, a motion may be made in arrest of judgment, and the opinion of Judge Davis taken upon the question.

So far as I have been able to investigate the subject, I am of opinion that this court has jurisdiction on account of the nature of the controversy. I leave out of view one very strong aspect of the case, which was presented by the counsel for the plaintiffs, namely: that growing out of the fact that this may, in one sense, be said to be an incident of the original suit — something inseparably connected with it, and that owing to that circumstance alone, independently of the nature of the controversy, the court might have jurisdiction precisely as it would of a bill filed (connected with a judgment at law), on the equity side of the court of which, as is well known, the court has jurisdiction, irrespective of the citizenship of the parties. Waiving that view of the case, at present I think the nature of the controversy is such as to give the court jurisdiction.

Section 1,000 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, which re enacts a provision of the act of 1789, declares that when a judge signs a citation on any writ of error, "he shall take good and sufficient security that the plaintiff in error or the "appellant shall prosecute his writ to "effect, and if he fail to make his plea "good, shall answer all damages and "costs where a writ is a supersedeas, "and stays execution; of all costs only "where it is not a supersedeas, as afore-"said." This does not prescribe the particular form of the security. In practice, the security has uniformly been under this statute a bond given by the party in the usual form, and because it is such a bond, the defendants contend that the obligations growing out of the bond are of a common law character, and really give rise to no question under the laws of the United States. But it is clear that in one sense the obligation must be determined by the law of the United States, namely, this statute—"If he fail to make his plea good he shall answer all damages and costs." Now what are those damages and costs, must be determined by a construction to be given to this statute, because it is this statute which constitutes the measure of damages, and is the law governing the rights of the parties. Section 1007 of the Revised Statutes is substantially the same as the act of 1789 amended by the act of the 18th of February, 1875, after the passage of the law authorizing an extension of time to sixty days, to give the bond. What is the law upon the subject, can be further ascertained by referring to rule No. 29, adopted by the Supreme court of the United States. A rule established by the Supreme court of the United States in pursuance of law, becomes, to all intents and purposes, of the same effect as the law itself, and where the court prescribes a rule as to the kind of indemnity that shall be given, then it becomes a rule under the law, and substantially a law of the United States. Now this was a supersedeas bond, and the rule is this: "Supersedeas bonds in the Circuit courts must be taken with good and sufficient security, that the plaintiff in error or appellant shall prosecute his writ or appeal to effect, and answer all damages and costs if he fail to make his plea good. Such indemnity, where the judgment or decree is for the recovery of money not otherwise secured, must be for the whole amount of the judgment or decree, including just damages for delay and costs and interest on the appeal, &c." This is the rule upon the subject, and whatever questions there are, must arise under the law and under this rule. Whenever any question comes up in a controversy between parties upon a bond thus given, what court is to decide it;—what was the intention of the law in relation to the determination of that controversy? Is it not manifest, that if it be true, that a State court may have jurisdiction of the case, it is only concurrent with the jurisdiction of the Federal court, and that the Federal court is peculiarly the tribunal that ought to decide all such questions, because they are questions that arise under the acts of Congress, or under rules of court passed in pursuance of acts of Congress; and is it not also manifest that if a State court took jurisdiction of such a controversy, that it might ultimately, under the law or under the rule, be carried to the Supreme court of the United States? And that position was not seriously controverted in the argument. If that is so, how can the court say, upon the declaration on the bond, that there may not necessarily arise some question which is not a mere common law question, but may become a question under the statutes or under the rule; and must it affirmatively appear before the court can take jurisdiction of the case, that there will be necessarily a question arising under the statutes or under the rule? It was said, and perhaps that constituted the strongest argument on the part of the defense in presenting the demurrer, that it did not follow, because there was a contract made under an act of Congress, or a bond given, that therefore the Federal court could necessarily take jurisdiction of the case. Perhaps that is so. The case of Wilson v. Sandford, 10 Howard, 99, was a case where there was a contract made growing out of a patent right, and the court held, where the question was whether or not the Supreme court of the United States had appellate jurisdiction in the case, that it had not, because it affirmatively appeared that there was no question arising under the patent law; that it was simply a contract made in relation to a patent right, all questions connected with which were to be determined independently of the statute upon the subject of patents.

Now, if it affirmativly appeared in this case that it was so; if, in other words, it did appear that there was no question arising in this case, either under the act of Congress, or under the rule of the court, then it might be brought within this decision; but it is manifest that if the question had been in relation to the validity of the assignment of a patent right, then it would necessarily come within the jurisdiction of the Federal court, because it would be a question arising under an act of Congress covering patent rights, and I apprehend that the Supreme Court in this case, does not intend to intimate that if such a question had come up on the validity of an assignment, as authorized by an act of Congress, that the court would not have had appellate jurisdiction of the case, although the amount in controversy might not have been two thousand dollars—the Supreme Court of the United States having jurisdiction independently of the amount in controversy in patent cases.

The first section of the act of the third of March, 1875, which we have had occasion so often to examine since it was passed, declares that "Circuit courts of "the United States shall have original "cognizance concurrently with the courts "of the several States, of all suits of a "civil nature at common law or in equi-"ty, where the matter in dispute ex-"ceeds, exclusive of costs, the sum or "value of five hundred dollars, and aris-"ing under the constitution or laws of "the United States." Now, is this not a matter in dispute arising under the laws of the United States, as it is presented upon the face of the pleadings? It is an indemnity given in pursuance of a law of the United States; the measure of the liability of the party, and the rights both of the plaintiffs and the defendants, depend upon a law of the United States, and a rule of the Supreme Court of the United States. It is impossible to take a step in the progress of the cause in order to determine the rights of the parties, without looking at the law and the rule as the guide of the court, and controlling its judgment in the determination of the case.

From the best consideration that I have been able to give this case, therefore, I think that the court has jurisdiction. It is a little singular that no case precisely in this form has been reported.

The argument, from inconvenience, is not without weight in determining this question. It is a controversy springing out of a suit already determined in the federal court. It is in one sense an off-shoot of that suit. It would seem, upon principle, that this is the proper forum to settle all controversies growing out of that suit. If it were a question connected with an execution, and a bill had been filed, as already stated, this court would be the proper forum to determine any such controversy. This is a bond growing out of that suit; it would seem that this is the proper forum to settle all controversies connected with the execution of the bond, and the rights of the parties, particularly as to the liabilities of the obligors to the bond, so that, conceding that it may in one sense be considered a new question, I feel inclined, so far as I am concerned, to establish a precedent, that the Federal court is the proper forum to settle the rights of the parties, and the demurrer, therefore, to the plea in abatement will be sustained, reserving, of course, as has been stated previously, the right to the defendants to move in arrest of judgment.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT, D. OF LOUISIANA.

OPINION IN MAY, 1876.

In Bankruptcy—Petition for Rent.

JAMES BUCKNER v. JEWELL and E. F. NORTON, Assignees.

PETITION FOR REVIEW—NEITHER THE BANKRUPT OR THE ASSIGNEE OCCUPY LEASED PREMISES AFTER THE BANKRUPTCY WITHOUT PAYING THE RENT.

Opinion by BRADLEY, J.

The petitioner leased a store, 133 Gravier street, to the bankrupt for five years, commencing October 1, 1871, at an annual rent of $3,200, payable monthly, 266.66; the lessee became bankrupt January 9, 1872, having paid all arrears of rent up to that time.

The assignees were appointed in April, and took possession of the premises, and refused to give up possession to the landlord. They paid him rent, however, from time to time, to the amount of $650. He sues for nine months' rent, which accrued during the occupation by the assignees, less the said payment of $650, the amount demanded being $1,750, besides interest.

He only demands judgment against the assignees for the proceeds of the property of the bankrupt which was in the building, on which he claims he had a lien. For the balance he asks a general judgment, with the privilege of coming in pro rata with the other creditors.

The assignees have filed an answer, and with it an account showing that the proceeds of the estate amounted to $2,492.40, of which $1,500 was from the goods in the leased premises; but they claim credit for the whole amount for the general expenses of the bankruptcy, including their own fees, and claim to have the petition dismissed, including the $650 paid to the landlord.

The position of the assignees is untenable.

A landlord cannot prove against a bankrupt's estate for rent which accrues after the bankruptcy; and neither the bankrupt nor the assignee can claim to occupy the leased premises thereafter without paying the rent in full, unless it has been prepaid by the bankrupt. If they continue to occupy the premises, they are liable personally for the rent, and the landlord has his lien on their goods in the premises, the same as against other tenants. For rent thus accruing after the bankruptcy, the landlord has nothing to do with the expenses of the estate. They are nothing to him. They cannot be deducted from his rent. If an assignee continues to occupy leased premises of the bankrupt, he ought always to make some definite arrangement with the landlord, unless he expects and is willing to pay the accruing rent.

This being the case, the petition for the rent is like any action for rent, and is subject to like rules and proceedings. I think I was mistaken, therefore, in refusing a jury trial in this case.

If the assignees wish it, they may have it, but the petitioner ought, in that case, to be allowed to amend his petition, and claim a judgment for the whole rent due.

If the assignees elect to let the case stand without a jury, the petitioner may have such judgment as he asks, namely, that the assignees be compelled to pay him the proceeds of the goods which were in the leased premises, less the expense of sale, and have a judgment for the balance to come in pro rata with the other creditors.

The assignees must, within ten days, file a written election which course they will pursue.

Messrs. KENNARD, HOWE & PRENTISS, for James Buckner, petitioner.

Messrs. L. A. SHELDON and SINGLETON & BROWNE, for assignees.

THE PEOPLE ex rel. H. B. MILLER v. COOPER et al.

BILL 300 UNCONSTITUTIONAL—NOT A GENERAL LAW—THE ACT OF 1872, FOR THE INCORPORATION OF CITIES CONSTRUED—LOCAL OPTION LAWS—COLLECTING OF THE REVENUE.

1. LOCAL OR SPECIAL LAW.—The words "local or special," in the clause of the 22d section of article 4, of the present Constitution, are used in contradistinction to the word "general," and the restriction, therefore, is equivalent to a command that all laws to be passed by the General Assembly, incorporating cities, towns or villages, or changing or amending their charters, shall be general.

2. WHAT IS A GENERAL LAW.—General laws are those which relate to or bind all within the jurisdiction of the law making power, limited as that power may be in its territorial operation, or by constitutional restraint; that the number of persons upon whom the law shall have any direct effect, may, by reason of the subject to which it relates, be very few; but it must operate equally and uniformly upon all brought within the relations and circumstances for which it provides.

3. THE CITY TAX ACT.—The city tax act assuming to be obligatory only to the extent the city council may elect to proceed under its provisions, in preference to those of the general law, is not a general law, but is a "local or special law" to those electing to proceed under it. The local option clause affects and characterizes it as "a local or special law," and brings it within the constitutional prohibition, and it cannot, therefore, be sustained.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.

The opinion of the court was delivered by SCHOLFIELD, J.

When the cases, of which Otis v. The People (reported 7 Chicago Legal News, 323) was selected as the representative, were before us at the January term, 1875, we refrained from considering the objection urged against the constitutionality of the act of April 15, 1875, known as "the city tax act," because in our opinion there were defects in the act itself which defeated its practical enforcement, and we indulged the hope that the wisdom of the legislature might relieve us of the delicate and responsible task of pointing out wherein, in our opinion, such legislation is in contravention of the Constitution.

The amendment to that act of April 7, 1875, however, attempts no more than to obviate the specific objections which we held in the Otis case rendered it impracticable to enforce it, and it has thus become manifest that the principle which we deem fundamentally objectionable in such legislation has not been asserted hastily and without due consideration by the legislature; and that if it shall now pass unchallenged it will seem to have the sanction of the court, and may in the future become the precedent for endless local option legislation in lieu of the general laws required by the constitution. We feel, therefore, constrained to pass by the numerous questions that have been discussed with so much ability by the different counsel, with reference to the proper construction of the act as amended, and the regularity of the various steps taken in the case, and to confine our observations to the single question, Is the act, as amended, a valid constitutional enactment?

By one of the clauses of Sec. 22 of Art. 4 of the present constitution, the General Assembly is prohibited from passing "any local or special law incorporating cities, towns, or villages, or changing or amending the charter of any town, city, or village."

The words "local or special" in this connection are clearly used in contradistinction to the word "general," and the restriction, therefore, is equivalent to a command that all laws to be passed by the General Assembly incorporating cities, towns, or villages, or changing or amending their charters, shall be general.

In obedience to this mandate of the constitution, the General Assembly passed an act, in force July 1, 1872, to provide for the incorporation of cities and villages, under the provisions of which cities may become incorporated, and those already incorporated may change their charters for its provisions. It is unlimited in its application, and fully meets the requirement of the constitution. It is not and cannot be reasonably claimed that it is not a general law. It contains all the provisions necessary to a complete municipal charter, among others those relating to the assessment and collection of municipal taxes. By these it is provided that such taxes shall be collected and enforced by the same officers, and in the same manner provided for the collection of State and county taxes. R. S. 1874, p. 231, Art 8, Sec. 2. This act, with the exception of some amendments immaterial to the question before us continued in force, was embodied in the revision of the laws made by the General Assembly in 1874. The same provision in regard to the collection of municipal taxes is also a part of the general revenue law in force since July 1, 1872.

The "City Tax Act" provides an entirely different system for the collection of municipal taxes, to be carried out and enforced by different officers. It does not repeal and take the place of the general law on the same subject, either expressly or by implication, but on the contrary it recognizes in direct terms its continued existence, and provides in the twenty-second section as follows:

"The city council of any city shall have power at any time, in lieu of the mode herein provided for the assessment and collection of general city taxes, to, by resolution or ordinance, elect to certify to the county clerk the amount or amounts required to be raised by taxation upon the assessment of property for State and county taxes, and to collect the taxes for said city in the manner provided for in the General Revenue laws of this State, and in such case to abolish the office of the City Assessor and City Collector. Provided, however, that nothing in this section contained shall be so construed as to prevent such corporation at any time thereafter from providing for the assessment and collection of taxes by ordinance, and in the manner in this act hereinbefore set forth."

It can hardly require argument or the citation of authorities to support the position which we shall assume, that a law conferring power upon municipal corporations to levy and collect taxes and prescribing the mode, is to that extent the charter or organic law of such corporations, and, being such, the requirement of the Constitution is, it shall be a general law.

General laws are said to be those which relate to or bind all within the jurisdiction of the law-making power, limited as that power may be in its territorial operation or by constitutional restraint. (Sedg. on Statutes, and Const. Law Jr., 30.) The number of persons upon whom the law shall have any direct effect may, by reason of the subject to which it relates, be very few, but it must operate equally and uniformly upon all brought within the relations and circumstances for which it provides. (People ex-rel. v. Wright, 70 Illinois, 398.)

The evil supposed to exist which led to the adoption of the clause in the Constitution under consideration, was dissimilarity in the provision of the different cities, towns and villages; and while it was not designed by the mere act of adopting the Constitution to repeal the provision of existing charters any further than they were in conflict with other provisions of the Constitution which became operative without the aid of legislation, it was intended, as is plainly manifested by the language employed, that no city, town or village should thereafter become incorporated, or have its charter changed or amended, except by a general law. All cities, towns and villages becoming incorporated would thus be governed by the same law; and all having their charters changed or amended would, to the extent of such change or amendment, likewise be governed by the same law. Neither the letter nor the spirit of the clause, therefore, allows that, under the pretense of enacting general laws in relation to cities, towns and villages, different systems of municipal law can be provided by the General Assembly for different cities, different towns, and different villages.

The section we have quoted from the City Tax Act leaves it optional with the city council whether the act shall apply to the city or not. We are bound to judicially know that many cities in the State have become incorporated under the general law, and have not elected to proceed under the City Tax Act; so that, where there should be a single formal law, uniform in its operation, we have, if this may be sustained, two local or special laws, unless indeed it shall be held we may have an indefinite number of general laws in force with dissimilar and discordant provisions in relation to the charter of cities, towns and villages at the same time.

It is true what are styled "local option laws" have been sustained by this court and by many other courts; but so far as we now recollect this has only been as against the objection that they were not laws, but an attempt to delegate legislative authority to the people. The question whether such laws are "local or special" within the meaning of our Constitution, has never been decided here—and if there is any decision elsewhere sustaining them as general laws against objection argued under a like constitutional restriction, we have been unable to find it.

If there may be two laws, either to be in force at the option of those representing the city authority in relation to the levy and collection of taxes, there may be two such laws in relation to every other question affecting municipalities; and if there may be two, they may be multiplied indefinitely, for either the local option brings the law within the prohibition of the constitution, or the General Assembly is unrestricted in regard to the enactment of such laws.

It will, therefore, be obvious if local option laws are not within the meaning of the words "local or special laws," this clause of the constitution is of no value whatever; for it need but to change the form of the legislation to produce precisely the same results as those which it was designed to prevent. It would be only necessary instead of saying as heretofore in special charters: "The City of Chicago," "the City of Quincy," or "the City of Peoria," etc., "shall have power," or "may," etc., simply to say, "all cities shall have power," or "may," etc. And then add a section conferring the option upon any city to adopt or reject its provisions.

It must not be understood that we claim there is no discretion to determine whether a city shall become incorporated or not, or whether a city incorporated at the adoption of the constitution may elect to change or amend its charter by adopting the provisions of a general law created for that purpose, for these rights are unquestioned and are within the contemplation of the constitution, nor must it be understood that we claim that the discretionary powers contained in the general law must be exercised in the same manner and to the same extent in every municipal corporation. We claim simply that when the election is made to become incorporated, or to change or amend an existing charter, the incorporation must be under a general law, and the change or amendment of the existing charter must be by adopting, to the extent of such change or amendment the provisions of the general law; that the measure and limit of municipal powers and duties, so far as they are a subject of regulation by the General Assembly, must be prescribed by the general law, and that it must absolutely and of its own force be applicable as the measure and limit of municipal powers and duties to all within the class to whom it relates.

"The City Tax Act," assuming to be obligation only to the extent the City Council may elect to proceed under its provisions, in preference to those of the general law, is not a general law, but is "local or special" to those electing to proceed under it. The local option clause affects and characterizes it as a "local or special law," and brings it within the constitutional prohibition, and it cannot, therefore, be sustained as a valid constitutional enactment.

The judgment must be affirmed.

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

OPINION FILED JUNE 30, 1876.

BARBARA KIEL et al. v. GEORGE P. A. HEALY et al.

Appeal from Cook Co.—Re-hearing.

DEED MADE BY MINOR NOT VOID, BUT VOIDABLE—WITHIN WHAT TIME MAY BE DISAFFIRMED.

1. MINOR'S DEED.—That the deed of a minor is not void but voidable.
2. MUST BE DISAFFIRMED WITHIN THREE YEARS.—That the deed of an infant must be disaffirmed within three years after reaching majority, or such infant will be concluded by the deed.
3. EFFECT OF SUBSEQUENT MARRIAGE.—That when the complainant was of age and free from disability, the time in which she had to disaffirm the deed commenced to run, and her subsequent marriage could not affect or prevent the running of the bar which had already commenced.
4. POWERS OF A COURT OF EQUITY.—That complainant voluntarily permitted the time to pass in which she could revoke the deed, and a court of equity is powerless to grant her the relief which she has lost by her own neglect to assert her rights in apt time.—ED. LEGAL NEWS.

Opinion by CRAIG, J.

This was a bill in equity brought by Barbara Kiel and Joseph Kiel, her husband, to set aside a deed of certain real estate in Chicago, executed by Barbara Kiel, on the 22d day of October, 1852, while she was a minor.

She was, when the deed was executed, sixteen years of age. She married Joseph Kiel in January, 1855, being then about five months past eighteen.

Since the deed was executed, the property conveyed has passed by mesne conveyance through the hands of several innocent purchasers.

The Circuit Court, on the hearing, rendered a decree dismissing the bill. The complainants appealed, and at a former term of this court a decision was rendered, reversing the decree. (Reported in 5 CHICAGO LEGAL NEWS, 438.) Petition having been filed, a rehearing was ordered, and upon further consideration of the case, we have arrived at a different conclusion from that reached by a majority of the court when the record was first before the court.

The facts upon which the decision of the case will rest, are not controverted. The real question involved is one of law, and that is narrowed down to the proposition whether Barbara Kiel can now avoid the deed executed by her on the ground that she was a minor at the time the conveyance was made.

The record affords no ground for the position of appellants that the deed was obtained by fraud, but on the other hand, it is obvious that when the deed was made she knew she was conveying the land, and after she was of age, and before marriage, she knew she had conveyed, and that her grantees had parted with the title, and yet no effort was made to impeach the deed at the time on the ground of fraud, nor did she express any dissatisfaction with what she had done.

The conduct of appellant and the facts surrounding the transaction are so inconsistent with the theory that the deed was obtained by fraud, that we cannot adopt it, and the evidence affords so slight a foundation for the position that further discussion of this branch of the case is not deemed necessary.

This brings us to the consideration of the real controverted question presented by the record, whether Barbara Kiel can now repudiate the deed made by her while a minor.

It is well settled by the authorities that a deed made by a minor is not void but only voidable. Such has been held to be the law in many of the States and it was expressly decided by this court in Cole v. Pennoyer, 14 Ill., 158.

The deed in question being voidable Barbara Keil had the right within a reasonable time after she became of age to revoke it. If she failed to avail of this right given her by the law, then the deed must be regarded as binding and obligatory upon her and upon all others. If she took no steps whatever to revoke the deed within a reasonable time after she attained her majority, non-action on her part will be regarded as a ratification of the instrument. She could not, by remaining silent for a number of years, render that void which was only voidable.

As was held in Block v. Hills, 36 Ill., 376, the deed of an infant may be ratified by acts in pais or by long acquiescence

The deed before the court was executed in October, 1852. Barbara Keil was eighteen years of age in August, 1854. When, as has been settled by this court her minority terminated. Stevenson v. Westfall, 18 Ill., 209; Kester v. Stark, 19 Ill., 328.

But no steps whatever were taken by her to revoke the deed or disaffirm the the conveyance, until the filing of the bill in January, 1871.

When she arrived at the age of eighteen years she had full power to sell and convey lands, make any and all contracts she saw proper, and bind herself for the faithful performance of contracts in the same manner and with like effect as other persons who are under no disability.

Was the act of disaffirmance which came for the first time in 1871, and after the land had passed through the hands of several innocent purchasers and had largely increased in value, within a reasonable time?

The time within which an infant, after majority, should revoke a conveyance made during minority cannot be regarded an open question in this State. In Blenkenship v. Stout, 25 Ill., 132, it was held that a person who has conveyed lands during infancy was bound to disaffirm the deed within three years after arriving at majority, and a neglect or failure to do so would be held to be a ratification of the conveyance.

This rule was adopted from analogy to a section in the limitation law of 1839, which required one under disability to bring an action within three years after the disability was removed. The same rule was adopted in Cole v. Pennoyer, 14 Ill., 158, and we perceive no reason why it should be changed.

If the infant has been imposed upon, and his lands obtained for less than an adequate consideration, certainly three years after he attains majority is time enough to determine that fact, and bring an action to recover the property. On the other hand, if a longer or indefinite time was allowed, the title to real property would be insecure, and the stability and repose in titles, which it is the policy of the law to foster and encourage, would be to a great extent destroyed.

There is nothing that has a greater tendency to retard the growth and prosperity of a country than insecurity in titles to real property.

The complainant, however, seeks to avoid the operation of the rule announced, on the ground that after her minority ceased she was under the disability of coverture.

From the 6th day of August, 1854, until the 12th day of January, 1855, Barbara Kiel was of age and unmarried. During this time she was under no disability, but had full power to sell and convey lands, and engage in any legitimate business she might desire. During this period she might have revoked the deed made by her while in minority and conveyed the title to the land to another, or she could have brought ejectment, or filed a bill to set aside the deed.

In the construction of statutes of limitation it is a well recognized rule that where the statute has begun to run, no subsequent or supervening disability in the party against whom it is taking effect, will arrest its operation. Angel on Limitations, sec. 197.

Cumulative disabilities cannot therefore be regarded, as one disability cannot be added to another. Mercers Lessee v. Selden, 1 Howard, 37; Eager v. Commonwealth, 4 Mass., 182.

Had there been a statute barring the right of the complainant to revoke the deed, unless the revocation was made within a given time after she reached her majority, it is clear that she could not now obtain the relief prayed for in the bill. But as the law requires an infant, within a reasonable time after reaching majority, to disaffirm a conveyance made during infancy, and in analogy to the provision of the Limitation Act of 1839, fixed that period at three years after the infant was of age, the principle that must control and govern the case is the same as if a statute of limitations had been enacted by the legislature.

The rule that an infant must disaffirm a conveyance within three years after reaching majority or she be concluded by the deed, was fully settled by Cole v. Pennoyer and Blenkenship v. Stout, supra, and the doctrine announced in those cases has remained the law of the State unquestioned so long that it has become an established rule of property, and it should not now be changed or modified unless the rule established was wrong in principle, and has operated detrimental to the public interest, neither of which do we believe to be the case.

When, therefore, the complainant was of age and free from disability, the time in which she had to disaffirm the deed commenced to run, and her subsequent marriage could not affect or prevent the running of the bar which had already commenced.

She voluntarily permitted the time to pass in which she could revoke the deed, and a court of equity is now powerless to grant her the relief which she has lost by her own neglect to assert her rights in apt time.

The decree of the Circuit court will be affirmed.

Affirmed.

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

OPINION FILED JUNE 30, 1876.

FREDERICK F. WHITE v. CATHERINE RUSSELL et al.

Appeal from Cook.

PARTNERSHIP—THE RIGHTS OF CREDITORS WHERE A DECEASED PARTNER HAD MADE A FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCE—FILING A BILL TO REACH ASSETS—PREVIOUS CASES CONSIDERED.

A CREDITOR OF A DECEASED PARTNER MAY FILE A BILL.—The bill in this case alleged that appellant and Rossman were in partnership; that appellant had an excess of capital in the firm, which was insolvent; that Rossman died insolvent, and his estate is in that condition; that he made a will devising his estate in equal parts to his wife and his brother James R. That Corby had administered on his estate, and in due course of administration, appellant, as surviving partner, had the claim of the late firm allowed in the probate court for $2,746.58; that he proved his individual claim; that the assets of the estate do not exceed $3,069 30, of which $1,530 was set off to the widow. That the demands against the estate amounted to $4,060.30, that Rossman being insolvent, with $2,050 of the firm money, purchased a lot, and had it conveyed to his wife, alleging, as a reason, that he was insolvent, and would thus be able to retain a home; Held,

1. That this was a fraud against which equity will afford relief in favor of creditors.
2. That when a claim is allowed in the county court against an insolvent estate, equity will take jurisdiction to remove fraudulent conveyances, and subject the property to the payment of the debts of the deceased.
3. The court states under what circumstances a creditor of an insolvent estate may file a bill to have fraudulent conveyances removed.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.

Opinion by WALKER, J.

The bill in this case alleges that appellant and J. V. R. Rossman were in partnership in business; that appellant had an excess of capital in the firm; that the firm was insolvent, and that Rossman died insolvent, and his estate is in that condition; that Rossman made a will, devising his estate in equal parts to his wife, and his brother, James R.; that Francis M. Corby had administered upon his estate, and in due course of administration, appellant, as surviving partner, presented and proved the claim of the late firm in the probate court, where he was allowed $2,746 58; that he also proved his individual claim, and was allowed $587.37, against the estate; that the assets of the estate do not exceed $3,069.30, and that $1,530 thereof had been set off to the widow.

That the aggregate of the demands against the estate allowed by the probate court amounted to $4,060 20; that in May, 1872, Rossman, then being insolvent, purchased a lot of ground in the city of Chicago for the sum of $3,050, and paid on the same money of the firm $2,050, and had the land conveyed to his wife for the reason he assigned that he was largely insolvent, and by having the lot so conveyed, he would be able to retain a home from his creditors; that he and his wife gave their note and a mortgage on the same for $1,000 to secure the remainder of the purchase money; that his wife died about the 7th of September, 1873; that before her death she made a will and devised this property to her mother, Catharine Russell, who has been in the receipt of the rents and profits arising from the same.

That Catharine Russell has pretended to convey the same to Wm. M. Case, but she has received no consideration therefor; that she only made such conveyance to cloud the title to the lot; that no portion of the money paid for the lot had been furnished by or belonged to Mrs. Rossman; that she held the property in trust for Rossman's creditors, all of which Catharine Russell and Case well knew; that the property is subject to the payment of the debts of the estate of Rossman.

These are the material facts set out in the bill. Defendants filed a demurrer which was sustained by the court, and the bill was dismissed, and complainant appeals.

The facts presented by this bill, if true, and the demurrer admits them, entitle appellant to relief. They show a fraud upon the creditors of the firm, and upon the creditors of Rossman, deceased. Whilst insolvent and for the purpose of placing this property beyond the reach of creditors, he wrongfully withdrew money belonging to the firm, which is insolvent, and purchased the lot, and had it conveyed to his wife. This is a fraud on creditors that equity cannot sanction. It is immoral, unjust, and highly inequitable. It is so to the extent that it would so strike the mind of all fair thinking men. It was an unjust appropriation of funds in his hands that should have been held for, and paid to, his creditors. As charged in the bill, it was contrived to hinder, delay and defraud his creditors, and cannot be sanctioned or sustained.

It is the settled practice of courts of equity to afford relief in favor of creditors in such cases where they have first exhausted their legal remedies without having obtained satisfaction of their debts. This is usually proved by a judgment and an execution returned nulla bona. That is held to rebut all presumption that the legal remedy would be availing to the creditor. But there are cases in which other proof will suffice, as where the debtor dies and the claim is probated and allowed against the estate, and it is shown to be insolvent, it is held that equity will take jurisdiction to remove fraudulent conveyances, and subject property to the payment of the debt. McDowell v. Cochrane, 11 Ill., 31, Bay v. Cook, 31 Ill., 336, and a number of other cases in this court established the practice.

The law not permitting the creditor of an estate, on recovering judgment against the administrator, or having his claim allowed, to have an execution, it has been held that proof of the allowance of the claim, and the insolvency of the estate, will be regarded as an exhaustion of the creditors' legal remedy, and will authorize a court of Chancery to proceed to hear and afford relief. The allegations of the bill are, in this respect, sufficient.

It is, however, urged that as the claim had been allowed against the estate, that an application by the administrator was the only mode by which Rossman's interest in the land could be reached; that creditors have no such power. And the case of LeMoyne v. Quimby (Sep. Term, 1874,) it is claimed, announces the rule, and other cases in this court are referred to for the same purpose. The cases referred to announce that the proceeding for the sale of real estate to pay debts as a general rule, must be by the administrator, but it has its limitations. As where a debtor in his lifetime makes a fraudulent conveyance to hinder or delay his creditors, such a conveyance, although void as to creditors, is binding on his heirs and representatives. Neither his heirs or executors or administrators can maintain a bill to set aside the conveyance, as it is binding on them. This being true, the only mode of reaching such property is by a bill filed by one or more of the creditors of the estate. Were the courts to deny such a remedy, then the unscrupulous debtor would thus be able to elude his creditors, and effectually consummate the fraud.

When, however, there is no such fraud, it is for the executor or the administrator alone to proceed to subject the lands of deceased to the payment of his debts. In such a case a creditor having proved his claim, cannot file his bill for the sale of real estate for its payment. That, when necessary, must be done by the executor or administrator. Equity, on the application of one or more of the creditors, will not withdraw the administration of estates from the probate courts where it has been placed by the statute, nor will it withdraw a part of the assets unless there are prior and superior liens against a portion of the property. But where there is an equitable fund that should be applied to the payment of all or a portion of the debts, which cannot be reached by the executor or administrator, then equity will, at the instance of creditors entitled to participate in the fund, seize upon it, and apply it to those equitably entitled to it.

The case of LeMoyne v. Quimby was where there was no impediment in the way of the administrator to prevent him from obtaining an order for the sale of the land and all of the interest which deceased held in it, and a creditor intervened to prevent its sale until outstanding titles could be settled, and it was held that the creditor could not so intermeddle; that the administration of estates could not be thus interfered with, although the administrator had no power to file a bill to settle the title before the land was sold. There was no question of fraudulent conveyances or fraudulent trusts created by the deceased, as there is in this case, and in that consists the broad distinction between the cases. The bill in this case, therefore, presented a case which, if the facts are true, entitled appellant to have the property subjected to sale for the payment of this claim, but whether other creditors may participate in the fund is not presented by this record, and will not therefore be discussed.

It is next urged that it appears from the bill that appellant is insolvent and that it would be improper to entrust him with the the money, that would arise from the sale of this real estate as his claim should be distributed among the creditors of the firm. The administrator being a party to the suit and being charged with the interest of all the creditors and the heirs, if he believes that the fund would not be safe in the hands of appellant, can apply to the court to have the money paid directly to the firm creditors, who are entitled to participate in its distribution and thus secure the estate against liability to again pay the firm creditors. Had Rossman been still living, appellant could undeniably have filed a bill for an account and to subject this property to the payment of such sum as should have been found due him or the firm on the accounting, and we apprehend nothing has since occurred to prevent his maintaining his suit. But in such a proceeding Rossman, on a proper showing, could have had a receiver appointed, or the money paid by the Master directly to the firm creditors. So in this case the administrator may on a proper showing have the money applied directly to those who may be shown to be entitled.

The decree of the court below is reversed and the cause remanded.

ROSENTHAL & PENCE, for appellees.

THROUGH the kindness of JOHN CONOVER, of the law firm of CONOVER & HICKLIN, of Galatin, Missouri, we have received the following opinion:

SUPREME COURT OF MISSOURI.

MAY TERM, 1876.

THE DAVIESS CO. SAVINGS ASSOCIATION
v.
B. K. SAILOR, et al.

AUTHORITY OF CASHIER TO BIND BANK.

Held, That the cashier of a bank has no authority to bind the bank, by statements to the surety on a note. That the bank has made arrangements for the payment of the note, and that he will not be looked to for payment thereof.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.]

Opinion by NEPTON, J.

This suit was on a promissory note, executed by John Ballinger and Benj. K. Sailor to Joshua M Sailor, and assigned by the latter to the plaintiff. This note was dated 25 January, 1872, and was payable in one month from date, and bore interest from maturity at 10 per cent. per annum. The suit was against the two makers and the assignee.

The defense of Ballinger was that he was really a security for J. M. Sailor, that on or about the 2d day of July, 1872, he called on the plaintiff to ascertain if said note had been paid by said Joshua M. Sailor, and was informed that, although said note had not been paid, plaintiff had made arrangements with said Joshua M. Sailor, by which they looked to him alone for payment of said note, and that they did not look any longer to this defendant for payment of said note, or any part thereof, and this defendant, relying upon such statements of plaintiff, did not give plaintiff notice in writing to bring suit upon said note against the said defendant, as he at the time intended to do, and would then have done but for such statements, and that, relying upon these statements, the defendant Ballinger took no steps to secure himself against liability on said note, as he would and could have done, but for said statements. That at the time said statements were made, and for several months thereafter, said Joshua M. Sailor was a resident of Daviess county, and was solvent and had a large amount of unincumbered real and personal property, out of which this defendant could and would have secured himself fully against every liability on said note, had he not been misled by said misrepresentations of plaintiff. That a short time before the institution of this suit, said Joshua M. Sailor became insolvent and absconded, and has ever since been a non-resident of this State, and has no property out of which any part of said note could be made.

To sustain this plea, defendant Ballinger testified on the trial, that in July, 1872, he went to the bank to see Mr. Tomlin, the cashier, and asked him if the Sailor note had been paid. He said it had not, but that the bank at Chillicothe, or McFerraus' bank, had a mortgage on Sailor's land, had been loaning him money, was carrying him, and that plaintiff would not look to him—Ballinger—any longer for the payment of the note. In consequence of these statements, defendant—and witness—thought no more of the matter, and was surprised at the suit some 14 months after the maturity of the note.

This evidence was objected to on the ground that the cashier had no right to bind the bank by such statements, and because they did not correspond with the defense set up in the answer.

Tomlin, the cashier, was examined on the other side, who said that no such conversation ever occurred, and that he never had any conversation whatever with Ballinger after the note was executed, in July, 1872, until this suit was brought. He stated some conversations with Ballinger in 1871, in which he told Ballinger of Sailor's indebtedness to the Chillicothe bank, by way of warning.

There was then evidence given as to Sailor's condition in 1871 and '72, and subsequently—his insolvency—his abandonment of the State about 1873, etc. It is unnecessary that the testimony should be stated, as no point arises on it. The court gave a number of instructions for the plaintiff, and also for the defendant, all based on the assumption that Tomlin, the cashier, represented the bank in this interview, or alleged interview, with Ballinger. It is useless to recite these instructions, as no point is made on them. On the evidence admitted, the issue was a very plain question of veracity between the cashier and the defendant Ballinger, and the verdict having been for defendant, it is not proposed that we should interfere on the ground of the weight of evidence.

The only point to be considered in this court is, whether the evidence of Ballinger was properly admitted, or rather, whether the statements said to have been made to him by the cashier, are such statements as, without proof of special authority, would bind the bank.

The general powers of a cashier are stated in Story on Agency, § 114, and Fleckner v. Bank of U. S., 3 Wheat., 360. He has no authority to bind the bank by declarations or admissions outside of the general line of his duty, which is to collect notes, keep the funds arising from them, and deliver up notes and other securities when paid.

The cashier in this case distinctly informed the defendant that the note was not paid, nor was any statement pretended to have been made from which any reasonable man could infer that the note was paid. The statement of the cashier was that a Chillicothe bank had made loans to Sailor, and proposed "carrying him," and that the plaintiff would not look to Ballinger. There was nothing in this statement from which the witness had a right to assume that the note had been paid or otherwise secured. On the contrary, the very reverse was stated in plain words, and the information in regard to what had been done in the bank at Chillicothe did not give any assurance that this note had been provided for in the mortgage taken by that bank.

Assuming, however, that the cashier's assurance was that the debt was otherwise secured, and that the defendant would not be troubled, that was, as the court of New Hampshire declared in Cochecho Nat. B. v. Haskell, 51 N. H., 116, (see same case, 12 Am. Rep., 67,) a case cited and relied on by both parties, a mere agreement to discharge the surety, and not within the ordinary scope of a cashier's authority.

A cashier of a bank has ordinarily no power to discharge a debtor without payment, nor has he any authority to bind the bank by an agreement that a surety shall not be called on to pay the note he has signed, or that he would have no further trouble from it. A special authority to discharge sureties may be provided, or the cashier may be allowed to represent the stockholders generally, without any regard to the usual duties of a cashier. But there must be proof of such authority, as upon general principles he does not have any such powers. There is no dispute in the case, in regard to the general principles of estoppel. They are recognized by this court in the case of Driskell v. Mateer, 31 Mo. R., 325.

The only question for this court to decide is how far declarations and statements by an officer of a bank, called a cashier, binds the bank in a case where there is no evidence to show special authority.

The evidence of Ballinger without proof of special authority conferred on Tomlin, its cashier, was incompetent to bind the bank.

The judgment must be reversed and the cause remanded. The other judges concur except Judges Wagner and Vories, who are absent.

CONOVER & HICKLIN and HALE & EADS, for appellant.

SHANKLIN, LOW & MCDOUGAL, for respondents.

AMENDMENT—RESULTING TRUST.

Hall v. Congdon, p. 279.

A bill in chancery was brought for the purpose of enforcing a trust in regard to certain land, and alleged an express trust. It was proposed to amend the bill by inserting allegations of facts from which a trust resulted. It was objected that the resulting trust was displaced by the express trust, and that the amendment would introduce a new cause of action. Held, that it was no objection to the implied trust that it was alleged that the defendant had expressly promised to perform it, and that the object of the bill as amended being to enforce substantially the same trust, the amendment did not introduce a new cause of action.

It being alleged that the money with which the land was purchased was the plaintiff's money: Held, that it was no objection to the implied trust that the defendant furnished the money by way of loan, and that the plaintiff had agreed that he should hold the land by way of security until the money had been repaid.

ABSTRACT OF ILLINOIS OPINIONS.

FILED JUNE AT SPRINGFIELD JUNE 30, 1876.

34.—Philip Crane v. Andrew S. Rutledge. —Error to McLean.—Opinion by BREESE, J., reversing and remanding.

CHARACTER IN SEDUCTION—TESTIMONY OF DIVORCED WIFE.

Held, 1. That in an action for seduction, the general character of the defendant is inadmissible in evidence. General character can only be admitted when the issues necessarily involve it—as a prosecution for keeping a common gaming house, etc. In such an action as the present, the woman's character for chastity is in issue, but the defendant's is not, and his general character cannot be shown.

2. In such action, the divorced wife cannot be introduced by the defendant, (nor the State, of course,) as a witness to prove a fact which could only have come to her knowledge through the marital relation while it continued. It would be different as to facts occuring after divorce.

35.—Hartwell C. Howard v. James T. Logan.—Error to Champaign.—Opinion by WALKER, J., affirming.

HOMESTEAD—WHERE HOUSE DESTROYED BY FIRE.

STATEMENT.—Fire destroyed a house on a homestead lot—the whole being within the exemption of $1,500. The owner finding himself unable to rebuild, sold, the lots to appellee. Appellant had a judgment, and he levied on the lots in appellee's hands, who brought bill to enjoin, and obtained a decree.

Held, That there was no loss of the homestead right by the accident; especially, as a homestead is not even lost by a voluntary absence for a temporary purpose, there being an intention of returning.

Andrew Wilson v. School Directors, etc. —Error to Calhoun.—Opinion by DICKEY, J., reversing, and dismissing the suit.

DEDICATION—COMPELLING CONVEYANCE TO DEFINE IT—PARTIES REQUISITES.

STATEMENT.—Dedication, by Wilson, of school-house lot. After 20 years' occupancy, for the purpose of a school, he made two attempts to convey the lot, conditionally, by deed. The deeds not being satisfactory, were both destroyed, the trustees of schools not having accepted, expressly nor by implication, either of the deeds, probably relying on the dedication alone.

Suit was brought, in the name of the trustees, to compel Wilson to convey. This the trustees dismissed. Then the directors of the district brought another suit, for the same purpose, alleging that the trustees refused to prosecute a suit for the purpose. In this, a decree was rendered for a full conveyance of the unqualified fee. Wilson brought up the judgment. Held,

1. That the directors had no interest upon which they could be allowed to bring such suit. This could only be brought by the trustees themselves, to whom the deed was to be made; or else some tax-payer, or other person having a pecuniary interest therein, on allegation that the trustees refused to do their duty in the premises.

2. If Wilson was under any obligation at all to give a deed, he could not be compelled to give one which would more than merely define the prior dedication.

38.—Isaiah Boon v. The Moline Plow Co. —Appeal from Piatt.—Opinion by SHELDON, J., affirming. SCOTT, Ch. J., dissenting.

VALIDITY OF NIGHT SESSIONS OF COURT.

STATEMENT.—In open court, a judge announced that he would hold a night session, and call the docket for trial. The case of appellant herein was reached between ten and eleven o'clock at night, when both he and his witnesses were absent. Judgment against him.

He moved for a new trial, on an affidavit alleging a meritorious defense, setting out the facts thereof; also that he and his witnesses had been constant in their attendance at court, that they all lived ten miles distant, that he could prove the facts alleged by at least four witnesses besides himself, that they were all married men, and could not be away from home at night. Motion for a new trial overruled. Held,

That the holding of a night session, by due appointment, is a matter of discretion in the court, not to be interfered with, except in case of abuse; and that parties notified by the announcement must attend, at their peril; and that the affidavit was insufficient.

[For other cases, see page 335.]

BAGGAGE RECEIPTS.—Philip A. Madan, arriving in this city on the New York and New Haven Railroad, gave the checks for his baggage, while in the train, to the agent of the New Transfer Company, at the same time receiving a receipt on which was a printed clause whereby the company limited its liability to $100 for loss of baggage, unless a special contract was made to the contrary. It was then dark, and Mr. Madan put the receipt into his pocket without looking at it. The baggage was stolen, and Mr. Madan sued for $415. On the trial, yesterday, the company set up the receipt as a binding contract, limiting their liability to $100 Judge Sedgwick charged the jury that it was for them to determine whether Mr. Madan could see enough of the paper to indicate that it was a contract, and not a receipt, and the jury gave Mr. Madan $415.—*N. We call attention to the following opinions, reported at length in this issue :

CONTESTATION FOR THE OFFICE OF JUDGE.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States by WAITE, C. J., holding that under the statutes of Louisiana, Kennard was not deprived of his office as one of the judges of the Supreme Court of that State, without due process of law.

RIGHT TO SUE ON A SUPERSEDEAS BOND IN THE U. S. COURTS.—The opinion of the United States Circuit Court by DRUMMOND, J., holding where a writ of error is taken from a judgment of a Circuit Court of the United States to the Federal Supreme Court, and a supersedeas bond given, and the writ of error dismissed, that a suit can be maintained on the bond in the Circuit Court where the original suit was commenced, without regard to the citizenship of the parties. We do not remember to have seen this precise question decided, but we are satisfied the decision of the learned judge is correct. To hold any other way would be to say, in many cases, before a plaintiff in the Federal Court could reap the fruits of his judgment, he would have to go into the State court.

BANKRUPTCY.—RENT OF LEASED PREMISES.—The opinion of the United States Circuit Court, for the District of Louisiana, by BRADLEY J., holding that neither the bankrupt nor the assignee can occupy leased premises after the bankruptcy without paying the rent.

BILL 300 UNCONSTITUTIONAL—SPECIAL LAWS.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of this State, by Scholfield, J., holding that the law known as "Bill 300" is unconstitutional; that the words "local or special," in the clause of the 22d section of article 4 of the constitution under consideration, are used in contradistinction to the word "general," and the restriction therefore is equivalent to a command that all laws to be passed by the General Assembly incorporating cities, towns or villages, or changing or amending their charters, shall be general. It is difficult to see how the Supreme Court could have made any other decision. In fact this decision is foreshadowed by that in the case of The People ex rel. Miller v. Otis, reported 7 Chicago Legal News, 323. It may not be amiss to inquire how or why such a bill ever came to be passed. After the fire it was claimed that Chicago, as well as some of the other cities of the State, needed to have a law stronger than the general revenue law, for the purpose of collecting revenue. Mr. Tuley being at the head of the law department of the city, and Mr. Medill, its mayor, urged, with all the power they had, the passage of Bill 300—claiming that it would be disastrous to the best interests of the city not to pass it. The city attorneys and the mayors of the cities of the State met at Springfield, and requested their local members to go for Bill 300. The entire daily press of this city, with the exception of the Times, favored the measure. The few members of the legislature who believed the bill, and its subsequent amendment, to be unconstitutional, and had the courage to stand up and speak against them, were denounced as tax-fighters. Time has shown who were working most effectually in the interest of the tax-fighters. This opinion affirms the judgment entered by Judge Wallace in the County Court, holding the law unconstitutional. E. Roby from the first took an active and leading part in the war upon Bill 300 in the courts.

THE DEED OF A MINOR—WITHIN WHAT TIME IT MAY BE DISAFFIRMED.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of this State by CRAIG, J., holding that the deed of an infant must be disaffirmed within three years after reaching majority, or such infant will be concluded by the deed; that when the complainant was of age and free from disability, the time in which she had to disaffirm the deed commenced to run, and her subsequent marriage could not affect or prevent the running of the bar which had already commenced. The former opinion of the court in this case is reported 5 CHICAGO LEGAL NEWS, 438.

RIGHT OF CREDITOR OF AN ESTATE TO FILE A BILL TO REMOVE A FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCE.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of this State by WALKER, J., as to the right of a creditor having a claim allowed in the County court against an insolvent estate to file a bill to have a fraudulent conveyance removed, and subject the property to the payment of the debts. The court holds, for the purpose of laying the foundation for filing a bill that the allowance of a claim in the County court and showing the estate to be insolvent, is equivalent to obtaining a judgment in a court of law, and having an execution returned, no property found. The court reviews its former decisions, and states that they are not in conflict with the doctrine here laid down. We regard this as an important opinion, and one which settles questions about which there has been great variety of opinion.

AUTHORITY OF BANK CASHIER TO BIND BANK.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of Missouri, by NEPTON, J., holding that the cashier of a bank has no authority to bind the bank by statements to the surety on a note; that the bank has made arrangements for the payment of the note, and that he will not be looked to for the payment thereof.

NOTES TO RECENT CASES.

AGENT OF MORTGAGEE TO COLLECT.

The Court of Common Pleas of Pa., 33 Leg. Intel., 238, in Taylor v. Vingeret, held that the agent of the mortgagee to collect the interest has not thereby an implied authority to collect and receive the principal; neither will such unauthorized receipt of the principal bind the assignee of the mortgagee.

PURCHASER SUBJECT TO JUDGMENT LIEN.

In the case of the Miner's Trust Co. Bank v. Roseberry, 33 Leg. Intel., 240, the Supreme Court of Pa. held that a purchaser of property subject to the lien of a judgment is not entitled to have himself credited with the excess of legal interest paid on such judgment, the defendant in the judgment not making any such claim.

FIREMEN—SALVAGE.

The U. S. District Court for the district of Texas, in Davey et al. v. Frost, 3 Cent. Law J., 419, held that firemen employed and paid under a city ordinance are not entitled to salvage for vessels saved while lying at their wharves, as such services are simply in the line of their duty.

BANKRUPTCY—CORRECTION OF STATEMENT OF ASSETS.

In re Asten, the United States District Court for the eastern district of N. Y., 14 N. B. Reg., 7, held that a resolution cannot be recorded where the statement of assets and debts shows that the requisite proportion of creditors have not confirmed it, although the statement is inaccurate; that a statement of assets and debts can only be corrected at a meeting of the creditors.

INVOLUNTARY PETITION—JUDGMENT WHEN FINAL.

The U. S. D. Court, S. D. N. Y.. in re Duncan et al., 14 N. B. R., 18, held when the court has adjudged that the requisite proportion of creditors have joined in an involuntary petition, the judgment is final, not only as respects the debtor, but as respects all his creditors, and will not be re-examined by the District Court except upon an allegation of fraud or bad faith; that after an adjudication of bankruptcy, no inquiry can be made into the truth of an affidavit filed to show that the requisite proportion of creditors have not united in the petition, unless fraud or bad faith is alleged.

AN ILLINOIS DIGEST.—There is a general desire with the profession in this State for a new digest of the reports of the Supreme Court, which shall commence with the first case, and proceed in regular order by subjects to the latest reported case. What is wanted is not a voluminous work of many volumes, but one giving the points decided by the Court, clearly and concisely, in the fewest possible words, with an index and table of contents, so skilfully arranged as to enable an attorney to readily find what the Court has decided on any given question. Such a digest would not only be of use to the profession but would be of great value to the Circuit judges and would have a tendency to make them more familiar with the decisions of the Supreme Court, and as a consequence, appeals would not be so frequently taken in order to make the judgments of the lower courts correspond with the decisions of the Supreme Court. It would be an aid to the Supreme Court itself, in preparing its opinions. Who will prepare such a digest? It would have a good sale.

RECENT ILLINOIS CASES.—In this issue we publish entire three opinions of the Supreme Court of this State, delivered on the 30th of last month, and give an abstract of thirty filed on that day, at Springfield. These opinions alone make this number worth, to any Illinois lawyer, more than the subscription to the volume.

MASTERS IN CHANCERY.—The judges of the Circuit Court have re-appointed George Willard, Walter Butler, Charles T. Adams and Horatio L. Wait, Masters in Chancery. Judge Grant Goodrich declined a re-appointment, and Henry Waller was appointed in his stead.

REHM'S CASE.—On yesterday, Judge Blodgett sentenced Rehm to six months' imprisonment in the county jail, and to pay a fine of ten thousand dollars, and to stand committed until the fine and costs are paid.

MEMBERS OF THE BAR ACTING AS JUDGES. It will be seen by the abstract of opinions published in this issue that the Supreme Court have decided that it is unconstitutional for a member of the bar to try a case as circuit judge, even where it is done under a stipulation of the parties. In other words that consent cannot create a judge unknown to the Constitution, or confer jurisdiction.

GARNISHEE—WAGES.—We would call the especial attention of our readers to the abstract of the opinion of the Supreme Court, relating to garnisheeing the wages of a laborer, etc. The Supreme Court evidently intend that a man having a family shall have the right to work and receive his wages up to the extent of twenty-five dollars, free from a garnishee process, and that a man may contract to receive his wages in sums of not more than twenty-five dollars in advance, and thus free himself from the grasp of hungry, devouring creditors, who would take the bread out of his childrens' mouths, if the law would allow it.

THE USE OF EXTRINSIC EVIDENCE TO SUPPLEMENT OR CONTROL DOCUMENTS OF TITLE.

7.—LOST WILL.

If a testator intended by his will to adopt two instruments, and only one is found, the law, (as shown by the judgment of Chief Justice Erle, and Justices Williams. Willes, and Byles in Dickenson v. Stidolph, 11 C. B., N. S., 341,) requires that effect should be given to that which is found. The Court of Common Pleas unanimously held that either the ordinary presumption must prevail that the missing paper was destroyed by the testatrix animo revocandi, or the principle must be applied that the apparent testamentary intentions of a testator are not to be disappointed merely because she made other dispositions of her property which are unknown by reason of the testamentary paper which contained them not being forthcoming. On the same principle a will is not revoked by a subsequent one where the contents are unknown, even where it is known that a difference which cannot be ascertained exists. See Hutchins v. Basset, 3 Mod. 203; 2 Salk. 592; Show P. C. 146; Goodright v. Harwood, 3 Wels., 497; 2 Will. Bl. 937; Cowp. 87; 7 Bro. P. C. 344.

In Keen v. Keen, 29 L. T. Rep., N. S. 247, Sir J. Hannen thought there could be no doubt that while on the one hand evidence of statements made by a testator subsequent to the execution of his will that he intends to act in conformity with the dispositions contained in the will is clearly admissible, it necessarily follows that other statements made by a testator to the contrary effect are admissible. The admissibility of evidence cannot depend on the form of words in which the intention is expressed. Accordingly, the will being missing, the learned Judge admitted such declarations not directly as evidence of destruction, but of intention not to adhere to the will.

The facts of Lord St. Leonards v. Sugden are so well known to the readers of the Law Times that we need not recapitulate them. The Chief Justice divided his judgment into four parts;—1. Was the will destroyed? 2. Is secondary evidence admissible? 3. Is it satisfactory? 4. If satisfactory, can part only of the will be admitted to probate?

The opinion of his Lordship as to the admissibility we presented in a condensed form in our criticism of Doe v. Palmer, while considering the use of parol evidence to ascertain alterations and interlineations. The fourth question his Lordship answered in the affirmative. "Why," he asked, "if one loses should all? He could not but think there must be some ultimate remainder of the realty, and that there might be some few legacies which Miss Sugden could not recollect. They could not be many. But to refuse probate would be to enable a wrongdoer or an accident to frustrate a will. This might be very mischievous. Of two evils it was better for the court to see its way to giving what effect it could to the will, rather than to allow wrong or accident to triumph." Sir George Jessel ably argued that as in cases of lapse it was the duty of the court to give effect to the secondary intention of the testator on failure of the first. He was of the opinion that probate of a will in solemn form, under the Probate Act, did not alter the law of the Chancery as to establishing wills, though it erected a new tribunal. "Separate wills for separate purposes," he said, "are not uncommon, and that in ejectment for Blackacre the will as to Whiteacre is immaterial. Secondary evidence depended on loss, and the requirements of justice in the case of lost deeds, and on principle there was no difference between wills and deeds. Before 1 Vict. c. 26, a will of personalty could be proved by parol." The learned Master of the Rolls then somewhat rhetorically continued: "Must declarations be limited to those made before the will? In other countries they had a like law in all cases. Our law formerly excluded the declarations of deceased persons, but crying injustice necessitated exceptions. There were three principal and three subordinate, those accompanying the act, those against interest, those in course of business. Subordinate to the first were the proofs of matters of general or quasi historical interest, to the second, questions of pedigree. The grounds of the admission were the difficulty of obtaining other evidence, the disinterestedness of the declarant, the absence of bias in that they were made before litigation or dispute, and lastly, the peculiar knowledge of the declarant. Each of these reasons existed in the case of a testator." Lord Justice James thought Dickenson v. Stidolph, 11 C. B. 341, directly in point. Lord Justice Mellish, while thinking declarations after the making of the will inadmissible, held that still there was sufficient evidence to justify the granting of probate.

E. C. HAMBURGHER,
Clerk of Supreme Court.

SPRINGFIELD, ILL., June 30, 1876.

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

ABSTRACT OF OPINIONS FILED AT SPRINGFIELD JUNE 30, 1876.

83-1875.—Harrison Dills v. Alexander Stobil et al.—Appeal from Adams.—Opinion by SCHOLFIELD, J., affirming.

SURRENDER OF LEASE—CHANGE OF POSSESSION.

Held, 1. That where it is eventually agreed between parties that a lease shall be surrendered, and a new one is thereupon made with another party, and the landlord accepts the new party as his tenant, this will estop the landlord thereafter from denying the surrender of the first lease, notwithstanding it was in writing, under seal, and the agreement to surrender is verbal.

2. An actual and continued change of possession, by the mutual consent of the parties, will amount to a surrender by operation of law.

3. Nor does it make any difference that the new tenant was in possession under the old as well as the new lease. The law does not require the useless ceremony of formally vacating the premises and then re-entering again.

208-1875.—Elizabeth Yeagle v. Ezekiel H. Palmer.—Appeal from De Witt.—Opinion by SCOTT, J., reversing.

RELINQUISHMENT ON CONSIDERATION OF HOMESTEAD AND DOWER RIGHTS—SEPARATE PROPERTY IN THAT CONSIDERATION—POWER TO SUE ON BOND THEREFOR—DEFENCES—TITLE.

STATEMENT.—Suit on a bond given by defendant to plaintiff in consideration that she should unite with her husband, John Yeagle, in a deed, and thus relinquish her homestead and dower rights therein. Held,

1. That the consideration was sufficient to support the bond in suit, as payable to the plaintiff—the payment being designed to obtain her another homestead, instead of the one she gave up, and it being therefore her separate property.

2. Homestead and dower rights are valuable rights secured to a woman by positive law; and of which she cannot be deprived by any act of her husband, nor in any manner to which she does not yield her voluntary consent. She can convey the rights by joining with her husband, but if any consideration therefor is exacted, that consideration is her separate property, being based upon the conveyance of her own personal and positive rights.

3. Nor can a purchaser question the good faith of the transaction, as to the creditors of the husband, as a defense against the payment of the bond. Only creditors can impeach it.

4. Nor will the defense be allowed, in such case, that the title has failed, unless there has been a prior offer to reconvey back again. The purchaser cannot retain the title, and withhold the purchase money. The parties must be placed in statu quo.

Ill. Cent. R. R. Co. v. Caleb Christy & Co.—Appeal from McLean.—Opinion by BREESE, J., affirming; SCOTT, J., dissenting.

DAMAGES TO GRAIN IN SHIPMENT—WHO MAY SUE THEREFOR.

STATEMENT.—Suit for damages in shipment and conveying of corn. Held,

That, inasmuch as the grain was not to belong to appellants until it arrived at its destination, and was there inspected and accepted, they had no such property therein in transitu as to entitle them to sue for damages to it. This right belongs only to the seller—he being the owner until delivery.

1.—Benjamin Shaw v. The People ex rel.—Appeal from Clark.—Opinion by CRAIG, J, reversing and remanding.

WEIGHT OF EVIDENCE—WHAT WILL BE CONSIDERED UNDER A GENERAL ASSIGNMENT OF ERROR THAT A NEW TRIAL OUGHT TO HAVE BEEN ALLOWED.

Held, 1. That it is no part of the duty of a court to instruct a jury in regard to what weight they should attach to the testimony of any witness. The jury are the sole judges of the credibility of the witnesses, and it is their province to determine, for themselves, without prejudice or bias from any source, the weight to be given to the evidence of each witness that may testify in a cause.

2. Under a general assignment of error that a court should have granted a new trial, an appellant may urge the rejection of proper, and the admission of improper, evidence, excepted to at the time; and, also, the giving of improper, and the refusing of proper, instructions, and that the evidence does not sustain the verdict.

31.—The City of Quincy v. Ebenezer B. Baker.—Appeal from Adams.—Opinion by CRAIG, J., reversing and remanding; SCOTT, J., dissenting.

LIABILITY OF CITIES FOR ICE ON SIDEWALKS.

STATEMENT.—Appellee, an asthmatic, much out of health, slipped and fell on a cake of ice, about a foot broad and elevated, it being in the middle of a public sidewalk, near the post-office, and being formed by the flow of a conductor through a leak in the awning. The injury was very severe, and probably permanent. The walk was from 12 to 16 feet wide, so that there was a space of 11 or 15 feet free from the ice. The accident occurred in daylight. Held,

1. That the law does not require a city or incorporated town to respond in damages to every injury received on a public street. To make a city liable, the injured must have used ordinary care to avoid the danger, and use all facilities for that purpose.

2. To make a city, or other municipal corporation, liable for obstructions in the streets, they must be of such a nature that they are, in themselves, dangerous; or such that a person, exercising ordinary prudence, cannot avoid danger or injury, in passing them—in general, such defects as cannot be readily detected.

Justice SCOTT, dissenting, held:

1. That the evidence showed the plaintiff had exercised even unusual care.

2. That, while a city is not liable for the condition of the streets where that condition is general, resulting from the action of the elements, unless there has been a negligence allowing it to continue longer than was necessary to restore a good condition, yet, where the damage to a street or sidewalk is local, and in a public place, readily detected by the city authorities, the city should be held liable for any accident occurring by reason of the defect.

4 P. D. William Fletcher v. The People.—Error to Moultrie.—Opinion by WALKER, J., reversing.

FILLING UP OF PANEL OF GRAND JURORS—SEVERAL COUNTS AND SENTENCES THEREUNDER ON CONVICTION.

Held, 1. That the statute allowing the filling up of the panel of grand jurors by summoning persons from the body of the county, is complied with sufficiently by the sheriff summoning from those in the court-room. He needs not go outside of the court-room, unless necessary. For even granting that the law intends that persons shall not be summoned who are in the habit of hanging around a court-room, yet it will be presumed, until the contrary appears, that the persons summoned were good citizens, having every needful qualification.

2. Where there are several counts in an indictment, and a prisoner is convicted thereon, it is error to pronounce a sentence in gross; but there must be a separate sentence on every count on which he is convicted.

10 P. D. Daniel Pierce v. The People.—Error to St. Clair.—Opinion by SCHOLFIELD, J., reversing.

WHAT THE "CONFIDENCE GAME" IS—CONSTRUCTION OF STATUTE.

STATEMENT.—Conviction and sentence for one year, under the statute, on the "confidence game."

The defendant secured, for some time, accommodations at a hotel in East St. Louis, by representing himself as carrying on business in St. Louis, and as having correspondents in New York and elsewhere, showing letter-heads, etc., also copies of drafts, and the like.

Payment being demanded at length, he gave his note, payable at a bank in St. Louis, where he claimed to have funds deposited. It was returned protested. He then gave an order on his son who had been in partnership with him. But the son was not found, and the store was closed. He then gave an order for flour on a milling company, who refused to honor it, on the ground that they had already lost considerable money by Price & Son. He was then arrested. Held,

1. That not all cases of fraud come under the confidence game law. The language is, "Every person who shall obtain, or attempt to obtain, from any other person, or persons, any money, or property, by the use of any false or bogus checks, or by any other means or device, commonly called the confidence game, shall be," etc. And the meaning is, that if money shall be obtained directly for, and by, the bogus check, etc., and not merely if a confidence shall be excited in the ability and willingness of one to pay for goods, or accommodations—that is, it must be not merely as a means of gaining credit, but as a matter of barter.

2. If defendant violated any part of the criminal code, it was the section as to obtaining goods and chattels by false pretenses, but not even this, unless the representation was in writing.

11 P. D.—Leander Haines v. The People.—Error to McLean County Court.—Opinion PER CURIAM, affirming BALANCING EVIDENCE—REASONABLE DOUBT—CIRCUMSTANTIAL PROOF.

STATEMENT.—Bastardy—prosecutrix, a deaf mute.

1. Bonnell v. Wilder, 67 Ill., 327, reaffirmed, namely, "where the only witnesses are the plaintiff and the defendant, and neither is impeached, and the plaintiff's evidence contradicts that of the defendant, the jury should look to the circumstances usually attending such a transaction as is testified to; which is a part of their general knowledge; and they ought to consider them and be governed by the reasonableness of the testimony of each, when so viewed.

2. Otmer v. The People, 76 Ill., 149, re-affirmed, namely, "What circumstances will amount to proof can never be matter of general definition. The legal test is, the sufficiency of the evidence to satisfy the understanding and conscience of the jury. Absolute certainty is not essential to proof by circumstances, but it is sufficient if they produce moral certainty, to the exclusion of every reasonable doubt.

MISTAKES IN INDICTMENT IN MATTERS OF FORM—CONSTRUCTION—SPECIAL TERM OF COURT.

STATEMENT.—Conviction for selling liquor without license. Held,

1. That where an obscurity arises in the language of an indictment, as from the words "intoxicating" and "liquors" being separated by a parenthetical sentence, yet if A appears, with reasonable certainty, what is the offence charged, this will not vitiate the indictment.

2. An order calling a special term of a circuit court needs not be set out in the record. Unless the contrary expressly appears, the presumption of the law is that the term is regular.

3. Where there are, say, twelve counts in an indictment numbered to six, and then the remainder are also numbered from one to six, this does not necessarily render the indictment uncertain. The numbers are no part of the counts, and the counts may be clearly referred to by the judgment, without them, and, if so, the judgment is good, and not void, merely by reason of a confusion in such numbering.

4. The objection that no more than $100 fine and 30 days imprisonment can be inflicted, in one prosecution, is not valid.

18 P. D.—William M. Connolly v. The People.—Appeal from Clark.—Opinion by SCOTT, Ch. J., affirming.

EVIDENCE IN THE SUPREME COURT AND BEFORE A JURY.

STATEMENT.—Bastardy. Held, That where a jury has been properly instructed, and where the testimony is contradictory and irreconcilable, the verdict of a jury will not be interfered with, even where the entire evidence is set out in the record; because a clearer understanding is always obtained of the testimony by hearing it from the witnesses, as it is delivered, than is ever obtained on its reproduction in writing. And especially in such a case as this, where the wildest latitude was given in the court below to assaults on the character of the prosecuting witness.

21 P. D.—William B. Henlin, et al. v. The People, etc.—Error to McLean.—Opinion by WALKER, J., affirming.

OBSTRUCTING HIGHWAY—JURISDICTION OF COUNTY COURT IN HIGHWAYS—PRESUMPTIONS—DEFENCES—VIEWERS.

STATEMENT.—Indictment for obstructing a highway by erecting fences, and placing gates across the highway.

The jurisdiction of the court to make the order for the highway was attacked in defence.

Held, 1, That in regard to highways, the county court is not an inferior, but a superior court; and therefore, it needs not set out, in an order, the facts necessary to confer jurisdiction; and its conclusions cannot be attacked collaterally; but everything will be presumed regular unless attacked in a direct proceeding, as provided by law, in appeal.

2. It is no defense that others also put gates across the same road, for it is no excuse in one violating a law, to say that others had also violated it.

3. Viewers may be appointed by a county court having acquired jurisdiction, whether at the first, or any subsequent term, until the matter is disposed of.

25 P. D.—Samuel P. Mooney v. The People.—Appeal from Shelby.—Opinion by BREESE, J., affirming.

REQUISITES OF RECOGNIZANCE—DEGREE OF CERTAINTY REQUIRED—CONSTRUCTION AS TO THE INDICTMENT—PLEADING.

STATEMENT.—Suit on a recognizance binding John Mooney to appear and answer to a charge of burglary and larceny. The recognizance was filled up by S. P. Mooney, and bore date September 12, while the approval of the officer bore date September 11. Held,

That this did not vitiate, since the filing in the clerk's office determined the date when it took effect.

The condition was that John Mooney should appear to answer the charge of larceny, whereas, the indictment was for burglary and larceny.

Held, Sufficient; since the condition also bound him to appear and abide the order of the court, and therefore answer any other charge that might be brought against him, this being one of the objects of a recognizance. (O'Brien v. The People, 41 Ill., 456)

The recognizance stated the wrong day as the beginning of the term.

Held, That the essence was the appearance on the first day of the next term; and the mere misstating of the date would not vitiate. Held, also,

That nul tiel recognizance associated with nul tiel record is an improper plea in such an action—the latter being the appropriate plea.

27 P. D.—John G. Kribs v. The People.—Error to Kane.—Opinion per curiam, reversing and remanding.

EMBEZZLEMENT—EVIDENCE.

STATEMENT.—Indictment for embezzlement—one Shaver having placed in the hands of Kribs some money, and taking this receipt therefor:

"ELGIN, ILL., June 26, 1874.

"Received of George W. Shaver five hundred and fifty dollars, to be loaned at ten per cent. for one year from this date. JOHN G. KRIBS."

Afterwards $150 was paid back, namely, in Nov., 1874; and interest at the same time on the whole up to December, 1874,—the balance Kribs converted to his own use. Held,

1. That, if the money was placed in the defendant's hands to be loaned, and he fraudulently converted it to his own use, the charge would lie. But if he merely placed it in his hands to look to him for repayment, the charge would not lie. One cannot resort to the criminal laws to enforce the payment of a debt.

2. In a trial, in such a case, it is error to admit evidence that the defendant collected money from others and converted it to his own use. He cannot be expected to come into court prepared to defend against any other charge than the one in the indictment.

28 P. D.—The People, etc., ex rel Mayo v. The Auditor of Public Accounts.—Petition for mandamus.—Opinion by SHELDON, J., refusing; SCOTT, C. J., dissenting.

REGISTRATION—FUNDING ACTS.

STATEMENT.—Macoupin county issuing a new bond in lieu of a prior indebtedness, occurring since the passage of the act of February 13, 1865, on the subject, and prior to the passage of the act of March 22, 1872, afterwards amended by the act of April 14, 1875. This new bond was presented to the auditor for registration, who refused to register it on the ground that the act of 1865 only related to debts accruing prior to its passage. A mandamus was sued out to compel the registration.

Held, 1. That the act of 1865 only applied to debts having accrued prior to its passage.

2. That the act of 1872 did not repeal that act, either expressly or by implication; since the acts may very well stand together—the purposes of the acts being different, namely—the act of 1865 is for the purpose of funding, and also for providing for payment by taxation; the acts of 1872 and 1875 are simply for funding indebtedness.

3. Nor can the later acts be regarded as amending that of 1865. Neither amendments nor repeals by implication are ever favored.

26 P. D.—John G. Kribs v. The People, etc. (Second case.)—Error to Kane.—Opinion by SCHOLFIELD, J., Reversing.

DISTINCTION BETWEEN LARCENY UNDER EMBEZZLEMENT ACT AND AT COMMON LAW.

STATEMENT.—Indictment for larceny as at common law, as to the money placed in defendant's hands, by Shaver (as supra), yet under the embezzlement statute.

Held, 1. That the indictment must set out the case of embezzlement, and then aver that so the defendant committed larceny; because the defendant's fiduciary character, which is the distinguishing feature between embezzlement and larceny, must be specially averred.

2. The larceny embezzlement statutes were solely and exclusively passed for private cases which larceny at common law did not include. Nothing that is larceny at common law is larceny under the embezzlement statute; and nothing that is larceny under the embezzlement statute is larceny at common law.

3. Where a prosecutor never had the money interest in his own hands—as where one sells a lot and converts the proceeds to his own use—the offense is not larceny at common law, the prosecutor never having had possession.

3. James G. Wright et al. v. Frank Troutman.—Error to Coles.—Opinion by CRAIG, J., affirming.

ASSIGNMENT OF LIEN IN CONTRACT FOR SALE OF LANDS—WHAT IS A VENDOR'S LIEN.

STATEMENT.—Lands bargained for under a contract of sale, providing that a full conveyance would be made on payment of the purchase money, ($6,000.) The contract and notes were assigned by the vendor to Troutman, who brought bill in equity to foreclose the "vendor's lien."

It was objected that a vendor's lien was not assignable; and therefore the action could not be maintained. A decree was rendered for complainant, directing payment or sale, etc. Held,

1. That this was not a vendor's lien, and was, therefore, assignable. A vendor's lien is an implied lien, where land has been conveyed, and the purchase money not fully paid. It is lost if another security is given, and it does not exist where, as in the present case, there is but a contract of sale providing expressly for retaining the title until payment—thus holding the land for security of the payment.

2. Such contract is as fully assignable as is a mortgage; so that an assignee can sue upon it.

4.—Ephraim Jennings v. Benson C. Harkle et al.—Error to Cumberland.—Opinion by SCOTT, Ch. J., affirming.

MECHANICS' LIEN AS TO A DISORGANIZED RELIGIOUS SOCIETY—OWNER'S LIABILITY THEREUNDER.

STATEMENT.—Plaintiff in error donated to a religious society a lot, on condition that they should build a house on it—lodging a deed in the hands of a third party to await the fulfilment of the condition. But the society disbanded, it seems, before the building was completed. Defendants in error furnished materials for the building, and brought suit to enforce the lien.

It was objected that the society ought to be made defendants, also. Held,

1. That a sufficient answer to this objection was that the society was disbanded, and had no existence.

2. That the owner of the lot succeeded to its interests. And as he knew of the erection of the building on the lot, and raised no objection, the lien could properly be enforced against him.

7.—Albert Cutright et al. v. Joseph R. Stanford et al.—Error to Cumberland.—Opinion by BREESE, J., affirming.

REIMBURSEMENT BY HEIRS — EXTENT OF THEIR LIABILITY—res adjudicata.

STATEMENT.—The plaintiffs in error were heirs-at-law of John Cutright, deceased. The defendants in error were executors of James E. Stanford, deceased, formerly administrator of the estate of John Cutright. During the administration, all the claims filed and allowed within the two years' limitation, were paid, leaving in the hands of the administrator, a large amount for distribution among these heirs. The distribution was made thereof, and a final settlement was had with the probate court.

But one Fox filed a claim, and had it allowed, after the two years had expired, based on a judgment previously obtained in the United States court—Fox being a non-resident—against the administrator, on the ground that the intestate was a stockholder in a railroad company indebted to him. The judgment was recovered by default. Fox began suit on the administrator's bond, after the distribution, and the administrator paid the claim. These executors brought the present suit for reimbursement of this amount, so paid for the estate descended to these heirs. Held,

1. That the heirs are liable to reimburse, to the extent of the property which descended to them severally.

2. That a decree for this purpose should be against them all jointly, for the whole amount; but to be paid pro rata, according to the property descending to each only.

3. As to the liability of the ancestor, as stockholder, that was res adjudicata in a competent court. The failure of the administrator to defend will be presumed to be because there was no defense available, as to the liability based on the intestate's having been a stockholder.

11. T. W. & W. R. R. Co. v. The People, use, etc.—Error to Sangamon.—Opinion by SHELDON, J., affirming.

SUIT FOR OBSTRUCTING CROSSING BY TRAIN—R. R. COMPANY'S LIABILITY THEREFOR.

STATEMENT.—Suit for obstructing crossing by railroad trains; brought primarily against the company, instead of the conductor, or engineer, under 53rd section, namely; "Every conductor, or engineer, violating the provisions of the preceding section, shall, for each offence, forfeit the sum of not less than $10, nor more than $100, to be recovered in an action of debt, in the name of the people of the State of Illinois, for the use of any person who may sue for the same; and the corporation on whose road the offence is committed shall be liable for the like sum."

It was contended that "the like sum" meant the sum for which the servant had been previously convicted—the sentence being the measure of the amount—which would render strictly necessary the prior conviction of the servant, in order to render the company liable at all. But the court held,

That such prior conviction is not necessary, and that the design of the statute is to make either the conductor, or engineer, or company, liable for the act.

12. James M. Hoagland v. Gideon Creed, et al., etc.—Error from Morgan.—Opinion by BREESE, J., dismissing writ of error.

NO JUDGE CAN BE CONSTITUTED BY AGREEMENT OF PARTIES.

STATEMENT.—Parties agreed to have a case heard by a member of the bar—who afterwards signed a bill of exceptions as Judge of the Circuit court. Held,

1. That no consent can confer jurisdiction, in such a case; and no valid judicial decision can be thus rendered; and not even a valid award, since the agreement is not a submission to arbitration. The judgment is simply a nullity.

2. There is no provision in our constitution for a temporary filling of the office of judge. Judges are only to be chosen in the manner prescribed by law; and a stipulation by parties that any other person than the judge shall exercise his functions in their case, is nugatory; even if the judge vacates his seat for the purpose of the hearing.

13.—Thomas L. Morgan et al. v. Henry D. Corlies.—Error to Champaign.—Opinion by CRAIG, J., affirming.

JUDGES IN OTHER CIRCUITS THAN THEIR OWN—JUDGE HAVING BEEN OF COUNSEL—STIPULATION IN A CHANCERY CAUSE—OBJECTIONS TO DEPOSITION, WHEN MUST BE MADE—EVIDENCE IN A DECREE.

STATEMENT.—During the pendency of a chancery cause, a considerable number of different judges sat in the court, and made orders, etc. The resident judge had been of counsel. It was urged that the record should show the reason why another circuit judge sat, or the proceedings are void. It was also objected that the resident judge, having been of counsel, ought not to have made any order in the case. Held,

1. That a circuit judge of one circuit may properly hold court in another circuit. And, although it were advisable to state in the placita that the non-resident judge presided at the request of the resident judge, yet this will be presumed in the absence of anything showing the contrary.

2. That even if a judge had been of counsel, he could properly make an order, unless objection was interposed at the time.

3. Where there is a stipulation on file that in consideration of an extension of time in which to answer, the answer should be to the merits, a plea instead of answer will be regarded as a violation of the stipulation, and may properly be stricken from the files.

4. An objection to depositions, as that they were without caption or certificate cannot be made for the first time in the Supreme Court.

5. Where facts found in a decree are alleged in the bill and admitted in the answer, the evidence of the facts needs not to be set out in the decree.

18. — John H. Daniels v. Frederick Aholtz.—Error to Edgar.—Opinion by DICKEY, J., affirming.

TRESPASS BY ONE UNKNOWINGLY AND UNDER DECEPTION.

STATEMENT. — Aholtz and Prather owned a tract of land each adjoining, and under one fence, in a single field. They both cultivated corn therein. Prather gathered his, and sold to Daniels the stalks, before Aholtz had gathered his, Prather representing the whole field to belong to himself, and selling the whole of the stalks to Daniels. The cattle being turned in, trespassed on Aholtz's corn. He brought suit against both, and recovered a judgment, which Daniels brought up on error; held,

That although Daniels was deceived and knew nothing of Aholtz's ownership, yet, as his cattle did the damage to the corn, he was liable for the trespass and damage thereby occasioned.

19.—Samuel C. Conwell v. John McCowen et al.—Error to Tazewell.—Opinion by SCOTT, Ch. J., affirming.

SUBROGATION.

STATEMENT.—These parties were partners, and, as such, contracted a debt with one Thompson, and gave a note with personal security. Afterwards, they dissolved partnership, and Conwell agreed to pay the debts of the firm, including the Thompson note. As an act to indemnify McCowen, he gave Thompson a mortgage in addition to the personal security. McCowen had, however, to pay the note in part, he being one of the principals thereon. He then brought a bill to be subrogated to Thompson, as his rights under the mortgage, so far as he had paid the claim. A decree was so rendered, and a decree of foreclosure entered; held,

That McCowen was properly subrogated to the rights of Thompson, so far as he had paid the note.

22.—Samuel R. Arbuckle v. The Midland R. R. Co.—Appeal from Edgar.—Opinion by WALKER, J., affirming.

LIEN LAWS FOR LABOR AND MATERIALS ON R. R.—LIMITATION.

STATEMENT. — Complainant brought a bill to enforce a lien for labor and materials, rendered in 1870, to the Paris and Decatur R. R. Co., under a contract with a contractor, and not with the company directly. He alleged notice to the company, and also a subsequent consolidation with the companies forming the Midland; held,

1. That the mechanic's lien law of 1861, gave no lien to a sub-contractor.

2. That, at the best, the claim was lost by the limitation clause of the lien law, the suit not being brought within the three months, nor even for years.

3. The law of 1872 does not relate back to labor and materials previously furnished, and, even if so, the limitation was again fatal to the proceeding.

4. If it be said that colsolidating railroad companies are liable for the debts of the prior companies, yet, in that case, the remedy is herein mistaken.

25.—John F. Rowand v. John Carroll.—Error to Edgar.—Opinion by SHELDON, J., affirming.

AFFIDAVIT FOR—NOTICE BY PUBLICATION INSTEAD OF PERSONAL SERVICE—ASSIGNMENTS OF ERROR.

Held, 1. That an affidavit of non-residence as the basis of publication instead of personal service, may be on information and belief and by another than the party: because the facts to be stated in the affidavit are not, of necessity, peculiarly in the knowledge of a party. And perjury would lie on such an affidavit. In attachment and replevin suits, the affidavits must be positive, because of the language of the statute; but in chancery service, etc., the language of the statute is different, and the same strictness is not required.

2. Errors cannot be assigned which only affect co-parties not joining in prosecuting the writ of error. Unless it can be shown that the rights of the complaining parties—plaintiffs in error—are prejudiced by the error, particularly relating to another, they cannot be heard thereon.

3. Dower might be assigned in relation to several tracts in a body, even prior to the statute of 1865 expressly allowing it.

33.—Frank J Hoffman, etc., v. William M. Fitzwilliam et al.—Appeal from McLean.—Opinion by SCOTT, Ch. J., affirming.

GARNISHMENT OF WAGES—RESTRICTIONS THEREON—WAGES AFTER SERVICE OF THE WRIT.

Held, That after the service of a writ of garnishment, a laborer may lift his subsequently earned wages, as they become due, provided the installments do not exceed $25, he being the head of a family, and residing with them. And an employer will be protected in paying such wages as they become due, after the service of the writ, in sums not more than $25. And even if a contract be terminated after the writ is served, and a new one entered into at the same salary, payable in advance, this act will make no difference as to the liability.

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

OPINION FILED JUNE 30, 1876.

WILLIAM ROTH v. MARY EPPY.

Appeal from Peoria.

THE LIQUOR LAW—SUIT BY WIFE FOR DAMAGES AGAINST LIQUOR SELLER—LAW NOT REPEALED BEFORE ACTION—THE REVISION—INTOXICATION—EXEMPLARY DAMAGES.

1. WHERE SEVERAL CAUSE THE INTOXICATION.—Where it was alleged that the intoxication was caused in whole by the defendant, and the proof was that the intoxication was caused only in part by the defendant, held, that a recovery might be had.

2. LAW NOT REPEALED.—That the revision of 1874 did not affect the right of action of the plaintiff under the act of 1872, so as to defeat it.

3. INTOXICATION.—What constitutes intoxication is a question of fact, to be determined by the jury upon the whole evidence, in the light of their own observation.

4. EVIDENCE AS TO EMPLOYMENT.—That, as bearing upon the question of damages, it was proper to show any want of, and inability to, obtain employment, in consequence of Eppy's previous habits of intoxication.

5. EXEMPLARY DAMAGES.—That to support a finding of exemplary damages, there must be a finding of actual damage, and that without this, exemplary damages cannot be awarded. This was what was decided in Freese v. Tripp, 70 Ill., 496, as to damages; nothing more.

6. RIGHT OF ACTION.—The court states who has a right of action under the statute.

7. DAMAGES EXCESSIVE.—The objection that the damages are excessive, is not sustained.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.

Opinion by SHELDON, J.

This was an action on the case, brought on September 24th, 1874, by Mary Eppy, under the liquor act, against William Roth, to recover for injury in her means of support, in consequence of the habitual intoxication of her husband, George Eppy, from intoxicating liquors sold and given to him by Roth. The plaintiff in the court below recovered a verdict and judgment for $1,200, and the defendant appealed.

Appellee's husband had, for years, been drinking to excess at appellant's drinking saloon, and continued to drink there up to the time he became insane, June 21st, 1874. He was sent to the insane Asylum at Elgin in July, 1874, and remained there under treatment until some time in April, 1875, when he was released and returned home.

There are various reasons urged for the reversal of the judgment.

The averment in the declaration is, that the defendant sold and gave to Eppy intoxicating liquors, "and thereby caused him the said George Eppy to become, and he was during that time before named, habitually intoxicated." It is claimed this is an averment that the intoxication was caused in whole by the defendant, and that such must be the proof; that it is not sufficient that the intoxication was caused in part by defendant; and that the most which the proof shows, is that defendant caused the intoxication in part.

The statute gives the right of action where the defendant shall have caused the intoxication in whole or in part. Contracts are entire and must be proved substantially as alleged, but torts are divisible, and in them the plaintiff may prove a part of his charge and recover, if there be enough proved to support the tort. Hite v. Blanford, 45 Ill., 9.

This objection we regard as without force. The point is made that the statute upon which appellee relied for a recovery was repealed before the suit was instituted. The suit was brought under the provisions of an act entitled, "An act to provide against the evils resulting from the sale of intoxicating liquors in the State of Illinois," approved January 13th, 1872. It is said this act was fully revised by the statutes of 1874, in an act entitled, "An act to provide for the licensing of and against the evils arising from the sale of intoxicating liquors," approved March 30th, 1874, and in force July 1st, 1874. That the statute of 1874 was a revision of the whole subject, and was intended as a substitute for the act of 1874, and therefore the act of 1872 was repealed, and ceased to be in force July 1st, 1874, which was before the commencement of this suit. A complete answer is found to this position on page 1012, Rev. Stat. 1874, under sections 2 and 4, where it is provided that no new law shall be construed to repeal a former law, whether such former law is expressly repealed or not, as to any offense committed against the former law, or as to any act done, or any right accrued, or claim arising under the former law, or in any way whatever to affect any such offense or act so committed or done, or any right accrued, or claim arising before the new law takes effect, save only that the proceedings thereafter shall conform so far as practicable to the laws in force at the time of such proceeding.

It is insisted that the evidence fails to show any habitual intoxication on the part of George Eppy.

It is conceded by appellant's council, that the insanity of Eppy was caused by long, continued excessive use of alcoholic liquors, that he had been in the habit of using intoxicating liquors to excess for many years, but it is denied that it was to the extent of being habitually intoxicated.

Very many witnesses on both sides were examined upon this point. Facts were detailed, and the opinions of witnesses given. There was a conflict of testimony as to the opinions of witnesses, whether at the various times testified to, the condition of Eppy, from the liquor he drank was one of intoxication or not. The testimony of some of the witnesses was, that they frequently saw Eppy at defendant's place intoxicated. Other witnesses stated his condition as verging on but not amounting to actual intoxication.

The question was one of fact for the determination of the jury, upon the whole evidence in the light of their own observation.

We think the decision of the question should rest with the finding of the jury, no sufficient reason appearing for disturbing it. It is insisted that the court below admitted improper, and rejected proper evidence.

Eppy having recovered, he returned home from the insane asylum in April, 1875, and inquiries were made of witnesses, as to his efforts to get employment, to obtain his former situation as locomotive engineer on the railroad, and his inability to do so. Exception was taken to such inquiries, which were permitted.

As bearing upon the question of damages, it was proper to show any want of and inability to obtain employment, in consequence of Eppy's previous habits of intoxication. The inquiry as to his desire for intoxicating liquors should have been excluded, but the refusal to exclude the inquiry was not of sufficient importance to amount to a fatal error.

Some evidence as to Eppy and his wife drinking together, was excluded, which might properly have been received, on the question of exemplary damages; but there was much other evidence of the same character which was received, which was abundantly sufficient for all purpose of advantage to the defendant on that head.

There was no error in not admitting proof of a license.

Objection is taken to the giving, modifying and refusing of instructions. Several of the questions raised under the instructions were met and disposed of adversely to the views of appellant's counsel, in the case of Hackett v. Smelsley, decided at the January term, 1875, and we need not further allude thereto. Other questions are sufficiently disposed of by what has already been said.

The third instruction for the plaintiff was that, under its hypothesis, the jury had a right, if they thought proper, to allow the plaintiff such punitive damages as they thought the evidence warranted.

It is erroneously supposed that this militates against the decision in Freese v. Tripp, 70 Ill., 496. All that was there decided in respect to exemplary damages, was that, to support a finding of exemplary damages, there must be a finding of actual damages, and that without this, exemplary damages cannot be awarded. But the present instruction was on the hypothesis, among others, that actual damages had been sustained. The employment, in the instruction, of the words "punitive damages" instead of "exemplary damages," was not material. They are synonymous terms. Hackett v. Smelsley, supra.

Some of the instructions for plaintiff may be faulty in being argumentative, but there is not sufficient in this respect to make them fatally erroneous.

We perceive no error in any modification which was made of defendant's instructions. The 15th instruction asked by the defendant, which the court refused to give, was one that assumed to define the words "habitual intoxication." These are terms in common use, generally understood in their application, more or less familiar to the observation of all unlearned persons, of no peculiar legal signification, calling for judicial exposition.

The definition which was here asked to be given, was not especially instructive to a jury. We do not consider that, for the want of this instruction, there was a loss to the jury of any words of essential enlightenment on the question of what was habitual intoxication.

Appellant's 5th refused instruction, was to the effect that defendant was not responsible for consequences which he or any reasonable or prudent man could not reasonably have foreseen as the natural consequence of selling liquors to the plaintiff's husband.

The provision of the statute is, that one who shall be injured in person or property, or means of support, in consequence of the intoxication, habitual or otherwise, of any person, shall have the right of action. We regard the instruction as properly refused.

Appellant's 6th refused instruction is confused, not sufficiently intelligible, and properly enough refused by the court.

Appellant's 12th refused instruction was calculated to mislead the jury, who would be likely to conclude from it that they could not, in their verdict, go beyond the actual damages sustained and give exemplary damages.

The remarks already made in reference to appellee's 3d instruction, are applicable to this 12th refused instruction

It is lastly complained that the damages are excessive. From an examination of the evidence, we see no sufficient ground for any interference with the verdict of the jury on this score.

Finding no error in the record sufficient for the reversal of the judgment, it must be affirmed.

Judgment affirmed.

BREESE, J.—I do not concur in this opinion, believing instructions one, three and five for plaintiff should not have been given. I think the damages are excessive, as plaintiff knew the habits of her husband when she married him.

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

OPINION FILED JUNE 30, 1876.

THE PEOPLE ex rel., etc., v. THE BOARD OF TRADE OF THE CITY OF CHICAGO AND THE DIRECTORS THEREOF.

Appeal from Cook.

THE BOARD OF TRADE—EXPELLING MEMBERS—POWER OF COURT TO RESTORE.

Held, that a court has no jurisdiction by mandamus to compel the Board of Trade of Chicago, which is to be regarded as a voluntary association, to restore a member who has been expelled.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.

Opinion by WALKER, J.

The General Assembly granted a charter authorizing a number of persons and their associates to form, in the city of Chicago, a board of trade. The organization was perfected, officers elected, by-laws adopted, and the objects of the incorporation carried into operation. Thomas Rice, the relator, applied to and became a member of the body. In the year 1872 he was a member of the firm of John B. Lyon & Co., which consisted of Lyon, Rice and George J. Bime. The firm was largely engaged in buying and selling grain during the month of August of that year. They purchased a considerable quantity of wheat of Dugan, Case & Co., and also of the firm of T. H. Seymour & Co., also 10,000 bushels of corn of this latter firm.

On the 22d of August, 1872, wheat suddenly declined largely in price. The wheat and corn was deliverable at the seller's option, a portion during that month, and a portion at any time during the year. On this decline in price the sellers who had deposited margins according to the rules of the board of trade necessary to secure the performance of their part of the contract, called on the firm of J. B. Lyon & Co., to deposit further margins, as they were authorized to do by the rules of the board of trade. This J. B. Lyon & Co. failed to do, and thereupon the respective venders proceeded, under the second section of the 9th rule of the Board of Trade, to give notice to Lyon & Co. that the contract must be considered as filled at the market price, and demanded payment of the difference between the selling and market price. The bill for the difference was presented for payment. Its correctness was admitted, and they at different times made various propositions for the settlement of the claim.

In October, 1873, Dugan, Case & Co. filed a complaint against J. B. Lyon & Co. with the Board of Directors of the Board of Trade. The members of the firm were notified to appear and defend themselves against the charges. They appeared and the hearing was continued from time to time until the 17th of March, 1874, when on a hearing the prosecution was dismissed without prejudice.

On the 3d day of April following, Dugan, Case & Co. petitioned for a rehearing, which was granted, and an order was passed allowing appellant and the other members of his firm to be allowed to appear by counsel, which had been previously denied them. Notice was served upon them, and on the 13th day of April they attended with counsel and obtained a continuance, and subsequently another continuance was granted them. They appeared in person and protested against the trial, denying any jurisdiction of the Board of Directors to try them, and withdrew, declining to offer evidence or make any defense.

The case was heard again, and on the 28th of April the several members of the firm were suspended from the privileges of the board until they should pay the money or otherwise satisfactorily arrange the claim. Rice thereupon filed a petition in the Superior court of Cook county for a writ of mandamus to compel the Board of Trade to restore them to all of the rights and privileges of membership therein. Respondents answered the petition, to which petitioners demurred, and the court below entered a pro forma order denying the writ, and relator appeals to this court.

No question has been raised whether the court below had jurisdiction to entertain the application for, and to award the writ of madamus. Has relator such an interest or legal right to a membership in the board as will be regarded by a court of justice? It is true that the body is organized under a statutory charter, and so are churches, Masonic bodies and Odd-Fellows, and temperance lodges; but we presume no one would imagine that a court would take cognizance of a case arising in either of those organizations, to compel them to restore to membership a person suspended or expelled from the privileges of the organization. They being organized by voluntary association, and not for the transaction of business, but for the purpose of inculcating their precepts and trusts, not for pecuniary gain but for the advancement of morals and for the improvement of their members, they are left to adopt their constitutions, by-laws and regulations for admitting, suspending, or expelling their members. This organization is not maintained for the transaction of business, or for pecuniary gain, but simply to promulgate and enforce among its members correct and high moral principles in the transaction of business. It is not engaged in business, but only prescribes rules for the transaction of business. In the organization of churches and the other bodies referred to, each person, on becoming a member, expressly or by implication, pledges himself to stand to and abide by all rules, edicts and regulations adopted by the organization. And it appears that all persons becoming members of the Board of Trade, do the same thing. And the body has the right to make, ordain and establish by-laws, rules and regulations for the government of the body and its members in their connection with it. It may be that when a corporation is created for the purpose of pursuing some pecuniary business for the acquisition of profits and gains for its members as stockholders, and a member is deprived of a right or privilege conferred by their charter, that a court would, by mandamus, compel the body to admit such member to the exercise of his rights. In that case, a member or shareholder has such a pecuniary interest as might enable him to be protected or be admitted to the exercise of such rights by legal process. But courts never interfere to control the enforcement of the by-laws of merely voluntary associations, created for the advancement of religious, moral and social principles, or merely for amusement. In such organizations they must be left to enforce their rules and regulations by such means as they may adopt for their government. The Board of Trade, so far as we can see, is only a voluntary organization, which their charter fully empowers them to govern, in such mode as they may deem most desirable and proper.

They have adopted their by-laws, provided a forum for their enforcement, which has acted thereunder, and the court will not interfere to control their action. It is true that in the case of Paige v. The Board of Trade, 45 Ill., 112, this court proceeded to investigate and decide the questions there presented and arising out of the by-laws of this corporation. But in that case no question was raised as to the power of the court to entertain jurisdiction to grant the relief sought. Inasmuch as we regard it as obvious that appellant has failed to disclose a right which entitles him to the relief sought, we must decline to review and pass upon the action of the court below, in refusing to award the writ to compel the Board of Trade to admit him to membership in that organization. The appeal will, therefore, be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

OPINION FILED JUNE 30, 1876.

NICHOLAS BERDEL v. CATHARINE BERDEL.

Appeal from the Superior Court of Cook County.

BILL AND CROSS-BILL FOR DIVORCE ON CHARGES OF CRUELTY AND DESERTION.

1. "Bruises and marks observed and sworn to (by witness) were competent testimony in confirmation of the evidence given by the complainant."

2. "It is the peculiar province of the jury to reconcile the conflict in the proof, and determine from all the evidence, whether the truth was on the side of the complainant or the defendant; and when this has been done, free from passion and prejudice, and the record contains evidence sufficient to sustain or justify the finding, the result of the verdict must be regarded as final."

3. It was error to admit evidence of complainant's good character—her good character not being in issue. But the evidence adduced being of no intrinsic strength or weight, could do no harm, and court will not reverse on that ground.

4. "It is only an error that works an injury that should reverse."

Opinion by CRAIG, J.

This was a bill for divorce brought by Catharine Berdel against Nicholas Berdel, her husband. The bill charges the defendant with acts of extreme and repeated cruelty inflicted upon the person of the complainant, and also alleges desertion for the space of two years.

To the bill the defendant put in an answer in which he denied each and every charge therein contained He also filed a cross-bill, in which he charged the complainant with desertion, without cause, for more than two years upon which ground he prayed for a divorce. To the cross-bill the complainant put in an answer denying the charges therein contained. Replications having been filed, a trial on both bill and cross-bill was had before a jury, which resulted in a verdict in favor of the complainant in each of the cases presented by her bill, and against the defendant on the cross-bill. The court, on motion, set aside the finding in the charge of desertion, but sustained the verdict as to extreme and repeated cruelty. A decree was therefore rendered dissolving the marriage and dismissing the cross-bill; to reverse which this appeal has been brought by the defendant in the original bill.

Two errors are assigned upon the record. First, that the verdict was contrary to the evidence; and second, that the court erred in admitting evidence of the character of the complainant.

The complainant and defendant were married in 1855, and resided together in Cook county until 1861, when the former left the home of her husband, and they have not since resided together.

The complainant claims that the cause of her leaving was on account of repeated acts of personal violence received from her husband; while, on the other hand, it is claimed she was well treated, and deserted her husband of her own accord, and not through any improper treatment on his part.

The evidence introduced before the jury, bearing upon the conduct of the parties, and the causes that led to the separation, is voluminous and exceedingly contradictory. We shall not enter upon a critical analysis of the evidence, as such would be of no practical benefit to the parties or the profession. We have, however, carefully examined the testimony, and while we would be better satisfied with the decree, if the evidence was less conflicting, yet, under the uniform rulings of this court, we perceive no ground upon which the decree, based upon the verdict rendered by the jury, can be reversed.

The complainant, in her evidence, testifies to numerous acts of personal violence on the part of her husband, which were unjustifiable and without cause or provocation; and, if her evidence be true, there can be no doubt but a clear case for divorce was established. But, independent of her evidence, on several occasions the marks of violence were discovered on her person by her neighbors; often she complained to have received blows from her husband.

While this character of evidence is not as satisfactory as if witnesses had been produced who saw the blows given, yet the bruises and marks observed and sworn to were competent testimony in confirmation of the evidence given by the complainant. It was also proven, that on two occasions, when the complainant returned to the house of the defendant, he allowed her to be assaulted in his presence; and in his own house, on one occasion, as the evidence shows, pushed down stairs; and on another, her hair was torn from her head, and her clothing badly injured by an inmate of the house, while, as one witness testifies, the defendant held the complainant so she could not defend herself.

It is true the defendant, in his evidence, positively denies every and all acts of violence, and says that he never in any manner mistreated or abused the complainant, and testifies to misconduct on her part, and introduces other evidence tending to establish the truth of his own. It was, therefore, the peculiar province of the jury to reconcile the conflict in the proof, and determine from all the evidence whether the truth was on the side of the complainant or the defendant; and when this has been done, free from passion or prejudice, and the record contains evidence sufficient to sustain or justify the finding, the result of the verdict must be regarded final. As was said (Coursey v. Coursey, 60 Ills., 186) the jury had the witnesses before them, and have passed upon the weight of evidence.

It is, however, argued that the court erred in permitting the complainant to introduce evidence of good character in the neighborhood where she resided.

The rule, as stated by Starkie, vol. 2, page 364, is this: There are three classes of cases in which the moral character and conduct of a person in society may be used in proof before a jury, each resting upon peculiar and distinct grounds. Such evidence is admissible, 1st, to afford a presumption that a particular party has or has not been guilty of a criminal act. 2ndly, to affect the damages in particular cases where their amount depends upon the character and conduct of any individual. And 3rdly, to impeach or confirm the veracity of a witness. This we understand to be the general rule on the subject.

While it is true the defendant introduced, on the trial, evidence of specific acts of the complainant tending to reflect upon her character for sobriety and modest, peaceable behavior, yet, under the rule announced by Starkie, we do not understand that she had the right to rebut by proof of general good character. Her general good character was not in issue. But upon an examination of the proof called on this subject, we fully agree with the counsel for appellant, when they say it was "of no intrinsic strength or weight;" and for that very reason it could do the defendant no harm. And while it was error to admit the proof, we cannot, on that ground, reverse. It is only an error that works an injury that should reverse. The decree will therefore be affirmed.

Affirmed.

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

OPINION FILED JUNE 30, 1876.

THE NORTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY v. THE PEOPLE, etc., ex rel. MILLER.

Appeal from the County Court of Cook Co.

EXEMPTION FROM TAXATION — AMENDMENT TO CHARTER—HOW FAR UNCONSTITUTIONAL.

The exemption in the amendment to the charter of the Northwestern University, to the effect "that all property, of whatever kind or description, belonging to or owned by said corporation, shall be forever free from taxation, for any and all purposes," is unconstitutional and void, in so far as it attempts to exempt from taxation any other property than that which is directly used for educational purposes. It was not competent for the General Assembly, under the Constitution of 1848, which was in force at the date of this amendment, to grant an exemption so broad and sweeping in its character.

The general principle upon which taxation was required to be levied by the Constitution of 1848, was that of uniformity, and exemptions were exceptional, and therefore to be construed strictly. Such exemptions are in derogation of public right—there are no presumptions in their favor—and every reasonable doubt should be resolved against them.

It not being competent for the General Assembly to make the exemption, the attempt was a nullity, and the case is not affected by the provision of the Constitution of the United States forbidding the impairing of the obligation of a contract.

SCHOLFIELD, J.—This appeal is from a judgment rendered by the Cook county court against certain lands and town lots in the towns of Evanston and Willmette, in Cook county, for delinquent taxes.

Appellant's claim is that the lands and town lots are exempt from all taxation, which claim is based on the fourth section of an amendment to its charter, approved Feb'y 14, 1855, in these words: "That all property, of whatever kind or description, belonging to or owned by said corporation, shall be forever free from taxation for any and all purposes."

It is conceded by a stipulation, read in evidence on the trial in the court below and made part of the record, that the lands and town lots, the taxation on which is in controversy, "are leased by appellent to different parties on leases for a longer or a shorter time, and that none of them are used or occupied for buildings or other direct appliances for education."

The question we propose to consider is, conceding that the clause we have quoted from appellant's charter is, as it seems to be, broad enough to comprehend these lands and town lots, was it competent for the General Assembly, under the constitution of 1848, which was in force at the date of that enactment, to grant an exemption so broad and sweeping in its character?

It was provided by section three, article nine, of that instrument: "The property of the State and counties, both real and personal, and such other property as the General Assembly may deem necessary for schools, religious and charitable purposes, may be exempted from taxation."

It is not claimed that appellant is, in any sense, a public corporation, but it is claimed that the purpose for which it is created is so far beneficial to the public that it affords a sufficient consideration for the grant of exemption from taxation in the amendments, and that when the amendment was accepted and acted upon by the corporators, it must be held a vested right which cannot be withdrawn by subsequent legislation because of the provision in the constitution of the United States which prohibits a State from passing a law impairing the obligation of a contract.

If it was competent for the General Assembly to make the exemption, we are not disposed to contest the correctness of this position, but if it was not competent to make the exemption, the attempt was a nullity, and the case is not affected by the constitution of the United States.

The corporation being private, the taxpayer, in general, is relieved of no obligation in consequence of the exemption which he would otherwise have to discharge by the payment of taxes, and in proportion as appellant becomes the owner of property which is thereby withdrawn from taxation, the burden of taxation is increased upon him.

The equality between burden and benefit in such cases is presumptive only, and can, if at all, only be true in fact in reference to the public as an aggregate. In the very nature of things, such exemptions must proportionally increase the burdens upon individual tax-payers, in many cases, where there can be no corresponding actual benefits. It is true it is impracticable that there can in any instance of the levy and collection of public taxes be an actual equivalent received by every tax-payer for the full amount he pays; or that there can be any system of taxation devised so perfect in its practical operation that there shall be no inequality in the distribution of the burden—but it has always been recognized that laws imposing taxes were just and equitable in proportion as they approximate such principles, and unjust and inequitable as they depart from them. The general principle upon which taxation was required to be levied by the constitution of 1848 was that of uniformity, and exemptions were exceptional and therefore to be construed strictly, and such is the general rule of construction in regard to exemptions from taxation. Cooley on Taxation, 146; Sedgwick on Stat. and Const. Law, 632. As is said in a recent case by the Supreme court of the United States—Tucker v. Ferguson, 22nd Wallace, 575,—"The taxing power is vital to the functions of government. It helps to support the social compact and give it efficacy. It reaches the interests of every member of the community. It may be restrained by contract in special cases for the public good, where such contracts are not forbidden. But the contract must be shown to exist. There is no presumption in its favor. Every reasonable doubt should be resolved against it. Where it exists it is to be rigidly scrutinized and never permitted to extend, either in scope or duration, beyond what the terms of the concession clearly require. It is in derogation of public right, and narrows a trust created for the good of all."

Bearing in mind this rule of construction, if it had been intended the General Assembly was to be empowered to exempt all property, of whatever kind or description, as is assumed to be done by the amendment to the charter, we must suppose it would have been so said in unmistakable language. By the language of the constitution we have quoted, while a discretion is conferred on the General Assembly, whether to exempt or not, and if it shall determine to exempt the amount of the exemption, it is clearly restricted in the exercise of this discretion, to property for schools and for religious and charitable purposes. Property for such purposes, in the primary and ordinary acceptation of the term, is property which is itself adapted to, and intended to be used as an instrumentality in aid of such purposes. It is the direct or immediate use, and not the remote or consequential benefit to be derived through the means of the property that is contemplated, houses, furniture, grounds, etc., to be actually used for educational purposes, may be said to be for schools or for school purposes, but property to be used in farming or manufacturing, or in trade, is property for farming, for manufacturing, or for trade, and the purpose to which the resulting profits may be devoted does not change its character. So property owned by corporations created for school, religious, or charitable purposes, and property for schools, or religious, or charitable purposes, by no means necessarily mean the same thing. The ownership may extend to all kinds of property authorized by the charter, whether it is such as is to be actually used in connection with the purposes of the incorporation or otherwise; but property for the purposes of the incorporation must be such as to be used in connection with those purposes. An accurate description of the property, the tax upon which is in controversy, would seem to be, "property used for profit for the benefit of the University."

As illustrative and in support of this construction, the following cases, which, though arising on the construction of statutes, are equally pertinent to the construction of like clauses in constitutions, may be referred to.

In the First M. E. Church v. The City of Chicago, 26 Ill., 482, the question was whether under a statute exempting from taxation "every building erected for the use of any literary, religious, benevolent, charitable or scientific institution, a building was exempted of which the third and fourth stories were in one large room used exclusively for religious purposes, while the first and second stories were rented for compensation and the proceeds applied to religious purposes, and it was held the portion rented for compensation was taxable, and the portion occupied for religious purposes was not. The court said: The meaning of the law is, as applied to religious buildings and furniture, that they must be used directly for sacred and not for secular purposes. It is not enough that the profits or income of the secular uses are to be applied to sacred purposes. When money is made by the use of the building, that is profit, no matter to what purpose that money is applied. It will be observed that the words of the statute therein describing the building to be exempted, are, "any building for the use of any literary or religious society," etc., and the argument that the fact that the profits derived from renting were devoted exclusively to religious purposes showed that the rooms rented, as well as the balance, were for the use of the religious society, was equally as forcible and rested on the same premises as does the argument here that the property is for schools, or the purposes of schools, although it is devoted to agricultural or other purposes entirely disconnected from schools, because the profits to be derived from renting it are to be appropriated in aid of the University.

In Pierce v. The Inhabitants of Cambridge, 2nd Cushing, 612, the statute exempted from taxation: "The personal property of all literary, benevolent, charitable and scientific institutions, and such real estate belonging to such institutions as shall be actually occupied by them or by the officers of such institutions for the purposes for which they were incorporated."

The plaintiff was a professor of mathematics and astronomy in Harvard College, and the house and land which he occupied was the property of the college but had been let to him at a rent of $400 a year, and the question was, whether this property was within the exemption of the statute. It was held that it was not; that the occupation of a lessee was not such an occupation as was intended by the statute; but that it would have been otherwise if the building had been erected by one of the professors or officers of the college, and had been occupied by the plaintiff with the permission of the college, and without having any estate therein or paying any rent therefor.

Washburn College v. Com'rs of Shawnee county, 8th Kansas, 344, presented the question whether a quarter section of land held by the plaintiff, which was a literary and educational institution, for the sole purpose of thereafter erecting its permanent buildings thereon, but which was at that time unimproved and unoccupied, was exempt from taxation under a clause in a statute exempting from taxation, "all property used exclusively for State, county and municipal, literary, educational, scientific, religious and charitable purposes," and it was held that it was not. See also Orr v. Baker, 4 Ind., 86; Lowell v. Lowell, 1st Metcalf, 538; State v. Ross, 4th Zabriskie, 497; Wyman v. St. Louis, 17th Mo., 335.

Our conclusion is that it was not competent of the General Assembly to exempt from taxation property owned by educational, religious or charitable corporations which was not itself used directly in aid of the purposes for which the corporations were created, but which was held for profit merely, although the profits were to be devoted to the proper purposes of the corporation. To the extent, therefore, that the 4th section of the amendment to appellant's charter approved February 14th, 1855, assumes to do so, it is to be considered void and of no effect, but no further.

The judgment is affirmed.

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

OPINION FILED JUNE 30, 1876.

CENTRAL CITY HORSE RAILWAY CO. v. FORT CLARK HORSE RAILWAY CO.

Appeal from Peoria.

THE RIGHT OF ONE HORSE RAILROAD COMPANY TO CONDEMN THE TRACK OF ANOTHER—MAY BE TWO HORSE RAILROADS IN ONE STREET.

1. CANNOT CONDEMN A PART OF ROAD. — One competing street railroad company cannot take, by the exercise of the right of eminent domain, a fragment of a competing road in successful operation, and the most valuable part of it, and thus destroy in effect and usefulness and value the remaining fragment.

2. MAY PERHAPS CONDEMN THE WHOLE.—That appellees may, perhaps, by a very liberal construction of the acts cited, and of the eminent domain act, condemn the entire road of appellants, and appropriate it to their use, on paying just compensation therefor.

3. TWO ROADS IN ONE STREE—PUBLIC ACCOMMODATION.—That there is no apparent reason why an easement in this street, wholly independant of that of appellants, should not be granted by the city authorities to appellees, if the public accommodation is not sufficiently subserved by this single road; the street is wide enough for an another independent track, without encroaching upon the public accommodations.

4. LAND NOT IN ACTUAL USE. — In former decisions, the court has held that land not in actual use, or necessary for the use of a railroad, might be condemned, clearly implying if it was in actual use for their track or appurtenances, it was not subject to condemnation by another road.—[ED LEGAL NEWS.

Opinion of the court by BREESE, J.

The General Assembly of this State, on February 21, 1867, passed an act entitled, "An act to provide for the construction of horse railways in the city of Peoria," by which the corporations therein named were authorized and empowered to construct and maintain horse railways along such streets in the city of Peoria, as the city council might authorize.

The city council, on October 6, 1869, adopted an ordinance authorizing complainant to construct and maintain horse railways along certain streets named therein, of which Adams street was one, the whole length thereof. Complainant duly organized as a corporation under the act of 1867, built and equipped a horse railway along Adams street, and commenced operating the same, nearly three miles, in December, 1870, at a cost of eight thousand dollars. It was the first railway of the kind constructed in that city, and when the enterprise was inaugurated, it was understood to be of doubtful result to the proprietors, in a financial view, and can only reach productive results by continuing it in its entirety under exclusive supervision of one authority and head.

In July, 1872, certain individuals became an incorporation under the general law, under the corporate name of the "Fort Clark Horse Railway Company." Articles of incorporation were duly executed, and filed in the office of the secretary of State, and the usual license, by that functionary, to commissioners named therein, to open books for subscription to its capital stock.

In May, 1873, the report of the commissioners, filed in the office of the secretary of State, showed the entire stock had been subscribed. The corporation was duly organized May 17th, 1873, whereupon the secretary of State issued a certificate of incorporation.

Before the organization of this company had been perfected, and on August 6th, 1872, the city council of Peoria passed an ordinance conferring upon a railroad company, with the name of defendants' company, authority to construct and maintain a horse railway over certain streets in the city, within certain limits. Some eight different streets, of which Adams was not one.

In August, 1874, complainant's company, having completed their road four years previously, and then in the profitable enjoyment of their franchise, producing some equivalent for their great outlay, were met by an application of this last constituted corporation to the city council, requesting that body to pass an ordinance to confer upon the defendant's company authority to construct and operate a horse railway, to depart from their line of way already there established and operated therein, so as to occupy Adams street, then occupied by complainants.

The city council passed the ordinance permitting defendants to build and operate a railway on Adams street to Harrison street, and reciting therein that the public interest forbid laying any more tracks on Adams and Main streets. The defendant's company were authorized and empowered and required to run their cars on and over, and to use for that purpose any and all the tracks and rails now laid on Adams street and Main street, and to make the necessary connections with the same, "provided they should first acquire, by purchase from the owners or by condemnation or other legal means, the rights to use and run over said tracks and rails."

To avail itself of this ordinance, the defendant's company, in October, 1874, presented their petitions to the judge of the Peoria county court, to proceed, according to the acts in force July 1st, 1872, respecting eminent domain, to assess the damages to be paid complainant's company for taking and appropriating to the use of defendant's company the railroad track, iron, ties and superstructure along that portion of Adams street running between Main street on the northeast and Harrison on the southwest, fronting the three blocks numbered on the easterly side as 6, 5 and 33, and on the westerly side as blocks 10, 11, 32.

The proceedings for condemnation were set for trial on October 21st, 1874, to prevent which this bill was filed, alleging the results of such proceedings would be a destruction of complainant's franchise, and productive of irreparable damage to them.

An injunction was prayed and granted.

An answer was put in to the bill and a replication thereto, and on the hearing the injunction was dissolved and the bill dismissed. Complainants appealed.

We shall not discuss all the questions raised upon this record, but confine ourselves to such points, the discussion of which will be decisive of the case.

It is not shown in any part of the case, where the fee in Adams street is vested. We will assume it is in the city. The grant of an easement therein by the city to the appellant was in 1869. That of appellees was in 1872 and before the company was organized. The right of appellants was consequently prior in time to any right claimed by appellee.

It would seem from the plot of the city of Peoria, made on exhibit in this cause, with the lines of these contesting roads distinctly marked thereon, that appellants road extends from South street on the southwest along Adams street, by a straight line northeasterly to Abington street, in close proximity to the Chicago Rock Island and Pacific Railroad, and near to the Peoria City Water Works, a distance, from its commencement to its terminus, of three miles as is alleged.

The width of this street is not noted on the map, nor is there any scale of feet. To the eye it appears to be a very wide street, capable, without detriment to the public, of allowing space sufficient for two railroads, did the public necessity demand greater accommodations than appellants' railroad could supply.

From the map we should judge the lines already established by these companies, are in a great measure, competing lines, that of appellees being parallel with appellants' line for many streets, the street next westerly of appellant's terminus to Main street, a distance, judging by the eye, of near one-half of appellants road.

The proposition of appellees is, after their road has reached Main street it shall be permitted to make a sharp turn to the southeast along Main street, to its intersection with Adams street, thence southwesterly, taking possession of appellants' road, the distance of three blocks. Then turn short to the northwestward one block along Harrison street to their line of road on Franklin street, thus breaking appellant's road nearly in the middle and rendering their franchise comparatively worthless.

The question then is, under the laws of this state, can a competing horse railway company, in an incorporated city, acquire, by compulsion, title to or the joint use of the track and superstructure of another like corporation, and for the express purpose of making the tracks so compulsorily taken a portion of its own line.

At first blush the proposition seems so indefensible as to cause no hesitation in giving a negative answer;

Appellees say this right, now claimed by them, is, if not expressly, at least impliedly conferred by chapter 66 R. S. 1874, title "Horse and Dummy Railroads." p. 571.

An examination of that act shows that private property, not property used and occupied by the public, was alone in the contemplation of the legislature when the act was passed.

If that kind of roads were thought of or designed to be included in the act why were they not named? Section 3 provides, no such company shall have the right to locate or construct its road upon or along any street or alley, or over any public ground in any incorporated city, town or village without the consent of the corporate authorities of such city, town or village, nor upon any road or highway.

It is a strained construction of this statute to include within its terms, roads, authority to construct which had been granted by the city, and in actual use.

We do not wish to be understood as holding one railroad company may not condemn the road of another, under a power granted by the legislature so to do. On this we express no opinion, but we do insist, an established railroad being a public institution, and useful only in its entirety, cannot be cut up and sectionized by a competing road, acting under the ordinance of a city council.

Proceedings might be instituted, perhaps, to condemn the entire road and franchise, and thus pass it over, as an entirety, to the competing road; but that one competing road can break it here and another there, at a different point, taking to themselves the most productive portions of the road, and leaving the unproductive fragments to the first proprietors, we do not believe, and have seen no authority giving countenance to a doctrine in its operation so unjust and at war with first principles. And we are at a loss to understand how this part of appellants' franchise, occupying the most populous and business part of the city, can be operated jointly by these competitors. But whether it can or not be safely done is unimportant to inquire, as, in our opinion, one competing street railroad company cannot take, by the exercise of the right of eminent domain, a fragment of a competing road in successful operation, and the most valuable part of it, and thus destroy, in effect, and usefulness, and value, the remaining fragments.

Appellees may, perhaps, by a very liberal construction of the acts cited, and of the eminent domain act, condemn the entire road of appellants, and appropriate it to their use, on paying just compensation therefor.

Appellees say they seek only to take the use of a small portion of appellant's track. Herein lies the insuperable objection to this proceeding. Take the whole, or none, is the command of justice and honesty. It is not at all like the case of an ordinary proceeding to condemn private property for a railroad, in which it would be no answer to say, take my whole farm, or the whole tract, or none. In such case there would be no propriety in such a demand by the proprietors of the land. Here is wanted a portion of appellants' franchise, the exclusive use of which by them gives value to the whole franchise. There is then, manifest propriety in saying to the competing roads, take all or none.

There is no apparent reason why an easement, in this street, wholly independent of that of appellants, should not be granted by the city authorities to appellees, if the public accommodation is not sufficiently subserved by this single road. The street is wide enough for another independent track, without encroaching upon the public accommodations.

The plausible plea of public policy forbidding another track there, may be a mere cover for a purpose. We see no ground, legal, just or equitable, for this grasping claim of appellees, and it should not receive the favorable consideration of a court of justice and of equity.

It is unnecessary to cite authority to sustain these views; the principles find a lodgment in every breast animated by right, and justice, and equity.

So far as this court has heretofore spoken on this question, a reference may be made to the P. P. & J. R. R. Co. v. The Peoria and Springfield R. R. Co., which was an application to condemn lands belonging to one company, for the track of the other. It was held that land not in actual use, or necessary for the use of a railroad, might be condemned; clearly implying, if it was in actual use for their track or appurtenances, it was not subject to condemnation by another road.

Competition—an honest, healthy competition—is productive of good. The law affords no aid to that kind of competition which claims the right to crush a competitor to advance a rival interest.

We are satisfied the injunction should not have been dissolved, but the same should have been perpetuated. If appellees desire to possess this franchise and property, already devoted to public use, let them institute proceedings to that end.

For the reasons given, the decree is reversed, and the cause remanded with directions to reinstate the bill, and make the injunction perpetual.

H. B. HOPKINS, L. HARMON and JOHN HOUGH for appellants.

H. W. WELLS for appellees.

OUR thanks are due JAMES H. DAVIDSON, general solicitor of the Keokuk Northern Line Packet Co., for the following opinion:

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

OPINION FILED JUNE 30, 1876.

THE KEOKUK NORTHERN LINE PACKET CO. v. THE CITY OF QUINCY.

WHARFAGE ON VESSELS — TONNAGE TAX—IS IT CONSTITUTIONAL.

An ordinance of the city of Quincy requires certain vessels to pay wharfage, according to the tonnage of the vessels. The court holds that the vessels of the appellants do not come within the terms of the ordinance, and therefore declines to pass upon the question of the constitutionality of the ordinance.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.

Opinion of the Court by SCOTT, C. J.

Elaborate arguments have been made on the validity of an ordinance of the city of Quincy that establishes a schedule of charges for landing at the public wharf of the city of "all boats and water crafts therein mentioned." But it will not be necessary to discuss that question in the present case.

One objection insisted upon goes to the foundation of the action and is fatal to the present judgment, no matter what construction might be given to the ordinance. The rates of charges for landing at the city wharf are specifically for the landing of each packet boat belonging to certain packet companies named in the ordinance, and there is also a provision, all persons plying "tow-boats," and all persons landing "transient boats or water crafts," shall be required to pay certain charges, according to the tonnage of the vessels.

The defendant company was running a regular line of packet boats, but was not one of the companies named in the ordinance which were required to pay the rates fixed for the privilege of landing at the city wharf, nor does its boats come within the definition of tow-boats or transient boats which are to be charged rates in proportion to their tonnage.

The ordinance does not, by its terms, apply to all packet boats, but only to boats of certain companies named, and to tow boats and to transient vessels. An attempt was made on the trial to prove defendant was the successor of the companies named in the ordinance, but the proof is by no means satisfactory to establish that fact. Conceding the fact, however, we are not inclined to hold it would subject defendant to the payment of the wharfage rates established. The defendant's company is a new organization, and the rates fixed are not chargeable to it by any express provision of the ordinance. It is not shown that all of the boats belonging to defendant and for which rates have been exacted, belonged to the original companies named in the ordinance. Nor does the ordinance assume to make the successors of the former companies liable for the rates charged against their boats. There is, therefore, absolutely nothing in the ordinance that makes it obligatory on defendant to pay any rates or charges for landing at the city wharf, and as this view is conclusive of the whole case, we will not now discuss other questions raised upon the record.

The judgment will be reversed and the cause remanded.

Reversed and remanded.

AQUILA H. PICKERING et al v. HENRY CEASE.

Appeal from Superior Court of Cook Co.

SPECULATIVE OPTION CONTRACTS IN GRAIN UPON THE CHICAGO MARKET HELD TO BE ILLEGAL AND VOID.

Opinion by SCOTT, C. J.

This controversy arises out of grain transactions between the parties, about which there does not seem to be any serious misunderstanding, except as to two "option deals" in corn,—one for 10,000 bushels for delivery in August, and another for a like amount for delivery in September. An amount was admitted to be due on former transactions, for which the Court rendered judgment in favor of plaintiffs and against defendant, Cease, who was the only defendant served with process. Plaintiffs claimed that a larger sum was due on the previous transations, but the amount was not considerable, and probably the sum found by the Court is nearly if not entirely correct. That, however, is not the matter in dispute. It has reference only to the two last transactions in corn, and it is in regard to those items that plaintiffs bring the the case to this Court on appeal.

Upon the theory that plaintiffs made purchases for defendants of corn for August and September delivery, still, in view of the evidence, the judgment is quite as large as it ought to be. Had plaintiffs sold the corn at the highest market price after the alleged purchases, there would have been but little if any loss sustained. Whether they were directed to do so by defendants was a question of fact, to be found by the Court to whom the cause was submitted. On this question the testimony was flatly contradictory. If the court adopted the theory of the defendants, the judgment is warrantedby the evidence. Clearly it was the province of the Court to determine which was the better evidence on that question, and we see no reason to be dissatisfied with the conclusion reached.

But there is another consideration that is fatal to a recovery in any event, so far as the two last deals are concerned. There is no sufficient evidence that any grain was in fact bought for defendants for delivery in August or September. So far as anthing is proven, the alleged purchases are purely fictitious: The grain plaintiff bought of Hutchinson was immediately sold back to him. It was not paid for, nor was it expected by the parties it would be called for or delivered. The parties were merely speculating in difference as to the market values of grain on the Chicago market. Such contracts are void at common law, as being inhibited by a sound public morality. They were in no just sense contracts, with the privilege of the seller to deliver at a future day. Time contracts are of daily occurrence, and must of necessity be in commercial transactions. Agreements for the future delivery of grain or any other commodity are not prohibited by the common law, nor by any statute of this State, nor by any policy adopted for the protection of the public. What the law does prohibit, and what it deems detrimental to the general welfare, is speculating in differences in market values. The alleged contracts for August and September, come within this definition. No grain was ever bought and paid for, nor do we think it was ever expected any would be called for, or that any would have been delivered had demand been made. What were these but "option contracts" in the most objectionable sense?—that is, the seller had the privilege of delivering or not delivering, and the buyer the privilege of calling or not calling for the grain, just as they chose. On the maturity of the contracts they were to be filled by adjusting the differences in the market values. Being in the nature of gambling transactions, the law will tolerate no such contracts. The judgment is for quite as much as it ought to be under the evidence, and will be affirmed.

WILKINSON, SACKETT & BEAN appeared for appellants; MCCOGG, CULVER & BUTLER for appellee.

JUDGE WALKER CONGRATULATED.

The immediate neighbors of a public man have facilities for judging of his true worth which the public at large have not, and therefore their judgment is entitled to more weight than the judgment of others. It is with pleasure that we clip from the Rushville Times of the 7th instant, the following account of the reception given to Judge Walker on the occasion of his re-election, upon his return from Mt. Vernon:

A very pleasant incident occurred at the close of the ratification meeting, Saturday night, which had no connection with the regular programme of the evening. As Judge Walker had just returned from Mt. Vernon, and our people having had no opportunity to congratulate him on his unanimous re election to the supreme bench, it was decided to improve the opportunity and give him a serenade. The announcement was made at the close of the meeting, and everybody, irrespective of party, were invited to join in honoring our respected citizen. A large portion of the crowd formed into line, headed by the Beardstown band, and marched to the residence of Judge Walker. On arriving there, the band proceeded to play a national air, at the conclusion of which Judge Walker made his appearance on the portico. Hon. S. P. Cummings stepped forward, and introduced him to the crowd, and said:

JUDGE WALKER: We, your neighbors and friends, irrespective of party, have come to congratulate you on your unanimous re-election to the office of Judge of the Supreme Court of the State of Illinois. You have our warm congratulations.

JUDGE WALKER'S REPLY,

Friends and fellow-citizens: I sincerely thank you for the compliment conferred by this token of your respect. I am unable adequately to express my feelings, but be assured that I highly appreciate this expression of your friendship and good will. Having since my boyhood lived in this community, and been identified with it, the compliment possesses the greater value.

I came to Rushville over forty years since. I was not then nineteen years of age; and like all others who immigrated to the State at that day, I was poor, and dependent alone on my own efforts and the good will of my neighbors for success in after life. And to the partiality and friendship of my fellow citizens I owe all that I may have accomplished. The confidence reposed, and the encouragement extended, have at all times stimulated me to diligent effort not to forfeit the trust thus extended.

I have been one of you from the time our county and the surrounding country was almost a wild, uninhabited and uncultivated. But it now possesses the beauty bestowed by improvement and which confers the abundance and comfort that is the natural reward of the toil, the privation and patience our people have endured. This condition of things has been produced by the almost heroic effort of our people. Nothing short of indomitable will, sustained by steadiness of purpose, could achieve such results.

I have witnessed the erection of our churches, the establishment of our schools, and other public institutions. You have advanced education on a firm and solid basis, and have practiced pure morals and disseminated useful information, until to-day this community is the equal of any in intelligence, moral and general information. These efforts to advance have resulted in an independence in thought and action that is entirely free from the control of mere leaders. All are capable of judging and acting for themselves, and usually correctly. The results of our efforts in behalf of education and moral development should be accepted as highly satisfactory.

We see that when our young men leave to seek their fortunes in other communities they, from their training, education and development of character among us, are enabled to rank with their associates, and some of them are making their mark in competition with rivals who have apparently had superior advantages. This should be to us a source of gratification, as it is the natural reflection from our social organization. We have reason, therefore, to believe that although our institutions lack in pretension, they have a solid basis, and are well calculated to develop well-formed minds, whether for the professions, business, or for other pursuits. And whilst we do not have overgrown wealth, competency is enjoyed by many and extreme poverty scarcely exists in our midst. And whilst we have high moral worth, we have but little depraved and vicious population. Our social organization contributes more to happiness and real enjoyment, than would wealth with its follies and its splendors. We, I think I may say, occupy a high moral position, and enjoy a fine social development. Our community is harmonious, is not distracted by personal feuds and strifes. We are free from vain and empty pretentions and ignorant arogance, and kindness and charity is the rule with our people. And I have always esteemed myself fortunate to have lived in such a community.

To the efforts of my neighbors and friends of the town and county, I am largely indebted for the public confidence and honor that has been so repeatedly conferred upon me. Your unselfish friendship and trust naturally inspired confidence amongst the people of other counties, and in fact throughout the State. You contributed largely twice to my election to the office of Circuit Judge. You have lent efficient aid to my election three times to a place on the Supreme Bench of the State. And the last election to that position was conducted in a manner the most gratifying, not only by my neighbors and acquaintances, but by the whole district. It is sufficient to satisfy the highest laudable ambition. It has impressed me with the deepest and most abiding gratitude; and it will stimulate me to unremitting efforts to so discharge my duty as to be worthy of such liberal and flattering confidence. Next to a consciousness of being right, and my self respect, I value the confidence and esteem of my friends. And few men have apparently had more reason to be well satisfied with such manifestations. I am deeply sensible of your past and present kindness, and I should be recreant to every principle of honor if I should fail to labor to be worthy of my friends at home and abroad. I shall therefore apply myself to the discharge of every duty that may devolve upon me in the future.

Having lived long and happily among you, it is my fervent desire to be able, during the remainder of my days, to participate in the enjoyment of your prosperity and happiness. And I hope that you may be enabled, not only to maintain the high, moral, social and intelligent position you have attained, but be able to progress to a still higher development.

I again thank you for this expression of your friendship.

When the Judge concluded his remarks, he cordially invited the crowd in, when they were sumptuously treated to a repast of the good things to satisfy the inner man.

We call attention to the following opinions, reported at length in this issue:

LIQUOR SUIT BY WIFE TO RECOVER DAMAGES.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of Illinois, by SHELDON, J., holding in a case where it is alleged that the intoxication was caused in whole by the defendant, and the proof is that the intoxication was caused only in part by the defendant, that a recovery may be had; that the action which was brought under the act of 1872 was not defeated by the revision of the statutes of 1874; that to support a finding of exemplary damages there must be a finding of actual damage. From this opinion Judge BREESE dissents, believing that instructions one, three and five for plaintiff should not have been given, and that the damages are excessive, as plaintiff knew the habits of her husband when she married him. In this connection we would refer our readers to the opinion of the Supreme Court of Iowa, construing the liquor law of that State, published in 8 Chicago Legal News, 324.

BOARD OF TRADE—POWER TO EXPEL MEMBERS—JURISDICTION OF COURT.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of this State by WALKER, J, holding that a court has no power by mandamus to compel the Board of Trade of Chicago to restore a member who has been expelled.

PRACTICE IN DIVORCE CASES.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of Illinois, by CRAIG, J., upon several questions of practice in divorce cases.

EXEMPTION OF THE PROPERTY OF AN INTITUTION FROM TAXATION.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of this State, by SCHOLFIELD, J., holding that the exemption in the amendment to the charter of the Northwestern University, to the effect "that all property, of whatsoever kind or description, belonging to or owned by said corporation, shall be forever free from taxation for any and all purposes," is unconstitutional and void, in so far as it attempts to exempt from taxation any other property than that which is directly used for educational purposes; that it was not competent for the General Assembly, under the Constitution of 1848, which was in force at the date of this amendment, to grant an exemption so broad and sweeping in its character.

THE RIGHT OF ONE HORSE RAILROAD COMPANY IN A CITY TO CONDEMN THE TRACK OF ANOTHER—TWO ROADS IN ONE STREET.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of Illinois by BREESE, J., holding that one competing street railroad company cannot take, by the exercise of the right of eminent domain, a fragment of a competing road in successful operation, and the most valuable part of it, and thus destroy in effect and usefulness and value, the remaining fragment; that appellees may, perhaps, by a liberal construction of the acts cited and of the eminent domain act, condemn the entire road of the appellants and appropriate it to their use on paying just compensation therefor; that there is no apparent reason why an easement in this street, wholly independent of that of appellants, should not be granted by the city authorities to appellees, if the public accommodation is not subserved by this single road, the street being wide enough for another independent road. In this case a temporary injunction was granted by Judge Burns, of the twelfth circuit. Judge Cochran being interested in the decision of the case, Judge Tipton, of Bloomington, went to Peoria and tried the case. He dissolved the temporary injunction and dismissed the bill, which decision is wholly reversed by the Supreme court. For the purpose of getting an early decision, the case was taken on appeal to Springfield instead of Ottawa. There are several very important questions decided in this case. One is, that if a horse railroad, in the street, of an incorporated company is not sufficient to properly accommodate the public, that the council may give authority to another to lay down a track in the same street. Another is, that one horse railroad company cannot, by the exercise of the right of eminent domain, condemn the track of another competing road by piece-meal.

WHARFAGE ON VESSELS—TONNAGE TAX.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of this State, by Scott, C. J., declining to pass upon the constitutionality of an ordinance of the city of Quincy requiring certain vessels to pay wharfage according to their tonnage, as the vessels of the appellants do not come within the terms of the ordinance. In a number of cases ordinances of a like character have been tested in the federal court, and in every instance decided to be in conflict with the constitution of the United States. We have no doubt this ordinance will be decided to be unconstitutional by our Supreme Court, when it passes on that question.

OPTION CONTRACTS.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of Illinois, by SCOTT, C. J., holding that speculative option contracts, or, as they are sometimes called, "betting on the price of grain at a future time," are illegal and void. These gambling grain contracts have seriously injured the character of our market with the farming community. They have put the market up and down, without any regard to the true value of grain. It is to be hoped that this decision of the Supreme Court will exercise a healthy influence over the market.

A TREATISE ON THE LAW OF PERSONAL PROPERTY. Vol. II. Embracing Original Acquisition, Gift, Sale, and Bailment. By James Schouler, author of "A Treatise on the Law of the Domestic Relations." Boston: Little, Brown & Company. 1876. Sold by E. B. Myers, Law Bookseller, Chicago.

The former volume of the author on personal property was issued three years ago. We then announced that, in order to complete the work according to the original plan, another volume on title would be required. The first having been received with universal favor by the profession, the author has carried out his original plan, and produced the second. Mr. Schouler says, pursuing, as before, a natural order of progression, he is enabled in this volume to give to the leading topics the full space needful for an elementary text book. Our law of Original Acquisition, which embraces topics familiarly known by the name of Occupancy and the Confusion of Goods and of Gifts, receives in these pages a more ample treatment than any writer has bestowed. With the law of Sales it is different—for here he has been aided by the larger works of Story and Benjamin—that by pursuing independent methods, making ample use of materials collected from all other accessible sources, and constantly investigating the reported cases for himself, he has carefully prepared an exposition of the law of Personal Property, which we may fairly call his own; the leading object being, if it were possible, to furnish within the space of some four hundred and eighty pages, a better working treatise on the subject for English and American lawyers than has been hitherto presented. Mr. Schouler is one of the most careful of text writers; his works are the result of years of careful study. He will not, as is the case with too many of the men of the present time, who assume to be law writers, make a book in a few months at the command of some law publisher. Law books are being made with too great haste. It is really a pleasure to examine a new law book which shows the marks of honest labor, as does the work before us. In mechanical execution, it is fully up to the high standard of the house from which it emanates.

CONTEMPT OF COURT.—A certain pompous judge fined several lawyers $10 each for contempt of court. After they had paid their fines, a steady-going old attorney walked gravely up to the bench and laid down a $10 bill. "What is that for?" inquired the judge. "For contempt, your honor." "Why, I have not fined you for contempt." "I know that," said the attorney, "but I want you to understand I cherish a secret contempt for this court all the time, and I am willing to pay for it."—Ex.

Dr. Kenealy is now elaborating a scheme for combining in his own person the functions of all the law courts, local, national and international. "Before long," he modestly says, he will establish a "High Court of Arbitration," to which all persons who have differences may resort, "if they think proper." The persons who thus think proper will "simply have to enter into an agreement to abide by the award of Dr. Kenealy, the judge." He observes, very pointedly, that "this award will be legally binding on both parties." Although the costs are to be almost nominal, "justice will be fairly and honestly administered." Parties may argue their own case, but "counsel will not be allowed to appear." We would recommend the learned doctor to read and perpend the case of The Queen v. O'Connell and others."—Ex.

PRINCIPLES OF THE LAW RELATING TO THE STOCK EXCHANGE AND TO THE SALE OF SHARES.

1.—PARTIES TO THE CONTRACT.

(a.) Principal and Agent.

A principal who employs his broker to deal for him on the Stock Exchange is bound by the customs of that market, though personally ignorant of them: (Grissell v. Bristowe, L. Rep. 4 C. P. 49; Sutton v. Tatham, 10 Ad. & E. 27; Chapman v. Shepherd; Whitehead v. Izod, L. Rep. 2 C. P. 228; Taylor and another v. Stray, 2 C. B., N. S., 175 and 97; 26 L. J. 185, 287, C. P, Maxted v. Paine, L. Rep., 6 Ex. 132; Bayliffe v. Butterworth, 1 Ex. 425.)

The contract of a stockbroker with his principal is not to procure the required shares at all events, but only to use due and reasonable diligence in endeavoring to procure them. (Fletcher v. Marshall and another, 15 M. & W. 755.)

If a stockbroker has received money to invest in shares, and does not deliver them within a reasonable time, his principal can recover against him in an action for money had and received; and where by the usage of a particular market there are fixed days for the settlement of all transactions between brokers and their principals, a reasonable time for the delivery of shares bargained for is until the next of such settling days. (Fletcher v. Marshall and another, 15 M. & W., 755.)

A purchasing broker represents that the person whose name is on the ticket which he issues is his principal; that he has authority to accept the transfer on that person's account, and to bind him; and that the person is capable of accepting the shares. (Merry v. Nickalls, L. Rep. 7 Ch. 733; L. Rep. 3 E. & I. 530.)

When a broker on the Stock Exchange becomes a defaulter, through the bankrupty of his principal, but is re-admitted on payment of a portion of his liabilities, he is not thereby released from his liability for the remainder, and therefore has a right to prove for the full amount against the estate of his principal. (Lacy v. Hill (Crowley's Claim), L. Rep. 18 Eq. 182; Lacy v. Hill (Scrimgeour's Claim), L. Rep. 8 Ch. 921.)

The undisclosed principals of members of the Stock Exchange can enforce the contracts made by their agents. (Maxted v. Paine (second action), L. Rep. 4 Ex. 203: 6 Ex. 132; Grissell v. Bristowe, L. Rep. 4. C. P. 49; Langton v. Waite, L. Rep. 6 Eq. 165.)

Stock-jobbers are principals, and personally liable upon the contracts into which they enter: Cruse v. Paine, L. Rep. 6 Eq., 641; L. Rep. 4 Ch., 441.

An action by a stockbroker against his principal for an indemnity is founded on the ordinary and general principles of common law with regard to implied indemnities (Duncan and another v. Hill; Duncan and another v. Beeson, L. Rep. 8 Ex., 242; Taylor and another v. Stray, 2 C. B., N. S., 175, 197; 26 L. J., 185, 287, C. P.; Lacey v. Hill (Scrimgeour's Claim) L. Rep. 8 Ch., 921). Where a stockbroker is subjected to loss by reason of his having entered into the contracts made by him on behalf of his principal, there is an implied promise on the part of his principal to indemnify him (Duncan and another v. Hill; Duncan and another v. Beeson, L. Rep. 8 Ex., 242; Taylor and another v. Stray; Lacey v. Hill (Scrimgeour's Claim), L. Rep. 8 Ch., 921; Lacey v. Hill (Crowley's Claim), L. Rep. 18 Eq. 182). Where a stockbroker is subjected to loss by reason of a default of his own, there is no promise which can be implied on the part of his principal to indemnify him, Duncan and another v. Hill; Duncan and another v. Beeson, L. Rep. 8 Ex., 242.

Loss suffered by a defaulting broker, in consequence of the rule of the Stock Exchange, that a defaulter's transactions shall be closed at market prices immediately on his failure, is not such a loss as will entitle him to sue his principal upon an implied indemnity, Duncan and another v. Hill; Duncan and another v. Beeson, L. Rep. 8 Ex., 242.

When a stockbroker has bought scrip certificates on the Stock Exchange for a principal, which scrip is afterwards repudiated by the directors of the company on the ground that it was issued by the secretary without authority, the principal cannot recover from his broker the money paid by him for such scrip: Lambert v. Heath, 15 M. & W., 486.

The principal of a mining share broker cannot resist payment of the money paid by the broker on his behalf, on the ground that the money was paid in pursuance of a wagering contract, illegal under 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109, s. 18: Rosewarne v. Billing, 15 C. B., N. S., 316; 33 L. J. 55, C. P.

There is an implied request by the principal of a share broker to the share broker to pay the amount due under the contract, and an implied promise to reimburse him: Rosewarne v. Billing, 15 C. B., N. S., 316; 33 L J ,55, C. P.; Chapman v. Shepherd, Whitehead v. Izod, L. Rep. 2 C. P. 228; Taylor and another v. Stray, 2 C. B. N. S., 175, 197; 26 L. J., 185, 287, C. P.

An unlicensed sharebroker can recover the money he has paid on his principal's behalf, but not any commission for his labor: Smith v. Lindo, 4 C. B., N. S., 395; 27 L. J. 196, C. P.; 5 C. B., N. S., 587; 27 L. J. 335, C. P.; Cope v. Rowlands, 2 M. & W., 149.

By a usage among sharebrokers who are not members of the Stock Exchange, similar to that which prevails on the Stock Exchange the names of their principals are not disclosed. That course of business is authorized by any person who thinks proper to deal in the market where it prevails. The broker who enters into a contract in that form becomes liable upon the bargain; and if he has to pay, through his principal's default, he can recover the money from his principal: Smith v. Lindo, 4 C. B., N. S., 395; 5 C. B., N. S., 587; 27 L. J. 196, 335, C. P.; Taylor and another v. Stray, 2 C. B., N. S., 175, 197; 26 L. J. 185, 287, C. P.

It is a question of evidence whether the party who sells stock meant to hold the broker only responsible, or to have also the security of the principal, the rules of the Stock Exchange not taking away the right to choose to what person credit shall be given: Mortimer v. M'Callan, 6 M. & W., 58.

When a stockbroker is bound by the Stock Exchange rules to pay the price of shares duly bought by him for a principal, and does pay accordingly, it is no answer to his claim for repayment that a winding-up proceeding subsequent to the contract of sale has rendered a complete legal transfer of the shares impossible, without the leave of the court: Chapman v. Shepherd, Whitehead v. Izod, L. Rep. 2 C. P., 228; Taylor and another v. Stray, 2 C. B., N. S., 175, 197; 26 L. J., 185, 287, C. P.—The London Law Times.

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

ABSTRACT OF OPINIONS FILED AT SPRINGFIELD, JUNE 30TH, 1876.

43.—Benjamin F. Logan v. George Musick, et al.—Error to Logan.—Opinion by CRAIG, J., affirming.

CONTRADICTORY EVIDENCE — CREDIBILITY — GAMING CONTRACTS—WHAT THEY ARE.

STATEMENT.—Appellees were commission merchants, and as such, bought wheat for appellant for June delivery and for July delivery; and also sold grain for him, on exchange at Chicago—the selling resulted in a loss of over $3,000—appellant having paid a margin of $1,200. Then another similar transaction was made to save the previous loss. But only 10,000 bushels instead of 20,000 being sold, there was a further loss, owing, one of the appellees testifies, to sudden restrictions placed upon them by appellant's raising the price. On this, the evidence was quite contradictory. Verdict for plaintiffs (appellees)—the defense being an offset, against the commission claims, of the losses in the transaction, charged to the fault of the merchants—also, that the contract was a gaming contract. Held,

1. That the contradictory testimony of the witnesses was peculiarly and exclusively within the province of the jury to estimate its credibility, respectively.

2. That where parties deal in options, leaving the sale to the option of either buyer or seller, the transaction is a gaming contract, and cannot be enforced in any way; nor can commissions be collected thereon. But where, (as in this case) there is an absolute buying or selling, leaving nothing optional but the time of future delivery, the transaction is legitimate, and commissions for services therein can be collected.

44.—T. W. & W. R. R Co. v. Jerry Gilvin.—Error to Pike.—Opinion by DICKEY, J., affirming.

DELIVERY OF GRAIN SOLD CONDITIONALLY—RIGHTS OF SELLER THEREIN—WHO TO SUFFER BY FRAUD PRACTISED—ESTOPPEL.

STATEMENT. — One Smith contracted with Gilvin for wheat, to be loaded into a car furnished by Smith for that purpose, but not to be removed until judgment was made. Smith, before the grain was loaded, obtained a bill of lading from the R. R. agent, on his representation of the purchase. On this bill, as collateral security, he obtained money from a bank, giving a draft on a firm in Toledo. Gilvin, knowing nothing of Smith's doings herein, loaded up the wheat, meanwhile, and, afterward, hearing of Smith's having absconded, removed the wheat again from the car into his warehouse. The draft being protested, the railroad company paid the amount, and sued Gilvin to recover the damages to them. Being defeated, they brought error. Held,

1. That Smith having received the car from the company, and having put it into the possession of Gilvin, and the condition on which the title was to pass to Smith having utterly failed, there never was a delivery to Smith, and the grain was all the while in the possession of Gilvin, and he had a right, at any time, on breach of condition, to restore the grain to his warehouse again, without notice to any one.

2. The doctrine of estoppel cannot apply, since he was no privy, in any way, to the deception practised by Smith.

3. The loss was caused by the negligence of the railroad agent in giving a bill of lading for grain not, in any wise, in his possession or control; and, therefore, the company must bear it.

4. Even if both the bank and the railroad company on the one hand, and Gilvin on the other, were equally innocent, the rule is, that in such a case, the party must be the loser who gave credit to the knave.

5. No man can be deprived of his property except by his consent or forfeiture. If he has acted in bad faith therein, as to a third party, he may, on the principle of estoppel, be required to surrender it to a party deceived by him. Otherwise, he must consent.

6. Smith, never having acquired any title, could not give title to the R. R. or the bank.

AUDITOR'S CERTIFIED LIST OF SWAMP LAND —EVIDENCE IN EJECTMENT.

STATEMENT.—In ejectment for swamp lands, by the county against Grumley, the court rejected, as evidence for plaintiff, a list of swamp lands certified to by the auditor of public accounts. Verdict, accordingly, for defendants. Held,

That, by the terms of the statute, such list is competent evidence—as much so as patents for school lands.

DELIVERY OF PERSONAL PROPERTY ON SALE —REQUISITES THEREOF—FRAUD IN LAW.

STATEMENT.—Appellee purchased some hogs, a half interest in a reaping machine, and a lot of corn and wheat growing. Afterwards, a judgment was obtained against the seller before a justice of the peace by appellant, who levied on this property, all except the reaper still remaining on a farm belonging to the seller's (and judgment debtor's) wife. Appellee put in his claim to try the right of property—the delivery of the property being the particular question. The reaper was in the hands of the other half-owner thereof. Held,

1. That the growing grain, having been delivered so far as the nature of the property would admit, was exempt from the levy.

2. That the reaper, being in the hands of the other part-owner, was sufficiently delivered.

3. That the hogs, remaining still on the farm where they were sold, and there being, therefore, no visible change of ownership, were subject to the levy, nor would it have been different had the buyer employed the seller to continue to feed them on the farm for him.

4. There needs be no intentional fraud in a sale, to vitiate it, where the property remains with the former owner. This is fraudulent in law, as to creditors, notwithstanding the good faith of the parties. The law requires, so far as possible, some notice of a change of possession as to goods sold.

CONDITIONAL DELIVERY OF DEED—PRAYER FOR GENERAL RELIEF.

STATEMENT.—The appellant, being in expectation of death, caused his son, who held the legal title, to execute to his daughter, the mother of the infant appellee, a deed to certain lands. As to the actual delivery, the evidence was contradictory. But the daughter having died, appellant brought suit in equity to cancel the deed, alleging no delivery of it, and praying protection to his possession. The court dismissed the bill, although praying general relief, likewise. Held,

1. That, if there had been a delivery of the deed, yet it was a conditional delivery, namely: to take effect on his death only, and that this condition may be enforced, although it be not expressed in the deed, [it being a condition of the delivery, and not of the conveyance, is the principle of the decision, evidently, although not the exact language of court].

2. That, under the general prayer for relief, the court could enjoin disturbance of the possession, although denying the specific prayers of the bill.

CONSTITUTIONALITY OF STATUTES — TITLES TOO BROAD — CONSTITUTION — PRESUMPTION.

STATEMENT.—This case involves the question, simply, of the constitutionality of a private law authorizing Belleville and Mascoutah to subscribe to a railroad according to the title of the act. But the body of the act also embraced Nashville, although the title did not The Senate bill included the latter place also, in the title; but it seems the House, in passing it, dropped the latter part of the title by some accident. Tax was levied in the town of Mascoutah, to meet the interest of the bonds issued there. Defendant paid the tax under protest, and brought an action in the Circuit court. Losing the case, he brought it to the Supreme court. Held,

1. That every presumption of regularity must prevail as to an act signed by the speakers of both houses and the governor.

2. That in the absence of the original bill from the secretary's office, the printed copy must guide the court.

3. That where a bill is broader than the title, if the part which is not embraced in the title can be taken out, and yet leave a sensible and complete law, as to the matters actually included by the title, this must stand as constitutional and valid; and the law will only be adjudged void as to the part not included in the title.

ELECTIONEERING LIBELS—RIGHTS OF NEWSPAPERS—RESTRICTIONS — COMPENSATORY AND EXEMPLARY DAMAGES—REPETITION OF INSTRUCTIONS—MALICE IN FACT AND IN LAW.

STATEMENT.—Suit for libel against the Quincy Whig, by appellant, who was a candidate for office, who recovered $25, and appealed on the ground of erroneous instructions. Held,

1. That a repetition of instructions ought to be refused.

2. In such an action, a defendant can not be allowed to prove that there was no malice in fact, in the publication of a libelous article, as against compensatory damages; but only against exemplary damages.

3. Though it is lawful for newspapers to discuss the respective merits and qualifications of candidates for office, yet they cannot be allowed to assault with impunity, the private character of such candidates.

4. It is no excuse to say that the article was printed and published during the excitement of a campaign, and solely for the purpose of defeating the libeled candidate.

5. The publisher of a journal may publish facts; but the character and reputation of a candidate for office are as sacred as those of any other citizen, and should be equally protected.

6. Nor is it any excuse to say that the publisher supposed he was rendering a service to the public, to defeat a candidate by such means.

STRIKING PLEAS FROM THE FILES—JUDGMENT BY NIL DICIT AND DEFAULT—DISTINCTION.

STATEMENT. — Pleas stricken from the files—Judgment by nil dicit, for $8057.90. Held,

1. That where pleas are stricken from the files, and the evidence heard on the motion is not preserved by bill of exceptions, the Supreme court cannot review this action of the court below.

2. Where pleas are stricken from the files, a judgment by nil dicit is the proper practice, because here there has been an appearance entered; whereas a default is only proper where there has been no appearance.

DISMISSAL OF APPEAL IN CIRCUIT COURT FOR NON-COMPLIANCE WITH RULE.

STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS—PLEADABLE BY MUNICIPAL CORPORATION—WHEN BEGINS TO RUN.

STATEMENT.—Action in 1875, for personal injury by a defective sidewalk, in 1872. Statute of limitations pleaded by the city, successfully. Held,

1. That a municipal corporation may plead against a private citizen, or in any suit, the statute of limitations, or any other defense available to an individual party.

2. That the statute begins to run when the injury was first received, whether the full results were then apparent or not.

ERASURE OF INDORSEMENT ON PROMISSORY NOTE AS TO TRUST DEED—PRESUMPTIONS.

STATEMENT. — A promissory note was presented against Lang's estate, secured by a trust deed. On the back of the note, was the following indorsement, erased by a pen:

"Release of trust deed, by which this note is secured, made and delivered by order of holder." Signed by the holder (who had since died), and his attorney. The attorney testified that he had no recollection of the matter, but the indorsement was in his handwriting, and he thought the erasure was his also, and especially as he was in the habit of making, as attorney, such indorsements on notes secured by trust deed, when the trust deeds were to be cancelled. The court held,

That the presumption of law arising from the nature of the case, and the ordinary course of affairs, was, that the entry had been made on a promise of Lang to pay the note, and that, he failing to do so, it was erased, as not expressing the truth in the matter; and, therefore, it did not invalidate the note, or the trust deed, the deed being still actually uncancelled, and the note unpaid, as was evident from its being in the hands of the executor of the holder.

The production of the note and trust deed was prima facie evidence of the debt still existing, and the security still remaining; and in the absence of contrary evidence, it must prevail.

APPEAL BOND—RELEASE OF PRINCIPAL BY BANKRUPTCY—SURETY—BAD JOINT PLEAS.

STATEMENT.—Suit on an appeal bond given on carrying up a case to the Supreme court; there affirmed. Plea, that Sandusky (principal) had received a discharge in bankruptcy, from the judgment on which the bond was given, both joining in the plea. Demurrer; sustained; held,

1. That the bankruptcy of the principal obligor could not affect, in itself, the obligation of the surety in any manner.

2. A joint plea, bad in part, is bad in whole; and so, although, if separately pleaded, the bankruptcy of the principal might avail him, yet the plea being joint, and being bad as to the surety, could avail for neither.

BALANCE OF EVIDENCE BY THE SUPREME COURT.

STATEMENT.—A claim for dower in personal property, by virtue of a marriage with the intestate, fifteen minutes before his death. The question was, whether he was conscious, and gave consent, at the time of the ceremony. Both in the County court and in the Circuit court, Mrs. Fitzsimmons prevailed with her claim.

The parish priest who performed the ceremony, testified that he thought intestate was unconscious at the time, and gave no consent that he could see.

On the other hand, the petitioner and her mother, testified positively, that he was, at the time, conscious, and gave consent by a nod of the head. Her brother also testified that he thought so. The court, without assigning any especial reasons, pronounced the "weight of the evidence" to be "against the finding."

MECHANIC'S LIEN LAW—PUTTING UP LIGHTNING RODS.

Held, That furnishing materials and labor in putting up lightning rods, does not come under the protection of the mechanic's lien law, being neither "building, repairing, altering or ornamenting" a house in the meaning of the statute.

72.—The Protection Life Ins. Co. v. John R. Palmer, adm'r., etc.—Appeal from McLean.—Opinion by WALKER, J., affirming.

ASSUMPSIT ON SEALED INSTRUMENS—DATE OF NOTICE—COMPUTATION OF TIME—NO DEFAULT OR FORFEITURE AFTER DEATH OF INSURED.

STATEMENT.—Suit on insurance policy in assumpsit; the company claimed in defense that the policy had lapsed, the assured having failed to pay an assessment made upon him in his lifetime. He died on the 5th of March. The notice of assessment bore date January 25; was mailed in Chicago on the 3d of February, and in due course of the mail, should reach the assured on the 4th—the next day; assessments were to be paid in thirty days after date of notice, or policy void; held,

1. That as the statute has abolished all distinction between actions on sealed and on unsealed instruments, assumpsit may be brought on a policy, though sealed.

2. A notice is not to be dated with the date of the paper containing it, nor of the depositing it in the post-office, which is merely a means of conveying the notice to the party to be notified, just as a messenger would do; but of actual possibility of service, that is, on arriving at its destination by post, which will be presumed to have been at the time, and in business hours; and it will be presumed that the assured received it duly.

3. The computation of time for the thirty days, will exclude the first day, viz., the 3rd of February, and include the whole of the last day, viz, the 6th of March. So then, in this case, the assured had the whole of the 6th of March to pay the assessment in.

4. But he died on the 5th, and therefore, was not in default at the time of his death. And a life insurance company cannot annul a policy for a default happening after death. [Although, in the payment of the policy, they may deduct any assessment or premium due.]

78.—Mary E. Harris v. Frederick Evans. et. al.—Appeal from Montgomery.—Opinion by DICKEY, J., affirmed.

LEVY AND DISCHARGE OF AN EXECUTION.

STATEMENT.—A sheriff levied an execution on some property, sold a part of it, and applied on the judgment; and, at the request of the plaintiff's attorney left the remainder in the hands of the judgment debtor, to be harvested and marketed—it being wheat. The debtor marketed the grain and paid over only a part of the money—retaining over $300 of it; held,

1. That if an officer pursues a different course, as to the disposal of property levied on, than that prescribed by the statute, he is liable therefor. If by the request or assent of the judgment creditor, the judgment creditor must suffer the loss.

2. If (as in this case), a sufficient amount of the property is levied upon to satisfy the judgment, this is, of itself, a satisfaction of the execution. And the money being lost in this way, the judgment is satisfied, and the debt paid by the levy, and the plaintiff, having assented to the arrangement, has no remedy.

81.—George Scroggs v. Joseph O. Cunningham.—Appeal from Champaign.—Opinion by SCOTT, Ch. J., affirming.

INTEREST ON PARTNERSHIP ACCOUNT.

STATEMENT.—This was a partnership account, and the case largely consists of a construction of the terms of the articles of dissolution embracing no principle of law. The court however, held,

That where a partner, whose duty it is to render an account, refuses to do so, or to allow access to the books, he may afterwards properly be charged with interest by the court, from the day the account ought to have rendered, on the amount found due from him.

83.—Joseph Bongard, et al. v Christian F. Block.—Appeal from Champaign.—Opinion by BREESE, J., affirming.

THE STATUTE OF FRAUDS AS TO CAUSE OF ACTION EX DELICTO.

Held, That, under the word "creditors," in the statute of frauds, are included all who have causes of action arising ex delicto; so that if one, expecting to have a judgment in tort rendered against him, conveys his lands to his children for "natural love and affection," without reserving enough to satisfy any liability which may be therein found against him, the conveyance will be set aside, as delaying, hindering, or defrauding creditors.

84.—Victoria Bongard v. Henry C. Core.—Appeal from Champaign.—Opinion by WALKER, J., reversing and remanding.

MARRIED WOMEN AND THEIR SEPARATE PROPERTY—HOW ACQUIRED—HUSBAND AS AGENT IN MANAGING—"EARNINGS"—PROCEEDS, INCREASE, ETC.—PERSONAL LABOR OF HUSBAND.

Held, 1. That a married woman may employ her husband, to act as her agent, in regard to her separate property.

2. If a husband and his wife live upon her farm, and she employs and pays for the labor, in raising grain, the grain is her separate property, even if her husband does act as her agent in preserving and selling it.

3. And if the farm is purchased in whole, or in part, by grain and articles so raised upon it, the farm is nevertheless her separate property.

4. The rents of a wife's property, the products of her farm, or the increase of her stock, are not included in the word "earnings." They are as much her separate property as the principal out of which they arise.

5. And if a husband contributes his personal labor in a minor degree to raise grain, this does not change the ownership thereof from her to him.

PETITION OF A GUARDIAN TO SELL MORTGAGED LANDS.

STATEMENT.—Petition to sell lands which were mortgaged, to pay the mortgaged debt; brought to the Circuit court. The court granted the petition, and there was a kind of amicable appeal to the Supreme court, to ascertain whether the Circuit court had jurisdiction in the matter. This the court declined to decide because there was no necessity, at any rate, for the exercise of such a jurisdiction; since, if the lands were to be sold at public sale at all, a foreclosure sale would be as well for the minor heirs as a guardian's sale; and even better, since there is a redemption in a foreclosure sale.

VENDOR'S LIEN—ENFORCEMENT BY ADMINISTRATOR.

STATEMENT.—Bill filed to enforce a vendor's lien by administrators. During the proceedings, the heirs sold the note to a party, but it was not assigned. Held,

1. That the personal representatives of a vendor can enforce a vendor's lien, for the benefit of the estate.

2. Although an assignee cannot, yet where there has been no transfer of the note by indorsement, such an act as selling it by the heirs during the progress of a suit to enforce by the administrators, does not change the status of the matter.

90.—Keokuk, etc., Packet Co. v. City of Quincy.—Appeal from Adams.—Opinion by SCOTT, Ch. J., reversing and remanding.

CHARGES FOR BOATS LANDING—HOW WHARFAGE CHARGEABLE.

Held, 1. That, without an ordinance, boats cannot be charged for landing at a public landing place.

2. An ordinance specifying certain classes of boats, and certain companies, and subjecting them to certain rates, cannot be made available against the successors of such companies, without specially providing to that effect.

95.—Joseph W. Arnold v. James H. Crowder.—Appeal from Sangamon.—Opinion by BREESE, J., reversing.

THE LAW OF FIXTURES—INTENTION AS TO FIXTURES—ONUS PROBANDI—EFFECT OF MORTGAGE.

STATEMENT.—The question herein was, whether platform or stock scales, set into a place excavated for that purpose in the soil, passed under a mortgage sale of the premises. Held,

1. That the general maxim of the law is, that what is annexed to the land becomes a part of the land; but it is not always easy to say what constitutes an annexation sufficient for that purpose.

2. Perhaps, the true rule is, that articles not otherwise attached to the land than by their own weight, are not to be considered as part of the land. But the circumstances may be such as to show that they were intended to be part of the land. If so, the onus of showing this intention is upon those who affirm it to be realty. And, so, an article may be affixed, and yet not intended to be a part of the land. Then the onus is on those claiming it to be a chattel. The intention is manifested by acts.

3. A mortgage will pass all the fixtures on land, unless it expressly reserves them. Even a hay-cutter, affixed to a stable, has been held to pass, and also a threshing-machine.

4. The general doctrine is stated by Washburn to be that, "If the owner of land provides anything of a permanent nature, fitted for, and actually applied to use upon the premises, by annexing the same, it becomes a part of the realty, and passes to the purchaser, though it might be removed without injury to the premises; and this, as between mortgagor and mortgagee, whether the article in question be annexed to the premises before or after making the mortgage. Although the rule may be different between landlord and tenant.

5. In Bishop v. Bishop, 11 N. Y., 123, hop-poles, piled on the ground, passed with the land; and in Weston v. Weston, a bell hung upon a frame, and fastened to it by a hasp, the frame being nailed to the cupola of a barn, was held part of the realty.

6. The hay-scales, in this case, passed under the mortgage.

7. Annexations are presumed to be with a design of permanency.

73.—William P. Corbin v. James W. Pearce.—Appeal from Moultrie.—Opinion by DICKEY, J., affirming.

EXECUTION LIEN—VARIANCE BETWEEN EXECUTION AND JUDGMENT—EFFECT OF LEVY—EFFECT OF AMENDING AN EXECUTION AFTER LEVY MADE.

STATEMENT.—Judgment against Cox before J. P. for $154.50, July 16, 1875. Three days afterwards, execution issued thereon for $104.50. August 23, Cox assigned all his personal property to Corbin, for the benefit of creditors, and Corbin took possession on the same day, under the assignment. August 26, the execution was levied on a portion thereof. Replevin by Corbin; tried September 1, before the justice. On that day, the justice changed the amount in the execution to $154 50.

It was insisted, first, that the variance as to amount between the execution and the judgment, rendered the execution void; and, second, if not, then the alteration of it rendered it void. The court Held,

1. That, while an execution based on a void judgment is void, and while a discrepancy may be so marked as to afford a just inference that the judgment in question is not the one mentioned in the writ, (which inference, however, is rebuttable,) yet, if it appears that, in fact, the writ was issued on the judgment, a variance, though an irregularity, will not avoid the writ.

2. A levy by an officer, under a valid writ, vests the title of the property in him, for the purpose of obtaining funds to apply on the judgment; and this title remains until divested by subsequent proceedings. And although the writ has no legal effect after the return day, yet a levy made under it prior to the return day remains good; and the title is not divested, even by the return of the writ; after which return he may advertise and sell the property, by virtue of the levy. And, accordingly, no act done to the writ, subsequent to the levy—even if thereby the writ should be destroyed—can, in any way, invalidate the levy, or title of the officer, or his right to make the sale.

3. Such an amendment, however, could not enlarge the lien of the execution, or levy; nor could it bind any party in interest not having notice. Nor could an amendment enlarge a lien of the levy, even if regularly made. It could not, in any way, have any retroactive effect.

75.—Sarah Husband, use, etc., v. Elisabeth Epling.—Appeal from Sangamon.—Opinion by SCHOLFIELD, J., reversing and remanding.

ASSIGNABILITY OF INSTRUMENTS IN WRITING, AS TO THE PAYMENT, ETC.—PLEA OF COVERTURE AND REPLICATION THERETO—SEPARATE PROPERTY IN AN ESTATE.

STATEMENT.—Suit by appellant on the following instrument: "Whereas, there has been a matter of controversy between Sarah Husband, of the one part; and Emily Jane Brunk, Elisabeth Epling, and William T. Mason, children and heirs of Thomas Mason, deceased, of the other part; witnesseth, that, whereas the said Sarah Husband claims a compensation for keeping and raising said children, during the lifetime of said Thomas Mason, deceased; and whereas the said parties have agreed upon a settlement, as follows; the said Emily Jane Brunk, Elisabeth Epling, and William T. Mason, agree to pay said Sarah Husband the sum of eighteen hundred dollars; that is to say, six hundred dollars each; which, when paid, is to be in full satisfaction of all claims and demands which the said Sarah Husband, or her children, have, or claim, against said persons, for keeping or raising to this date, which amount is to be paid over when the estate of the said Thomas Mason is settled up." (Signed.)

On this was indorsed, "We assign this claim to Jane Husband," etc. Suit brought by Sarah Husband for use of Jane Husband.

The first question was upon this assignment, under the statute allowing assignments by indorsement of all "instruments of writing whereby the maker agrees to pay any sum of money," etc. On this the court Held,

That it is essential to the assignability of any instrument, under the statute, that the event upon which it is to become payable must inevitably happen, sometime or other. Notwithstanding the law provides that estates shall be settled up, and it is to be presumed that the law will be obeyed, yet the event is not to be regarded as morally certain, since it depends on human agencies.

Therefore the instrument is not assignable.

The other question in the case was on a cross-error. The defendant pleaded coverture, and the plaintiff replied that she was about to enforce a bona fide valid claim against the estate of defendant's father, and defendant signed the above instrument, in consideration of the release of that claim, which was accordingly released. The court below sustained a demurrer to the replication. But, Held,

That the replication was proper; since the defendant's interest in her father's estate was her personal property, and was protected or enlarged by the withdrawal of the claim against the estate. And a married woman is empowered to make contracts concerning her separate estate, on which she will be held liable at law.

WHEREAS, ELL NATHAN HOPKINS, BEING indebted upon three promissory notes (given by him for balance of purchase money), each for the sum of thirteen hundred and fifty-eight dollars and seventy-five cents, all bearing date of the twentieth day of April, A. D. 1874, and all payable to the order of himself, one in eighteen, one in thirty, and one in forty-two months, after said date, each of said notes bearing interest from date until maturity at the rate of eight per centum per annum, payable at the maturity of the first one due of said notes, and yearly thereafter, and each bearing interest after maturity at the rate of ten per centum per annum, did to secure the payment of said notes and interest, by his trust deed of even date with said notes, filed for record in the office of the recorder of Cook county, in the State of Illinois, on the nineteenth day of June, A. D. 1874, and recorded at page 293 of book 402 of records, in said office, convey unto me, the undersigned, Samuel M. Moore, the lands and premises therein and hereinafter described, in trust, among other things, that in case of default in the payment of the said promissory notes and interest, or any part thereof, according to the tenor and effect thereof, the undersigned, Samuel M. Moore, on the application of the legal holder of said notes, or either of them, should sell and dispose of said premises, and all the right, title, benefit, and equity of redemption of said Ell Nathan Hopkins, his heirs and assigns therein, at public auction, at such place in the city of Chicago, in the State of Illinois, or on said premises, as might be specified in the notice of such sale, for the highest and best price the same would bring in cash, two weeks' notice having been previously given of the time and place of said sale, by advertisement in the Chicago Legal News or in any newspaper at that time published in said city of Chicago, and to make, execute and deliver to the purchaser or purchasers at such sale, good and sufficient deed or deeds of conveyance for the premises sold, and to apply the proceeds or avails of such sale in the order and manner, and for the purposes prescribed in said trust deed, and that in case of default in any of said payments of principal or interest, then, and in that case, the whole of the principal sum, secured in and by said trust deed, and the interest thereon to the time of sale, might at once, at the option of said legal holder become due and payable, and the said premises be sold in the manner and with the same effect as if the said indebtedness had matured: to the originals of which notes and trust deed, now open to inspection in the custody of Charles M. Sturges, attorney at law, at Room No. 7, Methodist Church Block, in said city of Chicago, as well as to said record of said trust deed, reference is hereby had and made for further certainty as to the contents and provisions thereof. And whereas, default was made in the payment, when and as they became due, of the principal and interest of the one of said notes which fell due eighteen months after the date thereof, and also in the payment when and as the same became due, of the first due instalments of interest upon the other two of said notes respectively, which said sums so in default are and remain still due and unpaid. And whereas, by the election of the legal holder of said notes upon the default aforesaid, the whole of the principal sum secured by said trust deed, with the interest thereon to the time of sale, has become due and payable and said legal holder has thereupon made application to the undersigned to sell said premises for the purposes and in pursuance of the provisions set forth in said trust deed. Now, therefore, public notice is hereby given, that for said purposes, and in pursuance of said provisions, I, the said Samuel M. Moore, on the thirty-first day of July, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-six, at the hour of one o'clock in the afternoon of said day, at the building occupied as a court house, situate at the southeast corner of Adams street and LaSalle street, in the city of Chicago, in the county of Cook, in the State of Illinois, to wit, at the door of said building which fronts on said Adams street, and is nearest to said LaSalle street, will sell and dispose of, at public auction, for the highest and best price the same will bring in cash, the following described lands and premises, situate in the town of Calumet, in the county of Cook and State of Illinois, to wit: Lots one to fifteen inclusive, in block thirteen; and lots one to seven, inclusive, in block fourteen; being twenty-two lots, all in Vincennes Road addition to Washington Height, being a subdivision of the west half of the southeast quarter of section nineteen, and that part lying east of the Dummy Track, of the east half of the southwest quarter of said section, all in township thirty-seven north, range fourteen, east of the third principal meridian, as the same is recorded in book three of maps, on page twenty-five, in the recorder's office of said Cook county, together with all and singular the tenements, hereditaments, privileges and appurtenances thereunto belonging, and all the right, title, benefit and equity of redemption of the said Ell Nathan Hopkins, his heirs and assigns therein. Dated this fifteenth day of July, A. D. 1876.

SAMUEL M MOORE,
Trustee as aforesaid.

CHARLES M. STURGES, Atty. 43-45

EDMUND S. HOLBROOK,
Attorney, Metropolitan Block.

STATE OF ILLINOIS, SUPREME COURT, WITHin and for the Third Grand Division of said State. William H. Brooks, Jr. v. Catharine E. Ewing Kearns. —Error to Circuit court of Cook county.

Whereas, the said William H. Brooks, Jr., has sued out a writ of error from said Supreme court to reverse a judgment obtained by said Catharine E. Ewing Kearns against said William H. Brooks, Jr., in the said Circuit court of Cook county, which said writ of error is now pending in said Supreme court; and whereas, a writ of scire facias has been duly issued herein, returnable on the first day of the next term of said Supreme court, to be holden at Ottawa, in said State, on the second Tuesday in September next, according to law; and whereas, also, it appears by affidavit, on file in the clerk's office of said Supreme court, that the said Catharine E. Ewing Kearns is a non-resident of the State of Illinois, and without the reach of the process of said Supreme court,

Now, therefore, you, the said Catharine E. Ewing Kearns, the said defendant in error, whose non-residence appears as aforesaid, are hereby notified to be and appear before the justices of said Supreme court, at the next term of said court, to be holden at Ottawa, in said State, on the second Tuesday in September next, to hear the record and proceedings brought into said Supreme court on return of said writ of error, and the errors assigned, if you shall see fit, and further to do and receive what said court shall order in this behalf.

Dated this 12th day of July, A. D. 1876.

C. D. TRIMBLE,
Clerk of the Supreme Court,
By A. H. TAYLOR, Deputy.

EDMUND S. HOLBROOK, Atty. for Brooks. 43-46

WHEREAS, ELL NATHAN HOPKINS, BEING indebted upon three promissory notes (given by him for balance of purchase money), each for the sum of sixteen hundred and ninety-six dollars and twenty-five cents, all bearing date of the twentieth day of April, A. D. 1874, and all payable to the order of himself, one in eighteen, one in thirty, and one in forty-two months, after said date, each of said notes bearing interest from date until maturity at the rate of eight per centum per annum, payable at the maturity of the first one due of said notes, and yearly thereafter, and each bearing interest after maturity at the rate of ten per centum per annum, did to secure the payment of said notes and interest, by his trust deed of even date with said notes, filed for record in the office of the recorder of Cook county, in the State of Illinois, on the nineteenth day of June, A. D. 1874, and recorded at page 54 of book 403 of records, in said office, convey unto me, the undersigned, Samuel M. Moore, the lands and premises therein and hereinafter described, in trust, among other things, that in case of default in the payment of the said promissory notes and interest, or any part thereof, according to the tenor and effect thereof, the undersigned, Samuel M. Moore, on the application of the legal holder of said notes, or either of them, should sell and dispose of said premises, and all the right, title, benefit, and equity of redemption of said Ell Nathan Hopkins, his heirs and assigns therein, at public auction, at such place in the city of Chicago, in the State of Illinois, or on said premises, as might be specified in the notice of such sale, for the highest and best price the same would bring in cash, two weeks' notice having been previously given of the time and place of said sale, by advertisement in the Chicago Legal News, or in any newspaper at that time published in said city of Chicago, and to make, execute and deliver to the purchaser or purchasers at such sale, good and sufficient deed or deeds of conveyance for the premises sold, and to apply the proceeds or avails of such sale in the order and manner, and for the purposes prescribed in said trust deed, and that in case of default in any of said payments of principal or interest, then, and in that case, the whole of the principal sum, secured in and by said trust deed, and the interest thereon to the time of sale, might at once, at the option of said legal holder become due and payable, and the said premises be sold in the manner and with the same effect as if the said indebtedness had matured: to the originals of which notes and trust deed, now open to inspection in the custody of Charles M. Sturges, attorney at law, at Room No. 7, Methodist Church Block, in said city of Chicago, as well as to said record of said trust deed, reference is hereby had and made for further certainty as to the contents and provisions thereof. And whereas, default was made in the payment, when and as they became due, of the principal and interest of the one of said notes which fell due eighteen months after the date thereof, and also in the payment when and as the same became due, of the first due instalments of interest upon the other two of said notes, respectively, which said sums so in default are and remain still due and unpaid. And whereas, by the election of the legal holder of said notes upon the default aforesaid, the whole of the principal sum secured by said trust deed, with the interest thereon to the time of sale, has become due and payable, and said legal holder has thereupon made application to the undersigned to sell said premises for the purposes and in pursuance of the provisions set forth in said trust deed. Now, therefore, public notice is hereby given, that for said purposes, and in pursuance of said provisions, I, the said Samuel M. Moore, on the thirty-first day of July, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-six, at the hour of one o'clock in the afternoon of said day, at the building occupied as a court house, situate at the southeast corner of Adams street and LaSalle street, in the city of Chicago, in the county of Cook, in the State of Illinois, to wit, at the door of said building which fronts on said Adams street, and is nearest to said LaSalle street, will sell and dispose of, at public auction, for the highest and best price the same will bring in cash, the following described lands and premises, situate in the town of Calumet, in the county of Cook and State of Illinois, to wit: Lots one to twenty inclusive, in block fifteen; lots six, seven, ten and eleven, in block twelve; and lots twenty-three and twenty-four, in block thirteen, being twenty-six lots, all in Vincennes Road addition to Washington Heights, being a subdivision of the west half of the southeast quarter of section nineteen, and that part lying east of the Dummy Track of the east half of the southwest quarter of said section, all in township thirty-seven north, range fourteen, east of the third principal meridian, as the same is recorded in book three of maps, on page twenty-five, in the recorder's office of said Cook county, together with all and singular the tenements, hereditaments, privileges and appurtenances thereunto belonging, and all the right, title, benefit and equity of redemption of the said Ell Nathan Hopkins, his heirs and assigns therein. Dated this fifteenth day of July, A. D. 1876.

SAMUEL M. MOORE,
Trustee as aforesaid.

TRUSTEE'S SALE.—WHEREAS, JAMES H. BOWen and Caroline A. Bowen, his wife; George S. Bowen and Julia E. Bowen, his wife; and Chauncey T. Bowen and Therese S. Bowen, his wife, grantors, made their certain deed of trust to the undersigned, Robert C. Wright, as trustee, bearing date October 15th, A. D. 1872, and conveying the premises, hereinafter described, to secure payment of two certain promissory principal notes for the sum of twenty thousand dollars each, and ten notes for interest on each of said principal notes, for eight hundred dollars each, all bearing even date with said trust deed; said principal notes being payable five years after date, and the interest notes being payable at intervals of six months after date; which deed of trust is recorded in the recorder's office of Cook county, Illinois, in book 41 of records, at page 242, and provides, amongst other things, for sale of said premises in case of default in payment of said notes, or either of them, or any part thereof, or in case of default in the payment of taxes;

And whereas, default has been made in payment of a part of two of said interest notes that became due and payable forty-two months after date thereof, and also in payment of taxes on said premises, and application has been made by the legal holder of said notes to said trustee, to advertise and sell said premises, according to the terms of said deed of trust; and the amount due and unpaid on said notes is eight hundred dollars, with interest thereon at eight per cent. per annum since the fifteenth day of April, 1876, and the whole of said principal sums, to wit, forty thousand dollars, with interest at eight per cent. per annum since the 15th day of April, 1876, is also unpaid,

Now, therefore, in pursuance of said application, and by virtue of the power and authority given by said deed of trust, I will sell at auction, for cash, at two o'clock in the afternoon on the thirty first day of July, A. D. 1876, on the said premises (also known as numbers 15 and 17, Randolph Street, in the city of Chicago), the said premises, to wit: Lot one, of Bowen Brother's plat of subdivision of sub-lots four, five, six, seven, in re-subdivision of lots twenty-six to thirty-four inclusive, in block ten, Fort Dearborn addition to Chicago, being forty feet front on Randolph street, by one hundred and sixty-eight feet to Benton Place, and being west and adjoining the alley, with the improvements thereon, and all right and equity of redemption of said grantors in said deed of trust, their heirs and assigns therein.

TO WILLIAM HENRY COMMONS, ROBERT Commons, John Commons, Charles Wesley Commons, Rhoda Jane Commons, Jane Commons, widow, Charlotte Ann Commons, and William Charles Commons:

Take notice that on Monday, August 21st, 1876, at 10 A. M., or as soon thereafter as the matter can be heard, I shall present my final report and account as executor of the last will and testament of Henry Commons, deceased, for approval, to the County Court of Cook county, Illinois, at Chicago, Illinois, and shall at the same time ask that the estate of said deceased may be declared fully settled, and that I may be discharged from further duty, when and where you can be if you see fit.

43-43 JAMES COMMONS, Executor.

WHEREAS, ELL NATHAN HOPKINS, BEING indebted upon three promissory notes (given by him for balance of purchase money), each for the sum of fifteen hundred and twenty-seven dollars and fifty cents, all bearing date of the twentieth day of April, A. D. 1874, and all payable to the order of himself, one in eighteen, one in thirty, and one in forty-two months after said date, each of said notes bearing interest from date until maturity, at the rate of eight per centum per annum, payable at the maturity of the first one due of said notes, and yearly thereafter, and each bearing interest after maturity, at the rate of ten per centum per annum, did, to secure the payment of said notes and interest, by his trust deed of even date with said notes, filed for record in the office of recorder of Cook county, in the State of Illinois, on the nineteenth day of June, A. D. 1874, and recorded at page 295, of book 402 of records, in said office, convey unto me, the undersigned, Samuel M. Moore, the lands and premises therein and hereinafter described, in trust, among other things, that in case of default in the payment of the said promissory notes and interest, or any part thereof, according to the tenor and effect thereof, the undersigned, Samuel M. Moore, on the application of the legal holder of said notes, or either of them, should sell and dispose of said premises, and all the right, title benefit and equity of redemption of said Ell Nathan Hopkins, his heirs and assigns therein, at public auction, at such place in the city of Chicago in the State of Illinois, or on said premises, as might be specified in the notice of such sale, for the highest and best price the same would bring in cash, two weeks' notice having been previously given of the time and place of said sale, by advertisement in the Chicago Legal News, or in any newspaper at that time published in said city of Chicago, and to make, execute and deliver to the purchaser or purchasers at such sale, good and sufficient deed or deeds of conveyance for the premises sold, and to apply the proceeds or avails of such sale in the order and manner, and for the purposes prescribed in said trust deed, and that in case of default in any of said payments of principal or interest, then and in that case the whole of the principal sum secured in and by said trust deed, and the interest thereon, to the time of sale, might at once, at the option of said legal holder, become due and payable, and the said premises be sold in the manner and with the same effect as if the said indebtedness had matured: to the originals of which note and trust deed, now open to inspection, in the custody of Charles M. TRUSTEE'S SALE.—WHEREAS, KATHARINA Feilen and Peter Feilen, her husband, did on the fifth day of June, A. D. 1875, as grantors, execute and deliver to Lyman Baird, as grantee and trustee, their certain deed of trust of that date, to secure the bond of the said Peter Feilen, of even date therewith, (which said bond has been assigned to James D. Dana), for the sum of $3,200.00, with interest thereon at ten per centum per annum since the date thereof, which principal sum, with interest thereon since June 5th, A. D. 1875, is now claimed to be due under the provisions of said bond and deed of trust, on which bond there is now claimed to be due the sum of about $3,562.72, and default having been made in the payment thereof;

And whereas, application has been made to me, the said trustee, by the legal holder of said bond for the sale of the premises in said deed of trust described, to wit: all the following described lands and premises, situate in the city of Chicago, county of Cook and State of Illinois, to wit:

Lot numbered twenty-seven (27), in block three (3), of subdivision of blocks two (2) and three (3), and the west thirty-three (33) feet of block one (1), in the State Bank of Illinois' subdivision of the northeast quarter of the northwest quarter of section four (4), township thirty-nine (39) north, range fourteen (14) east of the third principal meridian. The said lot has a frontage of twenty-five (25) feet on the south line of North avenue, and extends south of that uniform width one hundred and six (106) feet, more or less, to an alley.

Now, therefore, I, Lyman Baird, trustee as aforesaid, hereby give notice, that, in pursuance of such application, under the powers and for the purposes in said trust deed expressed, I will, on Monday, the 21st day of August, A. D. 1876, at ten (10) o'clock A. M., at the north door of the court house on Adams street, nearest LaSalle street, in said city of Chicago, sell at public auction, for cash, all the real estate and premises hereinbefore and in said deed of trust described, with all the rights, benefits and equity of redemption of the said grantors and their heirs, assigns, and legal representatives therein.

TRUSTEE'S SALE.—WHEREAS, ON JUNE 12TH, 1872, Edwin S. Stewart executed, acknowledged and delivered to the undersigned, trustee, a trust deed, conveying the following described premises:

Block twelve (12), and the west half of block thirteen (13), in Avondale, an addition to Chicago, being a subdivision of the west half of the northeast quarter of section twenty-four (24), in township thirty-eight (38) north, range thirteen (13), east of the third principal meridian, for the purpose of securing by the east half of said block twelve, the payment of a promissory note for seven hundred and ten dollars; by the west half of said block twelve (12), the payment of a promissory note for six hundred and ninety dollars; by the west half of said block thirteen, the payment of a note for six hundred and seventy-nine dollars; and by all of said property the payment of a note for six hundred dollars; all of said notes being dated June 12th, 1876, being payable at the First National Bank of Chicago, with interest at ten per cent. per annum, payable semi-annually to Alonzo J. Sawyer or order, signed by said Stewart and falling due, the first three above mentioned, three years from date, and the last on December 16th, 1872, which said trust deed was recorded in the office of the recorder of deeds of Cook county, Illinois, in book 139, page 429, and was given to secure the purchase money of said premises;

And whereas, it is provided in said deed, that in case of default in the payment of said notes and interest, or either or any part thereof, on the application of the legal holder of said note or notes, it shall be lawful for said trustee to sell said premises or any part thereof, in mass or separate parcels, as said trustee may prefer, at public auction at the north door of the court house, in the city of Chicago, in the State of Illinois, for the highest and best price the same will bring in cash, twenty days' notice of such sale having been first given in one of the newspapers published in said city, and out of the proceeds of such sale, after paying costs of advertising, sale, commissions and all other expenses of the trust, taxes and assessments, to pay the principal and interest due on said notes, rendering the overplus to the grantor;

And whereas, said notes were duly endorsed by said payee in blank, and default has been made in the payment of the principal of said first three notes, and of all interest thereon; since June 12th, 1875, on said note of $679; since Dec. 12th, 1874, on said note of $690; since June 12th, 1874, on said note of $710, excepting $8.95 paid on said interest;

And whereas, application has been made to the undersigned, as such trustee, to sell said lands according to the terms of said deed, by the legal holder of said notes, upon which there is now estimated to be due the sum of $2,762.85,

Now, therefore, I, the said trustee, pursuant to the powers given me in said deed, do hereby give notice that on Saturday, the fifth day of August, A. D. 1876, at 10 o'clock A. M., at the west north door of the court house on Adams street, in said city of Chicago, I shall sell at public auction, for the highest and best price the same will bring in cash, the said premises, to wit: The said east half of said block twelve, for the purpose of making the money due on said note of $710; the said west half of block twelve for the purpose of making the money due on said note of $690; and the said west half of block thirteen for the purpose of making the money due on said note of $679, and all costs and expenses of sale and of the trust, together with all the right and equity of said Stewart in said premises.

CHICAGO LEGAL NEWS.

CHICAGO, JULY 22, 1876.

The Courts.

We have received from JOSIAH H. BISSELL, official reporter, the following opinion, which is to appear in his forthcoming volume of reports:

U. S. CIRCUIT COURT, N. D. OF ILLINOIS.

SHERIDAN SHOOK et al. v. ARTHUR MCKEE RANKIN et al.

In Equity.

1. COPYRIGHT—TRANSLATIONS OF PLAYS.—Where the translator of a play, by consent of the author, has obtained a copyright upon it, the owner of such copyright can maintain a bill enjoining any other person from using or representing such translation, or any part of it.
2. PRACTICE.—Affidavits, evidently intended to be used in a case, but not entitled in it, will be allowed to be read on motion for injunction.

Complainants' bill alleged that prior to February 1, 1875, a dramatic composition or play, entitled "Les Deux Orphelines," was designed and composed in the French language by Adolph D'Ennery and Eugene Cormon, residents and citizens of France. N. Hart Jackson, a resident of the United States, became the owner by purchase and assignment of the original manuscript, for representation in the United States.

Before February 1, 1875, Jackson, with the consent of D'Ennery and Cormon, composed and arranged a translation from the French play into the English language, and entitled the translation "The Two Orphans," being a literal translation of "Les Deux Orphelines," and adapted his translation for performance and representation to English-speaking audiences.

February 1, 1875, by and with the consent of D'Ennery and Cormon, and before publication, Jackson obtained a copyright on his translation, as author, under the copyright laws of the United States.

Complainants afterwards became the sole owners and proprietors of the original manuscript in French, the translation by Jackson and his copyright, by purchase and assignment from Jackson.

Complainants alleged that the original "Les Deux Orphelines" had never been translated or published with the knowledge or consent of its authors, except the translation by Jackson; that defendants had announced and had on divers nights publicly performed, the "Two Orphans" at the Adelphi Theater in Chicago, without the consent and license of complainants; that defendant Rankin and his associates had previously, and while in the complainants' employ, performed and acted the "Two Orphans," and had thereby familiarized themselves with it, and were acting the same translation at the Adelphi.

Prayer for an injunction and accounting.

The bill was supported by several affidavits, among which were complainants' and Jackson's. The affidavits were sworn to in New York, but were not entitled of the suit or court until filed.

The affidavit of L. F. Post, one of complainants' counsel, was filed, showing these affidavits were made and sworn to for the purposes of this suit and for no other purpose.

The defendants denied that Jackson acquired any rights by his translation or copyright; that "Les Deux Orphelines" was translated by consent of the authors by John Oxenford, of London, prior to Jackson's translation; that defendants had obtained from London, Oxenford's translation, and intended thereafter to perform the latter, and not Jackson's translation.

Motion for an injunction upon bill and affidavits to restrain the defendants from publicly performing the "Two Orphans."

Upon hearing, defendants objected to the reading of complainants' and Jackson's affidavits, because not properly entitled when sworn to.

S. M. MILLARD and L. F. POST, for complainants, in support of the motion cited on the point that an author might be a translator:

21 Morgan's Law of Literature, 315-321, as to what constitutes infringement; Boucicault v. Wood, 2 Bissell, 34. What is prima facie evidence of copyright? Roberts v. Myers, 23 Law Reporter, 396.

CLARKSON & VAN SCHAACK and NORMAN J. EMMONS, for defendants.

DRUMMOND, J.—It seems to me that the complainants are entitled to an injunction to prevent the defendants from performing the work which has been translated from the French of D'Ennery and Cormon by N. Hart Jackson into English, and adapted by him for representation on the stage in this country.

The court can go no farther in deciding a motion of this kind than the proofs of the case clearly warrant. What are the facts established here beyond controversy? They are these: D'Ennery and Cormon were the authors of a drama in the French language called "Les Deux Orphelines;" Jackson translated it into English, and adapted it to representation on the stage. This was with the consent of the authors. After this was done, he applied under the law for a copyright, and the question is, whether there was any valid objection to his obtaining a copyright for the play, thus translated into English.

I do not see that there was. He was the translator of the play. He adapted it to representation on the stage, and was, in the sense of the law, the author of that for which he obtained a copyright. No one could complain of this, except the authors of the play in French, and it affirmatively appears that they assented to this action on the part of Mr Jackson. Then I do not see why he was not protected under the law for his translation and adaptation of the work to the stage, and of which he was in one sense the author.

That being so, has the defendant infringed his rights by performing this unpublished drama? To decide that, it is only necessary to determine the effect to be given to sundry affidavits which have been introduced in the case—those of Mr. Shook, Mr. Palmer and Mr. Jackson. I think it is proper for the court to receive these affidavits for the purpose for which they were filed. It is well known that the courts are much more liberal upon this subject than they were in former times. They do not reject affidavits simply because there may be some clerical error or omission, provided it appears that they were intended for the case which the court is called upon to investigate.

It affirmatively appears, I think, that these affidavits were made for the purpose of being used in this case; and conceding that they did not at the time contain the proper title of the cause, still they were made and forwarded to counsel, who may be presumed to be authorized by the parties to give the proper character to them by stating the name of the cause in which they were to be used. It seems to me that it would be adopting a very rigid rule, and one hardly in accordance with the liberal practice of the present day, to declare that the affidavits should be rejected because at the time when the affidavits were made and signed by the parties, the name of the cause was not stated, provided they knew that they were to be used in the cause, although they did not know the technical description of the title of the same.

Then, these affidavits being received, as I think they should be, there can be no doubt that these defendants—the principal defendants who have performed this play—have been using the translation of Mr. Jackson, as adapted by him for representation on the stage.

They acquired their familiarity with it in consequence of the direct action of the translator or his assignees, and it would be hardly fair under the circumstances of the case that they should be permitted to go on and use it contrary to the wishes of the owners. It has been said that they do not propose to use it any longer; but in view of the facts the court cannot assume that they will not do so, or refuse an injunction on that ground. It is not controverted that these complainants are Jackson's assignees, and are entitled to all his rights. I do not think that, because Mr. Jackson, or, possibly, the complainants, may have been mistaken as to their legal rights, or as to the particular character annexed to their rights of property subsisting in this drama, the court should be prevented from acting in this case. The court will not go into a collateral issue upon this question of injunction. The only point is whether complainants have rights which have been violated by the defendants, and whether they are entitled to an injunction upon the facts as they are presented in the case.

I have no doubt that they are, and therefore an injunction will issue, restraining the defendants from performing the play, which has been translated from the French of D'Ennery and Cormon, by N. Hart Jackson, and adapted by him for representation on the stage, or any part thereof.

As to the romance of the "Two Orphans:" It purports to be a story in narrative form, founded, as I suppose, upon the play of the "Two Orphans;" but, so far as I have been able to examine it, I do not see, even conceding that its publication was made with the consent of the complainants, that it deprives them of the right to the play of the "Two Orphans," as translated by Mr. Jackson.

It would take much time for me to go through this story in detail, and compare it with the drama, which I have not had an opportunity of doing. But so far as I have looked at it, I think it does not deprive the complainants of a right to an injunction on that account.

As to the translations of the French play, I know there may be certain phrases which may be identical in them, as translated by Jackson and Oxenford. There are or may be the same translations of some French words; but, of course, the fact of there being identity of a few phrases does not make them one play as translated.

It always must be a question to be decided by comparison whether or not there is any essential part of the play taken as translated by Mr. Jackson. What I mean is, that they have no right to take any part of this, the work of Mr. Jackson, and use it.

So far as I can see, the translations are made by two distinct persons, and independent of each other. I do not, therefore, touch the Oxenford play in this decision at all.

The order will be that the defendants shall not use the whole or any part of Mr. Jackson's translation—the drama which he has translated and adapted for representation on the stage in this country.

As at present advised, I shall not enjoin the defendants from using Oxenford's translation.

[The question of the right to use the Oxenford translation came up subsequently before Judge Drummond on a motion to attach McKee Rankin for contempt, and he decided that the defendants had the right to use that translation, but that they must be careful not to interpolate any phrases of Jackson's translation.

[The consent of an author to publication abroad places him in the position of a foreign author, and is an abandonment of his rights under our statute. UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT, D. OF CALIFORNIA.

(Before Hon. OGDEN HOFFMAN, District Judge.)

In Re FUNKENSTEIN.

BANKRUPTCY—FALSE STATEMENT IN PETITION—FINAL JUDGMENT.

1. FALSE STATEMENT IN PETITION.—A petition in involuntary bankruptcy, alleged, among other things, that it was filed by one-fourth of the creditors representing one-third of the provable debts, as required by the act. The bankrupt made default, and the court entered an order that the facts set forth were true, and adjudicated him bankrupt. On a motion to set aside the adjudication, on the ground that the requisite number of creditors had not joined in the petition, held, that it was not within the power of the court to do so.
2. FINAL JUDGMENT.—That "the judgment shall be final," does not mean merely that no appeal shall lie from it, but that the matter so adjudged shall not thereafter be examined.
3. FRAUD.—If the ground on which the motion was made were fraud, bad faith, or collusion, the rule would be different.

JOSEPH NAPTHALY for petitioners.

DAVID FREIDENRICH, for opposing creditors.

Opinion by HOFFMAN, J.

The petition against the bankrupt in this case, was filed on the 9th of April, 1875. It contained the usual averment that the petitioners constituted one-fourth in number of the creditors of the bankrupt, and that the aggregate of their debts, provable under the act, amounted to at least one third of the debts so provable. On the return day of the order to show cause, the bankrupt made default and he was adjudged bankrupt. The order was in the form prescribed by the Supreme Court under the original act. It was not modified to accommodate it to the provisions of the amended act of June 22, 1874.

With respect to the allegations of the petition, the court adjudged "that the facts set forth in the petition were true."

On the 29th April, the bankrupt filed his duly verified schedules, setting forth his debts and liabilities. On the 21st day of May, 1875, the bankrupt filed his petition for discharge. This was opposed by several of his creditors, who also moved that the adjudication be set aside and the proceedings vacated and dismissed, on the ground that the requisite number of creditors had not joined in the petition, and the debts due them were not of the amount required by the act. The matter was referred to the register, whose report is admitted to be true.

It appears that the petition was signed by seven creditors, representing in the aggregate $4 292 of indebtedness. By the bankrupt's own schedules it appeared that the number of his creditors whose claims are undisputed, are thirty-eight, and the aggregate of his indebtedness due them is $115,062.76. These schedules were offered in evidence before the register, and their accuracy admitted. It thus appears that the petitioning creditors constitute less than a fifth in number of all the creditors, and the debts due them amount to less than a twentieth of the total indebtedness of the bankrupt.

Had these facts appeared on the return day of the rule to show cause, the petition would have been dismissed, as of course.

The question presented is, can the court now take notice of them, and if so, what action should be taken? The statute provides that if, on the return day, the debtor "shall admit in writing that the requisite number and amount of creditors have petitioned, the court, if satisfied that the admission was made in good faith, shall so adjudge, which judgment shall be final, and the matter proceed without further steps on that subject." And if it shall appear that such number and amount have not so petitioned, the court shall grant a reasonable time, not exceeding ten days, within which other creditors may join in such "petition." If, at the expiration of that time, the requirements of the statute are complied with, the matter may proceed. If not, it is to be dismissed.

It will be observed that these provisions contemplate two cases. The first, where the debtor admits in writing the allegations of the petition with regard to the number and amount of creditors, and the second, where those allegations are denied. No provision is made for cases where the debtor neither admits nor denies, but merely makes default. In the first case, the court is required, if satisfied that the admission was made in good faith, to so adjudge, which judgment is final.

In the succeeding section, the provisions seem to embrace cases of default as well as those where the bankrupt admits the facts. It enacts in substance that if, on the return day of the order to show cause, the court shall be satisfied that the requirement of the act as to the number and amount of creditors has been complied with, or if within the prescribed time creditors sufficient to make up the required number and amount shall sign the petition, the court shall so adjudge, "which judgment shall be final."

It will be noticed that the form of the adjudication in the case at bar very imperfectly complies with these requirements. The act seems to contemplate a distinct and explicit judicial finding of the fact that the requisite number and amount of creditors have petitioned. And the judgment of the court on that point is made final. The form used merely finds that the allegations of the petition are true. This form, as before stated, is prescribed by the supreme court. It has not been modified since the passage of the amended act. The propriety of inserting the more explicit judgment which the act seems to contemplate, has been overlooked.

But I do not consider that this irregularity is fatal to the proceeding. The judgment of the court that the allegations of the petition are true, embraces all the allegations of the petition, as well as those relating to the number and amount of the petitioning creditors as the other necessary averments. The court has in fact passed upon the truth of those allegations, as much as on that of the allegation of the residence of the plaintiff, and the date and existence of the act of bankruptcy, which are also facts necessary either to give the court jurisdiction, or to authorize the proceeding. The mere circumstance that its judgment has not been so explicit on one point as the act would seem to contemplate, ought not to defeat the proceeding. The inconvenience and hardship of so holding would be very great, for the same form has been followed in all cases of involuntary bankruptcy in this district, and it is presumed in many others. The clerks have no doubt very generally contented themselves with following the forms prescribed by the Supreme court.

The briefs of counsel in the case at bar discuss the question whether the averment with regard to the number and amount of creditors is a jurisdictional averment. On this point the opinions of the district judges are conflicting. The learned judge of the District court for the Eastern district of Michigan holds that to give the court jurisdiction, the petition must contain a clear, consistent and explicit allegation as to the proportionate number of creditors petitioning, and the amount of debts represented by them. For the want of such an allegation he vacated the order to show cause, and refused to allow an amendment. In re Rosenfelds, 11 B. R. 86. In Ex parte Jewett, 11 B. R. 443, the learned judge for the district of Massachusetts held that the insertion of the name of one of the creditors instead of that of the debtor, by a clerical mistake, did not vitiate a proceeding under the act to effect a composition, and that notwithstanding the error there was "a case in bankruptcy pending against the debtor." In this case there had been no adjudication. The views of Lowell, J., were adopted by the learned judge of the southern district of New York in the recent case of In re Duncan, Sherman & Co., where the point raised in the case at bar was distinctly adjudged. In the two previous cases the point upon which the judges differed was, whether it was necessary, in order to give jurisdiction, that the petition should contain a clear, consistent allegation that the requisite number and amount of creditors had joined in the petition. In the case at bar, as in that of Duncan, Sherman & Co., the petition contains the requisite allegation, and the question really is, can the enquiry as to whether that allegation be true be re-opened after the court has, on the return day of the rule to show cause, adjudged that it is. Blatchford, J., held that the provision of the statute which declares the judgment of the court on the point shall be final, forbids the reopening of the question at any subsequent stage of the proceedings, unless fraud be alleged and proved. His language is: "Unless this be so, there is no necessary limit to the number of times the court may be required to re-examine the question thus declared to be finally adjudged. I speak now of an allegation merely that the court has erred, and not of an allegation of fraud or bad faith."

In these views I concur. I think the finality, attributed by the act to the judgment of the court, does not mean merely that no appeal shall lie from its judgment, but that the matters so adjudged shall not be thereafter re-examinable, even by itself. But I do not consider that Congress meant to deprive the court of its inherent right, where fraud and imposition have been practiced upon it, to apply the remedy. The ground upon which the present motion is based, is merely the insufficiency in number and amount of the petitioning creditors. In the brief of counsel fraud and bad faith are charged. There is certainly much color for this accusation. The gross disparity between the aggregate of provable debts due the petitioning creditors, and the total amount of the bankrupt's indebtedness, vehemently suggests the suspicion that both parties must have known that the allegation that they represented one-third of his entire indebtedness, was untrue. The creditors could have been at little pains to ascertain the facts if they supposed $4,292 to be one-third of an indebtedness which, twenty days subsequently to the filing of the petition, the bankrupt stated under oath to be $115,062.76.

For some reason, the opposing creditors failed to prove their debts before the election of an assignee. The assignee was therefore chosen by the petitioning creditors. He reports that no assets whatever have come into his possession. The counsel for the petitioning creditors intimate in their brief that the object of the opposing creditors in procuring the adjudication to be set aside, is to obtain the benefit of certain judgment liens on the real estate of the bankrupt.

But if so, why has the assignee failed to find the real estate? And why have they failed to point out to the assignee of their own selection assets which it is his duty to collect and distribute amongst all the creditors? The bankrupt about two yeas ago was adjudged bankrupt, but denied his discharge. The debts set forth in his schedule seem to have been contracted since the former adjudication. He claims that the debts from which he then sought to be discharged are barred by the statute of limitations.

Under all the circumstances, I think it proper that the opposing creditors should have an opportunity to allege, and prove if they can, fraud, bad faith or collusion in obtaining the adjudication. I therefore deny the motion as it is now made, but leave is given to renew it on the ground of fraud, bad faith, or collusion. —The Central Law Journal.

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

OPINION FILED JUNE 30, 1876.

THOMAS SAMUEL v. FRANCIS AGNEW.

Appeal from Superior Court of Cook Co.

SALE UNDER ATTACHMENT, WHAT TITLE PASSES—REPLEVIN, IN WHAT COURT MAY BE BROUGHT.

1. ATTACHMENT SALE—WHAT INTEREST PASSES.—That the proceedings in attachment are against the interest of the defendant in attachment, and those claiming under him, in the thing attached; and that a person whose goods have been seized improperly, and who is no party to the suit, is not concluded by the judgment.
2. REPLEVIN THE PROPER REMEDY.—Replevin is the proper remedy against a sheriff who has levied a writ of attachment against one person upon the property of another, at the instance of the party whose property is thus wrongfully levied upon.
3. IN WHAT COURT MAY BE BROUGHT.—That it was competent to commence the suit in replevin in the Circuit court, when the attachment suit was in the Superior court.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.

STATEMENT.—This proceeding was instituted by appellant against appellee, as sheriff of Cook county, for the purpose of having him attached and punished for contempt in not selling certain goods and chattels in his hands, levied upon by an attachment and special execution.

A rule to show cause was entered and served upon appellee, who, in return thereto, showed that the goods and chattels, so levied upon, had not been sold, but had been delivered up to the coroner of Cook county on a writ of replevin issued out of the Circuit court of Cook county, at the suit of one, Edward Tyler, who was not a defendant in the attachment suit, after the executions had been issued and levied on said goods and chattels by appellee; and that he had been guilty of no negligence in selling before the writ in the replevin suit was served upon him. The court thereupon ordered that appellee be discharged, to reverse which order this appeal is prosecuted.

Opinion by SCHOLFIELD, J.

The question first arising on this record is, does a judgment in rem in attachment, where goods belonging to a person other than the defendant in attachment, and upon which there is no express prior lien in favor of the attaching creditor, have been seized by the sheriff, give the sheriff the right to hold the goods against the owner, or, in other words, convert what was before a tortious possession into a lawful one.

Counsel for appellant insist, this court in Bliss et al. v. Heasty et al., 61st Ill., 338, recognizes the doctrine that the judgment in such cases is conclusive when the goods are purchased by third parties, bona fide at the sale, although it would not be so as between the parties to the suit. A reference to the question before the court in that case will show that the court, in what was said, had not the slightest reference to a case where, under an attachment against one person, the goods of another are seized. There was no question, then, but the property seized was that of the defendant in the attachment, and he had proper notice by publication. The question was whether the judgment thereupon rendered was so conclusive between the parties as to bar an action by the defendant in the attachment for the malicious suing out of the attachment; and, with reference to that question, this language was used: "Appellants urged that the court below erred in rendering the judgment, because they claim the recovery in the attachment suit is conclusive between the parties, and cannot be questioned in a collateral proceeding. That it is so far conclusive, that strangers to the proceeding will be protected in their rights by purchase or otherwise, inasmuch as the court acquires jurisdiction of the subject matter, we cannot doubt." But there is nothing from which it can be inferred that the court intended to say that the issue of an attachment and the publication of a notice, in a suit against it, would give the court jurisdiction to render a judgment against the goods of B., merely because they had been wrongfully seized as the goods of it by the sheriff.

On the contrary, however, in Germania v. Steam Tug Indiana, 11th Ill., 535, where it was contended by counsel that a sale of a boat under proceedings in attachment, operated like sales under proceedings in admiralty courts, and that the purchaser acquired an indefeasible title, divested of all liens of whatsoever nature; it was held, the ordinary proceeding by attachment, although in some respects a proceeding in rem, has no such conclusive effect as a decree in admiralty, and that a sale under it does not divest any liens of a superior degree, nor any antecedent liens of the same degree. And this is quoted with approval in Propeller Hilton v. Miller et al., 62 Ill., 222.

It is said, in Drake, on Attachments, § 220: "It is a well settled principle that an attaching creditor can acquire through his attachment no higher or better right to the property on assets attached, than the defendant had when the attachment took place, unless he can show some fraud or collusion by which his rights are impaired." And we understand the more reasonable doctrine to be, that proceedings in attachment are against the interest of the defendant in attachment, and those claiming under him in the thing attached; and that a person whose goods have been seized improperly, and who is no party to the suit, is not concluded by the judgment. Megee v. Brine, 3rd Wright, 50-63; Breeding v. Siegworth, 5th Casey, 396; Woodruff v. Taylor, 20 Vt., 65; Barber v. The Bank, 9th Conn., 407.

The question then occurs, is replevin a proper remedy against a sheriff who has levied a writ of attachment against one person upon the property of another, at the instance of the party whose property is thus wrongfully levied upon? It seems to be well settled that this remedy would be appropriate in such cases, aside from anything to be found in our statute. Allen on Sheriffs, 272 et seq; 3rd Robinson's Practice 477, 8; Clark v. Skinner, 20th Johns, 465; Thompson v. Button, 14 Id., 84; Gamer v. Campbell, 15 Id., 401; Judd v. Fox, 9th Cowen, 259; Chinn v. Russell, 2d Blackford, 172; Daggett v. Robins, Ibid, 415.

The first section of our statute, entitled, "Replevin," Gross Stat. (1869) p. 569, extends the action generally to all instances where goods or chattels shall have been wrongfully distrained or otherwise wrongfully taken, or shall be wrongfully detained in favor of the owner or person entitled to their possession.

The second section is as follows:

No action of replevin shall lie at the suit of the defendant in any execution or attachment, to recover goods or chattels seized by virtue thereof, unless such goods and chattels are exempted by law from such execution or attachment, nor shall any action of replevin lie for such goods and chattels, at the suit of any other person unless he shall at the time have a right to reduce into his possession, the goods taken." Thus clearly implying that when the goods of a person, other than the defendant in the execution or attachment are seized, and he has the right to reduce them to possession, he may bring replevin. Heagle v. Wheeland, 64th Ill., 423.

The remaining question is, whether it was competent to commence the suit in replevin, in the Circuit Court, or could it only have been legally commenced in the Superior Court when the attachment suit was pending? Taylor et al. v. Campl, 20th Howard, 583, and Freeman v. Howe et al,, 24th Id., 450, and other decisions cited from the Supreme Court of the United States, sustain the doctrine that where goods are in the custody of the officers of a United States Court under judicial process from such court, they cannot be taken by process from State courts, and so vice versa, and this to the end that there shall be no conflict between the respective jurisdiction of the State and Federal courts, and if that question were involved here they would be conclusive. But it is not, and upon the other questions discussed in them, they are binding only to the extent we are convinced of the justice and correctness of their conclusions. Nor is there any question presented of conflict as to the control of the property between courts of dissimilar organization and powers. Both courts emanate from the same sovereignty, and they have co-ordinate jurisdiction in civil cases in Cook county. In Jones v. Albee, 60th Ills., 34, we held that it was the design of the constitution that judges of the Circuit Court and the judges of the Superior Court of Cook county should exercise the same powers, and be placed upon the same footing.

There is, therefore, no apparent reason why, if the action of replevin might be brought in the Circuit court of Cook county, it might not, with equal propriety, be brought in the Superior court of that county, which is practically but a branch of the same court. Jones v. Albee, supra.

Entertaining these views, it follows, in our opinion, the court properly held that appellee was guilty of no contempt of court in surrendering the property in his custody to the coroner, on the writ of replevin.

When, if in any case an officer who submits in good faith to one, rather than the other, of two jurisdictions upon the face of record, apparently equally obligatory upon him, can be adjudged guilty of contempt, because it shall subsequently appear that to which he submitted was not legally paramount, we shall leave for the present an open question.

The judgment is affirmed.

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

OPINION FILED JUNE 30, 1876.

GEORGE E. EDBROOKE v. WILLIAM S. COOPER et al.

Appeal from Superior Court of Cook County.

PLEADING—EFFECT OF FILING PLEA WHILE ISSUE ON DEMURRER WAS STILL PENDING—STRIKING PLEA FROM THE FILES.

Opinion by SCHOLFIELD, J.

On the 6th day of April, 1874, appellant filed his demurrer to the plaintiff's declaration, and three days afterward, that is to say, on the 9th, he also filed his plea of non-assumpsit thereto. The record recites, that on the next day, the 10: "This day came the plaintiffs to this suit, by Carter, Becker and Dale, their attorneys, and the defendant by S. M. Davis, his attorney, comes also, and this cause, coming on now to be heard upon the defendant's demurrer to the plaintiff's declaration filed in said cause, after argument of counsel, and due deliberation by the court, * * * the court being fully advised in the premises, finds that said declaration is sufficient in law, and orders that said demurrer be, and the same is hereby overruled.

On the 11th of the same month, the record shows the plea of non-assumpsit was, on motion of plaintiff's attorneys, stricken from the files "for want of affidavit of merits, in pursuance of the statute in such case made and provided, and judgment was then entered" against the defendant for want of a plea. Subsequently the record was by order of the court, amended by striking out the words, "for want of affidavit of merits, in pursuance of the statute in such case made and provided."

The errors assigned question the regularity of the action of the court in sustaining the demurrer, and in subsequently striking the plea from the files.

There is no pretense that the declaration was, in fact, obnoxious to demurrer, but it is insisted, the filing of the plea, subsequently to the filing of the demurrer, was an abandonment of the demurrer, and withdrew the question presented by it from the consideration of the court.

It has been held in Nye v. Wright, 2d Scam., 222, and Grier v. Gibson, 36 Ill., 521, that a defendant, by filing a plea to a declaration, waives an antecedent demurrer; but this can hardly apply to the plaintiff unless he joins issue on the plea.

It is an old and familiar rule of pleading, that a party is not allowed to both plead and demur to the same matter. Stephens on Pleading, (9th Am. Ed.,) 278.

The record distinctly shows that the defendant did not abandon his demurrer, but that he appeared when it was called up by counsel; and it was overruled after argument of counsel. He is, therefore, estopped by the record from claiming his demurrer was abandoned.

The plea having been filed subsequently to the filing of the demurrer, and while the issue presented by it was still pending, the court was authorized to treat it as a nullity, and strike it from the files. Taylor v. Rhea Minon, 414.

Even if the plea had not been filed until after the demurrer was disposed of, being filed without the leave of the court, it might, in the discretion of the court, have been stricken from the files. Conradi et al. v. Evans et al., 2nd Scam., 186.

The court certainly was not authorized to strike the plea from the files, merely because it was not sworn to, since no affidavit was filed with the declaration; but it was properly stricken from the files because it was improperly filed while the issue on the demurrer was pending.

No objection is pointed out to the amendment of the record, and we are of the opinion there is none.

The judgment is affirmed.

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

OPINION FILED JUNE 30, 1876.

No. 204.—B. F. STANLEY v. E. B. VALENTINE et al.

Appeal from Cook.

ESCROW—EFFECT OF PUTTING A RELEASE OF A MORTGAGE ON RECORD BY MISTAKE.

Where a release of a mortgage was made by the mortgagee, and left in escrow with a third person, and before the performance of the conditions under which the release was deposited, and without any delivery to the mortgagor, the release, by mistake or accident, was filed for record, and was recorded, held, that judgment creditors acquire no rights or advantage by such recording, and that an injunction will lie to restrain such creditors from selling under the levy of an execution, anything more than the equity of redemption of the mortgagor.

The recording of the release, under such circumstances, constitutes a cloud upon the title of the mortgagee, which a court of equity will remove.

The mortgagee, by making such a release and placing it in escrow with an agent, by whom it was placed on record by mistake, is not estopped to deny that it is his deed; especially so, where judgment creditors only of the mortgagor, seek to take advantage of the record of the release, or they advance no money, give no credit, or do any act by which they change their attitude to the case.

WALKER, J.

On the 4th day of November, 1872, appellant received from Elizabeth Valentine a mortgage on certain real estate in North Evanston, in Cook county, to secure the purchase money for the property, and for which she had given her six notes for different amounts, and payable on various dates, and amounting in the aggregate to $8,500, and bearing ten per cent. interest per annum. The mortgage was duly recorded on the 26th of February, 1873. About the 10th of March, 1873, she being desirous of raising money by loan and to secure the same by deed of trust on the property, for the purpose of paying one of the notes she had given for the purchase money of $3,850, applied to Benj. E. Gallup for a loan of $4,000, who consented to make it if her title should prove satisfactory, except a prior mortgage, and that given to appellant, and that appellant on being paid the $3,850, and being thereby enabled to pay the prior mortgage, would release his mortgage and take from her a new mortgage subject to a mortgage to be given to Gallup to secure the balance of his purchase money on the lots.

At the time this arrangement was agreed upon, appellant was on the eve of starting to New York, to be absent some time, and to enable the arrangement with Gallup to be carried out, he executed a release of his mortgage, and delivered it to Gallup to be held in escrow until the transaction should be fully consummated, and then delivered to Mrs. Valentine. Appellant having gone East, by some accident or mistake the release was taken from Gallup's office to the recorder's office, and there filed for record, which appellee learned for the first time on his return from New York. No loan was ever made by Gallup to Mrs. Valentine.

On the 17th day of February, 1873, Thomas Cogswell and others obtained a judgment in the Superior court of Cook county against Mrs. Valentine for $500.18 and costs. And the same parties recovered another judgment against her, in the same court, on the 30th day of April, 1873, for $499 67 and costs.

The judgment creditors sued out executions and placed them in the hands of the sheriff, who levied on these lots and advertised them for sale on the 31st May, 1873. Appellant thereupon filed this bill to have the release cancelled and the judgment creditors enjoined from selling the lots, unless it be subject to his mortgage. A temporary injunction was granted, but, on a hearing, the court below dissolved it, and dismissed the bill, and complainant appeals.

There is no pretense that Gallup had any the slightest authority to deliver the deed of release until the condition was performed upon which it was placed in his hands. Nor is it claimed that those conditions were ever performed, or that the release was rightfully filed with the recorder, and spread upon the records. That was an accident or mistake, without either appellant or Gallup intending that it should be done. Nor was there any delivery to Mrs. Valentine. It never went into her possession or came under her control, nor was it delivered to the recorder or any other person for her. As to her, then, the release in no wise changed or affected her rights, and was, as far as the apparent release of her mortgage was concerned, absolutely void, and was such a cloud on appellant's title as, in equity, required it to be cancelled, and she restrained from asserting any rights under it.

It is true that there is no specific prayer that it be cancelled as to her, but the bill contains the general prayer for relief, and no rule of chancery practice is more familiar than that other than the specific relief prayed will be granted under the general prayer, when consistent with the facts stated in the bill. Now such relief in this case is perfectly consistent with, and is not repugnant to or variant from, the facts alleged and proved. And we presume no one would say the prayer would be defective had it been specifically made in this bill. It then follows that it was error in the court below not to have retained the bill and granted at least that relief.

But it is urged that by filing the release for record, the judgment creditors acquired a superior lien to that of appellant. That the recording of the release, although by accident or mistake, let in their subsisting judgments as a lien that postpones appellant's mortgage to their debts. On the other hand, it is claimed that as the release was never delivered and was absolutely void, that creditors or subsequent purchasers, although bona fide, acquired no rights thereby. The release never having been delivered, it became no more operative than had it been a forgery. That the title of appellant could not pass from him until the deed was delivered. That the judgment creditors had not been misled by the recording of the release to advance money, to give credit, or do any act on the faith that the release was valid and operative; that their position to the case is in no way changed, nor have they done any act which gives them a superior or any equity whatever to claim an advantage over appellant's mortgage.

It is manifest to all that a deed cannot be operative until it is delivered. Perkins, who wrote his treatise on conveyancing more than three centuries since, says (sec. 138, p. 28), "and if I make a deed and deliver it to a stranger, as an escrow, to keep until such a day, etc., and upon condition that if, before that day, he to whom the escrow is made shall pay me ten pounds, give me a horse, enfeoff me of a manor, or perform any other condition, then the stranger shall deliver the escrow to him as my deed; in this case if he deliver the same to him as my deed before the conditions or condition fulfilled, it is not my deed simpliciter. But if the condition be fulfilled and the escrow delivered by him (after the conditions performed) as my deed; then it is my deed and shall bind me; and then begins to be my deed and shall not have relation to the first delivery." This, perhaps, is as early an announcement of the rule as may be found in the books, and is the same as definitions given by courts and text writers since that time. We are aware of no change in the rule since he wrote. Pierce v. Pitts, Ft. W. & C. R. R., 34 Ill., 13.

Then if a delivery before condition performed confers no title, it is difficult to perceive how others can acquire title from the grantee named in the escrow. Washburn on Real Property, vol. 3, p. 372, says: "If a deed is delivered before the previous condition is performed, it will not be the deed of the grantor, or have any effect as such;" and he refers to numerous authorities which support the text. The case of the grantee getting possession of the escrow by fraud before the condition performed, and then selling the land to an innocent purchaser, was fully discussed in Shirley v. Ayers, 14 Ohio, 308. The court say: "Until the performance of the condition it (the deed) must remain a mere scroll in writing, of no more efficacy than any other written scroll. But when, upon the performance of the condition, it is delivered to the grantee or his agent, it then becomes a deed to all intents and purposes, and the title passes from the date of the delivery. The delivery to be valid must be with the assent of the grantor. If the grantee obtains possession of the escrow without performance of the condition, he obtains no title thereby, because there has been no delivery with the assent of the grantor, which assent is dependent upon compliance with the conditions." "The recording of an escrow does not make it a deed."

The court held that although the grantee obtained the escrow and placed it on record, and then sold it to an innocent purchaser, he acquired nothing by his deed, because his grantor never acquired any title by obtaining possession of this escrow. It is likened to a deed which the grantee had stolen when no title is thereby acquired; and it is distinguished from one obtained by fraud from the grantor himself, while the title passes by the actual delivery by the grantor himself. See Smith v. Royalton Bank, 32 Verm., 341; People v. Bostwick, 32 N. Y., 450; Everts v. Agnes, 4 Wis., 453; Black v. Schreve, 13 N. Y., 458; Dyson v. Bradshaw, 23 Cal., 536; Ogden v. Ogden, 4 Ohio St. R., 191. From these authorities it would appear that even a grantee is not protected by a purchase, however honestly and fairly he may have acted, unless there was a delivery to his grantors. But we are not required to go the length of the rule announced in these cases to hold the release inoperative and void in this case.

But, in this case, the release never went into the hands of Mrs. Valentine. She did not know or intend that the release should be placed upon record. Hence, this case is not as strong as some of those referred to above. We are, therefore, clearly of the opinion that the judgment creditors acquired no rights or advantage by the recording the release, and they should have been restrained from selling under their executions, any thing more than Mrs. Valentine's equity of redemption, and in refusing to do so, the court erred.

In the light of the decisions referred to, there is no force in the objection that appellant, by making the escrow and placing it in the hands of an agent, and it having got upon the record, he should be estopped to deny that it is his deed. We have seen that such is not the rule, and it should be especially so here, as the judgment creditors have advanced no money, given no credit, or done any act by which they have changed their attitude to the case.

For the errors indicated, the decree of the court below is reversed and the cause remanded.

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

OPINION FILED JUNE 30, 1876.

MATHIAS RICKERT v. PEOPLE.

Error to DuPage.

THE "CLUB" SYSTEM AN ILLEGAL DEVICE TO EVADE THE DRAM-SHOP LAW.

1. JURISDICTION OF JUSTICE.—Section 12 of the act entitled Dram-Shops, Chap. 43, R. S., 1874, confers jurisdiction upon a justice of the peace, in suit brought to recover a a fine for violation of Section 2 of said act.

2. THE "CLUB" A DEVICE TO EVADE THE LAW.—An association or club called "Wheaton Copartnership Company, Number One," organized for the purpose of allowing defendant to distribute intoxicating liquors to the members thereof, to be drank upon the premises when distributed, was a shift or device to evade the law.

3. UNLAWFUL SELLING.—The appellant having no license to keep a dram-shop, whatever liquors were either given away or sold for tickets by him, under that arrangement, come within the definition of "unlawful selling."

4. IMPOSSIBILITY OF EVADING THE STATUTE.—It is preposterous to assume that a number of persons may with impunity associate themselves together as a firm or voluntary company, purchase a quantity of liquors, and retail them out to the several members. Such an enterprise is unlawful and all concerned would be guilty of violating the statute.

Opinion by SCOTT, C. J.

This action was commenced before a justice of the peace on complaint under oath, to recover the fine imposed for a violation of the second section of an act entitled "Dram-Shops," to provide for licensing of, and against the evils arising from, the sale of intoxicating liquors. That section makes it unlawful for any person not having a license, to keep a dram shop, either by himself or another, to sell intoxicating liquors of any kind, in a less quantity than one gallon, or in any quantity to be drank on the premises or in any adjacent room or place, and subjects the offender to fine and imprisonment. R. S. 1874, chap. 43, sec. 2. The 12th section provides that any fine or imprisonment mentioned in the act may be enforced by indictment in any court of record having criminal jurisdiction, or the fine may be sued for and recovered before any justice of the peace of the proper county, in the name of the people of the State of Illinois. Under this clause of the statute the justice of the peace had jurisdiction to try the cause, and we are not aware of any provision of the constitution it contravenes. McCutcheon v. The People, 69th Ills.

Of the questions raised, only one need be considered, and that has relation to the guilt of defendant. The statute makes the giving away of intoxicating liquors, or other shift or device to evade its provisions, unlawful selling. That defendant resorted to a shift or device to evade the provisions of the law against selling intoxicating liquors, we entertain not the slightest doubt.

There is no pretense defendant had a license to sell intoxicating liquors, and hence it follows if he made any sales in a less quantity than one gallon, or in any quantity to be drank on the premises or in any adjacent room or place, such sales must have been unlawful.

Prior to the first day of July, 1874, defendant had a bar in a room in the "Platt House," where he kept for sale the usual stock of liquors, having a license to keep a dram shop.

About that date there was organized what is called the "Wheaton Copartnership Company, No. One." The object of the company as set forth in the articles of association, was "to promote temperance, friendship, and good feeling in the community at large." "Any white male citizen above the age of twenty-one years, of steady, industrious habits, sound mind and memory, and good moral character," could become a member of the association on complying with certain conditions. The association or company had as officers, a president, vice president, secretary, and treasurer, whose duties were all defined. The capital stock of the company was to be $300, and was to be invested in business, but what that business was or its character, is not declared either in the articles of association or in the by-laws. One of the by-laws provides, "no partner shall give any goods of the company to a minor, unless such minor is a member of his family," and another that "no partner shall sell any of the firm goods to any person or persons whatever, either directly or indirectly." At the time this prosecution was commenced the proof shows the association consisted of about one hundred and fifty members. Notwithstanding it is declared the object of the association is the promotion of "temperance, friendship and good feeling in the community at large," among its first acts the company rented the room defendant had formerly occupied, purchased of him the remaining stock of liquors he had on hand, and set up and opened a saloon, without having first obtained a license to keep a dram-shop, and all under the management of defendant, with the specious title of "treasurer." Bender, the secretary of the alleged company, was examined as a witness on the part of the prosecution, and gave a description of the place and manner of doing business as follows: "There were two front rooms in the Platt House, and that the west one was used for an office, store-room and one thing and another; that there was a door between the two rooms, and a front door opening south from the west room; and that from the east room there was also a door opening to the south on the street which was closed the latter part of June last, and had since that time remained closed; that a club or association known as the 'Wheaton Co-partnership Company, Number One' had had control of the east room from the first day of July, 1874; that this club had possession of the east room, and that the defendant stayed there most of the time and took charge of it, and kept it in order for the club; that in this room there was a bar, the same which was there and kept by the defendant before that time; that there was kept there lager beer, two kinds of whisky, bitters, wine, a beer cooler and glasses, with a lunch, but no brandy; that the defendant had absolute control of the east room during the night time, and that from the 1st day of July, 1874, to the 4th day of October, 1874, this beer and other liquors were from time to time delivered in glasses to different persons in this room; that the liquors were often replenished by defendant; that moneys received by defendant were by him put in his pocket; that the cost or price of one glass of beer was five cents, and five cents for the poorer quality of whisky, and ten cents for the better quality; ten cents a glass for wine, one kind of cigars was five cents, another kind ten cents each; that the defendant had nailed up on the bar a United States government license before the 1st day of July, 1874, and that it had remained there ever since; that the defendant and also his father drank liquor there without paying for it; that liquor was delivered to boys under the age of twenty-one years, but persons living outside the county did not get liquors there." Tickets were issued to persons on becoming members of the association, entitled, "Certificates of co-partnership investment in the Wheaton Co-partnership Company, Number One," signed by the president and secretary, with figures printed thereon from one to twenty, both numbers inclusive. Such tickets cost one dollar. Whenever a member wanted anything at the bar, he presented his ticket and it was punctured by cutting one number for a glass of beer, one for a poor grade of whisky, two for a better grade, and two for a glass of wine, and if he took a cigar the ticket was punctured in the same manner according to the price of the cigar selected, each number representing five cents.

Although the business had been carried on in this way from the first of July to October, no distribution of profits had been made among the alleged members, nor had the treasurer been called upon to make any account. The whole business was transacted by defendant; all purchases were made by him; he retained all moneys for tickets, paid all bills, and if he kept any account with the association this proof fails to show it. The proof is that moneys received by defendent were by him put in his pocket, and no other account is given of the receipts. Any person, it appears, could become a member of the association simply by buying a ticket. The witness whose testimony we have before cited says, "that he supposed a person might join the club, call for a glass of beer, get it, have his ticket punched, and then offer back his ticket and demand the balance of the money paid in by him, get it, and cease to be a member of the club." It is added, however, nothing of the kind had ever occurred, but the witness states he had known an instance of a person who was not a member drinking beer that belonged to the club in the club room. All this is plainly a device on the part of the defendant and those who desire to patronize his bar, to avoid the provisions of the law and to enable him to sell intoxicating liquors at retail, as he had formerly done, without first obtaining a license to keep a dram-shop. The purpose and object is so transparent that the subject need not be seriously discussed. The whole thing is a subtle artifice, planned with a view to avoid the penalties denounced against persons violating the law. The ticket arrangement was simply paying in advance and getting the liquors at convenient seasons when desired. The proposition is absurd that the ticket-holders really owned the liquors with which the bar was stocked. Each party bought tickets to be used at the bar when he wanted anything, and for no other purpose.

Should we adopt the theory of the defense, that the several ticket holders, or parties constituting the association, in fact owned the liquors in the saloon, it would make no better case for defendant, and a vastly worse one for the parties associated with him. In that view the liquors would belong to the company as partnership stock, and the company would have no more rightful authority to sell to the individual members or partners, at retail, without a license to keep a dram shop, than a mere stranger would have. Buying tickets, as we have seen, was simply buying twenty drinks, and paying for them in advance: Each one paid for whatever he got as he would have done had he bought of a licensed seller. It is preposterous to assume that a number of persons may, with impunity, associate themselves together as a firm or voluntary company, purchase a quantity of liquors and retail them out to the several members as they would to strangers. Such an enterprise is unlawful, and all concerned would be guilty of violating the statute. If such a device could be tolerated, it would render all legislation on this subject nugatory. But the alleged association is a mere fiction. It is nothing but a device under the guise of a copartnership company, adopted to enable defendant to sell intoxicating liquors to whomsoever might desire to buy at his counter, and to enable him to do so without taking out a license for that purpose, as the law requires.

The real object of the parties engaged in the business was purposely concealed in the articles of association. Had it been an honest enterprise there would have been nothing to conceal. It was adopted under legal advice, and is obviously nothing but a shift or device to evade the provisions of the law, and whatever liquors were either given away or sold for tickets under that arrangement, came within the definition of "unlawful selling." It was a question of fact whether the association was a mere shift or device to evade the provisions of the law, and the jury having found it was, we see no reason to be dissatisfied with the conclusion reached. The evidence so fully and so clearly sustains the verdict that we have not deemed it necessary to remark upon the instructions. Any other verdict than the one rendered could not be permitted to stand.

The judgment must be affirmed.

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

ABSTRACT OF OPINIONS FILED AT SPRINGFIELD, JUNE 30TH, 1876.

96.—Joseph Arnet v. Henry Stook.—Appeal from Sangamon.—Opinion by WALKER, J., reversing and remanding.

PURCHASE OF MORTGAGED CHATTEL—WHO MAY COMPLAIN OF WANT OF DILIGENCE IN MORTGAGEE.

Held, 1. That one purchasing a mortgaged chattel before the maturity of the debt, purchases subject to the mortgagee's claim.

2. Such purchaser cannot be allowed to say that the mortgagee did not use due diligence in reducing the property to possession on the maturity of the debt. Such a defense is only available to a creditor, or purchaser, after condition broken.

97.—C., B. & Q. R. R. Co. v. Robert Damerell et al.—Appeal from Adams. Opinion by SHELDON, J., reversing and remanding.

R. R. CROSSING OF A HIGHWAY—COMPARATIVE NEGLIGENCE.

Held, 1. That one approaching a railroad crossing of a highway, is held to the exercise of due care and prudence, and cannot recover if he recklessly or carelessly comes into danger thereon.

2. The statute does not require the engine driver of a train to both ring a bell and sound a whistle, in approaching a crossing, but only that he shall do the one or the other.

3. It is not the duty of an engine driver to stop on approaching a highway crossing.

100.—Hiram H. Rosengrantz v. William Mason.—Appeal from Macon.—Opinion PER CURIAM, affirming.

PRESUMPTION AS TO PROMISSORY NOTE.

Held, That the giving of a promissory note, of itself, unexplained, is not evidence of a settlement of all demands between the parties.

101.—William M. Davis v. Andrew J. Dresback.—Appeal from Macon.—Opinion by CRAIG, J., reversing and remanding.

IMPEACHMENT OF OFFICERS RETURN—MORTGAGE SALE—EXTENDING TIME OF REDEMPTION.

Held, 1. That the return of an officer can only be impeached by clear and satisfactory evidence; and not merely upon the testimony of parties to the suit in which the return is made.

2. Where third parties have not acquired rights upon the faith of a return, it may be impeached by parol evidence, sufficient in degree.

3. Where several tracts of land are to be sold by a master in chancery under a decree, they should be sold separately. But if a certain quarter section, etc., or tract described by metes and bounds, is mortgaged as one tract, it may properly be sold together.

4. If a purchaser at a mortgage sale promises to extend the time of redemption, he will be held to his promise, even without a particular consideration, for it would be against public policy and good faith to allow him to excite confidence, in the security of which the mortgagor would allow the time of redemption to pass by, and then refuse to keep his promise.

102.—St. L., N. & T. H. R. R. Co. v. Robert Bell, etc.—Appeal from Madison.—Opinion by DICKEY, J., reversing.

NEGLIGENCE OF R. R. AS TO TURN-TABLE.

STATEMENT.—Appellee (9 years old), was injured by playing on a turn table; not kept locked, but only latched; situated remotely from any thoroughfare.

Held, That in view of the isolated situation of the turntable, the company were not chargeable with negligence, in not keeping it locked or otherwise protected.

103.—Sophia Church et al. v. Joseph G. English et al.—Error to Vermillion.—Opinion by SCOTT, Ch. J., affirming.

AMENDMENT OF COURT RECORD—WHEN AND HOW IT MAY BE DONE.

STATEMENT.—Amendment in 1875, by a court, on notice, of the records of a term in 1865, ten years previous. Held,

1. That a court has power to amend its records of a previous term, on notice to parties concerned, except that the rights of all parties not parties to the record, or their privileges, cannot be disturbed by the amendment. And the amendment may be made from any authentic source as the judge's minutes.

2. There is no limitation, as between the parties to the record, as to the time when the amendment may be made.

Sherman S. Jewett v. John Cook.—Appeal from Champaign.—Opinion by CRAIG, J., affirming.

DEFRAUDING CREDITORS—EFFECT AS EVIDENCE OF AN ATTACHMENT—AFFIDAVIT.

STATEMENT.—Cook's goods attached by virtue of a writ of attachment against West—the goods having been sold by West; and Cook having purchased them from the purchaser of West, after Cook himself had instituted attachment proceedings against West, and levied upon the goods in the hands of West's vendee, and having dismissed his attachment suit on the purchase of the goods. Held,

1. That if West's sale was only colorable, and Cook knew it was so, and bought the goods afterwards with such knowledge, Cook's purchase was then tainted with fraud, even if he was a bona fide creditor himself, and bought the goods to save his own debt. But it must be shown that West's sale was fraudulent, (which was not done in this case.)

2. Nor would the affidavit filed in his own attachment suit be held an estoppel in regard to the nature of West's sale. The affidavit would only be evidence that Cook thought, at the time, the sale was fraudulent; or, if the sale was proven fraudulent in the second attachment suit, the affidavit might be used to show that Cook knew it to be so.

106.—Asher Merwin v. Alexander Arbuckle.—Error to McLean.—Opinion by WAKLER, J., reversing and remanding.

FALSE REPRESENTATION AS TO LANDS—EVIDENCE FOR DEFENDANT.

STATEMENT.—Charge of false representation as to lands sold, which the seller had never seen. Defendant offered to show that he had received the same representation from his grantor, but the court rejected the evidence. Held,

That he should have been allowed to show this, because it bore directly upon his knowledge of the falsity of the representation. To render a representation fraudulent, it must not only have been false, but the party making it must have known that it was false, and a person seeking to recover must have relied upon it. Also, it must be material.

107.—Mathew Hanson v. Anton Meyer.—Appeal from McLean.—Opinion by SHELDON, J., affirming.

COVENANTS AS TO ASSIGNS NOT NAMED THEREIN—RETROACTIVE STATUTES.

STATEMENT.—Suit by a lessee against assignees of the reversion to whom the property was sold during his lease, to enforce a covenant contained in his lease. Held,

1. That, where assigns are not mentioned in a covenant, they are not bound thereby.

2. A statute passed after the execution of the covenant providing the contrary as a general rule, cannot retroact on covenants thus made prior to the passage thereof, so as to bind assigns.

110.—The Town of Old Town v. William Dooley.—Appeal from McLean.—Opinion by SCHOLFIELD, J., affirming.

RIGHTS OF OWNER OF SOIL IN A HIGHWAY.

STATEMENT.—Appellee, by permission of commissioners of highways, joined his fences to the approaches of a bridge erected across a stream, on his land. He was warned to remove it as an obstruction to a ford across the stream, but refused. Hence this suit. Held,

1. That the statute is only affirmative of the common law right of the owner of lands whereon a public road is laid, to use and enjoy the use of the lands, subject only to the easement which the public have in the highway.

2. That the ford being in no sense necessary, is not protected from the intrusion of appellee's fences.

3. The privilege of watering stock, using a spring, etc., is not incident to the right of the public to a passage over one's land.

111.—David Huesch, impl. etc. v. Elizabeth Scheel et al.—Appeal from St. Clair.—Opinion by CRAIG, J., reversing and remanding.

PRIORITY OF LIEN IN MORTGAGE—MERGER—NOTICE OF PRIOR UNRECORDED MORTGAGE.

Held, 1. That a mortgage subsequent to another in date, but first filed for record, has a prior lien, unless the mortgagee therein has, in some way, notice of the first mortgage unrecorded. And the burden is on the mortgagee in the first mortgage given, but last recorded, to show that the other mortgagee had such notice.

2. If the mortgagee whose mortgage was first of record but last of execution, takes a deed of the premises from the mortgagor, solely to give him additional security, and not absolutely, there will be no merger, and he will not thereby lose his priority.

3. The meeting of a greater and less estate in the same person does not, of necessity, make a merger. This depends upon the intent and interest of the parties; and if a court sees it necessary, in order to advance the ends of justice, that

We call attention to the following opinions, reported at length in this issue:

COPYRIGHT—TRANSLATION OF PLAYS.—The opinion of the United States Circuit Court, for the Northern District of Illinois, by DRUMMOND, J., holding, where the translator of a play, by consent of the author, has obtained a copyright upon it, the owner of such copyright can maintain a bill enjoining any other persons from using or representing such translation, or any part of it.

BANKRUPTCY—FALSE STATEMENT IN PETITION.—The opinion of the United States District Court for the District Court of California, by HOFFMAN, J., where a petition in involuntary bankruptcy alleged, among other things, that it was filed by one-fourth of the creditors, representing one-third of the provable debts, as required by the act, and the bankrupt made default, and the court entered an order that the facts set forth were true, and adjudicated him a bankrupt—on a motion being made to set aside the adjudication, on the ground that the requisite number of creditors had not joined in the petition, held, that it was not within the power of the court to do so.

ATTACHMENT SALE — WHAT INTEREST PASSES—REPLEVIN AGAINST SHERIFFF.—The opinion of the Supreme court of this State, by SCHOLFIELD, J., holding that the proceedings in attachment against personal property, are against the interest of the defendant in attachment, and those claiming under him in the thing attached; and that a person whose goods have been seized improperly, and who is no party to the suit, is not concluded by the judgment; that replevin is the proper remedy against a sheriff who has levied a writ of attachment against one person upon the property of another, at the instance of the party whose property is thus wrongfully levied upon; that it was competent to bring the action of replevin in the Circuit court, although the attachment suit was in the Superior court. We are aware that there is some conflict of authority upon the latter branch of the case, but have no doubt under our statute the decision is correct.

DEMURRER—STRIKING PLEA FROM FILES.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of this State, by SCHOLFIELD, J., as to the effect of filing a plea while an issue on demurrer, is still pending.

ESCROW—PLACING RELEASE OF MORTGAGE ON RECORD BY MISTAKE.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of this State, by WALKER, J., as to the effect of placing the release of a mortgage on record by mistake of the person in whose hands it was left, as an escrow.

THE CLUB SYSTEM AN ILLEGAL DEVICE TO EVADE THE DRAM-SHOP LAW.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of Illinois, by SCOTT, C. J., showing that the selling of liquor under the club system is plainly a device on the part of the defendant, and those who desire to patronize his bar, to avoid the provisions of the law, and to enable him to sell intoxicating liquors at retail without first obtaining a license.

SUSPENSION OF THE STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS—COVERTURE.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of Tennessee, holding that where the right of action had accrued, and afterwards the statute is suspended, and during the suspension plaintiff is married, the coverture existing at the end of the suspension cannot be relied on to defeat the bar.

PROBATE OF NUNCUPATIVE WILL.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of Tenessee, by MC'FARLAND, J., as to how the Probate of nuncupative will may be set aside.

INSURANCE—AUTHORITY OF AGENT.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, by SHARSWOOD, J., holding that where agents are acting for an insurance company, and are held up to the public as such, the reasonable presumption is that they are authorized to act for the company in a general way, unless the company specify what may be their special duties and powers. There is some common sense in this opinion. Insurance companies should be held responsible for the acts of their agents, the same as individuals.

NOTES TO RECENT CASES.

BANKRUPTCY — ENFORCING MORTGAGE IN STATE COURT.

The Supreme Court of Georgia held, in Cummings v. Clegg, 14 N. B. R., 49, that a mortgage creditor who did not prove his debt, may enforce his mortgage in a State court, although the property was duly set apart to the bankrupt as exempt.

JUDGMENT CREDITOR ABANDONING LEVY.

It was held by the Supreme Court of Georgia, in Winship v. Phillips, 14 N. B. R., 51, that a judgment creditor who levied upon personal property, and subsequently abandoned his levy, by permitting the property to go back into the hands of the defendant, may enforce his lien against land sold by the bankrupt before the commencement of the proceedings in bankruptcy, and need not follow the personal property into the hands of the assignee.

BANKRUPTCY—REDEMPTION OF PROPERTY.

The Supreme Court of Alabama, in Trimble v. Williamson, 14 N. B. R., 53, held, that where the right of a creditor and the right of a debtor, to redeem property sold under an execution, are, under the State laws, distinct and independent; the bankruptcy of the debtor does not affect or extinguish the right of the creditor.

BANKRUPTCY — FIRM—INVOLUNTARY PROCEEDING.

The U. S. District Court for the eastern District of New York, in re Pitt et al., 14 N. B. R., 59, held, that a firm cannot be adjudicated bankrupt in an involuntary proceeding to which one of the members is not a party; that an involuntary petition cannot be amended by adding a new party, after all the testimony has been taken, and the case is on hearing before the court.

EMPLOYEES OF DEFAULTING RAILROAD CO.

The Circuit Court of Richmond, Virginia, in Duncan et al. v. C. & O. R. R. Co., held, that employees of a defaulting railroad company are not to be considered as creditors at large of the company, in regard to their claims for wages, in arrears at the time of the appointment of a receiver of the company; that when mortgagees come into a court of equity, seeking satisfaction of their claims against a railroad company, by suit for foreclosure, they should be required to satisfy all arrearages of pay due employees, out of the trust property or its future earnings.

THE PHILOSOPHY OF LAW: being notes of Lectures delivered during twenty-three years (1852-1875) in the Inner Temple Hall, London. By Herbert Broom, LL. D., late Professor on Common Law to the Inns of Court. New York: Baker, Voorhis & Co., 1876.

Dr. Broom needs no introduction to the bench and bar this side of the Atlantic. As the author of Commentaries upon the Common Law and Constitutional Law, and of a treatise upon Legal Maxims, he has been long and favorably known to the profession in America. And while his commentaries have not, perhaps, attained the rank in this country to which their merits entitle them, yet no English work of the present generation of lawyers is more favorably known in America than Broom's Legal Maxims. As indicative of the high esteem in which it is held among our foremost lawyers, it may be remarked that the late Judge Arrington, that Nestor of the Chicago Bar, was accustomed to carry a copy of Broom's Maxims almost daily to and from his house on his way to his office, perusing it in the street cars. Indeed, it has become a vade mecum, both with students and practioners.

The present work is designed as a sketch in outline of the leading principles relating to contracts, torts and crimes. In the language of the author, it is "the result of much thought devoted to the adapting of legal knowledge to the ordinary concerns of life." Each of the three topics indicated is discussed in a general chapter, giving clearly and succinctly an outline of the topic under consideration, and each of these chapters is, in turn, supplemented by a chapter presenting the application of leading principles of law to given facts. These supplementary chapters necessarily contain frequent illustrations of the principles under discussion as applied in adjudicated cases, and these illustrations seem to have been carefully selected and are always apropos to the subject in hand. The author's definitions of contracts, torts and crimes are very satisfactory, and his statements of legal principles are uniformly clear and precise, being never encumbered with unnecessary verbiage, yet always sufficiently full and clear to be readily understood, even by the lay reader. And this is certainly high praise of any technical or professional treatise.

Our chief criticism upon the book is upon its title, which strikes us as rather a misnomer. The work is in no sense a philosophical analysis of the law, regarded either as a science, or as a part of the existing machinery of government. Indeed, the literature of our profession contains few such works, either English or American, and the authors who have successfully written of the philosophy of law, may be counted upon one's fingers. The present work is rather an introduction to the study of the law, and such, if we mistake not, will be its recognized status. As such, it is admirably adapted to the purposes intended. And this indicates another class of readers who may peruse its pages with much profit and satisfaction. We refer to that large, and, we trust, growing class of young men, who, while not intending to enter upon the law as a profession, are yet desirous of adding to the general culture of a college training, some acquaintance with our law as a science, and with its practical administration in courts of justice. No branch of legal literature has been more neglected than this, yet none is worthy of more attention. And among this class of elementary works, we predict for this volume a deservedly high rank.

TECHNICAL ERROR.—Any one who has examined the recent opinions of the Supreme Court of this State, cannot fail to have noticed that the court is less disposed than formerly to reverse for technical error, if upon the whole record it appears that the judgment could not have been properly rendered otherwise. The opinion we published in our last issue, construing the liquor law of this State, is a good illustration of a growing disposition to disregard technical error.

LVI. NEW HAMPSHIRE REPORTS.

We are under obligations to Hon. John M. Shirley for advance sheets of volume 56th New Hampshire Reports, from which we take the following head-notes:

ACTION FOR LIBEL—PLEADING—EVIDENCE.

Carpenter v. Bailey, p. 283.

On the trial of an action for libel, it appeared that the original writing, the publication of which was the foundation of the suit, was among the records of the navy department at Washington. Held, that secondary evidence of its existence and contents was properly admitted.

The alleged libel contained charges against the plaintiff as paymaster in the naval service of the United States stationed at Portsmouth, and requested his removal. Held, that a letter from Vice-Admiral Porter, while in charge of the department, to the plaintiff, making the removal, and stating the reasons for it, was admissible as an act of the department.

The plaintiff was permitted to testify that he sold his furniture at a loss upon his transfer from the naval station at Portsmouth. Held, no cause for setting aside the verdict in his favor

The allegations of a special plea of justification in such case must be proved substantially as laid. Hence, where such plea set up specific facts, going to show that the charges were true, and other facts showing that the occasion was lawful and the end justifiable, and alleged that such was the fact—Held, that the court properly refused to charge the jury that if the alleged charges are true the plaintiff cannot recover; also, that the jury were properly instructed among other things, that if the occasion was lawful, and the alleged libel true, the verdict should be for the defendant.

Whether an alleged libel is a privileged communication, is a question for the jury under proper instructions from the court.

DAMAGE FROM STOPPAGE OF COMMON SEWERS—DEGREE OF CARE—NOTICE.

Rowe v. Portsmouth, p. 291.

A city, having power by statute to construct public sewers, and to demand and receive pay from adjoining owners for liberty to enter their private drains into such sewers, is responsible for negligently suffering them to occasion a nuisance to the estates of such adjoining owners, if the nuisance does not result from the original plan of construction, and could be avoided by keeping them in proper condition.

In maintaining such public sewer, a city is bound to use that degree of care and prudence which a discreet and cautious individual would use if the whole loss or risk was to be his alone.

A city will not be liable for injuries caused to individuals, by an obstruction in such public sewer not placed there by its own officials or by authority of the city government, until after actual notice of such obstruction, or until, by reason of the lapse of time, actual notice may be presumed.

SALARIES OF COUNTY OFFICERS UNDER THE PRESENT CONSTITUTION.

STATEMENT.—Suit on official bond of clerk for failing to pay over fees into the treasury. Defence, that his salary was only $1,500, whereas the county contained between 30 and 50,000 inhabitants, and the constitution provides that in such counties the minimum of salary shall be $2,000, and the commissioners had no right therefore to allow less; held,

That the constitution provides no minimum, but only a maximum for the salary of county officers, to be fixed by county boards, etc.

EXPOSITION OF THE CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISION CONCERNING DRAINING, ETC.

Held, That neither the constitution providing "that the general assembly may pass laws permitting the owners or occupants of land to construct drains, or ditches for agricultural and sanitary purposes;" nor the act thereunder providing "for the constructing and protection of drains, ditches, levees and other works," (R. S., 1874, ch. 42, § 1, and Const. 1870, Art. Sec. 30) in the design or scope thereof, applies to works where the construction of an expensive levee, as a principal work to prevent the overflowings of a river. A levee must be merely auxiliary to a system of drainage, such as proposed in this case.

This point embraces the whole case. But the court added several very valuable dicta, namely:

1. The act referred to is unconstitutional, because it makes no provision for a vote of the people to be affected by a proposed improvement.

2. The general assembly possesses no power, under the constitution to vest commissioners or juries with authority to assess and collect taxes, or special assessments, for contemplated improvements.

3. Only cities, towns and villages may levy special assessments, or special taxes, for local improvements; and all other corporations can only be vested with jurisdiction to assess and collect taxes for corporate purposes, and that, too, under the positive inhibition that the taxes shall be uniform in respect to persons and property.

SUBSTITUTION OF VERBAL CONTRACT FOR WRITTEN ON TRIAL OF A CAUSE.

CONTRACT FOR EXTENDING TIME OF REDEMPTION—RELATION OF THE PARTIES AS TO OPPESSION AND DURESS.

STATEMENT.—Bill in chancery for relief for fraud and oppression in the making of a contract, whereby Ross was to have an extension of the time for redemption of lands sold from him, on condition that he would deed to Sutherland 122 acres of the 1100 sold, and Sutherland would convey to his (Ross') sons, 822 acres; also, within a certain time, Ross should pay between $12000 and $13000. It was claimed that, by reason of the relation between the parties (Ross being in the power of Sutherland), Ross was not in a condition to assert his rights in making the contract, and, therefore, an oppressive contract was forced upon him. The bill was dismissed, and the Supreme Court, in affirming, Held,

1. That there was nothing peculiar in such a relation, which should interfere with a free contracting by the parties, or prevent them dealing as strangers at arm's length, Ross not being any more in the power of Sutherland than any man is in the power of another who seeks to obtain some valuable thing which the former has to dispose of, and there was no ground therein for the interposition of equity.

2. That the evidence disclosed no actual oppression.

DELIVERY OF GOODS BY MISTAKE—RESPONSIBILITY OF CARRIER OR WAREHOUSEMAN THEREIN — EFFECT OF NEGLIGENCE OF CONSIGNEE—TROVER.

Held, 1. That an action of trover lies against a carrier, who, by mistake, delivers goods to a wrong person.

2. The same rule applies to warehousemen, who are not only responsible for losses arising by their negligence, but for those occasioned by the innocent mistake of themselves, and their servants, in delivering goods to a person not entitled to them, it being a part of their duty to retain the goods until they are demanded by the true owners; and if, by mistake, they deliver the goods to the wrong person, they are to be held responsible for the loss, as upon a wrongful conversion.

3. And where goods have arrived at their destination, the railroad company carrying them hold to them afterwards the relation of warehousemen; and hence, the rule applies to them in either relation.

4. And the rule applies where the delivery is made to the person to whom the goods are shipped, if the delivery is made before he fulfils a condition upon the delivery; as, for example, payment.

5. Nor does such company fulfil the demands of the law, when it has improperly disposed of property in its custody, by simply placing itself in a condition to repossess the property.

6. Nor is it an excuse that the proper consignee was negligent in calling for a delivery of the goods to himself; for this negligence does not contribute to the injury complained of.

PRIORITY AS TO NOTES SECURED BY SAME TRUST DEED—IRREGULAR PROCEEDINGS OF TRUSTEE—INJUNCTION OF EJECTMENT SUIT.

STATEMENT.—Trust deed given on three promissory notes, due at different times, the deed providing that if the note first falling due was not paid within three days after maturity, the whole should become due and payable, and the premises should be sold to pay all of them. Before maturity, the note first falling due was negotiated to Judd—the other two to Burke. The first not being paid, Judd ordered the trustee to sell. He advertised to sell on the 13th of December. Then Burke, apprised that his notes were also payable by the terms of the deed, also directed the trustee to sell for the satisfaction thereof. He advertised to do so on the 12th of December. On the 12th, Burke bought in the land for the amount of his notes, and received a deed. The trustee proceeded to sell again the next day, and Koester was the purchaser, to whom, also, the trustee gave a deed on the same day. Both deeds were filed for record Dec. 13th, Burke's being a few hours ahead of the other. But Koester went into immediate possession of the premises. Burke brought ejectment. Koester filed bill to enjoin the ejectment suit, which bill was dismissed. Held,

1. That Judd's note, falling due first, gave him a prior lien, of which the trick of the trustee and Burke could not deprive him.

2. Koester, paying off Judd's note, was entitled to be subrogated to his rights.

3. Yet he could not use his lien as a defense to the action of ejectment, in which he must be defeated; because by the deed of the 12th, the legal title of the trustee passed, though wrongfully, to Burke.

4. But he was entitled in equity to a protection of his prior lien, and the suit in ejectment ought to have been enjoined.

5. The double sale was altogether irregular and unauthorized. All the claims should have been embraced in the same sale.

[The cause in ejectment was affirmed, and the other reversed and remanded, with directions to the court below to set the sale aside, and have the lot re-sold, and to enjoin the enforcement of the judgment in the ejectment suit, on an amendment of the bill for that end.—W.] John W. Harshberger v. John H. Foreman et al.—Error to Edgar.—Opinion by WALKER, J., affirming.

LAND UNDER VENDOR'S LIEN SOLD TO PURCHASER WITHOUT NOTICE—EFFECT.

Held, That where land subject to a vendor's lien is sold to a party who has no notice that a part of the purchase money remains unpaid at the time of his purchase, he takes the land discharged of the lien. And the evidence to prove such notice on his part must be clear and satisfactory, or he cannot be charged therewith.

AVOIDANCE OF INSURANCE POLICY—NOT BY SUBSEQUENT UNLAWFUL ACT IN EQUITY—DEFENSE AT LAW — CONSOLIDATION OF GARNISHMENT SUITS—EQUITY JURISDICTION AS TO A MULTIPLICITY OF SUITS—WEEN IT ATTACHES.

STATEMENT.—Bill for injunction against collecting the amount of a policy, on a loss by fire—not on the ground of fraud in procuring the policy, it being admitted that the risk, in itself, was a proper one; but on the ground that Gunning procured the policy with the sinister purpose of afterwards destroying the premises by fire; which purpose was afterwards, as is alleged, actually carried into effect. Held,

That as it is claimed the policy was avoided only by a subsequent unlawful act, there is no ground for relief in equity, in the rescinding of the contract. This is only matter of defense against the payment of the policy when sued upon, and is, therefore, available at law.

But it was contended the suit in equity was maintainable to prevent a great multiplicity of suits, the company having been summoned by divers creditors of Gunning to answer as garnishee. But, Held,

1. That if the defense were established once, it would suffice for all. And if it could be made to appear that there was but a single cause of action, the court, on motion of the garnishee, could consolidate the actions, notwithstanding there were different plaintiffs; and so a single verdict could be rendered in all.

2. The proper practice, in such case, would be to enter judgment against the garnishee, if justly liable, in favor of the debtor; which would then stand, in favor of the debtor, for the benefit of such of his attaching or judgment creditors as should prove their right to share the proceeds. These creditors would then have the right to control the payment; and the money, when collected from the garnishee, would be distrtbuted among the creditors.

3. But even if the practice were different, yet, it would be incumbent on appellant to establish the defense at law; and then, if it should appear that other parties continued to harrass the company on account of the same cause of action, equity would interfere to prohibit further vexatious litigation. Until then, equity cannot properly entertain jurisdiction.

PROPERTY IN WILD BEASTS DOMESTICATED —LICENSE.

STATEMENT.—Action for damages in killing a young buffalo bull, which had been imported from the western plains, civilized and reared with cattle, by Jones. He was of a roving disposition, and would trespass, at times, upon the neighbors' pastures, etc. But he could always be driven home without any difficulty, and was never dangerous. He would also feed from the hand, and seemed thoroughly domesticated; although breechy, as sometimes the ordinary cattle are.

In the defense, it was alleged that the animal was feræ naturæ, and therefore, defendant had a right to kill him while trespassing. And, second, that the defendant had a license from the owner to kill him. The latter plea was based on the following facts: Some months before the killing, defendant came over to plaintiff's house to complain of the animal then trespassing. An angry altercation ensued, during which defendant threatened to shoot the animal, if he were not kept at home, and the owner angrily exclaimed, "Well, go and shoot him, if you want to." He did not, then, but afterwards did so. As to this, the court Held,

1. That if these evidently angry words were to be construed as a license at all, the permission must be strictly confined to the then present time; and could not be made available, subsequently, as a permission.

2. It is, in itself, unreasonable to suppose that an owner of a valuable animal would give another man license to kill the animal at will.

As to the first defence, held,

That when an animal, though originally wild, has been domesticated, as the evidence showed this one to have been, so as to be controllable like other ordinarily domestic animals, the property therein is the same as in domestic animals; and no one has any more right to destroy it than to destroy any other domestic animal, trespassing in like manner.

INTERPRETATION OF STATUTES RELATIVE TO DAMAGES ON DISSOLUTION OF AN INJUNCTION, AS TO THEIR EFFECT THEREON.

Held, 1. That the act of 1874, relative to the dissolution of injunctions, and allowing suit to be brought on the injunction bond, although the damages were not assessed at the time of the dissolution, thus amending the similar act of 1861, which required the damages to be assessed at the time of the dissolution, and would not, on failure, allow suit subsequently on the bond—cannot be allowed a retroactive effect; and, therefore, cannot apply to bonds executed before its passage. For, the prior act entered into, and became a part of, the agreement in the bond.

2. It is competent to the parties to stipulate expressly that the damages shall be assessed on dissolution, and the contract will be enforced, notwithstanding the provisions of the later act.

DIVORCE—ALLEGATION OF AN ATTEMPT TO POISON — HOW ALLOWABLE — SEPARATE MAINTENANCE.

STATEMENT.—Bill for divorce by appellant, against appellee, on the grounds of adultery, and an attempt to cause his death by poison, put into coffee prepared separately by appellee for appellant. Cross-bill, alleging that appellant, by wrongful conduct, had caused appellee to desert him, in a week after marriage, and praying separate maintenance. Appellant was 74 years old and blind; appellee 24 years old. Original bill dismissed; the prayer of the cross-bill granted. The charge of poisoning was thrown out by the court.

The Supreme Court, commenting on the evidence adversely to the decision of the court below, Held,

1. That the charge of attempting to poison was improperly thrown out by the court, since, if proven, it would tend to confirm the charge of adultery, and strengthen the evidence thereon.

2. The evidence showing that appellee had been kindly treated, as she herself admitted, after the separation, and there being no excuse for her leaving, except that he had said that he had been deceived by her, and she was not a virtuous woman, she had no sufficient reason for leaving him; and ought not to have been allowed thereon a separate maintenance.

Both decrees were reversed, therefore.

SUPREME COURT OF TENNESSEE.

STATE, FOR USE OF HEIRS OF HOWARD, v. PARKER.

SUSPENSION OF STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS—COVERTURE.—Where the right of action had accrued, and afterwards the statute is suspended, and during the suspension plaintiff is married, the coverture, existing at the end of the suspension, cannot be relied on to defeat the bar.

SAME—GUARDIAN AND WARD—TRUSTEE.—A ward is not barred because the statute has run as to the guardian. The doctrine that when the trustee is barred the cestui que trust is also barred, does not apply to guardian and ward.

SURETIES—SEVERAL BONDS.—Sureties upon several bonds may be sued at the same time. It is not necessary to exhaust the property of the guardian and sureties on the last bond, before bringing suit against sureties on the first.

This is an action against the security upon a guardian bond, commenced in the Circuit court of Lincoln county on March 27, 1874.

On the 3d of October, 1859, H. E. Moore was appointed guardian of Mary B., Martha, Julia A., Hester A., W. S., and James S. Howard, minor children of Benjamin Howard, and entered into bond in the sum of $3,000 with defendant, W. W. Parker and one R. H. McDonald as his sureties. On the 7th of October, 1861, Moore renewed his guardian bond in the sum of $5,000, with the said McDonald and one John S. Fulton as his sureties. On the 5th of March, 1866, Moore resigned as guardian, and on the same day F. M. Snoddy was appointed guardian of the three children last named, the others having become of age and married. Mary B. was of age May 23,1862; married December 28, 1865; Julia A. became of age January 29, 1866, married December 18, 1866. Hester A. became of age in 1870; W. S. Howard was of age June 14, 1868, and James F. on the 13th of December, 1872.

On the 31st of July, 1867, the guardian Snoddy, and all the parties for whom Moore had been guardian, filed a bill in chancery against H. E. Moore, R H. McDonald, and E. B. Boyles, administrator of Fulton. In 1870 they obtained a decree against Moore and Boyles, administrator, McDonald having been adjudged a bankrupt. An execution was issued and returned nulla bona. This action on Moore's bond of October 3, 1869, was commenced March 27, 1874, against defendant Parker alone, who was surety thereon. The case was heard by the Circuit judge without a jury. Judgment for the heirs, and an appeal by Parker. The statutes of limitations are chiefly relied on as a bar to this action.

Abstract of Opinion.—By sec. 2775 of the code it is provided that actions against sureties of guardians shall be commenced within six years after cause of action accrued. In this case the cause of action accrued to Mary B. May 23, 1862, and to Julia H. January 29, 1866, the dates at which they came of age. 10 Yer., 160. But it is insisted that the statute of limitations was suspended until the 1st of January, 1867, and at that time they were both under disability by means of coverture, and therefore are not barred. At the time the cause of action accrued they were not under disability, and their subsequent coverture cannot be relied on to defeat the bar of the statute.

As to W. S., James F., and Hester A., who were minors, the cause of action accrued at the time of the resignation of Moore, and the appointment of Snoddy as guardian. It is insisted that the right of action of these children is barred, because it accrued to his guardian immediately upon his qualification, and, that being so, he was barred January 1, 1873, and the guardian being barred that the wards are barred, though they be minors. To sustain this position, we are referred to the case of Goss v. Singleton, 2 Head, 67, and other cases, holding that when a trustee is barred the cestui que trust is barred. The position is not sound, nor is it sustained by these authorities. In the cases cited the legal title was in the trustee, but the legal title is not in the guardian. The ward is the owner, and the guardian is a mere custodian. It follows, therefore, that though the statute may bar the guardian, it does not bar the wards, and under our statute he has three years in which to commence an action after the removal of his disability. W. S. Howard became of age June 14, 1868, and Hester A. on December 9, 1870, and this action not being commenced within three years after the removal of their disability, the statute is a bar to their recovery, but not as to the youngest child, James F., who became of age on the 13th of December, 1872.

But it is insisted that none of these plaintiffs are barred. The statute was suspended when they commenced suit on the 31st of July, 1867, against H. E. Moore and his sureties on his last guardian bond, and that they could not maintain an action against the sureties upon the bond until they had exhausted the property of the guardian and the sureties on his last bond. This position is untenable. When the cause of action accrued against the guardian it accrued against the defendant. This suit was the commencement of action against defendant; he was not a party to the suit of July 31st, 1867, and was therefore not affected thereby. If they had seen proper, they could have made him a party to the bill filed at that time, and the court could have rendered a decree against the sureties upon the different bonds, declaring the order of their liability. The case of Jamison v. Crosby, 11 Hum., 273, which has been referred to, was not decided with reference to the statute of limitations; in fact, at that time there was no such statute in favor of sureties upon guardian bonds. While it may be true that the sureties upon the several bonds are not liable to make payment at the same time, or to be sued at law in the same action, yet there can be no question but that they are liable to be sued at the same time. The conditions of the bonds are that the guardian shall faithfully perform the duties of his guardianship; whenever he fails to do so he is guilty of a breach of the conditions of the several bonds, by the same act and at the same time, and the cause of action accrues against the sureties on each bond at the same time.

Judgment affirmed as to the plaintiff, James F. Howard, and reversed as to the others, their suit dismissed, and they will pay four-fifths of the costs, and defendant will pay the balance.

Opinion by LEA, Special Judge.—Commercial and Legal Reporter.

KNOXVILLE, JUNE 17, 1876.

JOHN BROWN AND WIFE v. E. Z. C. HARRIS et al.

NUNCUPATIVE WILL—PROBATE—SETTING ASIDE—NOTICE.—The probate of a nuncupative will in the county court is, in substance, under our statutes, required to be in solemn form; and such probate ought not to be set aside upon petition, merely because of the absence of the process or notice from the record, where the want of notice is not averred in the petition. The recital of the record that the next of kin were notified to appear, is sufficient to show the fact of notice.—[ED. Commercial and Legal Reporter.

Opinion of the court by MCFARLAND, J.

The nuncupative will of Matilda Roy was admitted to probate by the County court of Monroe county, at the June term, 1875. Subsequently at the September term, upon the petition of the next of kin, or some of them, the probate was set aside, and the will and proceedings certified to the Circuit court for an issue and contest in the usual form. In the Circuit court the administrator, with the will annexed, moved to dismiss the petition and annul the action of the County court setting aside the probate. This motion was sustained and the will was declared valid under the probate of the County court, and the matter remanded to that court to be proceeded with. The contestants have appealed.

The argument in support of the action of the Circuit court is, that the probate of a will had in solemn form cannot afterwards be set aside, and that under our laws the probate of a nuncupative will is a probate in solemn form, by the express requirements of the statute. If the next of kin, when notified to be present at the probate in the County court, failed to contest, and asked for an issue to be made, they cannot afterwards have the probate set aside. This, so far as we know, is a new question in this state. A probate in common form is the usual mode of proving wills in the County court: that is, wills other than nuncupative wills, may be set aside upon the petition of the parties in interest, and issue made for trial in the Circuit court, even after the lapse of many years. But probate in solemn form cannot thus be set aside. A probate in solemn form may be had in the County court by citing all who are intended to be present at the probation, and in their presence the will is offered for probate, and the witnesses all examined and the judgment of the court thereon establishes or rejects the will. Sec. 2166 of the Code, from the act of 1784, enacts "that no nuncupative will shall be proved by the witnesses * * * * till process has issued to call in the widow or next of kin, or both, if conveniently to be found, to contest it." This, in substance, requires the probate of such a will to be in solemn form, and we do not see but what the same results would follow as to the right to have the probate set aside which attach to other wills proven in solemn form.

The record of the County court shows that the will of Matilda Roy was produced in open court at the May term, 1875, for probate, when it was ordered that the probate be continued until the June term, and that process issue as to all resident defendants, and publication be made as to all non resident defendants, next of kin, notifying them that the will would be offered for probate at the June term. The record shows that a number of persons, including all the petitioners except Mary E. Barr, (who was a niece of the testatrix,) and her husband, by writing signed by attorney, waived service of process to appear at the June term, and at the June term the record recites that the next of kin were notified to appear on the day of probate.

The petition assumes that the probate of the will in the County court was in common form, but does not in terms aver a want of notice. Is the recital of the record that the next of kin were notified, sufficient to show the fact? Should the record affirmatively show the service of the process? The requirement of the statute is that "process" shall issue, etc. "Process" ordinarily would mean process issued by the clerk which should constitute part of the record, but the mere absence of the process or notice from the record, where the fact of notice is recited, ought not to vitiate the probate, where want of notice is not averred. The probate of a will is a proceeding in rem, and while we think parties in interest who had no notice ought not to be denied their right to contest, yet when the record shows a case of probate in solemn form and no want of notice is averred, that the probate ought not to be set aside merely because of the absence of the process or notice from the record.

Affirm the judgment.

SURVIVORSHIP.—ITS PERIOD, ITS MEANING.

[From the London Law Times.]

WAITE v. VARAH (34 L. T. Rep. N. S. 437).

The words survivor and survivorship play an important part not only in the calculations of insurance companies, but also in limitations of real and personal estate by deed or will. They test the skill and ingenuity of the draftsman, and frequently perplex the learned judges in equity who have to discover an intention for a testator inconsistent with the words used by him, if they may thereby prevent an intestacy or other failure of the provisions for his family. Often the question is, whether a gift to a survivor or a gift over on the death of a survivor, creates by implication an estate in those who precede their survivor, or succeed one who survives others; and then the principles laid down by Chief Justice Vaughan in the case which Lord Alvanly described as the great case which everyone has in his mind, meaning thereby Gardner v. Sheldon, have to be considered. Further, the time of survivorship is to those who lack prophetic foresight, an unknown quantity, and even where it appears to be limited, the reports show that frequently the limitation is either ill defined originally, or rendered indistinct by the change of circumstances. The survivorship may have reference to the testator, and then mere questions of fact are involved. But a prior donee or donees may intervene, the gift may either be absolute or for life. Though absolute, the gift to the survivors may not be expressly contingent. Even here, formerly, the period of survivorship was referred to the testator's death. Cripps v. Wolcott (4 Mad. 11), fixed the period to that of distribution where personalty was involved. Further, the prior absolute gift may be followed by a gift contingent on survivorship, and the contingency may be limited to the death of a prior tenant for life, as in Jenour v. Jenour (10 Ves. 562), where property was to be divided between two nephews who were brothers, and to go to the survivors of them in case the brother should leave no lawful issue; or the contingency may be indefinite. Again, an executory devise to a survivor may refer to the death of the testator. (Doe and Lifford v. Sparrow, 13 East, 359.)

Again, the prior gift may not be absolute, but only for life; here, in the simplest case, the period is of course indefinite. But frequently there is, then, another event, as the attaining majority superadded, and where such is the case, the courts choose the personal event as more likely to produce a reasonable scheme for the distribution of property. (Crozier v. Fisher, 4 Russ. 398.)

Lastly, the word survivor is one of the few words which the courts have considered themselves at liberty to change for one etymologically quite different. "And" has been changed to "or," "or" to "and," "fourth" to "fifth," "several" to "respective," "future" to "former," and "survivor" "to other." We shall, therefore, discuss first the period at which survivorship is to be ascertained in bequests of personalty and devises of realty; secondly, the change made in the meaning of the word survivor by judicial interpretation, which, disregarding its etymological sense, takes it as used instead of the word "other."

First, the Period.—Sir John Leach confessed his inability to reconcile every case, but considered it to be settled that if a legacy be given to two or more equally to be divided between them, or to the survivors or survivor of them, and there be no special intent to be found in the will, the survivorship is to be referred to the period of division. If there is no previous interest given in the legacy, then the period of division is the death of the testator, and the survivors at his death will take the whole legacy. But if the previous estate be given, then the period of division is the death of the tenant for life, and the survivors at such death will take the whole of the legacy. Even to Sir John Leach, the complicated idea of survivorship proved a fallacy. The rule just cited respecting survivorship to a tenant for life is too broadly stated, for the tenant for life may predecease the testator, and then the period of division will be the testator's death. (Spurrell v. Spurrell, 11 Hare., 154.)

The rule to govern the period for ascertaining the survivors in limitations of realty, was for a long time unsettled. Many cases fixed the period at the death of the testator. Doe v. Prigg made this the rule even in a devise to a class (8 B. & Cr. 231.) Wordsworth v. Wood, (1 H. L. 129), was thought by some to overrule Doe v. Prigg. In Young v. Robertson (H. L. 8 Jur. N. S. 825,) it was laid down as the rule that words of survivorship are to be referred to the period appointed for the payment or distribution of the subject matter of the gift. Nevertheless, in the next month, the Lord Chancellor Westbury in the House of Lords, held that the law in respect of real estate, was still unsettled. Taaffe v. Conmee (12 Ir. Ch. Rep. 338, H L.; 8 Jur. N. S. 919; 6 L. T. Rep. N. S. 666.) And Vice Chancellor Wood in Re Gregson's Trusts (10 Jur. N. S. 696; 10 L. T. Rep. N. S. 612), held that Doe v. Prigg was not overruled; but on appeal (10 Jur. N. S. 1168; 2 D. J. & S., 428,) Lord Justice Turner expressed his decided disapproval of Doe v. Prigg. He attributed what he called the painful conflict of authorities, partly to the fact that courts of law had, as to real estate, leaned strongly in favor of the vesting at the death of the testator, whilst the courts of equity had, as to personal estate, leaned as strongly to the vesting at the period of division. It was plain to his mind that the decisions as to personalty were strongly founded upon the intention of the testator, but still the governing question as to both laws was, and always had been, the intention of the testator. "The law," he said, "is subordinate to the intention. It comes into force only when the intention has been ascertained, and it cannot constitute the medium by which the intention is to be ascertained. In Foas' Will (11 Jur. N. S. 785) the Master of the Rolls followed Young v. Robertson, and Vice Chancellor Wood, in Wilmott v. Hewitt, distinguishing the case from Young v. Robertson, upon the words of the will, held that the survivorship was not to be referred to the period of distribution, but to the time of the death of the legatees dying in the lifetime of the tenant for life. (11 Jur. N. 1820.) These two cases show that Young v. Robertson is good law as to personalty, yet the intention is to govern.

In Bowers v. Bowers, (21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 134; L. Rep. 8 Eq. Ca., 283,) there was an immediate gift to four residuary legatees and devisees in equal shares, "with benefit of survivorship," in case any of them should be without issue, and in case any of them should die leaving children, then the share, whether original or accruing of each so dying, to go to such children. Vice Chancellor Malins held that the clause of survivorship was merely to guard against lapse, and was, therefore, confined to the lifetime of the testator. Lord Chancellor Hatherley and Lord Justice Giffard reversed this decision. The former observed: "There have been many cases in which the court has said that to refer a clause providing for the divesting of a share to the time of the testator's own death, so as to make it merely a provision against lapse is not a natural construction. It is not prima facia to be supposed that he contemplated the death of the objects of his bounty in his lifetime, but he is to be considered as contemplating their death at some later period, unless he uses language which shows that he is referring to the time of his own death. Take the case of an immediate gift to A, "and in case he shall happen to die, then to B." Here death being spoken of as contingent, the testator must be referring to death before some particular period, and as there is no other period to which it can be referred than his own death, we are obliged to treat the gift over as taking effect only in the case of A's dying in the the testator's lifetime. But if the gift over is "In case A shall happen to die leaving issue," we have a contingency, and there is no occasion to confine the death to any particular period. (L. Rep. 5 Ch. App. 244.)

In marriage settlements, limitations to children on the death of the survivor of father and mother of course are frequent. Here the limitation is on the death of a person a certain event, and the word survivor merely ascertains who that person is, and therefore presents no difficulty of construction, though the limitation to a class of children may. The latest important case on such a limitation is Jeyes v. Savage (L Rep. 10, Ch. App. 555), in which Woodcock v. Dorset was explained.

AGENCY—OF THE EXTENSION OF AN AGENT'S AUTHORITY.

BY THE CONDUCT OF THE PRINCIPAL.

The authority with which an agent is invested is not necessarily confined to the performance of those actions alone which are authorized by the bare words in which an authority is conveyed. On the contrary, it is rarely so confined. Generally speaking, the authority may be extended in a variety of ways by the operation of a number of rules and principles, some of which have already been discussed. There now remains for consideration the influence of the principal's conduct in extending the original authority.

The rule applicable to this branch of law has been laid down with great clearness in the work of a learned writer upon mercantile law. The only ground of liability on the part of a principal, to third parties dealing with an agent for the acts of the agent done in excess of the power given him, and which he would be held to have even in a question between himself and the principal, is such culpa or quasi-culpa on the principal's part as would be a relevant ground for the plea of estoppel against his pleading the actual terms of the authority given to the agent. Where the principal by his words or conduct wilfully causes another to believe the existence of certain powers in the agent, and induces him to deal with the agent in that be lief; where the principal has by words or by conduct made a representation to another as to the agent's authority in order to induce others to act upon it, where the representation or conduct complained of, whether active or passive in its character, has been intended to bring about the result whereby that other dealing with the agent has altered his position to his loss—in such a case, and in such a case alone, will the doctrine of estoppel apply to bar the principal from pleading against the third party the terms of the real authority which he gave to the agent. Mere negligence is not of itself a ground of estoppel: Bell Commentaries, iii., I. 3, n. 5. The importance of the rules defining the limits of an agent's authority will fully appear when it is remembered that an agent's power to bind his principal is limited to the scope of his authority: Olding v. Smith, 16 Jur. Q. B., 497.

In Bishop v. Countess of Jersey, 2 Drew., 143, 1854, a bill was filed against the members of a banking firm for the purpose of making them liable to repay to the plaintiff the sum of £5,000, of which she alleged she had been defrauded by a former member of the firm. From the evidence it appeared that A., the member in question, had advised the plaintiff, a customer of the bank, to sell out some Dutch stock. He told her the firm could procure for her better security, and that he had one in view. He told her the money was wanted by his own son, who was in trade. The plaintiff sold out the stock and paid the money into the bank; she then gave him a check to draw it out and invest it. He drew it out, misapplied it, and absconded, the interest having been regularly carried to her account in the meantime in the books of the bank, but it did not appear by whom. All these transactions took place at the banking house, and the plaintiff had no acquaintance or dealings with this member except as banker and a member of the firm. The other partners did not appear to have known of them at the time they took place. The Solicitor-General (Sir Richard Bethel), with whom was Mr. Cairns, contended, inter alia, upon the authority of Willett v. Chambers, 2 Cowp., 814, and Rapp v. Latham, 2 B. & Ald., 795, that if one partner makes representations to a customer of the firm, however untrue they may be, the customer has a right to be put in the same position by the other partners as if the representation had been true. Vice-Chancellor Kindersley was of opinion that the defendants were not liable, on the ground that it was not within the scope of the business of bankers to seek or make investments generally for their customers, nor did the partners know of the dealings before the other partner had absconded. No direct reference was made to the principle that where one of two innocent persons must suffer by the fraud of a third, he who enabled that person, by giving him credit, to commit the fraud shall be the sufferer: 3 Salk., 233; 1 Ld. Raym., 225.

This case was referred to in Thompson v. Ball, 10 Ex., 10; 23 L. J., 321, Ex., a decision of the court of Exchequer in the same year. There the manager of a joint stock bank, at which the plaintiff kept a deposit account, represented to him that the bank had an equitable mortgage on some houses of a third person, subject to a mortgage of £400, and advised him to purchase the houses for £595, £400 to be paid in discharge of the mortgage, and £195 to the bank. The plaintiff consented, and took his deposit receipts to the manager at the bank, who, on presenting them to a clerk, obtained from him £595. The manager then gave the plaintiff a receipt in his own name, stating that £195 was the balance of purchase money of the houses, and that £400 was deposited with him to pay off the mortgage. He afterwards absconded with the £595. The plaintiff having brought an action against the bank to recover the money, the jury found that the manager had authority to assign securities, that the manager intended to make the plaintiff believe, and the plaintiff did believe, that the manager was acting in this transaction as agent of the bank. The court held that the bank was responsible for the money. The obvious conclusion from the findings of the jury was that the money was paid to the manager as agent of the bank. This distinguishes the case from Bishop v. Countess of Jersey (sup.).

There are a number of cases under this head in which the agent has been allowed to hold himself out as a principal.

In Ramazotti v. Bowring, 29 L. J 30, C. P.; 7 C. B. N. S., 85; 6 Jur. N. S., 172, 1860, N., representing himself to be the proprietor of a certain business carried on under the name of the Continental Wine Company, induced the defendants to receive from him certain wines and spirits in part satisfaction of a debt previously contracted by him with them. N. was really only clerk to R., who was the real proprietor of the establishment. The name of R. appeared over the entrance to the cellars, but it was not visible to persons going to the counting house. R's name also appeared (though in an ambiguous manner) upon a receipt signed by one of the defendants on the delivery of some of the goods. In an action brought by R. for the price of the goods, the Common Serjeant left it to the jury to say whether the plaintiff or N. was the real owner of the business, and told them that if they were of opinion that N. was the real owner, they must find their verdict for the defendants, but that if they thought the plaintiff was the owner, they must find for him. A verdict for the plaintiff was returned. A rule nisi for a new trial on the ground of misdirection, was obtained, and afterwards made absolute. "I think," said Erle, C. J., "the proper question was not put to the jury. . . . The proper question under the circumstances would have been whether Ramazotti so conducted himself as to enable Nixon to hold himself out to be the true owner of the goods, whether Nixon did so hold himself out, and whether the defendants, in dealing with Nixon, believed him to be the owner." Other points were raised in the course of the arguments, but it is not necessary to discuss them here.

The court of Queen's Bench had a similar question before them in Edmunds v. Bushell and Jones, L. Rep. 1 Q. B., 97, 1865. The defendant J. carried on business at Luton and in London. The business in the latter place was carried on in the name of Bushell & Co. J. employed B. to manage his business, and carry it on in the above name. The drawing and accepting bills of exchange was incidental to the carrying on of such a business, but it was stipulated between them that B. should not draw or accept bills. B. accepted a bill in the name of "Bushell & Co., and the court held that J. was liable on the bill in the hands of an indorsee, who took it without any knowledge of B. and J., or the business.

Where, however, the agent of a wharfinger, whose duty it was to give receipts for goods actually received at the wharf, fraudulently gave a receipt for goods which had never been received, the principal was not held to be responsible, because it was not within the scope of the agent's authority in the course of his employment to give such a receipt: Coleman v. Riches, 16 C. B., 104; 24 L. J., 125, C. P.—The London Law Times.

COURT OF APPEALS ABSTRACT.

CONTRACT—FAILURE TO PERFORM—WAIVER AGREEMENT FOR SALE OF BONDS—TENDER OF PERFORMANCE.

Defendant agreed to purchase and plaintiffs to sell bonds of an Alabama railroad company, indorsed by the State of Alabama. Delivery and payment was to take place at plaintiff's place of business at a specified day and hour. At the precise time defendant was at the appointed place, and asked for the bonds. Plaintiffs, who did not own the bonds, had agreed for the purchase of some with one K., and K. had offered them, but they had not accepted bonds which were indorsed with the name of the governor of Alabama, but without his official title. All parties believing the formality mentioned necessary, defendant told plaintiffs if they would deliver bonds indorsed in conformity to it before half-past two of that day to M. & Co., that firm were authorized to receive them. Before the time mentioned plaintiffs offered bonds, a part of which were indorsed by the governor without the addition of his official title. M. & Co. refused to receive them because of the want of the formality. The informal bonds at the time of such offer did not belong to plaintiffs, but to K, plaintiffs having taken them upon an agreement that if they were accepted they would pay K. for them. Held, that by the failure to deliver the bonds at the time and place originally agreed upon the defendant was relieved from all liability; that although the informality in indorsment did not render the bonds invalid as against the State of Alabama, and a tender of them to defendant in the first instance would have been sufficient, the tender to M. & Co. not being of such bonds as defendant had then agreed to accept, defendant was not liable on the contract. Levy et al. v. Burgess. Opinion by Andrews, J. [Decided March 21.]

EVIDENCE—HYPOTHETICAL QUESTIONS ALLOWED.

Hypothetical questions are permitted in which counsel may, for the purpose of having the opinion of experts, assume the facts as they claim them to exist, and an error in the assumption does not make the interrogatory objectionable if it is within the possible range of the evidence. Hartnett v Garvey. Opinion per curiam. [Decided June 13.]

INSURANCE—FIRE POLICY—CONDITIONS IN—RIGHT OF INSURER TO CANCEL.

A condition attached to a fire insurance policy provided that it should be void in case the property should be described so as to diminish the premium, or if the risk should be increased during its continuance, by any means within the control of the assured, in such case no premiums were to be returned. It also provided for a termination of the insurance at the election of the insurers upon notice to the insured and a repayment of a ratable proportion of the premium in case the risk should be increased by the erection or occupation of buildings upon neighboring premises, "or otherwise," and it also provided that "if for any other cause the company shall so elect, it shall be optional with the company to terminate the insurance," after the like notice and repayment of the unearned premium.

Held, that the principle of noscitur a sociis did not govern in the interpretation of the contract, and that under it the company had, upon notice and repayment of unearned premiums, the right to terminate a risk whenever they should desire so to do. International Life and Trust Co. v. Franklin Fire Ins. Co. of Philadelphia. Opinion by ALLEN, J. [Decided April 28.]

NEGLIGENCE—PROXIMATE CAUSE OF DEATH—WHAT IS NEGLIGENCE.

Plaintiff's intestate, a passenger on defendant's cars, was, while alighting from the cars, by the negligence of defendant's servants, so injured that the injury would be certain to produce death unless relieved. He employed surgeons of acknowledged competency to treat him, but he died. Held, that the defendant was liable for his death, and would not be relieved by the fact that a mistake in treatment may have been made by the surgeons, which contributed to the result, Sauter v. N. Y. C. & H. R. R. R. Co. Opinion by CHURCH, C. J.

The sudden jerking of a train backwards while passengers are rightfully passing out of the cars, is a negligent act, and a danger not presumptively to be apprehended by a prudent man. [Decided April 18.]—Albany Law Journal.

SUPREME COURT OF PENNSYLVANIA.

MENTZ v. LANCASTER FIRE INS. CO.

Error to the Court of Common Pleas of Crawford County.

Where agents are acting for an insurance company, and are held up to the public as such, the reasonable presumption is that they are authorized to act for the company in a general way, unless the company specify what may be their special duties and powers.

Opinion by SHARSWOOD, J.

It was admitted on the trial of the cause below that Murray and Clow were agents of the insurance companies at Titusville, of the defendants in error, and of the Armenia Fire Insurance Company. There was no evidence tending to show that their powers were special. It must be assumed then that they were authorized to act as general agents of the companies in all matters relating to the effecting of insurance on their behalf. It may be conceded that as such general agents they would have no power to waive any express condition in the policy. But the question was not of their power to do this, but whether their declaration of a fact, namely, that the condition had been actually complied with, would estop the company from controverting the fact. The evidence offered and rejected was that the agent had told the assured that the proper indorsement had been made on the policy. Now, such a declaration, made by a duly authorized agent or officer, would only operate as an estoppel. It lulled the party to sleep by the assurance that the conditions of the policy had been complied with, and that his indemnity was secured. In point of fact, then, local agents are held out as acting for the companies they represent in all respects except as to the actual issue of the policies. The companies will assuredly lose all public confidence if they shelter themselves behind the special character of the powers of such agents, when parties have relied upon their declarations.

The case of Worcester Bank v. Hartford Fire Insurance Company, 11 Cush., 265, is not in point. There the parties insuring were told by the agent that it would make no difference that the second insurance was not indorsed on the policy; that he would make a memorandum of the fact in his book, which would answer every purpose. The question there was whether the agent could avoid performance of the condition, which is a very different question from that presented on this record.

Judgment reversed and procedendo awarded.

CHICAGO LEGAL NEWS.

CHICAGO, JULY 29, 1876.

The Courts.

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES.

OCTOBER TERM, 1875.

197.—FRANCIS L. MARKEY, ISAAC BRANCH, and DANIEL W. BRANCH, Appellants, v. W. C. LANGLEY, SAMUEL KEYSER, and C. D. COOK.

Appeal from the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of South Carolina.

POWER OF SALE—WHEN A SALE WILL BE SET ASIDE.

The court states the duty of a trustee or mortgage, in making a sale under a power, and holds that where a power coupled with a discretion has been exercised, a court of equity in the absence of fraud, should rarely interfere.—ED. LEGAL NEWS.

Mr. Justice SWAYNE delivered the opinion of the Court.

The statement of facts agreed upon by the counsel of the parties, has abridged our labor in this case. We shall confine our remarks to the points which, in our judgment, require consideration, referring to the facts only so far as is necessary for the elucidation of our views.

The validity of the two mortgages executed to Langley & Co. by the corporation known as the Kalmia Mills, is not questioned; nor can it be doubted that the power to sell, which they contained, was sufficient to warrant the sale of the mortgaged premises in the manner prescribed. Olcott v. Bynum, 17 Wall., 63. The good faith of Langley & Co. in making the sale, and of Cogswell, Evans & Mordecai in making the purchase, are undisputed. No ground is disclosed for doubt as to either of these points. All concerned acquiesced at the time and were apparently satisfied. This litigation has grown out of the large and unexpected depreciation of the property upon which both the appellants and appellees supposed their debts were abundantly secured, and out of the proceeds of which they expected to be paid, if a sale became necessary.

Upon the default of the mortgagor, the mortgages gave the mortgagees authority "to put the mortgaged premises into the hands of some good broker and auctioneer, to be sold for cash or credit, at the option and direction of the mortgagees, at public sale to the highest bidder, according to the custom of vendue, after advertising" as directed, and, further, "to do and perform all and every other act and acts, thing and things which shall or may be necessary and proper for the full and complete effecting and performing of the covenants and agreements herein contained."

The terms of sale advertised were a cash payment of one-third of the amount bid, and the balance in six, nine, and twelve months, secured by notes and a mortgage upon the premises. At the sale, the auctioneers announced that they were authorized to state "that the purchasers would be able to negotiate more favorable terms with the sellers, provided it was to their mutual interests."

The property was sold to Cogswell, for himself, Evans, and Mordecai, upon a bid of the amount due Langley & Co., and $20,000 in addition. One-third of the amount bid to be paid in cash, was $71,445.69. The buyers thereupon represented to Langley & Co. that it was impossible for them to make the cash payment, and asked for indulgence and a change of the terms of the sale with respect to the times when the payments were to be made.

Langley & Co., rather than re-advertise the property and take the risk incident to offering it for sale again, entered into an agreement with the purchasers, whereby it was stipulated as follows:

That the purchasers should give to Langley & Co. their four several promissory notes, one for $180,000, payable on the 12th of January, 1868, (being for the principal of the debt then due to them,) with interest, and three others, each for $4,779.92, payable respectively at five, six, and seven months, with interest, (being for interest then due on the principal debt,) and, in addition, another note for $20,000, payable with interest on the 3rd of April, 1868.

The title to the mortgaged premises was to be conveyed to Cogswell, first to pay the several notes for the purchase-money, and then in trust for such uses and purposes as Cogswell, Evans & Mordecai should appoint. They were also to give to Langley & Co. their bond secured by several mortgages upon their individual property, conditioned to pay any residuum that might be left due on the notes after exhausting the property covered by the deed of trust to Cogswell. This agreement was in all things carried out by the parties. The note of $20,000 was intended to meet the liabilities of the Kalmia Mills to its creditors, other than Langley & Co. The debt due to Markey & Co. was one of those intended to be thus provided for.

A few days before the sale Markey & Co. put on record a contract with the Kalmia Mills, under which they had been working upon the mortgaged premises. This gave them a mechanic's lien. They threatened to enjoin the proceedings to sell by Langley & Co. Cogswell, Evans & Mordecai thereupon gave them a guaranty that if the guarantors became the purchasers of the premises they would continue the contract under which Markey & Co. had been working, and indemnify them against any loss arising from the Kalmia Mills failing to pay the amount due on the contract. This being arranged, Markey & Co. interposed no obstacle to the sale. After the sale they entered into a contract with Cogswell, the trustee, whereby it was stipulated that they should be paid the sum of $18,000 for their work done and to be done. They continued to work under this contract, and received payments from time to time.

The enterprise in which Cogswell, Evans & Mordecai had engaged, with the premises they had bought as its basis, having failed, they requested Langley & Co. to take possession of the premises conveyed by the trust deed to Cogswell, and of the premises covered by the mortgages given by Cogswell, Evans & Mordecai, and to proceed to sell under the powers contained in those instruments. Langley & Co. thereupon advertised the Kalmia Mills property to be sold on the 10th of March, 1868.—Markey & Co. and other creditors threatened to interpose by injunction. Langley & Co thereupon filed this bill to settle their rights and those of the adverse parties. On the day fixed for the sale the Kalmia Mills property, by consent of parties, was bought by Langley for $160,000. Forty thousand dollars of the fund was reserved by order of the court to await the result of this litigation.—Subsequently, by the like consent of parties, the property mortgaged by Cogswell, Evans & Mordecai was sold and yielded the net sum of $52,148. The proceeds of both sales were less than sufficient to satisfy the amount due Langley & Co. by $6,152 13, leaving nothing to be applied to any other liability of the Kalmia Mills.

The contest in the court below was as to the application of the proceeds of these sales. The defendants claimed that Langley & Co. should be charged with the amount of the cash bid of Cogswell at the sale under the original mortgages, $71,449.69, as so much paid to them, because they had no right to waive its payment at the time of the sale and include it in the notes given for the purchase-money.

This, if done would leave a residuum of the proceeds of the sales large enough to pay the balance due Langley & Co., and also the amount due on the trust note of $20,000. Failing this, the defendants insisted that this note should be paid out of the proceeds of the Kalmia Mills property, and of the property mortgaged by Cogswell, Evans & Mordecai severally, pro rata with the other notes given for the purchase-money.

The court below decided against them upon both points. Here the same propositions have been urged upon our attention.

The first one cannot be maintained, for several reasons.

The mortgagor makes no objection to the sale as made. If it were defective, this would cure the defect and give it validity.—Taylor's Admr. v. Chowning, 3 Leigh, 654; Benham et al. v. Shaeffer et al., 2 Cal., 387. If the power require the sale to be for cash, and it is made for part cash and part credit, the departure from the power is beneficial to the mortgagor, and the sale is valid.—Hubbard v. Jarrell, 23 Md., 75. When the power is to sell for cash, and the sale is made accordingly, the mortgagee may allow time for the payment of the purchase-money, and whether this arrangement is made before or after the sale is immaterial.—Malone v. Williams, 39 Alab., U. S., 202.

Where mortgaged premises were offered for sale for cash under a power which required the sale to be so made they were struck off for $2,375. The purchaser tendered $1,200 cash, and offered to give any security that might be required for the payment of the balance when the sale was confirmed. The mortgagee declined to receive the money and security as not in conformity with the terms of the sale. The property was offered for sale again and bought by the mortgagee for $1,600.

The court said: "In determining upon the approval or rejection of the sale in such cases, the true question to be considered is not so much whether there has been a literal or technical, as a fair and reasonable compliance with the terms of sale, and a bona fide disposition of the property.

"Without intending to charge the mortgagee in this case with the willful violation of his trust, the circumstances disclosed by the proof show reasonable ground for the inference that he misapprehended the nature of his duty as trustee, which required an advantageous sale of the property for the benefit of all the parties interested." The sale was vacated.—Horsey v. Hough, 38 Md., 139; see, also, Gibson's Case, 1 Bland's Chy., 144; Olcott v. Bynum, 17 Wall., 63.

Where a power coupled with a discretion has been exercised, a court of equity, in the absence of fraud, very rarely interferes.—Olcott v. Bynum, supra.

In this case the mortgagees were expressly authorized to sell for cash or on credit. This gave them authority to do either, or to combine them in the sale. What was done was a simple exercise of the discretion with which they were clothed. It was in pursuance of the notice given at the vendue. It was intended to promote the sale of the premises upon the best terms that could be procured. Such an exercise of the power was as competent after as before the property was struck off. In this respect the power is without restriction. The arrangement was apparently greatly beneficial to Markey & Co. and the unsecured creditors, as well as to Langley & Co. It does not appear that there was any bidder but the purchasers. It is clear that they could not have made the cash payment. If insisted upon, the sale would have fallen through. Besides the mortgaged premises, a large amount of additional property was pledged for the payment of the purchase-money. The light thrown backward by subsequent events shows clearly that it was the only way to secure the payment of the debt due to Langley & Co. and leave anything for the other creditors. The arrangement seemed to furnish the means of satisfying all demands. That it failed to do this was not the fault of Langley & Co.

A mortgagee, in such circumstances, is a trustee for the benefit of all concerned. He must regard the interests of others as well as his own. He should seek to promote the common welfare. If he does this, and keeps within the scope of his authority, a court of equity will in no wise hold him responsible for mere errors of judgment, if they have occurred, or for results, however unfortunate, which he could not reasonably have anticipated.—Hext v. Porcher, 1 Strob. Eq., 172.

The second proposition is also untenable.

The liens of the mortgages and the mechanic's lien attached to the proceeds of the sales in the same manner, in the same order, and with the same effect as they bound the premises before the sales were made.—Aster v. Miller and others, 2 Paige, 68; Sweet v. Jacobs, 6 Idem, 355; Brown v. Stewart, 1 Md. Chy. Decis., 87; Olcott v. Bynum, 17 Wall., 63.

In the view of equity, the new securities stood in substitution for the old ones, the liens of Langley & Co. being prior in point of time to all others, and first to be paid. As the case is developed in the record, such appears plainly to have been the intent of the parties. The note of $20,000 was the last to mature.

If the sale to Cogswell had been made by a master or a trustee other than those named in the power of sale, for cash or on credit, the money, when received, would have been paid over according to the priorities of the liens of the parties entitled to receive it. Langley & Co. would have been first paid.

The fact that the sale was made by the mortgagees, acting as trustees and performing the functions of a master, does not change the principle involved nor affect its application.

It appears that a question was raised in the court below as to the right of the unsecured creditors of the Kalmia Mills to share with Markey & Co. in the proceeds of this note. As there can be no such proceeds, we need not consider that subject.

The decree of the Circuit court is affirmed.

UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT.

No. 195.—OCTOBER TERM, 1875.

JACOB MAGEE and HENRY HALL, Plaintiffs in Error,
v.
THE MANHATTAN LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY.

In Error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of Alabama.

BOND OF INSURANCE AGENT—RELEASE OF SURETY.

Held, That the agreement as to the commissions, and the circumstances that it was unknown to the sureties and not communicated to them by the insurance company, did not exonerate the sureties from liability upon the bond.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.

Mr. Justice SWAYNE delivered the opinion of the court.

The defendant in error sued the plaintiffs in error upon a bond which recited that Henry Voorhes had been appointed an agent of the insurance company, and was conditioned for his paying over to the company all moneys belonging to it which he should receive.

The breach alleged was that he had received such moneys, which he had failed to pay over.

The defendants pleaded three pleas:

1. That Voorhes had paid over all moneys belonging to the company which he had received after the execution of the bond.

2. That at the time of the execution of the bond, Voorhes, as such agent, was indebted to the company, and that there was an agreement between him and the company that all moneys received by Voorhes should be credited upon this indebtedness; that these facts were concealed from the defendants, and that all the moneys so received were so credited.

3. That the plaintiffs required the giving of this bond as as a condition on which only they would retain Voorhes in their employment as such agent; that they required further, an agreement by Voorhes that all his commissions thereafter earned should be applied to his past indebtedness to the company; that they were so applied; that the defendants were ignorant of the indebtedness, and of this agreement; that if they had been informed of them, they would not have executed the bond, and that the agreement as to the commissions, and its execution were a fraud on them, and that the bond as to them was thereby avoided.

The third plea was demurred to, and the demurrer was sustained. Issue was taken upon the first and second pleas. The jury found for the plaintiff, and the court gave judgment accordingly.

The only question presented for our determination, is as to the sufficiency of the third plea.

The demurrer admits the substantial facts which the plea avers. Do the agreement as to the commissions, and the circumstances that it was unknown to the sureties and not communicated to them by the company, exonerate the sureties from liability upon the bond?

A surety is "a favored debtor." His rights are zealously guarded both at law and in equity. The slightest fraud on the part of the creditor, touching the contract, annuls it. Any alteration after it is made, though beneficial to the surety, has the same effect. His contract exactly as made is the measure of his liability, and if the case against him be not clearly within it, he is entitled to go acquit.—Ludlow vs. Symonds, 2 Caines'

Cases, 1; Miller vs. Stewart, 9 Wheat., 681.

But there is a duty incumbent on him. He must not rest supine, close his eyes and fail to seek important information within his reach. If he does this, and a loss occurs, he cannot, in the absence of fraud on the part of the creditor, set up as a defence facts then first learned which he ought to have known and considered before entering into the contract. —Kerr on Fraud and Mistake, 96.

Vigilantibus et non dormentibus jura subveniunt.

Where one of two innocent parties must lose, and one of them is in fault, the law throws the burden of the loss upon him.—Hearne vs. Nichols, 1 Salk., 289.

It may be well, before examining the question arising upon the plea, to advert to some of the points bearing upon the subject, which have been adjudged in authorritative cases.

A fraudulent concealment is the suppression of something which the party is bound to disclose.—Kerr, sup., 95.

To constitute fraud, the intent to deceive must clearly appear.—Spofford vs. Newson, 9 Iredell (Law), 507.

The concealment must be willful and intentional.—De Gol. on Guar. and Sur., 366.

The test is, whether one of the parties knowingly suffered the other to deal under a delusion.—2 Kent's Com. (Comst. ed.), 643.

The mere relation of principal and surety does not require the voluntary disclosure of all the material facts in all cases. The same rule as to disclosures does not apply in cases of principal and surety as in cases of insurance on ships or lives.—North Brit. Ins. Co. v. Loyd, 10 Exch., 533.

In this case a former guarantor was discharged and others taken in his place. The fact of the prior guaranty was not disclosed. The subsequent guarantors made no enquiry and they were held to be liable. If the surety desires information he must ask for it. The creditor is not bound to volunteer it. An undisclosed prior debt will not affect the validity of the contract.—Hamilton v. Watson, 12 Clarke & F., 119.

If the creditor be applied to he must make a full and frank communication.—De Golyar, sup., 367.

One took a note from another whom he knew to be insolvent, and did not disclose that fact to a person who became surety. It was held that the surety was bound and that the payee had a right to presume he was aware of the insolvency of the principal.—Ham v. Greve, 34 Ind., 18.

To render the general allegation of concealment sufficient in a pleading, it is necessary also to aver that the creditor either procured the surety's signature or was present when the instrument was executed, and then misrepresented or concealed essential facts which should have been disclosed, otherwise the allegation of fraud is only the pleader's deduction.—Burks v. Wonterlein, 6 Bush., 24.

In this case the court said: "The principal may have presented her" (the payee) "the note, signed in her absence, when she could have made no communication to the surety and could therefore have been guilty of neither misrepresentation nor concealment, and the general allegation of concealment does not negative the idea of her absence."—Ibid.

In such circumstances the creditor is under no obligation, legal or moral, to search for the surety and warn him of the danger of the step he is about to take. No case has gone so far as to require this to be done.—Wyethes v. Labouchere, 3 De Gex. & J., 609.

The creditor is not bound to inform the intended surety of matters affecting the credit of the debtor, or of any circumstances unconnected with the transaction in which he is about to engage. —Ibid.

It appears by the record in this case that the plaintiff was a corporation of the city of New York, that Voorhes was the agent of the company at Mobile, in the State of Alabama, and that the parties to the bond were all of that city.

The plea does not set forth any of the circumstances attending the execution and delivery of the bond. It does not aver that there was any misrepresentation, anything fraudulently kept back, or any opportunity to make disclosures on the part of the company, or any inquiry by the sureties, before the bond was delivered. Nor is it averred that the company was aware that the sureties were ignorant of the facts complained of. It is, perhaps, to be inferred from the plea that the fact was—as the record aside from the plea shows it to have been—that the bond was executed at Mobile and sent by Voorhes by mail to the company in New York. If this were so, the company upon receiving it was under no obligation to make any communication to the sureties. The validity of the bond could not depend upon their doing so. The company had a right to presume that the sureties knew all they desired to know, and were content to give the instrument without further information from any source. Under these circumstances it was too late after the breach occurred to set up this defence.

There is another objection to the plea. There was nothing fraudulent in the agreement. The obligation of the agent was simply to pay over the money of the company which he should receive. This the sureties guarantied that he would do. To do it was a matter of common honesty, not to do it was a fraud. The agreement of the agent to apply money belonging to him derived from any source in payment of a pre-existing debt to the company, had no such connection with what the sureties stipulated for as gave them a right to be informed on the subject, except in answer to enquiries they might have made. They made none, and there was no obligation on the part of the company to volunteer the disclosure.

On both these grounds the plea was bad, and the demurrer was properly sustained.

The judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES.

OCTOBER TERM, 1875.

198.—GAIUS WHITFIELD, Appellant, vs. THE UNITED STATES.

Appeal from the Court of Claims.

COTTON SOLD TO THE CONFEDERATE STATES—TITLE TO.

1. TITLE OF CONFEDERATE STATES IN COTTON.—That the Confederate States government could acquire title in cotton by purchase, and such cotton at the close of the war, passed to the United States.

2. SALE OF COTTON TO BE PAID IN CONFEDERATE BONDS.—In this case the appellant sold his cotton to the Confederacy, ond took their bonds in payment. He contributed directly to the means of prosecuting the rebellion. He thus knowingly devoted his cotton to the war, and his rights must follow its fortunes. He cannot recover in the courts of the United States, the purchase money due from the confederacy, upon the principle that a sale upon credit implies a guarranty of the solvency of the purchaser, until the payment is made.—ED. LEGAL NEWS.

Mr. Chief Justice WAITE delivered the opinion of the court.

During the war of the rebellion, Whitfield, a resident of the State of Alabama, being the owner of 177 bales of cotton raised by himself, sold it to the Confederate States government, agreeing to receive in payment the eight per cent. bonds of the Confederate States. In January, 1865, payment of the purchase price was made and accepted in bonds of the kind agreed upon, payable to bearer, and falling due in the years 1868, 1871, and 1880. Whitfield kept the bonds in his possession, and, at the trial of this case below, produced them in open court. The cotton was never taken away by the Confederate States authorities, but remained in the possession of Whitfield until September 1, 1865, when it was seized by the treasury agents of the United States, acting under color of the authority of the abandoned and captured property acts. After the seizure, 59 bales were restored to Whitfield, pursuant to an arrangement made with him, as compensation for putting the cotton in good order, and the remaining 118 bales were sent forward to New York, where they were sold by the cotton agent of the United States and the proceeds paid into the treasury. This suit was brought to recover these proceeds.

In U. S. v. Huckabee, 16 Wall., 414, we held that real property purchased by and conveyed to the Confederate States during the war passed to the United States at the restoration of peace, by capture, and we sustained the title of the United States thus acquired against a claim made by the vendors of the Confederate States, that the conveyance was obtained from them by duress. The same principle was recognized and acted upon in U. S. v. Titus, 21 Wall., 475.—We have thus decided that the Confederate States government could acquire title to real property by purchase, and it is not easy to see why a different rule should be applied to personal property. The ownership of that, even more than real property, was required for the operations of the Confederacy. Contracts of sale made in aid of the rebellion will not be enforced by the courts, but completed sales occupy a different position. As a general rule, the law leaves the parties to illegal contracts where it finds them, and affords relief to neither. A sale of personal property, when completed, transfers to the purchaser the title of the property sold.

Whitfield's sale in this case was not on credit, but for bonds when passed from hand to hand as money. The transaction in this respect was not different from a sale to the United States for any of their public securities payable at a future day. The sale was complete when the bonds were accepted in payment. The title then passed to the Confederate States without a formal delivery. From that time Whitfield ceased to be the owner of the cotton.

The claim, then, that he had the right to retain the possession of the cotton until the purchase-money was paid, because of the insolvency of the Confederate government, is not applicable to the facts established by the evidence, as the purchase money had been paid before the insolvency. But if this were otherwise, it is not easy to see how his claim, growing out of his illegal contract as it does, can be enforced against the United States in the Court of Claims. In Sprott v. U. S., 20 Wall., 463, it was decided that one owing allegiance to the government of the United States could not avail himself of the courts of the country to enforce a claim under a contract by which, for the sake of gain, he knowingly contributed to the "vital necessities of the rebellion." For that reason we refused to give effect to a purchase of cotton from the Confederate government. This case is not distinguishable from that in principle. Cotton, as we have often said, was, during the late war, as much hostile property as the military supplies and munitions of war it was used to obtain. When Whitfield, therefore, sold his cotton to the Confederacy and took their bonds in payment, he contributed directly to the means of prosecuting the rebellion. He says in his petition, it is true, that his sale was not made to aid the rebellion, but the purchase was clearly for that purpose and no other. This he could not but have known. Under such circumstances "he must be taken to intend the consequences of his voluntary act."—(Hanauer v. Doane, 12 Wall., 347.) By his sale he knowingly devoted his cotton to the war, and his rights must follow its fortunes. The courts of the country would not relieve him against one who held title by conveyance from the Confederate States and under that title had obtained possession. Neither would they interfere in behalf of a purchaser from the Confederate States to enforce possession under his sale. But when his possession has been lost by reason of his sale, no matter how, the courts will afford him no relief against the loss. Having by his acts entered the lists against his rightful government, he cannot, if he loses, ask it for protection against what he has voluntarily done. In this case, he seeks to enforce a right growing out of his contract of sale, which was tainted with the vice of the rebellion. It was a contract which could not have been enforced against him, and he is equally powerless under its provisions against others. He seeks, in effect, by this action to recover, in the courts of the United States, the purchase money due from the Confederate States, upon the principle that a sale upon credit implies a guaranty of the solvency of the purchaser until the payment is made. We have already seen that such is not his position here; but if it were, having lost his possession, he has no standing in court for relief. He is not the owner of the property, and his lien is not one the courts of the United States will enforce.

The judgment of the Court of Claims is affirmed.

Through the kindness of Jesse Holdom, of the Chicago bar, we have received the following opinion:

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

OPINION FILED JUNE 30, 1876.

425.—FRANCIS BINZ v. JAMES E. TYLER, ET AL.

Appeal from the Superior Court of Cook.

PLEADING—DECLARING ON INSTRUMENT IN HAEC VERBA—STATING LEGAL EFFECT.

Where an instrument set out in haec verba, and the pleader misstated its legal effect, held, that the instrument being before the court, its legal effect was to be determined by the court, and that determination could not be influenced by the subsequent allegation, of the pleader, as to its legal effect, which was mere matter of conclusion.

Where judgment was on the demurrer for want of plea, and appellant assigned for error, that the verdict was against the evidence, held, that appellant, by permitting judgment thus to be given, was so far out of court that he was entitled to cross-examine witness for the purpose of reducing the damages only; and it was not admissable for him to make a defence to the action. The demurrer admitted every material allegation in the declaration, and nothing was left to be inquired into, but the amount of damages sustained.

This was an action of assumpsit by appellees against appellant. The first count of the declaration is as follows:

For that whereas, the said plaintiffs heretofore, to wit: on the third day of September, A. D. 1873, at the city of Chicago to wit, at the county of Cook aforesaid, demised and leased, by a certain indenture of lease bearing date the day and year last aforesaid, to "The South Chicago Turn Verein of the city of Chicago," certain premises, with appurtenances thereunto, belonging and appertaining for a certain term of years, to wit: for the term of from the 3rd day of September, A. D. 1873, for and during and until the first day of May, A. D. 1879, at a rental at the rate of one thousand dollars per annum, until May first, A. D. 1874, and thereafter, until the full end and termination of said lease at the yearly rent of two thousand dollars, which said rent was to be paid on the first day of each and every month in equal portions and instalments in advance, a copy of which said indenture is hereunto attached and marked exhibit "A," and is hereby made a part and parcel of this, the first count in this declaration and which said indenture was on to wit: the day and year last aforesaid, at the county aforesaid, duly executed by the said plaintiffs and the said "The South Chicago Turn Verein of the city of Chicago," and that thereupon the said "The South Chicago Turn Verein of the city of Chicago," went into and used, held, occupied and enjoyed said premises from thence hitherto, and is still in the occupancy of the same, and also, on to wit: the day and year, and at the county aforesaid, in consideration of the renting and demising of the aforesaid premises, and the making and executing of the indenture of lease last aforesaid, so he the said plaintiffs made and executed, by the said defendant, entered into and made the following agreement in writing, upon the back of said indenture of lease, and then and there, on the day and year, and at the place last aforesaid, signed, sealed and delivered the said writing to the said plaintiffs, which said writing is in the words, letters and figures, following, viz:

"In consideration of one dollar to me in hand paid, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, I hereby guarantee to James E. Tyler, B. W. Phillips and Jacob Weil, their heirs, executors, administrators or assigns, the full payment of the sum or sums of money specified in the within lease, and also guarantee to said Tyler, Phillips and Weil, the prompt fulfillment of all the provisions, conditions and agreements therein mentioned, hereby binding myself, my heirs, executors, administrators and assigns."

(Signed.) F. BINZ. [SEAL.]

Witness, G. HEINRICE.

By which said writing the said defendant bound himself to pay the rent and fulfill and perform all and every of the covenants therein in said lease contained to be performed and fulfilled on the part and behalf of the lessees in said lease mentioned; that on to-wit: the first day of November, A. D., 1874, at, to-wit: Cook county aforesaid, a large sum of money became and was due, and payable to the said plaintiffs from the said "The South Chicago Turn Verein of the city of Chicago," by and under the terms of the said indenture of lease to them made as aforesaid, to-wit: the sum of one thousand one hundred sixty-six and 66 100 dollars of rent aforesaid in said lease reserved, to be by them paid as aforesaid, that the said rent has been by the said plaintiffs demanded of the said "The South Chicago Turn Verein of the city of Chicago," and was by it refused the payment of the said last mentioned sum of money, and thereafter and upon, to-wit: the day and year last aforesaid, at the county aforesaid, the said plaintiffs notified the said defendant of the non-payment of said rent by said "The South Chicago Turn Verein of the city of Chicago," and then and there requested and demanded payment of the said last mentioned sum of money so due to the plaintiffs, as aforesaid, in pursuance and accordance with the terms and conditions of his said writing and guaranty, so by him made and executed to the said plaintiffs as aforesaid, but, to pay the same sum of money due as aforesaid the said defendant then and there failed and refused so to do. Following is the consolidated common counts: The appellant demurred to the special count, and for cause of demurrer assigned. First, that the plaintiffs have declared upon an undertaking of the defendants as though it was an ordinary undertaking, and not a conditional one. Second, that it appears from the instrument declared on that the action is premature. Third, also, that the declaration is in many respects uncertain, informal and insufficient.

The court overruled the demurer, and appellant electing to abide by his demurrer by argument of parties it was referred to the court to assess appellees damages, and the court thereupon proceeded to assess the same at $1,166.66, upon which judgment was given, and this appeal was prayed and perfected. The errors assigned are,

1st. The court erred in overruling the demurrer to the appellee's declaration.

2d. The verdict was contrary to the evidence.

3d. The plaintiff's evidence showed that the right of action, if any existed, belonged to James Tyler alone, and not in connection with the other appellees.

Opinion by SCHOLFIELD, J.

It is objected that the declaration treats the instrument by which defendant's liability is charged as an original undertaking, whereas it is collateral, and should have been so declared on. It is stated as matter of conclusion of the pleaders, that the defendant, by the writing previously set forth in haec verba, bound himself to pay the rent and fulfil and perform all and every of the covenants therein in said lease contained, etc. But the instrument itself being before the court, its legal effect was to be determined by the court, and that determination could not be influenced by the subsequent allegation of the pleader as to its legal effect. This allegation was therefore surplusage only, which did not affect the preceding material allegations in the count.

It is also objected that the action was prematurely brought, that appellee could not sustain an action for the rent until the expiration of the lease, which the declaration shows had not occurred when the action was commenced.

This has no support in anything in the declaration. The lease therein described requires the payment of rent at the rate of two thousand dollars yearly, on the first day of each and every month, in equal portions and instalments; and we are aware of no principle which will prevent a recovery for any instalment remaining unpaid after it is due. To hold there could be no recovery for rent until the expiration of the term, would require us to make a new contract for the parties, entirely different from the one they have made for themselves.

The guaranty is as broad in its terms as is the lease. The words "the prompt fulfilment of all the provisions, conditions and agreements therein mentioned," we think should be held to embrace, as they literally import, every obligation imposed by the lease in the lessee; apart from this, however, the undertaking that full payment shall be made "of the sum or sums of money specified in the within lease," can, in our opinion, be reasonably construed in no other way than that payments shall be made as the sum or sums shall become due, as provided by the terms of the lease.

When it is said payment shall be made of a debt, in the absence of any expression to the contrary, the reasonable, and indeed necessary implication is, that this shall be when the debt is due.

The remaining objection, urged that the verdict was contrary to the evidence, cannot be considered.

The judgment was on the demurrer for default of plea. The defendant, by permitting judgment thus to be given, was so far out of court that he was entitled to cross-examine witness for the purpose of reducing the damages only; and it was not admissable for him to make a defence to the action.

The demurrer admitted every material allegation in the declaration, and nothing was left to be enquired into but the amount of damages sustained by the plaintiff. Morton v. Bailey et al., 1st Scam. 213. Cook v. Skelton, 20th Ill 107. The judgment is affirmed.

WE are under obligations to WALTER M. HOWLAND, of the Chicago bar, for the following opinion:

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

OPINION FILED JUNE 30, 1876.

No. 596.—CITY OF CHICAGO v. B. F. BROPHY.

Appeal from Cook.

LIABILITY OF CITY FOR DAMAGES FOR OBSTRUCTIONS IN STREETS.

In this case, the evidence sustains the verdict.

An obstruction in a public street, eighteen inches high, and sufficient to overturn a baker's wagon, carefully driven, is dangerous.

It is presumed that when a sewer is placed in a public street of a city, that it is done by the proper authority of the city.

If the city does such work, it is bound to know the condition in which the street is left—whether dangerous or otherwise.

It is not error to refuse duplicate instructions.

A verdict for $1,500 for a broken limb, with a possibility of a permanent injury, though large, is not so excessive as to justify a reversal.

Opinion by CRAIG, J.

This was an action brought by the appellee against the city of Chicago to recover for an injury received in the public street of the city, alleged to have been caused by an obstruction placed in the street by the employees of the city.

A trial was had before a jury, which resulted in a verdict in favor of appellee for $1,500. The court overruled a motion for a new trial, and rendered judgment on the verdict.

Three grounds are relied upon by appellant to reverse the judgment:

1st. That the verdict is against evidence.

2nd. That the court erred in giving appellees third instruction, and in refusing appellants instruction No. four.

3d. That the damages are excessive.

The accident occurred on the 20th day of December, 1872, resulting in the fracture of appellee's leg, and otherwise severely injuring him. About six weeks before the injury the city had placed a sewer in West Eighteenth street, and two or three days before the accident a catch basin had been placed at the corner of West Eighteenth street and Ruble street, which was connected by a branch sewer with the main sewer which was in the centre of the street.

The dirt taken from the excavation in constructing the branch sewer was not removed from the street, but it was filled above the sewer leaving a ridge extending from the catch basin to the centre of the street, from a foot to eighteen inches in height. This ridge, the evidence tends to show, could not be seen when the accident occurred, for the reason the street was covered with snow which was somewhat drifted.

Appellee, who was driving a baker's wagon in the usual course of his business, his team going in a walk, encountered the ridge of dirt, the wagon was turned over and fell upon him, breaking his leg and spraining his ankle. We see nothing in the evidence from which it can be said appellee failed to use ordinary care and caution in passing over the street; he had been engaged in driving a bakers wagon for several years, and seems to have been a cautious driver.

While he was familiar with the condition of that part of the street where the main sewer was constructed, and had passed over it frequently. As we understand the evidence, he did not know the condition of the street where the branch sewer was constructed, and had not had occasion to pass over it after it had been finished until the day of the accident. Appellee was not aware of its dangerous condition, and had no reason to suspect it was unsafe.

It was proven by several witnesses that the street, in the condition in which it was when the accident occurred, was unsafe and dangerous.

No witness was called to show or explain why the obstruction was left in the street.

It is not denied that it is a duty resting upon the city authorities to keep the public streets free from obstructions and in a safe condition for all who may have occasion to travel over them.

While the city had the undoubted right to construct the sewer in the street, yet in making the improvement, it had no right to leave piles of dirt upon the street in such a condition that it would be unsafe or dangerous for wagons to pass. It does not appear from the evidence, that it was necessary in making the improvement, to leave the ridge of dirt over the sewer that appears to have been done; but even if it was, it would be negligence on the part of the city to do so, unless guards were put up, or notice of some kind given to warn travelers of the dangerous condition of the street. Nothing of the kind was, however, done in this instance.

We are therefore satisfied that the evidence before the jury was sufficient to warrant the conclusion that appellee was in the exercise of due care, and that the accident was from the negligence of the city in failing to keep the street free from obstruction. The third instruction given for appellee to which exception was taken is as follows: If the jury believe, from the evidence in this case, that the injury complained of was caused by a dangerous pile of dirt or earth left in Eighteenth street by persons employed by the city authorities to place a sewer or catch basin in such street, then the jury are instructed that it is not necessary that the plaintiff, in order to recover in this suit, should prove that the city authorities had actual notice that such pile of dirt or earth was in said street.

It is said that there is no evidence that any dangerous pile of earth existed in the street. We do not so understand the evidence. Several of the witnesses testify to the dangerous condition of the street, and the proof shows the ridge of dirt eighteen inches high extending from the catch basin to the centre of the street. These facts, in connection with the additional one that appellee's wagon in passing over the obstruction was overturned, was sufficient to justify the instruction. It is also urged that there was no proof that the persons who did the work were employed by the city.

This objection is fully met by the decision of this court in city of Chicago v. Johnson, 53 Ill. 91, in which it was held that it is a reasonable presumption when such work is done within the limits of the city that it is done by the proper authorities of the city. Nor is the objection to the last clause of the instruction tenable. If the city caused the work to be done it was bound to take notice of the character of the work and the condition in which it was left, whether safe or dangerous. As to the fourth instruction of appellant, which the court refused, its substance was contained in appellant's third instruction given, and even if it contained a correct proposition, it was not error to refuse it as it has been often held by this court not to be error to refuse duplicate instructions.

This brings us to the last point relied upon by appellant, that the damages are excessive, while the verdict is large, and we would have been better satisfied had it been smaller, yet under all the evidence it is not so excessive as to justify a reversal.

It appears that the larger bone of the leg was broken about midway between the knee and ankle joint, and at the same time the ankle joint was sprained.

At the time of the trial, appellee had not entirely recovered from the injury received, and it was by no means certain that he ever would entirely recover.—Under these circumstances, we cannot disturb the verdict on the ground that it is excessive. The judgment will therefore be affirmed.

Judgment affirmed.

THROUGH the kindness of JOHN W. SHOWALTER, of the Chicago bar, we have received the following opinion:

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

OPINION FILED JUNE 30, 1876.

No. 241.—CHARLES W. ALLEN et al. v. JOHN WATT.

Appeal from Cook.

EFFECT OF BEING GARNISHEED IN A FOREIGN STATE.

1. Full faith and credit must be given in Illinois, to judicial proceedings in Ohio.

2. The fact that a debt has been sued for, or that a judgment has been rendered in such suit, does not prevent the defendant from being garnisheed by a creditor of the plaintiff—even in another State.

3. When such garnishment proceeding is in another State, the garnishee is not bound to disclose there the fact of the pendency of the suit, or of the judgment against him in this State, unless, by statute in the former State, such matter is made a defense in the mouth of a garnishee.

4. Such garnishment in a sister State may be pleaded to the action in this State; if the latter suit has proceeded to judgment, the defendant may protect himself by injunction.

5. Watt, being defendant at the suit of W. & P. in the Superior court, pleaded that, since the last continuance, Allen & Ellis, who were creditors of his, had paid part of the debt sued for under a garnishment proceeding brought by W. & P. in Ohio; held, that on an application by A. and E. to stop the levy of an execution issued by Watt against them, on a judgment for the same debt, in the Circuit Court, Watt is estopped to dispute the propriety and validity of the payment in Ohio and its operation as a discharge of his judgment in the Circuit court.

Opinion by BREESE, J.

The questions raised in this record arise out of the following facts: John Watt commenced an action of assumpsit in the Cook Circuit Court, on the 13th of January, 1873, against Charles W. Allen and Almond D. Ellis, wherein, on the 29th March, 1873, a judgment was rendered against them for the sum of five hundred and forty-seven 66-100 dollars, together with the costs. On March 31, the plaintiff in the judgment assigned the same to Carlisle Mason, who, on the third day of May thereafter, placed the assignment on file in the clerk's office, and caused the assignment to be noted on the record. On February 20, 1874, a firie facias was issued on this judgment, and came to the hands of T. M. Bradley, Sheriff, to be executed. On March 10, 1873, the firm of Worthington & Power, doing business in Cincinnati, Ohio, under that name and style, and creditors of John Watt and one Johnson, commenced their action by attachment in the Court of Common Pleas of Hamilton county, State of Ohio, against Watt and Johnson, and at the same time Allen and Ellis were summoned as garnishees, as debtors of Watt, and such proceedings were had, that on March 22, 1873, to save costs, as is alleged, they filed their answer to said garnishment wherein they acknowledged they were indebted to Watt at the time of the service of the summons upon them, in the sum five hundred and forty-five dollars and sixty-six cents.

Watt was brought into court by publication against him and Johnson, and on June 30, 1873, a judgment was rendered against them for the sum of $808 26, and then and there it was ordered Allen and Ellis to pay the amount of this indebtedness to Watt, being $545.66, to the clerk of the court within ten days thereafter. This amount they allege they paid at the time to Worthington and Power, by direction of the clerk of the court; and this amount they allege is the identical claim sued for by Watt, and for which he recovered the judgment above mentioned. On February 20, 1873, Worthington and Power brought their action of assumpsit in the Superior court of Cook county against Watt and Johnson, for the same cause the attachment proceedings were instituted by them in the Court of Common Pleas of Hamilton county. To this action, Watt and Johnson, at the March term, 1873, pleaded the general issue, and filed therewith the affidavit of Watt that they, Watt and Johnson, had a good defence to the action to the extent of $689.25.—At the July term following, the defendants, Watt and Johnson, filed a special plea, setting up the rendering of the judgment in the Court of Common Pleas of Hamilton county, Ohio, against them for the same cause of action, for $808 26, and another special plea coming in bar as to $545.66, then setting out these attachment proceedings—the garnishment of Allen and Ellis, and the answer admitting a debt due by them to Watt, of $545 66; that at the June term, 1873, of the Common Pleas Court, judgment was rendered against them for $808.26, and against Allen and Ellis for $545.66, in favor of Worthington and Powers, owning execution ordered against Allen and Ellis after ten days; that this judgment remains in full force, and that afterwards, in July, 1873, Allen and Ellis paid $545.66, pursuant to such order of court, and plead the same in bar of a recovery by Worthington and Power, to that extent, against them.

At the time of filing these special pleas, Watt filed an affidavit for a continuance, alleging as cause, that after the commencement of the suit the plaintiffs sued defendants for the same cause to the March term of the Court of Common Pleas of Hamilton county, Ohio, setting out briefly all those proceedings, and Allen and Ellis' answer to the garnishee proceedings—the recovery of the judgment against them, and against Allen aud Ellis; their information that Allen and Ellis had paid this judgment, alleging that this payment satisfied so much of plaintiff's claim sued for in this action then pending; that they can have the proof of this payment by the next term, wherefore a continuance is asked. A continuance was granted.

So far as the record informs us, this cause is still pending and undetermined in the Superior Court.

On Feburary 20, 1874, a writ of fieri facias issued on this judgment recovered by Watt and assigned to Mason, which came to the hands of T. M. Bradley sheriff, to be executed. Hence this bill of complaint and injunction by Allen and Ellis; and the question is, does the bill show any equities to justify relief against this judgment of the Cook Circuit Court?

The Circuit Court was of opinion it did not, and on the hearing dissolved the injunction and diminished the bill, and the complainants appeal.

After full consideration of the elaborate arguments submitted on both sides of this case, we are of opinion the decree of the Circuit Court should be reversed upon several grounds.

The Court of Common Pleas of Hamilton county, in the State of Ohio, in which these attachment proceedings were had, was, it is not denied, a court of competent jurisdiction of the subject matter, and acquired jurisdiction of the persons of appellants by service of process upon them, and the judgment of that court is entitled to full faith and credit in this State. This judgment, so rendered by a court of competent jurisdiction, has been paid and satisfied by appellants, and there is no justice in requiring them to pay it a second time. The fact that Watt had recovered a judgment against appellants made them no less his debtors when the garnishee process was served upon them; and we do not see in what respect it could have benefitted them had they set this up by plea in the Ohio court. The statute of that State is broad and comprehensive, and it makes the service upon the garnishee a lien upon the debt he owes the party defendant in the attachment. Chief Justice Kent said in Embree and Collins v. Hanna, 5 Johns, 100: That it was a settled and acknowledged principle in the English Courts, that whenever debt has been recovered of the debtors under the process of foreign attachment, the recovery is a protection in England to the garnishee against his original creditors, and he may plead it in bar.

The principle is distinctly recognized in Allen v. Dunday, 3 Dunford & East, 125. The Supreme court of Pennsylvania said, in McCarty v. Melvin, 2 Dallas 277, on general principles of justice and reason it would be difficult to satisfy the mind why money should not be attached in the hands of debtors, as well after as before the person to whom it is due has sued for it.

Surely it can make no difference if judgment is rendered in the suit, for as we have said, the debt remains. though in another form, and public policy fairly warrants it.

The attaching creditors having acquired a lien on this debt due by appellants prior to the alleged assignment of the judgment to Mason, he must be held to have taken the assignment subject to all the defences the judgment debtors might be able to establish against its payment, and no defence can be more available than payment under legal proceedings in a court of competent jurisdiction.

Watt, in his defence to the action brought against him and Johnson in the Superior court did not then claim or pretend this judgment had been assigned by him, but on the contrary he claimed the benefit of the proceedings against appellants as garnishees, and of the payment made by them on the order of the court therein, and this is another reason why the decree should be reversed. Watt is estopped, by taking advantage of this payment by appellants, as he did in this plea and affidavit for continuance. Had this judgment against appellants been in fact assigned, it is strange Watt should have claimed the benefit of the debt on which it was based, as a payment by him or his firm to the attaching creditors.

We have said this recovery and payment in the attachment proceedings might be pleaded in bar to a recovery in the action, but that action had proceeded to judgment, and no plea could be introduced. No other remedy could be pursued, than by injunction to stay the execution of the judgment. Of this appellants have availed and we are of opinion they were well entitled to the writ—that there is strong equity in their bill, and it should not have been dismissed on the hearing.

The claim that this recovery and payment by appellants in the attachment proceedings was collusive and colorable only, we do not think is sustained by the proofs, and we can see no injustice in being required to pay their debt to the creditors of Watt, rather than to Watt himself.

From the best consideration we can give this cause we are of opinion the decree should be reversed and the cause remanded.

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

OPINION FILED JUNE 30, 1876.

ALEXANDER E. GUILD. JR., v. THE CITY OF CHICAGO.

Appeal from the Superior Court of Cook Co.

TITLE TO ACT—SPECIAL ASSESSMENTS—ARTICLE 9 OF GENERAL LAWS.

1. TITLE TO ACT.—That the subject of the section of the act in question is sufficiently expressed in the title of the act.
2. IF LAW APPLY TO ONLY ONE CITY.—If the section of the law had been made to apply to some one city or village alone, there would have been force in the objection that it was a local or special law, and it would then have been a local and special law, changing or amending the charter of a city or village, but this provision is not one of that character. It is a general provision, alike applicable to, and affecting all cities and villages, and not within the provisions of this constitutional inhibition.
3. SPECIAL ASSESSMENTS—CONTIGUOUS PROPERTY.—That the word contiguous, as used in this constitutional provision, applies to special assessment as well as to special taxation, and that the special assessment therein contemplated is one upon contiguous property. But where the ordinance directs it to be levied upon the property to be benefited by the improvement, etc., without limitation to contiguous property, it would not for that reason be void if the assessment was, in fact, made upon contiguous property.
4. ARTICLE IX.—The court states the effect of a city adopting Article IX. of the General Law.—ED. LEGAL NEWS.

SHELDON, J.

This is an appeal from an order of confirmation by the Superior court of Cook county, of a special assessment which had been made by commissioners for the public improvement of opening and extending Dearborn street, in the city of Chicago, from Jackson street to Fourteenth street.

The assessment proceedings were had under the provisions of article 9 of an act of the General Assembly of this State entitled, "An act to provide for the incorporation of cities and villages," approved April 10, 1872, Laws, 1871-2, p. 218.

Section 54 of said article provides that "any city or incorporated town or village may if it shall so determine by ordinance, adopt the provisions of this article without adopting the whole of this act, and where it shall have so adopted this article, it shall have the right to take all proceedings in this article provided for, and have the benefit of all the provisions hereof." The common council of the city of Chicago adopted this article by ordinance passed September 2, 1872.

The first objection taken to this assessment is that the ordinance of adoption of this article is null and void, for the reason that said section 54, which provides for such adoption of the article is unconstitutional, because:

1. The subject of that section is not expressed in the title of the act, and so the section is in violation of that provision of the constitution that "no act hereafter passed shall embrace more than one subject, and that shall be expressed in the title."

The argument is that the title of the act is for the incorporation of cities and villages—the organization of municipalities—but that section 54 does not respect the organization of any municipality, but the amendment only of existing charters, which is a different subject. The act provides not only that existing cities and incorporated towns may adopt this 9th article of the act, but that they may become incorporated under the act. The argument employed would lead to the extent that the whole act is unconstitutional so far as it relates to existing cities and incorporated towns, it being amendatory of prior laws applicable to them. By the adoption of the entire act any existing city or incorporated town would become wholly incorporated under the act. By the adoption of the 54th section alone it might be regarded as incorporating to that extent under the act. Anything legitimately appertaining to the incorporation of cities and villages we regard as germane to the subject expressed in the title, and that this section does pertain to such purpose. See The People v. Wright, 70 Ill., 388.

2. Again said section 54 is claimed to be unconstitutional for the reason that the Legislature therein delegate the power of legislation to cities, towns and villages, which by the constitution it alone can exercise. We regard this question as settled in this State by former decisions of this court. In the People v. Reynolds, 5 Gilm, 12; and The People v. Salamon, 51 Ill., 55, the validity of laws was sustained, which depended for their going into effect upon the result of a majority of the votes of the people of the localities to be affected by the laws. It was there said that a law may depend upon a future event or contingency for its taking effect, and that contingency may arise from the voluntary act of others; that the contingency may as well be the result of the vote of the people of the locality to be affected by the law as any other. This article 9 alone, and by itself disjoined from the rest of the acts in order to have operation in any city, incorporated town or village depended for its going into effect upon the future event or contingency of the passage of an ordinance for its adoption. The contingency might as well be the adoption of the article by an ordinance as the adoption of it by a vote of the people. Under the principle of those decisions this 54th section does not conflict with the constitution in this respect claimed.

3. A further reason why section 54 is said to be unconstitutional is, that the Legislature therein attempt to exercise a power which by the constitution it is inhibited from exercising, viz: to change, extend or amend an existing charter.

The constitutional provision relied upon in this behalf is "The General Assembly shall not pass local or special laws * * * * incorporating cities, towns or villages, or changing or amending the charter of any city or village." Had the section been made to apply to some one city or village alone there would have been force in the objection. It would then have been a local and special law changing or amending the charter of a city or village. But this provision is not one of that character.—It is a general provision alike applicable to and equally affecting all cities and villages, and not within the provisions of this constitutional inhibition.—The People v. Wright, supra.

It is objected that the ordinance providing for this improvement is void, as it provides for the exercise of the taxing power in another and different manner from that prescribed by law.

Section 9 of article 9 of the constitution provides, "The General Assembly may vest the corporate authorities of cities, towns and villages with power to make local improvements by special assessment, or by special taxation of contiguous property, or otherwise."

Section 1 of article 9 of the act in question provides, "The corporate authorities of cities and villages are hereby vested with power to make local improvements by special assessment, or by special taxation, or both, of contiguous property or general taxation, or otherwise, as they shall by ordinance prescribe."

The ordinance directing the improvement provides: That said improvement shall be made and the cost thereof paid for by a special assessment to be levied upon the property benefited thereby, to the amount that the same may be legally assessed therefor, and the remainder of such cost to be paid by general taxation.

The point of the objection is that the law conferring the power to make local improvements by special assessments, limits its exercise to contiguous property, and that the ordinance entirely disregards this limitation.

There are other portions of this section 9, or article 9, which seem to contemplate that the assessment is to be made upon such property as may be specially benefited, without regard to whether it be contiguous or not. The law in this respect should receive a construction to make it conform to the constitution.

It is contended upon the part of appellant that the constitutional provision that corporate authorities may be vested with power "to make local improvements by special assessments or by special taxation of contiguous property or otherwise," confines the subject of special assessment to contiguous property—that the word "contiguous" here relates as well to special assessment as to special taxation, so that both special taxation and special assessment must be upon contiguous property. It is insisted on the other hand that the word "contiguous" does not apply to special assessment, but only to special taxation, so that it is only special taxation which is to be upon contiguous property, leaving the subject of special assessment unrestricted. That as before the adoption of the present constitution a valid special assessment had been recognized and defined by decisions of this court as an assessment upon all property specially benefited by the improvement, not more than the benefits conferred, and in proportion to benefits without any limitation to contiguous property, the constitution should be understood as having used the words "special assessment" in the same sense. After a full consideration of the respective arguments upon the question, we arrive at the conclusion, that the word "contiguous," as used in this constitutional provision, applies to special assessment as well as to special taxation, and that the special assessment therein contemplated, is one upon contiguous property. But although then it is to be regarded as the meaning of the constitution and statute, that the special assessment is to be upon contiguous property and the ordinance directs it to be levied upon the property to be benefited by the improvement, etc., without limitation to contiguous property. The ordinance would not for that reason be void. If the assessment was in fact made upon contiguous property it should be upheld, notwithstanding the general terms of the ordinance.

A point is made that the constitution does not confer the power to authorize local improvements to be made by "general taxation," and that the ordinance for the improvement, in so far as it provides that any part of the cost shall be paid by general taxation, is void. Were that even so, we fail to see the force of the objection as bearing upon the question here involved, which is not one respecting the imposition of any general tax, but a special assessment solely and the point is dismissed without further notice.

It is further objected that the assessment roll, as returned by the commissioners making the assessment, is defective in the respect that there is no map accompanying the same as by law required.

Section 25 of article 9 of the act as originally passed did require the commissioners to make a map showing the RELEASE OF SURETY ON BOND.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States, by SWAYNE, J., as to what will operate to release the surety sureties on a bond.

COTTON SOLD TO THE CONFEDERATE GOVERNMENT.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States by WAITE, C. J., holding that the Confederate government could acquire cotton by purchase, and the title in such cotton capture, during the war, passed to the United States; and that a party who sold cotton to the Confederate government, and took his pay in Confederate bonds, he keeping possession of the cotton until it was taken by the treasury agents of the United States, in September, 1865, had no claim on the government of the United States or the cotton, which he could enforce in the court of claims.

PLEADING—SETTING FORTH INSTRUMENT.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of this State by SCHOLFIELD, J., holding that where an instrument is set out in haec verba and the pleader misstates its legal effect, that the instrument being before the court, its legal effect is to be determined by the court, and that determination cannot be influenced by the subsequent allegation of the pleader as to its effect, which was mere matter of conclusion.

LIABILITY OF CITY FOR CONDITION OF STREETS.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of Illinois by CRAIG, J., as to the liability of a city for damages, for an injury caused by the obstruction of its streets.

GARNISHEE IN FOREIGN STATE.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of this State, by BREESE, J., as to the effect of being garnisheed in a foreign state.

SPECIAL ASSESSMENTS — CONTIGUOUS PROPERTY—ARTICLE IX.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of this State, by SHELDON, J., holding that the word "contiguous," as used in the provision of the constitution under consideration, applies to special assessment as well as to special taxation, and that the special assessment therein contemplated is one upon contiguous property, but, where the ordinance directs it to be levied upon the property to be benefited by the improvement, without limitation to contiguous property, it would not for that reason be void, if the assessment was in fact made upon contiguous property. The court states the effect of a city adopting Article IX., of the general law, and what is to be regarded as a general law.

LAND TAKEN FOR RAILROAD — DAMAGES.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, by SHARSWOOD, J., holding that the measure of damages for land taken by a railroad is the difference between the market value of the property before and after the construction of the road, so far as that difference was caused by the construction; that the market value of land is not a question of science and skill, upon which only an expert can give an opinion.

CHEAP POSTAGE.

The present congress has done a good thing for the public in changing the rates on third class matter so as to allow books, printed matter, etc., to go through the mails at one-half the former rates. This will enable lawyers and others in New Mexico, or any of the States or Territories of the Union, to receive their books, blanks, letter-heads and envelopes, with card printed thereon, from any of the cities of the Union, by prepaying the postage thereon at the rate of eight cents per pound. This change in the law will work a great change in the book and stationery trade in the country. The following is that part of the law which relates to the payment of postage on third-class matter. We are indebted to Hon. W. M. Springer for an official copy of the act as it passed Congress:

SEC. 15. That transient newspapers and magazines, regular publications designed primarily for advertising purposes, or for free circulation, or for circulation at nominal rates, and all printed matter of the third class, except unsealed circulars, shall be admitted to and be transmitted in the mails at the rate of one cent for every two ounces or fractional part thereof, and one cent for each two additional ounces or fractional part thereof, and the sender of any article of the third class of mail-matter may write his or her name or address therein, or on the outside thereof, with the word "from" above or preceding the same, or may write briefly or print on any package the number and names of the articles enclosed. Publishers of newspapers and periodicals may print on the wrappers of newspapers or magazines sent from the office of publication to regular subscribers the time to which subscription therefor has been paid. And addresses upon postal cards and unsealed circulars may be either written, printed or affixed thereto, at the option of the sender.

SEC. 16. That all acts or parts of acts in conflict with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

REPORTS OF CASES ARGUED AND DETERMINED IN THE SUPREME COURT OF THE STATE OF KANSAS, by W. C. Webb, Reporter, Vol. XIV., containing cases decided at the July term, 1874, and January term, 1875, Topeka, Kansas. Geo. W Martin, Kansas Publishing House, 1876.

The manner in which this volume is brought out is creditable to the printer and the reporter. There are quite a number of opinions of interest contained in it. In Morris v. German, p. 221, it is held that on the foreclosure of a mortgage containing a stipulation to pay reasonable attorney fees, in case of foreclosure, it is error for the court without the hearing of any evidence, upon simply its own knowledge, to tax the amount of such fees. In Clark v. Spencer, p. 399, it is held that an agreement to withdraw the plea of usury is against public policy and cannot be sustained.

In forty-one table talks Uncle Toby treats a large number of subjects of general interest, and his healthy, honest, outspoken manner of dealing with these questions is worth listening to. We do not agree with him in all his convictions and opinions, but he is tolerant of free thought, and we shall not have any controversy with him. Indeed, Uncle Toby keeps so well up with true progress that a little encouragement would make him a first-rate reformer. We shall hope to hear from him again. Obituary.

The mails bring us the tidings of the decease at Geneva, Switzerland, on the 12th instant, of Joseph I. Taylor, Esq., a prominent member of the Bar of this State, many years a resident at Princeton, Bureau County. Mr. Taylor had but recently taken his family to Europe for a sojourn of some duration, and was himself about to return to Princeton to attend at the August term of Judge Leland's Court, when he was attacked by what has proved a fatal illness. Those who know Mr. Taylor and have witnessed his professional career in his adopted State during a period of over twenty-five years, describe him as an upright and faithful counsellor, a zealous and popular advocate, and an attorney whose honesty in matters of pecuniary trust had become proverbial among the people of his county. We are sure that his family, left as strangers in a strange land, will have the sincerest sympathy of all who hear of their sudden bereavement.

A VERY singular decision has just been given by the French court of appeals at Rouen in the case of the steamer Amerique, of the French Trans-Atlantic Co.'s line. This vessel, it will be remembered, was abandoned on the high seas by her commander, Capt. Roussan, and afterward picked up by a couple of English steamers, and carried safely into an English port.

The court of appeals has decided that the steamer Amerique was lost, not through any defect in her construction or equipment, nor yet through stress of weather, but simply "through the fault of the captain and crew, through bad handling and through an inadequate acquaintance with her steam engines and the working of her pumps." The court has been obliged to recognize the validity of a clause in the company's bills of lading, which frees the company from responsibility in case of accidents resulting from any fault of the captain; but it holds the insurance companies liable, as these companies insure freighters against risk arising out of the misconduct or barratry of the master of the vessel.

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

ABSTRACT OF OPINIONS FILED AT SPRINGFIELD, JUNE 30TH, 1876.

135.—Catlin Preston impleaded, etc. v. Joseph M. Williams et al.—Appeal from Clark.—Opinion by CRAIG, J., affirming. [SCHOLFIELD, J., not taking part in the decision.]

CORRECTION OF MISTAKE IN A DEED—RULE AS TO VOLUNTARY CONVEYANCE—DEED CONSTRUED AS TO ITS BEING A VOLUNTARY CONVEYANCE—NOTICE OF PRIOR CONVEYANCE TO A SUBSEQUENT PURCHASER.

STATEMENT.—Bill in equity to correct mistake in the description of premises in a deed.

It was contended that the deed was a mere voluntary conveyance by Peter G. Cooper, to his two children. The mother had obtained a divorce from Cooper, and the custody of the children was assigned to her, and an allowance of an annual payment of alimony during her life. He proposed to give her a gross sum, in full discharge of the decree of alimony, and she accepted it and received this deed to the children, in full satisfaction. Held,

1. That, although it is a rule that equity will not decree the specific execution of a contract unless the contract is based upon a fair and valuable consideration; and, on the same principle, will not rectify a mistake in a voluntary contract without consideration, as against the party who executed the instrument, yet, in such a case as this at bar, the grantees are not to be considered mere volunteers; since the grantor deeded the land in discharge of a valid obligation resting upon him, and the mother had the right to have the deed made to the children instead of herself.

2. Appellant having had notice of this prior conveyance when he accepted his deed from Cooper, for these same premises, does not occupy the position of an innocent purchaser, and is not entitled to protection. However defective the prior deed to the children might be, a court of equity will not permit him to profit by the mistake therein, he having had notice of it before taking his own conveyance.

138.—Almon B. Ives v. Walter Vanscoyoc.—Error to McLean.—Opinion by SCHOLFIELD, J., reversing and remanding.

WHAT BILL OF EXCEPTIONS MUST SHOW AS TO INSTRUCTIONS—PARTNERSHIP ASSETS IN GARNISHMENT PROCEEDINGS—MISTAKE IN PARTNERSHIP SETTLEMENTS NOT TO BE RECTIFIED BY A JURY IN GARNISHMENT.

STATEMENT.—This case turned on the refusal of instructions asked by appellant. In the Supreme court it was maintained that as the bill of exceptions did not contain all the instructions given on either side, as well as those refused, the court could not decide thereon. In regard to this it was, Held,

That where it does not appear from the bill of exceptions that there were any instructions given, there is nothing upon which to base a presumption that any were given comprising the substance of those refused—although, where it appears, from the bill of exceptions, that some were given and others refused, and only the latter are set out, non constat, but that those actually given comprised the substance of those refused, so that the court cannot say the refusal was error.

As to the instructions refused, the court Held,

That it is proper to instruct a jury that in an action of garnishment, an unsettled partnership account cannot be considered by them; and, also, that if a settlement were made, but there were mistakes therein, the jury could not correct the mistakes.

139.—The Governor etc., for use, etc. v. Levi A. Dodd et al.—Appeal from Ford.—Opinion by WALKER, J., reversing and remanding.

NON-FEASANCE OF CLERK OF CIRCUIT COURT—CONSTRUCTION OF OFFICIAL BOND—LIABILITY THEREON.

STATEMENT.—Suit on appellee's official bond, as clerk of the Circuit court, for a debt lost, as was claimed, in consequence of his failing to enter the amount of a judgment recovered against the defendant in the suit. An execution was issued, and was levied upon a large amount of personal property, but the property was taken from the sheriff, in consequence of the informality of entering the judgment.

The Supreme court Held,

1. That, where a mistake of this kind causes loss, the clerk and his sureties are liable on his bond—the statute requiring the bond to be conditioned for the faithful performance of the duties of his office, and not merely that the clerk shall not wilfully violate his duties or be guilty of malfeasance. The obligation can only be met by faithfully performing those duties, so that they are liable for his non-feasance, as well as for mis-feasance or mal-feasance.

2. It is the duty of clerks of courts of record, to enter all the orders, judgments and decrees as soon as practicable; failing in which they are liable on their bonds. In regard to the principle of liability, there is no difference between the clerk and a sheriff, or constable.

142.—Dunfee R. Wilson et al. v. Elizabeth H. Turner.—Appeal from Champaign.— Opinion by SCOTT, CH. J., affirming.

NOTE GIVEN IN ANOTHER THAN THE REAL NAME—AVERMENT THEREON.

STATEMENT.—The declaration was on a promissory note, containing one count, which averred that the note sued on was given to the plaintiff, (appellee) as "Lizia H. Turner." Pleas were entered of non-assumpsit, and set off. Held,

1. That as one name and the middle initial were given correctly, a court will presume that the word "Lizia" is a contraction of Elizabeth — the appellee's name.

2. That the pleas virtually admitted that the note was given to the plaintiff by that name, and the note, as there was no variance between it and the declaration, might be properly read in evidence.

145.—Joseph Edgington, Administrator, etc., v. Henry C. Hefner, et al.—Appeal from Ford.—Opinion by BREESE, J., reversing and remanding.

ACCORD AND SATISFACTION UNDER MORTGAGE CLAIM — VARIOUS REMEDIES OF MORTGAGEE—PROMISE OF RELEASE MUST HAVE A CONSIDERATION.

STATEMENT.—Appellant's intestate held a mortgage on land in Iowa, executed by appellees. Appellees sold portions of the land, the mortgagee releasing the mortgage as to the portions sold, when the sales were made—supposing the remainder would be sufficient security, and desiring to accommodate the Hefners. In this action, they set up such release, as operating in the way of an accord and satisfaction, and so discharging the notes, pro tanto. Held,

1. That there was no such effect following upon such releases, nor would there have been, if the whole mortgage had been abandoned. For a mortgagee has several concurrent remedies, although he can obtain but one satisfaction. He needs not look to the land mortgage, for his debt; but he can proceed at once on the note thus secured, and subject the debtor's general property to its payment; or he may bring ejectment on condition broken; or make a peaceable entry—or, if he prefer, he may have in equity a strict foreclosure, or foreclosure and sale.

2. If even there had been a promise that these notes should be paid by the releases, the promise could not be enforced, as it would be without consideration.

146.—Gustave Sandberg v. Peter Papineau.—Appeal from Ford.—Opinion by WALKER, J., affirming.

MONEY PAID ON CONDITIONAL GARNISHEE JUDGMENT — CREDITING ON GENERAL JUDGMENT—GENERAL PRINCIPLES AS TO THE POWER OF COURTS TO ORDER CREDITS.

STATEMENT.—The court ordered to be credited upon a judgment against appellant the amount paid on a conditional garnishee judgment by appellee, under a supposition that he was legally bound to pay it. Held,

1. That a court has power, in all cases, to compel credits on judgments or executions, where it would be illegal, or inequitable, to proceed to collect the amount claimed. A court of justice will never permit a plaintiff, simply because he has acquired an unjust advantage by obtaining an execution, to retain and enforce it.

2. However, the payment of a conditional judgment by a garnishee is at his peril, since should the conditional judgment not be made absolute, he would be liable afterwards to pay the debt to his own creditor—the defendant in the original suit.

147.—Joshua M. Clevinger v. John F. Curry et al.—Appeal from Champai n.—Opinion by SHELDON, J., reversing.

IMPEACHMENT OF WITNESSES—CREDIBILITY —ASSUMING INSTRUCTIONS.

STATEMENT.—Berry, a party, was impeached as a witness in his own case. Afterwards, this instruction was given:

"The court instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence that the reputation of Berry is, in any manner, impeached for truth and veracity, his credit as a witness should be restored in matters where he is corroborated by the unimpeached statement of the other credible witness." Held,

1. That this instruction was wholly wrong (1), In that it assumed that there were other credible witnesses who corroborated the impeached witness in some matters; and that their statements were unimpeached. (2), In that it declared, in such matters, the witness' credit should be restored, so far as corroborating testimony was adduced. (3), In that it took the credibility of the witnesses, at least, in part, from the consideration of the jury to whose province it peculiarly belongs.

2. There is no artificial rule of belief to control the minds of a jury. And a court cannot properly instruct whom to believe or disbelieve.

MUNICIPAL ORDINANCE AS TO SHADE TREES.

Held, 1. That a municipal corporation can pass and enforce an ordinance forbidding the hitching of horses to shade trees, or fences, upon any street; or upon private premises.

2. Where one plants out trees, by permission, in front of his own lot, he has only the same interest therein that other citizens have; and has no title or control therein as against the public, and he is, therefore, liable to the same restrictions and prohibitions and regulations, that others are.

SUIT ON BOND OF J. P. — TIME LIMITED THEREON BY STATUTE—DEMURRER.

STATEMENT.—Suit on a bond of a J. P. for money collected and not paid over. A demurrer to the declaration was sustained. The declaration showed on its face that the suit was brought more than five years after the expiration of the term of office; which the statute in force when the bond was executed forbade. It was objected that this being a statute of limitations, in effect, it therefore must be pleaded, and could not be availed of by demurrer. Held,

1. That, although in an action on a penal statute, a statute of limitations must be pleaded, yet the statute under which the bond was executed, declared that the bond should have no force after five years, and was not a statute of limitation merely.

2. Nor does the provision of the statute that the bond shall continue until all the business the justice is required to perform shall be done, and the suit for the mere payment of the money, is not such unfinished business as the statute contemplates. Whenever the money was collected, it was the duty of the justice to pay it over; and if he failed, his sureties were immediately liable for the breach, and if sued for within the time prescribed by the statute, the liability could be enforced.

151.—The Board of Supervisors of Logan County v. The City of Lincoln.— Appeal from Logan County.—Opinion by SCOTT, Ch. J., affirming.

PROPORTIONING TAXES BETWEEN COUNTY AND CITY—LIMITATIONS—ESTOPPEL AS TO MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS.

STATEMENT.—Suit by the city to recover amount due from the county, under its charter providing as follows: "That an accurate account shall be kept of all expenditures made for county purposes, in which shall be charged all expenditures for county purposes, except for the making and repairing of roads and highways, and the building and repairing of bridges in the county, with the city, ratably to the county and the city of Lincoln, in proportion to the taxes collected for county purposes within the city, and paid into the county treasury by each respectively. And the surplus of all such taxes shall be divided between the city and the county, in proportion to the amount of taxes collected for county purposes within the city, and in the county, without the city, and paid into the county treasury by each respectively."

The declaration contained only the common counts; and the pleas were the general issue, and statute of limitations. Held, 1. That it was within the power of the Legislature to pass a statute authorizing such ratable division.

2. If not paid the statute of limitations would not run against it, because it was in the nature of a trust fund, held by the county for the city.

3. Neither could the doctrine of estoppel in pais apply. The non-action of city officers, even for an unreasonable length of time, can not cut off the rights of the corporation. Before the doctrine of estoppel can be invoked, there must be some positive acts by the municipal officers which may have induced the action of the adverse party, when it would be inequitable to permit the corporation to stultify itself by retracting what its officers had done.

SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE OF A PAROL CONTRACT FOR CONVEYANCE OF LAND.

Trustees of Schools, T. 24 v. Trustees of Schools, T. 25.—Appeal from McLean. —Opinion by WALKER, J., affirming.

MONEY BELONGING TO A SCHOOL TOWNSHIP HELD BY ANOTHER.

STATEMENT.—Appellants held certain moneys for appellees, until appellees were organized. But, without claiming the funds to be their own, they mixed them with their own, and loaned them and treated them as their own, and even when a schedule was presented from T. 25 to the appellants, they refused to pay it. And although they declared they would pay over the funds if the county board should so order, yet when the county board did so order they refused. The supreme court animadverts very severely upon appellees' conduct; and in regard to their excuse that they desired to know that they should be protected in paying over the funds, remarked, that the decree of the court below would have been ample protection; and yet they had appealed from the judgment; and that it was their duty to pay over the money whenever 25 became a legal school township, it being previously only a half township by joining with the north half lying in Livingston county.

STATEMENT.—Action on the case for the malicious burning of a house. Judgment for $800, the full value of the house; in which the mother had a dower interest. Held,

1. That in such an action, a preponderance of evidence is sufficient; and it may be circumstantial. There is no need that it be direct and positive.

2. Prior statements and acts of the defendant, are competent evidence therein.

3. The jury, in assessing damages, are not confined to merely compensatory damages, because the act was malicious; and, therefore, may properly be visited with punitive damages.

PARTIES IN FORECLOSURE SUIT FOR PURCHASE MONEY—AVERMENTS AS TO PARTY CORPORATION—WHAT MAY BE ASSIGNED AS ERROR.

STATEMENT.—Suit in chancery against John C. Short, P. & D. R. R. Co., and New York Trust and Loan Co., to foreclose a mortgage given by Short, for the purchase money of land.

It was assigned as error that the court overruled a demurrer to the bill; made, it seems, on the ground that the bill did not aver that the Trust and Loan Company (which did not join in error), was a corporation; also, that Short's wife should have been made a party; also, that the affidavit of non-residence of the Trust and Loan Co., and the publication notice were defective. Held,

1. That, as the Trust and Loan Co. was only brought in because of an interest acquired after the execution of the mortgage, and was, therefore, a proper party, it was not necessary to aver that it was a corporation; whether it possessed corporate powers, or, if so, what was the extent of those powers, was a question of no importance, in a proceeding of this character.

2. Where a mortgage is given for purchase money, the wife of the mortgagor needs not be a party to a suit for foreclosure.

3. Whether the Trust and Loan Co. had sufficient notice by publication, or not, does not concern these plaintiffs in error, and they cannot complain of any defect therein. A party can only complain of an error affecting his own rights.

160.—Samuel A. Buckmaster v. James Gowan.—Appeal from Clark.—Opinion by DICKEY, J., affirming. [SCHOLFIELD, J., having been of counsel, took no part.]

PARTNERSHIP AGREEMENTS ONLY ENFORCIBLE INEQUITY.

STATEMENT.—Action of assumpsit by appellant against appellee. Demurrer to the declaration sustained by the court under these facts:

Gowan, Buckmaster and Patterson agreed to enter into a partnership in performing a construction contract, to be secured with a railroad company—the latter two to do the work; the former to furnish necessary money for carrying on the work—the final profits to be equally divided.

The contract was afterwards obtained, the work in part accomplished, but not completed because of Buckmaster's failure to furnish money, appellant claiming to have laid out $1,000 of his own money, and alleging a loss in prospective profits of $50,000.

Held, that the demurrer was properly sustained since the breach was not that of a promise to become a partner; but the partnership was actually formed, and the loss occurred from Gowan's failure as a member of the firm to contribute to the capital stock; so that the wrong can only be ascertained by a final settlement of the affairs of the firm, which can be had only in a court of equity, and not by an action at law.

ANTE-NUPTIAL CONTRACTS IN LIEU OF DOWER—EFFECTS OF DIVORCE THEREON.

STATEMENT.—These parties entered into an ante-nuptial agreement, by which the wife was to have at the husband's death, should she survive him, $2,000, in lieu of all dower claims. They were married, and, after two years she deserted him without any apparent cause. He procured a divorce thereon, and afterwards died—she surviving him. She brought in her claim on the ante-nuptial contract, on which the court in decreeing divorce had not passed. The claim was disallowed in the county court, and then on appeal in the circuit court. The supreme court Held,

1. Although, in this case the ante-nuptial contract does not strictly fall within the statutory definition of a jointure, yet it is in the nature of a jointure, being expressly in lieu of dower.

2. As the statute declares that a divorce for the fault of the wife destroys her claim for dower, so this ante-nuptial contract must fall under the same rule, since it was in lieu of dower.

3. The contract was based upon the assumption that, she surviving would be left his widow, which implied condition was never fulfilled, as she never was his widow, and, therefore, had no claim to the $2,000.

CONTRACT BY LETTER—ENTIRE CONTRACT WITH STATED PAYMENTS DURING THE TIME OF SERVICE—LIABILITY FOR DISCHARGING EMPLOYED WITHOUT FAULT.

STATEMENT.—Appellant sent a letter to appellee, proposing to give him work through the winter, at ten dollars per week. Appellee accepted, but was discharged without fault, long before the expiration of the time. Failing to secure other employment, he brought suit for damages. Held,

1. That the proposal and acceptance by letter constituted a valid contract; the terms of which was work through the winter at ten dollars per week.

2. That the contract was an entirety, notwithstanding the payment was to be weekly; and the appellant is justly liable to appellee for the damages the latter sustained by his discharge without fault.

CONCURRENT POSSESSORY REMEDIES—WRITS OF ASSISTANCE ISSUED IN VACATION—REQUISITES OF SUCH WRITS.

STATEMENT.—After foreclosure and sale of mortgaged premises, the chancellor, on application of the purchaser, made an order, in vacation, that one who entered into possession of the premises after the sale under the mortgagor by conveyance of quit claim, should deliver up the possession. Also proceedings were instituted before a justice of the peace, in action of forcible entry and detainer, to recover the possession. It was objected that this action of forcible entry and detainer barred the issuance of a writ of assistance, and that such order must be made in term time, and not in vacation; and must be preceded by an injunction to deliver up the possession. Held,

1. That the issuance of a writ of assistance, and the action of forcible entry and detainer, were concurrent remedies; and either, or both, might proceed until a satisfaction was had—which would then bar further proceedings.

2. The subsequent action at law could not oust the equity jurisdiction previously acquired.

3. Issuing an order for a writ of assistance is not the instituting of a new suit, but is only another step in the foreclosure suit. It cannot be said that the case is no longer lis pendens after the foreclosure and sale, and conveyance executed thereon. The court of chancery is not functus officio until the decree is executed by a delivery of possession.

4. And pro hac vice, the purchaser is a party to the decree. And whoever meddles with the property, which is the subject of the decree, becomes, by that act, a party to the decree.

5. The statute expressly allows a judge in vacation "to hear and determine motions, . . . to make all necessary orders to carry into effect any decree previously entered, including the issuance of necessary writs therefor.

6. It is only necessary to make an injunction to deliver up possession before the issuance of a writ of assistance, where the decree of foreclosure contains no order for the surrender of the possession.

DELIVERY OF DEED AND MORTGAGE IN CONFLICT — POSSESSION — BONA FIDE PURCHASER.

STATEMENT.—This was a conflict as to whether a deed or a mortgage was delivered first, to the grantee or mortgagees, respectively. In the deed, the date was first written March 18, but was erased, and 19 substituted. The mortgage bore date March 18. The mortgage was left by the mortgagor with the recorder for record on the 23rd, and then on the 26th sent by the recorder to the mortgagor, who forwarded it to the mortgagees at New York. They returned it to the mortgagor to have it executed and acknowledged by his wife. This was done and again it was sent to the mortgagees. On the 19th and 20th of March, the grantee in the deed removed to the premises, and took possession, although his deed was not yet recorded. Held,

1. That taking open and visible possession of premises is an equivalent to recording the deed. And that this being before the recording of the mortgage, the deed had thereby priority, and the mortgagees took with notice, and as subsequent purchasers.

2. As the mortgagees negotiated immediately with the mortgagor, there was no delivery of the mortgage until it reached them in New York. The mortgagor could not deliver to himself for the mortgagees, and he did not deliver to the recorder for them, since the mortgage was returned to him and he himself sent it on to mortgagees.

It was contended in respect to the deed, that one could not be regarded as a bona fide purchaser until he had paid the full amount of the consideration. Held,

3. That this doctrine does not prevail under our registry laws.

LEGAL EFFECT AND CONSTRUCTION OF RELEASE TO R. R. OF LANDS ON WHICH TO LOCATE TRACK—PAROL EVIDENCE.

STATEMENT.—Appellant executed to appellee the following release:

"Know all men by these presents, that I, S. C. Conwell, of the county of Mason, and State of Illinois, in consideration of one dollar, to me in hand paid, by the Springfield and Northwestern Railroad Company, the receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, do hereby agree to release and convey unto the said company the right of way over any lands owned by me in Mason county, Illinois, and to execute and deliver to said company a proper release and conveyance of the same as soon as the road is located. In witness whereof," etc.

"Witness, outside of Havana—

Not to include any town property."

On this, the following instruction was given in a trial for the condemnation of property of appellant:

"You are instructed that the release, read in evidence, given by Conwell, releases all his damages which might otherwise have accrued by means of the construction and operation of the road over his lands, and he will be entitled to no damages, and the jury will so find."

It was contended, however, that the company, at the time the release was executed, contemplated two routes for the location of the road, and the release was only intended to embrace lands of Conwell along the route finally abandoned by the company in laying the road. Held,

1. That parol evidence could not be introduced to explain, vary, or change the terms of the instrument, in which there is no ambiguity.

2. Under the release, it was the duty of appellant to execute a proper conveyance whenever the road was located.

3. And where one held an equitable title, under a bond, to any of the lands, at the time the release was executed, the legal title remaining in the releasor, then, if the bond should afterwards be forfeited, the release would cover the land thus reverting to the legal owner.

4. The release was a complete bar to any recovery for damages; and the instruction of the court below was correct.

174.—Adams Express Co. v. Milton L. Wilson.—Appeal from Clay.—Opinion by SCOTT, Ch. J., affirming.

EXPRESS COMPANIES—LIABILITIES—THROUGH CONTRACT—SUBSEQUENT RECEIPT.

STATEMENT.—A package of goods delivered to appellant, to be conveyed from Flora to Decatur. The appellant's line only extended part of the way; but its agent took the pay for the whole distance. The package was lost on the route.

It was contended that appellant having, at the end of its line, given the package to another carrier, its responsibility there ceased. Held,

That the company could thus have limited its liability, by a special contract with the shipper; but, in the absence of such special contract, and when the company accepted the payment of the entire through charges, the liability continued to the place of destination. Nor could a receipt given after the loss occurred (no receipt being given when the goods were delivered to the company), in any manner affect the liability of the company, or relieve it of any portion of its common law responsibility as a common carrier.

SUIT FOR USE OF DIVISION FENCE—RECOUPMENT.

STATEMENT.—Suit for the use of a division fence. The defendant presented a counter claim for damages, by the plaintiff's cattle breaking through the division fence, and destroying defendant's (Scott's) corn.

As a part of the verdict, the jury returned this special finding of a matter of law—which should have been decided by the court: "We, the jury, find, from the evidence, that the damages claimed to have been done by plaintiff's cattle to defendant's corn, is not a proper subject of recoupment in this case." Held,

1. That the doctrine of recoupment tends to promote justice, and prevents needless litigation. It avoids circuity of action, and multiplicity of suits. It adjusts, by one action, adverse claims growing out of the same subject matter. A claim originating in contract may be set up against one founded in tort. And, consequently, damages for tort in relation to the same subject matter, in which a suit on contracts is brought, may be recouped.

2. As, herein, the plaintiff's claim is for the value of the use of the fence, and the defendant's for damages suffered by reason of its insufficiency, the latter claim has an important bearing upon the former, and is a proper subject of recoupment in the case.

SUPREME COURT OF PENNSYLVANIA.

PENNSYLVANIA AND NEW YORK CANAL AND RAILROAD COMPANY v. BUNNELL.

1. The measure of damages for land taken by a railroad is the difference between the market value of the property before and after the construction of the road, so far as that difference was caused by the construction.

2. The market value of land is not a question of science and skill, upon which only an expert can give an opinion.

3. Evidence as to the price offered and paid for other property in the neighborhood should not be received.

Error to the Court of Common Pleas of Susquehanna county.

Opinion by SHARSWOOD, J., May 8th, 1876.

The first two assignments of error are to the admission of an offer by the plaintiff below to ask a witness what was the fair market value of the plaintiff's farm before and after the construction of the road upon it, only as affected by such construction. The objection was that it left the witness to allow speculation and consequential causes of depreciation, instead of purely legal ones, in his estimate. That the true measure of damages is the difference between the market value of the property before and after the construction of the road, so far as that difference was caused by the construction, is not denied. It is not easy to see how the question could have been more accurately framed. Market value is what the property would sell for. It was said by the court, in Schuylkill Navigation Co. v. Hebrum, 7 S. & R., 622, "the only safe rule is to inquire what would the property, unaffected by the obstruction, have sold for at the time the injury was committed? What would it have sold for as affected by the injury? The difference is the true measure of compensation. This accords with all that has been held in subsequent cases, of which it will be enough to refer to Brown v. Covey, 7 Wright, 495; Delaware, Lackawanna and Western R. R. Co. v. Benson, 11 P. F. Smith, 369; East Pennsylvania Railroad Company v. Northwestern, 11 Wright, 28. Another objection was, that it did not appear that the witnesses had competent knowledge to speak upon the subject. The market value of land is not a question of science and skill, upon which only an expert can give an opinion. Persons living in the neighborhood may be presumed to have a sufficient knowledge of the market value of property, with the location and character of the land in question. Whether their opinion has any proper ground to rest upon, or is mere conjecture, can be brought out upon cross-examination. Such opinions have always been received. "It is a kind of evidence," said Chief Justice Tilghman, in Kellogg v. Krauber, 14 S. & R., 142, "so commonly admitted, without dispute or objection, that I have no doubt of its legality. Brown v. Covey, 7 Wright, 506; Pennsylvania Railroad Co. v. Henderson, 1 P. F. Smith, 321.

The third assignment is, that the plaintiff was allowed to ask a witness whether the location and construction of this railroad upon the plaintiff's farm was an advantage or disadvantage to it, and in what way. It seems to be considered that this question calls for an opinion which would embrace law as well as fact. It may be that there are consequential damages, for which the law allows no recovery; but when the witness is asked in what way the road was an advantage or disadvantage, surely the answer must show whether it would fall within the rule. It would be hard to frame a question that would not either be open to this objection or to a more decisive one of being leading. White Deer Creek Improvement Co. v. Sallaman, 17 P. F. Smith, 421.

The fourth, fifth, and sixth errors assigned may be considered together. There was no inconsistency in the rulings of the court. The fact that before the railroad was constructed the canal afforded the plaintiff a cheap and sufficient means of conveying his products to market, was surely material, and the fact that it belonged to the plaintiffs, and might be abandoned by them, did not vary the aspect of the case. In the damages which the plaintiff originally received for the construction of the canal, it is to be presumed that the advantage he derived from it as a highway to market was duly considered. It may be that the abandonment of the canal by the defendants was damnum absqui injuria. But the fact that it was there was an element in the assessment of the damages which was important; nor was it material how much the plaintiff had demanded or received for the construction of the canal.

As to the seventh assignment, the question, "how much (if any) does the burden of fencing the railroad detract from the value of the farm?" was entirely proper. Value meant market value. That was what the attention of the witness had been called to just before. The question then was the same as that which the learned counsel for the defendants thought ought to have been put: "How much less would the whole farm sell for in market on account of additional fencing made necessary by the road?" The question was in the very words used in the charge of the judge below, and afterwards in this court in Delaware Railroad Company v. Benson, 11 P. F. Smith, 380.

We find no error in the rejection of the evidence that after the construction of the railroad the post-office was moved to a point nearer to the farm. That could not have affected the market value, or if it did, it is not easy to see how it was brought about by the construction of the railroad. It might be removed by the government at any time.

As to the eighth error, which relates to the striking out of the defendants' evidence in relation to the prices offered and paid for other properties in the neighborhood, it is sufficient to say that this ruling of the learned judge below is fully supported by the determination of this court in East Pennsylvania v. Hunter, 4 Wright, 53, in which it was held that in such a proceeding as this evidence of the price paid or amount received for land in the neighborhood in particular is inadmissible. The only proper test is the opinion of witnesses as to the value of the land taken, in view of its location and productiveness, its market value, or the general selling price of land in the neighborhood.

We are of opinion that the answer of the court to the defendant's first point was correct. The plaintiff was not concluded by the amount claimed in his first petition, which the court granted him leave to amend. That the court had power to allow the amendment is clear: Pennsylvania Railroad Company v. German Lutheran Congregation, 3 P. F. Smith, 445. The learned judge properly admitted it as persuasive evidence to the jury of the estimate the plaintiff had himself put upon his damages.

The qualification of the affirmance of the defendants' fourth point was entirely right in view of the evidence in regard to the fence erected by the defendants as not sufficient for the purpose.

We do not fully understand the criticism made in the thirteenth assignment to that part of the charge in which the court instructed the jury to be "particular to inquire whether the increase in value came in the railroad or some other cause." It is not objected that it was wrong, but that it was emphatic. That rather involves a question of taste as to style, which we do not sit here to consider. But the clause thus extracted and objected to forms but part of a sentence, and the whole, taken together, is not even subject to the objection of being too emphatic. It was but a very proper caution to the jury. The judge said: "In arriving at a conclusion you may properly inquire what the property would have sold for immediately before and after the road was constructed and in successful operation, being particular to consider whether the increase in value, if any, arises from the improvement in question, or from some other cause."

On the whole find no error in the record.

Judgment affirmed.

The provision of the act of July 27, 1866 (14 U. S. Vose v. Yulee. Opinion by CHURCH, C. J.

Where in the original action the claim was against several defendants upon a joint liability in equity, and when it went back from the appellate court it was substantially an action at law against one defendant who was a non-resident of the State; held, that although if the action had originally been brought against him in that form he might have been entitled to a removal under the act of 1787; this would not aid him in making a case under the act of 1866. TRADE-MARK—WHAT CONSTITUTES.

Plaintiff, who was a packer of lard, used as a trade-mark a print of the domestic hog. Defendant, who was also a packer of lard, placed upon his packages a representation of a wild boar upon a globe. There was no resemblance between the two marks, and no attempt to represent the packages as being plaintiff's, and there was no probability of defendant's mark being mistaken for that of plaintiff's by one acquainted with plaintiff's mark. Held, that plaintiff could not maintain an action to restrain defendant from using the label adopted by him. lots to be benefitted by the improvement, and to mark on each lot shown in the map, the amount assessed against it. Laws 1871-72, p. 251. This section was repealed by an act approved April 25, 1873, in force July 1, 1873. Laws 1873, p. 66, Section 26 of Article 9, which as originally passed required the commissioners to certify the map with the assessment roll to the court, was amended by an act which took effect March 30, 1874, and by the section as amended no map is necessary to accompany the roll. Rev. Stat., 1874; Sec. 140. The assessment in question was made in 1875. The title of the repealing act of 1873 is "An act to repeal section twenty five, and to amend sections twenty-seven and twenty-eight, of an act entitled 'An act to provide for the incorporation of cities and villages.' Approved April 10, 1872."

The position taken is that this repeal and amendment do not change the law as respects the city of Chicago. That upon the adoption by the Common Council of the city of Chicago, of article 9 of the act, that article as respects the city of Chicago, ceased to be article 9 of an act entitled "An act to provide for the incorporation of cities and villages," but became from that time forth a part of and one of the provisions in the city charter of the city of Chicago; that the repealing act is limited to the general law as it does not profess to extend to any city charter which the city had adopted, and made article 9 a part of its charter; that upon the familiar principles applicable to general and particular statutes the repeal cannot be held to extend to any such city charter. The same argument would apply to the case of a city which had become incorporated under and adopted the whole of the act, and no amendment simply of the act or repeal of any of its provisions would apply to such city, unless it were included by express reference.

We know of no good ground upon which to rest for support such a position. By the process of adoption by a city of this article of the act, the article is not taken out of the act, and no longer a part thereof and incorporated into and made a component part of a different law, to wit: the city charter. The act still remains operative in all its parts, in respect to all cities and villages in the State. Any unqualified amendment of the article, or repeal of any of its provisions, affects the article in its application universally to all the cities and villages in the State, irrespective of the circumstance of its having or not been previously adopted by any city or village.—The only effect in this wise of any such adoption of the article, is to make it operative in a city or village where it was not operative before. The heading and subject matter of this article 9 is "Special assessments for local improvements." In the making thereof since the adoption of this article, the city of Chicago, for its authority and guide of action, looks to article 9 of "An act to provide for the incorporation of cities and villages," and not to its city charter as a distinct thing therefrom. And it is governed by article 9, not as it was at the time of its adoption by the city, but as it is at the time when action comes to be taken thereunder.

At the time of the making of the assessment in question, the commissioners for information as to their duty had recurrence to article 9 of this act of the General Assembly. They found there no provision requiring a map to be made or returned with the assessment roll. True there was such a provision therein at the time of its adoption by the city, but it had since been repealed, and the article contained no such provision at the time when the commissioners acted, and they were not required to make or return a map with the assessment roll. The effect of the construction contended for would be to thwart the purpose of the act in securing uniformity in the charters of cities and villages, as every change in the law by the Legislature would operate to produce differences in such charters.

It is claimed that the ordinance directing this improvement was void for the reason that the Board of Public Works of the city of Chicago, had never made a report recommending or disapproving the work with a statement of the expense thereof, as formerly required by the charter of the city. According to section 20 of article 9, the city council are required to appoint three of its members or any other three competent persons to estimate and report the cost of the improvement contemplated.

Whether or not the city council might have pursued in this respect the former provision of the city charter, we can have no doubt there was a right here to proceed under article 9, and there was no more required than to follow the mode there prescribed. The report of the Board of Public Works was not necessary; it was not required under any of the provisions of article 9.

It is objected that there is no proof showing that the common council ever passed any ordinance directing this improvement. The court excluded the ordinance when it was offered in evidence before the jury, and rightly. It was not competent evidence to go to the jury under the issues. The only issues to be determined by the jury were whether the property of the appellant was assessed more or less than it was benefited, or more or less than its proportionate share of the cost of the improvement, and the amount for which it ought to be assessed. Sec. 31, art. 9.

The same remarks are applicable to the exclusion of the report of the Board of Public Works as evidence before the jury. The ground of its exclusion by the court was "that the report was already before the court and jury as pleadings." Any question arising upon the report as well as the ordinance was one for the court. The transcript of the record does not contain the original petition in the condemnation proceeding, nor the supplemental petition in the assessment proceeding, nor does it purport to be a complete copy of the record. A certified copy of the ordinance must have been a part of the original petition for condemnation, section 5 of article 9 requiring that the petition shall contain the same. This assessment was in that same proceeding. Sec. 53, art. 9. The supplemental petition for the assessment is required to recite the ordinance for the improvement and the report of the commission as to its cost. Sec. 22, art. 9. Appellant in the court below recognized and treated the ordinance as a part of the record. Before the impannelling of the jury he moved to dismiss the proceedings, because the ordinance providing for the improvement was illegal and void, and the same reason was made one of the grounds of his motion in arrest of judgment. The objection is without merit.

It is insisted that the court below erred in not awarding appellant a separate trial. The language of section 34, article 9, taken in connection with prior sections relative to the proceedings on application for judgment, would seem to show that a single hearing and a single judgment, several in effect, was contemplated by the law.

We think at most that the allowing or not of a separate trial was but a matter of discretion with the court below, and there is no ground to think the discretion of the court was improperly exercised.

It is assigned as error that the witness Benze, one of the commissioners who made the assessment, was not permitted to answer the questions whether, in the assessments of property along the line of Dearborn street, he had established some scale, increasing and decreasing as he went toward and from the contemplated improvement, and how, in assessing the north and south half of appellant's lot, he arrived at a difference of one dollar and twelve cents.

Appellant's counsel state that they rest the propriety of these questions upon the decisions of this court in City of Chicago v. Larned, 34 Ill., and Crote v. City of Chicago, 56 Ill., 428, where in the former case it was held that an assessment, not in proportion to benefits but in proportion to frontage, is unconstitutional; and in the latter that evidence offered to show that the cost of an improvement was assessed in proportion to frontage, was competent. The application of the cases is not perceived. The questions asked were not whether the assessment was made in proportion to frontage. The decisions were under a different law. Section 24, article 9, prescribes the basis upon which assessments shall be made, which conforms to the decisions of this court as to what is the right basis. Even if the commissioners, in making their assessments, proceeded upon a wrong basis, their assessment was not controlling. Sec. 31, art. 9 provides that on the hearing either party may introduce such other evidence as may tend to establish the right of the matter.

The question upon the hearing was whether appellant's land had been assessed more than it was benefitted, or more than its proportionate share. And it was gone into at large by the evidence of quite a number of witnesses on both sides introduced before the jury. There is no ground for the objection.

Appellant's 5th objection in the court below to the application for judgment on the assessment, was that the objector's land was not contiguous to the improvement and could not be assessed, and upon his attempting to prove that it was not so contiguous, that fact was admitted by the appellee. This admitted away the case of the appellee, as we hold that under the constitution and statute the authority was to make special assessments only on contiguous property, and this assessment not having been made on contiguous property, it was unauthorized and illegal.

But we do not adopt appellant's definition of the term contiguous, that it is to be used in its strictly etymological meaning of touching, and to be confined to property abutting on the improvement. Webster, in his dictionary, does define "contiguous" as "touching," but adds that the word is sometimes used in a wider sense, though not with strict propriety, for adjacent or near without being absolutely in contact. We think that it is in this wider sense in which the word is used in the constitution, and that it is not necessary to come within the meaning of "contiguous property," that the property should abut on the improvement. It may be that the property assessed was in fact contiguous property according to the scope which we would give to the term "contiguous," but the admission is fatal.

On the ground of this admission the refused instruction on this head should have been given, and the motion for a new trial should have been granted instead of being overruled.

The judgment is reversed and the cause remanded.

ABE. LINCOLN, COUNTRY LAWYER AND PRESIDENT.

We clip the following from an exchange:

Some years since, James F. Joy, before he became president of the Michigan Central Railroad Company, was the attorney of the road. While acting in this capacity, he found it necessary to employ a lawyer to defend a suit, brought in one of the Illinois courts, against the company. As it turned out, the lawyer employed for this purpose was one Abraham Lincoln, of that State. Lawyer Lincoln successfully defended his railroad client, and sent in a bill to Mr. Joy of $75 for his services.

This bill Mr. Joy refused to pay, alleging that it was not customary for "country lawyers" to charge or receive such a fee for such services. Lawyer Lincoln, however, nothing abashed by such a distinguished rebuke, brought suit for the bill against Mr. Joy, as attorney for the M. C. R. R., and obtained a verdict for the full amount of his bill.

Time rolled on, and in 1861, this same "country lawyer" became President of the United States. A year or two afterward, a vacancy occurred on the bench of the Supreme Court of the United States, and Mr. Joy, among others, became a candidate for the Presidential appointment. When the application was made to the President by Mr. Joy's friends, Lincoln "told a little story" about one Mr. Joy, attorney for the M. C. R. R., and a certain "country lawyer" in Illinois, and after telling it, declined to make the appointment. Naturally enough, Mr. Joy did not relish Mr. Lincoln's "little joke," and never, afterward, spoke very favorably of Mr. Lincoln's personal or administrative qualities.

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES.

No. 186.—OCTOBER TERM, 1875.

ROBERT A. PHILLIPS, Plaintiff in Error,
v.
CHARLES W. PAYNE.

In Error to the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia.

DE FACTO GOVERNMENTS—RETROCESSION OF PART OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

1. RETROCESSION.—This suit was brought to determine the validity of the retrocession by Congress, to the State of Virginia, of that part of the District of Columbia, as originally constituted, which was ceded by Virginia to the United States. Held, that the plaintiff in error is estopped from raising the point which he seeks to have decided. That he cannot force upon the parties, an issue which neither of them desires to make.

2. THE DE FACTO CONDITION OF THINGS.—In this litigation, the court is constrained to regard the de facto condition of things which exist with reference to the county of Alexandria, as conclusive of the rights of the parties before the court.

3. DE FACTO GOVERNMENTS.—That a government de facto, in firm possession of any country, is clothed, while it exists, with the same rights, powers and duties, both at home and abroad, as a government de jure. The court considers the nature of governments de facto and de jure, and states the practice of the United States in recognizing such governments.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.

Mr. Justice SWAYNE delivered the opinion of the court.

This suit was brought to determine the validity of the retrocession by Congress to the State of Virginia, of that part of the District of Columbia, as originally constituted, which was ceded by Virginia to the United States. The plaintiff in error was the plaintiff in the court below. The case upon which he relies is thus set forth in his declaration:

In pursuance of the Constitution of the United States, Virginia, by an act of her legislature of December 3, 1789, ceded to the United States that part of her territory subsequently known as the county of Alexandria. Congress passed an act accepting the cession. Maryland ceded to the United States the county of Washington, and Congress accepted that cession also. The two counties constituted a territory ten miles square, which Congress set apart as the seat of the government of the United States, and organized as the District of Columbia, over which the Constitution of the United States required that Congress should exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever. Thereafter, on the 9th of July, 1846, Congress, in violation of the Constitution, passed an act purporting to authorize a vote to be taken by the people of Alexandria county, to determine whether the county should be retroceded to the State of Virginia, and declaring that in case a majority of the votes should be cast in favor of retrocession, the county should be retroceded and forever relinquished in full and absolute right and jurisdiction. A majority of the votes were cast for retrocession, whereupon, without any further action by Congress, the State of Virginia passed an act declaring that the county was reannexed and formed a part of the State. Since that time, the State has assumed to exercise full jurisdiction and control over the county, and to authorize the election of officers for the county, among whom is one known as the collector for the township of Washington. The defendant was elected such collector, and assumed to exercise the duties of his office. The State has also assumed to enforce the assessment and collection of taxes upon persons and property in the county. The plaintiff resides in the county and owns a large amount of real estate and other property there. The defendant alleged that an assessment had been made upon this property; that there was payable to him as such collector, upon the assessment, the sum of $165.18, and he demanded payment. In the event of refusal to pay, he would have sold the property pursuant to the law of the State. To prevent the sacrifice which this would have involved, the plaintiff paid the money under protest, notifying the defendant at the time, that he regarded the exaction as illegal and unauthorized, upon the ground that the county of Alexandria was not within the jurisdiction of the State of Virginia, but that it was within the District of Columbia. He avers that the act of Congress of 1846, before mentioned, every thing done under it, and the law of Virginia re-annexing the county to the State and extending her jurisdiction over it, are contrary to the Constitution of the United States, and illegal and void.

He therefore claims to recover the amount so paid to the collector.

The defendant demurred. The court below sustained the demurrer, and gave judgment for the defendant.

The question presented for our determination is whether there was error in this ruling.

The law of prescription applies to nations with the same effect as between individuals.—Lawrence's Wheaton, 303, 304; Vatel, Book 2. ch. 11, secs. 141, 146, 147, 149.

In cases involving the action of the political departments of the government, the judiciary is bound by such action.—Williams v. The Suffolk Ins. Co., 13 Pet., 420; Garcia v. Lee, 12 Pet., 511; Kennet v. Chamberlain, 14 How., 38; Foster v. Nelson, 2 Pet., 209; Nabob of the Carnatic v. The East Ind. Co., 2 Vesey, Jr., 60; Luther v. Borden, 7 How., 1; Rhode Island v. Massachusetts, 12 Pet., 714.

The judiciary recognizes the condition of things with respect to the government of another country which once existed as still subsisting, unless the political department of its own government has decided otherwise.—Kennet v. Chambers, 7 How., 38.

For certain purposes the States of the Union are regarded as foreign to each other.—Buckner v. Finley, 2 Pet., 590; Warden v. Arrel, 2 Wash. Va. Rep., 298.

Under certain circumstances, a constitutional provision may, like a forfeiture, be waived by a party entitled to insist upon it.—6 Hill, 48; 24 Wend., 337; 3 Comst., 199, 511; 18 Barb., 585.

The acts of an officer de facto, within the sphere of the powers and duties of the office he assumes to hold, are as valid and binding with respect to the public and third persons, as if they had been done by an officer de jure.—Elwood v. Monk. 6 East, 235; King v. Corp. Bedford, 6 East, 368; Tucker v. Aiken, 7 New H., 134; Fowler v. Babe, 9 Mass., 231; Com. v. Fowler, 10 Mass., 291; People v. Collins, 7 J. R., 549. These propositions were referred to in the discussion at the bar, and we have not overlooked them.

But we do not invoke their aid, and have found it unnecessary to consider the effect of either of them in this case.

We shall place our judgment upon another and a different ground, and shall confine our further remarks to that subject.

The State of Virginia is de facto in possession of the territory in question. She has been in possession, and her title and possession have been undisputed, since she resumed possession, in 1847, pursuant to the act of Congress of the preceding year. More than a quarter of a century has since elapsed. During all that time she has exercised jurisdiction over the territory in all respects as before she ceded it to the United States. She does not complain of the retrocession. The political departments of her government, by their conduct, have uniformly asserted her title, and the head of her judicial department has expressly affirmed it.—McLaughlin v. The Bank of Potomac, 7 Gratt., 68. The United States have not objected. No murmer of discontent has been heard from them. On the contrary, Congress, by more than one act, has recognized the transfer as a settled and valid fact.—Act of July 5, 1848, chap. 92, 9 Stat., 244; Act of Feb. 2, 1871, ch. 33, 16 Stat., 402; Rev. Stat. U. S., sec. 1795. Both parties to the transaction have been and still are entirely satisfied. If the objection taken by the plaintiff in error were maintained in the length and breath insisted upon, serious consequences would follow. In that view a part of them would be that all laws of the State passed since the retrocession, as regards the county of Alexandria, were void; taxes have been illegally assessed and collected; the election of public officers and the payment of their salaries were without warant of law; public accounts have been improperly settled; all sentences, judgments, and decrees of the courts were nullities, and those who carried them into execution are liable civilly, and perhaps criminally, according to the nature of what they have severally done.

A government de facto, in firm possession of any country, is clothed while it exists with the same rights, powers, and duties, both at home and abroad, as a government de jure. It may send embassadors and make treaties. Such treaties bind the nation and descend in full force upon any succeeding government that may be established. The assailants of a king de facto in England are liable to be punished for treason. Such was the rule of the common law, and the celebrated statute of Henry 7th only re-affirmed it. The legislative and judicial authorities called into existence may proceed as if the prior government had not been displaced. All municipal functions may be performed without regard to the origin of the new polity. Cromwell's embassadors were received everywhere. Hale accepted from him the place of a judge of the common pleas. After the restoration, Charles the 2d made him Chief Baron of the Exchequer, and subsequently Chief Justice of the King's Bench. The Code Napoleon was the work of a ruler whose government rose amid the ruins of a revolution and was subsequently overthrown. The governments of both these rulers were doubtless regarded by the other governments of Europe as only de facto. Whether they were or were not de jure also is a question which, in this case, it is unnecessary to consider.

In all cases where the United States have been called upon to recognize the existence of the government or the independence of any other country, they have looked only to the fact, and not to the right. Such has been the uniform course of our government. 1 Kent's Com. (Comst. ed.) 170; Vatel, Book 2, ch. 12, secs. 196, 197; Id., Book 4, ch. 2, secs. 14, 18; 1 Hale's P. C., 101; Foster's Crown Law, pp. 397, 399; Camp. Lives of Chief Justices, 526; Lawrence's Wheat., 49, note; Id., 471, note.

The plaintiff in error is estopped from raising the point which he seeks to have decided. He cannot, under the circumstances, vicariousiy raise a question, nor force upon the parties to the compact an issue, which neither of them desires to make.

In this litigation we are constrained to regard the de facto condition of things which exists with reference to the county of Alexandria, as conclusive of the rights of the parties before us.

The judgment of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia is affirmed.

UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT.

No. 216.—OCTOBER TERM, 1875.

JAMES P. CARROL, A. BAXTER SPRINGS, WILLIAM B. STANLEY, CHARLES LOGAN and ARTHUR W. KENNEDY, Appellants,
v.
JOSHUA and THOMAS GREEN.

Appeal from the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of South Carolina.

LIABILITY OF STOCKHOLDERS FOR DEBTS OF CORPORATION—STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS.

1. LIABILITY OF STOCKHOLDERS.—The appellees filed the bill in June, 1872. The bill seeks to make appellants individually liable, as stockholders of the Exchange Bank of Columbia, which was incorporated by an act of the legislature of South Carolina, in 1852; by this act it is alleged the Exchange Bank "was endowed with the same rights and privileges, and made subject to the same duties and liabilities, provided for the Planters' and Mechanic's Bank," and that by the 4th section of the act incorporating the last-named bank, it was declared "that in case of the failure of said bank, each stockholder, copartnership, or body politic, having a share in such bank at the time of such failure, or who shall have been interested therein at any time within twelve months previous to such failure, shall be liable and held bound, individually, for any sum not exceeding twice the amount of his, her or their share or shares."

Held, 1. After commenting upon the statutes of South Carolina extending the statute of limitations, that more than four years having elapsed since the time from the last extension commenced running, an action at law would be barred, and an action at law being barred, a bill in equity would also be barred.

2. That the statute of limitations in force when this cause of action accrued, and under which this cause must be decided, was that of 1712; that that statute contains no exception as to actions on the case, save for slander.

3. That in an action at law, case was the proper action, and not debt, to recover of a shareholder for the debts of a corporation.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS

Mr. Justice SWAYNE delivered the opinion of the Court.

A number of important questions arising in this case have been fully argued, which we shall pass by without remark. We have not examined any of them exhaustively, and have not found it necessary to do so. Our judgment will be placed upon the defence of the statute of limitations, and our opinion will be confined to that subject.

The appellees filed this bill, and the subpœnas were issued in the court below, on the 18th of June, 1872. The bill seeks to make the appellants individually liable as stockholders of the Exchange Bank of Columbia, which was incorporated by an act of the legislature of South Carolina, of the 16th of December, 1852. It is alleged in the bill that by this act the Exchange Bank "was endowed with the same rights and privileges, and was made subject to the same duties, liabilities, obligations, and restrictions provided for the said Planters' & Mechanics' Bank," and that by the fourth section of the act incorporating the last-named bank it was declared "that, in case of the failure of said bank, each stockholder, copartnership, or body politic, having a share in such bank at the time of such failure, or who shall have been interested therein at any time within twelve months previous to such failure, shall be liable and held bound, individually, for any sum not exceeding twice the amount of his, her, or their share or shares."

It is conceded for the purposes of this opinion that the provision, quoted from the act of 1852, applies to the stockholders of the Exchange Bank as well as to the bank itself.

The master found and the court below affirmed, the finding as correct, that the Exchange Bank failed in the month of February, 1865, and never resumed business after that time.

The defendants severally set forth in their answers "that the cause of action stated in the bill did not accrue within four years before the exhibiting of said bill." The complainants replied and took issue. It appears that the bank suspended specie payment several years before its failure at the time specified by the master, and some stress is laid upon this fact by the counsel for the appellants in discussing the case in this aspect. We have preferred to adopt the finding of the master because it is the view most favorable to the appellees, because the proof as to that period brings the case clearly within the terms of the statute, while the proof is further that the bank paid specie until its suspension was legalized, and that if it had been put in liquidation on the first of February, 1865, it could then have met all its liabilities and redeemed its outstanding bills in specie or its equivalent.—Rec., 63. Its subsequent losses arose from the war. According to the statute the liability of "each stockholder" arose upon "the failure of the bank." The liability gave at once the right to sue, and, by necessary consequence, the period of limitation began at the same time. From the last of February, 1865, four years expired on the first of March, 1869. But there are certain interruptions of the running of the statute to be taken into account. An act of the legislature of the State, of the 21st of December, 1861, suspended the statute of limitations until the close of the first session of the next general assembly. This suspension was continued by successive acts. The last one was passed on the 22d of December, 1865, and prolonged the suspension "until the adjournment of the next regular session of the general assembly." The supreme court of the State held that these acts arrested the effect of the statute of limitations from December 21, 1861, until December, 1866.—Wardlow v. Buzzard, 15 Richardson, 158.

It does not appear in the case at what time in December, 1866, the general assembly adjourned. From December, 1866, the statute was in full force. Four years from that time expired in December, 1870. The war in South Carolina ended on the 2d of April, 1866.—The Protector, 12 Wall., 701.

The Circuit Court of the United States for South Carolina was open for business on and after the 12th of June, 1866.

In any view of the facts that can be taken, more than four years elapsed after the statute began to run before this suit was instituted.

The statute of limitations of South Carolina, in force when this cause of action accrued, and under which the case must be decided, was that of 1712.—Angel on Lim., Appendix, p. xcviii.

The sixth section declares, among other things, "that * * * all actions of account and upon the case, (other than such accounts as concern the trade of merchandise,) * * * * * all actions of debt grounded upon any lending or contract without specialty, all actions for arrearages of rent reserved by indenture, all actions of covenant * * * which shall be brought at any time after the ratification of this act, shall be commenced and sued within the time of limitation hereafter expressed, and not after —that is to say, the said actions upon the case other than for slanders, and the said actions for accounts, * * * * and the said actions for * * * debt, * * * within three years next after the ratification of this act, or within four years next after the cause of such actions or suits, and not after." The statute contains no exception as to actions on the case, save that for slander. All others are expressly barred at the expiration of the time named.

The section of the act of 1852 above quoted, which is said to create the individual liability here in question, is silent as to who shall sue The suit was, therefore, necessarily to be brought by and for the benefit of the parties injured.—2 Inst., 650; Com. Dig., Debt, A., 1.

Individual liability is repugnant to the law of corporations, and qualifies in this case an exemption which would otherwise exist. Stockholders in such cases are liable according to the plain meaning of the terms employed by the legislature, and not otherwise. The section is silent as to a preference to any class of creditors. All, therefore, in this case stood upon a footing of equality, and were entitled to share alike in the proceeds of the litigation. The remedy against the stockholders was necessarily in equity.—Pollard v. Bailey, 20 Wall., 521.

They were severally compellable to contribute according to the amount of the stock they respectively held and the liabilities of the bank to be met, after exhausting its means, the maximum of the liability of each stockholder not to exceed in any event twice the amount of his stock.—Iglehart v. The Bank of Circleville and others, 6 McLean, 568.

It is obvious from this statement that if there had been a suit at law against the stockholders, debt could not have been maintained.

The action of debt lies on a statute where it is brought for a sum certain, or where the sum is capable of being readily reduced to a certainty. It is not sustainable for unliquidated damages.—1 Ch. Pl., 108, 113; Stockwell v. The U. S., 13, Wall., 542.

"The action of debt is in legal contemplation for the recovery of a debt eo nomine, and in numero." "Case, now usually called assumpsit," is founded on a contract express or implied.—1 Chy., 99; Metcalf v. Robinson, 2 McLean, 364.

Let us apply these tests to the case in hand. Certainly the amount sought to be recovered was not certain, and could not readily be reduced to certainty, and there was clearly an implied promise on the part of the stockholders.

The legislature created the corporation, and prescribed certain terms to which the stockholders should be subjected. This was an offer on the part of the State. It could be accepted or declined. There was no constraint. By taking the stock the terms were acceded to, the contract became complete, and the stockholders were bound accordingly. The same result followed, which would have ensued under the like circumstances between individuals. The assent thus given, and the promise implied are of the essence of the liability sought to be enforced in this proceeding. If a remedy at law were necessary clearly it must have been case.

Case is a generic term, which embraces many different species of actions. "There are two, however, of more frequent use than any other form of action whatever. These are assumpsit and trover."—Steph. Plead., 18.

"The more legal denomination of the action of assumpsit is trespass on the case upon promises."—3 Woodison's Lectures, 168. This form of action originated, like many others, under the statute of Westminister 2, 13 Ed. 1, ch. 24, sec. 2. Its establishment was strenuously resisted through several reigns.—2 Reeves' Hist., pp. 394, 507, 608. It was sustained, upon full consideration, in Slades' Case, 4 Coke, 92, which was decided in 44th Elizabeth. When the statute of South Carolina of 1712, here in question, was enacted, the term case was as well understood to embrace assumpsit as anything else in the law of procedure to which it is now held to apply.

Blackstone thought that one of the most important amendments of the law during the century in which he lived was affected "by extending the equitable writ of trespass on the case, according to its primitive institution, by King Edward the First, to almost every instance of injustice not remedied by any other process."—4 Commen., 442.

But if debt were the proper form of action if this were a suit at law, the result must be the same. The act bars "all actions of debt" grounded upon any lending or contract without speciality—also "after the lapse of four years." The contract here was of the class last designated. The statute was only inducement. The implied promise of the stockholders to fulfill its requirements was the agreement on their part, and it was without specialty.

Where a deed poll was executed by a lessor, and the lessee entered and enjoyed the premises, it was held that he was liable according to the terms of the lease, but that he was suable only in assumpsit.—Goodwin v. Gilbert, 9 Mass., 484; Newell v. Hill, 2 Metcalf, 180.

So where one conveys land by deed, pursuant to a parol agreement, the law implies a promise by the grantee to pay the purchase-money, and it may be recovered, but the action must be in case, and not debt on the specialty.—Butler v. Lee, 11 Alabama, 885; Bowen v. Bell, 20 John., 338; Wilkinson v. Scott, 17 Mass., 249.

In Lindsay v. Hyatt, 4 Ed. Ch., 104, the act of incorporation declared that the directors and stockholders might be sued for the debts of the corporation, either at law or in equity, as if they were joint debtors or co-partners. The Vice-Chancellor said: "It appears to me that the six years within which actions on simple contract indebtedness must be brought does apply."

Speaking of a suit at law, he said: "In such an action the declaration must be in case founded on the statute." * * * "The form of the action and the nature of the liability to be enforced fall within the provisions of the statute which takes away the right to sue after six years."

Corning v. Horner & McCullough, 1 Comst., 58, was a suit at law against stockholders upon a similar statute and involving the same statute of limitations. It was said that the action must "necessarily be an action on the case at common law upon the liability of the stockholders for the debt of the company." The same conclusion was reached as to the time when such actions were barred as in Lindsay v. Hyatt.

Baker v. the Atlas Bank, 9 Metc., 182, was a bill in equity founded upon a statute making the stockholders liable in the cases specified. The defendants relied upon a statute of limitations which declared that "all actions founded upon any contract or liability not under seal shall be commenced within six years next after the cause of action shall accrue, and not afterwards." It was held that the statute applied in equity as well as at law, and that after the lapse of six years, the bar was complete.

The Commonwealth v. The Cochituate Bank, 3 Allen, 42, was also a case in equity involving a statute creating a liability on the part of the stockholders of the bank, and the same statute of limitations. The same conclusions were reached by the court as in the preceding case.

It is insisted by the learned counsel for the appellees that while the limitation act of 1712 provided that "actions of debt upon any lending or contract, without specialty," should be brought within four years, it did not limit actions of debt upon specialties, and that the liability here in question being created by a statute, is to be regarded as falling within the latter class.

It is said that an obligation to pay money, arising under a statute, is a debt by specialty. In support of this point Bullard v. Bell, 1 Mason, 243, has been pressed upon our attention. Fully to examine that case would unnecessarily extend this opinion. It was cited in Baker v. The Atlas Bank and in Corning v. McCullough without effect. We think it is distinguishable from the case in hand in several material points. If it be in conflict with the cases to which we have referred, in this connection, we think the results in the latter were controlled by the better reason.

If a claim like that of the appellees sued at law, would have been barred at law, their claim is barred in equity. This proposition is too clear to require argument or authorities to support it.

The decree of the circuit court is reversed, and the cause will be remanded with directions to dismiss the bill.

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT, W. D. WISCONSIN.

OPINION, JULY 15, 1876.

In re WORTHINGTON.

In Bankruptcy.

JUDGMENT ON A HOLIDAY—BANKRUPTCY—ADVERSE CLAIM—VOLUNTARY SUBMISSION.

1. Held, Following the construction placed upon the statute by the State Supreme Court, that a judgment entered on a day which is a legal holiday, is void, and that where a judgment was entered on the 24th of December, and a transcript thereof filed in a foreign county on the 25th of December, which was a legal holiday, the filing of the transcript created no lien upon the land in that county.

2. That, although a party claiming an adverse interest cannot be brought in by petition, by an assignee, in a summary way, to have the claim determined, such claimant may voluntarily come in by petition, and submit his claim to the decision of the court.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.

Opinion by HOPKINS, J.

This is an application of Charles E. Storm and others, judgment creditors of the bankrupt, for an order directing the assignee to sell certain real estate of the bankrupt, situate in the county of Wood, and to apply the proceeds upon their judgment and for leave to prove as unsecured creditors any balance that remains upon the judgment after applying said proceeds thereon.

They show in their petition that on the 24th of December, 1874, they recovered judgment against the bankrupt for $3,464.11 in the Circuit Court of Milwaukee county, and that on the 25th day of December a transcript was filed and the judgment docketed in Wood county, and they claim that thereby it became a lien upon the real estate of the bankrupt situate in that county.

They represent that the real estate in Wood county which they want sold is not of sufficient value to pay their judgment, and pray that the assignee may be directed to sell it free of the lien and to pay the proceeds to them, and that they be allowed to prove up the deficiency as an unsecured debt.

The assignee opposes the granting the order, on the ground that the judgment is not a lien on the bankrupt's real estate in Wood county, for the reason that it was docketed there on the 25th day of December, which is by the statute of this State declared to be a legal holiday. Laws of 1862, chapter 248.

This raises the question as to the operation of a statute declaring a certain day a holiday. The act does not in terms prohibit any act from being done on that day; it simply declares that the day shall be a holiday. Does that make the official act of the clerk in docketing the judgment on that day void? For only upon that ground can this court consider the question. If it is voidable, the party must go to the State courts for redress.

The question is settled in Lampe v. Manning, 38 Wis., 673; it seems to me that the clerk had no authority to docket the judgment on that day, and, if not, the entry was void, and no lien was created thereby. The court there hold that the term "holiday" imports dies non juridicus, and that no authority exists on that day to do any official act, although no express prohibition is contained in the act. That a prohibition is implied in the term holiday.

This is a decision of the State court upon the effect of the statute, and it may be unnecessary for this court to go further in search of authorities to support it. If declaring the 25th of December to be a legal holiday, ipso facto, made it no day in law, we are to look to the common law to see what acts, if any, could be performed on such days.

Sunday, at common law, was regarded as a dies non juridicus. In Becloe v. Alpe (Sir William Jones, 126), the court say that Sunday was not a dies juridicus for the awarding of any process, nor for entering any judgment of record. 12 John., Van Vechten v. Paddock, 177.

Lord Coke in Mackally's Case, 9 Coke, 66, took a distinction between judicial and ministerial acts, performed on that day, but in Hoyle v. Cornwallis, 1 Strange, 387; that distinction was overruled, so that at common law both ministerial and judicial acts were prohibited on such days.

Now by adopting the decision of the Supreme court as the authorative interpretation of the act, it follows that the entering of the judgment on that day was void, and hence no lien was created thereby.

See also for a further discussion of this question, Story v. Elliott, 8 Cow. R., 27; Houghtailing v. Osborn, 15 John., 119; Butler v. Kelsey, id. 177. If the judgment was a lien, it is preserved by the bankrupt law, and it is the duty of this court to protect it as such. But in determining that question we have to look to the State statutes and the construction placed upon them by the State courts, and if by those the judgment is a valid lien, it is our duty to give it its full force and operation.

The filing of the transcript and docketing of the judgment in Wood county were necessary to give a lien on the bankrupts' real estate in that county, 2 Taylor Stats., p. 1509, sections 61 and 62, and such filing and docketing having been on the 25th of December, they were not legally done, and must be regarded a nullity, which leaves the petitioners as to those lands in no better situation than any other creditor of the bankrupt.

As the entry constitutes an apparent cloud on the title they should cause a cancellation of the docket entry so as to remove the colorable lien created thereby. The asignee is therefore ordered to sell the real estate in Wood county free of any lien of the petitions by virtue of the said judgment, and to hold the proceeds for distribution among all the unsecured creditors; and in order to further protect the purchaser or purchasers thereof from the assignee, I shall direct that an injunction issue out of this court perpetually enjoining and restraining the petitioners and their attorneys and agents from selling or offering to sell such real estate or any portion by virtue of said judgments, or from enforcing or attempting to enforce the same upon said real estate.

The petitioners having voluntarily appeared and moved the court to enforce the pretended lien, the court thereby has acquired jurisdiction to proceed and dispose of the whole matter in this summary way, which it could not have done upon summary petitions of assignee. But the authorities hold, that although a party claiming an adverse interest cannot be brought in by petition by assignee in a summary way to have the claim determined, that such claimant may voluntarily come in by petition and submit his claim to the decision of the court without resorting to the form of a plenary action.

The petitioners have leave to prove for the full amount of the judgment being valid for ought that appears to the court now, the lien on real estate in Wood county alone being void. An order and injunction will be issued in accordance with this opinion.

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

OPINION FILED JUNE 30, 1876.

No. 306.—BENJAMIN F. SHERMAN, Appellant, v. LOUIS BUSH et al., Appellees.

Appeal from the Superior Court of Cook.

No. 307.—LOUIS BUSH et al., Appellants, v. BENJAMIN F. SHERMAN et al., Appellees.

Appeal from the Superior Court of Cook.

DEFENDANT ABSENT IN REBELLION—RELEASE—AGREEMENT TO RELEASE MORTGAGE—ADVERTISEMENT UNDER TRUST DEED—WHAT IT SHOULD CONTAIN—WHEN PROPERTY AFTER SALE IS AGAIN SOLD TO TRUSTEE—ACQUIESCENCE IN SALE, A WAIVER OF IRREGULARITIES.

1. ABSENCE OF MORTGAGOR IN REBELLION.—That the question of the right of a creditor, when the mortgagor was absent voluntarily in the rebellion, to enforce the payment of his debt, has been put at rest by the former decisions of this court.

2. AGREEMENT TO RELEASE.—That an agreement to release a portion of the mortgaged property without consideration, would be a mere gratuity, and could not be enforced. When acted upon, it would be binding upon the parties, even if there was no consideration for the agreement.

3. ADVERTISEMENT OF SALE.—That it is sufficient if the notice of sale contains enough to show that there has been a default in the condition; and also that it recites any fact the mortgage itself may provide it shall contain. More than this is mere redundancy, and can answer no good purpose.

4. TRUSTEE PURCHASING AFTER SALE.—After the trust has been fully performed, and all fiduciary relations ceased, the law has not forbidden the trustee to deal with what had been trust property, as strangers may do, and acting in good faith he may become its owner, by purchase or otherwise.

5. ACQUIESCENCE A WAIVER.—That acquiescence in the sale, unexplained for any considerable time, will be deemed a waiver of all mere irregularities that may have intervened.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE.

On the 23d day of May, 1856, Winchester Hall, one of the complainants, purchased of Ayers and Hamilton, a block of ground which included within its limits the lands involved in this controversy. A portion of the purchase money was paid down, and the remainder, represented by six promissory notes, was secured by mortgage upon the premises, containing a power of sale. The notes matured in sets of two of equal amount, in one, two and three years from the date of the sale. According to the testimony of Bush, the real estate was bought on the joint account of himself, Hall and Richard, since deceased, whose heirs, by an amendment to the bill, have been made complainants, and that an agreement in writing showing the interests of the several parties, was signed at the time; but for convenience the title was taken in the name of Hall, who resided or was about to reside, in Chicago, the other partners both residing in the State of Louisiana. It was not disclosed to the vendors any person other than Hall had any interest in the purchase, nor was the alleged agreement made a matter of record. So far as the public could know, or had any reason to believe, Hall was the sole owner. He treated the property as having the exclusive ownership, making contracts in relation thereto and not disclosing that any one else had any interest in it. On the 23d day of March, 1857, Hall sold the west half of the block to Joseph Smith, but the incumbrance created by the prior mortgage resting upon the entire premises, Smith would not consummate the purchase unless Ayers and Hamilton would agree that that portion he was proposing to buy might in some way be released from the mortgage indebtedness, so that he might acquire a clear title when he should pay for the same. Hall procured an agreement from Ayers and Hamilton that in the event of payment to them at maturity of the installments to become due on the 23d day of May, 1857, they would agree to hold the west half of the block liable for only one-half of the residue of the unpaid purchase money, with the distinct reservation, however, that Hall was not to be released from the payment of any portion of the mortgage indebtedness. That arrangement was satisfactory to Smith, and was endorsed on the back of his contract with Hall, both of which were recorded on the following day.

The installments maturing on the 23d day of May, 1857, were fully paid, and subsequently one half of the residue of the purchase money, but no application was made to have the holder apply it in discharge of the mortgage indebtedness on the west half of the block which had been sold to Smith, nor was it ever so applied.

In the mean time Sherman had bought of Ayers and Hamilton such of Hall's notes as were unpaid, and took an assignment of both the notes and mortgage, and thereafter controlled them.

After making some payments, Smith found he would be unable to comply with his contract, and for a nominal consideration re-conveyed the property to Hall, losing all benefit of what he had paid.

On the 6th day of June, 1860, Hall conveyed by deed all his interest in the premises to Bush, to be by him held in trust for the parties originally interested, except so far as Hall's interest was concerned, that was to be as security for his indebtedness to Bush.

But that indebtedness has long since been adjusted, so that Hall now claims to be the equitable owner of one-third of the estate. Although this latter deed was upon record, it does not appear Sherman had any actual knowledge of its existence until about the time he was making the sales under the mortgage.

In April, 1861, all of Hall's notes given to ——— for the property, except one for $3,445, had been paid, either to Ayers and Hamilton, or to Sherman after he became the owner. At the request of Hall, and for a consideration, Sherman extended the time of payment on this latter note until 1861, and upon a like request consented to a further extension until May 1, 1862, upon the positive agreement no further extension should be asked. Before the day of payment last agreed upon had arrived, open hostilities between the North and the South had commenced. Louisiana had in the month of January, 1861, passed an ordinance seceding from the Union, which was a matter of public interest, and was, of course, known to Hall. Immediately after the fall of Fort Sumpter, Hall left the State of Illinois for his former home at Thibodeaux, in Louisiana, with the avowed purpose to cast his lot with the people of the South. Previous to his departure Hall made no arrangements whatever for the payment of the balance due Sherman on the mortgage indebtedness. Perhaps in May, 1862, after New Orleans had come into the possession and under the control of the federal armies, and communication had been established by rail and by water between Thibodeaux and New Orleans, Sherman wrote to Hall at the latter city to know if he could do anything toward paying his note. That letter was subsequently returned to him from the dead letter office with the post mark of New Orleans upon it. One reason why Hall did not receive that letter was, he had previously entered the military service of the South, and passed within the rebel lines. Had he remained at Thibodeaux, his place of residence, he would have been within the Union lines all the time, except a period of about six weeks in the summer of 1863, and had he been loyal to the government he could have been in constant communication with New Orleans and with Chicago, where his property was situated. After waiting many months and hearing nothing from Hall, Sherman advertised the property, and by virtue of the power of sale contained in the mortgage, on the 3d day of February, 1863, sold part of the premises to D. C. Nicholes, and made him a trustee's deed for the same. Upon a like notice on the 10th day of March following, he sold another portion of the property to Eben Colfax, and also executed to him a deed. The aggregate amount of these sales was about sufficient to discharge the mortgage indebtedness, perhaps a small balance remained Both Nicholes and Colfax conveyed that portion of the property purchased by them respectively at the trustee's sale to Mrs. Cleaver, and it is under titles derived from her that defendants claim the property involved in this litigation. This bill was filed to have the trustee's deeds to Nicholes and Colfax, and their deeds to Mrs. Cleaver, set aside and complainants let in to redeem the property on payment of what was due on the mortgage, and if for any reason that specific relief could not be granted they might have a decree for compensation. On the hearing the court dismissed the bill as to all defendants, except Sherman, and found that under the bill was due complainants from him $6,714.65, and that he was chargeable on the ground of constructive, but not actual fraud. From that decree Sherman, as well as complainants, appealed.

Both appeals are now to be considered as one case on errors assigned by the respective parties.

Opinion of the court by SCOTT, C. J.

Although made a ground of relief in the bill, it is not insisted in argument it was any obstacle in the way of the execution of the power of sale contained in the mortgage, that the mortgagor was within the enemy's lines during the late war. His absence from the State was voluntary, and was with a view to cast his lot with a people then in rebellion against the government. Had he remained at the home he selected in the South after open hostilities had commenced, he would still have been within the federal lines and within access to his creditors. The question of the right of a creditor, under such circumstances, to enforce payment of his debt, has been put at rest by the former decisions of this court. Mixer v. Sibly, 53 Ill., 61; Willard et al v. Boggs, 56 Ill., 163; Harper v. Ely, 56 Ill., 179; Seymore v. Bailey, 66 Ill., 288; Hall v. Conn. Mut. Life Ins. Co. (Sep. T. 1873.)

Unless, therefore, the mortgage had been released as to the west half of the property, no valid reason existed why the creditor could not exercise the power of sale contained in the mortgage, to foreclose and cut off the mortgagor's equity of redemption. Sherman was the assignee of the mortgagee, the legal holder of the indebtedness secured, and was the only party that could rightfully exercise the power of sale. Pardee v. Lindly, 31 Ills., 174; Strother v. Law, 54 Ills., 413.

Had any portion of the property been discharged from the operation of the mortgage, it is very clear no sale could thereafter be made, that would legally affect the title. Whether any portion of the property included in the mortgage had been released prior to the trustee's sale, depends upon the construction that shall be given to the agreement of Ayers and Hamilton of the 23rd of March, 1857. The position assumed is that by reason of the agreement with the superadded facts of the payment of the installments due May 23rd, 1857, and the subsequent payment of one-half of the residue of the purchase money, the west half of the property became released and was discharged from the effects of the mortgage, long before Sherman undertook to execute the power of sale. We do not think the position is warranted by any fair construction of the agreement, certainly not in view of what subsequently transpired between the parties.

It will be remembered that Ayers and Hamilton were induced to consent to the agreement to release that portion of the property as a matter of mere favor to Hall and Smith to facilitate the making of the contract of sale between them. No consideration whatever was paid them, and no advantage in any respect accrued to them in consequence of making the agreement. On their part it was a mere gratuity. No doubt the object the parties had in view was that any payment made by Hall might be in reduction of the incumbrance on the west half of the property, until it should be released by the payment of one-half of the debt secured on the whole property, so that Smith might obtain an unincumbered title for that portion he had contracted to buy. It was a mere privilege to the parties to have all payments subsequent to the installment due on the 23rd day of May, 1857, so applied, and nothing more. When acted upon it would be binding upon the mortgagees notwithstanding there may have been no consideration for the agreement. After Smith had invested his money upon the faith of the previous consent of the mortgagees to permit future payments to be applied in a particular way, they would be estopped to retract such consent. It would be inequitable and against good conscience. But the agreement was for Smith's benefit and was in no sense for the benefit of Hall. Consent was given upon the express condition, Hall was not to be released from the payment of any portion of the unpaid mortgage indebtedness. Before any further payments had been made on the installments maturing after the 23rd of May, 1857, Smith being unable to complete his contract, re-conveyed the west half of the property back to Hall. Hence there was no necessity for having future payments made by Hall applied in reduction of the incumbrance on that portion of the property, and neither Hall nor anyone else ever asked to have them, nor were they ever so applied. Plainly it was no interest to Hall to have the payments so appropriated, and he consequently gave himself no concern about them. His obligation was to pay the entire mortgage indebtedness, and it was a matter of no consequence to him whether it rested on the east or west half of the property.

It is a misconception of the meaning of the agreement to suppose that Hall, by reason of the reconveyance of the property to him by Smith, obtained it with the privilege of having future payments applied in reduction of the incumbrance upon the west half. Clearly, any one claiming under Smith, as grantee, would be entitled to the benefit of the contract, but Hall claimed nothing as the grantee of Smith. What was done was the cancellation of the contract of sale. That was the effect of the reconveyance. After the reconveyance Hall held the property under the deed from Ayers and Hamilton, the same as though no contract had ever been made with Smith.

The circumstances proven establish, most conclusively, the parties themselves understood the agreement was for the benefit of Smith, and not Hall, after the reconveyance payments were made, without any reference as to how they were to be applied. Although the agreement was on record, it appears Sherman had no actual notice of it until about the time he was making the sales, under the power contained in the mortgage. Hall procured Sherman to release from the operation of the mortgage portions of the east half of the property, without disclosing to him that he understood the west half had already passed from under the mortgage. When the release of portions of the east half was made for Hall's convenience, it was expressly agreed Sherman reserved and retained his lien upon all the rest of the premises mentioned in the mortgage for the then unpaid amount secured thereby. Had it been the understanding of Hall the west half of the property had been or could be released on payment of one-half of the unpaid balance of the purchase money, it would have been a gross fraud on Sherman to procure from him a release of portions of the east half while he was under the belief all the rest of the premises remained subject to the mortgage, without diclosing that fact to him. On every principle of justice, it seems to us, in view of what transpired between the parties, Hall is estopped to insist there was any release of the west half of the property, under the agreement with Ayers and Hamilton. The acts of the parties are wholly inconsistent with any such theory. Neither Hall nor Smith ever asked to have the subsequent payments applied on the west half of the property, that it might be discharged from the mortgage lien, and they never were so appropriated. But could it, by any fair construction, be held that Hall could avail of the agreement with Ayers and Hamilton, it might, with great justness, be said, there was no consideration for it, and neither they nor their assigns were bound to perform it, so far as he is concerned. Hall was in no position to be prejudiced by the non-performance, and he could evoke no principle of estoppel as against them. He was not induced by any action on their part to place himself in a position he would not have done had it not been for the agreement, and there could therefore be nothing inequitable in permitting them to retract, had they chosen to do so.

Most difficult of all the questions arising from the record, is whether the sales made by Sherman, under the power contained in the mortgage, were effectual to foreclose the equity of redemption of the parties interested in the estate.—Should it appear the power was rightly exercised, the sales will not only bar the rights of Hall, but those of parties claiming the property under him as grantee or otherwise. One objection taken is the advertisement under which the sales were made was designed to mislead parties as to the amount remaining unpaid on the mortgage. Only one note, the last in the series, was unpaid, but the notices published recited in general terms default had been made in payment of the mortgage indebtedness, without specifying in what particular.—Who were interested in that question? Only Hall and those claiming under or jointly with him. They knew what amount had been paid, and of course were not misled. Strangers were in no wise interested in that question. So far as the public were concerned, and those that desired to become bidders or purchasers at the sale, it was enough that default had been made in the conditions of the mortgage. No complaint is made the trustee sold the property for more than was actually due. How then were defendants prejudiced by what is alleged to be a defective notice, and no creditors are complaining they were misled by it? But aside from this view we are not aware the law has made it obligatory upon the trustee to state in the notice of the sale the exact amount due under the mortgage, nor does the contract of the parties, as set forth in the mortgage, require it to be done. It would seem to be sufficient if the notice contains enough to show there has been a default in the condition, and also that it recites any fact the mortgage itself may provide it shall contain. More than that is mere redundancy, and can answer no good purpose.

Another point relied on with great confidence, as effecting the validity of the sale, is that the trustee was both buyer and seller at his own sale, in violation of a well known rule of law. Upon this ground the right of complainants is based, to be let in to redeem the property, and in case the specific relief cannot be obtained, they may have a decree for compensation against the offending trustee, and those confederating with them. One remarkable feature of the case is, there is not a particle of direct evidence in the record to sustain the allegation of the bill on this most important branch of the case, and the acts of the parties are all susceptible of an explanation consistent with the entire fairness in the sale. There is no conflict in the testimony. The answers of the trustee and purchasers, as well as the first grantee of the purchasers, were all called for under oath. So far as they are responsive to the allegations of the bill they are evidence, and were read on the hearing for that purpose. All the other testimony on this branch of the case comes from defendants examined as witnesses. The broad and unequivocal denials in the answers of any collusion between the trustee making the sale and the buyers are fully sustained by the testimony, and no contradictory evidence appears in the record. The buyers bought and paid for the property with their own money without any previous understanding with the trustee. Nicholes, who bought at the first sale himself made an arrangement with Cleaver to sell the property to his wife, and in pursuance with that contract it was afterwards conveyed to Mrs. Cleaver. With the preliminary negotiations Sherman had nothing to do. Cleaver called upon Nicholes in reference to another piece of property, and it was then for the first time he learned this property was for sale. All the proof is the property was sold for a high figure, perhaps more than it was really worth. But a small cash payment was made and the balance of the purchase money secured upon the property with no additional security. It was understood Cleaver was not then pecuniarily responsible, and unless the property appreciated in value it was not thought any thing could be realized out of the sale except the payment in hand. Afterwards, for a nominal consideration, Nicholes transferred to Sherman the securities taken from Cleaver and all benefit of the sale, and Sherman refunded to him the amount of his bid. It is shown Colfax bought at the second sale for himself and paid for the property at the time without any previous understanding with the trustee. Both Nicholes and Colfax according to the testimony, were abundantly able to buy the property and pay for it. Soon after the second sale Colfax entered into nogotiations with Cleaver, to sell him the part of the property he had bought. Under the belief he had effected a sale, he made a deed of the property, which was regularly acknowledged, but Cleaver for some reason refused or neglected to complete the sale. Colfax it seems had then left the State and the deed was placed in Sherman's safe, simply for safe keeping. Being unable to effect a sale, Colfax desired to get his money out of the speculation, that he might keep it at interest to defray current expenses. Sherman at the request of Colfax paid him back the amount of his bid and took the property off his hands. Sometime afterwards, the trade with Cleaver was consummated and for the purpose of making the conveyance, the old deed made by Colfax, was used. Although this latter deed bears date in July, 1863, it was not in fact delivered until the trade was consummated in June, 1864, about the time the deed was recorded. Complainants have challenged the fairness of the sales to Nicholes and Colfax made by the trustee under the power contained in the mortgage. The burden of proof was upon them to establish the fraud and collusion between the seller and the buyers. There is a total failure of evidence to establish the charges in that behalf. All the proof is the other way, and absolutely nothing to militate against it. Both the buyers and the seller declare under oath the sales were in good faith and without any collusion or previous understanding. The bidders bought on their own account and not for the trustee, nor in his interest. The sales were open and all the world were at liberty to bid. It is not even suggested the sales were not openly and publicly conducted.

Assuming it to be proven, as we must do, from the testimony, the sales were fairly conducted and the purchasers bona fide, no reason can be assigned why they were not effectual to cut off the equity of redemption of Hall and all claiming the same estate through him. What contracts Sherman may have afterwards made in relation to the property could not vitiate the sales. When his trust had expired, there is no reason in law or public policy, why he could not contract in relation to the property the same as any stranger could do. At the time he negotiated with Nicholes and Colfax in regard to the property, his duties as trustee had ceased and he occupied no confidential relations to Hall or any one claiming the property. After the trust had been fully performed and all fiduciary relations ceased, the law has not forbidden the trustee to deal with what had been trust property as strangers may do, and acting in good faith he may become its owner by purchase or otherwise. In the case at bar the equity of redemption had been cut off by a sale in all things substantially correct. The property had passed into the hands of third parties and beyond the reach of the mortgagor. Upon principle, how could the former owner be affected by any dealing of his former trustee with the property.

No policy adapted to preserve the utmost fairness between a trustee and the cestui qui trust, has inhibited the trustee after their relations have wholly ceased to deal with the property as any other person might do. This view of the law is warranted by the previous decisions of this court. We had occasion, in the recent case of Munn v. Burgess, 70 Ill., 604, to examine this branch of the law, and it was there said "jealous as courts of equity are, watching the conduct of a trustee in connection with the objects of his trust, he is only forbidden by them from dealing with the trust property for his own benefit so long as the trust continues. The moment it ceases he occupies precisely the same relation to it that strangers to the trust do, and acting in good faith, he may become the owner by purchase or otherwise." The principle of this case is conclusive on this point, in the case we are considering.

When Sherman took an assignment to himself of the property bought by Nicholes and Colfax, his duties as trustee had been fully discharged. He had not previous to that time, dealt in the trust property, for his own benefit, and what he did afterwards could by no possibility prejudice complainants. On the principle, they had no interest in the property that could be misappropriated by him who had been their trustee. The deeds had been delivered, and the property had passed irrevocably from the trustee, and the cestui qui trust into the hands of bona fide purchasers, and they could sell it for any consideration they chose to whomsoever would buy. Whether Sherman paid any adequate consideration for the property, is a matter of no consequence and does not affect the decision. Whether he did or not affords no grounds for relief in their favor.—There is yet another consideration that bears strongly on the decision of the case. Should it be conceded the irregularities insisted upon actually existed, still the sale would not be absolutely void, but only voidable at the election of the parties interested in the estate.

Acquiescence in the sale, unexplained for any considerable time, will be deemed a waiver of all mere irregularities that may have intervened. Whatever may have been the status of Bush, or Richards or his heirs, in consequence of the civil war, they can assert no rights in this court that Hall could not maintain, had he been the sole complainant. Succeeding to his rights under the mortgage, whatever would bar relief as to Hall would cut off relief as to them. More than four years elapsed after the sales alleged to be irregular were made, before any steps were taken to set them aside. If Hall did not know of the existence of the facts which he now insists vitiate the sales, it was because of his own voluntary conduct. The exigencies of the war of the rebellion can afford no excuse for the delay in asserting whatever rights he may have had in the premises. Voluntarily he placed himself beyond the protection of the laws and the government under which he had acquired his claim to the property he now seeks to have appropriated to him by a court of equity.

The State to which he removed had already by ordinance manifested a purpose to withdraw from the federal Union. He deliberately elected to cast his lot with the people of the South, and abandoned his property in the North to the chances of war. Whatever may have been his declared intention, it was of his own choice he placed himself in a position where he would be subject to be drafted into the armies organized for the destruction of the government, and if he had not volunteered he no doubt would have been compelled to enter the military service. He chose the former alternative, and enlisted in the armies of the South. Had he remained at Thibodeaux, the place selected for a home for himself and family, he would still have been, as we have seen, within the federal lines, with the exception of a brief period in the summer of 1863. Direct communication was kept open by rail and by water between Thibodeaux and New Orleans, and from thence to Chicago, where his property was situated. Had he remained in the vicinity of this property it would doubtless be conceded he allowed an unreasonable time to elapse before bringing his bill, and surely it cannot be asked for him in a court of conscience the application of a more liberal rule, because he was absent through many years, engaged in a war for the destruction of the government. On what principle of justice can he invoke the application of a less stringent rule than would be applied to a citizen who had contributed by his presence and his means to the maintenance of those laws, under which all property is secured? Without justifiable cause he abandoned his property to what he called the "chances." No provision was made for removing the incumbrance he knew was liable to be foreclosed in a summary manner that would cut off whatever claim he had to the property. He paid neither interest nor principal, and manifested no disposition to do so. Nor did he make any provisions for the payment of taxes which was necessary to preserve the property for the parties interested in it. Most clearly he abandoned all his interests in the property to the vicissitudes of war. As was forcibly said by Mr. Justice Davis in McQuiddy v. Ware, 20 Wall, 14: "Here then is a "case of a party engaging in the re- "bellion without provision for his "debts, to which there was no de- "fense, asking a court of equity after "the lapse of many years, without suf- "ficient excuse for the delay to interfere "in his behalf, because his creditors "adopted the wrong methods for the en- "forcement of their claims against "him."

Adopting the language of this court in Hall v. Conn. Mu. Life Ins. Co. as most appropriate, it is an anomalous excuse for a party to offer in a court of equity, for not asserting at an earlier period whatever rights he may have had in the premises, "that he was voluntarily away engaged in a warfare for the destruction of the government." In Hamilton v. Lubukee, 51 Ill., 415, it was said, "even if the mortgagee himself had been the purchaser through the aid of a third person to whom he could have conveyed and then taken the title from him, such title would not be absolutely void, but voidable only; and if immediate steps should not be taken by the cestui que trust, the mortgagor, on his obtaining a knowledge of the sale, to set it aside, a ratification by him would be implied. Such a sale can be set aside only at the option of the cestui que trust, and that must be determined in apt time."

The case of Munn v. Burgess, cited supra, has some elements in common with the one we are considering. It was there said: "At most the irregularity complained of in the sale, only rendered the title voidable, and an application to set it aside for that cause, should have been made within a reasonable time, and before the rights of innocent third parties had intervened." Numerous cases in this court declare the doctrine of laches as applicable to the case at bar. Dempster v. West, 69 Ills., 613; Cox v. Montgomery, 36 Ills., 398; Winchester v. Edwards, 57 Ills., 46: Seymore v. Bailey, supra.

The principle that lies at the foundation of all cases in this court upon this subject is, the party who challenges a sale on account of irregularities that may have intervened, must be diligent in his discovering that which he alleges will avoid the sale, and diligent in his application for relief. Unreasonable delay, not explained by equitable circumstances, has always been declared evidence of acquiescence in the sale, and a waiver of all mere irregularities. A party will not be permitted to delay, to enable him to speculate on the chance of an appreciation in values of the property, and elect to avoid the sale only when it will be profitable to do so. He must make his election at the earliest practicable moment.

In the case at bar complainants are only seeking to enforce equitable rights. Default had been made in the conditions of the mortgage, and all that remained to them under the most favorable construction, was the equity of redemption in the property. Relief in no view could be had except in a court of chancery, and upon terms that should be just to all parties.

At the sales under the power contained in the mortgage, the property sold for its full cash value. Since then it has increased many times in value, so that now it would be desirable to redeem the property. No great speculation could have been anticipated shortly after the sales. All the facts complainants now know upon which they base the theory the sales are invalid, would have been in the reach of Hall had he not voluntarily gone beyond the federal lines while the war was in progress, when it was impracticable to return. Such facts were matters existing on the public records, and were readily accessible to any one seeking to know them. Actual hostilities ceased between the North and the South in the spring of 1865. Shortly thereafter communication was fully established between all sections of the country. The mails were established, and travel was entirely safe. It was practicable for complainants, had they instituted inquiry, to have obtained all the information they now possess in the year 1865. Yet this bill was not filed until December, 1867. Perhaps one reason is the property had not then appreciated in value to so great an extent. Complainants have shown no equities superior to those of defendants. Now since the law has been established that gives value and permanent security to property, they seek to recover that which had been deliberately abandoned. Previously no effort had been made to discharge the incumbrance resting upon the property. This, it seems to us, would be inequitable, and especially after the lapse of so great a period, even if it should be conceded complainants may have had equitable rights in the premises had they asserted them in apt time. After a most careful examination we discover no grounds for relief in any view of the case that can fairly be taken.

The decree will therefore be reversed and the bill dismissed.

TERMS:—TWO DOLLARS per annum, in advance Single Copies, TEN CENTS.

We call attention to the following opinions, reported at length in this issue.

DE FACTO GOVERNMENTS—RETROCESSION OF PART OF DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States by SWAYNE, J., in a case brought to determine the validity of the retrocession by Congress to the State of Virginia of that part of the District of Columbia, as originally constituted, which was ceded by Virginia o the United States. The court states the rights of de facto governments, and that it has been the practice of the United States to recognize them.

LIABILITY OF STOCKHOLDER FOR DEBTS OF CORPORATION—STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States, by SWAYNE, J., as to the liability of stockholders for the debts of a corporation, construing the statutes of South Carolina, extending the statute of limitations, and stating which is the proper form of action to bring against such stockholder to establish his individual liability.

JUDGMENT ON A LEGAL HOLIDAY VOID—BANKRUPTCY—ADVERSE CLAIM.—The opinion of the United States District Court for the western district of Wisconsin by HOPKINS, J., holding, following the construction placed upon the statute by the Supreme Court of Wisconsin, that a judgment entered on a day declared to be a legal holiday by statute is void; that although a party holding an adverse interest cannot be brought in by petition by an assignee in a summary way, to have the claim determined, such claimant may voluntarily come in by petition and submit his claim to the decision of the court. We fear that the learned judge, for whose opinions we have the greatest respect, has gone too far in holding that no lien is created by a transcript because it is filed on Christmas day. We are constrained to believe that he would not have made the decision if it had not been for the construction placed upon the statue by the Supreme Court of Wisconsin. In this connection we refer the reader to an able and exhaustive opinion of our Supreme Court in Langaber v. The Fairbury, Pontiac & N. W. R. R. Co., et al., delivered by the learned judge BREESE, reported 6. CHICAGO LEGAL NEWS, 190, where it was held that in certain cases a bill in chancery might be filed and an injunction issued and served on Sunday; that anciently courts of justice did sit on Sunday; that the early Christians of the sixth century and before, used all days alike for the hearing of causes, not sparing Sunday itself; but in the year 517 a canon was promulgated exempting Sundays, and other canons were afterwards adopted exempting other days, which were all adopted by the Saxon kings, and all confirmed by William the Conqueror and Henry the Second, and in that way became a part of the common law of England; that by these canons other days were declared unjudicial, as the day of the purification of the blessed Virgin Mary, the feast of the ascension, the feast of St. John the Baptist, and All Saints and All Souls days. These were as much unjudicial days as Sunday. Yet the most devoted admirer of the common law would not hesitate to say that the proceedings of a court of justice in this State on either of those days would be valid. Judge Breese so ably sets forth the necessity for courts of justice to be able on Sunday, in certain cases, to exercise judicial restraining power, that we give the concluding portion of his opinion, which is as follows:

"Here this dies non juridicus, was selected by the railroad company as the proper day to commit a great outrage upon private and public rights, believing the arm of the law could not be extended on that day to arrest them in their high-handed and unlawful design. To the complainants, the acts they were organized to perpetrate on that day, were fraught with irreparable injury. Feeble indeed would be the judicial arm if it could not reach such miscreants. To save a debt of twenty dollars, judicial acts can be performed on Sunday, and ministerial as well. To prevent the ruin of an individual such an act must not be done! Lame and impotent conclusion. In Comyn's Digest, title 'Temp,' under the head Dies non juridicus, it is said the Chancery is always open. So the Exchequer may sit upon a Sunday or out of term; p. 333 (c. 5.) There is nothing, to an intelligent mind, revolting in this.—Suppose, in times of high political excitement, a citizen is indicted for treason, and judgment of death pronounced against him by a servile judge, who, not a slave of the Crown, as were Trevelyan, Scroggs, and Jeffries, but yet the slave of an enraged populace, on an indictment never returned into court or found by a grand jury, and defective in every essential, and this judgment pronounced on Saturday, and the time of his execution fixed on the following Monday. To arrest this proposed judicial murder, an application is made to a member of the appellate court on the intervening Sabbath; who would justify the judge should he fold his arms, and on the plea the day was not a judicial day, suffer the victim to be led to execution? The necessity of the case would be the law of the case. The judge who has no respect for this principle is unworthy of the ermine, and an unfit conservator of the rights of the citizen. The case before us is not one of life or death, but involves irreparable injury to property. An imperious necessity demanded the prompt interposition of chancery. On that principle the act is fully justified. This is the dictate of right, of reason, of common justice and common sense.

The decree of the court below, quashing the writ of injunction and dismissing the bill, is reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings.

DEFENDANT ABSENT IN THE REBELLION — RELEASE — ADVERTISEMENT UNDER TRUST DEED—RIGHT OF TRUSTEE TO PURCHASE.—The opinion of the Supreme court of Illinois by SCOTT, C. J., holding that the question of the right of a creditor, when the mortgagor was absent, voluntarily in the Rebellion, to enforce the payment of his debt, has been put to rest by the former decisions of the court; that an agreement to release a portion of the mortgaged premises without consideration is a mere gratuity and cannot be enforced, but when acted upon will be binding upon the parties. The court states what an advertisement of a trustee's sale should contain, and holds that after the trust has been fully performed and all fiduciary relations ceased, the law has not forbidden the trustee to deal with what had been trust property, as strangers may do, and acting in good faith, he may become its owner by purchase or otherwise; that acquiescence in the sale unexplained for any considerable time will be deemed a waiver of all mere irregularities that may have intervened.

DRAINS AND SEWERS—ACT UNCONSTITUTIONAL.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of this State by SCOTT, J., holding that commissioners appointed under the act in question, have no rightful authority under the statute, to construct a levee as a principal work, independently of a system of drainage, nor can they under the statute, at the expense of land owners, erect and maintain at great expense, an immense levee on the banks of a river subject to overflow, when such levee is not connected with any system of drainage or ditches; that the Legislature possesses no power under the constitution to vest the commissioners or juries selected by the county court, with authority to assess and collect taxes or special assessments for such contemplated improvements; that the General Assembly has power under the constitution to vest cities, towns and villages only with power to make local improvements by special taxation upon contiguous property, benefitted by such improvement. All other taxation must be uniform in respect to persons and property within the jurisdiction imposing the same.

NOTES TO RECENT CASES.

ENACTING CLAUSE OF STATUTE.

The Constitution of Nevada provides that the enacting clause of every law shall be as follows: "The People of the State of Nevada, represented in Senate and Assembly, do enact as follows." The Supreme Court of that State, in State v. Rogers, 3 Am. L. T. Rep., 339, held, that this clause is mandatory, and that the omission of the words "Senate and" from the enacting clause of an act of the legislature, renders the act unconstitutional and void.

NATIONAL BANKS—ILLEGAL INTEREST.

The United States Circuit Court for the District of Kansas, in Crocker v. First National Bank, 3 Am. L. T. Rep, 350, held, where a national bank located in Kansas, charged and received interest at the rate of eighteen per cent. per annum, that it was liable, under the National Banking Act, to pay back twice the amount of interest so received; that if the person who paid such illegal interest is adjudged a bankrupt, the right of action passes to his assignee in bankruptcy; that the amount of the recovery is twice the full amount of interest paid, and is not limited to twice the excess of interest paid over the legal rate.

WITNESS — COMPETENCY OF — WHAT LAW GOVERNS.

The Supreme Court of Ohio, in John v. Bridgman, 27 O. St., 23, held, when at the time the action was brought, a witness would have been incompetent, but an amendatory law in force at the time of the trial makes him competent, that the law in force at the time of the trial governs the question; that such a law, so applied, is not retroactive within the prohibition of the Constitution.

BANKRUPTCY—VOID TRANSFER OF PROPERTY

The Supreme Court of Minnesota in Stevenson et al., v. McLaren et al., 3 Cent. Law Journal, 478, held that under the thirty-fifth section of the Bankrupt Act of 1867, the transfers of property mentioned by it are, as against bankrupt proceedings instituted within the prescribed time, absolutely void, and the property so transferred may be taken by the marshal under a provisional warrant issued in such proceedings.

THE RIGHT FOR ONE DOG TO KILL ANOTHER.

The Supreme Court of Michigan is Heisrodt v. Hackett, 3 Cent. Law Journal 479, held that a statute permitting "any person," and requiring police officers, to kill unlicensed dogs, does not justify one dog in killing another of his own motion. We judge from the opinion of the court that it would have been held to be a legal killing if the dog had been set on by a police officer or a constable.

CHECK ON BANKER—ASSIGNMENT OF DEBT.

The English Court of Common Pleas Division in Schroder et al. v. The Central Bank of London, 34 L. T. Rep., N. S., 735, held, that a check is not an assignment by the drawer to the payee of a debt or chose in action, within the meaning of the Judicature Act, 1873, sec. 25, sub. sec. 6., and therefore the payee of a check has no right of action for its dishonor against the banker on whom it is drawn.

BLACKSMITH SHOP IN CITY.

The Supreme Court of Pa., in Raub v. Tamany et al., 3 Monthly Western Jurist, 209, held that the erection of a blacksmith shop in a town or city is not a nuisance per se. We are not aware of any decision on this question in Illinois, but we do know that there are several blacksmith shops in the most populous portions of the city. We have no doubt the court here would hold with the Pennsylvania court, that they are not a nuisance per se.

SPEECHES OF LORD ERSKINE, WHILE AT THE BAR. Edited by James L. High, Counselor at Law, Volume I. Chicago: Callaghan & Co., 1876. Price bound in half calf, $4.50; sheep, $3.50; cloth, $3.00.

These speeches, edited by Mr. High, comprise four volumes. The first and second are now before us. The third and fourth will follow in about four weeks. Great credit is due the publishers, Messrs. Callaghan & Co., for the magnificent style in which they have presented these volumes to the profession. It is with a feeling of pride as well as pleasure that we say these volumes were printed upon the Legal News press, from plates made in the Legal News stereotype foundry. The paper is heavy and of a superior quality. The binding, in three styles, half-calf, sheep and in cloth, is from the bindery of Cox & Co., and is fully equal to that of any similar work ever published in the West. In the preparation of these speeches for publication, Mr. High has exercised that good taste and judgment for which he has become so celebrated as an author. The first volume contains a well written memoir of Lord Erskine, by Mr. High, in which the principal events in the life of the learned jurist and eloquent orator are briefly sketched. We know of no work better calculated than these speeches to give a lawyer a correct idea of State trials, or prosecutions by the government. In the prosecutions for libel we see the same efforts to convict the smaller criminals by the evidence of the greater, and to allow the latter to go unwhipped by justice, as in the late whisky prosecutions. By reading these speeches the lawyer will see the importance of not giving too much weight to the evidence of self-convicted criminals. The present is the most complete collection of Lord Erskine's speeches that has ever been published, as it contains many that have never before been given to the reading public, and is believed to contain all his legal arguments of every nature which were ever reported. Each speech is prefaced with a concise statement of the facts in the case, to enable the reader to better understand the argument which follows. In some instances extracts from the pleadings or testimony are given, but in all cases the learned editor has kept brevity and conciseness constantly in view. In addition to the statements of cases, notes are added to aid in a fully understanding of the text, or to elucidate some obscure reference, but in no case has the text been altered. Mr. High in concluding his preface says, "the extent and variety of the topics covered by these speeches, the vast research and fertility of genius which they display, not less than their lofty eloquence and an ardent love of liberty manifest throughout them all, fix their place as legal classics, to which the lawyer will forever turn with increasing delight."

REPORTS OF CASES ARGUED AND DETERMINED IN THE SUPREME COURT OF THE STATE OF WISCONSIN, with Tables of the Cases and Principal Matters. O. M. Conover, Official Reporter. Volume XXXIX., containing Cases determined at the August term, 1875, and the January term, 1876. Chicago: Callaghan & Company, Law Publishers. 1876.

The mechanical execution of the volume is excellent, and reflects credit upon our Chicago publishers from whose house it emanates. They fully appreciate the necessity of having the opinions of a court of last resort of a State, placed in the hands of the bar as soon as possible after they are delivered. The present volume contains all the cases not previously reported, which were ripe for reporting on the 6th of June last, including all those finally determined before that date; in accordance with the views of the court, where there was oral argument in the Supreme Court, the counsel who appeared there, are alone named in the report of the argument; where submitted on briefs, the names of counsel are given as found upon the briefs. The opinion of the court refusing to admit Miss Goodell to the bar, the propriety of rendering which the newspapers have hardly ceased to discuss, is here given in full, and occupies fifteen pages. In Siegbert et al. v Stiles, it is held, under the Wisconsin statute, that commercial paper maturing on Sunday, or on a legal holiday, becomes due on the next preceding secular day; and by analogy to this statute, where any other contract, by its terms, matures on a Sunday, it will be held to mature on the next preceding secular day.

In Hopkins v. Hopkins, it is held, that in actions for divorce, the courts of Wisconsin have no authority to take the custody and control of the child from both parents, and give it to a stranger.

THE FLUSH TIMES OF ALABAMA AND MISSISSIPPI. A series of sketches, by Joseph G. Baldwin. Eleventh thousand. San Francisco: Sumner, Whitney & Co., 1876.

This is a neat volume of 330 pages. It contains sketches of lawyers and anecdotes relating to legal matters, some of which are quite amusing.

ENDOWED LAW PRIZES.

At a recent meeting of the board of management of the Union College of Law, a communication was received from Callaghan & Co., whereby that firm proposed to permanently endow an annual prize of $100 to such member of the graduating class of each year as should be found by a committee of attorneys to have attained the highest proficiency in his legal studies. The letter accompanying the proposal stated that the donors were attracted by the past success and future promise of the college to believe that it would aid in rendering Chicago the legal centre of the country. The offer was accepted with thanks, and a resolution adopted that the Callaghan prize of $100 be published as one of the regular prizes of the college. The Horton prize of $50 for the best brief or essay on some legal topic, which was awarded for the first time at the last commencement, called forth from the students several highly meritorious efforts, though it was announced too late in the year to admit of full preparation for the contest. The Callaghan prize will add zest to the examinations of the coming college year, and will stimulate the class of 1877 to its utmost efforts. Two other prizes are under consideration, and will probably be announced before the opening of the term on Sept. 15, next. One of these will be for highest legal attainments in the junior class, and the other for oratory in either class.

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

ABSTRACT OF OPINIONS FILED AT SPRINGFIELD, JUNE 30TH, 1876.

185.—Louis Farndenstein v. Calvin D. McNear, et al.—Appeal from De Witt.—Opinion by CRAIG, J., reversing and remanding.

NON-FEASANCE OF CONSTABLE—SICKNESS AS AN EXCUSE.

STATEMENT.—McNear, as constable, having an execution, was notified that at a certain date, the defendant in the execution (who lived in another county) would be in the county of McNear with property, subject to execution. The defendant remained several days in the county, but no levy was made. On the trial of suit upon the official bond, against the objections of plaintiff, McNear was allowed to allege and prove in excuse of his non-action, that he was sick at the time with chills and fever. Held,

1. That as to the official acts of the constable, his official bond, and the statute in force when it was executed, must be taken to be the contract between him and his sureties on the one hand, and the public on the other.

2. Sickness is no excuse for non-performance of a constable's duty, since he could turn the business over to another officer, if unable to attend to it himself; or, at least, could notify the plaintiff in execution and the J. P., so that they could take the necessary steps.

Herein, DICKEY, J., (SCOTT, Ch. J., concuring with him) concurred with the other judges in reversing this case; but thought the rule that sickness could not excuse the non-performance of an official act, was stated too broadly by the opinion in the case.

196.—Joseph R. Shaw et al. v. The Wilson Sewing Machine Co.—Error to McLean.—Opinion by DICKEY, J., affirming.

SURETIES' LIABILITY UNDER SPECIAL STIPULATIONS.

STATEMENT.—Appellee, constituting Shaw an agent for selling machines, took from him a bond, with security, (Dunlap) which provided: "The undersigned agree and consent that the Wilson Sewing Machine Company may, in their discretion, take and receive from said Shaw any security whatever at any time, and grant any extension to said Shaw, without in any way affecting the liability of the signers hereto, or either of them, or discharging, or releasing of them, or either of them, from the obligation of this bond."

Shaw, becoming delinquent in payment to the amount of over $1,000, the company settled with him, and took his note payable in six months, with interest. Suit was brought afterwards on the bond. Shaw was not served, and Dunlap, the surety, pleaded to the declaration

It was strenuously maintained that the settlement with Shaw released the obligation of the bond; but held,

That this might have been so, if the surety had not expressly stipulated that he guarantied not only present, but all future liabilities, and that the taking of other security or granting extension, should not release the obligation of the bond; and, although it seems to be a very improvident act for the surety to enter into such a stipulation, the court cannot relieve him from the results of his own folly.

200.—Henry Schwabacker et al. v. Emory L. Rush et al.—Appeal from McLean.—Opinion by SCOTT, Ch. J., affirming.

EVIDENCE REQUISITE IN ATTACHMENT, AS TO INTENT TO DELAY, ETC., CREDITORS—FRAUD.

STATEMENT.—Attachment against Rush, in which the affidavit alleged, that within two years defendant fraudulently conveyed and assigned the property attached, with intent to hinder and delay creditors. Held, that if the sale called in question, was a fair transaction on a valuable consideration, the attachment cannot be maintained under that allegation, even if there had been no sufficient delivery to pass the title to the purchaser, as against execution creditors of the vendor. Under the allegation the fraudulent intent must be proved, and the assignment of the property must be actually fraudulent, to maintain the attachment.

203.—John H. Francin v. Peter Kerker.—Appeal from McLean. Opinion by BREESE, J., reversing and remanding.

DISTRESS FOR RENT, WHERE PREMISES SOLD DURING THE TERM—PLEA OF SET OFF.

STATEMENT.—Distress for rent in $640, for a lease of farm. During the term the landlord sold the farm, and then afterwards instituted these proceedings to collect arrears. Defendant pleaded a set-off of $5,000. He made no attempt to prove the plea, but was permitted under it, against objection, to show the sale of the farm—although the purchaser had neither received nor demanded any rent of him, nor had he attorned to the purchaser. Held,

1. That a plea of set off is an acknowledgment of the justice of the plaintiff's demand, and where it fails in the proof, the judgment must be for the plaintiff's demand.

2. As the defendant had not attorned to the purchaser, he could not deny his landlord's title, nor interpose any matters between his landlord and the purchaser, as a defence.

208. Delinquent lands of Ford County, etc., 1874 v. The People, etc.—Appeal from Ford.—Opinion by SHELDON, J., affirming.

REQUISITES OF PROCEEDINGS TO SELL LANDS TO PAY TAXES—CONTESTANTS—BURDEN OF PROOF—PRESUMPTIONS—FORM OF JUDGMENT.

STATEMENT.—Application for judgment against delinquent lands. James Mix (the real appellant) filed 36 objections, of which only a few were considered by the Supreme court, as conclusive of the case.

It was insisted that it was incumbent on the People to show a compliance with all the various provisions of the statute under which the objections were made. Held,

That the collector's report of the list of delinquent lands makes a prima facie case; and devolves the burden of proof upon a contestant.

It was objected that the record showed no sufficient advertisement nor certificate. Held,

That, as the clerk had certified that the newspaper containing these was lost, and as the bill of exceptions states that the paper showing the publication of the delinquent list, with certificate, was given in evidence, the presumption is that the advertisement and certificate were sufficient.

It was objected that it did not appear the collector filed with the county clerk the list of delinquent lands five days before the commencement of the term, as required by statute. Held,

The presumption is that the collector performed his duty in this respect.

It was objected that the form of the judgment entered, varied from that prescribed by the statute. The statutory form is, first, a judgment against the land for the taxes; and then an order for the sale thereof for the taxes. But herein the form of judgment against the land was omitted, and only the order entered. Held,

That this was a substantial compliance with the statute, since the order amounted to a determination of what was the amount of taxes due upon each tract, and an order of sale thereof for the payment. Held,

Also, that costs may properly be taxed against a contestant failing to make good his objections.

213. Andrew J. Roberts v. William Parlin, et al.—Appeal from Mason.—Opinion by SCHOLFIELD, J., Reversing.

REQUISITES OF OFFICIAL BOND UNDER STATUTE OF 1872.

STATEMENT.—Suit on official bond, dated April 8, 1873, in the following form:

"Whereas, Andrew J. Roberts was, on the first day of April, 1873, elected constable for the town of Manito, county of Mason, and State of Illinois; Now, therefore, we, Andrew J. Roberts, as principal, and John C. Rocker and M. W. Rogers, as securities, jointly and severally, agree to pay to each and every person who may be entitled thereto, all such sums of money as the said constable may become liable to pay on account of any execution which shall be delivered to him for collection, by virtue of his office; and all such damages as each and every such person may sustain by reason of any mal-feasance, mis-feasance, or non-performance of duty on the part of said constable." Held,

1. That, although under the law of 1861, this bond would have been valid and binding as a statutory bond, yet, by the act of July 1, 1872, superseding the former, it is provided that "every constable, before he shall enter upon the duties of his office, shall execute and deliver to the county clerk of the proper county, within twenty days after his election, a bond, to be approved by said clerk, with two or more good and sufficient securities, in the sum of not less than $2,000, nor more than $10,000, conditioned that he shall faithfully discharge the duties of his office, etc. The said bond shall be made payable to the people of the State of Illinois."

As there was no compliance with this statute therein, the bond is invalid as a statutory bond.

2. Nor is it a good common law bond, because therein it is indispensable that there shall be an obligee, as well as an obligor, and that it shall be for the payment of a certain sum of money.

3. Nor is it good as the evidence of a contract enforcible at common law, because there is the absence of necessary parties; contracts cannot be made by one party alone.

4. The bond cannot be enforced in any way, but is void.

214.—Jerome B. Massey v. William S. Hardin.—Appeal from Mason.—Opinion by CRAIG, J., affirming.

FORECLOSURE OF CHATTEL MORTGAGE—ESTOPPEL OF MORTGAGEE THEREIN.

STATEMENT.—Appellant foreclosed a chattel mortgage on personal property of appellee, who had executed the mortgage, and at the sale bid in the property and left it in charge of appellee. A part of the stock died, part was sold on attachments against appellant, and the remainder sold by appellee to pay him for keeping the property.

Appellant claimed that the foreclosure sale was not absolute, and was not intended to transfer the title; but only to continue the lien until he should succeed in borrowing money for appellee. Appellee maintained that the sale was absolute. Held,

1. That it was a question of fact for the jury, whether a note is satisfied by a sale of mortgaged property.

2. Appellant cannot be allowed to say that he did not conduct the sale according to law, and that he did not, in good faith, bid in the property at the foreclosure sale. He is estopped by his own conduct; and must be held to his engagement at the sale.

180.—John Jones v. John Warner.—Appeal from De Witt.—Opinion by WALKER, J., affirming.

SUIT ON COVENANTS IN WARRANTY DEED—LACHES OF GRANTEE—CONSTRUCTION OF COVENANTS—IRREGULARITY OF JUROR'S CONDUCT.

STATEMENT.—Appellant took a deed of warranty from appellee, of lands in Missouri, which he failed to have recorded. Afterwards, a decree was made in the county where the land was situated, divesting appellee of all title in this land, under a bond he executed to one Devarel, more than two months after the date of the deed to appellant. Service was by publication. Appellant brought suit on the covenant of seizins and good right to convey, and also general warranty. Held,

1. That these are covenants in presenti, and if broken at all, are broken immediately on the delivery of the deed.

2. If, afterwards, the grantor sells the land again, and through the negligence of the grantee the subsequent sale is allowed to take effect, he is without remedy on the covenants of seizin and right to convey.

3. Under the covenant of general warranty, it must be shown that the covenantee has been evicted by an outstanding title, and not by his own acts or negligence; or, that he is unable to obtain possession under the title derived from covenantor, by reason of the fact that the title he has received is inferior to the title under which the land is held adversely. An exception to this may be where the covenantor, by his prior or subsequent acts, defeats the title he has covenanted to warrant and defend.

4. But the Missouri decree might be impeachable, under the general doctrine that a judgment or decree is only prima facie evidence of facts recited beyond the State where the decree was rendered.—But if the decree was fraudulent, it would give plaintiff no right of action on the covenants in the deed. In impeaching the decree, no especial plea was necessary, the fact being merely matter of evidence.

5. Where it is apparent that no harm could have proceeded from the irregular conduct of a juror, a verdict will not thereon be set aside, even if permitting the irregularity might be a proper ground for punishing the officer having the jury in charge.

STATUTE OF FRAUDS—SIGNING—DAMAGES ON FAILURE TO FULFIL A BID FOR LANDS AT ADMINISTRATOR'S SALE.

Held, 1. That where, directly after a bid at an administrator's sale of land, the administrator draws up a deed and signs it, and the bidder signs a note, and both are left with a third party, with directions to deliver the deed when the requisite personal security on the note was given, and a mortgage executed and delivered on the land, as required by the conditions of sale; this is a sufficient signing under the statute of frauds, to bind the parties.

2. Where the bidder then fails to fulfil the conditions, and the land is afterwards sold at a reduced price from the amount of the first bid, he is liable to make up the loss.

POSSESSION UNDER LIMITATION ACT OF 1835 AND ACTUAL RESIDENCE BY TENANT—GENERAL CONSTRUCTION OF THE ACT.

Held, 1. That, under the limitation act of 1835, the seven years actual residence on the land of which the title is deducible of record according to the terms of the act, may be by tenant, as well as in person.

2. This construction of the law is confirmed by the decisions in the State of Kentucky, from which State the law of 1835 was derived, it being a familiar rule of law that where one State adopts a statute in force in another, which has been construed by the courts of the State where the statute was in force, the act is adopted with the construction given it by such courts.

3. In Kentucky, it has been decided that, under the occupying claimant's law, where a tenant occupies a portion of the time, and then the landlord comes in, immediately on the expiration of the term, he should be "permitted to avail himself of the protection which the statute would have afforded the tenant, had he continued his possession; in the same manner that a vendee is allowed the benefit of the previous possession and settlement of his vendor. The design of the statute equally requires the protection of the landlord who comes in after the tenant's time may have expired, and, therefore, an interpretation of the statute, according to its spirit, is, that the settlement and possession of the tenant should ensue to the benefit of the landlord and be accorded him. * * * The actual occupancy of the land by settlement of seven years, under a title deducible of record, constitutes the bar which the statute intended to provide; and whether there be one or more occupants during the seven years is immaterial, provided they are connected with the same title, and hold under one another in succession, or for each other."

4. Where there is a contest between a purchaser under a senior judgment and a purchaser under a junior judgment against the same debtor and owner, and then the latter lets the land to the debtor as his tenant, the possession of the latter is adverse as to the former purchaser, and is a possession by tenant of the latter purchaser.

5. Where, between the latter purchaser and the former owner, there is a contract of sale, under which the former owner enters into possession under the contract, the possession, on the same principle, is that of the vendor. By the purchase, he recognizes the vendor's title, and, like a tenant, in all proceedings for the recovery of the possession by the vendor, he is estopped from disputing his title. He enters and holds under the title of the vendor, and his occupancy is subservient and subordinate to that title; and, from this relation, and for the same reason, his possession becomes as fully that of the vendor as does that of the tenant become that of the landlord.

6. Where, in such case, the vendee dies, leaving his tenant in possession, and the widow takes only such control as is temporary, and without making any claim on her own behalf, and turns over the possession to the vendor, there is no break thereby in the continuity of possession, as to the vendor; and he can claim the benefit of the statute.

TOO LARGE A BID AT A JUDICIAL SALE BY A JUDGMENT CREDITOR, NOT RELIEVABLE.

Held, That where an equity of redemption has been levied upon, on a judgment against a mortgage, and one bids at the sale without thinking of, or knowing of, the existence of the mortgage, though on record, and bids an amount much too high for the interest sold, he has no standing in a court of equity to apply for relief from his mistake. It was his own negligence merely, in not examining the records, which caused his loss, and herein the doctrine of caveatemptor fully applies. And it makes no difference that the bidder was the judgment creditor himself, for whom the levy was made.

TRESPASS ON SWAMP LANDS—PRINCIPLE OF LIABILITY.

STATEMENT.—Appellee purchasing swamp lands from Livingston county, and failing to make payment, the contract of purchase was rescinded, and the land resold to appellant. Afterwards, appellee employed a large number of choppers and cut timber off the land, knowing that appellant had the legal title. Held,

That, while it is necessary in order to subject any one to the penalties of the statute against thus cutting timber, it must be proved that he knew the land was not his own, and that he did not merely cut timber honestly believing the land to be his after taking reasonable pains to ascertain his boundaries; yet, as all the circumstances in this case tend to show appellee committed a wilful trespass in the cutting, he is liable to the penalties of the statute.

225.—Joseph C. Morrison v. James C. Smith.—Appeal from McLean.—Opinion by WALKER, J., reversing and remanding.

STATEMENT.—These parties being partners, deposited money with bankers. There being some dispute between them, fearing that appellee would get control of this money, and thus compel him to sue for a settlement, appellant went to the bank to draw it himself. But one of the bankers said he could not pay it, but would give him a draft, on a bank in Chicago, but told him he had no funds there, and it would not be paid if presented. But to control the funds as to appellee, he took the draft, giving the banker his check. Afterwards the bank failed, and appellant returned the draft, the firm receiving credit for the amount on which appellant received dividends from the assignee in bankruptcy, which he offered to share with appellee; but which appellee refused to receive, but filed a bill for an account, under which it was decreed that appellant pay him one-half of the entire amount deposited to the credit of the firm. It was contended that the appellant, by these transactions, had appropriated and converted the money to his own use. Held,

That there was no act or intention of a conversion of the funds; that either of the parties had a right to draw them for the use of the firm; that appellant had a right to do so in order to compel his partner to sue for the settlement rather than do so himself; that there was nothing done by appellant that contributed to the loss by bankruptcy; that the presumption of a settlement with the bankers by taking the drafts, was fully explained and rebutted; and that, therefore, there was no such liability on the part of appellant as that placed upon him by the decree of the court below.

SEPARATE PROPERTY OF WIFE BY GIFT OF HUSBAND—SERVICES OF HUSBAND AS AGENT IN REGARD TO SUCH PROPERTY.

STATEMENT.—Suit in chancery to recover certain moneys, notes and property, claimed to belong to the estate of Rosanna G. Gill, deceased. She and appellant were married in 1853—she being then a widow—and owning 80 acres of land in fee, and 40 acres life estate, as dower, and some household property.—Appellant never claimed his marital rights, but the property was kept separate, the land was rented separately, and when appellee sold the grain proceeds, he gave her the money. The decision rests on grounds prior to the act of 1861. Held,

1. That, in equity, a gift from the husband to the wife will be supported, even where no trustees are interposed.

2. The gift may be inferred from acts and circumstances as well as words—that is by some clear, unequivocal act of the husband by which he divested himself of his property and engaged to hold as trustee for the separate use of his wife. (Several authorities of other States cited in confirmation, as also English decisions.)

3. Herein the separation of the rents, and his drawing up the notes payable to her when she loaned the money derived therefrom, were acts conclusive of the intention to treat this as her separate property. And these notes which he was decreed to deliver up were of this character. He having thus divested himself, in her favor, of the title to the property, could not again reclaim it.—And where he had separate grain rents at the time of her death, on lands, and afterwards sold these, he could not be allowed to retain the money.

4. Notwithstanding the gift is void at law, yet it will be upheld in equity, when the gift is complete and the setting apart of the grain executed his intention, and made the gift therein complete.

5. Nor can appellant be allowed for services in takin care of the separate property, unless it appears that, at the time the services were rendered, they were intended to be charged for and were not gratuitous.

[SCHOLFIELD, J., having been of counsel, took no part in the decision.]

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

JANUARY TERM, 1876.

WILLIAM UPDIKE, et al., v. ANDREW J. WRIGHT.

DRAINS AND LEVEES.—ACT UNCONSTITUTIONAL.

HELD, That commissioners appointed under the provisions of the act, have no rightful authority under the statute, to construct a levee as a principal work, independently of a system of drainage, nor can they, under the statute, at the expense of land owners, erect and maintain at great expense, an immense levee on the banks of a river subject to overflow, when such levee is not connected with any system of drainage by ditches.

That the General Assembly possesses no power, under the constitution, to vest the commissioners or juries, selected by the county court, with authority to assess and collect taxes or special assessments for such contemplated improvements.

The General Assembly has power, under the constitution, to vest cities, towns and villages only with power to make local improvements by special taxation upon contiguous property, benefited by such improvement. All other taxation must be uniform in respect to persons and property within the jurisdiction imposing the same.

SCOTT J.—It is stipulated the demurrer to the bill in this case shall raise the following questions, and none other:

First.—The constitutionality of the act of the General Assembly of the State of Illinois, entitled "An act to provide for the construction and protection of drains, ditches, levees, and other works," approved April 24, 1871.

Second.—The power of the commissioners to construct a levee as a principal work.

Third.—The power of the commissioners to issue bonds directly to the laborers in payment of labor.

Our inquiry will first be directed to the second proposition, viz: Have the commissioners any rightful authority under the statute to construct a levee as a principal work, independently of a system of drainage? That section of the statute under which the construction of the levee in this case was undertaken, provides that whenever one or more owners or occupants of said land shall desire to construct a drain or drains across the lands of others for agricultural and sanitary purposes, they may present a petition to the county court, setting forth the necessity of the work, with a description of its or their starting points, route and terminus, and then it is added: "And if it shall be "deemed necessary for the drainage of "the lands of such petitioners, that a "levee or other work be constructed, "the petitioners shall so state, and set "forth a general description of the same, "as proposed." R. S. 1874, chap. 42, Sec. 1. This statute was evidently passed in view of that clause of the constitution which declares: "The General Assem"bly may pass laws permitting the own"ers or occupants of lands to construct "drains and ditches for argricultural "and sanitary purposes across the lands "of others." Art. 4, Sec. 31, Const. 1870.

Apparently an effort was made to have the law enacted conform to the constitutional provisions in every particular. Hence it is declared the work to be done is the construction of drains and ditches for agricultural and sanitary purposes, and if it becomes necessary in the construction of a system of drainage that a "levee or other work" be adopted to make that system available, such levee or other work may be constructed under the provisions of the statutes. But it is nowhere intimated the owners or occupants of lands may undertake, under the provisions of this law, the building and maintenance of an immense levee, on the borders of a river not connected with any system of drainage by ditches; neither the constitution nor the statute contemplates any such work. What was in the minds of the framers of the constitution and the legislators who enacted the law in pursuance of its provisions, must have been the drainage of lands by means of drains and ditches, and what is said in the statute on the subject of a "levee or other work," is always in connection with a system of drainage in that mode. The work outlined by the constitution and the statute is comparatively insignificant, and may be done at no great cost; but that which is undertaken in this case, is the construction of a levee on the banks of the Wabash river of many miles in length, and estimated to cost a great many thousand dollars. No system of drainage by drains and ditches was planned or deemed necessary for agricultural and sanitary purposes. The representation to the county court is the lands of petitioners are subject to overflow from the Wabush river, that their fences and crops are liable to be swept away and destroyed by such overflow, and that the same can be prevented by an earth work levee. The undertaking is one of great magnitude, and will require the expenditure of large sums of money. The assessment on complainant's lands is over $10,000, and the allegations in the bill is that unless all future assessments proposed to be made be arrested, the levee will cost more than the land is worth. Any construction of the statute that would warrant the owners or occupants of lands to enter upon such an immense and costly work, seems forced and unreasonable. It is only in connection with drainage for agricultural and sanitary purposes, that "levees or other works" may be undertaken as auxiliary to the damage of the lands. Our opinion is, this is the only construction the statute will bear consistently with the constitution, otherwise one owner whose lands are subject to overflow at certain seasons of the year from a river, could set in motion the proceedings for the erection of a levee sufficient to protect his lands, no matter how expensive, and have the costs levied upon lands of others in the vicinity which commissioners appointed by the court might deem benefitted by the improvement. Such a work can not be said to be draining lands by drains and ditches over the lands of others, nor is such a levee in any just sense in the language of the statute "necessary to the drainage of the lands." The work of constructing a great levee along the banks of a river subject to overflow, which defendants are about to do, is not embraced within the provisions of the statute, and is therefore without authority of enabling law.

But the decision may be placed on the other ground indicated; that the General Assembly possesses no power under the constitution to vest the commissioners or juries selected, or the county court, with authority to assess and collect taxes or special assessments for the contemplated improvement, section 5, article 9 of the constitution of 1848, which declared, "the corporate authorities of "counties, townships, school districts, "cities, towns and villages, may be "vested with powers to assess and col- "lect taxes for corporate purposes; such "taxes to be uniform in respect to per- "sons and property within the jurisdic- "tion of the body imposing the same," was always construed by the decisions of this court as a limitation upon the powers of the general assembly to grant the right to assess and collect taxes to any other than the corporate or local authorities of the municipality or district to be taxed. Board of Directors v. Huston, Jan. 7, 1874; Howard v. The St. Clair & Ill. Levee and Drainage Co., 51 Ill., 130; South Park Com. v. Solomon, 51 Ill. 37; Gage v. Graham, 57 Ib. 144; Hesler v. Drain Com. 53 Ib. 105. It was also held that power in the Legislature was subject to the future limitation that a local burden of taxation or special assessments could not be imposed upon a locality without the consent of the tax-payers to be affected. That section of the Constitution of 1870, upon this subject provides, "The General Assem- "bly may vest the corporate authorities "of cities, towns and villages the power "to make local improvement by special "assessments, or by special taxation of "contiguous property or otherwise. For "all other corporate purposes, all munic- "ipal corporations may be vested with "authority to assess and collect taxes, "but such taxes shall be uniform in re- "spect to persons and property within "the jurisdiction of the body imposing "the same." This clause in the present constitution, like that in the constitution of 1848, must be construed as a limitation on the power of the legislature. Giving it that construction, the General Assembly can only vest cities, towns and villages with power to make local improvements by special assessments or special taxation upon contiguous property benefited by such improvement. By necessary implication it is inhibited from confering that power upon other municipal corporations or upon private corporations, only cities, towns and villages are within the constitutional provisions, and although other municipal corporations may be vested with powers to assess and collect taxes for corporate purposes, the limitation is absolute; such taxes shall be uniform in respect to persons and property within the jurisdiction imposing the same; with equal propriety this clause of the present constitution, like the same provisions in the former constitution, must be regarded as restricting the General Assembly in conferring the power to levy and collect taxes, either general or special, to the mode and manner therein indicated. We do not understand the Legislature possesses powers unlimited and unrestricted, to invest whomsoever it may choose with authority to assess and collect either special assessments or taxes for every conceivable purpose. As we have seen, only cities, towns and villages may levy special assessments or special taxation for local improvements, and all other municipalities can only be vested with jurisdiction to assess and collect taxes for corporate purposes, and that, too, under the positive inhibition, such taxes shall be uniform in respect to persons and property. It would seem, therefor, to follow as a corrollary from the propositions stated, that neither the commissioners or the juries selected, nor the country court, are such bodies as under the constitution may be given power to make local improvements by special assessments or special taxation upon contiguous property.

There is still another consideration that has an important bearing on the decision of the case. The clause of the constitution we have been considering, like that of the constitution of 1848, must be understood in the light of the decision of this court as forbidding the General Assembly from imposing a burden by taxation upon any locality without the consent of the citizens affected. Under this law the people whose property is subject to taxation or assessments, have never given any consent to it, if we exclude those who may have signed the petition addressed to the county court. No opportunity was afforded them to do so, nor does the law make any provisions for submitting the questions to a vote to ascertain the will of those whose property is to be subjected to this local burden. It is imposed upon them under the statute by the decisions of the county court, obviously that section of the constitution that declares the General Assembly may "pass laws, per- "mitting the owners or occupants of "lands to construct drains or ditches for "agricultural and sanitary purposes," implies that the community whose property is to be taxed may have the right of election in the matter. Otherwise an owner's burden may be imposed upon them without their consent, and such proceedings might be had as would result in the deprivation of property. How can the land owners be permitted to construct drains and ditches, unless some election is guaranteed to them?

The language employed implies voluntary action. Illustration will make the inconsistency of the present law apparent: For example: the privilege is given to any occupant as well as the owner of land, of presenting a petition to the county court. Should the construction contended for prevail, a tenant residing upon land adjacent to a river subject to overflow, might present a petition, and under decision of the court, the work of erecting a levee miles in length and costing large sums of money, might be entered upon, and the expenses assessed upon the property in proximity to the river that might in any degree be deemed benefitted. An intention to confer such unwarranted power upon one man who would himself be subject to none of the burdens imposed, ought not to be imputed to the Legislature. Any laws not permitting an election as to the propriety of undertaking the work, are vicious and within the inhibition of the constitution. It does not militate against this construction that the land owner may appear before the county court when the petition is presented and resist the application, or may contest the assessment upon his property when made; whether the contemplated work shall be undertaken and his property subjected to taxation, is not made to depend upon this election but upon the decision of the courts. It would be a solecism to call that privilege an election.

In the case at bar this immense work, which, if completed on the plan proposed, will subject all the property in the vicinity that in the judgment of the commissioners or juries selected may be benefitted, to a heavy and burdensome taxation, was commenced under the decision of the court as to its propriety, and not any election of the people upon whom the burden will fall. Such a law is in contravention with the constitution, as well as with the plainest principles of right and justice. The former decisions of this court, cited supra sustains this construction.

Entertaining these views, which are conclusive of the whole case, it will not be necessary to discuss the other branch of this case suggested.

The decree will be affirmed.

Decree affirmed.

RIGHT OF EXECUTOR TO TRANSFER NOTES AND INVEST FUNDS OF TESTATOR.—A decision was given this week in the United States Circuit Court by Judge Blodgett in the case of Palmer C. Smith v. J. C. Ayer & Co., of Lowell, Mass., and in the case of Smith v. The Bank of Westborough, Mass. These cases were brought to restrain the collection by the defendants of two promissory notes of the amount of $39,250 each, one of which was held by Ayer & Co., and the other by the Westborough Bank under the following circumstances: In 1872 Job R. Renick held the title as naked trustee of the W. ½ of the S. W. ½ of Sec. 10, 39, 13. It was claimed by the complainants that it was held for the estate of Renick Huston, who died in 1864, leaving a will, Thomas T. Renick being the executor. J. R. Renick held the land in trust for T. T. Renick to the extent of certain outlays and expenses which had been incurred by him about the property to the amount of from $20,000 to $30,000. In July, 1872, T. T. Renick made a sale of the land to J. D. Harvey, and J. R. Renick executed a conveyance therefor. One-quarter of the purchase price was paid in cash, and for the remainder notes were given to T. T. Renick for $39,250 each, due in one, two, and three years, secured by trust deed. In 1873, T. T. Renick died in Ohio, leaving a will in which he made B. F. Renick executor. Prior to his death he became a partner in a manufacturing business at Canton, O., and in the will he bequeathed the interest in the business to B. F. Renick for the benefit of himself and certain nephews and nieces, with a direction to continue the business, and manage and control the same according to his discretion so long as he should think best.

Subsequently to the death of T. T. Renick, B. F. Renick purchased the interest of one of the partners in the business at the time of T. T. Renick's death, and the firm name was changed from Tower, Claassen & Co., to B. F. Renick & Co., the business in other respects being continued the same as before. A considerable indebtedness existed at the time of T. T. Renick's death, against the firm of Tower, Claassen & Co., and B. F. Renick, in May, 1875, obtained a loan from Ayer & Co. of $39,250, giving the note of B. F. Renick & Co. therefor, secured by the note of Harvey for the same amount, which was to become due July 14, 1874. In June, 1875, B. F. Renick made a loan of $30,000 from the First National Bank of Westborough, giving the note of B. F. Renick & Co., secured by the note of Harvey for $39,250, falling due in July, 1875. Both these notes of Harvey had been in September, 1874, extended for a period of two years from the time when they respectively fell due.

The questions raised were, first, as to whether J. C. Ayer & Co. were chargeable with notice of the equities as in case of overdue paper, in respect to the note taken by them, they having taken it after its maturity. Second, as to the estate of T. T. Renick, whether B. F. Renick, as executor, had any right to dispose of the notes, and whether the transferring of them by him as such executor gave notice to Ayer & Co., and the bank, that he was doing it as executor. Third, whether B. F. Renick, as executor of T. T. Renick, had power, under the will, to put in additional assets into the business in which T. T. Renick was partner before his death.

The Judge held that as to the first point, Ayer & Co., having fully informed themselves that the makers of the note claimed no equities then against them, and stating that they expected to pay it when due, Ayer & Co. were not bound to enquire as to any further equities. As to the second point, the Judge said the executor had the same legal power over the notes to transfer them in the way he did that T. T. Renick would have had if he had lived. Lastly, as to the power of the executor, it was held that the powers under the will were ample, and that the executor had the right to use any assets that came into his hands which belonged to the estate in payment of the debts against him, or the firm debts, and in protection of the business. The bill was therefore dismissed.

TIME OF EXAMINATION OF APPLICANTS FOR ADMISSION TO THE BAR.—At the September term, 1875, of the Supreme Court, Rule Forty-three was amended by striking out the word "Friday." The rule, as amended, will read: "Thursday of the first week of each term, shall be the day on which such examination shall be made"—examination of applicants for license to practice in the courts of this State. The next examination will be on Thursday, the 14th of September. Applicants will do well to remember this fact, and not wait till Friday, and find the examination was concluded on Thursday.

TRESPASSING IN COAL MINES—MEASURE OF DAMAGES.

OTTAWA, Ills., July 31, 1876.

An important case affecting the interests of coal miners and owners of coal lands has just been terminated in the Circuit Court of this county. The case involved from $60,000 to $75,000 in money, but much more which might be involved in damages real, consequential and vindictive, or in the way of punishment. The case was that of Mathiessen & Hegder, the well known Zinc firm of La Salle v. The Northern Coal and Iron Company, of La Salle.

The Zinc Company claimed that the Coal Company had undermined grounds of the plaintiffs, in getting coal. The proofs were against the defendants, and conclusive. The rule of law laid down to the jury by Judge Leland, viz: "The rule of damages is that the value of the coal mined is what it is at the mouth of the shaft, less the expense of transporting it from the place mined to the mouth of the shaft," left only the question of damages, which the jury fixed at $25,000. The defendants claimed that the rule of damages should be so much per acre in the coal vein, according to the measurement of the coal in the vein. Trespassers in coal lands of another should take warning. A.

CONSTRUCTION OF GRANT.

Stevenson v. Wiggin, p. 308.

In a warranty deed of land was the following clause: "Also conveying the right to draw water from any and all the springs on said Clement's [the grantor's] land, easterly and above the aforesaid described premises, with the right to conduct the same by aqueduct to said premises, for all uses or purposes forever."

Held, that the grantee was entitled to take all the water from the springs, provided the same was in good faith required for use on the granted premises.

Held, that the grantee was entitled to make such reasonable arrangements about the springs as were reasonably necessary to enable him to use all the water.

WAY OF NECESSITY.

Pingree v. McDuffie, p. 306.

A party having conveyed a portion of his land over which was the only means of access to the remaining land. Held, that a right of way by necessity to the remaining land was reserved.

GUARDIAN AND WARD — JURISDICTION OF PROBATE COURT.

Critchett v. Hall, p. 324.

The jurisdiction over the settlement of guardian's accounts is in the probate court. The declaration in an action in favor of a ward against his guardian, or of a guardian against his ward, must show that the account has been settled in the probate court.

FROM STRAFFORD PROBATE COURT.

REPLEVIN—FILING NEW BOND.

Briggs v. Wiswell, p. 319.

The court, upon a proper case being made, may permit the plaintiff to file a new or additional bond, so that the security may be double the actual value of the property replevied.

The plaintiff alleged in his writ that the value of the property replevied was $5,000, and filed a bond in the sum of $8,000. Held, that he might be permitted to show that the value did not exceed $4,000; also, that he might file an additional bond for $2,000, or a new bond for $10,000.

Upon the trial, the value of the property alleged in the writ is not conclusive against the plaintiff.

v.
THE UNITED STATES.

Appeal from the Court of Claims.

POWER OF SECRETARY OF TREASURY—TREASURY NOTES—PAYMENT OF IN LEGAL TENDER NOTES—PROTEST—SUBSCRIPTION AGENT.

1. AUTHORITY OF SUBSCRIPTION AGENT.—In regard to the alleged error, that the subscription agent had no lawful authority to make the statement contained in the advertisement, that the treasury notes were payable in gold, the court say that, independently of that question, the acceptance and payment of the same in legal tender notes, was a waiver of the claim put in to have them paid in gold.
2. PROTEST.—The effect of the protest against receiving payment in legal tender notes, considered.
3. NO RIGHT OF ACTION.—That the court below did not err in holding the plaintiff, as executor of the decedent, had no right of action as against the defendants, to recover the difference in value at that time, between the legal tender notes and gold.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.

Mr. Justice CLIFFORD delivered the opinion of the court.

Power was conferred upon the Secretary of the Treasury, by the act of the seventeenth of January, 1861, to borrow two hundred and fifty millions of dollars, for which he was authorized to issue bonds or treasury notes, the treasury notes to be of any denomination fixed by the Secretary, not less than fifty dollars, and to be payable three years after date, with interest, at the rate of seven and three-tenths per centum per annum, payable semi-annually. Section three provides that the Secretary shall cause books to be opened for subscription to the treasury notes, for fifty dollars and upwards, at such places as he may designate, and under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, to be superintended by the assistant treasurers, at their respective localities, and at other places, by such depositaries, postmasters, and other persons as he may designate, giving notice thereof as therein directed.—(12 Stat. at Large, 259.)

Pursuant to the authority conferred, the secretary appointed Jay Cook one of the special agents, to open a book for subscriptions to the treasury notes, and it appears that the secretary addressed to him, as such special agent, a circular letter of instructions, in which, among other things, he stated that "all payments must be made in the lawful coin of the United States, and whenever the amount subscribed shall not be paid within the period prescribed, the first payment shall be forfeited to the United States."

Sufficient appears in the finding of the court to show that the special agent opened a book for subscriptions, and that he published an advertisement, describing what the denominations of the notes would be, and giving the date when they would be issued, and that he stated that the notes would be "payable in gold in three years, or be convertible into a twenty-year six per cent. loan, at the option of the holder. That each note would have interest coupons attached, which could be cut off and collected in gold at the mint, every six months, and at the rate of interest therein prescribed."

Subsequent to the publication of that advertisement, the testator of the plaintiff, then in full life, became the purchaser of treasury notes to the amount of fifteen thousand dollars, of the description named in the act of Congress and the advertisement, dated as described in the finding of the court, and it appears that all of the notes were in the following form: Three years after date the United States promise to pay to the order of —— dollars, with interest at 7 3-10 per cent., payable semi-annually.

On the tenth of December, 1864, the secretary gave notice that the department was ready to redeem the notes on presentation, and that he would pay the same, in lawful money, or by converting the same into bonds as authorized by law, and that interest would cease on all such notes, not so presented after three months from that date, at which time the right of conversion would also cease.

Throughout the testator of the plaintiff insisted that it was his right to have the notes paid in gold, and on the third of March, 1866, he caused the notes to be transmitted here to certain bankers, with instructions to present the same at the treasury and ask for the payment of the same, with interest, in gold, and with directions, that if the payment in gold was refused, to accept the currency, under protest. Payment in gold was subsequently refused, and the agents accepted the principal and interest after maturity in legal-tender notes, under protest, as directed by their employer.

Gold, at the time the notes were presented, was worth in the market at a premium of thirty-two cents on the dollar over the legal-tender notes accepted in payment by the agents acting for the testator of the plaintiff. He demanded payment in gold, but his agents accepted the currency under protest, by his directions, the payment in gold having been refused.

Based on these facts the executrix of the decedent instituted the present suit in the Court of Claims to recover the difference in the market value of gold and legal-tender notes at the date of the payment made by the United States to the testator of the plaintiff. Judgment was rendered for the defendants in the court below and the plaintiff appealed to this court. Appended to the finding of facts are the conclusions of law reported by the court, which, in the view taken of the case, it will not be necessary to reproduce for separate examination.

Four errors are assigned by the present plaintiff: (1) That the court below erred in holding that the subscription agent had no lawful authority to make the statement contained in the advertisement, that the treasury notes were payable in gold. (2) That the same court erred in holding that the statement, and what appears in the record in connection therewith, did not in law bind the defendants to pay the notes in gold. (3) That the court erred in holding that the notes were lawfully paid by the defendants in the legal-tender notes. (4) That the court erred in holding that the plaintiff, as executrix of the decedent, had no right of action, as against the defendants, to recover the difference in value at that time between the legal-tender notes and gold.

Questions not necessarily involved in the matters of fact found by the court below will not be re-examined, even though they are presented in the assignment of errors. Controversies between parties usually depend, in the first instance, upon the matters of fact, out of which the controversy in the particular case arises, and it often happens, even when it is suggested that the decision depends upon the legal questions presented, that it is nevertheless important to examine the facts with care, in order to ascertain whether the supposed legal questions do actually arise in the case.

Payment of the treasury notes was accepted by the testator of the plaintiff, and it appears that he, at the time the payment was made, then being in full life, surrendered the notes to the secretary for cancellation. Neither deception, mistake, nor undue advantage is suggested, but the whole record shows that it was an honest difference of opinion between the secretary and the decedent as to the rights of the parties, and that it terminated by the voluntary acceptance of the legal-tender notes, on the part of the agents of the decedent, in lieu of gold, as offered by the secretary, and by the surrender of the treasury notes to him for the United States. Such an acceptance of payment was a waiver of the claim antecedently made, and amounted to a full discharge of the same, independently of the question whether the notes accepted in payment are or are not a legal tender, as insisted by the counsel for the defendants.

Had not the treasury notes held by the decedent been surrendered to the United States, the effect of the acceptance of the currency notes in payment might possibly have been different, but it is clear that a protest under such circumstances is utterly insufficient to qualify the effect of the waiver evidenced by the acceptance of what was offered in payment of the treasury notes in lieu of gold. Gold was claimed, but the secretary refused to pay in that medium, and the agents of the decedent, acting in pursuance of his instructions, accepted the medium offered by the secretary, knowing full well that it was offered in full discharge of the treasury notes, and it appears that they not only accepted the medium of payment offered by the secretary, but surrendered the treasury notes to the secretary as the well-known financial agent of the United States.

Actual surrender of the treasury notes to the secretary was a condition precedent to the right of the secretary to redeem the same, and that fact was as well known to the agents of the decedent as to the secretary, and it must be that they knew full well that the payment of the treasury notes could not be made unless the surrender was absolute and unconditional.

Viewed in the light of these suggestions, it must be held that the protest, being unauthorized by law, was a mere ex-parte act, without any legal efficacy to qualify the voluntary surrender of the treasury notes, which both parties understood to be absolute and unconditional.

Due protest at the time of paying custom duties, has the effect to give the merchant the right to sue the collector to recover back duties illegally exacted, because the act of Congress provides that the protest in such a case shall have that effect. (5 Stat. at Large, 727.) Congress might, doubtless, give a corresponding effect to such a protest, in a case like the one before the court; but it is scarcely necessary to remark that there is no such statutory provision, and in the absence of it, the ruling must be that the protest is wholly insufficient to qualify the absolute and unconditional surrender of the treasury notes.

Enough appears to show that the surrender was made with a full knowedge of all the circumstances, and without the least compulsion; that the secretary gave public notice that the department was ready to redeem the notes, on presentation, by paying the amount in lawful money, or by converting the same into bonds, as authorized by law. Treasury notes of the kind, to a large amount, were over due, and the holders of the same were given the option to accept payment in legal tender notes or in the bonds authorized by law, and they were informed that interest, on all such as should not be presented within the next three months, would cease from the expiration of the period allowed for their presentation.

Fifteen thousand dollars of the treasury notes were held by the decedent, then in full life, and he claimed that he should be paid in gold, and it appears that the secretary refused to make the payment in that medium, and insisted that the United States had the right to redeem the same, or make the payment in the manner proposed in the published notice. Payment in gold being refused, the decedent transmitted the over-due notes to their agents here, with instructions to accept payment, under protest, in accordance with the terms proposed by the secretary, and the finding of the court shows that his agents obeyed his instructions, and that the whole amount of the notes presented, including the interest thereon after maturity was paid in the medium proposed by the secretary.

Prompt payment, no doubt, was desired; but the decedent was under no legal compulsion to accept any other medium of payment than that which he demanded. Both he and his agents were, doubtless, convinced that the secretary would not recede from the position he had taken, but he was at perfect liberty to reject the terms proposed, and to refuse to surrender the over-due securities which he held.

Duress, if proved, would rebut the presumption of assent, and would, doubtless, be sufficient to relieve a party in such a case from the effect of a compromise procured by such means, but the burden of proof to establish such a charge, in every case, is upon the party making it, and if he fails to introduce any such evidence to support it, the presumption is that the charge is without any foundation.

Unconditional acceptance of a medium of payment different from that promised by the United States, or absolute acceptance of a smaller sum from the Secretary of the Treasury than the one claimed from the United States, even in a case where the amount relinquished is large, does not leave the United States open to further claim on the ground of duress, if the acceptance of the different medium or the smaller sum is voluntary, and without intimidation, and with a full knowledge of all the circumstances; nor is the case changed if it appears that the claimant was induced to accept the different medium or the smaller sum in full, as a means to secure an earlier payment of the claim than he could otherwise hope to procure. (Mason v. U. S., 17 Wall., 74.)

Parties having claims against the United States, which are disputed by the officers authorized to adjust the same, may compromise the claim and may accept payment in a different medium from that promised, or may accept a smaller sum than that claimed, and where it appears that the claimant voluntarily entered into a compromise, and accepted payment in full in a different medium from that promised, or accepted a smaller sum than that claimed, and executed a discharge in full for the whole claim, or voluntarily surrendered to the proper officer, the evidences of the claim, for cancellation, he cannot subsequently sue the United States, and recover in the Court of Claims for any part of the claim voluntarily relinquished in the compromise. (Sweeny v. U. S., 17 Id., 77; U. S. v. Child, 12 Id., 244; U. S. v. Justice, 14 Id., 549.)

Decisions of the kind, by this court, are quite numerous, and they show beyond all doubt, that parties may adjust their own controversies in their own way, and that when they do so voluntarily and with a full knowledge of their rights and all the circumstances, no appeal lies to the courts to review their mutual decision. Courts cannot make contracts for parties, and if parties understandingly contract to adjust a controversy between them in a particular way, and actually execute the contract, they are both bound to regard the controversy as at an end.

Taken as a whole, the findings of the court below, show beyond all doubt that the decedent, voluntarily and with a full knowledge of all the circumstances, elected to accept payment of the treasury notes in the manner proposed by the secretary, and that the surrender of the same to the United States was absolute and unconditional. Nothing less can be inferred from the communications of his agents inclosing the securities, when the same were transmitted for redemption, in which his agents say that they "present the notes for payment in accordance with the terms proposed" by the department. Such an acceptance, if intended to waive every variation from the terms antecedently demanded, could hardly be more complete or explicit, nor is its real character changed in any respect by the fact that the agents asked leave, in the same communication, "to enter protest, under their instructions, against payment otherwise than in gold."

They surrendered the securities, and asked leave to enter the protest in the same communication, which was in effect saying, our principal still thinks he ought to be paid in gold, but inasmuch as the department declines to pay in that medium, he has decided to accept payment in the medium which you propose.

Suppose the controversy had respect to the sale and purchase of an article of personal property, instead of the redemption of treasury notes, and that it appeared that the price asked by the owner was one hundred dollars, and that a person desiring to purchase the same, had offered the owner ninety dollars for it, which the owner, at the time, declined to accept. Of course the bargain, in that state of the case, would not be complete; but suppose the owner of the article should subsequently forward the same to the person who made the offer, informing him that he would accept the offer, no one, it is presumed, would hesitate to decide that the voluntary acceptance of the offer concluded the bargain, if the person who made the offer elected to pay the money, even though the seller might have written in the same communication, that he ought to have ten dollars more, and should protest that the article was worth the whole amount he asked for it in the prior negotiations. Remarks of the kind would not have the effect to qualify the acceptance of the offer and the unconditional delivery of the article.

Apply that rule to the case before the court, and it is clear that the protest of the agents did not have the effect to qualify the voluntary acceptance of the terms proposed by the secretary, and the absolute and unqualified surrender of the securities to the United States, and that there is no error in the record.

Judgment affirmed.

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT, W. D. WISCONSIN.

OPINION, AUGUST 4, 1876.

In re SAUTHOFF AND OLSON, Bankrupts.

CREDITOR'S RIGHTS IN BANKRUPT'S ESTATE—POWER OF COURT TO DIRECT OUT OF WHICH FUND LIEN CREDITOR SHALL BE SATISFIED.

1. Where a creditor held several judgment notes against a person who was afterwards declared a bankrupt, and held several mortgages and two insurance policies as collateral security for their payment, and a few days before the filing of the petition in bankruptcy, the creditor caused judgment to be entered upon such judgment notes, and execution to be issued thereon, held, that the bankrupt court had power to so marshal the assets as to require such creditor to foreclose a mortgage before resorting to the general fund; but that this rule would not extend to a mortgage that was loaned to the bankrupt to be used as a security for the payment of the judgment notes. That the rights of the assignor of such a mortgage would be superior to those of the assignee in bankruptcy.

2. POLICY PAYABLE TO WIFE.—That the same principle applies in the case of the policy payable to the wife. She is to be regarded as a security to that extent, and entitled to protection in preference to the assignee, as the representative of the general creditors. But the mortgage of the bankrupt Sauthoff and wife to the petitioner, and the policy payable to the bankrupt, fall within the general rule on the subject of marshaling securities, and the petitioner, to that extent, is to be regarded as doubly secured, and should be required to first exhaust his remedy on them, and be allowed out of the general fund in court, the balance remaining after applying the proceeds of those securities upon his debts.

3. THE HOMESTEAD.—The rule, as to the homestead, stated.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.

HOPKINS, J.

This is an application by John J. Suhr, for an order directing payment of three judgments in his favor against the bankrupts, entered on the 3d day of April, 1876, upon their promissory notes, by virtue of separate warrants of attorney attached to each. The judgments in the aggregate amount to about $3,000. No question is raised as to the validity of the judgments. The facts as admitted being that the notes were discounted in the usual course of business by petitioner, who is a banker, and that the warrants to confess judgment were attached and accompanied by the notes, and were given more than two months before the petition against the bankrupts was filed. There is no charge that the bankrupt in any way procured the entry of judgment except by giving the warrants of attorney to confess.

On the day the judgments were entered executions were issued on each, and a sufficient portion of the bankrupts' stock in trade was seized to satisfy them.

The other creditors instituted proceedings in bankruptcy, on the 6th of April, and after an assignee was appointed, the parties agreed that the goods might be sold by the assignee, and the proceeds be kept separate, and deposited in the registry of this court, and that the lien of the executions should be transferred to the fund in court with the same force as it existed on the goods by virtue of the levy.

The petition further shows that as collateral security to the debt of the petitioner, the bankrupt, Sauthoff, assigned to him a policy of insurance upon the life of his wife, payable to him, and that he and his wife assigned another policy upon his life payable to his wife, and that the bankrupt procured his brother, Wm. Sauthoff, to assign as further collateral security a note and mortgage belonging to him upon the homestead of the bankrupt, upon which there was due one thousand dollars, and that the bankrupt and his wife gave as further collateral security another mortgage upon the homestead of $1,000. All which were duly transferred to and held by the petitioner, as collateral security for his debt against the bankrupts. By means of which and of these judgments, he had ample security, and will get his pay in full, while the other creditors will not get to exceed one-half of theirs.

The assignee has sold the property for enough to pay all of the judgments out of which petitioner makes this application for payment.

The assignee opposes the application, and insists that the petitioner should be required, first, to exhaust the other security that he has and only receive out of the fund in court, the amount that may remain after applying the avails of the other securities.

He insists upon the application of what he claim to be the rule in equity, that as the petitioner has security upon two funds for his debt, while the general creditors, represented by the assignee, have security on but one, he should be required to resort, first, to his security upon which the other creditors have no lien.

The general rule in equity is, that where there are several creditors having a common debtor, who has several funds, all of which can be reached by one creditor, and only a part by the others, the former shall take payment out of the fund to which he can resort exclusively, so that all may be paid. This principle enforces the right of the creditor having a lien upon all the funds to be paid in full, but it requires him to obtain it out of such portions of the funds as will cause the least inconvenience and injury to the creditors whose liens are confined to one fund. In this way no wrong is done to the one who has all the funds within his reach. His lien is not impaired as to either fund. The authority of the courts over him only extends to directing him, which he shall first appropriate to his claim, restraining him, during such reasonable time as may be necessary to successfully make such application, from proceeding to appropriate the other. Keeping the other sacred, however, in the mean time, to make up any deficiency.

The common debtor cannot complain of this rule, for he is benefitted by having a larger portion of his debts paid by pursuing this course, than if all the funds were needlessly exhausted by a single creditor.

But it is uniformly held that courts should not exercise this power to the material injury or prejudice of the creditor holding both funds. But this restriction does not extend so far as was contended by petitioner's counsel, as to deprive the court of the exercise of the power in all cases where the creditor may be somewhat delayed in his remedies, or where the time of obtaining payment may be somewhat postponed. If it did, it would defeat the operation of the rule in most cases, for in almost every conceivable case, some time would be necessarily required in converting a security of any kind into money, and a delay of some extent is therefore inevitable in the practical application of the doctrine of marshaling securities. But a mere delay or postponeing of payment is not regarded in such cases as a material injury, for the interest on the claim is deemed an adequate compensation to the party for such delay. Interest is deemed a sufficient compensation for the delay of payment, which is incident to all judicial proceedings.

The remedy to render available the security should also be certain and direct, before a party should be required to adopt it, and defer other remedies that he is entitled to, in order to obtain satisfaction of his debt.

In this case the remedy of the petitioner is quite simple. An action to foreclose a mortgage and sell the property, is not a difficult or uncertain remedy, and a party could hardly maintain the position that a security so easily converted into money as a mortgage, and by so expeditious a method as exists in this State, was a doubtful remedy, or would unreasonably delay him or materially injure or prejudice his rights.

Courts of equity exercise this power in such cases—not as an independent equity that exists against the creditor. For, as the writers on this subject say, no equity can be created against the creditor holding the double fund security by a party who has an imperfect security. But they say it is an equity against the debtor, for to allow the doubly secured creditor to take the doubly charged estate, would enable the debtor to get back the singly secured estate discharged of both debts.

This would be literally true in this case, for when the special sureties are released from the petitioner's claim, they will all go back to the debtor, and they cannot be reached by the assignee in his hands. So that the right sought to be enforced is rather an incident to the equity against the common debtor, and is free if judiciously applied, from all objection or charge of injustice. Adams' Equity, 272; Willard's Equity, 337; Story's Eq. Ju., § 634, et seq. This doctrine is analogous to that which gives a surety the right to compel the creditor to exhaust this remedy against the principal's property before resorting to him. Now what application is to be made of this doctrine in this case.

First, is the mortgage assigned by William Sauthoff to the petitioner such a security as that the assignee can require the petitioner to apply it upon his debts before using the general fund?

I think not. That transaction was in effect, but a loan of this mortgage to the bankrupt for that purpose, and that William occupies the position of a surety to that extent, and as such his rights are equal, if not superior, to the rights of the assignee, and if his rights are equal, the claim of the assignee is defeated. But I think they are paramount, and that he has a right to require that the petitioner exhaust all property of the bankrupts that he has a claim upon, to secure the same debts first, and the rights of the assignee as to this mortgage, are subordinate to his.

The same principle applies in the case of the policy payable to the wife. She is to be regarded as a security to that extent, and entitled to protection in preference to the assignee as the representative of the general creditors. But the mortgage of the bankrupt Sauthoff and wife to the petitioner and the policy of insurance payable to the bankrupt, fall within the general doctrine above stated on the subject of marshalling securities and the petitioner to that extent is to be regarded as doubly secured, and should be required to first exhaust his remedy on them and be allowed out of the general fund in court the balance remaining after applying the proceeds of those securities upon his debt.

The petitioners' counsel contended for the right to take the whole pay out of the general fund and to leave the assignee to his rights of subrogation. But I do not deem that just in this case. The estate should not be burdened with litigation which would involve new and intricate questions, that would not arise in suits prosecuted by the petitioner. I can see no hardship in requiring him to collect those claims himself.

The petitioners counsel also claims that as this mortgage was on the bankrupt homestead, which was not liable for his debts in this State, and could only be encumbered or conveyed by the wife's joining her husband in a conveyance of it, that it should be considered in the nature of a security furnished by the parties, the wife particularly, that was equally entitled to protection as the securities I have before referred to.

He cited and relied principally upon the case of Dickson v. Chom, 6 Iowa, 19, as sustaining this position. In regard to that case it is only necessary to remark that, it was decided mainly upon the statute of that State and therefore cannot be regarded as an authority where the statute dees not exist.

In that case the creditor had a mortgage on the insolvent's homestead, which he cancelled voluntarily and sought full payment of the debt originally secured by the mortgage out of the general assets.

The court ruled that as the statute required a creditor secured by a mortgage on a homestead to exhaust his remedy against the other property of the mortgagor before selling the homestead, the creditor had a right and it was his duty to collect his pay out of the general assets if he could before he could resort to his mortgage. This case therefore when properly understood does not contravene the general equity doctrine hereinbefore laid down.

The Supreme Court of this State have, in two cases, considered the question substantially involved here. First, in Jones v. Dow, 18 Wis., 241; and again in White v. Polleys, 20 Id., 530—and they do not recognize any such right in a mortgagor of a homestead in this State, as is contended for in this matter by petitioner's counsel.

In the case of Jones v. Dow, supra, the mortgage covered the homestead and a business block, and the mortgagor insisted that the business block should be sold first. But the court, it appearing that there were judgment creditors, who had a lien upon the block, and not upon the homestead, denied his claim, and the Chief Justice, in delivering the opinion of the court, says: "Until the Legislature shall declare the obligation to preserve the homestead superior to that of paying one's honest debts, we must hold the equity of the creditor at least equal to that of the debtor in cases like this." And, in the other case, the question arose between a mortgagor, whose mortgage covered his homestead and other property, and a judgment creditor having a lien upon the other property only, and the court there held that the debtor had no right to have the property not included in homestead first exhausted, in order to preserve to him the homestead.

That a part of the property being a homestead, did not change the equity rule that required a party having security on two funds, to first exhaust his remedy upon the fund he was alone secured upon, where there was another party having security on the other.

I fully concur in these views, and shall follow the doctrine of those cases in my disposition of this question.

The legislature has, since that decision, in suits to foreclose mortgages covering the mortgagor's homestead and other property, required the sale of the property not included in homestead first. But this is not such a suit, and the statute, in terms, does not include a proceeding of this nature, or suits in equity for the marshaling of assets, and as it is in derogation of a long established principle of equity jurisprudence, I do not feel at liberty to extend its operation by construction beyond its plain reading.

I shall therefore order petitioner to collect and to exhaust his remedy upon the mortgage of F. Sauthoff and wife and the policy of insurance payable to the bankrupt, and to apply the avails upon his claim, and that he be paid from the general fund only what shall remain after such application. But as it is apparent that enough will not be realized therefrom to pay it in full, I shall order that he be paid now $2,000 to apply thereon, retaining enough to meet any balance, if there should be any. Perhaps the assignee and petitioner may be able to agree upon a valuation of these securities and upon a sum at which the petitioner will be willing to take them, in which case, if approved by the court, the matter may be at once closed.

The clerk will enter order in accordance with the terms of this opinion.

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

OPINION FILED JUNE 30, 1876.

No. 132.—THE FIRST NATIONAL BANK OF SIOUX CITY et al. v. GEORGE W. GAGE.

Appeal from Superior Court of Cook.

1. CREDITOR'S BILL—WHEN IT MAY BE FILED.—Held, That a creditor's bill may be filed at any time against a defendant, after an execution has been issued and returned, in whole or in part, unsatisfied; that the sheriff may take the responsibility to make his return before the expiration of the ninety days, and when a return of nulla bona has been made, the creditor may exhibit his bill.

2. FOR WHAT BILL IS GOOD.—That the bill is good as a bill of discovery, but would not warrant the issuing of an injunction, or the appointment of a receiver, as there is no distinct charge of fraud, or that defendants have any particular property.—ED. LEGAL NEWS.

Opinion by SCOTT, C. J. Complainant having obtained judgment at law against defendants, on the same day filed their bill to discover assets in the hands of defendants, for an injunction and for the appointment of a receiver. No reason is perceived why the bill may not be good as a bill of discovery, and to that extent defendants ought to have been required to answer it. The allegations are sufficient for that purpose.

Objection is made, there is no proper return of nulla bona, to the executions issued on the judgments, and hence the bill was prematurely filed. The allegation is, on the same day the judgments were rendered, that thereafter executions were issued, and afterwards returned by the sheriff, wholly unsatisfied—that he could find no property of the defendants in his county out of which to satisfy the executions. It plainly appears all this took place before the bill was filed. Our statute on this subject provides, that whenever an execution shall have been issued against the property of a defendant on a judgment at law or in equity, and shall have been returned unsatisfied in whole or in part, the party suing out such execution may file a bill in chancery against such defendant, and any other person, to compel the discovery of any property or thing in action belonging to defendant. R. S. 1874, p. 203, sec. 49.

Under this statute, what reason can be assigned why the sheriff shall retain the execution for any particular time? The law requires him to make return within ninety days. He may, however, take the responsibility to make his return before the expiration of that period, and when a return of nulla bona has been made, the creditor under the statute may exhibit his bill. The demurrer admits the allegations of the bill; there had been a return of nulla bona previously made on the executions issued on the judgments at law, and that is all the law requires. Bowen v. Parkhurst, 24 Ills., 257.

While this bill is good, and may be maintained as a bill of discovery, we do not think the bill or the accompanying affidavits contain anything that would warrant the court in granting an injunction and in appointing a receiver. The bill contains no clear and distinct charge that defendants have any particular property or things in action in their possession, and there can be no necessity for a restraining order of court; and still less reason can there be for the appointment of a receiver.

There is no necessity shown by this bill for the appointment of a receiver, for there is no distinct charge of fraud, nor does it appear from the affidavits accompanying it with clearness and distinctness, that there is any property or things in action to be preserved for the benefit of the judgment creditors. A receiver should be appointed in no case, unless it is made to appear there is an imperative necessity for the step, to preserve some particular property for such parties as shall be entitled to the benefit. No such case is made by this bill and affidavits.

For the error indicated in sustaining the demurrer to the bill, purely as a bill of discovery, the decree will be reversed and the cause remanded.

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

OPINION FILED JUNE 30, 1876.

DAVID A. GAGE v. GEORGE C. SMITH et al.

Appeal from Superior Court of Cook.

CREDITOR'S BILL—INJUNCTION—RECEIVER.

1. WHEN A RECEIVER WILL BE APPOINTED.—That the section under consideration by the court, was adopted almost literally from a prior statute of New York, under which it was held, that the appointment of a receiver follows as a matter of course, where the equity of the bill is not denied on the hearing.
2. CONSTRUCTION OF OTHER STATE.—The court states the rule, where a statute is adopted from another State, which has received a construction, and cites from the New York cases to show, in case of a creditor's bill, where the return of the execution unsatisfied pre-supposes that the property of the defendant, if any he has, will be misapplied, and entitles the complainant to an injunction in the first instance; that it seems almost a matter of course to appoint a receiver to collect and preserve the property pending the litigation.
3. DECREE.—The decree in this case construed.
—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.

STATEMENT.—Appellees filed their bill in chancery, in the office of the clerk of the Superior Court of Cook county, alleging that at the November term, 1874, of the Superior court, they obtained a judgment against appellant for $1,486.14; that on the 18th day of November, 1874, an execution was issued thereon to the sheriff of Cook county, which was returned by him on the 23d day of December, 1874, unsatisfied, and that the judgment is still in force.

It is further alleged, that on or about January 1st, 1874, appellant was engaged in the hotel business in Chicago; that appellees are informed and believe that in the course of said hotel business, divers persons became indebted to him in a large amount, and that the defendant, at the time of filing the bill, had debts due him to a large amount, and for which he holds divers securities and evidences to a large amount, and has divers goods, wares and merchandise, and other articles of personal property of value, which belong to him, or in which he is in some way or manner beneficially interested, and that he has equitable interests and things in action of some nature or kind which might or ought to be applied to the payment of appellee's judgment.

It is further alleged, that appellant is the owner of, or in some manner beneficially interested in, some real estate in this or some other State, or some chattels real of some nature or kind, or some contract or agreement relating to real estate, or the rents, issues and profits of some real estate; and also that appellant is owner of or in some way beneficially interested in the stock of some company or co-partnership; and that also he has in his possession some money in coin or bank bills, or that he has money deposited in some bank, or elsewhere to his credit, or that he has money or securities held by some other person in trust or otherwise for his benefit.

And it is charged, on belief, if appellant has made any sale, assignment or transfer of his property or effects, or any part thereof, such sale, assignment or transfer is merely colorable, and made with a view of protecting the property or effects of appellant so assigned, and placing the same beyond the reach of appellee's judgment, and enabling appellant to control and enjoy the same, and the avails thereof, or to hinder and delay appellees in the collection of their debt, and that so it would appear, if appellant would state and set forth where, and to whom such sale, etc., was made, and what was the amount in value of the property or effects so sold, and what were the terms of such sale, etc.

Appellees claim a full discovery of all such property belonging to appellant, and of all trusts whereby any property or effects were held for him, and of any sale, assignment or transfer which appellant has made of his property, and of the persons to whom such sale, etc., has been made, and the trusts upon which such sale, etc., was made.

It is charged, that appellees have reason to believe, and do believe, that appellant had property, etc., of the value of $100 and upwards, exclusive of all prior first claims, and which orators have been unable to reach by execution.

It is also alleged that the bill is not exhibited with collusion, etc.; that appellees have reason to believe, and do believe, that George Taylor has property, things in action or effects, held in trust for appellant, and that George W. Gage and John A. Rice are indebted to him, and hold property in trust for him.

The prayer is that appellant answer; that he be prohibited from making any assignment of his property, and from confessing any judgment for the purpose of giving any preference to any other creditors over appellees to obtain his property; that a receiver be appointed, and for general relief.

The affidavit annexed to the bill is as follows:

State of Illinois, } ss.
Cook County, }

On this 29th day of December, one thousand eight hundred and seventy-four, personally came before me D. K. Tenney, who, being duly sworn, saith that he is one of the attorneys of the complainants; that he has heard the foregoing bill of complaint, read and knows the contents thereof, and that the same is true of his own knowledge, except as to the matters and things therein stated upon information and belief, and as to those he believes it to be true,

[SEAL.] N. BACON,
Notary Public.

Appellants demurred generally and specially, to the bill, and assigned for cause:

1st. Want of equity.

2d. That the bill is not signed and sworn to according to the rules and practice of the court.

3d. That the charges in the bill are in the alternative, and not positive.

The court overruled the demurrer and appointed a receiver, and directed that appellant assign, transfer and convey to him all his property, equitable interest, things in action and effects, except as aforesaid, and all books, papers, and vouchers relating thereto, and that he submit to be examined, etc.

The final decree recites that the bill was taken as confessed for want of an answer, and it decrees that appellees recover of appellant $1,492.89, with interest thereon from the 18th day of November, 1874, together with costs; that the receiver pay the amount of the same out of the proceeds of the property of appellants which has been or may be assigned to him pursuant to the order of the court, according to the equitable priority of appellees, as between them and the complainants' other creditor's suits against appellant, and that he bring the residue of the proceeds of the property into court, to abide the further order thereof, etc.

Opinion by SCHOLFIELD, J.

We are of opinion, the sufficiency of the affidavit to the bill to authorize a preliminary decree for injunction, and the appointment of a receiver, is not properly before us. No such use was made of it. Appellant appeared and demurred to the bill, and upon the demurrer being overruled, he refused to answer further, whereupon the court rendered a decree pro confesso, and the only question, therefore, is whether the allegations of the bill are sufficient to authorize the decree.

The forty-ninth section of the chancery code, (R. S. 1874, pp. 203-4,) provides, "whenever an execution shall have been issued against the property of a defendant, on a judgment at law or in equity, and shall have been returned unsatisfied in whole or in part, the party suing out such execution may file a bill in chancery against such defendants and any other person, to compel the discovery of any property or thing in action belonging to the defendant, and of any property, money or thing in action due to him, or held in trust for him, and to prevent the transfer of any such property, money or thing in action, or the payment or delivery thereof to the defendant, except when such trust has in good faith been created by, or the fund so held in trust has proceeded from, some person other than the defendant himself. The court shall have power to compel such discovery, and to prevent such transfer, payment or delivery, and to decree satisfaction of the sum remaining due on such judgment, out of any personal property, money or things in action, belonging to the defendant or held in trust for him, with the exception above stated, which shall be discovered by the proceedings in chancery, whether the same were liable to be taken in execution at law or not. This section was adopted almost literally from a prior statute of the State of New York. Edwards on Receivers, p. 269, 70, under which it was held, that the appointment of a receiver follows, as a matter of course, where the equity of the bill is not denied on the hearing.—See Edwards on Receivers, supra; Bloodgood v. Clark, 4 Paige, 574; Corning v. White, 2d Paige, 567; Congden v. Lee, 3d Edwards, 304; Bank v. Schermerhorn Clarke, 214; Austin v. Fegueira, 7 Paige, 56.

In the first cited of the above cases the chancellor said: "In these cases of creditors' bills, where the return of the execution unsatisfied presupposes that the property of the defendant, if any he has, will be misapplied, and entitles the complainant to an injunction, in the first instance it seems to be almost a matter of course to appoint a receiver to collect and preserve the property pending the litigation."

We have repeatedly recognized the rule of construction, that in adopting the statute of another State, it is presumed the general assembly intends that it shall receive the construction given by the courts of the State, from which it is adopted, unless such construction is inconsistent with the spirit and policy of our laws. Campbell v. Quinlin, 3 Scam. 288; Rigg et al. v. Wilton, 13 Ills. 15; Streeter v. The People, 69 Id. 598.

No such inconsistency being apparent in the present instance, the construction adopted by the courts of New York should be followed.

The existence of the judgment, and the return of the execution unsatisfied, are distinctly and positively alleged in the bill; and it is also alleged on information and belief, that appellant has property, etc., of the value of more than $100, exclusive of all prior claims, which appellees have been unable to reach by execution. If this was untrue, appellant should have answered and denied it. It comes with an ill grace from him, after having refused to answer and disclose the facts with regard to the property, which it is claimed he conceals and withholds from the payment of his debts, to say that the quality of such property is not alleged with sufficient certainty. If it were known precisely what property he has, how concealed and where, it would be unnecessary to call upon him for discovery.

The remaining objection urged, is to the form of the decree, in directing that the amount of the judgment shall be satisfied by a sale of the property to be discovered, before any property is in fact discovered. We do not perceive how appellant is injured by this. It is very clear, even under the terms of the decree, there can be no satisfaction of the judgment until something is discovered out of which it can be satisfied. And whether the receiver is vested with the power to make sale subsequent or prior to the discovery, would seem to make no possible difference. He can only execute the power when there is something upon which it can act, and appellant cannot be heard to object, unless the receiver shall attempt to satisfy the decree out of property exempt from seizure for that purpose, or shall unnecessarily sacrifice or waste property liable to be so seized. When, if ever, this shall happen, the law will afford an adequate remedy, but until it does, it can scarcely be considered important to discuss it.

In our opinion, there is no error in the record, and the decree will therefore be affirmed.

Affirmed.

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

OPINION FILED JUNE 30, 1876.

JOHN W. TURNER et al. v. NEWTON JENKINS, use of JULIUS S. STARR.

Error to Peoria.

PRACTICE—BILL NOT SIGNED—TAKING TESTIMONY—NOTICE TO GUARDIAN AD LITEM—MASTER'S REPORT—RECITALS OF SERVICE IN RECORD.

1. BILL NOT SIGNED.—The fact that a bill was not signed, cannot, for the first time, be insisted on in the Supreme Court. At most, it is a mere irregularity, and will be deemed to have been waived by answer, even by guardian ad litem.
2. SERVICE OF SUMMONS.—It is stated what will be considered a good return of service.
3. MASTER'S REPORT.—The finding of the court was based "upon proof taken before the master," and that proof showing no facts that would sustain the decree, it is reversed.
4. NOTICE TO GUARDIAN AD LITEM.—That the testimony contained in the master's report was improperly considered, for the reason it was taken without notice to the guardian ad litim.
5. "WERE DULY SUMMONED."—Held, That the finding in the decree of a court of general jurisdiction, defendants "were duly summoned," will be prima facie evidence of the existence of that jurisdictional fact.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.

This was a bill in chancery, filed Sept. 8, '68, in the Peoria Circuit Court, by Jenkins for use of Starr, against John Turner and plaintiffs in error, and the allegations are, that at the June term, 1868, of said court, Jenkins obtained judgment against said John Turner, who is the father of plaintiffs in error, for $1,358, debt, and $121.46 costs, which is still in force and unsatisfied. Said judgment being mostly for money loaned by Jenkins to John Turner, to purchase lands in the bill described, which he had contracted of Jeremiah Harker for $35,000. That John Turner purchased said lands with his own money, but to defraud complainant and creditors, took the deed to his said children, aged 16 and 12 years at the date of said deed, April 10, 1867. That John Turner is insolvent, etc. The bill prays, among other things, that John Turner be held to answer; that a guardian ad litem be appointed to answer for said minors; that on proof of the allegations in the bills, the court will set aside the deed from Harker to said infants, or decree that said lands be held as aforesaid, against said John Turner, etc. The bill is not signed by complainant or counsel. The summons is made returnable on the 4th Monday of September, 1868. Decree taken Nov. 11, 1868, recites defendants were duly summoned, etc. John Turner defaulted; that the guardian appeared for said minors, and filed answers, admitting minority, and prayed protection of the court; the case had been referred to the master, who had made his report, which was all the evidence in the case; court finds equities with complainant, that the land mentioned in the bill was purchased with John Turner's money, a large portion of which he had borrowed from Jenkins, and none of it furnished by said minors; also, said judgment and insolvency of John Turner. Bill taken as confessed as to Turner. Orders that Turner pay complainant the amount proved in said bill, it being the judgment and costs, in twenty days, and in default thereof, that said lands be sold, or so much as necessary to satisfy said judgment and costs. Lands were sold in a lump, and bought in by Starr, he bidding therefor, debt and costs.

Opinion by SCOTT, C. J.

The fact the bill may not have been signed, either by complainant or counsel, can not be insisted upon for the first time in this court; at most it is a mere irregularity, and will be deemed to have been waived by answer, even by guardian ad litem. It is a question that pertains to practice, and the right of an infant defendant will not be considered prejudiced, if the guardian ad litem answers without suggesting the omission which would be equivalent to an express waiver. No substantial defect is perceived in the service upon the minor defendants. The officer returns; he served the summons by reading and delivering a true copy "to the within named defendant, John W. Turner and Mary Turner." A similar objection taken to the service on the defendants, in Greeman v. Harvey, 53 Ill., 386, was declared to be untenable. So in this case, as in that, it may reasonably be inferred from the language used, a copy of the summons was delivered to each defendant named.

Confessedly, the service upon John Turner to the September term of court, was defective. Without any steps having been taken, the cause was continued. At the ensuing term the decree recites, defendants "were duly served ten days before the first day of the October term." Only the summons to the September term is found in this record, non constat, but a summons may have been issued to the October term, duly served on defendants, and lost from the files. Every reasonable presumption will be indulged in favor of the jurisdiction of a court of general jurisdiction, and its finding in the decree, defendants "were duly summoned," will be held to be prima facie evidence of the existence of that jurisdictional fact. Nothing appears in this record that rebuts the presumption in favor of the jurisdiction of the court, as indicated by the finding in the decree. This bill was to subject lands, the legal title to which was in the minor defendants, to the payment of a judgment in favor of complainant, against John Turner, on the ground he was the equitable owner. The judgment debtor made no defence in the court below, nor does he join in this writ of error. The usual answer was filed by a guardian ad litem, admitting the minority of the defendants named, and invoking the protection of the court. The cause having been referred to the master, he made a report of testimony taken by him, "and from the proof taken before the master," the court finds certain facts, which in its opinion establish the equities of complainant. No other evidence is found in the record, except that contained in the master's report. And indeed, the recitals in the decree exclude the idea any other testimony was heard. All the findings of the court are based on the proof taken before the master. Aside from the objection, the testimony was taken before the master, without notice to the guardian ad litem. We do not think the evidence is sufficient to support the decree. There was no legitimate testimony to establish the existence of a judgment in favor of complainant and against Turner, unsatisfied and subsisting at the time the proof was taken. No record of any judgment in any court was exhibited. The decree only finds complainant obtained judgment against Turner, but when, in what court, and whether it was unsatisfied, and a lien upon the judgment debtors' equitable estate, it is silent. But the testimony contained in the master's report was improperly considered, for the reason it was taken without notice to the guardian ad litem, whose business it was to defend for the minor defendants, and whose interest in the property was about to be cut off by the decree. This position is not answered by the suggestion. Infants are bound by the acts of their guardian in all matters relating to the practice in the court. No doctrine is better settled than that a guardian ad litem cannot admit away any of the substantial rights of infants, who are always in chancery regarded as the wards of the court. But conceding the correctness of the rule asserted, there must be an express waiver of an irregularity in practice, or some positive act from which a waiver may be inferred. Mere non-action on the part of the guardian, will not be considered as a waiver of anything in favor of infants, whether it relates to mere practice or to the substance of the defence. In this case the guardian did nothing by which the infants would be bound. He had no notice the testimony was to be taken, and he could not be present, nor did he do any act that could be construed into a waiver of the irregularity that intervened after the testimony had been reported in court.—Hence the testimony was not admissible as against the infant defendants, for want of notice, notwithstanding their guardian may have failed to make any positive objection on the hearing. It would be otherwise, had defendants been adults. Had they made no objection, they would have been considered as having waived the want of notice as to taking the testimony.

Independently of the "proof taken before the master," the court found no facts that would sustain the decree against the infants.

The decree will be reversed and the cause remanded.

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

OPINION FILED JUNE 30, 1876.

H. G. POWERS v. A. C. BRIGGS et al.

Appeal from Cook.

WHEN A NOTE SIGNED BY THE TRUSTEES OF A CHURCH WILL BE REGARDED AS THEIR INDIVIDUAL NOTE.

Where a note, in the body, runs, "one year after date, we, the trustees of the Seventh Presbyterian Church, promise to pay to the order of H. G. Powers," etc., and was signed "Trustees. A. H. Briggs, Louis B. Kelly,' et al., held, that this note bound the defendants only as individuals, and did not bind the church.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.

Opinion by SCHOLFIELD, J.

Suit was brought on two promissory notes for $600 each, one payable in one year, and the other payable in two years from date, but in other respects precisely the same in form. That payable in one year from date is as follows:

$600. Chicago, May 17, 1870.

One year after date, we, the trustees of the Seventh Presbyterian Church, promise to pay to the order of H. G. Powers, six hundred dollars, value received, with interest at six per cent. per annum.

A. H. BRIGGS,
LOUIS B. KELLEY,
JOHN CORBETT,
F. D. MARSHAL, } Trustees.

Evidence was admitted by the court below, over the plaintiff's objection, showing that at the time the notes were executed, the defendants were trustees of the Seventh Presbyterian Church of Chicago, and that the the notes were given for the difference in value between church organs, which they had exchanged.

The court gave judgment for the defendants, and the correctness of that judgment depends upon the single question, whether the notes bind the defendants individually, or only the corporation of which they were trustees.

The authorities are not entirely harmonious on the question; but, after a careful examination of the numerous cases cited in the elaborate briefs filed by the respective counsel, our opinion is the court erred in finding that the defendants were not individually liable on the notes.

The general rule appears to be, when the names of the principal and agent both appear upon the instrument, it will be held to be the bill or note of him who signs it, unless it satisfactorily appears that he signed it in a mere ministerial character, intending to bind another. "Unless," said Lord Ellenborough, in Leadbetter v. Farrow, 5 M. & S. 45, "he says plainly, 'I am the mere scribe,' he will be bound."

The rule is thus stated by Shaw, C. J., in Bradlee v. Boston Glass Co., 16 Pickering, 350: "As the forms of words in which contracts may be made and executed are almost infinitely various, the test question is, whether the person signing professes and intends to bind himself, and adds the name of another to indicate the capacity or trust in which he acts, or the person for whose account the promise is to be made; or whether the words referring to the principal are intended to indicate that he does a ministerial act in giving authenticity to the act, promise, and contract of another. Does the person signing apply the executing hand as the instrument of another, or the promising and engaging mind of a contracting party?" See also Morrill v. Codding, 4 Allen, 403; Leach v. Blow, 8 Smedes & Marshall, 228; Chick v. Trevett, 20 Maine, 462; Fogg v. Virgin, 19 Id., 252; Sturdivant v. Hull, 59 Id., 172; Barker v. M. F. Ins. Co., 3 Wendell, 94; Hills v. Bannister, 8 Cowen, 31; Moss v. Livingston, 4 Comstock, 208; Dewitt et al. v. Walton, 5 Selden, 571; Savage v. Rix et al., 9. New Hampshire, 263; Tucker Manufacturing Co. v. Fairbanks et al., 98 Mass., 103.

Testing these notes by this rule it would seem clear they are binding only on the defendants as individuals. Although the words "the trustees of the Seventh Presbyterian Church" appear in the body of the notes, and the word "trustees" is appended to the defendant's signatures, there are no words used implying an undertaking on the part of the corporation. The corporation is not assumed to be acting by or through the defendants, nor does it even appear the defendants act for or on behalf of the corporation. The language clearly indicates that the defendants were trustees when they signed the notes, but not that the corporation promised to pay them.

Nor do we consider the facts proved here outside of what appears on the face of the papers change the result. True, they show plaintiff knew the defendants were trustees, and the consideration of the notes was the church organ. But it does not follow from this that the plaintiff was giving credit to the corporation, or that he knew the defendants intended by the notes that he should do so; and there is no other evidence tending to show he gave credit to the corporation. It was not unreasonable that the defendants having the charge and control of the finances of the corporation and being acquainted with its resources, would give their paper for property of the corporation, intending to protect themselves against loss, from its funds, and the notes themselves are the most satisfactory evidence that they did do so.

In this view of the case it is unnecessary to express any opinion as to the admissibility of the parol evidence.

The judgment is reversed and the cause remanded.

Scott and Sheldon, JJ., dissent.

FULLER & SMITH for the appellant.

U. S. DISTRICT COURT, E. D. PENNSYLVANIA.

THE U. S. v. RHAWN.

The law under which the National Banks are incorporated does not exempt them from examination by the Internal Revenue Officers mentioned in Section 3177 of the Revised Statutes.

A clerk of a Supervisor of Internal Revenue is, however, not such an officer.

This case was tried at the last November Sessions of the court, before Judge Cadwalader, who charged the jury as follows:

Charge by CADWALADER, J.

Section 3177 of Revised Statutes of the United States enacts, that any collector, deputy collector, or inspector, may enter in the day time, any building or place where any articles or objects subject to tax are * * * kept within his district, so far as it may be necessary for the purpose of examining said article or articles, and that any owner or person having the agency or superintendency of such building or place, who refuses to suffer such officer to examine such article or articles, shall for every such refusal, forfeit five hundred dollars. Sect. 3163 enacts, that every supervisor, under the direction of the commissioner, shall see that all laws and regulations relating to the collection of internal taxes, are faithfully executed and complied with, &c.

The present suit is to recover $500, a penalty alleged to have been incurred by the defendant, who is president of a National Bank, by refusing to suffer a person who was acting under the direction of Mr. Tutton, the Supervisor of Internal Revenue, to examine such checks of customers of the bank as were kept in it, in order to discover whether any, and which of them were unstamped, contrary to the provisions of the internal revenue law upon the subject.

It is alleged that there was an application to defendant, to suffer such an examination to be made, and that the defendant refused to suffer this to be done.

The defendant contends that the revenue officer had no right to make the examination requested. The ground of this contention is, that the law under which the National Banks are incorporated provides for the occasional examination of their affairs, and for reports of their condition to the Controller of the Currency, and enacts, that they shall not be subject to any visitorial powers other than are authorized by the act, or are vested in the courts of justice.

These banks are fiscal agents of the Government of the United States, and it would be most extraordinary that Congress should have exempted their customers from a necessary and proper scrutiny under the revenue laws in a matter which has no legitimate connection whatever with the affairs of the banks. As to the position thus taken by the defense, I am of the opinion that it is wholly unreasonable and unfounded in law. If you believe the testimony of Mr. Tutton, he told the defendant that there was no desire or intention to examine into the affairs of the bank, or the accounts of its customers, and stated that the sole purpose was to ascertain whether checks in its keeping were unstamped.

If unstamped, they were subject to tax under the revenue law.

The visitorial powers over a corporation are the subject of a distinct head under the law of corporations. The examination of such checks under the revenue law is not the exercise of a visitorial power under the Act of Congress relative to the banks. This part of the defense, therefore fails in law.

It appears, however, that the person who asked to make the examination in this case was a clerk of the supervisor. Such a person is not an officer within the meaning of the law. The words of section 3177 are, "any collector, deputy collector or inspector;" and a clerk to the supervisor is not included in this description.

If the supervisor was himself authorized to make such an examination, he could not delegate this power to the clerk.

Your verdict should therefore, for this reason, be for the defendant.

WE have received from C. C. BONNEY, of the Chicago bar, the following opinion:

CIRCUIT COURT OF COOK CO., ILL.

JULY TERM, 1876.

SPRINGER et al. v. GIBBONS et al., and MULVY v. THOMPKINS et al.

BURNT RECORD CASE—STRICT FORECLOSURE—REDEMPTION—RIGHTS OF PURCHASERS—WHAT IS A FINAL DECREE.

1. COMPLAINANTS' TITLE.—That complainants have failed to make out the title they claimed.

2. RIGHTS OF PURCHASERS.—That purchasers had a right to rely upon the judgment of the court, and were not required to run any risk on account of any errors in that judgment. If a court having jurisdiction, says a title is good, purchasers have a right to say so too, and to hold the property, no matter how many errors there may be. Such judgment is conclusive, between the parties, until reversed or set aside.

3. WHAT IS A FINAL DECREE.—The court states what is to be regarded as a final decree, in a suit for strict foreclosure, and the effect upon the right of the defendant to redeem of not entering a final or confirmatory order.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.

FARWELL, C. J.

In these Burnt Record cases in which the complainants ask for a decree of the court declaring them the owners in fee simple of the property in question, I have examined all the authorities cited on the hearing, and have endeavored to satisfy myself as to what are the legal rights of the parties. Upon the whole I am of opinion that the complainants have failed to make out the title they claim. The important facts in the case are as follows, viz:

We call attention to the following opinions, reported at length in this issue.

POWER OF SECRETARY OF TREASURY—TREASURY NOTES—LEGAL TENDER NOTES.—The opinion of the Supreme court of the United States, by CLIFFORD, J., as to the power of the secretary of the treasury and the subscription agent, to advertise that treasury notes were payable in gold, and the effect of a protest against receiving payment of the same in legal tender notes. The court holds independently of the question whether they were payable in gold or legal tender notes, that the party by receiving legal tender notes in payment waived any right he might have had to receive payment in gold, and that no action could be maintained by the party to recover the difference between payment in gold and payment in legal tender notes.

CREDITORS' RIGHTS IN BANKRUPT'S ESTATE—LIEN CREDITORS.—The opinion of the United States District Court for the Western District of Illinois, by HOPKINS, J., defining the rights of creditors in a bankrupt's estate, and holding that the District court has the power to marshal the securities of a bankrupt's estate, and in certain cases to direct out of which fund lien creditors shall be paid, and to direct them to foreclose mortgages before resorting to the general fund.

CREDITORS BILL—WHEN IT MAY BE FILED.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of this State by SCOTT, C. J., holding that a creditor's bill may be filed at any time after the return of an execution, nulla bona, in whole or in part; that in order to obtain an injunction or the appointment of a receiver, the bill should charge that the defendant has some particular property. There has hardly been a creditors bill filed in this State before the expiration of ninety days from the date of the execution, but what the defendant has demurred, claiming on this ground it should be dismissed. The bar will be glad that this question is put to rest in this State. We would in this connection call attention to the opinion of the court by SCHOLFIELD, J., involving some of the same questions as in this case. In determining when an injunction will be issued and a receiver appointed, the two opinions should be construed together, and the New York decisions, construing the statute of that State, from whence our statute was derived, should be consulted.

BILL NOT SIGNED—TAKING TESTIMONY—NOTICE TO GUARDIAN—RECITALS OF SERVICE.—The opinion of the Supreme court of Illinois by SCOTT, C. J., holding that the objection that the bill is not signed cannot be made for the first time in the Supreme Court; that the testimony contained in the master's report was improperly admitted, for the reason it was taken without notice to the guardian ad litem; that where the finding in the decree of a court of general jurisdiction is that the defendants "were duly summoned," such recital will be prima facia evidence of that jurisdictional fact. In some of the circuit courts of the State a very loose practice has grown up, and the appointment of a guardian ad litem is regarded as a mere matter of form.—This timely opinion of the Supreme Court will have a tendency to cause the lower courts to see that guardians properly defend the interests of minor defendants submitted to their care.

NOTE SIGNED BY TRUSTEES—WHEN IT BINDS THEM AS INDIVIDUALS.—The Opinion of the Supreme Court of Illinois by SCHOLFIELD, J., as to when a note signed by the trustees of a church will be regarded as their individual note. Church trustees will do well to see, in making notes, that they promise "as trustees."

INSURANCE—NOTICE—PROOF OF LOSS.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of this State by CRAIG, J., in an insurance case deciding several questions relating to the notice to be given and the proof of loss to be made in case of the destruction of the property covered by the policy.

NATIONAL BANKS—EXAMINATION: The opinion of the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania by CADWALADER, J., holding that National Banks are not exempt from examination by the Internal Revenue Officers, mentioned in section 3177 of the Revised Statutes, but that a clerk of Internal Revenue is not such an officer.

STRICT FORECLOSURE—DECREE—FINAL ORDER—RIGHTS OF PURCHASERS.—The opinion of the Circuit Court of Cook County by FARWELL, C. J., as to what will be regarded as a final decree in a suit for strict foreclosure, and the effect of omitting to enter in such suit the final or confirmatory order, and holding that purchasers have a right to rely upon the judgment of a court having jurisdiction, and are not required to run any risk on account of any errors in such judgment. If a court having jurisdiction says a title is good, purchasers have a right to say so too, and to hold the property, no matter how many errors there may be. Such judgment is conclusive between the parties until reversed or set aside. The court also states what is to be regarded as a final decree in a suit for a strict foreclosure, and the effect upon the right of the defendant to redeem of not entering a final or confirmatory order. The case of Wadhams et al v. Gay, referred to by Judge Farwell, is one of the most celebrated legal contests to settle the rights of purchasers under a decree, ever had in this country. This case was several times before the Supreme Court with varying results. But the law of the case was finally established as Mr. Kales claimed it should be, in his original brief before the Supreme Court. The final opinion is reported 7 CHICAGO LEGAL NEWS, 169.

NOTES TO RECENT CASES.

COMPENSATION OF ATTORNEY.

The U. S. District Court for the District of New Jersey in 14 N. B. R., 150, say in the case of Drake, that the compensation of the assignee's attorney must be reasonable and proportioned to the value of the estate. This will do very well to talk about, but the fact remains that attorneys in bankruptcy cases are in the habit of not only charging very heavy fees, but of collecting them. This practice is not confined to attorney s but it extends very generally to persons who have the handling of the bankrupt's estate. We need a bankrupt law, but not such a law as the present one. The fees should be lowered, the practice should be simplified. There should no be one blank required where there are ten now. It takes about a hun dred blanks to get a man through bankruptcy.

BANKRUPTCY—WIFE'S CLAIM—EVIDENCE OF HUSBAND.

The United States District Court for the eastern district of Pa. in re Bean, 14 N. B. R. 182, held that a bankrupt may testify to support a claim of his wife against the State, where such testimony would be competent under the State laws in force prior to the first of December, 1873.

BANKRUPTCY BILL OF SALE.

The U. S. District Court for the District of Vermont, in Allen v. Whitmore, 169, held that if a bill of sale is recorded in the clerk's office at one place, upon a representation by the bankrupt that he resided there, it will bind the assignee, although the bankrupt actually resided at another place.

CUSTOM OF TRADE—PACKER—GENERAL LIEN.

The English Court of Appeals ex-parte Shubrook, 34, L. T. Rep., N. S., 785, held that a packer has a general lien for the amount of his charges upon the goods of a customer in his hands. Not only in respect of the particular goods, but also in respect of any other goods of the same customer.

Parsons, Jr., Law Book Publisher, 1875.

This work is in two substantial volumes, making over eighteen hundred pages. These Commentaries pursue the order adopted, and contain much of the matter to be found in Blackstone's Commentaries. Messrs. Broom and Hadley say they are meant to be such as Blackstone would, if now living, have reproduced; amending where amendments were needed, adding from the Reports and Statute Books, and modifying his style in accordance with modern usage. They treat of the Rights of Persons, the Rights of Things, Private Wrongs and Public Wrongs. Under the first of these heads are considered, not merely the absolute rights of individuals, such as the Right of Liberty and that of Property, but also the nature of those institutions, which, by the framers of our law, were deemed essential for asserting and maintaining them. Under the second of the above heads, are included the classification and legal nature of real property, the tenures and titles of its occupants, the various species of estates, the modes of acquiring and transferring them. Personalty is likewise here noticed; the property in and title to it. The third division is devoted to the redress of private wrongs, the courts which administer it, their jurisdiction and mode of procedure; while the fourth division treats of acts which are criminal, in kind with offenses against the Crown, the commonwealth, the community, the manner of repressing and of punishing them. An epitome follows on the rise and progress of the law in England. This edition contains all the citations to the English cases. The American editor has illustrated the doctrines laid down in the text, by extensive notes and citations to the American cases. Where the English law is in harmony with the American, the cases cited in the notes will show that fact, and the prominent distinctions or differences. These Commentaries are a mine of law—a library of themselves, which will prove useful and instructive to any lawyer or student who thoroughly consults their pages.

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

ABSTRACT OF OPINIONS FILED AT SPRINGFIELD, JUNE 30TH, 1876.

228. Casper Kemper v. President, Trustees, etc.—Error to Morgan.—Opinion by SCHOLFIELD, J., affirming.

MOTION TO DISMISS APPEAL FROM J. P.—NATURE OF APPEAL BONDS—WAIVER, ETC.

STATEMENT.—Appeal bond in a J. P. case, filed Sept. 8, on a judgment rendered August 18th. Motion to dismiss because the bond was not filed in twenty days. Held,

1. That the removal of causes from an inferior to a superior court for a trial de novo, are unknown to the common law, and can only be prosecuted where they are given by statute, which statute must be strictly complied with.

2. Nevertheless, appeal bonds are in the nature of process to remove a cause from a justice of the peace to the Circuit court, and hence any objection may be waived by the parties; and any appearance not limited to the purpose of objecting to the sufficiency of the steps taken to perfect the appeal, will be deemed a waiver of all objections in that regard.

3. Where the records of court simply show that a continuance in an appeal case was by "order of court," it will not be presumed to have been by consent of parties, nor are affidavits admissible to supply any records thereon, except in a direct proceeding to reform the record. And where a continuance is thus merely by order of court, a party may appear at the subsequent term for the purpose of moving to dismiss on proper grounds.

230.—William H. Broadwell v. Alfred H. Paradise.—Error to Morgan.—Opinion by SHELDON, J., reversing and remanding.

DAMAGES ON RETURN OF GOODS REPLEVIED TO AN OFFICER.

STATEMENT.—Appellee replevied goods levied upon by appellant, a sheriff. Afterwards, he dismissed his suit, and the court ordered a return of the property. Defendant then entered a motion to have the damages assessed. After several continuances, the matter was referred to a jury, which returned a verdict that they found no damages to assess. Motion for new trial overruled. Held,

1. The sheriff held a special property for the benefit of the general owner in the goods seized, and he was entitled to have assessed as damages the value of the use of the goods, the rule being that, in trespass or trover, if the property be taken by a stranger, the whole value may be recovered by the special property man, he holding the balance, beyond his own interest, in trust, for the general owner. But if the suit be between him and the general owner, the latter is entitled to a reduction of the value of his interest. Under this rule, the sheriff ought to have had the full value of the use of the property, although he himself had no beneficial interest therein, and personally sustained no damage, Paradise being regarded as a mere stranger, although the property had been taken from him by the levy.

It was, however, contended that, as neither the officer nor the execution creditor could be allowed to use the property levied upon, no damages could properly be assessed on this account. But, held,

2. That although it may be that neither of them suffers any damage by a deprivation of the use of the property, that the accruing interest on the judgment may indemnify the execution creditor, yet the general owner is to be regarded as sustaining damages during the time the property is taken, and held from being applied upon the execution; he loses the interest on its value, which runs against him, in the meantime, on the judgment, and as an equivalent to the interest, he ought to have damages.

3. The recovery by the defendant is, in respect of the entire interest in the property, that of both the special and general owner, and the damages recovered for the use of the property, if not for the benefit of the special owner, will be for the benefit of the general owner. All that the officer realizes in respect to the property, whether damages for its use or the proceeds of its sale, will be applied and held for the benefit of the general owner. All things that may remain after satisfying the execution against him, will be held in trust for the general owner.

PROSECUTIONS UNDER PENAL STATUTE — ELECTION UNDER.

STATEMENT.—Action for penalties for violation of 6th section, ch. 43, R. S. 1874. It was contended that the court erred in not compelling plaintiff, before going to trial, to elect, specifically, what particular offence under section 6 the defendants were to be required to answer. But, Held,

That, as there was no evidence offered except under one clause of that section, so that defendants were not called upon to meet offences under different clauses, the judgment cannot be disturbed on that ground.

235.—Charles T. Hillyer v. Delia O. Lewis et al.—Appeal from Ford.—Opinion by SCOTT, Ch. J., affirming.

IRRELEVANT EVIDENCE ADMITTED IN CHANCERY—RULE THEREON—PRESUMPTION.

STATEMENT.—Suit for foreclosure—the contention was whether a certain note under the mortgage had been paid. On this the evidence was conflicting. Held,

That, where, on excluding all evidence admitted, which is claimed to be improper, enough remains to sustain the decree of the court, it will be presumed that the court, on the hearing, considered only legitimate evidence, and excluded from consideration all testimony not properly admissible found in the record. In chancery causes, it is not error for which a decree should be reversed, that the court admitted irrelevant testimony.

231.—John C. Crabtree, et al. v. Sarah Dodsworth, ex'r et al.—Appeal from Morgan.—Opinion by BREESE, J., affirming.

PARTIES WHEN NOT ALLOWED TO TESTIFY.

STATEMENT.—Crabtree, and his securities on a promissory note, were sued. One of the sureties pleaded that the time had been extended to the principal debtors without his knowledge, and proved the fact by Crabtree himself. Held,

That the principal debtor, being a party to the suit, wherein the opposite party sued in a fiduciary character, was not, under the statute, a competent witness, even in behalf of a co-defendent. The design of the statute is, that where parties testify, they shall be on equal ground, and the representatives of a deceased party would be greatly at a disadvantage, if opposing parties were permitted to testify.

285.—Richard Towl v. Benjamin Wilson et al.—Error to Madison.—Opinion by WALKER, J.

FAILURE OF COVENANTS IN DEED—INJUNCTION—NEGLECT TO DEFEND IN EQUITY SUIT—FRAUDULENT REPRESENTATION.

STATEMENT.—Wilson represented that he owned the title to lands he sold to Towl, whereas he only owned an undivided share of four-sevenths in one portion, and of three-sevenths in another. Towl paid two notes, given for the purchase money. But, failing in the third, suit for foreclosure was brought, and no defense being made, a decree was obtained. Towl consulted a lawyer while the suit was pending, who advised him that he could not make a defense unless he could show that Wilson was insolvent. After decree obtained, Towl brought a bill to enjoin the foreclosure sale and execution of the decree. Held,

1. That, as he failed to interpose a defense to the foreclosure suit while pending, his bill for injunction cannot be maintained. And it is no excuse that he was misadvised by his attorney. He and his attorney were bound to know the law.

2. He has a remedy at law on the covenants in the deed, to the extent of the deficiency in the amount of the interest conveyed, and he must be left to that remedy.

3. Wilson was not necessarily guilty of fraud in the representation, as he might not have known the defect of his own title, and the extent of his interest. In order to constitute a fraudulent representation, the party making it must know it to be false.

286.—Jane C. Crane v. William H. Crane et al.—Error to Vermillion.—Opinion by SHELDON, J.

CHANGE OF VENUE ON ACCOUNT OF PREJUDICE IN THE JUDGE — MOTION, WHEN MADE—HOMESTEAD.

STATEMENT.—Bill brought to set aside a deed executed by appellant and her husband (appellee) and the legal representatives of the grantee therein, on the ground that it was procured by threats, menaces, and duress. This turned wholly on the evidence, against appellant.

There are, however, two points of law made; (1) that the court refused a motion to change the venue on account of the prejudice of the judge; (2) there was no formal waiver of homestead rights in the premises conveyed. Held,

1. That a motion to change the venue on account of the prejudice of a judge, comes too late on the trial of a cause, after all the evidence has been heard, and ought not then to be entertained. Nor is it a sufficient ground that the prejudice was unknown to the applicant until the day previous.

2. The deed having been made before the amendatory act of 1857, comes under the act of 1851, relative to homesteads. This act related only to forced sales by judicial process, for which a formal release was necessary to subject the premises to the forced sale, but no prohibition whatever rested on a voluntary alienation of the homestead.

TESTIMONY OF DAMAGE IN LIQUOR PROSECUTION.

Held, That under a prosecution for selling liquor to a husband, it is improper to allow testimony concerning the former value of the husband's estate, and the diminution thereof. The statute gives an action only on the ground that the wife is injured in her person, her property, or her means of support.

290.—Laura A. Dickinson v. C., B. & Q. R. R. Co.—Error to Fulton.—Opinion by SCOTT, Ch. J., reversing and remanding.

AMENDING DECLARATION—VENUE OF ACTION AGAINST RAILROAD COMPANY.

STATEMENT.—Appellant brought a suit for injuries received, jointly with her husband, and recovered judgment. On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed the case on the ground that the husband was not a proper party. Then the husband was dismissed out of the case, and the defendant company pleaded in abatement that the venue was laid in the wrong county (Fulton), the injury being received in McDonough, there being a change in the law after the original suit was commenced, requiring a local venue. Held,

1. That dismissing the husband out of the suit, and not alleging any new cause of action, did not constitute a new suit.

2. That as the law, when the action was originally brought, allowed it to be brought as it was brought, the court did not subsequently lose jurisdiction previously acquired, by reason of the amendment as to parties.

SETTLEMENT ON WIFE BY HUSBAND, AS TO CREDITORS.

Held, That as the husband, at the time this property was settled on his wife, retained enough to satisfy his indebtedness, and as the wife had an equitable interest in the premises by reason of her means having been employed in its purchase, the settlement was justifiable, and cannot be impeached.

Peter Papineau v. Maxime Belgrade.—Appeal from Ford.—Opinion by WALKER, J., affirming.

SECURITY FOR COSTS — AVERAGING BY A JURY.

Held, 1. That notwithstanding the statute requiring residents to give security for costs, etc., is peremptory, yet its application is discretionary with the court, and error cannot be assigned on the decision of a motion thereon.

2. A guardian's settlement may be impeached, notwithstanding its approval by the court is a judicial act.

3. After a court has heard the evidence in a cause, it cannot properly adjourn, and enter the judgment in vacation. [The Supreme Court, however, remanded this case, with directions to the court to enter the judgment when court again convenes.]

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

OPINION FILED JUNE 30, 1876.

THE KNICKERBOCKER INS. CO., of Chicago, v. JOHN S. GOULD et al.

Error to DuPage.

INSURANCE — PROOF OF LOSS — NOTICE — EVIDENCE.

1. NOTICE—PROOF OF LOSS.—The court construes the clause in the policy providing for immediate notice and proof of loss.

2. THE WORD "IMMEDIATE."—The court gives the word "immediate" a liberal construction.

3. PROOFS OF LOSS AS EVIDENCE.—That it was proper to introduce in evidence, for the purpose of establishing the fact that such proofs of loss were made and delivered to the company, as was required by the terms of the policy.

4. PAROL PROOF.—That it was competent to establish by parol proof, the fact that plaintiffs were insured in other companies, and the evidence of the amount of such insurance, cannot be said to be proving the contents by parol.

5. DUE DILIGENCE.—The court states the proper manner of proving the loss of the property insured, and what will be considered "due diligence."

6. DEFECTIVE PROOF.—That if defective proofs of loss are handed into the company within the time required by the policy, and no objection is made to them, it will be considered as waived. But this rule does not apply when defective proofs are handed in after the time named in the policy.

7. INTEREST ON POLICY.—That the policy was a contract for the payment of money at a certain time, and, as such, it was proper for the jury to allow interest on it in making up their verdict.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.

Opinion by CRAIG, J.

This was an action of assumpsit brought by John S. and William Gould in the Superior Court of Cook county, against the Knickerbocker Insurance Company of Chicago, on a policy of insurance of $2,500 on certain goods contained in the mill of the plaintiffs, located at the corner of Beach and Polk streets, in Chicago, which was destroyed by the Chicago fire of October, 1871.

On the motion of the defendant, the venue of the cause was changed to Du Page county, when a trial was had before a jury, resulting in a verdict and judgment in favor of the plaintiffs for $2,905.41.

It is first urged that the judgment cannot be sustained, because timely notice of the loss was not given by the insured to the company.

The policy provides that, "in case of loss the assured shall give immediate notice thereof in writing, and shall render to the company a particular account of said loss in writing under oath, stating the time, origin, etc."

The goods mentioned in the policy were burned on the 8th or 9th of October, 1871. After the fire an inventory of the goods destroyed was made out and delivered to the secretary of the company on the 13th day of November following. No objection whatever was made by the company in regard to the form of the proof, nor was any objection interposed that previous notice of the loss had not been given, but the proofs of loss were retained. Nothing was paid on the policy, nor did the company take any action in regard to the claim.

It will be observed that the language employed in the policy in regard to notice and proof of loss is peculiar. "In cases of loss the assured shall give immediate notice thereof in writing, and shall render to the company a particular account of said loss in writing."

The language used would seem to indicate that it was the intention that notice of loss and proofs of loss should be furnished the company at the same time, as the two portions of the sentence are closely connected by the word "and." It is not indicated in the first clause to whom the notice shall be given, nor is there any time specified in the last clause when the proof of loss shall be rendered.

If this construction be the correct one, then the word "immediate" must receive a liberal construction, in order to carry out the manifest intent of the parties, as it is apparent that it was impossible immediately to furnish proofs of loss.

This view seems more reasonable by referring to another provision in the policy, which is as follows: "do insure, etc., to the amount of $2,500 against all such immediate loss or damage as may occur by fire, etc., to be paid sixty days after due notice and proofs of the same, made by the assured and received at the office of this company."

The word "due" notice, not "immediate" notice, is used, and the loss that may occur is to be paid sixty days after notice and proofs are received.

If it had been within the contemplation of the contracting parties not to require notice and proofs of loss to be given at the same time, it is but reasonable to presume the payment of loss would have been specified to be made sixty days after notice of loss given, or in sixty days after proofs of loss. When all the provisions of the policy are considered together, we therefore feel warranted in giving the word "immediate" a liberal construction. This, too, is in harmony with the authorities.

In the Peoria Marine and Fire Ins. Co. v. Lewis, 18 Ill., 553, when the question arose whether the notice of loss had been given within the time required by the conditions of the policy, it was said: "The provision in the conditions, that notice is forthwith to be given of the loss, means within a reasonable time under the circumstances—the use of due diligence."

May, in his work on insurance, states the rule in regard to notice of loss, thus: "If the notice be required to be forthwith, or as soon as possible, or immediately, it will meet the requirements if given with due diligence under the circumstances of the case, and without unnecessary and unreasonable delay, of which the jury are ordinarily to be judges.

Under the rule here announced which is substantially the same as held by this court in the case cited supra, the question presented is whether the notice given under the circumstances was a substantial compliance with the provision of the policies.

The fire which consumed plaintiffs' property was a general conflagration. It spread over and consumed more than one hundred acres of the principal business portion of the city of Chicago.

Business of all kinds was demoralized and to a great extent suspended. The office of the defendant together with its books and papers were destroyed.

The plaintiffs, who had been engaged in a large manufacturing business, held a large number of policies of insurance on this property. Time was absolutely necessary for them to arrange their papers, procure the necessary blanks and learn the location of the offices of the insurance companies before they could give notice of loss and furnish proofs.

Under all the circumstances of the case, we cannot say there was an unreasonable delay.

To give the word "immediate" a literal interpretation would defeat the ends of justice, and in a case of this kind require of the insured an impossibility, as the office of the company had been destroyed and the plaintiffs had no information as to the location of the officers or agents of the company, and hence it was impossible forthwith to give the notice and furnish proofs of loss.

It is also urged that the averments of the declaration were not sufficient as to the value of the property destroyed and the amount of other insurance on the same.

Whether the declaration would have been regarded sufficient on demurrer, is a question that does not arise, as no demurrer was interposed.

We perceive no variance between the proof introduced and the declaration, and we are aware of no ground upon which the court could have sustained the motion of the defendants to exclude the evidence from the jury.

Had the defendants regarded the declaration insufficient, the proper mode to reach the defect was by demurrer.

It is also claimed that the court erred in permitting the proofs of loss to be introduced as evidence of the kind, value and amount of property destroyed.

Upon an examination of the record, we do not find the proofs were introduced for the purpose indicated.

The record discloses the fact that the proofs were offered in evidence, for what purpose however the record is silent; they were objected to, but upon what grounds does not appear; the objection was overruled and the evidence was admitted to the jury.

It was proper to introduce in evidence the proofs of loss, for the purpose of establishing the fact that such proofs were made and delivered to the company as was required by the terms of the policy, and such no doubt was the object and purpose of the evidence.

The amount of loss seems to have been fully established by testimony entirely independent of the proofs of loss.

Nor do we see any force in the objection that parol proof was admitted of the amount of insurance held by the plaintiffs on the property in other companies.

It was certainly competent to establish by parol proof, the fact that plaintiffs were insured in other companies, and the evidence of the amount of such insurance cannot be said to be proving the contents of a writing by parol.

There was no issue involved which required the production of the policies held in other companies, their terms and conditions were of no importance, and it was not necessary to establish their contents.

It is next urged that the court erred in giving plaintiffs 3 and 4 instructions, which were as follows:

3. If the jury believe from the evidence, that there was such a loss of property described in the declaration herein, as is therein set out, then they are authorized in determining for themselves, from all the facts and circumstances of this case as developed by the evidence, whether or not, after said loss, the plaintiffs gave immediate notice thereof in writing to defendant.

4. If the jury believe from the evidence that there was a loss of property described in the delaration, as therein stated, and that after said loss the plaintiffs did not give immediate notice thereof in writing, yet if they, at the same time, find from the evidence that on or about November 13, 1871, the plaintiffs submitted to defendant proofs of said loss as required by the policy of insurance herein introduced, and defendant accepted the same, and retained the possession thereof from thence thereafter, and made no objection to the plaintiffs not having given immediate notice of said loss in writing, either at the time said proofs were submitted, or at any time thereafter, then the jury are authorized in finding that defendant waived such immediate notice in writing, as is above mentioned.

Whether due diligence has been used in giving the required notice may be regarded a question of fact which is ordinarily left to the jury to be determined from all the circumstances in the case bearing upon the question. May on Insurance, Sec. 462; Edwards v. Baltimore Insurance Company, 3 Gill, (Md.) 176. But when there is no dispute in relation to the facts and circumstances bearing upon the question of diligence in giving the notice, then the question may be regarded as one of loss for the court. May on Insurance, Sec. 462; Kimball v. Howard Fire Insurance Company, 8 Gray, 33. The facts in regard to the diligence, used in this case were not conceded, but were controverted before the jury, and therefore we see no error in the 3d instruction.

As to the fourth instruction we are satisfied it is erroneous.

If a notice of loss was given defective in form, and the company received it and pointed out no defect and made no objection thereto, such would no doubt be regarded as a waiver of a sufficient notice, but a failure to give notice in time rests entirely upon a different ground from a failure to give notice in due form.

The reason is obvious where a defective notice is given; if the company points out the defects, the insured can supply them by a new notice; and if the company fails to point out the objections they may very properly be regarded as waived, but a notice not served in time rests on a different principle. If the company makes objection the insured cannot remedy the defect; it is too late, and hence there is neither reason or necessity for the company to speak nor be concluded by its silence.

We do not think that an insurance company is concluded by a notice of loss not issued in time, for the reason that no objection is interposed at the time service is made, and, therefore, the instruction, as given, was not correct.

But while the instruction failed to lay down the rule correctly, it could do no injury to the defendant, as notice of loss was, under all the circumstances, given within the time required by the policy. We cannot, therefore, reverse on account of the error contained in the instruction.

The first instruction of plaintiffs is objected to because it authorized the recovery of interest, in case the verdict should be in favor of the plaintiffs.

After the amount of money named in the policy became due, we are aware of no reason why it would not draw six per cent. interest. The policy was a contract providing for the payment of money at a certain time, and, as such, it was proper for the jury, in fixing the amount of the verdict, to allow interest; this point was expressly decided in the Peoria Marine and Fire Ins. Co. v. Lewis, 18 Ill., 553, and we observe no reason to change the rule there announced.

The last point relied upon by the defendant, is that the court erred in refusing a new trial on the ground of newly-discovered evidence.

Upon an examination of the affidavits presented in the motion, we are satisfied the testimony newly discovered, is, in part, in the nature of impeaching evidence, and the rest is merely cumulative.

We understand the rule to be well settled, that a new trial will not be granted when the evidence is of this character.

After a careful examination of the whole record, we are satisfied it contains no substantial error.

The judgment will, therefore, be affirmed.

DIVORCE— EXTREME CRUELTY—COMPETENCY OF CHILDREN AS WITNESSES.

Day v. Day, p. 316.

Upon the trial of a libel for divorce on the ground of extreme cruelty, only two assaults upon the libellant by the libellee were proved, and those of not a very aggravated nature. It was in proof that the libellee used very violent language towards the libellant, cursing her, and applying indecent epithets, and conducting himself so as to terrify his wife and children, and make living with him intolerable. Held, that these facts furnished evidence from which the judge who heard the cause was authorized to find that the charge was supported.

Upon such trial, a boy ten years old was offered as a witness. He appeared to have no knowledge of the nature of an oath. Having been first instructed by the court upon that point, he was permitted to testify. Held, that he was properly admitted.

If a child under the age of nine years is found, after examination by the court, to possess a sufficient sense of the wickedness and danger of false swearing, he may be sworn, and admitted to testify.

INSURANCE—MISTAKE CURED BY THE STATUTE.

Tuck v. Hartford Fire Ins. Co., p. 326.

Under General Statutes, ch. 157, sec 2, an omission by one applying for insurance to state fully and truly the state of the title to the property upon which insurance is sought will not avoid the policy, unless such omission was intentional and fraudulent.

The plaintiff's policy was on the interest of mortgagors in mortgaged premises. There was another policy on the same interest in another company, and also an insurance of the interest of mortgagees in a third company. The plaintiff's policy contained a provision that the assured should not be entitled to recover of the defendants any greater proportion of the loss than the amount insured by their policy bore to the whole sum insured on said property, without reference to the solvency or liability of other insurers. Held, that the jury were properly directed to apportion the loss between the defendants and the other company having insurance on the same interest, without taking into account the value of the interest of the mortgagees on the insurance on that interest.

AUTHORITY OF INSURANCE AGENT.

The London Law Times of July 8th says: "The United States Supreme Court has in the case of Hoffman v. Hancock Mutual Life Insurance Company, reported in a recent number of the Chicago Legal News, affirmed a principle of law familiar enough to the English lawyer. The Insurance Company employed a general agent named Thayer. In the exercise of his authority he appointed a sub-agent, who, whilst acting as insurance broker, was to receive for such applications as he might bring to Thayer 30 per cent. of the first premium paid for the insurance. Sometime after his appointment the sub-agent applied for an insurance for Hoffman, to whom he gave a receipt, setting forth that he had received from him a sum specified, being the first annual premium on an insurance of 8,000 dollars on the life of Hoffman. From the evidence at the trial it appeared that the sum mentioned as the first premium was made up of a sixty day note, a cancelled debt due from the sub-agent to Hoffman, a premium note, and a horse valued at about £80. The application was reported to Thayer, but nothing said of the receipt. Hoffman subsequently called upon Thayer for the policy, and then for the first time produced the receipt. The latter refused to ratify the conduct of the sub-agent.—Hoffman thereupon brought an action against the company for the property delivered by him to the sub-agent, and a verdict was entered for the defendant. Upon a re-hearing, a verdict was entered for the plaintiff. The defendant then moved for a new trial, which was granted. Meanwhile Hoffman died. His widow then filed a bill, praying that the company should be compelled to deliver the policy to her, and to pay the amount of the insurance specified. The company never received any part of the property delivered to the sub-agent. "Life insurance," said the learned judge who delivered the opinion of the court, "is a cash business. Its disbursements are all in money, and its receipts must, necessarily, be in the same medium." Then having pointed out that if the agent had authority to take the horse in part payment, he could have taken other horses, and his authority would extend to the doing of everything necessary for the keeping of the horses until they were sold, such, for instance, as the building of stables, or at any rate the hiring of labor and room, he went on to say, "The exercise of such a power by the agent was liable to two objections. It was ultra vires, and it was a fraud as respects the company. Hoffman must have known that neither Goodwin (the sub-agent) nor Thayer had any authority to enter into any such arrangement, and he was a party to the fraud. No valid contracts could arise from such a transaction. This objection is fatal to the appellant's case." The facts of the case were in conflict, but they were sufficiently clear to permit of the application of the plain principle that an agent has prima facie power to bind his employer only when he acts within the scope of his authority. It is needless to dilate upon the reason of the rule, or to dwell upon the beneficial grounds on which it rests. We have from time to time touched in these pages upon the maxims and principles of the law of agency, but of no rule and of no principle is the knowledge more important to the community in general than of the broad rule which should guide people in dealing with persons who profess to act for others. The main features of that branch of law are clear and well defined. They are easily within the comprehension of every mind capable of transacting the ordinary business of commercial intercourse, yet it is surprising how often men act to their own detriment through ignorance of its simplest principles."

PRIZE-VESSEL CAPTURED IN VIOLATION OF NEUTRALITY LAWS.

The opinion of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, in the case of Collins et al. v. The Steamer Florida, is reported 3 Washington Law Reporter 173. The rebel cruiser, Florida, while anchored in the neutral waters of Bahia, was captured by a war vessel of the United States, and brought into Hampton Roads, by a prize-crew, where she was accidentally sunk; Brazil demanded and received satisfaction from the United States for the violation of her neutrality; and this circumstance in connection with the illegality of the seizure, was held to conclude the rights of the captors, and that she could not be condemned as a prize.

Wiltberger held a mortgage upon land to secure the payment of money, and filed a bill to foreclose, and obtained a decree of strict foreclosure to the effect that if the defendants did not, within thirty days, pay the amount due, they should be forever foreclosed of all right and equity of redemption. The thirty days expired and the money was not paid, but no other, or further, final, or confirmatory, or absolute order of foreclosure was entered. Wiltberger, or persons claiming under him, then sold and conveyed the lots in question in this suit, being a portion of the mortgaged property, to the complainants in this suit; they paid the full value of the lands, and supposed they were getting a good title. After such sale and conveyance, some of the defendants to the foreclosure suit took the record by writ of error to the Supreme Court, and the decree of the court below was reversed and the cause remanded, and the bill for foreclosure was finally dismissed by Wiltberger, the complainant therein. Now upon this state of facts, what are the rights of the complainants? Must they stand in Wiltberger's shoes? or, on the other hand, are they entitled to protection as persons purchasing under or relying upon the final decree of a court having jurisdiction of the parties and of the subject matter?

It was urged by counsel on the hear ing, that the decree was erroneous upon its face, and was liable to be reversed, and was in fact reversed as soon as the Supreme Court could get hold of it, and that purchasers claiming under it were bound to take notice of its infirmities. I think not. They had a right to rely upon the judgment of the court, and were not required to run any risk on account of errors in that judgment. If a court, having jurisdiction, says a title is good, purchasers have a right to say so too, and to hold the property, no matter how many errors there may be. Such judgment is conclusive between the parties until reversed or set aside. And if, while it is in full force and before any steps are taken to set it aside, third persons purchase and pay their money, relying upon the validity of the judgment, they are to be protected. This doctrine is recognized in Waddams v. Gay, recently decided by the Supreme Court.

The important and difficult question in the case is this:—Was this foreclosure decree, within the meaning of the law, such a final decree or adjudication as operated, upon the expiration of the thirty days and the default in payment, without further order by the court, to absolutely bar the right to redeem, and to clothe Wiltberger with a perfect title both at law and in equity? It was final enough to enable the parties to go to the Supreme Court, and to get a decision there upon the merits. If it was final enough for that purpose, was it not final enough to enable a purchaser to rely upon it?

Were there no controlling decisions in point, and were I left to decide this question upon general principles, I should, in view of the rule generally applied to determine whether or not a decree is final, say that this decree is final, inasmuch as it seems to give all the relief prayed for, and does not necessarily call for any further action of the court. But there are rules applicable to this class of cases, which must control—rules long since established by the decisions and practice of the courts, and now generally recognized as binding. The whole law relating to mortgages is peculiar, and is to be found in the decisions of the courts, rather than in the contract of the parties or in the language of decrees, viewed only in the light of general rules of law and practice. In order to ascertain whether or not the mortgagor has lost all right to the mortgaged property, it will not do to merely see how the mortgage reads, or how the decree reads, but we must also see what, if anything, the courts have decided as to the effect of such language.

A mortgage, vadium mortuum, is upon its face a very plain and simple document. It is an absolute conveyance of property, subject to the condition of being defeated by the payment of the money on the day agreed upon. If the money is not paid, the land is lost to the mortgagor, and becomes dead to him forever. But the courts have interposed for the relief of the suffering, and for the protection of the weak, and have so changed the legal effect of the instrument that it is no longer what it purports upon its face to be, nor what it was originally intended to be by those who first used it.

This decree of strict foreclosure is very much like the mortgage. It reads plain enough and seems strong enough to cut off all right and equity of redemption in case of non-payment.

But what is the language of the books? In Daniel's Chancery Practice, Vol. 2, p. 1248 (* p. 1204) it is said, "There are many cases of decrees, which, although they are final in their nature, require the confirmation of a further order of the court, before they can be acted upon. * * * The most ordinary case in which a further order is necessary to complete the decree, is that of a decree of foreclosure. * * If the defendant does not pay the money the plaintiff's right to the estate will become absolute. He must, however, in order to complete his title, procure a final order for confirming it, otherwise the decree of foreclosure will not be pleadable. The same practice is also to be observed in the case of decrees for the redemption of a mortgage," etc. See to the same effect, Seton on Decrees, p. 140 & 144. In Thompson v. Grant, 4 Maddock's R., 232, it is held that, until the final confirmatory order of foreclosure, the mortgagee has no title that will pass under a clause in his will devising lands.

Bolles v. Duff, 43 N. Y., 469, is a recent case, and directly in point. There had been a former suit on a bill to redeem, and a decree had been entered allowing redemption, finding the sum due, and fixing the time within which the money should be paid, and decreeing that in case of failure to pay within the time prescribed, "the plaintiff's complaint be and do from thenceforth, stand dismissed out of this court." The money was not paid, but no further order was obtained. In Bolles v. Duff, that decree was relied upon as a final decree of foreclosure, but the court held it insufficient, and Johnson, J., in his opinion says: "The authorities in England are quite uniform, that this final order is necessary in a strict foreclosure, and that until that final order is obtained, the mortgage is not foreclosed, and no title passes to the mortgagee." * * "Without extending this rule beyond the cases to which it is now applied, I think it sound in its application here, to a strict fore closure implied from a dismissal of a bill to redeem. Until that order be obtained the records of the court do not show which party has finally obtained the judgment or who is the owner of the land. Until that order is obtained the complainant may apply to have the time to pay the amount decreed to be due, extended."

Such seems to be the law, and I find no decisions to the contrary.

Decrees of strict foreclosure are not viewed with favor, and are not often allowed. If parties choose to rely upon them, they must see to it that their proceedings are regular. The decisions of the courts show no tendency to dispense with any of the precautions heretofore required in such proceedings.

A decree may be prepared in favor of the defendants.

BROGDEN v. MILLER.

Few defences can be imagined of a more unsatisfactory character than that of an objection to the sufficiency of a stamp on a policy of insurance. Insurance companies generally pride themselves on their honor in meeting their liabilities, irrespective of technical objections that might be raised in their favor; and consequently we do not often meet with any attempt on their part to set up purely technical defences in court, unless there is some substantial defence on the merits as well. An objection to the stamp on a policy is simply discreditable, and it is usually viewed in this light in the courts as well as in the mercantile world. The English Judges "are wont to show no great favor to stamp objections," (Pitt Tylor, p. 402); and a recent report furnishes a memorable instance of the style in which they receive them when urged on behalf of an insurance company. In Brogden v. Miller, it will be recollected that the defendant, who represented the Victoria Insurance Company, successfully resisted an action on a contract for insurance of a steamship, on the ground that the contract was expressed in a slip, and that the slip not being stamped, the contract was void. There can be no doubt that the decision of the Court of Appeal on this point was wrong; but it is not the least striking feature of the case that the Judges rigidly abstained from expressing any opinion as to the character of the defence. Neither in the judgment delivered nor in the course of the argument, did they express any sense of disgust with the objection raised; although it is impossible to read the report of the case without expecting to meet at every line of it a sharp expression of their opinion on the point. How the English Judges meet the objection is shown in a very similar case which came before the Queen's Bench Division of the High Court of Justice, in January last—Sassoon v. Harris, (Law Times, 22 Jan. 1876, p. 216). The action was brought on a marine policy of insurance, and one of the grounds of defence was that the policy was insufficiently stamped, and therefore void. A verdict having been given for the plaintiff, a rule was afterwards obtained to enter a nonsuit or a verdict for defendant. At the argument, counsel for the defendant expressed their regret at being obliged by their instructions to insist upon this ground of defence. The Judges referred to it in the course of their judgment as follows:

COCKBURN, C. J.—"As to the stamp question, I grieve to say that our judgment must be for the defendants. I regret that a body of underwriters should have so lowered the standard of insurance morality as to insist upon the objection, but as it has been taken we have no alternative but to give effect to it."

BLACKBURN, J.—"When the history of this case is published, it will frighten foreign houses from English business, and the statute will thus turn out to have been impolitic as well as harsh. And there appears to have been no desire to cheat in this case; there was merely a mistake resulting in a loss to the revenue of some four or five shillings; however, the law would be the same if the loss were threepence only. The legislature has enacted that the whole benefit of the insurance shall be lost in such a case. The penalty is utterly disproportionate, and the principle impolitic as well as immoral, for it holds out inducements to mean men to take mean advantages, and makes those who pass such a law guilty of the immorality of it. For myself, when at the Bar, I have often been told by clients that they had it in their power to take objections of this kind, but declined to do so on the ground of prudence, from fear of losing their business. In Wolff v. Hardcastle, 1 B. & P., 3, 8, it appears that no objection was taken for want of compliance with statutory formalities." And I find Buller, J., expressing himself as follows: 'Time was when no underwriter would have dreamed of making such an objection; if the solicitor had suggested a loophole by which he might escape, he would have spurned at the idea. He would have said, is it not a fair policy? Have I not received the premium? And shall I not now, when the loss has happened, pay the money? This would have been his answer, and he would immediately have ordered his broker to settle for the loss.' I quite agree with Buller, J., and I give judgment for the defendant with the greatest reluctance. I almost feel myself partner in the moral guilt of the statute. I have tried hard to find some way out of it, but the law is clear and the facts are clearly within it."

This is refreshing. It is equally so to read that, "the defendant, immediately after the delivery of the judgment of the court in his favor, wrote to the Times announcing that it was never his intention to take advantage of the stamp objection, and further that he had himself, since the judgment, written to the plaintiff requesting him to present the policy again for his settlement of the claim." We may suggest that the attention of the Minister of Justice might well be directed to the reports of these two cases, with a view to the amendment of those provisions of the Stamp Act which relate to policies for sea insurance. It is quite possible to protect the revenue without opening a door to rascality, and making the legislature a party to the dishonesty of unscrupulous corporations.—The New Zealand Jurist.

AMERICAN FUNEREAL ORATORY.—The London Law Times has had frequent articles commenting severely upon speeches made by members of the American Bar upon funereal occasions, and not always without some reason. The speeches made at such meetings of the Bar should always be in accordance with the truth. The Law Times of July 20th says:

We have more than once given our readers some examples of funereal oratory in America on the occasion of the deaths of lawyers of reputation. Judge Lynd, of the Pennsylvanian Court of Common Pleas, died recently, whereupon the Bar had a meeting. Judge Lynd, judging from the speeches, has never had an equal in virtue, integrity, industry, and ability. "No man," we are told, "is necessary to the public;" but, nevertheless, the loss of Judge Lynd is "irreparable." There would appear to be some mysterious process in Philadelphia for detecting corrupt judges, for one speaker says that Judge Lynd passed through life without reproach. "There was no smell of fire upon his garments." Judge Ludlow was particularly brilliant, thus describing the decease of the late Judge: "The pale horse and his rider ranged through the world at all times, but as the hours of this fatal day rolled into the flood of time with savage fury, on every moment of each he wrote 'Death's Own!'" Judge Briggs was less happy, and positively found a flaw in his deceased brother. "As a speaker," he says, "he was not so successful. He gave conclusions, but without his reasons, thus leaving his hearers to work up to them as best they might." This is rather severe. The Hon. Charles Gibbons also forgot the solemnity of the occasion, for he made a fierce attack on "that beggarly system of economy that is practised in this country, that refuses to public servants a decent compensation for public services." The climax of misery, however, was reached by Judge Ludlow, who sent his hearers away with this pleasant interrogatory, "friends and brothers, who will fall next?"

REMOVAL OF CAUSES—COSTS.

The United States District Court for the Eastern District of Michigan, in Scripps v. Campbell et al., 1, American Lawyer, 10, held in suits commenced in the State Courts and removed into the Federal Court, the right to costs is not determined by R. S., sec. 968, but by the statute of the State; that where the plaintiff, in an action on the case commenced in the State Court and removed into the Federal Court, recovered less than one hundred dollars, the defendant is entitled to costs under compiled Laws, sec. 7390, as a matter of right.

IMPORTED ARTICLE—PAYMENT OF DUTY—SUBROGATION.

In re Kirkland, et al. 14 N. B. R. 139, the United States Circuit Court of Maryland held that if a party purchase an imported article, duty free, and is subsequently compelled to pay the duty in order to get possession of the article, he is entitled to be subrogated to the priority of the United States.

The head note to Blackman v. Bainton 15 C. B. N. S. 432, is quaint: "Twenty-five witnesses and a horse on one side against ten witnesses on the other. Held, not such a preponderance of 'inconvenience' as to induce the Court to bring back the venue from the place where the cause of action (if any) arose."

No. 200.—THE CITY COUNCIL OF CHARLESTON et al., Appellants,
v.
BRANCH, SONS & COMPANY.

Appeals from the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of South Carolina.

CONSOLIDATION OF RAILROAD COMPANIES —ITS EFFECT UPON TAXATION OF THE PROPERTY OF SUCH ROADS.

Mr. Justice BRADLEY delivered the opinion of the court.

These cases require but very little discussion, as they have already been before the court and substantially settled in Tomlinson v. Branch, and The City of Charleston v. Branch, reported in 15th of Wallace, pp. 460, 470. The result to which we came in those cases was substantially this: that the respective roads and the property of the two companies, which had become consolidated in the hands of the South Carolina Railroad Company, namely, that of the Canal and Railroad Company, and that of the Louisville and Charleston Railroad Company, respectively retained their original status toward the public and the State, the same as if they had not been consolidated under a single proprietorship. As one of these roads has become taxable and the other has not, the rights of the State and the public growing out of this accidental diversity may sometimes raise questions of some embarrassment. This occasions this occasions the only difficulty to be solved in these cases. From Branchvills to Charleston there is but one road, and that is a part of the original road of the Canal and Railroad Company, used in common for both branches of the property. The Louisville and Charleston Railroad Company had a chartered right to extend their road to Charleston; but were met by the exclusive privileges of the elder company, and hence the purchase of its property, and the ultimate consolidation. Now the fact that the elder company had this exclusive privilege shows that even if the consolidation had not taken place, the old road would have continued to do the work of both companies between Branchville and Charleston, and this part of the line would have been now subject to taxation. It does not follow, therefore, that this part of the road, though used for the accommodation of both branches, should be regarded as divisible into proportional parts, one subject to taxation, and the other not. It is to be regarded as simply the road the property of the old company, in the hands of the new company it is true, but subject to all the liabilities of its original charter. Hence we held that the entire line of road between Branchville and Charleston is subject to taxation; and that prima facie the railroad terminus and depot in Charleston and the property accessory thereto, belong to the elder portion of the joint property. But inasmuch as the charter right of the present company extended to Charleston, we further held that if it could be fairly shown that any of the company's property there was acquired by the present company for the accommodation of the business belonging to its original roads or for the joint accommodation of the entire system of roads under its control, such property would pro tanto, and in fair proportion, be exempt from taxation. This was intended to meet the case of such property as the present company might have acquired in Charleston either separately or in conjunction with the old company, had no consolidation taken place, and had the line between Branchville and Charleston used by both, remained the property of the old company. Of course, in carrying out this principle, any repairs or improvements made on the old line or the property of the old company would become a part thereof, and be subject to taxation. But newly-acquired property might not be. This is the general principle. The method of carrying it out in detail admits of some latitude for the exercise of deliberation and judgment. We have examined the report of the special master to whom the matter was referred, and the review of that report by the court below, and we think that a result was reached corresponding in the main to the principle which we have endeavored to establish. There is but one item which we regard as calling for any interference with the decree appealed from. That is the item of twenty-five thousand dollars for replacing the tracks and side tracks within the city limits, which we think fairly belongs to the old road, and should have been taxed in toto, and not pro tanto.

With this modification the decree of the Circuit court is affirmed.

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES.

OCTOBER TERM, 1875.

STOTT et al. v. RUTHERFORD.

PRESUMPTION—LEASE.

In Error to the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia.

Where the recital in a lease as to the character in which the lessors acted, is not inconsistent with their holding the legal title in trust, if such be necessary to its validity the presumption will be in favor of the validity of the instrument. The rule of law that a lessee is estopped from disputing the title of his lessor, followed.

Mr. Justice SWAYNE delivered the opinion of the court.

This is an action of covenant brought upon an indenture of lease, executed by the plaintiffs in error and one P. D. Gurley, since deceased, to the defendant in error. The declaration sets out sundry breaches of stipulations contained in the lease. The defendant pleaded non est factum and satisfaction of the claim of the plaintiffs by payment. Upon the trial several bills of exception were taken by the defendant. They show that he made numerous points, all of which were overruled by the court. But one of them requires any consideration. He objected to the admission of the lease in evidence, upon the ground that it showed upon its face that the lessors had no title to the premises, and that the instrument, was, therefore, a nullity. The court admitted the evidence, and an exception was regularly taken.

A verdict was rendered for the plaintiffs. The defendant moved for a new trial, and the case was heard by the full court in general term. The court ordered a judgment to be entered for the defendant veredicto non obstante. The plaintiffs have brought the case before this court for review The judgment of the court below proceeded solely upon the ground of the invalidity of the lease, and that subject is the only one argued here.

The lease created a term beginning on the 1st day of February, 1864, and to continue five years. It recites that the lessors, in making the lease "were acting as a church extension committee, by authority and on behalf of the general assembly of the Presbyterian Church, old school." The leasehold premises are described as "being lot number four and part of lot number five," etc., "as now held by the parties of the first part," etc. The lessee covenants, among other things, "that he will well and truly surrender and deliver up the possession of said premises to the said parties of the first part, their successors and assigns, in accordance with the stipulations herein contained, whenever this lease shall terminate." It was provided that the lessors might terminate the lease for nonpayment of rent, or otherwise, at their option, by giving the requisite notice. The language of the grant was, "have granted, demised, and to farm let." The words "grant" and "demise" in a lease for years create an implied warranty of title and a covenant for quiet enjoyment. Burney v. Keith, 4 Wend., 502; Grannis v. Clark, 8 Cow., 36; Young v. Hargrave's Adm., 7 Ohio Rep, part 2, 68.

The declaration avers "that by virtue of which said indenture the said defendant immediately thereupon entered into the occupancy and enjoyment of said premises and appurtenances, and was possessed thereof until about the first day of October, 1869, when he vacated such possession and occupancy, and the term of said lease was determined." This is not denied by the defendant's pleas, and is, therefore, according to the settled rule of the law of pleading, to be taken as admitted. The lessors executed the lease in their own names, and not as agents. They demised the premises in the same way. The rent was stipulated to be paid to them in their own right. The covenants of the lessee were all to them personally. If there had been a breach of the covenants of title and for quiet enjoyment, they would have been personally liable for the damages. The lessee entered into possession and remained in possession, enjoying that possession as long as he chose to do so. He had on his part the full benefit of the contract. When called upon to pay and perform, as he had covenanted to do, he answered that the lessors had no title, and that he was in no wise responsible to them.

In Laws v. Purser, 6 Ellis & Bl., 932, the plaintiff, a patentee, had licensed the defendant to manufacture the article covered by the patent. After having done so, he refused to pay the royalty. The patentee sued him. He pleaded "that the letters-patent were void, and that he had a right to make and sell the article without the plaintiff's permission." The plaintiff demurred. The court said: "It would be monstrous if the defendant, after such an agreement acted upon, could on this ground refuse payment." The demurrer was sustained.

There are two answers to the defense relied upon in this case.

The recital in the lease as to the character in which the lessors acted, and all that is said upon the subject in the bill of exceptions, are not inconsistent with their holding the legal title in trust, to enable them the better to discharge the duties touching the property with which they were clothed. Every reasonable presumption is to be made in favor of the validity of the instrument which they executed. The act done pre-supposes the prior act necessary to give it validity. It is not stated in the bill of exceptions that the lessors had no paper title, but, "that they possess no estate whatever in said lands, except such as pertained to the office of such committee, and have no estate therein in their individual capacity." The legal title in trust would be just such an estate as is here exceptionally and negatively indicated. We are all of the opinion that it is a fair inference from this language that the lessors had such an estate, or some other title in trust, sufficient to warrant their giving the lease and to render it valid.

We think the principle that the lessee cannot dispute the title of his lessor also applies. We see nothing to take the case out of this long-settled and salutary rule. Williams v. Mayor, etc., 6 H. & J., 529; Stewart v. Roderick, 4 Watts & S., 189; Coburn v. Palmer, 8 Cushing, 627. The rule applies with peculiar force where the lessor was in possession and transferred that possession upon his faith in the validity of the lease to the lessee. Taylor's Landlord and Tenant, sec. 707.

Whether the testimony set forth in the bill of exceptions, as to the title of the plaintiffs in error, was competent, is a question not raised before us, and upon which we therefore express no opinion.

According to the views upon which the judgment below was given, the lessee could not only refuse performance of all his covenants, but, at the end of the term, he could have held possession in defiance of his lessors, and he could have contined to hold possession until they showed a valid title in a suit brought to enforce it, or until such a title in such a suit was shown by some other party. This, we think, would be contrary alike to reason, justice and the law.

The judgment of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia is reversed, and the case will be remanded to that court, with directions to enter a judgment upon the verdict in favor of the plaintiffs in error.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

[JUNE 6, 1876.]

BLAIR v. ERIE RAILROAD COMPANY.

LIABILITY OF RAILROAD COMPANY FOR THE INJURY OF MESSENGERS.

Appeal from the Fourth Department.

This is an appeal from a judgment affirmed by the General Term of the Fourth Department, upon a verdict in plaintiff's favor, the exception of defendant having been ordered to be heard in the first instance at the General Term. The cause was tried at the Steuben County Circuit, the Hon. James C. Smith, Justice, presiding. The plaintiff proved that the intestate resided at Hornellsville; that he was employed by the United States Express Company to deliver freight about town; that he had formerly been an express messenger of said company; that on the second day of April, 1874, at the request of one Bowles, who was then express messenger of said company, the intestate took his place as such express messenger of said company, and started upon a train of defendant's from Hornellsville, as such express messenger; that he paid no fare; that he was riding on the front end of the baggage car; that his business as such express messenger was to distribute packages; that while so riding, and in charge of the property of said United States Express Company, in said car, the said train was run into by a construction train operated by the defendant's servants, by reason of the negligence of the defendant's servants operating said construction train, and the intestate was killed in consequence of said collision. The defendant read in evidence two contracts set out in full in its answer, and proved that they were in force as alleged in the answer at the time of said collision. The answer sets out two contracts, —one dated August 2, 1858, between the New York and Erie R.R. Co. and the United States Express Co., and the other dated March 14, 1871, between the Erie Railway Co. and the said express company. It was conceded that prior to the execution of the contract of March 15, 1871, the defendant has succeeded as lessee to all the rights, business and franchises of the New York and Erie Railroad Company. The contract of March 15, 1871, is a modification of that of August 2, 1858, and assumes the condition of the prior contract, except as modified, so that both may be considered as one contract made by the defendant. By one of the provisions of the contract of March 15, 1871, it is agreed that the Erie Railway Company "shall assume the usual risks taken by railroads on the express matters of the parties of the second part, except that the railway company shall not assume any risk or loss on any money, bank notes, bonds, gold bullion or jewelry packages, and for which, with the express company's safes and messengers, no charge for carriage is to be made by said railway company." And further, "that the officers and messengers of the express company shall pass free of charge on the said railway and branches." By the contract of August 2, 1858, it is also provided as follows: "The party of the first part" (the railroad company) "further agrees to transport, free of charge, to and from Jersey City, Dunkirk and Buffalo, and such other points on the line of their road as the second party" (the express company) "may deem expedient in order to accommodate their business, their money, safes, contents, and messengers; the party of the first part assuming no liability whatever." It was conceded upon the trial that the intestate, at the time of the collision, was a messenger of the United States Express Company within the meanings of said contracts. The defendant's counsel asked the court to direct a verdict for the defendant upon the ground that, by reason of said contracts, the defendant was not liable in this action, but the court decided that said contracts afforded no defense to the action, and that the only question in the case was a question of damages, and refused to direct the jury to find a verdict for the defendant, to which decisions and refusal, and each of them, the defendant's counsel duly excepted. The court then charged the jury that the only question for them to decide was the amount of damages to which the plaintiff was entitled. And the defendant's counsel excepted to such charge upon the ground that, by reason of said contracts, the plaintiff was not entitled to recover. The jury found a verdict of $4,000 in favor of plaintiff. The Court of Appeal has affirmed the judgment, with costs.—N. Y. Daily Register.

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES.

No. 513.—OCTOBER TERM, 1875.

THE UNITED STATES, Plaintiffs, v. JOHN W. NORTON.

On a certificate of divison in opinion between the Judges of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York.

EMBEZZLEMENT—P. O. MONEY ORDERS—REVENUE LAWS—INDICTMENT—WITHIN WHAT TIME MAY BE BROUGHT.

1. That the indictment was found under the eleventh section of the "Act to establish a Postal Money-Order System," passed May 17, 1864, which act is not a revenue law within the meaning of the third section of the act of 1804, and, therefore, the defendant cannot be tried or punished, unless the indictment shall have been found within two years from the time of the committing of the offense, and that the indictment is not for crimes arising under the revenue laws, etc.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.

Mr. Justice SWAYNE delivered the opinion of the Court.

It appears by the record that Norton was indicted for the embezzlement at different times of money belonging to the money-order office in the city of New York, he being a clerk in that office when the crimes were committed.

The indictment was found on the 21st of February, 1874. He pleaded "that the several offenses did not arise, exist, or accrue, within two years next before the finding of said indictment." To this plea the United States demurred. Upon the point thus presented as to the sufficiency of the plea, the judges were divided in opinion.

The indictment was founded upon the eleventh section of the "Act to establish a postal money-order system," passed May 17, 1864.—13 Stat., 76.

The "Act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States," of the 30th of April, 1790. (Sec. 33, 1 Stat., 119,) declares: "Nor shall any person be prosecuted, tried, or punished, for any offense not capital, nor for any fine or forfeiture under any penal statute, unless the indictment or information for the same shall be found or instituted within two years from the time of committing the offense or incurring the fine or forfeiture aforesaid."

The act of the 26th of March, 1804, "in addition to the act entitled 'An act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States,' enacts (Sec. 3, 2 Stat., 291) "that any person guilty of crimes arising under the revenue laws of the United States, or incurring any fine or forfeiture by breaches of said laws, may be prosecuted, tried, and punished, provided the indictment or information be found at any time within five years after committing the offense or incurring the fine or forfeiture, any law or provision to the contrary notwithstanding."

The substantial question presented for our determination is, which of these two provisions applies as a bar to a prosecution for the offenses described in the indictment. The solution of this question depends upon the solution of the further question, whether the "act to establish a postal money-order system" is a revenue law within the meaning of the 3rd section of the act of 1804.

The offenses charged were crimes arising under the money-order act. The title of the act does not indicate that Congress in enacting it had any purpose of revenue in view. Its object, as expressly declared at the outset of the first section, was "to promote public convenience, and to insure greater security in the transmission of money through the United States mails." All moneys received from the sale of money-orders, all fees received for selling them, and all moneys transferred in administering the act, are "to be deemed and taken to be money in the treasury of the United States. The Postmaster-General is authorized to allow the deputy postmasters at the money-order offices, as a compensation for their services, not exceeding "one-third of the whole amount of fees received on money-orders issued," and at his option, in addition, "one-eighth of one per cent. upon the gross amount of orders paid at the office." He was also authorized to cause additional clerks to be employed, and paid out of the proceeds of the business, and to meet any deficiency in the amount of such proceeds during the first year, one hundred thousand dollars, or so much of that sum as might be needed, was appropriated.

There is nothing in the context of the act to warrant the belief, that Congress in passing it was animated by any other motive than that avowed in the first section. A willingness is shown to sink money, if necessary, to accomplish that object.

In no just view, we think, can the statute in question be deemed a revenue law.

The lexical definition of the term revenue is very comprehensive. It is thus given by Webster: "The income of a nation derived from its taxes, duties, or other sources, for the payment of the national expenses."

The phrase, other sources, would include the proceeds of the public lands, those arising from the sale of public securities, the receipts of the Patent Office in excess of its expenditures, and those of the Post Office Department, when there should be such excess as there was for a time in the early history of the government. Indeed, the phrase would apply in all cases of such excess. In some of them the result might fluctuate, there being excess at one time and deficiency at another.

It is a matter of common knowledge that the appellative revenue laws is never applied to the statutes involved in these classes of cases.

The Constitution of the United States, article 1, sec. 7, provides, that "all bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives."

This construction of this limitation is practically well settled by the uniform action of Congress. According to that construction, it "has been confined to bills to levy taxes, in the strict sense of the words, and has not been understood to extend to bills for other purposes which incidentally create revenue."—Story on the Const., § 880. "Bills for raising revenue," when enacted into laws, become revenue laws. Congress was a constitutional body sitting under the Constitution. It was, of course, familiar with the phrase "bills for raising revenue," as used in that instrument, and the construction which had been given to it.

The precise question before us came under the consideration of Mr. Justice Story, in the United States v. Mayo, 1 Gall., 396. He held that the phrase revenue laws, as used in the act of 1804, meant such laws "as are made for the direct and avowed purpose of creating revenue or public funds for the service of the government." The same doctrine was reaffirmed by that eminent judge, in the United States v. Cushman, 426.

These views commend themselves to the approbation of our judgment.

The cases of the United States v. Bromley, 12 How., 88, and the United States v. Fowler, 4 Blatchford, 311, are relied upon by the counsel for the United States. Both those views are clearly distinguishable, with respect to the grounds upon which the judgment of the court proceeded, from the case before us. It is unnecessary to remark further in regard to them.

It will be certified, as the answer of this court to the circuit court—that the indictment against Norton charges offenses for which, under the limitation provided in the thirty-second section of the act of Congress, approved April 30, 1790, entitled "An act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States," the defendant cannot be prosecuted, tried, or punished, unless the indictment shall have been found within two years from the time of the committing of the offenses; and that the indictment is not for crimes arising under the revenue laws, within the intent and meaning of the third section of the act approved March 26, 1804, entitled, "An act in addition to the act entitled an act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States."

UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT.

No. 6.—OCTOBER TERM, 1875.

JOSEPH A. WALKER, Plaintiff in Error, v. CHARLES S. SAUVINET.

In Error to the Supreme Court of the State of Louisiana.

REFUSING TO FURNISH REFRESHMENTS TO A MAN OF COLOR—TRIAL BY JURY.

1. This was an action brought by the defendant in error, against the plaintiff in error, a licensed keeper of a coffee-house in New Orleans, for refusing him refreshments when called for, on the ground that he was a man of color.

2. TRIAL BY JURY.—That the trial by jury in suits at common law, pending in the State courts, is not a privilege or immunity of national citizenship, which the States are forbidden, by the Fourteenth Amendment, to abridge.—[ED LEGAL NEWS.

Mr. Chief Justice WAITE delivered the opinion of the court.

This is an action brought by Sauvinet against Walker, a licensed keeper of a coffee-house in New Orleans, for refusing him refreshments when called for, on the ground that he was a man of color.

Art. 13, of the constitution of Louisiana, provides that "All persons shall enjoy equal rights and privileges upon any conveyance of a public character; and all places of business or of public resort, or for which a license is required by either State, parish or municipal authority, shall be deemed places of a public character, and shall be open to the accommodation and patronage of all persons, without distinction or discrimination on account of race or color." On the 23rd February, 1869, an act was passed by the general assembly of the State, entitled "An act to enforce the thirteenth article of the constitution of this State, and to regulate the licenses mentioned in said thirteenth article." Sec. 3 of this act is as follows:

"SEC. 3. That all licenses hereafter granted by this State, and by all parishes and municipalities therein, to persons engaged in business, or keeping places of public resort, shall contain the express condition that the place of business or public resort shall be open to the accommodation and patronage of all persons, without distinction or discrimination on account of race or color, and any person who shall violate the condition of such license shall, on conviction thereof, be punished by forfeiture of his license, and his place of business or public resort shall be closed, and, moreover, shall be liable at the suit of the person aggrieved to such damages as he shall sustain thereby, before any court of competent jurisdiction."

On the 27th February, 1871, another act was passed entitled "An act to regulate the mode of trying cases arising under the provisions of article thirteen (13) of the constitution of Louisiana, or under any acts of the legislature to enforce the said article thirteen of the said constitution, and to regulate the licenses therein mentioned."

Secs. 1 and 2 of this act are as follows: "SECTION I. Be it enacted by the senate and house of representatives of the State of Louisiana in general assembly convened, That all cases brought for the purpose of vindicating, asserting, or maintaining the rights, privileges, and immunities guaranteed to all persons under the provisions of the article thirteen of the constitution of Louisiana, or under the provisions of any acts of the legislature to enforce the said article thirteen, and to regulate the licenses therein mentioned, or for the purpose of recovering damages for the violation of said rights, privileges, immunities, shall be tried by the court, or by a jury if any party of the suit prays for a trial by jury.

"SECTION II. Be it further enacted, &c., That if the jury do not agree or fail to render a verdict, either for the plaintiff or defendant, the jury shall be discharged, and the case shall be immediately submitted to the judge upon the pleadings and evidence already on file, as if the case had been originally tried without the intervention of a jury; and it shall be the duty of the judge to decide the case at once, without any further proceedings, arguments, continuance, or delay; each party having the right to appeal to the Supreme Court in all cases where an appeal is allowed by law."

Walker, in his answer, denied all the allegations in the petition, and prayed for a trial by jury. The cause was thereupon tried to a jury, who failed to agree. This having been entered upon the minutes, Sauvinet, by his counsel, moved that the court proceed to decide the case under the provisions of Sec. 2 of the act of 1871. To this Walker objected, alleging for cause that the act was unconstitutional, but without specifying in what particular. Time was given counsel to file briefs upon the constitutional question, and, at a later day, after consideration, a judgment was rendered against Walker for one thousand dollars. That judgment was affirmed upon appeal to the Supreme Court of the State, and this court is now called upon to re-examine the judgment of affirmance.

So far as we can discover from the record, the only federal question decided by either one of the courts below, was that which related to the right of Walker to demand a trial by jury, notwithstanding the provisions of the act of 1871 to the contrary. He insisted that he had a constitutional right to such a trial, and that the statute was void to the extent that it deprived him of this right.

All questions arising under the constitution of the State alone are finally settled by the judgment below. We can consider only such as grow out of the Constitution of the United States. By article VII. of the amendments, it is provided that "in suits at common law, where the value in controversy shall exceed twenty dollars, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved." This, as has been many times decided, relates only to trials in the courts of the United States.—Edwards v. Elliott, 21 Wall., 557. The States, so far as this amendment is concerned, are left to regulate trials in their own courts in their own way. A trial by jury in suits at common law pending in the State courts is not, therefore, a privilege or immunity of national citizenship, which the States are forbidden by the fourteenth amendment to abridge. A State cannot deprive a person of his property without due process of law, but this does not necessarily imply that all trials in the State courts affecting the property of persons must be by jury. This requirement of the Constitution is met if the trial is had according to the settled course of judicial proceedings. Murray's Lessee v. Hoboken L. & I. Co., 18 How., 280. Due process of law is process due according to the law of the land. This process in the States is regulated by the law of the State. Our power over that law is only to determine whether it is in conflict with the supreme law of the land, that is to say, with the Constitution and laws of the United States made in pursuance thereof, or with any treaty made under the authority of the United States. Art VI., Const. Here the State court has decided that the proceeding below was in accordance with the law of the State, and we do not find that to be contrary to the Constitution, or any law or treaty of the United States.

The other questions presented by the assignment of errors, and argued here, cannot be considered, as the record does not show that they were brought to the attention of either of the courts below.

The judgment is affirmed.

Mr. Justice CLIFFORD dissenting.

I dissent from the opinion and judgment of the court in this case, and I am requested to say that Mr. Justice FIELD also dissents both from the opinion and judgment.

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES.

No. 222.—OCTOBER TERM, 1875.

THE FRANKLIN FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY OF PHILADELPHIA, Plaintiff in Error,

v.

JAMES L. VAUGHAN.

In Error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Arkansas.

INSURANCE—INTEREST OF ASSURED—OVERVALUATION.

1. PROOF OF LOSS.—That in seeking to recover the amount insured upon his goods destroyed by fire, the insured was bound only to prove his policy, his loss, and the service of preliminary proofs.

2. INTEREST IN PROPERTY INSURED.—The effect of making a mistatement, in answering that there was no incumbrance on the property insured, stated.

3. OVERVALUATION OF PROPERTY.—When the defense of overvaluation of the goods will prevail —[ED. LEGAL NEWS.

Mr. Justice HUNT delivered the opinion of the court.

In seeking to recover the amount insured upon his goods destroyed by fire, the insured was bound to prove only his policy, his loss, and the service of preliminary proofs. This proof he made.

The insurance was for $2,500. The jury found the value of the goods destroyed by fire to be $7,204.

Defence is made on the ground of a violation of that condition of the policy which provides that "if the interest of the assured in the property is not absolute, it must be so expressed in the policy, otherwise the insurance shall be void," and of a misstatement in answering that there was no incumbrance on the property insured.

The insured had bought the goods of one Flowers. They were in the store of Harris & Co., auctioneers, at the time of the purchase, and were left there for sale by and under the direction of Vaughan, the purchaser. It was agreed by him that the first proceeds of the sale should be paid to the vendor to the amount of $3,150, and if the auctioneers advanced money upon the stock they were authorized to retain the possession and control of the goods as their security. There is no evidence, or claim, that any such advance was made.

We see nothing in the writing produced to justify the claim that the property insured was incumbered, or that any person other than the vendor had any interest in it, or that the title of the insured was not absolute. The property was sold to the insured in April, 1873, and the evidence showed that when so sold it was in the auction store of Harris & Co., for sale. The goods remaining there the purchaser took possession, and proceeded to make sale of them, as was also proved on the trial. The writing produced contains no limitation of Vaughan's title, and expresses no right of possession or control in any person other than himself, except in the event that Harris & Co. should make advances. The paper stipulated that Harris & Co. might hold the possession and control of the goods as security for their advances. There was no such stipulation in favor of the vendor. He did not profess to retain any right in the goods or any control over their possession. So far as he was concerned, Vaughan had the full power of disposition. His claim was upon the money realized from the sales. To bring his claim into enjoyment, it was necessary that sales should first be made, and Vaughan, and Harris & Co. as the agents of Vaughan, were entrusted with this duty. The goods were, and the proceeds of the goods when sold would be, the property of Vaughan. His agreement as to the proceeds did not affect his title or estate. While it is possible that, in the event of a fraudulent combination to defraud him, Flowers might have invoked the aid of a court of equity in securing the proceeds of the sales, there is nothing to affect the present title of his vendee. It may be likened to the familiar case of an insurance upon a house in the name of the mortgagor, which he promises to hold for the benefit of the mortgagee. While, under certain circumstances, equity would interfere in behalf of the mortgagee, it can scarcely be doubted that, until the occurrence of such circumstances, the mortgagor is the owner of the policy and its fruits.

A defence was also sought to be made on the ground of the over-valuation of the goods by Vaughan when he obtained the insurance. The policy was preceded by an application in this form: "Application of James L. Vaughan for insurance, etc., in the sum of $6,000, on the property specified — the value of the property being estimated by the applicant. Valuation on stock, etc., $2,000; sum to be insured, $6,000; rate, 3 10 of 2 per cent.," which statement was signed by Vaughan and agreed to be true, so far as it was known to him, and so far as it was material to the risk. This was on the 23d of March, 1873. The fire occurred on the 5th day of May, 1873.

The sale of goods after the purchase, and before the fire, amounted to the sum of $653. The jury found the goods, which were actually destroyed, to have been worth $7,204. These two sums show the value of the goods, to wit, $7,857.

The value of the goods was to be estimated by the applicant. He gave this estimate at $12,000 and there is not the slightest evidence that such was not his honest estimate of their value. Insurance agents, as well as other persons, know with what partiality most men estimate their property, and how much more valuable they esteem it when their own than when it is their neighbor's. They do not object to this principle when the premiums are received for issuing policies. It is only when losses occur that they seek to apply the more rigid test of actual value.

The value of a stock of goods is not always, nor usually, indicated by its purchase price. Such goods are often bought in the country to sell at retail, and at a profit. What may be expected to be obtained for them under such circumstances may reasonably be considered their value, and that the owner and purchaser should estimate them at much more than he gave for them, and should hope and expect to make large gains and and profits upon their sale, was, no doubt, understood by the agent making the insurance.

The counsel for the plaintiff in error, in his brief concedes that it is not every over-valuation which will avoid a policy, but he objects to the charge of the judge, that to produce this result the over-valuation must be "grossly enormously" in excess of truth. It is hardly just to the judge holding the circuit, or to the claimant, that the charge should rest upon this statement. The judge undoubtedly said, "that if the valuation was grossly enormously in excess of the value of the goods, then the burden is cast on the plaintiff of showing that he acted honestly and in good faith in making the valuation, and that it was not made for any fraudulent purpose or with any fraudulent intention, but was an honest and unintentional error." He did not, however, say that nothing less than this would have that effect. He said, also: "The law exacts the utmost good faith in contracts of insurance, both on the part of tne insured and the insurer, and a knowing and willful over-valuation of property by the insured, with a view and purpose of obtaining insurance thereon for a greater sum than could otherwise be obtained, is a fraud upon the insurance company that avoids the policy." * * "It is a question of good faith and honest intention on the part of the insured, and though he may have put a value on his property greatly in excess of its cash value in the market, yet if he did so in the honest belief that the property was worth the valuation put upon it, and the excessive valuation was made in good faith, and not intended to mislead or defraud the insurance company, then such over-valuation is not a fraudulent over-valuation that will defeat a recovery."

Looking at the whole charge, as we must do, we think the jury were correctly instructed, and that there was nothing said to which the committee can properly except.

The judgment should be affirmed.

We have received from Col. Vallette, of the Chicago bar, the following opinion:

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

Opinion Filed June 30, 1876.

No. 473.—Charles E. Grant et al. v. John J. Bennett et al.

LIS PENDENS — CONSTRUCTIVE NOTICE OF DECISION OF SUPREME COURT—PURCHASER IN GOOD FAITH.

1. Lis Pendens.—That the filing of a bill in chancery is not to be regarded as lis pendens before the service of the summons or subpœna.
2. Constructive Notice of Decision.—That, under the evidence in this case, Grant, the purchaser, was not chargeable with constructive notice of the decision rendered by the Supreme Court, in the case on appeal.
3. Purchaser in Good Faith.—That the purchase of the premises by Grant, was made in good faith, and for a valuable consideration.—[Ed. Legal News.

Opinion by Craig, J.

This was a bill brought by John J. Bennett, et al., appellees, in the Circuit Court of Cook county, against Charles E. Grant and others, to set aside as a cloud upon their title a certain deed, purporting to have been executed on the 4th day of March, 1869, by Mary A. Newcomb, to Charles E. Grant, for certain property in Hyde Park, in Cook county. The cause came to a hearing upon the pleadings and evidence, and the court rendered a decree in favor of the complainants in the bill, to reverse which this appeal has been brought.

The property originally belonged to Abraham J. Rockafellow, who in 1868 conveyed it to Mary A. Newcomb, but on the 4th day of March, 1869, he filed his bill against her in the Circuit Court of Cook county, to compel a re conveyance. The bill was filed about noon of the 4th; summons was issued and served on the following day; the deed from Newcomb to Grant was delivered one or two hours subsequent to the filing of the bill.

The bill filed by Rockafellow, was, upon the hearing, dismissed, and he appealed, which resulted in a decision reversing the decree, with directions to the Circuit Court to enter a decree in favor of the complainant. On the 18th day of June, 1871, a final decree was rendered in the Circuit Court; prior to this however, and on the 16th day of March, 1871, the deed to Grant was placed upon record; after the rendition of the decree on the 18th day of June, appellees purchased of Rockafellow, and claiming title under him, file this bill.

Three questions arise upon the record.

First. Whether the filing of the bill by Rockafellow v. Newcomb, can be regarded as lis pendens before the service of subpœna?

Second. Was Grant chargeable with constructive notice of the decision rendered in this court in the case on appeal?

Third. Was the purchase of the premises by Grant made in good faith, for a valuable consideration?

It is clear, from the evidence, that Grant received a deed of the premises from one to two hours after the bill was filed. If, therefore, the finding of the bill can be held to be lis pendens, without the service of subpœna, it follows that the conveyance to him would be held subject to the final result of the bill.

We have examined the authorities bearing upon the question, with that degree of care that the importance of the subject demands, and we are satisfied that in the Courts of Chancery in England, and in the States where the common law prevails, lis pendens does not exist until a summons or subpœna has been duly and regularly served upon the defendants in the bill, except where the common law rule has been changed by statute.

The service of subpœna alone is not sufficient, but a bill must also be filed, and where a bill has been filed and a subpœna served whether the bill was filed before or after service, lis pendens began from the date of the service, and not from the filing of the bill.

In Sugden on Vendors, vol. 3, page 322, the rule is stated thus: "A subpœna served is not, however, a sufficient lis pendens, unless a bill be filed; but when the bill is filed, the lis pendens begins from the service of the subpœna."

Freeman, in his work on Judgments, sec. 195, says: "Lis pendens, except when some statute prevails otherwise, begins from the service of the process or subpœna, and not before."

The same doctrine is announced and sustained in the following authorities: Anon, 1 Verm, 318; Murray v. Ballou, 1 John, Chancery, 576; Hayden v. Bachlin, 9 Paige, ch. 513; Hemmington v. Hemergton, 27 Mo., 560; Allen v. Mendiville, 26 Miss., 397; Leich v. Wells, 48 N. Y., 611; Powell v. Wright, 7 Beaven.

Has the Common Law rule been changed by our statute, which declares the mode of commencing suit in chancery, shall be by filing a bill of complaint with the clerk of the proper court, setting forth the nature of the complaint?

While this statute prohibits the practice which has prevailed in some places, of suing out a summons in chancery by merely filing a præcipe, yet it by no means follows that the filing of a bill is to be regarded a lis pendens. The mode of commencing a suit in chancery or taking the first step in that direction is one thing, but the effect to be given to that act is another question.

While the statute has clearly and in emphatic terms declared the manner in which a suit in chancery shall be instituted, it is silent in regard to the effect to be given to the filing of the bill, on the rights of persons not parties to the action. The result is, the Common Law rules that govern courts of chancery is still in force and must prevail. The case of Hodgen v. Gridley, 58 Ill., 431, cited and relied upon by appellee has no bearing upon this question. The point there decided was, that process could not issue without filing the bill, and if process was issued, or publication made without a bill being filed, the court acquired no jurisdiction over the defendants. In the other decisions of this court, cited by appellee, the question here involved did not arise and was not discussed. In regard to the second question, we are satisfied if a final decree had been rendered in the Circuit Court, or this court, in the case of Rockafellow v. Newcomb, transferring the title to the premises from the latter to the former, before Grant filed his deed for record, such decree would have defeated the title of Grant.

But the judgment rendered in this court, although prior to the filing of the deed for record, was not a final disposition of the case. It is true the decision rendered settled the rights of the parties, but the decree of the Circuit Court was reversed and the cause remanded, with instructions to the Circuit Court to render a decree that upon Rockafellow re-conveying certain property to Miss Newcomb, that she re-convey the property in question to him.

It needs no argument to show that the decision, while it settled the rights of the parties in the pending litigation, yet it was not a final judgment, in the sense that term is used, to be a lien and binding on the property of a defendant.

We now come to the last point in the case: Whether Grant purchased in good faith, and for an adequate consideration. While it is clear from the evidence that at the time Miss Newcomb conveyed to Grant she was aware that Rockafellow would institute proceedings to obtain the land from her, and she no doubt sold the premises for that reason, and while her conduct in defending the action in her own name, without disclosing the fact that she had conveyed, is not commendable, yet the record is barren of evidence that establishes the fact that Grant was actuated by any improper motives in making the purchase, or that he had any knowledge that Rockafellow had any claim to the property, or that there was danger of litigation over the title.

Grant testified that he bought the property of Miss Newcomb, about the 15th day of January, 1869, for $2,000; that a Mr. Reed, who was a mutual friend, had called upon him and stated she was in every way reliable, and was in need of money and desired to sell the property. He paid $300 when the bargain was made, and agreed to pay the balance when she made out a deed. On the 4th day of March, 1869, she delivered him a quit claim deed, and he paid her the remaining $1,700 in currency. He also testified, when he received the deed he had no knowledge that any difficulty existed between Miss Newcomb and Rockafellow, and did not know that any person had any claim on the land, and did not even know of whom or how she acquired the title to the property.

Miss Newcomb testifies the trade was made in January, 1869, and $300 paid, and the deed was executed and delivered on the fourth of the following March, when the remaining seventeen hundred dollars was paid. Mrs. Greves testified the deed was delivered in her presence at her house on the 4th day of March, 1869, and the $1,700 paid. Carpenter, the scrivener who prepared the deed, says Miss Newcomb called upon him on the 3rd day of March, 1869, and left the deed made by Rockafellow to her, and directed him to make out a deed to Grant; that on the day following, the deed was executed and acknowledged before him.

Here is the evidence of grantor and grantee and the officer who prepared the deed and took the acknowledgment, and Mrs. Greves, who has no interest in the suit, all concurring in the fact that the sale was made and consummated at a particular date, and delivered, and the consideration for which the land sold was actually paid. This proof on the part of the appellants is not overcome by the evidence introduced by appellees.

If it be true that the object of Miss Newcomb in making the sale to Grant was to deprive Rockafellow from obtaining a reconveyance of the property, such would not defeat the title Grant acquired, if he purchased in good faith without notice of the equities of Rockafellow. Nor can the conduct of Miss Newcomb in defending the suit instituted by Rockafellow against her in her own name and not disclosing the fact she had sold, affect Grant so long as he had no knowledge of the impending litigation.

It is said the fact that Grant failed to place upon the record the quit-claim deed and the anti dating the warranty deed subsequently obtained, are facts which show bad faith on his part. It is not unusual for a person to retain a deed and not record it.

As to the other matter it was in proof when the quit claim deed was delivered, Miss Newcomb agreed to make a warranty deed at any time Grant might desire it, and when the warranty deed was subsequently made, it was anti-dated to correspond with the time the purchase was made by Grant. The date the parties might insert in the deed was of no consequence. Nothing could be gained by making a second deed, except Miss Newcomb would be responsible to Grant on the covenants, in case the title should fail.

The quit-claim deed would as effectually pass the title, as a warranty with full covenants. The law upon this point is well settled. Butterfield v. Smith, 11 Ill., 485; Brady v. Spruck, 27 Ill., 478; Meyen v. Clayton, 61 Ill., 35.

Various other matters of a similar character have been urged by appellees for the purpose of showing that Grant did not purchase in good faith.

But unless we presume without sufficient proof that the four witnesses, Grant, Carpenter, Miss Newcomb and Mrs. Greves, have deliberately testified falsely, we are aware of nothing upon which the sale and conveyance of the property consummated on the 4th day of March, 1869, so far as Grant is concerned, can be impeached.

After a careful examination of the whole record, we are satisfied the decree cannot be sustained. It will, therefore, be reversed, and the cause remanded.

BREESE, J., dissents, and holds when the bill in chancery was filed a suit was pending. He further believes there are facts in the record strongly tending to mark the transaction as fraudulent.

WALKER, J. I dissent from the decision in this.

SCHOLFIELD, J. I dissent from the opinion of the majority of the court.

SUPREME COURT OF TENNESSEE.

KNOXVILLE, MAY 20, 1876.

W. G. NEWMAN et al. v. P. W. ASHE et al.

While it is the better rule to construe strictly the power of corporations, still it was within the corporate powers of the city of Knoxville to purchase and own land outside the city limits, for water reservoir purposes.

Land being purchased for such a purpose, the title vested in the city, and was not divested by a change of purpose.

Land conveyed for a fair consideration does not revert to the bargainer because some outside consideration has not been performed, when there is nothing in the deed to show that such failure was, by the contract, to forfeit the title.

The right to re-enter is reserved to the bargainer and his heirs, and not to his grantees.—[ED. Commercial and Legal Reporter.

Opinion of the court by MCFARLAND, J.

This is an action of ejectment, brought to recover a lot of land two hundred feet square, lying within the present corporate limits of the city of Knoxville. The plaintiffs having failed in the action, bring the cause to this court for revision.

It is conceded that the land was formerly owned by Calvin Morgan, and both parties claim title through him. On the 6th of December, 1838, said Morgan conveyed the lot in dispute to the mayor and aldermen of Knoxville, for the purpose of erecting a reservoir thereon. This deed was duly registered. No reservoir was ever erected, however, and the city authorities afterwards subdived the lot and sold and conveyed it to various parties—the several defendants to this action and others through whom they claim.

Calvin Morgan died between the years, 1850 and 1852, and on the 12th of February, 1853, the executor of his will conveyed to John Fouche twenty-five acres of land, including the land in dispute. On the 22d of April, 1853, Fouche conveyed to Jacob Newman, Tazwell W., and W. G. Newman, a lot, the boundaries of which also include the disputed land.

This deed, after giving the boundaries, uses this language: "Containing, after deducting two hundred feet square, heretofore sold by Calvin Morgan, Sr., to the corporation of Knoxville for a reservoir lot, 6 acres 99-100 poles." In another part of the deed the bargainer quit claims to the bargainees of his title to said two hundred feet square, but without warranting the title. The action is brought by W. G. Newman, and the heirs of Jacob and Tazwell W. Newman.

It is manifest upon this statement that if the deed of Calvin Morgan to the mayor and aldermen, of the 6th of December, 1838, be valid, and nothing else appearing, the title of the defendants is superior.

The plaintiffs therefore maintain:

First, That this deed was inoperative and void, because the land at the time was without the corporate limits of the city of Knoxville, and the corporate authorities had no power under the charter and laws to purchase and take the title to such land; and

Second, If this be not so, that the title of the city was lost by reason of its failure to perform the conditions contained in the deed, and the title thereby reverted to the grantor, and passed to them under their deeds.

These questions were determined against the plaintiffs by the Circuit Judge.

Upon the first question, a strict construction of the powers of municipal corporations may be conceded as the safer rule, and that such corporations must act within the powers of their charters, and to carry out the legitimate purposes of their creation; and the power to purchase real estate for the purposes of speculation could certainly not be inferred from the general powers contained in city charters. But the act of the 19th of January, 1830, while it does not in express terms give the power to purchase and hold real estate outside the corporate limits for the purpose of constructing water works, yet it does so by necessary implication. The power to construct water works, a legitimate corporate purpose, is expressly given, and the authority is given to the mayor and aldermen "to protect from injury by adequate penalties * * * the pipes, hydrants or fixtures, buildings or improvements, belonging to, or in any wise appertaining to said water works, whether within or without the limits of said corporation."

We think it requires no latitude of construction to hold that the corporate authorities had at the time the power to purchase and take the title to the lot for the purpose indicated; and this being so, the deed is not on this account void, although no water works were ever constructed upon the lot in question. The purchase having been made in accordance with the power and authority then existing, the title passed, and was not defeated by reason of a change of purpose on the part of the corporate authorities, as to constructing waterworks upon the land.

To determine the next question, it is necessary to notice the material parts of the deed in question, as follows: "The said Calvin Morgan, for and in consideration of the sum of $1,000, to him in hand, the receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, and for and in consideration that the said mayor and aldermen hereby agree, as soon as conveniently practicable, to erect for said Morgan's use, a hydrant within ten feet of the descending pipe from the reservoir contemplated, furnishing water sufficient for the domestic consumption of one family, hath granted, etc., etc., to the mayor and aldermen of Knoxville, for the use and benefit of said town, and for the purpose of erecting a reservoir thereon, a certain tract of land, etc., etc., with the privilege of ingress and egress." It is argued that the failure of the corporation to erect the reservoir and the hydrant, within the time indicated, was a breach of the condition upon which the land was conveyed, and gave to Morgan the right to avoid the conveyance by a re-entry.

We hold that this is not a proper construction of the deed; that the conveyance was absolute and unconditional; that the undertaking of the mayor and aldermen to erect a hydrant was a part of the consideration of the conveyance, and Morgan might or might not have had his remedy for the non-performance of this undertaking; but there is nothing in the deed to show that a failure to perform this undertaking was to forfeit the title to the land, or cause it to revert to the grantor—where a fair consideration, as in this case, has been paid outside of the undertaking in question. Courts would certainly not imply a condition that the title is to be forfeited by a non-compliance of the further undertaking of the bargainees.

Such conditions would have to be clearly expressed. The language of the deed, showing that the conveyance was for the purpose of erecting a reservoir thereon, as standing alone, has no other significance than to show that the purchase by the corporate authorities was within their power, and for a legitimate purpose.

We think this holding will be found to be in accordance with the authorities upon the subject. Shepherd Touchstone, p. 127. If it were conceded that the deed is subject to the construction contended for, the authorities hold that the right to enter or avoid the deed is reserved only to the bargainer or his heirs, and does not pass to his grantee. 4 Kent, p. 127; Washouse on Real Property, 1st Vol., pp. 450, 451.

We think there is nothing to show any attempt upon the part of Morgan or his heirs or representatives to assert the right of re-entry, though he remained in possession for some years after the conveyance.

We think there is no error in the record, and the judgment will be affirmed.

WE are under obligations to C. C. BONNEY, of the Chicago bar, for the following opinion:

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

OPINION FILED JUNE 30, 1876.

HARTFORD LIFE AND ANNUITY ASSURANCE CO. v. HARTWELL GRAY et al.

Appeal from Cook.

APPLICATION FOR INSURANCE—EVIDENCE TO CONTRADICT.

1. GENUINENESS OF SIGNATURE.—That when the genuineness of a signature to an instrument is established, it affords prima facie evidence that the contents of the instrument were known to the subscriber, and that it is his act, and that the burden is upon those who assert the contrary, to make such proofs as shall overcome this prima facie evidence.

2. DISREGARDING TESTIMONY.—That a jury cannot willfully disregard the testimony of an unimpeached witness; that while they may judge of the credibility of a witness, they must exercise judgment, and not will merely, in doing so.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.

Opinion by SCHOLFIELD, J.

The question first to be considered is, was secondary evidence of the application for the policy properly received? for if it was not, the ground of defense entirely fails.

It was witnessed by "Capt. B. Wheeler," and it is insisted by appellees that its execution must be proved by him. It has been held by this court that it is not necessary to produce the subscribing witness to testify to the execution of the instrument, when he is beyond the reach of the process of the court. Wiley et al. v. Beem et al., 1st Gilm., 302; Newsom v. Suster, 13th Ill., 175; Miller v. Metsger, 16th Id., 390, and the same rule obtains if the witness cannot be found on dilligent enquiry. Clark v. Sanderson, 3rd Beimey, 192; Jackson ex dem v. Gager, 5th Cowen, 383; Jackson ex dem v. Cody, 9th Cowen, 140; Ingram v. Hall, 1st Haywood, 207; Jackson ex dem v. Root, 18th Johns, 60; Whitteman v. Brooks, 1st Greenleaf, 59; Baker v. Blount ynd Haywood, 404; Lansing v. Chamberlan, 8th Wend, 620; Note to Jones v. Coopriders, 1st Blackfield, 49; Spring v. South Can. Ins. Co., 8th Wheaton, 269.

The evidence shows that the witness left Belvidere, the place where the instrument was subscribed, and was last heard of in Wisconsin. An agent of the company at Belvidere testifies to this, and also, that he has made enquiries as to his whereabouts and endeavored to find him, but has been unable to do so. We think this was sufficient to authorize the introduction of other evidence of the execution of the instrument.

We are also of opinion that the evidence of the genuineness of the signature of Morey, to the application, was sufficient for the purposes of the case, standing, as it does, uncontradicted.

The next question is, was it incumbent on the company to prove that Morey filled up the blank application, or that he was acquainted with the contents of the application when he signed it; or is it incumbent on the plaintiffs to show that he was ignorant of the contents of the application when he signed it, in order that they shall be relieved from its representations?

It has been several times laid down, in previous decisions, as the rule recognized by this court, in such cases, that it may be shown the applicant for the policy in fact did not make the representations as shown by the application; but that the application was filled out by the agent of the company, he inserting the statement claimed to be false, of his own accord. It has, however, never been ruled that the court will, in the absence of all evidence, presume the application was thus made out, and we have been referred to no decision elsewhere announcing such doctrine. Numerous cases are referred to by counsel for appellees, holding that insurance companies, establishing local agencies, must be held responsible to the parties with whom they transact business, for the acts and declarations of the agents, within the scope of their apparent employment, as if they proceeded from the principal; and that policies will not be avoided for errors by the agents acting within the apparent general scope of their powers, on the artificial and unwarranted assumption that they are agents of the applicants for policies.

But, so far as our own observation has gone in all the cases, the onus was on the party denying that the application was the act of the person by whom it was signed, to prove the circumstances which justified the denial.

We are of opinion, when the genuineness of a signature to an instrument is established, it affords prima facie evidence that the contents of the instrument were known to the subscriber, and that it is his act, and hence that the burden is upon those who assert the contrary, to make such proofs as shall overcome this prima facie evidence.

There was no evidence introduced, on the trial below, tending to prove Morey was ignorant of the contents of the application; that it was filled up contrary to his direction, or without his knowledge; or that any representations were made to him by the agents of the company.

The court, at the instance of the plaintiffs, instructed the jury "that they are the judges of the credibility of witnesses, and of the weight of evidence. They may believe and accept, or disbelieve any testimony which, under all the circumstances of the case, is not creditable and entitled to weight in deciding the issue in this case."

This is entirely too comprehensive in its terms. The jury are at liberty to disbelieve the evidence of a witness who has been impeached, in any of the modes recognized by the law for impeaching witnesses, which may include not only direct contradictions and evidence of bad character, but also the inherent improbabilities of his statement, and his manner and appearance while testifying, but they cannot be allowed to go beyond this, and determine for themselves that other circumstances not within legal contemplation tending to impeach the witness, show that his evidence is impeached, and therefore entirely disregard it. The effect to be given to evidence, it is true, may depend, in some degree, on circumstances other than those which are regarded as directly tending to impeach a witness, such as his opportunity for knowing that to which he testifies, the strength or weakness of his memory—his interest in the question, and even his temperament—but, here also, the jury are limited and can only consider those circumstances which, in human experience, are known to affect perception, memory and judgment. The form of the instruction is calculated to mislead. What circumstances in the case tend to discredit any particular part of the evidence, or what is necessary for that purpose, is not indicated.

The jury might well understand from the instruction that it was left to them to determine, without restriction, whom to believe or to disbelieve.

In Robertson v. Dodge, 28 Ill., 161, it was held a jury cannot willfully disregard the testimony of an unimpeached witness; that while they may judge of the credibility of a witness, they must exercise judgment, and not will, merely, in doing so.

In Evans v. George, at the present term, this precise form of instruction was condemned.

For the reasons given, the judgment is reversed and the cause remanded.

We call attention to the following opinions, reported at length in this issue.

R. R. Liability—Injuries to Express Messengers.—The opinion of the New York Court of Appeals as to the liability of railroad companies for injuries to express messengers.

Consolidation of Railroads—Taxation.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States, by Bradley, J., as to the effect of the consolidation of railroads upon the taxation of their property.

Postal Money Orders—Indictment for Embezzeling.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States, by Swayne, J., construing the act of Congress creating the postal money order system, and providing for the punishment of those who should be found guilty of embezzlement, and holding that such act was not to be regarded as a revenue law.

Refusing to Furnish Refreshments to a Colored Man—Trial by Jury.—The opinion by the Supreme Court of the United States, by Waite, C. J., in a suit brought against a coffee-house keeper, in New Orleans for refusing to furnish refreshments to the appellee, on the ground that he was a colored man, and holding that the trial by jury in suits of common law, pending in the State courts is not a privilege or immunity of national citizenship, which the States are forbidden by the fourteenth amendment to abridge.

Insurance Case.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States, by Hunt, J., in an insurance case.

Lis Pendens—Notice on Appeal—Purchaser in Good Faith.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of Illinois by Craig, J., holding that the filing of a bill in chancery is not to be regarded as lis pendens before the service of summons upon the defendant, and that in the case before the court, the purchase of the premises was in good faith and for a valuable consideration, and the purchaser was not to be regarded as having constructive notice of the decision of the Supreme Court rendered in the case on appeal. We regard this as an extremely important opinion, the question as to what shall be regarded in such a case as lis pendens never before having been passed upon by our Supreme Court. It is to be regretted, however, that the opinion is only by a majority of one. Breese, Walker and Scholfield, JJ., dissent from the opinion of the majority of the judges. Breese, J., being of the opinion that when the bill in chancery was filed a suit was pending, and that there were facts in the record strongly tending to mark the transaction as fraudulent.

Covenant not to Carry on Business, etc.—The opinion of the English Divisional Court for Appeals holding that it is no breach of a covenant not to carry on the business of a wholesale or retail confectioner for a grocer and tea-dealer to sell a particular kind of sweet-meat, in which a confectioner may happen to deal.

Authority of City Council to Commit for Contempt.—The opinion of the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, by Gray, C. J., holding that the Massachusetts statute, conferring authority upon the presiding officer of the City Council to commit for contempt, is unconstitutional.

Divorce—Expenses—Attorneys' Fees—Appeal.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of this State, by Scott, J., holding that an appeal will lie from a decree entered in a divorce suit ordering the husband to pay a sum of money to the wife for the expenses accrued and to accrue in defending against the husband's appeal to the Supreme Court, and to pay the wife's attorneys' fees. The main question in this case has never before been decided in this State.

Power of City to Purchase Land beyond Limits.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of Tennessee by McFarland, J., holding that while it is the better rule to construe strictly the power of corporations, still it was within the corporate powers of the city of Knoxville to purchase and own land outside the city limits; that land being purchased for such a purpose. The title vested in the city, and was not divested by a change of purpose.

Insurable Interest—Wager Policy on Life—Suicide.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of this State, by Sheldon, J., holding, in the case before the court, that the relation of father and son did not create an insurable interest in the son in the life of the father, unless the son had a well-founded or reasonable expectation of some pecuniary advantage to be received from the continuance of the life of the father, and passing upon several interesting questions of pleading upon a life insurance policy, and stating, where the death of the insured occurs, the presumptions as to whether he met his death by his own hands, or died from natural causes.

When a Person may be Imprisoned for Neglect or Refusal to Perform a Money Decree.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of this State, by Scott, C. J., holding that when the neglect or refusal to perform the decree is not from mere contumacy, but from the want of means, the result of misfortune, not induced by the fraudulent conduct on the part of the defendant, the party will be compelled to adopt some mode other than imprisonment, to enforce the decree consistent with the practice in the courts, either by execution, or by other final process, or by sequestration of real or personal estate, or by the exercise of such other powers as pertain to courts of chancery, and which may be necessary to the attainment of justice; that decrees for the payment of alimony are not different from other decrees for the payment of money; that imprisonment for non-compliance therewith unless wilful, or unless upon a refusal of the defendant upon proper demand made to deliver up his estate in satisfaction of the decree, is within the inhibition of the constitution as against imprisonment for debt.

Application for Insurance—Evidence to Contradict—Genuineness of Signature.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of this State by Scholfield, J., as to whether secondary evidence of the application for the policy could properly be received, and holding, that when the genuineness of a signature to an instrument is established, it affords prima facie evidence that the contents of the instrument were known to the subscriber, and that the burden of proof is upon those who assert the contrary.

Chitty's Treatise on Pleading and Parties to Actions, with a second volume containing Modern Precedents of Pleadings, and Practical Notes. In two volumes. Vol. II. The Seventh English Edition, corrected and enlarged by Henry Greening, Esq., of Lincoin's Inn. Sixteenth American Edition, with Notes, and References to the English and American Decisions, by J. C. Perkins, LL. D. Springfield, Mass. Published by G. & C. Merriam. 1876. Sold by W. B. Keen, Cooke & Co., Booksellers, Chicago.

It would be a waste of words to speak to any lawyer of the value of Chitty's Pleadings. It is one of the most remarkable law works of this or any other age. It has been the leading text book upon the complicated subject of pleading for more than two generations in England and America, and stands to-day without a successful rival. It is still acknowledged as the best authority in all courts where the common law prevails. A new and exhaustive edition of such a work as this, containing references to all the recent important opinions of England and America, involving questions of common law pleading, is an enterprise in which lawyers must take a deep interest. The edition before us contains about twenty-two hundred pages, is beautifully printed, and bound in a dress worthy of such a work. In this edition the American notes have been very much enlarged, and many editions of new notes have been made; and they have all been blended and made homogeneous with the English notes. The rules adopted and the cases decided under the new systems of pleading and procedure in the several States, have been referred to so far as it has been supposed it would be useful. In consequence of the great changes which in modern times, made in abridging, compressing and simplifying the forms of precedents in pleading, the second and third volumes, which are composed of forms founded on antiquated precedents, and which have heretofore been connected with and published as a part of Mr. Chitty's Treatise on Pleading, have become for the most part practically obsolete, and have not, therefore, been republished with this edition of the Treatise, but in the place of those volumes, and as a substitute for them, a single volume of precedents, carefully adapted to modern practice, has been prepared, and is now published as a companion of the Treatise. This volume is founded on Chitty's Precedents in Pleading, and contains a copious and diversified collection of forms which are clear, concise, and, so far as we are able to judge, well suited to the practice of the present time.

This digest is arranged with taste and skill, so as to enable the lawyer to find just what has been decided by the Supreme Court of Michigan in the least possible time. While the points of law decided are given briefly, they still contain sufficient to enable the reader to form a correct idea of the cases. Every Michigan lawyer should lose no time in adding this digest to his library. We are sure no person who has a set of Michigan reports can afford to be without it.

Jones v. The State.

CRIMINAL CASE.—INSTRUCTING JURY IN ABSENCE OF PRISONER.

1. Where the jury on the trial of a felony have retired to consider of their verdict, it is error for the court, on the return of the jury into court, to again instruct them as to the law of the case in the absence of the accused, who is then in jail under the order of the court.

2. Such irregularity is not cured by the presence of defendant's counsel at the giving of such additional instructions.

LIABILITIES OF BANKERS PAYING STOLEN ORDERS FOR PAYMENT OF MONEY.

ARNOLD v. THE CHEQUE BANK, LIMITED
(34 L. T. REP. N. S. 729.)

The plaintiffs in this case, who were merchants in New York, being desirous of transmitting £1000 in payment to their correspondents, Messrs. Williams and Co., of Bradford, inclosed in a letter to England a draft for that amount, specially indorsed to them. The draft was stolen out of the letter by a clerk in the plaintiff's office, and was afterwards presented at the defendants' bank with a forged indorsement, by Messrs. Williams and Co.; and the defendants having cashed the draft at the bank on which it was drawn, placed the proceeds to the credit at their bank of the person who had presented the draft, who subsequently drew out the whole amount, with the exception of £106. The plaintiffs sued for the proceeds of the draft as money reserved to their use. On the trial evidence was tendered by the defendants of a usual or almost invariable practice of sending, besides the letter containing the draft, a letter of advice by the same or another ship, for the purpose of showing that the plaintiffs had by negligence afforded facilities for the fraud that had been practiced; but this evidence was rejected by Lord Coleridge, who, in the result, directed a verdict for the plaintiffs for the amount of the draft and interest. A rule nisi having been obtained to set aside this verdict and for a new trial, on cause being shown, the questions raised were: First, whether, under the circumstances, the money received by the defendants for the draft was received to the use of the plaintiffs; and, secondly, whether there was any evidence of negligence by which the plaintiffs were estopped from setting up against the defendants their title to the draft, and whether the rejected evidence was admissible for the purpose of showing such negligence. Lord Coleridge, delivering the judgment of the Common Pleas Division, consisting of himself and Archibald and Lindley, JJ., decided both these points in favor of the plaintiffs, who will, accordingly, keep the verdict they had obtained at Nisi Prius.

About the first question there could be very little doubt, after the clear enunciation of the law on the subject by Lord Chelmsford, in Hollins v. Fowler (33 L. T. Rep. N. S. 73, 81). It was there laid down that, "Any person who, however innocently, obtains possession of the goods of a person who has been fraudulently deprived of them, and disposes of them whether for his own benefit or that of any other person, is guilty of a conversion." In fact, in Hollins v. Fowler, and Arnold v. The Cheque Bank, the same question substantially arose, namely, Where one of two innocent parties must suffer, who is to be that party? And in both cases the answer was very properly returned: The party who directly (though perhaps innocently) caused the loss. Accordingly, in Arnold v. The Cheque Bank, it was held that the defendants who had converted the money were prima facie bound to recoup the plaintiffs for the loss sustained by them by reason of such conversion. But then came the second question, whether there was any evidence of negligence by which the plaintiffs were estopped from setting up against the defendants their title to the draft? This question, we should have thought, might have been summarily disposed of by applying the old maxim, "A stranger shall neither take advantage of, nor be bound by, an estoppel" (Co. Litt. 352a), for we do not see how the objection that the plaintiffs had omitted to send a letter of advice with the draft could lie in the mouth of the Cheque Bank, though circumstances may be imagined in which Messrs. Williams and Co. would have been entitled to complain of such omission. This view of the point, however, was not presented to the court by the plaintiff's counsel, nor noticed in the judgment delivered; the decision in favor of Messrs. Arnold on the second question proceeding upon the ground that even if they had been guilty of negligence in not sending a letter of advice, yet that such negligence was "entirely collateral to the transmission of the draft," and an omission which "could in no sense be considered as the proximate cause of the larceny and forgery" that had occurred. The Common Pleas Division was, no doubt, perfectly right here, both as to the law and the facts to which they had applied it, but as some of the cases on this subject have been apparently more often commented upon than clearly understood, we will take this opportunity of endeavoring to explain and reconcile them.

The counsel for the bank, after having quoted the dictum of Ashurst, J. in Lickbarrow v. Mason, (2 T. R. 63, 70), to the effect that it may be laid down "as a broad general principle that wherever one of two innocent persons must suffer by the acts of a third, he who has enabled such third person to occasion the loss must sustain it" (see Hollins v. Fowler, sup.), proceeded by a curious mischance to quote—in support of his contention that the defendants were entitled to rely upon this rule of law—two cases, which, if properly understood, the court held to be clear authorities for the plaintiffs: (Young v. Grote, 4 Bi, 253; and Ingham v. Primrose, 7 C. B. N. S. 82). In the former often-criticised case, the plaintiff's wife, acting as his agent in that behalf, had filled up a cheque with such extreme negligence, that one of his clerks was enabled with the greatest ease to change the amount for which it was drawn from 50*l.* 2*s.* to 350*l.* 2*s.*, and it was held that under the circumstances the loss must fall upon the plaintiff. "The blame," said Burrough, J. (4 Bi. 260), "is all on one side," and Best. C. J., pointed out that Pothier in his Traite du Contrat du Change (pa. 1. ch. 4 sect. 100), had considered the very question, and decided it in the same way as he was about to decide it. In Ingham v. Primrose the defendant had torn an acceptance of his own in half, and one Murgatroyd having picked up the two pieces in his presence, without any remark from him, pasted them together again, and put the bill in circulation. It was held that the defendant was liable to the holder of the bill. "The defendant here," said Williams, J., delivering the judgment of the court (7 C. B N. S., 87), "by abstaining from an effectual cancellation or destruction of the bill has led to the plaintiff's becoming the holder of it for value, and without any just cause for supposing that it had been cancelled or annulled." Now, it is clear that the negligence in both these cases was in the transaction itself—in the drawing of the cheque, or the cancellation of the bill—and not in something collateral to it; and Lord Coleridge, after having pointed out how Arnold v. The Cheque Bank, differed from the above authorities in this respect, gave his entire approval to the following statement of the law by Mr. Justice Blackburn in Swan v. The North British Australasian Co. (2 H. & N., 175, 182). That learned judge there said, "What I consider the fallacy of my brother Wilde's judgment (in the court below, 7 H. & N., 633), is this, he lays down the rule in general terms 'that if one has led others into the belief of a certain state of facts by conduct of culpable neglect calculated to have that result, and they have acted on that belief to their prejudice, he shall not be heard afterwards as against such persons to show that state of facts did not exist.' This is very nearly right, but in my opinion not quite, as he omits to qualify it by saying that the neglect must be in the transaction itself, and be the proximate cause of leading the party into that mistake, and also, as I think, that it must be the neglect of some duty that is owing to the person led into that belief, or what comes to the same thing, to the general public, of whom the person is one, and not merely neglect of what would be prudent in respect to the party himself, or even of some duty owing to third parties with whom those seeking to set up the estoppel are not privy." Every case of this kind, in fact, must stand upon its own peculiar circumstances, and in the great majority of cases we should say that common sense would point out with tolerable clearness upon whom the loss ought to fall. "If such negligence" (i. e., merely collateral negligence), said Lord Coleridge, in conclusion, quoting The Bank of Ireland v. Evan's Charities (5 H. of L. Cas. 389, 410), "could disentitle the plaintiffs, to what extent is it to go? If a man should lose his cheque book, or neglect to lock the desk in which it is kept, and a servant or a stranger should take it up, it up, it is impossible to contend that a banker paying his forged cheque would be entitled to charge his customer with that payment."—The London Law Times.

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

OPINION FILED JUNE 30, 1876.

THE GUARDIAN M. LIFE INS. CO. v. PATRICK HOGAN.

Error to Winnebago.

INSURABLE INTEREST—WAGER POLICY—AUTHORITY OF AGENT—PLEADING—DECLARATION ON POLICY—WHAT ARE NECESSARY AVERMENTS—SUICIDE.

1. INSURABLE INTEREST.—What constitutes an insurable interest in the life of another, stated.
2. SUICIDE—NATURAL DEATH.—The instructions of the court below, where death had occurred, as to the presumption whether it was from natural causes, or a case of suicide, discussed, and the law stated.
3. NECESSARY AVERMENTS.—The court states what are necessary averments in a declaration upon a life insurance company.
4. AUTHORITY OF AGENT.—The authority of an agent to bind an insurance company in receiving an application for a life policy, and the effect of changing the policy for that of another kind, and the proper mode of declaring on such new policy, considered.
5. INSURABLE INTEREST.—Held, in this case, that the mere relation of father and son, did not create an insurable interest in the son in the life of the father, unless the son had a well-founded or reasonable expectation of some pecuniary advantage to be derived from the continuance of the life of the father.
6. WAGER POLICY.—The court cites approvingly, a case wherein a policy of insurance to a creditor, on the life of a debtor, the sum insured was so largely disproportionate to the amount of the creditor's claim that the policy was held void as being a mere wager policy.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.

Opinion by SHELDON, J.

On December 31, 1868, the plaintiff in error, a corporation of New York, granted to John Hogan, of Rockford, Illinois, a policy of insurance, No. 16,870, on his life, for $10,000, to be paid to his son Patrick Hogan, who resided some seventeen miles from Rockford, in Ogle county, on the death of the father, subject to the conditions of the policy. The circumstances under which the policy was issued were: That J. C. Mayberry was the general agent of the company in 1868 and 1872, residing at Rockford. L E. Herrick was a solicitor of insurance under Mayberry, and went out in company with one Parkison, another insurance solicitor, from Rockford to Ogle county, to solicit Patrick Hogan to take insurance on his own life. He declined to take any, but originated a suggestion for a policy on his father's life, John Hogan, an old man, living at Rockford, if it was practicable. There were doubts of its practicability, but after an interview of some hours an application was made out by Herrick, to be delivered to Mayberry. Herrick knew nothing of John Hogan, except from Patrick's statements, neither he nor Mayberry ever having seen John Hogan till long after the policy was issued. The application was taken away by Herrick, and soon after delivered by him to Mayberry. The signature of John Hogan appeared to the application, and, as may be inferred from the evidence, was in the handwriting of Herrick. Mayberry forwarded the application to New York, to the company, and received therefrom the policy, and mailed it to Patrick Hogan, Mayberry never having seen or had any communication with Patrick up to that time. He never collected any premium from John Hogan, or had any communication with him. At a subsequent time Mayberry requested Patrick Hogan to change the policy into a Tontine policy, stating to him that the company were changing all their policies to Tontine policies, and having gone to his house to see him for the purpose. There was an arrangement that Patrick Hogan would call and see about it. Some days or weeks afterward, he came into Mayberry's office, and at the latter's request signed the following letter, the signature "John Hogan" being written by Patrick Hogan, viz:

ROCKFORD, ILL., Oct. 28, 1872.

J. C. MAYBERRY, ESQ., State Agent, Rockford,

Dear Sir:—Please obtain for me a Tontine Policy for ten thousand dollars in the Guardian Mutual Life Insurance Company of New York, as I wish to surrender policy No. 16,870, and accept its return value to apply on the premium on the new policy, reference being had to my application for policy No. 16,870.

Yours truly, JOHN HOGAN.

Thereupon Mayberry himself filled out and forwarded to New York what is called a "dummy application" for the new policy, Patrick Hogan doing nothing more than to sign the letter as above. The company thereupon issued a new policy on the Tontine plan, called a "Tontine Saving Policy," No. 33,754, dated Nov. 7, 1872. This policy, like the first, purports to insure the life of John Hogan in the amount of $10,000, for the sole use of his son Patrick Hogan, and contains the recital that it is granted "in consideration of the representations made in the application for policy No. 16,870, which is hereby made a part of this contract."

John Hogan died from the effects of taking arsenic, August 26, 1873. This suit was thereafter brought by Patrick Hogan against the insurance company, upon this second policy, the "Tontine Saving Policy," wherein he recovered, in the court below, a verdict of judgment for $10,500, and the defendant appealed to this court.

SHELDON, J.

It is first insisted as a ground for reversing the judgment, that the averments in the declaration are not sufficient to sustain the judgment upon the evidence. The declaration was framed precisely as if John Hogan had, as the policy purported in fact, procured the insurance himself for the benefit of Patrick Hogan, and so it is not averred, as it need not be in such case, that Patrick Hogan had any interest in the life of John Hogan. But a different rule prevails where one procures insurance on the life of another. In such case the plaintiff must aver in his declaration on the policy that he had an insurable interest in the life insured, and prove the same affirmatively as a part of his case. And as the fact here is, that Patrick Hogan procured the insurance in question upon the life of John Hogan without the latter's knowledge or consent, and that Patrick Hogan alone, without the knowledge of John Hogan, paid whatever premiums were advanced upon the policy, it is insisted the declaration is not sufficient to sustain the judgment upon the evidence, for want of the averment that Patrick Hogan had an insurable interest in the life of John Hogan.

Although it may be otherwise upon the proof, upon any question as to the validity of the policy as respects the form of the declaration, we regard the company as concluded from making any such objection. With knowledge of the facts the agents of the company allowed and were instrumental in causing the transaction of the insurance to assume the form which it did, and in framing the declaration upon the policy the plaintiff was justified in treating it according to its purport, and upon a mere question of pleading, the company should not be heard to make the objection, that the transaction was different in fact from what it purported to be by the policy.

And in this connection may be answered another point made, that the application was a fraud on the company in not disclosing that it was really Patrick Hogan's application when it purported to come from John Hogan. The whole conduct and dealing of the agents with Patrick Hogan throughout the entire affair, in all its different stages, show too much of privity and knowledge on the part of the agents of the company, in respect of the actual facts, to expose the transaction to this imputation. It is further objected on this subject of pleading, that inasmuch as, according to the recital of the policy sued on, it was issued "in consideration of the representations in the application for policy No. 16,870, which is hereby made a part of this contract," the declaration should have set out the whole transaction, beginning with the original insurance, and have counted upon both policies. A good cause of action was shown by declaring upon the policy sued on alone, and we regard it as unnecessary to have noticed in the declaration the former policy or application. If the representations in the former application furnished any matter in defeat of the right of action, it was open to the defendant to avail of it in defense.

It is said if this position taken is not correct, then the court below erred in permitting the original policy and the payments made under it to be given in evidence on the trial. But this was done, ot in support of the action, but to meetn the matter of defence set up of suicide. Had such defence been established, the limit of recovery by the provisions of the policy would have been the amount of premiums paid. In view of this defence, the proof, we think, was properly made of the whole amount of the premiums which had been paid under both the policies.

The policy in suit, as also the original one, contained the provision that "should the death of the assured be caused by any act of self-destruction, whatever, sane or insane, then the said company shall pay to the assured the full amount of the premiums that shall have been paid hereon, but no further sum whatever, and then in that case the policy shall cease and determine. It clearly appeared that John Hogan died from the effects of arsenic, either purposely or inadvertently taken by himself. It was a main ground of defence that the poison was taken designedly and the death caused by suicide. Evidence was adduced tending to its proof.

The court below gave to the jury, for the plaintiff, this instruction. And the court further instructs the jury that in case of death and the evidence leaves the matter in doubt whether the deceased came to his death by an act of self-destruction or by accident, the law presumes the death to have occurred from accident. The giving of this instruction is assigned as error. This instruction required even more than full proof of the fact of suicide—the amount of proof required in a criminal case to constitute full proof of the fact in dispute, only requires evidence which satisfies the minds of the jury of the truth of the fact to the exclusion of every reasonable doubt. This instruction in effect tells the jury that if there is under the evidence, any doubt of the fact that the deceased destroyed himself, the law presumes the death to have occurred from accident.

Under the instruction, no matter how strong the preponderance of evidence might have been of the commission of suicide, yet, if the jury had a doubt upon the subject, it is not seen how they could have done otherwise than to find against the fact of suicide.

Where there is the occurrence of death merely and no evidence upon the subject, the presumption is that it was from natural causes, and not an act of self-destruction. The presumption prevails in the absence of proof or in the case where the evidence on the point is equally balanced. This is the extent. The jury we think were not under this instruction, left at liberty as they should have been, to determine from all the evidence whether there was here an act of self-destruction or not. The defendant was entitled to have the issue it made on this question fairly submitted and decided upon a preponderance of the evidence adduced. An instruction to a jury what the "presumption of law" was upon a question of disputed fact, was commented upon in Garritson v. Pegg, 64 Ill., 111, and condemned as being extremely likely to mislead the jury. The instruction was erroneous. Objection is also taken to this instruction which was given for the plaintiff.

If the jury believe from the evidence that the plaintiff, Patrick Hogan, was the son of John Hogan, and that the relations between the father and son were amicable and affectionate, and that John Hogan was a prosperous and well-to-do man; and if the jury further believe from the evidence that Patrick Hogan had remained at home and worked for his father several years after he became of age, for which he had received no compensation from his father, and if they also believe from the evidence that Patrick Hogan had made valuable improvements after he became of age, upon an eighty acres of land of his father's, under a promise, or a well grounded expectation that his father would give him the land upon which the improvements had been made, and that his father, John Hogan, had subsequently disposed of the land and had made said Patrick Hogan no compensation for the improvements made by him, said Patrick Hogan thereon, and that he, Patrick Hogan had a just, legal and moral claim upon his father, for such labor and improvements upon said piece of land, at the time of making said application for insurance upon the life of his father and the issuing the policy thereon, then the court instructs the jury that such facts would constitute an insurable interest in Patrick Hogan, in the life of his father, John Hogan.

As also to the refusal to give the following instructions which were asked on behalf of the defendant.

If you shall find from the evidence that the applications for insurance, bearing date December 29, 1868, and October 28, 1872, offered in evidence, and purporting to have been made by John Hogan, were really in substance the application of Patrick Hogan, for insurance on the life of his father, then you will enquire whether Patrick had an insurable interest in the life of his father which would support a policy for $10,000.

In determining this question, you will enquire whether, from the evidence, it appears that at the time of making such applications, said Patrick had any pecuniary interest, as creditor or otherwise, in the life of his father, or any reasonable expectation of profit or advantage which might be thwarted by his father's death, for the law will not enforce policies of insurance procured for mere gambling or wager purposes, upon lives, on the continuance of which the assured cannot be deemed to have an insurable interest, and the mere relation of father and son, where both parties are of mature years, and live apart, in independent pecuniary circumstances, and mutually entirely independent of each other, and having no business relations with each other, does not create an insurable interest in the son on the life of the father; and in deciding whether, in this case, Patrick Hogan had such an interest in his father's life as will support the insurance procured, you will take into account all the evidence as to the respective ages and situations in life of the father and son, and their business and social relations, and all other facts which tend to show whether, as above defined, the son had an insurable interest in his father's life, at the date of his application aforesaid.

You are further instructed that though a party may have some insurable interest in the life of another as creditor or otherwise, yet if the amount of insurance procured upon such life appears palpably to be very largely in excess of any possible loss the assured can suffer from the death of the insured, then the presumption of a gambling or wager insurance arises, which calls upon the assured to show that such insurance was not procured as a mere cover for gambling, or a wager upon the life of the insured; and in this case, if you believe from the evidence that the plaintiff had some interest of an insurable character, as already defined, in his father's life, at the date of his several applications for insurance, yet if you find from the evidence that the amount procured was vastly disproportionate in its excess to any probable loss which Patrick might suffer from his father's death, such circumstance has a tendency to prove that the insurance was procured for mere purposes of speculation, and as a cover for gambling, and if from the evidence you shall find that such was the fact, then the plaintiff cannot recover in this action.

Under the facts, we consider that Patrick Hogan had no just or legal claim upon his father for labor or improvements, and that should not have been submitted to the jury as a question for them to find upon. A moral claim would not constitute an insurable interest in behalf of one as a creditor. The facts, as we regard them, were no more than evidence tending to show an insurable interest, and should not have been declared by the court to constitute an insurable interest. As said by the court, in the case of Ruse v. The Mutual Benefit Life Insurance Company, 23 N. Y., 516: "A policy obtained by a party who had no interest in the subject of insurance, is a mere wager policy." "But policies, without interest, upon lives, are more pernicious and dangerous than any other class of wager policies, because temptations to tamper with life are more mischievous than incitements to mere pecuniary frauds. And see 3 Kent Comm., 11th ed., 462-3. It is said that every man has an interest in his own life to any amount he chooses to value it, and may insure it accordingly. But what is such an interest in the life of another as will support a contract of insurance upon the life, is confessedly not as yet very well defined under the authorities.

Some of them tend in the direction that the mere relationship, as between father and son reciprocally, is a sufficient foundation upon which to rest an insurable interest. Mr. May, in his late treatise on the Law of Insurance, § 107, says, that that precise question yet remains to be decided; and he states as the result of his review of the authorities, his conclusion to be, that the relationship seems to be of little importance, except as tending to give rise to the circumstances which justify a well-founded expectation of pecuniary advantage from the continuance of the life insured, or risk of loss from its termination. Mr. Bliss, in his work on Life Insurance, section 31, seems to arrive at essentially the same conclusion. We are disposed, from an examination of the authorities and our own sense of the requirement of sound public policy, to concur in such conclusion, and hold that the mere relation here of father and son did not constitute an insurable interest in the son in the life of the father, unless the son had a well-founded or reasonable expectation of some pecuniary advantage to be derived from the continuance of the life of the father. We do not regard, as really holding anything different, the case cited as a contrary authority by appellee's counsel, of Insurance Company v. Bailey, 13 Wall., 619, where the court, in discussing this question, say, as the better opinion, "that it is sufficient to show that the policy is not invalid as a wager policy if it appear that the relation, whether of consanguinity or of affinity, was such between the person whose life was insured and the beneficiary named in the policy, as warrants the conclusion that the beneficiary had an interest—whether pecuniary or arising from dependence or natural affection—in the life of the person insured." We think this may consist with the idea that it is the well-founded expectation of advantage to be derived from the continuance of the life insured, which makes the insurable interest in it, and not the mere relationship as between father and son, under any and all circumstances.

The circumstances of the situation of the parties as bearing this connection, were, that at the time of the application for the original policy, John Hogan was an infirm man, having but a partial use of his right arm and leg, unable to labor, engaged in no business, and sixty years of age, as the application states, though his age was a point in dispute, there being evidence tending to show he was at least five years older. He had four children; had been married to a second wife about four years before, by whom he had a young child. He left an estate of some $13,000, and a legacy by his will of $1,000, to Patrick Hogan. The latter was forty years of age, living away in another county, some seventeen miles distant, with a family of children, upon a farm of his own of 300 or 400 acres.

As respects the second refused instruction, appellee's counsel saying nothing in just ification of its refusal, asserts that it was given, and files with his brief a certificate of the clerk to that effect. But we, of course, cannot notice it. The bill of exceptions states that the instruction was refused. We can only look to and act upon that. Cammack v. Lewis, 15 Wall., 643, was a case where, in a policy of insurance to a creditor, on the life of a debtor, the sum insured was so largely disproportionate to the amount of the creditor's claim that the policy was held void, as being a mere wager policy. This would seem to have entitled the defendant to the instruction. According to the views which have been expressed, the first refused instruction was substantially correct, and we think should have been given; as also that the above one given for the plaintiff, should have been refused.

Other questions have been raised and discussed, which, in order to the disposition of the case, it is unnecessary to notice, and we pass them by without considering them. The judgment is reversed and the cause remanded.

We are under obligations to the law firm of HERVEY, ANTHONY & GALT, of this city, for the following opinions:

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

OPINION FILED JUNE 30, 1876.

BARNUM BLAKE v. CHRISTINE BLAKE.

Appeal from Cook.

DIVORCE—APPEAL FROM DECREE ORDERING MONEY TO BE PAID FOR EXPENSES AND ATTORNEY'S FEES.

1. APPEAL.—That an appeal will lie from a decree ordering a husband, in a divorce case, to pay money to the wife for expenses already accrued, and to accrue, and for attorney's fees.
2. FINAL ORDER.—That such a decree is not to be regarded as interlocutory, merely; it is more in the nature of a final decree, and if no appeal lies, it would furnish an instance of a money decree against a party for which no relief can be had.
3. APPEALS.—It is apprehended, says the court, there can be no decree against a party that will work a deprivation of his property or liberty, from which no appeal or writ of error will lie.
4. ATTORNEY'S FEES.—That the attorney's fees allowed in this case were excessive.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.

Opinion by SCOTT, J.—A motion was made in this court to dismiss the appeal in this case, on the ground the decree appealed from is interlocutory and not final. The appeal taken is from a decree of the Circuit Court awarding attorneys' fees, and money to defray the expenses attending the defense of an appeal which defendant had prayed from an order of the Circuit Court committing him to prison as for contempt, for non-compliance with a previous decree for alimony and solicitors' fees in complainant's suit against defendant for divorce.

The question raised is one that has never been passed upon by this court; but upon first impression we are of opinion the appeal will lie. It is a money decree, is for a specific sum, and is payable absolutely. No execution has been as yet awarded, but the court has the undoubted authority to award an execution, or, if payment was willfully and contumaciously refused, the decree might be enforced by attachment as for contempt, or payment might be coerced by sequestration of real or personal estate. Blake v. The People, Sept. T., 1875, (reported 8 CHICAGO LEGAL NEWS, page —.)

By one mode or the other the decree could be enforced, and if defendant has property it could be in some way consistently with the practice in courts of chancery be subjected to its payment. Such a decree does not seem to us to be merely interlocutory. It is more in the nature of a final decree, and if no appeal lies, this case affords an instance of a money decree against a party for which no relief can be had, no matter how unjust or oppressive. This ought not to be.

It is no answer to this position to say defendant can have this decree against him reviewed on appeal or error after a final decree in the original cause. Of what avail would that privilege be to him then? The litigation might be protracted and years elapse before any final decision could be reached. In the meantime he has been imprisoned for disobedience to the decree, or his property under process of law been subjected to the payment of the sum decreed.

Nor does the fact an appeal is allowed impose any hardship not incident to other money decrees from which appeals may be prosecuted.

On the theory alimony is for the immediate benefit of the wife to enable her to prosecute or defend her suit against her husband on terms of equality. The only serious result would be to delay the litigation until the propriety of the decree for temporary alimony and solicitor's fees could be determined in the appellate court. On the contrary if an appeal should be denied it might subject defendant to very great hardships in many cases, as the sequel will show. It is apprehended there can be no decree against a party that will work a deprivation of his property or liberty, from which no appeal or writ of error will lie. Such is the decree against defendant. Under it he may be deprived of his liberty or his property subjected to levy and sale.

Entertaining jurisdiction of the cause, but one other question arises, and that has relation to the amount ordered to be paid, whether it is justified by the facts in the case.

Undoubtedly the court under our statute has power to award attorney fees and other expenses in divorce causes and the matter is largely in the discretion of the court. But this court has always assumed jurisdiction to review the action of the court below in the allowance either as to alimony or solicitor's fees and its right to do so has not been questioned. Blake v. Blake, 70 Ill., 618.

Such allowances must always be reasonable, having in view the wealth and social standing of the parties. What would be suitable alimony for the wife or reasonable counsel fees, is a matter of evidence.

We have examined with care the evidence in this cause, and we cannot avoid the conclusion, the sum allowed for attorney's fees and expenses of the suit is unreasonable and oppressive in the extreme, in view of the services rendered and to be rendered. The record has been incumbered with a vast amount of useless matter, wholly irrelevant to this application, and if counsel choose to perform this valueless labor, he will not be permitted to charge defendant for his services.

The decree will be reversed and the cause remanded.

Decree reversed.

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

OPINION FILED JUNE 30, 1876.

NO. 460.—BARNUM BLAKE v. THE PEOPLE.

Appeal from Cook.

WHEN A PERSON MAY BE IMPRISONED FOR NOT COMPLYING WITH A DECREE TO PAY MONEY.

1. IMPRISONMENT FOR NEGLECT OR REFUSAL TO PERFORM DECREE.—That when the neglect or refusal to perform the decree is not from mere contumacy, but from the want of means, the result of misfortune, not induced by any fraudulent conduct on the part of the defendant, the party will be compelled to adopt some mode other than imprisonment to enforce the decree, consistent with the practice in the courts, either by execution or by other final process, or by sequestration of real or personal estate, or by the exercise of such other powers as pertain to courts of chancery, and which may be necessary to the attainment of justice.

2. DECREES FOR THE PAYMENT OF ALIMONY.—That decrees for the payment of alimony are not different from other decrees for the payment of money; that imprisonment for non-compliance therewith, unless willful, or unless upon a refusal of the defendant, upon proper demand made, to deliver up his estate in satisfaction of the decree, is within the inhibition of the Constitution against imprisonment for debt.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.

Opinion by SCOTT, C. J. Shortly stated, the case made by this record is, that on the eighth day of February, 1875, the court entered an order in the case of Christine Blake v. Barnum Blake, then pending for divorce, that defendant should pay the complainant $75 forthwith, and the sum of $65 on the first day of every month next following during the pendency of the suit, for temporary alimony, also pay the further sum of $150 to her solicitor's within ten days from that date, as a reasonable retainer and counsel fee, and that defendant refund to her the sum of $6, costs advanced, and that in case of default in the payment of such sums of money, or any part thereof, the same should be collected in accordance with the usual practice in courts of chancery in such cases.

An affidavit having been filed showing defendant had not complied with the decree of the court in that particular, and that there was then due, under the decree, the sum of $426, and that another monthly instalment would mature on the next day, thereupon on the first day of June, 1875, on motion of complainant's solicitors, the court entered an order that defendant be arrested and brought into court for a failure to make payments of the several instalments of alimony and solicitor's fees as he had been directed to do by the original decree.

On being brought into court, defendant first entered a motion that he might be discharged from arrest for the reason he was then, and had been, pecuniarily unable to comply with the decree of the court for the payment of the several sums of money specified, and secondly, for a modification of the decree allowing alimony, that the installments to be paid might be so reduced that he could thereafter pay them. Both motions were based upon affidavits in which were given in detail the facts relied upon in support of the motions. Counter affidavits having been presented and considered, the court overruled both motions, and ordered defendant to pay instanter the amount due under the original decree, and in default of such payment he be remanded to the custody of the sheriff, to be safely kept until he should comply with the order, or be otherwise discharged.

Under our statutes there are several modes in which decrees in chancery may be executed or enforced. When there shall be no direction that a master in chancery or commissioner execute a decree, the same may be carried into effect by execution, or other final process, according to the nature of the case, or the court may, if necessary, direct an attachment to be issued against the party disobeying such decree, and may fine or imprison him, or both, in the discretion of the court, and may also direct a sequestration for disobedience to any decree. R. S. 1874, p. 203, sec. 47.

In divorce cases the court is authorized to require the husband to pay the wife such sums of money as may enable her to prosecute or defend the suit, and when it is just and equitable, may allow her alimony pending the litigation, and may enforce the payment in any "manner consistent with the rules and practice of the court." R. S. 1874, p. 421, secs. 15, 18.

It is apprehended that decrees for alimony may be enforced by execution or other final process, as other decrees in chancery, or in any other mode consistent with the practice in the courts of chancery. But as cumulative remedies, no doubt the court may enforce decrees for alimony, either by sequestration of real or personal estate, by attachment against the person by fine or imprisonment, or both, in the discretion of the court," as other decrees in chancery may be enforced.

That courts possess power to commit as for contempt, to compel obedience to decrees for the payment of alimony, has been recognized by this court in a number of cases. Buck v. Buck, 60 Ills., 105; O'Callaghan v. O'Callaghan, 69 Ills., 552; Dinet v. The People, (Sept. T., 1873). In Buck v. Buck, the court committed defendant for disobedience to a decree for alimony and maintenance, and its action was affirmed on appeal.

While this extraordinary power is conceded to rest in the courts, it is nevetheless subject to this limitation imposed by the constitution, that a party may not be imprisoned except in cases where it shall appear he has the pecuniary ability to enable him to comply with the decree, and his disobedience is willful. In O'Callaghan v. O'Callaghan, it was said: "The court is empowered to punish willful obstinacy in such cases by imprisonment, but we think the spirit of our constitution forbids that the pecuniary inability of the party not resulting from his fraudulent conduct to produce that condition, cannot be punished as a contempt by imprisonment."

Where the neglect or the refusal to perform the decree is not from mere contumacy, but from the want of means the result of misfortune, not induced by any fraudulent conduct on the part of defendant, the party will be compelled to adopt some mode other than imprisonment to enforce the decree consistent with the practice in the courts, either by execution or by other final process, or by sequestration of real or personal estate, or by the exercise of such other powers as pertain to courts of chancery, and which may be necessary to the attainment of justice. It is not perceived in what respect decrees for alimony are different from other decrees for the payment of money. Imprisonment for non-compliance therewith, unless willful, or unless upon a refusal of defendant upon proper demands made to deliver up his estate in satisfaction of the decree, is within the inhibition of the constitution against imprisonment for debt.

The case at bar comes within the rule declared. It appears from the affidavit in the record, defendants refusal to comply with the decree of the court was not wilful, but resulted solely from his pecuniary inability, and that, under our former decisions was sufficient to entitle him to be discharged from arrest. Detailed statements of defendant's financial condition were given, from which it appears he had no means and no income from which he could discharge the decree. This condition was not the result of any fraudulent conduct on his part, but was produced by misfortunes in commercial transactions. There is nothing in the record that disproves or even contradicts defendant's account of his financial condition. It must therefore be regarded as a fair and candid exposition of his monetary affairs. Defendant discloses that he has real estate and perhaps personal property, but it is all heavily incumbered. A full exhibit of all his property, real and personal is made, that it may be subjected to the payment of alimony under the decree, in any manner known to the law or consistent with the practice in the court. This is all he can do and having offered to surrender his property, such as he has, he is entitled to be discharged from arrest.

The judgment will be reversed and the cause remanded, with direction to the court to enter an order discharging defendant.

ENGLISH DIVISIONAL COURT FOR APPEALS.

Thursday, June 1.

(Before BRAMWELL, B. and GROVE, J.)

LUMLEY v. THE METROPOLITAN RAILWAY COMPANY.

LEASE—COVENANT NOT TO CARRY ON THE BUSINESS OF A CONFECTIONER—GROCER SELLING SWEETMEATS.

It is no breach of covenant not to carry on the business of a wholesale or retail confectioner for a grocer and teadealer to sell a particular kind of sweetmeats in which a confectioner may happen to deal.

This was a rule to set aside a non-suit by the Judge of the Clerkenwell County Court, and to recover £10, 10*s*., the agreed damages, and the question raised was, whether there had been a breach of the covenant contained in a deed dated the 3rd June, 1868, and made between the Metropolitan Railway Company of the one part, and Robert Lumley of the other part. Mr. Lumley was a wholesale confectioner, and the company took his premises, and contracted with him that he should have certain rights of preemption; these were afterwards given up, in consideration that the company entered into a covenant that no tenant should carry on at the premises mentioned in the deed, the business of a pastry-cook or wholesale or retail confectioner. The company afterwards let the premises on lease to Day, and inserted in his lease a similar covenant to that contained in their deed with Lumley.

Mr. Day carried on the business of a grocer and teadealer, and it appeared he was in the habit of selling a particular kind of sweetmeat to the extent of 28lb or so a week.

The question raised was, whether the sale of the sweetmeat was a breach of covenant hereinbefore referred to.

A rule nisi was granted to set aside the non-suit, against which

Waddy showed cause.—The only question here, is as to what carrying on the business of a confectioner includes. According to Johnson, a confectioner is a man whose trade it is to make confections or sweetmeats. [BRAMWELL, B.—A man sells coals and potatoes, is he therefore a green-grocer?] The real test is, whether or no he substantially carries on the trade of a confectioner.

Arthur Charles supported the rule.—Day is a confectioner quoad this particular sweetmeat. The other side say this covenant should be read as a covenant prohibiting retail confectionery only. The evidence here is, that as much as 28 lb. of this sweetmeat is sold every week. In Doe dem. Gaskell v. Spry (1 B. & Ald. 617), the defendants covenanted in a lease not to carry on certain trades in the premises demised, amongst others, that of a butcher. From the evidence, it appeared that the defendant was a carpenter and joiner, and had taken the house in question to fit up a chandler's shop, in which various provisions were sold. He was also in the habit of selling meat in a raw state to his customers, though the animals were not killed there. Lord Ellenborough, C. J., says: "It is not necessary that a man should carry on every branch of a trade on the premises in order to come within the proviso of the lease. It will be quite sufficient if he partially carries on these; and here he does exercise a material part of it in exposing the meat for sale."

BRAMWELL, B.—Were it not that a rule nisi had been granted, I should have thought this case perfectly clear. Mr. Charles reads this covenant as if it meant the tenant shall neither carry on the business of a confectioner, nor sell articles usually sold by a confectioner. Here the defendant carries on the business of a grocer, and it appears that grocers and confectioners alike deal in the same things; why, then, is this a breach of covenant? It is merely a case of two different tradesmen selling the same article. I think the County Court Judge came to a right conclusion.

GROVE, J.—I am of the same opinion. Had it rested with me whether this rule should have been granted, I certainly should have refused it. The real question is, does the defendant substantially carry on the business of a confectioner? If, under pretense of carrying on a grocer's business, he was really trading as a confectioner, the case would have been altogether different. The case cited is distinguishable; the point there was whether there must be a killing and slaying on the premises in order to make a man a butcher.

Rule discharged.

SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT OF MASSACHUSETTS.

WHITCOMB'S CASE—MARCH 30, 1876.

Habeas Corpus.

AUTHORITY OF CITY COUNCIL TO COMMIT FOR CONTEMPT—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW.

The Massachusetts statute conferring authority upon the presiding officer of the city council to commit for contempt, is unconstitutional.

Petition for habeas corpus. It appeared that Ephraim D. Whitcomb was summoned to testify before a special committee of the Common Council of the city of Boston. He appeared, but refused to answer a question propounded to him, stating that he did not refuse because the answer would criminate him, but did refuse for business reasons. Whitcomb was ordered to be committed for contempt. Ch. 128 of the acts of 1863, under which these proceedings were to be had, provides that "in case any witness summoned and paid to attend and testify before any City Council shall fail to attend in pursuance of such summons, the presiding officer of such City Council, or either branch thereof, may issue a warrant to bring such witness before them to answer for the contempt, and also to testify as a witness in the cause in which he is summoned."

The question in the case was whether this statute was constitutional.

Held, That the Common Council has not the power to commit and punish for contempt without right of appeal or trial by jury. To confer such a power upon municipal boards or officers, which are not courts of justice, and whose proceedings are not an exercise of judicial power, is repugnant to the constitution of the commonwealth, and a violation of the twelfth article of the Declaration of Rights, which declares that no subject shall be arrested, imprisoned, or deprived of his liberty, but by the judgment of his peers, or the law of the land. So much of the Stat. of 1863, c. 158, as undertakes to confer such authority upon the presiding officer of each branch of a City Council, or the chairman of a board of selectmen, was inoperative and void.

Opinion by GRAY, C. J. Prisoner discharged.—Law and Equity Reporter.

SUPREME COURT OF OHIO.

IN THE MATTER OF ALBERT BEALL.

Motion for a writ of habeas corpus from Gallia county.

SIMEON NASH, for Beall.

JOHN LITTLE, attorney-general, for the respondent.

BY THE COURT. The applicant was convicted of assault and battery in the Court of Common Pleas, and was sentenced to imprisonment and the payment of a fine. After serving out his term of imprisonment, he was arrested on a writ of execution, no property being found, and again imprisoned. He now applies for a writ of habeas corpus, on the ground that the provision of the act of April 7, 1863, (S. & S., 610, sec. 2), authorizing such arrest and imprisonment, does not apply to a case like his, where it was no part of the judgment that he should stand imprisoned till the fine and costs should be paid, or if the provision does so apply, then that it is unconstitutional. We think neither of these positions is maintainable. The statute plainly authorizes the proceeding in all cases where a party has been adjudged to pay a fine; and we are aware of no provision of the constitution which it violates.

Motion overruled.

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES.

No. 213.—OCTOBER TERM, 1875.

THE NEW YORK LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY, Plaintiff in Error.
v.
HENRIETTA HENDREN.

In Error to the Supreme Court of Appeals of the State of Virginia.

FEDERAL QUESTION—LAW OF WAR—JURISDICTION.

1. FEDERAL QUESTION.—That the record does not show that any Federal question was decided, or necessarily involved in the judgment rendered by the court below.
2. JURISDICTION.—That the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of the United States, over the decisions of the State courts, is limited.
3. NO JURISDICTION.—That this case having been presented to the court below for decision, upon principles of general law alone, and it nowhere appearing that the Constitution, laws, treatise or executive proclamations of the United States were necessarily involved in the decision, the court has no jurisdiction.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.

Mr. Chief Justice WAITE delivered the opinion of the court.

This record does not show that any federal question was decided or necessarily involved in the judgment rendered by the court below. The pleadings, as well as the instructions asked and refused, present questions of general law alone. The court was asked to decide as to the effect, under the general public law, of a state of sectional civil war upon the contract of life insurance, which was the subject of the action. It was not contended, so far as we can discover, that the general laws of war, as recognized by the law of nations, applicable to this case, were in any respect modified or suspended by the Constitution, laws, treaties, or executive proclamations of the United States. This distinguishes the present case from that of Matthews v. McStea, of which we took jurisdiction, (20 Wall., 640,) and decided at the present term. In that case the question was presented whether the President's proclamation of April 19, 1861, did not suspend, for the time being, the operation of that principle in the law of war which prohibited commercial intercourse in time of war between the adherents of the two contending powers. Here there is nothing of the kind.

Our jurisdiction over the decisions of the State courts is limited. It is not derived from the citizenship of the parties, but the questions involved and decided. It must appear in the record or we cannot proceed. We act upon questions actually presented to the court below, not upon such as might have been presented or brought into the case, but were not.

The case, therefore, having been presented to the court below for decision upon principles of general law alone, and it no where appearing that the Constitution, laws, treaties, or executive proclamations of the United States were necessarily involved in the decision, we have no jurisdiction. We have often so decided. (Bethel v. Demaret, 10 Wall., 537: Delmas v. Insurance Co., 14 Wall., 666; Tarver & Keach, 15 Wall., 67; Rockhold v. Rockhold, decided at the present term.) The motion to dismiss the writ for want of jurisdiction is granted.

Mr. Justice BRADLEY dissenting.

I dissent from the judgment of the court in this case. When a citizen of the United States claims exemption from the ordinary obligations of a contract by reason of the existence of a war between his government and that of the other parties to it, the claim is made under the laws of the United States, by which trade and intercourse with the enemy are forbidden. It is not by virtue of the State law that such intercourse is forbidden, for a separate State cannot wage war. That is the prerogative of the general government. It is in accordance with international law, it is true; but international law has the force of law in our courts because it is adopted and used by the United States. It could have no force but for that, and may be modified as the government sees fit. Of course, the government would not attempt to modify it, in matters affecting other nations, except by treaty stipulations with them. If it did, it would prepare itself to carry out its resolutions by military force. But in many things that prima facie belong to international law, the government will adopt its own regulations; such as the extent to which intercourse shall be prohibited; how far property of enemies shall be confiscated; what shall be deemed contraband, etc. All this only shows that the laws which the citizens of the United States are to obey in regard to intercourse with a nation or people with which they are at war, are laws of the United States. These laws will be the unwritten international law, if nothing be adopted or announced to the contrary; or the express regulations of the government, when it sees fit to make them. But in both cases it is the law of the United States for the time being, whether written or unwritten.

The case, then, of claiming dissolution or extinction of a contract on the ground of the existence of a war, is precisely a case within the meaning of the law which gives a writ of error to this court from the judgment of a State court where a right or immunity is claimed under the Constitution of the United States, or under an authority exercised under the United States. The power given by the Constitution to Congress to declare war, and the authority of the general government in carrying on the same, are the grounds on which the exemption or immunity is claimed. It is under the authority of the government of the United States that the party is not only shielded but prevented from the execution of his contracts. If he performed them it would be a violation of his obligations to his government.

And it is highly expedient that obligations and immunities of this sort, arising from public law and the public relations of the government, should be subject to uniform rules, and to the final adjudication of the judicial department of the general government.

UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT.

No. 205.—OCTOBER TERM, 1875.

ANDREW H. HAMMOND and ARTHUR A. GOODELL, Appellants.
v.
THE MASON AND HAMLIN ORGAN COMPANY.

Appeal from the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Massachusetts.

PATENT—ASSIGNMENT—RIGHT TO USE—RE-ISSUE.

1. Held, That the defendant corporation is entitled to the benefit of the contract between Mason and Hamlin, covered by Exhibit A.; and that this gives them the right to use the attachment under the extension of the original patent, now assigned to the plaintiffs.
2. That, Louis having sold this invention, and doubt existing whether the purchasers would obtain a patent for it, intended by this contract, and by Exhibit D., to secure to them the benefit of the exclusive use of that invention, in connection with his first mechanism, so long as the latter was protected by any patent founded on his right as inventor.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.

Mr. Justice MILLER delivered the opinion of the court.

On the 18th day of November, 1856, a patent issued to Lafayette Louis for an invention which produced a tremolo in the musical notes of melodeons or reed instruments, and which has since become known as the tremolo attachment. Mr. Louis surrendered and obtained reissues of this patent on the 26th day of February, 1867, and again on the 26th day of May, 1868, and after his death, his wife, who was his administratrix, obtained, in July, 1871, what appears to have been both a reissue and a renewal for seven years of the same patent, the whole right in which she assigned to plaintiffs, May 30, 1872.

Whereupon the present suit, which is a bill in chancery, is brought against the defendants, as infringers, for an injunction and for an account of profits, and other relief.

The defendants, not denying the allegation of the use of the invention, interpose a plea, and on this plea the case was heard, and a decree rendered dismissing the bill.

The plea sets up the right to use the invention described in the reissued patent of 1872, in defendants, as shown by five several written instruments, signed by Louis in his life-time, which were made parts of the plea as exhibits A, B, C, D, and E.

The first of these is a contract between said Louis and Henry Mason and Emmons Hamlin, for the use by the latter in their melodeons, of the original invention of Louis, and is dated April 10, 1861. Exhibit B is a copy of an application by Louis for a patent for an improvement in his tremolo attachment, with the accompanying specifications, and is dated September 25, 1868. Exhibits C, D, and E are all dated the same day as this application, and are contracts between said Louis and the Mason & Hamlin Organ Company for the sale of this improvement and its use in connection with the invention already patented in 1856 and reissued in 1867 and 1868.

Exhibit A is a contract by which Louis agrees to furnish to Mason and Hamlin his patent tremolo attachment in such numbers and as they may order them, at one dollar for each attachment, and if he fails to furnish them as ordered, Mason and Hamlin are licensed to make, use and sell the same in connection with all musical instruments manufactured by them, anywhere in the United States. The closing paragraph of this contract declares that "the said parties mutually bind themselves and their legal representatives to the covenants and agreements herein contained, to continue in force until the full expiration of the term for which said letters-patent have been granted, and during such period as the same may be hereafter renewed or extended.

It is not alleged that any of the subsequent contracts abrogated this one. It cannot be denied that this contract extends to the renewal of the patent which was assigned to plaintiffs. The only question on this branch of the plea is whether the Mason and Hamlin Organ Company are entitled to the rights of Mason and Hamlin.

As the case was decided on the sufficiency of the plea, its allegations must be taken as true, and all that can be reasonably inferred from those allegations, and from the various exhibits which it makes, must also be held to be true. The plea does allege that the defendants are "the legal representatives, and successors, and assignees in business and interest of said Mason and Hamlin." This allegation seems to be full and specific, and the only doubt of its sufficiency arises as to whether the legal representatives spoken of in the agreement are or can be others than executors, administrators, or heirs. Whatever doubt might be entertained on this point, we think is solved by the fact that Louis, in the subsequent contracts of 1868, seems throughout to treat with the corporation as successors of Mason and Hamlin in the contract of 1861. For in exhibit E he sells and assigns to the company the exclusive right to use his supposed improvement under the patent of 1856 and all the subsequent reissues, and as this new improvement required the use of the old, he seems here to recognize the right of the company to control the license he had previously granted to Mason and Hamlin.

We are of opinion, therefore, that the defendant corporation is entitled to the benefit of the contract between Mason and Hamlin, covered by exhibit A, and that this gives them the right to use the attachment under the extension of the original patent now assigned to plaintiffs.

It is said that defendants never demanded these attachments, and, therefore, they had no right to make them.

But the allegation is full that Louis at all times refused to manufacture and furnish the attachment to defendants, and we think under the contract this authorized them to make them for themselves

The court below, however, rested its decision on another ground, which we think equally conclusive.

As we have already said, Louis signed these contracts with the defendant company on the same day that he made his application for a patent for his improvement in the tremolo. The supposed improvement consisted in a different construction of the parts already patented by him. By the first contract (Exhibit C) he sold to the defendant this invention wholly, and authorized the patent to issue to the company. By the second (Exhibit D) he licensed them to use this new invention or improvement in connection with his former patents, and in connection with a patent of his of 1862, for an improvement in pianos with melodeon attachments, and the company agreed to pay him a royalty of one dollar each for his new tremolo attachment, at an average of forty attachments per month. The third contract (Exhibit E) provides that if the company fail in securing a patent for the improvement sold to them, referring to his original patent and re-issues, and to his sale of the later invention, and his claim to use it in connection with the old patents, he grants to the defendants the exclusive right, under the letters patent already granted, and under any and all re-issues thereof, to make, use and sell the specific mechanism described and set forth in the application for the new patent.

Without elaborating this matter, we concur in the opinion of the Circuit Court that Louis, having sold this invention, and doubt existing whether the purchasers would obtain a patent for it, intended by this contract and by exhibit D to secure to them the benefit of the exclusive use of that invention, in connection with his first mechanism, so long as the latter was protected by any patent founded on his right as inventor. It was this use for which defendants are sued in this case.

While it is, perhaps, not necessary to decide whether in any case a sale of an invention which is never patented carries with it anything of value, we are of opinion that the rights growing out of an invention may be sold, and that in the present case the sale, with the right to use it in connection with the existing patent and its reissues or renewals, protects defendants from liability as infringers.

The decree of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

U. S. CIRCUIT COURT, DISTRICT OF OREGON.

OPINION FILED JULY 31, 1876.

No. 320.—W. W. PAGE v. JOSEPH W. TRUTCH.

Action to Recover Money.

LIABILITY OF ATTORNEY FOR NOT GIVING A CORRECT CERTIFICATE OF TITLE.

An attorney who is employed by the lender to examine the title of property offered as a security for a contemplated loan by the borrower, is responsible to the lender for the correctness of his opinion, although the expense of the examination is paid by the borrower.

If the attorney certifies that the security is a good one, he thereby warrants that the title shall not only be found good at the end of a contested litigation, but that it is free from any palpable, grave doubt or serious question of its validity.

An attorney who conducts a suit to foreclose a mortgage taken upon his certificate that the title was good, is not entitled to extra compensation because of labor and time consumed in such suit, in contesting the validity of such mortgage, upon a question within the scope of his certificate.

Whatever extra labor or time is bestowed in conducting the suit on account of such question being raised, is bestowed for the benefit of the attorney himself in maintaining his certificate, and he is only entitled to charge his client as for an uncontested case.

DEADY, J.—This action is brought to recover the sum of $1,800 gold coin, with interest from April 20, 1876, for professional services rendered by the plaintiff to the defendant between November, 1874, and said date, in conducting a suit to foreclose a mortgage upon the north half of block 8 in the city of Portland.

The answer of the defendant admits the services, but denies that they are worth more than $500 in coin, and alleges that the plaintiff, in the conduct of said suit, received sundry sums of money from the defendant for which he has failed to account; and also that the loan for which said mortgage was given as security was made upon the certificate of the plaintiff acting as attorney for defendant to the effect that the property was "a good and valid security" for such loan, but that in fact there was a grave question as to the validity of said mortgage, and that the same was "a perilous and doubtful one," whereby the defendant was put to great costs, trouble and delay in collecting his money, and suffered great loss on account of the uncertainty of the title to said property, and the consequent depreciation in its market value.

The reply admits the receipt of $86.50 in currency for the plaintiff on defendant's account, but denies that plaintiff was employed by defendant to examine the validity of the mortgage, and that the security was doubtful or perilous.

In pursuance of the stipulation of the parties, the cause was heard by the court on July 21st, without the intervention of a jury.

From the evidence the facts of the case appear to be as follows:

In December, 1873, Mr. Edwin Russell, then manager of the Bank of British Columbia, in this city, and the agent of the defendant, then and now a resident of Victoria, V. I., loaned to D. D. Bunnell, guardian of the five minor children of Emsley R. Scott, deceased, the sum of $12,000 in gold coin, at one per centum per month interest, and took as security therefore a mortgage executed by said Bunnell, as guardian aforesaid, upon the north half of block 8 in the city of Portland, the same being the property of said minor children. That said Bunnell, before executing said mortgage, procured the order of the County Court of Multnomah county, authorizing him, as guardian aforesaid, so to do; that said Russell, before making said loan and accepting said security, employed the plaintiff to examine the title to said property and the authority of said Bunnell to execute said mortgage, and that said plaintiff, in pursuance of said employment, gave said Russell a certificate to the effect that the title to said property was in said minor children, and said Bunnell was duly authorized to make the loan and execute the mortgage as security therefore; and that said money was borrowed for the purpose of improving said property by building a market house thereon, which was done.

That afterwards, in November, 1874, the interest being in arrears upon said mortgage, the plaintiff was employed by said Russell acting as the agent of the defendant to foreclose the same; that in pursuance of said employment he brought suit in the Circuit Court for the county aforesaid, where there was a decree dismissing the same upon the ground that the mortgage was invalid for want of power in the County Court to license the guardian to mortgage his wards' property; that thereupon said plaintiff took an appeal to the Supreme Court of the State, which court upon consideration of the cause, gave a decree foreclosing said mortgage and directing a sale of the premises for the amount due thereon; and that afterwards in the spring of 1876, the plaintiff caused said property to be offered at sale upon an execution to satisfy said decree, at which sale there being no bidders, the defendant by his agent, Mr. Lloyd Brooke, bid in the same at $15,500, that being substantially the amount then due thereon. That the defendant has only received in satisfaction of the decree in said suit of Trutch v. Bunnell, the property aforesaid, and that assuming the title to be good, it is not now and was not at the time of said sale worth more than $12,000 in gold coin. That it was worth to foreclose said mortgage, provided there had been no material objection to the validity of the same, not more than 5 per centum of the amount recovered, but there being good cause to question the validity of the same for the alleged want of power in the County Court to authorize the guardian to execute the same, and the suit to foreclose being contested by the guardian ad litem on that ground, it was worth not more than $1,000.

That the plaintiff, while acting as attorney for the defendant in said foreclosure suit, received from the clerk of said Circuit Court, out of the moneys paid to said clerk by the defendant as costs and expenses of said suit, the sum of $160 in currency, for which he has not accounted to the defendant.

On the argument, several questions of law and fact were discussed by counsel. The plaintiff insisted that in making the examination of the title of the mortgaged premises he was not acting as the attorney for the defendant, but for Bunnell. But upon the evidence it is clear that the facts and law are to the contrary.

In his own testimony, the plaintiff, while he states that Russell was not to pay him for the examination and that Bunnell was, also admits that Russell would not make the loan except upon his certificate that the title was good and that the County Court had power to authorize the loan, and that he gave him such a certificate; while Mr. Russell testifies explicitly that he employed the plaintiff, who was then attorney for the bank, to make the examination, and that upon his certificate he made the loan, but that it was understood that Bunnell was to pay all the expenses of the examination of the title, as it was the custom for the borrower to do. Add to this the frequent declarations of the plaintiff to the agent of the defendant, when doubts were expressed as to the essuec of the foreclosure suit, that he was responsible for the validity of the mortgage and would pay the defendant himself if he failed to make it out of the mortgaged premises, and there can be no doubt but that he was acting as the attorney of the defendant in making the examination of the title, and is responsible to him accordingly. The fact that the borrower, Bunnell, was to pay the expense of the examination does not affect the question a particle. If the plaintiff agreed to look to him for the compensation for his services, that did not make him any the less the defendant's attorney.

Practically, it is admitted that the compensation claimed by the plaintiff is an extraordinary fee, and his right to recover it is placed upon the ground of the serious character of the litigation involved in the foreclosure suit and the extra time, labor and risk incurred by him in conducting it. In reply to this it is argued for the defendant that as the loan was made by him on the plaintiff's certificate that the security was good, and he being responsible for that opinion, if any serious question arose in the course of the litigation concerning the validity of the mortgage, just so far the correctness of the certificate was impugned or brought in question, and whatever extra labor, time or risk the plaintiff incurred on this account, was in fact incurred for himself, and therefore the defendant ought not to be required to compensate him for it.

The certificate is not to be considered a warranty against every frivolous and speculative question which the dishonesty of the debtor or the ingenuity of counsel may interpose against the enforcement of the security, but I think it ought to be held as a warranty or representation, not only that the mortgage would be found or held to be valid at the end of a protracted and expensive litigation, but that there was no palpable, grave doubt, or serious question concerning its validity.

Ordinarily, when a party loans money upon the certificate of an attorney that the title to the proposed security is good, he does not expect that in the enforcement of such security he may encounter a question which gives the debtor or other persons interested in the property a reasonable ground to contest his claim and put him to the risk and expense of a contested litigation. Upon this branch of the case my conclusion is, that the defendant having taken the security in question upon the opinion of the plaintiff that it was valid, whatever extra labor or risk the latter incurred in enforcing it on account of its alleged invalidity, was incurred in contemplation of law and good morals for himself and not the defendant, and therefore he is only entitled to compensation as for an uncontested suit to foreclose.

In disposing of this question I have not considered it necessary or proper to express an opinion upon the validity of the mortgage. Most of the gentlemen of the bar who were examined as witnesses in the case, expressed the opinion that it was invalid, and leaving out of consideration the effect of the certificate, fixed the compensation of the plaintiff proportionately high—one of them, Judge Strong, even going so far as to say that he ought to have 25 per centum of the value recovered; upon the principle, I suppose, that he considered the debt in such extreme peril that the attorney who recovered it, ought to be considered as a salvor and allowed salvage.

But even supposing the plaintiff had not given the certificate, and that he is entitled to compensation accordingly, he could not recover the fee claimed. Whatever risk there might be in the litigation, there could not be any extraordinary labor or time attending it. There were no witnesses to examine or evidence to sift and marshal. The contest, so far as there was one, turned upon a single narrow question of statute law, upon which the arguments on either side are apparent and limited. The opinion of Mr. Justice Shattuck, before whom the case was heard in the court below, was that $1,000 was a reasonable compensation for the services, and such was the opinion of other leading attorneys at this bar. In a country where the justices of the Supreme Court only get a salary of $3,000 per annum, a fee of $1,000 for conducting a foreclosure suit involving $14,000 and one such question of law and two or three weeks work, at the outside, ought to be considered a liberal compensation. But the conclusion having been reached that the plaintiff is only entitled to recover as for an uncontested suit, it is not necessary to consider the matter in this light any further. Upon this point there is no conflict in the evidence. All the witnesses agree that for an uncontested foreclosure suit, five per centum upon the amount recovered is a reasonable compensation for the services of the attorney. To ascertain what this amounts to, as there was no money collected on the decree, it became necessary to inquire into the value of the mortgaged property bid in by the defendant.

Upon this question the evidence is quite conflicting. It is given upon the assumption that the defendant acquired a good title to the property by the purchase at the sheriff's sale, and so it will be considered. The figures range from $25,000 to $10,000. From all the circumstances of the case, and the relation of the witnesses to the transaction and the subject of real property in this city, I am very certain that the minimum valuation is much nearer the mark than the maximum one. The property consists of 4 lots between Front and First and Jefferson and Madison streets. The improvement upon it is a one-story brick building about 40 feet wide and 200 feet long. It was built for a market house where there appears to be no demand for one. No one offered to bid upon the property at the sale and it only brings in $50 per month rent. I have found the value of it to be $12,000, and my impression is that that sum is rather above than below its real worth. Five per centum upon this sum is $600, which is the amount the plaintiff is entitled to recover, less the amount received by him from the defendant. The evidence upon the latter point is not satisfactory. But it appears from two receipts given by the plaintiff to the clerk of the Circuit Court, that he received from the latter out of the costs and expenses paid by the defendant in the foreclosure suit the sum of $224.50 in currency. But the plaintiff shows by the receipt of the clerk of the Supreme Court that he had advanced $35.50 of this amount and was entitled to receive it back. Besides this, I deduct $29 from these receipts because I am not satisfied but that it was advanced by the plaintiff. This leaves $160 of the amount received by the plaintiff unaccounted for, which must be deducted from the sum due plaintiff for his services. Converting the $600 into currency gives $660, which sum, less the $160, is the amount for which the plaintiff is entitled to judgment—$500.

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT, W. D. WISCONSIN.

OPINION, AUGUST 1, 1876.

In re LAMMER, Bankrupt.

SETTING OFF HOMESTEAD UNDER THE BANKRUPT LAW—OCCUPYING PREMISES FRAUDULENTLY.

In this case, the bankrupt owned a lot upon which was an old house, in which he lived with his family; he built a business block on the front of the lot, and moved the old house back, and repaired it. A short time before filing his petition in bankruptcy, he moved into the business block with his family, and claimed it as his homestead. The court disregarded his claim, and held, That it was intended as a fraud on the rights of creditors, and not a bona fide change.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.

Opinion by HOPKINS, J.

The bankrupt, when he filed his petition to be declared such, was the owner of lot 5, block 118, in the village of Menominee, 44x132 feet in size, upon which was a new brick block just finished and an old house (which had formerly stood on the site of the new block), which had been used as a dwelling house. When the block was built, it was moved on to the back part of the lot, and placed on blocks fronting on a side street, the new block being on the front. It was repaired sometime after it was moved, and the family of the bankrupt moved into it and occupied it as a dwelling house up to a short time before the filing of the petition in bankruptcy.

The new block was finished for business purposes, and not as a dwelling house. There was a saloon and billiard-room in the basement; two stores on the first floor, and a public hall in the second story. The entrance to the basement and hall was on the corner outside. The bankrupt occupied one of the stores for his business as a merchant, and had offered the other store for rent up to the time he moved into it with a part of his family. The new block cost about $9,000, and was mostly paid for out of the store.

The creditors, about the time it was finished, commenced pressing for their pay, and some sued him, and when he filed his petition in this court his personal property was in the custody of the sheriff on execution.

After his creditors commenced suing him, he placed some board partitions in one of the stores, not extending to the ceiling, and moved in there with his wife and child, leaving his father and mother, who lived with him and constituted a part of his family, in the old house. After he moved in he claimed it as his homestead. In about a month after that time he filed his petition to be declared a bankrupt.

The assignee, however, refused to set off the new block as a part of his homestead, but set off the balance of the lot, including the old dwelling house and all of the lot except 44x56 feet on the front end. The bankrupt, feeling himself aggrieved by the action of the assignee, now moves the court to set aside the assignee's report, and for an order that he set off the whole lot as exempt on the ground that it is his homestead.

The statute of this State exempts not to exceed one-quarter of an acre of land in a village or city and "the dwelling house thereon," owned and occupied by the debtor as a homestead. In order to constitute a homestead under the statute, it will be seen that it must be the dwelling house of the debtor, not a store, saloon or shop, so it becomes necessary to first determine whether this block can be considered a "dwelling house" within the meaning of the statute. This is a question of fact to be ascertained from the evidence.

It is conceded, that it was not built for, or intended as, a dwelling house, which is apparent by the construction of the building itself. It has none of the conveniences or comforts of such a house, and the bankrupt himself testified that he intended to build his dwelling house on some other lots in another part of the village which he had commenced to improve with that view. So I must find that it was not built or intended for a dwelling house, and was not suitable in its then condition for such use, and was not in any reasonable sense a dwelling house, unless a debtor arbitrarily has the right to call anything he pleases a dwelling house, and, by moving into such building, estop a court from all further enquiry into its character.

This is, substantially, the bankrupt's claim in this case. If occupation is alone to determine the question, then a grist mill, or cotton or woolen factory, or saloon, or church, may be a dwelling house and exempt as a homestead, for a party could move his family into either and live there as the bankrupt did in this store.

But I do not think the statute will allow of such a construction. It uses the word "dwelling house" in its common and ordinary sense, and to distinguish it from other kinds of buildings. Those words are used as a limitation upon the right of the debtor and restrict his claim to that character of building.

I do not mean by this to go so far as to hold that it must be exclusively used for that purpose, but in some reasonable sense it should be susceptible of being a dwelling house.

A building may be constructed for a store and dwelling house, saloon and dwelling house, but its construction should in some manner and to some extent manifest its character of dwelling house so as to give some appearance of good faith, in calling or claiming it as such.

If this is the true meaning and construction of the statute, could this party after he had built this block for business purposes with no appearance or claim that it was to be used as his dwelling, on the eve of bankruptcy move into it, and thereby change its character, and thus withdraw from the reach of his creditors that amount of his property? If he can, he had within his power the right to commit a great fraud upon his creditors, and if the law upholds such a transaction, it may be said to sanction what honesty would denounce as a great moral wrong.

But I do not believe the act admits of such a construction.

This block was built mostly by goods out of the store—his creditors' property—and does any one believe that if he had told his creditors that it was to be claimed as his homestead, they would have stood by and seen him put the property to such a use? Most certainly not. He was not worth anything, he had no means to put into a homestead, he was owing more than he could pay, and having built the block under such representations to his creditors, he should be estopped from interposing a homestead claim to it just as soon as he had finished it.

They rested easy when he was building a business block with their means, for that was not placing the avails beyond their reach. Their remedy was not at all impaired by that change. But to allow him by a simple act of his will to withdraw all that property by moving his family into it and claiming it as his homestead, is too unconscionable to be sanctioned if within the power of courts to prevent it.

In this case he says this building cost him $9,000, a larger sum by a good deal than the value of his other property liable to the payment of his debts. The assignee, acting upon what he supposed the better construction of the act, refused to set off the block as a dwelling house or as a part of the homestead exemption.

The bankrupt claims that the old wooden dwelling house is in bad condition, and is located amid unpleasant surroundings. The evidence shows this complaint is not wholly groundless, but he did use it as a dwelling house as long as he meant to pay his debts, it would seem, and did not discover its defects until he conceived the idea of not paying his creditors. Then he seemed to discover that it was too poor to live in. This discovery was coeval with his intention to defraud his creditors. In his insolvency he became ambitious for a better dwelling house than when he deemed himself able to pay his debts, and hence moved into this block. It was conceded on the argument that he moved in under advice of counsel to be able to hold it as his homestead. But the wooden building was a dwelling house and the block was not, and the occupancy being commenced under such circumstances and such motives, cannot be held to accomplish the purpose designed. The fraud of the party vitiated its effect and rendered the act nugatory.

Indeed, I cannot believe from the evidence that the occupancy for residence of his family was intended to be permanent. It was a mere experiment to frighten his creditors—not bona fide, so that all the claims based upon the pretended occupancy fail for want of reality and good faith.

All such devices are plain violations of the true spirit and meaning of the homestead law. It was intended to secure a "home" for the family, and therefore exempted the "dwelling house." It was not intended as a refuge for dishonest debtors to retire to, when overtaken by bankruptcy, and thereby keep their property away from their creditors.

In view of the frequent complaints that I hear against the law, I will venture to suggest that they all have their origin in the omission to prescribe a limit upon the value of the homestead to be exempted.

Bankrupts too often occupy the most elegant and costly residences under claim of homestead. Those of weak moral perceptions very frequently are distinguished in that direction, and do not seem either to be disturbed by the fact that they are built out of the property of their creditors. Such fraudulent use of their creditors' money often provokes severe comments upon our homestead law.

The Supreme Court of the State has often given expression to sound views on the subject, and in Casselman v. Packard, 16 Wis., 119, they decided that all the buildings on the quantity of land that might be exempted, were not exempt. That only the "dwelling house" was exempt, and stores and shops or other buildings on such land were not.

The assignee recognizing this as the law, set off only the dwelling house. He held that the block was not a dwelling house, in which opinion I fully concur.

The bankrupt's counsel argued that the room in the block occupied by the bankrupt could be set off, if not the whole block. That the court could divide the building horizontally and perpendicularly and give him that part, and cited Phelps v. Rooney, 9 Wis., 70, on that point. Something of that kind is said by the Chief Justice in his dissenting opinion, but the idea was too chimerical to find favor with that court, and until it is sanctioned by the State Courts I shall not attempt its adoption here.

I place my decision on the broader ground that this new block was not a "dwelling house" in fact, and the pretended occupancy of it, as such, was not in good faith, or intended to be, nor was it intended to be permanent, and therefore no change in the real character of the building was effected by that attempt at occupation by the bankrupt.

This doctrine is not new in the Federal Courts in this State. In re Wright, 3 Bisbell, 359, the bankrupt, a few days before going into bankruptcy, sold his dwelling house and moved into his store and claimed that as a homestead, but the court disallowed the claim and held that it was intended as a fraud on the creditors, not a bona fide change. Such, I think, is the case here, and therefore deny the motion to set aside the report of the assignee.

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

OPINION FILED JUNE 30, 1876.

M. A. BRUCE v. MARY J. DOOLITTLE et al.

Appeal from Scott.

CITATION AGAINST GUARDIAN—WHEN ACTION ON BOND BARRED BY STATUTE OF LIMITATION—ACCOUNTING—JUDGMENT IN VACATION.

1. That when an action on a guardian's bond is barred by the statute of limitations, it does not prevent the County Court from citing such guardian to account.
2. That when there is an error in the previous accounting of a guardian, it may be re-stated, and the guardian charged with the omitted item.
3. That it was error for the county court to enter the judgment in vacation.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.

Opinion of the court by Mr. Justice DICKEY.

This was a proceeding instituted in the County Court to compel Manning A. Bruce, who had been appointed guardian in 1848 of Maria J., Elvira L. and James W. Campbell, to render an account and make final report of his guardianship. The guardian, who was appellant here, was brought in by citation issued and served under the statute enacted for that purpose.

In the County Court an order was entered requiring appellant to account, as guardian, for certain moneys in his hands belonging to his wards, from which he appealed to the Circuit Court, where a trial was had before the court, and the court found from the evidence that appellant had in his hands $3 735.09 belonging to his wards.

The court thereupon entered an order requiring appellant to pay over to Maria J. Doolittle $1,395.04, to Elvira L. Cackley $1,395.04, and to the heirs of James W. Campbell $945.00. To reverse the order of the Circuit Court this appeal has been taken.

It is first urged that an action is barred upon the guardian's bond by the statute of limitations, and appellant could not therefore be required to render an account on citation issued by the County Court.

So far as appears from the record, the statute of limitations was not set up or relied upon by appellant in the County Court, where the proceedings were commenced, or in the Circuit Court, where the order appealed from was entered. But even if the statute had been set up, it would be no bar to this proceeding by citation, to require a guardian to account, for it is not an action either at law or equity, within the meaning of the statute, in bar of which the statute of limitations can be pleaded. Gilbert v. Guplice, 34 Ill., 112. The main object of the proceeding is to determine the amount of money in the hands of the guardian, due the wards, and require an account. The statute confers express power on county courts to compel guardians to render their accounts upon oath touching their guardianship, and also authority to require guardians to give additional security when necessary, and in default thereof, power of removal. At the time the citation was issued in 1872, the bond executed by the guardian and his sureties, was in force. The guardian had rendered no final report of his doings as such, and the County Court not only had the power to require an account, but it was a duty resting upon it to take action in the matter. It appears from the record that the appellant rendered an account to the County Court in 1851, which showed a balance in his hands belonging to his wards, and although efforts were made by the County Court after that time to compel a further account and settlement by citation, they proved unavailing, and appellant was not brought before the court until 1872. It is claimed by appellant that the account rendered in 1851 is final, between the guardian and his wards, and that the Circuit Court in stating the account, could not go behind that account, or in any manner reopen it for further adjudication.

While the approval of the guardian's account by the court, in 1851, was a judicial act, yet, if the guardian had secured money which he had failed to account for, or charged himself with too small an amount, no reason is perceived why the wards may not require the account to be correctly stated, and the guardian properly charged. Bird v. Lockwood, 35 Ill., 215. Prior to the rendition of the account in 1851, the guardian had sold real estate belonging to the wards, under a decree of the Circuit Court, for the purpose of raising money for their education and support. In 1850, he filed a report of the sale to the court, from which it appears the land sold for $2,200. Notwithstanding this fact, a short time afterwards he rendered an account in the probate court in which he charged himself with $2,002, as the amount for which the real estate sold. But not satisfied with this fraudulent concealment of money that belonged to his wards, he also reported that $667.33⅓ of the proceeds of the sale of real estate belonged to his wife during her lifetime as widow of the father of the wards. This, too, was done when the records of the Circuit Court showed that the widow's dower had been assigned in the lands previous to the time he had made sale of the ward's interest. The effect of this would be to deprive the wards, whose interest he had sworn to protect, of the interest which would accrue from year to year on a large portion of the estate, and placed it in his own pocket.

The Circuit Court however did not reopen the account which had been approved, but merely on the evidence required the guardian to charge himself with that portion of the proceeds of the sale of the lands which he had fraudulently concealed from the Probate Court in his report, and also required him to account for interest on $667.33⅓, which he had attempted, in defiance of his duty and requirement of law, to appropriate to his wife.

There was one other item—the rent of the farm from 1846 to 1848. The guardian had charged himself with but one hundred dollars, while the proof showed the rent to be worth a much larger sum. The court, from the evidence, required the guardian to account for $160 rent he had never accounted for or charged to himself. The account of the guardian rendered in 1851, which was the last report made, was not disturbed, but left in full force, but in addition to the account then rendered, a guardian was required to charge himself with the items alluded to, which he had received as guardian and had never accounted for. We are satisfied from the evidence the court was fully justified in the conclusion reached; indeed, from the evidence, the court would have been warranted in requiring the guardian to account for a much larger sum. James G. Campbell, the father of these wards, died seized of a good farm and quite a large amount of property. The appellant married his widow and became guardian of his children. Under his management the property has been squandered and the children have secured little or no education, and while the law required the appellant, as guardian, to render an account to the Probate Court each year, and when the wards came of age, pay over to them the amount in his hands, this duty was ignored, no report made after 1851, and the money belonging to the wards has been squandered or used by the appellant in his own business. This conduct of the guardian has no sanction in the law, and had the Probate Court properly discharged its duty, he would have been removed years ago for disregard of duty and his securities sued on his official bond.

It is, however, claimed by appellant that he has settled with the wards and nothing was due them at the time the court made the order. It appears from the evidence that in 1853, Maria J. Campbell was married to Mr. Doolittle. No formal settlement was made with her. She resided with appellant some years after she was of age and received her board and clothes. But it is fair inference from the evidence, that her labor was worth all she received. James W. Campbell died in 1861. Prior to this, appellant claims to have settled with him. But all he secured was a horse-bridle and saddle, valued at $2.00, and the settlement was based upon the erroneous report of 1851. The court allowed appellant what he had paid to this ward and charged him with the balance due, which under the evidence was proper. Elvira L. Campbell married Cackley in 1863. In 1871, appellant obtained a receipt of her. But the evidence shows that the receipt was obtained on the representation that there was but $60 going to her, and that was on a settlement appellant was then making in answer to a citation in Mason county. If it turned out any further sum was due, the receipt should not stand in the way. Under the circumstances the receipt given by Mrs. Cackley cannot be regarded as conclusive upon her. Upon a careful examination of the evidence, we are satisfied that the facts found by the court were fully authorized by the testimony, and that the order entered was proper. But after the court had heard the evidence, the court adjourned for the term and the judgment of the court was entered in vacation. Appellant was not present nor did he consent. The rendition of the judgment in vacation was error for which the judgment must be reversed and the cause remanded. The court is however directed to enter the judgment when court again convenes.

Reversed and remanded.

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

OPINION FILED JUNE 30, 1876.

ANDREW WARREN v. JAMES E. TAYLOR et al.

Appeal from Superior Court.

RESCINDING CONTRACT—FALSE REPRESENTATIONS—INTEREST ON RESCISSION.

1. Where a party is induced to enter into a contract by false representations, the court discuss the question as to the length of time within which the party must rescind the contract and bring his action for damages, after discovering such representations to be false.
2. INTEREST. The court states from what time in such action, and the rate per cent. of interest may be recovered.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.

Opinion by WALKER, J.

The principal question presented in this case is one of fact, exceptions having been taken on the rulings of the court to only two or three legal propositions.

But it is urged, that the court below should have granted a new trial because the finding of the jury was manifestly against the weight of evidence. When examined, it is found, that if all of the evidence were taken alone, on either side, it would be amply sufficient to sustain a verdict for that side. Withdraw all of appellant's evidence, and no one would question the correctness of the finding. Or, on the other hand, if all of appellee's evidence was struck out, then the defence would be established beyond question. But the evidence is highly conflicting, and portions of it is irreconcilable. And it was for the jury, under proper instructions, to find and determine what was proved under the issues of fact in the case. Such instructions were given, and the jury found in favor of the plaintiff, and we are not prepared to say that it is decidedly and clearly against the preponderance of the evidence. In the conflict, it was for the jury to find the facts, and unless the evidence failed to warrant the verdict, the court could not rightfully set it aside. We are therefore of the opinion that the court below did not err in refusing to grant a new trial. It is urged that the finding of the jury is excessive. That, according to the evidence of Sheldon, the Wisconsin lands were worth, at the lowest estimate, from $3,500 to $5,000, and that appellees had no right to recover more than the difference between that sum and the amount of the debt.

The answer to this is, that if the contract to take the lands on the debt was procured by false representations, known to have been such by appellant, and they were relied upon by appellees, and they were thereby induced to enter into the agreement, it was void, and appellees, on discovering the fraud, had the right to repudiate it, and sue for and recover the debt. The jury, on the evidence and under proper instructions, have found that appellees were so induced to enter into the contract, and we are not disposed to disturb the finding. Had the contract been fairly entered into by the parties, and the only fraud had consisted in fraudulent representations by appellant, when the price was fixed on the lands by Sheldon, then a different question would have arisen, which is unim portant now to determine.

It is said that the delay of eighteen months after the fraud was discovered, was too great before bringing suit, to be permitted to recover. And the case of Cox v. Montgomery, 36 Ill., 396, is referred to in support of the proposition. That case, in limiting the period within which the party defrauded must bring suit, is perhaps one of the most extreme cases. But there the party had full knowledge of the fraud, and all of the facts constituting it for the period of eighteen months before suit brought. Here, on the other hands, appellees only had their suspicions aroused, and commenced their investigations that length of time before this action was commenced.

Appellant's property was scattered, and the record of titles in Cook county had been destroyed by fire, and we may reasonably suppose that some considerable time expired before they could learn all of the facts necessary to establish their case, and to hold appellees precluded from rescinding the sale would be to materially shorten the period laid down in Cox's case, which we are not inclined to do.

It is next urged that the verdict was excessive, inasmuch as it allowed appellees seven per cent. interest on the account from the time it was stated until the finding of the verdict. On the statement of an account and the ascertainment of the balance due, the present statute only allows six per cent. interest. But the statute then in force authorized the parties by written or verbal agreement to stipulate for any rate of interest not exceeding ten per cent. per annum. Pub. Law, 1857, sec. 2, 45.

Tyler in his testimony states that his firm had been charging appellants seven per cent. in their dealings with him, and he had been paying it. This, in the absence of proof to the contrary, was evidence from which an agreement to pay that rate might be inferred, but had it been rebutted by evidence that no such agreement had in fact been made, then the presumption would have been rebutted, as we apprehend that a rate higher than that fixed by the statute could only be collected when there was an express stipulation or agreement therefor.

There was no evidence in this case rebutting the presumption, and there was no error in its allowance. It is also urged that interest could only be allowed from the time of the rescission of the contract, and the case of Harding v. Larkin, 41 Ill., 414, is cited in support of the proposition. That was an action of covenant for the breach of warranty of title. That grew out of a valid and binding contract. But here, the contract was fraudulent and void, and the rescission of the contract and tender of a re-conveyance of the lands, placed the parties in their former position, as though the conveyances had never been made. Hence, there is no presumption of rents and profits received by appellees; and the proof shows that the lands were vacant and unoccupied. Had the evidence shown that appellees had received rents and profits, whatever amount they had received, could have been set off or recouped against the recovery. But the record is barren of any such evidence, and interest was properly allowed from the date of the settlement, and the striking of the balance. After a careful examination of the entire record, we perceive no error for which the judgment should be reversed, although we should have been quite as well, if not better satisfied, had the jury found the other way, and the judgment of the court below must be affirmed.

OPINION, JULY, 1876.

MILLER BROTHERS v. THE PROCEEDS OF THE KATE HINCHMAN, and GILBERT HUBBARD et al. v. THE SAME.

Appeal in Admiralty from the District Court.

LIENS AGAINST VESSEL — SUPPLIES FURNISHED IN HOME PORT — MORTGAGE — STATE LAWS — THE 12TH RULE.

That the mortgage, in this case, is to be paid in preference to the supplies and materials furnished in the home port.

12TH RULE.—That, as the twelfth rule now stands, and is construed by the Supreme Court, a claim for materials, supplies, repairs or other necessaries, where a lien exists by the law of a State, though not by the maritime law, may be enforced in the admiralty, in a proper case of admiralty jurisdiction; but it by no means follows that because the law of the State gives a lien, it is superior to that of a mortgage; that, as between the different liens existing in this case, that of the mortgage is paramount.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.

DRUMMOND, J.—The original libel in this case, under which the schooner was sold, was filed by Seamen, and the sale took place December 16, 1874. On that day these parties filed intervening claims for a portion of the proceeds of the vessel arising from the sale. These cases have been submitted to the court under a stipulation of the following facts:

A mortgage was executed upon the schooner, dated March 1, 1871, which was duly recorded in the office of the collector, at Chicago. The claim of Miller Bros. was for labor and materials furnished the vessel from January 1st, 1873, to December, 1874. Gilbert, Hubbard & Co.'s claim is for supplies furnished, partly prior to 1871, and also during that year and up to October, 1874. Chicago was the home port of the vessel, and the supplies and materials were there furnished at the request of the master and owners. The parties had a lien upon the schooner under the laws of the State of Illinois. There is not a sufficient fund in court, arising from the sale, to pay the mortgage, as well as Miller Bros., and Gilbert, Hubbard & Co., and the question is, whether the mortgage is to be paid in preference to the supplies and materials furnished in the home port.

I am of opinion it is, and that it constitutes a prior lien upon the vessel and should be first paid out of the proceeds. It may be admitted that if these supplies and materials constituted a maritime lien upon the vessel, that this priority would not exist, but the case of the Lottawana, 21st Wallace, 558, decides that these claims did not constitute a maritime lien, and although that case was decided under a strong dissent, still, whatever may be our personal views, we must assume it to be the law in the Federal courts upon the subject; thus reaffirming the rule laid down by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of the Gen. Smith, 4 Wheaton, 443.

In the case of the Lottawana, the Supreme Court held that the claims which were made under the State law of Louisiana were not valid because that law had not been complied with, and there was no obstacle arising in that way to prevent the payment of the mortgage which was there set up. In this case it is admitted that there was a valid lien for supplies and materials furnished to the schooner, under the law of this State, and we are therefore met directly by the question whether the mortgage supersedes the State lien. The law of the State required that in order to make the lien available as against other creditors or subsequent encumbrances, or bona fide purchasers, proceedings must be instituted within nine months after the indebtedness accrued. This would exclude a large portion of the claims of the libellants.

The 27th section of the act of 1850, (contained in section 4,192 of the Revised Statutes of the U. S.,) required, in order that mortgages on vessels should be valid as against certain persons, that they should be recorded in the office of the collector of customs, where the vessel was registered or enrolled. That section provided that the lien by bottomry on any vessel created during her voyage, by a loan of money or materials necessary to repair or enable her to prosecute the voyage, should not lose its priority or be in any way effected by the mortgage. This undoubtedly means a maritime lien, and not a lien created solely by a law of one of the States. It was intended that in all such cases as are referred to in the proviso, the vessel should be bound independent of the mortgage, but as the lien in this case was not a maritime lien, it is not within the terms of the proviso.

As the twelfth rule in admiralty now stands, and as construed by the Supreme Court, a claim for materials, supplies, repairs, or other necessaries, where a lien exists by the law of a State, though not by the maritime law, may be enforced in the admiralty, in a proper case of admiralty jurisdiction, but it by no means follows that because the law of the State gives a lien, it is superior to that of a mortgage. The case of Aldrich v. Ætna Co., 8 Wall., 491, is a strong illustration of this principle. There it was sought to make an attachment against the vessel, issued and served subsequent to the recording of the mortgage, supersede it, because the law of the State, as to the mortgage, had not been complied with, which the Supreme Court decided could not be done. White's Bank v. Smith, 7 Wall., 646; The Belfast, 7 Wall., 624.

In the case of the Emily Souder, 17 Wall., 666, the supplies and advances were made in a foreign port and constituted a maritime lien, and were properly held to be paramount to the claims of the mortgagees, and, indeed, were within the terms of the proviso of the act of Congress as to the recording of mortgages on vessels.

The Supreme Court of this State, in construing the law of the State in relation to the lien of boats and vessels in the case of the Barque Great West, No. 2, v. Obenndorf, 57 Ill., 168, and in the case of the Propeller Hilton v. Miller, 62 Ill., 231, held that the lien created by the statute for supplies or materials furnished was subordinate to that of a mortgage given and recorded under the act of Congress; and it is held in the case of the Grace Greenwood, 2 Bissell, 131, that a mortgage properly recorded under the act of Congress, took precedence of the lien under the State law for supplies and materials furnished subsequent to the mortgage.

To the principles announced in that case, and which I believe has been followed in this circuit since, I still adhere. It seems to me, as between these different liens existing in this case, that of the mortgage is paramount. The Sky Lark, 2 Bissell, 251; The Lady Franklin, 2 Bissell, 121. The legislation of Congress was upon a subject confessedly within its legitimate authority, and it must therefore override all State legislation upon the subject, even if any existed. As the decision of the District Court was in accordance with the views here stated, the decree is affirmed.

We are under obligations to the law firm of MOORE & WARNER, of Clinton, for the following opinion:

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

OPINION FILED JUNE 30, 1876.

LOUIS FREDENSTEIN v. CALVIN D. MCNIER et al.

Appeal from Dewitt.

LIABILITY OF CONSTABLE AND HIS SURETIES FOR NOT LEVYING AN EXECUTION — SICKNESS NO EXCUSE.

1. WHAT STATUTE GOVERNS.—That, in determining the liability of a constable and his sureties for the official acts of the constable, the bond and the statute in force at the time, must be regarded as the contract between the defendants and the public.

2. SICKNESS NO EXCUSE.—That the sickness of a constable is no defense to an action brought on his official bond, for failing to levy an execution; that illness cannot excuse the non-performance of an official act enjoined.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.

CRAIG, J. This action was brought by Louis Fredenstein, before a justice of the peace against Calvin D. McNier, as constable, and S. P. Waldo and D. M. Gavender, his sureties, on the official bond of the constable.

The condition of the bond read in evidence, declared that the principal and his sureties jointly and severally agree to pay to such and every person who may be entitled thereto, all such sums of money as the said constable may become liable to pay on account of any executions which shall be delivered to him for correction, by virtue of his office, and all such damages as each and every person may sustain by reason of any malfeasance, misfeasance or non-performance of duty on the part of said constable.

It has been provided by statute, if a constable shall fail or neglect to return an execution written ten days after return day, or if the demand, debt or claim be wholly or in part lost, or if any special damage shall arise to any party on account of the neglect to act, or the misfeasance or non-feasance of any constable in the discharge of any official duty, the party aggrieved may have his action against such constable, and his sureties on the official bond, and shall recover thereon the amount of the execution and costs with interest from the date of the judgment upon which the execution issued.

In determining the liability of the constable and his sureties for the official acts of the constable, the bond and the statute in force at the time must be regarded as the contract between the defendants and the public. It appears from the evidence that in July, 1872, appellant recovered a judgment before a justice of the peace of DeWitt county against Isaac J. Shinnaman; on the third day of August thereafter an execution was issued on the judgment and delivered to the constable McNier. Shinnaman at the time lived a short distance across the line in Piatt county, but the constable was notified that on the 23d day of August, the defendant in the execution would have property at a Mr. Brown's, in DeWitt county, subject to be levied upon, and he was requested to make the levy.

When the time arrived that the constable was notified the defendant in execution would have property in the county subject to the execution, he came into the county with a threshing machine and three span of horses and remained there from three to four days. The constable however, although he resided only a short distance from the place where the property was, made no attempt whatever to levy upon it. The execution was returned, no property found, and the defendant in the execution has since died and his estate is insolvent. The only excuse offered by the constable for his failure to discharge his duty and make a levy as required by law, was, that at the time the property was in his county, he was sick with chills and fever, and in consequence thereof, made no effort to levy upon the property. The appellant on the trial objected to the introduction of all evidence tending to prove sickness of the constable as a defense to the action, but the objection was overruled and the evidence admitted. At the request of appellees the court gave this instruction to the jury:

2nd. The court instructs the jury for the defendant, that if they believe from the evidence, that an execution came into the hands of McNier, as constable, in the case of Frebenstein v. Shoenamann for $54.50 and costs, dated August 3rd, 1872, and that McNier was notified by the justice that Shoenamann would have property in the county on the 23rd and 24th days of August, 1872, following, and if they further believe from the evidence that on the 23rd and 24th days of August, 1872, when the property of Shoenamann was in the county, that the constable McNier, was confined to his bed from sickness, at the time the property was in the county, in such manner that he was incapable of attending to his official duties, then they will find for the defendant, but if after the defendant recovered, if he recovered so that he could perform his official duty, and the property still remained in the county of DeWitt, the defendant failed to make all reasonable efforts in his power to find such property and make the levy, the defendant would be liable.

The court refused to instruct the jury in behalf of appellant that the sickness of the officer could not be relied upon as a defense to the action.

We call attention to the following opinions, reported at length in this issue.

FEDERAL QUESTION — JURISDICTION. — The opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States by WAITE, C. J., stating what will be regarded as a Federal question so as to give the Supreme Court of the United States jurisdiction to review the judgment of a State court.

PATENT CASE.— The opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States by MILLER, J., in a patent case.

ATTORNEY — LIABILITY OF TO LENDER WHEN PAID BY BORROWER.—The opinion of the United States Circuit Court for the district of Oregon by DEADY, J., holding that an attorney who is employed by the lender to examine the title of property offered as a security for a contemplated loan by the borrower, is responsible to the lender for the correctness of his opinion, although the expense of the examination is paid by the borrower; that if the attorney certifies that the security is a good one, he thereby warrants that the title shall not only be found good at the end of a contested litigation, but that it is free from any palpable grave doubts or serious question as to its validity; that an attorney who conducts a suit to foreclose a mortgage taken upon his certificate that the title was good, is not entitled to extra compensation because of labor and time consumed in such suit in contesting the validity of such mortgage upon a question within the scope of his certificate.

This opinion will be of general interest to attorneys throughout the United States. The learned judge is of the opinion that the legal profession should be held to the same liability as the members of other professions.

BANKRUPTCY—HOMESTEAD.—The opinion of the United States District Court for the western district of Wisconsin, by HOPKINS, J., refusing to allow the claim of a bankrupt to have his homestead set off to him in a business block in which he and his family were residing, on the ground that his occupancy of it was a fraud upon the rights of creditors, and was not intended to be in good faith.

GUARDIAN'S ACCOUNT—CITATION—STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS—JUDGMENT IN VACATION.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of this State, by DICKEY, J., holding that a guardian may be cited to account by the County Court, even after an action upon his bond is barred by the statute of limitations; that judgment in the case should not have been entered by the County Court in vacation.

FALSE REPRESENTATIONS.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of this State, by WALKER, J., as to within what time a party, who has been induced to enter into a contract by false representations, must rescind the contract and bring his action, after discovering such representations to be false.

LIENS IN ADMIRALTY— SUPPLIES FURNISHED IN HOME PORT.—The opinion of the United States Circuit Court for the northern district of Illinois, by DRUMMOND, J., holding that in the case before the court, the mortgage is to be paid in preference to the supplies and materials furnished in the home port. That as the 12th rule now stands, and as construed by the Supreme Court, a claim for materials, supplies, repairs, or other necessaries, where a lien exists by the law of a State, though not by the maritime law, may be enforced in the admiralty, in a proper case of admiralty jurisdiction, but it by no means follows, that because the law of the State gives a lien, it is superior to that of a mortgage. The court refers to its former decisions upon this question, and still adheres to them.

SICKNESS NO EXCUSE FOR NOT LEVYING AN EXECUTION.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of Illinois, by CRAIG, J., holding that sickness is no defense to an action brought on the official bond of a constable, for failing to levy an execution; that sickness cannot excuse the non-performance of an official act enjoined by statute. Judge DICKEY concurs in the judgment, but is of the opinion that the rule, that illness cannot excuse the performance of an official act enjoined, is laid down too broadly in the opinion, and needs qualification. SCOTT, C. J., concurs with DICKEY, J. The question upon which the judges failed to agree in this case, is one of the greatest importance to sheriffs and constables.

NOTES TO RECENT CASES.

CONSTRUCTIVE TRUST—LACHES.

The Supreme Court of Penn. in Evans' et al. Appeal, 33 Leg. Intel., 280, held that where a party claims to hold another as trustee under a constructive trust, he must assert his claim with diligence, and that even less than six years will bar him on account of his laches.

MECHANICS' LIEN—MARRIED WOMAN.

The Supreme Court of Pa. in Schreiffer v. Saum et al., 33 Leg. Intel., 280, held that a mechanics' lien to bind a married woman's separate estate must be filed against her and her husband, and indicate that the person joined with her is her husband, and that the work and material were done and furnished for and about the improvement of her separate estate.

ACT OF GOD—CARRIER BY WATER—ACCIDENT CAUSED PARTLY BY STORM, PARTLY BY TERROR OF ANIMAL.

The English Court of Appeal in Nugent v. Smith, 34 L. T. Rep. N. S., held that a loss occasioned by the act of God is a loss arising from and occasioned by the agency of Nature which cannot be guarded against by the ordinary exertions of human skill and prudence so as to prevent its effect. The plaintiff delivered to the defendant in London, a mare to be carried by the defendant by steamer from London to Aberdeen, between which places the defendant run steamers as a common carrier. A storm arising during the voyage, the mare was so injured that she died. The jury found that the injury was caused partly by excessive bad weather, and partly by the struggling of the mare, and they negatived all negligence on the part of the defendant. The court held, reversing the judgment of the Common Pleas, that upon these findings of the jury, the defendant was not liable. COCKBURNE, C. J. said there is no authority for the proposition, nor is there any trace of a special custom of the Realm, i. e., common law, that all carriers by sea are subject to the liability of a common carrier, whether by sea or land.

SLANDER — PRIVILEGE — STATEMENT BY WITNESS.

The English High Court of Justice, Common Pleas Division, in Seaman v. Nethercliff, 34 L. T. Rep., N. S., 878, held, that no action lies for defamatory words, spoken by a witness in a judicial proceeding, even if spoken for the witness' own purpose, and maliciously. The defendant, an expert in handwriting, was in cross-examination at a police court, whether he had heard of some severe comments made on his evidence, by the Judge, in a recent case, in which he had given evidence against the genuineness of a will. He said he had, and desired to make a further statement. The magistrate refused to hear him, but he persisted, and said he believed the will to be forged. An attesting witness to the will, brought an action for slander, and the jury found that the words were not spoken in good faith as a witness, but as a volunteer for defendant's own purposes, and maliciously, and found a verdict for plaintiff. The court, on a motion for judgment, held that the words were privileged, and that the defendant was entitled to judgment.

TRADE MARK—TRADE NAME—IMPROPER USE—INJUNCTION.—The opinion of the English Supreme Court of Judicature in the case of the Singer Manufacturing Co. v. Wilson, occupies twelve pages of the London Law Times Reports. We regret that its length prevents us from publishing it entire. The Singer Manufacturing Company had acquired a great reputation as manufacturers of sewing machines, which were commonly known as "Singer" machines, and had largely advertised these machines, describing themselves in the advertisements as the makers of the "Singer" machine. The defendant manufactured and sold machines in imitation of the Singer machines, but differing from them in some important particulars, and describing them in his advertisements and price lists as "Singer" machines of his manufacture, but the word "Singer" did not appear on the machine, which bore the defendant's own trade mark and his own name as manufacturer. The plaintiff's machine also bore a trade mark, which the defendant's trade mark in no way resembled. The court held, affirming the decision of Jessel, M. R., that the defendant could not be restrained from using the word "Singer" in this way, as he stated clearly in his advertisements and price lists that machines described as "Singer" machines were manufactured by himself. 34 L. T. R. N. S., 858.

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT.—The next term of this court will commence at Ottowa, on Tuesday, September, 12th. Already attorneys are engaged in preparing abstracts, briefs and arguments, and in reading proof. We have printed for this term, some of the most beautiful briefs and arguments ever presented to the court. We have facilities for doing this class of work unequalled in the west. Having large fonts of type, and employing a large number of experienced workmen, we are enabled to print attorneys' briefs and abstracts for them with accuracy and without delay. All orders from the country will be promptly filled and proofs carefully read.

THE USE OF EXTRINSIC EVIDENCE TO SUPPLEMENT OR CONTROL DOCUMENTS OF TITLE.

VIII.—EQUITABLE PRESUMPTIONS.

Before we discuss the rules and cases appertaining to the use of parol evidence to rebut or fortify an equitable presumption, it will be wise to call attention to the different systems of classifying these equitable presumptions which writers of repute and authority adopt in their treatises. Before the Statute of Uses the word "use" in chancery contemplation stood in the place occupied now by the word trust, and Sir William Blackstone, Lord St. Leonards, and Mr. Hayes, with different degrees of success have applied the rules settled as to the one to the parvenu successor. The Statute of Frauds speaks of a trust or confidence which shall or may arise or result by the complication or construction of law on a conveyance, or be transferred or extinguished by an act or operation of law. Mr. Lewin remarks that the terms implied trusts, trusts by operation of law and constructive trusts, appear from the books to be almost synonymous expressions, and then distinguishes: 1. Implied trusts; 2. Trusts by operation of law; 3. Constructive trusts. At the same time he observes that constructive trusts form one branch of trusts by operation of law, while resulting trusts constitute the other. This form of definition is scarcely logical. We think Mr. Griffith is more correct in distributing the different species into implied trusts and constructive trusts, ranging a resulting trust under the former (inasmuch as it is the intention of the party therein to which operation is given by law), and defining a constructive trust as an equitable presumption, not only juris but de jure, to be displaced, indeed, by evidence of another equity, but not to be rebutted. However this may be, as far as the discussion of the use of parol evidence is concerned, the nomenclature of Mr. Taylor and Mr. Griffith seems the most serviceable. We shall commence with a concise statement as to the admissibility of parol evidence in proving an ordinary use or trust, and then proceed to the more complicated trusts or equitable presumptions in which such evidence plays so important a part. Our titles we propose to arrange in the following order:

1. The simple or express trust.
2. Executor the trustee of his surplus for the next of kin.
3. Revocation of will by marriage and other circumstances.
4. The nominal purchaser of an estate a trustee for the person who pays the money.
5. Purchase by a husband or parent in the name or names of a wife and child.
6. Joint purchases.
7. Vendor's lien.
8. Purchases by persons making undue use of information.
9. Purchases by persons having undue influence.
10. Repetition of legacies.
11. Performance of a covenant to leave money.
12. Performance of a covenant to settle land.
13. Election.
14. Satisfaction of debts, legacies, and portions.

A glance at the list will show that some of the presumptions operate in cases of wills exclusively, others exclusively in cases of deeds, while the remainder are more or less common to both.

1. THE SIMPLE OR EXPRESS TRUST.

In Fordyce v. Willis, 3 B. C. C., 587, Lord Chancellor Thurlow said, "I have been accustomed to consider uses as averrable, but perhaps, when looked into, the cases may relate to feoffment, not to conveyances by bargain and sale, or lease and release." That is to say, on a conveyance operating by livery of possession, a use or trust might at common law be averred or declared by word of mouth, but in deeds of bargain and sale, or lease and release and covenant to stand seized, the consideration expressed in the deed alone raised the use on trust. If it had been otherwise, Tyrrell's case, which decided that a use cannot be upon a use, would not have been law, and the most important section of the statute of user would have had the operation the legislature intended, instead of being narrowed to a rule, which, as Lord Chancellor Hardwick observed, "though made upon great consideration, and introduced in a solemn and pompous manner, had no other effect than to add two or three words to a conveyance of the legal estate." Dyer, in his report, of the case, which was decided by the judges of the Common Pleas, in the Court of Wards 4 & 5, Phil. & Mary, thus quaintly states the judgment. (The case was a bargain and sale by A. to her son B., with a further limitation of the use to herself.) "Mes semble a toutes les Justices et a Saunders, Chief Justice, que le limitation des uses supra est void. Car admit que la statutes d'enrolments ne ust estre faits mes tantum le Statute de Uses in 27 Hen. 8, donques te cas supra ne poit estre es que use ne port estre ingendre de use." Dyer 155*a*, 20.

29 Car. 2, c. 3. An act for the Prevention of Frauds and Perjuries, better known as the Statute of Frauds, contains the following important rules:—Sec. 7. "And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, that from and after the said 24th June, all declarations or creations of trusts or confidences of any lands, tenements, or hereditaments shall be manifested and proved by some writing signed by the party who is by law enabled to declare such trust, or by his last will in writing, or else they shall be utterly void and of none effect. Sect. 8. Provided always that where any conveyance shall be made of any lands or tenements by which a trust or confidence shall or may arise or result by the implication or construction of law, or be transferred or extinguished by any act or operation of law, then and in every such case such trust or confidence shall be of the like force or effect as the same would have been if this statute had not been made. Anything hereinbefore contained to the contrary notwithstanding. Sect. 9. And be it further enacted, that all grants and assignments of any trust or confidence shall likewise be in writing, signed by the party granting or assigning the same, or by such last will or devise, or else shall likewise be utterly void and of none effect."

In Ireland, the Right Hon. J. E. Walsh, the learned Master of the Rolls, in Nicholson v. Mulligar, 3 Ir. Rep. Eq. 322, compared the weight of evidence necessary to rebut a resulting trust in the case of a purchase in another's name with that requisite to prove or establish an ordinary parol trust. He gave it as his opinion that much weaker, or at least much less definite evidence, was sufficient in the first case; that all that was necessary was to show that the person who paid the prices was not intended to take the benefit of the purchase, and that the law would then leave it where the conveyance purported to give it.

The reported cases substantiate the opinion expressed in Nicholson v. Mulligar. The notion that any expression of confidence and its reciprocation by the person trusted is sufficient to constitute a trust, though frequently entertained, is not the doctrine of the courts, except where there is fraud. As in contracts at common law, so in trusts in equity, something definite and final is required. Not only must the subject-matter, but the objects also must be ascertained or definitely ascertainable. Inchoate attempts to form a trust, whether shown by parol or parchment, are not enforceable; and yet parol evidence of completed intention is sufficient to superadd a trust to important legal documents.

In Beeden v. Major, 12 L. T. Rep. N. S. 562; 11 Jur. N. S. 537, a feme sole purchased £1000 Consols in the name of her niece, informed her of the fact, and that she intended the sum should be for her benefit, and procured her to execute a power of attorney enabling the aunt to transfer the stock and to receive the dividends. Vice Chancellor Kindersley was of opinion that this power to sell the stock did not amount to a retention of the ownership, that it was only the retaining a power to destroy the niece's right, and stood on the same footing as if there had been a declaration of trust subject to a power of revocation. He accordingly held that a trust was well created for the benefit of the niece after her aunt's death. He also held that the aunt, having also by will bequeathed an annuity, and the facts not establishing a parental or quasi-parental relationship, there was no ademption, but that the niece was entitled both to the £1000 and the annuity. On appeal, the Chancellor affirmed the decision, 13 L. T. Rep. N. S. 554.

In Down v. Ellis, 35 Bea., 578, money was standing in the name of a married woman, which, after her decease and that of her husband, was claimed by her mother on the ground that it had been invested for her while separated from her husband in her daughter's name. The affidavit of the mother was corroborated by the fact that the dividends had been received by her with the assent of the daughter and her husband, who was a Welsh clergyman, and not wealthy. Lord Romilly held the evidence sufficient to establish the resulting trust.

In Milroy v. Lloyd, 31 L. J., 798, Ch; 7 L. T. Rep. N. S. 178; M., in consideration of natural love and affection to his niece, by deed transferred to L. fifty bank shares, then belonging to him, with the certificates or scrip of the same, and the dividends upon trust during his life or until the niece's marriage, to apply the dividends for her use and benefit; and in the event of his death before her marriage, to transfer the share to her with trusts for her issue, in the event of her marrying in the settlor's lifetime. At this time L. held a general power of attorney from the settlor to transfer the stock of any incorporated company which might be standing in his name; and soon after the date of the deed the settlor gave him the certificates of a large number of shares he held in the same bank, including the shares mentioned in the deed; and he executed a special power to him to receive the dividends on all the shares in the bank then in his name. This was the only transfer ever made to L. of the fifty shares. The said power of attorney was never left with the bank, as was needed by their rules; but under another special power L. received the dividends, and sometimes paid them to the niece and sometimes to the settlor, who handed them over to her. Lord Justice Bruce and Lord Justice Turner held that M. continued up to his death both legal and beneficial owner of the shares, and had not by the deed conferred the ownership on any other person, and had not constituted himself a trustee for his niece or made any contract enforceable against him or his estate.

In Arthur v. Clarkson, 35 Beav., 458, a person voluntarily gave his promissory note to two friends for his natural child, and deposited with them title deeds to secure the amount. In his will he alluded to the provision. After the testator's death Lord Romilly held that a valid trust had been created.

In Gee v. Liddell, 35 Beav., 621; L. Rep. 2 Eq Ca., 341; a testator bequeathed £2,000 on certain trusts, and he empowered his executor, who was also his residuary legatee, to retain the amount, in his hands uninvested, he paying interest thereon. After the testator's death, the executor, being satisfied that the testator intended to bequeath £3,000, and not £2,000, promised to make it up to £3,000. He made no investment, but continued to pay interest on £3,000 till his death. Lord Romilly held that as to the additional £1,000, there was a complete voluntary trust which the court would enforce.

In Morgan v. Mallison, L. Rep. 10 Eq. Ca., 475, one Saunders signed a memorandum in this form, "I hereby give and make over to M. an India bond, value £1,000," and give it to his medical attendant, Dr. Morris, but did not hand over the bond. He died, and the residuary legatee under his will claiming, Lord Romilly held that the memorandum was a good declaration of trust, and that Dr. Morris was entitled to the bond. —The London Law Times.

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

ABSTRACTS OF OPINIONS FILED AT OTTAWA, JUNE 30, 1876.

25–1874.—John M. Reynolds v. Joseph M. Greenebaum. — Error to Cook.—Opinion by SCOTT, C. J., affirming.

DELIVERY OF LEASE—POSSESSION A QUESTION OF FACT—CHARGE AS TO EVIDENCE.

Held, 1. Where a written lease is left in the hands of the scrivener for the benefit of both parties, this is a sufficient delivery thereof.

2. Whether one was really in possession of the premises, under such lease, is a question of fact for the jury.

3. It is erroneous to charge a jury that they should disregard the testimony of a witness who has sworn falsely in any material point; for the credibility of witnesses is a matter exclusively for the jury.

4. Nevertheless, where such a charge is merely abstract, and could not have prejudiced the rights of parties, a cause will not be reversed therefor.

382–1874.—James H. Bowen et al. v. Mary Bond et al.—Appeal from Ogle.—Opinion by SHELDON, J., reversing and remanding.

RECITALS OF COURT RECORDS.

Recitals of court records—how construed—and what their effect is—as to jurisdiction—direct and collateral proceedings—distinctions thereon—power of sale to an administrator—how construed—where no debts at the time of making the sale—validity of sale.

STATEMENT.—Bill to enjoin suit in ejectment, and to clear title, dismissed. Appellants claimed title to the premises, under an administrator's sale, which was impeached—the files being lost, and no evidence of the validity of the sale except the records. Objection being made thereon to the jurisdiction, it was Held,

1. That recitals of a record are competent evidence to sustain jurisdiction when this is impeached in a collateral proceeding.

2. A recital that proof was made in a cause "of the service of notice according to the provisions of the statute, in such case made and provided," meant that notice had been given by service instead of publication, and that this service had been in accordance with the requirements of the statute, as to the first mode of notice required, namely, by service of a written notice, together with a copy of the account and petition by the administrator; and it should not be construed to mean that there was service of notice only, without a copy of the account or petition, served on the heirs, etc

3. A recital in a decree "that it appeared to the court that notice according to law was given of the pendency of this cause," will cure a minor defect in a certificate of publication of notice, so as to make the certificate sufficient to give jurisdiction [in argument].

4. While, in a direct proceeding, on writ of error to reverse the proceedings of the court below, in such a case, an entitling of an order of court will not be held to show the proper filing of a petition containing the statutory allegations, namely, what lands the intestate died seized of, etc., and requesting the aid of the court, without a direct recital, yet the rule is different in a mere collateral proceeding.

5. The general rule is, that a party who has purchased land under the judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction, bona fide, and with no notice of any such defects as the absence of a summons, or notice, should not be put in jeopardy of his title, or be required to take the risk of the loss or abstracting of a loose paper from the files, when the decree or judgment of the court recites the fact that process was duly served, or the required notice duly given. And the rule applies in case of the absence of a petition.

6. In a collateral proceeding, the stating of facts in a record is, at least, prima facie evidence of the existence of those facts, to be rebutted only by the clearest proof. And where it appears that there was a petition for the sale of real estate, the findings in an order of sale may fully show that the court had jurisdiction over the subject-matter.

7. Where an order of sale directs an administrator to report at the "next term of the court," this is not to be construed as limiting the power of selling within that period of time. The grant of power to sell is general, without restriction as to time, and the provision as to making report at the next term does not have the effect of imposing any restriction as to time upon the power of sale. Nor does the fact that the court subsequently continues the cause, and thus extends the time for reporting, or gives an extension of time to the administrator to make the sale, limit it by express words to a time certain—the next term. The order, as well as the subsequent orders of continuance for report, is to be regarded as but formal orders made on the call of the docket, and no significance is to be attached to them as, in any way, changing the order of sale, or limiting the time of making the sale.

8. If, meantime, the debts were paid so that there were no debts at the time of the sale remaining unpaid, the sale will not, for that reason, be held void; because the fact would not retroact so as to annul a valid decree of sale by a court having competent jurisdiction. A purchaser at such sale cannot be held to be under obligation to go and examine first whether there are really any debts owing by the estate, sufficient to require the sale of that particular land, at the peril of getting nothing by his purchase. In all such cases, a purchaser must be held to be a bona fide purchaser without notice, who must, therefore, be protected. He is only required to look to the order of sale as his warrant to buy.

9. Nor does it charge a purchaser with notice that the cause was continued from term to term after the first order of sale.

NEGLIGENCE OF PASSENGER CARRIED PAST A STATION—NOTIFYING PASSENGERS.

Held, 1. That a passenger being carried past a station and then jumping from the car cannot hold the railroad company liable for the injury he may have received from thus leaping from the car; because this has no necessary connection with the being carried past the station.

2. And where a train at night stops at a watering place, and not a station for passengers, there is no obligation to notify passengers of danger; and if one is injured by getting off at such a place, it must be regarded as a result of his own negligence, and not that of the company.

TRIAL WITHOUT A JURY—WHAT REVIEWED ON APPEAL—FRAUD UNDER BANKRUPT LAW IN THE CREATION OF A DEBT—NEW PROMISE AFTER DISCHARGE.

Held, 1. That where a court tries a cause without a jury, and no error of law is complained of, the Supreme Court will not disturb the finding of the court, unless the judgment is clearly and manifestly against the evidence.

2. Under the bankrupt law, if property is sold, and the buyer obtains possession of it, under an agreement to pay cash on delivery, then ships the goods beyond the reach of the seller, and refuses to pay the cash, such act is regarded as fraud in the creation of the debt, in the meaning of the 33rd section.

3. Where, after a discharge in bankruptcy, the bankrupt makes a new promise to pay a debt, the discharge will not preclude a recovery.

487–1874.—John H. Donlin v. Louis J. Daegling.—Appeal from Superior Court of Cook.—Opinion by BREESE, J., affirming.

PAROL EVIDENCE IN CONNECTION WITH A WRITTEN AGREEMENT.

STATEMENT.—Court house of Kankakee destroyed by fire; except the walls—the insurance company having a risk thereon, employed Donlin to rebuild. Donlin employed Daegling—a brick-mason—to rebuild the walls, under a written agreement, for $4,500 to be paid in installments, as the work progressed. The work was to be done in a manner acceptable to the county authorities. Work was begun, the standing walls partly torn down; and bricks being laid thereon, the county authorities threatened to enjoin the work, unless more of the walls were taken down before the re-building should commence. This further tearing down the brick-layers regarded as extra work; and asked $1,000 more for it. Donlin, thinking this charge excessive, offered to pay for it by the day. They refused; and then he told them to go on and he would pay them what it was worth. The work was done, and $1,000 claimed for it as quantum meruit, which Donlin refused to pay. Held,

That notwithstanding the written contract, it was competent for the parties to supply any supposed defect in it, as to the quantity of work to be done; for such testimony does not vary the terms of the contract in any of its obligatory parts, when the contract does not specify exactly what work was to be done in taking down and rebuilding; and there are no written plans or specifications showing this as to quantity, and the only particular specification in the contract is as to quality.

FRAUDULENT REPRESENTATIONS IN THE SALE OF LANDS—EVIDENCE THEREOF—TRUSTEE AFTERWARDS BECOMING INTERESTED IN LANDS—LACHES IN EQUITY.

STATEMENT.—Bill in chancery by appellee, charging that appellant holds certain lands in trust for appellee, and praying a conveyance of the title. Charles Walker (now deceased), in his lifetime, together with appellant, his wife, conveyed the land in controversy to Eliphalet Terry, of Connecticut (now deceased), who, by his last will and testament, bequeathed to certain trustees $5,000, the income to be paid to the appellee for life; and, after her death, the principal to be equally divided among her children. Also, the residue of his estate to be divided into four parts, and one part held by the trustees for the use of appellee, on the like trust as the $1,500; and he gave the trustees full authority to sell and convey the real estate.

After Walker conveyed the land to Terry, he continued to look after it as Terry's agent; and he was authorized to ascertain if he could make sale of it. This agency was subsequently withdrawn.

After Terry's death, the trustees again appointed Walker as agent to look after the land and assist them in making sale of it. The appellee's husband (Edward Covington), residing in Connecticut, also, to some extent, assisted the trustees and had some correspondence with Walker in regard to the sale of the land. Walker sent on a proposition of purchase, from one Bentley, a brother-in-law, and advised the trustees, if they wished to sell, to close with the offer, as it was a fair one—especially considering that some of the land was quite wet, and not tillable, and there being no communication with Chicago, seven miles distant, except by wagon. The offer was, thereupon, accepted, and conveyance made—notes and mortgage being given on deferred payments. Bentley afterwards sold the land to appellant, who, afterwards, was left as the widow of Walker. The trustees had resigned after the conveyance to Bentley, but before the conveyance to appellant.

The bill charges fraud in Walker's representations to the trustees, and that the trustees placed entire confidence therein, and believed them to be true; and that appellee but recently discovered the falsity thereof; that the sale was made really to and for Walker's wife, through Bentley, etc., and asking a reconveyance to appellee.

In defense, the limitation statute of 1835 was set up among other answers. Held,

1. That the legal presumption is always in favor of innocence, and against all imputations of fraud; and that it would be unreasonable, after a great lapse of time, to require exact proof of all minute circumstances of any transaction, or to expect a satisfactory explanation of every difficulty, real or apparent, with which it may be incumbered. In such cases, the most that can fairly be expected, if the parties are living, from the frailty of human infirmity, is, that the material facts can be given with certainty to a common intent; and, if the parties are dead, and the case rests in confidence and in parol agreements, the most that can be hoped for is to arrive at probable conjectures, and to substitute general presumptions of law for exact knowledge. Fraud, or breach of trust, ought not lightly to be imputed to the living; the legal presumption is the other way. And, as to the dead, who are not here to answer for themselves, it would be the height of injustice and cruelty to disturb their ashes, and violate the sanctity of the grave, unless the evidence of fraud is clear beyond all reasonable doubt.

2. Fraudulent representations must not only be wilful, but the conduct of the opposite party must have been influenced thereby to vitiate a transaction in the sale of land.

3. Where fraud is charged in regard to representations merely advisory, the burden necessarily rests upon those charging the fraud, to establish, by clear and satisfactory proof, (1), That the representations made and the advice given, were in bad faith; (2), that they were material; and (3), influenced the sale of the land.

4. Where values rest in the estimate of witnesses, the question of the knowledge of such value by the representor is not conclusively settled by a preponderance of evidence in such estimates; since so many circumstances affect the value of land, which different minds may look at in different ways, that it would be grossly unjust to condemn an estimate as fraudulent because more persons should be found to say it was too low than that it was fair and reasonable. The experience and competence of the witnesses to judge must be taken into account, and also the experience and competence of the representor. Even if inaccurate, representations are not, therefore, fraudulent.

5. Where an agent or trustee has fully discharged his duty and ended his trust, the fact that he subsequently becomes interested in the land sold through his agency, does not vitiate the sale.

6. Laches in an equity suit will destroy the right of relief, because, by long delay, circumstances susceptible of proof, when they are of recent occurrence, become unsusceptible of proof, and thus work injury to a defendant.

531–1874.—David Dreyer v. Henry C. Durand.—Appeal from Cook.—Opinion by BREESE, J., reversing.

FRAUDULENT CONCEALMENT—WHAT CIRCUMSTANCES DO NOT SHOW THIS.

STATEMENT.—Creditor's Bill, on the ground that appellant is fraudulently concealing his property by transfer to his co-defendant, in this cause. Answer that this co-defendant was the owner of the goods claimed by the bill, and that appellant was only an agent to sell them for him. Dreyer was burnt out in 1871; and applied to his uncle to help him, who did so, by putting him into the store. He acted as "agent," and kept his bank account as "agent for" this uncle, and so drew his checks, and the same notification was also in the bill heads, and on the wagons. Held,

That there was no fraudulent concealment in any way, and the public were sufficiently notified of the existence of the agency.

532–1874.—M. E. Hanandez v. J. B. Drake.—Appeal from Cook.—Opinion by WALKER, J., affirming. (SCOTT, Ch. J., dissenting.)

ATTACHMENT—NOTICE IN NEWSPAPER—DEFECTIVE EXECUTION—SUBSEQUENT ERRORS—ISSUING AFTER A YEAR FROM RENDITION OF JUDGMENT—EFFECT ON LIEN—NOTICE ON SETTING ASIDE SALE—EQUITY JURISDICTION.

STATEMENT.—In a foreign attachment suit, notice of publication was made in a weekly newspaper, and was therefore objected to as insufficient. Held,

That what was said in Kerr v. Hitt, 75 Ill., 51, namely, on the point that the LEGAL NEWS, a weekly law publication, was such a newspaper as the statute requires, is fully applicable to this case.

The first execution issued after payment lacked the signature of the clerk, and sale being made thereon, it was set aside at the instance of the purchaser (plaintiff), and the land was resold under an execution in due form. Held,

1. That as the court had acquired jurisdiction to adjudicate upon the matter, it could not lose that jurisdiction by any error that subsequently occurred; and its judgment became absolutely conclusive, and binding in all collateral proceedings, whether in a court of law or equity.

2. Where an invalid execution is issued, a sale thereunder may be set aside without notice to the defendant—since the execution, levy and sale are thus without vitality. However, had the purchaser been a stranger, the plaintiff in execution might have been required to give notice to the purchaser on moving to set aside the sale.

3. But where the second execution is issued more than one year after the rendition of the judgment, without reviving the judgment by scire facias, the execution is voidable, though not void, as at common law; our statute having made no change in the common law rule in this respect. When thus issued, therefore, without reviving—the first execution being null as though none had ever been issued—and the defendant takes no steps to have it quashed, or proceedings under it set aside before they are consummated, this neglect creates a counter presumption strong enough to overcome the presumption of a satisfaction of the judgment; and the court will not set aside sales or other consummated proceedings under the execution.

4. Were such sale void, or voidable, it must be set aside by ejectment at law, and not in equity. An unsupported charge of fraud does not give equity jurisdiction in such cases.

LACHES AS TO SECRET TRUSTS IN LANDS—ESTOPPEL.

Held, That where a claim for a secret trust in lands has existed, without assertion, for many years, and the claimants have stood by and seen valuable improvements made upon the lands, and various persons become interested therein, under apparently absolute titles of record, they are estopped from asserting their claim.

RULES TO PLEAD WHEN NECESSARY TO JUDGMENT BY DEFAULT.

STATEMENT.—Suit commenced April 8, 1873, to the April term, 1873; summons served on appellant at that date. No declaration was filed until May 30, 1873—the terms of the court, by law, commencing on the 3d Monday of each month. The cause remained on the docket, no plea being filed, and no rule being taken, until April 23, 1874, when the plaintiff called up the case, and took judgment by default, against appellants, who afterwards made a motion to set aside the default, which was overruled. Held,

That under these circumstances it was error to take a judgment by default, without a rule to plead, and service of it on the defendant. A party who is not required to plead is not in default, although, ordinarily, a party who, without any rule, fails to plead according to the practice of the court, is in default. Nor does it make any difference in principle that other parties were made defendants with appellants, who were not served; and against whom alias summons was issued.

29.—Peru Coal Co. v. George G. Merrick. Error to Kendall.—Opinion by CRAIG, J., affirming.

CHANCERY BUSINESS—HEARING MOTIONS—SECOND APPLICATIONS FOR CONTINUANCE—WHEN DEFENDANT CAN ADDUCE EVIDENCE.

Held, 1. That the mere fact that a court is in session for the purpose of disposing of chancery business, does not deprive it of jurisdiction to hear and determine an application for change of venue, in an action at law. This may, indeed, by the terms of the statute, be done even in vacation, and an application may be made when the court is in session for any purpose.

2. A second application for a continuance will not be allowed at the same term, unless based upon facts which had arisen since the overruling of the first motion.

3. A defendant cannot, while a plaintiff is under cross-examination, offer account books in evidence, as a part of the cross-examination. There is no rule of practice which permits a defendant to introduce evidence until the plaintiff has closed his case.

[DICKEY, J., having been of counsel, took no part.]

VALIDITY OF ORDERS OF COURT—DOMICIL—RECITALS IN RECORDS OF COURT—NATURE OF PROBATE JURISDICTION IN COUNTY COURTS—SALES—PETITION.

STATEMENT.—Petition to be allowed to redeem from a sale, made by an administrator, under order of court, for want of jurisdiction in the court ordering the sale. Held,

1. That, to allow, after the lapse of years, an issue to be raised collaterally to test the verity of orders by courts, as to the sale of lands; which, upon their face, show the jurisdiction in the court, would be fraught with great evil, in view of the commercial character which custom, in this country, has affixed to lands, and the frequent and great fluctuations in value to which they are subject.

2. In many cases, the domicil of an intestate can hardly be determined by reason of his having had more than one residence, occupied alternately, as pleasure or convenience dictated, or by reason of a change of domicil being in process of consummation at the time of his death. And so, if this question, however deliberately passed upon by a county court, is to be considered always open to proof, whenever any one may choose to raise it in a collateral proceeding, it is fair to presume that different results might be reached by different tribunals, or even by the same tribunal, at different times, varying, in each case, to conform to the preponderance of proof then produced.

3. A fact which may, when a decree for the sale of lands is rendered, be demonstrably proved, may become, by the lapse of time, unsusceptible of satisfactory proof, by reason of the death or absence of witnesses; and, if titles derived from administrator's sales should be held subject to this element of insecurity, few men would be found to invest in them except at prices ruinous to the estates.

4. When a decree is made for the sale of lands, a court therein acts judicially, and therefore determines the question of its jurisdiction, both over the subject-matter and the person; and this is conclusive, if questioned collaterally. Property rights acquired under such decree cannot be disturbed, without gross injustice; even if the decree appears to have originated in a total misapprehension of principle.

5. For, as to county courts, although they are of limited, they are not, strictly speaking, of inferior jurisdiction; and when they adjudicate upon the class of questions over which they have general jurisdiction, as liberal intendments will be granted in their favor as would be extended to proceedings of a Circuit Court; and therefore their records are conclusive when questioned in a collateral proceeding, as, for example, in administrations the jurisdiction is general, and their records are conclusive therein; and as to granting letters, etc., or the domicile of the deceased, all that is requisite is that the record do not show the want of jurisdiction.

6. In a petition to sell lands, it is not requisite that the names of the heirs should be given.

56.—Harriet King v. Eugene B. Mix.—Error to Kane.—Opinion by SCOTT, J., affirming.

ASSIGNING A HOMESTEAD UNDER INSTRUCTIONS FROM THE SUPREME COURT—AGREEMENT OF PARTIES.

Held, That when, on remanding a cause, the Supreme Court instructs the court below as to two alternative modes of assigning a homestead, or its equivalent, to a widow, namely, setting apart the homestead, or else giving her in lieu of it, $1,000 and interest, if the land is indivisible, the court below is at liberty, in its judicial discretion, to adopt either mode, according to the facts in evidence, and where a settlement is made by an agreement of the solicitor of the petitioner and the opposite party, and a decree made accordingly, it is no objection that the solicitor had no authority to make such agreement, provided the facts, independently of the agreement, would justify the decree of the court under the instructions of the Supreme Court.

58.—Marshal Stone v. Hannah Carr.—Appeal from Peoria.—Opinion by SCHOLFIELD, J., affirming.

CONSTRUCTION OF THE EVIDENCE ACT AS TO EXCEPTIONS TO THE RIGHT OF PARTIES TO TESTIFY IN THEIR OWN BEHALF—EXCUSE AS TO FALSE AFFIDAVIT.

Held, 1. That, under the evidence act of 1867, where heirs, etc., are interested, each of the enumerated disqualifying causes as to a party testifying, stands by itself; and the exceptions apply to such as they are at all applicable to, separately, in the order in which they are stated, and, therefore, the intent is, that no person directly interested, etc., shall be allowed to testify when the adverse party sues, or defends, as the executor, administrator, heir, legatee, or devisee, of any deceased person; except as to facts occurring subsequent to the death of the deceased; but, if the adverse party sues or defends, as guardian, or trustee for such heir, legatee, or devisee, then the additional restriction is imposed that such facts shall not only have occurred subsequent to the death of the deceased, but also after such heir, legatee or devisee shall have attained majority. The manifest purpose of the act is, that parties in interest shall be allowed to testify only where they are on terms of comparative equality.

2. It is not a sufficient excuse for a false affidavit that a party legally responsible had been advised by counsel to make the affidavit.

THE GENERAL JURY SYSTEM.

Among the so called improvements in criminal procedure made in some of the Western States is the abolition of the grand jury, and some of the reformers in other States are crying out against this institution as an unnecessary and expensive part of our method of administering penal justice. There is no doubt that in certain cases the investigation before the grand inquest adds somewhat to the cost of the proceeding, and may, perhaps, delay somewhat the events known as conviction and sentence. Probably where the evidence on the part of the prosecution is conclusive and easily gotten at, the necessity of having the witnesses give in their testimony two or three times operates oppressively, and there would be much time and trouble saved if one appearance only of witnesses was necessary. Yet, in those instances where there is much doubt, an impartial examination by a jury of the prosecutor's evidence is of benefit both to the public and to the accused individual; to the public by enabling it to dispose promptly of uncertain cases, so that they do not clog up the criminal calendar, and to the individual by saving him from the humiliation of a public trial where there is no prima facie case against him. The grand jury is an inherent part of the common-law system, and it has for centuries answered a good purpose. It may occasionally prove an obstacle to the speedy punishment of crime, but we think it more often proves one to malicious prosecution. The penal system of the common law has many defects which it is the duty of legislation to remove, but we cannot think the grand jury is one of them. In the prosecution of those accused of crime, too much care cannot be taken that an unjust conviction be not had, and a public trial for a felony ought not to be undertaken unless there is prima facie evidence enough to satisfy twelve men that the charge is probably true.

It would seem by the above, which we take from the Albany Law Journal, that that able publication is not in favor of abolishing the Grand Jury. We are among those who believe that the Grand Jury may be abolished, without any injury to the prompt and efficient administration of criminal law. All that should be accomplished by the grand jury in the way of indicting persons charged to have committed crime, can as readily be done on a preliminary examination before a committing magistrate or judge. It is probably true that there would not be as many persons held to answer for crime, but it is undoubtedly true that there would be a larger proportion of the persons held, finally convicted. We do believe that before a person is committed to prison, there to remain for weeks and sometimes months, he should have an opportunity, at least, to show that he is not guilty of the crime with which he is charged. Under the Grand Jury system, how many men who were entirely innocent of the crime with which they were charged, because they were unable to get bail, have remained in jail months, and sometimes years, awaiting trial, who, if they could have met their accusers face to face, on a preliminary examination, would have been able to have removed all suspicion, and shown that the charges were made through malice, and without foundation.

It is apparent that appellant lost his debt on account of the failure of the constable to perform a duty the law casts upon him, and it is not denied that the constable had due and ample notice when the property would be in his county, which was liable to be taken on the execution, and that the property remained in the county of DeWitt a sufficient length of time, so that by the exercise of reasonable exertion on the part of the constable, it could have been secured upon the executions.

The only excuse the constable has to offer to relieve him and his sureties from the liability imposed by statute, and his official bond, is that he was sick and not able to perform a duty voluntarily assumed.

If sickness could be relied upon as defense to an action in any case brought upon an official bond of a constable for a failure to discharge a duty resulting in loss, the constable in this case has, in our judgment, entirely failed to establish a state of facts which can shield him and his sureties from an action.

If he was sick and unable to serve the execution, why did he not notify appellant or the justice who issued it, so that it could be placed in the hands of some other constable, and thus save the debt? The property remained in DeWitt county from three to four days; if the constable was sick, when the defendant in the execution first came in the county with the property, there was ample time for him to have sent the execution to a constable in good health, and had it levied, but the constable did nothing but quietly remained at his home for three or four days, when the property was within two miles of his residence, and permitted the defendant in execution to come and go with the property as he saw fit. Such conduct on the part of an officer entrusted with the business of the public cannot be sanctioned or sustained.

But we cannot hold that sickness of a constable will relieve him and his sureties from duties implied by law.

In the case of the People et. al. v. Palmer, 46 Ill., 398, which was an action brought against a sheriff and his sureties upon the official bond of the sheriff for the failure to levy an execution upon property of defendant, it was said:

"It is a safe rule to hold that a sheriff failing to levy on personal property in the possession of the defendant, can only discharge himself from liability by showing the property was not subject to levy."

The onus is upon the officer. While, it is true, the defense relied upon in that case was not sickness, yet the reasoning will apply with as much force and effect if the excuse relied upon there had been the same as set up to defeat this action.

If a sheriff cannot on account of sickness discharge the duties imposed upon him by law, he must provide a sufficient number of deputies, so that the business will not be neglected or left undone; so, too, with a constable, should he be overtaken with sickness and unable to discharge the duties of his office, he should resign or pass the business into the hands of other like officers who can properly attend to the business so that loss will not follow.

Public policy requires that an officer elected or chosen to fill official position, should be held to a strict performance of every duty enjoined upon him by law; in no other manner can the laws be properly enforced, and the rights of the people preserved. As the sickness of the constable was no defense to the action brought upon the official bond, the evidence of sickness was improperly admitted, and the instructions of the court upon this question given for appellees, were erroneous, for which the judgment will be reversed and the cause remanded.

Reversed and remanded.

DICKEY, J.—While I concur in the judgment, it is my opinion that the rule, that illness cannot excuse the non-performance of an official act enjoined, is laid down too broadly in this opinion, and needs qualification. In my view of the law it will not do to hold that no illness, however extreme, can excuse an officer for any such omission. The law does not require the performance of impossible acts.

SCOTT, C. J.—I concur with Mr. Justice Dickey.

THE RECENT AMENDMENT TO THE BANKRUPT LAW.

Under the recent amendments to the bankrupt law the making of a voluntary assignment of all his property by an insolvent is no bar to his discharge in bankruptcy. A voluntary bankrupt may file his petition for discharge although more than a year has elapsed since he filed his petition.

The following is the amendment:

AN ACT to amend the act entitled "An act to amend and supplement an act entitled 'An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States,' approved March second, eighteen hundred and sixty-seven, and for other purposes," approved June twenty-second, eighteen hundred and seventy-four.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section twelve of said act be, and the same is, hereby, amended, as follows: After the word "committed" in line forty-four, insert: Provided also, That no voluntary assignment by a debtor or debtors of all his or their property, heretofore or hereafter made in good faith for the benefit of all his or their creditors, ratably and without creating any preference, and valid according to the law of the State where made, shall of itself, in the event of his or their being subsequently adjudicated bankrupts in a proceeding of involuntary bankruptcy, be a bar to the discharge of such debtor or debtors. That section fifty-one hundred and eight of the Revised Statutes is hereby amended so as to read as follows: At any time after the expiration of six months from the adjudication of bankruptcy, or if no debts had been proved against the bankrupt, or if no assets have come to the hands of the assignee, at any time after the expiration of sixty days and before the final diposition of the cause, the bankrupt may apply to the court for a discharge from his debts. This section shall apply in all cases heretofore or hereafter commenced.

Approved, July 26, 1876. Department of State, Aug. 5, 1876. A true copy.

S. A. BROWN.

The London Law Times says: Infants are a troublesome class in the community, and a fruitful source of litigation. The law relating to them will probably have another illustration from a case tried on the 21st instant, on the Western Circuit, before Baron Amphlett and a common jury. We refer to the case of Mitchell v. France, which was an action on a bill of exchange given by the defendant, when an infant, for the value of a horse. For the last fifteen months of his minority, the defendant, who came of age in January last, had been in receipt of £1,500 a year. Whilst staying at Penzance, in Jan., 1875, he bought a hunter for 100 guineas, and paid for it by the bill in question. The jury found that the hunter was a necessary for a person in the position of the defendant. Under the term "necessaries" are included many things that would be excluded by a strict application of the word. At law the expression is a relative one, and must be construed with reference to the infant's age and position. Thus, livery for a servant has been held to be necessary in the case of an infant captain, and an infant volunteer has been held liable for his uniform (Coates v. Wilson, 5 Esp., 152); and in a recent case (Hill v. Arbon, 34 L. T. Rep. N. S., 125), a pair of spurs, a suit of horse clothing, a breastplate, and set of best plated harness, supplied to a man nearly twenty-one, who managed a farm for his father, were considered necessaries. In all these cases the question is, as stated by Willes, J. in Ryder v. Wombwell, whether it is so necessary, for the purpose of maintaining himself in his station, that he should have these articles, as to bring them within the exception under which an infant may pledge his credit for them as necessaries.

THE COLLEGE OF LAW.

The Union College of Law announces for the coming year, several new features of interest. James L. High, Esq., who is now one of the most successful and widely read of American writers on equity topics, will assume the Professorship of Equity. The selection is a particularly admirable one. Mr. High is a very unpretentious but a most judicious and sound lawyer, whose abilities have tended to exalt the reputation of the Bar of our city and State throughout the country. His acquisition by the College of Law is a most fortunate and timely one. Prof. Cumnock of the Evanston University, who is announced as the Instructor in Elocution, is a gentleman of thorough culture, and has few superiors as a teacher of this most important branch. So many lawyers are deficient in this part of their education, that we can only regret that instruction in the use of the voice, is not made an imperative instead of a voluntary feature of the Law Course. Prof. Elias Colbert, the renowned Statistician, Commercial Editor of the Tribune, Scientist, Author and Astronomer, Director of the Dearborn Observatory, is not only one of the most versatile men in this country, but one whose thoroughness in each of the branches to which his versatility extends, is unquestioned. He has consented to teach Short-hand or Phonography, of which he is the oldest and probably most perfect master connected with journalism. Every student at law in this age, should learn short-hand. It adds to the value of his services while a student, and furnishes him with an art of immeasurable importance to his future as a lawyer.

Perhaps the feature which will attract as much attention as any other is the extended course of lectures by members of the bar, so extended as to indicate that the college is backed by a very unanimous approval on the part of the bar. The course will comprise one lecture each day, for five days in the week, during the first two terms of the college year, amounting in all to 130 lectures, of which an average of five will be given by each of the following 25 lawyers, among others, viz.: Atty.-Gen. James K. Edsall, of Dixon; Hon. Lyman Trumbull, Leonard Swett, John Van Arman, John M. Jewett, Obadiah Jackson, John Borden, George Gardner, Joseph M. Bailey, of Freeport: Wm. Barge, late of Dixon, now of Chicago; Emory A. Storrs, Elliott Anthony, Judge John A. Jameson, I. N. Stiles, Thos. Dent, Chas. H. Reed, James L. High, C. C. Bonney, M. F. Tuley, Marshall D. Ewell, Edward Roby, R. H. Forrester, James P. Root, and Geo. W. Kretzinger. The course of upward of 70 lectures given last year by members of the bar not only indicated the lively interest felt by the bar in the success of this institution, but pointed out certain advantages in such a course of lectures over any that could be given by a single lecturer however experienced in the art. The course renders the students personally acquainted with many leading members of the bar, and with their mode of speaking, thinking, and acting. The lectures are often full of personal reminiscences, from the experience at the bar, of the lecturers, and as often relate to a class of topics not dwelt upon in the elementary treatises. Instead of consisting of mere definitions and elementary outlines, which the student has already found in better form in his text books, they are diversified, pungent, practical and pointed, and full of a kind of instruction which the student could not obtain elsewhere except by experience. This course of lectures will be opened by Hon. Leonard Swett, on Monday, Sept. 18. The examination of students from law offices for admission to the senior class will occur on the 15th and 16th of September.

HIRAM BARNEY, Collector of the Port of New York, Plaintiff in Error,
v.
WILLIAM WATSON and WILLIAM G. TOWNLEY.

In Error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York.

PAYING DUTIES UNDER PROTEST—WITHIN WHAT TIME NOTICE OF DISSATISFACTION TO BE GIVEN—WITHIN WHAT TIME APPEAL MAY BE TAKEN FROM DECISION OF COLLECTOR.

Mr. Justice BRADLEY delivered the opinion of the court.

This was a suit brought by the defendants in error against the collector of customs, at New York, to recover certain duties alleged to have been overcharged upon certain goods imported in December, 1863. The plaintiffs claimed that they were "flannels," dutiable at only 35 per cent. ad valorem; the collector held them to belong to a particular class of goods which were subject to an additional specific duty of 18 cents per pound. As the quantity of goods was 7,984 pounds, the difference was $1,437.12. For this amount, with interest, the plaintiffs brought the suit.

The goods in question were part of a large invoice entered on the 24th of December. 1863, on which day the sum of $8,840.93 was paid on account. The entry was not liquidated until the early part of March, 1864, when an additional sum of $1,182.71 was demanded. To this the plaintiffs demurred as it was based on the aforesaid charge of 18 cents per pound in addition to the ad valorem duty on the goods in question.

The questions arising at the trial, as to the character and dutiability of the goods referred to, and the evidence proper to decide the same, are not of sufficient importance to demand special consideration. The principle question below, and that which has been most discussed in this court, is, whether the plaintiffs gave timely and sufficient notice of protest and dissatisfaction with the decision of the collector.

No objection was made until the additional amount was demanded in March, 1864. The import entry was endorsed with the following memorandum: "Liquidated and notified importer, Mar. 11, 1864." The additional duty was paid and a formal protest in writing was served by the plaintiffs on the 24th of March, 1864. In the meantime the importers had appealed to the Secretary of the Treasury, and had obtained his decision, dated the 21st of March, affirming that of the collector.

The defendant insisted that this protest was too late; that it should have been made within ten days from the entry of the liquidation on the import entry. But the court allowed the plaintiffs to prove that the liquidation was really completed before the 11th of March, and that within ten days after its completion a written notice of dissatisfaction, different from the formal protest, was given to the collector. To this the defendant excepted. The jury rendered a verdict for $2,235.72, being the whole amount demanded with interest.

It is assumed in the argument and seems to have been assumed at the trial, that the case was governed by the act of March 3rd, 1857, (11 Stat., 195,) by the 5th section of which it was provided, "That on the entry of any goods, wares, and merchandise imported on and after the 1st day of July aforesaid, the decision of the collector of the customs at the port of importation and entry, as to their liability to duty or exemption therefrom, shall be final and conclusive against the owner, importer, consignee, or agent of any such goods, wares, and merchandise, unless the owner, importer, consignee, or agent shall within ten days after such entry, give notice to the collector, in writing, of his dissatisfaction with such decision, setting forth therein, distinctly and specifically, his grounds of objection thereto, and shall within thirty days after the date of such decision, appeal therefrom to the Secretary of the Treasury, whose decision on such appeal shall be final and conclusive; and the said goods, wares, and merchandise shall be liable to duty or exempted therefrom accordingly, any act of Congress to the contrary notwithstanding, unless suit shall be brought within thirty days after such decision for any duties that may have been paid, or may thereafter be paid on said goods, or within thirty days after the duties shall have been paid in cases where such goods shall be in bond."—11 Stats. at Large, 195.

On examination of the various acts of Congress relating to claims for overcharge of duties on imported goods, we are satisfied that the act of 1857 above quoted had no application to this case; but that the case was governed by an act passed on the 26th of February, 1845. 5 Stat., 727.

To make this more apparent it will be necessary briefly to advert to the history of the laws on this subject.

The case of Elliott v. Swartwout, 10 Pet., 137, decided in 1836, affirmed the principle which had been established by previous authorities, that money paid to a collector for duties illegally demanded, if paid under compulsion in order to get possession of the party's goods, or to prevent their being seized for the duties, may be recovered against the officer in an action at common law, provided the payment be made under protest and with full notice of the intent to sue, so that the officer may protect himself by retaining the money in his possession; but that a payment voluntarily made without such protest cannot be recovered back. The embarrassments which ensued in consequence of the large amount of duties withheld from the public treasury by Mr. Swartwout, the defendant in that case, induced the passage of an act in 1839 (5 Stat, 348, sect. 2), which required all duties collected to be paid into the treasury without regard to claims for overcharge, and deprived the party of an action at law, by giving him the specific remedy of an appeal to the Secretary of the Treasury. This was held to be the effect of the act, although not its express terms, as may be seen by a reference to the case of Cary v. Curtis, reported in 3rd Howard, 236. In 1845 the right of action was restored by an act passed to explain the act of 1839. It declared that nothing contained in this act should be construed to take away the right of any person who should pay money for duties under protest in order to obtain goods imported by him, which duties were not authorized or payable, in part or in whole, by law, to maintain an action at law to ascertain and try the validity of such demand and payment, and to have a right to a trial by jury according to the due course of law; but it required the protest to be made in writing, and signed by the claimant, at or before the payment of the duties, setting forth distinctly and specifically the grounds of objection to the payment thereof. Act of Feb. 26, 1845; 5 Stat., 727. This act was never repealed until the passage of the act to increase duties on imports, approved June 30th, 1864, by the 14th section of which (13 Stat., 214) it was enacted that on the entry of any vessel, or of any goods, the decision of the collector as to the rate and amount of the duties, both on the tonnage of the vessel, and on the goods, should be final and conclusive, unless the owner or consignee should, within ten days after the ascertainment and liquidation of the duties, give notice in writing to the collector, on each entry, if dissatisfied with his decision, setting forth distinctly and specifically the grounds of objection, and should appeal to the Secretary of the Treasury within thirty days after such ascertainment and liquidation; and unless suit should be brought within ninety days after the secretary's decision. This act supplied the act of 1845, and repealed it by implication. But it was not in force when the goods in question in this case were imported. Therefore, the proceedings in this case were subject to the regulations of the act of 1845, which required the protest to be made at or before the payment of the duties alleged to be illegal.

The act of 1857, which was erroneously supposed to govern the case, did not relate to a decision upon the rate and amount of the duties to be charged; but to the decision of the collector whether the goods were on the free list or not. This act was passed for the purpose of reducing duties on imports still lower than the rates imposed by the tariff act of 1846, and it made a large addition to the list of articles entirely exempt from duty. The list of additional articles exempted is extended at large in the act, and occupies the greater part of it. The last section then enacts, that on the entry of any goods imported after the first of July then next, the decision of the collector as to their liability to duty or exemption therefrom shall be final and conclusive, etc., unless the importer or consignee, etc., shall, within ten days after such entry, give notice to the collector in writing, of his dissatisfaction, etc. See Act, 11 Stat., 195. Now, the question whether goods imported were or were not on the free list, and exempt from any duty at all, could and necessarily would be decided on their entry, and need not await any ascertainment or liquidation of the amount. Hence it was required that the notice of dissatisfaction should be made within ten days after such entry, and the requirement, on this view of the act, was a reasonable one. The act does not in terms, nor by implication, repeal the act of 1845. That act still furnished the rule to be observed if the importer, admitting that the goods were dutiable, questioned the rate and amount of duties to be paid. In most cases the amount, and in many cases the rate, could not be ascertained, until after examination and appraisement; and hence, a limitation to ten days from the time of entry would often, perhaps generally, deprive the party of any remedy at all.

The question in the case, therefore, really was, whether the importers made their protest in accordance with the act of 1845, namely, at or before paying the duties complained of. It is not denied that they did this so far as relates to the additional charge of $1,182.72. But they claim a return of more than this, and, under the charge of the court, they obtained a verdict for nearly double this amount, which would include some portion of the money paid by them without protest when the goods were first entered. This was erroneous.

The judgment must be reversed and the cause remanded with directions to award a venire de novo.

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES.

No. 190.—OCTOBER TERM, 1875.

SELAH CHAMBERLAIN
v.
THE ST. PAUL AND SIOUX CITY RAILROAD COMPANY, THE SOUTHERN MINNESOTA RAILROAD COMPANY, A. P. MANN, S. B. RUGGLES, W. R. MARSHALL, C. SHEFFER, T. A. SCOTT, H. D. HALL, G. I. SENEY, and J. A. STEWART.

Appeal from the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Minnesota.

1. The act of Congress of March 3d, 1857, granting certain lands to the territory of Minnesota, for the purpose of aiding in the construction of several lines of railroad between different points in the territory, only authorized for each road, in advance of its construction, a sale of one hundred and twenty sections; no further disposition of the land along either road was allowed, except as the road was completed in divisions of twenty miles.

2. Where land is conveyed to the State by a corporation as indemnity against losses on her bonds loaned to it, the bondholders have no equity for the application of the land to the payment of the bonds which can be enforced against the State, and her grantees take the property discharged of any claim of the bondholders.

Mr. Justice FIELD delivered the opinion of the court.

The plaintiff is the holder of bonds of the State of Minnesota, amounting to half a million of dollars, and seeks to charge certain lands in the possession of the defendant railroad companies with their payment. The bonds were issued in 1859, to the Southern Minnesota Railroad Company, under the authority of the constitutional amendment of April, 1858. That company was one of the four companies to which the Territory of Minnesota, on the 22d of May, 1857, granted the lands obtained by the act of Congress of March 3d of that year. The grant of the State was made in express terms, subject to the provisions of the act of Congress, and would have been thus subject without any declaration to that effect. The act of Congress only authorized a sale of one hundred and twenty sections for each road in advance of its construction. Any further disposition of the land along either road, was allowed only as the road was completed in divisions of twenty miles.

The Southern Minnesota Railroad Company was authorized to construct two of the lines mentioned in the act of Congress, and took, therefore, under the grant of the state, a title to two hundred and forty sections. No title to any greater quantity passed from the State. In allowing one hundred and twenty sections for each line to be disposed of before the construction of any part of the road, Congress intended to furnish aid for such preliminary work as is required in all similar undertakings. We do not understand that the complainant contends that the company acquired an interest in any other lands than the one hundred and twenty sections for each of its roads.

In July of that year, the lines of the two roads were definitely surveyed and located to the extent of the grading subsequently made, and maps of the surveys were filed in the General Land Office at Washington. But it does not appear that any other work for the construction of either of the roads was done during the year.

The Territory of Minnesota became a State in October, 1857, and was admitted into the Union in May, 1858. Its Constitution prohibited the loan of the State credit in aid of any corporation; but the first legislature assembled under it, being desirous of expediting the construction of the lines of road, in aid of which the congressional grant was made, proposed in March, 1858, an amendment to the Constitution, removing this prohibition so far as the four companies named in the act of May 22d, 1857, were concerned. The amendment was submitted to the people, and on the 15th of April, of the same year, was adopted. It provided, first, for the issue of bonds of the State to the railroad companies; second, for taking from them security for the payment of the interest, and against loss on the bonds thus issued; and, third, for a forfeiture of the lands and franchises of the companies in case certain portions of their respective roads were not completed within prescribed periods.

1st. The bonds were issued to each of the four companies, bearing interest at the rate of seven per cent. per annum, payable semi annually in the city of New York, to an amount not exceeding twelve hundred and fifty thousand dollars, in installments of one hundred thousand dollars, as often as any ten miles of its road was ready for placing the superstructure thereon, and an additional installment of the same amount as often as that number of miles of the road was fully completed and the cars were running thereon, until the whole amount authorized was issued. The bonds were to be denominated Minnesota State railroad bonds; they were to be signed by the governor, countersigned and registered by the treasurer, and sealed with the seal of the State; they were to be issued in denominations not exceeding one thousand dollars, payable to the order of the company to whom issued, transferable by endorsement of the president of the company, and redeemable at any time after ten and before the expiration of twenty-five years from their date; and for the payment of their interest and the redemption of their principal the faith and credit of the State were pledged.

2d. The security to be taken for the payment of the interest on the bonds received by each company, was to consist of an instrument pledging the net profits of its road, and the security against loss on the bonds was to consist of a conveyance to the State of the first two hundred and forty sections of land, free from prior incumbrances, which the company was or might be authorized to sell; and a transfer to the treasurer of the State of an amount of first mortgage bonds on the roads, lands, and franchises of the company corresponding in amount to the State bonds issued to it. The delivery of the first mortgage bonds necessarily implied the execution of a mortgage or deed of trust for their payment. In case either company made default in the payment of the interest or principal of the bonds issued to it by the governor, no more State bonds were to be thereafter issued to that company, and the governor was to proceed to sell, in such manner as might be prescribed by law, its bonds, or the lands held in trust, or require a foreclosure of the mortgage executed by the company to secure its bonds.

3d. Each company which accepted the bonds of the State was required, as a condition thereof, to complete not less than fifty miles of its road on or before the expiration of the year 1861, and not less than one hundred miles before the year 1864, and four-fifths of the entire length of its road before the year 1866; and the amendment declared that any failure on the part of the company to complete the number of miles of its road in the manner and within the several times thus prescribed, should forfeit to the State all the rights, title and interest of any kind whatsoever, in and to any lands granted by the act of May 22d, 1857, together with the franchises connected with the same, not pertaining to the portion of the road then constructed.

The Southern Minnesota Railroad Company accepted the amendment and executed the pledge of net profits and the conveyance of the two hundred and forty sections required. It also executed a deed of trust upon its roads and all its lands and franchises to secure its first mortgage bonds, to be transferred to the treasurer when State bonds were received. It then entered upon the construction of its roads and contracted with the plaintiff to grade and prepare the road-beds for the superstructure. During that and the following year, 1859, thirty-seven and a half miles of one of the roads and twenty miles of the other road, were thus graded by the plaintiff. As often as any ten miles of either of the roads were ready for the superstructure, the governor issued to the company bonds of the State to the amount of one hundred thousand dollars. Nearly all of these bonds, amounting to half a million of dollars, were transferred to the plaintiff for his work in grading the roads, and are still held by him. They were indorsed by the president of the company with a waiver of presentment, demand, and notice.

An act of the legislature passed on the 12th of August, 1858, required the first mortgage bonds of the company to be transferred to the treasurer, to be drawn so that the interest and principal should mature sixty days before the maturity of the interest and principal of the State bonds, and as the bonds of the company offered were accepted, we assume that they were so drawn. The act also provided for the foreclosure of the mortgage or deed of trust whenever default was made in the payment of either interest or principal.

The company never completed any part of either of its roads, and did nothing more than the grading mentioned, and it made default in the payment of the interest maturing upon the State bonds, and also in the payment of the interest accruing on its first mortgage bonds. The governor thereupon proceeded under the above act, and an act passed on the 6th of March, 1860, and procured a foreclosure of the mortgage of the company, and the roads, lands, and franchises which it covered were sold pursuant to its provisions, and at the sale were purchased by the State. This purchase took place in October. 1860, and the necessary conveyances were made to the State. From that time until the 4th of March, 1864, the State held the property, lands and franchises thus acquired. During this period, it made repeated efforts to induce other parties to undertake the enterprises and carry them to completion, but without success.

On the 4th of March, 1864, the legislature passed an act by which two new companies were organized: one, with the same name as the original company, The Southern Minnesota Railroad Company; and the other, by the name of the Minnesota Valley Railroad Company. The name of this latter company was afterwards changed to that of St. Paul and Sioux City Railroad Company.

To the companies thus organized the legislature granted, subject to certain conditions, all the property, rights, and franchises of the original company, which the State had acquired, "free from all claims and liens;" those which appertained to one of the lines were granted to the new Southern Minnesota Railroad Company; those which appertained to the other line were granted to the Minnesota Valley Railroad Company, now the St. Paul and Sioux City Railroad Company. The conditions annexed to the grants were complied with and the grants accepted. These new companies soon afterwards commenced the construction of their respective roads, and had, at the commencement of this suit, nearly completed them. The Southern Minnesota Railroad Company had constructed and equipped one hundred and sixty-seven miles of its road, at an expenditure of five millions of dollars; and the St. Paul and Sioux City Railroad Company had constructed and equipped one hundred and seventy miles of its road, at an expenditure of three millions of dollars.

Upon the completion of ten miles of its road each company received from the governor, pursuant to the provisions of the act, a deed in fee simple of one hundred and twenty sections of land appertaining to its road, to which the State was entitled under the congressional grant, and the bonds of the original Minnesota company transferred to the treasurer of the State were cancelled.

Pending these proceedings the bonds of the State in the hands of the complainant remained unpaid, and they are still unpaid. The faith of the State, solemnly pledged for the payment of both principal and interest, has never been kept. So far from keeping it, the State as early as November, 1860, adopted an amendment to its constitution prohibiting any law, which levied a tax or made other provision for such payment, from taking effect until the same had been submitted to a vote of the people and been adopted by them. This prohibition, if not a violation of the State's pledge, conflicts with its spirit. The bonds issued are legal obligations; the State is bound by every consideration of honor and good faith to pay them. Were she amenable to the tribunals of the country, as private individuals are, no court of justice would withhold its judgment against her in an action for their enforcement.

The complainant, under these circumstances, finding no relief from the pledged faith of the State, and unable to pursue any remedies at law against her on the bonds, seeks to charge with their payment the two hundred and forty sections mortgaged by the company under the amendment of 1858 and purchased by the State under the foreclosure of the mortgage, and now held by the defendant railroad companies.

The position of the complainant is, that notwithstanding the form of the contract, the original company was in fact the principal debtor, and the State its surety, and that as the creditor to be paid, he is entitled to have the securities taken by the State applied to the payment of the bonds held by him; that the one hundred and twenty sections for each road, which the company was authorized to construct, became its property by the act of May 22d, 1857; that the subsequent interest of the State under the trust deed and mortgage was only the right to hold them as security against loss upon its bonds; that this interest was not changed by the foreclosure of the mortgage and purchase of the State at the sale; and that the lands passed to the defendant railroad companies with notice that they were thus held by the State.

The general doctrine, that a creditor has a right to claim the benefit of a security given by his debtor to a surety for the latter's indemnity, and which may be used if necessary for the payment of the debt, is not questioned. The security in such case is in the nature of trust property, and the right of the creditor arises from the natural justice of allowing him to have applied to the discharge of his demand the property deposited with the surety for that purpose if required by the default of the principal. In this case the deed and mortgage to the State were not intended to create a trust in favor of the holders of her own bonds. The State was primarily liable to the bondholders; and it was only as between her and the company that the relation of principal and surety existed. It may be doubted whether the bondholders could call upon the company in any event. The indorsement made by the president simply transferred the bonds; it was not the act of the company. Be that as it may, whatever right the plaintiff had to compel the application of the lands received by the State to the payment of the bonds held by him, it was one resting in equity only. It was not a legal right arising out of any positive law or any agreement of the parties. It did not create any lien which attached to and followed the property. It was a right to be enforced, if at all, only by a court of chancery against the surety. But the State being the surety here, it could not be enforced at all, and not being a specific lien upon the property, cannot be enforced against the State's grantees.

Where property passes to the State, subject to a specific lien or trust created by law or contract, such lien or trust may be enforced by the courts, whenever the property comes under their jurisdiction and control. Thus, if property held by the government, covered by a mortgage of the original owner, should be transferred to an individual, the jurisdiction of the court to enforce the mortgage would attach, as it existed previous to the acquisition of the government. (The Siren, 7 Wallace, 158, 159.) But where the property is not affected by any specific lien or trust in the hands of the State, her transfer will pass an unencumbered estate.

But aside from this consideration, which of itself is a sufficient answer to the present suit, the long delay of the complainant in asserting any claim to the lands in controversy, whilst the defendants were constructing, at a vast expenditure of labor and money, their railroads, deprives his suit of favorable consideration. It does not appear that for twelve years after the abandonment of work by the original Minnesota company on the roads, the grading of which it commenced, he set up any claim such as is advanced in this suit. On the contrary, it is abundantly established that in various ways he urged upon members of the legislature the adoption of measures for the construction of the roads, which involved an appropriation by the State for that purpose of the lands in controversy; and that after the new companies were organized, and the lands were granted to them, he urged them to proceed with the enterprises, knowing that upon those lands they relied to carry on the works. Under these circumstances, it would be manifestly inequitable and unjust to grant his prayer.

The conclusion we have reached, renders it unnecessary to consider the effect of the alleged forfeiture, declared by the State, upon the interest of the company in the lands.

Decree affirmed.

THROUGH the courtesy of L. S. DIXON, late Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Wisconsin, and now of the law firm of Dixon, Hooker, Weggs & Noyes, of Milwaukee, we have received the following opinion:

SUPREME COURT OF WISCONSIN.

THE STATE ex rel A. J. DRAKE v. PETER DOYLE, Secretary of State.

THE JURISDICTION AND CONTROL OF THE FEDERAL COURTS OVER THE STATES BY ACTION AGAINST THEIR OFFICERS—THE POWER OF THE SUPREME COURT TO COMPEL THE SECRETARY OF STATE TO REVOKE A LICENSE ISSUED TO A FOREIGN INSURANCE COMPANY.

1. FOREIGN INSURANCE COMPANY.—Save by the voluntary license of the State, a foreign insurance company has no right to carry on its business within the State. The State sees fit to grant a license to it on the condition, instantly revocable upon condition broken. The insurance company breaks the condition, but claims the right, notwithstanding, to act under the license throughout the State. Here is a direct and approximate interest of the State, and raising a contingency requiring the interposition of the court to preserve the prerogatives of the State in its sovereign character.

2. THE STATUTE—DUTY OF SECRETARY.—The statute of the State devolves upon the Secretary of State the imperative duty of revoking the license of the insurance company, upon condition broken, and prohibits a renewal of the license for three years; that the statute is not void, and the license may be revoked without notice.

3. JUDICIAL POWERS.—That the duty of revocation does not impose judicial powers upon the Secretary of State.

4. THE CONDITION—THE FEDERAL CONSTITUTION.—That the statute of the State prescribing the condition upon which licenses shall be granted, is not a violation of the Federal Constitution.

5. UNCONSTITUTIONAL STATUTE.—That it is the settled doctrine of the Wisconsin Supreme court, that if it be unconstitutional, the whole statute authorizing licenses to foreign insurance companies is unconstitutional.

6. INJUNCTION BY FEDERAL COURT.—The court considers the effect of an injunction issued by a Federal Court, to restrain the Secretary of State from revoking a license.

7. SUIT IN FEDERAL COURT AGAINST STATE OFFICER.—The court examines the various opinions of the Supreme Court of the United States, and holds that where a suit is prosecuted in a Federal Court, by a private party, against a State officer, in which the State has a direct interest, but cannot be made a party, the officer himself must have an interest or liability in the subject matter, upon which the jurisdiction of the court can attach.

8. WHEN STATE THE REAL PARTY.—That when such a suit is prosecuted against a State officer, having no such interest or liability in his official capacity only, to affect a right of the State, the State is the real defendant within the prohibition of the amendment to the Constitution.

9. THE FEDERAL COURT NO POWER TO BIND THE STATE AS TO ITS OWN OFFICERS.—The court reviews the various decisions upon the subject, and holds that the State is not bound in the exercise of its authority by the proceedings of a Federal Court against its officer.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.

RYAN, C. J.—The facts of this case were discussed at the Bar, on the motion to quash the alternative writ. But as some of them did not then appear of record, we refrained from any expression of opinion in overruling the motion. All the material facts are now before us for final adjudication.

It appears by the return that the license of the Insurance Company in force when these proceedings were commenced, expired by limitation pending the alternative writ; and that some three days after the motion to quash the alternative writ was denied, the respondent renewed the license for another year. His doing so, under the circumstances, may have been an act of questionable propriety. But the fact itself is immaterial here, because it was agreed by counsel, if it were otherwise doubtful, that if a peremptory writ should be granted, it should cover any subsisting license issued by the respondent to the Insurance Company.

The motion to quash the alternative writ was argued for the respondent by the Attorney-General. The demurrer to the return was argued for the respondent by the learned counsel who represented the Insurance Company in the Federal Court, and a brief was afterward submitted on his behalf by the Attorney-General. Different questions were raised for the respondent by the different counsel, which will be considered in proper order.

I. It was stated by the Attorney General that the suit of the relator against the Insurance Company had been settled; that the relator has no further interest in the question, and therefore no further right to the writ. The fact does not appear of record, but it is immaterial.

So far as the private right of the relator is concerned, it is now well settled that this court would not assume original jurisdiction to enforce it. Attorney-General v. R. R. Cos, 35 Wis., 425; Attorney-General v. Eau Claire, 37 Wis., 340; State v. Baker, 38 Wis., 71; State v. Supervisors, Ib., 554. But, as it is said in Attorney-General v. Railroad Cos, "In a government like ours, public rights of the State and private rights of citizens often meet, and may well be involved in a single litigation. So it may be in the exercise of the original jurisdiction of the court. The prerogative writs can issue only at the suit of the State, or the Attorney General in the right of the State. They may go on the relation of a private person, and may involve private right." And the question before us is not upon the private right of the relator, and is independent of the accident that there is a relator in the case. The question on which the exercise of jurisdiction here must turn is, whether the subject matter of the writ is one "quod a statum reipublicæ pertinet; one affecting the sovereignty of the State, its franchises or prerogatives." Atty.-Genl. v. Eau Claire. And on this question there appears to us to be no room for doubt.

Save by the voluntary license of the State, the Insurance Company has no right to carry on its business within the State. The State sees fit to grant a license to it, upon condition, instantly revocable upon condition broken. The Insurance Company breaks the condition, but claims the right, notwithstanding, to act under the license throughout the State; claims that the condition is void, and that the license is therefore independent of the condition on which it was granted. And it assumes to carry on its business throughout the State, under the license, in defiance of the condition. Here is very plainly a direct and proximate interest of the State, affecting the State at large, in some of its prerogatives, and raising a contingency requiring the interposition of this court to preserve the prerogatives of the State in its sovereign character. Atty.-Genl. v. Eau Claire.

The statute of the State devolves upon the respondent the imperative duty of revoking the license of the Insurance Company, upon condition broken, and prohibits a renewal of the license for three years. The respondent claims that the statute so far is void, and wholly disregards it. Upon condition broken, he refuses to revoke the subsisting license of the Insurance Company, and upon its expiration, renews it. Whether the respondent be right or wrong in his view, and that is for this court and not for him to determine, it is very certain that it concerns the State at large, that one of its principal officers executes his office in positive and deliberate disregard of a public statute defining its duties.

Such a case, when presented, is one eminently calling for the exercise of our original jurisdiction; one, with or without a relator, eminently fit to be presented to the court for adjudication. The writ of mandamus, in such a case, eminently serves its function as a prerogative writ.

II. It was objected to the statute, by the learned counsel who argued the demurrer, that it provides for no notice to the Insurance Company, gives it no opportunity of being heard on the question of revocation for condition broken. It might have been more provident to have required such notice; but that rested entirely in legislative discretion. It was for the legislature alone to say whether or not the Insurance Company should have license to act within the State; and if so, on what conditions, and how revocable, such license should be granted. Authorizing such a license, out of its mere discretion, it was competent for the legislature to impose any conditions, reasonable or unreasonable, and to provide for revocation, upon any cause or no cause, in any manner it might see fit.

It was for the Insurance Company to elect whether it would seek or accept the license authorized, on the very terms on which it was offered, at its own peril of the very power of revocation reserved. And, having elected to accept the license, it cannot now set up a vested right in the license, inconsistent with the license and in defiance of the terms and conditions on which it was granted. It voluntarily ran the very risk of summary revocation, ex parte, to which it now objects. It took the license cum onere, and has no just ground of complaint that the license is not more favorable to its interests.

We have carefully examined the numerous authorities cited on this point, and are unable to discover the application of any of them to the revocation of a voluntary license, in the precise manner reserved in the license itself.

III. It was likewise urged that the duty of revocation imposed upon the Secretary of State, operates to confer judicial power upon that officer.

We cannot think that either the power to grant a license or the power to revoke it, involves the exercise of a judicial function. Both appear to us to be plainly and equally ministerial functions. The Secretary, upon certain facts appearing to him, is authorized to issue a license; upon certain other facts appearing to him, is required to revoke it. This is a common condition of ministerial duty. In such a case, the ministerial officer must exercise his personal intelligence in ascertaining the fact upon which his authority is founded; but he acts upon his peril of the fact, and can in no sense be said to exercise a judicial function. If the use of personal judgment in such cases should be held to be judicial, the distinction between ministerial and judicial functions would be very much removed.

The Secretary of State is a ministerial officer, authorized by law to perform different duties, upon different contingencies. If he make mistakes of fact in the performance of his functions, his action may be void or voidable, only, in different circumstances. But he cannot judicially determine the facts on which he acts or refuses to act. This can only be done by the courts, whose duty it is, in proper cases, to review his action and determine the facts and his official duty upon them.

IV. It is contended, not that the statute of the State prescribing the condition upon which license shall be granted, is a violation of the Federal constitution, but that it has been so adjudged by the Supreme Court of the United States, and that thereupon and thereby the statute has ceased to have any force.

For the purpose, as Waite, C. J., remarks, (20 Wall., 459) of putting foreign insurance companies, licensed to do business in this State, upon equal footing with its own companies, sec. 22 of chap. 56, of 1870, requires foreign companies, before license, to file an agreement in the secretary's office, not to remove causes against them from the State to the Federal courts.

In Morse v. Ins. Co., 30 Wis., 496, the Insurance Company had, in violation of its agreement, petitioned the State court to remove the cause from the State to the Federal Court, under the Act of Congress. This court held the agreement to be a valid relinquishment of the right of such removal, obligatory upon the Insurance Company, and gave judgment against it. The judgment of this court was taken by writ of error to the Supreme Court of the United States. And that court in Ins. Co. v. Morse, 20 Wall., 445, reversed the judgment of this court, upon the ground that such an agreement did not deprive the Insurance Company of the right of removal to the Federal Court, under the constitution and laws of the United States.

The question was certainly not free from difficulty; and while we think, with all due deference, that the weight of authority and sound principle sustain the views of this court, it is our duty and pleasure to submit to the decision of the Federal Court, on a point unquestionably within its final jurisdiction.

Under that decision, it follows that the jurisdiction of the State Court in that case was ousted, upon the presentation of the petition to remove the cause to the Federal Court, and that all subsequent proceedings in the State Courts were coram non judice. Gordon v. Longest, 16 Peters, 97; Kanonse v. Martin, 15 How., 198; Ins. Co. v. Dunn, 19 Wall., 214.

The sole question, therefore, before the Federal Court, upon the writ of error in Ins. Co. v. Morse, was whether the right of the Insurance Company to remove the cause to the Federal Court remained, notwithstanding the agreement. Upon that point only, is the judgment in that case conclusive on this court; upon that point only, is the opinion of that court authoritative with this.

"This court, and other courts organized under the common law, has never held itself bound by any part of an opinion, in any case, which was not needful to the ascertainment of the right or title in question between the parties. In Cohens v. The State of Virginia, 6 Wheat., 399, this court was much pressed with some portion of its opinion in the case of Marbury v. Madison. And Mr. Chief Justice Marshall said, 'It is a maxim not to be disregarded that general expressions in every opinion are to be taken in connection with the case in which those expressions are used. If they go beyond the case they may be respected, but ought not to control the judgment in a subsequent suit, when the very point is presented. The reason of this maxim is obvious. The question actually before the court is investigated with care, and considered in its full extent; other principles which may serve to illustrate it are considered in their relation to the case decided, but their possible bearing on all other cases is seldom completely investigated.' The cases of Ex parte Christy, 3 How., 292, and Jenness et al. v. Peck, 7 How., 612, are an illustration of the rule that any opinion given here or elsewhere cannot be relied on as a binding authority, unless the case called for its expression. Its weight of reason must depend on what it contains." Carroll v. Carroll, 16 How., 275. The rule is elementary, but we choose to give in the words of the court to whose opinion we consider it presently applicable.

Ins. Co. v. Morse, was decided by a divided court. The opinion of the majority, delivered by Mr. Justice Hunt, applies to the agreement of the Insurance Company, not to remove the cause to a Federal court, the general and familiar rule, that parties cannot, by contract, oust the ordinary courts of their jurisdiction; citing to that effect several cases, English and American; and quoting the rule from Story's Eq., sec. 670, in these words: "And where the stipulation, though not against the policy of the law, yet is an effort to divest the ordinary jurisdiction of the common tribunals of justice, such as an agreement in case of any disputes, to refer the same to arbitrators, courts of equity will not, any more than courts of law, interfere to enforce that agreement; but they will leave the parties to their own good pleasure in regard to such agreements. The regular administration of justice might be greatly impeded or interfered with by such stipulations, if they were specifically enforced."

Having held the rule to be otherwise applicable to the agreement of the Insurance Company, the opinion proceeds to inquire, whether the agreement gains validity from the statute of the State requiring it; and holds that it does not, because the right of removal is given by the Constitution and laws of the United States, and therefore the majority of that court reversed the judgment of this court, on the ground that the petition to remove the cause to the Federal Court had ousted the jurisdiction of the State court.

So far, the opinion deals with the question involved in the case. Having so held, the opinion had exhausted the question before the court; had exhausted its appellate jurisdiction to this court; had exhausted its concern with the statute of the State. In its own view of the question before it, the only concern of that court with the statute of the State, was, whether it could operate to take the agreement out of the general rule held to be applicable to it. The agreement was directly before the court; the statute at best was only before the court collaterally. And we may be pardoned for suggesting that, the validity of the statute not being directly involved in the decision, the declaration that it is unconstitutional, overlooked the universal rule of all American courts, sanctioned by that court (Cooper v. Telfair, 4 Dallas, 14; Parsons v. Bedford, 3 Pet., 433; United States v Coombs, 12 Pet., 72), that courts will avoid an interpretation or application of a statute rendering it unconstitutional; and will hold one so, only in plain and peremptory cases, and with the domestic policy of the statute, with the right of the State to refuse license to insurance companies refusing to make the agreement, that court had no concern.

"This court has no authority to revise the act of (Wisconsin), upon any grounds of justice, policy or consistency to its own Constitution. These are concluded by the decision of the public authorities of the State. The only inquiry for this court is, does the act violate the Constitution of the United States, or the treaties and laws made under it?" Carpenter v. Pennsylvania, 17 How., 456.

The statute of the State does not assume to prohibit insurance companies taking license under it, from removing actions on its policies from State to Federal courts. It only provides that no insurance company shall be licensed under it, which shall not file an agreement not to remove them. So that the question in Ins. Co. v. Morse was not whether the statute was in violation of the right of removal, but whether the voluntary agreement of the Insurance Company was obligatory upon it. The only question upon the statute before the court was, whether it could operate to give validity to the agreement, held to be otherwise invalid. And it is sufficiently plain that the validity of the agreement, and the validity of the statute requiring the agreement, are entirely distinct questions. The invalidity of the agreement has been determined by the court of last resort on the subject, but the statute remains. And we take it that no provision in the Constitution, laws or treaties of the United States is violated by a statute of the State prohibiting the license of the State to foreign corporations to do business within it, upon any condition whatever. The right of the State to refuse such license is absolute; and, being absolute, it may be exercised at absolute discretion, not to be questioned or abridged, anywhere, under any pretense. It was within the appellate jurisdiction of the Federal Court to refuse effect to the agreement, as ousting the jurisdiction of the Federal courts; but it is not within its jurisdiction to hold foreign insurance companies entitled to license without the agreement. It can hold an insurance company not bound by the agreement when made, as repugnant to the Constitution and laws of the United States; but it cannot excuse the agreement, as a condition precedent to license under the State statute. So far, the statute stands outside of its appellate jurisdiction; raising a pure question of State policy and economy, in a matter within the absolute pleasure of the State. Conceding the invalidity of the agreement, the statute still prohibits license, within the mere discretion of the State, without the agreement; and the statutory license cannot issue without it. In authorizing voluntary licenses, with absolute right to annex any condition to them, the State may exact agreements morally although not legally binding on the licenses. It may be presumed there is some sense of decency even among corporations. It may be presumed that not every insurance company will voluntarily make such an agreement, as a condition of a voluntary and advantageous license, and then deliberately violate it, even with the sanction of the Supreme Court of the United States. In any view, such a violation is a scandalous breach of good faith, indicating a disposition to bad faith in all the dealings of the company. And, though the agreement be not obligatory in law, yet has the State a right to trust to it, as obligatory in conscience; and to refuse licenses to all insurance companies refusing to execute it. In that view of it, the Federal Court has no appellate jurisdiction over the statute; and the declaration that it is unconstitutional was brutum fulmen. To that extent, at least, the State retains power over foreign corporations seeking to do business within it. The statute is indeed inoperative to give validity to the agreement, ousting the urisdiction of the Federal courts. So the Supreme Court of the United States has decided. But it is operative to prescribe the conditions on which the State, in the exercise of its sovereign authority, sees fit to license foreign corporations within it. That is for this court, not that, to determine. No foreign insurance company need come here under the agreement; coming, every foreign insurance company violating the agreement is guilty of a moral fraud upon the State. And, in upholding the statute to this extent, against the extra judicial dictum of the Supreme Court of the United States, we may quote in our own behalf the language of one of the great chief justices of that court: "A sanction is claimed to a breach of trust, and a violation of moral principle. In such a case, the mind submits reluctantly to the rule of law, and laboriously searches for something which shall reconcile that rule with what would seem to be the dictate of abstract justice." Hannay v. Eve., 3 Cranch, 242.

The provision in sec. 22 of chap 56 of 1870, requiring the agreement as a condition of license, was alone before the court in Ins. Co. v. Morse. And so far we have considered it by itself. But this writ is applied for, not under that section, but under chap. 64 of 1872. And the two statutes, taken together, put the whole subject in a view, which was not before the court in that case, and could not properly be in any case of its appellate jurisdiction. The former statute requires the agreement; the latter statute provides for the revocation of any license issued, upon violation of the agreement. And, the agreement being invalid to oust the jurisdiction of the Federal courts, the two provisions together are equivalent to one, requiring the revocation of a license issued to a foreign insurance company, upon its application to remove an action on its policy, from a State to a Federal Court.

The statute extended to these foreign insurance companies the privilege of doing business in this State, on equal footing with domestic companies. Experience showed their power to harass the citizens of the State doing business with them, by removing actions on their policies from courts of the vicinage, to distant and expensive tribunals. Hence the provisions of both statutes. And, conceding to the fullest extent the right of removal of actions commenced, we can see no pretense for questioning the power of the State, in the exercise of its absolute discretion on the subject, to revoke the license of a company exercising the right. The State has power to make its voluntary license subject to forbearance of a right, and revocable upon its exercise. The right may survive the license, but the license cannot survive its exercise. So, grants are sometimes made upon condition to forbear a right. It was for the authorities of the State alone to judge that the exercise of the right is an abuse of the privilege of the license. With that question, the Federal courts have no concern. They can hold, as they have, that the right exists impending actions; but they have no jurisdiction over the question whether foreign corporations, exercising the right, shall be permitted by the State to do business within it. That is matter of State policy, State law, State jurisdiction.

The distinction between the validity of the agreement, and the validity of the statute, is readily illustrated. It is quite clear that the Secretary of State takes no authority under the statute, to license a foreign insurance company not executing the agreement. That is a condition precedent to his authority. This court would assuredly refuse to compel him to act in disregard of the statute which confers his authority. And we take it that the Supreme Court of the United States would hardly claim appellate jurisdiction to review our decision, or to compel a State officer to act officially for the State, in disregard of the letter of his authority, on the ground that the agreement, when executed, is inoperative to oust the jurisdiction of the Federal Court.

It appears to us to be very plain that the statute of 1870 is valid enactment; that its validity was not involved in the decision of Ins. Co. v. Morse; that its validity, as a limitation upon the issue of licenses under State authority, was not within the appellate jurisdiction of the court; and that the declaration in the opinion that it is repugnant to the Constitution and laws of the United States and therefore void, is but an improvident and erroneous expression of the learned judge who delivered the opinion. With all due deference, we may be permitted to say of it what Lord Mansfield said of a dictum of Chief Justice Holt: "That is obiter saying only; and not a resolution or determination of the court, or a direct solemn opinion of the great judge, from whom it dropped." Saunderson v. Rowles, 4 Burr, 2064.

The opinion proceeds to discuss the relations of foreign corporations to the State in a scope wholly foreign to the judgment in the case, and in a tone inconsistent with decided cases in that court, and therefore, so far, of no authority there or here. It is sufficient for this case that that great tribunal has frequently and uniformly held that the corporations of one State have no right to migrate to another, there to exercise their franchises, except upon the assent of such other State; and that such assent may be granted upon such terms and conditions as the State granting it may think proper to impose. Ins. Co. v. French, 18 How., 404; Paul v. Virginia, 8 Wall., 168; Ducat v. Chicago, 18 Wall., 410; Ins. Co. v. Massachusetts, Ib. 566; Osborn v. Mobile, 16 Wall., 479.

Paul v. Virginia was the case of an insurance company of New York, doing business in Virginia, under a statute of the latter State, prohibiting foreign insurance companies from doing business there, without license to be granted upon conditions precedent. It was decided as late as 1868, and the court uses this language:

"The corporation being the mere creation of local law, can have no legal existence beyond the limits of the sovereignty where created. As said by this court in Bank of Augusta v. Earle; 'It must dwell in the place of its creation, and cannot migrate to another sovereignty.' The recognition of its existence even by other States, and the enforcement of its contracts made therein, depend purely upon the comity of those States—a comity which is never extended where the existence of the corporation or the exercise of its powers are prejudicial to their interests or repugnant to their policy. Having no absolute right of recognition in other States, but depending for such recognition and the enforcement of its contracts upon their assent, it follows, as a matter of course, that such assent may be granted upon such terms and conditions as those States may think proper to impose. They may exclude the foreign corporation entirely; they may restrict its business to particular localities, or they may exact such security for the performance of its contracts with their citizens, as, in their judgment, will best promote the public interest. The whole matter rests in their discretion." And this doctrine is expressly affirmed in Ducat v. Chicago, a like case in 1870.

The doctrine is so sound in itself, and so many of the decisions of that court on other subjects would be disturbed or subverted by a departure from it, that we feel safe in holding it to be the settled law of the Federal Supreme Court, notwithstanding intimations to the contrary in the opinion in Ins. Co. v. Morse; another reason for regarding these as not sufficiently considered, as is apt to be the case with all obiter dicta.

V. But if we should be mistaken in all this, if the provision of the statute of 1870 requiring the agreement, be unconstitutional, there is another view of the case, in our judgment, conclusive of it.

Morse v. Ins. Co. was decided in 1874, and reported in 1875. The legislature of the State has since been in session, and there is no doubt that their attention was called to the decision. Yet, though they have since enacted at least one statute, chap. 300 of 1876, amending the general insurance laws, they have not repealed or modified the provision requiring the agreement. This is a strong confirmation of our view, derived from the statute itself and its history, that the legislature would not have adopted or retained the statute authorizing licenses to foreign insurance companies, without the provision for the agreement. It is not an independent provision, to fall by itself.

The other provisions of the statute in regard to license, cannot be executed independently of it. It was evidently designed as a compensation for the provisions authorizing licenses—an inducement to them. And it is the settled doctrine of this court that, if it be unconstitutional, the whole statute authorizing licenses to foreign insurance companies is unconstitutional. Slauson v. Racine, 13 Wis., 398; Lynch v. The "Economy," 27 Wis., 69; State v. Dousman, 28 Wis., 541.

In that view of the statute, no license to foreign insurance companies would be authorized by law; the Secretary of State would have acted without color of authority in issuing the license in question; the license would give no color of right to the Insurance Company to do business within the State; and it would be our undoubted duty to compel the secretary to undo an official act, done without authority, an infringement upon the prerogatives of the State, and a usurpation of its sovereign authority.

VI. The return pleads in bar of the peremptory writ, an injunction of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Western District of Wisconsin, issued upon a bill filed in that court, by the Insurance Company against the Secretary of State; restraining that officer from revoking the license of the State to the Insurance Company, and the brief of the Attorney-General takes the position that the Federal Court had jurisdiction of the bill; and that jurisdiction of the subject-matter having first attached in that court, the jurisdiction of that court is exclusive of the jurisdiction of this.

Upon the application to us for the alternative writ, the learned counsel for the relator made a statement, repeated on both arguments without contradiction, which has left a very painful impression on our minds. He stated that as early as July, 1875, the petition for the alternative writ was filed, and the writ issued, and we think served, in one of the Circuit Courts of this State; that upon the suggestion of the Attorney-General, in September, that the petition should, for convenience, be withdrawn from that court and immediately filed in this; the relator's counsel assented, withdrew the petition from the Circuit Court and sent it to the Attorney General to be at once filed in this court, according to the suggestion; that the relator's counsel understood it to be so filed here, and the alternative writ issued; that it was not so filed; but that in the meantime the proceeding was taken, and the injunction issued in the Federal Court, of which the relator's counsel had no notice. It does not appear by the record of the proceeding annexed to the return, that the Secretary of State or the Attorney-General appeared in the Federal Court, or made any objection to the injunction. Indeed, the record implies that there was no such appearance or objection. As the facts, except, perhaps, the last, do not appear of record, we are without power to act upon them; but, if they are correctly stated, the present objection to our jurisdiction to issue the writ, appears to us to come with an ill grace from the chief law-officer of the State. For it would be a grave encroachment upon the sovereign authority of the State, if State officers could so transfer judicial control over their official action for the State, and the prerogative jurisdiction of this court, to an inferior Federal Court. But it is quite certain that the Federal Court has not jurisdiction to bind the State, or to foreclose the authority of the State courts, on behalf of the State, over its own officers, in their duty to it under its own law.

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

OPINION FILED JUNE 30, 1875.

THE PACIFIC HOTEL COMPANY v. JOSEPH POLLACK et al.

Appeal from Cook.

POWERS OF THE BOARD OF EQUALIZATION TO ASSESS CAPITAL STOCK OF CORPORATIONS—RULES FOR SO DOING.

1. THE LOCAL ASSESSOR.—That the local assessor is not required to fix any valuation upon the capital stock; the return to be made by him is merely of certain facts which may be important in enabling the State Board of Equalization to fix its value; that this return is not necessary to give the State Board jurisdiction to assess the capital stock of a particular corporation.
2. NOT A BOARD OF REVIEW.—That, so far as this class is concerned, the board does not act as a board of review, but as an original assessor.
3. THE EVIDENCE.—That the schedule is but one form of presumptive evidence of that which admits other forms of proof equally satisfactory, for the purpose of ascertaining the data for the application of the rule adopted by the board.
4. THE RULE.—The court states the rule and manner of assessing the capital stock of corporations.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.

Opinion by SCHOLFIELD, J.,

The bill in this case prays that the collection of all taxes levied upon the capital stock of the Pacific Hotel Company, as assessed by the Board of Equalization for the taxes of the year 1873, be enjoined. Demurrer was sustained to the bill by the court below, and the correctness of that ruling is questioned upon grounds, the sufficiency of which, we shall now attempt to consider.

By section thirty-two of the revenue act in force July 1st, 1872, it is required that companies and associations incorporated under the laws of this State (other than banks organized under the general banking laws of this State) shall, in addition to the other property required by this act to be listed, make out and deliver to the assessor a sworn statement of the amount of its capital stock, setting forth particularly "1. The name and location of the company or association; 2d. The amount of capital stock authorized, and the number of shares into which such capital stock is divided; 3d. The amount of capital stock paid up; 4th. The market value, or if no market value, then the actual value of the shares of stock; 5th. The total amount of all indebtedness, except the indebtedness for current expenses, excluding from such expenses the amount paid for the purchase or improvement of property; 6th. The assessed valuation of all its tangible property." Such schedule shall be made in conformity to such instruction and forms as may be prescribed by the auditor of public accounts. "In all cases of failure or refusal of any person, officer, company or association to make such return or statement, it shall be the duty of the assessor to make such return or statement from the best information which he can obtain."

Section thirty-three requires that "such statements shall be scheduled by the assessor and such schedule with the statements so scheduled shall be returned by the assessor to the county clerk, said clerk shall at the time he makes his report of assessments forward to the auditor all such schedules and statements so returned to him. The auditor shall annually, on the meeting of the State Board of Equalization, lay before said board the schedules and statements herein required to be returned to him; and said board shall value and assess the capital stock of such companies or associations in the manner provided in this act." Which is as prescribed by section three "to ascertain and determine respectively the fair cash value of such capital stock including the franchise, over and above the assessed value of the tangible property of such company or association." It is alleged in the bill that the valuation or assessment of appellant's capital stock is grossly unequal, unfair and oppressive, and was made in fraud of its right; and it shows that in listing its property, appellant omitted to list its capital stock or indebtedness in addition to its tangible property, for the reason that neither the auditor of public accounts nor the duly authorized assessor furnished it with the instructions or forms, in conformity with which such return is required to be made, or made demand for such return."

The position is taken and discussed with much ability by the counsel for appellant, that this renders the tax levied upon its capital stock absolutely void, and among other cases cited in its support are, Graves v. Bruen et al., 11th Ill., 439; Tibbetts v. Job et al., Id., 460; Schuymler et al v. Hull, Id., 463; Marsh v. Chestnut, 14th Id., 223; Billings v. Dutton, 15th Id., 218.

In our opinion, there is an important distinction between the returns required by the statutes in those cases, and that required by the section under consideration and the principle controlling there, has no necessary application here. In the cases in the 11th of Illinois, the listing included the valuation of the property upon which the rate per cent. of taxation levied had to be computed and extended for collection. Without a return, therefore, there was nothing upon which to compute the amount the tax-payer should pay, there being no authority to determine it otherwise than upon computation, based upon the assessed valuation of his property. In the last two cases cited, the listing also included the valuation of the property upon which the rate per cent. of taxation levied had to be computed and extended for collection, and it was essential the return should be made within the time prescribed by the statute, to allow the tax payer an opportunity to inspect the return and prepare for the hearing of his objections to the assessment. Here, however, the local assessor is not required to fix any valuation upon the capital stock; the return to be made by him is merely of certain facts which may be important in enabling the State Board of Equalization to fix its value. Nor do we understand this return is essential to give the State Board of Equalization jurisdiction to assess the capital stock of a particular corporation. So far as this class of property is concerned, it does not act as a board of review, but as an original assessor. The law enjoins upon it as a duty, not to assess the capital stock of such corporation as shall be returned or reported to it by the auditor, but to assess the capital stock of each company or association respectively, now or hereafter incorporated under the laws of this State. (Revenue Law of 1872, § 108.) This is to be done, not from the evidence of the schedule alone, for there is nothing in the language of the section, or of the act, that makes it conclusive for any purpose, but necessarily from such sources of information as shall be satisfactory to the minds of the members of the board. They, as well as local assessors, act in making assessments, under the solemnity of an oath, and in discharging every enjoined duty in the absence of specific statutory limitations, must resort to such appropriate means as they shall deem necessary to enlighten their understandings and satisfy their consciences. That this is so in regard to local assessors in fixing valuations, has never, so far as we are aware, been seriously questioned. The only difference between an assessment by a board and an individual, is manifestly but the difference between ascertaining the judgment of a single mind and the aggregate judgment of a number of minds. The same evidence operates equally on the mind whether the individual acts alone or in conjunction with others, although in the latter case concession or compromise may become indispensable to reach a result by reason of the differences in mental organization. To the extent, therefore, that it is feasible for the State Board of Equalization, in assessing capital stock, to act as a local assessor does in ascertaining the value of property which he assesses, we are unable to comprehend why it may not do so. If in this we are not in error, it then follows it was competent for the members of the State Board of Equalization to resort to such sources of information, in this respect, as shall be most satisfactory to themselves, and it can admit of no contsoversy that they might become enlightened as to the value of capital stock by information, although it should not be communicated in the precise form prescribed by the schedule.

It is true, when the board adopts a rule by which to be governed, it should be adhered to until it shall be repealed and a new one adopted in its stead, but the data essential to the application of the rule adopted by the board in the present instance, and the reasonableness

We call attention to the following opinions, reported at length in this issue.

PAYING DUTIES UNDER PROTEST.—The opinion of the United States Supreme Court, by BRADLEY, J., as to the practice of paying duties under protest, and stating within what time notice of dissatisfaction must be given, and within what time an appeal may be taken from the decision of the collector.

LAND GRANT CONSTRUED.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States, by FIELD, J., holding that the act of Congress of March 3d, 1857, granting certain lands to the Territory of Minnesota, for the purpose of aiding in the construction of several lines of railroad between different points in the same territory, only authorized for each road, in advance of its construction, a sale of one hundred and twenty sections; no further disposition of the land along either road was allowed, except as the road was completed in divisions of twenty miles; that where land is conveyed to the State by a corporation, as indemnity against loss on her bonds loaned to it, the bondholders have no equity for the application of the land to the payment of the bonds, which can be enforced against the State, and her grantees take the property discharged of any claim of the bondholders.

THE JURISDICTION AND CONTROL OF THE FEDERAL COURTS OVER THE STATES BY ACTION AGAINST THEIR OFFICERS.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of Wisconsin, by RYAN, C. J., holding that where a suit is prosecuted in a Federal Court, by a private party, against a State officer, in which the State has a direct interest, but cannot be made a party, the officer himself must have an interest or liability in the subject-matter upon which the jurisdiction of the court can attach; that when such a suit is prosecuted against a State officer having no such interest or liability in his official capacity only to affect a right of the State, the State is the real defendant within the meaning of the prohibition of the amendment to the Constitution; that a State is not bound, in the exercise of its authority by the proceedings of a Federal Court against its officer. In this case the court held that it had the power to enter an order requiring the Secretary of State to revoke a license, which he had improperly issued to a foreign insurance company. This opinion, delivered by the learned chief justice, will attract universal attention in legal circles throughout the Union. It is bold and aggressive, and goes further than any opinion of the Supreme Court of South Carolina in sustaining the doctrine of State rights.

WHEN MARRIAGE REVOKES A WILL—THE STATUTE PROSPECTIVE—THE SEPARATE ESTATE OF A MARRIED WOMAN.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of this State by SHELDON, J., holding that under the act of 1845, a married woman might dispose of her separate estate by will; that under the act of 1861, all a married woman's property is made her sole and separate property; that the enactment which went into force July, 1, 1872, that "a marriage shall be deemed a revocation of a prior will," was prospective in effect and had reference only to marriages which should take place thereafter, and did not apply to marriages which had taken place prior to the passage of the act. We regard this as an exceedingly important opinion in several particulars. One of the most important being the defining what is to be regarded as a married woman's separate estate. We know quite a number of good common-law lawyers, who have been of the opinion that a married woman could only devise by will what was known under the old English law as "her separate estate." The court is evidently correct in holding that a married woman may now devise all her property.

ASSESSING CAPITAL STOCK.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of Illinois by SCHOLFIELD, J., defining the powers of the State Board of Equalization to assess the capital stock of corporations, and stating the manner of making the assessment.

SUPREME COURT OF TENNESSEE.

KNOXVILLE, MAY 15, 1876.

ALLEN HOLLAND v. L. LOCKE et al.

MATERIAL ALTERATION.—Striking out all the names except one of several payees, to a bill single, is a material alteration.

BURDEN OF PROOF.—It rests upon the holder of the paper to show that the alteration was not made by him, before he can recover on the note.

STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS.—The note being out of the way, the claim is barred by the statute of limitations.—[ED. Commercial and Legal Reporter.

MCFARLAND, J.—The note or bill single in controversy was originally made payable to the several persons who sold the slave, the consideration of the note; but when the note is produced upon the beginning of this litigation, it appears that all the names of the payees have been stricken out, by drawing lines across them, except one, James W. Gillespie, and on this ground the maker of the note (Locke) pleaded non est factum to the action at law. This was a material change of the obligation, and if made by the obligees or owners of the note, or any of them, without the knowledge or consent of the obligor, it would amount, in law, to an alteration, and would be fatal to a recovery. If the names were stricken out by a stranger, it would be termed a "spoliation," and a recovery might be had upon it, if enough remained to determine its identity and its terms; otherwise, secondary evidence might be resorted to. Crocket v. Thomason, 5 Sneed, 342.

It does not appear in the present case who made the change in the writing, but it appears that the obligor, Locke, did not know of or consent to the change, and it was incumbent upon the parties claiming under the note, and who produced it, to explain the alteration, which they have failed to do, and there can be no recovery upon it.

The complainant, who claims to be the equitable owner of the note, can stand upon no higher ground, and claim no greater right than the payees of the note.

The complainant can have no recovery against Locke upon the footing of the original consideration, because the slave was not sold to the defendant Locke, but to his sister, and Locke only became bound by his note, if at all; and, secondly, the note or bill single being out of the way, any indebtedness arising upon the original sale of the slave is clearly barred by the statute of limitation, which was pleaded and relied upon.

The decree of the Chancellor dismissing the bill will be affirmed. The complainant will pay the costs of this court; the costs of the court below as decreed by the Chancellor.

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

ABSTRACTS OF OPINIONS FILED AT OTTAWA, JUNE 30, 1876.

61.—John Wilson v. Henry Kruse.—Appeal from Peoria.—Opinion by BREESE, J., reversing and remanding.

AMENDMENTS OF ATTACHMENT AFFIDAVIT—DEED—COLOR OF TITLE.

Amendments of affidavits in attachment—legal presumptions as to affidavits and issuing writs—proceedings—executions—limitations—color of title—payment of taxes—transfer by appeal—description of land—second sheriff's deed—effect thereof.

STATEMENT.—Suit in ejectment—pleas; outstanding title in another party; and statute of limitations. The title claimed was under proceedings in attachment. This was claimed to be void, on the ground that there was no affidavit filed; and this being a jurisdictional fact, the court acquired no jurisdiction in the attachment suit—the paper purporting to be an affidavit not being properly sworn to, as it was alleged. The writ of attachment recited that the plaintiff had complained on oath, etc. Held,

1. That it is not to be presumed that a clerk makes a false recital in a writ; or that he would issue a writ of attachment without the oath required.

2. If an affidavit was not, in fact, sworn to, it could have been amended under section 8 of the statute; and, if amendable on objection, it cannot be held void. It would be error to refuse an amendment to the affidavit, however defective it might be, and even if it were sworn to before an improper officer.

3. Even, where an affidavit for attachment had written on it by a judge, the words "subscribed and sworn to before me," but the signature of the judge was omitted—the order, however, of the judge being inscribed below these words, that the writ should issue—this was held to show, by strong implication, that the affidavit was sworn to. (English v. Wall 12 Rob., 132.)

4. Attachment proceedings cannot be attacked on the ground that the jurat of the affidavit was not signed by the officer, if, in fact, it be shown that the oath was administered by him.

5. A defective affidavit in attachment is not void; and can be attacked only in a direct proceeding.

6. Where it is alleged that it does not appear that the sheriff attached the property of the defendant, this objection does not go to the jurisdiction of the court, but only to the regularity of the proceedings under the writ.

7. Where an attachment was pending in the County Court at the time of the repeal of the statute conferring such jurisdiction upon it, the cause was transferred by the repealing statute to the Circuit Court, which had then the same jurisdiction as if the cause had originated therein.

8. Objections to the regularity of attachment proceedings after jurisdiction attaches, are of no consequence collaterally.

9. In attachment, only a special execution can issue, but this may issue although a general execution was awarded in the judgment.

10. As to the description of land in a sheriff's deed, the rule is, when there are two descriptions—the one complete of itself, and the other indeterminate—the incorrect description may be rejected as surplusage, and the complete description be allowed to stand alone.

11. If a sheriff's deed be defective—as for want of a seal—and he afterwards makes a good deed to the grantee, the latter deed relates back to the time of execution of the defective deed. And a sheriff can be required and compelled to make a correct deed. The law is well settled that for the advancement of a right, and for the furtherance of justice, and when the rights of third parties will not be injuriously affected, a deed will have relation to, and take effect from, the time the parties were entitled to receive it.

12. Color of title requires that an instrument professes to convey the title, but not that the title, when traced to its source, should prove to be an apparently legal title.

13. Payment of taxes thereunder may be by a tenant.

69.—Herman B. Goodrich v. David C. Cook.—Error to Superior Court of Cook.—Opinion by SCHOLFIELD, J., affirming at appellant's costs.

PROCEEDINGS AFTER JUDGMENT—PRESUMPTION—COSTS.

Orders in a cause—proceedings after judgment—presumption as to certificate of evidence, etc.—supplemental record—costs on successful party in the Supreme Court, when. Held,

1. That while a court cannot make an order in a cause after it has been finally decided and passed beyond its control, yet this does not militate against the right of a court before whom an action at law, or in chancery, has been tried, to give time to prepare a bill of exceptions, or certificate of evidence, for the judge's signature; nor prohibit the filing of a bill of exceptions, or certificate of evidence, properly signed in apt time by the judge, after the decree has been entered up.

2. As to a certificate of evidence, the presumption is that it was presented and signed at the right time, and that, otherwise, the judge would not have signed it; and the mere fact that it was not filed until a later day, does not rebut that presumption.

3. When a supplemental record is filed, it becomes a part of the record, in a case appealed, as if it had been incorporated in the original record.

4. Where an appellee is at fault in not having had a certificate of evidence filed in the office of the clerk of the court below, before appellant sued out his writ of error, he will be taxed with all the costs made in the Supreme Court.

70.—Anson Sperry, guardian, etc. v. Patrick Fanning.—Error to Superior Court of Cook.—Opinion by CRAIG, J., affirming.

PERSONAL LIABILITY OF GUARDIAN ON CONTRACTS FOR HIS WARD—GENERAL PRINCIPLES.

STATEMENT.—A minor ward owned lots in Chicago. Appellant (guardian) executed a contract for erecting buildings thereon, signing his name as guardian, and having no order from court. Held,

1. There is a marked distinction between the agreement of an agent, who describes himself as contracting for a principal, and the covenant of a principal, who contracts by and through an agent. The former may be regarded as the personal contract of the agent; while the latter may be held to be the undertaking of the principal.

2. The mere use, by a promissor, of the name of trustee, or of any other name of office, will not discharge him. Some one must be bound by the contract, and if he does not bind some other, he binds himself; and the official name is then only regarded as one of description.

3. Accordingly, a guardian cannot, by his own contract, bind the person or estate of his ward; but if he promise, on a sufficient consideration, to pay the debt of his ward, he is personally bound by his promise, although he expressly promised as guardian. And it is a sufficient consideration if that promise discharges the debt of his ward; and he may thus discharge the debt of his ward, and then lawfully indemnify himself out of the ward's estate; or, if he be discharged from his guardianship, he may have an action against the ward for money paid to his use.

78.—Peter Stubher v. Christian Belsey.—Error to Woodford.—Opinion by SCOTT, J., partly reversing.

EQUITY JURISDICTION—WHEN AND WHERE CONSTRUCTION OF LEGAL RIGHTS MUST BE SOUGHT—REVIEW OF DECREE BY AGREEMENT NOT ENTERTAINED.

STATEMENT.—Bill contesting the will of Joseph Belsey, previously admitted to probate, on the ground that it was not, in fact, his will; and praying that, if the will was his, the court would construe it. As to the first ground the bill was dismissed, and as to the second, retained. Held,

1. That, where no trust is created, neither the executor, nor the heir, nor the devisee, who claims only a legal title in the estate, can come into a court of equity for the purpose of obtaining a judicial construction of the provisions of a will. Equity will not entertain jurisdiction merely to declare legal rights.

2. The Supreme Court will not review a decree rendered by agreement of parties.

85.—Richard C. Craft v. J. O. McConoughy.—Error to Ogle.—Opinion by CRAIG, J., reversing and remanding.

COMBINATIONS IN RESTRAINT OF TRADE.

STATEMENT.—Four grain-dealing firms entered into a secret combination to control prices of grain, etc., their copartnership being entirely concealed from the public, to whom they were held out as competing houses, although they met, from time to time, in secret conclave, to make arrangements, etc., and bound themselves to abide the result of the deliberations. Held,

1. That such an agreement, controlling the general grain trade in that locality, was in general restraint of trade, and therefore void. The rule is, that a partial or particular restraint upon trade is good, where the consideration is adequate, and the restriction reasonable; but an agreement in general restraint of trade, is contrary to public policy, illegal and void.

2. The test of this reasonableness is, whether the restraint is such only as to afford a fair protection to the interest of the parties in whose favor it is given, and not so large as to interfere with the interest of the public. Whatever is injurious to the public interest, is void, on the ground of public policy.

3. So long as competition is free, the interest of the public is safe, but where a secret combination destroys all competition, it creates a monopoly against which the public interest has no protection.

4. And a court ef equity will not lend its aid to enforce a division of profits among conspirators of this kind.

107.—John McNab v. Hezekiah Young.—Appeal from Superior Court of Cook. Opinion by BREESE, J., affirming.

OMISSION OF A WORD IN A RETURN DOES NOT NECESSARILY VITIATE PROCEEDINGS OR DEPRIVE OF JURISDICTION—SERVICE ON UNNECESSARY PARTY.

STATEMENT.—Bill to set aside conveyances under a sale on execution to satisfy a judgment in the U. S. Circuit Court. It was claimed that the court had not jurisdiction of parties, because of an omission of the word "copy" in the return of the officer serving the writ, namely, "served this writ by leaving a true — in the hands," etc. Held,

1. That, by every fair and reasonable intendment, the service was good, as to the defendant mentioned in the return in that connection; since it is impossible to doubt that a copy was left, although the word "copy" is omitted in the return.

2. As to a co-defendant—although service was not according to the statute—yet as he was not a necessary party, but a mere naked trustee with no real interest, a defective service could not vitiate.

120.—Amos S. Gilbert v Wallace G. Bone.—Appeal from Warren.—Opinion by SCHOLFIELD, J., affirming.

WHEN VERDICT SET ASIDE—EVIDENCE UNDER PENAL STATUTE—AFFIRMATIVE OF THE ISSUE A QUESTION OF LAW—AND PREPONDERANCE.

STATEMENT.—Action of debt by appellant against appellee for issuing marriage license to a minor without consent. Held,

1. While it is true that this, being a civil action, needs not be established with the same degree of certainty requisite in a criminal prosecution, yet it is brought under a penal statute; and before a party can recover, in such a case, he must bring himself clearly within the provisions of the statute.

2. The Supreme Court will not disturb a verdict merely because, if the question of fact had been submitted to it, in the first instance, instead of to the jury, it would have come to a different conclusion. In order to justify the interference of the court, a verdict must be clearly and palpably against the evidence. The evidence must be considered with reference to the issues, and if then it is apparent, at first blush, that the conclusion of the jury is unauthorized, it is the duty of the court to set the verdict aside.

3. Whether a plaintiff or defendant has the affirmative on the particular issue, is a question of law for the court, and not, in any degree, a question of fact for the jury. Also, to what extent it is incumbent on either to have a preponderance of evidence, is also a matter of law.

113.—George F. Work v. William E. Hall.—Appeal from Cook.—Opinion by SCHOLFIELD, J., reversing in part.

COMMENCEMENT OF SUIT—MECHANICS' LIEN—DECREE—DIFFERENT CLAIMANTS—ENFORCEMENT OF LIEN.

STATEMENT.—Mechanics' lien for materials, etc. Answer to petition that petitioners, beforehand, accepted a note of a third party, in satisfaction, and thereby waived all right to a lien. Also, that the bank (made co-defendant) purchased bonds, etc., without notice of any such lien, on the certificate of the architect, that there was no such lien. The limitation of six months was also pleaded. Held,

1. That where one firm commences a suit in mechanics' lien proceedings, and afterwards an amendment is made, admitting as parties to the petition, another firm, the commencement of the suit is not to be dated at the amendment, but at the original filing of the petition, however improperly or irregularly the first firm may have filed the petition. Other parties can be admitted at any time before final judgment.

2. Where there are different claimants the rights of all should be settled in the same decree.

3. The lien attaches to the property, but it cannot be enforced against subsequent purchasers, who are not otherwise liable for the payment of the debt, beyond the sale of the property.

137.—John A. Huck v. Henry Flentye.—Appeal from Superior Court of Cook.—Opinion by SCHOLFIELD, J., reversing and remanding.

PARTY WALLS—LIABILITY THEREFOR.

Held, That, while a party who builds a party wall, partly on his own land, and over the line partly on his neighbor's land, without any agreement or knowledge thereof on the part of the latter, he cannot afterwards recover a portion of the cost of erection, even if his neighbor erects a building adjoining the wall; yet where there is knowledge, even if no express agreement, and if, at the time of the erection, it is beneficial or necessary to the neighboring lot-owner, and the latter accordingly uses the wall, there is a liability incurred thereby for contribution toward the building of the wall.

155.—Reason C. Kill v. Town of Yellowhead.—Appeal from Kankakee.—Opinion by SCHOLFIELD, J.

PROSECUTION FOR OBSTRUCTING HIGHWAY—INITIALS IN DESCRIBING ROAD—ESTOPPEL.

Held, 1. That, in a prosecution for obstructing a public highway, initials may properly be used to describe the highway; for where a custom is so universal and of such antiquity that all men must be presumed to know it, courts will not pretend to be more ignorant than the rest of mankind, but will recognize and act upon it.

2. An objection that a record of a highway is void, because it shows the petition was not acted on in the time prescribed by the statute, is not tenable, if not made in the court below; and more particularly where the record shows that after the road was ordered, the objector accepted the payment of damages awarded him in laying it out.

160.—Gould's Adm'r v. Mason's Ex'r.—Appeal from Warren. — Opinion by BREESE, J., reversing and remanding.

PARTY CANNOT MAKE EVIDENCE FOR HIMSELF—ADMISSIONS—INTERESTED PARTIES AS WITNESSES.

Held, 1. That a party cannot be allowed to make testimony for himself and claim its benefit in an issue on trial, and where it appears that a jury must have, or may have, based their verdict, in whole, or in part, on such evidence, or upon testimony as to what one party said in the absence of the other, a cause will be thereon reversed.

2. Where it is objected that the husband of the daughter of a testator is not a competent witness for the executor, the objection must be overruled where it appears that the daughter had been provided for by her father's will, and has no interest, therefore, in the controversy pending—as she herself would then be a competent witness.

180.—W. Lowell v. N. F. Wren.—Appeal from Cook.—Opinion by SCHOLFIELD, J., affirming.

CONSPIRACY TO OBTAIN A MARRIED WOMAN'S SIGNATURE.

STATEMENT.—Bill to enjoin sale under a deed of trust, filed by appellee, on the ground that appellant and another, with her husband, conspired to defraud her by procuring the notes and deed of trust to be executed as if by her, but that she never signed them, nor authorized any one to do so for her, and never acknowledged the deed. The notes purported to be signed by appellee, "per John Wren." The acknowledgment of the deed was written out and attested by one Albin, as notary public, whom, appellee testified she did not know, and she was never introduced to him as a notary public. Further, however, she said, on one occasion, her husband brought her a paper to sign, she asked him what it was, as she could not read or write. He replied, "It's only a matter of form," and, thereupon, she made her mark, not knowing what the paper was; her husband then gave the paper to appellant. She was not asked whether she acknowledged her signature, etc. Held,

That these circumstances in testimony, together with the further facts that the husband appears to have been entirely worthless, and that appellant was present when the signature was obtained, participating in what then occurred, etc., proved sufficiently that they had conspired with the husband to obtain the execution of the notes and deed fraudulently.

196.—Stephen Hanford v. Isaac Blessing.—Appeal from Kankakee. — Opinion by SCHOLFIELD, J., affirming.

EVIDENCE AS TO WHETHER A CONVEYANCE IS A DEED OR A MORTGAGE—INTERLOCUTORY ORDER NOT APPEALABLE.

STATEMENT.—The controversy herein was as to whether a certain conveyance was absolute, or only intended as a mortgage. The direct testimony was about evenly balanced. Held,

1. That where the grantee subsequently executes a mortgage on the premises to secure indebtedness to the grantor, and where it is shown by disinterested witnesses that the grantee frequently claimed to own the property, and denied any right of the grantor in it, and exercised continued acts of ownership, such as renting the property to other parties, these circumstances being inconsistent with the position of a mere mortgagee, raise a legal presumption that the first conveyance (in controversy) was absolute, and not intended to be a mortgage.

2. Where a judge imposes terms on granting a preliminary injunction, this cannotbe reviewed in the Supreme Court, because it is interlocutory, and not final.

203.—George A. Moore v. John Mauck.—Appeal from Mercer.—Opinion by SCHOLFIELD, J., affirming.

AFFIDAVITS IN ATTACHMENT AMENDABLE—DEFECTIVE AFFIDAVITS—EFFECT OF DEFICIENCY — WHEN NOT AMENDABLE — VIOLENT EJECTION A QUESTION OF FACT.

STATEMENT.—Suit for "wrongfully taking goods and chattels from plaintiff," and for "wrongfully and forcibly taking possession of certain premises occupied by the plaintiff and his family." Plea, not guilty; with notice of special matters, namely: That the goods and chattels were taken in attachment, in due course of law; that appellant's wife, as his agent, sued out a replevin for the property, and on the trial the replevin suit was decided in favor of appellee; and that the land belonged to appellee, and had been occupied by appellant as his tenant, and appellant and his son having gone to California, whereon appellee caused a notice to be left at the house; upon service of that notice, appellant's wife and family left the premises, and appellee took possession.

The attachment proceedings were claimed to be void by reason of a defective affidavit. Held,

1. That where a statute provides that affidavits in attachment proceedings may be amended, although informal, and not in accordance with the requirements of the statute, a sufficient amount of vitality is imparted by such amendable defective affidavits to render them voidable only, and not absolutely void; although, if it is so defective as not to be amendable, as by omitting the names of the parties, the amount of indebtedness, or all grounds of issuing the attachment, the affidavit is void.

2. As to whether improper means were used to eject the family of the appellant from the land, this is a matter of fact for the jury.

209.—John A. Brown v. Frederick H. Luehrs.—Appeal from Superior Court of Cook.—Opinion by SHELDON, J., affirming.

NEW TRIAL.

New trial on newly-discovered evidence — requisites — interlocutory proceedings—transcript of evidence taken by a stenographer—depositions—commissioner.

STATEMENT.—Bill to enjoin the collection of a judgment, and to vacate the judgment, on the ground of newly discovered evidence, since the term of court at which the judgment was rendered. Held,

1. That the rule governing such cases is, that a bill for a new trial is watched by equity with extreme jealousy, and that the court must see that injustice has been done, not merely through the inattention of parties; that a party is not entitled to relief after verdict, upon testimony which, with ordinary care and diligence, he might have procured and used upon the trial at law. But where there is no lack of diligence imputable, and evidence is afterwards discovered which would be likely to have a controlling influence and produce a different result, a judgment will be re-opened.

2. Where it is objected that a preliminary injunction was granted without notice, the objection can avail nothing in the way of reversing a decree on final hearing, making the injunction perpetual.

3. A transcript of evidence taken by a stenographer at the common law trial, in such a case as this, is properly admissible in evidence, when sworn to by him as true and correct.

4. Where it is objected that an officer taking a deposition was not the same as the one to whom the commission was directed—as where the commission was sent to "the Clerk of the District Court, of the ninth judicial district, in Dubuque, county of Dubuque, Iowa," and the certificate shows the officer to have been "clerk of the District Court of the State of Iowa, in and for Dubuque county," it is held there is no variance. A person acting as commissioner, may be designated by the name of an office he holds, as well as by his proper name. And where a certificate to a deposition is to the effect that the person taking it did so pursuant to the commission, this is proof of his identity.

243.—Samuel H. Melvin v. Lamar Ins. Co.—Error to Superior Court of Cook.—Opinion by SHELDON, J., reversing and remanding.

BONA FIDE SUBSCRIPTIONS FOR SHARES OF STOCK—SURRENDERS WHEN FRAUDULENT—LACHES.

STATEMENT.—Bill by stockholders, in behalf of themselves and others, against the company, on the ground that the officers were guilty of collusion and fraudulent conduct prejudicial to the rights and interests of the other stockholders; more especially in this, that they, having in 1869, subscribed for and taken a large number of shares (5500), and paid for them in the usual way, were afterwards permitted to surrender all said shares, and withdraw from the company all the money and assets that they had paid therefor, and also to withdraw other funds or assets of the company, and appropriate them to their own use—that afterwards a receiver was appointed for the company, etc. The answer was that the defendants only held the 5500 shares as a loan for money advanced as security for the loan. Bill dismissed.

It appeared that the 5500 shares were held out to other stockholders as on the same footing as other bona fide subscriptions; and were counted in as assets of the company; and an auditor's certificate obtained on a showing so representing these shares as subscribed for in the usual way. Held,

That the presumption is that all subscriptions stand on the same basis, and all shares are entitled to the same benefits, and subject to the same burdens, and in the subscription of each person, every other subscriber has a direct interest. And where there purports to be an amount of stock taken, when in fact it has not been taken, but issued to individuals under a private agreement that they may at pleasure surrender the shares and take back their money, such an arrangement is a fraud in law, even though it may not have been intended as a fraud, and it will be disregarded, and the parties be held bound to all the responsibilities of bona fide subscribers. (Numerous authorities cited to fortify this point.)

It was contended that a party has a right to make any condition he pleases to a subscription, provided the condition is expressed in the contract; that what he is forbidden to do, is, to make an unconditional subscription, accompanied by a secret stipulation written or parol. Held,

1. That the present case does not come within that rule, because here certificates of stock were issued in the usual form, and the issue appears on the books of the company, as a regular issue, unaccompanied by any sign of a condition. They showed the stock taken to be real, bona fide, absolute issues of shares. And other stockholders were entitled to rely upon the certificates and book entries, and are not to be held bound to go back and take notice of any antecedent individual contract existing between the directors and the takers of the shares—and so the transaction stands as an unconditional subscription controlled by a secret agreement embodying conditions.

2. Nor are shareholders bound to look into the management of the affairs of the company, and will not be held to have notice of every thing which has been done by directors; who may be assumed by the stockholders to have done their duty.

3. Nor need other stockholders to show that such a subscription deceived them, and influenced them to subscribe for shares. The transaction being, in itself, fraudulent, will be disregarded, whether any one was influenced by it, or not.

4. Nor will the stockholders be estopped by the fact that they met and approved the course of management while the particular facts of the secret transaction was unknown to them.

5. And if a committee is appointed to collect the assets of the company, to ascertain whether business should be suspended, this committee is confined to the purpose of the appointment. They have authority to collect the assets, but not to give them away, or release them without payment.

6. Nor will a delay of two years be regarded as laches in such case.

245.—Gravel Road Co. v. Philip Daun.—Appeal from Superior Court of Cook.—Opinion by SCHOLFIELD, J., affirming.

COLLECTION OF TOLLS ON A GRAVEL ROAD.

STATEMENT.—The question presented herein was whether a person, traveling some distance on a toll road between gates, and turning into another road, in good faith, and not for the purpose of passing around a gate, is liable to pay toll for the distance he thus travels on the road. Held,

That a company can collect its tolls only at the gates or places legally established; and, therefore, those only can be compelled to pay who pass through the gates, etc., when traveling in good faith on their proper course. And this principle is not changed by the fact that at the gates the charges are proportioned to distance, or made by the mile under the requirements of a statute.

251.—Protection Life Ins. Co. v. Ann E. Foote.—Appeal from Knox.—Opinion by SCHOLFIELD, J., affirming.

MUTUAL LIFE INSURANCE CO,—POWER OF OFFICERS AND AGENTS—DUTY OF MEMBERS—PAYMENT OF ASSESSMENTS—WAIVER AND FORFEITURE.

Held, 1. That in a mutual life insurance company, which must, as well as others, necessarily transact its business through officers and agents, it is to be held, that, in the absence of express provisions in their charters, limiting the powers or appointment of these, every person, becoming a member by taking out a policy, impliedly consents that the company shall be represented by such officers and agents, as are reasonably necessary for the transaction of its business; and that they shall possess the powers and perform the duties ordinarily possessed and performed by such officers and agents.

2. And a member must be held to know that no officer or agent of the company can, for his benefit, do any act, or waive the performance of any act required of him to be performed, in contravention of the charter of the company, or of its by-laws, unless, indeed, it may be in the case of a by-law adopted without his knowledge, and under circumstances where the law will not charge him with knowledge.

3. From the very nature of such a company, it is indispensable that an assessment shall be promptly paid, since in no other way are policy-holders to receive their insurance; and it may well be doubted, therefore, whether it is competent for those representing the company to accept anything less than the amount actually due from each stockholder, in discharge of an assessment; for if it could be done with one it could be done with all, and thus the whole purpose of the corporation be defeated.

4. But forfeitures are not indispensable to secure the payment of assessments. They are simply convenient, and, perhaps, more effective than any other mode. Nor is a temporary delay in the payment of an assessment necessarily subversive of the purposes of the incorporation. And forfeitures, in the view of the law, are always odious. When declared for accidental or merely technical grounds, which produce no substantial or permanent injury, forfeitures are unjust and oppressive, and may, in many instances, be relieved against in a court of equity. Therefore, while it is not competent for officers and agents to relieve an assured from the payment of any assessment, they may mitigate terms on which a policy would be otherwise declared forfeited, and waive causes of forfeiture, where the waiver does not substantially impair the rights of creditors and policy-holders. The principle is the same with mutual insurance companies as with others. It would be otherwise if the charter or by-laws expressly prohibited such waiver.

5. Where a notice of an assessment is sent to an assured, and the mode of remitting prescribed—as by post office order, or draft, he is not to be held liable to a forfeiture if he promptly remits, although the remittance may not reach the officers within the time prescribed. He has a right to rely upon the post office as a medium of conveyance, and if a delay therein occurs, without his fault, he is not to be held chargeable.

258.—James D. Lehmer v. The People ex rel.—Appeal from County Court of Cook.—Opinion by BREESE, J., affirming.

JUDGMENT IN TAX CASE—CLERICAL ERRORS IN ASSESSMENT ROLLS—RES ADJUDICATA.

Held, 1. That a judgment is sufficient in a tax case, which substantially complies with the statute, even though not technically exact in all respects.

2. Where there are merely clerical errors and omissions in an assessment-roll, they may be amended, where they do not affect any person's rights or interests.

3. It is too late, on appeal, to inquire whether a street for which a special assessment has been made, is public or private. If no objection was made below at the time application was made for a confirmation of the assessment, the question is res adjudicata, and will not be examined.

259.—Baptist Theological Union v. People ex rel.—Appeal from County Court of Cook.—Opinion by SCHOLFIELD, J., affirming.

EXEMPTION OF CORPORATIONS FROM TAXATION.

Held, That where a charter, granted in 1865, under the Constitution of 1848, exempted, perpetually, the property, real and personal, belonging to the corporation, from all taxation and assessments, the property on which tax was levied being obtained for the purpose of leasing, and being let on long leases, and the income therefrom being used to maintain the institution—the charter is unconstitutional and void, in this respect.

OUR thanks are due to the law firm of COOPER & BASSETT, of Peoria, for the following opinion:

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

OPINION FILED JUNE 30, 1876.

IN THE MATTER OF THE WILL OF ESTHER R. TULLER, Deceased.

Appeal from Peoria.

REVOCATION OF A WILL BY MARRIAGE—UNDER THE COMMON LAW—UNDER THE STATUTE OF ILLINOIS—EFFECT OF MARRIAGE ON THE WILL OF A FEME SOLE—WHAT IS A MARRIED WOMAN'S SEPARATE ESTATE.

1. UNDER THE COMMON LAW.—That, under the common law, the will of a feme sole is revoked by her subsequent marriage.

2. UNDER THE STATUTE.—That, under the statute of 1872, which gives to every female of the age of eighteen years, the power to devise her property by will or testament, the same reason does not exist as at common law.

3. MARRIED WOMEN'S SEPARATE ESTATE.—That, under the act of 1861, all a married woman's property is made her sole and separate property; but this statute gives no power of disposing of her estate. The act of 1845 gave a married woman power to dispose of her separate estate. The reason, then, for holding the will of a feme sole to be revoked by marriage, no longer exists, as the marriage would not destroy the ambulatory nature of the will, but still leave it subject to the wife's control.

4. THE STATUTE MAKING MARRIAGE A REVOCATION OF A WILL, PROSPECTIVE.—That the enactment which went into force July 1, 1872, that "a marriage shall be deemed a revocation of a prior will," was prospective in effect, and had reference only to marriages which should take place thereafter, and did not apply to marriages which had been had prior to the passage of the act, and that it is without effect upon the will of Mrs. Tuller. —[ED. LEGAL NEWS.

Opinion by SHELDON, J.

This is an appeal by Lydia A. Cole, residuary devisee and legatee under the will of Esther R. Tuller, deceased, from the order and judgment of the Circuit Court of Peoria county, refusing to admit said will to probate. Such order and judgment have been made on appeal in reversal of an order of the County Court admitting the will to probate.

The facts are, that Esther R. Tuller, on the 20th day of May, 1869, made and published her will, she being then a widow and having at that time living, three children by a former marriage, all of whom are still in full life; afterwards on the 2d of September, 1869, the testatrix was married to one Marcus Hosmer, from whom she was, on the 16th day of December, 1873, divorced by decree of the Circuit Court of Peoria county, upon bill filed by her for that purpose.

The testatrix died on the 6th of March, 1874, having made no other will, and having had no child by said Hosmer. The question presented is, whether there was a revocation of the will by the marriage with Hosmer. It is the old and well settled rule of the common law that the will of a feme sole is revoked by her subsequent marriage, and it is contended that under this rule the will was revoked. The reason of the rule was, that a will is, in its nature, ambulatory during the testator's life, and can be revoked at his pleasure; that the marriage destroys the ambulatory nature of the will, and leaves it no longer subject to the wife's control, and that it is against the nature of a will to be absolute during the testator's life. It is, therefore, revoked in judgment of law by such marriage. 4 Kent. Comm., 527; 2 Greenlf. Ev. § 684. That reason does not exist under our present statute of 1872, which gives to every female of the age of 18 years, the power to devise her property by will or testament.

Did it exist under the Statute of Wills of 1845, in force up to 1872? The first section of the Statute of Wills of 1845, provides as follows: Every person aged 21 years, if a male, or 18 years, if a female, or upwards, and not married, being of sound mind and memory, shall have power to devise all the estate * * which he or she hath, or at the time of his or her death shall have in and to any lands, etc.; all persons of the age of 17 years, and of sound mind and memory, married women excepted, shall have power to dispose of their personal estate by will or testament, and married women shall have power to dispose of their separate estate, both real and personal, by will or testament, in the same manner as other persons. The statute draws a manifest distinction between the property generally, of married women, and their separate property, giving power to dispose of the latter by will, but not of the former. The strict rules of the old common law, as is well known, would not permit the wife to take or enjoy any real or personal estate, separate from, or independent of, her husband.

But courts of equity have admitted the doctrine that a married woman is capable of taking real and personal estate to her own separate and exclusive use; and whenever real or personal property is given, or devised, or settled, upon a married woman for her separate and exclusive use, her interest will be protected in equity against the marital rights and claims of her husband and of his creditors. The separate estate of a married woman was a creature of equity at the time of the passage of the statute of 1845. By the statute of 1861, entitled, "An act to protect married women in their separate property," all the property of a married woman is made her sole and separate property, and is thereby made as fully her separate estate as any separate estate which she could in any way have had at the date of the passage of the act of 1845 and after, except that the statute of 1861 gives no power of disposing of her estate. Such being the case, then, that under the statute of 1861 all of the property of a married woman is made her separate estate, we know no sufficient reason why, since the act of 1861, the statute of 1845, giving to married women the power to dispose of their separate estate by will, should not have operative effect in respect to all of a married woman's property, and be construed as enabling her to dispose of all her property by will, in the same manner as other persons. The reason, then, for holding the will of a feme sole to be revoked by marriage would no longer exist, as the marriage would not destroy the ambulatory nature of the will, but still leave it subject to the wife's control.

The further reason given that the marriage of a feme sole is such an entire change in her condition and relations that it is generally held to work a revocation of her will, (1 Redfield on Wills, 292,) equally fails, as since the act of 1861 her marriage works no essential change in her conditions and relations as respects her property. We are of opinion, then, that since the act of 1861, the will of a feme sole is not revoked by marriage, the reason of the rule no longer existing. Her will, then, in this respect must be regarded as standing upon the same footing with the will of a man. As respects his will, marriage is not a revocation of it; but marriage and the birth of a child are an implied revocation of a will previously made. Such was recognized by this court to be the rule in Tyler v. Tyler, 19 Ill., 151, and the authorities referred to. But it was there held, that under our statute, making the wife heir to the husband, and the husband heir to the wife, when there is no child nor descendant of a child, marriage is, in the absence of facts showing an intention to die testate, arising subsequent to the marriage, a revocation of the will of the husband made prior to the marriage, disposing of his entire estate, without making provision in contemplation of the relations arising out of the marriage. It is insisted that the present case falls within that decision, and is controlled thereby. The facts of that case were, that Stephen H. Tyler and the complainant in the suit intermarried in this State in 1842, and here lived as husband and wife until his death in 1855; that he died never having had a child, and leaving a considerable estate in this State, and that the defendants claimed his estate under a will executed in the State of Connecticut, where Tyler then lived in 1834, which will devised his entire estate to his blood relations.

Under such circumstances, in view of our statute of descents, providing that when there should be a widow and no child or descendant of a child of the intestate, then the one half of the real estate and the whole of the personal estate, shall go to such widow, it was held that the marriage was a revocation of the will. The reason of the rule of the English courts that marriage and the birth of a child were, but that marriage alone was not, a revocation of a will, was recognized to be, that by the law of descents there, the child may inherit the parent's estate, but that the wife and husband could not inherit from each other. But that, as under our law the wife and husband may inherit from each other the one-half of each other's lands, in case there be no child or lineal descendant, the reason of the common law rule would require that marriage alone would revoke a will, and the rule was made to conform to the reason of it; and it was held that marriage alone worked a revocation of the will. In that case there was no child of the marriage, and from the instant of the marriage, upon the death of the husband without a will, one-half of his real estate and all his personal estate would have gone to the widow. In the present case, the testatrix at the time of the making of her will and up to the time of her death, and since, had three children living.

Had she died at any time during the existence of her marriage all her property, in the absence of a will, would have gone to these children, and none of it to her husband. Where is the reason, then, to require in such a case as this, that marriage alone should revoke the will? Under the laws of this State in force when the will was made and since, Hosmer, the husband, could have taken nothing, if there had been no will. The property disposed of by the will was the separate estate of the testatrix. No estate by the courtesy ever became initiate.

The marriage did not vest in the husband the personal property of the wife, nor any right to the rents and profits of the real estate; and as his wife had children of her own by her first husband, to inherit, he, Hosmer, could take nothing as her heir, at her death.

The sole effect of the revocation would be, to let others inherit her property, whom the testratrix had in her mind when she made her will and purposed should not take her estate.

To set aside the will would be to thwart the solemnly declared intention of the testatrix, and that without benefit to the object of the marriage relation, on whose account, as a new object of duty to be provided for, the revocation of the will would be brought about. The revocation of a will which arises from subsequent marriage and birth of a child, is an implied or presumptive revocation.

It is founded upon the reasonable presumption of an alteration of the testator's mind, arising from circumstances since the making of the will, producing a change in his previous obligations and duties. 4 Kent Comm., 521. Under the general rule, the circumstance of marriage alone did not lay the foundation of a presumed alteration of the testator's intention; but it was marriage and the birth of a child; and both must have concurred, in order to raise an implied revocation of the will. Brush v. Wilkins, 4 Johnson, ch. 506. There was a qualification of the general rule upon this subject, made in the case of Sheath v. York, 1 Vesey & Bea., 390, which bears strongly upon the present case. A widower, having a son and two daughters, devised his estate, real and personal, and then married and had a daughter. The Ecclesiastical court held the will to be revoked as to the personal estate, but Sir William Grant thought that there was no ground to presume the will revoked as to the real estate, upon any implied condition annexed to it, or upon any presumed change of intention when the testator had already an heir apparent, and the revocation would be of no use to the subsequent child, who could not take the land. It might be revoked as to the personal estate, for that lets in the subsequent child, but he held that it was not, in such case, revoked as to the land. The principle of that decision seems to meet precisely the question now under consideration, and to require a qualification to the general rule laid down in Tyler v. Tyler, that under our statute of descents, a subsequent marriage is a revocation of a will, and to exclude the application of the rule to the facts of the present case, for the reason that there is no ground to presume the will revoked upon any presumed change of intention, inasmuch as the testatrix had, at the time of the making of the will, and ever after, three children, and, as was said in Sheath v. York, the revocation would be of no use to the subsequent husband, as he could not take the property.

But it is said that it does not matter whether the husband or wife do actually become heir to the other or not, that it is enough that the marriage creates the possibility of such a result.

But that is not the principle which governs. If it were, then under the common law rule upon the subject, marriage alone would work a revocation, as upon a marriage, there would exist the possibility of the birth of a child, and in the case cited of Sheath v. York, there was a possibility of the daughter of the subsequent marriage becoming an heir by the death of the son of the former marriage, * * * not matter whether it survives the parent or not, and it is said that there the birth of the issue, and the mere possibility of its becoming an heir by surviving its parents, at once revokes the will.

It is the occurrence of new social relations and moral duties arising by marriage and the birth of issue raising a presumption of a change of intention in the testator, which impliedly revokes a previous will, and the revocation so made by the occurrence of those events is once for all, and the will is not restored on the subsequent death of the issue contributing to produce the revocation during the life of the testator. But under the state of facts in this case, there has been no actual occurrence of the circumstances to afford ground of a presumed intention to revoke the will, but only a possibility of such occurrence taking place. It is finally insisted that there is here, a statutory revocation of the will, by force of the statute of 1872, Laws 1871-72, p. 355 in force July 1, 1872, that "a marriage shall be deemed a revocation of a prior will." That as the will did not take effect nor were any rights acquired under it, until the testatrix's death, its validity depends upon the law as it then stood at the time of her death, that the statute, though passed after the making of the will, takes effect upon it precisely as though the law had been passed before its execution.

The question is not so much whether the statute affects rights vested before its passage, as what was the intention of the legislature. A law is a rule of civil conduct, and the principle is, that it is a rule for the regulation of future conduct. It is, in the general, true, that no statute is to have a retrospect beyond the time of its commencement, for the rule and law of parliament is, that nova constitutio futuris formam debit imponere, non præteritis, 4 Bac. Abr., 636, Statute C.

It is the doctrine applicable to all laws that, generally, they are to be considered as prospective, and not to prejudice or affect the past transactions of the citizens. Not that the legislature cannot, in some cases, make laws with a retrospective operation, but that it is not to be supposed they so intended, unless that intention has been manifested by the most clear and unequivocal expressions. Garret v. Wiggins, 1 Scam., 335; Bruce v. Schuyler, 4 Gilm., 221; Thompson v. Alexander, 11 Ill., 54; Marsh v. Chestnut, 14 Id., 223; Hatcher v. T. W. & W. R. R. Co., 62 Id., 477; Whitman v. Hapgood et al., 10 Mass., 447; Somerset v. Dighton, 12 Mass., 383; Dash v. Van-Kleek, 7 Johns, 477; Sedgwick on Stat. and Const. Law.

The law of 1872 is not retrospective in terms; there is no indication of the legislative intention that it should be retroactive, and we must regard the intention to have been that it should have only a prospective and not a retrospective operation. We are of the opinion, then, that the enactment which went in force July 1, 1872, that "a marriage shall be deemed a revocation of a prior will" was prospective in effect, and had reference only to marriages which should take place thereafter, and did not apply to marriages which had been had prior to the passage of the act, and that it is without effect upon this will of Mrs. Tuller.

Our conclusion, is that the court below erred in reversing the order of the County Court instead of affirming the same, and that the judgment of the Circuit Court should be reversed and the cause remanded.

Judgment reversed.

COOPER & BASSETT, Attys. for appellant.

MCCULLOCH, STEVENS & WILSON, STARR & CONGER, Attys. for appellee.

of which has been pressed upon our attention in previous cases, may obviously be obtained by reference to appellant's charter, and by communications from those familiar with its affairs and those acquainted with the value of its stocks and the amount and value of its debts, and by reference to the assessed valuation of its tangible property, although no schedule on the prescribed form shall have been made. In other words, the schedule is but one form of presumptive evidence of that which admits of other forms of proof equally satisfactory for the purpose of ascertaining the data for the application of the rule.

But has appellant by the omission to make and return the schedule, been denied the right to be heard in regard to this assessment?

Appellant's officers knew when its tangible property was assessed. They are charged with knowing what the law required, and therefrom that appellant's capital stock would be assessed by the State Board of Equalization, and that they were directed to make the schedule. Of what consequence is it, if the form of the schedule and the instructions from the auditor were not tendered them, or that no demand was made upon them for the schedule? Their duty in that regard is not thus limited. They now claim it was to appellant's interest, was of vital consequence to it, that it should be heard through this schedule, and yet they do not pretend they made any effort, although the opportunity to do so indirectly admitted, is to be thus heard. Why did they not apply for the blank forms and the instructions of the auditor, themselves, that the schedule might have been completed in time to deliver to the local assessor, with their return of the list of appellant's tangible property? It was no less their duty to have done so, than it was the duty of the auditor and assessor to have prepared and furnished the blank forms and the instructions. But again, appellant's officers had notice, by the law, of the time and place of the meeting of the Board of Equalization, and that among other duties incumbent on it, was to assess for taxation appellant's capital stock.

We cannot suppose that the board would have been unwilling to receive information respecting the value of property to be affected by its action, in such form as might have been consistent with a reasonable degree of convenience and facility in the transaction of the business before it, for such, as we conceive, was unquestionably its duty. Nor can we suppose that information thus communicated would not have received all the consideration to which it was entitled.

But it does not appear that appellant communicated, or offered to communicate, any information whatever, respecting the value of this capital stock, to the board. It has, then, had an opportunity to be heard, both by making the schedule and presenting it to the local assessor, and by communication to the Board of Equalization while it was in session, both of which it voluntarily waived. Is it consistent with the principles of equity, however, to say, true, appellant might have been thus heard, had it pleased its officers to have availed of the opportunity, still it was imperative that it should be heard, and not having been, the tax is unauthorized. This is not claimed, nor can it be claimed to be sanctioned by law. The utmost that is required in any case, is to afford parties what the law deems, under the circumstances, a reasonable opportunity to be heard, and if they do not choose to avail of it, the consequences must rest with themselves. The claim is also made that appellant was entitled, when it was in default in making the schedule, to have it made by the assessor, that it might prefer that he should make it, to having it made by its own proper officers. This could hardly be true in any case where it was not supposed that more was to be gained by concealing than by disclosing the facts affecting the value of the capital stock.

But, in our opinion, a conclusive answer to the claim, is the requirement that the local assessor shall make and return a schedule, in default of the corporation doing so, is a matter in which it has no concern. Having waived whatever of privilege it had in this respect, and by so doing, made it probably more difficult to ascertain the value of its capital stock than it would have been had it made the schedule, it took its chances of letting the Board of Equalization ascertain the value in the best way it could. As before observed, the schedule would be but prima facie evidence of that which is susceptible of proof otherwise, and is simply designed to aid the Board of Equalization in its labors. The assessor was not the agent of the corporation, nor could a schedule made by him be regarded in any sense, as a representation of facts made by it, but it would rather be evidence obtained by him affecting its property, in spite of its neglect or refusal to make disclosures.

The remaining allegation in the bill to be noticed is in substance, that while appellant's capital stock was assessed professedly in conformity with the rule which the board had adopted for assessing capital stock, it was in truth assessed without any evidence of the fact essential to the application of the rule. It has been held in many cases by this court, that in no event will the collection of a tax be enjoined unless it clearly appears injustice will otherwise result to the complainant; and we have held that the mere application of the rule adopted by the Board of Equalization and applied in the present instance in ascertaining the value of the capital stock of corporations is of itself not sufficient evidence of injustice to authorize the interposition of a court of equity to enjoin the collection of the tax computed upon such valuation. In view of the facts that assessors, in ascertaining values, may act on their own personal knowledge as well as on information derived from other sources, it is not enough to say the evidence before them at the time of making the assessment was insufficient, for it might be that no evidence was necessary, they might of their own personal knowledge have had all the information that could have been imparted by evidence. Or, if they acted on the hypothesis that a state of facts different from the true state of facts existed, it should be shown either expressly that it was known the facts assumed were not true, or that the facts assumed were in themselves so unreasonable that an honest mind of ordinary intelligence could not believe them to be true. The rule of the Board required that there should be ascertained "the market or fair cash value of the shares of capital stock, and the market or fair cash value of the debt (excluding from such debt the indebtedness for current expenses)," which were to be added together, and from their sum was to be deducted the equalized valuation of the tangible property, leaving the balance as the value of the capital stock, over and above the assessed value of the tangible property. It is alleged in the bill that the shares of stock were worthless, but it is also alleged appellant was largely indebted, and what was the value of that debt is not stated. It is shown that the entire property is not equal in value to the amount of the bonded debt, but this signifies nothing, since the bonded debt neither destroys the value of the property nor exempts it from taxation. Whether appellant is indebted or free of debt, the same property is there, and it is the property, disconnected from all questions of the owner's indebtedness, whether in the form of liens upon the property or otherwise, that is the basis of the taxation. If the value of the debt is greater than the equalized valuation of the tangible property, the difference theoretically represents the value of the intangible property, which is as much a part of the capital stock as it is the tangible property.

It does not appear otherwise than from the general assertion of the worthlessness of appellant's capital stock and its franchise (which cannot, from the other allegations in the bill, be true in the sense the words "capital stock" are used in the revenue act), but that the result reached by the Board of Equalization may be correct so far, at least, as a valuation can be correctly ascertained by the application of the rule applied by the Board.

We think the allegations fail to show such injustice to appellant in this assessment as authorizes a court of Chancery to interfere, and the decree of the court below will therefore be affirmed.

Affirmed.

The Courts.

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT, E. D. MICHIGAN.

THE DOLPHIN.—In Admiralty.

LIEN OF UNDERWRITER—AVERMENTS IN LIBEL.

The underwriter of a ship has a lien for the premiums due upon marine policies, and is entitled to payment from the proceeds of sale.

The libel or petition should aver not only the dates and amounts of the policies, but the names of the parties insured, and the character and extent of their several interests in the vessel.

On exceptions to the libel of the Orient Mutual Insurance Company. The libellant set forth that it was a New York corporation, that the Dolphin was a vessel of more than 20 tons burden, used in navigating the great lakes and waters connecting the same, and the waters of the State of Michigan; that, on the 6th of March, 1875, the master and owners represented to the libellant that the vessel stood in need of insurance, and that, in pursuance of their representations and request, it furnished insurance in the amount of $4,000; and that there was due to libellant for premiums the sum of $277.38, for which libellant claimed a lien upon the vessel. To this libel, Stephen B. Grummond, who also filed a libel against the schooner for salvage, excepted; for the reason, that the matters set up therein were not within the admiralty jurisdiction of this court; that a claim for premiums was not a lien upon the schooner, such as this court ought to enforce by proceedings in rem. The Dolphin had been sold upon other claims, and the proceeds were in court awaiting distribution. Mr. James J. Atkinson for libellant; Mr. F. H. Canfield for claimant..

BROWN, J.—The question presented by the exceptions to the libel is one of great novelty and importance; and it is believed that no direct adjudication upon the point can be found either in this country or in England. After years of doubt in the minds of the profession, and some conflict of opinion in the courts, it was finally settled by the Supreme Court, in the case of the Insurance Company v. Dunham, 11 Wall., 1, that the contract of marine insurance is maritime in its character, and that in case of loss a libel may be sustained by the insured against the underwriter. It seems to me to follow as a necessary corollary that the underwriter may maintain a suit in admiralty for the premium, as it would be at war with established principles to say that the maritime character of a contract could be invoked by one party and not by the other.

The more serious question, however, remains to be decided, namely, whether the underwriter has a lien upon the vessel for the payment of his premium. The question is not discussed in this case nor in any other where actions have been sustained in the admiralty, upon contracts of insurance. If the analogies of the contract of affreightment are to govern, as indicated by the Supreme Court in the opinion above cited, page 30, the lien would follow as a necessary consequence. It is described in the opinion as "a contract or guaranty, on the part of the insurer, that the ship or goods shall pass safely over the sea, and through its storms and its many casualties to the port of its destination, and if they do not pass safely, but meet with disaster from any of the misadventures insured against, the insurer will pay the loss sustained. So, in the contract of affreightment, the master guarantees that the goods shall be safely transported (dangers of the sea excepted), from the port of shipment to the port of delivery and there delivered. The contract of the one guarantees against loss from the dangers of the sea, the contract of the other against loss from all other dangers. * * * The object of the two contracts is in the one case maritime service and in the other maritime casualties." If in the one case the shipper has a lien upon the vessel for a breach of the contract of affreightment, and the ship has a lien upon the cargo for the payment of the freight (though for reasons applicable to the character of this property this lien is dependent upon possession), it is difficult to see why upon principle the underwriter should not have a lien upon the ship for the payment of his premium.

It is true the general sentiment of the profession is adverse to the existence of such a lien, but no more so, perhaps, than it was to the jurisdiction of the admiralty in actions upon policies of insurance.

In the case of the Williams, Brown's Admiralty Reports, page 208, perhaps the most exhaustive disquisition upon maritime liens to be found in the books, the judge remarked, page 215: "Without any very thorough examination at the time, but drawing mainly upon what we had ever assumed to be the law, we ruled that all maritime contracts, made within the scope of the master's usual authority, did per se, hypothecate the ship; and that those of affreightment, insurance, towage, the fitting out and discharge of vessels, and for aiding them in distress, were instances only of the application of the rule." I should have no hesitation in adopting the general principle there announced, that all contracts within the scope of the master's authority are binding upon the vessel, but in its application to the contract of insurance, I think the learned judge overlooked the fact that such contracts are not within the scope of the master's authority. General Interest Insurance Company v. Ruggles, 12 Wheat., 408; Foster v. United States Insurance Company, 11 Pick., 85.

Even a ship's husband, whose powers with regard to the fitting and equipment of a vessel are much more extensive than the master's, has no authority to bind the other part owners by a contract of insurance. Bell v. Humphries, 2 Starkie, 345; Finney v. The Warren Insurance Company, 1 Metcalf, 16.

The case of the Williams was that of a contract for services in the nature of salvage, made by a master whose power was unquestioned, and is a direct authority only for the proposition that all contracts, whether executed or executory, which he makes within the scope of his authority are binding upon the vessel. Obviously, however, the learned judge based his opinion upon a much broader principle. On page 217, referring to the case of the Pigs of Copper, 1 Story, 314, he observes, "This judgment is referred to in this connection more particularly to illustrate the position that a denial of salvage is not a rejection of a proceeding in rem; but it quite as fully sustains the broader proposition, soon to be considered, that all authorized maritime contracts pledge the vessel for their performance." Again, on page 222, he says: "The wider principle, that every maritime agreement binds the ship as well as the owner, is that upon which we rest our decision."

Although the authorities cited in support of this proposition refer to cases of salvage, or of contracts within the scope of the master's authority, and therefore do not sustain it to its fullest extent, yet I apprehend the principle is a safe one, and subject to two or three exceptions, which at an an early day were imported into the maritime law of this country by the Supreme Court, following too closely the English authorities, one which may be acted upon without trenching upon the proper domain of the common law. So far as a dictum can be an authority it is certainly an authority for the lien of the underwriters.

The doctrine that the admiralty courts of this country are restricted to the jurisdiction exercised by the High Court of Admiralty in England at the time of the adoption of our Constitution is now so completely overthrown that no argument can be properly deduced from it. The only exceptions believed to exist to the jurisdiction in rem of the admiralty over maritime contracts is that of supplies furnished domestic vessels, established in the case of the Gen. Smith, and recently recognized in the case of the Lottawanna, 21 Wall., and that of masters' wages, held not to be the subject of a lien in the case of the Steamboat New Orleans v. Phœbus, 11 Peters, 175. Contracts for the construction of vessels which are recognized as maritime by the Continental codes and a lien given thereby, were also held by the Supreme Court in the case of Roach v. Chapman, 22 How., 129, not to be subject to the admiralty jurisdiction in any form.

In determining whether a maritime lien exists in favor of the underwriter, it is well to consider the source of the doctrine that courts of admiralty have jurisdiction over policies of insurance. The subject is fully discussed in the case of the Insurance Company v. Dunham, pages 31-38, and the court remarks: "Perhaps the best criterion of the maritime character of a contract is the system of law from which it arises, and by which it is governed. And it is well known that the contract of insurance sprang from the law maritime, and derives all its material, rules and incidents therefrom. * * * These facts go to show, demonstrably, that the contract of marine insurance is an exotic in the common law. And we know the fact historically that its first appearance in any code or system of laws was in the law maritime as promulgated by the various maritime States and cities of Europe." Mention is here made of the maritime laws of the ancient Rhodians, of the ordinances of Barcelona, Venice, Florence and of Antwerp, and the court further observes: "But an additional argument is founded on the fact that in all other countries, except England, even in Scotland, suits and controversies arising upon the contract of maritime insurance are within the jurisdiction of the admiralty or other marine courts. * * * It is also clear that, originally, the English Admiralty had jurisdiction of these as well as of other maritime contracts." * * This last remark is corroborated not so much by positive adjudications to that effect as from the language of the commissions issued to the early Vice Admiralty courts which authorize them to take cognizance of marine policies. This would hardly have been done had such jurisdiction never been exercised by the High Court of Admiralty in England.

Tracing, then, the jurisdiction of the Admiralty over contracts of insurance to the continental law, it is pertinent in this connection to inquire whether that law gives to the underwriter a lien upon the vessel for the payment of his premiums.

Art. 16 of the marine ordinance of Louis XIV., title "Of Seizure of Vessels," in enumerating the persons entitled to liens upon ships, makes no mention of underwriters, but Valin, in commenting upon this ordinance, book 1, lib. 14, sec. 16, says: "If this article has not mentioned them (the underwriters), it is probably because the ordinance takes it for granted in many articles under the title of 'insurance,' that the premium is paid in cash at the time the policy is signed, while, by the custom of this place, and of many others, it is paid after the arrival of the ship at a port of safety. However this may be, the insurer of a vessel has doubtless a lien (privilege) upon her for the payment of his premium as the insurer of a cargo has a lien upon it. This lien ranks with that of the lender upon bottomry and with material men."

A privilege is defined by Art. 2095, of the Civil Code as "a right which the character of the credit gives to a creditor to be preferred to other creditors even mortgagees (hypothecaires)." If not analogous in all respects to our "lien," it authorizes the like preference in payment to claims within its scope from the proceeds in court.

Emerigou treats the contracts of insurance as analogous to that of maritime loan or bottomry, and observes (Emer. on maritime loans, chap. 1, sec. 4): "In the one contract the lender bears the sea risks; in the other, the underwriter. In the one, the maritime interest is the price of the peril, and this term corresponds with the premium which is paid in the other. In either case it is incumbent upon the plaintiff to prove that the condition has been fulfilled. In case of a suit it lies upon the lender, in order to render the contract of maritime loan executory, to show that the ship has arrived at her port of destination in safety; and in an action on a policy of insurance it lies upon the assured to prove the loss, capture or shipwreck of the vessel." * * *

"The policies of insurance made on loose sheets of paper create a lien on the property of the parties, provided they are executed before sworn brokers or notaries; but the other contracts do not create such a lien unless they are recorded by a notary in his public register, in the sworn form as ordinary contracts."

Again, in his work upon the contract of Insurance, ch. 3, sec. 9, Emerigou says: "The ordinance having regarded the premium as paid in cash upon signing the policy, the insurer, who had not been paid, was not placed among creditors whose ranks and preferences are determined by articles 16 and 17. Title "Seizure of Vessels." From this silence it has been often concluded that the insurer had no privilege, because it is said the matter of privilege is stricti juris (droit etroit) it is necessary they be expressly bestowed (deferes) by law, and it is never permitted to extend them from one case to another, because of equal or superior equities. But it should be considered that the premium of insurance is comprised in the expense of the equipment or building; it becomes, then, in some measure, part of the thing insured, which by this means is presumed to have an increased value (valoir davantage). Consequently, the privilege which the ordinance accords to the seller or material man ought to be common to the insurer, a creditor to the amount of his premium."

In support of this doctrine the learned author cites several decrees of the tribunals of commerce.

So, also, Alauzet des Assurances, Pt. 2, Sec. 2, Ch. 15: "It is rare that maritime premiums are paid in cash; they are settled generally in notes called premium notes (billets de prime) the maturity of which varies with the length of the voyage and the usage of the place; the lien of the insurer is preserved for the payment of the notes; they are not considered as working a novation, provided always the discharge (quittance) be not absolute, and the origin of the notes not doubtful."

See also Cleisac, P. 237, 318, 323, and 363. Pothier des Assurances, Ch. 3, Art. 3, Sec. 2. Boulay Paty, Vol. 1, Tit. 1, Sec. 2.

If any doubts, however, ever existed in the law of France, with regard to this lien, they are put to rest by Article 191 of the commercial code, which reads as follows: "Privileged debts are the following, and in the order in which they are classed:

1. Judicial costs and other charges incurred in obtaining a sale of the vessel and a distribution of the price.
2. The charge for pilotage, tonnage, hold fees, mooring and dockage.
3. The wages of the keeper, and the expenses of guarding the vessel from the time of her entrance to port to the sale.
4. The storage of her rigging, tackle and apparel.
5. The expenses of repairing the vessel, rigging and apparel since her entrance into port from her last voyage.
6. Wages and pay of the captain and crew employed in the last voyage.
7. The sums loaned to the captain for the necessary expenses of the vessel during the last voyage, and the re-imbursements of the price of goods sold by him for the same purpose.
8. The sums due to the vendor, material men and workmen employed in her construction, if she has not yet made a voyage, and those due to creditors for furnishing work, labor and for refitting, victualing, outfits and equipments before the departure of the vessel, if she has already made a voyage.
9. The sums loaned on bottomry on the rigging and apparel for repairs, victualing, outfit, equipment before the departure of the vessel.
10. The amounts of the premiums of insurance effected on the hull, rigging, apparel, outfit and equipment of the vessel for her last voyage.
11. The indemnity due to the freighters for not delivering goods laden on board or for the losses which the goods may have sustained from the default of the captain or crew.

The creditors comprised in each of the numbers of the present article shall have a concurrent lien on the vessel for the amount of their demand, and in case of insufficiency, the price of the vessel shall be divided equally among them (i. e., those of the same class) in proportion to the amount due each."

In a recent work upon the commercial code of France, by Edmund Dufour, (Paris, 1859,) in speaking of this article, section 215, the author observes, "We see that if the code has admitted this opinion (of Valin) as to the principle of the lien, it has largely modified the combinations. The underwriters are still paid before the shippers, but that is all. They are ranked by the material men, who are placed two degrees above them in the scale of liens. They are also distanced by lenders upon bottomry, who immediately precede them. This classification appears to me more rational than that of Valin. For, the truth is, insurance is only a private affair of the insured; it is a very proper act of prudence, it certainly merits and it possesses all the sympathies of the law; but it is, after all, only a passive element of navigation. It rather repairs disasters than comes directly in aid of them of its efforts. It is otherwise with the material men, as well as with lenders upon bottomry. It is the labor of the one, and the goods or the money of the other, which permit the vessel to undertake its voyage. There is then in their favor a reason for preference, which is not wholly arbitrary, and the code has done well in recognizing it." The nature of this lien is discussed at length, and is applied as well to time policies as well as to policies or for a single voyage.

In a recent admirable dictionary of the maritime law of France, by Aldrick Caumont, Paris, 1867, under the head of marine insurance, section 141, the author observes: "A lien is attached to the premium for the last voyage, if it be that made during the life of the policy upon the hull. This lien for the last voyage, resulting from articles 191 and 192, exists whenever there is a policy executed. The insured, who, asserting his right to suit, has attached the proceeds of the ship for the amount of his premium, is not permitted to claim a lien for the increase of premium for the time during which navigation is closed.

Any number of voyages made during the time fixed for the duration of the insurance, are considered as one and the same voyage. The broker has a lien upon the sum assured for the premium which he has paid. The liens for premiums of insurance upon property, rank only after that accorded to contracts of bottomry. They constitute an expense made for the preservation of the res. In case where an insurance upon the hull has been made for a limited time, the underwriters have a lien upon the ship, not only for the premiums of the last voyage, but also for the entire premium due under the policy." In support of these various constructions of article 191, the author cites opinions of the Court of Cassation, of the Imperial Court of Bordeaux, and Rouen, and Aix, and of the Tribunal of Commerce of Marseilles.

From these authorities I gather the following summary of French law upon this subject:

(1) That the Marine Ordinance of Louis XIV. did not expressly recognize the lien of the underwriter, but in this regard it was held not to be exclusive, and the premium was generally (perhaps not universally) held by the courts as a privileged debt.

(2) That the privilege of the underwriter for payment of the premium due upon the policy for the last voyage, is expressly recognized by Art. 191 of the Code of Commerce, and that such privilege is also extended to time policies.

(3) That this privilege is not waived by taking premium notes, unless it is thereby intended to be discharged.

Now, if the Supreme Court has adopted the Continental law in respect to jurisdiction over contracts of insurance, must it not be presumed logically to have adopted it as an entirety, and not by piecemeal? It certainly seems so to me, and it goes very far to justify the language used by the circuit judge in the case of the Williams.

It is claimed, however, that these contracts are made exclusively upon the credit of the owner. If this were so, it might be presumed in a particular case that the lien was thereby waived, but with the exception of supplies, repairs and materials furnished in the home port, the mere fact that the contract is made by the owner does not import a waiver or lien. There is no doubt of the existence of such lien in favor of seamen, although hired by the owner in person; nor in favor of shippers, where the contract of affreightment is made with the owner. Nor is it, I believe, any objection to the lien of a lender upon bottomry, that the bond was made by the owner.

In the nature of the contract itself, I see no reason forbidding such lien to the underwriter which does not apply with equal force to the salvor, or material man. Their contracts differ mainly in the fact that the services of the underwriter are rendered only upon a contingency which may never happen. That the question has never before arisen is due, as before observed, solely to the fact that the contract of marine insurance was not generally recognized as maritime until the opinion was pronounced in the Insurance Co. v. Dunham.

Under the ruling in this case, I feel constrained to hold that the contract of insurance being maritime in its character, the underwriter is entitled to a lien upon the ship for the payment of his premium: although, for the reason given by Dufour, I think it should rank in the lowest class of strictly maritime liens.

I think, however, the libel is defective in this case, in failing to aver the names of the parties insured, and the character extent of their interests in the vessel. I think it should also appear that the policy was a marine policy, or at least that it covered the vessel during the season of navigation. I regard it as very doubtful whether an ordinary fire policy covering a vessel while lying at the wharf during the winter would be the subject of admiralty jurisdiction. The above quotation from Caumont, citing a judgment of the Tribunal of Commerce at Marseilles, apparently supports this opinion. The schedule annexed to the libel seems to indicate that the policies were issued covering separate moieties of the vessel. This, however, should be made distinctly to appear.

I think I see considerable difficulty in enforcing the lien of an underwriter upon an undivided interest of a part owner, especially if the proceeding were an original one, against the vessel itself, and not against its proceeds of sale. The same difficulty, however, frequently occurs in connection with the mortgages upon undivided interests, and I should not regard it as insuperable, and if it should appear that each moiety of his vessel was covered by a lien of the same amount, the question could be easily solved, as the effect would be practically the same as if the entire vessel was covered by a single policy. The difficulty with the libel in this case is, that it has been attempted to employ the ordinary blank libels for supplies in actions for premiums, for which they are illy adapted.

Upon this ground the exceptions to the libels must be sustained, with leave to amend.

Through the kindness of the law firm of GREGORY & PINNEY, of Madison, Wis., we have received the following opinion:

U. S. CIRCUIT COURT, W. DISTRICT WISCONSIN.

[Before DAVIS and HOPKINS, JJ.]

JOHN F. CURTS et al. v. STEPHEN CISNA et al.

LAND TITLE DECISION—TAX TITLE—AGENT PURCHASING AND SELLING TO THIRD PARTY—RIGHTS OF THIRD PARTIES.

1. An agent, to pay taxes on the lands of his principal, cannot acquire a valid tax deed on the same when they have been sold for taxes.

2. Where an agent had acquired a tax deed on the lands of his principal, and contracted to sell the same to a third party, who had no notice of the fraud, but his agent, in making the purchase, had had such knowledge, and such purchaser had received a contract only for a deed, and had paid two-thirds of the purchase money, Held, That the fact that the agent of such purchaser had had knowledge of such fraud, was not sufficient to affect his principal, unless the facts and circumstances were such as to show that he had the same in mind at the time of the transaction of the purchase: that the right of such purchaser to call for a conveyance from the fraudulent grantee in the tax deed, was an equitable right merely, and that, as the right of the principal so defrauded to call for a conveyance of the interest vested by the fraudulent tax deed in his agent was the older equity, it must prevail.

3. A purchaser under a contract for a deed, though he may have paid a part or all of the purchase money, if he has not obtained a conveyance of the legal estate, cannot maintain as a defense that he is a purchaser bona fide and for a valuable consideration and without notice, so as to enable him to insist on the completion of his purchase, or the re-payment of what he has paid on it, as a condition of surrendering his claim under the contract. He must rely on the integrity and solvency of his vendor.

A purchaser without notice will not be protected against the superior equity of an adverse claim, as where a party had purchased what in reality was only a tax title, he must be held as having assumed the burden of maintaining that such tax title had extinguished the patent title, and which, as to him, was an adverse one.

HOPKINS, J. — The bill in this case charges that one, Horatio Curts was, in 1865, the owner of the land in controversy, being 320 acres of heavily timbered land in Clark county, in this State, and that he employed the defendant, Cisna, as his agent to pay the taxes thereon, as well as upon other lands owned by him in that vicinity, as he was a non-resident and furnished him the funds necessary for that purpose. That the general taxes due in the winter of 1865, were paid by defendant for him, but a special war bounty tax was levied in February, 1865, of about $13.00, of which he had no notice, and for which the land was sold in May, 1865, without his knowledge; that the defendant Cisna, continued to pay his taxes up to the time of his death in 1868; that on his death his property descended to John Curts, his father, who thereafter continued to employ Cisna to pay the taxes for him, as he had before done for Horatio, his son, and that he furnished the necessary funds to pay all taxes, and to redeem from tax sales as might be necessary, up to the time of his death in March, 1874; that the defendant Cisna paid the taxes up to the time of his death, either directly or by redemption, and never notified him of the tax deed mentioned in the complaint, or of the existence of the tax for which it was given; that in 1869 Cisna, discovering that the land had been sold for the special tax in 1865, and that the certificates were outstanding, purchased them, and on the 15th of June, 1869, took a deed thereon to himself, which he immediately had recorded; that after the deed to him he paid the taxes thereon with Mr. Curts' money the same as before, and sent receipts to him; that on the death of John Curts the complainants in this case succeeded to his interest and title as his heirs-at-law; that the defendant Cisna, on May 29, 1874, contracted to sell the lands for $1,500 to the defendant Gage, through the agency of one B. F. French, an attorney residing in Clark county, who acted as Gage's agent.

The bill then charges that the land was worth $8,000, and that Mr. Gage or Mr. French, his attorney, had notice of the facts and circumstances under which defendant Cisna obtained the tax deed, and that only a part of the consideration agreed upon had been paid, and no deed had been executed or delivered by Cisna to Gage of the premises. The bill prayed that the defendants might be required to release all claim under the tax deed and that it might be decreed void against them.

The defendants file a joint and several answer, in which they admit the land to be worth $8,000, as charged in the bill, and that Cisna's title was a tax title, as stated in the bill. They deny that he was the agent of either Horatio or John Curts to pay their taxes on the land as alleged, and they allege that John Curts had notice of the tax deed and deny that either Gage or French, his agent, in making the purchase had any knowledge or notice of Cisna's relations with the Curtses, or that he was their agent or owed them in any duty whatever. It does not state when they or either of them first had notice of the plaintiff's claim nor whether it was before or after the second payment of $500 in 1875, nor does it claim that a deed has been executed to Gage or that he has any other right than is derived under the contract set out in the bill.

Upon these issues testimony has been taken, from which it appears most conclusively that Cisna was the agent of both Horatio and John Curts for the payment of their taxes on this land as charged in the bill.

The defendant's letters to them and the tax receipts sent them by him place that question beyond all doubt and convict him of a most deliberate and outrageous fraud in the transaction of obtaining the deed, and also of falsehood in his testimony in denying the agency. It is seldom that parties are enabled to establish the rascality of an adversary so incontrovertibly as the plaintiffs in this case have that of the defendant, Cisna.

It appears that on the day he took this deed, he paid all the general taxes due or unpaid on the land, out of Mr. Curts' money, and sent to him the receipts and his account, including a charge of $5 for his services, and also $5 paid B. F. French for services, and wrote him as follows: "I went to Clark county and paid the taxes; your land is all clear now, except some that lies back from the river, there is a tax deed on, which was given in 1864," and again on the 16th of June, 1869, the day after he had taken and recorded this deed, he wrote him again about paying the taxes in Clark county, in which he said "the land is all clear now" with the exception of the old tax deed of 1864, and that he would see if that could not be released for the costs.

In view of these letters and receipts it seems preposterous that he should claim the land under that deed or attempt to deny his agency. It must have required some courage coupled with a great degree of moral depravity on his part to deliberately write a falsehood of that character to his employer, who had trusted his interests in his hands. It looks like a carefully contrived scheme to defraud his employer of this valuable property.

He paid the general taxes and sent receipts therefor, and took the deed for the special tax, which was unknown to his principal, and therefore would not likely be discovered, as there would be no occasion for examination in regard to such a tax. He doubtless thought if he could conceal the existence and record of the deed for three years, the principal's right to impeach it would be barred, as the statute of this State limits the right of an original owner to three years to bring an action to defend or set aside a recorded tax deed.

But this is not all of his fraudulent conduct. He continued to pay the subsequent taxes out of Mr. Curts' funds, and to send him the receipts. This became a necessity to avoid inquiry on the part of Mr. Curts, and the consequent investigation, which would necessarily expose him before his scheme had existed three years.

It is true, he swears that he told Mr. Curts of the existence of this deed in 1870, but his testimony on that point, Mr. Curts being dead, was incompetent. But if not incompetent, it is incredible. A careful examination of the letters written by him to Mr. Curts after that time (and they are numerous) shows that no mention was made of any such deed, although reference is made to tax deeds on other portions of his land. From this silence we are constrained to discredit his testimony upon that point, as well as upon the question of his agency. It is also true that a Mr. Bowman swears that he told Mr. Curts of this deed in 1870, and so does Mr. B. F. French testify that he spoke to him about it once. But from the whole evidence and conduct, and transactions of the parties, Curts and Cisna, subsequent to that time, we think these witnesses must be mistaken; that their conversation must have related to some other tax deed, or have been understood by Mr. Curts as relating to some other tax deed.

The position occupied by Mr. French in reference to this matter is not wholly free from suspicion. The evidence may not be sufficient to charge him as a confederate of Cisna, but there are circumstances that require close scrutiny into his conduct, motives and testimony. He swears he had the tax certificates and sold them to Cisna, knowing they were on Curts' land, on condition that Cisna should take a deed and not let Curts have them, and yet charges $5 for services rendered to Mr. Curts on the day of the deed, that Cisna paid, and neither he nor Cisna is able to state what those services were, and very soon after Mr. Curts' death, we find him negotiating for this title with Cisna, for and in the name of Mr. Gage, the other defendant. It is also shown that Cisna paid him $50 out of the first payment for his services in buying the land from him, which, in short, was paying him for buying this land of him for a client of his—a transaction almost as questionable as that of Cisna in taking the tax deed. He probably knew all about it, but as there is no proof that he acquired such knowledge during the time he was acting as agent for Gage, Mr. Gage's rights would not be affected by his former knowledge, unless we presumed that he had the facts of the case in his mind at the time, which his evidence negatives.

But it is not necessary to pursue the examination of Cisna's rights any further. He did not acquire any rights under the deed, and is not entitled to any benefit or advantage therefrom, and whatever he has received he should pay back, either to his co-defendant, from whom he received it, or to the complainants, the victims of his contemptible fraud.

This brings us to the consideration of the rights of the defendant Gage.

In the answer, the rights of a bona fide purchaser are claimed for him. The facts to constitute him such are imperfectly stated in the answer, but as the parties have gone to a hearing, we will examine the question upon its merits, not regarding any technical imperfections in the pleadings.

The defendant Gage is not within the authorities a bona fide purchaser, for to constitute such, the purchase must be completed by a deed, and the consideration be fully paid, before notice of complainant's rights. Hill on Trustees (marginal), 514 et seq; Boone v. Chiles, 10 Peters, 177, 242; See Leading Cases in Equity, page 93, et seq; See also, Hunter v. Simrall, 6 Little, 22; Blight's Heirs v. Banks, 6 Monroe, 698; Halstead v. The Bank of Kentucky, 4 J. J. Marsh, 534; More v. Clay, 7 Ala., 142.

In this case the consideration was not fully paid, nor was there a deed to Mr. Gage. The title, while in the vendor Cisna, is considered as held for the benefit of the prior equity in preference to those of later origin, so that the defendant Gage is not entitled to the land. The only question remaining is whether he is entitled to have the amount he had paid toward the purchase, to wit, the $1,000, refunded before the surrender of his claim.

This involves the consideration of a good many questions, and first, not being a bona fide purchaser, not having the legal title, can his interest be considered as other than an equitable right, and if so, does he not fall within the rule that when both parties' rights are equitable, the older prevails?

The equitable right of these complainants to this land as against the defendant Cisna, under whom the defendant Gage claims, is clear and unquestionable. His title, the tax title, was obtained without any act or deed on their part, and was obtained by fraud and without consideration to them, so their equity is perfect and the older.

The defendant Gage has a contract for the land upon which he had paid $1,000, before the commencement of this suit. Now, is his interest anything but an equitable one? If not, it must yield to the complainant's. In Peabody v. Fenton, 3 Barb. Chy. R., 451, 465, it is held that if a bona fide purchaser has not obtained the legal title by a valid conveyance, he cannot protect himself against the prior equity of the original owner, although he has a contract for the purchase and has actually paid for the land, and cites in support of that doctrine, Wiggs v. Wiggs, 1 Atk. Rep., 384; Moore v. Mayhew, Freemans Chy., 175; Tourville v. Nash, 3 Peere Williams, 307; 2 Sug. on V. & P., 274, 9th ed.

In Boone v. Chiles, 10 Peters, 177, 210, the court examine the subject to ascertain who are entitled to the rights of a bona fide purchaser, and arrive at the conclusion that such rights exist only "when a prior equity can be barred or avoided only by the union of the legal title with an equity arising from the payment of the purchase price without notice and a clear conscience."

If this is a correct statement of the rule, the rights of a bona fide purchaser do not attach upon paying the purchase price and taking a contract for a deed, but only on a union of a legal title with the payment, and that until such union the right of the purchaser is equitable, and a prior equity must prevail.

This view is supported by the weight of American and English authorities, and is fatal to the defendant's claim of protection as to the $1,000 paid before surrendering his rights under his contract. He must look to his contract and seek redress of the party with whom he contracted.

But there are some other questions presented in this case that deserve some notice from their importance.

The fact is admitted by the pleadings that the defendants contracted to buy this property for less than one-fifth of its real value. Is he entitled, in view of that fact, to be treated as a bona fide purchaser without notice? Under such circumstances, should not a court presume that he had notice of the defective and imperfect character of the plaintiff's title, particularly in the absence of any explanation on the subject? The purchaser of a promissory note at such a discount, would not, by the law merchant, be regarded as a bona fide holder for value to cut off the equities of the maker, and should a court of equity look with more favor upon a transaction apparently so unjust and unconscionable?

It would seem to not be consistent with the quality of equity to do so without some satisfactory explanation of such gross inadequacy, especially where the party claiming under such contract is seeking to defeat a prior equity of unquestionable character as that of the plaintiff's in this case is.

This case differs in another important respect from the reported cases when the rights of the bona fide purchasers are discussed.

In the most of them the plaintiff had voluntarily parted with the title, had made a sale and delivered a deed and was seeking to avoid it on the ground of fraud on the part of his grantee in obtaining it. In that class of cases courts of equity very properly lean toward the protection of a party who had bought, relying on the record and apparent title.

But in this case, the plaintiffs or the intestate have not conveyed; they had not clothed Cisna with any apparent title. The record shows them to be the original owners and that Cisna's claim was adverse—only a tax title, which probably accounts for the inadequate price paid. The record disclosed also that Cisna had obtained this property, worth $8,000, for about $13.

This places the parties in a different attitude before the court. It is the case of the purchaser of an adverse title seeking the protection of a bona fide purchaser as against the real owners and claimants. No case has been found where the purchaser of an adverse title has been allowed to demand of the real owner what he may have paid for the adverse title as a condition of surrendering his worthless claim.

In Moore v. Dodd, 1 A. K. Marsh, 103, it is held that a purchaser without notice will not be protected against a superior equity, deduced under an adverse claim. Mr. Gage knew his vendor's title was a tax title only, and should be held as having assumed the burden of maintaining that it had extinguished the title of the plaintiff, which was the record title, and adverse as to him.

Courts of equity should pause before going to this extent. A party who obtains "acres for cents," as tax title owners are charged with doing, hardly occupies a position which authorizes him to introduce to courts of equity, parties claiming under him as innocent purchasers as against the parties owning the original title. Grantees cannot be transformed so readily into subjects of favor in those courts. The taint of the original transaction will adhere to them until they show, at least, that they have paid full value, which might warrant a court in presuming that they had purchased in the belief that they were getting a good and perfect title. But when, as in this case, the purchaser pays only one-fifth of the real value, he cannot be entitled to claim the protection, or the favorable consideration due to a bona fide purchaser, but should rather be looked upon as a speculator in questionable titles.

In view of all the testimony in this case, we have come to the conclusion that the defendant Gage, must be considered as not occupying the position of a bona fide purchaser, and therefore his claim is no better than that of Cisna, and that he, as well as Cisna, must surrender and release all claim or title to the land in controversy, and pay the costs of this case to be taxed.

The complainants, upon paying the amount paid by Cisna for special tax certificates and interest thereon, into court, will be entitled to a decree requiring the defendants to release and relinquish all right and title to said land and the whole thereof, and perpetually enjoining them from setting up or claiming any right derived under or through the tax deed mentioned in the bill of complaint.

I concur in this opinion.

SUPREME COURT OF WISCONSIN.

THE STATE ex rel. A. J. DRAKE v. PETER DOYLE, Secretary of State.

THE JURISDICTION AND CONTROL OF THE FEDERAL COURTS OVER THE STATES BY ACTION AGAINST THEIR OFFICERS—THE POWER OF THE SUPREME COURT TO COMPEL THE SECRETARY OF STATE TO REVOKE A LICENSE ISSUED TO A FOREIGN INSURANCE COMPANY.

As originally adopted, the Federal Constitution extended the judicial power of the United States to controversies "between a State and citizens of another State;" vesting in the Supreme Court of the United States original jurisdiction in all cases "in which a State shall be a party." This grant of original jurisdiction in such cases to that great court appears to have been considered exclusive. Federalist, No. 80; Story's Const., sec. 1,682; 1 Kent, 298; Georgia v. Brailsford, 2 Dallas, 415; Cohens v. Virginia, 6 Wheat., 264.

The jurisdiction was probably intended to apply only to cases in which a State should be plaintiff. But it was held to embrace all controversies between States, whether plaintiffs or defendants, and citizens of other States; so far reducing a sovereign State to the condition of a private corporation. Chisholm v. Georgia, 2 Dallas, 419. This was probably a surprise, certainly an offense, to most, if not all, of the States. Says Chancellor Kent:

"The judicial power, as it originally stood, extended to suits prosecuted against one of the United States by citizens of another State, or by citizens or subjects of any foreign State; but the States were not willing to submit to be arraigned as defendants before the Federal courts, at the instance of private persons, be the cause of action what it might. The decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of Chisholm v. The State of Georgia, decided in 1793, in which it was adjudged that a State was suable by citizens of another State, gave much dissatisfaction, and the legislature of Georgia carried their opposition to open defiance of the judicial authority. The inexpediency of the power appeared so great that Congress, in 1794, proposed to the States an amendment to that part of the Constitution, and it was subsequently amended in this particular, under the provision in the fifth article." 1 Kent, 296.

The amendment is in these words: "The judicial power of the United States shall not be construed to extend to any suit in law or equity, commenced or prosecuted against one of the United States by citizens of another State, or by citizens or subjects of any foreign State."

The manifest object of the amendment was to preclude the Federal courts from jurisdiction over a State, in any case, at the suit of private parties. And by all rules of construction, the prohibition should apply to all cases in which the interest of a State is so concerned that it ought otherwise to be a party. But the intent and letter of the amendment have been greatly narrowed by the effect given to it by the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States.

The Constitution designed that court to be, as it is, a great national tribunal; a court of last resort on all questions of national character; and a court of a dignity and authority unequaled by any tribunal known in modern history, not perhaps excepting the imperial chamber at Wetzlar, to which it has been compared. Federalist, No. 80; Story's Const., sec. 1,679; 1 Kent, 296. And yet that august tribunal has no general jurisdiction, but is essentially a court of defined and limited jurisdiction, original and appellate. We speak with profound deference to that court, in saying that it should be matter of surprise to no jurist, to no student of history, that so august a tribunal, so constituted and limited, should have from the beginning proved impatient of the limited scope of its own authority and that of the inferior Federal courts on which its own jurisdiction chiefly rests; gradually and sometimes almost insensibly extending it, and signally illustrating the maxim, ampliare jurisdictionem. Its views of Federal jurisdiction have always been aggressive. It has but illustrated a general human tendency, a common phase of judicial history, in gradually enlarging the letter of its jurisdiction by construction; until its jurisdiction by implication appears to exceed its jurisdiction by express grant; until it appears to be loaded down and impeded, we might almost say overwhelmed, by excess of jurisdiction, presumably never contemplated by the framers of the Constitution.

And it was, perhaps, hardly to be expected that an amendment to the Constitution, abolishing a jurisdiction originally granted by that instrument to Federal courts, would be kindly regarded by so great a court so constituted, or favorably construed for the prohibition and against the jurisdiction. So it has surely proved.

The amendment appears to have been first before the court in Hollingsworth v. Virginia, 3 Dallas, 378. The question was the effect of the amendment upon pending suits, and the court "delivered an unanimous opinion, that the amendment being constitutionally adopted, there could not be exercised any jurisdiction, in any case, past or future, in which a State was sued by the citizens of another State, or by citizens or subjects of any foreign State." But a few years later, in a cause in which a State claimed an interest but was not a party, the court used this language:

"The right of a State to assert, as plaintiff, any interest it may have in a subject, which forms the matter of controversy between individuals, in one of the courts of the United States, is not affected by this amendment; nor can it be so construed as to oust the court of its jurisdiction, should such claim be suggested. The amendment simply provides, that no suit shall be commenced or prosecuted against a State. The State cannot be made a defendant in a suit brought by an individual; but it remains the duty of the courts of the United States to decide all cases brought before them by citizens of one State against citizens of a different State, where a State is not necessarily a defendant. In this case, the suit was not instituted against the State or its treasurer, but against the executrixes of David Rittenhouse, for the proceeds of a vessel condemned in the Court of Admiralty, which were admitted to be in their possession. If the proceeds had been the actual property of Pennsylvania, however wrongfully acquired, the disclosure of that fact would have presented a case on which it was unnecessary to give an opinion; but it certainly can never be alleged that a mere suggestion of title in a State to property, in possession of an individual, must arrest the proceedings of the court, and prevent their looking into the suggestion, and examining the validity of the title." United States v. Peters, 5 Cranch., 115. It will be presently seen that the suggestion here thrown out is the seed of great growth of jurisdiction, inconsistent with the spirit of the amendment, if not with its letter.

The amendment appears to have next come before the court in Cohens v. Virginia, 6 Wheat., 264. The State had prosecuted the plaintiffs in error criminally in one of her courts, and there was judgment of conviction against them. They sued out a writ of error from the Federal Supreme Court to the State court, against the State; the State being defendant in error in that court. Notwithstanding the amendment, the court claimed jurisdiction of the cause, upon the ground that such a proceeding was not a suit within the meaning of the amendment, though it subjected the State to a judgment in that court, at the suit of a private party. And the court has hitherto adhered to that rule in numerous cases.

In Osborn v. U. S. Bank, 9 Wheat., 738, the court thus states the question: "The direct interest of the State in the suit, as brought, is admitted; and, had it been in the power of the bank to make it a party, perhaps no decree ought to have been pronounced in the cause, until the State was before the court. But this was not in the power of the bank. The eleventh amendment of the Constitution has exempted a State from the suits of citizens of other States or aliens; and the very difficult question is to be decided, whether, in such a case, the court may act upon the agents employed by the State, and on the property in their hands." And the court thus states its conclusion: "It may, we think, be laid down as a rule which admits of no exception, that in all cases where jurisdiction depends on the party, it is the party named in the record. Consequently the 11th amendment, which restrains the jurisdiction granted by the Constitution over suits against States, is, of necessity, limited to those suits in which a State is a party on the record. The amendment has its full effect, if the Constitution be construed as it would have been construed, had the jurisdiction of the court never been extended to suits brought against a State by the citizens of another State, or by aliens. The State not being a party on the record, and the court having jurisdiction over those who are parties on the record, the true question is, not one of jurisdiction, but whether in the exercise of its jurisdiction, the court ought to make a decree against the defendants; whether they are to be considered as having a real interest, or as being only nominal parties." The court then proceeds to show that the officers of the State, who were the parties to the record, were personally liable to the bank, and therefore had a real, personal interest, under the State indeed, but distinct from the interest of the State; and upon that ground upheld the decree against them.

This is the leading case upon the subject. And it is very distinguishable from the case before us, in which the Secretary of State has no interest whatever; is a mere nominal party, the State alone having the whole interest in the subject; a mere shadow of the State set up for jurisdiction against the body over which jurisdiction is prohibited by the Constitution.

The next case which we find is Governor of Georgia v. Madrazo, 1 Peters, 110. That was a case in admiralty, in which the Governor of the State intervened in behalf of the State, and the court uses this language:

"In the case of Osborn v. The Bank of the United States, 9 Wheat., 738, this question was brought more directly before the court. It was argued with equal zeal and talent, and decided on great deliberation. In that case, the auditor and treasurer of the State were defendants, and the title of the State itself to the subject in contest was asserted. In that case, the court said, 'It may, we think, be laid down as a rule, which admits of no exception, that in all cases where jurisdiction depends on the party, it is the party named in the record.' The court added, 'the State not being a party on the record, and the court having jurisdiction over those who are parties on the record, the true question is not one of jurisdiction, but whether, in the exercise of its jurisdiction, the court ought to make a decree against the defendants; whether they are to be considered as having a real interest, or as being only nominal parties.'

"The information of the Governor of Georgia professes to be filed on behalf of the State, and is, in the language of the bill filed by the Governor of Georgia on behalf of the State, against Brailsford.

If, therefore, the State was properly considered as a party in that case, it may be considered as a party in this.

"The bill of Madrazo alleges that the slaves which he claims, 'were delivered over to the government of the State of Georgia, pursuant to an act of the General Assembly of the said State, carrying into effect an act of Congress of the United States, in that case made and provided; a part of the said slaves sold, as permitted by said act of Congress, and as directed by an act of the General Assembly of the said State, and the proceeds paid into the treasury of the said State, amounting to thirty-eight thousand dollars or more.'

"The governor appears, and files a claim on behalf of the State, to the slaves remaining unsold, and to the proceeds of those which are sold. He states the slaves to be in possession of the executive, under the act of the legislature of Georgia, made to give effect to the act of Congress on the subject of negroes, mulattoes or people of color, brought illegally into the United States; and the proceeds of those sold, to have been paid in the treasury, and to be no longer under his control.

"The case made, in both the libel and claim, exhibits a demand for money actually in the treasury of the State, mixed up with its general funds, and for slaves in possession of the government. It is not alleged, nor is it the fact, that this money has been brought into the treasury, or these Africans into the possession of the executive, by any violation of an act of Congress. The possession has been acquired by means which it was lawful to employ.

"The claim upon the governor is as a governor; he is sued, not by his name, but by his title. The demand made upon him is not made personally, but officially. The decree is pronounced, not against the person, but the officer, and appeared to have been pronounced against the successor of the original defendant; as the appeal bond was executed by a different governor from him who filed the information. In such a case, where the chief magistrate of a State is sued, not by his name, but by his style of office, and the claim made upon him is entirely in his official character, we think the State itself may be considered as a party on the record. If the State is not a party, there is no party against whom a decree can be made. No person in his natural capacity, is brought before the court as defendant. This not being a proceeding against the thing, but against the person, a person capable of appearing as defendant, against whom a decree can be pronounced, must be a party to the cause before a decree can be regularly pronounced.

"But were it to be admitted that the governor could be considered as defendant in his personal character, no case is made which justifies a decree against him personally. He has acted in obedience to a law of the State, made for the purpose of giving effect to an act of Congress; and has done nothing in violation of any law of the United States.

"The decree is not to be considered as made in a case in which the governor was a defendant, in his personal character; nor could a decree against him in that character be supported.

"This decree cannot be sustained as against the State, because, if the 11th amendment to the Constitution does not extend to proceedings in admiralty, it was a case for the original jurisdiction of the Supreme Court. It cannot be sustained as a suit, prosecuted, not against the State, but against the thing, because the thing was not in possession of the District Court.

"We are, therefore, of opinion that there is error in so much of the decree of the Circuit Court, as directs that the said slaves libelled by Juan Madrazo, and the issue of the females now in the custody of the government of the State of Georgia, or the agent or agents of the said State, be restored to the said Madrazo, as the legal proprietor thereof, and that the proceeds of those slaves, who were sold by order of the governor or the said State, be paid to the said Juan Madrazo; and that the same ought to be reversed; but that there is no error in so much of the said decree as dismisses the information of the governor of Georgia, and the claim of William Bowen."

Governor of Georgia v. Madrazo was followed and affirmed in Kentucky v. Dennison, Governor, 24 How., 66. This was an application for mandamus, by the governor of Kentucky against the governor of Ohio, within the original jurisdiction of the Supreme Court; to enforce the performance of an executive duty by the defendant governor. Of course the mandamus could not go to the State, but to its officer only. And the objection was taken that it was not a case between two States, to give jurisdiction to the court under the Constitution. But the court holds:

"So, also, as to the process in the name of the governor, in his official capacity, in behalf of the State.

"In the case of Madrazo v. The Governor of Georgia, 1 Pet., 110, it was decided that in a case where the chief magistrate of a State is sued, not by his name as an individual, but by his style of office, and the claim made upon him is entirely in his official character, the State itself may be considered a party on the record. This was a case where the State was the defendant; the practice, where it is plaintiff, has been frequently adopted of suing in the name of the governor in behalf of the State, and was, indeed, the form originally used, and always recognized as the suit of the State.

"Thus, in the first case to be found in our reports, in which a suit was brought by a State, it was entitled, and set forth in the bill, as the suit of 'the State of Georgia, by Edward Tellfair, governor of the said State, complainant, against Samuel Brailsford and others'; and the second case, which was as early as 1793, was entitled and set forth in the pleadings as the suit of 'His Excellency Edward Tellfair, Esquire, Governor and Commander-in-chief in and over the State of Georgia in behalf of the said State, complainant, against Samuel Brailsford and others, defendants.'

"The cases referred to leave no question open to controversy, as to the jurisdiction of the court. They show that * * * it has also been settled, that where the State is a party, plaintiff or defendant, the governor represents the State, and the suit may be, in form, a suit by him as governor in behalf of the State, where the State is plaintiff, and he must be summoned or notified as the officer representing the State, where the State is defendant.

"We may, therefore, dismiss the question of jurisdiction without further comment, as it is very clear, that if the right claimed by Kentucky can be enforced by judicial process, the proceeding by mandamus is the only mode in which the object can be accomplished."

What is said in Governor of Georgia v. Madrazo, and in Kentucky v. Dennison, of the governor of a State, applies equally to any other State officer, acting for the State, virtute officii. The question is not one of the dignity of the office, but of the representation of the State, pro hac vice. "In the application of this principle, there is no difference between the governor of a State and officers of a State of lower grades. In this respect they are upon a footing of equality." Davis v. Gray, 16 Wall., 203.

The opinion of the court in Osborn v. The Bank, and Governor of Georgia v. Madrazo, were both delivered by Marshall, C. J.; and the opinion in Kentucky v. Dennison, by Taney, C. J.; two of the most illustrious jurists known in the history of jurisprudence among the great English-speaking common-law peoples. Their doctrines were surely well and wisely considered, are entitled to the most profound deference and not lightly to be overruled. And these cases are in entire accord upon two propositions, both conclusive of the question before us.

1st. That where a suit is prosecuted in a Federal court, by a private party, against a State officer, in which the State has a direct interest but cannot be made a party, the officer himself must have an interest or liability in the subject matter, upon which the jurisdiction of the court can attach; and,

2nd. That where such a suit is prosecuted against a State officer having no such interest or liability, in his official capacity only, to affect a right of the State, the State is the real defendant within the prohibition of the amendment of the Constitution.

These rules are vital. Where there is such an interest or liability of the officer personally, the jurisdiction of a Federal court might be held to attach, against him personally, upon such interest or liability, without direct violation of the Constitutional amendment prohibiting jurisdiction against the State. But when there is no such personal interest or liability of the officer, and the suit is against him in his official capacity only, for the purpose of reaching an interest or liability of the State, then jurisdiction attaches on the interest or liability of the State, not of the officer; the State is the real defendant, and the officer only a nominal defendant; and jurisdiction is as much prohibited as if the State itself were defendant. To hold that jurisdiction could, in such a case, be exercised against the State, in the person of its officer, would be a direct and mere evasion of the constitutional prohibition, which the judges of all courts, Federal and State, are sworn to support; which no judicial construction of any court can erase from the paramount law of the land.

The subject matter of Governor of Georgia v. Madrazo, came again before the court, ex parte, Juan Madrazo, 7 Peters, 627, upon application to file a libel in admiralty against the State. The application was denied; the chief justice saying of it: "It is a mere personal suit against a State to recover proceeds in its possession, and in such a case no private person has a right to commence an original suit in this court against a State."

Osborn v. The Bank, Governor of Georgia v. Madrazo, and Kentucky v. Dennison, are so closely connected in principle that we have considered them together, a little out of the order of the latter case. Between Governor of Georgia v. Madrazo and Kentucky v. Dennison, another case came before the court and has its place in the reports, in which the jurisdictional question might have properly arisen. This is Dodge v. Woolsey, 18 How., 331. It was the case of a bill filed in an inferior Federal court, by a private party, against a tax collector of the State, to restrain the collection of a State tax. Several questions were raised and passed upon by the court in that case, quite foreign to the question which we are considering. The jurisdictional question before us, arising under the amendment of the Constitution, appears not to have been raised at the bar or considered by the court. The jurisdiction of the Federal courts over the subject-matter, in other respects is discussed; but not the jurisdiction over the State officer, acting officially, without interest, within the constitutional prohibition. It appears quite obvious that this question was altogether overlooked. Indeed, the court says of the case of State Bank v. Knoop, 16 How., 369: "It rules this in every particular; and to the opinion there given we have nothing to add, nor anything to take away." State Bank v. Knoop, did indeed involve the questions passed upon in Dodge v. Woolsey, but it was a writ of error to a State court, and could not possibly involve the jurisdiction of a Federal court in an original suit, against a State officer acting officially. The oversight is the more to be regretted, because the assumption of jurisdiction in Dodge v. Woolsey, disregards the two conditions before noticed, as solemnly established in Osborn v. The Bank, and Governor of Georgia v. Madrazo, subsequently confirmed in Kentucky v. Dennison. But the rule applies to it, that a case which overlooks a point cannot be held to overrule cases expressly deciding the very points. And the positive rules of Osborn v. The Bank, and Governor of Georgia v. Madrazo, must be held to survive the silence of Dodge v. Woolsey. If this were otherwise, the negative authority of Dodge v. Woolsey, on the question of jurisdiction, must be taken to be overruled by the positive authority of the later case of Kentucky v. Dennison.

Then comes Davis v. Gray, 16 Wall., 203, where a receiver appointed in a cause pending in an inferior Federal court, filed his bill in the same court, against the governor and another officer of a State, to restrain them in executing the law of the State. The question of jurisdiction was raised and discussed by the court. And Mr. Justice Swayne, who delivered the opinion, says of the question:

"A few remarks will be sufficient to dispose of the jurisdictional objections as to the appellants.

"In Osborn v. The Bank of the United States, these things, among others, were dicided:

"(1.) A Circuit Court of the United States, in a proper case in equity, may enjoin a State officer from executing a State law in conflict with the Constitution or a statute of the United States, when such execution will violate the rights of the complainant.

"(2.) Where the State is concerned, the State should be made a party, if it could be done. That it cannot be done, is a sufficient reason for the omission to do it, and the court may proceed to decree against the officers of the State in all respects as if the State were a party to the record.

"(3.) In deciding who were parties to the suit, the court will not look beyond the record. Making a State officer a party, does not make the State a party, although her law may have prompted his action, and the State may stand behind him as the real party in interest. A State can be made a party only by shaping the bill expressly with that view, as where individuals or corporations are intended to be put in that relation to the case.

We call attention to the following opinions, reported at length in this issue.

ADMIRALTY—LIEN OF UNDERWRITER—AVERMENTS—LIBEL.—The opinion of the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Michigan, by BROWN, J., holding that the underwriter of a ship has a lien for the premium due upon marine policies of insurance, and is entitled to payment from the proceeds of sale; that the libel should aver not only the dates and amounts of the policies, but the names of the parties insured, and the character and extent of their several interests in the vessel.

TRYING CASES BEFORE MEMBERS OF THE BAR.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of this State, by SCHOLFIELD, J., holding that parties cannot confer jurisdiction upon a court by consent, neither can they by consent empower any individual other than the judge of the court to exercise its powers, and that a judgment entered in a case tried before a lawyer by consent of the parties was a nullity. We should think this opinion would put a stop to the practice of trying cases before members of the bar who have no commissions as judges. What would be thought of the Supreme Court if it should, every time the parties consented or desired it, appoint seven members of the bar to act as a supreme court? If, under our constitution, members of the bar can act as circuit judges without being elected by the people, they may also, under like circumstances, act as supreme judges. It is undoubtedly the proper practice to allow none to act as judges except these who are constitutionally appointed or elected.

TAX TITLE—AGENT PURCHASING AND SELLING TO THIRD PARTY—RIGHTS OF THIRD PARTIES.—The opinion of the United States Circuit Court for the western district of Wisconsin, by DAVIS and HOPKINS, JJ., holding that an agent to pay taxes on the lands of his principal, cannot acquire a valid tax deed on the same; that where an agent had acquired a tax deed on the lands of his principal, and contracted to sell the same to a third party, who had no notice of the fraud, but his agent in making the purchase had had such knowledge, and such purchaser had received a contract only for a deed and had paid two-thirds of the purchase money, that the fact that the agent of such purchaser had had knowledge of such fraud, was not sufficient to affect his principal, unless the facts and circumstances were such as to show that he had the same in mind at the time of the transaction of the purchase; that the right of such purchaser to call for a conveyance from the fraudulent grantee, in the tax deed was an equitable right merely, and that as the right of the principal so defrauded to call for a conveyance of the interest vested by the fraudulent tax deed in his agent was the older equity, it must prevail.

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.—The Supreme Court of Illinois will commence its September term at Ottawa on Tuesday next. The certified copies of records of decrees or judgments appealed from must be filed in the clerk's office at Ottawa on or before the second day of the term. Provided twenty days intervene between the day of the judgment or decree appealed from and the sitting of the court; but if ten days and not twenty shall so intervene, then the record must be filed on or before the tenth day of the term; see section 73, Revised Statutes 1874, p. 783. The call of the docket, according to rule 32, published in 55 Illinois Reports and in 4 Chicago LEGAL NEWS, 226, will commence with the second week of the term, and twenty cases per day will be subject to call. The abstract and brief of the plaintiff in error or appellant, must be filed in the clerk's office one day before the day when a cause stands subject to call. The defendant in error, or appellee, in case he does not argue orally, can file a brief within ten days after the time fixed for filing the brief of plaintiff in error, or appellant, and the latter has ten days for a reply.

Under rule 58, in all cases where the defendant in error or the appellee desires to plead and not join in error, he must file such plea in the office of the clerk at least five days before the cause stands for trial, and the issue thereon must be made up before the day the cause stands for trial.

REPORTS OF CASES AT LAW AND IN CHANCERY, argued and determined in the Supreme Court of Illinois. By Norman L. Freeman, reporter. Volume LXXVII. Containing the remaining Cases submitted at the January Term, 1875, and a portion of the Cases submitted at the June Term, 1875. Printed for the Reporter. Springfield, 1876.

We have received from Mr. Freeman a copy of the above volume just fresh from the press. In style and mechanical execution it is similar to its immediate predecessors. It contains 131 cases; of these 70 are affirmed, and 61 reversed. There are 8 cases in which the judges do not all concur, and 2 in which the opinions are per curiam. We give the names of the judges who tried the cases in the courts below, and how they were disposed of in the Supreme Court: Lyman Lacey, 4 affirmed and 8 reversed; Cyrus Epler, 6 affirmed and 7 reversed; John Burns, 2 affirmed, 3 reversed; Thomas F. Tipton, 3 affirmed, 4 reversed; T. B. Tanner, 3 affirmed, 4 reversed; C. L. Higbee, 3 reversed; James C. Allen, 3 affirmed, 4 reversed; C. S. Zane, 4 affirmed, 4 reversed; Joseph Sibly, 1 affirmed, 2 reversed; C. B. Smith, 8 affirmed, 4 reversed; J. C. Thompson, 1 affirmed; J. W. Cochran, 3 affirmed; H. M. Vandeveer, 1 affirmed, 1 reversed; City court of East St. Louis, 1 affirmed; O. L. Davis, 1 affirmed, 2 reversed; S. M. Moore, 1 affirmed; W. H. Snyder, 13 affirmed, 7 reversed; Amos Watts, 10 affirmed, 5 reversed; Monroe C. Crawford, 1 affirmed, 1 reversed; Charles H. Layman, 1 affirmed; S. B. Bryant, 1 reversed; H. B. Decius, 1 affirmed; Johnson county Circuit Court, 1 reversed. Judge Snyder has the largest number of any of the judges affirmed. At the conclusion of the volume is the following table of unreported cases:

Bester v. Chapman. Appeal from the Circuit Court of McLean. Opinion per Curiam. Decree affirmed. Messrs. Williams, Burr & Capen, and Mr. Hamilton Spencer, for the appellant. Mr. W. M. Hatch, for the appellee.

Bross v. Lieb. Appeal from the Circuit Court of Cook. Opinion per Curiam. Decree reversed. Mr. Edward Roby, and Mr. Wm. Bross, for the appellant. Mr. Jas. K. Edsall, Attorney General, for the appellee.

Chicago and Alton R. R. Co. v. McKnight. Appeal from the Circuit Court of Macoupin. Opinion by McAllister, J. Judgment affirmed. Mr. W. R. Welch, for the appellant. Mr. John I. Rinaker, for the appellee.

Walwrath v. Cleary. Appeal from the Circuit Court of Cook. Opinion per Curiam. Decree reversed and remanded. Mr. Edward Roby, for the appellant. Messrs. Hay, Greene & Littler, and Messrs. Robinson, Knapp & Shutt, for the appellee.

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

ABSTRACT OF OPINIONS FILED AT OTTAWA, JUNE 30, 1876.

309.—John Barker v. Int. Bank of Chicago.—Error to Cook.—Opinion by CRAIG, J., reversing and remanding.

ESTOPPEL OF GRANTEES AS TO PRIOR TRUST DEED.

Held, That where one makes an accommodation note, and afterwards conveys the premises in the deed of trust, and in the sale thereof treats the note as a valid indebtedness, and provides that the deed of trust shall stand as a lien thereon, to secure the payment of the debt, his grantees are not in a position to defeat the lien created by the trust deed.

321.—E. Erickson v. Margaret Rafferty.—Error to KNOX.—Opinion by BREESE, J., reversing and remanding; DICKEY, J., dissenting.

NOTICE AS TO MORTGAGE WITH WRONG DESCRIPTION.

STATEMENT.—Bill to reform a mortgage deed, and to foreclose it—the mortgage being for a different piece of land than that intended, the mistake being that of the scrivener, as was alleged. Held,

That the mortgage with the misdescription, being on record, was sufficient to put any one on inquiry who knew the extent of the means of the mortgagor's limited possessions, etc., and if such a one would buy the property meant to be included in the mortgage, he must be charged with notice, notwithstanding the misdescription.

477.—Charles Peterson v. John W. C. Nehf.—Appeal from Superior Court of Cook.—Opinion by SHELDON, J., reversing and remanding.

RES ADJUDICATA—REQUISITES.

Held, That in order to constitute a question res adjudicata, it is not essential that the parties in a former suit be precisely identical, if the question in the latter case was made a distinct issue in the former, and a decision rested on it, as for example, whether certain conveyances were fraudulent as to creditors, or not. In such case, if a married woman brings suit to clear titles and a question is made upon a certain conveyance, and it is decided valid, the same question cannot afterwards be raised as to the land, in a creditor's bill against the husband.

A LUCKY VETERAN.—Years ago, Charles M. Lee was a great lawyer in Rochester, N. Y. On one occasion he was defending an old veteran for passing a forged promissory note for thirty dollars. There was scarcely a doubt of the man's guilt, but Lee, getting over the knotty points of the evidence as well as he could, undertook to carry the jury by escalade on the ground of the prisoner's Revolutionary services. He described in graphic terms the bloody attack on Stony Point, by Mad Anthony, at which the prisoner, then a dare-devil of 19, had distinguished himself, and closed his speech as follows:

"Gentlemen of the jury, will you send to the State prison for passing a contemptible thirty-dollar forged note, an old hero of three-score-and-ten, who in his youth, cheered the heart of his country in the darkest hour of the Revolution by storming Stony Point?"

This was a poser for the jury, who, retiring, returned after an absence of about two hours, when the clerk went through the usual formula:

"Gentlemen of the jury, have you agreed upon a verdict?"

"We have."

"Do you find the prisoner at the bar guilty, or not guilty?"

"Not guilty, because he stormed Stony Point!" thundered the foreman.

The audience applauded, the crier rapped for order, the District Attorney objected to the recording of the verdict, and the Judge sent the jury out again, telling the foreman, in a sharp tone, that they must find an unconditional verdict.

After an absence of a few minutes, they returned, when the foreman rendered the simple verdict of not guilty, adding, however, as he dropped into his seat:

"It was a good thing though, for the old revolutionary cuss, that he stormed Stony Point!"

Company v. Debolt, and the Mechanics and Traders Bank v. Debolt, proceeded upon the same principles, and were controlled by that authority, with respect to the jurisdictional question arising in each of those cases as to the defendants."

And again, speaking of parties: "We feel no difficulty in disposing of the case as it is presented in the record."

This case professes to follow Osborn v. The Bank; but it is extraordinary that it takes no notice of the essential rule cited from that case, that defendant State officers, to give jurisdiction, must themselves have an interest or liability in the subject-matter. And it is more extraordinary still, that, quoting several cases with, at best, a very remote bearing on the question, the opinion makes no reference to Governor of Georgia v. Madrazo, or Kentucky v. Dennison, with both of which the opinion is directly in conflict, as well as with the rule in Osborn v. The Bank. And, with all due respect, we think it may be said of Davis v. Gray, that, instead of following the well considered and established rules in Osborn v. The Bank, Governor of Georgia v. Madrazo and Kentucky v. Dennison, it rather follows, presumably by inadvertence, the blind lead of Dodge v. Woolsey, itself an incongruity, sandwiched in the reports between inconsistent decisions.

We cannot think the vital principle established in Osborn v. The Bank, or the judgments in Governor of Georgia v. Madrazo and Kentucky v. Dennison, overruled by Davis v. Gray. These cases are too solemn and of too high authority to be set aside sub silentio. We cannot but think that they were overlooked; the learned judge who delivered the opinion, being misled by the unconsidered and unfortunate departure from those cases of Dodge v. Woolsey.

Woodruff v. Trapnall, 10 How., 190; Curran v. The State of Arkansas, 15 How., 304; State Bank v. Knoop, 16 How., 369; Ohio L. & T. Co. v. Debolt, 16 How., 416; The Bank v. Debolt, 18 How., 380; and The Bank v. Skelly, 1 Black., 436, cited in the opinion to support jurisdiction in Davis v. Gray, were all writs of error to State courts, to be classed with Cohens v. Virginia. And their authority for original jurisdiction in an inferior Federal court, is not perceived. And it may be said in passing, that the learned judge who delivered the opinion was in error in saying that in Woodruff v. Trapnall a writ of mandamus was issued to the proper representative of the State. The judgment of the Supreme Court of the State was simply reversed in the usual form. So in Curran v. Arkansas, the judgment of the State court was reversed; the Federal Supreme Court simply following the State Supreme Court in holding that such a suit would lie against the State, by her own law, in her own courts.

When the decisions of a State court vary in interpreting State law, the Supreme Court of the United States makes its own election which it will follow. Gelpcke v. Dubuque, 1 Wall., 175. We may, with profound respect, presume here upon the like right of choice; and we prefer to hold the rules in Osborn v. The Bank, Governor of Georgia v. Madrazo, and Kentucky v. Dennison, as the more authoritative and well considered cases to settle the law of that court, unless expressly overruled. When adjudications so solemn and so well considered are disregarded or forgotten in the court, none of us may presume to say Indignor; but surely all of us should recall sounder and safer principles established in that great court, Quandoque bonus dormitat Homerus.

And the rules established in Osborn v. The Bank, Governor of Georgia v. Madrazo, and Kentucky v. Dennison, exclude jurisdiction of the Federal court of the bill and injunction pleaded by the secretary of State in this case.

Our conclusion would not be different if we were to accept Davis v. Gray as overruling the earlier cases, and establishing a different rule. For that case does not go the length, no case which we have been able to find in that court does, of holding that the State would be bound, in the exercise of its authority, by the proceeding of the Federal court against its officer. Conceding the power of the Federal court to bind the officer, as between him and the plaintiff who sues him, the constitutional amendment absolutely prohibits it from binding the State, as against either the plaintiff or its own officer. In such a case the private party seeking his remedy against the officer, must be content with that, valeat quantum. He can have none against the State, or binding the State, or binding the officer against the State. Against the authority of the State over its own officer, against the officer's duty to the State, Federal process in such a case can avail nothing. It is more than the case of one not bound by a judgment, because not a party. It is not the case of one without the jurisdiction of the court, but of one above the jurisdiction. It is the case of a sovereign State, over which the charter creating the Federal courts, for grave political reasons, prohibits jurisdiction in such cases, has abrogated the jurisdiction once improvidently granted. It would be a singular perversion of all judicial rule, to hold that the State could not be bound as a party, but is bound without being a party. And it would be a simple nullification of the constitutional amendment, to hold the State in any way bound by the judgment of a Federal court against its officer, at the suit of a private party. That would be, not judicial construction, not judicial stretch of jurisdiction, but judicial revolution.

And it would involve the singular absurdity that, while the original Constitution which expressly gave jurisdiction at the suit of private parties, against a sovereign State, confined such jurisdiction to the Supreme Court of the United States; a court worthy of such jurisdiction, if any Federal court could be; the amendment prohibiting such jurisdiction in any Federal court, would subject a sovereign State, in the person of its officer, and the administration of the State government, to the process of any petty Federal court which Congress might see fit to establish, at the suit of any vagabond citizen or corporation of another State, doing business in it.

We abide by the letter and spirit of the Constitution. Unfortunately, many things in its administration are tending toward centralization, which the history and temper of the American people give grave warning might be closely followed by disintegration. The fintegrity of the Union has been tried. The integrity of the States is on trial. Much rests upon the moderation and forbearance of the Federal courts; as much perhaps upon the firmness of the State courts, refusing to abdicate State authority in State matters, to assumption of Federal jurisdiction. We will faithfully try to do our part. In refusing, at the last term, to assume a jurisdiction properly belonging to the Federal courts, we had occasion to say, and we now repeat:

"It is perhaps unfortunate that the Federal Constitution left any ground for concurrent jurisdiction of the Federal with the State courts. It has led to some mischievous confusion of adjudication, and some vicious usurpation of jurisdiction, by both Federal and State courts. In this day, this is a great and growing evil, and we propose, in this State, for the sake of judicial order and of the integrity of the Federal and State governments, to do what we may toward confining the courts of the State to State jurisdiction, and the courts of the United States to Federal jurisdiction." Bromley v. Goodrich, ante.

VI. Had the Federal court had jurisdiction of the bill and injunction pleaded by the Secretary to bind the State, it could not avail him in this case, because the license in force when the bill was filed and the injunction issued, has expired by its own limitation; and it is only to that license that the injunction can relate. The injunction is indeed very loose and general; literally broad enough to restrain the Secretary from revoking any license to the Insurance Company for any cause, for all time. But it must receive a reasonable construction and be confined to the things and the condition of things existing when issued. When the license existing at the time the bill was filed, expired, the injunction was spent. The Secretary might have found ground for refusing a new license, dehors all matters pleaded in the bill; or the legislature might have repealed or modified the statute authorizing the license. The new license, therefore, created a new relation with the State, though it may have been but the renewal of an old relation which had expired by limitation, and the Federal court which issued the injunction could hardly have intended, certainly had in any view no authority, to bind the defendant for all time, outside of the actual condition of things pleaded in the record, or in new relations between the parties. Even Federal jurisdiction, where it attaches, is not so comprehensive or prospective.

VII. The writ in this case will issue, in the right of the State, at any hazard to its officer. We apprehend, however, that there will be none. The State officer is bound to obey the State authority. And if any one, to be found within the State, should molest any officer of the State, for obeying the process of this court, in the administration of the State government, and the fact should be properly brought before us, we think we should be able to afford ample and summary remedy.

We regard this matter as a grave attempt to baffle State authority in the administration of State affairs, in a way to be a temptation for the use of a somewhat injudicial adjective. And we are thoroughly in earnest, as is our duty under our oaths, to enforce State authority, in State affairs, over State officers, and on foreign corporations who come here ex gratia of State law, and then set the law at defiance. We mean to suffer no trifling here. The writ must be so framed that the Secretary not only shall promptly revoke the existing license, but shall refrain from granting any other license to the Insurance Company for three succeeding years; and that he certify the revocation to this court, within twenty-four hours after service of the writ upon him.

Let the writ issue at once, in accordance with this opinion.

[For the LEGAL NEWS.]

THE "JURIST" UPON CODE PRACTICE.

In the September number of the Monthly Western Jurist, is a short article, upon "Code Practice," which contains extraordinary statements, and displays very apparent unfamiliarity with the subject.

The writer commences with citing the opinion of Mr. Justice Grier, as stated by the Luzerne Legal Register, in such a manner as to make it appear that the animadversions of Justice Grier expressed the views of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. Justice Grier has for thirty years been upon the bench of the Supreme Court, and has had little or no opportunity to study the practical advantages of a Code of Procedure; and, indeed, has been called upon to consider almost no questions of pleading.

Mr. Justice Grier, however, although more splenetic in expressing his views, has but followed in the path of former greater lights.

Chief Justice Abbott, Chief Justice Eyre, Mr. Justice Wilson and Lord Kenyon, all, among other learned judges in England, opposed any innovation in the forms of common-law practice. Such has been the history of the bench. The judges have ever been conservative and opposed to progress. The battle between the young, active members of the bar, upon the one side, in favor of changing the practice with the advancement of civilization and change in the surroundings of life, and the conservative bench, upon the other side, strongly opposed to disturbing any of the inherited forms, is an old one.

No less a brilliant lawyer than Cicero entered the fight, and, in his Oratio pro Murena, discharged his terrible satire upon the verbose forms of action of that day. So far, the spirit of progress has triumphed, and the laws of all countries have at last yielded to the inevitable power.

We borrowed our forms of action from England, but the country of their origin has abolished them for more than twenty years.

Twenty-four States and Territories of the Union have done likewise, and have Codes of Procedure. The State of Illinois has neither code nor common law practice. The Jurist, in the article referred to, says:

"The law-makers of Illinois have shown wisdom by retaining the common law rules of pleading."

How have they done so? The beginning and end of all the arguments made during the last half century, by the advocates of the common law practice, have pointed to the system of special pleading, as the one great and beautiful science in common law practice.

A learned Judge in New York, who doubted the wisdom of adopting a Code of Procedure, said that under the old system "the pleader was able to reduce the issues to be tried to a very small number, and all the other facts in the case would be disposed of before trial."

In Illinois, however, special pleading is virtually abolished by statute, and the defendant may, in his answer, give notice of any special matters he intends to prove upon trial for a defense.

This is, so far, code practice. The code abolishes all forms of pleadings, for both plaintiff and defendant. The law of Illinois has abolished common law pleading for the defendant, and retained it for the plaintiff!

With strange consistency, the Jurist continues:

"The principles of the common law system are as correct as they were a century ago; all that is necessary to adapt them to our times, is to lop off the forms and technicalities that adapted them to the institutions of that time, and add such as will adapt them to the present."

No advocate of a code of procedure ever claimed more. Every State in this Union has attempted just that reform: twenty-four of them by codes of procedure, and the rest by miscellaneous legislation. The practice in the States having a code, is more uniform than in those claiming to use common law practice, and the changes adopted by Illinois, Michigan and other States that cling to common law practice—changes which the Jurist applauds as forming "the modern common law system"—have all been borrowed from the code. The law of Illinois now permits amendments of process and pleadings in form and substance; allows set-offs by defendant against plaintiff; abolishes distinction between trespass and case; permits trover and replevin to be joined; permits a defendant, by notice, to state the facts constituting his defense, in the place of special pleading; allows assumpsit upon sealed instruments—all of which are code "innovations." In Michigan, declarations in trover, in certain cases, need only state the conversion; assignees of shares in action may sue in their own names; all parties to a bill of exchange or promissory note may be sued in one action; pleading and processes may be amended; special pleas are abolished; defendants, by notice, state the facts relied upon for defense; set-offs are allowed for defendants.

It will be seen, Michigan has adopted certain code innovations, and Illinois has adopted certain other code innovations. So every other State, retaining common law forms, has adopted more or less of code innovations, until the practice in those States has grown widely dissimilar. Now, which State has what the Jurist calls "the modern common law system?"

But the most remarkable argument made by the Jurist is ab inconvenienti, in these words:

"Practitioners in a State having a code of its own, find it difficult to practice in the United States courts, as the National Supreme Court retains the common law system. The Circuit and District Courts of the United States also follow that system, subject, however, in some things, to the local State laws. But the practitioner, in a State having the common law system, finds himself at all times qualified to practice in his own State courts, and in all the courts of the United States to which a case may be taken."

It is not strange that lawyers, who have experience in none but common law practice, should often show an ignorance of their subject when they attempt to criticise the code system; but it is surprising that a magazine, published for the instruction of a learned profession, should publish such a loose statement.

Every lawyer knows that the "common law system" of the U. S. Supreme Court is confined to civil controversies, where a State, or a consul, or a vice-consul, or an ambassador or public minister be a party, or an ambassador's servant be defendant. Such practice is almost exclusively local to the District of Columbia, and concerns but a very minute portion of the bar. The Supreme Court has no power to prescribe forms of pleading for inferior courts, except in chancery and admiralty. "The Circuit and District Courts of the United States" do not "follow that system, subject, however, in some things, to the local State laws."

Such was the law until Congress, in June 1872, enacted that,

"The practice, pleadings, and forms, and modes of proceeding in civil causes, other than equity and admiralty causes, in the Circuit and District Courts, shall conform, as near as may be, to the practice, pleadings and forms, and modes of proceeding existing at the time in like causes in the courts of record of the State within which such Circuit or District courts are held; any rule of court to the contrary notwithstanding." (R. S. of U. S., Sec. 914.)

Senator Carpenter, of Wisconsin, was instrumental in procuring this statute to be enacted. It aroused the opposition of the U. S. judges in the code States; and Mr. Justice Miller, for forty years a district judge, often upon the bench, referred to it as, "Mr. Carpenter's code." But it became law and remains law; and in States having a code of procedure, the practice in actions at law, in the United States Courts, is code practice, exactly the same as in the State Courts.

It is not the intention of the writer in this article to discuss the merits of the code, but to call attention to the manner of argument sometimes used against it.

In the future, the writer may point out some of the manifest superiorities of code practice to that nameless system we now use.

GEORGE F. WESTOVER.

Chicago, Sept. 5, 1876.

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

ABSTRACTS OF OPINIONS FILED AT OTTAWA, JUNE 30, 1876.

264.—Joseph A. Griswold v. William H. Shaw.—Appeal from Superior Court of Cook.—Opinion by SCHOLFIELD, J., reversing and remanding.

CASE OUT OF ITS ORDER — AMENDMENTS WHEN ALLOWED.

STATEMENT.—Case taken up out of its order under the "five-day rule;" and judgment rendered against appellant's objections. Also, a material amendment being made, by leave, to the declarations, appellant was denied leave to file an additional plea going to the bona fides of the assignment of the notes in suit. Held,

That the rulings of the court in both these particulars were erroneous.

271.—George W. Honeyman, ex'rs, etc. v. Samuel Jarvis, guardian.—Appeal from Mercer.—Opinion by SCHOLFIELD, J., affirming.

COMPROMISE OF A DOUBTFUL RIGHT—CONSIDERATION—RESPONSIBILITY.

STATEMENT.—In Indiana, the law requires a guardian, when he applies for leave to sell real estate of his wards, to file an additional bond, conditioned for the faithful account of the money to be received for the sale. The sureties on this bond—but not the sureties on his general bond—are liable for his default in this particular matter. John Honeyman (son of the testator) was guardian for the wards, for whom appellee is now guardian, and made such application, under such a bond, with his father as surety; and was thereon appointed by the court as a "special commissioner" to make the sale. He failed to pay over the money arising from the sale, became insolvent, and removed to this State—the appellee being appointed guardian for the wards. Appellee had an interview with the testator afterwards, and claimed that he (the testator) was liable, as surety, on the bond; and the testator gave him his note, (on which suit was brought in this case) in settlement of his supposed liability on the bond.

It was claimed the note was without consideration, on the ground that the testator was not liable on the bond, since, when the guardian, as special commissioner, turned over the proceeds of the sale to himself, as guardian, it discharged the special bond. The court do not decide whether the testator was really liable on the bond, or not; remarking only that if this bond did not secure the faithful performance of duties under the order of sale, there was then no bond. But, on the supposition, that the testator was not, in reality, liable, it was Held,

1. It was not essential to sustain the note that it be absolutely certain, the testator was liable on the bond; on the principle that the compromise of a doubtful right, though it afterwards turns out that the right was on the other side, where there is no actual or constructive fraud, and the parties act in good faith, with full knowledge of the facts, is a sufficient consideration to support a promise—the real consideration which a party receives under a compromise being, not the sacrifice of the right, but the settlement of the dispute, and the abandonment of the claim; and it is no objection to the validity of the transaction, that the right was really in one of the parties only, and that the other had no right whatever. The fact that the one may have had no claim is immaterial, if he was honestly mistaken as to his claim.

2. Where one is merely mistaken as to his rights, but knows the facts, in a matter in which he has constituted himself a judge in his own cause, and decided against himself, he cannot afterwards be heard to reverse his own judgment.

3. In this case, it is sufficient that the claim that the testator was liable on the bond, is not so unfounded and absurd, as to raise the presumption that appellee knew he had no claim, and therefore acted in bad faith in taking the note.

292.—Elias Richardson v. Theodosia Quinn.—Appeal from Livingston—Opinion per curiam, affirming.

MONEY PAID BY MISTAKE.

Held, That in a suit to recover back an excess of payment of 10 cents per bushel (or other amount), on a large quantity of grain, the over payment being claimed as having been made under a mistake of facts, there is only a question of fact involved; and the verdict will not be disturbed where the evidence was conflicting.

No. 294.—John D. Easter & Co. v. Joseph H. Boyd.—Appeal from Livingston.—Opinion by CRAIG, J., affirming.

NOTE PROVIDING FOR ATTORNEY FEE—WHEN ENFORCIBLE HEREIN.

Held, That where a promissory note contained the provision that "if not paid when due, and the same is sued, ten dollars, if sued in justice's court, and twenty-five dollars, if sued in District or Circuit court, additional, to defray the expenses of the plaintiff for his suing the same; to be entered up as a part of the judgment," it cannot be enforced; because the attorney fee thereby provided for, is not due until after the institution of the suit; and the court cannot, in an action on the notes, render a judgment for a claim not due at the time the action was commenced. It would be different, however, if the fee was made due and payable at the time of default in the payment of the notes, instead of being made to depend on the contingencies of suing, and in a particular court.

297.—Charles Seilaff v. Lorenz Guthrie.—Appeal from Superior Court of Cook.—Opinion per Curiam, affirming.

ABSTRACTS, ON APPEAL.

Held, That where, on appeal, an abstract filed in the Supreme Court is little better than an index to the record, the decision below will be affirmed; for the judges of the Supreme Court have not time to look through the record in quest of specific errors which would reverse.

339.—Adam Smith v. William B. Bateham.—Error to Superior Court of Cook.—Opinion by SHELDON, J., reversing and remanding.

AFFIDAVIT OF MERITS ON JOINT PLEA.

Held, That in a joint plea requiring an affidavit of merits, the affidavit is sufficient if made by only one of the defendants.

371.—Sterling Bridge Co. v. William N. Pearle.—Appeal from Whiteside.—Opinion by SCHOLFIELD, J., reversing and remanding.

SECURITY FOR COSTS—CHALLENGES OF JURORS—DEGREES OF NEGLIGENCE—TESTIFYING TO OPINIONS.

STATEMENT.—Case against appellants for injuries to appellee, received in consequence of a defective approach to appellant's bridge, at Sterling. Verdict of $6,000.

Appellant moved for a rule on appellee for security for costs. Three days afterward, appellee moved for leave to prosecute as a poor person. No disposition of either motion appears of record. But the court, after the making of the latter motion, ordered a jury and trial of the cause. Held,

1. That this was, in effect, an allowance of the later motion, and, therefore, a denial of the former. And the granting of this was within the discretion of the court; which discretion will not be interfered with, unless manifestly abused.

2. Under the requirements of the statute, twelve jurors must be called into the box at once, before either party is required to examine them, and kept up, as to number, until the examination is completed; since the statute is not to be construed as only requiring that the jurors shall, before any examination as to their competency, be ordered into the jury-box, to the number of twelve. And it is, therefore, error to compel either party to exercise his right of peremptory challenge until the panel of twelve is filled. Yet the jurors are then to be passed upon in panels of four, and the statute does not require a plaintiff to exercise his peremptory challenges to the entire panel of twelve, before the defendant can be called upon to exercise his right of challenge. Each panel of four must be accepted before calling up another. But there must be twelve in the box all the time, and when one is challenged, another must be called into the box, and then, from those in the box, another must be added to the panel of four under examination.

3. In such a case as this, when a party to the action testifies, it is error to ask him for opinions. He should be required to testify only to facts, and then it should be left to the jury to draw conclusions as to the comparative or absolute negligence.

4. It is not correct to instruct a jury, in such a case, that, where a plaintiff, as well as a defendant, was negligent, the plaintiff can recover, unless his negligence contributed "to a considerable degree" to the injury complained of; the rule being that the degrees of negligence must be measured, and considered, and whenever it shall appear that the plaintiff's negligence is comparatively slight, and that of the defendant gross, he shall not be deprived of his action. And the corollary is, that, where the negligence of the plaintiff is not slight, and that of the defendant gross, in comparison, the plaintiff cannot recover. If a plaintiff has failed to exercise due and ordinary care, and thereby has contributed to bring on himself an injury, unless the negligence of the defendant has been gross in comparison with his, he cannot recover.

386.—T. P. & W. R. R. Co. v. Allen M. Eastburn.—Appeal from Iroquois.—Opinion by CRAIG, J., reversing and remanding; DICKEY, J., dissenting.

JUDGMENTS IN VACATION—SECOND FINAL JUDGMENT.

Held, That where, under the statute declaring that when a cause or matter is taken under advisement by the judge of a Circuit Court, or of the Superior Court of Cook county, and the cause or matter is decided in vacation, the judgment, decree, or order therein, may be entered of record in vacation, but such judgment, decree, or order, for good cause shown, may be set aside, or modified, or excepted to, at the next term of the court, upon motion filed on or before the second day of the term on notice, a judgment is thus entered in vacation, which passes by the next term, without action, it is error for the court, at a subsequent term, to enter a remittitur, and render another final judgment in the cause—for then it acts without jurisdiction.

407.—Harriet C. Roberts v. Helen M. Beckwith.—Appeal from Will.—Opinion by SHELDON, J., reversing and remanding.

JOINT DECREE—HUSBAND AND WIFE—LIEN ON WIFE'S SEPARATE PROPERTY.

STATEMENT.—Petition for partition, and account for rents and profits; held,

1. That a joint decree may be made against husband and wife for rents and profits, in such a case; and be made a lien on the lands, although it is the wife's separate estate.

2. If the land is a homestead the decree needs not be reversed; but should there come to be a taking of the land under the lien, the homestead can be saved in the same way as under the levy of an execution at law.

3. A decree of this kind should not be for the full amount of the rents and profits. All permanent improvements should be deducted.

Zebina Eastman v. City of Chicago.—Appeal from Criminal Court of Cook.—Opinion by SCOTT, Ch. J., reversing and remanding.

CONSTRUCTION OF ORDINANCE AS TO SECOND-HAND DEALERS.

STATEMENT.—Prosecution under an ordinance of Chicago declaring that "any person who keeps a store, office, or place of business, for the purchase or sale of second-hand clothes, or garments of any kind, or second-hand goods, wares, or merchandise, is hereby declared to be a dealer in second-hand goods."

Defendants were booksellers dealing in such stock as is usually sold in a retail book-store, and, in connection with their other business, second-hand books; held,

That, if such an ordinance applies to books at all, which is very doubtful, yet, it must be construed to apply only to those whose principal business it is to deal in old goods, and not to such as carry on principally a trade in new goods, and only deal in old as a small portion of their regular business—this being a mere adjunct to their real or leading trade.

448.—Edmund Curtis v. George Baugh.—Appeal from Ogle.—Opinion by WALKER, J., reversing and remanding.

INDEMNITY TRUST DEED—MEASURE OF DAMAGES.

Held, That where a trust deed is given to indemnify against loss to lands, as by cutting off timber, the measure of damages is merely the actual loss accruing in the way indemnified against; and the deed cannot be extended to cover notes given to another, as collateral security for indebtedness due from a third party, for balance due on the same lands, the whole transaction not being originally intended to create a penalty, but to indemnify against loss.

490.—P. Strubher execu'rs., v. J. H. Moler, exr's.—Appeal from Peoria.—Opinion by WALKER, J., reversing and remanding.

PARTY IN INTEREST AS WITNESS—EXCEPTIONS OF STATUTE CONSTRUED—PRESUMPTION FROM SETTLEMENT OF ACCOUNTS—ADMISSIONS AS EVIDENCE.

STATEMENT.—Suit against an estate for services rendered the testator. It was first objected that the plaintiff was allowed to testify in his own behalf, the party being dead to whom he rendered the services. But, held,

1. That as he testified in order to rebut the testimony of one as to a settlement between the plaintiffs and the executors after the death of the testator, his testimony was within the first exception of the statute.

2. As a general rule, a strong presumption arises that a settlement of accounts between parties embraces all the items each has against the other, which are due; and this presumption throws the burden of proof upon one asserting the contrary, to prove that the item was not due, or was omitted by consent of the parties, or by accident.

3. Evidence of admissions by parties, is, as a general rule, unsatisfactory; but not always so. Sometimes it is the most satisfactory of all verbal testimony, when the admission was made understandingly and deliberately, and is testified to by an intelligent, truthful witness of good memory. But it is weak otherwise, and especially if testified to by an unintelligent, forgetful or biased witness.

483.—Redmond Prindiville v. Obadiah Jackson.—Opinion by SHELDON, J., reversing and remanding.

WATER REGULATIONS—UNIFORMITY—DUTY AND RIGHTS OF CITIZENS.

STATEMENT.—Petition for mandamus to compel the Board of Public Works to allow the petitioners to connect with certain service pipes, attached to water mains, for convenience, when the mains were first laid. The Board had refused, on the ground that the petitioners refused to pay the cost of the service pipes thus laid, on joining them. Mandamus granted. Held,

That, as, under the charter, the Board had full power to make rules and regulations as to the manner of supplying water, etc., to the citizens, and as they had made the regulation that every citizen desiring to connect with the service pipes already laid should pay the cost of laying the same, the condition imposed on the petitioners was but just and reasonable. The claim of the petitioners is the demand of a special privilege; a claim of exemption from their proportionate share of taxation; a claim that the service pipes for their own use shall be furnished at the expense of the city, while other citizens paid for theirs. Rights and privileges should be equal among citizens; and this claim of the petitioners conflicts with the rule of equality and uniformity in taxation.

SUPREME COURT DOCKET.

The following is the list of cases on the docket at Ottawa, for the September term, as forwarded to us by the efficient clerk, Mr. C. D. TRIMBLE:

PEOPLE'S CAUSES.

1. Robbins v. The People, etc.
2. The People ex rel. Hungate v. Cole.

We are under obligations to FREDERIC ULLMANN, of the Chicago bar, for the following opinion:

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

OPINION FILED JUNE 30, 1876.

JESSE M. HOAGLAND v. GIDEON CREED et al.

Error to Morgan.

Where a case was tried by agreement before a member of the bar, and a judgment rendered by him as judge of the Circuit Court, the judgment was declared to be a nullity.

SCHOLFIELD, J.—The record brought before us by this writ shows a trial by agreement before Edward P. Kirby, Esq., a member of the bar, and what purports to be a judgment rendered by him as judge of the Circuit Court of Morgan county. The bill of exceptions, or rather what purports to be the bill of exceptions, is signed by him, and it is impossible for us to close our eyes to the fact, however strongly inclined we may be to do so, that the record sought to be reviewed, is one made by Edward P. Kirby, Esq., a member of the bar, and not by any one commissioned to act as Circuit Judge. What we might hold, did it appear that he was acting as Circuit Judge under color and claim of authority, we will not say. It is sufficient that all pretense that he was a judge de facto is without any foundation in the record. It expressly shows that he is a member of the bar, and that his authority for assuming to act as judge, was the agreement of the parties. Freeman on Judgment, sec. 148; Case v. State, 5 Ind., 1; State v. Anone, 2d Holt and McCord, 27; State v. Alling, 12 Ohio, 16; Blackburn v. State, 3 Head, 690, and Pepin v. Lachenmyer, 45 New York, 27, cited by the counsel for the defendant in error, are, therefore, not in point.

Under our Constitution, judges are elected by popular vote, except to fill vacancies not to exceed one year, which shall be filled by the appointment of the governor. Const. 1870, Art. 6, sec. 32—and all judges shall be commissioned by the governor. Same Art., sec. 29. And unlike the Constitution of some other States, it contains no authority for temporarily filling the office in any other way. With regard to the doctrine that consent cannot confer jurisdiction as to the subject-matter, and that judicial power cannot be delegated, we deem it unnecessary to enter into any extended discussion. All that need be said on these subjects is so well said by Judge Cooley in his work on Constitutional Limitations, 1st Ed. p. 399, that we shall content ourselves with transcribing it:

"But, the courts of a country cannot have these controversies referred to them by the parties which the law-making power has seen fit to exclude from their cognizance. If the judges should sit to hear such controversies, they could not sit as a court; at the most, they would be arbitrators only, and their action could not be sustained on that theory unless it appears that the parties had designed to make the judges their arbitrators, instead of expecting from them valid judicial action as an organized court. Even then the judgment could not be binding as a judgment, but only as an award, and a mere neglect, by either party to object to the want of jurisdiction, could not make the decision binding upon him, either as a judgment or as an award."

If the parties cannot confer jurisdiction upon a court by consent, neither can they by consent empower any individual other than the judge of the court to exercise its powers.

Judges are chosen in such manner as shall be provided by law, and a stipulation by parties that any other person than the judge shall exercise his functions in their case, would be nugatory even though the judge should vacate his seat for the purpose of the hearing.

That which in the present record purports to be a bill of exceptions and judgment, is therefore a nullity, and there is no case before us upon which we are authorized to render final judgment. It follows the writ of error must be dismissed.

Writ of error dismissed.

CHICAGO LEGAL NEWS.

CHICAGO, SEPTEMBER 16, 1876.

The Courts.

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES.

No. 219.—OCTOBER TERM, 1875.

THE STEAM FERRYBOAT AMERICA, her Tackle, etc., THE UNION FERRY COMPANY, Claimants.

v.

THE CAMDEN AND AMBOY RAILROAD TRANSPORTATION COMPANY.

Appeal from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York.

The court states the rule as to what is required of vessels meeting or passing each other, so as to avoid a collision.

Mr. Justice CLIFFORD delivered the opinion of the court.

Sailing rules were ordained to prevent collisions between ships employed in navigation, and to preserve life and property embarked in that perilous pursuit, and not to enable those whose duty it is to adopt, if possible, the necessary precautions to avoid such a disaster, to determine how little they can do, in that direction, without becoming responsible for its consequences, in case it occurs.

Except in special cases the sailing-ship is required to keep her course where a steamship is approaching in such a direction as to involve risk of collision, but the rule is widely different if the two ships are under steam, and they are meeting end on, or nearly end on, so as to involve risk of collision, the requirement in that event being that the helms of both shall be put to port, so that each may pass on the port side of the other. 13 Stat. at Large, 60.

Steamships meeting end on, or nearly end on, should seasonably adopt the required precaution, and neither can be excused from responsibility, in case of omission, merely upon the ground that it was the duty of the other to have adopted the corresponding precaution at the same time, if it appears that the party setting up that excuse enjoyed equal facility to obey the requirement with the other party, and might have prevented the disaster. Imperative obligation is imposed upon each to comply with the rule of navigation, nor will the neglect of one excuse the other, in a case where each might have prevented the disaster, as the law requires both to adopt every necessary precaution, if practicable, to prevent the collision, and will not tolerate any attempt of either, in such an emergency, to apportion the required precaution to avoid the impending danger, in case where both or either might secure perfect safety to both ships and all entrusted with their control and management.

Two steamboats, to wit, the steamtug Fairfield and the ferryboat America, on the thirteenth of December, 1866, collided in East river, in the harbor of New York, and it appears by the transcript that the owners of the former instituted the present suit in the district court of the United States against the ferryboat, to recover damages for the injuries sustained by the steamtug on the occasion, whereby it is alleged that she was damaged to such an extent that she soon sunk and became a total loss. Service was made and the owners of the ferryboat appeared and filed an answer. Testimony was taken on both sides, and the district court having heard the parties, entered a decree dismissing the libel, and the libellants appealed to the Circuit Court. Hearing was again had in the Circuit Court, and the Circuit Court reversed the decree of the district court and entered a decretal order in favor of the libellants, and referred the cause to a master to estimate the damages. Subsequently the master made a report, to which the respondents filed exceptions, but the Circuit Court overruled the exceptions and entered a final decree in favor of the libellants for the sum of seventeen thousand seven hundred and twenty-three dollars and seventy-five cents, with the costs of both courts; from which decree the respondents appealed to this court.

Sufficient appears to show that the steamtug was proceeding down East river, having come from the navy-yard, and that she was bound on a trip round the Battery into the North river; that the other steamer was a ferryboat, belonging to the Fulton ferry, and was making one of her regular trips from her slip at the foot of Fulton street, New York, to her slip at the foot of Fulton street in the city of Brooklyn. Theories widely different, and irreconcilably inconsistent, are maintained by the respective parties, but it may afford some aid in reaching the true solution of the controversy to reproduce those theories before adverting to the evidence by which each of the parties attempts to show that the other is responsible for the disaster.

Both parties agree that the tide was ebb, and the libellants allege that the steamtug, in proceeding on her intended trip, was heading down the river nearly in the middle of the same when the ferryboat left her slip on the New York side, for the purpose of transporting her passengers to her slip on the Brooklyn side; that as the two vessels advanced towards each other she, the steamtug, blew one whistle to indicate that she intended to go to the right, and that she ported her helm at the same time as evidencing that intention; that the ferryboat paid no attention to the signal given by the steamtug, but continued her course up the river and towards the vessel of the libellants, and that the steamtug, finding that the ferryboat was rapidly approaching without changing her course, and that a collision would probably ensue if she, the steamtug, pursued her course, rung her bell to slow, stop, and back, and the libellants aver that the orders were promptly obeyed and that the headway of their vessel was nearly or quite stopped, and they charge that it was not until their vessel was in that condition that the ferryboat blew two whistles to indicate that it was her intention to go to the left, and they also aver to the effect that it was then too late to avoid a collision, for two reasons: first, because the vessels were too close together; and secondly, because the power of the steamtug to move forward was stopped; that the steamtug, under the circumstances, could not do anything except to continue to back her engine, and the allegation is that the ferryboat kept on at full speed, striking the steamtug on her port bow, crushing in her planks and timbers to such an extent that she sank in a few minutes.

Suppose those allegations were all founded in fact, the conclusion of the libellants that the collision happened through the carelessness, negligence, and want of skill and proper management in those navigating the ferryboat might perhaps be adopted as correct, but the whole theory of fact involved in those allegations is denied by the respondents, and they allege that when the pilot of the ferryboat discovered the steamtug, the former was not more than two hundren yards from the Brooklyn shore and about the same distance from her slip on that side of the river, and that she was heading up the river, against a strong ebb tide, for the purpose of getting room to swing into her slip, and that the ferryboat was under full speed, heading down the river and towards the Brooklyn shore, on a course which, if continued, would carry her in front of the steamtug on the Brooklyn side of the river; that the ferryboat thereupon kept steadily on her course up the river, in order that the steamtug might pass in front of her, as she easily might have done, without any danger of collision, and the respondents allege that the steamtug continued that course under full headway, until she was within a short distance of the ferryboat, when it was impossible for the two boats to prevent a collision, and the respondents aver that it was at that moment and under those circumstances that the steamtug blew one whistle, to indicate that she intended to go to the right, and that the ferryboat answered the signal with one whistle, and put her helm hard-a-port and reversed her engine and backed, which was all she could do in the emergency to avoid the impending peril. Hence they aver that the collision was caused by the carelessness, negligence, and want of skill and proper management of those in charge of the steamtug.

Evidence giving some support to each of the conflicting theories is exhibited in the record, and the District Court decided in favor of that assumed by the respondents, but the Circuit Court was of the opinion that the libellants ought to recover, and entered a final decree in their favor.

Mutual accusations are made, each against the other, that the respective steamers were without lookouts, but the court here does not find it necessary to give such accusations, in this case, much examination, as the proofs are clear and satisfactory that each vessel was seen by the other in ample season to have adopted every necessary precaution to have prevented the collision, and it also appears to the entire satisfaction of the court that the want of a lookout on the one side or the other did not contribute in any degree to the disaster, which is all that need be remarked in respect to those accusations. The Farragut, 10 Wall, 338; City of Washington, 91 U. S.

Viewed in the light of these suggestions, it is quite clear that the decision must turn upon the merits of the controversy. Inevitable accident is not set up by either party, nor could it be with any hope of success, as it appears beyond all doubt that each steamer was seasonably seen by the other, as they were approaching nearly end on, and that they collided, the ferryboat striking the steamtug on the port bow, just aft the stem, in the open channel of the river, where each might have passed the other on either side in perfect safety, if proper measures for that purpose had been seasonably adopted to carry such an intention into effect.

Decided support to the material facts of that proposition is found in the libel and in the answer, as well as in the statements of the principal witnesses on both sides. Nothing different could have been intended by the libellants, as they allege that the steam tug "headed down the East river and about the middle thereof," and the respondents allege that the ferryboat "was heading up the East river against a strong ebb tide, for the purpose of getting room to swing into her slip."

Confirmation of that view is also derived from the charts exhibited by the parties, which show that the two steamers were approaching each other nearly end on, without any substantial change of course, until they were so close together that no efforts of those in charge of their navigation could possibly have avoided the impending danger.

Argument to show that nothing could have been done at that moment to avoid the collision is quite unnecessary, as the proposition is self-evident, but the fault consists in getting the two vessels into that dangerous situation. Precautions, in such cases must be seasonable in order to be effectual, and if they are not so, and a collision ensues in consequence of such delay, it is no defense to allege and prove that nothing more could be done at the moment to prevent it, nor to allege and prove that the necessity for precautionary measures was not perceived until it was too late to render them availing.

Inability to do anything effectual to prevent a collision, at the moment it occurs, usually exists, but it seldom happens that there is much difficulty in tracing the cause which produced it to some antecedent neglect, carelessness or unskillfulness in those having the command of one or both of the vessels.

Two ships under steam, if they are meeting end on, or nearly end on, so as to involve risk of collision, are required to put their helms to port, so that each may pass on the port side of the other, but if they neglect to comply with that requirement until it is so late that the object to be accomplished cannot be effected, it is no defense to allege or prove that one or both ported their helms before the collision occurred, for unless a party seasonably complies with the requirement, the act of compliance is without substantial merit.

Both parties allege in this case that they ported their helms, and the court here is of the opinion that if either had put the helm hard-a-port in season the loss of property would not have taken place. Beyond all doubt it was the duty of each to have complied with that rule, but inasmuch as the circumstances convince the court that if either had properly complied with the rule the collision would have been avoided, the conclusion must be that both were in fault.

Seasonable compliance with the rule is not alleged by the respondents, nor is there any proof exhibited in the transcript to warrant such a conclusion. Instead of that the answer admits, in effect, that the collision was inevitable before the ferryboat put her helm to port. Nor have the respondents attempted to place their defense entirely upon that ground. Merit to some extent is claimed by the libellants because those in charge of the steamtug did at sometime blow one whistle, to indicate that the steamtug would go to the right, and that she ported her helm, but the evidence convinces the court that the signal was not seasonable, and that the porting of the helm was by no means sufficient to constitute a compliance with the rule of navigation.

Grant that, and still the libellants suggest that the ferryboat paid no attention to the signal, and it may be that the charge is correct, but if so it would not follow that the steamtug might run down the ferryboat, as rules of navigation are ordained to preserve life and property, and not to promote or authorize collision. Even flagrant fault committed by one of two vessels approaching each other from opposite directions will not excuse the other from adopting every proper precaution to prevent a collision. The Maria Martin, 12 Wall., 47.

Admit that proposition, and still the libellants suggest that they also rung to slow, stop, and back, and they aver that the signals to that effect were properly obeyed, but the court is convinced from the evidence that these last mentioned signals immediately followed the whistle to go to the right, and that the signals, one and all, were too late to be effectual.

Indefinite as the allegations of the libel are, it may well be urged that the libel contains nothing inconsistent with that conclusion, and the answer expressly alleges that as soon as the steamtug blew her whistle it was obvious that she would strike the ferryboat on the starboard side, unless the ferryboat changed her course "to ease the blow."

Tested by these several considerations, the court here is of the opinion that both vessels were in fault and that the damages and the costs in both of the courts below should be equally apportioned between the two vessels, as prescribed by the decisions of this court. Decree reversed, with costs in this court, and the cause remanded with directions to apportion the damages and the costs in both courts below equally between the respective vessels, in conformity with the opinion of the court.

U. S. DISTRICT COURT, W. DIST. MICHIGAN.

OPINION MAY 8, 1876.

In re WILLIAM W. PHILLIPS.

In the matter of the proof of debt of Chase, Isherwood & Co.

The requisites of a notarial seal are determined by the law of the locality from which the official derives his authority.

An official seal is an impression on the paper directly, or on wax or wafer attached thereto, made by the official, as and for his seal.

In the absence of express legislation, an official seal need not contain the name of the official.

It is the seal, and not its composition or character of words and devices which raises the presumption of official character of which the courts take judicial notice.

The presumption is, that a seal is the official seal of the person it purports to be, and who subscribed the jurat.

Any impression made upon sealing-wax or wafer adhering to the paper, without any device or words indicative of the particular official, is entitled to judicial sanction as evidence of the official character of the individual who signs the jurat.

WITHEY, J.—Chase, Isherwood & Co., of Ohio, proved their claim against the bankrupt estate before a notary public of Lucas county, Ohio, who subscribed the jurat "A. E. Scott, Notary Public, Lucas Co., Ohio." On the paper containing his certificate is impressed a seal containing the words "Notarial Seal, Lucas Co., Ohio," in the center of which seal is distinctly seen a device of some kind impressed upon the paper.

We are referred to, but cannot follow the judgment, in re Henry Nebe, 11 N. B. R., 289, where it was decided by Mr. Register Clark, of the Eastern District, and approved by Judge Longyear, that a proof of debt before a notary public of Wayne county, Michigan, authenticated by his signature and a seal impressed on the paper, containing the wards "Notary Public, Wayne Co., Michigan," was defective and insufficient, because the name of the notary was not on the seal, and impressed upon the paper. Reference was made in that case to Gay v. Railroad Co., 11 Iowa, 310, 314, in support of the conclusions reached.

The certificate and seal in the Iowa case were those of a commissioner for the State of Iowa, residing in New York. He certified to an affidavit made before him, and authenticated it by his signature and a seal, in the body of which the name of the State, "Iowa," was written with a pen, and not impressed.

The authenticated seal in the Iowa case was partly impressed and partly in writing, which fact alone would render the seal not entitled to credit as evidence, for the Iowa code requires the commissioner's seal to be impressed on the paper, or on wax or wafer thereon. It also requires the seal of a notary public to have his name and the words "Notarial Seal, Iowa," thereon, so as to impress the same upon his certificates. That case, therefore, while undoubtedly rightly decided, comes far short of authority for the rejection of the seal as evidence in the case of Chase, Isherwood & Co.'s claim.

The generally received doctrine is that a notarial seal proves itself. Starting out with this fundamental rule, the question is presented, What is it that determines the character or make-up of a notary's or other official's seal? We answer, It is determined by the law of the locality from which the official derives his authority; or, if there is no law prescribing what the seal shall be, resort must be had to the common law to ascertain. So far as we can learn, the laws of Onio do not prescribe what the seal shall be, or, at least, do not require that the name of the notary shall be thereon, as the laws of Michigan do not.

At an early date, a seal was an impression on wax, according to Lord Coke. 3 Inst., 169. Signets and rings were used from very ancient times to make impressions in wax, as seals. Afterwards an impression upon wax, wafer, or other tenacious substance capable of being impressed, was held sufficient as a seal 5 John. R., 230.

A plate of metal, on which is engraved the arms or device of a public official, has long been used. More recently, machines which stamp the paper and impress the seal thereon, without wax, wafer, or other substance to receive the stamp, are held sufficient as to public official seals. Pillow v. Roberts, 13 How., 472. Where has it ever been held in common law courts that an official's seal must contain his name? We fail to find one in the absence of express legislation. An official seal, then, is the impression on the paper directly, or on wax or wafer attached thereto, made by the official as and for his seal. But how are courts to know that it is his seal unless it contains his name, not written, but impressed on the document? The seal of a notary public is taken judicial notice of, the world over. We venture to affirm that the presumption in favor of an official seal does not arise from the name impressed on the paper; on the contrary, it is the seal which authenticates, not the particular name, word, or device on it. This is in harmony with the common law idea of a seal, viz., the impression, and had its origin in those days when the great men and official dignitaries of earth could not write their names, and so had to sign by the signet, ring, cross, etc. Hence the seal impression placed upon a document by a notary public, signifies authentication of his official character. It is the seal and not its composition or characters of words and devices which raises the presumption of official character, of which courts take judicial notice. Accordingly, it has been held sufficient, when the words and devices have been so far obliterated and defaced from a seal that nothing certain could be made out as to its particular character, if enough remained to show satisfactorily that the document had been sealed. Again, where, owing to defacement or obliteration, the question is raised as to a seal having been impressed, the fact has been referred to a jury for a verdict. 3 McLean, 332; 4 McLean, 247.

Suppose, then, this was the case of a partially obscured or defaced seal, or one whose impression was so imperfect that the words and character upon it could not be made out; the only question would be, was it sealed, and not whether the name of the notary appeared.

Our opinion is, that the seal in this case, of which we take judicial notice, is evidence of the notarial character of Scott; the presumption being that it is the official seal of the person it purports to be, and who subscribed the jurat. We even think any impression made upon sealing-wax or wafer adhering to the paper, without any device or words indicative of the particular official, would be equally entitled to judicial sanction as evidence of the notarial or official character of the individual signing his name as "Notary Public, Lucas Co., Ohio."

The register is directed to allow the proof of claim. The clerk will certify this opinion to the register.

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT, MARYLAND,

MARCH 10, 1876.

In re KIRKLAND, CHASE AND CO.

A party who purchased an imported article duty free, and was compelled to pay the duty in order to get possession thereof, is entitled to priority, although he has proved his claim as unsecured.

At various times during the year 1872 William Bayne & Co. purchased sugar in bond from the bankrupts, amounting in the aggregate to one hundred and eighty hogsheads, duty free. In payment for this they gave notes to the bankrupts to the amount of fifty thousand dollars, which were indorsed by the bankrupts and passed for value to bona fide holders. The bankrupts paid duty on the sugar from time to time until their failure, when a balance still remained unpaid. On the 5th day of October, 1872, the purchasers paid four thousand eight hundred and nineteen dollars and forty-six cents, to purchase four thousand two hundred and twenty-seven dollars and sixty cents in gold in order to pay duties, and on the second day of December, 1872, their trustees paid one thousand and sixty-seven dollars and nineteen cents, to purchase nine hundred and forty-four dollars and forty-two cents in gold in order to pay duties. The proceedings in bankruptcy in this case were commenced on the 7th day of October, 1872. William Bayne & Co. also failed, and on the 15th day of October, 1872, made an assignment for the benefit of creditors to Andrew Reid, James Hooper, Jr., and P. S. Chappel. Including the claim for duties, there was due from the bankrupts to William Bayne & Co. the sum of twenty-three thousand five hundred and eighteen dollars and twenty-three cents. On the 25th day of October, 1872, the trustees proved this claim. The holders of the notes given for this sugar, having received a dividend from the estate of William Bayne & Co. of fifty-five per cent., also proved for the balance against the bankrupts, who were the indorsers. The assignees contested the claim of the trustees of William Bayne & Co., on the ground that they had a right to set off such dividends as they might be compelled to pay to the holders of the notes. This controversy was referred to an arbitrator, who, on the 6th day of August, 1873, awarded "that the trustees of William Bayne & Co. are entitled to a dividend from the estate of Kirkland, Chase & Co., upon the claim of twenty-three thousand five hundred and eighteen dollars and twenty-three cents, equally with the other creditors of that estate, and that Kirkland, Chase & Co. cannot set up the matter of the dividends they may have to pay the holders of the notes as any bar to the present allowance." After this the trustees received dividends on the claim from time to time, the amount received on the money paid out for duties being eight hundred and seventy-eight dollars and sixty-seven cents. When the trustees proved their claim they were not aware of their right to a priority, but soon afterwards they were aware that D. J. Foley, Bro. & Co. had filed a petition claiming such a right on their claim. In June, 1875, after the decision of the Circuit Court on that petition, the trustees notified the assignees of their claim to priority. It was conceded that the assignees had funds sufficient to pay the claim, if it were allowed. When the sugar was entered at the warehouse, the bankrupts gave a bond, with John C. Bridges and Wm. D. Shurtz as sureties. The sureties also failed, but their estates at the time of the payment of the duties were amply sufficient to pay the claims of the United States.

Andrew Reid, sole surviving trustee, on the 20th day of October, 1875, filed a petition claiming priority for the sum of five thousand and seven dollars and ninety-eight cents, being the balance of the money paid for duty. The assignee filed an answer, setting up the award, the proof of the claim, the laches of the petitioner, and the statute of limitations of two years.

GILES, J.—Let an order be entered that the assignees pay to Andrew Reid, out of the money now in their hands, the sum of five thousand and seven dollars and ninety-eight cents, with interest from October 20th, 1872, and the costs of this proceeding.

We are under obligations to F. W. S. BRAWLEY, for the following opinion:

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

OPINION FILED JANUARY 21, 1876.

LOVIRA TAYLOR v. GEORGE W. RENN et al.

Appeal from Superior Court of Cook.

SPECIAL CONTRACT—ARCHITECT'S CERTIFICATE — DAMAGES FOR DELAY IN FINDING—POSSESSION.

1. ARCHITECT'S CERTIFICATE.—The work was done under the direction of the architect, and was done in substantial compliance as to the quality of the work, and from his decision there can be no appeal, unless he can be charged with fraud or mistake, his action is conclusive upon the parties.

2. PROOF REQUIRED.—It being the contract of these parties that the certificate of the architect should be conclusive, appellees made out their case by producing and proving such certificate.

3. WAIVING THE RIGHT TO OBJECT ON ACCOUNT OF DELAY.—Appellant knowing of the delay in finishing the building, and permitting appellees to go on with the work after the day specified, making no complaint, waived performance at the day, and continued the contract as in full force after the day specified for its completion.

4. POSSESSION.—That possession of the keys was full possession of the house.

5. RIGHT OF ACTION.—The court states the rule as to the right of a party to bring an action where he has done work under a special contract, but not within the time or in the precise manner as named in the contract.—[ED. LEGAL NEWS.

BREESE, J.—This was indebitatus assumpsit in the Superior Court of Cook county, by George W. Renn and William G. Waddell, plaintiff, against Lovira Taylor, defendant, to recover a balance alleged to be due for their work as carpenters and joiners, and materials furnished to complete a brick building belonging to the defendant, situate on West Randolph street, in the city of Chicago.

The cause was tried by the court, without a jury on the general issue.

The court found for the plaintiff, assessing the damages at five hundred dollars, rendering judgment therefor.

To reverse this judgment the defendant appeals and claims plaintiffs were not entitled to recover anything, insisting as a proposition of law that when contractors are shown to be willfully in default and where there is no voluntary acceptance of the work done, the parties in default cannot recover anything for what they have done in their own wrong, and in support of it, refers to a large number of authorities of this and other courts.

We are not disposed to take any exception to this proposition, the onus being upon appellant to establish the terms of the proposition, the wilful default and that the acceptance of the work done was compulsory, not voluntary on her part.

What are the proofs?

The agreement to do the carpenter's and joiner's work on this house, and furnish material, was made September third, 1873, plaintiffs agreeing to do the work according to the plans, specifications and drawings of Theo Karls, architect, in a good, substantial and workmanlike manner, "to the satisfaction of and under the direction of the said architect." They agreed to complete the job by the fifteenth of November of the same year and in case of failure to pay twenty dollars per day, for each day later. For which work and material, and their completely and faithfully executing it and furnishing the materials therefor, so as to carry out the contract and the design according to its true spirit, meaning and intent, and at the time mentioned and to the full and complete satisfaction of said Theo Karls, the architect and superintendent, defendant agreed to pay plaintiffs the sum of two thousand and forty-five dollars upon the estimates of said Karls. It was further agreed that before plaintiffs should be entitled to demand payment for the work or any part of it they should produce to the defendant a writing or certificate under the hand of the architect and superintendent Karls, stating the amount due for materials furnished and work done by the plaintiff as per contract.

It was further agreed, in case any difference of opinion should arise between the parties in relation to the contract, the work to be performed under it, or in relation to the plans, drawings and specifications, the decision of Theo. Karls, the architect, should be final and binding on all the parties.

We have examined the testimony in the cause, and fail to find any willful or other default on the part of appellees.

Whilst the work progressed, the required certificates of the architect were presented and paid. So, that, up to November 17, 1873, one thousand dollars had been paid on the contract. On that day, another certificate was presented by appellees to appellant, for four hundred dollars, on which she paid the sum of one hundred dollars only. The final certificate was issued by the architect on the 16th of January, 1874, which, after deducting one hundred dollars on account of lumber furnished of an inferior quality, leaving a balance due of five hundred and sixty-nine dollars. This, added to the balance due on November 17, 1873, of three hundred dollars, shows a balance due appellees, of eight hundred and sixty-nine dollars.

The architect and superintendent, Karls, testified that the work was done by appellees under his superinterndence and direction; that it was performed substantialy as required by the contract; that they did as he directed; that he was at the building every other day, or every third day while the work was progressing, in October and November, and probably three or four days in December, and was there in January.

It is sufficient, in disposing of this appeal, to advert only to the contract and this testimony of the architect. The work was done under his superintendence and direction, and was done in substantial compliance as to quality of work and materials used, and from his decision there can be no appeal, unless he can be charged with fraud or mistake. The architect knew what the contract required, and his testimony is with direct reference to its terms. His action is conclusive upon the parties. Canal Trustees v. Lynch, 5 Gilm., 521; McAvoy v. Long, 13 Ill., 147; McAuley v. Carter, 22 Ib., 52, and Korp v. Lill, decided at September Term, 1874, where all the cases are reviewed.

It being the contract of these parties that the certificate of the architect should be conclusive, appellees made out their case by producing and proving such certificate. He was made the judge of all matters pertaining to the contract. He drew the plans and specifications, and superintended the work, and when he certifies the money was due under the contract and testifies the work was done in substantial compliance with its terms, what should prevent a recovery?

Appellants say there were defects in the material. That may be so, but the architect allowed one hundred dollars for that, and another architect, Bauman, testified that sum would have completed the work substantially, according to the contract. There is then no evidence of default, wilful or otherwise, so that one of the terms of appellant's proposition drops out.

But it is said the contract was not completed at the time specified. There was no claim set up for the stipulated damages on that account. But was there any delay for which appellees are justly chargeable? The contract was to do the joiner and carpenter work on a brick building. It needs no argument to show, even if the contract for such work does not provide, that it is always made with the understanding that the owner of the building shall keep the mason's work so advanced as to enable the carpenters to do their work. Cold, freezing weather arrived whilst this work was in progress; appellant was requested by the architect on three or four occasions to heat the building so that the plastering might dry, which she promised to do, but did not do. Had it been heated, the carpenter's work, he testifies, could have been completed by the 15th December, and by the time specified in the contract, had the plastering been dry. By the specifications the base and casings were not to be put on until the plastering was thoroughly dry, and appellees were delayed on this account. Heating was necessary to dry the plastering—it was not dry enough for the carpenter's work to go on until the first of January. The delay, then, is not chargeable to appellees. Appellant prevented the work from proceeding by reason of failing to heat the building. It was her act or omission. Marsh v. Kauff, decided Sept. Term, 1874, and such is the acknowledged doctrine everywhere.

Appellant, knowing of this delay, and permitting appellees to go on with the work after the day specified, making no complaint, waived performance at the day, and continued the contract as in full force after the day specified for its full completion, and this she had a clear right to do. If this was a condition precedent, it ceased to be so by the subsequent conduct of appellant.

The other term of appellant's proposition is, there was no voluntary acceptance of the work. Being sworn as a witness, she testifies she was at the building very often, as much as once or twice a week; that the keys were delivered to her sometime in January, 1874; had demanded them before. There was no compulsory acceptance here. Possession of the keys was full possession of the house, and they were delivered to her on her own demand, and which she freely accepted. So that there is nothing left of the two terms of appellant's proposition. The case cited by appellant, from 5 Gilm., 91, Eldredge v. Row, holds, if a person contracts to build a house upon the land of another, and proceeds to perform the work in part, and afterwards refuses or neglects to complete it according to the terms of the agreement, it would be impracticable for the employer to abandon, and he may properly appropriate the work so far as it has progressed, without being subject to an action upon a quantum meruit unless he should render himself liable by an acceptance.

All the cases cited by appellant on his first point containing the main propositions, are like this case in 5 Gilman, and were executory contracts or contracts only in part performed. If the rule was as contended for, in relation to executed contracts, though not strictly according to their terms, every employer who furnishes the land on which the house is built, if not built in the time specified, and in the precise manner stipulated, and of good materials, but is in fact completed and accepted, and which has added value to the land, could free himself from his obligation to pay for it by alleging the work was not done at the time stipulated, nor such materials furnished as promised, nor that the work was done in the manner agreed.

The true rule, as found in all books of authority, is this: if a party plaintiff prove a special agreement, and the work done, but not pursuant to such agreement, he may recover upon the quantum meruit, for otherwise he would not be able to recover at all. Whenever there has been an entire performance of the precedent condition, but not exactly according to the contract, the plaintiff may recover on a quantum meruit, Sindingdale v. Livingston, 10 Johns, 36. The same in principle is the case of Eggleston v. Buck, 24 Ill., 262, and is the doctrine of all common law courts, and by text writers of authority. Chitty on Contracts, 826; Addison on Contracts, 409; Greenleaf on Ev., § 104.

The evidence in this record shows a substantial compliance with the contract though not in all its terms, and on every principle of law and justice, appellant having accepted the work and materials, is liable in this action.

Appellees have filed cross-errors, having excepted to the finding of the court, as less than their proofs warranted. They clearly show that on November 17, 1873, there was the sum of four hundred dollars due them on the architect's certificates and estimates of that date. Of this sum, one hundred dollars only was paid. On the certificates of January 17, 1874, there was due appellees, five hundred and sixty-nine dollars. The amount of appellees' recovery should have been three hundred dollars, with interest from November 17, 1873, plus five hundred sixty-nine dollars, with interest from January 17, 1874.

The judgment is reversed and the cause remanded, with directions to the Superior Court to render a judgment accordingly.

The cause is remanded for that purpose.

Through the kindness of WM. M. HOWLAND, of the Chicago bar, we have received the following opinion:

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

OPINION, JANUARY, 1876.

EMIL HORNER v. JESSE B. SPELMAN et al.

Appeal from Superior Court of Cook.

CERTIFICATES — TRANSCRIPT — EVIDENCE — DISCHARGE IN BANKRUPTCY.

A transcript of record of court of foreign State, certified by the clerk under the seal of court, together with a certificate of the presiding judge that the attestation is in due form, is a proper authentication.

The plea of payment in this case is not sustained by the evidence.

It is not error to refuse to admit in evidence a discharge in bankruptcy, when such discharge was not pleaded.

A judgment for fraud is not released by a discharge in bankruptcy.

BREESE, J.—This was debt in the Superior Court of Cook county on a judgment rendered by the Superior Court of Hartford county, in the State of Connecticut, in an action for damages sustained "by reason of sundry covins, frauds, wrongs and injuries by the defendant committed against the plaintiffs."

The defendant pleaded nul tiel record payment and accord and satisfaction of the judgment, on all which issues were made up and submitted to the court for trial without a jury.

The court found for the plaintiff the amount of the judgment as debt, and assessed the damages by computing interest thereon, and rendered judgment accordingly. The defendant appeals.

Appellant makes objection that the record of the Superior Court of Hartford county is not well authenticated.

We are of opinion it is in substantial compliance with the act of Congress May 26, 1790. Rev. Stat. 1845, appendix 624, and was properly admitted in evidence.

The clerk has certified a transcript of the proceedings under the seal of the court, and the presiding judge of the court has certified that the attestation is in due form. This is all the act of Congress requires. Ducomun et al v. Hysinger, 14 Ill., 249.

Under the plea of payment it was attempted to be shown that through an arrangement made with Tobias Kohn, who was on defendant's bail bond in the suit in Connecticut, the judgment had been paid, but the evidence fails to show it. On the contrary, it is shown these plaintiffs have never raised any part of it. They have Kohn's note for a part of it not due at the time of this trial. This arrangement with Kohn was made, as we infer from the testimony, while an action was pending against him on the bail bond. Nothing has been realized from it, and the plea of payment is not sustained. Nor could a release of Kohn from his bail bond be a payment of this judgment. This will not be denied.

It is not like the payment of a debt by a surety, where he can claim in equity, at least, to be subrogated to all the remedies of his principal. Nothing of the kind.

All that is necessary to be said on the refusal of the court to admit in evidence appellant's discharge in bankruptcy is, that such discharge was not pleaded, and had it been it could not avail as the judgment obtained in the Superior Court of Hartford county was for "the covins, frauds, wrongs and injuries" committed by appellant.

Section 33 of the Bankrupt Act provides that no debt created by the fraud of the bankrupt shall be discharged under that act. Bump's Law and Practice in Bankruptcy, 518.

There being no error in the record the judgment must be affirmed.

Judgment affirmed.

SUPREME COURT OF TENNESSEE.

KNOXVILLE, MAY 15, 1876.

J. W. COLBURN et al. MAYOR AND ALDERMEN OF CHATTANOOGA.

JURISDICTION IN CHANCERY. — The Chancery Court has jurisdiction to prohibit the issue of illegal evidences of debt, upon a bill filed by a tax-payer.

CITY SCRIP.—Officers of a municipal corporation may not issue scrip in anticipation of the taxes of another year.

CORPORATE POWERS.—Corporate powers are to be strictly construed.—[ED. Commercial and Legal Reporter.

LEA, Special J.

This bill was filed by complainants in behalf of themselves and other tax-payers of the city of Chattanooga, to enjoin the mayor and aldermen from issuing any scrip, treasury warrants, currency, note, bill or other evidence of debt, until legal authority is first obtained for so doing.

The bill alleges that by an act of the General Assembly of the State, approved on the 20th day of March, 1873, entitled "an act to provide for the issuance of bonds by the cities," it is provided that in no case shall the authorities of cities having more than 8,000 and less than 20,000 inhabitants, issue bonds or other evidences of debts until authorized by a two-third vote of the qualified voters of such city, at an election held for that purpose; and when duly authorized so to do, by an election held as aforesaid, such authorities are empowered to issue bonds or evidences of debt not exceeding $100,000 in addition to the debts outstanding at the time of the passage of said act; that Chattanooga contains less than 20,000 inhabitants; that authority has been given by the requisite number of votes, at an election, to issue $100.000 to the Cincinnati Southern R. R. Co.; that without any authority by a vote of the qualified voters of said city, said board of mayor and aldermen have, since the passage of said act of the General Assembly, issued evidences of debt amounting to more than $90,000, and that such evidences of debt consist of warrants on the treasurer, drawn by the mayor and countersigned by the recorder, currency warrants, which are due in one and three years, which are promissory notes, having the form and general appearance of bank bills; that the treasury warrants are payable in city scrip; that by this creation of debts the defendant has greatly depreciated the credit of the city—so much so that said scrip is now bought and sold at from forty to fifty cents on the dollar; that notwithstanding said depreciation, defendants were still issuing large sums of said scrip; that contracts are made payable in cash, but are paid in issues of the city at their cash value, and thus two dollars or more of scrip will be paid for one dollar of indebtedness; that by this means bankruptcy and ruin is being brought upon the tax-payers; that defendants be required to answer and state the amount of evidences of indebtedness issued since the passage of the act of the 20th of March, 1873, in what it consists and the character of the same, and by what authority issued.

The defendant answers, after a motion to dismiss for want of jurisdiction of subject matter and parties, which was overruled by the court, that the entire funded and floating debt of the city is between one hundred and fifty-four and one hundred and fifty-eight thousand dollars, besides some $5.000 or more not audited; that since March 20. 1873, about seventy or eighty thousand dollars of indebtedness has been issued; that they issued the warrants and scrip under the authority of and for the purpose specified in the municipal charter, and to accomplish the objects of their incorporation, and for providing for the payments of the debts and expenses of the city; that upon the coming into office of the present board, they found no money in the treasury and a large outstanding indebtedness, and being deprived by the action of the General Assembly of the State, at its last session, of the power to enforce the collection of taxes for the years 1874-75, they issued warrants and scrips, believing such a course to be necessary to the maintenance of the city government, and for the best interests of the people; that they have the right to issue warrants upon their treasury, whether they have money therein or not, and the right to issue scrip. That the credit of the city is depreciated, but not by any illegal creation of debt, but by the action of the last legislature suspending the collection of taxes; that in one transaction they paid $3,364.83 in scrip, ranging at the rate of from 50 to 75 cents on the dollar; at another time they paid $529.96 in scrip, at from 60 to 75 cents; at another time $2,500 at 60 cents, at another $1,143.20 at 50 cents on the dollar, and $1,300 was paid at 62 or 63 cents, and some few other payments at from 45 to 60 cents were made; that warrants on the treasury were paid in city scrip, bearing ten per cent. interest, if the holder so desires it; that warrants were issued payable in city scrip; that the scrip was not issued to circulate as currency; that the form of the scrip is:

STATE OF TENNESSEE. [1.]

One year after date the Board of Mayor and Aldermen of the city of Chattanooga will pay one dollar to bearer.

THOMAS TAYLOR, Mayor.
———, Auditor.

And endorsed: "This note is receivable for all taxes and other dues of the city on presentation;" that these are now outstanding:

Warrants on Treasurer	$41,183.23
Ten per cent. scrip	26,278.89
One year scrip	8,381.00
Three years scrip	21,771.00
Three years interest on 10 per cent. script	7,458.42

That $100,000 in bonds has been voted to the Cincinnati Southern Railroad Company, but the same is not yet issued; that they have been governed by a conscientious desire to discharge their duty, and that no expense has been incurred or evidence of indebtedness issued but that which they believed to be necessary for the good order, government and improvement of the city, and such as is contemplated in the charter under which they acted. It is admitted that Chattanooga contains a population less than twenty thousand. The cause was heard upon the bill, answer and exhibits, and an injunction granted, and defendants have appealed to this court.

The first question presented by the case for our determination is, had the chancery court jurisdiction of the subject and of the municipal conduct of the defendant by bill filed by a tax-payer? It is insisted for the defendants that illegal acts, such as defendants are charged with, effect the whole public, and the public must, by its authorized officers institute the proceeding to prevent or redress the illegal act, and that therefore the Attorney-General was the proper person to file this bill; and we are referred to the reports of several States thus holding. The better and more universal doctrine is that any tax-payer may bring his bill in equity to prevent the corporate authorities from acting ultra vires, where the effect will be to impose on him an unlawful tax, or to increase his burden of taxation. 2 Dillon on Municipal Corporations, sec. 731, says: "In this country the right of property holders or taxable inhabitants to resort to equity to restrain municipal corporations and their officers from transcending their lawful powers, or violating their legal dates in any mode which will injuriously affect the tax-payers, such as making an unauthorized appropriation of the corporate funds, or of an illegal disposition of the corporate property, or levying and collecting void and illegal taxes and assessments upon real property * * * has been affirmed or recognized in numerous cases in many of the States. It can, perhaps, be vindicated upon principle, in view of the nature of the powers exercised by municipal corporations and the necessity of affording easy, direct and adequate preventive relief against their abuse.

It is better that those immediately affected by corporate abuses should be armed with the power to interfere directly in their own names, than to compel them to rely upon the actions of a distant State officer."

The action of the Chancellor, therefore, in overruling the motion to dismiss the bill for want of jurisdiction, was proper. The charter of the city of Chattanooga provides that the corporation "shall have full power to borrow money on its bonds for any object that its authorities may determine to be important to the promotion of its wellfare, and is not made improper by existing law, provided that the sum borrowed under the provisions of this section, shall not exceed the sum of fifty thousand dollars, without being specially authorized to do so, by a majority of the qualified votes of said city."

The unconstitutionality of the act of March 20, 1873, has been argued with great earnestness, because the caption of the act does not state the subject of the act, and because it repeats the section just quoted from the charter of incorporation of the city of Chattanooga. In the view we have taken of this case, it is immaterial whether said act is constitutional or unconstitutional, or whether it repeats any part of the charter or not. Neither by the act of March 20, 1873, nor by the charter, has the corporation any power to issue warrants on the treasurer, or city scrip, for the purpose of raising money for the ordinary expenses of the corporation. Warrants on the treasurer may be given by an authorized officer to pay money, but only as evidences to him that the debts had been audited by the properly authorized officers of the body, and serve as vouchers to him for his disbursements. Mayor and Council of Nashville v. J. G. Fisher et al., Nashville, 1875. If there be not money in the treasury, then the corporation should borrow as provided in the charter or by existing law, or they should levy and collect such tax as to raise whatever sum is needed, and if they can neither borrow, nor raise the money by taxation, to meet their expenditures, then they should cease their expenditures until they can thus realize according to law.

But for no purpose had the corporate authorities the right to issue warrants on the treasury payable in city scrip, or to issue the city scrip. Their action was illegal and contrary to law and public policy. This city scrip is about the size, and upon the same kind of paper, and in every respect very much like national bank notes, and was doubtless designed to circulate as currency.

The court will strictly construe municipal charters, and require clear authority for the powers assumed to be exercised under them. While these defendants aver that they have acted in the utmost good faith, yet so much abuse of power, not to say corruption, has been found in some municipalities, and such onerous burdens placed upon the tax payers, that to use the language of a distinguished author, "it is the part of true wisdom to keep the corporate wings clipped down to the lawful standard."

Let the decree be modified as indicated in this opinion, and the injunction be made perpetual.

SUPREME COURT OF LOUISIANA.

HORTER, PETERSON & FENNER, Appellants,
v.
MERCHANTS MUTUAL INS. CO.

Appeal from Fifth District Court, Parish of Orleans

A company is liable for a risk taken by one of its employees, before business hours, on a vessel past due.

GIBSON & AUSTIN, for plaintiffs.
A. & W. VOORHIES, for defendant.

LUDELING, Ch. J.—The plaintiffs sue defendant for $745, the value of certain goods or merchandise, insured by defendant, which were lost while on board the steamer Victor, from the perils insured against.

The defendant alleges that there was no contract of insurance in regard to the said goods; that the Victor was past due, and news of her loss had reached the city when the plaintiff sent his clerk to effect the insurance, before business hours, and in the absence of the officers having charge of the business department, who procured an employee of defendant to make the indorsement, etc.; that afterward the president notified plaintiffs that the risk could not be taken.

The evidence shows that plaintiffs had a general policy with the defendant; that on Saturday evening plaintiffs received bills of lading for the goods on the Victor, and early Monday morning their clerk went to the insurance office, and presented the said policy at the marine clerk's desk, and that a clerk or employee of the company "wrote up the indorsement in their policy book;" that sometime during that day the president of the company wrote to notify the plaintiff that the company declined the said risk, etc.

It is urged that because the vessel was past due, and the insurance was effected at about 8½ o'clock, a. m., and the indorsement was made by the book-keeper instead of the marine clerk of the company, the contract was no contract.

To this we cannot assent. The plaintiffs had a right to present themselves at the company's office whenever it was open, and to presume that the employees in said office were authorized to transact the business which they undertook to perform; and whether the company would take risks on vessels past due or not was a question within the discretion of the company.

There is no proof that plaintiffs had knowledge that any accident had befallen the steamer when they applied to have the insurance effected.

It is therefore ordered that the judgment of the lower court be reversed, and that there be judgment in favor of the plaintiffs, and against defendant, for $745, with legal interest from judicial demand and costs.

SUPREME COURT OF PENNSYLVANIA.

RESERVE MUTUAL INS. CO. v. KANE.

Error to District Court of Philadelphia.

A son has an insurable interest in his father's life.

Under the poor-laws of Pennsylvania, he may be obliged to support his father.

Per Curiam.—By the 28th section of the poor-law of June 13th, 1778, the father and grandfather, and the mother and grandmother, and the children and grandchildren of every poor person not able to work shall, at their own charge, being of sufficient ability, relieve and maintain such poor person, at such rate as the Court of Quarter Sessions of the proper county shall order and direct. Maintenance of a father or mother unable to work is therefore a legal liability. When we add to this the feelings of natural affection, and the desire produced by these feelings to provide for the comforts of parents, the right to effect an insurance on the life of the parent to carry out these purposes ought not to be denied. It would be technical in the extreme to say that a son has no insurable interest in his father's life. Poverty may overtake the father in his lifetime, and thus both father and mother be cast upon the son; or if the father die before her, the necessity may fall at once upon the son. Why then should he not be permitted to make a provision, by insurance, to reimburse himself for his outlays, past or future? What injury is done to the insurance company? They receive the full premium, and they know, in such case, from the very relationship of the parties, that the contract is not a mere gambling adventure, but is founded in the best feelings of our nature, and on a legal duty, which may arise at any time. We are of opinion that the policy is not void.

Judgment affirmed.

We are indebted to ARNOLD TRIPP, of the law firm of Haines & Tripp, for the following opinion:

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

OPINION FILED JUNE 30, 1876.

MURPHY v. MCGRATH, Adm'r, etc.

ASSAULT AND BATTERY—ABATEMENT OF ACTION—THREATS—EVIDENCE——NEWLY-DISCOVERED EVIDENCE.

Opinion by BREESE, J.

This was trespass, assault and battery, in the Cook Circuit Court, by Dennis Gleason, plaintiff, against Thomas Murphy, defendant, resulting in a verdict for the plaintiff, on which the court rendered judgment, having denied a motion for a new trial. It appears, after verdict found, and whilst a motion was pending to set it aside and to arrest the judgment, the plaintiff died, and the same was suggested to the court, and that letters of administration had been granted to Terrence and Mary McGrath, and the suit therefore progressed in the name of the administrators, their names appearing thereafter as plaintiffs on the record. Appellant's abstract is entitled Thomas Murphy, appellant, against Terrance McGrath and Mary McGrath, administrators of Dennis Gleason, deceased, etc. appellees.

At common law, doubtless the action would have abated on the death of the plaintiff, before final judgment; but by the act of the General Assembly of this State, in force July 1, 1872, it survived to the personal representatives. Laws of 1872, p. 108, § 123.

There is nothing in the way of executing the judgment by the administrators.

Complaint is made that the court refused the following instruction, asked by the defendant:

"If the jury believe from the evidence that on the 4th day of July, 1873, the plaintiff threatened to kill the defendant with a cleaver, and if they should further believe from the evidence that in his testimony with reference to said threat, the said plaintiff knowingly and wilfully swore to what he knew to be false in a matter material to the issue, then the jury may disregard the whole of his testimony, except so far as the same is corroborated by other credible evidence given to the jury by other credible witnesses in the trial of this cause."

As to the first branch of the instruction, it has been held that acts done or words spoken by the plaintiff some time previous to the assault, which were part of a series of provocatives often reiterated, and continued up to the time of the assault, are admissible in evidence in mitigation of damages. But evidence with respect to the conduct of the plaintiff at other times and upon other occasions, the assault and battery having been committed without any provocation given at the time, cannot be given in evidence to mitigate the damages, 1 Waterman on Trespass, 238-239. The assault by the plaintiff against the defendant, as occurring twenty-one days prior to the assault and battery complained of, was not a subject for the consideration of the jury. As to the second clause of the instruction, the substance of it was given in defendant's first instruction, and the court did not err in refusing to repeat it.

It is claimed a new trial should have been granted on the newly discovered evidence brought to the notice of the court. That testimony is cumulative upon the testimony of other witnesses of defendant, heard on the trial, of which he was one. It is by no means of a character to determine the verdict in his favor, or to lessen the damages. The affidavit of appellant setting out this new evidence, does not come up to the requirements of the law in such cases as held in Ritchey v. West, 23 M., 385, where it was said the affidavit must state positively the new evidence is true. The affidavit is faulty in this particular. Seeing no error in the record, the judgment must be affirmed.

THOMAS SHIRLEY, for appellant.
HAINES & TRIPP, for appellee.

SUPREME COURT OF INDIANA.

SEPTEMBER TERM, 1876.

BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—WHAT IT MUST SHOW AS TO THE EVIDENCE—PRACTICE.

5,367. Ward v. The State. Decatur C. C. Affirmed. PETTIT, J.

The bill of exceptions does not show that all of the evidence is in the record by words, nor are there any equivalent words from which the court can draw the conclusion that all the evidence is in. Therefore, the court cannot consider any question as to the evidence. Nor can the judgment be reversed upon the instructions, as they may have been correct under evidence which may have been given in.

EVIDENCE—PRACTICE—DEPOSITIONS.

Baber v. Rickart et al.; Warren C. C. Reversed. BUSKIRK, J.

Suit on promissory note; the answer alleges that the notes were given in consideration of the right to make and vend a certain ditching machine, and that said machine failed to do the work warranted, etc.

The warranty declared that the machine would do certain work in a certain county. The evidence to show the working of the machine outside of the limits described in the warranty, was admissible, as tending to prove the capacity of the machine for work.

Motion was made to suppress certain depositions, on the ground that they were not authenticated. Under our statute, a justice of the peace of another State is empowered, within his jurisdiction, to take and certify depositions. But the justice cannot come into this State and certify depositions taken before him out of it.

MOTION IN ARREST OF JUDGMENT.

Laydon v. The State. Fountain, C. C. Affirmed. Pettit, J.

In a criminal case, a motion to arrest of judgment only raises two questions: 1st. That the grand jury which found the indictment had no legal authority to inquire into the offense charged, by reason of it not being within the jurisdiction of the court. 2d. That the facts stated do not constitute a public offense. In this case the offense was clearly and properly charged, and the court had jurisdiction.

MINORS PLAYING BILLARDS—EVIDENCE.

Bond v. The State, Jackson C. C. Affirmed. Downey, C. J. Under an indictment for permitting a minor to play billiards it is not necessary that anything was wagered on the game.—From the Indianapolis Sentinel.

LOW RATES OF INTEREST.—In the "Report" by Mr. Stephen H. Rhodes, of Massachusetts, on life insurance in that State, he makes the following sensible remarks on the effect of the prevailing rates of interest on the business of insurance.

"Money can now be obtained upon first class securities at a very low rate of interest. This fact has an important bearing upon the business of life insurance. Should the present rates prevail for any considerable length of time, the (so-called) profits of the companies from this source will be very much diminished, if not annihilated. That the decline in the rate of interest did not seriously affect the companies during 1875 is apparent from the statement rendered. Upon gross assets of $405,288,388, the companies doing business in this State received during the year for interest and rents $23,915,562, or five and nine-tenths per cent. The reserve, upon which the companies are required to earn four per cent., was $359,502,956. The rate received, computed upon this sum, was 6.65 per cent. First class loans maturing at the present time, can be replaced at a great reduction in the rate of interest. Large sums are lying idle in the banks at a merely nominel rate, and such loans as insurance companies should invest in will not yield, at present rates, over four or four and one-half per cent., net. Agents should bear this fact in mind when soliciting, and policy holders must expect that their dividends will diminish from this cause. From present appearances, the standard of valuation adopted by this State (four per cent.) is none too high for safety.

MEMBERS OF BAR AS JUDGES.—With pleasure we give place to the following note from Mr. Ullmann:

CHICAGO, Sept. 14th, 1876.

MRS. MYRA BRADWELL:

Dear Madam—In July last you published an abstract of a Supreme Court opinion then just filed at Springfield, relating to the validity of judgments entered by members of the bar acting as judges by stipulation.

Being desirous of knowing what effect this decision would have on the practice which prevails to a considerable extent in this city, of trying cases by agreement before members of the bar, but having the verdict and judgment entered in open court, I procured a copy of the opinion, and at the request of several lawyers, last week sent it to you for publication.

It did not occur to me that your acknowledgment of having received the opinion from me might give the impression that I had been engaged in the case and had made the point decided by the court, until a legal friend expressed considerable surprise that I should have violated such a stipulation.

Lest such an impression might be shared by others, I write to say that I never heard of the case until I saw your abstract of the opinion.

Yours truly, FREDERIC ULLMANN.

THE SUPREME COURT DOCKET.—Mr. Trimble, with his usual enterprise, had the SUPREME COURT DOCKET printed and distributed on yesterday, although the time for filing records did not expire till Thursday morning.

CHICAGO LEGAL NEWS COMPANY,

TERMS:—TWO DOLLARS per annum, in advance Single Copies, TEN CENTS.

TO OUR SUBSCRIBERS.

This issue closes the eighth volume of the LEGAL NEWS. We have given to the readers of the LEGAL NEWS, for the small sum of two dollars and twenty cents per annum, which includes postage, the most important opinions of the Supreme Court of the United States, as well as those of many of the Circuit and District Courts, and head-notes to the opinions of the various State Supreme Courts, months and often years in advance of their appearance in the regular series of reports. In our abstracts of Illinois opinions we have kept our readers fully posted upon the questions decided by the Supreme Court of this State. The LEGAL NEWS is the only legal journal that has, through the year, given a report of every motion made in the Supreme Court of the United States. This feature alone is worth many times the subscription price. We have prepared and sent out with this number a table of all the cases reported at length in Volume VIII., giving the name of the Judge who delivered the opinion and the point of law involved in the case, and a thorough index. We will furnish bound copies of Volume VIII., at the office, for $3.00 per volume, and of volumes IV., V., VI. and VII. at the same rate. The money must in all cases accompany the order.

We hope all our subscribers, who have not already done so, will immediately, upon receiving this number, send us the required two dollars to renew their subscriptions, and twenty cents to pay the postage, which, under the present law, must be paid in advance by the publisher.

We call attention to the following opinions, reported at length in this issue.

COLLISION.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States, by CLIFFORD, J., stating what is required of vessels meeting or passing each other so as to avoid collisions.

DUTIES—PRIORITY OF PAYMENT.—The opinion of the United States District Court of Maryland, by GILES. J., holding that a party who purchased an imported article, duty free, and was compelled to pay the duty in order to get possession thereof, is entitled to priority, although he has proved his claim as unsecured.

SPECIAL CONTRACT—ARCHITECT'S CERTIFICATE—DELAY—DAMAGES.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of Illinois, by BREESE, J., holding under the building contract in this case that the certificate of the architect was conclusive, and that from his decision there could be no appeal unless he could be charged with fraud or mistake—that it being the contract of the parties, the certificate of the architect should be conclusive. The appellees made out their case by producing and proving such certificate; that appellant, knowing of the delay in finishing the building and permitting appellees to go on with the work after the day specified for its completion, making no complaint, waived performance at the day, and continued the contract as in full force after the day specified for its completion.

TRANSCRIPT—DISCHARGE IN BANKRUPTCY.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of this State, by BREESE, J., as to the proper manner of certifying a record, and holding that it was not error not to admit in evidence a discharge in bankruptcy, when such discharge was not pleaded, and that a judgment for fraud is not released by a discharge in bankruptcy.

INJUNCTION—CITY SCRIP—CORPORATE POWERS—ANTICIPATING TAX LEVY.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of Tennessee by LEA, Special J., holding that a court of chancery has jurisdiction to prohibit the issue of illegal evidences of debt, upon a bill filed by a tax-payer; that officers of a municipal corporation cannot issue scrip in anticipation of the taxes of another year; that corporate powers are to be strictly construed.

PROOF OF DEBT BY NOTARY.—The opinion of the United States District Court for the western district of Michigan, by WITHEY, J., holding a proof of debt in bankruptcy, taken before a notary public to be good, and that the requisites of a notarial seal are determined by the law of the locality from which the officer derives his authority. The Federal courts as a general rule have been too strict in limiting the authority of notaries public in taking these proofs, and requiring unusual evidence of their official character. We are glad to see that Judge Withey disregards some of the former opinions on this subject.

INSURABLE INTEREST.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, holding that a son has an insurable interest in his father's life. This opinion is not in accord with the opinion of the Supreme Court of this State, in 8 CHICAGO LEGAL NEWS, 382.

ASSAULT AND BATTERY.—The opinion of the Supreme Court of this State, by BREESE, J., in an action brought to recover damages for an assault and battery.

THE SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS—The September Term of this Court commenced at Ottawa on Tuesday last. All the judges were in attendance, ready to enter upon another year of legal labor. Theirs is at best a hopeless task. They may deprive themselves of society—devote the whole twelve months in the year to the examination of records, the reading of abstracts and briefs, and the writing of opinions—and it will be utterly impossible, under our present system, for them to properly dispose of more than one-half the business which comes before the court. The question arises, what is best to be done to relieve the court from this press of business? Some say, increase the number of judges; others, create appellate courts; and quite a number say, make litigation expensive. We must confess that we are not among those who wish to make litigation expensive. We believe that justice should be administered with as little expense to the citizen as possible consistent with the interest of the State. To make litigation expensive, is to place the poor man's rights at the mercy of the rich. To increase the number of judges would have a tendency to give us one man's opinions, and deprive us of the united judgment of the judges in important cases. To create appellate courts, and make them a kind of half-way legal station between the circuit courts and the Supreme Court, would promote litigation, and, instead of being an aid to the Supreme Court, would greatly increase its business. If appellate courts were created, and the cases which could be taken from such courts by appeal or writ of error to the Supreme Court were limited as much as the present Constitution will allow, we have no doubt the Supreme Court would be relieved of its press of business, and able properly to dispose of all the business that would come before it in a reasonable time. At the commencement of this term there were seventy cases on the docket for a re-hearing. Judging by the way the court has already disposed of many of these cases it does not intend to waste much time in disposing of the re-hearing docket.

The Judges of the Supreme Court are all men of experience and distinguished ability, and, without a single exception, possess the confidence of the people of the State. It is not just that they should be so over worked, when a little wise legislation would relieve them. Shall we have it the coming winter?

GOVERNOR BRAYMAN. — Gen. Mason Brayman, recently appointed Governor of the Territory of Idaho, passed through our city this week, on his way to take charge of the gubernatorial affairs of that territory. Governor Brayman is a gentleman of culture, and extensive and varied experience. He was the author of the Revised Statutes of 1845, of this State, which have not only been the model, but the acknowledged superior of all subsequent Revisions. He was at an early day attorney of the Illinois Central Railroad Company, and took an active part in securing the location and completion of that road. He served with distinction as a general in the army, during the rebellion, and was in some of the severest battles of the war. We have no doubt the Governor will take a pride in seeing that the laws of the territory are properly revised. He goes with the intention of making his permanent abode in the territory. The people of the territory are to be congratulated upon his appointment.

GROWING CROPS AND PERSONAL CHATTELS.

A question of more than ordinary importance under the Bills of Sale Act was recently raised in the Common Pleas Division in the case of Brantom v. Griffiths, 34 L. T. Rep. N. S., 871. Its importance was due to the terms of the 7th section of that Act, according to which the expression "bill of sale" includes bills of sale, assignments, transfers, declarations of trust without transfer, and other assurances of persons as well as power of attorney, authority or licenses to take possession of personal chattels as security for any debt. It also provides that the expression "personal chattels" shall mean goods, furniture, fixtures and other articles capable of complete transfer by delivery, and shall not include * * any stock or produce upon any farm or lands which by virtue of any covenant or agreement, or of the custom of the country, ought not to be removed from any farm where the same shall be at the time of the making or giving of such bill of sale." The only facts of the case which it will be necessary to notice here are few in number. The plaintiff made a claim to certain growing crops, under two instruments by which these crops had been assigned to him. The documents were not registered under the Bills of Sale Act, 1854. The defendant accordingly contended that his claim as execution creditor was good.

In the long series of decisions upon the 4th section of the Statute of Frauds, there will be found a variety of cases in which the question raised was the converse one, namely, whether a sale of growing crops conferred an interest in land within the meaning of the statute. The opinion of Lord Tenterden appears to have been that if the thing would at the time of delivery be a personal chattel, then no interest in the land was conferred. Thus in Watts v. Friend, 10 B. & C., 446, an agreement to sell the crop produced from certain seed at a price named, was held to be a contract for the sale of goods within the 17th section, and not a contract conferring an interest in land within the 4th section of the Statute of Frauds. Mr. Justice Littledale has also expressed an opinion to the effect that a sale of any produce of the earth reared by labor and expense, whether it was in a state of maturity or not, provided it was in actual existence at the time of the contract, was not a sale of an interest in or concerning land: Evans v. Roberts, 5 B. & C., 829. In another case, however, when a plaintiff had bought timber whilst standing, and was to cut it down, the contract of sale was held to be within the 4th section, although it did not appear when it was to be cut, or what state it was in as to growth at the time of the contract, Scorell v. Boxall, 1 Y. & J., 396, and in the same case Baron Hullock distinguished between crops and other articles which are raised by the industry of man; and things, such as trees, which give no annual profit. Although there has been some uncertainty in the law relating to the subject, the principles laid down by Mr. Benjamin in his treatise on the sale of personal property, (pp. 88-90) based as they are, on the remarks of Mr. Justice Blackburn (Blackb. on Sales, 9, 10), are substantially correct of these principles; the first is that an agreement to transfer the property in anything attached to the soil at the time of the agreement, but which is to be severed from the soil and converted into goods, before the property is transferred by the purchaser, is an agreement for the sale of goods, an executory agreement within the 17th section. The second principle enunciated is, that when there is a perfect bargain and sale vesting the property at once in the buyer before severance, a distinction is made between the natural growth of the soil and fructus industriale. The former is an interest in land, the latter are chattels. These distinctions have been dwelt upon by Chitty likewise in his work on contracts. He gives at p. 280 the general rule in somewhat similar terms.

We shall now be better able to appreciate the difficulty in Brantom v. Griffiths. So far as relates to the provisions of the Statute of Frauds, we have seen that the sale of anything attached to the soil may or may not be a sale of an interest in land according to the time when it is intended that the property should vest in the vendor, and to the nature of the thing sold. We are thus enabled to get to one conclusion, namely, that growing crops are not goods and chattels in point of law for all purposes and under all circumstances. When dwelling upon this point, Mr. Justice Brett quoted with approbation a passage from Williams on Executors (7th edit. p. 709), in which the law is thus stated: "There are certain vegetable products of the earth which, although they are annexed to and growing upon the land at the time of the occupier's death, yet as between the executor or administrator of the person seized of the inheritance, and the heir in some cases, and between the executor or administrator of the person seized of the inheritance, and the heir in some cases, and between the executor or administrator of the tenant for life, and the remainderman or reversioner, in others, are considered by the law as chattels, and will pass as such. These are usually called emblements. The vegetable chattels so named are the corn and other growth of the earth, which are produced annually, not spontaneously, not by labor and industry, and thus are called fructus industriales." In the present case the growing crops had belonged to the occupiers of a farm. The plaintiff, after the assignment, allowed the growing crops to remain on the land. Now, if we proceed upon the analogy of the cases upon the Statute of Frauds, the crops in question were chattels within the 17th section. Besides, at common law a growing crop, produced by the labor and expense of the occupier of lands, was as the representation of that labor and expense, considered an independent chattel: per Justice Bazley in Evans v. Roberts (sup.) quoted in Benjamin on Sales, p. 90. Hence arises the question, should this analogy be applied to cases under the Bills of Sale Act.

In the judgment of Mr. Justice Brett was cited a number of instances where it is stated that growing crops are considered as mere chattels, but his Lordship nevertheless came to the conclusion that "although they are chattels for some purposes they are not so for all, and therefore they cannot be said to be within the Bills of Sale Act, because they are chattels for all purposes, nor without the Act because they are chattels for no purposes." He then proceeds to consider whether they are goods. The argument against the contention that they are goods was, that the Act only includes goods which are capable of complete transfer by delivery, and that the statute only applies to things which at the time when the statute is to be applied to them might be delivered and are not, which is not the case with growing crops; these, therefore, are not within the Bills of Sale Act. This view was adopted by Mr. Justice Brett. A decision of the court of Common Pleas in Ireland (Sheridan v. M'Cartney, 5 L. T. Rep. N. S., 27) in which the contrary was held, was adduced as an authority, but overruled on the ground that Chief Justice Monahan overlooked the real meaning of the provision as to stock or produce which ought not to be removed; "For it seems to me," said Mr. Justice Brett, "to apply to farm stock or produce, which is severed from the land, and which could be delivered, but by agreement or custom is prevented from being delivered, such as straw, and other things of a similar nature." Speaking of the quotation at Westminster of authorities from the Irish and Scotch courts generally, his Lordship remarked that "Irish and Scotch decisions, although they ought to be treated with deference, are not binding upon us in the same way as decisions of the courts in this country." The authority of the Irish case quoted had already been questioned by the Court of Exchequer in Gough v. Everard, 8 L. T. Rep. N. S., 363, where Chief Baron Pollock said in effect that the decision could be supported only by a liberal interpretation of the statute, and that such an interpretation would be quite inappropriate when the parties were acting honestly. We do not think that the reasoning of the judgments in Brantom v. Griffiths altogether satisfactory, although we think the equity of the case has been met. The weak point in the reasoning of the judgment of Mr. Justice Brett appears to be that there is no sequence between his conclusion that growing crops are not chattels for all purposes, and his instances of cases where growing crops are treated as chattels. Perhaps, too, it is unfortunate that nothing, so far at least as can be gathered from the report of the case, was said of the numerous cases upon the construction of the Statute of Frauds. As we have already said, we think the result of the case does no wrong; but we should have been better pleased had the reasoning been more strictly logical.—The London Law Times.

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

ABSTRACT OF OPINIONS FILED AT OTTAWA, JUNE 30, 1876.

308.—Peter Abt v. Minnie Burgheim.—Appeal from Superior Court of Cook.—Opinion by SCHOLFIELD, J., affirming.

SELF DEFENSE DEFINED AND LIMITED.

Held, That where one forcibly enters the premises of another, and uses indecent and abusive language, or while therein, commits an assault and battery upon him, he is only justified in using such force as is reasonably necessary, under the circumstances, to defend himself and expel the intruder; and if, in so doing, he employs more force than was reasonably necessary, under the circumstances, he will be liable in damages.

324.—R. W. Hyman v. William Bayne.—Appeal from Superior Court of Cook.—Opinion by WALKER, J., reversing and remanding.

LIMITATION OF 1849—SAVINGS UNDER THAT AND LATER STATUTES—CONSTRUCTION—PLEADING.

Held, 1. That the savings of the limitation act of 1849, apply as well to a non-resident debtor, who has never been in the State until the cause of action accrued, as to a resident who leaves the State.

2. Our late statutes of limitation, which provide that "where a cause of action has arisen in a State or Territory, out of this State, or in a foreign country, and by the laws thereof, an action cannot be maintained by reason of the lapse of time, an action thereon shall not be maintained in this State," relates as well to actions already barred by foreign law at the time of the passage of the act, as to those which should afterward become so barred.

3. In regard to pleading it is a settled rule that one pleading a statute having an exception in the enacting clause must, by averment, exclude himself from the exception. But where the exception is contained in a proviso, or other part of the statute, the exception must be set up and relied upon by the other party, and he must show that his adversary's claim falls within the exception.

315.—Julius White, et al v. Board of Trustees.—Appeal from Superior Court of Cook.—Opinion by SCHOLFIELD, J., affirming.

CONSTRUCTION OF OFFICIAL BOND.

STATEMENT.—Appellants were sued as sureties on the bond of a township treasurer. The breaches claimed were the failure of the treasurer to pay over to his successor (Gage) certain money in his hands.

The first point made on appeal was that in 1870, Greene was appointed for two years, and gave bond; which bond was destroyed in the great fire of 1871. He was required to replace the bond, which he did with the one in suit; and it was claimed that as this bond was executed for that purpose only, these sureties were only bound for the acts of Greene until the expiration of the two years for which he was appointed in 1870.

1. But the court held that the appointment of 1870 must have been for the unexpired term of some one, for a year; since the regular term would, under the statute, commence in 1869, and 1871; and so, when Greene was appointed again on the 2nd of October, 1871, this must have been for the full term of two years, or until 1873; and the new bond given after the fire was then for the term closing in 1873; and, therefore, the position was not tenable—and more especially as the bond in question does not profess to be executed merely as a substitute, or to have any retroactive effect.

2. Also held, that no matter what were Greene's own representations as to the purpose of the bond, if appellants were content to take his word, rather than go to the trustees to inquire, they cannot be allowed to complain that they trusted unwisely therein.

3. Nor did the consolidated school law of 1872 terminate the official term of Greene as treasurer—the act continuing elections, etc., as they were under the prior law.

4. And where the superintendent received the bond and filed it, and paid money afterwards to Greene, as treasurer, this was equivalent to an express approval, and so fulfilled the requirements of the statute in this respect.

OBJECTION TO ASSESSMENT ROLL HAPPILY DISPOSED OF.

STATEMENT.—Tax case. The objection was that the assessment rolls were not returned in the time prescribed by law. The court held,

That, inasmuch as the statute expressly declares that such a delayed return shall not vitiate, and as there is no express provision of the constitution relating to the manner of such returns, it is quite novel to apply to the case the constitutional provision that no person can be deprived of his life, liberty, or property, except by due process of law.

COURT CORRECTING MISTAKES OF ITS MINISTERIAL OFFICER—WHEN ON MOTION AND WHEN NOT.

STATEMENT.—Suit in equity brought to correct the mistake of a master in a certificate of sale and deed. It was claimed that the court had no jurisdiction to correct the mistake of a ministerial officer, if one was made; that appellee had a remedy in a court of law, to correct the mistake by motion. But the court held, that the mistake existed not only in the certificate, but also in the deed; and even if the former might be corrected, on motion, the latter could not be corrected in any way but by application to a court of equity. And a court of equity has competent jurisdiction in such cases.

374.—Alfonso Yates et al. v. Village of Batavia.—Appeal from Kane.—Opinion by SCOTT, Ch. J., affirming.

EQUITY JURISDICTION.

STATEMENT.—Prosecution under liquor ordinance—bill to enjoin further proceeding, and to settle the validity of the ordinance. Held,

That a court of chancery has no jurisdiction of the subject of such litigation; nor is it in the power of parties to waive the question of jurisdiction of the court, and compel it to try the cause. Whatever defense may have existed to the actions was complete in the court of law where they were pending.

471.—Morris David v. Timothy M. Bradley.—Appeal from Cook.—Opinion by SHELDON, J., reversing and remanding.

WHO MUST SIGN BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—MEASURE OF DAMAGES IN REPLEVIN.

Held, 1. That a bill of exceptions must be signed by the judge who tries the cause or before whom the proceedings take place.

2. Where property is replevied, and the plaintiff fails to prosecute his replevin suit, the measure of damages is not the value of the property, but only the value of the interest of the special owner in the property, as for example, where the property was taken by a distress warrant, for rent due, the measure of damages is the amount of rent due.

470.—J. W. Spellman v. Stephen Dowse.—Appeal from Will.—Opinion by WALKER, J., reversing and remanding.

QUESTION OF JURISDICTION—VENUE OF PROCEEDINGS TO SELL LANDS OF NON-RESIDENT MINORS.

Held, That, where the question of jurisdiction in a court rendering a decree ordering the sale of a lot, arises, an appeal from an order confirming the sale, will be regarded as a direct proceeding on the original order of sale; although the report of the sale and order of confirmation were seven or eight years after the sale. For, nevertheless, it is a continuation of the original case. And the want of jurisdiction of the subject-matter may be shown at any stage of the proceedings; and until every order or step required by the statute has been taken and completed.

2. The wards living in Ohio, in this case the statute was imperative that the proceedings should be had in Cook county, Illinois, where the land lay to be affected by the order. And there could be no jurisdiction in a Will county court

VARIOUS TAX OBJECTIONS DISPOSED OF.

STATEMENT.—Tax case. The first objection made was that appellant had made a tender of all taxes and costs, except printer's fees, of ten cents on each tract; which tender the collector refused to receive, as the types were set, and the paper struck off, though not distributed among the patrons. Held,

The collector properly refused the tender, not including the statutory printer's fees; except that he might have accepted and receipted for the money offerred, specifying, in the receipt, the non-payment of, the printer's fee; and then asked the court for a judgment for the printer's fee. [Probably the taxpayer would not allow this, but demanded a full receipt.]

It was objected that the assessment was void, because the county clerk refused, on proper request, made in due time, to include, in the books returned to the assessor, a portion of the lots in blocks, and not in lots, under the provision of the revenue act: "When all lots in one block belong to one owner, they shall, at the request of the owner, or his agent, be listed as one block." Held,

1. That appellant failed to show that he was the owner.

2. Another section of the act provides that "No assessment of property, or charge for any of said taxes, shall be considered illegal on account of any irregularity in the tax lists, or assessment rolls, or on account of the assessment rolls or tax lists not having been made, certified to, or returned within the time required by law, or on account of the property having been charged, or listed, in the assessment roll, or tax list, without name, or in any other name than that of the rightful owner, and no error or informality in the proceedings of any of the officers connected with the assessment, levying, or collecting of the taxes, not affecting the substantial justice of the tax itself, shall vitiate, or in any manner, affect the tax, or the assessment thereof."

3. By this statute nearly all previous rules laid down as determining causes in decisions of the Supreme Court have been abrogated.

It was objected that the court below refused to allow an objection that the certificate returned by the town clerk showed the assessment of taxes to have been in excess of the amount authorized by law. Held,

1. That this nowhere appears; and appellant has not shown in what manner, or to what extent, the excess was produced or existed.

2. The presumption is that any difference in amounts, was produced by extending the tax over one, or a few tracts, rather than that the clerk would intentionally incur the penalties of the law by deliberately raising the amount levied on all the property assessed.

3. It was the business of appellant to show that the tax was void in its levy, or that the law had been violated in such a manner as to affect the substantial justice of the tax levied on his property.

It was objected that the law was violated by the county clerk in failing to extend the road tax in a separate column on the collectors' books. Held,

That this, though an irregularity, does not affect the substantial justice of the tax.

It was objected that the town clerk of South Chicago failed to certify the levy of the tax to the county clerk within the time required. Held,

That Mix v. People (June T., 1874) was annulled by the subsequent adoption of the 191st section of the revenue act curing such defects as suggested by the objection. (Buck v. People, of the Sept. T. 1875.)

[In conclusion, the court passes a severe censure on clerks for sending up such shapeless and confused records in tax cases; and declares they are generally much larger than fairness to litigants warrants.]

350.—Catharine Paris v. Thomas Lewis. —Appeal from Superior Court of Cook. —Opinion by SCHOLFIELD, J., affirming.

COLOR OF TITLE AND PAYMENT OF TAXES THEREUNDER — INITIALS IN DESCRIBING LANDS—GOOD FAITH.

STATEMENT.—Petition to establish title under burnt record act. Answer, and petition in the nature of a cross-bill, setting up title in defendant (appellant). A question arose, under the limitation law of 1839, as to color of title, and payment of taxes under it. Appellant had the better title because of appellee's inability to connect himself with the patent title from the United States. It was by stipulation admitted that neither appellant nor any of those under whom she claims, ever had been in possession, and that the property was entirely vacant until 1862. April 7, 1863, appellee's immediate grantor took possession by a tenant, and possession has continued until now. Held,

1. That the payment of taxes, under the act, may be made by an agent appointed by parol. A request by letter, or orally, would be sufficient authority. And this authority, moreover, may vest without any express request; and be inferred from circumstances, as, for instance, from the fact that one without interest in the land pays the taxes, and is afterwards compensated for it by the owner. In this, the presumption is that the taxes were paid for the owner, and that the person paying was his agent in making the payment. It is not requisite, in this respect, more than in other respects, in civil actions, that the proof shall be positive, or that the circumstances shall be strong and convincing in their character. It is enough that the evidence sufficiently preponderates to reasonably establish belief.

2. Receipts for taxes are sufficiently definite in describing lands by customary initials, etc., and the court will take judicial notice of the meaning of such initials.

3. Where it is objected that a grantor did not act in good faith in acquiring title under the act, it must be shown that the grantee had notice of the grantor's bad faith. And especially, where the grantor was an intermediate grantor only, the grantee has a right to rely upon previous title in good faith, and seven years' payment of taxes. The bad faith of the intermediate grantor cannot relate back to, and affect, previous titles acquired in good faith, with which the grantee is connected.

RESCISION—LACHES—ESTOPPEL.

Held, 1. That an unreasonable delay in commencing proceedings to rescind a contract on the ground of fraud, will prevent relief in a court of equity. This delay, however, depends on circumstances of excuse. [In this case, the delay was six years, and held inexcusable.]

2. Where one discovers fraud in passing notes upon him, and then sues upon the notes afterwards, this act of suing is a confirmation of the contract on which the notes were based; and he is thereby estopped from setting up the fraud to procure a rescision.

384.—Village of Kewanee v. James P. DePew.—Appeal from Henry.—Opinion by SCHOLFIELD, J., reversing, SCOTT, Ch. J., dissenting.

COMPARATIVE NEGLIGENCE AS TO DEFECTIVE SIDEWALKS EXPLAINED.

STATEMENT.—Suit for injuries by means of a defective sidewalk. Held,

That a plaintiff cannot recover for injuries received through the defendant's negligence, when his own negligence has contributed to such injuries, unless his negligence was slight and the defendant's gross, when compared together.

2. And so where one was aware of a defect in a sidewalk, and yet, in passing, paid no heed to its vicinity, but was engaged in looking at a passing carriage in the street, and is thus injured, he has no claim to damages for an injury thus received.

3. If one does not know of a defect, he may be justified in assuming that the sidewalk is safe, and acting on that hypothesis. Or, knowing of a defect, yet, if some present necessity distracts his attention, he may be excusable in not recollecting. But one in the full exercise of his faculties, passing over a sidewalk in daylight, without any crowd to jostle or disturb, and no intervening obstacles to obscure approaching danger, and no suddenly occurring cause to distract his attention, is under obligation to use his eyes to direct his steps, and if he fails to do so, it is at his own risk.

4. And especially, where the character or extent of the defect is not such as to arouse, necessarily, any serious apprehension of imminent peril to the public, although there may be passive negligence in the city officers, yet it is not then to be regarded as gross.

DOMICIL—CHANGE THEREIN—REQUISITES—TEMPORARY ABSENCE.

STATEMENT.—Contested election to the office of collector, the contest being based on the ground of the ineligibility of the claimant, in that, at the time of the election, he was not a resident of the State, and was not a legal voter and elector. Decree that appellant was not eligible, on a trial by jury.

He was an unmarried man, and had resided with his brother, in this State, from 1838 to 1873. He had but little personal property, and no land; and no home but his brother's. In 1872 he was registered as a voter, and was one of the judges of election in the township, in 1873, and was, in 1871 or 1872, elected township collector.

In June, 1873, he packed up what little effects he had, and set out in quest of a new home, visiting Iowa, Nebraska and Kansas. In the latter State, he took a contract for building a bridge, in part. He went to Fort Scott, however, and was very sick there. On his recovery, he left his team at Fort Scott, and came back to his brother's, by rail—having been absent about seven months. He did not, during that time, remain long enough in any one State to gain more than a temporary residence. When he started, he had no definite point in view, thinking, at one time, he would go to California; at another, Texas, or south somewhere, etc, to seek a different climate, and perhaps settle and locate a soldier's claim. Not finding what he sought, he returned, and, in April after his return, he was elected.

The theory of the contestant was, that, leaving his home in Illinois, without making any provision for a return to it at a future time, was ipso facto such an abandonment as to deprive him of the right of claiming it as his home, even should he return to it afterwards. Held,

That he acquired no new residence; for, even if he had the animus, the factum was still wanting. His intention to resume his old home on failing to find a new one, was manifested by his return; and he had not, therefore, forfeited his residence here, by a temporary absence not resulting in a settlement elsewhere. He did not leave the State with a fixed intention, but only a conditional intention, to become a resident elsewhere.

398.—John H. Henick v. Jude P. Gary. —Appeal from DeKalb.—Opinion by SCOTT, Ch. J., affirming. (Breese, Schofield and Dickey, JJ., dissenting.)

DISEASED SHEEP—DAMAGES — LIABILITIES.

STATEMENT.—Suit for damages, by reason of sheep becoming diseased through contact with the sheep of defendant, afflicted with scab, on account of the neglect of defendant to take care of them. Verdict, not guilty. Held,

1. That a multiplicity of instructions is a fruitful source of error, and ought to be abandoned.

2. Plaintiff, in such a case, was bound to use and exercise ordinary care and diligence, in taking care of and properly treating his diseased sheep, and endeavor to heal and cure them, in order to recover. If unacquainted with the disease, and he treated it as a person of ordinary prudence and skill might do, it was sufficient, as he is not held to the exercise of any peculiar skill.

3. If plaintiff's sheep caught the disease elsewhere than from defendant's sheep, or his father's sheep that had been previously afflicted by contact with defendant's, no responsibility attached to defendant.

MARRIED WOMAN'S RESPONSIBILITY AS TO MECHANIC'S LIEN—HUSBAND AS AGENT, ETC.—PARTIES—DECREE.

STATEMENT.—Suit to enforce mechanic's lien; demurrer to first petition sustained; to amended petition, overruled; joint decree rendered; and this was assigned also as error.

The question was raised whether there was a cause of action against the owner of the premises, Fannie Greenleaf, for furnishing materials and performing labor under a parol contract made with her husband after the written contract —that is, extra materials and extra labor. Held,

1. Mrs. Greenleaf, though a married woman, had a right to bind herself for labor and materials furnished in the erection of buildings on her separate property.

2. And if she could, in person, contract, she had power to authorize her husband to contract in her behalf, and such authority will be conclusively inferred from his acting with her knowledge in the matter.

3. And there is nothing, in such case to shield her separate property from liability for payment.

4. The husband is a necessary party, in proceedings in mechanis's lien, because of his interest in the separate property. But the decree cannot be rendered against him personally for the debt.

440.—David Coey v. George Lehman.— Appeal from Superior Court of Cook. —Opinion by CRAIG, J., reversing.

MECHANIC'S LIEN—PAYMENT CONTINGENT ON ACCEPTANCE.

STATEMENT. — Petition in mechanic's lien for extra materials and labor under a contract with a guardian. Judgment for $1,132.22. The error assigned, of which the appellate court took notice, was: "The court erred in rendering judgment in favor of the plaintiffs below, because they had not complied with the terms of their contract, in ascertaining the amount, if anything, due them, before the commencement of the suit." The work was to be estimated and accepted, etc., and payment was to be made on an architect's certificate. Held,

That, as the parties had seen proper to incorporate these provisions in the contract, and to provide that particular mode of payment, they must be content therewith; for courts are powerless to disregard the terms of a contract, plainly expressed; but contrariwise must enforce them according to the apparent intention of the parties. And so, failing to secure the arhitect's certificate, the plaintiffs could not enforce payment, for the contract made his decision final.

446.—Nancy Suver v. William O'Riley.— Appeal from Warren.— Opinion by BREESE, J., affirming.

SUIT FOR PROCEEDS IN POSSESSION OF A THIRD PARTY—GENERAL RULE.

Held, That where one is entitled to the proceeds of a sale from another, it is no defense that those proceeds have not come to hand, but are in the hands of another for the seller. The buyer can sue, nevertheless, since, technically, they are in the hands of the seller, when held by a third party to be handed over to the seller. And the buyer cannot bring suit against the holder, because there is no privity between them, and no contest; but must bring the action against the seller of the proceeds, the same as if they had been actually delivered by the holder to the seller.

449.—A. M. Niles v. Jacob Harmon.—Error to Iroquois.—Opinion by SHELDON, J., affirming.

HOW MORTGAGE FORECLOSED AS TO SUCCESSIVE GRANTEES—GENERAL RULE—QUIT-CLAIM DEED AS TO FAILURE OF TITLE.

Held, 1. That in the case of successive grantees of different portions of an entire tract of land, upon which is a mortgage before given by the grantor, upon foreclosure of the prior mortgage, such granted portions are to be sold in the inverse order in which they were granted, so that the lands of the last grantee shall be subject to be first sold.

2. Where the owner of mortgaged land conveys a portion of it, with warranty, it is his duty to protect the grantee against the mortgage, and in foreclosing the mortgage, it is just and right that it should be satisfied, if it may be, out of the portion of the land remaining in the mortgagor, and that it should be first charged with the debt. This protects the interest of the purchaser of the portion sold, and but makes the mortgagor pay his own debt out of his own land.

3. And should the mortgagor convey the portion remaining to him to a second purchaser, this purchaser takes the land as it was in the hands of the mortgagor, subject to the equity of being first charged with the payment of the mortgage debt; and so, it is equitable, that the land of the second purchaser should first be sold for the satisfaction of the debt before resort is had to the land of the first purchaser.

4. But where the first purchaser has not paid the purchase money, and has given back a mortgage to secure its payment, this land may equitably be first sold—unless the notes he had given for the purchase money had been transferred, before maturity, to a bona fide purchaser. This places him in the same condition, in this respect, as to personal liability, as if he had paid for his land at the time of the purchase; and there exists the same necessity that, in order to protect him from injury, the lands should be sold in the inverse order of their alienation.

5. Under a quit-claim deed, no fraud appearing, there is no responsibility for a failure of title.

EQUITY JURISDICTION AND COMMON LAW IN CONTRACTS.

Held, That where a claim arises out of a contract, equity has no jurisdiction to measure the damages. Exclusive jurisdiction in that class of cases, belongs to the common law courts.

450.—Oglesby Coal Co. v. Henry Pasco. —Appeal from LaSalle.—Opinion by SCHOLFIELD, J., affirming.

INHERITANCE — HALF-BLOOD — ESTOPPEL— MARRIED WOMAN—EQUITY JURISDICTION —NUISANCE—STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS.

STATEMENT.—Bill in equity by appellant, against appellees, praying that a deed from Abagail Pepson, and her husband, for 12½ acres of land, to appellee, Elizabeth Pasco, be set aside; that appellees be restrained from interfering with appellant's possession; and from keeping a saloon on the premises; and that they be required to remove a building therefrom, used as a saloon.

Appellant claims under John Corrigan, by virtue of a contract between him and Barbara Shelton, of which it is assignee; an equitable title, conditioned upon a certain payment; and by deeds from certain other persons, as heirs at law, of Mary Fell, the legal title to the undivided six-eights of the whole property.

Patrick Fell was seized in fee of the property, and died intestate, leaving Thomas Fell, his only heir at law, who subsequently died intestate, while seized in fee of the property, leaving no child or children, nor descendant of any child, surviving; but leaving his mother, and certain half-brothers and sisters, on her side.

The question was, whether she took as sole heir to their exclusion. Held,

That our statute does not follow the common law rule, in this respect; but forbids distinction between kindred of the whole and of the half-blood. Nor does it require that the half-blood shall be of the blood of the ancestor from whom the estate descended.

It was alleged that during the last illness of Mary Fell (the mother of Thomas Fell and of the half-brothers and sisters, among whom were John Corrigan and Abigail Pepson), a family consultation was held, between her and them, as to the disposition of the lands of which Thomas Fell died seized, including particularly, the 12½ acres, and also a certain lot in LaSalle, the title to which, it was then believed by them, was vested in her as sole heir of Thomas Fell. On such consultation it was mutually arranged, that she should convey the 12½ acres to John Corrigan for his portion of the supposed estate, on the condition that he would care for an infirm brother during his life, which condition was afterwards fulfilled. Abigail Pepson, for her share, was to have the LaSalle lot, and a deed was accordingly executed to her by Mary Fell for it, and she took possession; in which all acquiesced. Corrigan also took possession of the 12½ acres under Mary Fell's deed, until he sold and agreed to convey it to Barbara Shelton, who took possession under the contract, claiming to own the whole, until her subsequent assignment of the contract to appellant.

The question, under these facts, was, whether Abigail Pepson was estopped from claiming any interest, as heir at law of Thomas Fell, in the 12½ acres. Held,
