1962 PUBLIC USE OF NATIONAL WILDLIFE REFUGES

The number of visitors on the National Wildlife Refuges in 1962 was almost identical with 1961. Approximately 11 million persons used these areas both years. This is the first year that failed to show an increase in visits. Since 1951, when public use figures were first compiled, the annual rate of increase has averaged between 8 and 11 percent. The unusually cool summer in 1962 throughout the mid-West resulted in a marked decline in boating use. The very restrictive waterfowl season accounted for a decline of more than 42 percent in waterfowl hunting on the Upper Mississippi Wild Life and Fish Refuge.

Primary consideration for public use on National Wildlife Refuges is given to sightseeing, nature observations and photography, interpretive programs, fishing, and hunting where such uses will have no appreciable effect on fish and wildlife. Secondary consideration is given to picnicking, swimming, and boating. There are very few opportunities for camping.

Wildlife observation, picnicking, swimming, and sightseeing were again the most popular uses, accounting for $7\frac{1}{4}$ million visitors or about 67 percent of the total. This represents a decline of about $\frac{1}{4}$ million visitors. Fishing accounted for about $29\frac{1}{2}$ percent or $3\frac{1}{4}$ million persons, a slight decrease from 1961. Hunting was enjoyed by 366,186 persons or about $3\frac{1}{2}$ percent of the total use. Actually, this year there were 64,000 more hunters than last year which was attributable to increased hunting of big game and upland game on these areas.

In previous years public use on the Upper Mississippi River Wild Life and Fish Refuge, which extends for 284 miles along the river from Wabasha, Minnesota, nearly to Rock Island, Illinois, has accounted for one quarter of all public use on refuges. In 1962 the intensity of use dropped from nearly 3 million visitors to 1,837,550. This is a decline of more than a million persons using the river for water-activated recreation. Public use on the 44,000-acre Crab Orchard National Wildlife Refuge in southern Illinois also decreased slightly, from 1,484,000 to 1,353,000. On the 59,000-acre Wichita Mountains National Wildlife Refuge in southwestern Oklahoma public use increased from 919,772 persons in 1961 to 1,102,155.

Refuges which are superimposed on Bureau of Reclamation, Corps of Engineers, and TVA reservoirs and flood control projects were again heavily used. These 24 cooperative refuges had over 2 million visitors in 1962. The intensity of use on these 24 refuges, together with 31 refuges on which the annual visitors exceed 30,000 persons is shown on page 6.

The following tabulation of public use, arranged by regions, is based upon information submitted by all refuge managers.
